Mr. ROBINSON moved for a return of instructions given to the Commission to investigate into the affairs of the Northern Railway. He said the motion to which he proposed to call the attention of the House was a counterpart of a notice placed upon the paper by the hon. member for North Oxford a week or ten days ago. Unfortunately, or perhaps accidentally, his hon. friend was not in the House when the notice was called. As the motion referred to a matter in which the Northern Railway was concerned, and as he was also personally interested in it, his name having been mentioned by the Commissioners in their reports, he naturally wished to speak to the notice placed on the paper by the hon. member for North Oxford. He was, however, ruled to have been out of order, on the ground that he had not asked leave of the hon. member to move the motion in his absence. Hence it was that, being so much interested in the question, he had placed a motion on the notice paper. He hoped he would not be charged with discourtesy towards the hon. member for North Oxford. As the House was aware, a return had been sent down from the Commissioners appointed to investigate into the affairs of the Northern Railway, in which return his name was mentioned in the following terms:—

“We find that various sums, amounting together to $5,440.68, were paid out of the railway funds for the election expenses of the Honourable J. B. Robinson, as a candidate for the District of Algoma (the said Robinson being at that time President of the Northern Railway Company), and that, under Mr. Cumberland’s direction, the said amount was thus charged in the books of the said Company, viz.: one-third to “Contingencies,” one-third to “Parliamentary Expenses,” and one-third to “Legal Expenses,” in instalments of one-twenty-fourth per month,—making in all seventy-two instalments. We further find that the Honourable J. B. Robinson, whilst President of the said Company, overdraw his account to the extent of about $4,900, which sum is in addition to the sum of $5,440.68 above mentioned, and is, with interest, still unpaid.”

What he complained of was this—and it was a point respecting which every hon. member placed in his position would complain—that the Commissioners did not give him an opportunity to explain the items charged against him. They did, however, afford such an opportunity to gentlemen of their own political stripe—Mr. J. D. Edgar, Colonel Denison, and Messrs. Wells and Gordon; but he was perhaps wrong in asking that the same opportunity should be given to him. Nevertheless, the fact remained that, though he was as prominent as any man in Toronto in connection with the construction of the Northern Railway, as he, when an alderman, submitted the motion to the City Council which resulted in the grant of $200,000, though he had been President of the road during thirteen or fourteen years, yet he was not called before the Commissioners, as might certainly have been expected if there was any matter connected with the Northern Railway to be investigated, especially when some rumours had been circulated in Toronto, perhaps by the Commissioners themselves. He remained in Toronto five weeks for the purpose of being examined by the Commissioners if any charge existed against him, but he was not examined, and, notwithstanding that fact, the Commissioners thought it was consistent with honest fair play and honourable dealing to mention his name in their report, although the opportunity given to others to explain matters was not afforded to him. It was true that Mr. Cumberland, as appeared from the report, referring to the item regarding election expenses in Algoma, was asked by the Attorney General of Ontario: “was there any arrangement made before hand that Mr. Robinson’s expenses should be paid by the company?” to which Mr. Cumberland said: “I invited Mr. Robinson, being our President, to seek the seat of Algoma, and proposed to him that if he did, we would pay the election expenses.”

Mr. ROBINSON.

Now, although perhaps Mr. Cumberland said what he thought was right for one man to say of another, still he would have infinitely preferred to have had the chance to explain his own matters to the Commissioners. That was what any one in his position would have liked to have had the opportunity of doing. As he had not been afforded such opportunity, he was forced, in vindication of himself, to tell the House, and through the House to tell the public, how it occurred that he was a member for the district of Algoma, or, rather, how he became a candidate for that constituency in 1872. In that year there was a general election, and the late Mr. Crawford, late Governor of the Province of Ontario, wrote to him from his seat in the House of Commons, asking him to become a candidate for his seat as member for West Toronto. He had made up his mind that, having contested so many elections and having an extensive business at that time all to himself, and being interested in several enterprises, he decided that he would not be a candidate for any constituency. He wrote and told Mr. Crawford this. Mr. Crawford came to Toronto. Of course, there was considerable excitement, and prominent men of the party were discussing as to who should be the candidate. In the meantime, other gentlemen, who thought they would have an equally good chance of being returned, urged their claims. These claims came before a meeting attended by fifty or sixty prominent members of the party in Toronto, at which meeting he had the honour to be nominated chairman. He did his part in reconciling the differences between the candidates, he being at that time, as far as Toronto was concerned, entirely out of the running. The excitement became greater, and he felt that he might still be brought in to be a candidate for the representation of West Toronto, and so on the very next day he packed up his trunk and took the steamer for the shores of Lake Superior, at the same time informing his friend Mr. Crawford what he had done. Unfortunately for him, among the places at which the steamer stopped, was Sault Ste. Marie, a prominent place in the district of Algoma. When he got on shore with other gentlemen he heard, much to his astonishment, that a meeting was to take place of the different committees from parts of Algoma, to decide whether they would or would not approve of the re-nomination of Mr. Cumberland. Unfortunately, perhaps, for that gentleman, he seemed to have lost the confidence of his constituents; at all events, they did not hesitate to tell him so. He did not blame or attack Mr. Cumberland on that account; other prominent men occasionally lost the support and confidence of their constituents, and in this case it might have been due to some local cause. Mr. Cumberland's constituents gave him distinctly to understand that not under any circumstances would they vote for or return him. As he (Mr. Robinson) had visited the district during six or seven years, and had been a sort of pioneer, being engaged in mineral enterprises, and as gentlemen interested in Algoma knew it, the gentlemen said, unfortunately for him: "Here is Mr. Robinson; he is just the gentleman we want, let him be the candidate." He told the people there, as he had done in Toronto, that under no circumstances would he become a candidate for the representation of the district of Algoma in Parliament. But Mr. Cumberland was so anxious on behalf of the Northern Railway bond-holders that there should be some representative of the interests of the road in Parliament, that he not only invited him to become a candidate, as he had said in his sworn testimony, but entreated him, and at the moment, having no time to consider the matter, he became a candidate for the district of Algoma. He had gone to the northern part of the district, and being acquainted, as he had previously mentioned, with a great number of the early settlers, he was returned as member; but he had not become a candidate—indeed he would have been a fool had he acted otherwise—until it was fairly and honourably understood on the part of the Northern Railway and himself, that his expenses would be paid. He had made a great sacrifice in the interests of the bond-holders of the road, and it was but just that this should have been done. On this understanding, he became a candidate, and now he saw, for the first time, in a paper sent to this Legislature, that the expenses of this election amounted to some $5,000. He had not previously known what they were; and he could excuse Mr. Cumberland, or any one acting in the interests of this railway, for taking that step, for the time had come when the Northern Railway should be represented in Parliament; and why? because different political parties existed; and what was at present the case? It had been a matter of complaint that traffic passing over this road to Lake Superior was carried over the Collingwood line of steamers owing to political influence, and had this traffic not now gone to Sarnia and other places? And why? perhaps because other gentlemen sitting in Parliament were interested in other lines of steamers, which were not as important as the Collingwood line, nor the route taken so well adapted for the purpose as the Northern Railway route. It had also been said that his account had been overdrawn to the extent of some $4,900. It sufficed to say in this regard, that he had been the oldest officer of the road, with which he had been connected at the time of its commencement. The fact of his account having been overdrawn had been first drawn to his attention, he believed, in 1873, by a very respectable old gentleman, the accountant of the company, who also said to him in a jocular way:—"Mr. Robinson, if you don't look after this, you will be getting into trouble very probably some day." Large items had been entered against him, and the accountant had remarked on that occasion:—"I know you don't owe them, but still I think it just as well for you to attend to the matter." At the time, he was put out by the treatment he had received at the hands of the company and the Government, and he had told Mr. Hamilton, the accountant, as perhaps any other good-tempered man would have done under the circumstances, to attend to his own business, and he (Mr. Robinson) would attend to his; and gave the matter no further consideration until a year or so afterwards. In 1875 he was going up to Lake Superior, when he recollected the caution given him by Mr. Hamilton, and decided to look into his account, well aware at the time that he did not owe it. He went to Mr. Cumberland, with whom he was not then on friendly terms, and said to him: "Mr. Cumberland, I am told that my account has been overdrawn something like $4,500 or $4,600, and I want you to sit down and write me a letter stating that I do not owe it." Mr. Cumberland, after a little hesitation, complied, and this letter he had still in his possession.

Mr. ROBINSON.

Several amounts had been charged against him, with which he had no more to do than any other hon. member of the House, as far as his private account was concerned. As he had stated at the time, Mr. Hamilton might as well have charged him with the cost of engines, or anything else. Mr. Cumberland, in the course of the recent enquiry, had been asked by Mr. Mowat, he believed, whether he (Mr. Cumberland) had had any conversation with him about this account and the sum he should have received as President, and the answer had been in the affirmative, that the claims were for expenditure made in the company's interest; and that if he (Mr. Robinson) had received the same pay as Mr. Morrison, when President of the road, he would be a creditor instead of a debtor of the company. If he had obtained the same salary as Mr. Justice Morrison, who was President when the road was not earning one-third of what it earned when he occupied that position, this would have been the case. He had always contended that he should have received the same amount, and this had been the understanding. The road was to a great extent under the control of one man, Mr. Cumberland, in the interest of the bond-holders who had invested in it some five or six millions, and this man, who had sworn that he almost entirely controlled the line, had bargained that he should receive the same salary that Mr. Morrison had obtained, and was there a bond-holder or a share-holder in Toronto who would not say that to this he was justly entitled? He had been deeply interested in the road from the very outset; and, under the circumstances, he contended that there was no foundation for the charges which had been laid at his door. He would have given these explanations under oath, but this privilege was denied him by the political Commissioners, who, nevertheless, had extended a similar privilege to their political friends. It had been said, some two or three years ago, when he was turned off the road for political reasons, that his had been a political appointment. Whether such information had been given by friends of the Government or not, he did not know, but it sufficed to say that this charge was inexcusable. He was the first man of all others in Toronto who had called meeting after meeting in favour of the construction of this road. He had done all one man possibly could do in its interests, and finally he had succeeded. He had secured a bonus of $200,000 from the city of Toronto in favour of the line, twenty-three years ago; and this amount, compared with the then available resources of the city, was equal to $1,200,000 at the present time. It would have pleased the Irish heart of the Speaker if he had been present at some of the assemblages in question,—rough meetings they were, and violent was the contest, but the friends of the project were not daunted, and by a majority of one, the City Council, of which he was then a member, granted the bonus he had mentioned. The people recognizing his services in this relation, elected him a director. This happened twenty years ago, and yet, as the excuse for turning him out of office somewhat recently, it had been averred that he had received his appointment on political grounds. Then he had not the honour of being acquainted with Sir John Macdonald, who lived at Kingston; and he had been told that unless the $200,000 bonus had been secured, the contractors would have had nothing whatever to do with the road. He had since pursued the course he had always had at heart in the interests of the railway; and in 1860, he had introduced an Act placing the line in the position it at present occupied. Whenever he had an opportunity he had done service for the road. As far back as 1863 he had a letter from Mr. Cumberland to the effect that he had fairly won his way to the Presidency; and, when an attempt was made in that year to interfere with his position, Mr. Sandfield Macdonald wrote him a letter, alluding to his services in a handsome way and expressing the hope that he would retain the office. The right hon. member for Kingston, who knew the services he had performed, also wrote him a letter of sympathy on the subject. To charge him with such an offence was not fair under the circumstances. They might as well prefer similar charges against W. A. Thomson or George Laidlaw,

President of the Credit Valley Road. He did not like to speak of himself in this connection, but he thought any other hon. member placed in the same position would have availed himself of the same opportunity of putting himself right before the country. Why should he not be treated with the same courtesy as was accorded Mr. J. D. Edgar, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Gordon. The Commissioners said:

“In consequence of rumours that other parties had received sums of money for improper purposes out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company, and that Mr. J. D. Edgar had been the recipient of some for his election expenses, it was considered proper to have Messrs. Cumberland and Edgar examined in relation thereto.”

They charged him (Mr. Robinson) with having done certain things, but, although they knew he was ready and willing, they would not examine him. Still, the slurs and insinuations of the report were not calculated under the circumstances to destroy the good name and respectability of any man. Although the report was only six months old in the city of Toronto, where he was well known, it was already covered with the dust of ages—no one believed the charges contained therein. If, during the twenty years of his services, he had been rewarded as well as the gentleman he had referred to, he would have had $100,000 to his interest in the road at this moment. He thanked the House for extending to him the courtesy which the Commission did not think it right to extend, and excused himself to the hon. member for North Oxford for his apparent discourtesy in taking advantage of the resolution to make this explanation. As the papers asked for were already before the House, and the motion had afforded him an opportunity to make this explanation, he would ask leave to withdraw it.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman cannot do that, he must have his answer.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said before the motion was withdrawn there were two or three other matters connected with the report to which he wished to call the attention of the House. He was sure they were all glad to hear from the hon. member for West

Toronto the evidence which that hon. gentleman would have liked to have given elsewhere. The right hon. member for Kingston had repeatedly told the House that the money expended in connection with the election of 1872 was given to assist promising young candidates, and he was glad to hear that the hon. member for West Toronto was not one of those promising young candidates. But the hon. gentleman had a liberal fund to draw from, as they found he was the recipient of not far from $6,000.

Mr. ROBINSON: I was not the recipient.

Mr. ROSS said the money was spent in an election in which the hon. gentleman was a candidate, and he might apply it whichever way it suited. He was aware for the first time to-day that the Northern Railroad was particularly anxious to be represented on the floor of the House. As he understood parliamentary representation, he thought it was the constituencies, the people of the country, who were represented, and not corporations. Of course, he was young and inexperienced in political life, but he was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman state that Mr. Cumberland was very anxious he should have a seat in the House in the interest of the Northern Railway Company, particularly as it was known the corporation was indebted to the Government at that time. This admission placed parliamentary representation on a new basis to him, and he hoped that there were not many hon. gentlemen in the House who, when they spoke the truth, would be obliged to to make such an admission. He had no reason to follow closely the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto, but he would make some other enquiries in regard to other statements in the report. Among other things, the sum of $1,000 was paid out of the funds of the Company for stock in the Mail newspaper. This was an interesting item. He could understand how the Northern Railway Company would be very anxious to enlist the services of a gentleman of the respectability of the hon. member for West Toronto, and how the corporation would be willing to allow the hon. gentleman to overdraw his account to the extent of $4,000 or $5,000, but why they should subsidize the Mail and not be equally liberal to other newspapers in the Dominion he failed to see. But the liberality of the Company did not stop there. The report stated:

Mr. Ross.

“ We further find that a sum of $2,500, charged in the books of the Northern Railway Company to the Hon. D. L. Macpherson, was not money due to or by that gentleman, or for which the Company had received, or was to receive, value; but was a subscription paid by Mr. Cumberland to the said Hon. D. L. Macpherson, as Treasurer of a fund raised as a testimonial to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald.”

This was the climax of the liberality of the company. In the first place, the company must have a President who was able to engineer things so as to get $200,000 from the corporation of Toronto; secondly, they required a President who understood his private accounts so well that he was quite able to overdraw to the extent of $5,000 and not know it; thirdly, it was necessary to have a President whose capacity for public business was so notable that it would pay to subsidize his election expenses to the amount of $6,000; fourthly, they subsidized a newspaper in Toronto for, he would do them the credit of supposing, the interests of the corporation; and, lastly, understanding the valuable services of hon. members of this House, they donated $2,500 by way of a testimonial to one of the public men of Canada. He could appreciate liberality from whatever source it came, and he was sure the right hon. member for Kingston received that item in the testimonial fund as one of the highest compliments. For an individual to subscribe was a small matter, but for a large corporation, represented by the hon. member for West Toronto, was a great thing, especially when it was done so quietly, and only a private entry made of the transaction. That was, he repeated, the climax of liberality, particularly when they added the additional fact that the road was pretending to be bankrupt, and was appealing to the Government for relief from its proper and legal obligations.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. OLIVER resumed the debate. He said that when Mr. Speaker left the chair at six o'clock, he was about to explain why he had not moved his motion with reference to the Northern Railway, which he had put upon the notice paper two weeks ago. In the ordinary way he asked for certain information which he believed it was very desirable that the House and the country should see. The day after he put it on the paper, that information was brought down to the House, and, as a consequence, he did not proceed with the motion. The object he had in view was accomplished, and therefore he allowed the notice to drop when it was called. If his hon. friend from West Toronto had given him the slightest intimation, or the slightest hint that he desired to rise and explain, he would have allowed him an opportunity on that motion. But the hon. gentleman seemed to take it for granted, and perhaps he was correct, that when the motion was reached he would have moved it. The House had heard the hon. gentleman's justification for accepting his expenses in the Algoma election. No doubt the explanation was satisfactory to the hon. member, but he doubted whether it would be satisfactory to the people of this country. By the report brought down it appeared that the hon. gentleman was President of the road at the time; and he had every opportunity of knowing, and no doubt he did know, the financial condition of the company at the time he ran for Algoma. He knew that the Railway Company was offering to the county of Simcoe five cents upon the dollar for the stock it had; that Toronto was offered from five to ten cents for its stock, and that the Government was offered about seventeen cents upon its stock. Yet the hon. gentleman allowed the Managing Director to use $6,000 of the funds of this bankrupt institution to pay his election expenses in Algoma. It was well known that the road was soliciting the Government to take $500,000 for the sum of $3,000,000 due to the people of this country by that corporation. It would be interesting to the House and country if a copy of one of the hon. gentleman's election speeches could be obtained. No doubt he said he had sacrificed his personal interests in accepting the position, and that, through his influence, navigation of the lakes would be improved, and lighthouses would be erected. But, according to the confession of the hon. gentleman, he was not the representative of the District of Algoma, but of the Northern Railway. A query here suggested itself—Why did this railway require a gentleman of the ability of the hon. member for West Toronto to represent it in the House while other public corporations did not require a representative? It must have been to promote the interests of the railway and not the interests of Algoma, and to induce the Government of the day to compromise with the Northern Railway by taking seventeen cents in the dollar on the amount due. The hon. gentleman had stated that the dust of ages had rested upon the report. He (Mr. Oliver) was satisfied that the dust of a month or the dust of a day did not rest upon the copy which the hon. gentleman had in his hand, to judge by its appearance across the floor of the House. It must have been perused time and again, and every item marked. The dust of ages did not rest upon it, and the hon. gentleman would find the next time he presented himself to the electors, that he would be asked to explain why he took this $6,000 of the funds of the Northern Railway. One thing struck him (Mr. Oliver) very forcibly in reading over the report, and that was in reference to the way in which the account was entered. If this was a straightforward, above-board, honourable transaction, why was this $6,000 not charged to an account for election expenses? Why was it hidden in other accounts? Mr. Cumberland directed that one-third should be charged to contingencies, one-third to parliamentary expenses and one-third to legal expenses, in instalments of one twenty-fourth per month, making in all seventy-two instalments. Why was the account hidden under these three heads, if it was a transaction which the shareholders should become aware of? He did not desire to enter into the other amounts that were spent, and he would not have entered into this had not the hon. member for West Toronto brought it up. But he had nothing to do with the other amounts which were spent for objects foreign to the railway, as he understood the Northern Railway had paid the Government all that it could be legally called upon to pay. As a consequence, they had nothing further to do with the railway. But it was interesting to know that these public corporations throughout the length and breadth of the country contributed so largely towards the election of hon. gentlemen sitting opposite.

Mr. ARCHIBALD said it seemed to him a matter of regret that the explanations of the hon. member for West Toronto were not taken before the Commissioners appointed in the matter. The Commission certainly required the explanations to make a perfect report, as, before they were made, there might have been a doubt as to the constituency which the hon. gentleman represented in 1873, but with them there could be no doubt that the hon. gentleman really represented the Northern Railway and not the constituency of the district of Algoma. He sympathised with the hon. gentleman in the way he was sought after. In order not to represent West Toronto he was obliged to take his flight to Algoma, and directly he set his foot in the village of Sault Ste. Marie he was pressed, not to represent the District of Algoma, but the Northern Railway. While the item with regard to the Northern Railway was very interesting, there were two or three other very interesting items. One of these was $1,000 invested as stock in the Mail newspaper. They all knew that about 1871 or early in 1872 there was a good deal of anxiety expressed for the establishment of a newspaper in Toronto to support of a Liberal Conservative cause. It might reasonably be expected that gentlemen who held opinions in accord with the Liberal Conservative party would subscribe liberally, but he did not see what the Northern Railway had to do with the Mail newspaper. Nominally, the amount was charged to the advertising account, but it was in evidence that it was not expected that one single dollar would be repaid by way of advertising. Another remarkable entry was that of $2,500 towards the testimonial for the right hon. member for Kingston. Under ordinary circumstances, had that right hon. gentleman not been in the House, there might have been nothing wrong in contributing to that fund; but there was something wrong in the money being taken without the consent of the directors or those largely interested, for the purpose of adding it to a sum to be given to a gentleman of considerable political eminence in this country. Wrong as it was under such circumstances, it was still more wrong when that hon. gentleman occupied the position of leader of the Government at the time, and when the Northern Railway expected to be a suppliant to the Government for certain favours. He thought these three items bore a very strange look indeed.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. BLAKE said it was necessary, in order that they might fully appreciate the position in which the House stood on this occasion, and in which gentlemen whose names had been mentioned in relation to the payment stood, that they should recall to their recollection something as to what the position of the Northern Railway was at the time of Confederation and since. At the time of Confederation, and anterior to that, the Northern Railway was indebted to the old Province of Canada in two separate sums, which had been separate by reason of a prior legislation. The first was in the sum of £50,000 of second preference bonds, and the second sum was £475,000 for which the Government held a lien, with interest, on the railway. The way in which they became separate was this:—The original sum had been the first lien on the road altogether; but, by the patriotic and disinterested exertions which the hon. member for West Toronto had described—and the hon. gentleman must have been sorry that there was not some one else to panegyrize him—this lien was postponed, and was put to a comparatively low position; and as part of these transactions it was that the £50,000 was secured to the Government by the second preference bonds. There was a series of first preference bonds and a series of second preference bonds; and then there was this lien of £475,000, that was to be paid by the earnings of the Company after paying the working expenses. At Confederation, these assets, with large arrears of interest, became the property of Canada; and from that time the Northern Railway was a frequent applicant for legislative assistance. In the very first Session of the Canadian Parliament, the Northern Railway Company had applied for legislative aid, and obtained it to a very considerable extent. It secured the power to issue £50,000 of what were called 3 A bonds, and £50,000 of what were called 3 B bonds, both taking precedence of the Government lien, thus postponing this lien still further by the amount of £100,000 sterling, or an interest charge of £6,000 sterling a year. This was the operation of the Company during the first Session of Parliament after Confederation; a debt tolerably insecure at that time was made, he need hardly say, very much worse by the postponement which had taken place, of interest charged with respect to that debt of £6,000 a year. This Act, while it brought the railway under the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, also provided specifically for the distribution of its earnings, and provided, in short, that after the payment of the working expenses and interest on the different classes of bonds to which he had referred—the First Preference, Second Preference, 3 A and 3 B—its earnings should be applied to the payment of the interest on the Government lien. There was then a statutory charge freshly created in favour of the Government—postponed it was true to the extent of £6,000 a year—but still a fresh statutory charge in favour of the Government was postponed for the interest on the lien; and the earnings of the company were first consecrated for the payment of the working expenses, the prior interest charges, and the interest on this lien. The company, which for a long time had continued in arrears with regard to the payment of the interest on the lien, he need hardly say, so remained in arrears. It was difficult to meet it. The company, nominally a company, and one supposed to be controlled by the shareholders, was really under prior legislation a Company controlled by prior bond-holders, whose interest it was, of course, to have the road kept in as good a condition as possible, and to secure the payment of their interest. Beyond that, they had no direct pecuniary interest. This ultimate disposition of the profits; what might have been done with them; what salaries were paid to the President, &c.; at what price, for what consideration and to what extent members of Parliament might be retained or engaged in elections, &c., were considerations of which these bond-holders were disposed to take a large and liberal view, because the surplus assets of the company, beyond the payment of their interest, was not theirs. They had nothing to do with these things, which belonged only to the country, and, if out of the country's funds these expenses could be paid, and everything made very smooth and pleasant, the bond-holders would not lose. This state of things continued from 1868 all the way down to 1871, and at this time, as was very well known had been the case before the company sought to obtain what Mr. Cumberland in his evidence before the Royal Commission called a new Capital Account, and the convenience of having such an account was demonstrated in this evidence. Sundry awkward items were put into suspense—although in his opinion the creators of, rather than these awkward items themselves, should have been suspended—and were obliged to remain in suspense until a new capital account was opened, when they were quietly buried. For these and other purposes, Mr. Cumberland said they had for years been struggling for such an account. Such were the relations of this company to the Government and the Parliament when the transactions referred to by some of his hon. friends took place. The company, owing these large sums to the Government, paid no particular interest on on the lien whatever, and was controlled by the bond-holders, who had, as he had already said, no pecuniary interest in it after the dividends were paid, and was managed under their directions by Mr. Cumberland, and the hon. member for West Toronto as President of the road. In that state of things it appeared by the evidence that a person then and now a member of the other branch of the Legislature applied, early in 1871, to the Managing Director of the Railway Company for a contribution to a testimonial, which was then being got up for the hon. member for Kingston, then a member of this House as he still was, and then Prime Minister of Canada, which he now was not. Under these circumstances, the contribution was asked for and was given; and the sum was $2,500, as the Commission reported, and if these allegations were correct—of course they were open to dispute and question. This $2,500 was taken out of the monies which should under the law have been paid to the Government, and which formed a portion of the earnings that were applicable towards the payment of the interest on the lien, and which by Act of Parliament should have been so applied. It had been taken out of the country's funds by persons who had no right so to do, and he held the hon. member for West Toronto responsible as the then President of the company, as much as Mr. Cumberland, for that operation. Either the hon. member knew of it, or he ought to have known of it. It seemed, moreover, that this hon. gentleman had received money for his services as President of the company; that this remuneration had not been sufficient, and that for these services he claimed the modest sum of $100,000, to be paid out of the funds of the Company. With such assiduous attention as the hon. member for West Toronto claimed to have paid in his position of President of the Company, to its arrangements, he hardly supposed—as indeed the evidence of Mr. Cumberland led them to think—that the hon. member was not aware of the fact of the proposed addition to the testimonial then being collected for the hon. member for Kingston. That was done, the sum was paid, the assets of the Company applicable to the payment of the lien were by so much reduced, and the hon. Senator no doubt applied the sum to the purposes named. That sum, however, owing to the little difficulty to which he had referred—these were awkward items which it did not do to set down in plain black and white—was put in suspense, and poor Mr. McPherson was represented to owe to the Northern Railway Company this $2,500; and so it continued until the goal of all hopes had been attained, and the capital account had been achieved, when it was debited to the very appropriate item—Municipal Bonus and Government Subsidies Expenses. To what Government and to what expenses were questions he left for others to answer; but there they found this item its resting place, and there it still remained. Time rolled on; he would pass over the Session of 1871 and the Session of 1872, and come to the general elections about which the hon. member for Kingston evinced considerable anxiety, and with reference to which his exertions were recorded, in speeches and in writings, and his difficulties with reference to Ontario particularly, and about which topic, the hon. gentleman in almost touching language, in his evidence before the Royal Commission, pointed out how desperate his situation was, how beset with enemies, and how essential it was to obtain assistance, not merely from local friends, but also from that great friend of the Conservative Party, at that time, Sir Hugh Allan. The hon. gentleman then pointed out that he had called for assistance from various quarters, and, as appeared from the evidence taken before the Royal Commission, these demands were responded to by Mr. Cumberland himself. Mr. Cumberland was asked "You took part in the elections in Ontario did you not? A.—I did. In Toronto and the vicinity? A.—Yes. Q.—Did you subscribe towards the elections in Ontario? A.—I helped in the elections pecuniarily." Mr. Cumberland did not reply simply yes, but said that he helped in the elections pecuniarily. They now knew how, he supposed. They saw that Mr. Cumberland identified himself, and justly, to a very large extent—with the Northern Railway Company, which was in some sort a corporation—and helped in the elections pecuniarily. Mr. Cumberland was also asked: "In subscribing to the elections did you consider that you were in any way recompensing the Government for any interest in this railway?" (the Pacific, not Northern) A.—Certainly I did not; I subscribed and paid as a member of the party." There was proven in the evidence given a little before that the hon. member for Kingston was on intimate terms with Mr. Cumberland; that the hon. gentleman had applied to him to become a director of the Pacific Railway; that Mr. Cumberland was unwilling personally to so far make a sacrifice of himself—he (Mr. Blake) believed that this was the appropriate phase—as to put his name in the hands of the hon. member for Kingston; that the Government gave him carte blanche, and that he (Mr. Cumberland) at last consented to impose upon himself the trouble, toil and sacrifice and all the other losses incidental to becoming one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway; that they were on these intimate terms, and that, under these circumstances, Mr. Cumberland, as a member of the hon. gentleman's party, subscribed and paid money towards the elections. Well, time rolled on; the elections were still more warmly contested, and the hon. member for West Toronto, as an hon. gentleman had observed, finding himself surrounded by evil ones in his own constituency, fled to Lake Superior. The hon. member felt that he could not resist their solicitations and that he would be forced against himself to contest West Toronto. He did not choose to do so, and so went northwards, but, unfortunately, wherever the hon. gentleman went, he still found constituencies eager to possess his services; and having escaped by flight,—he (Mr. Blake) did not say that it was ignominious—but by sudden and hasty flight, and endeavoured to place some thousand miles of fresh water between him and Toronto; he landed on the rocky shore of Algoma, and at once was the man for the hour. The hon. gentleman did not find it easier to resist the small number of persons who would surround him at one spot in Algoma, a constituency which, large and important as it was territorially, was not possessed of a great many votes, and at that time, many persons could not have congregated together to exercise that influence over the hon.

Mr. BLAKE.

gentleman, of which he was so afraid in Toronto, still he resisted; but at length he yielded to the earnest representation of Mr. Cumberland, who, as the hon. gentleman had told them, with a frankness admirable in itself, impressed on him the eminent importance of the Northern Railway Company having a representative in Parliament. The electors of Algoma had lost confidence in Mr. Cumberland; possibly they had found that he was not the representative of the constituencies, but the representative of the Railway Company, but at all events, a new, fresh man was to be brought forward, not to be elected for Algoma, but as the representative of the Railway Company; and the man who was fleeing from Toronto and who was avoiding the honour of being elected for a constituency in the metropolis of the West, was brought forward as a free and independent member, according his support to the hon. gentleman opposite. The electors of Algoma were naturally induced to believe that they were electing a member to represent them, while all the time the hon. gentleman's moving cause had been what? It was not ambition to enter Parliament, and it was not ambition to represent the people, for he did not want to represent the noble constituency which that night must feel honoured in having him as their representative, but it was because the Northern Railway Company wanted to have a representative in Parliament, because he wished to sustain the hon. member for Kingston, and tell that hon. gentleman that there was a member for the company in the House at its back in the negotiations which that company had for years endeavoured to force on the Government of this country. He would not call these false pretences, because they were assented to by the hon. member for West Toronto—and because he supposed the term was not parliamentary—but under these pretences, by whatever parliamentary name they might be characterized—that hon. gentleman went before the people of Algoma. The hon. gentleman then, no doubt, lauded the efforts of the hon. member for Kingston; stated that, with a due measure of independence, which every member, at any rate during his election, reserved to himself, he would support the hon. member for Kingston; and denounced his opponent as a person desirous of subverting that hon. gentleman, and destroying the Conservative party. But no doubt the hon. gentleman did not tell these electors that he was going to Parliament to represent a railway corporation, by which his expenses would be paid out of monies belonging not to them but to the people of this country; and these electors would hear with very great surprise that this was a fact; that money had been fraudulently and dishonestly applied to the payment of these expenses. But the hon. gentleman now declared, —and they had recently heard a great deal of the same sort of thing—that he did not know how much was spent on that action. He (Mr. Blake) found from Morgan that the hon. gentleman then polled 300 votes precisely, and consequently, as the expenses paid out of the public purse, of which the hon. gentleman and Mr. Cumberland were trustees, exceeded $5,440, his votes cost the hon. gentlemen $18 per head. He had heard that the hon. gentleman at that time had a steamer, in which he was going from port to port and from point to point in his constituency; and he saw that in the details of the account, there was an entry of $700 or $800 for a steamer. The amount might be larger; but so it was. The hon. member for Algoma had his election expenses paid by the company of which he was the President to the tune of $18 per head for every vote polled, out of the moneys which, as his solemn, statutory duty, he should have applied towards the payment of the debt due to this country by that company, which the hon. gentleman came to Parliament to represent. The hon. member for Kingston had been the recipient of a testimonial, of which the $2,500, as the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex had said, must have been a most gratifying item. Having succeeded in securing the return of so devoted a follower as the hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Kingston was called upon shortly afterwards to consider the proposition of the company. In 1871, this company obtained the lease other lines, and it contained an express clause inserted, he believed, at the instance of his hon. friend on the Railway Committee, though for this he did not vouch, declaring that the rank of the Government lien should not thereby be altered. In 1872, another Act was passed, legalizing the leases taken under the Act of 1871, and, in addition, authorizing the Company to issue and guarantee a rather larger amount of new debentures on account of the leased lines under their direction, and providing that the interest on these debentures should also be charged as part of the working expenses of the Company; those working expenses which, as he had already stated, had been by the prior Acts declared prior in the distribution of the earnings. The Northern Railway, continued Mr. Blake, was thus permitted practically to add another large burden in preference to the Government lien. In the Session of 1873, the hon. member for the Northern Railway Company, fresh from the electoral honours he had won in Algoma, and true to that mission he now informs us he had undertaken in Parliament, introduced a Private Bill for the company, proposing to reorganize its capital and settle the Government lien. Objection was taken to a private member undertaking to settle a Government debt, and, in that Session, the Government came down with a policy which, between the 1872 elections and the Session of 1873, they had determined upon. Notwithstanding the conduct of the Railway Company in paying this sum of $5,000 or $6,000 to elect the hon. member for Algoma to sit in this House and support the Government, they proposed that the lien on the Northern Railway Company and the £50,000 second preference bonds and £50,000 third B's, which had just been issued, should be wiped out altogether for a lump sum of half a million dollars. That proposal was brought down by Mr. Tilley; but it was resisted, notably by my hon. friend from Lambton, as entirely too favourable to the Company; and, when it was shown that it would not be permitted to pass without strenuous opposition, it was withdrawn. So the hon. member for the company, notwithstanding the cordial support of the member for Kingston, and that hon. gentleman's readiness to settle these millions of dollars for half a million, in consequence of the exertions of my hon. friend from Lambton, did not succeed, and the scheme was dropped. In 1875, under the régime of my hon. friend, a new Bill was introduced, based on other considerations and proposed on an entirely different view altogether. In this case, as in 1873, the member for Algoma was a supporter of the Government, though, of course, his views might have been different if he had been a member for the Railway Company. That Bill proposed that the lien should be satisfied on payment of £100,000 sterling, with all the arrears of interest on the second preference bonds, the Government retaining the second preference bonds for £50,000, which were stated by Mr. Tilley to be worth almost par, and the third preference B bonds, the value of which is not so easily ascertained because they are not quoted, together with some £20,000 more of interest. The time was extended to November last, and up to that time the Government had received some $560,000 in hard cash, besides retaining £50,000 sterling, worth from 93 to 95 in the market, or practically equal to stock, and the third B's with $30,000 arrears of interest on them. So the result of that settlement was not so favourable to the company as that proposed when the hon. member for Kingston was supported by the hon. member for the company. Practically, we have received more than twice as much money for this debt as the hon. member for Kingston asked Parliament to agree to. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite have complained, if not in the House, out of it; their organs have complained; I have seen it made especially a source of complaint in the Province of Quebec, that such an unfavourable settlement for the country should have been made with the company; while hon. gentlemen are trying to bring back to power, as First Minister, the gentleman who tried to induce Parliament to take less than one-half the sum.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. MASSON: It is probably because he has other qualities.

Mr. ROBITAILLE: He did not press it.

Mr. BLAKE: No; my hon. friend stated at a late stage of the Session that it would be opposed, and the hon. gentleman preferred the termination of the Session to the interests of the company. The hon. gentleman agrees that it was an indefensible proposal, but he assoilzies the hon. gentleman from Kingston because he did not press the indefensible proposal. The present scheme was carried, I think, without opposition.

Mr. BOWELL: No; I objected to all the propositions.

Mr. BLAKE: Was there a division?

Mr. BOWELL: It was carried on division.

Mr. BLAKE: I am aware of the hon. gentleman's extreme objection. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would rather accept half a million from the member for Kingston than $1,100,000 from my hon. friend from Lambton.

Mr. BOWELL: That is a mistake also. You had better stick to facts.

Mr. BLAKE: I am also at liberty to express an opinion. That is my opinion; I maintain it. I have pointed out what the relations of this company were to the public during this whole time. I was a supporter of the proposed settlement of my hon. friend from Lambton. I had myself made an independent examination, so far as I could, from the reports of this company and other inquiry into the subject, and I was satisfied that that sum was as much as we could expect the company to be able to raise, and that if we asked more they would fail; if less, we would be asking less than would be due to the country. But I should not have dreamed of supporting that or any other proposition for the settlement of that debt if I had known what Parliament knows to-day, that the funds, which should have been applied during these long years of bankruptcy, towards paying off this debt had been grossly and dishonestly employed, as they are proved to have been. Had I been aware that a single shilling had been applied to buy electors to return members to support the hon. member for Kingston, had I been aware that a single shilling had been applied to give testimonials to the hon. member then First Minister, I should have asked for a searching enquiry into all these transactions to see what had become of all this money, and whether some part of it could not be paid into the public Exchequer before the settlement of the debt. I do not believe that this Parliament, or even the Parliament in which the hon. member for Terrebonne, who cheers me, was a supporter of the Government, would have condoned the application, under the head of "D. L. Macpherson," "legal expenses," "contingencies," "Parliamentary expenses," &c.—the dishonest and fraudulent application of sums belonging to the company to purposes which those who paid them were afraid to avow. The hon. gentleman objected to the form of that entry. I agree that in part it is wrong, but his censure is too sweeping. As to "legal expenses," I do not know whether the member for the company was also the lawyer for the company, and I agree that the Manager and President did in that err and authorize the entry of a wrong item. As to "contingencies," we know what an elastic term that is. The hon. gentleman seems to think that all natural and proper. Did no blush mantle his cheek as he spoke? He may perhaps believe it was a proper thing for a railway company, whose whole assets were due to the Government, to pay for the support of the return of a member to sustain a party which it was the true interest of the country to maintain in power. I have said the entry of "legal expenses" is wrong and that of "contingencies" questionable, but as to the third item he was too harsh when he characterized that as a mistake. It is for "Parliamentary expenses." I appeal to the hon. member for West Toronto whether it is not fair to charge as a "Parliamentary expense" the return of a member for the company. If the whole had been put down as "Parliamentary expenses," the item would be as honest as the day. I hope he will modify his censure on that item and agree with me that the return of a member for the company to Parliament is a Parliamentary expense. This subject deserves the attention and consideration of this House. If members of this House are to receive the funds due to the public by corporations, which, under the Statute, are bound to apply these funds in the payment of the public debt, if the President of a railway company, occupying a situation in which he was himself bound to see that the money was properly applied, shall accept a payment of this large sum of money towards the expenses of his return to Parliament, and if Parliament, having it brought to its notice, shall not pass upon it, I think Parliament will have failed to have done its duty. I do not think the circumstance is one we can avoid passing upon. I think the payment out of the funds of his Company—

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BOWELL: Or any other fund?

Mr. BLAKE: Certainly; but there are degrees of guilt. It is a graver crime for the President of a company owing money to the Government to take the moneys, of which he is the custodian, and apply them to the payment of his election expenses, than for the Great Western or any other company to do the same thing.

Mr. BOWELL: Or to take the Government funds to buy members of Parliament?

Mr. BLAKE: I hold it to be about the same thing. It seems to me there should be an enquiry into these payments. I very much regret that the hon. gentleman was not summoned before the Commission and given the opportunity of making a statement. That ought to have been done. But no practical injustice was done him on two grounds—because, first, he has had the opportunity of giving his own account just as he pleased a few days after the statement was made public, and, secondly, because I am sure every one who heard him felt it would have been better for him, kinder for him, if his statement had not been made this day. Still the interests of justice would have been better served if he had been allowed to give his evidence, and I have no doubt that, if the law proposed by my hon. friend from North York had been in force, to allow persons charged with crime to give evidence on their own behalf, the Commissioners would have called before them both the hon. member for West Toronto and the hon. member for Kingston. Perhaps they were influenced by the principle of the present law, that persons so charged should not be compelled to incriminate themselves.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Bah.

Mr. BLAKE: Does the hon. gentleman say it is not a crime? If it be a crime the person who perpetrated it is a criminal, and it is as such criminal that I now address the hon. member for West Toronto, through you, Sir.

Mr. CAMERON said he could not help thinking that the hon. the Minister of Justice had no justification for such an attack as he had made on the hon. member for West Toronto, and that it was a vivid recollection of past favours of a similar kind received from that gentleman by the Minister of Justice that prompted the bitter spirit in which the attack was conducted. But he thought the House was losing sight of a very important matter with reference to this Commission—a matter which concerned the hon. the Minister of Justice, and upon which he would be glad to hear him say something. He meant the question of the legality of the Commission—whether the whole thing from beginning to end was not a legal farce, a prostitution of the powers of the Executive for political and party purposes, whether it had any legal authority, and whether, in fact, the law of the land was not prostituted by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of gaining an advantage over political opponents. He did not believe the hon. the Minister of Justice had anything to do with the matter, because that hon. gentleman was absent from the country at the time the Commission was issued; but he would be surprised if such an acute lawyer would say that the Statute would support such an exercise of the Executive power. The clause read:

“Whenever the Governor in Council deems it expedient to cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada, or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof, and such inquiry is not regulated by any special law, the Governor may, by commission in the case, confer upon the Commissioners or persons by whom such inquiry is to be conducted, the power of summoning before them any party or witnesses, etc.

Now, could it be said that the funds of the Northern Railway, or the manner in which the representative of the bondholders in charge of the road had used the funds, was a matter connected with the good government of Canada, or the conduct of part of the public business of the Dominion? No lawyer would hold that the Statute would cover inquiry into private matters. It might as well be contended that the Government could inquire into the affairs of a bank in which it had deposited money. In this case the Government were mortgagees. Could it be said that a mortgagee had a right to inquire into the actions of a mortgagor with a view to finding out whether, if he had been more prudent and economical, he could not have paid the mortgage money? He had come to the conclusion that the Commission was an illegal farce, and that the witnesses examined could not be indicted for perjury. This was shown in an opinion, at page 71 of the report, by the late Hon. John Hillyard Cameron. But there was another reason why the Commission should not have issued at the time it did. The Government had solemnly agreed by Act of Parliament to accept a composition, and they knew that the only means by which the company could raise the money to pay was to go into the money market. Knowing that the Government agreed to wait until the 1st November for the payment of the composition; but in July they issued this Commission, the result of which was to change the credit of the company, and, at all events, to prevent or endanger the payment of the composition. If a merchant acted in that way towards one of his customers, it would be looked upon as a piece of private dishonesty, and it was hard to characterize the conduct of the Government in this respect in other terms. There were, however, still further reasons. A suit in Chancery was pending in Ontario against the company in which those very transactions were impeached. The Court was seized and possessed of the legal power to investigate the matter, but the Government took it out of the hands of the Court of Chancery and appointed a Royal Commission. It was not for him to defend the payment of the election expenses out of the Railway funds. His individual opinion was that any such payment was improper. He had no connection with the road directly or indirectly and never expected to have. He had no political sympathy with Mr. Cumberland, for that gentleman had read himself out of the Conservative party and gone over to the gentlemen opposite. He cared not whether Mr. Cumberland was right or was wrong, or whether the hon. member for West Toronto was justified or not in having his election expenses paid. These points were immaterial when they came to consider the greater question whether the Government had any right to issue the Commission or whether they had abused their powers for political reasons. As soon as sufficient evidence was obtained by the Commission to inculcate the political opponents of the Government it abruptly closed its labours. A half finished report of a half finished work was presented and the Government took the money from the company. Notwithstanding all the "scandalous" revelations the Government accepted the settlement. They did not want to go too far. The railroad had changed hands and the President had become a supporter instead of a political opponent, and the hon. occupants of Treasury Benches were willing to accept the money and end the whole matter. His hon. friend from Middlesex had spoken of the subsidy to the Mail as an outrageous transaction. If the enquiry had gone further it might have been found that another newspaper of even larger circulation, and more public influence, published in the same city as the Mail, had been also subsidized. It was well known that newspapers would not do anything without a quid pro quo, and, if the investigation had been carried further, they would have found that other papers had an interest in the Northern Railroad. The hon. member for Middlesex had spoken of the $2,500 charged to Mr. Macpherson. If it had been enquired whether that was a matter sanctioned by usage, or whether any other company had done anything similar, the discovery would have been made that another railroad, whose President was not a supporter of the hon. member for Kingston, had previously subscribed a similar sum to the same fund, and that Mr. Cumberland simply followed the good example of the Great Western Railroad in this respect. Besides, if he was not mistaken, the Grand Trunk did the same thing. Mr. Macpherson had expressly stated, however, that the fact of this subscription being made by the Northern Railroad, was entirely unknown to the hon. member for Kingston; and he thought the hon. the Minister of Justice would have shown better taste if he had abstained from the personal comments he had made in regard to that right hon. member. The hon. the Minister of Justice had discussed the propriety of charging part of this fund to contingencies. Had the book-keeper sought for a proper term, considering that the bulk of the money had been spent upon wild Indians, he would have called it "missionary expenses." That was the proper Reform term, and was certainly appropriate considering the part of the country in which the money was expended. The hon. the Minister of Justice had also referred to the gross impropriety of any hon. member having his election expenses paid by any company or individuals, or coming here in any other capacity than that of a free and independent representative of free and independent electors. He had heard of other cases in which funds had been raised for electing members of Parliament, to which banks had contributed; and he had also heard of an election that once took place in that immaculate constituency, the West Riding of Durham, where the expenses of the hon. member representing the constituency were defrayed out of a subscription, to which corporations, as well as individuals were subscribers. He was convinced of the illegality of the whole proceedings connected with the Commission, and that its principal object was to embarrass and stultify political opponents.

Mr. CAMERON.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman who had just sat down had spoken as a lawyer. While he would not presume to offer any legal opinion upon the point raised, he would say that, in the absence of the hon. the Minister of Justice, he sent the statement to the Department of Justice to obtain information as to the proper mode of procedure in reference to the investigation. He obtained an opinion from the late Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Bernard, which could be produced if the hon. gentleman would move for it. He (Mr. Cameron) would then perhaps see he was a little rash in characterising as illegal what so distinguished an ornament of the profession had decided was perfectly right and proper. He would call attention to the fact that an impropriety in connection with the management of the affairs of the Northern Railroad was known to the Government, which had not been developed by the Commission. He had been told by some person that an extraordinary payment had been made to some legal firm at Toronto. Upon being spoken to, Mr. Cumberland gave personal assurance that no such irregular payment had been made. Subsequent inquiry, however, revealed the payments which appeared on page 7 of the report. It still appeared that certain legal gentlemen obtained the sum of $5,000, and other persons the sum of $465.68 for purposes that he conceived were wholly foreign to the business of the Government and to the business of the company. It would also be remembered that in the Act of 1865 he provided the following clause—

“It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council, at any time after the passing of this Act, to nominate and appoint one additional Director of the Company, who shall, in all things, have the same power as an ordinary Director, but whose concurrence shall be necessary to any future expenditure upon new works or equipment undertaken after such appointment.”

He proposed this because he conceived it to be absolutely necessary that, if the Government had such a large interest in this Company, it should also have a voice in the management of its affairs. He found that payments were made without any reference to the Government, and absolutely without the knowledge of the President of the Company. He immediately addressed a formal letter to the President calling his attention to the extraordinary payments, and demanding on behalf of the Government, as an interested party, that steps should be taken preventing any such payments in the future upon the mere order of the Managing Director. At a meeting held in consequence of this letter, steps were taken to have the financial management of this deplorably mismanaged company put upon a sounder footing; and, as far as subsequent payments were concerned, there was nothing, he presumed, with which complaint could be found. Immediately after the transaction he referred to—and a disturbance created in the Board of Directors in consequence of this correspondence with Messrs. Gordon & Wells & Co.—the Secretary of the Company sent a letter through one of the directors to the Government Director, exposing the particular item referred to, and expressing the opinion that the time had come when he should clear himself from any impropriety of the company by exposing the transactions. The hon. gentleman who had spoken last said the enquiry was drawn to a close as soon as the items under discussion had been brought out. He thought he had shown that the Government knew of these matters before the Commission was issued. The Commission was issued because of the irregularities, and nothing could more clearly justify, nay demand, the issuance of the Commission than the formal letter of the Secretary of the Company, stating that these improper payments had been made. That disposed effectually, he thought, of that point which the hon. gentleman had made. The hon. gentleman accused the Commissioners of being partizan. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had nothing to do with defending the Commissioners, except to say that the chairman, Mr. Larratt Smith, was as well known as the hon. member for Victoria, and quite as well respected. The deprecating tone in which Mr. Smith had been spoken of would not be used where that gentleman was well known, and where he was able to defend himself. Mr. Smith would not dream of doing anything but what was thoroughly just and perfectly proper. The other two gentlemen named in the Commission were well known, at all events in their respective neighbourhoods. Mr. Hope, now a member of the other House, was a prominent merchant of the city of Hamilton, and was known far and wide for his probity. Mr. Featherstone, the other Commissioner, resided in Ottawa, and had been repeatedly elected Mayor of the city, and no person stood higher in character.

Mr. BOWELL: Mr. Hope did not serve.

Mr. MACKENZIE said Mr. Hope did not serve because he was on the Bank of Commerce Board, on which Mr. Cumberland acted, and he thought it was not proper that he should be on a Committee of enquiry on one of his colleagues. The hon. gentleman said that another railway company was indebted to the Government. The Great Western Railway, to which allusion was made, had made a settlement two years before this time, and what it had done did not at all affect the position the Government had taken. The hon. gentleman said it was the duty of the Government to refuse to accept the settlement made under the Act of Parliament if they believed that an improper use had been made of the funds. He would read the clause of the Act relating to this.

“If the said Company or any Company formed by its amalgamation with any other Company under any Act of the present Session, do on or before the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, or within such extended time as the Governor in Council may grant, not exceeding three months thereafter, pay to the Receiver-General of Canada, or to the Financial agents of the Dominion in England, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds sterling, such payment shall operate as a full discharge and release of the said lien and of all principal and interest due in respect thereof; and the Receiver-General or the said financial agents (as the case may be) shall give the Company a certificate of such payment, which shall be sufficient evidence of the discharge of the lien and of all claims in respect thereof.”

He had only to say in regard to this that the Law Officer of the Crown, his hon. friend the Minister of Justice, decided as his legal opinion that the Government had no power to refuse the balance which the Company tendered the day before the expiration of the period prescribed by Act of Parliament. That opinion might be wrong, as might the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice in regard to the issuance of the Commission—as the hon. member for Victoria thought; but the Government thought proper to act upon that opinion, and so the money was accepted. What steps might be taken, or should be taken, if any, for the recovery of the money which undoubtedly belonged to the Government was something which would find its solution in the course of time. It was perfectly clear that when the Commission was discharged, the reasons which existed for its issuance had ceased. The company was a semi-public company and trustees of English bondholders and trustees of the Government. The Government payment rested upon their discretion, wisdom and justice in dealing with the funds. Next to the English bondholders—to whom the Government gave way some years ago—the Government stood first, and standing first, they were in exactly the position of an ordinary creditor, or in a condition of holding a lien which took preference of everything else except the interest to the bondholders. If the Government made any mistake, it was in not appointing a majority of the Board of Directors, in order to take charge altogether of the financial affairs of the company; and most certainly this would have been done had the Government any reason to suspect that the funds were being improperly disposed of. Could anything be more improper than that the manager of a company should pay £9,000 or £10,000 to two or three parties in the endeavour to get some arrangement made for the original shareholders; and yet, although no arrangement was possible without the assent of the Government, Mr. Cumberland chose to pay this sum in order to buy over opposition to the measures that were being passed through Parliament in 1875. The hon. member for Victoria said the President of the company went over to the Ministerial or Clear Grit side. That was the first he had heard of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. CAMERON: He did; it is well known that he did.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could only say that he knew nothing about it.

Even if it were so, it would not make any difference. The Government took the most prompt steps to stop the irregularities.

Mr. McCALLUM said, when the Bill for settlement with the Northern Railway was before the House in 1875, he disagreed with the Government and objected to it. The Minister of Justice said that it was the last plan which could be adopted. As reported in Hansard, Mr. Blake said :

“He agreed with his hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Thomson) regarding this matter, and, from a careful investigation of the affairs of the Company, it would be ruined if it were compelled to meet its obligations.”

The Minister of Justice used some not very kind language towards him, and then he (Mr. McCallum) quoted from the Hon. Mr. Crooks' report to the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario in Council, on the 3rd of May, 1873, as follows:—

“Upon an examination of the returns of revenue as earned by this railway, and after a liberal allowance for expenditure on capital account, etc., it appears to the undersigned that the Company could with facility pay interest at the rate of five per cent per annum on this amount of the Provincial loan, and at the same time exist in full efficiency, and make from time to time such alterations and additions as its traffic and the public interests might require. The undersigned therefore considers this sum to be a good asset of the Province of Canada for the amount of $2,311,666.67, and that the sum of £50,000, stg., of bonds, with interest from July 1st, 1867, is equally so, and that it would be a most disadvantageous arrangement, and unjust to this Province, if the proposition contained in said resolutions were adopted.

“(Signed) “AD. CROOKS.”

At this time it was well known that the hon. the Minister of Justice was in sympathy with the Hon. Mr. Crooks, but the hon. gentleman was in Opposition to the then Government of the Dominion. He (Mr. McCallum) moved in 1875 for a six months' hoist of the Bill, which was lost on a division. But he had his vindication now by the acknowledgment of the Government, and the hon. gentleman must have known that he (Mr. McCallum) was right in 1875, although he had said the contrary. In 1873, when the report of Mr. Crooks was made, the hon. gentleman, then in Opposition, opposed the settlement with the Northern Railway, the real reason being that the Manager of the road was supporting the Government of the day. But, when the hon. gentleman crossed the floor of the House, he seemed to have got new light; and this accounted for the settlement of 1875. As far as the report on the Northern Railway was concerned, he (Mr. McCallum) was sorry that the enquiry had not been extended to the management of the Northern Extension Railway. If this had been done, in his opinion, a great deal more corruption would have come to light than had been developed regarding the Northern Railway. There was no doubt that the money which the people of this country ought to have had, as he had said on the passage of the Bill, had gone to the building of the Northern Extension, twenty-six miles of which, if he was informed aright, were constructed on a capital stock of $13,000. As far as the hon. member for West Toronto was concerned, he could give his own explanation and justification, and he (Mr. McCallum) was not in the House to defend Mr. Cumberland. But he did not think that the fact of Mr. Cumberland subscribing $1,000 towards the stock of the Mail newspaper was a proper subject of enquiry by the House. That matter lay between Mr. Cumberland and the Directors, especially as the Government had got all its claims paid. This, however, was not the first time the Government had assisted newspapers. For instance, last year the present Government paid the sum of $1,100 or more to the Globe, for copies circulated in Europe, no doubt in the interest of a certain party, and to poison the minds of intending emigrants against another political party before even they set foot in the country. And many other newspapers had been subsidized by the Government in the same way. The Minister of Justice always seemed anxious to get hold of anything that would reflect injuriously upon any members on the Opposition side of the House. He forgot that the party with which he was allied had for its leader the man who made the “grand stand" and the "big push," and appealed to the faithful to come down handsomely.

Mr. TUPPER said he thought the discussion was necessary. The Government had laid on the table a blue-book, being the report of the Northern Railway Commission, and he thought he expressed the sentiment of every member of the House, not in the secrets of the Government, when he said that no person could peruse the document without coming to the conclusion that there was nothing to explain its existence. There was nothing in the report to show why the Commission had been issued, and he had hoped that the Government would have availed themselves of the opportunity afforded by the discussion to give the House some reason for taking that extraordinary step. Both lay and legal gentlemen would agree with him in the opinion that nothing but circumstances of the most stringent public necessity would ever justify a Government in adopting a Star-Chamber movement such as this. The feeling of every person who rose from a perusal of the document would be one of strange bewilderment; first, as to what occasioned the appointment of the Commission; and second, as to what caused the suspension of its action. If there was a necessity for it, if the Government were justified in issuing a Commission, it was because they had a large lien against the company, and that the arrangement for its settlement was made under the representations presented by the company which the Government had reason to suppose were deceptive, and which, if proved by the Commission, would justify them in withdrawing from the arrangement and freeing themselves from the obligation they had undertaken. The report presented the extraordinary spectacle of a Commission issued and certain investigations made, the object of which, unless the party possessed some information outside the covers of the report, remained absolutely a secret. The general impression was that the Government was moved to institute the enquiry in the hope that they would unearth some scandals for which they had so remarkable keen a scent, and which they seemed to think it was their peculiar mission to reveal. The general impression was (and it was an impression which any one not in the Government secret would arrive at) that, having pursued the investigation to a certain point, they found they were on tender ground, that, instead of being able to accomplish the object in view, every step they took would involve their own friends in discreditable acts, and so they thought that the sooner they hushed up any further enquiry the better. The hon. the Minister of Justice had referred to the proposition which Mr. Tilley as Minister of Finance had made to the House, and he had detailed the facts correctly in regard to the position of the Government. It was no secret that the general impression entertained was, both in the House and out of it, that the claim of the Government against the Northern Railway was not a good one, and that the circumstances of the company were such that the Government would never be able to obtain the face value of the claim. An application was made to the late Government for the composition of the claim. They very naturally took the step of obtaining the most able and efficient persons as Commissioners to investigate into all the facts and circumstances in connection with the company, and report to the Government the amount of money which the Government, taking into consideration the ability of the company, would be justified in accepting in discharge of its claim against the company. A report was made by Mr. Langton, the Auditor-General, whom they had no reason then, or now, to suppose was not eminently qualified to discharge the duty imposed on him. Mr. Tilley brought the resolutions before the House, and, upon the statement being made by some hon. members that they had reason to believe the company was in possession of a larger amount of assets than Mr. Langton's report led them to believe, the Government withdrew the resolutions, stating at once to the House that they would not assent to the proposition.

Mr. McCALLUM.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman say that such a statement was made to the House?

Mr. TUPPER said that, on statement being made in the House that the company was able to pay a larger sum, the Government arrived at the conclusion that without further information and investigation it would not be justified in agreeing to the arrangement, and it did not press the resolutions to a conclusion.

Mr. BLAKE said the then Minister of Justice challenged his hon. friend the Premier across the floor of the House with being responsible for having, by his objection, stopped a settlement which was necessary in the interests of the country and the Northern Railway, and said he would be held responsible therefor by the people of Toronto and vicinity.

Mr. TUPPER said the recollection of the hon. the Minister of Justice might be correct, but the circumstances as they rested in his mind were that the discussion led to the withdrawal of the resolutions. The hon. member for Lambton was not the only member that objected. There were a number of hon. members on both sides of the House who took very strong grounds against the proposed settlement, prominent among them being the hon. member for Hamilton. The hon. the Minister of Justice seemed to think that every act must be corrupt; he had a most deplorable view of human nature. Hon. gentlemen opposite had, he admitted, some reason to suppose that the proceedings of the Northern Railway, after the change of Government had taken place, were not animated by that straightforward business-like integrity they had a right to expect. When they found that the management at once struck down a President on political grounds, and gave to the present Government the strongest assurance possible that the company would be used as a political engine in future, there was some reason to come to the conclusion that the Government were being approached, and that at their most vulnerable point; that if they could make a settlement with the company they would receive political aid, and the Northern Railway would be worked in their interests. The Government should have regarded with suspicion the political complexion given to the Northern Railway Board, in view of the negotiations for the settlement of the Government claim. He was only expressing the sentiments of the House and country when he declared that the company would have effected no settlement to this hour if they had not adopted such a course in relation to hon. members opposite. He wanted to know why the settlement was consummated? If the Government had the power to issue a Royal Commission, and if it had ascertained that the company were guilty of fraudulent transactions, as the hon. the First Minister had declared, why was the settlement completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not declare that he had the proof, but that such an allegation had been made.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. the Minister of Justice had distinctly declared that the Commission had proved transactions which were fraudulent and criminal against the company. If the Government could show that the engagement had been made with the Northern Railway under false pretences and false statements on the part of one of the parties to the transaction, the Government would have the right to say that they would not carry out the engagement. Having probed the circumstances of the company to the bottom, he asked the reason why the Government did not come down to the House and announce that they had refused to carry out the engagement with the company under the circumstances and were ready to accept the responsibility? The hon. the Minister of Justice could not shield himself behind the assertion that if they had known all this beforehand no settlement would have been made. That hon. gentleman would have to answer to the people and the House why, in the face of the information obtained by the Commissioners and by other means, he accepted the composition, especially in the face of the fact that the company were able to procure the money against the determined struggle of the Government to weaken their credit in England. The Government could not have done anything to deteriorate the character and position of the Northern Railway equal to the issue of the Royal Commission at that particular juncture. The company having proved that they could raise the money notwithstanding the attempt of the Government to break down the credit and ruin the position of the corporation, had given the best evidence they could that the agreement with the Government should never have been carried out. The Government could not say that they had brought down all the testimony in their possession, and that the report contained all the results of the Commission. Why did they appoint an accountant to investigate the company's accounts, for they surely did not mean to say that he had done nothing? Why was his statement not before the House? Was it because it would have convicted hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches of having closed a bargain by which an unfair sum was accepted? The Government would have to show the country why they had not refused to consummate the bargain and come to Parliament showing the grounds on which they had not carried out the engagement with the company. He was amazed at the wonderful purity that appeared to animate the Minister of Justice. When the hon. gentleman so far forgot his high position as to denounce the right hon. member for Kingston as a criminal, because the Northern Railway Company had contributed to a testimonial presented to him, it showed not only an absence of good taste, but it was an act of injustice that ought to stain the reputation of any public man. The feeling not of Conservatives, not of supporters of the late Government, but of every high-minded and honourable man in Canada was one of gratification that there was sufficient public spirit in a great political party to come forward and in the most substantial manner testify what they felt a public man deserved who had spent his life and talents in the service of his country, without being able to obtain the means of that pecuniary independence which his position required, in the interests of the Dominion. The public sentiment was that, although non-ourable and creditable as the act was to the party and public sentiment, it was no more than a simple measure of justice to the high-minded and honourable man who, during a long period had shown himself to be a true and devoted patriot, and who had sacrificed himself at the shrine of his country; it would have been discreditable enough had the hon. the Minister of Justice so far forgot himself to have used that language in the absence of any statement made elsewhere, but it was the more so when viewed in the light of the fact that the Hon. D. L. Macpherson, a man of high character and unblemished honour, had pledged his word and honour that he had no communication with the right hon. member for Kingston, except in regard to the mode of investment, and that he was entirely ignorant as to who were the subscribers to the fund. This was not the first time that the hon. the Minister of Justice had applied the epithet of criminal to the right hon. the member for Kingston. The hon. gentleman went into West Toronto, and surrounded by his personal acquaintances and friends on a public platform, he denounced the hon. member for Kingston as a convicted criminal, and appealed to the electors for a verdict against the hon. member for Kingston, who was regarded by the large majority of the people of Canada as one of the most unstained and unselfish patriots to be found in the country. The hon. gentleman received his answer—500 of a majority in that magnificent constituency hurled the accusation back in his teeth, and branded him as a slanderer. That verdict had again and again been endorsed by the people, east, west, north and south, and, wherever there was a constituency of independent men, free from the corrupt seductions of the Government, the hon. gentleman would receive the same verdict, that the right hon. member for Kingston was an unstained patriot, and he a foul-mouthed slanderer. After a life spent in making the worse appear the better reason, which was the hon. gentleman's business and profession, he had become an adopt as a special pleader, and had he listened to him for the first time, he might have placed some confidence in his professions of purity, but he knew what denunciations of corruption made by the hon. gentleman meant. He knew that where corruption was brought home to the hon. gentleman himself, and fastened on his Government that hon. gentleman just as sincerely and energetically defended the most corrupt and most indefensible transactions which had ever stained the reputation of any Government in this country. Did the hon. gentleman want to be informed on this point? He would recall to the mind of the House, a transaction which took place before he (Mr. Blake) had held for one month the position of a member of the Government of Canada; and point to the fact that, no sooner was the hon. gentleman in his seat as a member of the Government, than that Administration was negotiating with a great Railway Company, on the eve of a general election, and the result of that negotiation was the taking by that Government of $69,000 of public money out of the Treasury of Canada, and the handing of it over to that company. He was not a lawyer; but he challenged the hon. gentleman himself to say, on the floor of the House, although the hon. gentleman might defend that corrupt and indefensible transaction,—that this act was not done, not only without the sanction of law, or parliamentary authority, but also that it was not done in express defiance of the law; and yet that hon. gentleman talked to the House about purity in reference to the transaction in question. The law required that, if the money could be paid at all, the Government before paying it must have the report of the Treasury Board, in express terms; but that money was paid without having the authority of the Treasury Board at all for the payment. And this was not all. That hon. gentleman himself ran an election in West Durham. A distinguished gentleman, well known to the people of this country—who he believed lived in West Durham—was Mr. Simpson, the President of the Bank of Ontario; and did the hon. gentleman not know that on the counter of that bank lay a subscription paper to secure money to pay that hon. gentleman's election expenses? Did he not know that when customers came into the bank, they were requested to put their names to this paper and subscribe? And did he not know that, having paid the hon. gentleman's election expenses, which had been subscribed for on the counter of the Ontario Bank, and having collected the money to do so, the Bank of Ontario had drawn out of the pockets of the people of Canada something like $50,000 a year, from the hour that hon. gentleman had taken his seat in the Government of Canada down to the present moment? And yet that hon. gentleman talked about purity to hon. members of the House, and about purity in running elections. He was not going to justify the transaction of his hon. friend (Mr. Robinson), but with relation to it he would say that his hon. friend's statement was plain, unvarnished and straightforward. His hon. friend made a clear statement of his convictions and feelings, and evidently felt justified in what he had done. The Northern Railway Company had felt they had to contend against hostile influences in the House, and that parties in the House were interested in attacking their interests, and they had thought it right and proper that they should meet that hostility by endeavouring to have some person in the House prepared to defend their interests when attacked. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) mean to say that his hon. friend from West Toronto was the only man interested in railways who ever sat in that House, or who so interested sought aid and support from the Government. An hon. gentleman so situated had sat on their side of the House; and what did that hon. member do? He went over to the Ministerial side of the House, and immediately obtained substantial favours and assistance from the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, for that very railway. That hon. gentleman then at once secured justice at all events, and this was the only means of getting it. Night after night, and day after day, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, in the Committee Rooms vindicated the interests of railways and companies with which they were connected, yet they had never been attacked. The truth was that the Minister of Justice in this instance had sought to pay off an old score which, years ago, was incurred by the spirited assault made by the hon. member for West Toronto in answer to excessive provocation given by the hon. gentleman from South Bruce, who should have reserved his wrath for the devoted heads of the overwhelming majority of his own friends and neighbours who rejected his advice on that occasion in sustaining his hon. friend from West Toronto. But one would suppose that the very name of electoral corruption would shock these hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Had the Minister of Justice ever heard of the judgment—the legal judgment delivered by the Chief Justice of the great Province of Ontario in the case of the London election. Did he know the language in which Colonel Walker was then branded as one of the most corrupt men to be found in the bounds of Canada; and was he aware that this judgment was confirmed by the full Court, which further disqualified Colonel Walker, and branded him as worse than corrupt—as a man who had given testimony under oath which was unworthy of belief. But instead of these hon. gentlemen being shocked with regard to this matter, did they not find the Premier, when he received an ovation in his own county, have, as his body-guard, supporter and right hand man, this same Colonel Walker who had been branded by one of the highest Courts of the country as one of the most corrupt men in the Dominion. And not only that, but when the Minister of the Interior went to run an election as a Minister of the Crown, this man, who had been disqualified from even tendering a vote by a judgment of Court, and who was debarred from polluting by his presence any Legislative Assembly in the country, was the companion as the henchman, advocate, and supporter of the Minister of the Interior; and yet these hon. gentlemen had the audacity to talk about electoral corruption, and to make professions of purity which, however well-sounding in the ears of the hon. gentlemen behind them, only excited a feeling of disgust and contempt through the House and country on the part of every man who was not prepared to support and uphold unvarnished hypocrisy instead of purity.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he did not propose to follow at any length the hon. member for Cumberland with regard to the rash and stale slanders to which the hon. gentleman had given utterance. He did not think that Col. Walker's case should be discussed on the floor of the House. There were some crumbs of comfort and sweet morsels which the hon. gentlemen opposite were entitled to enjoy and roll under their tongues; and, from the beginning to the end, he was glad that these hon. gentlemen were commencing to talk as they had done last summer. They said, as it were:—"We do not pretend to be pure; we have no respect for purity, though we did at one time make the country believe that we were honest; but now—look at Colonel Walker." He was not there to defend Colonel Walker.

An HON. MEMBER: I should think not.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: But he was there to defend the hon. gentleman from Cumberland against himself. That hon. gentleman, reckless as he was in denouncing the Minister of Justice as a foul-mouthed slanderer, and as a leading public man in this country, yet to some extent he had a reputation, if the hon. gentleman himself had no regard for it.

Mr. TUPPER: I did not say that the Minister of Justice was a condemned criminal.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: The hon. gentleman had, however, said that the Minister of Justice was a foul-mouthed slanderer. It was a shame to say such a thing in the House. No man occupying the hon. gentleman's position should have been willing so to degrade the discussion; such tactics were a disgrace to the House and the hon. gentleman. He was prepared to meet the hon. gentleman there or elsewhere, and settle the stale accusations of which the hon. gentleman had spoken. He did not pretend that human nature on his side of the House was better than human nature on the other side; but he did affirm that the Liberal Party had been so led as to make political dishonesty in its ranks impossible. The hon. gentleman defended the Northern Railway transaction, and told the people to prepare themselves for a revival of the olden times, when railway companies had not only sent members to Parliament, but had also subscribed funds as an honorarium to the chief law officer of the Crown. The conduct of the hon. gentleman had been indecent and improper. He did not think that the hon. gentleman from West Toronto was so greatly to blame, and he was not going to attack the right hon. member for Kingston. These hon. gentlemen were the victims of a system which had existed for twenty years. They had been surrounded by a clique of men who believed that the benefits the country had to bestow were for them alone. The hon. gentleman for Cumberland had not only justified the action of the Northern Railway Company, but had also said it was naturally to be expected that railway companies should send members to Parliament to represent, not the people, but these corporations. The hon. gentleman from West Toronto was the victim of a system which had only been exposed in part. The right hon. member for Kingston had once declared in the House, he had proof that an American railway corporation had paid his own (Mr. Huntington's) election expenses, and that he (Mr. Huntington) sat as a representative of alien enemies; but of this no proof had been made. It appeared, however, that at the time the hon. member for Kingston was bringing that false charge against himself, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) occupied the position in which the Northern Railway Commission Report that night placed him; and the hon. member for West Toronto held the position in which he, too, had been placed. The country should understand properly the circumstances, because the hon. member for Cumberland, amid the enthusiastic cheers of his supporters, had announced that a railway corporation might fitly expend public money it happened to have in its hands, to send members to the House to represent its interests and press its claims in it.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HUNTINGTON thought it might be well to enquire how many other railway companies had acted on that principle. Hon. Mr. McPherson, whose name had been mentioned that night, had been a politician expecting favours from the country, and one who had canvassed and obtained subscriptions to the fund in question. The position was painful but the truth must be told. He solemnly called the attention of the House to the dangers connected with the doctrine which the hon. gentleman from Cumberland had advanced that night, with the clamorous approval of his supporters. As to the taunts of corruption which had been cast across the floor of the House, they were untrue. The Liberals had declared that elections must be purely carried on, and, if their own friends had suffered in the administration of the law, this only the more clearly proved the sincerity of the Party. He did not grudge the hon. gentlemen the comfort to be obtained from the fact that their friends had so suffered; but he would add that they had only followed the corrupt policy pursued by the hon. gentlemen opposite during the past twenty years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for Shefford had stated that they were the victims of a system which had existed for the past twenty years. The hon. gentleman did not blame them so much as he pitied them; and the hon. gentleman gave them the advantage of his sorrow. He could look back not twenty but thirty-three years; to nearly twenty years of official life, and to thirty-three years of Parliamentary life, and he would declare, in the presence of the House and in the presence of the country, that neither the men nor the Governments with which he had been connected could be justly charged with any acts of corruption. They could hold up their heads in this country as he held up his head in the House, and declare that, if ever a Government was conducted with a sincere, a simple, and an anxious desire for the good of the country, and for no other purpose and no other wish, it was the Government with which he was connected. In a style similar to what they had heard that night, they had been charged by their opponents with improper conduct; all kinds of stories had been concocted against them; and all kinds of scandals had been sought to be raised and resuscitated; but, whenever these accusations were examined and sifted, they were found to be baseless and groundless. He remembered the time when there was a great cry throughout the country that the late Government had been guilty of all kinds of crimes which would drive them from public life, because they had paid too much for mucilage and penknives. From every hustings at every election, the cry of mucilage and penknives was raised against them, but a decent old Reformer said the other day in Upper Canada: "I don't know how it is Sir John managed the country with a little mucilage and a few penknives, when it takes millions of dollars to keep our people in power." The hon. gentleman said they had corrupted the country and the electors. The hon. gentlemen opposite did not corrupt the electors, but they bought up the elected. The hon. member for Queen's stated the other day that the whole delegation, headed by Mr. Laird, was bought up. That was not denied and could not be denied, and the hon. members had to ask why as they were promised the bribe, they did not get it. Mr. Laird got it, and the members for Prince Edward Island whose votes were drawn away from the late Government were diddled out of it. The hon. member for Shefford talked about purity. Why, neither in his public or private life, could that hon. gentleman talk of purity. The hon. gentleman had a face of copper.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: I challenge—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall adjourn the House if order is not maintained.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: I desire, Mr. Speaker—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand it, the hon. member for Shefford has risen to a point of order. I want to hear what it is before deciding.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: In order to state the point of order, I must repeat what the hon. gentleman has said. He said I had a face of copper, and that I had no respectability either in public or private life.

Mr. SPEAKER: Oh no; the hon. gentleman did not say that. The hon. gentleman said that the hon. member for Shefford had talked of purity in private life. What the precise meaning of that is I do not understand. It may be an insinuation, and a very improper one.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: I may be permitted to make one observation. It is not the first time the hon. gentleman has made the accusation. There is no ground for it, and I challenge him to repeat it.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to observe this great excitement, which has gone further than it is desirable it should go. I shall endeavour to watch very closely what is said, and if any observations which are out of order are made, I shall endeavour to call the hon. gentlemen to order. A statement was made by the hon. member for Cumberland which was not put in a way which seemed to be understood by some hon. gentlemen on my right. As far as I understand it, the hon. member did not charge the hon. the Minister of Justice with being a foul-mouthed slanderer, but said the hon. the Minister of Justice could not have used the expression "convicted criminal" in any part of the country without such a statement being made to imply that he was a "foul-mouthed slanderer." The language is very objectionable, and I am very sorry that it has been used. I shall endeavour to make parliamentary rules observed, and call any hon. gentleman to order who is out of order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had been called to order a little too soon; and he was sorry Mr. Speaker's warning had not been given a little earlier in the debate. The hon. member for Shefford called him to order in one breath and in the next challenged him to repeat the statement. After securing a ruling that the remark was out of order, the hon. member challenged him to repeat it. If that hon. gentleman had not run away from the subpoena issued for him and had given evidence before the Pacific Scandal Commission and told the truth, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) could have made him prove, out of his own mouth, that he was in league with aliens for the purpose of doing away with the best interests of his country.

Mr. HUNTINGTON called the hon. gentleman to order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman alluded to what I said on a former occasion, and I have a right to justify everything I said. But I regard not the statements of that hon. gentleman; I will hand them over to the tender mercies of others,—to the hon. member for Chateauguay, to the Courts in Scotland, to the law—

Mr. BLAKE called the hon. gentleman to order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman himself said I was a criminal.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that to apply to the hon. member for West Toronto, and not to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE: Your understanding is perfectly correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TUPPER: That is taking back.

Mr. BLAKE: Not at all; I say that Mr. Speaker's understanding of my remarks is perfectly correct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he knew that statement had been made in Toronto, but he thought the hon. the Minister of Justice had reconsidered the matter, and that the amicable arrangements established between them would have prevented the repetition of that unjust and injurious language towards himself. And he (Sir John A. Macdonald) must consider such language unjust and injurious, when, after styling him a "convicted criminal" on the hustings at Toronto, the hon. the Minister of Justice held out the right hand of fellowship or hospiality to him. He believed that the hon. gentleman had regretted, even in the hour of political triumph or excitement, ever having used the expression. He could not pretend that everything he had done had been correct. He had often confessed, upon looking back at his long political career, and seeing things with the light of ripened experience, that he should like to undo many things. He had no desire to raise himself falsely in the estimation of his countrymen, but he believed he had earned this character at least: "With all his faults, frailties and failings, still we believe he did what he thought best for his country." The late circuit he had made had proved that he had not only the esteem of those politically connected with him, but the good-will of those politically opposed. His whole soul, while in Parliament, his every feeling and ambition were governed by a desire for the good of the country. That, in a country like this, could only be obtained by the assistance of political friends, and that he was a strong party man and had been supported by strong party men was a necessity before he could do the good which even his opponents admitted he did. He was grieved extremely at the tone which the hon. the Minister of Justice had adopted towards him. He thought a new era had commenced—that the very appropriate lesson the hon. gentleman gave the House the other day, when he appealed to hon. members to set aside all strong language and irritable feeling, would abolish all this bitterness. Yet the hon. gentleman had availed himself of this opportunity to give the hon. member for West Toronto a good return for what he said of him (Mr. Blake) in that city a year ago. But the hon. gentleman was not satisfied with that, but by a series of insinuations he attempted to injure him (Sir John A. Macdonald) in the good opinion of the House and the country. The legislation respecting the Northern Railway, regarding which so many inuendoes had been uttered by the hon. the Minister of Justice, was carried on in Parliament like the legislation affecting any other road. Everything they required doing was investigated by the Railway Committee, which was composed of leading men on both sides of the House. He did not remember that he was present at any one of the discussions upon any Bill affecting the Northern Railway; and hon. members knew that after being fully discussed in Committee, railway Bills generally obtained the sanction of the House with little observation. His hon. friend for Cumberland, to whom he must return his most grateful thanks for the manly defence he had made in his behalf, had truly said that the effort made to receive half a million of dollars from the Northern Railway Company by the late Government, and brought down to the House by Mr. Tilley, was done after careful consideration by the Auditor-General. The Government was so anxious that the matter should be fully considered that, although the railway laid all their statements before them, and used all the arguments that ought to be required in order to obtain the Government sanction, the Government refused to accede. The report as to the road was made by Mr. Langton, and he was known to be both honest and capable. He, at all events, was not bribed by the Northern Railway; he, at all events, had no election expenses to be paid; he, at all events, had no testimonial given to him. He went to Toronto to examine the books as a public officer, and on his report the Government felt itself satisfied in coming down with that proposal. If had truly been said that on discussion in the House, and on objection by the hon. the Premier—who had a perfect right to object if he thought it his duty—the Government withdrew the resolutions. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not profess to be a man of accounts, but he placed the most implicit confidence in the statement of Mr. Langton, and he thought Parliament was making a mistake in refusing to accept the report of that gentleman as to the amount the Northern Railway could be called upon to pay. But what he (Sir John A. Macdonald) most desired to impress upon the House, was that the Government in making that proposition did so upon the report of their trusted officer. How often, nay, how universally did the hon. the Premier justify everything done by a report of a officer of a Department. In every point his reference was the officer in charge of the particular work. In the issuance of the Commission he acted upon a report of an officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He justifies himself by it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; I stated that we accepted the report as a matter of course.

Mr. MASSON: You said you were no lawyer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his hon. friend could not help that ministerial responsibility. It was said the Minister of Justice was absent from the country at the time, but the services of the Deputy Minister were called in, and, his report being accepted, the Government must assume the responsibility of it. The late Government, in like manner, acted upon the report of Mr. Langton, he being the head of the Accounts Department of the Dominion; and the insinuation that the Government were bought or induced from friendly, political or any other object, not to the good of the country, was what he (Sir John A. Macdonald) believed he might fairly call a calumny—a calumny of the worst kind, whether insinuated or asserted. And now, as to his own case. The hon. gentleman had said it was a very suspicious circumstance that the road had subscribed to his testimonial. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was surprised at this attack upon him after the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Macpherson. It was always unpleasant to have personal matters brought up in this way; but in the vicissitudes of political life one must expect that kind of thing. He had had a great deal of it in his time, and he submitted, as he was obliged to do and as he had been accustomed to do for many a long day. It would be remembered that, in 1870, he was struck down with illness supposed to be mortal. He lay for months in a state, as Mr. Macpherson had stated in his remarks in another place, which was supposed to be his last. This being made known, his friends began to consider as to what would become of his family. He did not like to speak of this, but he supposed he must. His friends, finding it exceedingly probable that his family would lose their head and protector, began to consider what could be done. On enquiry they found—whether through his own fault or his devotion to public business—that he would leave them but a slender provision. He himself was perfectly unconscious of what was going on around him; and it was then, as he understood it, that this movement commenced. It was taken up vigorously, not in the idea that it was to do any good to him, but to those he left behind him. It was feared that he was far beyond the need of any pecuniary circumstances, and that the place which knew him would know him no more. The movement was actuated simply by the feeling that his family should not be left in penury. After recovering his consciousness, he was taken to Prince Edward Island, where he stayed the whole summer, and was at that time unaware that the movement was going on. It was never communicated to him, never hinted to him, and he never heard of it in any way until, on his return to Ottawa in the fall, he saw some statements made in the newspapers that the project was rumoured. But his friends studiously kept the knowledge away from him. It was not until Mr. Macpherson asked his approval of the names submitted to him as trustees of the fund that he had any specific information of the matter. These names were submitted, and he was sure he had only to mention them for every hon. member to agree that they were as honourable men as there were in Canada, and that they would not allow anything to be connected with the testimonial so far as they knew, that would touch their honour, his own honour, or the honour of his family. Their names were Colonel Gzowski, Hon. George W. Allan, and Colonel Burnet. These gentlemen were the trustees of the fund at the present moment. He had the same complaint as his hon. friend from West Toronto, in that neither of them were called as witnesses before the Commission. Here was a grave charge brought against them. Its animus was obvious from the way it was spoken of in the House, yet not the slightest intimation was given him that the matter would be brought up before a Commission. He did not know of any charge being made against him, except from what he was told by Mr. Macpherson. He would read Mr. Macpherson's statement. Why did not the Commissioners ask Mr. Cumberland to make his statement of the matter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We did ask Mr. Cumberland.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Commissioners took good care only to ask such questions as would inculcate him, and not those which might exculpate him. The statement of Mr. Macpherson was as follows:—

“I desire to make a personal statement. I have observed in the report of the Northern Railway Commission my name mentioned in connection with the subscriptions to what is known as the Sir John Macdonald testimonial, and I wish to impart some information to the House on the subject. The presentation of a substantial testimonial to Sir John Macdonald was a matter agitated by his friends from time to time for years before it was earnestly proceeded with. They considered that the long, useful, and distinguished services he had rendered to the country entitled him to some substantial testimonial at the hands of his friends. They were aware that he had devoted the best part of his life—nearly a quarter of a century—to the service of the country, receiving only a very small salary, which was inadequate to make provision for his family should he be taken from them, but it was not until after his severe illness in 1870—an illness which we all know proved all but fatal—that any earnest movement was made towards obtaining a substantial testimonial for him. At that time a number of his friends took counsel together, and decided upon proceeding with the project. They felt very deeply how painful it would be had he been carried away at that time, as there was every prospect of being the case. For weeks together the announcement of his death would have caused less surprise than the announcement that he continued to live. It was felt, I say, that it would be a painful and distressing event if those dependent upon him should be left on the world without adequate provision. It was then a committee was appointed; and I was asked to act as treasurer. I consented, and became perhaps the most active member of the committee. I state here that I never communicated with Sir John Macdonald on the subject, never told him that such a project was on foot; I never communicated with him directly or indirectly until the subscription was closed, when, of course, he had to be communicated with, to ask him the names of the trustees he would like to have appointed to administer the fund. I am the only person who knew the names of all the contributors, and I never stated to Sir John Macdonald the name of any one of the donors to that fund. Sir John Macdonald was perfectly ignorant of the subscriptions to the fund except what he may have seen in the newspapers. If there was anything blameworthy in receiving the subscription referred to, Sir John Macdonald is entirely innocent of it. I don't think there was anything blameworthy. I am quite prepared to assume all the blame. If there is any blame, it attaches to the committee, and especially to me, because I was the acting member of the committee, but none can attach to Sir John Macdonald, for he was entirely ignorant of the names of the contributors to the fund. He was so then, and he is so to-day, except the one that has been made public through the agency of the Commission. As I have already said, I don't think it was at all blameworthy to receive that subscription; and, if there are any who think otherwise, they must, at all events, acquit Sir John Macdonald, for I repeat, as unqualifiedly and emphatically as I am capable of doing, that he was entirely ignorant of it, as he still is of every other subscription to the fund."

Every word of that was true. He could declare upon his oath that he did not know then and did not now know the name of one contributor except the Northern Railway, and what was said in the newspapers about the Great Western Railway. Excepting these, he did not know the name of a single contributor. He must say that he did not feel at all too proud to receive this testimonial from his friends. The fund was in the hands of the trustees. He had no control over it. He could not lay his hand on a dollar, the money being for the benefit of his family when he died. He was not ashamed that his friends took such an interest in him that they did something to provide for his family when he was no more. He did not think justice had been done the Mail newspaper respecting the stock taken by Mr. Cumberland. The Mail was not subsidized by the Northern Railway. Mr. Cumberland became a subscriber for so much stock. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) saw him write his name in the stock book. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) took a great interest in the starting of the Mail to counterbalance the influence of the Globe. He took ten shares himself, which he had not now, however. He, or the late Sandfield Macdonald, got Mr. Cumberland to subscribe. Mr. Cumberland was a member of the party and was supposed to be wealthy, and whose business was it if he took stock in the Mail? The Mail Company had nothing to do with the fund out of which Mr. Cumberland paid for the stock. The Northern Railway did not subscribe. It was Mr. Cumberland who subscribed, and if he chose to pay it with Northern Railway stock that was a matter to be settled between him and the directors. It was greatly to be regretted that the Commission had been appointed. There was no justification for it. If the Minister of Justice had been in the country at the time, he would not have sanctioned the issuance of the Commission. If an investigation were required, it could be had by a proper legal tribunal, and not by this Star Chamber. The existence of a Commission of this kind used recklessly in the way it had been, was the destruction of the freedom and liberty of the subject. If the Government of the day had a claim of £5 or £5,000 or £5,000,000, it did not matter; it was only in the position of creditor, and it had no power to appoint a Commission of judges of its own choosing, without reference to the debtor at all. The Commissioners were judges; they tried the case; and they were chosen by the Government alone for political reasons. Charges were made against gentlemen without giving them an opportunity of appearing before the Commission to answer them. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that what the First Minister had said about the individual character of the Commissioners was true, yet they were known to be violent political partisans. They were all men who would go great lengths for the gentlemen opposite; they would go as far as they could honestly, and perhaps, like other strong partisans, they might strain a point a little in favour of their political friends. Now, why did the First Minister issue the Commission? It was not, he ventured to say, because of the statement of old Mr. Hamilton—a man dissatisfied with Colonel Cumberland because he refused to raise his salary—that $2,500 had been paid into the Testimonial Fund. The real reason was to have an opportunity to get a stab at a political opponent. The hon. the First Minister said the Commission could not continue to sit after the Northern Railway had paid the claim of the Government. But the Commission was issued after the agreement to pay the money had been made. The Government said they could not get over accepting the money. If so, if the bargain was obligatory, then why was the Commission issued after that bargain had been made? Yet the Commission was issued and evidence was taken behind the backs of the accused. But, when it was found that the investigation if pursued would affect gentlemen belonging to the Government party, then the Commissioners adjourned, and they did not meet again. They had got their object, base as that object was. The Commission was illegal. Fancy such a Commission being issued in England. Fancy the people of England, who wrote against the old Star Chamber in England, knowing that we had a Star Chamber in Canada. There was one lawyer among the Commissioners, but he was more of a business man than a lawyer, and did not practice at the bar. They took up the charges made by the book-keeper Hamilton, and tried them behind the backs of the accused, and then the report was sent out to the public. The idea of destroying the reputation of men as honest and as high in the estimation of this country as any one of the present Administration from the First Minister downwards, in this manner. See what would happen if this was accepted as a precedent. Again and again, when the Government wanted to stab a man behind his back, they would issue a Commission and call for such evidence as they liked, give such instructions as they liked, and have such private communications with the Commissioners as they liked. Men were to have their characters assailed and their reputations ruined by a Star Chamber of this kind. In England it would not be submitted to for a moment, and he was much surprised if the people of Canada either would stand it when they understood what had been done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. YOUNG said this discussion had brought out some very grave facts, which it was absolutely necessary the House should take cognizance of. He should not follow the style of recrimination which had been indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for West Toronto had much to answer for in bringing about such an acrimonious discussion. It had been made acrimonious by the other side for the purpose of preventing the House from seeing the gravity of the facts brought before it. He wished to direct the attention of the House to the gravity of these facts. Funds, which properly belonged to the Dominion of Canada, which ought by Statute to have been paid to the Dominion, were taken out of the coffers of the Northern Railway Company, and applied to purposes which he felt the House was bound to investigate to the bottom. When such grave facts were brought to the attention of this Parliament, when it was proved and could not be denied that moneys belonging properly to the people of this country had been used in election contests on behalf of one political party, Parliament was bound to make a thorough investigation into the facts of the case. He would not enter into the legal bearings of the matter, but he thought it would be most extraordinary if the Government, having so large a claim upon the company, could not, when certain misdemeanours had been brought to its notice, issue a Commission to enquire into the way in which the company's affairs had been managed so far as the interests of the Government were concerned. The fact that the Commission had shown that this money was improperly and fraudulently used, proved that it was in the interests of the people that it should have been appointed. This company, which was indebted to the Government to the extent of about three millions of dollars, had taken funds properly belonging to the people of this country, and had paid nearly $6,000 towards the election expenses in Algoma of the present member for West Toronto, and had overpaid him about $5,000 above the salary to which he was entitled as President of the road; and, further, had given $2,500 towards a testimonial to the right hon. member for Kingston. He (Mr. Young) felt bound to accept, for the present at any rate, the statement of the right hon. gentleman that he was not personally cognizant of the fact that this amount was taken out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company and contributed to the testimonial in his honour; but could that be said of the Senator who got that money into his possession, and was there any doubt that that money was contributed by the Manager of the Northern Railway Company with a corrupt intent to induce the Government of the day not to press the company for its debt due the Dominion, or to agree to a composition of its claim? At about the same time that this contribution was given, a proposition was made to relieve the company of its debt of three millions for about $500,000, and it was impossible to doubt that the amount was contributed by the Manager and President of the company with the view of influencing the Government of the day corruptly in regard to the claim which they had upon the company. Thus, whatever might be said in excuse of the course of the right hon. member for Kingston, it could not be said of the other parties who took these funds, and fraudulently and improperly devoted them to this purpose. These circumstances being disclosed a short time after the revelations in reference to the Pacific Railway, had created a very painful impression on the public mind. They were aware that great indignation was felt when it became known that the charter for the greatest public work ever undertaken in Canada was handed over to Sir Hugh Allan with one hand, while $162,500 was taken by the Government of Canada with the other, and that this money was used to debauch the whole of the constituencies. It was then felt that a huge system of corruption had grown up under the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, and, when it was found that the Northern Railway Company's funds had been employed, to some extent at least, in connection with the Government of the day, the impression deepened, and still more was this the case, when, within the last few weeks, it had been found that a large portion of the Secret Service money had been retained in the hands of the right hon. member for Kingston. There was a strong impression that they had not yet got to the bottom of these matters, that there was a depth of iniquity not yet probed; and, in connection with this matter, they would be derelict in their duty to the people of Canada if they did not see that an investigation was made by a Committee of this House into the whole facts of the case. Let the whole truth be known, and, if the same statements could be made with respect to the present Government, he would insist upon an examination into them also. They had been made in reference to the Opposition. In this case they had been admitted by the hon. gentleman who had received some $11,000 of this money, and they were bound, as Canadians, in duty to their country, and in vindication of public morality, to sift these facts to the very bottom. They were bound to consider that only two years ago this company came to Parliament professing to be bankrupt—professing that it was impossible for them to pay the claim which the people of Canada had against them. When the proposition was made, he was doubtful as to the position of the company, and he took the trouble to read the papers carefully, and was led to believe that the company had not misappropriated any of these funds, and that in deed and in truth, it was impossible to collect the claim which the country had against them. Now, however, they found that the management had been deliberately using funds which ought to have gone to the Dominion of Canada, in electing gentlemen to Parliament to sustain the Government of the day. That, of course, took away so much of what belonged to the people of this country. If he had been aware that this company was so misusing these funds—and they could not tell yet how large the amounts were which had been smuggled into their accounts, as, for all they could tell, sufficient to pay the whole claim of the people of Canada might have been so used—he would not have supported the proposal to relieve the company. By that relief the people of Canada had lost a very considerable amount of money, having obtained only $1,100,000, while the whole debt, including interest, amounted to about three millions. The whole circumstances, he thought, were of the most painful description. He regarded them as deeply to be regretted, and the hon. member for West Toronto showed too much courage—courage rather of the quixotic order—when he dragged the facts before the attention of the House. But having made the statement, and out of his own mouth confessed the leading facts, the House was bound to see that the whole circumstances were sifted to the fullest extent. Another reason for moving the amendment he was about to submit to the House was this: There was a very strong feeling throughout the country, and it existed to-day that when certain other facts came to the knowledge of Parliament in 1873—that the charter for the Pacific Railway had been handed over to Sir Hugh Allan, and that he had spent $350,000 in trying to carry the elections for the Government of the day—this House ought not to have allowed the matter to drop, as it did, but should have made a most searching investigation, and taken the steps which would have been taken in England, provided the charges had been satisfactorily proved. If such a charge had been made in the Imperial Parliament as was made in 1873, if the facts had been brought out there as they had been revealed here, he felt satisfied that the Parliament of England could and would have taken only one course, and there were many people in Canada to-day who believed that, in 1873, Parliament stopped short of its duty, and that action should have been taken which would have marked the indignation of the people at the wide-spread corruption that prevailed at that time. He, therefore, felt that no excuse was necessary in moving an amendment, and it was one which few hon. members would take the responsibility of voting against. He moved in amendment:

“That all the words after ‘that’ in the said motion be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—‘the allegations in the Report and evidence of the Commission on the Northern Railway Company, as to the application of moneys payable to the Government, deserve the serious consideration of this House, and that a Select Committee of nine members be appointed to inquire into, and report upon the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.’”

Mr. TUPPER asked the ruling of the Speaker as to whether the amendment was in order, as it did not amend the motion but swept it away and dealt with a question altogether outside of it. At the same time he was in favour of a motion which would give the Committee power to make an exhaustive enquiry.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the motion was in order.

Mr. BLAKE said he would offer a few words with regard to the two-fold proposition of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron): First, as to the legality of the Commission, and, secondly, as to the propriety of the Government accepting payment of the money in view of the facts which were disclosed. With regard to the question of the original issue of the Commission, although he assumed the responsibility as a member of the Government, yet he was absent when the question was decided. Upon his return to Canada, he was made cognizant of the issue of the Commission, and he decided to remain in his present position as a Minister, and to assume the official and technical responsibility in regard to the Commission. It was well understood that the Government possessed a very extensive power to issue Commissions, but those Commissions, unless they came within the language of the Statute and possessed the statutory powers, were simply voluntary Commissions, capable of receiving such evidence and obtaining such information as persons might voluntarily choose to bring before them. The law declared that, under certain circumstances, Commissions might be issued, clothed with greater power, and if it should be adjudged—and the Courts were open and the question could be raised at any moment—that a Commission had exceeded its powers under the Statute, that instant its powers ceased, as it derived or assumed to derive vitality from the operations of the Statute; that instant the compulsory power of procuring the attendance and examination of witnesses ceased. If the legal argument of the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for North Victoria were correct, that no witness need have attended before the Commission, then, if the Commissioners sought to enforce the attendance of witnesses or the production of papers, the question of the legality of their act could have been raised in the Court with the utmost facility. Therefore it was that the law itself provided against any abuse of that power, because, if it clothed with that power only the Commissions which were within the law, and if this or any other Commission went beyond the law, there were no means of obtaining more information than persons were willing voluntarily to give. Commissions had been issued very extensively in England for many years, but the distinctions were very clear and plain between such voluntary Commissions and Commissions assuming compulsory powers. The charge, which was not insinuated but made very broadly, as to the mode in which the investigation had been conducted, and as to the course which was alleged to have been assumed by the Commissioners to have obtained certain information and then closed the enquiry, was not warranted by the evidence contained in the report now before the House. No one who read the report and remembered what he read could say that there had been anything improper done either by the action of the Government or by the action of the Commissioners. To say anything else was to impute a wilful misstatement of facts to the gentlemen who had acted on the Commission, and, whatever might be their political views, they were certainly respected respectively in the communities in which they resided. He did not believe any such charge for a moment. They made as full an investigation as the obstacles and difficulties which they met enabled them to do, and their labours were terminated only on coming to the legal conclusion that the circumstance of the payment of the $560,000 had, in effect, put an end to their Commission. That view was pressed upon them by the solicitor of the company, and the respectable lawyer as well as respectable man, the Chairman of the Commission, came to the same conclusion. He (Mr. Blake) maintained that the conclusion was right, and it was the conclusion he had reached on the subject. Looking at the preamble of the Commission, it appeared to him that, so soon as this money was paid, the purpose for which the Commission was appointed ceased to exist, and it could no longer legally continue its labours. The Commissioners came to the same conclusion. It had been said that the Government should have refused to receive the money because, as was alleged, the settlement had been obtained by fraud, and the hon. member for the North Riding of Victoria had applied to this case the doctrines familiar to lawyers, and applicable to settlements between man and man. But this was not such a settlement, nor a settlement at all in point of fact. An Act of Parliament authorized the company to pay a specified sum of money, with certain arrears of interest, at any time before a fixed date, to the Government's financial agents in London or to the Receiver-General in Canada, and he had advised his hon. friend, who was anxious to be able to refuse the money, that, under the circumstances, this could not be avoided. Parliament alone could alter the prescribed conditions. He might have been wrong, but such was his opinion that he had also advised his hon. friend that the time for payment could not be extended, as was desired. Under these circumstances, within a day or two of the expiration of the parliamentary term, the £115,000 was paid to the Receiver-General. The hon. member for Cumberland alleged that, in 1875, the Government, from corrupt motives, made a settlement with this company; and that hon. gentleman, with the remarkable consistency which characterized his arguments, declared, a few minutes later, that because, with the assent of Parliament, the Government, in 1876, extended the time, they had determined to destroy the credit of the company, by issuing a Commission of Enquiry; and, further, that, a short time afterwards, in order to regain the lost favour of the company, the Government had accepted the money. Such a course, sustained only by such suggestions, would hardly receive the credit or approval of the House. The hon. gentleman had also alluded to his election expenses in 1867, in the West Riding of Durham. His intended constituents had then told him that they proposed he should be elected free of expense to himself. At the close of the election, he said he thought it reasonable that they should not be at the charge of livery expenses and some little advertising he understood had taken place, and sent them his cheque for £25. This was returned, but he sent it back again, insisting on its acceptance. This was his account of his personal election expenses on that occasion. He, however, thought it quite probable that many electors had contributed small sums towards the general and legitimate expenditure. His successor, as representative of that riding, the present Chief Justice of Manitoba, had told him that he had been treated in the same way, as was the custom of the Liberal Party on such occasions in that constituency. He considered it alike a credit to the constituency, and no discredit to the candidate. In the South Riding of Bruce, the same course was pursued. He had, however, on the occasion of his election—without his consent—while in England, paid some $300 or $400 towards the expenses of his election. He believed that this was the proper way to act under such circumstances; and he thought that, if electors paid such expenses themselves, the expenditure at elections would be greatly reduced. The relations between candidates and electors involved mutual obligations. He would not comment on other observations made by the hon. member for Cumberland; but he left it to the House and country to decide whether they were merited. The hon. member for Kingston had alluded to the retort made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. It was to be remembered that the statement in question was made in the absence of Mr. Laird. It had been previously, however, averred in the newspapers, after Mr. Laird had accepted office and before the elections. Mr. Laird, who had been returned by acclamation, in very distinct terms referred to it on the hustings in Prince Edward Island, when he announced that the hon. member for Kingston or some member of the late Administration informed him early in the preceding Session—that was indeed hinted at in the Speech from the Throne—that he would have a seat in the Cabinet before the close of the Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He did not make that statement in this House, and, if he had done so, he would have lied.

Mr. McMILLAN: Further than that, I question the right of the hon. member for South Bruce to make a statement of that kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. BLAKE said he had never until that night heard this statement denied; and then the hon. gentleman with reference to an absent man, who was the Lieutenant-Governor of a Province, said he lied.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: If he said so, it is so.

Mr. BLAKE said Mr. Laird went on to say that he had not been approached by the member for Lambton or any one of the then Opposition; and that from them he had had no offer, or the suggestion of an offer, of any office whatever. He (Mr. Blake) thought he knew all that occurred on that occasion, and the statement of Mr. Laird was fully and literally true. He himself had then had an interview with Mr. Laird and other of the island members, and what he had said to them was: "There is the blue-book; there is the evidence; you know our views on it; I pray you to study and consider it, and to act as the interests of your country require in this emergency." The hon. member for Kingston charged the Postmaster-General with having run away from the Royal Commission, but it was still open to the hon. member to prove the charges he had made against the Postmaster-General, if he could do so; and the hon. member could then have proved them, if it were possible to do so, in the absence of the hon. member for Shefford. The hon. member for Kingston had attacked other persons in their absence before that Commission. Such a charge, under the circumstances, investigation being challenged, ought not to be repeated, except for the purpose of formulating the charge and proceeding to an enquiry. Justice apparently demanded that treatment of such painful questions. The hon. member for Kingston adverted to the fact that upon an occasion at Toronto he had used the phrase "public criminal" with reference to him.

Mr. TUPPER: Convicted criminal.

Mr. BLAKE said that phrase was not used merely by insinuation, but, on the face of it, and by obvious construction, in connection with that great public investigation when a serious public charge was established, as he believed then and believed even now, by the imperfect testimony of the Commission and from the evidence of the hon. gentleman and his friends. In no other sense was that phrase used. He was not in the habit of using words outside of the House with reference to the conduct of any gentleman which he did not use in it. In his speech in the debate on the Address in 1873, he certainly implied his opinion that the hon. gentleman was in that particular a public criminal, using the phrase in the sense in which it was used to a person guilty of such a political crime as was charged against the hon. gentleman. If the charge of the hon. member for Shefford, as formulated in the motion which was the foundation for the Royal Commission were true, the hon. gentleman would not deny, in the sense in which he put it, that he was a public criminal. His (Mr. Blake's) friends and himself believed the charge was established.

Mr. ORTON: Never.

Mr. BLAKE: I do not expect the hon. gentleman to believe it.

Mr. ORTON: The hon. gentleman did not prove it when he tried in Centre Wellington.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE: I am not discussing whether I proved it or not. This book (the evidence taken before the Royal Commission) proves it. He regretted having been obliged to use that phrase, but it was, in his opinion, the only adequate expression to signify their meaning of the position of the hon. gentleman with reference to the Pacific Railway transaction. The hon. gentleman had alluded, in terms to which he had no objection, to what had occurred since that expression was first used. It had been their good fortune to resume habits of social intercourse, but Mr. Speaker had stated the import of the expression which had called for the reply of the hon. member for Kingston. He would say that, if it appeared from the report of the Commission, that the hon. gentleman had been cognizant of the fact that the subscription to the testimonial had come from the Northern Railway Company under the circumstances under which it actually did come, he should think the term applied to the hon. member for West Toronto applicable to the hon. member for Kingston. It was not established by the evidence that there was any such knowledge on the part of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman had intimated that he had brought irrelevant matters into the debate for the purpose of proving him guilty of corruption. He was bound to explain to the House the whole relations of this company to the Government, with a view to elucidating what had been said by the hon. member for West Toronto, and which was still left in obscurity by that hon. gentleman. Was it not important to know that Mr. Cumberland had been subscribing money in the interest of an election in Ontario; was it not important to know what the circumstances were under which the then hon. member for Algoma had entered the House? The circumstances were such as he had described, and it was important that the matters he had touched upon should be before the House. It was a grave transaction when it was arranged that an hon. member should be assisted in his election out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company. Any insinuation that members of the Government were influenced by friendship or favouritism in the final settlement with the road, was an unfounded calumny. They could not judge from the evidence that the company influenced the late Administration; but they knew what the company thought. They knew how important a vote was, and they had the evidence before them as to the pecuniary assistance rendered the late member for Algoma. In view of that fact, what was to be said of the malice of the insinuation that this Government had been actuated by corrupt motives in their dealings with the company? He was very glad that the statement of the hon. member for West Toronto had been made, even at this late hour. It would have been right for the hon. gentleman to have had an opportunity to go before the Commission if he chose; but he did not agree with the view that the Government was responsible for that. It would have been competent for them to have made the Commission public the moment it closed; but they determined not to do so, and that the evidence should not be divulged in any way or sense until Parliament met. It was competent for the hon. members for Kingston and West Toronto, the instant the report was brought down, to have made any statement they pleased, so that their explanations might go to the country contemporaneously with the allegations in the report. The hon. gentleman had made observations as to the circumstances connected with the subscription to the testimonial. He had never implied that there was anything wrong in the hon. gentleman receiving such a testimonial from his friends. It was quite another thing, however, when they considered whence the funds were derived. The hon. gentleman said he knew nothing about the source of the funds except by report. But the hon. member for North Victoria had told the House that another railway company had contributed to the fund. That came from the hon. gentleman's own side of the House. They did not know, and did not want to suggest anything more as to the remaining source from which the subscriptions came. The hon. member for Kingston said he was discharged from culpability on account of his ignorance of the source from whence the money came, and he acknowledged he would have been inculpated had he known that the money was from the Northern Railway. Then what was the attitude of Hon. Mr. Macpherson who took the money, he knowing that the assets were mortgaged to the Government, working expenses excepted? It was the same as if the money was taken from the public funds. He would state frankly to the hon. member the fact of $2,500 being given ought to have excited some degree of suspicion and evoked some degree of enquiry. There was a saying in the Sacred Book with reference to charity—that the right hand should not know what the left hand did, but it appeared this was reversed. The hon. gentleman implied that it was the duty of the recipient to remain ignorant of the sources from which the money came. The right hon. gentleman had made a mistake in not securing himself against that which might perhaps be the case, that which probably would be the case, and which turned out to be a certainty—that a large portion of this fund was derived from public sources, or from corporations that ought not to have subscribed, and that actually a considerable sum was public money belonging to this country, which the hon. gentleman stated, and his statement was not doubted, was so tied up that it was impossible for it to be restored. He (Mr. Blake) did not think that the term he applied to the hon. member for West Toronto was applicable to this transaction. The fault of the hon. member for Kingston was negligence in not seeing that there was no possibility of this thing happening, and in submitting to an arrangement which rendered restoration impossible.

Mr. DAVIES said that, when he had been in the House three weeks, his hon. friend from Queen's was concluding a speech, in which he said that he (Mr. Davies) had stated to him at a public meeting during the election which the hon. member had recently contested, that he (Mr. Davies) had bargained with the Government for a Minister for Prince Edward Island. On the occasion referred to, he did not think it desirable to reply, having only heard a portion of the speech, and no opportunity to do so had presented itself until now without violating the rules of the House. The right hon. member for Kingston had just stated that the votes of certain Prince Edward Island members had been purchased. The best way to explain the matter would be to make a simple statement of the facts, as far as he was concerned, and he was perfectly indifferent whether it injured the party with which he was associated or not. After the Province of Prince Edward Island came into confederation, just prior to the first election, two members of the late Government, the hon. member for Cumberland and the Hon. Mr. Tilley—

Mr. DEVLIN: I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether the hon. gentleman is really addressing himself on the question before the House, or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has a right to reply to what he considers an imputation upon his character, or at least upon his conduct.

Mr. DAVIES: These two hon members came down, and it was then said by the hon. member for Queen's that they were in such a position with the Government as to secure a Minister for Prince Edward Island, and that that Minister should have the distribution of patronage.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): No, no.

Mr. DAVIES said they thought it desirable to wait upon the Ministers and their views were ascertained. It was stated that it was the intention of the Ministers to give a portfolio to one of the members from Prince Edward Island; with regard to the distribution of patronage that would be a matter to be considered after the elections were over—the Ministry would be guided by the recommendations of those friendly to them. He and the hon. member for Queen's were freely interviewed, and the hon. member for Cumberland and the Hon. Mr. Tilley were very desirous of obtaining their support. No unfair overtures were made to them, but it was urged that they should support the Government if they saw it their duty to do so. They were also interviewed by the Opposition.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. BOWELL: By whom?

Several HON. MEMBERS: Name them.

Mr. DAVIES: It is unnecessary to name them.

Mr. POPE (Queen's): Name them. Don't name those on one side, and not on the other.

Mr. DAVIES said the leaders of the Opposition were desirous of having an interview, and accordingly waited upon them. The hon. gentleman, the present Premier, the hon. the Minister of Justice and the Hon. Mr. Dorion were present. They saw they were very desirous of obtaining their support, provided they could do so conscientiously and fairly. He said that in Prince Edward Island he had been allied with the local Conservative Party, but owing to the unfortunate Pacific Scandal he could not join the Conservative Party at Ottawa. There was very little said. The hon. gentlemen saw they had to contend against what they considered very great corruption, and they hoped they would feel it their duty to support them. This was three or four days before the resignation of the right hon. member for Kingston. He (Mr. Davies) said he felt bound to vote against the then Government. Incidentally he said to the hon. member for Lambton that he would like to know the policy of the Opposition regarding the appointment of a Minister for Prince Edward Island, in case they came into power. The hon. member for Lambton said their policy would be to assign a Minister to Prince Edward Island; but there was no bargain made. The question was asked, not from personal motives, but in the interest of the Province. Accordingly, when the Opposition came into office a Minister was appointed for Prince Edward Island. When he was removed the people in that Province did not think they had suffered a very great grievance, as it was unreasonable for them to expect a Minister for all time. It might be said that the votes of the members from Prince Edward Island were sufficient to turn the scale, but there was not a bargain or sale even if this were so.

Mr. POPE said he had made a statement the other day in the House in a few remarks that were designated as coarse and vulgar, which he would repeat if necessary. He had known the hon. member for King's for about fifty years, and he believed, when that hon. gentlemen made a statement, it was a truthful and honest one. The hon. gentleman stated at a large and intelligent meeting that the only stipulation he had made with the new Government was that Prince Edward Island should have a representative in the Cabinet.

Mr. DAVIES: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not use the word "stipulation."

Mr. POPE: I will prove it in writing by gentlemen whose integrity cannot be doubted.

Mr. SPEAKER: When an hon. member of this House states distinctly that he has not used certain words, I think we are bound, in a parliamentary sense, to accept the denial.

Mr. POPE said he submitted so far as that was concerned, but he would take the earliest opportunity of putting this matter right. He understood the hon. member to say that the only stipulation he and his colleagues made was that a representative of the island should have a seat in the Cabinet. The hon. member himself stated that he put the question to the hon. member for Lambton, and that the latter announced the policy of the then Opposition as favourable to the proposition. Yet the hon. the First Minister declared the other day that he had never said what had been attributed to him, and that he knew nothing of the statement made by the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. SPEAKER said the great inconvenience of such irregular debates was manifest. A distinct statement had been made by the hon. member for Kings, which entitled the hon. member for Queen's to make an explanation respecting something which he was alleged to have said. The hon. member had made his explanation respecting something which he was alleged to have said. The hon. member had made his explanations, and he and the hon. member for Queen's differed very materially as to the precise points of the statement made at that particular time. The whole question was entirely apart from the subject under discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the hon. member for Queen's is allowed to proceed, I shall feel it to be my duty to reply.

Mr. POPE (Queen's): I submit that my veracity has been called in question. The hon. member for King's made a statement in which he stated that the hon. member for Lambton made that declaration to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member said nothing of the sort.

Mr. DAVIES: I said I had asked the hon. member for Lambton, the present Premier, what his policy would be in regard to appointing a Minister for Prince Edward Island. He replied that the policy of the Opposition, if they came into power, would be to give the island a Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was desirable that the matter should be allowed to remain there.

Mr. POPE said he would take other means of proving the statement he had made. A slur had been attempted to be cast on him the other day by the hon. the Minister of Justice, when he had no opportunity to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid it would be improper to reply to it to-night.

Mr. POPE said the slur was in regard to carrying his valuable life across to the island in an ice-boat. He would tell the hon. the Minister of Justice that he (Mr. Pope) represented the finest constituency in the Dominion and was returned by the largest number of votes; that an insult to him was an insult to his constituents, and he would submit to no insult or slur from the hon. the Minister of Justice, or any Minister or hon. member, without taking an opportunity to reply to it. He cared not for himself, but he would adopt that course in justice to his constituents. The statement he had made with respect to the seat in the Cabinet had been fully confirmed. He had not the opportunity to bring it home to the First Minister, but he could point to the hon. the Minister of Justice, whom he found at nine o'clock in the morning at the lodgings of his hon. friend.

Mr. DAVIES said the hon. member for Queen's never caught the hon. the Minister of Justice at his lodgings.

Mr. POPE said it was at the lodgings of Mr. Laird, and his hon. friend from King's was there. The hon. the Minister was astonished when he saw him (Mr. Pope) there, and he beckoned the hon. member for King's out. Those little negotiations were going on at that time. From the attention shown by the hon. the Minister of Justice to the hon. member for Prince Edward Island it might have been thought he was much in love with him. He smiled upon the hon. member his benignant smile.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was reluctantly compelled to call the hon. member to order.

Mr. POPE said he would not have risen to speak had not his name been mentioned. He felt he could justify what he had said, and he had endeavoured to prove that his statements were correct. He had risen to correct what had been said as to his position, which had been assailed. It was well known that at that time promises were made, as had been stated by the hon. member for Kingston, and he (Mr. Pope) was justified in stating the other day that promises were made, and that those promises should be carried out. Every word he had said was true and he was prepared to substantiate it. He well remembered the occasion of the Pacific Scandal debate, when the present Premier made his powerful speech and declared that he would consider that any member of the House who would vote for the other Government would be equally guilty with them, and ought to be so branded. His answer was that if he received the brand it would be in the true interests of his country. But he would not like to brand the hon. the Minister of Justice, and put a mark on him which he could not get rid of.

Mr. SPEAKER called the hon. member to order, and said the language was very unparliamentary.

Mr. POPE.

Mr. POPE said he was only following the example of those who had preceded him.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not intend to answer the harangue of the hon. member, but, as the hon. member had referred to a past debate, he desired to state that he did not intend to cast a slur on the hon. member for Queen's. When proposing the vote for a Penitentiary in Prince Edward Island, he stated that, as members of Parliament, including the hon. member for Queen's, had crossed the ice, convicts might do so. He regretted if the reference had been misunderstood, but it had allowed the House to learn the mode in which the hon. member conducted debates.

Mr. POPE: I desire to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman chooses to speak on the matter before the chair he has the right to proceed, but I must beg him to confine himself to the subject before the House.

Mr. POPE said he would not like to put a mark on the hon. the Minister of Justice that he would not get rid of, but he recollected very well the circumstances when this alleged promise was made to Prince Edward Island. He recollected the trips the hon. gentleman made to negotiate these matters, and he also recollected a notorious character who was prowling about this building at that time. He would like to have his figure cut in wood, and to see some hon. gentlemen of his acquaintance with that figure slung around their necks.

Mr. SPEAKER asked the hon. gentleman if he could show that this matter was connected with the question before the House.

Mr. POPE: Why has the question of a seat for Prince Edward Island been brought up?

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has answered that. There were some observations made on my left which were replied to. The question now before the House is the appointment of a Committee to make special enquiry into the subject of the report of the Commissioners on the Northern Railway.

Mr. POPE: I was merely going to say---

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order. The hon. member for Queen's is so entirely out of order and so determined to persist in continuing out of order that it is impossible to allow him to proceed. I must ask the House to sustain me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Do you decide, Mr. Speaker, that you are to be the judge of the manner in which an hon. member is to address the House? Never was there a Speaker in any House of Commons who made such a misrepresentation of British institutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: I stated distinctly that, if the hon. member persisted in speaking out of order, I must throw myself on the House.

Mr. POPE: Well, Sir—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call on the House to sustain my position.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman from Queen's has sat down at least three distinct times.

Mr. POPE: Only because the Speaker rose.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was watching the whole thing, and he was allowed a latitude by the chair which is not usual. Mr. Sinclair has the chair, and I claim he has the right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: On that point let me say to the House that my impression is that the hon. member for Queen's sat down because I called upon him. I have called him to order because I think he persists in speaking entirely out of all relation to the matter before the House. I have endeavoured to explain that he is entirely out of order, and I am quite willing to hear him if he will speak to the subject. Twice he declared his intention of speaking to the subject, but in each case he resumed those remarks which were out of order. I said I would throw myself upon the House to sustain my ruling, and I do so.

Mr. PALMER: The question before the House is—

Mr. CAUCHON: You have decided the question of order, have you not, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. PALMER: As I understand the question before the House, it is in reference to these gentlemen who are said to be implicated in this report on the Northern Railway.

Mr. CAUCHON: That is not a question of order.

Mr. PALMER: I am speaking on the question of order. If the hon. gentleman interrupts me, I shall again repeat that it is entirely unnecessary for him to endeavour to prevent my speaking. He said that, whether the matter should be referred to a Committee or not, of course depended upon the opinion of the House. His hon. friend the Minister of Justice and the right hon. member for Kingston, as well as the member for Cumberland, had instanced cases of a similar description, and his hon. friend from Queen's, P. E. I., was only doing the same thing when he was stopped.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the member for Queen's was out of order, as he had introduced matter entirely irrelevant to the debate.

Mr. POPE said that, if the Minister of Justice would grant him a Committee or a Royal Commission—the latter seemed to be at present in great favour—and permit him to examine, under oath, the other members from the island, he would prove the statement he had made. He had been a long time in public life, though certainly in a smaller sphere than this, and he could only say that, if the language which he had heard the Minister of Justice use, was employed by the commonest possible man on the public street, it would be simply considered disgraceful.

Mr. SINCLAIR said that, as a member from Prince Edward Island, he desired to make an explanation. In 1873, when the island entered Confederation, they were not very familiar with party lines in Canada; but, when they came up to Parliament in October, it was no secret that the Conservative Government proposed to add two Departments to the Ministry, one for Prince Edward Island and one for British Columbia, and they were informed that, if they joined the Conservative ranks, they would have a representative in the Cabinet. The members of the Opposition told them that it was contrary to their policy to create more Departments, on account of it being so expensive. The hon. member for Queen's had told them that a seat in the Cabinet had been offered to him, but that, if they would support the Conservative party, he was willing to resign his claim in favour of Mr. Laird. He considered that the island was entitled to a portfolio from whatever party in power, and they stated to both political parties that, on the question at issue then, they would vote according to their judgment, as they did vote. He had told his friends in the island, at the general election, that he thought they ought to support the Reform party; and upon that policy he was returned, and to this party he still gave an independent support. This was the whole affair. Both parties had been anxious to give them a seat in the Cabinet, and it was only too true that this seat they had since lost, which he considered they should still have.

Mr. TUPPER explained that on the occasion of the admission of Prince Edward island, he and Mr. Tilley had visited the island, but neither Mr. Tilley nor himself had then made approaches to the hon. gentleman for Queen's or any of his friends. Mr. Laird had requested them to give himself and friends an interview, and this was accorded. During that interview, at which, he thought, the hon. member for King's was present, Mr. Laird stated that their object was to state that the Dominion Government had no interest in the contest about to take place on the island, and that, whoever was elected during the struggle, whether members of the Liberal or Conservative parties of the island, they would come to Ottawa as friends and supporters of the late Government. They also asked that appointments on the island should be postponed until the election was decided. To this, he and Mr. Tilley acceded, as it was a fair and just arrangement; and his hon. friend for Queen's was obliged to admit that this was the case. Mr. Laird had further represented that, in the selection of Senators for the island, both parties should be represented, and they had replied that as to this point there would be no difficulty, as it was upon this principle that the other Provinces were represented in the Senate. That evening, for the first time, he heard that a portfolio had been promised to the island; this question, to the best of his recollection, had never been raised. At the elections of 1873 on the island, the Conservative Party, he believed, obtained two, and the Liberal Party four seats, and the members elected, as Mr. Laird had assured them, came to the House as supporters of the late Administration, and were introduced either by members of, or leading gentlemen connected with, that Government.

Mr. SINCLAIR.

Mr. MILLS: Did these gentlemen not then stipulate that they were not to be considered supporters of the Government?

Mr. TUPPER said the Minister of the Interior misunderstood the plain statement he had made. All these hon. gentlemen came up as supporters of the late Government. Not a finger had been raised by himself or any of his colleagues with regard to the contest on the island; they had accepted Mr. Laird's statement in good faith, and they had carried out that arrangement in good faith. Everybody knew at the time all that was proved before the Royal Commission, and the evidence was before the country, when these hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island were introduced to the House by his hon. friend from Kingston or by himself, or some leading member of the Conservative party, and they then presented themselves to the House, as was the custom with party men under similar circumstances. He would do the hon. gentlemen the credit of saying that, down to the last moment, they believed that the late Government would have a majority. But they were followed day and night by certain Ministerialists, until they came to the conclusion that the late Government would fall, and they expressed great disinclination to being left in the cold shades of Opposition. When it became palpable that the majority was transferred, by means which he did not feel it necessary to characterize at the present moment in the terms such a transaction deserved.

it was agreed that the hon. members should have their pound of flesh—their seat in the Cabinet. No one would have listened with greater pain or regret to one statement of the hon. member for King's County, P.E.I., than the hon. the First Minister, who knew it would go into the Hansard alongside with the statement he ventured to make in the House on a recent occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would repeat the statement he made—that he made no promise with regard to a seat in the proposed Cabinet. They had an interview with the hon. gentlemen from the island, at which there were present Mr. Dorion, the present Ministers of Justice and the Interior, and himself. The whole situation was discussed, and his recollection of what took place was wholly different from what the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., had mentioned. It was utterly impossible that they could make any promise or condition of the character named, and he never sought or bought the support of any member by such a promise.

Mr. YEO said, as there had been a great deal said with regard to the hon. members from Prince Edward Island, he wished to make a few remarks. The hon. member for Kingston referred to them as having been bought. He (Mr. Yeo) could speak for himself and no one else, and he would explain the facts as he understood them. When he first came to Ottawa, his intention was to support the late Government, and the general feeling of Prince Edward Island leaned that way. But, on arriving here and noticing the dark cloud which was hanging over the Government, he thought he would await developments. The hon. members from the island were urged to support the late Government, and they attended one of the caucuses on the distinct understanding that their action in that respect should be considered non-committal. Afterwards, they had the interview with the Opposition, to which allusion had been made by the hon. the Premier. At that conference no seat in the Cabinet, or any other promise was made. They were told that the whole matter was before the House, and that, if they supported the Opposition, they would deal with them in a right and fair manner. The hon. member for Queen's, however, told him that a seat in the Cabinet was to be given to Mr. Laird. He then declared that for one he should not sell himself for a seat. He wanted to see what was right, but he would rather sit in the cold shades of Opposition than support a Government that could not clear itself. He did not make any decision then, but waited for the explanation of the Government, but the next day they resigned. He knew nothing further until Mr. Laird had a seat in the Cabinet. He was sorry they should have lost their representation in the Cabinet, but he expected everything would come right after the next general election if the present party held office. He came to Ottawa free and independent, and he expected to leave as he came; under no other circumstances would he remain.

Mr. PERRY said he was sorry that this controversy had taken place, as he did not think any desirable results had been derived from it. He was sorry also that the Government had not seen fit to continue the representation of Prince Edward Island in the Cabinet. The island was so remote from the seat of Government that very often its interests might suffer if they had not a seat in the Cabinet. But, however that might be, he did not think it was sufficient reason for him to withdraw his support from the Government. The Government would have to be guilty of perpetrating an act of greater injustice to the island before he would think of withdrawing his support. The hon. Ministers from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were conversant with the requirements of Prince Edward Island, and he thought they could trust those hon. gentlemen to see that none of their immediate wants were neglected. He would be sorry to see any of his hon. colleagues sold for a seat in the Cabinet, as Prince Edward was worth considerably more than that. He trusted that the Government would restore their representation in the Cabinet, or, if not, that the hon. gentlemen he had referred to would watch their interests closely.

Mr. ROBINSON said the object he had in moving the resolution—to get an opportunity of complaining of the injustice done him—had been answered. That injustice had been confessed, not only by the hon. the Postmaster-General but even by the hon. the Minister of Justice. Hon. members of both sides ought to feel obliged to him for giving them an opportunity to air their eloquence; he had given them, through his motion, one of the best field days that had occurred since the House was inaugurated. The hon. the Minister of Justice had called him a criminal. He had heard the hon. gentleman say a similar thing respecting the hon. member for Kingston, and a fortnight afterwards he invited the hon. gentleman to dinner. What would the hon. the Minister of Justice, then, do for him? He would be happy to withdraw the motion and agree to the amendment of the hon. member for Waterloo.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope my hon. friend has not made up his mind to do that, because I am going to move an amendment.

Mr ROBINSON: All right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo, was a continuation of the injustice, as a full enquiry could not be made by virtue of it. He would move, in amendment to the amendment,

“That the following words be added after the word ‘allegations’; ‘and also to make a searching enquiry into the accounts of the Northern Railway and Northern Extension Railway, so as to complete the enquiry begun and left unfinished by the Commission.’”

Amendment agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That the allegations in the Report and evidence of the Commission on the Northern Railway Company, as to the application of moneys payable to the Government, deserve the serious consideration of this House, and that a Select Committee of nine Members be appointed to enquire into, and report upon the said allegations, and also to make a searching enquiry into the accounts of the Northern Railway and Northern Extension Railway, so as to complete the enquiry begun and left unfinished by the Commission.

House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes to
Two o'clock.

Mr. PERRY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 6th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

FRENCH REPATRIATION.

QUESTION.

Mr. MASSON enquired of the Minister of Public Works whether he would bring down the correspondence with regard to the repatriation of the French immigrants, at least before concurrence in the item in question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This correspondence will be brought down as early as possible, at any rate before concurrence.

SALARIES OF JUDGES READJUSTMENT ACT AMENDMENT

BILL.—(BILL No. 50.)

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 50) To amend the Act 37 Victoria, chap. 4.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRISON DISCIPLINE BILL.

[BILL No. 55.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

GAMBLING IN PUBLIC CONVEYANCES BILL.—[BILL No. 56.]

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY AND MUSEUM BILL.

[BILL No. 13.]

(Mr. Mills.)

THIRD READING.

Amendments made in Committee of the Whole read the second time, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ROCKWOOD ASYLUM TRANSFER
BILL.—[BILL No. 40.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright for the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means and the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, read.

Mr. CHARLTON said that, as the debate had assumed a very wide range, and as hon. gentlemen who had preceded him had indulged in charges of a general nature against the Government, the House would perhaps excuse him if he also indulged in remarks not strictly relevant to the question before the House. In the first place, he would call attention to the difficulties which beset the Government when they took office, and which had continued to beset them up to the present time. One of the greatest of these difficulties was the bargain made with British Columbia, and the impossibility of fulfilling the terms of the agreement with regard to the completion of the Pacific Railway. The hon. member for North Ontario had expressed a fear that the country would not be able to bear the strain this would put upon the resources of the country; but, whether this would be the case or not, the responsibility for the inception of this scheme did not rest with this Government, which only succeeded to obligations imposed by their predecessors. He was bound to say that many hon. gentlemen on his side of the House agreed with the hon. member for North Ontario in entertaining fears regarding the ability of the country to carry forward the scheme. In addition, the Government, on taking office, were confronted by difficulties in Manitoba created by mismanagement and aggravated by continued mismanagement. They were also met by the inevitable necessity of increasing the expenditure, in consequence of the addition to the Dominion of the great North-West, a vast region comprising one-third of the area of the Continent, which would probably yet become the home of tens of millions of people. Machinery for the Government of this territory had to be provided; our laws had to be extended to it, settlers had to be protected, military and trading posts established, and a police maintained. This entailed a very large expenditure, which would not give returns for a great many years. A still greater and an unforeseen difficulty was the great commercial depression which had fallen upon the country and prostrated its industries; it had continued up to the present and had caused shrinkage in the revenue and general distress, while at the same time the Government was called on to meet increased expenses. They had heard a great deal about this depression and its causes. He believed an hon. gentleman who had been a Minister of the Crown had stated in the House that it was due to the sins of omission and of commission of the present Government; and he thought the right hon. member for Kingston, in many of his pic-nic speeches, had assured the intelligent people of the Dominion that it was due to the Government. The hon. gentleman said that, when he left office, the country was happy and prosperous; and that now there was distress and depression. The hon. gentleman might as well have said that when he left office the Speaker was three years younger than he was to-day; and that now the Speaker was older and so much nearer his grave. The one was as inevitable as the other; and the Government had no more control over one than over the other of those facts. What were the causes of this depression? Had this Government anything to do with them? Could any Government have averted or mitigated the calamity? To these questions he would answer in the negative. The cause of it was the war of the United States, commenced in 1860, in which half a million of able-bodied men were consigned to untimely graves, and which piled up a debt of thousands of millions of dollars; which swept one third of that country with fire and sword, and which destroyed the property of numerous industries in it. A period of inflation, extravagance and recklessness followed this war; the people consumed their substance in riotous living, and then the inevitable day of reckoning came, and, in the crash that followed, bubbles were pricked; the gas escaped; inflated values melted away; and the people came down to hard pan. Had this Government anything to do with this, or were they responsible for it? No great commercial nation could pass through a commercial disaster without affecting every commercial nation on the face of the globe, so intimate were trade relations. No sooner were industries prostrated in the United States than the blow was felt in Great Britain, Germany, France and to the remotest bounds of the civilized and commercial world. How did it affect Canada? If one half of the mechanics engaged in the United States in erecting buildings were idle, of course the demand for Canadian lumber was diminished; and if one half of this lumber was not required, this great industry would be prostrated. In this way the depression affected Canadian industries, and over these causes they had no control whatever and any assertion to the contrary could not be made without insulting the intelligence of the people. Was this prostration greater than it was in the United States, in England or in Russia? On the contrary, the condition of this country exhibited comparative prosperity. The Dominion, as to its material interests, had suffered less than older, more commercial and more wealthy states. Wherever there was disease, there would be, as a matter of course, doctors. The hon. member for Cumberland was a doctor, and this eminent medical gentleman had examined into the case. The hon. member had made his diagnosis and had prescribed the treatment. To be sure, doctors disagreed, and this was the case in the present instance, some believing that the healing effects of time would bring up the patient with proper diet. The hon. member for Cumberland, however, thought differently; he desired to have the back of the patient blistered and the body compressed, and if possible, to induce a dropsical condition of the limbs; and to give the patient copious internal potions composed of Horace Greeley's Political Economy, and of Henry C. Cayley's Science of Trade and Domestic Production. He believed, however, that this hon. member had not always maintained the same opinion in this relation. Some two years ago, when the Finance Minister proposed to raise the duties, the hon. member found a good deal of fault with the policy, and denounced the Government for increasing the burdens of the people, pronouncing the policy false and uncalled for, and one which proved the Finance Minister to be an incompetent man, unfit to occupy his present honourable position. The following year it was generally believed that owing to the exigencies of the Government and the shrinkage of the revenue, the House would be asked to advance the duties, and it was stated that the right hon. member for Kingston, the hon. member for Cumberland, and many other hon. members on the opposite side of the House had speeches prepared denouncing the proposed advance. The Finance Minister, however, announced, to the surprise of the Opposition, that owing to the hard times it had been decided not to do so; and then was to have been seen a great elongation of visages on the opposite side of the Chamber. Their thunder was useless, and the gun they had primed so carefully, was not to be fired. But they were equal to the occasion, and, after one day's reflection, they denounced the Finance Minister for not raising the duties and protecting our struggling industries. A story occurred to him which admirably illustrated the case; it concerned two Indians, who were brought under the influence of religious convictions. One was named Ben and the other Sam. A certain missionary was accustomed, after talking with Sam about his spiritual condition, to treat him to cider; and Sam rather liked the religious exercises. One day Sam advised Ben to go and see the missionary. Ben declined, but Sam urged him to re-consider his determination. Ben asked what he could make out of it.

Sam replied that the missionary would talk about Moses, Joshua, Jehosaphat and Jerusalem, and then treat to cider. Ben went up on a Saturday and found the missionary busy. The latter nodded, and Ben sat down, waiting for the opening of the exercises. The missionary made no sign, and, accordingly, Ben thought that the duty devolved on himself, and he exclaimed: Jehosaphat, Judas Iscariot, Julius Cæsar, Jim Crow. The missionary, in surprise, asked who he meant, and Ben answered, "I mean cider." So with the hon. gentlemen opposite. Although there was much incongruity and inconsistency in their position, yet they kept their object in view, and this object (which was as desirable to them as cider to the Indian) was—office. They had heard a great deal said about protection versus free trade, but that was not the issue at the present time. The issue was as to the relative degree of protection it would be proper to afford our industries. We had now what some considered an efficient protection, and what others claimed to be insufficient. Last year he took the position that the duty on the 17½ per cent. list, looking at it from a protectionist standpoint, was sufficient, and he took that position to-day. He believed it would be mischievous and detrimental ultimately to the interests of the manufacturers themselves to give a larger duty. Had we anything to complain of at present as to the state and developments of our manufactures? In 1875, the exportation of domestic manufactures was \$2,293,000, and in 1876 it had increased to \$3,164,000. Surely an increase of 38 per cent. in one year was a satisfactory exhibit for any industry to make; and he ventured to say that in no other country, whether its policy had been free trade or protectionist, could be shown a better exhibit. Any one who visited the Philadelphia Exposition must have been proud of the Canadian exhibit there, and astonished at the progress the Dominion was making as a manufacturing nation. He wished to call the attention of the House to one point, that the consequences of depression were charged by manufacturers to the lack of protection. Now the depression had existed in Canada for the last three years; it had existed in all commercial and manufacturing countries, and it was a fallacy to say that it was due here to a lack of protection. To arrive at a just conclusion, they wanted to draw a comparison between the condition of our industries and those of other countries. It was useless to deny that manufacturers were uniformly selfish in their demands. They had no objection—it was not natural that they should—to large dividends. When the manufacturers of the United States were crying out about hard times and depression, they were able to raise lobby funds of thousands of dollars and were able to influence Congress and get their measures through. At that very time they were paying dividends, in many cases, of 20 to 30 per cent. He did not think that Canadian manufacturers would go through this course as shamelessly as was done in the United States, but he verily believed they would have no objection to raise their dividends from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. While listening to their arguments, the consumers, interests wanted to be taken into consideration also, and they should enquire what they were likely to derive from protection. Suppose the result of the discussion was the conclusion by the country that we should adopt a "sufficient protective system" as manufacturers called it, and suppose that at some distant day—he hoped it might be far in the future—the hon. member for Cumberland, as Finance Minister, was called upon, in accordance with this sentiment, to adjust the tariff, did they suppose that the difficulties of the hon. gentleman would be at an end when he arrived at the conclusion as to what his policy should be? His difficulties would just be commencing then. The hotels would be packed and the trains would be crammed with delegations from every manufacturing industry in the country to get their particular interests taken care of; and in every case the representatives of one particular interest would be opposed to the recognition of protection in other interests. Suppose the hon. member commenced with pig iron, and was about to put a 20 per cent. duty on it, on the ground that it would enable the manufacturers to supply Canada with all the iron she used. Every manufacturer who used iron to make stoves and castings of any kind would at once protest, and say if that duty was imposed they would be ruined. Then, suppose the hon. member turned his attention to steel, and determined to impose a protective duty upon it, every manufacturer that made a tool would protest against it. If he attempted to put a duty on shoe-findings, every shoemaker would protest and say the imposition of such a duty would ruin him. The result would be the same as in the United States. The hon. gentleman would have to go round the whole circle and tax every conceivable commodity, and so leave matters in relatively the same position as before, only raising the price of everything and increasing the cost of labour and of living. It reminded him of the story of a man who stood one night against a lamp-post holding himself up and supposing he stood one hundred feet in the air while all the while his feet were on the clay, and he was drunk to boot. But no man would deny that the production in this country of all goods now imported would be a benefit, and he would be glad to see the operatives and artizans who were labouring to supply our wants living in Canada, provided that result could be secured at a cost not too great. In hearing hon. gentlemen descant on the advantages of protection, they would imagine that 1,000,000 at least would be added to the population, if the commodities we imported were manufactured here. A great many illusions were dispelled by hard facts, and, when the rosy picture drawn by the Protectionists came to be examined in the light of hard facts, he feared it would dwindle down to small proportions. We imported, it was estimated, \$50,000,000 of dutiable goods, which might be produced in Canada. On an average, operatives produced \$1,000 worth of goods per annum; a proportion of these operatives in the various trades would be women and children. By dividing \$50,000,000 of imports by 1,000, they had 50,000 as the number of operatives that would produce the same goods. This increased population of operatives would comprise such women and children as were employed; but, if they made a liberal estimate, the number of those depending upon the labour of the operatives might be set down as two to one, which would make a total of 150,000 additional population. No man would deny that that would be an advantage, but what would it cost? In the first place, a duty of \$9,000,000 would be sacrificed on the goods. The tariff to exclude those goods would not be less than twenty per cent. more than at present; but if it was ten per cent. more than at present, it would add \$5,000,000 more to the cost of the \$50,000,000 of dutiable goods now imported. The raising of the tariff would tend also to enhance the cost of all other goods now manufactured here which would add, say, \$5,000,000 more, so that it would be seen that the total cost of adding 150,000 to the population would be an annual tax of \$19,000,000 or over \$1,200 per head. The country could not afford and would not consent to any such policy. It was asserted by the hon. member for North Ontario the other night that protection would not increase the burdens of the people. Last winter, while the Depression Committee was in session, questions were put to the witnesses as to the extent of their business, the length of the time they had been engaged in business, what capital they had when they started, &c. It was noticeable that they were very reticent as to their success, but the inference was fair in all cases that the large capitals employed in business were accumulated from small beginnings. They were unanimous in the assertion that business was very much depressed, and that higher duties would correct the evil. But, when the question was asked if the addition to the duties would raise the cost of their manufactures to the consumer, they hesitated in their answers, but generally, in a hesitating way, would reply in the negative. Then, when they were asked what good would result to them if the price was not raised, they could not give a satisfactory answer. The United States Protectionists used to get over the difficulties by admitting that the price would be raised, and pointing to the compensating advantages in the shape of new works, increased demands for labour, and an advance in the price of farm products. The most important manufacturing industry in Canada, the lumber trade, had not been adverted to in the discussions of free trade and protection. The lumbermen were directly interested in having cheap supplies; duty placed upon the importation of goods used in this business was a blow to it, because all the products of the industry were sold abroad, and it was a matter of importance that the manufacturer of lumber should be able to produce as low as possible. In times past the most plausible argument in favour of protection was the great advantage of being the consumer and producer together. The cost of transportation, however, had been diminishing yearly, and it cost less to-day to carry wheat from California to Liverpool than it formerly did to send goods a two days' journey. Distant points in America reached by railway lines could now reach market almost as cheaply as those near at hand. This was owing to the fact that the trunk lines sacrificed local trade and carried through freight at very low figures. Wheat was carried from Chicago to New York last summer at twelve cents a bushel by rail, and the competition between these great trunk lines had practically wiped out the advantage of bringing the consumer and the producer together. Allusion was often made to the experience of the United States, as regarded protection. It was natural that such should be the case. They might talk about these things theoretically, but here at our very doors this question had been worked out and practised, in all its stages and phases, and it was perfectly natural to turn from theory to practice. Now what had been the result of protection in the United States? If protection could ever be beneficial, it would be in the United States. First of all, it had enhanced the price of goods enormously, and had unhealthily developed manufactures. The present development had been reached at a cost so enormous to the consumers as to stagger human belief. No less than \$6,000,000,000 had been absolutely paid by consumers in order to produce that development which they have in their manufacturing industries to-day, and for all this the doubt arose whether that industry was on as healthy a basis and as healthily developed as it would have been without the contribution of one dollar of that mountain of taxation. The hon. member for Cumberland alluded the other night to the most gratifying condition of the export trade of the United States; and to the fact that the United States had, last year, exported of domestic manufactures the enormous sum of \$58,993,000. That was a considerable sum, but what proportion did it bear to the production of the manufactures of the country. According to the census of 1870, the manufactures of the United States produced \$4,000,000,000, and between \$58,000,000 and \$60,000,000 was only  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the entire production. To reach the entire result of exporting  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of their domestic productions, the Americans had for many years been paying an annual tax of 44 per cent. upon the whole amount. That was a beautiful theory. There must be money made out of it. For the purpose of exporting  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., they had, for years, bled the consumers of the country to an incredible extent. Was the whole export trade of the United States relatively larger to-day than it was when this extreme protective policy commenced in 1861? In 1857, the exports of domestic manufactures in the United States amounted to \$31,034,000; in 1859, to \$33,848,000; in 1860, to \$39,586,000. Now, if the rate of increase had been maintained to the present year, which was maintained between 1857 and 1860, under a revenue policy, or a policy very much like ours, in place of an export trade of \$58,993,000 in 1876, there would have been an export trade of \$84,386,000. Now, let them look at the exportation of cotton manufactures. In 1857, it was \$6,115,000, with an average of 21 per cent. tariff duty; in 1859, \$3,316,000, average duty 19 per cent; 1860, \$10,934,000, average duty 19 per cent; 1876, \$9,818,000, average duty 41 per cent—\$1,116,000 less than sixteen years before. If the ratio of increase which existed between 1857 and 1860 had been maintained to 1876, the exportation in cottons in that year would have been \$35,526,000; and there was no earthly reason why the ratio of increase might not have been continued under the moderate tariff of the period from 1850 to 1860. It was claimed by Protectionists that protection was compensating the farmer for the increased price of what he had to pay for his goods, by furnishing him with markets at home at which he could get higher rates for his produce. He would examine into this, both in respect to the prices received for food, and the purchasing power of other commodities. In 1860 (when there was no protection) flour was 24 per cent. higher than in 1870. In 1860, 100 lb. Saxony wool would buy 37½ yards of cloth; in 1870, the same quantity of wool would buy 24 yards; in 1860, 100 lb. of Saxony wool would buy 14½ pair of blankets; in 1870, only 8½ pairs; the quantity of hides that would, in 1860, buy 132 pairs of shoes would only in 1870 purchase 6½ pairs. In 1825 to 1832 (protection) wheat averaged at New York \$1.10½, corn 62 cents; 1833 to 1842 (compromise tariff) wheat averaged \$1.35½, corn 77½ cents; 1843 to 1846 (protective) wheat averaged \$1.02, corn 57 cents; 1847 to 1850 (no protection) wheat averaged \$1.26, corn 68½ cents; 1851 to 1854 (no protection) wheat averaged \$1.44, corn 71½ cents; and 1855 to 1860 (no protection) wheat averaged \$1.69, corn 87½ cents. These stubborn figures rendered it doubtful whether the theory of protection enhancing the price of food was the correct one. Protection, he admitted, raised the price of food when it became necessary to import provisions. So long as a country had a surplus of food, no matter what system of protection was carried out it would not affect the price of the great food staples one iota. New England was the heart of the manufacturing industries of the United States. If protection produced any benefits upon the agricultural interests it certainly must be in New England. He would read an extract from a recent number of the Springfield Repub- lican, one of the foremost New England papers. After giving statistics as to the decrease of the agricultural population, the article proceeded to say:

Mr. CHARLTON.

“The consequence is that much of the once reclaimed farm land will be forest in the next century, and the prices at which farms can now be bought in these towns seem marvellous indeed, after our experience in local real estate, less than the fences and buildings could be bought for. A one-hundred acre Savoy farm, with fair buildings, and timber valued at $100, recently brought but $1,200; and a two-hundred acre Hawley Place, with good house and sheds connected, and two barns, 30 by 40 feet, that was a year ago bought for $800, was recently sold for $400.”

His hon. friend from Cardwell—to whom he begged to present his humble compliments and congratulations—in the course of his maiden speech asserted that the question of free trade vs. protection had nothing to do with the recent Presidential contest in the United States. He did not agree with his hon. friend, as it had been one of the leading political issues of the United States for several years. The strength of the Protectionist party in the United States was waning day by day, and the manufacturers themselves were, to a great extent, convinced that the policy was pernicious. A good deal had been said about slaughtering goods—this was one of the grievances of the manufacturers. He was unable to see how this would be prevented by the imposition of ten per cent. additional duty. It was worth while to enquire who lost by the transaction. If any man gained, it would be the consumer. He apprehended that the Canadian consumer could afford to buy goods at seventy-five cents on the dollar, and still better at fifty or twenty-five cents, and he could even stand them being given to him for nothing. Manufacturers had proposed that, as the Americans exacted a duty of 35 per cent., we should exact one of the same amount, and if this did not stop the “slaughtering” they would retaliate by sending their goods into the United States to “slaughter” their market, and make them sick of the business. In addition to the 17½ per cent., Americans had to pay the cost of transportation to our markets, and other charges there; charges were an additional amount of about

2½ per cent., which made the protection to our manufacturers 20 per cent. The Americans, therefore, if they slaughtered goods, did it in the face of a disadvantage of 20 per cent. against them. Now, if our manufacturers wished to checkmate them by slaughtering their own goods, would it not be better to do it here where they had 20 per cent. the advantage, and drive them from this market, than to go, as they proposed to do, to the United States, where, even if the duties were no higher than here, they would be at a decided disadvantage. The remedy was certainly a quixotic one, but if they proposed to adopt it they should give our own countrymen the advantage. He was not opposed to manufactures, and would be glad to see all our goods manufactured here. It was better to have varied interests and diversity of employment. But this should not be attempted to be secured by a forcing process. Manufacturers were disposed to take advantage of the depression, and there was great danger of their getting the people to impose a heavier tax than their necessities required. In no country were manufacturing industries fully employed. They were depressed in Free-trade England and in Protectionist America, and there was the greatest amount of depression in the two countries that were remarkable for the stringency of their protective policy, namely, Russia and the United States. He believed that the policy of the present Government was calculated to build up the manufacturing industries of the country upon a sure and stable foundation. He believed that they had grown to a healthier development than had been the case in the United States. The latter country was enabled to export goods through overproduction, and not on a healthy basis. As the representative of North Norfolk, he would like the farmers, his constituents, protected by a duty upon corn, and he would not even object if the whole people were taxed fifty cents per head for their benefit; and the latter tax would be no more objectionable, perhaps, upon principle, than the former, as either would be a general tax for the benefit of a locality. But the First Minister must consult the interests of the whole Dominion. He could not act as merely the representative of Lambton; he had to consider what was best for the whole country. He ventured to say that no duty could be placed upon corn that would benefit more than ten ridings in the Dominion, there not being more than that number which raised more corn than they could consume. As regarded wheat, so long as the Canadian and American soil yielded a surplus, which was sold in the same market, the price there received must regulate the price in each country. As to corn, he proposed to give a few statistics. In 1874, we imported 5,331,000 bushels, costing $2,676,000; we exported 2,680,000 bushels, receiving therefor $1,778,000; leaving 2,651,000 bushels in the country costing $898,000. The average cost of the entire quantity imported was 50 cents per bushel, and, deducting the amount received for the portion sold, this left the net cost of what we retained for consumption at 34 cents per bushel. In 1875 we imported 3,679,000 bushels, costing $2,457,000; we exported 2,080,000 bushels, receiving therefor $1,589,000, leaving 1,599,000 bushels for consumption, standing the country in $868,000. The average cost, per bushel, of the entire amount imported was 64 cents, and the net cost of what was retained for consumption after deducting the amount received for portion sold was 54 cents. In 1876 we imported 3,625,000 bushels, costing $2,356,000; we exported 2,047,000 bushels, receiving therefor $1,047,000. We retained 1,588,000 bushels, costing $808,000. The average cost was 64½ cents, and the net cost of what was retained for consumption was 50 cents. Would the hon. gentleman tell them that the country lost in these transactions? We acted as factors, buying and selling, and made a profit by it. On the Welland Canal a great number of mills were erected, in which were invested $1,000,000, and their owners were employed in buying, grinding, and exporting American wheat. Was this business detrimental to the country? These mills gave employment to millers, coopers, and others, and the business in which they were engaged was advantageous to the country. The other night, the hon. member for North Ontario, with relation to this very canal question, told them that these canals were built for the Americans. The hon. gentleman would pardon him if he said that this reminded him of the South American Indians who dwelt amid the ruins of the temples and palaces of their ancestors and were ignorant of their design, or history, or origin. The hon. gentleman seemed equally ignorant of the purpose for which the canals were built, which was, not to benefit the Americans, but to build up our own commercial power. West of us lay a region, the richest on the face of the globe. It now contained eighteen million inhabitants, and would have a population of scores and scores of millions. The commerce of this region was a great prize; and for securing this prize were these canals designed. The imposition of a duty on grain—even so slight a restriction as the bonded system—would, under the present keen competition, drive from these canals the business they were intended to secure. Nothing could be more absurd than such a policy. It was called a National Policy. It had formerly been in existence a few months. It was slain in the house of its friends, and the neighbours were called in to assist at the obsequies, and now these neighbours were charged with the death of the bantling. Why was it defeated? The hon. member for Kingston told them it was owing to his absence in Washington. If so, this was not the only thing the country had lost in consequence of that visit. One advantage of the visit, he (Mr. Charlton) might mention: the fact that the country had then lost so much from the bungling of the member for Kingston was from one point of view evidence of the divine favour. The Bible said: "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth;" and in that sense, their losses might be taken as an evidence of love, otherwise no gratification whatever could be extracted from the Washington negotiations. As to the National Policy, a combination of special interests was foreshadowed. Nova Scotia desired a duty on coal; and the hon. member for North Ontario had stated that the manufacturers of Ontario would agree to this in exchange for higher duties on their wares. An attempt was made to induce the farmer to believe that a duty on grain would be an advantage to his class, but, if five cents were thus added to the price of grain, it would cost the farmer a dollar. This policy would not be acceptable to the country. It had once been dropped by its advocates as a monkey would drop a hot potato; and they had better never take it up again. The general elections, he believed, would convince these hon. gentlemen that this policy was offensive to the country, if they were not sooner convinced. The hon. gentlemen of the Opposition were very bellicose. They wished to bring the United States to terms by imposing retaliatory duties and inaugurating a war of tariffs; the attempt to coerce the United States would be as absurd as to expect the tail to wag the dog; four millions could not coerce forty-five millions, and a tariff war with that country would be a petard which would hoist its engineer. We were not in a position to make the United States feel our wrath; that policy was absurd. The United States discriminated against all countries alike, and if we discriminated against them and attracted their notice, it would provoke bad feeling, and perhaps counter retaliation. The United States was our only market for sawn lumber, and we sent them one-thirteenth of what they consumed. A slight additional duty would stimulate their production and shut our lumber out of their market. The United States was our only market for barley, and sufficient additional duty on this article would lead to its production on the Western prairies to our great disadvantage. A retaliatory policy would be a sheer piece of fatuity, stamping any Government which attempted it with total inability to grapple with the questions of the day. Very little was known of Canada a short distance beyond the frontier, and an editor of a leading New York paper had told him a few months ago that they knew so little about this country, that there was no inducement to supply their readers with Canadian news. A retalatory policy would also prejudice our chances of obtaining reciprocity; and postpone its realization a great many years. He sympathized with the hon. gentleman from North Ontario when he expressed great dissatisfaction owing to the fact that the election in Bothwell had been so speedily consummated that he could not bring his influence to bear in that constituency. At the next election in Bothwell, however, that hon. gentleman might so make arrangements that he could mount his horse at the tournament, set his lance in rest, and unhorse, if he was able, the hon. member for Bothwell. A few days ago, he had noticed in a paper of which the hon. member for North Hastings was reputed to be the responsible editor, a charge that the First Minister had entered office three years ago a poor man, and that he was today a millionaire. This charge implied speculation, fraud, dishonesty and theft. It was a foul calumny, unworthy of utterance on the part of any public man. It was also there charged that the Minister of Justice did not give four months of the year to the performance of his duties; but this was also false. The right hon. member for Kingston, in his picnic excursions, had preferred many charges against the Ministry, which they would be glad to hear in the House; and, if they did not there hear them, they would consider these accusations to be false. The hon. gentleman was highly gratified because a great number of people had flocked to listen to him; but he was an object of curiosity in Western Ontario, and it had been a great many years since the hon. gentleman had made a triumphal progress through the country. The hon. gentleman had also an eminent reputation, though he would not say what kind of eminence it was; and hence, he thought, that the receptions in question were not an unmixed compliment to the hon. gentleman. The country wished to know whether the hon. gentleman was a picnic Knight, a hero invincible in peace, and invisible in war; and whether he was prepared to back up, on the floor of the House, the assertions he had scattered broadcast over the country. The hon. gentleman had declared that the sins proven and established against the present Government were greater than all the sins charged even against the late Administration. There arose before his (Mr. Charlton's) mind a vision of the past; the memory of a broken constitution; the memory of a person who defied the authority of Canada, fed in a foreign land by money given by the head of the late Administration; the recollection of that scheme of madness, the Canadian Pacific Railway, entailing difficulties which a century might not remove; the recollection of the fact that a Conservative Government deliberately refused to pass an Election Law to prevent the disgraceful scenes which would forever stain Canadian history in connection with the year 1872,—in order that they might debauch and corrupt, by the use of a great fund of money dishonestly procured, the electors of this country; the mistakes, the sins of omission and commission, and the recklessness which had brought this country to the brink of ruin, and which made of Canadian politics a pit of corruption. If the present Government were guilty of greater crimes than these, for heaven's sake, let the country be informed of it. Slight differences existed among Reformers; they were divided as to protection and free trade; but, nevertheless, they were united in support of the Ministry. Of the head of the Government, the Province of Ontario was proud; he was a perpetual and standing example of the truth of Solomon's proverb: "Seest thou a man diligent in business, he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men." This hon. gentleman had mounted the ladder of promotion, round by round. They were loyal to these men, their leaders; they felt that the charges preferred against them were malicious, vexatious, foundationless, and false; but, if hon. gentlemen opposite could prove these accusations, let the proof be produced, or let these hon. gentlemen stand branded as manufacturers of accusations which were destitute of foundation.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said the House had listened with a great deal of attention to the able and elaborate discourse which his hon. friend from North Norfolk had delivered. The hon. gentleman, however, had wandered from one part of the earth to the other, and not one solitary sentence that he had uttered touched upon the question before the House. The speech of the hon. member called to his mind an anecdote connected with the delivery of a sermon some time ago. One hearer asked another what he thought of the discourse, and the reply was: "I listened to it very attentively, and I came to the conclusion that, if the minister had taken small-pox as a text, there would not have been the slightest danger of his catching it, for he never came near it." What the House had to consider was the policy of the Administration upon the tariff, and he would admit, at the outset, that it was one of the most important questions which was ever considered by any Legislature. In dealing with the subject, he utterly denied the doctrine which the hon. member declared as he sat down—that they were here only as representatives of constituencies. He took the view announced by the hon. the Premier the other day, that it was their duty not only to look to the interests of the constituencies they represented, but in all legislation to see how the whole Dominion would be affected. He looked at the subject from a broad, national and Dominion point of view. *Up to the year 1846, our policy was in imitation of that of Great Britain, which was then a protective and a discriminative one. In 1854, reciprocal trade relations were established between the United States and old Canada. That policy was continued until 1858, when the present system was introduced. A great many persons called the system "incidental protection." Sir Alexander Galt called it "modified free trade." But call it what they chose, it was a policy under which the industries of the country prospered, a vast amount of wealth was accumulated, and manufactures were established which gave employment to a certain class which they could not otherwise have obtained unless they left the country. He wished to quote an authority on this subject, whom every one would consider competent to speak thereon, and one who, without disparagement to the hon. the Finance Minister, might be called as able as that gentleman. In a letter written to the Hon. James Ferrier in 1875, Sir Alexander Galt used the following language:—

Mr. GIBBS.

"Though a Free-trader theoretically myself, I have always recognized the necessity and advantage of adapting the application of principles, in themselves sound, to the circumstances of our country, the habits of our people, the conditions of our climate, and our political relations to Great Britain and other countries. My views on this subject have ripened, but have been in no respect changed since, in 1859, I then arranged the Tariff, and subsequently modified it in 1866. The policy adopted then, and which to a large extent remains in force still, was popularly known as Incidental Protection, though it might more appropriately have been termed Modified Free Trade. Under this system of revenue, it is well known that our manufacturing interest has grown to its present considerable proportions; and it is in the same direction I consider a re-adjustment of the Tariff should now be made. Sixteen years have, however, elapsed since that Tariff was passed, and within that period much has occurred to render a thorough revision necessary. Our Confederation now embraces a vastly greater and more varied area; our relations to Great Britain are happily unchanged, commercially; but, as regards the United States, their civil war, with its results upon the taxation and currency of that country, have caused most material changes, which may require corresponding legislation on the part of Canada. Without presuming to anticipate the direction of specific action, I think that it is the duty of our Parliament broadly to lay down the rule that, in the imposition of duties to be paid by our own people, the interests of Canada should be the ruling consideration. We cannot and ought not to ignore the interest which our fellow subjects elsewhere have in our revenue policy. But, as regards the United States, I frankly declare that they ought to be dealt with in the same purely selfish spirit with which they treat us. For my part, I am heartily tired of efforts at conciliating the United States commercially—they meet with no response, and even existing treaties and laws are administered by them in a spirit of petty but vexatious exaction. I trust that henceforth the sole consideration will be how our trade legislation is to affect ourselves. Possibly this course may produce a wiser policy on their part, more worthy of a great commercial nation. I do not myself attribute the present industrial depression to any special cause within the power of our Legislature to remove; it is doubtless the result, in great measure, of over-production elsewhere and among ourselves. But it is certainly the duty of the Government to examine the allegations of the sufferers most carefully, with a view to their relief if practicable. And should such relief take the form of differential duties against the United State, I unhesitatingly adopt the position that we have a distinct and inalienable right to impose such duties if we choose."

His hon. friend from North Norfolk said we should be very careful in dealing with the people of the United States; that we should deal with them tenderly or we might provoke bad feeling. But that country had done much, since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1866, to provoke us. Had our cringing policy done anything for us; was it likely to bring about the object which everyone desired to see accomplished? He did not believe in waiting on the action of Congress at Washington any longer, and thought that our legislation for the future should be entirely different from what it had been in the past. We had now a country extending from one ocean to the other, and from parallel 45 to the North Pole, and we ought to legislate for the people living within this geographical area rather than to consider what effect our legislation would have on the people of the United States. After an enforced absence of three years from the deliberations of this Parliament—a subject which he would take occasion to bring before the House hereafter—he came back to find an hon. gentleman Finance Minister who was wont every Session to deliver a doleful dirge about the expenditure being likely to exceed the revenue. When that hon. gentleman made his speech the other day he seemed to feel exceedingly happy that his prognostications had been fulfilled at last. When we had a surplus, the hon. gentleman was miserable, and kept on predicting that our income would fall below the expenditure, and that was probably the reason why, when announcing the deficit the other night, the hon. gentleman was able to look hopefully to the future. The hon. gentleman had been to London; he went there annually, and it was to be hoped that he enjoyed himself; and it was also to be hoped that his next visit would result more advantageously to Canada. While in London last year, the hon. gentleman addressed the capitalists as follows, on the financial position of Canada:

"REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE.—The revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since the Confederation in 1867, although it has in the interval been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional kind, such as outlay connected with the several Fenian attacks on the country, the acquisition and organization of new territories, and providing an adequate defensive force for the Dominion, &c.

Year.	Revenue.	Expenditure.	Surplus.
1868.....	£2,851,652	£2,809,603	£42,049
1869.....	2,995,661	2,924,601	71,060
1870.....	3,231,714	2,988,648	243,066
1871.....	3,867,112	3,124,616	742,496
1872.....	4,142,963	3,517,893	625,070
1873.....	4,276,740	3,939,996	336,744
1874.....	4,973,649	4,791,023	182,626

In the year ending 30th June last, notwithstanding the unprecedented depression in trade in Canadian staples, the returns (though somewhat incomplete) show a satisfactory result, being—

Estimated Revenue.....	£5,050,600
do Expenditure..	4,850,000

Surplus..... £200,000

The eight years since Confederation, therefore, exhibit an aggregate surplus of £2,443,111 (not including the Sinking Fund), which has been partially applied in the redemption of debt, and partly expended on new works."

So that, making all the possible deductions, the aggregate surplus during the eight years since Confederation amounted to £2,243,111 sterling. The hon. the Finance Minister had brought down a tariff which he asked the House to adopt. The hon. the Premier had said it would be unwise, in the present state of the country, to remodel the whole tariff. If that position was correct, he would like to ask hon. members opposite who had been pleased by the effort made this Session to remodel it, as now proposed, in part? With the one exception of coal oil, not a manufacturer, producer or consumer of any kind had been pleased with what had been done. He wished to show the changes which had taken place in the trade of the country by the following table:—

Year.	EXPORTS :
	To Great Britain.	To United States.
1873....	$38,743,848	$42,072,526
1874....	45,003,882	36,244,311
1875....	40,032,902	29,911,983
1876....	42,740,060	29,916,876

IMPORTS :

Year.	From Great Britain.	From United States.
1873....	$68,522,776	$47,735,678
1874....	63,076,437	54,283,072
1875....	60,347,067	50,805,820
1876....	40,734,260	46,070,033

Imports of Cotton and Woollen Goods from United States.

1874.....	$1,178,264
1875.....	1,631,562
1876.....	2,499,227

Thus a diminution of exports to the United States as compared to Great Britain was shown, while a gradual and steady increase of imports from the United States as against Great Britain was taking place. What the manufacturers of this country complained of was that the United States imposed a tariff which prevented our manufacturers from exporting to their country while they could come to ours. By the returns just brought down the result was as follows: In 1873-4 manufactured goods were imported from the United States to the value of $24,937,937; 1874-5, $24,676,406, and 1875-6, notwithstanding the great depression, $21,438,758. It was interesting to see that during the same period the exportations from Canada to the United States had greatly decreased. On many Canadian articles imported into the United States there was a duty of from 35 to 45 per cent, and upon the same class on which we only charged 17½ per cent. Was that a matter of small importance? Would not the Government for one moment entertain the propositions submitted to them from all parts of the country on behalf of manufacturers who desired their interests to be protected? The hon. gentlemen opposite had not taken the slightest notice of all the remonstrances made. They had been content to see some of our most important industries go down for want of encouragement and protection. He referred more particularly to sugar refining, by the failure of which in Montreal 400 heads of families had been thrown out of employment. Not only this, but a large and profitable trade with the sugar-growing countries had been lost. The following was a comparison of imports from sugar-producing countries for the years 1875 and 1876 respectively:—

MR. GIBBS.

	Lbs.
1875. Equal to and above 13 Dutch Standard, from 11th April.	11,031,612
Equal to No. 9, and not above 13, from 11th April.....	11,390,593
Below No. 9 D. S., for the year .....	20,366,261
Above No. 9 D. S., to 10th April .....	3,490,312
	<hr/> 49,278,778

Of this 13,488,054 lbs. were from Brazil, an important factor in South American trade, Brazil being an excellent market for our lumber.

	Lbs.
1876. Above Dutch Standard 13..	10,507,178
Equal to 9 and not above 13.	3,894,629
Below 9 Dutch Standard....	19,261
	<hr/> 14,421,068

Not a pound imported from Brazil.

Of all kinds of sugar:—

Year.	From Great Britain. Lbs.	From United States. Lbs.
1875....	25,488,811	40,861,240
1876....	56,606,697	36,085,881
Above No. 13 Dutch Standard—
1875....	20,121,120	22,898,874
1876....	54,465,080	28,070,726

But this was not the only interest which was allowed to perish. Another important one was the importation of tea. The hon. gentlemen opposite, some years ago, thought fit to remove the 10 per cent. duty which was imposed on tea coming from the United States, and which encouraged direct foreign trade with China and Japan and elsewhere. But, on the duty being removed, teas could not be directly brought to Canada, wholesale tea merchants had been obliged to move from Montreal and other Canadian cities to New York, where they had a larger market and were still able to supply their Canadian customers. So strictly did the Americans enforce their law that a cargo of tea brought to Montreal direct from China, but afterwards diverted to New York, as profitable returns could not be made, was charged the extra ten per cent duty as coming from a point west of the Cape of Good Hope, although the bulk had not been broken. But what did the hon. gentleman care? Even the paltry little disarrangement of the tariff which he had made had been the means of wiping out several small industries in the Province of Quebec. It was high time that the hon. gentleman awoke to the fact that the people of the country desired legislation in an opposite direction. The great depression in Canada had other causes than the depression elsewhere. It should at least have elicited some Government enquiry, with a view, if possible, of alleviating to some slight degree the difficulties under which our manufacturers were at present labouring. He should have supposed that was a subject worthy the attention of a master mind, even of that of the Finance Minister of Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Victoria, N.S.) : You must look somewhere else for that.

Mr. GIBBS said the hon. the Finance Minister held that the more we imported the richer we were; and that, because we imported at the rate of $22 per head, and the Americans at the rate of $10 per head, therefore our business and trade relations must be in the most prosperous condition of the two countries. But very few people in Canada could be brought to entertain the same opinion. He (Mr. Gibbs) was one of those who desired to see the importations less than they were at present. He hoped by the establishment of manufactures that we would materially reduce our importations, and that even within the next few years. He must compliment the hon. the Finance Minister upon the imposition of 17½ per cent. upon the article of tubing. There were only three or four tube manufactories in the United States, and it was exceedingly doubtful whether a manufactory could be established here. This was the only instance in which the hon. the Finance Minister had attempted to meet the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite to him in the slightest degree, and he hoped it would lead to the establishment of manufactures of tubing in Canada. The question of Free Trade vs. Protection was one in which he did not propose to enter further in this discussion; he would await a more fitting opportunity. He trusted the day was not far distant when the Treasury benches would be filled by gentlemen who better represented the temper and spirit of the country.

Mr. PLUMB said it was perhaps fortunate that the House had an authentic record of what hon. members said in the debates. He found that the hon. member for North Norfolk last Session gave them the strongest possible arguments against the position which he now assumed. It occurred during the debate upon an amendment very similar to that now before the House. He said then, as reported in the Hansard :

“It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having, in the course of its history, imposed exactions and restrictions. This has been notably the case with Great Britain herself; and I think the assertion that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of the self-defensive power of a nation, is uncontrovertible. We have had an illustration of it in the neighbouring nation. The Southern States were without manufacturing industries, while the Northern States were filled with them, and the advantage this gave them, resulted in the suppression of the rebellion. No person will assert it is proper to protect industries that are not naturally adapted to the country, but when they were suited to the land it was the duty of the Government to foster them. Arts and manufactures do not spring up readily on a virgin soil. In the first place, trade has a tendency to remain in beaten tracks. Then the advantage is on the side of a nation in which manufactures are established, because money is always more easily obtained there than in a new country. Then, again, the possession of organized and skilled labour is an advantage that the manufacturers in a country where manufactures are established for a long time possess over a new country. But, although it may be conceded that protection is to the advantage of manufacturers, unless it can be shown that it is also an advantage to the other classes of the community, and the nation at large, all argument in favour of protection fall to the ground. It must be shown that the agriculturists are to be benefited by protection before it is incumbent upon the Government to adopt a protective policy. I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufactures, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops.”

That speech was a strong argument in favour of protection, but now the hon. gentleman had taken the other side. It appeared that he was equally able to present an array of figures to support either side of the argument. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to think that those who favoured the protection of our industries contended for a prohibitory tariff; but this was not the fact. No one on this side of the House had advocated such a policy. Notwithstanding the immense inflation of the paper currency, and the false values and extravagance to which it gave rise. During the past seven years, the United States had been able to reduce their taxes about three hundred millions of dollars, their national debt four hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars, and create a balance of trade in their favour, in 1876, to the amount of about 120 millions of dollars. They had also been able to enter the markets of the world with their manufactures in competition with the greatest manufacturing interests existing, to sell everywhere and compete successfully everywhere. This was the condition of things produced by the policy of the United States, false as it might be with regard to excessive protection. Their paper currency had greatly appreciated in value; the rate of interest on their national debt was largely reduced, and they were now prepared for resumption of specie payments, which would hardly give them any financial disturbance. This state of affairs was a sufficient answer to those who held that the example of the United States with reference to protection was one which ought in all respects to be shunned. He was perfectly willing to submit this example, although no one, as far as he knew, desired to introduce into this country the excessive American tariff. The Americans were selling us everything and buying very little from us. Every year saw an increase of their sales to us, while the reduction in our sales to them was most startling. Last year, we purchased one-half of our imports from the United States, the figures being 46 millions upon an aggregate of 93 millions of dollars. Our exports to the United States were of the value of 29 millions of dollars, and the balance against us amounted to over 16 millions. Almost everything that could be manufactured was sent from across the border into Canada. The hon. member for North York had stated that, in the late election for President, the issues of free trade and protection had been made prominent, but he failed to discover that these were the great issues in the canvass. However, if any success whatever had been achieved in this relation, the victory was in favour of protection, because the Republican party was the Protectionist party, and had succeeded in securing the Presidency for its candidate.

Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who had the majority of votes?

Mr. PLUMB said he thought the majority was in favour of Mr. Tilden. It was said that, if our manufactures were granted additional protection, it would be a tax on the consumer; but any policy which would stimulate trade, encourage capital, and give employment to the labouring classes would benefit the consumer. The industries of this country were at the present time so completely paralyzed, that it would be almost impossible to find a parallel to their existing condition. Such a policy would also stimulate immigration. He would not follow the example which the hon. member for North Norfolk had given in the concluding portion of his speech—in making or answering a bitter party harangue—but he would allude to statements made by the Finance Minister in bringing down the Budget. The respective positions taken by that hon. gentleman in 1874 and 1877, exhibited strong points of contrast. In 1874, the hon. gentleman had proclaimed a deficit, and intimated that the country was going to destruction, that nothing could save it from impending ruin but a complete reversal of policy; but no deficit really existed. The hon. gentleman had stated, when he subsequently appeared in the English money market as a borrower, that the country actually enjoyed a surplus. Now, however, the position was reversed. After three years of office, the hon. gentlemen opposite had to face a great and impending deficit, which could no longer be concealed by any art in figures, and how was it to be met? They were told that large items of expenditure in the last year's accounts were exceptional; that they were not likely to occur again; that daylight was at hand; that the dawn of better days was visible; that the difficulty would be met by a slight increase in the tariff; and that by raising the revenue $300,000 or $400,000, a deficit of $1,950,000 would be balanced. This cheerful tone was in strong contrast to the hon. gentleman's lugubrious manner in 1874, when the hon. gentleman announced that they would bring about salient reforms, reduce the public expenditure, and correct abuses which had crept in during a long Administration which they had stigmatised as essentially corrupt. Despite all these professions, the hon. gentlemen had not kept their promises or adhered to their principles. They, nevertheless, now assumed an air of hopefulness which he did not think at all borne out by the figures exhibited in the financial statement, warranted by the facts or by the condition of the country. These hon. gentlemen had everywhere denounced the extravagance of their predecessors and promised economy and retrenchment, but they had failed to meet their pledges. Even with regard to the Departmental services and disbursements, which were more immediately under the public eye, the Customs receipts for 1873-4 amounted to $14,325,192.64, and to collect it had cost $658,299.34. In 1876-7, the Customs collections amounted to $12,341,371.13, and the cost of collection to $721,608.60. Thus, with a reduced revenue, the expense of collection had been increased. Of Excise duties in 1873-4, there had been collected $5,594,903.84, and the expense of collecting it had amounted to $201,240.90. In 1876-7 the Excise duties amounted to $5,563,487.12, and the expense of collection to $218,359.01. In the Post Office Department for 1873-4, the receipts had been $1,139,973.15, and the cost of maintaining the Department had amounted to $1,387,270.48. In 1876-7 the revenue had been $1,102,540.32, a falling off of $37,000; and the expenditure had amounted to $1,622,000. No doubt, he would be told that this increase in expenditure was largely due to the great extension of postal routes; but on the other hand, it could be said that these extensions should not be made unless, at all events, they yielded some revenue. Doubtless, owing to the building of railways, the means for transporting the mails had also been cheapened, while correspondence had increased. Further, in 1874, there was charged to superannuation account $73,949.19; while, for the year 1876-7, this account amounted to $110,000. Notwithstanding the diminished revenue, year after year, the expenditure of the country was increased. It was no argument for these hon. gentlemen to say that they were forced in this expenditure by the policy adopted by their predecessors, for the policy of the latter they had bitterly denounced. These hon. gentlemen, moreover, with regard to the construction of the Pacific Railway, were not following the plan laid down by the late Administration, and, in point of fact, they had originated an entirely new scheme.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. PLUMB continued. He said it was claimed by the Government that, when they took office, they were saddled by the engagements of their predecessors, and that the Government had therefore been involved in large expenditures, for which they should not be held responsible. That might, in some degree, be true with regard to certain public works necessary to the improvement of navigation, but, in respect to such works, no complaint had been made, and if the Government had followed the policy of their predecessors in relation thereto, they had done wisely and well. One large expenditure, which had been freely criticised, and had received a great deal of attention, was that connected with the building of the Pacific Railway. As the plans adopted by the Opposition had been entirely departed from, he claimed that they could not be held responsible for the course pursued by the Government. He found, from reports laid before the House, that the expenditure incurred upon that work already was over $6,000,000. There were items of this expenditure which he thought were justly open to criticism. About two years ago, it was deemed necessary, in pursuance of the policy of the present Government, to open a line of road leading through the wilderness towards the Georgian Bay, to terminate at the mouth of French River. So pressing, apparently, were the public demands for that road, that its construction was to be hurried forward without delay, and without submitting the contracts for building it to Parliament. The matter was pressed with such haste that they might suppose there was immediate necessity for its construction. The hon. the Finance Minister, who was usually so cautious in his utterances, even went out of his way to endorse and recommend the project to the House. He (Mr. Cartwright) said: "Of all the schemes submitted to this House, that of my hon. friend the Premier, for opening up the fine and considerable tract between French River and the Ottawa Valley, is the one which, on the whole, is most likely to add to the paying productive population of the Province of Ontario." That was as vague as any utterance ever made by an oracle of Delphos, but no doubt it had the intended effect. The hon. gentleman did not exactly endorse the project; he meant nothing or anything, just as the statement might be read. He thought by this time the road ought to be approaching completion, and that very soon the wilderness would resound with the shrill echo of the whistle of the locomotive. But he feared that the solitudes would remain unbroken for some time to come, and that, upon examination, the project had either been found impracticable or that for some mysterious reason the contract had been abandoned. It was not unreasonable to suppose that there were strong motives for entering into this undertaking, and proper security should have been taken from the contractor, and steps ought to have been taken to hold him to his contract. There were, moreover, lines projected from Thunder Bay to Fort Winnipeg, which had been one of the most uncertain and varying of all railway schemes brought before the House. At one time it was proposed to utilize the "great water-stretches" of the West; another time there was to be a continuous railway line upon a certain route lying near to the water stretches; and, again, the line was to go farther northward, entirely outside the line first contemplated. This line of water stretches, which began nowhere, went nowhere, and terminated as it began, was to be utilized, not for traffic, for that would be impossible in a route so difficult and inconvenient for travel, but for the purpose of carrying the railway iron to the railway track. On the first line, large sums of money had already been expended, and the engineer had reported that it could not be completed in two years, and when it was finished it would be entirely useless, even for the purpose of carrying rails. Then, again, there was a telegraph line from Winnipeg, stretching to the Rocky Mountains, which had cost a large sum of money, and, as it was located before the line of railway was located, it would no doubt be found necessary to change its course. Those items were part of the system inaugurated by the present Government, who were solely responsible for them, and might go far to explain how it became necessary to meet deficits and incur new loans. The last loan of the hon. the Finance Minister had evoked considerable criticism. There could be no doubt but that the system of tender, which the hon. gentleman had departed from, was the correct one for a financier to pursue in making public loans. The plan adopted by the Finance Minister placed the loan in the hands of the large capitalists and enabled them consequently to control the price of future loans, and to dictate their own terms. The loan was placed at a commission of one per cent. Under the terms allowed to subscribers, they were to pay their subscriptions by instalments running through a series of months: 5 per cent. on application; 15 per cent. on allotment; 20 per cent., January 31st; 20 per cent., March 25th; 20 per cent., May 25th; 11 per cent., July 25th; interest accruing to the purchaser. Upon those terms the investors would get the loan, not considering the commission, at 89½. It was a price lower than the 4 per cents of the same character were selling at in the market at the time, but in view of the magnitude of the loan, the conditions, and the position of the country, owing to circumstances over which the Opposition had no control, it might be considered a fair price, and he hoped every future negotiation would give as good a one. Borrowing and taxation went hand in hand. The next thing to be done was to endeavour to meet the deficit. That was to be met by the imposition of duties which, according to the calculations made by the Finance Minister, would yield about $450,000, but which would not go very far to pay a deficit of $1,950,000. The proposed duty on tea was put in the most objectionable form—that of a specific duty, taxing alike the cheapest and most expensive qualities of that necessary article. It thus became an onerous impost upon those who could least afford to pay the duty, while it was comparatively light and trifling to those who could best afford to be taxed for their luxuries. Another point was that the imposition of this duty—so far as it could have an influence—should favour the direct trade of the country, and make it an object to import from the countries where this article was produced rather than bring it from intermediate ports, thus encouraging our shipping trade and our commercial trade as a whole. The duty on malt and beer might be all very well, but he could not understand why that comparatively mild liquor, beer, should be taxed, and that no additional tax should be placed upon whiskey, which was also made in this country. He could not understand why beer should have been selected, and why those who consumed that beverage should be obliged to pay for it at a higher rate, comparatively, than those who drank whiskey, which many an hon. member would rather see prohibited by some legislation than fostered by the partial legislation proposed to the House. The reason for selecting tubing for taxation was neither valid nor sound, and it was difficult to understand why that article out of our long list of free imports should be specially marked for duty at this particular time, especially when the value of the whole quantity imported only amounted last year to $266,000. There might, however, be some special reason for the selection, and it might be discovered afterwards. If the expenditure of the country proceeded, additional taxes would certainly become necessary. He did not agree with the hon. the Finance Minister that we had yet reached the end of the depression in the country. He claimed that if more taxes were to be levied they should be imposed in such a way as not to increase the burdens on the people, but in some degree to compensate those who had to pay them by stimulating some of the industries of the country now languishing under the depression which had prevailed during the past two or three years. The hon. the Premier, in speaking of the amendment to the resolution, which he (Mr. Plumb) intended to support, had stated that it went in the direction of taxing the poor man for his necessities. But it would be much better to tax the poor man slightly, if thereby he was given the means whereby to subsist and to pay his taxation, and it was in that belief and hope that he advocated the introduction of the principle of protection in a revised tariff which members on his side of the House thought was necessary to the best interests of the country. It was not the business of the members of the Opposition to place a specific policy before the country; that was the duty of the Government. No doubt when the time came, as come it would in his judgment, when the position of parties was reversed, a policy would be brought forward by the right hon. member for Kingston, whom he had the honour to follow, which would be for the good of the country and satisfactory to it, and would show that the promises made on this side of the House, unlike those made by hon. gentlemen opposite, had been fulfilled when they came into power.

Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said, on rising to address the House on the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, he did not propose to enter into a discussion of the question whether free trade, incidental protection, or a protection policy pure and simple, was the proper fiscal policy for the people of this country. The commercial and fiscal character of the question had been already so ably and fully discussed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that little remained to be said from his own individual standpoint. He proposed, however, to address a few remarks to the House with regard to the position taken by the hon. member for Niagara, and particularly with reference to the views expressed by the hon. member for Cardwell on what he called the abnormal expenditure of the present Administration. He congratulated the hon. member for Cardwell on the ability with which he had handled a brief from the hon. member from Cumberland. He had the pleasure of devoting considerable attention to the former hon. member before his entrance into Parliament. He had the pleasure of meeting him on very many occasions as well as the hon. member for Cumberland, and, knowing the sentiments of the latter hon. member, and finding the hon. member for Cardwell so frequently in his company, he was not at all surprised to find that the member for Cardwell followed so closely in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor. He congratulated the hon. member for Cardwell also on the fact that he seemed to appreciate the distinction between logic and sophistry, between fact and fiction,—much more closely, indeed, than did the hon. member for Cumberland in some of the financial statements he addressed to the House. In investigating the Public Accounts, the hon. member for Cardwell had come to this conclusion, namely, that the expenditure of the present Administration, during the years 1875-6, was greater by $600,000, than the expenditure of 1873-4. This statement had an amount of fairness and frankness in it which did credit to his good judgment and close investigation of facts. It was a question long in dispute between hon. members on both sides of the House as to whether the present or the late Administration was chargeable for the expenditures of 1873 and 1874. The hon. member for Cardwell had admitted the responsibility of the late Administration for that expenditure, and, with that as his starting point he had come to the conclusion, after omitting all exceptional sums for both years, that the present Government could only be justly charged with extravagance to the extent of $600,000. He had taken the trouble to compare the statements of the hon. member for Cardwell with the Public Accounts and found that in the main his conclusions had been tolerably correct. Nevertheless, there were a number of items in 1875-6 which must be admitted as exceptional and extraordinary which had not been considered by the hon. member. The first, which was not included, was the grant of $50,000 for the veterans of 1812. When that vote was proposed in the House, hon. members expressed themselves freely in regard to it, and there appeared to be only the one opinion entertained, that those who had served their country, encountered hardships and dangers in service should be even at this late day rewarded with some compensation. He was sure the hon. member for North Hastings, whose loyalty to his country was only excelled by allegiance to his party, would admit that the hon. member for Cardwell should not have omitted that sum from the Estimates of 1875-6. Then they had, to complete treaty obligations with Prince Edward Island, $40,000; to pay running expenses of Prince Edward Island Railway, $220,000; reporting and publishing debates, $13,000; additional on printing account, $13,000; expenses of Mounted Police, omitted by his hon. friend, $170,000; for the administration of justice and the establishment of the Supreme Court, $84,000; Insurance Inspection, $10,000; besides several miscellaneous articles which more than absorbed this abnormal expenditure so much complained of. If the hon. member had pursued his investigation into the Public Accounts a little farther, he would have found, as he (Mr. Ross) had found, and as any hon. member might find, that the exceptional and extraordinary expenditure of $600,000, which he charged against the present Administration, was not borne out by the facts. The hon. gentleman had referred in detail to the expenditures of some of the public Departments. First, he had noticed a deficit in the Post-office Department for the past year, which he had stated correctly at $520,000. A slight examination, however, would have shown him that last year was not exceptional, so far as the Post-office was concerned, because, from 1867 down to the present time, there had been an annually increasing deficiency. In 1867-68 it amounted to $91,000; 1868-69, $250,000; 1869-70, $285,000; 1870-71, $203,000; 1871-72, $237,000; 1872-73, $234,000; 1873-74, $248,000; 1874-75, $365,000; and last year $520,000. He admitted that this was a large deficit, one that could only be justified on the ground that every individual, not only in the House, but in the country, was interested in the utmost postal accommodation that the public funds could afford. He asked hon. gentlemen opposite if they were prepared to declare that a reduction should be made in the number of post offices, or that the number of miles necessary to traverse in the postal service should be diminished in order to reduce the expenditure. He was confident hon. gentlemen opposite would not commit themselves to such a policy, knowing the eager demand on the part of all classes in the community for that accommodation. But there were some grounds on which a certain amount of the deficit could be accounted for. First, there was a reduction in the receipts of last year amounting to $37,000, the depression of trade which seemed to have affected the general commercial revenue of the country having also affected the postal revenue; moreover, the postal service contracts made three or four years ago had expired, and it was necessary to renew them, and this could only be done at an increased expense. Again, the introduction of the free delivery system had cost the country $36,000, an expenditure which did not enter into the items of 1873-74. Then there was the grant of $6,000 for railroad mail service in the Province of Prince Edward Island. Those items added together would reduce the deficit in the Postal Department for 1875-6 to nearly the same amount as that for 1873-4. It was desirable, however, that the House should ascertain what was the average of those deficits. It was fair to assume that, if the present Administration, in view of all the difficulties by which they were surrounded, and particularly the depressed condition of the trade of the country, had not increased the indebtedness or expense of the service in a greater ratio than the preceding Government, then at least they could not be chargeable with undue extravagance. During the seven years that the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power the expenses of the Postal Service had increased annually at the rate of 15 per cent., or 107 per cent. increase in seven years. During the present Administration the increased expenditure only reached 7½ per cent. per annum. So far, the comparison was satisfactory. Let it be compared on another basis. If the amount of work done was in fair proportion to the expenses, then there could be no fair charge of increase. Under the old Administration work increased 82 per cent., while the expenses increased 107 per cent. Under the present Administration the amount of work had increased 30 per cent., while the expenses had only increased 7 per cent. But was Canada the only country that had a deficit in its postal service. Hon. gentlemen opposite pointed to the United States. One would suppose by their interest in American institutions just now that they were willing to transfer this House of Commons to the other side of the line.

Mr. Ross.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS—And abandon Canada with its free trade fanaticism and settle themselves beneath another flag, under more beneficial and prosperous influences. Well, what did they find? In 1873 we had a deficit in the Post Office Department of a quarter of a million, while in the United States the deficit was \$6,088,204. In the following year the United States had a deficit of \$7,529,842, and in 1875, of \$6,562,216; or in other words in the United States there was an average deficit of \$200 upon every post office, while in Canada there was only an average deficit of \$100. The hon. member for Cardwell next attacked the Excise Department. The hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to be much incensed about the matter. One hon. gentleman regretted very much, in the interest of temperance, that the Government proposed an increased duty on beer. He (Mr. Ross) was glad to see such an interest on behalf of temperance. He expected some day to deal with this question, and he would be glad to see the hon. members for Vancouver and Carleton advocate a Prohibitory Liquor Law. Well, under hon. gentlemen opposite, the expenses of this Department regularly increased. Between 1867-8 and 1873-4 there was an increase from \$78,938 to \$194,027, an increase of 150 per cent., or 20 per cent. per annum. Under the present Administration the increase was only  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum. This certainly did not show extravagance. The Militia Department was next attacked, and the charge made that the expenditure for militia purposes was of very little value to the country. True, the expenditure under this head was always very heavy, and it was quite possible full value was not received in any case for the outlay. But let them see the work done. In 1867, 37,170 men were drilled for 16 days; in 1868, 35,000 were drilled 8 days in battalion camp and local headquarters; in 1869, 34,000 for 13 days, do.; in 1870, 35,000, 16 days, in camp; in 1871, 34,503, 16 days, in large camps; in 1872, 34,340, 16 days, the same; in 1873, 30,358, 8 days in camp and 16 days at local headquarters; in 1874, 29,301, 12 days' drill; in 1875, 29,605, 12 days' local drill for infantry, and 16 days for field artillery in camp; in 1876, 23,000, 8 days' local drill, infantry, and 12 days, artillery, in camp. These figures showed that under the present Administration the number of men drilled had been nearly as great as under the late Administration. It was desirable that a large sum should not be expended for militia purposes. We were at peace with ourselves and at peace with all mankind. All we required was a nucleus in case of necessity. The present Government had effected a saving under this head last year of half a million dollars. An attempt was made by the hon. member for Niagara to show that in the superannuation connected with the public service some undue expenditures were made. He found that, from 1871 to 1874, the expenditure for superannuation increased under the late Administration 400 per cent., namely, from \$12,880 to \$64,442. Between the years 1873-4 and 1875-6, it increased from \$64,442 to \$101,627, or an increase of only 50 per cent. during the last two years. The expenditure under the Superannuation Fund was statutory, and as old men got unfit for service they were obliged to retire. Objection was also found with the Weights and Measures Act, but that Act was passed by the late Administration. If there was any blame for this notorious Act, the responsibility must rest on his hon. friend from Cumberland, who initiated the measure and carried it through Parliament in 1873. There was one peculiar feature about the remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell worthy of notice. While he pointed out the items of increased expenditure the items of decrease were all omitted. He would refer to one in particular. The average rate of interest paid upon the public indebtedness by the late Administration was  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum, while the average rate paid by the present Administration was 4.9 per annum, being a difference of one-half per cent. per annum on the liabilities of the Dominion. The effect of this reduction was the saving of \$20,000 per annum in interest alone. As it would be necessary for years to come to borrow largely, the importance of this reduction would be apparent. In the expenses for management also there was a large reduction. Under the old Administration the expense for management was 4 per cent., while under the present Administration it was less than 3 per cent. There had been also the following other reductions:—Dominion Mounted Police, \$42,000; \$83,000 in the management of Penitentiaries; \$157,000 in legislation; \$5,000 in hospitals; \$12,000 miscellaneous expenses; \$71,000 in management of the Dominion lands; \$118,000 in management of the Dominion forces in Manitoba. While these reductions were taking place, the present Administration had not forgotten public works chargeable to income. During the seven years in which the late Government were in power the expenditure on public works chargeable to income amounted annually to \$1,121,307, and during the present régime they amounted to \$2,092,035. In 1867 our interest account was four and a half millions in round numbers. In seven years that increased to five and three quarter millions, nearly an increase of one and a quarter million, representing in capitalized debt \$30,000,000. The ordinary expenses of the late Administration in 1867 were \$3,630,298, in 1873-4 \$8,324,026. The increased charges on Revenue amounted to \$3,000,000. He was pleased to learn that the hon. gentlemen opposite had learned economy since then. He ventured to say if they remained in opposition for a quarter of a century, as it was probable they would, they would have so practiced and studied the principles of economy as to be a guarantee of the careful management of this country for all time to come. And now a few words about the loan. If his hon. friend the Minister of Finance was mistaken, as the hon. gentleman opposite said, what did they find? That the Finance Ministers of other countries had made the same mistake. Looking over the work quoted by his hon. friend from Cardwell, "Fenn on the Funds," he saw that, since 1871, no less a sum than £305,000,000 sterling, had been floated upon the English market, not by tender, but at fixed values varying from 73 to 96½. This statement was to him assuring, as it showed that the Finance Minister had acted with due caution and with due regard for the interests of this country. The hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to take a special interest in the affairs, and particularly in the commercial prosperity of, the United States at the present time. He admitted that it was perfectly fair and legitimate for them, wherever they found commercial prosperity, and those who were capable of managing the affairs of a great nation, to inquire into the policy by which they were governed, to see whether or not that policy could be transferred to our own country; but the evidence in their possession did not go to show that the United States were to any great extent more prosperous than the Dominion. It was said by the hon. gentleman opposite that in some respects the labour market of the United States was much more prosperous than our own; but he found in a Liverpool paper, the Enquirer, a statement complaining that the labour market of England was not so prosperous as it was some years ago, and adding that this was no matter for surprise, since from the United States, which had at one time the reputation of being the paradise of labour, more immigrants of the artizan class had returned during the past two years than was ever known before to be the case; every transatlantic steamer arriving at Liverpool during this period had brought numerous passengers of this class. Besides, how was it that during the past year there had been such active competition in New York to secure employment on the Greenock Docks? If protection built up the financial prosperity of a country, as was represented to be the case, how could they account for this state of things? They should carefully examine other evidence of a general character before they would be satisfied in reversing our fiscal policy and adopting that of another country. For instance, taking the shipping of the United States in 1860, 77 per cent. of the whole trade of the United States was carried on in American bottoms. In 1868, under the protective policy advocated by the hon. gentlemen opposite, this was reduced to 44 per cent., and in 1873 it was further reduced to 28 per cent. The hon. gentleman, before proposing to change our fiscal policy, should also consider these facts. Last year the United States owned 2,424,000 tons of shipping, and Canada owned 1,460,000 tons. This was to say that the Americans had one ton of shipping for every 18 persons in their population, while Canada had one ton for every 2½ persons. This showed that our fiscal policy, whether free trade, incidental protection, or whatever it might be termed, had developed the commercial prosperity of the country and fostered its shipping interests in a far greater ratio than had been the case in the United States.

Mr. Ross.

Our trade represented $45 per head, while the trade of the United States represented only $28 per head. Our burdens of taxation were also lighter. These were all elements which went to contribute and did contribute towards the prosperity and power of any country. At this period of our history, when we were endeavouring to bind distant Provinces together and lay the foundation as it were of future conquests, commercially and financially, and build up the nucleus of a British Confederacy on this continent, he thought they ought not to change the fiscal policy which during the past thirty-five years had increased the commerce of Canada 700 per cent., and during the last ten years developed to an extraordinary degree the prosperity of this country. His hon. friend from North Norfolk had referred to the Centennial Exhibition, and to the fact that there Canadians were not only able to compete successfully with the United States, but also with other countries. If protection had accomplished so much for the United States as was alleged, how was it that we, under the present fiscal policy, had in many respects not only stood side by side, but out-distanced the Americans? Every Canadian agriculturist would be pleased to know that with regard to the dairy, concerning which we had free trade as far as agricultural products were concerned, we had not only excelled the whole of the United States on the average, but also the dairy productions of the State of New York, which in this respect enjoyed the highest reputation among the States of the Union. This showed that we had achieved such great progress that our fiscal policy should not be rudely changed. He, for one, was not prepared to consent to such an alteration. England, under the operation of free trade had increased her trade 400 per cent.; and since the negotiation of the Cobden Treaty with France in 1854, her trade with that country had increased from $95,000,000 to $375,000,000. Did this show that free trade was adverse to commercial prosperity. He was not prepared to lay aside the teachings of men like Cobden, John Bright, Gladstone, Lowe,

Mr. Ross.

Joseph Hume and others of the free trade school, for those of men like the hon. member for North Ontario, the hon. member for Niagara, and other hon. gentlemen opposite. It would be a suicidal policy to do so, and he hoped the day was far distant when Canada would hedge herself around with protection, and when her people would not be able to buy in the cheapest market available, and sell their productions, agricultural or manufacturing, in the dearest market open to them in the world.

Mr. WOOD said he did not intend to discuss the abstract questions of free trade and protection; this he had the honour to do on a former occasion, and the House and country quite understood the position he took in this relation. Neither would he discuss the merits of the recent loan negotiated by the Finance Minister, but he would briefly refer to the tariff which had been submitted to the House. He and other hon. gentlemen, when last Session opened, had expected that the tariff would be changed as was demanded in the interests of the country; but this was not done, and he was in consequence disappointed. The country had also been disappointed because increased protection had not been accorded. When he returned to his constituency, he was besieged by friends who wished to know why the Government had adopted such a policy, and he had replied that he was not in the secrets of the Government, but he presumed the Government had sufficient reasons for the course they had taken; and that he was satisfied that they had done what they considered best in the interests of the country. He had ventured, however, to say he thought that the Government, during recess, would revise the whole tariff, and that during this Session such a tariff would be submitted, affording to the manufacturing industries of the country that measure of protection to which he considered these industries were justly entitled in the present condition of affairs. This prediction had not been verified, and he confessed to feeling disappointment in consequence. To his mind it was clear that, if the Government had added 2½ per cent. to the present 17½ per cent.

list, with a 20 per cent. tariff they would have done simple justice to themselves and to the country at large. He admitted that we at present occupied a better position than we did twelve months ago; greenbacks then were worth 85, while to-day they were practically at par, and to that extent our manufacturing interests were protected, but for this the Government could not claim any credit. With greenbacks at par and a twenty per cent. tariff, he was quite satisfied that the country would be content, and, if any industry could not prosper under these circumstances, it should no longer exist. He gave the Government a generous, but not, as the hon. member for Cumberland had stated on a former occasion, a slavish support; and he had criticised their actions freely on this question.

Mr. BOWELL: And always voted with them.

Mr. WOOD said he was still prepared to accord the Government that generous support to which they were entitled. With their general policy he heartily agreed, but in their commercial policy he must differ from them. He was, nevertheless, bound to admit that any amount of protection which we at present enjoyed was received from the Ministry of the day. The late Administration had reduced the tariff from 20 to 15 per cent., though this was not demanded, and though it was not in the interests of the country, and, if they had allowed the 20 per cent. tariff to remain, he was certain that an immense amount of difficulty and trouble experienced on the part of Canadian manufacturers would have been avoided; some of the changes made in the present tariff were made in the right direction; cigars and tobacco he considered fair articles of taxation, and malt was to be placed in the same category. And he believed that hon. gentleman knew, and that the brewers of this country knew and allowed that in this respect in the change made they were a great deal more frightened than hurt. He held in his hand a letter which he had received two or three weeks ago from a gentleman who was connected with some of the largest brewers in the country for years, and was a man who spoke whereof he knew. With the permission of the House he would take the liberty of reading that letter, and he thought the hon. member for Cardwell and gentlemen holding the same views, that the Britisher would be deprived of his beer, or would get it at a very much increased price, would feel, when the letter was read, that that was a delusion.

"I see by the newspapers, the Finance Minister has intimated his intention to make some changes in the duties on coal oil. As I have long thought these duties an objectionable tax, and that anyone who will succeed in getting both Excise and Customs duties entirely wiped out would perform a just and most popular act, I now give my scheme for that object. From the Inland Revenue Report, as seen in the Globe of last Saturday, the amount of petroleum manufactured in the Dominion during the past four years was, in the aggregate, 32,074,694 gallons, of which it was said rather more than one-half was taken for home consumption. If, say, 17,000,000 were used at home, and which of course was the only dutiable part of the whole, the annual revenue derived was about $212,000. In 1875, the only year mentioned, there was imported 691,960 gallons, paying 15 per cent., making a total of $316,294. In order to compensate for the above amount of annual revenue, I would look to the duties on malt and ale.

"In the number of the Globe referred to, it is shown that of malt 30,693,447 lb., or 852,595 bushels were entered for home use, the duty on which at 1 cent per lb. is $306,934.47, so that the anomaly is presented of the indispensable necessity of light being taxed to a larger amount than malt liquors.

"In Great Britain, the duty paid by maltsters and brewers is about £8,000,000 sterling, so that each million of its population pays about $1,000,000 tax, whilst in this country a little more than one-quarter of a million is paid by 4,000,000 of people. Previous to the year 1868, a duty of three cents a gallon was levied on ale (with nothing on malt) which gave 96 cents on a barrel of ale. Now, the average quantity of malt used in the manufacture of a barrel of ale is just two bushels, which, at the duty now charged upon it produces 72 cents. So that it will be seen that by the change then made in levying the duty, there is a loss of revenue of 24 cents on every barrel of ale manufactured and equal to one-third of the whole duty now collected. As ale, when it is sold to the public, gives a great profit to the retailer—the cost to him of a barrel of 32 wine gallons being an average of $7.50, and the product at least $25—shows that it will bear a higher figure being paid for it, for $17.50 on an article costing only $7.50 is excessive. If the malt duty is raised to double the amount at present charged, it would about make up for the total abrogation of Excise and Customs duties on coal oil. But I do not see why a still greater revenue might not be obtained than by doubling the duty on malt. I would suggest the addition of a dollar on each barrel of ale, in addition to the tax on malt, to be collected by a stamp being placed over the tap-hole of each cask, which cask or barrel could not be broached without destroying the stamp. This latter plan is in use in the United States, and it is a most effective way of preventing fraud. The revenue then would be—double malt duty, $613,868.94, and duty on malt liquor, $426,297, making a total of $1,030,165.94. The increase here shown can be collected with the same expense as at present, and it would not lead to illicit manufacture, as a large duty on spirits does. The whole duty would exceed 20 per cent. on the wholesale price of ale. The present duty on spirits is at least 300 per cent. on the wholesale price. If, as is likely, the brewers will use their influence to oppose an increase in the duties, they can be answered by referring them to the ease with which they advanced the price of ale when the duty was changed from ale to malt. The Toronto brewers, having an advertisement in the Globe at that time, stated that, in consequence of the increased Excise duty, they would advance the price of ale $1 per barrel from that date.

“As of course you are aware, there was, between 30 and 40 years ago, a tax upon window lights in Great Britain, and it was considered a very odious tax; still it did not fall upon people of small means, as our coal oil tax does; for a house of seven windows paid nothing, one of eight windows paying a tax on one window, seven out of any number being free.”

Mr. ROCHESTER: Name.

Mr. ORTON: Name of the brewery.

Mr. WOOD said the letter was from a gentleman who was for years connected with two of the largest breweries in this Dominion. He did not feel inclined to name him.

Mr. YOUNG: It is not necessary.

Mr. WOOD: If I am bound to give the name I am quite willing to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: You are not bound to.

Mr. ORTON: I should like to ask whether he is now connected with a large brewery or not.

Mr. BOWELL: Where does he live?

Mr. WOOD: He lives in Hamilton.

Mr. BUNSTER: Name.

Mr. BOWELL: Is he in business now, or is he an Excise officer?

Mr. WOOD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD
Name.

Mr. BUNSTER: No bogus letters.

Mr. ROCHESTER: We ought not to have bogus letters read in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order in characterizing the letter as a bogus one. Hon. members can, of course, attach what importance they please to it.

Mr. BOWELL: In refusing to give the name, the House may understand that these are the views of the hon. member who read the letter.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is for the House to determine itself. The hon. gentleman is not bound to submit to the interrogation of any hon. member.

Mr. WOOD said he now came to another phase of the question before the House. When the hon. the Minister of Finance brought down his Budget speech, which disappointed a number of gentleman on the Opposition side of the House, and particularly the hon. the leader of the Opposition, he (Mr. Wood) must say that he also was disappointed at the course which that hon. gentleman had seen fit to take. He had expected from the right hon. gentleman a resolution which all true and honest protectionists in this House could have supported, and that he would have moved it at that time. But what did they find? The resolution submitted by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was one in which he, as a Protectionist, could not concur. That resolution announced a principle which no gentleman representing a constituency such as he (Mr. Wood) represented could for a moment think of supporting. It included agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests. It was a general omnibus resolution, including everything in the country, and might mean anything or nothing, just as circumstances might require. The only mining industry, that he knew of in the country which was particularly suffering at the present time was the coal mining industry and he supposed this part of the resolution was meant to catch those gentlemen from the Lower Provinces who felt that they ought to have protection upon coal. It did not say coal mining, but mining, and he asserted that coal mining was the only mining industry, they had at the present time.

Mr. DOMVILLE: Iron.

Mr. ROCHESTER: Plumbago.

Mr. WOOD said he heard of no one asking for protection for iron mines. The only mines brought before the attention of the House were the coal mines of Nova Scotia. Knowing his constituency to be largely interested in the question of coal, he had telegraphed to a number of his friends in Hamilton, and asked them: "How much coal do you use in the year, and how much duty are you willing to submit to upon that coal?" He had received some eight or ten telegrams, and not one of those gentlemen was willing to accede to a duty upon coal. He had also a written protest from four of the largest manufacturers of that city consuming 7,500 tons of coal, and not one of them was prepared to concede the duty upon coal. That was a very important interest to the people of Hamilton. Manufacturers throughout the country with the present  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. tariff could not agree to pay even 50 cents upon coal. But they had no indication that, if they agreed to that 50 cent duty, it would bring the coal from Nova Scotia into Ontario. On the contrary, they had it demonstrated that it would take from \$1.00 to \$1.50 to bring the Nova Scotia coal into Ontario. But this resolution of the member for Kingston made no exception. They would be compelled by this to vote for a duty on all kinds of coal. In Hamilton, they consumed about 50,000 tons a year. Two-thirds of this was anthracite coal, of which they could not get a ton from Nova Scotia if a tax of \$10.00 per ton were imposed. Was it fair to tax an article which they did not produce and could not get, and levy a tax upon the manufacturers and poor people of Ontario living in the large towns and cities? A tax upon coal would only reach a small portion of the population. The cities and towns of Ontario would have to pay the tax. The large farming population, the rural districts would not pay a penny of this tax. But this tax of a dollar a ton, which would be the lowest amount they could impose in order to bring the coal into the country, would have to be paid by the people living in the large towns and cities, and the manufacturing centres. No one representing a large town or city would vote for a resolution like that. It also included agriculture. He would leave that to some of the practical farmers in the House who knew how to deal with it better than he did, but he was certain that the farming community understood what was best for their own interests, and he was quite prepared to say that they had, at the present time, a very large measure of protection. Several of the articles they produced were taxed very largely, and he thought they could safely leave them to be taken care of in the House by the gentlemen who represented them so well. He desired to put these gentlemen to the test as to their genuine feelings on the question of protection. They had been passing through the country, and at various pic-nics condemning the Government for not giving protection. He believed the only interest in the country which really required protection was the manufacturing industry. He believed that, as far as the coal interest was concerned, no protection they could afford would be of any use in bringing Nova Scotia coal into Ontario. He believed the farming interest was well protected, and the intelligent farmers who understood their own business did not ask for protection. If these hon. gentlemen would vote for a fair and square motion for protection to the manufacturing industry, he would say they were the true Protectionists they professed to be. He moved in amendment to the amendment:

"That all the words after 'Resolved' be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:— That, inasmuch as it has deemed necessary to raise an additional revenue, it is the opinion of this House that the interests of the country would be better served by imposing additional duties upon such goods and wares as may be produced in Canada, thereby affording increased protection, while securing the additional revenue required."

Mr. COLBY said no one could have listened to the remarks of his hon. friend from Hamilton, who had just taken his seat, without being peculiarly impressed with the disappointed tone which pervaded those remarks, and contrasting it with the confident, the ardent, the ringing manner in which he had hitherto addressed the House upon his favourite theme of protection. He was not surprised that the hon. gentleman found himself in that frame of mind. The constituency which he represented were largely interested in manufactures; they were, upon principle, and from considerations of interest, Protectionists. The hon. member for Hamilton came here with his protectionist views, he urged them upon his friends who were at the head of the Government, but he found no encouragement there. The door was slammed squarely in his face, and the frame of mind in which he found himself was evidently and clearly accounted for. His hon. friend could find no comfort in looking to the countenance of his friends, but he tried if he could not extract some small comfort from the proposition of his opponents, and, in the spirit of enquiry, doubtful, ingenuous, anxious to know how his constituents at Hamilton felt with regard to the imposition of a duty upon coal, he telegraphed to leading business men and manufacturers, and now gravely informed the House that he was assured that the manufacturers of the city of Hamilton were not favourable to the imposition of a duty upon coal. He expected that his hon. friend from Halifax would shortly rise in his place and produce telegrams from influential parties in that city, to the effect that the duty on flour would be a very obnoxious tax in that region of the country. The hon. member for Hamilton came here last year, like many others, interested in the protection of the struggling industries, when those industries were passing through a period of peculiar and unexampled depression, when manufacturers and manufacturing establishments were tumbling and tottering all over the country, when manufacturing towns and villages were being swept as by a besom of destruction—the hon. member came and urged upon the Government the necessity of doing something for their relief. In reply, the hon. the Minister of Finance informed him that this was not Utah, and he (Mr. Cartwright) was not Brigham Young. The hon. member for Hamilton was treated to a learned and eloquent dissertation on finance; he asked for bread and was given a stone. He was told that under no circumstances, conditions, or stress whatever was it the function of the Government to stretch out its hand to raise a finger, to do anything either to protect or encourage the industries of the country; that, unless a Government should assume the entire control of the manufacturing establishments, it must be quit of all responsibilities in regard to them; that, if a man went into any enterprise, he did it at his peril and must take the consequences; that it was not the function of the Government to interfere in any way to protect him, no matter under what stress of circumstances he found himself. That was the position the hon. the Finance Minister and the Government took last year. This Session his hon. friend from Hamilton and his fellow Protectionists came again with their complaints, urging the depressed condition of the manufacturing and other industries, and asking relief from the Government, and were told that the hon. the Finance Minister had always held that the Government was not justified in imposing any duties whatever that the necessities of the revenue did not fairly demand. The exigencies of the hour required changes in the tariff, and the opportunity was given to the Government to declare what their policy was to be. They illustrated their doctrines by an example, by the most apt illustration possible, by the changes now proposed. What were those changes? A duty upon tea, which protected and encouraged no industry in the country; a duty on malt, which protected and encouraged no industry; a duty on tubing, which protected no industry, but, on the contrary, depressed certain industries. They not only proposed to levy duties upon free-trade principles upon neutral articles, but the struggling industries were actually to be taxed, in order to show that the Government acquitted itself of all responsibilities except the one naked consideration of raising a revenue. And, lest there should be any doubt as to their policy, the hon. the Premier emphatically endorsed the opinions of the hon. the Finance Minister, and said :

Mr. COLBY.

“The mere passage of an Act of Parliament would never establish any trade and would never foster any industry unless it were to change from one pocket to another the proceeds of the industries of the country. If a particular trade or industry were to be fostered, it could only be done at the expense of some other trade or industry. There was no theory more consonant with the Dark Ages of the world than that which protection offered.”

Those views were also the well-known views of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, of the hon. the Minister of Justice, and of the leading members who supported the Government. It was well, he thought, that the country should know and understand this. The counter proposition that was affirmed in the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston recognized a different principle, and proceeded from a different theory. It recognized that it was within the power, and that it was the duty, of Governments and Parliaments to do something directly or incidentally, to do something in some way, for the relief of suffering industries, and for the encouragement and protection of new and deserving enterprises. Those were the two views, that was the issue which was to divide the parties in this country. One party said: “We can do nothing to help the industries; it is the duty of the Government to be actuated purely by revenue considerations.” The other party said: “It is within the power and competence of the Government to give proper direction to the energies of the country, to do something to encourage the growing and relieve the distressed industries, and it is the bounden duty of Government to exercise that power whenever changes are made in the fiscal policy.” This distinction was one of far-reaching consequence and effect. Situated here as a new political community, we found ourselves suddenly in possession of one half a continent, in possession of a territory stretching from ocean to ocean, with varied resources and capabilities; we found ourselves in possession of a country in which the political institutions were not yet thoroughly consolidated, and in which intercommercial relations had not yet been established, in which there has not yet been that interchange of commodities and that fusion and blending together of people which was necessary to make a compact and powerful nation. We had a great work to perform. It was the mission of this Government and Parliament to found a nation. It was their mission to lay the foundations broad and deep for future greatness and prosperity, if it were possible for them to do so; and, while everything was plastic and new to their hand, it was possible by legislation to do much in the direction of the development of the country and of those industries which were essential to its prosperity. We had entered upon a career of unexampled expenditure for public works. We were about to build railways across the continent. We were about to build canals of unequalled magnitude. We were burdening this people almost beyond precedent for public works. Now, he believed that we should have in connection with our policy of public works, which was one approved of by the whole people, a fiscal policy which should utilize those public works and make them as valuable as they possibly could be made to the country. When the public works were completed, we did not desire them to be mere feeders to the United States. We did not want our railway, when built from the Pacific Ocean to the Rocky Mountains, to be merely a feeder to San Francisco. We did not want our railway, which would span Manitoba and our great West, to be merely a feeder to Milwaukee and Chicago. We did not want our canal system to be merely a feeder to Boston and New York, or our great improvements on the sea-board to be merely useful to the American cities on the Atlantic sea-board. If, by any policy which we could adopt, we could establish large industries; if we could build up towns and cities and give diversified employment to our population, we might keep within our territory the wealth which under other circumstances would flow out to enrich another country. He believed our fiscal policy should be made to harmonize with and supplement our policy of public works. He would suggest, with regard to the laissez faire policy which seemed to have been adopted by the Government of the day, that the Government were in the position of the founders of a new nation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Confounders.

Mr. COLBY: Or the confounders, as the right hon. member had said. The policy which the Government proposed to pursue, the laissez faire policy—the let-alone policy, the let-misfortune-take-the-hindmost policy, or whatever they might call it—that policy was not the one which influenced the great men who laid the foundations of the great Republic across our borders. That was not the policy of Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson and Madison. It was not the policy out of which had grown the unparalleled greatness of that country, or which had pervaded the intelligent masses of the free people of the Northern States. It was not the policy under which that country had attained greatness, and which culminated in the tariff of 1861 referred to by the hon. the Prime Minister as the Whig tariff, carried out by the Republican party. There had been a party in the United States many years that adopted free trade pure and simple, and where was that party to be found? Among the slave owners of the Southern States. Among the free people of the Northern States, the preponderance of sentiment was always in favour of a national policy that would build up home industries and develop the country. The policy of the slave holders was opposed to this. They cared simply for good returns from their great staples—their sugar, cotton and tobacco—and they wanted no greasy mechanics or artisans in their midst; they founded their conduct upon those doctrines which seemed to meet with such favour with the honourable gentlemen who shaped the fiscal policy of Canada to-day. But the free sentiment of the North had over been in favour of the protective policy. His hon. friend the Premier was at Philadelphia and saw the fruits of that policy there, and although he must have been proud of the Canadian exhibit, yet he must also have noticed what the protective policy had done for the United States.

Mr. COLBY.

He thought he could say without fear of contradiction that the period during which our manufactures were most prosperous was from 1862 to 1872-3. Although manufactures prospered, the prices of our commodities were not high. Domestic competition regulated prices and kept them down to a sufficiently low point. We were not much troubled with deficits either. During that period, the country enjoyed a greater degree of protection than any country with which he was acquainted. It was not a legislative protection by Act of Parliament, but it was protection de facto, an active, positive protection, a condition of affairs which protected us as thoroughly from the incursions of those across the border as a Chinese wall would have done. We had our own markets to ourselves, and were not troubled with goods sent here to be slaughtered. Our neighbours did not trouble us with their goods, because they could realize better prices at home. This was an exceptional condition growing out of their civil war. To our manufacturers it was equivalent to a valid protection, and under it they flourished and the country prospered. What he desired to show was that the doctrine of laissez faire was not the true doctrine for this country at this time. He did not understand that any hon. gentleman contended that under all circumstances the policy of this country was to be one of absolute and rigid protection; but he would point to the prosperity of the ten years he referred to as an instance which completely refuted the doctrine which was the foundation of the fiscal system of the gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury benches, viz., that nothing could be done by a Government to affect in any way beneficially the industries of the country. An hon. gentleman had read an extract from an English newspaper as to the condition of affairs in the United States brought about by a protective policy. He would himself quote from a prominent American paper, the Philadelphia Press, which was much more likely to be reliable than a foreign paper:—

“The wisdom of the protective policy is just now being signally vindicated. Protective duties have enabled us to establish and develop a manufacturing system that permits us to cope with the most industrial nations in the world. Our manufacturers have attained to such a degree of skill and excellence that they can undersell foreign manufacturers in their own native markets, and defy competition with them at home. The products of our looms and workshops are finding their way into every country, and successfully contending hand to hand with British genius and wealth in Sheffield, Manchester, in the Indian Empire, and in the Colonial possessions of England. Another curious incident growing out of the influence of protection is the emigration of foreign capital and labour to the United States. Rather than continue a hopeless competition abroad, foreign manufacturers are transferring their establishments to this country, thus adding to our wealth and productive resources. To this add the cheapening of every species of fabrics by the rivalry created between home and foreign industry, to say nothing of the means of existence afforded to the labouring masses, and we have a sum total of benefits flowing from the protective system that fully justifies the support it has received from Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Clay and other American statesmen, and from political economists of cosmopolitan reputation like Henry C. Carey and others."

Through its system of protection, America was now able to compete with England in the markets of the world. He knew of no country that had been successful in establishing manufactures that had not done so by protection. He knew of no great contending industry in any country that had not been built up by protection. Free trade could only become successfully possible in any country until after its industries had been strengthened by protection. Judging from the history of every country, before we could become a nation of Free-Traders, our industries must be strengthened by the same process to enable us to compete with the capital, experience, skill and established business of other countries. In any new country like our own, there was a period in which protection, pure and simple, was justifiable. He did not believe in trying to grow oranges in Canada or to foster impossible industries, but he did believe in protecting the manufacture of those goods we could make ourselves to as good advantage as others could make them for us. The fiscal policy of the Government was in his judgment unsound, and was not in the interests of the country. The doctrine that duties were to be imposed for revenue purposes and for no other purposes, whatever the circumstances might be, was one which the country would not support. He did not argue in favour of a blind and indiscriminating protection, but rather of one based on a careful study of our condition, needs and capabilities, for this he believed would build up our great industries, and promote the welfare of the whole country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he rose to make a few remarks with respect to the amendment of his hon. friend from Hamilton. His hon. friend was in an unhappy mood lately. To be sure he approved of the general policy of the Government, but he was deeply grieved and dissatisfied with their commercial policy. And he was equally "dissatisfied with the motion of the hon. member for Kingston." The hon. gentleman said he expected that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would come down with a strong resolution in favour of protection, and with a resolution echoing the sentiments resounding through Ontario during last summer. The hon. member would remember that it was distinctly stated when the resolution was introduced that it was merely partial, and meant to provisionally meet the temporary deficit. It was not an opportune or a proper time to bring down a general discussion. If the Government had in their wisdom adopted the, no doubt, confidential suggestions of the hon. member for Hamilton on the tariff, and had proposed a general readjustment, then the hon. gentleman would have a right to say that he had failed in his duty and had not carried out his professions. This was only a temporary expedient, as it was alleged, to meet a temporary deficit. There was no doubt there would be an opportunity presented for the hon. member to discuss the subject in all its aspects, and then the House would see where he stood. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton was ingeniously contrived to get as small as possible a vote. The miners were said not to require protection and the farmers not to desire it. The only parties that seemed to require protection were the manufacturers in Hamilton. The hon. member had telegraphed to his constitudents to know whether they would like coal cheap or dear, and, wonderful to state, they replied they wanted coal to be cheap. The hon. member had rather restricted ideas on the matter, and should take occasion to enlarge them. Perhaps the hon. gentleman read the Montreal Herald, and in that paper of to-day he would find a letter by Mr. George Stephen, a gentleman who had put more of his own capital into new enterprises than any one else in Canada. The letter was as follows:—

“To the Editor of the Montreal Herald.

“SIR,—Will you give me space to say a few words with reference to the remarks which our member, Mr. Workman, is reported to have made in the House, the other evening, on the motion for the appointment of a committee to consider the depressed condition of the coal trade.

“Mr. Workman is reported to have denounced, in the interest of the manufacturers of the Dominion, the proposal to impose a duty of 50c. a ton on coals, and after expressing his opinion that the attempt to send Nova Scotian coals into Ontario would be a failure, and ruinous to those engaged in it, he proclaimed himself only ‘partially a protectionist,’ adding ‘that he was a manufacturer, and therefore, considered it judicious to vote against a duty on coal.’

“Although Mr. Workman omitted to explain what were the special branches of manufacturing industry to which his partiality extended, it may safely be inferred that the Côte St. Paul Shovel Factory was not very far from his mind. Now, if Mr. Workman will only widen the scope of his vision sufficiently to take in some of the other interests of the Dominion, giving them the same consideration as the scythe and shovel trade, I have no doubt the effect would be the disappearance of his objection to a moderate duty on bituminous coal, with the additional advantage that his influence in Parliament, as the representative of the leading commercial constituency of the Dominion, would be greatly increased. Partial protection is about as senseless a creed as partial free trade.

“As to the policy of imposing a duty on coal, having taken some pains to ascertain the feeling of manufacturers from all parts of the Dominion using coal in their business, I am able to say that I have never yet met one who would object to a moderate duty of say 75c. a ton, on bituminous coal, which is the only kind of coal Nova Scotia produces, provided the impost formed a part of a general scheme of tariff reform, and I may say further that I myself, though interested in an enterprise whose estimated consumption of coal will exceed 100,000 tons a year, am in favour of a 75c. duty. On the other hand, I have never met a manufacturer who would consent to a duty either large or small, except on the condition stated. So it is, perhaps, just as well our Nova Scotian friends should understand this, as they seem a little inclined to adopt Mr. Workman’s ‘partial’ theory.

“They appear to be quite in favour of such a reformation of the tariff as will enable Nova Scotia to supply the Dominion with coals and refined sugar; but beyond that their principles of tariff reform do not go.

“Nova Scotia has all the natural facilities for the production of coal and iron as cheaply as any country in the world, provided she has equally favourable conditions of market, and her natural facilities for carrying on the business of sugar refining are said to be equally good.

“In like manner, each of the other Provinces of the Dominion has its own special advantages for the production of certain products, either natural or manufactured.

“Hence it seems to me that what the country needs most to-day, if you will allow me to say so, is a Government at once able and willing to apply themselves to the patriotic but difficult task of harmonizing these various interests—a Government who will try to estimate aright the capacities of the country, and decide what Canada can do successfully for herself, and what she cannot do, and ought not to attempt, and who would then so frame the Customs Tariff, that those industries for which we have a natural and special aptitude might have the advantage of an assured market within the Dominion.

“I do not ask that the volume of taxation should be increased one single cent beyond the sum absolutely required to carry on the government of the country.

“The lighter the burden of taxation, the better for all, but I do ask that the burden should be so adjusted to the back of the bearer, that the inference with his onward progress, shall be reduced to the minimum.

“I admit the present Government have shown a laudable desire to curtail expenditure, and so to lighten the weight of the burden, but they seem to have quite overlooked the fact that a burden may be light or heavy, according to the capacity and strength of the bearer and to the way it is distributed. If they have reduced the weight of the load, they certainly have not tried to keep up the health and strength of the bearer, neither have they shown the slightest disposition to adjust the distribution of the weight to the diminished strength of the carrier.

“Mr. Cartwright, in effect, tells us that all this is beyond the power and province of Government.

“The Premier expatiates on the advantages of Free Trade in terms which may be quite correct, but have no application to the circumstances of the case. If Mr. Mackenzie can give us Free Trade, let us have it.

“I am even willing to accept such a ‘partial’ modicum to begin with, as free intercourse with the United States would give us. Give us that, and the question of the duty on iron, coal and cotton goods would soon settle itself.

"In conclusion, let me add that I do not pretend to say that it is within the power of any Government to bring back the good times of the ten years previous to 1873, but it is quite within the power of a Government, who will take the trouble to understand the circumstances of the country, to do a great deal in the way of ameliorating the depression and distress from which every interest in the country is suffering more or less.

"Yours truly,

"GEO. STEPHEN."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does he say where this coal is consumed?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He does not. He saw that his hon. friend objected very much to his resolution, which his hon. friend called an anomalous resolution. He had also heard it termed, during the last few days, across the floor of the House, a log-rolling system, and the object of a log-rolling system was certainly to make the log roll. If only one man held a spike at one end, it would be shunted off the track, but if two men took hold, the miner and manufacturer having each a spike at each end of the log, with the farmer in the middle, the log would roll on. This, in fact, was the great merit of the resolution. It asked for united action with regard to all the great interests of the country, and sought to raise them out of the Slough of Despond into which all our industries had sunk, by acting together. It was said that trade was selfish, and certainly if all trade was conducted on the principle on which his hon. friend advocated this resolution, it was selfishness personified; it was the essence, the very quintessence of selfishness. The hon. gentleman would not have the miners or the farmers helped, and no one save the manufacturers, and only the Hamilton manufacturers at that. During the course of his remarks, the other day, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had said, when speaking of this tariff, that if the Government had shown sympathy with any one interest, or any desire to help any one interest—that if the Government would not stick to their blind and fatuous fly-on-the-wheel theory, he would give them a partial support; and very sharply he had been attacked for his pains by an hon. gentleman opposite. If the Government had taken one step, faltering, uncertain and feeble as it might be, in the way of helping a single interest in the country, he would have gone with them. He would have great pleasure in voting for the resolution of his hon. friend; and then perhaps they would see whether his hon. friend would vote for his own resolution. Last Session, the hon. member for North Norfolk had made a most eloquent speech in favour of protection and had then gone out of a small auger hole,—a smaller auger hole than was to have been seen in the barrel of cider of which the hon. gentleman had told them that day,—and said that he was in favour, just then, of a 17½ per cent. tariff, adding that they could wait a little while longer at all events before changing it. The hon. member for Hamilton had told them that he was in a great dilemma; he (Mr. Wood) approved of the political and general policy of the Administration, but was disappointed with their commercial policy. What was the hon. member to do? It was an old saying: "I love Plato much, but I love truth more." In the same manner, the hon. gentleman loved Hamilton and protection much, but he loved the Mackenzie Administration more. He believed that his hon. friend did not expect that the resolution would carry, or if he had, he would not have proposed it. The resolution was drawn for the purpose of inducing every miner and farmer to vote against it, but he believed that the miners and farmers would accept the test and vote for it. This resolution was an entering wedge, a first step, and they could not expect the hon. gentleman to take his second step with them. The hon. gentleman was selfishly willing to secure their assistance, but he would not assist in upsetting this obnoxious commercial policy of the Government; the hon. gentleman would not help them in log rolling,—he would not take a hand-spike and help the farmer and miner. But if, as he said before, the Government was in extremis, and the hon. gentleman thought that the Government was in danger, he was not sure that his hon. friend would have moved this resolution. But, as the Government had a large majority in the House, who, like his hon. friend, believed in the general policy of the Government, he (Mr. Wood) knew that this resolution had no chance of being carried, and that he could safely, two years hence—if the elections did not come on before that—flourish this resolution in front of the hustings. The hon. gentleman would like very much to see the hon. member for Kingston vote against this resolution, and then, when the elections came around, he could tell the electors that this had been the case. He accepted this first step on the part of the hon. member, weak as it was, and then perhaps when he (Mr. Wood) saw how generously they acted towards the manufacturing interests, he might take the second step; and if he did so, the hon. gentleman would find that his kindness and liberality and generosity would not be ill-spent if he gave a helping hand to the interests of the farmer and of the miner.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said he thought the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston was a little in advance of the resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton. It struck him that hon. members, during the debates, were always running away from the point at issue, and their conduct reminded him of the trick of a ground sparrow, which if disturbed in its nest in the field, by flying from point to point, decoyed the disturber away so as to prevent the discovery of its nest. The question at issue was whether the Government or the Opposition were best capable of governing the country. If the Opposition were so ardently in favour of protection for the agriculturist and the manufacturer as they seemed to be, why had they not granted this protection when their leaders held, during eighteen or twenty years, the reins of power. The Opposition advocated a duty on corn, and this was all nonsense. They ought, however, to have a national currency. If this had been granted by the late Government, they would have been in power to-day, but, as it was, this Government would remain in power for twenty years. The hon. member for North Ontario had stated that, with a twenty per cent. tariff, the revenue of the country would be increased, but this was a mistake. If the tariff, however, was reduced to fifteen per cent. the revenue would be increased. The old Conservative party had had the chance to make of this a great country, and, having failed to do so, they had no right to seek to return to the Treasury benches. It seemed to him that the colonies were more slowly civilized than older countries. The idea of protection and the proclamation of all such retrograde policies reminded him of a lobster crawling backwards. It was simply impossible to prevail on the people of Canada to favour a protective policy. This might be carried in towns and villages, but seven out of ten of the population of Canada were agriculturalists, who ruled the House and who were the friends of the Reform Party. Until business in this country was conducted on a cash basis, there would be no salvation or safety for it. Credit was the curse of mankind. We were obliged to raise thirty millions in taxation, and this really cost the country ninety millions of dollars yearly, because, with these thirty millions, the people could have made ninety millions. It was within the scope of human intelligence and of the Ministers to make a Dominion currency based on the bonded redemption, which would save all taxation, build the public works of the country, and pay its expenses. He risked his reputation on this statement. The Conservative party had never meant to build the Pacific Railway, but they had hoped by means of so broad, so imposing, and so tempting a project, to secure such tremendous influence as to ensure their maintenance in power for fifty years. If the Opposition expected to get back into power by means of the protection cry, they would be woefully mistaken; and, as to the declaration of the hon. member for North Ontario, that the Conservative Party would win the next election, this was that sort of buncombe to which the people paid no attention. The agriculturalists needed money, and it was necessary that the whole monetary system of Canada should be changed. That system was a crying evil in this country, and unless it were changed it would be impossible to make a nation of the Dominion. The agriculturalists made the country, and yet they received no assistance from the banking institutions. It was necessary that there should be a national currency of $40 or $50 per head instead of $4 or $5. The banks were making their money from interest on renewals, not from discounting fresh paper, and they were thus drawing the life-blood from the people. Such a system could not continue, no matter which political party was in power. The Opposition would never regain office upon a policy of protection, and they must abandon it. In regard to the loan negotiated by the hon. the Finance Minister, he was able to state, from a knowledge of London financial affairs, having raised money there, that the loan was made on the true principle, and, if the hon. gentleman had asked for tenders, he would have been a goose. The loan was the best that could have been made by any man in Canada; that was his judgment apart from politics or anything else. Two wrongs never made a right. When the Americans committed the wrong of charging a duty on Canadian products, that afforded no reason why we should charge a duty on goods imported from the United States. Duties always injured the country which imposed them. Let Toronto, Montreal, Kingston and Hamilton go to Jericho, the farmers were going to rule this country. While he personally regretted that the right hon. member for Kingston was out of office, it was in the interest of the country that he should be kept from power. Much was said of late regarding protection, but the true evidence of national prosperity did not depend on what the people produced but on what they consumed. With a House composed of two political parties, it was the duty of hon. members and of the Reform party to give a cordial support to the Administration of the day and keep the Conservative party out of power as long as possible.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said he proposed to offer a few observations upon the motion submitted to the House by the right hon. member for Kingston and the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton. He would not say anything regarding the Pacific Scandal, the pic-nics, the "big push" letter, or steel rails. He regretted that the Spoker's ruling the other night was not sustained, and that matters exceedingly irrelevant to the debate were not ruled out. He did not know the opinion held by other hon. members, but when he heard such matters introduced into every question which came before the House, these words always occurred to him:

"Enough of misery when words avail,
And what so tedious as a twice-told tale."

He would, therefore, confine his remarks within the scope of the motions before the House. In reading the amendment proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston, it occurred to him that any party which could promise to secure for this country the present and continuous advantages set forth in the amendment deserved perpetual office at the hands of the people. He claimed, however, that it was not within the power of the right hon. gentleman, or of the members on the opposite side of the House, to carry out all that was proposed, nor was it within the power of the Government side, or of both sides of the House combined. The amendment implied the securing of good harvests, the continuance of good trade, the stoppage of the vicious system of cheap credit in England, the suppression of fraudulent dealings and many other matters which neither the Government nor any political party could secure. During the debate many references had been made to the system of taxation in the United States. It was important to know to which of the many tariffs of the United States the remarks applied, as they had ranged as high as 42½ per cent. ad valorem, and as low as 5 per cent. It was, perhaps, not generally known that the periods of great prosperity in the United States had been those when the lowest tariffs existed. The most prosperous period the American people had ever seen was under the working of the Hamilton tariff, when the average duties ranged from 5 to 7½ per cent. That was one of the earliest tariffs of the nation and continued during a period of 25 years. Under it cotton goods were charged 5 per cent.; iron, 7½ per cent.; woollens, 5 per cent.; pig iron being admitted free. An American writer on political economy said :

“If we compare these 18 years of a low revenue tariff with any 18 years in our after history, when we had an avowedly protective system, we shall see that in point of steadiness, and especially in the point of a steady increase, they cannot be matched; they cannot be matched even by a comparison with the years 1846—1861, when we had ostensibly revenue tariffs.”

Until the year 1808 the average duties in the United States were about 11 per cent. During those 18 years the revenue increased from four millions in 1791 to 16 millions in 1808 and the ratio of increase to population was still more striking. The revenue began at the ratio of about one million dollars to one million of the population and steadily rose during that term to 2½ million dollars to one million of the population. The second tariff passed in 1816 and was called the Calhoun tariff. It was a highly protective tariff, the average duties under it reaching 42 per cent. The third was the Clay tariff, that of 1824, under which increased duties were still levied on protected articles, and it afforded proof that, when articles were protected by legislation, the parties who sought continuous and excessive protection were never satisfied. The Calhoun tariff gave certain articles very large protection, but, after eight years, instead of being satisfied with the protection they had obtained, they pressed the question further on the Government. The duties under the Clay tariff averaged from 28 to 32½ per cent. The next tariff was that of 1828, and was known as the tariff of abominations, and the duties were so excessive under it that it created the ire of South Carolina, causing misunderstandings and creating vexatious disputes and continuing throughout a long series of years, culminating in the civil war which rent the country. The average duties under that tariff were 42 per cent. Then came the Whig tariff of 1842; it was a highly protective tariff under which millions of capital were invested in the iron trade, and, when the duties were reduced subsequently, hundreds and thousands of people were reduced to beggary. The next was the Walker tariff in 1846, so called after the Secretary of the Treasury, and it more nearly approached the tariff in Canada to-day than any other tariff in the history of the United States; its average duties were ranged from 17½ to 22½. Then came the Morrell tariff of 1861, the average duties of which from 1862 to 1867 were 34½ per cent., the average on dutiable goods being 41½ per cent.—a higher average than that imposed under any tariff except the tariff called the tariff of abominations. The original tariff of 1861 had many additions made to it until the actual amount of them was 2,317 distinct articles. The following articles paid the following rates of duty per cent of their value:—Common window glass, 49; pig iron, 55; bar iron, 63½; cast iron pipes and stoves, 109; wood screws, 66; carpenters' squares, 82; sheet lead and pipe, 54; salt in bulk, 108; rice, uncleaned, 165; blankets, 81½; white chalk, 833½. With such a tariff the people were made to pay five and even ten times as much as the Government collected from it. Mr. Perry, an American writer on commerce, said, in reference to this tariff, that—

Mr. MACDONALD.

“No legislator on general principles and without solicitation would ever have thought of such a tariff as ours. It is true even of the moderate protection accorded in the Hamilton tariff. It is overwhelmingly true, and at every point, of the Morrell tariff. Distinguished members of the Committee of Ways and Means had related to him at length the methods pursued to gain the sanction of that Committee, and thus the ear and the votes of Congress. These methods were scandalous. If they were generally understood there need be a speedy end of all such legislation. The condition of ship-building and ship-owning in this country is the best practical commentary on the influence of protection in general. The system is here reduced to its lowest terms. The perfection of protection is prohibition. Our navigation laws prohibit the buying of ships for the sole purpose of encouraging the building of domestic ships. Notwithstanding their absolute monopoly of the market under this law, such are the duties levied for protection on the materials that go into ship-building that our ship-builders cannot build ships at a profit, it is illegal to buy them, and the result is, that while at one time 75 per cent. of our imports were carried in American bottoms, to-day the American flag has well nigh disappeared from the ocean.”

With regard to the effect upon morals of this excessive system, Mr Perry said :—

"The effect on morals is to loosen them. When citizens see their Government is a respecter of persons, that rich and otherwise influential men can get laws passed for their individual behoof, and that the cry of thousands weighs little against the unjust claim of one, popular regard for Government declines, of course; respect for laws declines, of course; the smuggler never yet failed to accompany high protective duties and never will: the selfish informer never fails to follow the smuggler; the legislator loses sight of the general good in the desire to please a few powerful constituents; bribes direct or indirect have had much to do with our protective tariffs. The public conscience is demoralized by the spectacle of interest and influence ruling in high places; large fortunes acquired through favoritism enthroned in law provoke envy and ill-will; the poor are angered at and ready to despoil the rich; the rich in turn condemn the unorganized though plundered poor, and society gets secretly disorganized at and by the ears in consequence of a departure from the path of impartial justice."

Under the Reciprocity Treaty between the United States and British North American Provinces, the aggregate exchanges went up from $20,691,000 to $33,494,000, and in ten years to $84,000,000. When the treaty was repealed in 1866 and the restrictive duties became operative again, it fell in one year from $84,000,000 to $57,000,000. He took up a paper and found that the total liabilities of the failures in New York for the month of February amounted to $4,320,000. Whenever he took up a paper and looked at the state of trade on the other side he found the depression, shrinkage, ruin, and loss equal to, if not greater, than that which prevailed in Canada. Some hon. members might say: "But are those the sentiments you enunciated last Session; are you speaking to-day precisely what you spoke then, when you stated that you hoped that during recess the Finance Minister would take into consideration the interest of every manufacturer?" His sentiments were to-day what they were last Session. He then said he would advocate no tariff that did not take into consideration the interests of the manufacturer and the consumer. He held that would exclude the manufactures of Great Britain, the United States or any other country; that the very instant we excluded the foreign manufacturer we took away the chief incentive the native manufacturer could have to compete with him; and that, the very instant the duties were raised to a point that excluded the foreign manufacturer, we were left entirely at the mercy of the native manufacturer. The experience of a high protective tariff in the United States was, that for every $5 that went into the public treasury, $9 went into the pockets of the manufacturer, and the entire $14 came out of the pockets of the consumer. The word "protection" was a very vague one, as they had seen in this discussion. The hon. member for Stanstead spoke about a discriminating protection. If one hon. member was asked what that protection meant, he would say 2½ per cent.; another would say 20 per cent., and others would say 30 per cent. He could not vote for any resolution that contained simply the word "protection," without qualification—he would require to know definitely what was intended to be done, and that stated clearly and distinctly. To-day how strangely altered were the circumstances of our manufacturers compared with last year. Last year our manufacturers were depressed and needed help. What were the facts then? Gold was 115 and goods had reached the lowest point they had almost ever reached in the United States. No one could have predicted the great change that had since taken place. Last year there was not a Protectionist in the House who would not have felt he had achieved a great victory if 2½ per cent. had been added to the tariff. To-day, goods had hardened in price from 10 to 20 per cent., and the mere price of gold was now worth to every manufacturer what a tariff increase of 8 per cent. would have been last year. It might be said that Government was not to be thanked for that. True, the Government had nothing to do with it. But was there not some consistency in admitting that, if manufacturers were now some 8 to 10 per cent. better off, their position had been immensely improved. Individually, he now thought the protection we had as against Great Britain was excessive. First we had 17½ per cent. duty; then we had ocean freight, marine insurance, inland freight and home charges, which, if added together, would bring the protection up to 30 per cent., which he thought was high enough for all purposes. With greenbacks almost at par, with the cost of freight between the United States and Canada, our position was not bad; and, perhaps, in a month or two, when gold might probably be at par, the Canadian manufacturer would have a protection of 20 per cent. against the Americans. While he might not be able to go as far as the author from whom he had quoted, they must not forget that the great industries of the United States sprang into existence without artificial assistance, not only without the help of England, but with her positive hostility, sending as she did agents to pull down several of the earliest factories. Still the industries of the United States flourished and grew. Were we as a people less energetic than the Americans; were we willing to admit we had less intelligence than they; or were we willing to believe that whatever they had achieved we were unable to accomplish? Looking at the question from all its aspects, he felt unable at present to vote for the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, or for the resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton.

Mr. BLAIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

House adjourned at Thirty minutes after
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 7th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 65) To make provision for the Extradition of Fugitive Criminals.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 67) To amend the Law respecting the Incorporation of Joint Stock Companies by letters patent.—(Mr. Cartwright.)

Mr. MACDONALD.

Bill (No. 68) For the better protection of life and property in the Mines of British Columbia.—(Mr. Bunster.)

BREACHES OF CONTRACT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 66) To repeal certain laws making breaches of contracts of service criminal, and to provide for the punishment of certain breaches of contract.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said this was a subject in which the whole country was interested, and a short explanation should be given.

Mr. BLAKE said the object of the Bill was to some extent explained by its title. There were on the Statute-books of several of the Provinces—Quebec, Ontario, and Prince Edward Island—certain labour laws framed upon the antiquated models in England, in which breaches of contracts of service were made criminal offences, punishable by fine and imprisonment. The modern spirit of the law was not to treat such offences as criminal, but to deal with them, as in point of fact they were, as civil matters. One object of the Bill was to repeal so much of those ancient laws as made breaches of service criminal. One of the Provinces to which he referred, Quebec, had assumed to repeal certain provisions of its law relating to this subject. He had received information from a person who wrote him on the subject, that the Bill introduced for a similar purpose in Ontario was rejected, owing to the view that it was beyond the power of the Local Legislature to deal with this matter, inasmuch as the act had been made a crime before Confederation, and that it came now within the purview of the Dominion Parliament. The matter was somewhat of a mixed character, but no harm could be done by repealing the laws so that the local Legislatures might feel at liberty to make provision to dispose of those complicated and somewhat difficult questions which arose between masters and servants. The Bill recited that certain breaches of contract, whether of service or otherwise, were of a character which demanded their punishment as crimes, and proceeded to describe those offences. Those exceptions were as follows:—First, breaches of contract which might probably involve the danger of serious bodily injury, or the loss and destruction of valuable property, real or personal; 2nd, breaches of contracts, whether of service or otherwise, in the case of a gas or water company, or other authority for supplying the gas or water to cities and towns, the breach of which would probably involve the deprivation of the city or town of its supply; 3rd, breaches of contract, whether of service or otherwise, the probable consequence of which would be to prevent or affect the progress of any locomotive, train or engine upon any railway carrying Her Majesty's mails or passengers. Those offences were declared criminal, and made punishable by a fine not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding three months, the mode of prosecution being that prescribed in the law relating to conspiracy and intimidation.

Bill read the first time.

REFUNDING OF FEES.

Mr. FRASER moved that the fees paid on Bill (No. 17) To extend the provisions of section 56 of the Act 34 Vic., chap. 5, intitled "An Act relating to Banks and Banking" to the Bank of British North America, be refunded, in accordance with the Report of the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. HOLTON said, as they might probably have other applications for the remission of fees, it might be as well to state the grounds on which this recommendation was made. The Bill was an amendment to the General Law relating to Banking, applicable, it was true, to the British North America Bank, but which was made an exception to the original provisions of the Act. The Bank came by petition and asked to be placed under the same provision as other Banks. The Bill was not of the nature of Private Bills, and ought not to be subject to fees.

Motion agreed to.

LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. TROW, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 69) to declare life insurance policies non-forfeitable, said the first section related to objections of a technical character, which were often raised against policy-holders. Provision was made that none of those objections should be raised, nor should the company take advantage of any informality, when the policy-holder had paid the premium for five years. Another section had reference to cases of suicide, and was designed to protect the assignee. It compelled the company not to take advantage of such cases, but to pay over a certain amount in ten instalments, extending over ten years.

Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. MACMILLAN asked leave to introduce a Bill to grant certain powers to the Agricultural Insurance Co. of Canada to change the name.

Mr. SPEAKER said this was manifestly out of order, as the time allowed for the introduction of Private Bills expired on Monday. The hon. gentleman might introduce the Bill by special permission.

Mr. MACMILLAN said he would move for special permission.

An HON. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER said the objection of one member was fatal.

Mr. MACMILLAN said he would ask that the rule be suspended in this case in order that he might introduce the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman was, no doubt, aware that a certain course was to be observed. If the rules were suspended, it must be on a petition to introduce, and that petition should set forth and establish certain very special circumstances which would justify the suspension. If they did not adhere to this rule, they might as well give up their efforts to remodel the practice with reference to Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was informed that in this case not one of the rules regarding Private Bills had been complied with. The Bill had not been printed, the fees had not been paid, and so on.

THE MIRAMICHI RIVER.

QUESTION.

Mr. DOMVILLE, in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, asked whether it was the intention of the Government to expend during the current year a sum of money for the improvement of the navigation of the South-west branch of the Miramichi River?

Mr. BLAKE: It is not.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

QUESTION.

Mr. YOUNG asked whether the Government intended to place an item in the Estimates with a view to have Canada properly represented at the Grand International Exhibition to be held in the city of Paris in 1878?

Mr. BLAKE: The subject is now under the consideration of the Government.

BAY DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

Mr. ROBITAILLE asked whether it was the intention of the Government to grant aid of some kind to help the building of the Bay des Chaleurs Railway, as a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. BLAKE: The subject has not been under the consideration of the Government.

RIVERS VERTE AND CABANEAU BRIDGES.

QUESTION.

Mr. BLANCHET, in the absence of Mr. ROY, asked whether it was the intention of the Government to include in the Supplementary Estimates a sum of money to repair the roadway and rebuild the bridges over the Rivers Verte and Cabaneau on the Temiscouata Road; this road being an Interprovincial one.

Mr. BLAKE: It is not.

Mr. BLAKE.

DOMINION NOTES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) moved for returns of the accounts of Dominion Notes of the denominations of one and two dollars (payable in Victoria) which have been forwarded by Government to the Assistant Receiver-General for the Province of British Columbia during each year since the admission of that Province into the Dominion, together with the amounts of such notes returned for cancellation during each year therein mentioned. He said his object was to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the fact that there were scarcely any Dominion notes in circulation in British Columbia, and that great inconvenience was caused by the scarcity of small change in that Province. The only change in circulation was American half dollars and coins of other countries of various denominations. Until recently, American coin had always passed at par, but there had been such an influx of it into Victoria that the merchants had been compelled to levy a discount of five per cent. Previous to the entry of British Columbia into Confederation, the local banks issued $1 notes, but since Confederation they had stopped this issue, for what reason he did not know. For a time the Dominion notes took the place of local notes, but they had gradually disappeared. He did not know whether those notes had been returned for cancellation, or what had become of them, but their absence from circulation in the Province was a great inconvenience. About eighteen months ago he wrote to the hon. the Finance Minister on the subject, but that gentleman had not the courtesy to acknowledge the receipt of the letter.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would inform me whether the letter was addressed to myself.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo): It was addressed to the Finance Minister.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: This is the first I have heard of it, certainly. It may possibly have arrived while I was absent in England. As to the main fact, I may just say that some considerable difficulty was experienced in getting our notes in circulation in British Columbia; a certain amount was sent there, I believe, two or three years ago. My attention was drawn to this matter some time ago by hon. gentlemen from British Columbia, and instructions were given to send a reasonable quantity of ones and twos to the Assistant Receiver-General of that Province, to be put in circulation. Whether they have arrived or not, I am not advised, but they are on the way, I believe.

Motion agreed to.

HORSE-SHOE BAR CHANNEL.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DOMVILLE, in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, moved for copies of correspondence between the Minister of Public Works and the officer in charge of the dredging improvements and deepening of the Horse-Shoe Bar Channel at the entrance of the Miramichi River, with a statement showing the total amount of dredging originally contemplated; the quantity of material removed from said Bar in the respective seasons that the dredge has been at work; the length, breadth and depth of the excavations removed, with the length of the work yet to be excavated, and the probable period of its completion, with a statement of the depth of water proposed to be obtained in said channel by such improvement.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not aware of any such correspondence being in existence. However, if there is any, it will be brought down. The state the work was in was presented to the House formerly, and of course it is not expected that it is to be again submitted.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTED COAL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. GOUDGE moved for a return of the quantities and value of the coal imported into the Dominion for the years 1873, 1874, 1875 and 1876; distinguishing the various kinds, say—Anthracite, Bituminous and Lignite; the countries and ports of the same whence brought;

the Province and ports of the Dominion where entered. His object, he explained, was to secure information which was not contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns. The total quantity of coal was given, but it was not classified into the different grades. He believed, from what he had learnt from the American reports, that a large portion, say two-thirds, of the coal imported into the Dominion was anthracite coal, and he desired to obtain accurate information on the subject. This was absolutely necessary in order to discuss intelligently the coal question, which was occupying to a very large extent the minds of the people of this country. He would suggest to the Minister of Customs the desirability of classifying the imports of coal in the future.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John): I do not think that we can furnish this information as far back as the hon. gentleman desires, as these returns have only been kept separately from the first of last July to the end of December. I do not think it possible to secure such information as to previous imports unless we apply to the different ports, and then it could not be depended on as accurate.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

REPATRIATION OF FRENCH IMMIGRANTS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MASSON moved for copies of all correspondence with the French Vice-Consul in Montreal, or other persons relating to the repatriation of French immigrants during the year 1876, together with a statement shewing the names of said immigrants who may have been repatriated, the date of their arrival in this country, their age and their occupations previous to their coming here: also all Departmental rules then and now in force relating to the same.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John): I will be happy to furnish the hon. gentleman with all possible information as to names, etc., but I do not know how the dates can be given.

Mr. MASSON said the dates were the most important point. If the names could be given the season could also be easily indicated.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said it had been remarked a few evenings ago that these immigrants were repatriated under an old departmental rule. He could only say that this rule did not apply to any such case as the present; it was only intended to enable an immigrant who could not earn his living here, or who was poor or sickly, to be sent to the country from which he came. Under the late Administration only three or four, or at most five, persons had been so returned to their homes. He did not complain of the existence of the regulation, but he did complain of its abuse.

Mr. BURPEE said he had previously stated that this rule provided for repatriation in certain cases. Its application had however been enlarged and extended in this instance.

Mr. POPE: Do I understand that the rule has been changed?

Mr. BURPEE: It has been extended.

Mr. POPE: In what way? By an Order in Council, or how?

Mr. BURPEE: The correspondence will show.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I may as well state what I said the other night, that the Government, as soon as these proceedings were brought to their notice, stopped them. I considered that this rule had been improperly used. My hon. friend is perfectly right in saying that it was intended to apply to individual cases of exceptional hardship, and not to the return of several hundreds of people. The Government found that it was being abused and stopped the proceedings at once.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURE OF THE SCHOONER NAPIER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for papers and correspondence connected with the seizure of the schooner Napier in Ingonish, in the year 1872, for smuggling, and a statement shewing if the Hon. William Ross has redeemed his bonds for the release of said vessel. If not, why not? The amount realized from the sale of goods seized on board such vessel. He said it was notorious that the Hon. William Ross had been for years in the habit of smuggling at St. Peter's; that the hon. gentleman was at last caught; that his vessel was seized with the goods she contained, by order of the Government of the day; that the vessel was released upon bonds given by Mr. Ross; that he (Mr. Ross) had been elevated by the present Government to the highest position he could occupy in this country; and that these bonds had not been redeemed. He presumed that the leader of the Government had been in the dark with reference to this matter, and that when the hon. gentleman discovered it, he sent Mr. Ross about his business in order that he might not disgrace the Cabinet, until the matter was satisfactorily explained away, and that he then placed him in a very high position. He moved that the papers be brought down in order that the whole transaction might be revealed.

Mr. Masson.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said this case happened in 1872. The vessel was seized on the 2nd October, 1872, and was released by the then Minister of Customs on the 7th October, the captain being relieved at the same time. A bond was taken from Mr. Ross. No information was asked for, nor was any demand made for the fulfilment of the bond until 1874, after the present Government came into power. The bond had not been collected yet. There was an important letter in 1872 written to the then Minister of Customs, the Hon. Mr. Tilley, explaining this matter, which had been lost, and, as yet, it could not be found, although it had been searched for. Mr. Tilley was telegraphed to, and sent the following reply:—

"Fredericton, Feb. 27, 1877.

"Jas. Johnston,
Comr. Customs.

"Collector Ross, Halifax, telegraphs me that his letter to Department, Oct., 1872, referring to seizure schooner Napier, cannot be found. Must be somewhere in Department. Not in my possession. Bouchette may suggest where it is. If my memory serves me, enquiry established smuggling by captain and crew, but exonerated owner from any knowledge of proceedings. Papers will, however, show.

“S. L. TILLEY.”

All the papers asked for would be brought down, but he thought it due to Mr. Ross that it should be explained that the delay arose from the loss of the letter referred to.

Mr. BOWELL: That does not release him from his bond?

Mr. BURPEE: He is not released.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the hon. member for Victoria ought to have very good grounds before he made such statements as he had regarding a gentleman who held a high position in the country, and who once held a seat in this House. He had known Mr. Ross for many years, and he thought it in extremely bad taste for the hon. member for Victoria to say what he had. The charge he was sure could not be made in the hon. member's own county, and it was rather strange that he had not made the accusation against Mr. Ross during the late election campaign. It struck him (Mr. Mackay) that an investigation had been held into the charge of smuggling on the part of the master of the vessel. Mr. Ross not being on board the schooner at the time the seizure was made, he had, it appeared, nothing whatever to do with the matter, except owning the vessel. It was clearly enough shown that Mr. Ross had nothing to do with the smuggling of liquors and other goods from St. Peter into Nova Scotia. In fact, Mr. Ross was neither a wholesale nor retail dealer in the trade in connection with the importation of liquors, but the hon. member for Victoria could not say that he was not interested in that way.

Mr. CAMPBELL asserted that he knew as a fact that Mr. Ross was for several years engaged in the trade of the importation of liquors, and that he had a vessel in that trade. Several merchants had been driven out of the business because they could not compete with a man who did not pay duty. He (Mr. Campbell) had examined the Customs Department, but he could not find the report as to the case. It seemed to him as if there had been some foul play. The money not then paid into the Revenue Department was still owing, and he considered he had a right to enquire into the matter.

Motion agreed to.

DEFALCATIONS AT PORT OF BADDECK.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for papers and correspondence in connection with the defalcations of the ex-Collector of Customs, William Redston, at the Port of Baddeck, and a return showing if the amount had been refunded to the Department; and if not, the reason for its not being refunded. He said this officer had, he believed, kept back a couple of thousand dollars of the public money. The case was put into the hands of the Government Agent at Halifax, judgment rendered against him, and his property was ordered to be sold—or at least so he understood, but he could not follow the case out. But the money had not yet been refunded to the Treasury.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said of course there could be no objection to the motion passing or to the papers being brought down. He might say, however, that the case was one that dated back to 1870. Action was taken against the sureties, and judgment for $2,400 rendered. In 1871, the lawyer in Halifax wrote that the sureties were worthless and could not be proceeded against. Action was accordingly taken against the Collector, but nothing was done towards collecting the amount until 1874.

Mr. TUPPER: The property was sold under an execution.

Mr. BURPEE said he did not think it was. The inspector was sent there to report upon the case, and he reported that the security covered a house and lot which was not worth more than $1,000 at the outside. The inspector recommended, as the Collector was a poor man with a large family, that $1,000 be taken in satisfaction of the claim. This was agreed to, and the Government had been trying to collect the money, but had failed so far, although they had several promises.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton): I congratulate the House that the hon.

member for Victoria has at last in his enquiries departed from the feud which exists between him and the Ross clan, and has gone into another.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE AT RONDEAU.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for returns shewing in detail the cost of the erection of the lighthouse at the harbour of refuge at Rondeau, under contract awarded by tender; the tender received and from whom; whether the lowest tender was accepted; the amount paid for extras in constructing breakwater on the lake side opposite the lighthouse, and whether such extras were done by tender publicly advertised for; also the name of the contractor for oil supplied to said lighthouse, the cost per gallon supplied, together with loss involved by the fire which occurred last fall in said lighthouse; and the correspondence relating thereto, whether from the lighthouse keeper or the Government Inspector. He said the piers of the lighthouse were left standing there for three years, after having been finished, before the lighthouse was erected. On the 7th September, last year, the lighthouse was erected, and on the 25th July—some months before the lights were put in—a keeper was appointed at a salary of $400 a year. In October, a portion of the lighthouse was destroyed by fire. It was said that the fire was caused by the explosion of the oil, which was supplied by Mr. Fitzgerald, an active supporter of Colonel Walker in the London election, and which was not up to the standard by a long way. Some $600 or $700 damages were involved by the fire. Moreover, the harbour had been rendered comparatively useless since then, as vessels could not with safety enter in. The importance of the harbour was shown by the fact that in three months 27 vessels took refuge there. Although the lighthouse was constructed by tender, the lowest tender was not accepted, but the tender was transferred to another party.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said it would have been well had the hon. gentleman reserved his remarks until he got more accurate information from the returns. The transaction with regard to the oil was a bond fide one. He did not know before that the contractor, Mr. Fitzgerald, was a strong political partizan. The contract was let by public tender and Mr. Fitzgerald gave the lowest tender. The oil was inspected by the officer of the department and was found to be of a superior quality. The lighthouse, however, was not let to the lowest tenderer. The lowest tender was that of Squires & Co., Brampton, their figures being $4,295. This was accepted, and the contract was awarded to them. But the firm afterwards refused to execute the contract, giving as an excuse that their sureties had failed. The rule was, that, where the lowest tender was not accepted, the Government fell back on others; if the estimate of their own officer was higher than the offer of the next tenderer, the contract was invariably given to him; but, if it was below, tenders for the contract were advertized for anew. The next tender was for $4,694, and, as the Government Engineer reported his estimate higher than that, the tender was accepted. The contractor afterwards said some extra work was required to prevent accidents through a storm or high water. The Government Engineer reported favourably, and a breakwater, at a cost of $400, was erected. In addition there were $287 for extras. The whole work was performed to the satisfaction of the Government Inspector. As to the explosion, an enquiry was held, but no cause could be discovered. It appeared that the lighthouse-keeper had left about an hour and a half before the fire took place. It would take fully $600 to repair the damage. He acknowledged the importance of the harbour, and no time should be lost in replacing the light.

Mr. MACKAY.

Mr. STEPHENSON said the fire occurred, according to the report of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on 19th October last. It was well known that the harbour of refuge was repaired long after that date, and the navigators could not understand why the light was not in operation after that date, when without it the harbour was rendered useless. The matter had been represented to him by steamboat-owners and others using the harbour, who had pressed upon them the necessity of having the light repaired at once. If the accident had occurred at Cow Bay or some place of minor importance, frequented by half a dozen vessels, the matter would have been properly attended to, and when the accident took place at the the only harbour of refuge on the north shore of Lake Erie, the people of Ontario could not understand why the same promptness should not be used.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said there had been no neglect whatever. The destruction of the light took place at almost the close of navigation. His impression was that lighthouse-keepers always showed temporary lights if accidents occurred to the lighthouses. He would, however, make inquiries into the subject.

Mr. STEPHENSON said it was stated in the report of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries :

“Owing to an accident from fire, the lamps and reflectors of the revolving apparatus of the main light were destroyed on the 19th October last, and the light has not been shown since that period.”

Navigators along the lake shore when they left Longe Point and steered for the Rondeau light had failed to discover it, and vessels had gone ashore in consequence of the neglect of the Government to repair the light. To show the necessity that existed for keeping the light up to a late period, he might state that steamers and row-boats were plying on the 1st January last year, and steamers were running to-day on Detroit river. When vessels were thus plying on our western waters it was absolutely necessary that a light of that importance should be re-erected the very next day, if possible, after it was burnt down.

Mr. SMITH said it was the rule of the Department that, if any accident occurred to a light, so that it did not any longer exist, information was given to the public at once. Therefore, the people of the district must have known that the light did not exist, because it had been burnt down, and he thought he remembered, though he was not positive on the point, that instructions were given to the light-house-keeper to exhibit a temporary light, if possible. It was the invariable rule to exhibit a temporary light, if possible. He felt satisfied—nevertheless he would make inquiries and inform the House on the subject—that a temporary light had been exhibited, and if it was not exhibited it was the neglect of the lighthouse-keeper.

Mr. STEPHENSON said the report distinctly stated that the light had not been shown since that period.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It might refer to the regular light.

Mr. TUPPER said he could readily understand that great neglect had taken place in regard to this matter. He took that opportunity to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the condition of the vessel at Cap D'Or, in the County of Cumberland.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that notice should be given before that motion was brought up.

Mr. TUPPER said he would place a notice on the paper. It was most important that the measures adopted for the protection of life and property, at great expense to the country, should be carried out, because it was evident that, if such were not done in regard to lighthouses and fog-whistles, they simply became delusions and snares, and caused the destruction they were established to prevent.

Mr. SMITH said he would challenge the hon. gentleman to bring up the matter at any proper time. The hon. gentleman was not his judge, and, if he were, he was not a disinterested one, and he was therefore not disposed to submit to his views in regard to matters in the hands of his Department.

Mr. MCGREGOR said there was a temporary light exhibited at Rondeau Harbour after the fire.

Motion agreed to

SPECIAL TARIFF FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. BUNSTER moved :

“That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—That in the opinio of this House the interests of British Columbia will be promoted by the adoption of a Special Tariff for the protection of the Farming, Mining and Manufacturing interests of that Province, until the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

He said that, four years ago, he had the honour of bringing this subject before the House. Since then, circumstances had occurred which he thought would enable the House to judge of the matter in a more favourable light; the question possessing additional interest to entitle it to their favourable consideration. He was glad the Speech from the Throne had referred to the visit made by the Governor-General to British Columbia last summer.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the motion could not possibly be in order.

Mr. BUNSTER said if the hon. the Finance Minister would bear with him for a few moments, he would show that it was in order. It was not fair or honest that, whenever the members from British Columbia rose in the House, they should be interrupted in this way. It was rather singular, to say the least, that the hon. the Finance Minister should interrupt him when he mentioned the circumstance of the visit of the Governor-General to British Columbia last year.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. member should place the motion in the hands of the Speaker before he proceeded to speak to it.

Mr. BUNSTER said he would do so at the proper time.

Mr. SPEAKER said he looked into the matter a few moments ago and found that the motion handed in was one of an abstract character, and therefore would be in order. Whether it was exactly consistent with the notice was another question.

Mr. BLAKE said the House had only to do with the motion on the notice paper, and that was the only one the hon. member could move.

Mr. SPEAKER said it had occurred to him that, looking at the motion as it appeared on the paper, it was entirely out of order; and he had, therefore, examined the motion itself. In his opinion it was in order, though it might be a very inconvenient abstract resolution.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that what appeared on the notice paper was merely a synopsis of the motion.

Mr. BUNSTER, continuing, said that, when His Excellency the Governor-General visited British Columbia last season, he was well received, as he deserved to be; and he, also, well received the farmers who waited on him en masse, and laid their grievances on this subject before him. His Excellency promised to aid them as much as lay in his power. It was reported that he (Lord Dufferin) had said that the farmers needed protection, but it was a question for his Ministers to deal with, the only thing he (Lord Dufferin) could do being to recommend the matter to them.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUNSTER said the hon. the Minister of Justice would not find him saying anything except what was correct and in the interests of British Columbia. His Excellency, having given the farmers a hearing and assured them that he would give all the assistance in his power, they (the farmers), a large and influential body, had solicited him (Mr. Bunster) to bring the matter before Parliament, and ask that a special tariff should be granted in the interests of the Province. No doubt it would be argued that a special or differential tariff could not be extended to any particular part of the Dominion, but it should be remembered that British Columbia was labouring at present under the disadvantages of a tariff almost altogether opposed to the wants and wishes of the people of that Province. British Columbia did not enjoy the privileges acquired under the Washington Treaty by other Provinces of the Dominion, and upon that fact he based the claim to have a special tariff framed in her interests. It was a matter of justice that that distant Province should receive the consideration on this subject it was so well entitled to. Their markets had been flooded with American produce, to the detriment of the farmers, ever since the Province came into the Union. The farmers on the island of San Juan, who felt they were labouring under great injustice in this matter as subjects of Great Britain, now possessed a market which they would not have obtained if they had remained part and parcel of the Dominion. He claimed, on behalf of British Columbia, that, inasmuch as there was already a differential tariff against the Province, the Government should take the subject into its favourable consideration and grant what was now so urgently needed and required, thus fulfilling the promise, or partial promise, made by His Excellency to the farmers of that country—a promise, he might add, that had made their hearts rejoice, giving them confidence, as it did, that they would be fairly and honourably dealt with by the Dominion authorities.

Mr. SPEAKER said that it was well known His Excellency could not make a statement on public affairs unless under the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown. It was not, therefore, strictly in order for any hon. member to inform the House as to what His Excellency did or did not say. His Excellency's name should not be used for the purpose of influencing the opinion of the House.

Mr. BUNSTER said he would also call the attention of the Government to a resolution passed in 1376 by the Local Legislature of British Columbia. It read as follows:—

“That, whereas, by the 7th clause of the Terms of Union, it is provided that the Customs Tariff and Excise Duties existing within the Province at the date of union should continue in force until the railway from the Pacific coast and the system of railways in Canada should be connected, unless by decision of the Legislature of British Columbia the Tariff and Excise Laws of Canada should sooner be adopted;

“And whereas, owing principally to the anticipated early construction and completion of the Pacific Railway, the Legislature of British Columbia adopted the Canadian Tariff and Excise Laws;

“And whereas the agricultural portion of the community throughout the Province have suffered severely from the adoption of the Canadian Tariff, which, while admitting some farm products free, imposed but a low rate of duty on all others—(he might say that scarcely any duties were imposed on foreign products)—and as connection between the Pacific Coast and the railway system of Canada is not likely to be accomplished so soon as was at first understood;

“And whereas, moreover, the neighbouring possessions of the United States of America overflow with a surplus of commo-ditities which this Province can produce in sufficiency for more than its present need:

“Therefore, your memorialists respectfully ask that your Excellency may be pleased to sanction the adoption for this Province, of the following changes in the tariff now in operation.”

The changes in the tariff they desired to secure were the removal of the duties levied on mining and agricultural machinery; and, in lieu thereof, the imposition of a small tax on the cereals which could be produced in the Province of British Columbia. This would be only a fair and perfectly just proceeding, and if the Government wished to do the Province justice they would certainly accede to it; and this could be done without inflicting any injury on the other Provinces of the Dominion. One duty imposed by the American Government militated heavily against their interests. They employed Indians in “gathering” oil, which was excluded from the American market, and they were consequently obliged to send it to England. They did not share, it was to be remembered, in the benefits accruing from the Washington Treaty. He thought he had shown that it was perfectly practicable for the Government to grant British Columbia a modified tariff, in order that the bone and sinew of the country might not be driven out of it, and that their farming lands might not again become portions of the howling wilderness. If those other Provinces were overrun with American produce, as they were in British Columbia, he was certain that the consequent disadvantage would be felt, and no one could therefore be blamed under such circumstances for defending the interests of his constituents; particularly if, as he (Mr. Bunster) was, supported by the Legislature and the entire population of his Province. British Columbia only desired to secure an exceptional tariff until such a time as Canada would carry out her pledges and build the railway. It was also to be borne in mind that, since the Province entered Confederation, the tariff had been raised 2½ per cent. on articles which they consumed. Unfortunately, they did not have a sufficiently large population to encourage manufactures, and even if this were the case they would in this relation be shut out of the American market. Many intelligent and thrifty farmers had gone to British Columbia from Ontario—some on the recommendation of his friends, and some on his own recommendation, which recommendation he now regretted having given, because they had said to him: "You have good land we know, because we see it before us, but you have no market; it is better to go to the States than to come to your country." Hence they lost settlers who were as good subjects and citizens as could be found anywhere in the world, simply because they lacked the small degree of protection which they desired, and which was necessary to establish a proper feeling of confidence. He earnestly implored the Government to take the matter into their favourable consideration. He thought that a tax on cereals would be preferable to the tax on malt. He asked hon. gentlemen to support him in his endeavour to secure what was simply a matter of justice for his Province. He would propose to add to the motion the proviso: "Until the Canada Pacific Railroad be built."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Does this imply compensation for any other unavoidable difficulty that may occur?

Mr. BUNSTER: The unavoidable delay will probably come up in another form. British Columbia is not insensible to the injustice done her.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I must inform my hon. friend that we cannot allow such a resolution to pass. However desirous we may be to meet his wishes, and those of other gentlemen from British Columbia, it is scarcely necessary for me to say that it is impossible for this Dominion to permit each separate Province to have a separate tariff adapted to its own especial needs; therefore, I hope that my hon. friend will not insist on pressing his motion. He has stated his case and his grievances, and I think it would not be advisable for him to press a resolution which I think the sense of the House will inevitably condemn.

Mr. DEWDNEY said that, prior to entering the Union, they had had the alternative of either retaining their own tariff or of accepting the Canadian tariff, which, if not then accepted, was to come into force when the railway was built. He was willing, however, to let the matter drop.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought that as his hon. friend from Vancouver had had an opportunity for making his explanations, which would go to the country and to the hon. gentleman's constituents, he (Mr. Bunster) had better adopt the suggestion of the Finance Minister, and withdraw his motion. Its passage, of course, was hopeless.

Mr. BUNSTER said that he would comply with the suggestions of the Finance Minister and of the leader of the Opposition, but nevertheless he would probably move the motion in amendment to the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston or before going into Committee of Supply. He would merely add that British Columbia had been worse treated, and therefore had more cause to feel discontented than any other Province in the Dominion. He hoped the Government might see their way to granting what he had asked for at some future time, and bring it down as part and parcel of their policy.

Motion, with leave of the House. withdrawn.

THE TORONTO HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) moved for a statement shewing the extent and character of the works carried on in the improvement of the Toronto harbour during the past year; together with all correspondence, plans, &c., having reference to the best method or methods of permanently securing the harbour against damage, and deepening it so as to admit vessels of largest tonnage navigating the upper lakes, with any estimate which may have been made of the cost of such improvements. He said he was aware that different opinions existed as to the best method of securing the improvement of Toronto harbour, and his object in moving for these papers was simply to obtain the best opinions that could be given in regard to a case of such gravity.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought that some of the information asked for was brought down to the House last Session. The papers desired he presumed were such fresh correspondence or reports as might have passed or been sent in since that date. No new plans had, however, been designed since the close of last Session in this regard. The only difficulty encountered in protecting this harbour related to the fact that the beach, which had formerly protected it on the south-east side, had been broken away. Experience had shown that the filling up of the harbour, which was anticipated in consequence of this breach having been made, had not occurred, and it might be that this breach would effect a sanitary reform in admitting purer water into the bay, besides preserving the depth of the water. The beach was wholly composed, as the hon. gentleman was aware, of sand, which shifted with the varying storms; sometimes, in consequence of this fact, the entrance of the water was less free on the eastern than on the western side of the harbour, and occasionally this was so much the case that ordinary lake steamers could not find an entrance there. There was, therefore, an uncertainty as to using the return passage for navigable purposes, for it was not at all absolutely certain that the destruction of the beach would move the obstruction of the harbour. The works carried on last year had been devoted exclusively to widening and deepening the entrance to Queen's Wharf, at the eastern end of the harbour. A considerable portion of the entrance to the harbour was composed of shaly limestone, which had been excavated by the ordinary dredging operations, and some of that work was yet to be done. When it was completed the entrance would be quite sufficient for almost any vessel navigating the lakes, while anchorage in the harbour was good and the water sufficiently deep after getting in. The maintenance of the depth along the wharves and landing places belonged to the Harbour Commissioners rather than to the Government, and that was a part of the work which they did not propose to undertake. He would, of course, furnish every information to the hon. gentleman that had not been previously brought down, but in the present state of the public revenue they did not expect to undertake any extensive work for the protection of the harbour in consequence of the breach alluded to. The reports received showed that an expenditure varying from $220,000 to $375,000, according to the plans to be adopted, would be required for the purpose, and there was some reasonable doubt, in the first place, whether the work was necessary, and, secondly, whether any of the plans would be efficacious.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said he was aware of the opinion that had already been expressed, but he thought it would be well to have that opinion ratified. If it could be shown that an expenditure of $220,000 to $375,000 was necessary, it would be a subject for the Government to consider in view of the importance of the harbour, not only to the city of Toronto, but also to the whole Province.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they quite recognized the importance of the harbour; it was next to the harbour of Hamilton, which, of course, was always the best. The Government was bound to give the closest attention to harbours such as Hamilton, Toronto and Presqu' Isle, which were natural harbours of refuge; but he did not think any of them were in immediate danger from any of the natural causes which sometimes affected harbours.

Motion agreed to.

AMOUNTS PAID BY STEAMBOATS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. CHEVAL moved for a statement as exact as possible, showing the amount paid by each steamboat to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, during the season 1875-6, for wharfage dues, together with the name and length of such steamboat.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF LIVE CATTLE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM moved for a return showing, 1st. The value of live cattle imported into each Province between the 1st day of July, 1875, and the 1st day of January, 1877. 2nd. The value of live cattle imported into each Province during the same period, and entered in bond for exportation. 3rd. The value of live cattle exported from each Province during the same period, specifying what portion thereof related to cattle imported in bond. 4th. The value of meats, fresh or cured; the product of cattle imported and killed in bond, and exported during the same period from each Province. 5th. The total value of meats, fresh or cured; the product of horned cattle exported from each Province during the same period. He said his object was to obtain the most complete information possible on this subject. The section of the country where he resided was deeply interested in the cattle trade, and it was necessary they should be in possession of all the facts connected therewith.

Mr. CASEY said he recognized the importance of the additional information asked for, but he suggested that the date in the motion should be changed from July 1st, 1875, to January 1st, 1875, so as to make the return cover the same period as the one he (Mr. Casey) moved for the other day.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he did not know whether he could furnish the details asked for in the 4th and 5th clauses, but everything that could be brought down would be submitted.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM accepted the amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EAGLE HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

Mr. CASEY moved for the Engineer's report of the survey of Eagle Harbour, in the county of Elgin, to decide on its suitability for a harbour of refuge; and map of the said harbour. He said in the summer of 1875 the Government saw fit to send an engineer to survey this harbour with a view to ascertaining how far it was adapted for a harbour of refuge. The people in that part of the country were naturally curious to know what report had been made. This was perhaps not the time to urge on the hon. the Minister of Public Works any further action in connection with this matter, but he would probably take another opportunity to say something on the subject.

Mr. CHEVAL.

Motion agreed to.

SALE OF CANADIAN SHIPS IN FRANCE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. KILLAM moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada, the Imperial Government, and any other Governments or persons, on the subject of the duty imposed on Canadian ships sold in France; also copies of such portions of recent Commercial Treaties between the United Kingdom and France, as permit the sale in France of ships registered in the United Kingdom on more favourable terms than ships registered in Canada. He said the object of the motion could be explained in a few words. About ten years ago ships built and registered in this country could be sold in France on payment of an import duty of two francs per ton. Since the last Commercial Treaty between England and France, ships registered in Great Britain were allowed to be sold on payment of the same duty, but Canadian ships were subjected to a duty of 40 fr. per ton. Whether this was expressly stipulated by the treaty, or whether it was a construction placed on the treaty by the French authorities, he did not know. In the latter case, it would be a similar construction to that which enabled the Americans to claim that seal oil was not fish oil, or that British Columbia was not part of the Dominion. He wanted to know, first, whether this evil could be remedied, and, secondly, whether the Government were taking any steps to remedy it. It would be as well to understand whether the Canadian ships were British only for the purpose of vexatious and annoying interference by the Imperial Government, or whether they were to be allowed the privileges British ships enjoyed in other countries.

Mr. BLANCHET said the hon. the mover should be thanked for bringing this subject before the House. He (Mr. Blanchet) was not a shipbuilder himself, but he happened to live in a place where a great many vessels were built, and shipbuilders had informed him that the duty of 40 francs per ton amounted to prohibition. A few years ago the French markets were good for Canadian vessels, but they were now deprived of them under the operation of this duty. The subject was brought to the attention of the Dominion Board of Trade at its last meeting, and a resolution was adopted asking the Government to try and find some means of relieving the shipbuilders of Canada in this particular. It might be that the duty was imposed by way of retaliation for the duty put upon French products by Canada. He hoped the Government would take the matter into consideration.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was very glad that the correspondence had been moved for, because it was desirable that the country should know exactly how this matter stood. The Government had had correspondence with the Imperial and French Cabinets and they were met in this way: This is a matter of treaty arrangement between England and France. The last treaty agreed that British ships should be sold in France, but it stipulated that they should be vessels built in Great Britain. Of course, our ships were British and were recognised as such by Imperial legislation. The correspondence would show exactly the position of the matter at present.

Motion agreed to.

THE POSTAL UNION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) moved for all papers or correspondence, if any, in regard to placing the Dominion of Canada in as favourable a position as any foreign country, under the provisions of the Postal Union made at Berne on the 9th October, 1874.

He said every hon. member would know that, under the Postal Union effected at Berne, which comprised all the countries of Europe, including the colonies of France and the United States, letters were conveyed to and from each nation at the rate of 5 cents. It was true that we had, with the United States and Great Britain, a very favourable postal arrangement, but we had not very good arrangements with other foreign countries. We had to pay a double rate of duties. For instance, a man on the other side of the St. Lawrence paid 5c. for a letter to France, while a man on this side had to pay 10c. for the same service. The colonies of Great Britain, and the Dominion of Canada were not included in this Postal Union, therefore he brought this motion before the House in order to know if the Government were using every exertion in this direction. He thought we should be placed certainly upon as good a footing as any country in the world in regard to postal matters.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he was sure the House would be obliged to the hon. gentleman for the attention he had applied to this important subject, and he (Mr. Huntington) would take the earliest opportunity to bring down the papers. When they came down, he was sure the hon. gentleman would be glad to find that the Government had done its best to place this country in the same position as those countries which obtained a position in the Postal Union under the convention at Berne. By that treaty there were certain provisions, one of which was that, if any member of the convention objected to the admission of any applicant, the admission could not take place. It had been agreed that sea rates of postage were to be an open question in all countries beyond the sea, and were to be the subject of future arrangement. It happened, after the union, when British India and the colonies were asking to be admitted, that the British Government did not take the same view as France in regard to the sea rates. The views of the British Government, however, prevailed, and, in consequence, when application was made by Canada, or, on our behalf, by the British Post Office, the French Government refused to permit our entrance into the Union. The Government had made every exertion last winter with the expectation, which was concurred in by the British Post Office, that the application would be successful in June last, but it was found impossible for Canada to obtain immediate admission into the convention. He was happy, however, to state that an application would be made at the next meeting of the convention by the British Post Office for the re-casting of the 17th rule in such a way that the majority of the members, instead of only one, would be able to accord admission to those seeking it, and then the Government hoped that Canada would be admitted. He thought the hon. gentleman would be glad to know also that, although Canada had not been able to obtain admission as yet to the Postal Union, whose benefits were so well known, the Government had been able to make such arrangements with the British Government, that we were in the same position with regard to them as if we were members of the Postal Union, and a treaty had also been made with Germany to the same effect, which would come into operation on the 1st of April next. The hon. gentlemen would find all the information in the papers.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he was perfectly satisfied with the remarks of the Postmaster-General, and he thought it was unnecessary that that the papers should be brought before the House.

Mr. TUPPER said he hoped his hon. friend would not withdraw the motion for the papers, as there was no objection to bringing them down, and the subject was one of great interest to the country.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was no objection to bringing down a sufficient number of the papers to put the House in possession of all the requisite information.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL CONTINGENCIES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. OLIVER moved for a return of the Contingencies voted and expended in each Department of the Government, from the 1st of July, 1868, to the close of the last financial year. The returns also to show the amount expended from July 1st, 1873, to 1st November of the same year.

Mr. HUNTINGTON.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. OLIVER, in the absence of Mr. Ross (West Middlesex), moved for a return of the names and number of officials in each Department of the Government with the salaries payable on the 1st July, 1873, and on the 6th November of the same year, had the several Orders in Council then existing been carried into effect; also, a similar return for the Civil Service salaries payable on 1st July, 1874, 1875, and 1876; Return to show what proportion of the increase (if any) was made under the provisions of the Civil Service Act of 1870.

Motion agreed to.

WOOD LAND IN MARQUETTE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. RYAN moved for a return showing the quantity of wood land in the county of Marquette, and the number of licenses to cut wood or timber in the said county, sold or issued by the Dominion Lands Office in Manitoba, during the last three years, to persons not being actual settlers. He said, in a prairie country, where coal did not exist or could not be easily or cheaply procured, the question of the wood supply became one of the greatest importance. Manitoba consisted chiefly of one vast prairie, within whose limits no coal existed. The nearest coal had been discovered in the valley of the Souris River, near the 49th parallel of latitude, between 250 and 300 miles west of the Red River. They did not yet know enough about the quality of the lignite or the quantity in which it existed to speak with certainty of the value of the discovery. Between 300 or 400 miles further to the North-West, however, veins of lignite of good quality and unusual thickness had been discovered on the banks of the Saskatchewan and other rivers of the North-West Territories. Geologists informed them that large tracts of these territories were underlaid with lignite, and there was no reason to doubt that, when means of communication should be established between those territories and Manitoba, this lignite would supply not only the North-West Territories but also the Province with fuel. Until then, however, for several years, the Province would have to depend entirely upon wood for fuel. When that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Selkirk to Rat Portage should have been built, they would tap the extensive wooded regions lying between the prairies and Lake Superior, and for all those portions of the Province upon the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or its connections, the wood question would be deprived of much of its difficulty. Until then, it seemed that Lake Winnipeg was the natural source of wood supply for the town of Winnipeg and all the Red River valley. The shores of the lake were in many places well wooded, as were also the banks of many of the streams running into the lake. The water was sufficiently deep to admit of navigation by schooners, drawing several feet of water, which could ascend the Red River as far as Selkirk, where the wood could be transhipped into barges and supplied to the whole Red River valley. Hitherto, however, all the wood consumed in the town of Winnipeg had come, not from Lake Winnipeg, as it should, but from the Assiniboine valley. It was easier to float wood down the Assiniboine than to convey it in boats against the current, and, consequently, wood was procured more cheaply from the Assiniboine than from the lake. All the wood from the Assiniboine was found in the county of West Marquette. Six years ago, there was a sufficient quantity of wood along the rivers and streams of West Marquette, if it had been carefully husbanded, to have answered all the requirements of settlement for several years to come. Unfortunately, it had not been husbanded. The new settlers and the natives had been guilty of extravagance, fires had been allowed to waste, and thousands of cords had gone down the Assiniboine year after year to supply Winnipeg and the Red River valley. The settlers were beginning to feel the scarcity of wood now. Six years ago there was no difficulty in procuring, in West Marquette, good white oak timber, forty and fifty feet long, squaring ten and twelve inches. To-day, the settler had the greatest difficulty to procure logs of a sufficient size to build his dwelling. Nearly all the square or flatted timber used in the town of Winnipeg had come from West Marquette. No hon. gentleman could contradict him when he asserted the principle that the settlers of the prairies of West Marquette had the first claims upon the woods of that county; that it was necessary in the public interest that these woods should be devoted, first of all to the wants of settlement; that, until every settler had enough wood to build his humble cottage, to warm his fireside, to build his stable and granary, and to fence his fields, it was unfair, it was impolitic and inconsistent with the public interest, to allow any wood or timber to be floated down the Assiniboine out of the county. He did not refer to this question merely for the purpose of finding fault, which was a duty members from his Province had frequently to perform. He desired to suggest a remedy; and he had sufficient confidence in the new Minister of the Interior to believe that, when, speaking for the settlers upon the prairies of West Marquette, he (Mr. Ryan) made a suggestion, it would receive from the Government the consideration it deserved. In the fall of 1874, a prairie fire had swept across thousands of acres of West Marquette and destroyed thousands of cords of wood. Two or three recurrences of such a fire would leave the country without wood, and seriously enhance the difficulties of the problem of settlement. During the Session of 1875, following the fire, he had directed the attention of the Government to the question. In response to his question on the floor of the House, the hon. Mr. Laird had taken, as he (Mr. Ryan) believed, an untenable position. Mr. Laird had denied the responsibility of the Dominion Government as the guardian of the wood lands of Manitoba, and endeavoured to fasten the responsibility upon the Provincial Government. To whom did these wood lands really belong? The fact was the Provincial Government did not own an acre of these lands, they were held by the Dominion Government as trustees not for the people of Manitoba alone, but for the people of the whole Dominion. As such trustees they could not deny their responsibility, and, if to-morrow a prairie fire swept across, and destroyed the woods, the people of Canada would justly hold the Dominion Government responsible. He did not deny that the people of Manitoba had a special interest in the preservation of these woods, which special interest might, if they were able, prompt them to take special measures for their preservation. But they were not able; the Province was financially embarrassed, struggling with debt. Within a year, the House had seen the Provincial Government suppliants for an increased subsidy. There were many legitimate demands upon them which they were unable to meet. Moneys were required for roads and bridges, and schools, strictly appropriate demands upon the Provincial Treasury, which they were unable to pay. Under the circumstances, therefore, it was unreasonable to expect the Province to defray expenses which were, in the first place, chargeable to the Dominion.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the third time and passed.

Bill (No. 13) To incorporate the Dominion of Canada Civil Service Mutual Benefit Association.—(Mr. Wood.)

Bill (No. 17) To extend the provisions of section 56 of the Act 34 Victoria, chapter 5, intituled "An Act relating to Banks and Banking," to the Bank of British North America.—(Mr. Fraser.)

Mr. RYAN.

CANADIAN SECURITIES COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.—[BILL No. 61.]

(Mr. Jetté.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

CITY MORTGAGE LOAN COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 58.]

(Mr. Ouimet.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

NEW BRUNSWICK CRIMINAL PROCEDURE BILL.—

[BILL No. 38.]

(Mr. Palmer.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. PALMER said his object in bringing the Bill before the House was to point out to the Minister of Justice what he considered an evil in the Criminal Law in New Brunswick. From the information he had been able to obtain the same evil applied to Ontario and the other Provinces. Prior to Confederation, the larger crimes were tried by the Superior Courts alone; but since that time crimes of the very gravest nature, capital offences excepted, were tried by County Court Judges, who were all single Judges. The same principle applied to other parts of Canada, although at the time he drew up the Bill, he was under the impression that it was peculiar to New Brunswick. He had always thought it was a very hard thing that, just as in the Court of the highest jurisdiction, there could be no appeal from the decision of a County Court Judge. He had seen no trouble arise from this, owing to the manner in which the Courts were constituted, and the fact that the Judges always gave the prisoner the benefit of the doubt, both in fact and in law. While, theoretically, this non-appealing power seemed an enormous jurisdiction, yet practically no injury had arisen. Nevertheless, he had seen, according to his judgment, evils which arose from the present system. Of course County Court Judges were very necessary, and, while they had performed their duties remarkably well, and he had nothing to say against them, still, as a rule, the leading men in the profession of the law were not appointed. He would put it to the Minister of Justice whether this was not a subject worthy of consideration—as to whether there could not be some appeal from the decision of these gentlemen, and that, instead of leaving it discretionary on the part of the County Court Judges whether they reserved questions of law for a Superior Court or not, it should be made compulsory. He thought the time had come when the security of feeling in the matter should be increased. He had brought forward the Bill as he thought the case of New Brunswick was exceptional, but such not being the fact he would ask that the order be discharged.

Mr. BLAKE said he was glad that his hon. friend had taken that course. Upon receiving the Bill, he had taken no steps to investigate the grievances complained of, because there was no opportunity of discovering whether the grievances were real and substantial or not. He had reached the same conclusion as the hon. member, namely, that there was no exceptional legislation in this respect as to New Brunswick. He had not been able to reach any conclusion as to the wisdom of the proposed change; but, the hon. gentleman, who occupied a distinguished position at the bar in his own Province, having brought the matter before the House, the Government would take some pains to ascertain whether there were any substantial grievances. In the absence of such particular grievances, it would be rather a dangerous thing to alter the law, with its present certainty, simplicity and inexpensiveness.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

INSOLVENT ACT REPEAL BILL.

[BILL No. 39.]

(Mr. Palmer.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. PALMER: The principle of this Bill is already settled by the House.

Therefore, I will ask that the order be discharged.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

THE COAL INTEREST.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. MacKay (Cape Breton) "That the petition of Henry Mitchell and others, be referred to a Select Committee," and the motion of Mr. Cartwright, in amendment thereto, read.

Mr. SPEAKER said he might as well state to the House that any hon. member who spoke against the matter being referred to a Committee under the original motion could not be a member of it if appointed under that motion. If the amendment was adopted, however, the case would probably be somewhat different. He would not pronounce his judgment in advance.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he would have very much preferred to have had the motion stand in its original shape; but, inasmuch as he considered it advisable to take half a loaf if he could not get a whole one, he presumed he would have to bow to necessity and accept what the Government saw fit to grant. At the same time, he would suggest to the Minister of Finance the addition of the following words to the amendment: "And to inquire into the best means of promoting inter-provincial trade, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time to this House." It seemed to him that this was a very important matter for a Committee to take into consideration, and to examine into; if the Minister of Finance would consent to the addition he suggested, he presumed that his best course would be to assent to the adoption of the amendment. He did not feel inclined to let the matter drop. He must enter his protest against the position assumed in this regard by the hon. members for Halifax and Pictou. The latter stated that no legislation could be of any service to the coal trade. The hon. member did not appreciate the position which either the petitioners, or those who brought the matter before the House took in this connection; they simply endeavoured to induce the House either to impose a duty upon all coal imported from the United States, or to grant a bounty upon all coal exported from the Dominion. Another matter was also submitted. Those engaged in the coal trade laboured under exceptional disadvantages. He contended that the statement of the hon. member for Pictou that this was a fallacy was not borne out by the facts. On looking at the tariff, it would be seen that almost every article which entered into the working of a coal mine paid 17½ per cent. duty; and, consequently, the allegation that legislation could be of no service to this industry was incorrect. In his opinion a great deal could be done by this means to raise this industry out of its present depressed state. If some of the most expensive articles used in connection with coal mines, such as locomotive engines, wire rope, powder, dynamite, tubing, and a great many others, were put on the same favourable footing with articles which entered into the construction of ships, and made use of in manufacturing in the Dominion, then legislation would go very far towards ameliorating the condition of this important interest. The hon. member for Halifax had taken the same position as the hon. member for Pictou; and to this hon. gentleman he would return the same reply. The hon. gentleman was very much mistaken if he considered that the interests of the Province of Nova Scotia could only be subserved by either placing a duty on coals imported or a bounty on coals exported. Remembering the vast importance of this interest, in which was invested some 12 millions of dollars, he thought that the least which might have been done by these hon. gentlemen would have been, at any rate, to refrain from throwing cold water on the application made for the purpose of having the matter referred to a Committee, to see what could be done. The hon. member for Waterloo had given the House to understand that it would probably be impossible for Nova Scotia to send coal to Ontario. Did the hon. gentleman not know that iron ore was sent many hundreds of miles in the United States by rail to places where coal was raised from the mines, in order to have it smelted; and this was a paying investment. Hon. gentlemen should also remember that, as this scheme was practically untried as yet, it was worth while, at any rate, to consider the question seriously and see whether an interchange of products could not be made between the East and the West. This was a duty, the performance of which this Legislature and its statesmen owed to the country, and for which they would receive credit throughout the Dominion, if a union on paper could be changed into a union based upon sound trade principles, and an interchange of commodities. He disclaimed any intention on the part of the people of Nova Scotia to force Ontario to take their coal. He believed a large trade could be done between these two Provinces. Ontario had a vast quantity of breadstuffs, and manufactured articles which Nova Scotia had to import from the United States, while Nova Scotia had coal in abundance, which Ontario required. He thought that Ontario occupied rather a humiliating position in the presence of the rest of the Dominion, and of the United States, when it was considered that the slightest civil commotion in the latter country might cut off the supply of so necessary an article as coal. The people and representatives of Ontario should make provision for such a contingency. He thought that the House was to a very large extent alive to the importance of this question. Whatever claims the manufacturing and agricultural interests might have on the attention of the House, they paled before those of the coal interest, as both the farmer to a certain extent at present enjoyed a certain amount of exceptional legislation made in their behalf, while the tariff, as it had existed ever since Confederation, bore more heavily on the coal than on any other industry in the whole Dominion. He begged leave to ask the House to consent to the appointment of the Committee to ascertain what could be done to relieve this trade from its present depressed state.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said the hon. member for Essex had stated that American coal could be laid down in Toronto at $3.50 a ton. He admitted that this was correct, but such coal came from Ohio and was of very inferior quality. It was unsuitable for house purposes; coal suited for these purposes was worth a great deal more. He held in his hand a circular from a house engaged in the coal trade. He found that at Buffalo, Briar Hill coal No. 1, cost $4.50 instead of $3.50, to be laid down in Toronto, and No. 2 Briar Hill, $4.25. These were the prices in June last. In September and November last, the same quality was worth in Buffalo, $4.25 instead of $3.50 a ton. Again, hon. gentlemen opposite said it was impossible to bring coal from Nova Scotia to Toronto for $2.50 per ton, although it was shown that such a contract had been made. It was contended that this was an abnormal state of things. He apprehended that this was also the case with regard to bringing coal from Cleveland to Toronto for 90 cents per ton, a rate much lower than usual. The hon. member for South Waterloo said that the Opposition claimed to be the friends of the manufacturers, and yet they wanted to tax manufacturers; that we imported 794,000 tons of coal a year, that it would be necessary to put on a duty of $1 a ton, and that therefore this tax would amount to nearly one million of dollars. But this was not at all correct. The Opposition did not ask for a higher duty than those who were interested in the coal trade petitioned for, and this was 50 cents per ton. The case ought to be stated and discussed fairly. Again, such a duty would not be a tax entirely on manufacturers, because a large portion of these 794,000 tons was anthracite coal, which was not used by manufacturers, except by those who were engaged in the furnace business and who used Lehigh lump for blasting and smelting purposes. The hon. member for Pictou said he was well acquainted with the shipping interests, and that it would be impossible to bring coal from Cape Breton to Toronto for $2.50 per ton; but, if coal could be carried from Cape Breton to Pictou for $1.50 a ton—as has been stated—why could not it be taken to Toronto for $2.50. He was further informed that coal had been brought from Liverpool to Montreal for $2 a ton. He saw no reason, under the circumstances, why it could not be carried to Toronto for the price mentioned.

Mr. MACKAY.

Mr. TUPPER said that he consented to serve on this Committee with a great deal of pleasure, but, when he learned that the Government were disposed to move an amendment which would emasculate the Committee as to their power to do anything of the slightest value, he had not felt inclined to do so. The motion of the Minister of Finance simply threw discredit on the petition itself, and the duty of the Committee was confined to ascertaining the truth of the allegations contained in the petition. He proposed, under these circumstances, to move in amendment to the amendment, a resolution, asking for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into the best mode of promoting inter-provincial trade, and to report upon the products that might be profitably interchanged between the Lake Ports and the Maritime Provinces. This question he considered one of very great importance, embracing the objects mentioned in the petition as well as many others. If the Minister of Finance, however, would accept the proposal of the hon. member for Cape Breton, he would be quite satisfied, and would be very glad to do the best in his power to accomplish the objects which the Committee should be named to accomplish.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he did not object to the proposition of the hon. member for Cape Breton.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said his hon. colleague no doubt had very little confidence in the Government when he asked for the Committee in question. He must have less now, when they refused the Committee first offered. He regretted very much that the Government had not deemed it proper to grant what had been demanded, and he believed that, if this had been done, a report would have been presented supporting every allegation contained in the petition. It appeared the Government did not desire this. He considered the amendment the reverse of complimentary to the signers of the petition, who comprised leading men in the Province of Nova Scotia. He believed that a large number of intelligent coal-owners and commercial gentlemen in Halifax and other districts of Nova Scotia had signed it, and they knew what they were doing. It was not at all complimentary, under the circumstances, that the Government should ask for an investigation into the truth of the allegations they had so made. It was well known that inter-provincial trade was quite possible, provided a little assistance was given in the shape of a duty on American coal sent into the Dominion. A writer in the Toronto Monetary Times said :

“The argument used by the Nova Scotia delegates before the Dominion Board, and the burden of the memorials presented to that body, as well as in the further petitions largely signed, which are to be laid before Parliament, was that the imposition of a duty of fifty cents per ton on American coal would enable Nova Scotia mines to send a larger quantity of their products into Ontario and would build up an inter-provincial trade by lessening the cost of downward freights on breadstuffs. That, indeed, the coal vessels coming up would take flour to Cape Breton more cheaply than the Americans could supply it from Portland or Boston. It would, doubtless, be a good thing if, by such means, the mines of Cape Breton and Pictou county, in which it is stated that twelve millions of dollars are invested, could be stimulated into a paying activity, while assisting to develop direct trade with the wheat fields of Ontario. But a word is pertinent as to whether the benefit to the lower Provinces will equal the disadvantage which that policy might imply to the portions of the Dominion bordering upon the Lakes.”

It would thus be seen that an arrangement could be made, with a small duty on American coal, that would be mutually beneficial both to Ontario and Nova Scotia—that a large amount of money now going to the United States would be kept circulating in our own country. A writer in one of the Halifax journals said :

“My second suggestion is that, in order to have a market within our own Dominion, and independent of the United States, the trade of Ontario be secured by Parliament subsidizing a line of steamers to ply from Cape Breton and Pictou to Toronto and Hamilton, or other western cities on the lake shore. Although the ordinary class of sea-going steamers cannot go beyond Montreal, yet it has been proved that steam propellers of very large carrying capacity can go through the canals, and at the same time be able to undertake the sea voyage to Cape Breton. I think there is not much doubt that with the proper class of boats this business might be made to pay; but, as there is a doubt about it, I think Parliament would not refuse granting a generous subsidy, and more particularly as this is a trade that would benefit Ontario and Nova Scotia exclusively.”

He hoped the Government would consider this suggestion and show that they had a desire to assist the coal industry. If the Government would at once subsidize a line of steamships and make the experiment, it might ultimately lead to a very large trade. As he believed the Government did not intend to take any action in the direction of imposing a duty on coal, they might subsidize a steamship line to promote the coal trade, and at the next Session of Parliament they would be able to report whether the enterprise had proved advantageous or not. He would not reply to the statements made by the hon. members for Pictou and Halifax, but those hon. gentlemen would be called upon by their constituents and answered when they next went before them at the next election.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said the eastern Provinces had large coal fields furnished them by nature, and the proposition to give protection on coal seemed an outrage upon the people of those Provinces. They had fish on one side and coal on the other, and they did not need any such protection on their coal as 50 cents a ton.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he regretted that on a question of so much importance as that under discussion he was compelled to differ from the argument of his hon. friend from Cape Breton. When the question was before the House on a former occasion, he felt it to be his duty, in order to consider it intelligently, to direct the attention of the House to some information which gentlemen interested in the coal trade had submitted to a Parliamentary Committee last Session. He at that time quoted the opinion of a gentleman who was competent to give the information, and who, perhaps more than any other man in Nova Scotia, had given his time and attention to the coal interests, and when he gave evidence before the Committee last year, no testimony, it was admitted, was of so much importance as that of Mr. Rutherford of Halifax. Mr. Rutherford stated that the cost of laying down coal in Toronto was $6.00 per chaldron. When they had the evidence of another gentleman that American coal could be laid down in Toronto for $3.50, it was a self-evident proposition that, if they were to force Nova Scotia coal into Ontario, it could only be done by Parliament placing a duty of $2.50 per ton on American coal. That was the conclusion at which he (Mr. Jones) had arrived from the facts, and he thought that was the view which would be borne out by documents before the House. The hon. gentleman who had spoken on the question on the other side said that if a duty was to be placed on coal they must expect a similar duty to be imposed on flour. That was a natural conclusion, and he would not ask that a duty should be placed on coal without admitting that a duty should be placed on flour. It would be an untenable position for any hon. member to occupy, to ask that the products of his own Province should be protected by a duty at the expense of the consumers in other Provinces, without at the same time admitting the justice of giving protection to the products of those Provinces taking Nova Scotia coal. They knew very well that Quebec, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick would be compelled to pay a duty on coal for the benefit of Nova Scotia alone, and he could not think that such would be a satisfactory arrangement to those four Provinces, because it would be for the benefit of only one Province. He was rebuked on a previous occasion by the hon. member for Cumberland—a rebuke which he would have felt a severe one if it had come from any other source—and he was told that he had abused his position in the House by acting in a certain direction on a question upon which his constituents had expressed a different opinion. He would direct the House to some of the points contained in the petition, and he would ask hon. members if the hon. member for Cumberland had not abused his position at any time, and whether the Government with which he was associated had not laid itself open to that suspicion, if the statements of the gentlemen who signed the petition were correct. The petitioners said:

Mr. McDONALD.

“Your memorialists deeply regret that in consequence of the subject of our coal trade having been lost sight of by the public, through the agitation on the subject having ceased when the duty was imposed on imported coal, the influence of American monopolists and of those who sympathize with them in this country, was sufficient in the following year to bring about a repeal of the duty of 50 cents imposed on imported coal.”

The petitioners declared that the influence of American monopolists and those who had sympathy with them had been sufficiently strong in the Dominion Parliament to bring about the repeal of the 50 cents duty imposed on American coal. The hon. member for Cumberland had said on a previous occasion that it was not his action or the action of the Government, but it would be held as a constitutional principle, acknowledged by all parties, that the Administration of the day was responsible for the legislation that was effected under its rule, and, if the hon. member for Cumberland was opposed to the policy which the House forced on his Government, if he had not valued his place more than his principles, it was his duty to have retired from office, taken an independent position, and maintained the interests of his country in Parliament. Those were the principles which any statesman who valued reputation and consistency would have carried out, and he would not have attempted to shelter himself behind the excuse that the policy was forced on them by the Opposition, when the Government of the day had a majority in the House. There was another point from which that hon. gentleman might perhaps extract some comfort. The memorialists having proceeded to point out the different modes by which the interests of the Dominion would be promoted, came to this conclusion:—

“We therefore ask in the interests, not of protection, but of free trade, that you request the Legislature to neutralize this hostile duty of 75 cents by giving an equal bounty on all coal sent to the United States; or else to impose a duty of 50 cents on all imported coal.”

It thus appeared that the petitioners were exactly in accordance with his views, and that they were not seeking an imposition of duties for protection but for free trade. So, when the hon. member for Cumberland accused him of having abused his position by the stand he had taken, he would ask that hon. gentleman to carefully study the petition before making such a reference. That hon. gentleman had stated during the last debate, as well as on previous occasions, that the action of the Dominion Government in imposing a duty on American coal had forced the United States into a reduction of their tariff. The hon. member for Pictou, during the late discussion, had called attention to the fact that, while the National Policy, so called, under which the duty on coal was repealed, was passed in March, 1870, the duty in the United States was not reduced until 1872 from $1.25 to 75 cents per ton. An examination of the evidence on the question showed that the statement made by the hon. member for Pictou on the previous occasion was strictly correct. The report of the Inspector of Mines and Minerals for Nova Scotia, in which a statement was given of the quantity of coal exported to the United States from 1860 to 1875, showed that from 1860 to 1865 it was free, from 1866 to 1871 the duty was $1.25, and from 1872 to the present time was 75 cents. The coal-owners of Nova Scotia had been under the impression that the cost of laying down American coal at the different lake points was very much larger than it proved to be. At the present time they believed—and he gave them the impression from information gathered last year from a gentleman who was before the Committee, and statements then furnished—that the average price in Toronto and Hamilton was $4.50. It appeared, however, that the true value was only $3.50 in Toronto, about the same price in Hamilton, and going west towards Sarnia the value was reduced to $2.75, $2.50 and $2.00. He was told that, in Ottawa, Ohio coal was laid down at $5.30 per ton. If the petitioners in Nova Scotia, who were under the impression that the cost of laying down American coal in Toronto was $4.50, had been correctly informed as to the facts, instead of asking for a duty of 50 cents they would have asked for one of $2.00. He observed the strange position in which hon. members found themselves in asking for that protective policy. The member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) thought it was his duty to ascertain the views of his constituents with regard to the proposed duty on coal, and there was no city where protection principles prevailed to a greater extent. But the Hamilton manufacturers, who came to Parliament and asked that the duty of 17½ per cent. on manufactured articles should be increased, instructed their representative not to vote for a duty on coal under any circumstances. That was only the logical result of the position occupied by hon. members when they attempted to argue in favour of a protective policy. At the last debate, the right hon. member for Kingston read a letter published by a prominent gentleman in Montreal commenting on the views of the hon. member for Montreal West, who styled himself a moderate Protectionist, and any one following the right hon. gentleman as he read that letter would have gathered from it that the writer was entirely in accord with Protectionists in regard to the duty on coal. They would have imagined that the writer of the letter was quite willing that such a duty should be imposed, even if it amounted to 75 cents per ton, although he was interested in a great industry which used 100,000 tons annually. But the right hon. gentleman did not inform the House that the industry with which the writer was connected was that of steel works at Londonderry, in the heart of Nova Scotia. Under such circumstances, if a duty were imposed, that gentleman, interested in that large industry, would have the benefit of it at the expense of manufacturers in other parts of the Dominion. If the Government consented to impose such a duty, that gentleman would afterwards represent to them that he was one of the largest manufacturers of pig iron, and therefore asked that a duty should be imposed on that article, which entered largely into other branches of manufacture. But there was another point which had been kept out of view by the hon. gentleman. While he was willing, as

Mr. JONES.

Artemus Ward used to say, to sacrifice his wife's relations—to sacrifice every other interest in the country—so that he might ultimately get a duty on iron under the guise of paying a duty on coal, while he was willing the duty should apply to coal, he took care that it should not apply to bituminous coal. This was the position assumed by other hon. gentlemen; and therefore the gentleman who wrote the letter strictly confined himself to the position that they were willing to pay 75 cents duty on American coal, because he had not to pay one cent himself. It was to him a source of deep regret that the coal interests were in their present depressed state; but he could not see that any legislation, short of the amount he had indicated, would be of any benefit to the coal interests of the Lower Provinces. As a representative from Nova Scotia, he could not ask the House to impose a duty on coal, unless at the same time he supported the placing of duties on other articles produced in other parts of the Dominion; and that was a policy which he could neither advocate nor defend. Looking at the subject in that light, he thought the coal interests would have to bide their time. He confessed he was not very sanguine about their future. Whatever chance that industry had was destroyed when the late Government negotiated the Washington Treaty; and the hon. gentlemen opposite must stand the responsibility with the people of Nova Scotia of having struck the most vital blow that could be imagined against that great interest. If that interest was languishing or less prosperous than formerly, it was the fault of the Government which negotiated the treaty, and not of the Government which refused to build up a protective policy at the expense of the people at large.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he was sorry to hear the views expressed by the hon. member for Halifax. The argument that the people of Toronto would have to pay a duty of $2.50 to enable the Nova Scotia coal to compete with the American coal in Ontario he thought was scarcely borne out by the evidence. The petition itself only asked for a duty of 50 cents per ton, and it was reasonable to think that the men who drafted that petition knew what they were about. The hon. member for Halifax had tried to make the question a political one; it should be kept entirely free from politics. When the Provinces entered Confederation, it was with the intention and object of forming a country for ourselves. They supposed that every sectional interest would be buried for the benefit of the whole. He could only account for the sentiments expressed by the hon. members for Halifax and Pictou by supposing that the old sentiment of Annexationism still dwelt within them. The hon. gentlemen probably wished that the country should go to wreck, be sub-divided, and fall into the hands of our American neighbours. Two years ago, he expressed a similar view with regard to the Government, and the more he saw of their policy the more convinced was he that he was right. Coal should be treated with more consideration than other interests. There were $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 invested in that industry, and there was a large class of the community dependent upon it for their support. In allowing it to fall behind, dangerous advantage was given to the United States. What would be the result in case of trouble with our neighbours, if the coal was not fostered? We would be almost entirely at the mercy of the Americans in case of war between them and England. For years we had been importing immigrants at a cost of $28 a head, and at the same time we were starving the people brought up in the country, who were compelled to emigrate to the United States in order to make a living. There was no sense in such a policy. No other industry in the country suffered under the same disadvantages as the coal industry. If the Government would only place the mining interest on the same footing as the shipping, it would be some advantage; but the Government showed no disposition whatever to help the mine owners. Before Parliament met this Session, the feeling was general that the Government would do something to relieve the suffering industries of the country. But every one had been disappointed. All the Government had done was to make a penny-whistle change in the tariff. The poor man's beer was taxed, and even the popular beverage, tea, had a duty put upon it by a Government, the chief of whom was a teetotaler. He could not comprehend this. The present tariff was a cobbler tariff. It would raise a revenue, but would not protect our industries at the same time. Other industries which ought to be protected besides coal were those of fire-brick and lime, for we had plenty of raw material.

Mr. CARMICHAEL said he rose to correct a misapprehension which existed with reference to his remarks the other evening. The hon. member for South Norfolk stated, as evidence to prove that coal could be carried from the Maritime Provinces to Toronto profitably, that he (Mr. Carmichael) had said that he had carried coal from Pictou to Poughkeepsie for $1.50 per ton. He was afraid he was not explicit enough, but he did not think that he had been misapprehended. His object in making the statement referred to was to show that the present depressed condition of the coal trade was not caused solely or mainly by the remission of duty on coal brought here from the United States. To prove this, he said that he had offered to carry coal from Pictou to New York for nothing. Following the same argument, perhaps the hon. gentleman might say it could be carried from Sydney to Toronto for nothing. But that would hardly admit of proof. He (Mr. Carmichael) further said that he had succeeded latterly in obtaining some 600 tons of coal to be carried up the Hudson at $1.50 per ton; but he did not intend to convey the idea that it could be done very profitably, as he had also offered to do it for nothing but could not get a cargo. They had to send a ship of 2,000 tons to New York, and 500 or 600 tons of ballast was required. He offered to carry the cargo free, on condition that the owner would pay for the loading and unloading. The hon. member for Cape Breton had said he would leave him and the hon. member for Halifax to their constituents. It might be that his constituents would disagree with him, but it mattered not. He had to act according to what he conceived to be to the interests of his constituents, and he preferred to conscientiously perform his duty than to maintain a seat in the House. In regard to the statement of the hon. member for Victoria that his interest in coal mining was not very great, it was true he had not a large direct interest, but, in addition to having some interest, he lived in the midst of the Pictou coal fields, and, being interested in shipping, he was also interested in coal.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. GOUDGE said he thought it very desirable that the coal interest should have a hearing as well as other interests, as it employed a large number of persons and a great amount of capital. By the last report, there were 4,000 men engaged in coal mining, averaging 136 days in the year. One of the reasons why the House was averse to granting a Committee to enquire into the matter, was the belief that coal from the Maritime Provinces could not possibly be delivered profitably at Toronto and other points west. But gentlemen who ought to know said this could be done, if Canadian coal was properly protected against American coal, and under the circumstances it would be wise to ascertain who was right.

Mr. TUPPER said he desired to draw attention to the statement made the other day by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Carmichael), to the effect that the American duty on coal was not reduced until June or August, 1872. He was very much surprised at this statement, as he remembered distinctly a discussion which took place in 1871, in which the statement was made, and it was accepted on all sides, that the duty had already been taken off. It might be remarked also, that the authority quoted by the hon. member for Halifax, namely, Mr. Rutherford, was second to none in the Dominion. That gentleman was at one time official Inspector of Mines in Nova Scotia, and since that time he had been employed by one of the largest companies in England as their representative in this country. His name was signed on the declaration that the American duty was reduced immediately after the imposition by the Canadian Government of the fifty cents a ton, as was also the name of nearly every mine-owner in Nova Scotia. On looking at the debates of the House in 1871, some remarks on this very question were found:

"Mr. Workman referred to the action of the American Government in remitting the duty on coal, and said it was absurd to suppose that any action of our Government had influenced them to do so."

It seemed, then, to be accepted that the American duty on coal had been reduced subsequent to, if not in consequence of, the imposition of a duty by this House. This being the case, the reduction must have taken place in June or August, 1872, the date assigned by the hon. member for Pictou. In the report he found that he (Mr. Tupper) had made some observations:

"He (Mr. Tupper) would remind those who said that the duty on coal in the United States had not been repealed through the course pursued by this Government, that although efforts had frequently been made to remove the tax, it had not succeeded until the Canadian Government imposed the duty on coal and flour. If the action of the American Government was not propter hoc, it was at least post hoc."

From the Congressional Globe, containing the official report of the proceedings of the American Congress, he found that Mr. Ward, on the 6th June, 1870, introduced a resolution relative to the matter, and again on the 14th June there was a discussion as to decreasing the duty on coal. While he had not had time to investigate the question thoroughly, he was satisfied that the reduction of the American duty followed immediately after the imposition of the Canadian duty.

Mr. MILLS said that discussions on the subject might be found both before and after the dates mentioned by the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. ROBINSON said that, coming from Ontario, he was not particularly interested in this question, certainly not so much so as those who represented Nova Scotia constituencies. Under any circumstances Ontario could obtain coal from Pennsylvania and Ohio. It was, however, for the representatives of Nova Scotia to consider the fact that Ontario spent yearly in buying American coal something over two millions. It was for his hon. friend from Halifax to say whether, under these circumstances, Nova Scotia, by means of some wise legislation, might not at all events secure one half of this sum. The hon. member for Halifax had quoted Mr. Rutherford, who was undoubtedly a high authority with respect to mines, but he was not aware that Mr. Rutherford knew anything about freights between Nova Scotia and the West. Certainly it was not evidence of such knowledge, if he said that it would cost from $4 to $5 a ton to convey coal from Sydney or Pictou to Toronto. His hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Mackay) had been in Toronto in August or September last, and together they had visited several shipowners, and they had received an offer to take coal from Sydney to Toronto for $2.50 per ton, provided a down cargo could be got. Mr. Dobson, an intelligent broker of Sydney, was one of the delegates to the Dominion Board of Trade, and, this gentleman having brought the coal question up, these practical business men, representing all the commercial interests in the Dominion, had passed a resolution in favour of the imposition of fifty cents a ton on coal coming into Canada. This fact could not be ignored, as the hon. member for Cumberland had stated; a gentleman of Toronto had tested the matter sufficiently three or four years ago to find out that coal could be profitably brought from Sydney and Pictou to Toronto or Hamilton. Mr. Dobson had also laid the question before the Toronto Board of Trade, and these shrewd business men had thought there was something substantial and encouraging in his representations. Objections had been urged to the distance, say 800 miles, from Sydney to Ontario, but it should be recollected that iron was brought from Lake Superior by rail and by water, to the magnificent furnaces of Pittsburg, over 800 miles, and it was a melancholy consideration to reflect that we bought this very iron for our Canadian purposes after it had been thus manufactured at Pittsburg, while we in Canada had better iron at our very doors. These facts were known in Ontario, though they seemed to stagger some gentlemen in Nova Scotia. We had propellers capable of carrying 3,500 barrels of flour to Halifax, Pictou and Sydney, and they could bring back 500 tons of coal. Say it cost 60 cents per barrel to send the flour down, and $2.50 a ton was received for the return cargo of coal; this would be a fairly profitable freight upon which a calculation could easily be made. He was strongly in favour of the cultivation of an inter-provincial trade, instead of sending our money to the United States for an article we might, with a proper protection, keep among our own people. The soft coal of Nova Scotia, as to durability, and lighting and heating qualities, was superior to the Ohio coal. He had received the following telegram from a coal dealer :

“Do not let McGregor’s statement that coal can be laid down here (Toronto) at $3.50 go uncontradicted; poor coal may be laid down at that, but the best Briar Hill coal, with which ours must be compared, costs over $4, and even $4.50; also contradict Charlton’s statement that Nova Scotia is inferior coal. It is superior in heating, in durability, and in cleanliness, and is out-and-out a better coal.”

Pennsylvania, by rail, supplied the United States with 72 per cent. of their coal, and he could not see why a profitable inter-provincial trade could not be done between Ontario and the Maritime Provinces, in this and in other respects, particularly as it was all to be done by water carriage.

Mr. METCALFE said he was surprised to hear the member for West Toronto advocate the imposition of a duty on coal, when the hon. members for Halifax and Pictou stated that the coal-owners did not want such a duty. He remembered when 50 cents was levied per ton on coal in 1870, and great complaints were made in consequence by the ship-owners of Ontario. It was not alone on account of the fifty cents duty, but also on account of the trouble, annoyance, and expense of landing it in Toronto, and this was considered equal to fifty cents more. Landing waiters had also to be appointed, and loss of time was involved. On the whole, he believed that a more odious or objectionable tax to Ontario could be conceived than a tax on coal, especially when they considered the fact that the poor of Toronto found it sufficiently difficult to warm themselves under the existing condition of things.

Mr. ROBINSON.

Mr. YOUNG said that the hon. member for East York was in error in stating that certain hon. gentlemen had announced to the House that coal-owners did not desire a duty on coal. The hon. member for Halifax had said that, on the whole, the adoption of a protective policy would not be in the interest of Nova Scotia. If it were true that, by the imposition of a small duty on American coal, the American Government, on a former occasion, had been induced to take the duty off Canadian coal, this would be a point of considerable importance; and it would be a most admirable course for the House to take; but he was convinced that the statement to this effect was entirely inaccurate. He was of opinion that a retaliatory policy, which had its advocates, would be a most dangerous one to pursue. He had observed that, in another portion of the building, an hon. member had given a notice of motion apparently in favour of a retaliatory policy, but the agitation of this question was fraught with the greatest danger to the people of Canada, and no man who favoured such a system could be properly considered as acting from patriotic motives. As to the other matter, the facts were as they had been stated by his hon. friend from Pictou; the American Government had not taken off their duty, or, rather, lowered it to 75 cents per ton, until 1872, while our duty on coal was imposed in 1870, and in 1871 it was removed. The first evidence of that which he would submit was a report of the Department of Mines for Nova Scotia for the year 1875, which contained a statement of the quantity of coal exported to the United States from 1865 to 1875, with the amount of duty paid in each case during each of those years. He found that, in 1871, the duty was $1.25 upon coal going into the United States, while, in 1872, the report stated that the duty was then 75 cents, showing that it was not until 1872 that the duty was reduced on the other side of the line. Then again he held in his hand a copy of the Statutes of the United States referring to fiscal duties. On June 6th, 1872, the Act chapter 315 was passed, of which he would read the first two classes:—

"On and after the first day of August, 1872, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter enumerated or provided for, imported from foreign countries, there shall be levied, collected and paid the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say :

"On all slack coal or culm, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, forty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

"On all bituminous coal and shale, seventy-five cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel."

That showed most conclusively that, wherever the hon. member for Cumberland obtained his facts, they were entirely incorrect, and that the statement made by the hon. member for Pictou was to the letter in accordance with the facts, viz., that we placed our duty on coal in 1870, and took it off in 1871, and that it was not till 1872 that the American Congress lowered the price of coal there, so that it was impossible that it could have been brought about by any action of ours two years before.

Mr. TUPPER said that, in the debate, a report of which he had in his hand, he saw a statement by Sir Alexander Galt that the duty had been taken off in the United States, so that, if he was mistaken, he was not alone in the mistake.

Mr. KIRK said this was a very important question, and the Committee, if appointed, would be a very important one. He hoped the Government and the House would have no objection to the appointment of the Committee. He thought the information they would obtain would perhaps demonstrate whether the allegations made that coal could be carried from Nova Scotia to Ontario at a profit were true or not. If they reported in the affirmative, it might induce some ship-owners to engage in the trade. He had no objection to placing a duty for the purpose of revenue on kerosene oil, which was produced only in the Province of Ontario, nor would he have any objection to placing a duty on coal for the same purpose; but, when they were asked to place a duty on coal which would involve a system of general protection, he must enter his solemn protest. He, as a representative from Nova Scotia, was there to protest against the imposition of a policy of protection on this Dominion. The Province of Nova Scotia was not a manufacturing Province. They had very few manufactories there, and those that were there could exist without protection, or with the protection they now had of 17½ per cent. If these manufacturers desired protection at all, it would not be against the importation of goods from the United States, but from Canada. He believed the manufacturers of Nova Scotia found Canadians their closest competitors. They had other industries in Nova Scotia besides coal industries and manufactures. They had ship-building, a most important industry, they had gold-mining, copper-mining and iron-mining. These, of course, required protection just as much as the manufacturing and coal industries. They had also another very important industry which had been lost sight of, the industry of fishing, of which his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knew something. How were they to protect the fishing industry of the Maritime Provinces? They had the very large industry of lumbering, and how could that industry be protected with the others? The imposition of increased duties on goods of any description would be an additional burden on each and every one of these industries. The only way then in which these industries could be protected at all would be by a system of bounties—a bounty on every barrel of fish, every foot of lumber, and every ton of shipping. He did not think the House was prepared for any such system of protection, and unless they did this they would be protecting the manufacturing industries at the expense of the others. For that reason, as a representative of the people of Nova Scotia, he protested against the imposition of increased taxation.

Mr. SPEAKER said it would be necessary that the addition to the amendment, which he understood had been agreed to, should be proposed by way of amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DYMOND moved, in amendment to the amendment :

"That the following words be added to the amendment:—And to inquire into the best means of promoting inter-provincial trade, with power to send for persons, papers and records."

Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to as follows:—

"That the Petition of Henry Mitchell, and others, be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. MacKay (Cape Breton), Laurier, McGregor, Flynn, Fraser, Workman, Macdonald, (Toronto), Campbell, Power, Tupper, Appleby, Sinclair and Dymond, to enquire into, and report upon the allegations as to the state of the Coal trade, contained in the said Petition, and to enquire into the best means of promoting inter-provincial trade, with power to send for persons, papers, and records."

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 15.]

(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. BLAKE suggested the withdrawal of the Bill. The measure he had introduced was in the printers' hands, and he had made provision to meet the difficulty.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

PROCEDURE AND EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.—

[BILL No. 3.]

(Mr. Irving.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 3) Respecting procedure and evidence in criminal cases.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported, with amendments.

House resumed.

Bill, as amended, reported.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

"That Government business shall have precedence on Thursdays during the remainder of the Session."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought this movement was premature. They had only been a few weeks in Session, and there was a great amount of business on the notice paper, and a large number of returns moved for which had not yet been brought down. He did not think it was proper, at this stage, to take a day from the general business of the House especially as the Government had so few measures to dispose of.

Mr. DYMOND.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was not a Public or Private Bill on the order paper, and more motions had been moved already than at any previous Session up to this time. Last year, the Thursday was taken some days before this. It did not interfere with any portion of the general business. It was the object of the Government to facilitate all the business, and he believed that could best be done by taking this additional day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Sessions were far too short for the good of the country, the good of the House and the good of the Administration. It was of importance that the propositions of the Government should go to the country, and that the people should have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on them in some way during the Session. In England, the Government measures were brought down during the first few weeks, and the people had four long months for discussing them before they passed into law. Here there was no such opportunity. He hoped at any rate, his hon. friend would allow to-morrow to private members.

Mr. MACKENZIE, after some further discussion, consented.

Motion as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That Government business shall have precedence after to-morrow, on Thursdays, during the remainder of the Session.

IMPROVEMENT IN PRISON DISCIPLINE BILL.—

[BILL No. 55.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 55) To make provision for improvements in Prison Discipline.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GAMBLING PRACTICES PREVENTION BILL.—[BILL NO. 56.]

(Mr. Blake.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 56) For the prevention of gambling practices in certain public conveyances.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he wished the hon. gentleman would insert a clause prohibiting pools on races and pools on elections. There was more bribery through pools at elections than through any other mode of gambling.

Mr. BUNSTER said the miners of British Columbia must have something to amuse themselves with, and therefore he would ask that the Act should not apply to British Columbia. The miners travelled a great deal on steamboats, and had to wile away the hours somehow. The miners were the bone and sinew of the country, and delivered vast wealth from the bowels of the earth. He did not want to see such arbitrary laws placed on the Statute-book. They did not all want to be parsons, but they wanted to be free men, with liberty to play a game of cards or drink a glass of beer if they desired. If people in other parts of the Dominion wanted these laws they could have them, but that was no reason why they should be forced down the throats of British Columbians. Sir James Douglas, one of the best of Governors, said: "Let the boys enjoy themselves," and this was the correct principle. He doubted very much whether the Dominion had the right to interfere with the Province in these matters. The Bill was paltry and would need a large force to maintain its operation. Fancy a regiment of militia being sent out to British Columbia because the miners played a respectable game of cards.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): A telegram states that two English regiments are going out to British Columbia.

Mr. BUNSTER: What for?

Mr. JONES: I do not know.

Mr. BUNSTER said he knew, but the people of British Columbia did not care for two or three regiments, for they were independent and fearless. If the law did not suit them, they would resist it. The law would be unjust and unkind. He had now and then indulged in a game of cards, and would again, even in defiance of the law.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUNSTER claimed the right, as a member of the House, to express his opinion freely.

Mr. BLAKE said he could not adopt any special rule for British Columbia, but whether there was any necessity to apply the law to steamboats or not he did not know, although at present it was not intended. He understood that at present it would not apply to British Columbia, as there were no railways there.

Mr. BUNSTER said the hon. the Minister of Justice was, as usual, making a farce of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, without the Pacific Railway, British Columbia would be of no use to the Dominion.

Mr. DYMOND: Do not say it is of no use to the Dominion.

Mr. BUNSTER said at the proper time he would answer the hon. member. At present he was answering the Minister of Justice. He had not lost confidence in the road being built. If this Government did not build it, some other Government would. It might broak twenty Governments; yet, nevertheless, the advanced opinion of young and intelligent Canadians would, in spite of old fogyism, insist upon the road being built.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) suggested that the words, "Unless he can disprove the presumption," should be added to the first clause. It might often occur that persons might play cards for a trifle quite innocently, and yet, according to the law, they would be criminals and liable to be placed in solitary confinement.

Mr. BLAKE said he would consider the suggestion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said gambling in public conveyances was a great evil; still, it was possible for a Bill to be too strict. He had often noticed, in travelling on the Gulf, very respectable people playing cards, evidently for a small sum.

Mr. CAMERON said it often happened that gentlemen, when on a long railway journey, engaged in a game of cards, and just to give a vim to the game a stake of perhaps $1 was put up. He thought the intention of cheating ought to be proved. However, he thought the whole matter was a difficult one.

Mr. BLAKE said it would be better for a few gentlemen in travelling to forego the pleasure of playing even for $1 or twenty-five cents, than that the evil of gambling should not be put down.

On Section 3,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the conductor ought to be the only person authorized to arrest any one found gambling on the train. The duty should not be left to subordinates.

Mr. BLAKE said it was necessary that brakemen and other assistants should have the power of arresting, as sometimes card-sharpers worked in gangs.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMITTEE.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought it would be convenient to strike the Committee appointed to enquire into the Northern Railway Company's affairs to-morrow.

Mr. TUPPER said formal notice was given last year under similar circumstances, of such intentions.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not remember that this was the case.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was informed that, in the case referred to last Session, notice was given that the Committee should be struck by the House.

Mr. MACKAY.

Mr. BLAKE said it was obvious, under these circumstances, that the House must strike the Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that, particularly as the hon. member for West Toronto was not in his seat, it was advisable to give notice of the intention to appoint the Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE announced that on Friday the House would be asked to strike the Committee.

House adjourned at

Fifteen minutes after
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 8th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

THE PENSIONERS OF 1812-15.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. VAIL, in presenting a return regarding the pensioners of 1812-15, stated that he had received a very large number of petitions—but from whom he was not aware—signed by a great number of persons, praying that amounts equal to the sums granted by the British Government to pensioners, be given to the pensioners of 1812-15. He took this opportunity of saying that it was quite impossible to appropriate for this purpose a larger sum than the $50,000 which had been voted by Parliament.

PROTESTANT INDIANS AND THE SEMINARY OF MONTREAL.

QUESTION.

Mr. BOWELL asked whether the arrangement mentioned by the Hon. D. Laird, in reply to a complaint by the Aborigines Protection Society, on the subject of the "alleged infringement of the land rights of certain Protestant Indians by the Seminary of Montreal," by which it was agreed to pay out of the Indian Funds the cost of certain litigation in respect of said rights, was still in force in respect of the litigation now proceeding in the Courts between said Indians and said Seminary of Montreal.

Mr. BLAKE: It is impossible to answer this question with any certainty, because the Government has no information except what is derived from the public prints, regarding the litigation between these Indians and the Seminary. The only suit that was authorized, insomuch that it was agreed that the expenses of counsel on their behalf should be paid out of the Indian Fund, is still proceeding, I believe. In this case it is alleged that a judgment was obtained by some slip or other, and it is announced in the newspapers that this is still going on, the intention being to secure the cancellation of that judgment. This agreement—as to the payment of counsel—has not been cancelled, and if that be the litigation to which the hon. gentleman refers, of course this arrangement remains in force; but, if the hon. gentleman refers to any other litigation, no other arrangement has been made.

WOOD-LAND IN MARQUETTE.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Order for the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Ryan for a return showing the quantity of wood-land in the county of Marquette, read.

Mr. RYAN said that, when the consideration of the motion was adjourned last evening, he was endeavouring to show the great necessity of some steps being taken to protect the woods of West Marquette, and that the responsibility of taking those steps rested with the Dominion Government, and he was about to suggest what seemed to him best to be done in the matter. All those acquainted with the Province knew that the woods extended along the banks of rivers and streams, sometimes for miles, in belts varying from one hundred yards to one or two miles in depth. If those belts were cut across where they were narrowest, it would do much to prevent the extension of the fires and would afford a vantage ground upon which to fight them. If, in addition to this, eight or ten labouring men were employed for a couple of months each fall, when the prairie grass was dry and fires most frequently and dangerously occurred, an amount of security against damage by fire would be obtained much more than commensurate with the trifling cost which would have to be incurred. If, moreover, the Government would establish the principle that under no circumstances should an acre of wood-land in West Marquette be sold, or a license to cut one single tree be granted except to actual settlers in the county, and for the purposes of settlement only, then he thought they would make a very great advance in the right direction. The adoption of those two suggestions would, in his opinion, make the woods go much further and last much longer than they were at present likely to do. He did not pretend that any management could make the woods adequate for all the purposes of settlement; a time was close at hand when the scarcity of timber would press hard upon the settlers; at best, that time could only be postponed. In connection with that question, he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to the case of one Captain McMillen, who, two years ago, was permitted to buy 320 acres, a half-section, of wood-land which he (Mr. Ryan) would not hesitate to assert was as valuable as any half-section of wood-land in the Province of Manitoba. It was situated in the heart of West Marquette, near the Assiniboine River, in a place where it was particularly valuable to settlers. Captain McMillen had been allowed to buy it at one dollar per acre when it was well worth ten dollars per acre; he had been allowed to buy enough wood-land to supply fifteen or twenty settlers with all the wood and timber they would require, at a time when Government were actually refusing to sell a single wood-lot of twenty acres to any actual settler in the county unless he belonged to that class of actual settlers known as homesteaders. Captain McMillen bought under the pretence that he intended to establish a tannery. Pretence was a pretty strong word, but he believed the circumstances justified its use, because, in the first place, although two years had elapsed, no tannery had been built or even commenced; and, in the second place, if a tannery had been actually intended, the land chosen would naturally have been oak land, as oak bark was used for tanning, and poplar bark was for such purpose worthless, and the land chosen and bought was the best poplar land in the Province, almost without a stick of oak, when oak land could have been easily procured. As the sale was made upon the condition that a tannery was to be built, if the public interest had been guarded with sufficient care, a clause must have been inserted in the patent avoiding the sale if the conditions were not fulfilled. He earnestly requested the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to the matter, for the public interests urgently demanded the cancelling of the patent. He regretted that the hon. the Minister of Militia was not in his place, but he supposed that what was said would reach him through the Hansard, if not otherwise. Two years ago a company of the troops stationed at Winnipeg were sent up the Assiniboine to cut fuel. Swinging an axe might be a very good military exercise; attacking a forest might be a very good preparatory exercise for attacking an enemy; so far as he was concerned he had no objection to the troops indulging in this military exercise; but, in the name of his constituents, he did most emphatically protest against the sending of troops into West Marquette to cut wood that was absolutely required for the purposes of settlement. He could not repeat too often that there was not sufficient wood in West Marquette for the settlers themselves, and they had the best claim to it. If it was desirable to send the troops to cut fuel, let them be sent to Lake Winnipeg, where the wood could be spared. If the Government did not wish to send them there, and wished to send them west, they ought to be sent as far as the Riding Mountains, where the timber would not be wanted for settlement at once; but he doubted the advisability of sending them even there, as none of the land west of Winnipeg had sufficient wood on it. The latest news of interest from Winnipeg was that Mr. Whitehead had received a contract for 50,000 railroad ties. He was delighted, as was every citizen of Manitoba, to learn that ties were being got out, because it looked as if business were really meant in the matter of railroads, but there was one phase of the question that was not quite so agreeable. Those ties were being got out south-west of Lake Manitoba. It would be remembered that, when the comparative merits of both routes of the Canada Pacific were being discussed in the House, the one crossing at the narrows, and the other running south of the lake, it was urged in favour of the northern route that it was well timbered. The fact that those ties were proposed to be got out on the southern route was a striking commentary upon the argument in favour of the northern one. He was glad to know that the ties were to be got out, but he protested against their being taken from the country south or south-west of Lake Manitoba, as the timber could not be spared. In conclusion, he wished to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to a defect in the departmental regulations respecting the sale of wood-land. A few days before leaving to attend the Session of the House, a number of his constituents had called upon him, and complained that they were not allowed to buy any wood-land. They were respectable farmers residing near Portage La Prairie; several of them had been residing there for five or six years. They had large farms, some of them having as many as one hundred acres cropped: their farms were prairie land and absolutely without timber. In order that there might be no mistake in the matter he accompanied them to the Branch Office of Dominion Lands at Portage La Prairie. Mr. Mills, the officer in charge, informed him that his instructions did not permit him to sell wood-lots except to persons having homesteads. While he contended that wood-land should be only sold to actual settlers, and for the purposes of actual settlement only, he thought it extremely unfair to discriminate between persons having homesteads and other actual settlers who had no wood upon their lands. When a man was bona fide an actual settler, cultivating and residing upon land bought from the Government, which land was without wood, it seemed very strange that the departmental regulations should say to him: "It is true you are an actual settler and have made extensive improvements; it is true you require wood and must have it for fencing, for fuel and for building; it is true you have no wood on your land; but, inasmuch as you paid the Government for your land and did not get a free grant of it, we will not sell you a wood-lot; they are only to be sold to persons having homesteads." He would request the hon. the Minister of the Interior to have the matter set right, and the instructions to the land agent rectified.

Mr. RYAN.

Mr. MILLS said the subject had attracted his attention, and he had written to the land officer at Winnipeg for what information he possessed on the subject. There was a good deal in the observations of the hon. member for Marquette in reference to the distribution of lands, and he would give the subject the fullest possible consideration as soon as he could find time to devote to it.

Mr. RYAN said he wished to make one more remark in connection with the subject. He saw by the last report from Winnipeg that Mr. Whitehead, one of the contractors, had given a contract to a gentleman residing in his county to cut out 50,000 railroad ties. He was as delighted as any other citizen of Manitoba to see they were likely to get a railroad; but there was another part of the news which was not so satisfactory—the ties were to be cut out in West Marquette. When the subject of the routes was under discussion, the advantage urged in favour of that running north was that the wood-land was largely in excess of that of the southern route. That was quite true, and he hoped the hon. the Minister of the Interior would give this matter his attention. It would be a serious matter if 50,000 ties were taken out of his county.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL. —[BILL NO. 47.]

(Mr. Richard.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. RICHARD said his object was to amend section 19, which provided that every candidate should deposit $50 in the hands of the Returning Officer to be applied to election expenses. He thought that section gave too great facility to persons to become candidates, and that it gave rise to sham candidature and other abuses. It was all very well to make it easy for the poor man to become a candidate at an election, but he thought they should guard against abuses which might result from it. By the abolition of the property qualification and simply requiring this deposit, almost any one could run at an election. The result would be that, instead of two men supposed to possess the confidence of their parties becoming candidates, several might run merely on personal or local grounds. If such a practice should prevail to any extent, the result would be to lower the standard of representation in the House. Their position in Quebec was different to that in Ontario. In that Province there were Reform and Conservative Associations who nominated the candidates, who were the only persons likely to run at the election. In Quebec there was no such system, and all attempts at establishing it had failed. It was desirable, under our form of Government, that every election should be the test of confidence in the Government; but, if opportunity was afforded several persons instead of representatives of the two parties to run, there would be danger of the ability of the Government being lost sight of, and purely personal or local questions made the issue. The Bill raised the deposit to $200. As under the existing law, $50 would be devoted to election expenses, and the remainder would be returned to the successful candidate, and to all other candidates having at least half the number of votes of the successful one. This provision would make very little difference to a bonâ fide candidate; he would only disburse $150 more than at present, which would be returned in the course of a few weeks. But, while not interfering with genuine candidates, the effect of the amendment would be to make the bogus candidates pause and reflect before running. He did not think the Bill would meet with any opposition; at any rate, the hon. the Finance Minister would not object to it, as its operation would probably send a few thousand dollars into the Treasury.

Mr. BLANCHET said he had listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Megantic, but he was unable to discover any reason for the adoption of the Bill. He was astonished at his hon. friend, who was an advanced Liberal, bringing in a Bill to limit the choice of the people. The Bill was a retrograde instead of a progressive measure. Instead of raising the deposit he thought it should be abolished altogether, and that the Government should bear the expenses of carrying on elections. He would move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. CAMERON said he agreed with the hon. member for Bellechasse that there was no necessity for the Bill. If a pecuniary deposit was required at all, $50 was certainly sufficient. He did not know there were so many bogus candidates as to render such legislation requisite. When they found that throughout the Dominion, men, without any bonâ fide expectation or possibility of being elected, became candidates at elections, it might be necessary to attach this safeguard to the law. But he was not aware that the practice was at all general. The Bill was contrary to the principle of the law which provided that no candidate should be required to have a property qualification. Surely a man might become a candidate without such a paltry security as the deposit of $150. If a man received less than half the number of votes of his opponent, it was no proof that he was not a bonâ fide candidate.

Mr. LAURIER said he was astonished that a good Conservative like the hon. member for Bellechasse, should take so much interest in the rights of the people. The hon. gentleman should remember, however, that liberty was to be kept within certain bounds. But he did not think that the Bill under consideration was any invasion of the rights of the people. He saw no reason for the hon. member for Bellechasse taking the course he had. He (Mr. Laurier) was not prepared to say that he would vote for the Bill, but it was a proposition which deserved consideration, and to shut it out from the House now would be premature. The better and more logical course to pursue was to allow the second reading, and have the Bill referred to Committee. If he thought necessary on further consideration, the hon. member for Bellechasse could make his motion when the Bill came up for the third reading.

Mr. BLAKE said he had hoped it would not be proposed to dispose of the Bill in the way proposed by the hon. member for Bellechasse, inasmuch as it was his intention to suggest that the order should be discharged. He thought it should be laid down as a general principle that all amendments of the electoral law should be conducted under the immediate and direct responsibility of the Government of the day. He did not wish to convey that it was improper, or anything else but commendable, for private members to bring forward any amendment for the purpose of preliminary discussion, or, it might be, to take a vote; but the final elaboration of those amendments would be more conveniently managed under the responsibility of the Government and in a general Bill. It was not the intention of the Government to introduce any such measure this Session, but he would suggest that the motions of the hon. members for Megantic and Bellechasse should be withdrawn, and the order discharged, with the view of the question being considered by the Government during recess, and dealt with in a general measure at the next Session. If no such proposition was then introduced, it would be quite competent for the hon. member for Megantic to move and take the sense of the House on his amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would oppose increasing the deposit from $50 to $200. He thought the experience of the last election had shown that the requirements of the $50 deposit had been amply sufficient to stop the nomination of bogus candidates, who were proposed simply for the purpose of making a speech or annoying their opponents.

Mr. RICHARD.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman perhaps forgets that the last election was not held under that law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he paid his $50 deposit nevertheless. He was very glad to hear the hon. the Minister of Justice say that the Government would assume the responsibilities of the question, as well as of other questions connected with the General Election Law of the country; and it had been suggested, and perhaps intimated, that the Government would next Session bring down a Bill on the subject. Under the circumstances, he thought the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Justice should be adopted, and the Bill and the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. CURRIER said he objected to the solemn declaration of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska that the Reform party did not seek to deprive the people of their rights in any manner. It was only last night that the hon. member for Vancouver had pointed out how the Government sought to interfere with the liberty of the subject in making a game of euchre an offence. He thought his hon. friend who proposed that the deposit be $200 had made a mistake, as every one ought to have the liberty of becoming a candidate for election to this House, without any deposit at all. The proposal to make the deposit $200 was a retrograde movement.

Mr. BLANCHET said it would not only interfere with the rights of the people, but with the rights of the Government. If the Bill were withdrawn, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. RICHARD said, although his opinions had not been altered by what had been said, yet, as the hon. the Minister of Justice had intimated that he would introduce amendments to the Election Law next Session, he would withdraw his Bill.

Amendment, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

QUEBEC GRAVING DOCK.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming the adjourned debate on Mr. Blanchet's proposed motion for a copy of the reports of Engineers, and other documents relating to the proposed Graving-dock at Quebec, read.

Mr. ROULEAU said he was greatly astonished when he heard the Premier, a few days previously, accuse the hon. member for Bellechasse and certain of his friends, with having treated this question from a local and too narrow point of view. The First Minister had stated that these hon. gentlemen would not settle the matter; that no decision would be made until all the engineers' reports were fully completed, and that these hon. gentlemen deceived themselves greatly if they thought they could carry off this enterprise. He was the more astonished owing to the fact that hon. gentlemen on that side of the House had not made any charge in this regard against the Ministry. In support of this assertion, it was only necessary to refer to Hansard of last year. It would be there seen, no doubt, that the hon. member for Bellechasse with his well-known talent, had represented the advantages presented in this relation by the South Shore, and the objections to the North Shore site; but he contended that hon. gentlemen were fully justified in taking such a course. Though representing the whole Dominion, and though bound to regard the general interest, yet it was necessary that members acquainted with the localities in question should inform other hon. members of the reason why these localities should be selected for public improvements. Therefore, they should not be charged with treating these matters from local points of view. In this instance, members who supported the South Shore project were sustained by all the engineers' reports presented up to the present time, and even by the majority of the deliberating body, whose sympathies were naturally opposed to the action they had considered their duty to recommend. This was at least sufficient to give hon. gentlemen the benefit of the doubt as to the irproachable intentions with which they were animated. They perfectly agreed with the Premier that the site of the Graving-dock should be chosen on the advice of professional men. The members of the left, advocates of the south shore, unfortunately of little influence with the Ministry, were above all interested in having this question decided on its intrinsic merits, and not according to the weight of influence which might be brought to bear upon the Cabinet, and which would be opposed to the interests of Lévis. They desired the dock to be placed in the least costly and the most advantageous position. All directly interested in the affair had a right to express surprise on account of the fact that they saw no progress being made. Over four years ago it was decided to build a Graving-dock in the harbour of Quebec, and the Harbour Commissioners had taken steps to procure the necessary funds. This was usually a thorny question, but this case was an exception to the rule. The Government had agreed to advance a certain sum towards the object, on condition that they would have the privilege of controlling the choice of the site. He saw no harm in this, as the Dominion was interested in the matter, but the Government should have reached a conclusion before to-day. Certainly the citizens of Quebec were badly treated by this delay—especially those who had taken the trouble to secure the election of one of the most influential members of the Administration whose experience with reference to the public works of the country was a guarantee that all would be for the best, and that expedition would be shown. Many of the Conservative electors of Quebec Centre had voluntarily sacrificed their political convictions in order to promote the material interests of their city; and these must have been greatly disappointed in the inaction of the Ministry. It seemed to him that the President of the Council, whose department did not require much of his time, should have made use of his so-greatly-wanted energy and of his experience, which went back one-third of a century, in order to hasten the execution of an undertaking in which his constituents were so directly interested. Either the hon. gentleman's influence was declining, or his will was being enfeebled; and they would believe him no longer when he repeated what he had said some months ago:—"A man who has been thirty-two years in Parliament, who has encountered the strongest adversaries that could be opposed to him, who had been betrayed by his own friends, and whom success had nevertheless always crowned, could accomplish many things." Some thought that the amount advanced by the Government should have been given and this seemed proper, as the dock would be built for the general benefit of the country; but in any event, if Quebec was obliged to pay for all she received, this ought to be an additional reason to prevent delay in this respect. He who paid, should be well and timely served. As this had not been done, complaints were natural. He did not doubt that the President of the Council would take the same course if he was a private member. The hon. member for the county of Lévis, who was possessed of a warm temperament, had nevertheless restrained himself regarding this question, which had a special interest for his constituents. Not content with mere moderation, the hon. gentleman had given them advice last year with reference to this subject. Fearing that, if imprudent zeal were shown on the part of members of the Opposition, the great influence he enjoyed with those who were in a position to affect the interests of the town of Lévis might be injured, the hon. gentleman had urged that "it was not politic to endeavor to embarrass the Ministers, in whom he had full confidence, and who would be obliged to render a decision so important to the country in general, and to his constituents in particular." He asked this hon. gentleman whether they had not followed his advice; was it possible for them to have been more moderate? He believed that, if the hon. member had shown more energy, the state of affairs would now be more satisfactory. A year had passed since the Government engineers had visited the sites, and still they were told that the plans were not yet sufficiently complete to justify a definite decision. The hon. gentleman should not be surprised if his constituents exacted a more decided course on his part. He had heard from the hon. the Premier that, according to present information, it appeared that the south shore was the best adapted for the building of the dock, though the Quebec site was preferable from a commercial point of view. The hon. gentleman should, consequently, show the House and the Government, of which he was one of the most faithful supporters, that he represented one of the finest counties in the Dominion, and that the town of Lévis, which was the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, and in which terminated another not less important line, would, in a few years, be the equal of Quebec, even from a commercial point of view. The hon. gentleman's friends believed that he would be successful if he displayed the requisite energy and determination. If the dock was not built at Lévis, the hon. gentleman knew well that his constituents would not be content with the accusation that the Conservative Party had made political capital out of the question; especially as his constituents knew that exactly the contrary was the case. The political capital had been made by the Liberal Party and against the interests of Lévis. The Liberals had commenced the agitation in this regard not only in the Federal but also in the Local elections. He did not believe that his hon. friend could charge the Conservatives a second time with having made political capital out of this question; to do so required the consummate experience of the President of the Council. In the elections of 1875, Mr. Shehyn sought election in Quebec East, and had been aided by the influence of the Dominion Government with reference to improvements then projected. The President of the Council assisted this gentleman, both in his paper and on the platform. All the organs of the Liberal party had followed a similar course. The Evenement of the 9th June, 1875, stated, in its report of a meeting held on the 8th June in Mr. Shehyn's interest: "Mr. Shehyn said in his speech that he came out particularly to advance public undertakings in the city of Quebec. He attributed delays in their execution to the hostility of Conservatives, and above all, of the Local Government against the Federal Government. He hoped that no delay would be shown in beginning these works." The Evenement stated that

Mr. ROULEAU.

Mr. Cauchon, who succeeded Mr. Shehyn, "spoke in the same sense, repeated the promises made by the candidate of his choice, and assured the electors that a municipal representative of St. Roch would be placed on the Harbour Commission." The Journal stated in its report of this meeting: "Mr. Cauchon spoke in his turn, and made some practical observations on the situation"—the hon. gentleman was always eminently practical—"and the desirability of electing men of business, who had a material interest in the city." As his candidate was reproached with not being a resident of the Division he said: "It is not residents who have assured for Quebec the construction of the Graving-dock and other docks." In the Evenement of the 12th June, 1875, in a report of a meeting held on the 11th of June, it was stated: "Some one in the crowd having said that they must have the North Shore Railway, Mr. Cauchon said that they must have both the North Shore Railway and the Graving-dock. He informed the electors that Mr. Shehyn would be one of the members of the Harbour Board." According to the law these Commissioners must choose the site of the Graving-dock. The Evenement of the 15th June stated: "The Harbour Board having voted $5,000 for the best plans," the Journal de Quebec said: "That this was only a matter of form, and that they wished to give the first prize to Messrs. Kimball & Morris." It asked at the same time if it was not true that $2,000 had already been given for a Graving-dock which would certainly never be built. It said that it had seen other plans besides those of Messrs. Kimball & Morris, which were preferable. It was then known that the plans of Messrs. Kimball & Morris were in favour of Lévis. The Journal of the 16th June stated that the prize for the best plans had been awarded Messrs. Kimball & Morris, but that this was of no consequence as the approbation of the Government must be obtained. He (Mr. Rouleau) believed he had clearly shown that the opinion of the President of the Council was then clearly in favour of Quebec in this regard. Let them now see what the hon. gentleman had done after his accession to a seat in the Cabinet. The following questions were put the hon. gentleman by the electors, but not answered: "Will the Graving-dock be built this spring, and will it be located in the St. Charles River? Should the Government build it at their own cost, and not simply advance the money?"—(Canadien, 1st December.) The Journal of the 18th December stated: "Mr. Cauchon says that this was a snare which was laid for him, and that the law did not permit him to make any promise, as this would render him ineligible." Nevertheless the hon. gentleman had a letter addressed him by the Mayor of Quebec, Mr. Murphy, in order that no doubt might exist with regard to his intentions. It was as follows:—

"SIR,—I am surprised to see the opposition made to Mr. Cauchon, especially in view of the exceptional circumstances in which it places Quebec, and of the suspicions it is sought to excite with regard to his intentions concerning our fine city. Having been present with him as a delegate of the Quebec Commissioners at a conference held with the Premier with respect to the Graving-dock, I saw what he then did and said, and I related it at a public meeting of the City Council. I give this spontaneous testimony as to these important services which he has rendered our city, from a feeling that it is my duty, and that it is but just to repeat them in public. I am sure that Quebec will not ignore its most vital interests to such a point as to reject the man who by his indomitable energy, his talents, his experience, and his position, can best secure them."

As Mr. Murphy was attacked for having written this letter, the Journal defended him as follows:—"The Mayor of Quebec has been insulted for having dared to express his opinion with regard to the present election. This was to have been expected, but what is consoling is the fact that what has been affirmed by Mr. Murphy is not the less incontestable." After having heard these extracts, he did not think the House could come to any other conclusion than that even the reply of the President of the Council to the delegation of electors that waited upon him, was an implicit promise to the effect, that he (Mr. Cauchon) would do all in his power to secure the Graving-dock for Quebec. He moved to amend the motion by adding the following words:—

Mr. ROULEAU.

"With copies of all plans, specifications, and estimates of cost which have been prepared with regard to the locations proposed for the Graving-dock on both sides of the St. Lawrence."

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think the Government had either plan or specification of the dock in their possession; if they had, he did not think it was in their power to produce them yet.

Mr. BLANCHET: Does the hon. gentleman say the Government has no power?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government could ask the engineers for them, but he did not think they were forced to give them. They were supplying the Government with plans and specifications for their approval, but the Government were still waiting for the documents referred to.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Harbour Commissioners were said to be creatures of the Government, and they would not dare to refuse the information asked for.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not suppose they would refuse the information. Still, they were not ready. The Government had seen the plans and specifications, but he did not think the copy furnished them could be used as a return.

Mr. CAUCHON said that the hon. member had certainly not been logical in the argument which he had presented to the House. The hon. gentleman had accused the hon. gentleman from Levis of having failed in the performance of his duty, and he had also accused him (Mr. Cauchon) of similar dereliction of duty. The hon. gentleman had contended that both he and his hon. friend from Levis were equally guilty in this relation, and the position assumed was assuredly illogical.

Mr. ROULEAU: I do not accuse either the one or the other hon. gentleman. I said that nothing was done regarding this question.

Mr. CAUCHON said this accusation was levelled both against himself and against the hon. member for Levis. Hence, if he had succeeded in this regard on behalf of Quebec interests, the hon.

member would be placed in a false position; and if the hon. member for Levis succeeded on behalf of Levis interests, the hon. gentleman would likewise be placed in a false position. The hon. member had also intimated that if this matter was not now settled, it was proved that those who had interested themselves in this enterprise had merely sought to secure what they desired of the electors; but the hon. gentleman ought to know that, until the work of exploration, &c., was concluded, the result could not be indicated. The hon. gentleman had endeavoured to establish that, before he entered the Cabinet, he had advocated the building of this dock; this was true, but was it a crime? He had sought to promote the interests of the city of Quebec at that time, and was this a crime? But he could easily prove that he had never made any promises with reference to this dock either during his own election. or during any other election. He had previously written articles stating that he desired justice to be done to Quebec, but he had expressly declared that, if the surveys showed that the dock could not be properly placed on the Quebec side of the river, he would submit to the decision. He was reproached for having made promises to the electors in this relation; he was not ashamed to say that he had advocated Quebec interests before he became a member of the Government, but he defied any one to show that either privately or publicly he had made any promises in this connection since he had entered the Ministry. He had done nothing of the kind.

Mr. OUIMET reproached the President of the Council with having promised the electors of Quebec the location of this dock on their side of the river, during his last election.

Mr. CAUCHON denied having done so.

Mr. OUIMET said that, if the hon. gentleman had not promised to secure the building of the Graving-dock at Quebec, the hon. gentleman's friends, who sat behind him (Mr. Cauchon) had made such pledges in his name.

Mr. CAUCHON: No; they did not.

Mr. OUIMET understood the hon. member for Dorchester to urge that, if this dock was not to be placed at Quebec, the site should at least be located somewhere. This question had been before the electors during the past three or four years, and during this period, it had been used for political purposes in constituencies on both sides of the river St. Lawrence. It was far from desirable that the settlement of the site should be left over until the elections of 1878, to be utilized in a similar manner, and he thought it was time that this was definitely effected. It was not a new thing for the Liberals to make use of important public works to influence elections; in December last, in Jacques Cartier, it was the Lachine Canal, and in Quebec, it had been the Graving-dock. He thought it was time to put an end to so objectionable a state of affairs, and he trusted that this great undertaking would be shortly placed in such a position that it could no longer be made use of to secure political ends.

Mr. CARON said that, for years past, and more especially since 1873 and 1875, when the law affecting the Quebec Graving-dock was amended, this question had been prominently before the public. From what his hon. friend from Dorchester had stated, it was quite evident that public opinion in the Province of Quebec in this regard was divided. Those who relied upon the report of Messrs. Kimball and Morris, whose names were connected with some of the most important English works of this character, considered that the Levis side should be selected. On the other hand, those who believed, as he did, that the Graving-dock should be in direct communication with the deep water terminus of the North Shore Railway, and near the centre of business, held that it should be placed on the Quebec side of the River St. Charles. If the spot could not be selected, there was no reason why Quebec should lose the dock, as another spot, Wolfe's Cove, had been considered under an engineering point of view perfectly acceptable. When this question was brought before the House, a few days previous, on the motion of his hon. friend from Belle-chasse, for papers connected with this most important matter, he had stated that it had been used as a political engine on several occasions during the last general Local elections in Quebec, and during the election which had followed acceptance of office by the hon. member for Quebec Centre. In answer to this remark, the President of the Council, with that delicacy of expression which always characterized his utterances on the floor of the House and outside of the House, had stated that it was not true. The hon. gentleman declared that this question had never been used for political purposes during any election in the city of Quebec. He was really astonished at the defective memory of the hon. the President of the Council. On more than one occasion the hon. the President of the Council had shown a defective memory. It would be remembered what a difficulty the hon. member had in calling to mind the fact of his being connected with an important public institution, receiving money from the Government, when he occupied a seat in the Local Legislature of Quebec. It required all the force and eloquence of the hon. the leader of the Opposition of Quebec, Mr. Joly, to convince him of this fact; and, before the committee struck to investigate this matter could bring down a report, the hon. the President of the Council resigned his seat in the Local House.

Mr. CAUCHON: I have no objection that the hon. gentleman should pursue that course of attack, provided that I have the right to rejoin. I need only say that the statement was unfounded as regards myself personally; and I proved it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. member to order.

Mr. CARON said it might be good tact for the hon. the President of the Council to have addressed the Speaker in French. The hon. gentleman certainly went as much out of the subject as he did in telling the hon. member for Dorchester that he would have been more eloquent had he been asking an appointment for his brother; yet the hon. the President of the Council was not called to order. It would be remembered how positive the hon. the President of the Council was in denying the statement he made as to the matter, namely, that the question of the Graving-dock had been made use of as political capital. It was not astonishing to hear that the hon. the President of the Council, with all his political experience, had determinedly refused to sign a declaration presented to him during his election—as the hon. gentleman had explained to the House on a previous occasion—for then he would have placed himself in a position which would have led to his disqualification, and he would have been deposed from his position as leader of the great Liberal Party of Lower Canada. The hon. gentleman denied that political capital had been made out of the Graving-dock, either in the Local or general election. Years ago, when there was a hostile feeling between the hon. gentleman and the hon. Senator who edited L'Evenement, he might have refused the testimony of that journal, but he would surely not do so now, when he and the hon. Senator were political allies. On the 9th of June, 1875, L'Evenement contained a report of a meeting held in the interest of Mr. Shehyn, the Liberal candidate for Quebec East in the Local House. Mr. Shehyn spoke as follows, according to L'Evenement:—

Mr. CARON.

“You will obtain in a few months the Graving-dock, that enterprise which will not only help the progress, but be the life of St. Roch and St. Sauveur. That Graving-dock is the beginning of important and gigantic works which will be built on the St. Charles. I think I can rely on being a member of the Commission.”

This was at a meeting at which the President of the Council was present, and at which he himself spoke. The report proceeded to say:—

“Mr. Cauchon was called and spoke with great success of the candidature of Mr. Shehyn, of his magnificent position in business and connection with the North Shore Railway, which was to be constructed by the Local Government. He also referred to the Graving-dock, the construction of which would throw $1,200,000 in St. Roch and St. Sauveur, to say nothing of the large amount which would be expended in Quebec for harbour improvements. Do you understand the effect of this? It is life and immense property for the city.”

Before going to the meeting, the hon. the President of the Council must have known the cost of the work. In the hon. gentleman's own election, the Chronicle published an article, in which it stated that the only ground on which it supported him was because of the influence he would have in securing the Graving-dock for Quebec. The Chronicle said on the 21st December:

"As we take it, the question which presents itself for Quebec in this election is not one of party by any means, although stump operators and partizan writers may seek to place it on that narrow ground. The question is, which of the two candidates is likely to exercise the greatest influence just now for the advantages of Quebec? There can possibly be no hesitation in pointing to Mr. Cauchon as the one who, by his present high position and connections, is best fitted in every way to do so. This language may seem strange on our part, but where the real interests of the city are concerned, we have never yet hesitated to sink our personal prejudices and dislikes in order to advocate the cause best calculated to promote the welfare and prosperity of the people. We have never had an overweening affection for the new President of the Council; we have fought him bitterly more than once, always speaking our mind of him and his conduct very plainly indeed, but this has never prevented us from recognizing the marked ability and great energy of the man, nor does it now blind us to the fact that much of the future destiny of Quebec depends upon the present endorsement by the electors of the Centre Division of his acceptance of office in the Mackenzie Administration. The moment is a critical one for the ancient capital, and the people in the Centre Division possess interests identical with those in the remainder of the city. We must all hang or fall together, and it can only be by accepting Mr. Cauchon, with all his faults, and returning a friend and supporter of the Government, and not a foe, that Quebec may expect the administrative favours it so much needs, and realize the long cherished hope it entertains. It is only reasonable, if we wish the Government to help us, that we should at least meet them half way, for it must not be put out of sight that great public works and improvements are contemplated in this city and neighbourhood in regard to which the Government has much to say. Let us take, for instance, the proposed Graving-dock, on the construction of which, on this side of the river, we all place so much stress. Is it at all likely we shall improve our chances of obtaining this great work by showing ingratitude to a man like Mr. Mackenzie, who has so frequently expressed his willingness to act for the benefit of Quebec? Is it not more human to expect that in such event his decision would be favourable to the side which returns a professed and enthusiastic supporter. We believe so at least. Then, again, we have Lord Dufferin's proposed embellishments of the city, and new castle of St. Louis on the the citadel, which, if carried out, will not only lastingly improve Quebec beyond her hitherto wildest aspirations, but entail the expenditure of a large amount of money to the advantage of our population. Is it possible to conclude that the rejection of Mr. Cauchon and the election of Mr. Tarte would be calculated to propitiate the Federal Government and advance our interests in these particulars? For it must be remembered that more than three-quarters of the large sums necessary to carry out His Excellency's proposition must come from the Ottawa treasury. We must not be understood to say that the realization of all these undertakings depends wholly upon Mr. Cauchon, but we believe it will be generally admitted that it is much better to have a powerful friend at court than none at all; while, on the other hand, Mr. Cauchon's defeat—which, however, we do not admit to be possible—could only indefinitely retard works pre-eminently needed at this moment by Quebec and its people."

Mr. CAUCHON said he had never intended to insult the hon. member for Quebec county or any other hon. member. He did not promise anything in connection with the Graving-dock question; and he was not responsible for any statements made by the Chronicle.

Mr. CARON said he never accused the hon. the President of the Council of having made a promise. That would have annulled his election. What he stated was that the question of the Graving-dock had been used as a political engine at local elections in Quebec. He now—from his seat in Parliament—reiterated that statement, that the question was used as a political engine, and, moreover, that the hon. the President of the Council was perfectly aware that the question was so used.

Mr. CAUCHON said the hon. member for Quebec county had quoted extracts from the press to show that he (Mr. Cauchon) had used the dock question as a political engine. In articles written by him, and for which he was responsible, there was no promise made in regard to the dock. Every hon. member had the right to represent his own interests, but the question was whether he (Mr. Cauchon) made any promise regarding the Graving-dock. He denied that charge and declared that he had not used the question as a political engine. In regard to the Chronicle, he was elected against its influence and that of its friends by a large majority, and he was returned in 1874 and 1875 without the Graving-dock question having been used in any way for political purposes.

Mr. CARON said he desired to repeat, in French, the remarks he had addressed to the House in English, as the hon. the President of the Council had spoken first in French and afterwards in English.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was a question which rested with the House. It was quite in order for an hon. member to address the House in one language and then in the other; but it was a different matter when an hon. member had taken his seat, and afterwards desired to make another speech.

Mr. BLAKE said, as the hon. the President of the Council had stated that he did not intend to make, and had not made any charge against the hon. member for Quebec county, he should rest satisfied.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said the question as to the right of an hon. member to address the House in French was involved.

Mr. MASSON asked if any hon. member objected to the hon. member for Quebec county making explanations in French.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he objected.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TASCHEREAU said he had heard with great astonishment the assertion that this matter had been made use of during the local elections of 1875, and during the election of his hon. friend from Quebec Centre. This pretension was incorrect. It was to be remembered that the election of Mr. Shehyn in 1875 was contested; the trial of the case had lasted a long time and a great number of witnesses were heard; the most distinguished lawyers of the Quebec bar were employed, and the Court had unanimously confirmed Mr. Shehyn in his seat. It was consequently evident that this matter had not been used as had been represented. A great deal of noise had been made with reference to the election of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, and it had been said that the hon. gentleman had formally promised to the electors to secure the construction of the dock on the Quebec side. Meetings had been held in various parts of the Division, and he had taken part in the successful election of his hon. friend, but he had not heard any promise whatever with regard to this subject, either on the part of the hon. gentleman or any of the hon. gentleman's friends. Strenuous efforts had been made to draw the hon. gentleman into a trap in this regard, but the hon. gentleman's opponents had been unable to secure a tithe of the evidence desired in order to contest the election. Everybody was aware that it was a matter of importance both to Quebec and Levis, to secure the location of this dock; a strong rivalry existed upon the subject between these two cities, and Messrs. Kimball and Morris, eminent English engineers, had been charged with the examination of the Quebec harbour. Their motives were suspected, and consequently the Government, in order that justice might be done in the premises, had instructed their own engineers to visit Quebec. These engineers had passed a great part of last winter in the survey of the harbour, and had even extended their labours into the spring, in order to discover what was the action of the ice in the harbour of Quebec at that period of the year. Their report was presented to the Government in the course of last autumn, and in view of this fact it was unreasonable to suppose that an important work of this character could be commenced during the winter season. Besides, other improvements in the harbour of Quebec were under the consideration of the Harbour Commissioners, and tenders for these works were to be submitted on the 26th of the current month. These improvements were very important to the city of Quebec, and if under the circumstances, fault could be found with the Government, censure should, for similar reasons, be passed on the Harbour Commissioners. He maintained the delays which had occurred were unavoidable. He readily understood why the members for the county of Quebec, the county of Levis, and even the county of Dorchester made use of this question, as they desired to annoy the President of the Council, but he could not understand so easily why the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Oimet) should adopt the course he had taken before the House, in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman's constituency was situated so far from the point in issue. The arguments of which hon. gentlemen opposite had made use might very justly be retorted against themselves, because the Local Government was not free from blame in a similar relation. The President of the Council was under no obligation to contradict all the articles written about him in the public prints. The great question to be considered was whether the Government had done anything wrong or not with reference to this important undertaking; and he thought it had been conclusively proved that the Administration was in no way to blame.

Mr. CAUCHON.

Mr. MASSON said he thought the discussion had demonstrated the wisdom of the position assumed by the hon. member for Cumberland, when the resolutions in favour of the Graving-dock were submitted to the House. The hon. gentleman had then maintained that this step should not have been taken by the Government unless they were prepared to indicate where the site would be located. He remembered that, when he sat on the other side of the House, he had expressed a similar opinion with regard to fortifications which it was proposed to erect; and, at that time, the hon. member for Chateauguay had made a motion with regard to this subject, in order to force him to vote with the Opposition, which he had done. It was an easy thing for a Government to promise to build a work of great importance, involving the expenditure of a large sum of money, and then to keep this dangling before the representatives and electors of the constituencies for political ends. This had been done in the present instance. The sound rule was to settle the location of every public work before it was submitted to the House. It was time that this question should be settled once for all; and it should not be left over until the next general elections, in order to enable the Ministerial candidates for the county of Levis and the city of Quebec to assure the electors that, if they were returned, they would have an excellent chance of securing this dock. Not only had this matter been utilized during elections, but advantage had been similarly taken of the Jesuit Barracks question. The electors of the city of Quebec had been told that, if they aided in overturning the De Boucherville Administration, they would secure the transfer of the Jesuit Barracks sooner than would otherwise be the case. The Government were wholly to blame for the false position in which they had placed themselves in this relation. Public opinion in the Province of Quebec had been greatly excited touching this important matter. When the Local Parliament opened at Quebec, after the general elections, he had seen the President of the Council with other persons, lobbying in the corridors of the building, while the report was circulated that, if the De Boucherville Administration were defeated, not only the Graving-dock, but also the Jesuit Barracks, would be obtained much sooner than was otherwise to be expected. What he had said last year was borne out by the facts. The documents and correspondence filed proved that the real difficulty did not relate to the title of the Jesuits' Barracks. Improvements devised for the city of Quebec had also been used for political purposes, and, by these means, enemies of the Administration were induced to support Ministerial candidates. The Premier last year, when he (Mr. Masson) had spoken of organs of the Liberal party, had said that the Chronicle was not one of the Liberal organs. This fact, however, made the case worse; this paper had then been induced to turn its coat, and become practically a Liberal organ under the circumstances. He thought that this was the best proof of the assertion that the Graving-dock question had been used in the city of Quebec as an instrument to secure the election of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, and to injure the De Boucherville Administration.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DESJARDINS said that, as the rules of the House had been suspended for the benefit of the President of the Council, who had spoken in both English and French, he thought that hon. gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House were entitled to the same privilege. The great majority of the members supported the Ministry with all the readiness and docility that could be desired, and the First Minister had no reason to fear the effect of the explanations which the hon. member for Quebec county might make in reply to the President of the Council. This, however, seemed to be only a continuation of the policy which had been adopted on the other side of the House. Not a long time previously the First Minister had spoken repeatedly in disregard of the rules, but, when the hon. member for Cumberland had attempted to reply, as appeared to him perfectly proper under the circumstances, the Minister of Justice had objected. He had heard hon. members from the district of Quebec express surprise in view of the fact that hon. members from the district of Montreal ventured to say a word on the subject of the Graving-dock. Whatever might be the importance of a public work, under these circumstances, the hon. members from the Quebec district considered the attitude of hon. members from the Montreal district an intrusion on their rights. They, however, considered that the public interests were concerned in this matter, which was important not only for the cities of Quebec and Levis, but for all cities having any connection with ocean navigation, and to all members from whatever city or Province they might come. He remarked with pleasure that, for the first time, the Ministerial leader from the Province of Quebec had sought to defend his acolytes; and, on the other hand, at least three Liberal members from the district of Quebec had successively recognized the President of the Council as their leader, and had defended the hon. gentleman's policy, in connection with which they all evidently felt that they shared, to a certain extent, a common guilt. This was only right on their part.

Mr. MASSON.

It was long since these hon. gentlemen had exhibited such generosity towards their leader. It was no matter for surprise that the question of selecting a site for this Graving-dock, had been used as a means for securing Ministerial votes. In 1875, during the election in Montreal West, when the principal point at issue appeared to be whether or not the Government would grant increased protection to our industries, the hon. member for Montreal West was permitted to use the name of the Government to persuade the electors that the Ministry was favourable to a protection policy, and that the following Session would witness the commencement of the fulfilment of their desires and hopes. The electors had been constantly kept under this impression, and the Ministerial journals had taken such a course as to strengthen this feeling. The Minister of the Interior also, when in need of votes, had shown great willingness to make promises as to what he could secure for his constituents. The hon. member had, in effect, said to his constituents, that, if he could do so much as he had done when he was a simple member of the House, what would he not be able to do in their interests, while occupying the position of Minister. If the hon. gentleman had imitated the modesty of his leader, the President of the Council, he would not have so rashly compromised himself. Various matters had been brought before the electors of the county of Jacques Cartier; and among them the famous subject of the Lachine Canal.

Mr. LAFLAMME objected to the hon. member continuing his remarks on this subject, unless he were given the privilege of reply.

Mr. SPEAKER said that, on the question of adjournment, a member might speak on any subject,—a most inconvenient practice, but one which Parliament had refused to abolish, and he could only appeal to the good sense of hon. members not to extend the discussion beyond all reasonable bounds.

Motion to adjourn lost.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I beg to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen who proposed the motion and the amend ment to the fact that I cannot bring down the reports of the Engineers at present. One of them is not prepared. The only plans and specifications which we have in the Department are the general specifications of the harbour. The contract is now about to be let; and we have only one copy of them and the general plan of the harbour. The plans for the Graving-dock proper have not yet arrived; and it is quite useless to pass a motion for papers that do not exist.

Mr. BLANCHET said he inferred from what had been stated that the decision on this question was very nearly settled, and that the Government had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to place this dock in the St. Charles River. He thought the President of the Council had made up his mind that no more political capital could be made out of this question in Quebec. The hon. gentleman could say it had been shown by the surveys of scientific men that the St. Charles River could not be chosen for the purpose; the hon. gentleman would be satisfied, and so also would the city of Quebec; hence he concluded that the hon. gentleman's case was hopeless. The reason why the hon. member for Levis the other day did not move his motion was, he thought, because the Premier had told him sufficient to let him understand that it would be of no use.

Mr. FRECHETTE: The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. BLANCHET said he would not discuss the question further. He thought that on the whole the reasons given in favour of the south shore were the strongest, and before long they would learn that the Government had not been able to adopt the St. Charles River site for the Graving-dock. The question would then arise as to when the work would commence. He would leave that to the Premier, who was a practical man, and as he said he did not want to make political capital out of the question, it was to be hoped he would commence the work as soon as possible, and not wait until next election before commencing operations. As the hon. member had stated there were no reports, no plans, no specifications—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say so.

Mr. BLANCHET said he understood the hon. the Premier to say he had no report before him except the report of the engineer. The documents belonged to the Department of Public Works. The surveys made last spring and during the summer were made upon instructions given by the Public Works Department to Mr. Page, and the Minister of Public Works could not be excused if he said he did not know of any report, because they belonged to his Department.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never said anything of the kind. I said I had Mr. Page's report, but I had not the report of the other engineer, and I was not prepared yet to bring them down.

Mr. BLANCHET said the specifications and plans belonged to the hon. the Premier's Department. If he was willing, he might bring them down, but, if he said they were not ready, and that he could not bring down the information asked, the hon. gentleman should state so to the House. He was, however, willing to withdraw his motion in accordance with the wish expressed the other day by the hon. the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. FRECHETTE said he must protest against the insinuation made by the hon. member for Bellechasse that the hon. the Premier approached him on the subject of the motion of which he gave notice a few days ago, a motion exactly the same as that proposed by the hon. gentleman. He denied the allegation, and protested against such an insinuation being made. Neither the hon. the Premier nor any of the Ministers said a word to him about the question, and his motion was withdrawn because he happened not to be in his place at the time. The hon. member for Bellechasse, being desirous of obtaining the advantage of initiating the matter, gave notice of the same motion, and that was the reason why his motion was not pressed before the House instead of that of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. BLANCHET said that during the first two days of the Session he enquired if the Government had a report upon the site of the Graving-dock, and the hon. the Premier answered "Yes." The hon. member for Levis gave notice of a motion for papers, and allowed that motion to drop twice, as he now said, because he was absent.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member was not in his seat.

Mr. BLANCHET said there was a way in which that might be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that in his opinion the hon. the Premier should have taken the advice which was offered him in 1875 by the hon. member for Cumberland, when he pressed him to settle the site for the Graving-dock at once, and thus remove it from the possible competition of rival politicians. Had that advice been accepted, perhaps the whole of that discussion, the cross-firing and the imputations cast to-day would have been saved to the House and the country. The hon. member for Cumberland said on that occasion:

"He learnt from a communication he had received from one of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, that not only had the officers of the Imperial Government, who were deeply interested in this matter, decided upon Point Levis as the proper location for this work, but that seven out of nine of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec—the men he supposed best qualified to judge what site should be selected—concurred in the opinion expressed by the Imperial officers in relation to this work. He regretted that under such circumstances the Premier was not in a position to state to the House whether the best location would be chosen, or whether that was to depend upon the amount of political pressure brought to bear upon the Government by parties in this House or outside of it. There were gentlemen in this House to whom the Government would be disposed to defer a good deal, who were ready to exercise all the influence they could bring to bear upon the Government, and he hoped the Premier would invoke the assistance of the House, if necessary, against any pressure that might involve a very large increase in public expenditure."

The hon. the President of the Council had said that everybody knew he was working to get the Graving-dock placed on the north side of the river. It was quite right that the hon. gentleman should have so worked when he was a private member of Parliament, if he was conscientiously of the opinion that that was the best position for it, and if he thought it would be for the benefit of his constituents to have it there. Although they had heard the extraordinary doctrine propounded that various interests and classes should not be represented in Parliament, yet, practically, they knew it was absolutely necessary for the good of the country that the various sections and local interests should be so represented. But after the hon. the President of the Council ceased to be a private member and became a member of the Cabinet, and as such a member of the Privy Council went back to seek the suffrages of his constituents and a renewal of their confidence, he was debarred by constitutional principles, and by his oath as President of the Privy Council, from working for the dock, and, more than all, from saying that he was working for it. The hon. gentleman said he never made any promise. It had been proved by statements uncontradicted that, while he did not make any promise himself, he heard promises made in his presence and he did not deny them.

Mr. FRECHETTE.

Mr. CAUCHON: Where is the proof that I heard them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hon. gentlemen say so.

Mr. CAUCHON: They were never made before me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said hon. gentlemen around him had said so time and again, and the hon. the President of the Privy Council must submit to be criticised upon the statements of half a dozen gentlemen in the same position as himself. The hon. gentleman was debarred from stating what his opinion was with reference to the site of the dock, or what he was going to do with regard to it, because he had sworn not to divulge what was the advice he was going to give to his colleagues. It was a sacrifice which every constituency must submit to which elected a Cabinet Minister, that their representative must cease to advocate any special interest with Government. As one of the Government he must sit in Council and act for the benefit of the whole country, even if such action was opposed to the interests of his own constituency. The hon. gentleman had said that everybody knew he was working for the dock. How could they know it unless he told them? and he ought not to have told them. They had a judicial decision in Lower Canada the other day that, if a candidate sat in a church and heard a priest say anything in his favour, he was particeps criminis if he did not rise in his place and protest against the statement. Never had such an instance of undue influence been exercised as that shown by the hon. the President of the Council—undue influence exercised by a Minister of the Crown, having the opportunity of pleading the cause of his constituency before his own colleagues in private. When the hon. gentleman stated that he was going to work for his constituents with his colleagues, if that was not undue influence he did not know what undue influence was, and it was undue influence of the most corrupt and corrupting kind. The hon. gentleman went down to St. Roch, a constituency composed in a large measure of working men, who depended on the employment of their labour for the support of their families, and the people were told in the most public manner: "Although the hon. gentleman may be personally obnoxious to you; although you may condemn his principles and practice in leaving the old Conservative party and accepting the leadership of the Liberal Rouge party; although you may feel disinclined to support an hon. gentleman in such duplicity of political principles, yet we must keep the pot boiling and have the chicken in it every day, and this can be had at the expense of the Government if you only re-elect the hon. gentleman who has taken a seat in the Cabinet." What was the use of passing the much praised Electoral Corruption Bill, what was the use of adopting measures to prevent individual bribery in individual cases, if a member of the Government was allowed, by such a statement as the hon. the President of the Council admitted he had made, to bribe a whole constituency? If the hon. the Premier as head of the Government had settled the site of the Graving-dock sooner, this would have been avoided, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would have had a different colleague sitting beside him as President of the Council. Then what was the moral of this whole matter? That whereas the question of the Graving-dock site had had a very corruptive influence at the last election, the hon. the Premier should see that the site was selected before the next election. Why did not the hon. the Premier bring down Mr. Page's report at once, for probably it might settle the whole difficulty? Mr. Page was Engineer-in-chief and deserved the confidence of the head of his Department. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had trusted that gentleman's report on many other occasions, and why therefore did he not depend on him now and take his advice, whatever it might be, and thus remove the question from the arena of conflicting political parties and avoid the unseemly recriminations in this House, and out of it, which had arisen from the delay that had taken place in the selection of a site.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the moral he drew from the whole affair was this: That hon. gentlemen opposite had so little to find fault with that they could occupy the greater portion of two days in discussing a trifling matter like this. He was somewhat surprised that the hon. member for Bellechasse had ventured two or three times to doubt his good faith to the House. The hon. member had ventured to suggest that, if there was not a report from one officer, there might be from another. He was not, however, in the habit of double-dealing with the House. Whether right or wrong he always stated the case frankly. He had told the hon. member for Bellechasse at the outset of the discussion that the report of Mr. Page, which he had previously informed the House was in his possession, could not at present be presented. He had told the hon. member the reason—that the report was submitted to another eminent engineer with a view of ascertaining whether he coincided in the views expressed. The hon. gentleman should have accepted that statement unless he had some reason to doubt it.

He had also chosen to state that a conversation had occurred between the hon. member for Levis and himself (Mr. Mackenzie) in regard to the motion which that hon. gentleman placed on the notice paper. He had never had a word of conversation with that hon. gentleman or any person in his behalf since he came to Ottawa about the matter. The Act simply conferred upon the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and himself the approval of the site after they had obtained plans and specifications and all particulars in regard to the dry dock. The plans had never yet been presented to them. A little over two months ago he called the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that they had not yet been forwarded, and he had stated on the last occasion when the subject was brought up, that Mr. Morris, one of the engineers, had recently come to Quebec, and the Government were in daily expectation of receiving the papers essential to a decision as to the site. Not a statement had been made during the debate, so far as he understood the French language, to inculcate the Government in any way whatever. They had not used the question for political purposes; if it had been so used he would have known it. It would have been a work of supererogation to have used it to have influenced the constituency of Quebec Centre. An article had been read from a Conservative paper, as if that paper could be accepted as evidence against the Government.

An HON. MEMBER: It was the Nouveau Monde.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the article had simply proved that Conservatives could be obtained to write almost anything that suited their purpose at the time; it proved nothing against the Government.

Mr. CARON rose to a point of order. He said he wished to correct an error.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the extracts had simply proved that this Conservative journal and its editor, animated by the usual spirit of selfishness of the Conservatives, chose to write an article strongly in favour of this location of the dock in Quebec, and urged the election of one of the city members to the Administration, believing that Quebec would thereby secure some particular benefit. If the article had been written by the hon. the President of the Council he could understand the quotation; or if the paper had been the property of the hon. gentleman, as the Mail was the property of the hon. member for Kingston, he could understand the quotation.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Mail is not my property.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, if the paper had been paid for like the hon. gentleman's paper, he could understand the quotation. But they had no connection whatever with the paper, and they had endeavoured faithfully to carry out the intention of the Legislature, which would be carried out. They were responsible for that; they accepted the responsibility and would perform the duty. It was a thoroughly good evidence of the miserably small policy of the Opposition when they would waste a day on such a question.

Mr. CARON said the papers he had quoted from were not Conservative. He had never heard them called Conservative except by the hon. the Premier, and he probably knew as little of and took as little interest in them as he did in the matter of the Graving-dock. There was no doubt whatever but that this question was used as a political engine during the election. He did not accuse the hon. the First Minister as being to blame for this, but he did accuse those who supported him in the Province and city of Quebec for using it as a political lever to a great extent.

Mr. CAUCHON said, even if the responsibility of those articles were on his shoulders, he defied any hon. member to show that there was anything in them by which he was compromised in any possible way. Stress was laid on the ability of the hon. member for Kingston on constitutional points, but unfortunately the logic and science of the hon. gentleman were frequently at fault, and they came to the conclusion that he was not infallible. In this matter he had worked as much as he could for the good of his constitants, but, if the engineers reported that the dock could not be at Quebec, they must submit to that decision.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had listened to the discussion with a great deal of interest, because the question was one which deeply affected the commerce of the whole country. He counted Quebec as the first maritime port in the Dominion, and every one who knew anything of the geography of the country must take the same view. When Confederation was formed, he found the harbour trust of the port in a state next to bankruptcy, and as Minister of Marine and Fisheries he did everything in his power to remedy the evils which existed. He endeavoured to carry out a policy in regard to the ports of Montreal and Quebec, which he thought warranted by his own and the experience of other commercial men. But while working in this direction he was libelled by the hon. the President of the Council in the Journal de Quebec. Despite that, however, he persevered, and, after years of vile misrepresentation and attack, he succeeded in getting the bonds of the Harbour Trust of Quebec purchased by the Government. He afterwards submitted measures reorganizing the Harbour Trusts and Trinity Houses of Quebec and Montreal, placing the powers under one executive. As the trusts were supported from the taxes on shipping, they gave a certain representation to the shipping interest, the Corn Exchange, Board of Trade and the cities. To those popular bodies, which were mainly concerned in the administration of the Boards, were given five members out of the nine. But one of the first acts of the present Government was to change the constitution of the Boards, and to transfer their control from the interests named to the Government of the day. He appealed to the House whether that was a just measure. Its effect was to allow a large amount of politics and partyism to enter into the control of the Boards, which was to be deprecated. In reference to the question immediately under discussion, the hon. the Premier had said the Harbour Commissioners might not be disposed to give the information asked for. Now, the Commissioners were the creatures of the Government, and they could be compelled to furnish the information if the hon. gentleman wished it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never said that the Harbour Commissioners might not be disposed to give the information.

Mr. MITCHELL: What did you say

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said I knew could get anything in their possession but I was informed they had no plans yet of the Graving-dock.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend stated they might not be disposed to give them to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then I will be set right. I will say, however, it is a remarkable thing that there are no plans of a work which will necessitate an expenditure of public money, or half a million of dollars as the President of the Council says, but of a million and a quarter as the friends of the hon. gentleman say.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There has not been a dollar of it spent.

Mr. MITCHELL: Kimball & Morris have had £1,000 paid them for making plans.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not from us.

Mr. MITCHELL said the money was paid by the Harbour Trust, however, who were the creatures of the Government, the majority of them being Government nominees; and the public would hold the Government responsible for maladministration or delays on the part of the Commissioners. If not a dollar of public money had been spent by the Government, it was very strange that tenders were received five weeks ago for the construction of the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. There are two distinct sets of plans—one for the general harbour works, now under construction, and one for the Graving-dock proper, which the Government have not yet received. We received the plans of the general harbour work long ago.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not catch the remarks of the hon. the Premier on that point. But it was remarkable that something like three years had elapsed since the work was taken in hand, and there were no plans ready yet. At this rate it would take a century to complete the Graving-dock. Considering the great distress existing among the labouring population, it was also remarkable that the Government had not taken the opportunity of relieving that distress by forcing their nominees on the Harbour Trust to proceed with the work in a more expeditious manner. Eight or ten years ago, an additional tax of five cents a ton was levied on all shipping, for the purpose of paying for improvements in Quebec harbour; and yet to this time not one dollar's worth of benefit had the shipping received. It was high time for either the improvements to be made, or the five cent. tax to be taken off. He was speaking on behalf of commercial and shipping interests, and not from a party point of view. It might not be known, but the Government should awake to the fact that the harbour in Quebec was a stalking horse to obtain political influence. Everything was done on account of partisanship. He knew he was hitting his own friends, for much the same course was pursued under the late Government. Three sites for the Graving-dock were named, Levis, the River St. Charles, and Wolfe's Cove. He heard men of a great deal of judgment who were largely interested in shipping say that neither Point Levis nor the St. Charles River were suited for the Graving-dock, but that Wolfe's Cove was the best place. First-class engineers should thoroughly examine the various proposed sites and report to the Commissioners, who should report to the Government as to the cost and the time in which the work could be completed. This should have been done two years ago, and the Graving-dock would nearly have been completed by this time.

Motion and amendment, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

PROCEDURE AND EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.

[BILL No. 3.]

(Mr. Irving.)

THIRD READING.

Order for consideration of amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (No. 3) respecting Procedure and Evidence in Criminal cases, read.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. BLAKE called the attention of the House to a proposed amendment of the hon. member for Cardwell, which had been postponed. Unfortunately the hon. member was not enabled to be present. But the hon. member and himself had agreed upon the form of the amendment. It was to meet cases where the signatures of witnesses examined in a preliminary investigation were denied, and where it was necessary to prove the signatures in the absence of the magistrate. He moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction to add the following clause to the said Bill:—

"The 64th section of the said Act is hereby amended, by adding the following words:—

"Provided that for the purposes of this section, a deposition of the witness purporting to have been taken before a Justice or Justices on the investigation of the charge, and to be signed by the witness and the Justice or Justices returned to and produced from the custody of the proper officer, shall be prima facie presumed to have been signed by the witness."

Amendment agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendment read the first and second time, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—

[BILL No. 5.]

(Mr. Dymond.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Mr. DYMOND said he was aware of the dangers that might beset the too adventurous layman who dared to trespass on what was regarded as the legal domain. But the question which he had brought up for consideration had its popular as well as its judicial aspect. It was quite true that the proceedings of our Courts were conducted by lawyers, and that in those proceedings, either on the Bench or at the bar, lawyers played the most agreeable, if not the most interested part. But as a rule both the prosecutor and the accused were not lawyers, but laymen. It was seldom that members of the legal profession were placed in the unpleasant predicament of being accused of crime; and with a shrewdness, that did them credit, they very seldom attempted to invoke the powers of the law as prosecutors. But while that was the case, the layman frequently stood imperilled of his life or his liberty, or as a suitor for justice against a man who had wronged him. What, under these circumstances, therefore, might be sport to the lawyers, might be death or suffering to the laymen, reminding one of Æsop's fable about the boys and the frogs, where the latter exclaimed: "What is sport to you is death to us." A year ago he had the honour of calling the attention of the House for the first time to the subject of allowing persons charged with crime to give evidence on their own behalf, if they were desirous of doing so. A Bill was introduced into the House proposing some measure of legal reform by a learned gentleman (Mr. Hillyard Cameron), whose death was deeply regretted by many besides his own political friends, for he was one who was always ready to give advice or counsel, whether he agreed or not with the proposition submitted to him and whether it came from a legal or lay member of the House. He (Mr. Dymond) proposed an amendment to that Bill, embodying his views on the subject, and in the short discussion which took place it was suggested by the hon. the Minister of Justice, without the expression of any opinion on his part as to merits of the question, that the proper mode of bringing the proposal before the House would be by a substantive resolution or by a separate Bill. He (Mr. Dymond) had acted on that suggestion, and the Bill now before the House was the result. Since the last Session of Parliament the subject has been discussed in the British House of Commons, on a motion similar to the one he now proposed, brought in by Hon. Evelyn Ashley. In that discussion an opinion was expressed by an eminent lawyer and Judge, who perhaps, as an authority on such a subject stood higher than almost any man at the present time,—he referred to the Right Hon. Russell Gurney, Recorder of London, a lawyer of exceedingly conservative instincts and whose experience as one of the principal Judges of the Central Criminal Court would not for a moment be questioned by any one acquainted with the working of the judicial system in the mother country. Mr. Russell Gurney in speaking to Mr. Ashley's Bill, expressed his opinion in the following words:—

"Having been brought up to the profession almost from a child, he had been favourable to the institutions and practices that he found in existence; but his experience, the experience of many years, as Recorder of London, and one of the principal Judges of the Central Criminal Court, had convinced him that it was most important for the interests of justice—for the conviction of the guilty, and the acquittal of the innocent—that some such change as was now proposed should be made in the law of this country (Great Britain)."

The scope of Mr. Ashley's Bill was somewhat wider than that of the measure now before the House, for it proposed that not only persons accused of crime should be permitted to give evidence under oath, but that the wives or husbands of such persons should also be admitted as witnesses. He did not propose to go so far on the present occasion. If the principle of the measure he now submitted should be approved, it was quite possible, in due time, that the further reform he had just referred to might come; but there was no occasion to encumber the consideration of the subject to-night by travelling at all beyond the simple proposition he had presented to the House. His attention had been called by an hon. member opposite to a very able article which appeared in the Law Magazine, published in London, showing that the subject was there obtaining increased attention, and exciting increased interest; and within the last few years the matter had been frequently debated in England in Social Science Congresses and on the floor of Parliament. The object of all judicial investigations, it would be admitted, was simply to discover the truth; it was not to obtain the conviction of the offender, or his acquittal, but it was to discover the truth of the allegations which might be presented by the Crown in the public interest. It would further, he presumed, be admitted that no one was so competent to tell the truth—supposing he would tell the truth—as the person who stood indicted at the bar. The witnesses might be mistaken, the Court might be wrong in its conclusions, but the accused must know whether he was guilty or not of the matter with which he was charged. The onus of refusing to accept the truth at his hands, if he were willing to tell the truth, must rest with those who objected to the proposition embodied in the Bill. It was sometimes imagined that the silencing of the prisoner was an inherent principle of British institutions. But up to the year 1836, in Great Britain, when the Prisoner's Counsel Bill was passed, the practice of putting suggestions to the prisoner by the Court, although not under oath, was almost a necessary part of every trial. The prisoner had to speak, if he spoke at all, in his own defence; his advocate could only address the Court on questions of law, and the Judge was compelled to question him in order to bring out his story. So late as 1848 only were magistrates in Great Britain prohibited from putting questions to the prisoners before them. So far as he had been able to gauge public opinion on the subject, two objections were urged to the course he proposed should be pursued. One was that, to put an innocent man upon his oath and examine him might tend to his own disadvantage; that, in the cross-examination by counsel, statements might be extracted from him which might prejudice him in the minds of the jury; that he would become confused, being unequal to the contest, and possibly admit what he might intend to deny. But the answer to that objection was that the examination would, under the Bill, be perfectly voluntary; no man would be compelled to put himself in the witness-box and submit himself to an examination unless by his own voluntary act. Then, again, it was asserted that encouragement would be given to commit perjury; that a man standing in peril of life and liberty would be tempted to commit perjury in order to effect his escape. He (Mr. Dymond) believed the value of an oath of far less value than a skilful cross-examination, and he could imagine no more certain mode of convicting a guilty man than to allow him to be examined and cross-examined by learned counsel. He ventured further to assert that it was unjust to an innocent man to deny him the right to purge himself on oath from a grave crime of which he might be accused, because a guilty man might add perjury to his other offences. Again, they were aware that the enforced silence of the prisoner was used frequently by counsel as a plea on his behalf. Hon. gentlemen connected with the legal profession knew that if they had nothing better to say for their client they could appeal to the jury to believe that if the man's mouth were not closed he might say something that would bring about his acquittal and justification. He believed, however, the chief reason why this reform had not been adopted earlier was due to that sort of British conservatism which was inherent in all our institutions, and which made us very slow to adopt anything in the nature of a change. There was also a dread arising from the fear of introducing anything like the continental system, the system which in France and some other continental countries placed the unfortunate person accused with crime on a sort of moral rack in order that the Court might extract from him some admissions of guilt, but he thought such a fear on our part might be dispelled when we remembered the wide difference there was between our judicial system and those of the countries to which he had referred. There, when proceeding by indictment, the Court practically began the inquiry by assuming the guilt of the prisoner, whereas, under our system, innocence was always assumed until guilt had been actually proved. Should the Bill which was now before the House go further, it might be possible to add some clauses which would effectually restrain any Court from exercising its power of examination to an extent unjust to the prisoner. He would venture to submit to the House some extracts taken from the proceedings of the meetings of the Social Science Association which were always attended by many very able lawyers, some of whose observations embodied not simply a statement of opinion but also an argument in favour of the views he held. At the meeting of the Association in 1874, Mr. Sheriff Dickson read a paper in which he used the following language:—

“In most criminal cases, as in all cases of personal injury, theft, forgery, and other frauds, there are really two parties—he who suffered from the crime and the accused. At present, one of them, who in England prosecutes and in Scotland has usually promoted the prosecution, is not only admissible but is usually the chief witness, whereas the other is excluded. In perhaps the majority of charges of rape and criminal assaults the rule operates with grievous injustice; as the fact of the intercourse is often not disputed, and the only question is whether it was voluntary—upon which the woman is under the strongest motives to give false evidence. A large proportion of other assaults are the sequel of quarrels; yet the jury are allowed to hear only one of the disputants, who, from having suffered in the fray, often feels bitter animosity to the accused, whose evidence, not likely to be more biassed, and equally necessary for a full and fair investigation, is inadmissible. The rule operates even more unjustly and unfairly in charges of perjury, especially where the evidence to which it applies has been given against one accused on a criminal charge. In that case one of the parties has been examined and the other excluded; but in the prosecution for perjury their positions are reversed. Or the case is quite possible of a civil suit, in which the grounds of action or defence involve a criminal charge, such as forgery, in which both the alleged forger and his accuser may be examined. This may be followed by the prosecution of the one party for forgery, in which the other alone is admissible. The jury may find him not guilty, and the third scene may be enacted of perjury against the witness on the former criminal trial, in which he is excluded in his turn, and his indefatigable and exasperated adversary has the field to himself. This state of things would have occurred in the recent Tichborne trial if the Claimant had been acquitted and had prosecuted Lady Doughty for perjury. In the civil trial both of them gave evidence at full length. In the one criminal trial, only the one, and in the other only the other could have been examined at all.”

Serjeant Pulling, also a high authority, in another paper enforced a similar view of the subject. So long ago as 1860 Mr. John Pitt Taylor, a gentleman well known and respected in the legal profession, laid down the proposition:

“(1.) That in all judicial investigations the object to be attained is the discovery of the truth, and no species of evidence ought to be excluded which can materially aid in that discovery; (2) the rules of evidence ought, so far as is practicable, to be the same in civil and in criminal proceedings.”

Mr. Taylor afterwards proceeded in a very sustained argument to advocate the admission of prisoners as witnesses in their own behalf. Right Hon. Joseph Napier, a most distinguished Irish lawyer, addressing the Social Science Association, in 1861, referring to this subject, said:

“There are cases in which no one but the accused could expose the falsity of the accusation, and there are cases also in which the accusation would not have been made, perhaps not even contemplated, but for the very rule which may screen it from exposure. The accusation indeed should always be sustained by independent evidence, but for this very reason it should be open to the accused to meet such evidence by his account of what he alone may be able to testify; and, moreover, as whatever the accused may state would naturally be received with jealous suspicion, he should be allowed to submit his testimony to cross-examination, that its value may be tested.”

The Right Hon. Russell Gurney, in the speech to which he had already referred, alluded to the experience he had acquired during two years residence in the United States. His statement on the authority of Chief Justice Appleton of Maine, and the Attorney of the United States District Court of New York, was that it would be considered the ends of justice could not be served by anything short of the admission of the accused to give evidence. But we had some experience in our own country to guide us to a right conclusion in this matter. He remembered the hon. and learned gentleman, the late member for Cardwell, speaking a year ago of his experience with reference to the measure to enable plaintiffs and defendants to give evidence in civil suits. Mr. Cameron remarked that a Bill which he introduced in the first instance was, shortly after it had been passed, repealed, but after the lapse of a few years was again introduced and became law, and its operation since that time had given universal satisfaction. He did not mean to assert that there were not cases in which perjury was committed, for perjury had been too often committed under all systems, but on the whole, the ends of justice had been better served by admitting the plaintiff and defendant to give evidence, although until a very recent period a strong prejudice adverse to the practice had existed. There were also many cases of persons charged with serious offences, which, if not technically criminal, were attended, on conviction, with severe penalties, who were admitted to give evidence on their own behalf, such as prosecutions under the local liquor laws, revenue prosecutions, and election trials; and some hon. members in the House owed their seats and their escape from being disqualified to the fact that they were allowed to enter the witness box, and, by a frank, straightforward and faithful statement, explain the circumstances which appeared to press most hardly against them. Before Parliamentary Committees of enquiry, and Royal Commissions, as well as in the cases he had mentioned, the penalty attached to a decision adverse to the persons charged was of a character quite as serious to them as was the punishment of imprisonment to a great many who were brought before the Criminal Courts; and, if men under those circumstances could be relied upon to tell the truth, and were not likely to commit perjury, he did not think it should be assumed too hastily that members of other classes, who were charged with offences that were in law held to be criminal, would be more likely to yield to the temptation to commit perjury. There were numerous cases in which, even supposing that the amendment to the law were not made as complete as he had ventured to suggest, it might be possible that the experiment might be advantageously tried; such for example as prosecutions for fraud, false pretences, embezzlement and all cases involving questions of account. He remembered the late member for Cardwell, while he disapproved of the proposed amendment of the law and expressed the opinion that the time had not come for its adoption, pointing out that the change proposed might be approached gradually by some such partial amendments as he (Mr. Dymond) had just referred to. The only other point to which he would allude related to an expression which fell from him a year ago, which had been commented upon at the time by some of his legal friends in the House and which appeared to have excited, if not irritation, at all events a little concern in their minds. That was, that he thought the adoption of the system would be conducive to a higher tone of morality in criminal proceedings. There was no member of the House, lawyer or layman, who had a higher opinion of the character of the bar than he entertained, and he would be grieved if anything he had said implied that members of the legal profession did not occupy in that respect not only a respectable but a most exalted position. By admitting persons charged with crime to give evidence, all temptation on the part of those entrusted with their defence to set up theories which might not be founded upon truth was removed. He thought that in many instances counsel would feel themselves constrained to adopt a different style of defence if they knew that they would rest the foundation of their defence upon the testimony of the person accused. He was aware that in Canada legal gentlemen did not usually follow what was called criminal law practice exclusively; it came to them in common with other branches of their profession and probably they did not enter so completely into the spirit of that business as those in Great Britain who devoted themselves almost exclusively to it. But he ventured to assert, from a pretty long observation in years past of criminal procedure in the mother country, that the system of defence adopted did not exercise an elevating influence upon the minds of counsel. It was in that sense, and in that only, that he ventured to make the remark which he did on a former occasion. He believed, in conclusion, that the proposition he had the honour to submit to the House would, if adopted, conduce to an improvement in the administration of justice and be more fair to those persons who unfortunately stood in the position of being charged with crimes against the law.

MR. DYMOND.

Mr. CAMERON said he did not think the hon. member for North York need have apologised as a layman for introducing this important subject to the House. The hon. gentleman had shown an amount of research and careful consideration of the subject which no lawyer could have exceeded. At the same time, it was not to be expected that the hon. member, or any other layman, could have that practical experience of the working of alterations of the law, such as proposed, which those engaged continually in practice in the Courts necessarily acquired. The hon. gentleman had quoted some authorities in favour of the proposed alteration. Mr. Russell Gurney, however, was the only one out of eight or ten distinguished lawyers who spoke on Mr. Ashley's Bill in the English House of Commons, who favoured the principle of the measure. The Attorney-General opposed it with great vehemence, as did also Sergeant Simon, Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen, and others. This was sufficient to show that the general current of legal opinion, at any rate in 1874, when the Bill was introduced, was strongly and overwhelmingly against the proposed alteration in the law; indeed, so strong was the opinion in the House, that Mr. Ashley withdrew the Bill. After this discussion had proceeded for a short time, the hon. member for North York would find that the same state of things existed here. When we began to make any alteration in the law, it should first be considered whether an evil existed of a character which required redress. The practical experience of Judges and counsel certainly did not lead to the conclusion that any such evil existed which required the proposed amendment. In the words of one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke in the debate in the English House, "he never knew a case where innocence had suffered, or justice had been defeated for the want of this proposed alteration of the law." He thought the legal gentlemen of the House, who had had much experience in criminal trials, would probably echo these words. For himself, he could certainly endorse them, as in his own experience he had never seen a case in which, through the absence of a rule allowing the accused to testify in his own behalf, an innocent man had been found guilty, or a guilty man acquitted. There were two points to be considered, whether the alteration of the law was required for the purpose of acquitting the innocent, or of convicting the guilty, or for both purposes. In regard to convicting the guilty, a very strong argument used against the amendment was that it was striking at one of the fundamental principles of the English law, that a man should be presumed innocent until proved guilty. If the measure was adopted, it would have the effect of shifting the presumption—the accused would have to prove himself innocent before he was proved to be guilty. But it was claimed that this was only a permissive act, and that a prisoner could not be compelled to give evidence. What would be the practical effect of that? Every jury would convict and every Judge agree with the conviction, if a man, who had the right to testify in his own behalf, did not avail himself of the privilege. During the debate in the English House, it was suggested that that difficulty might be obviated by inserting a clause providing that neither Judge nor counsel should call attention in any way to the fact that the accused had not tendered his evidence. Such a provision would amount to nothing. The jury would know that the man could become a witness if he chose and could have pledged the value of his oath, whatever it might amount to, and the conclusion would be formed that, if he did not say on his oath he was innocent, he was guilty. Another objection was that the Bill would introduce a temptation to commit what was termed the heinous crime of perjury—in many cases a much more serious crime, or in no case could it be a less serious moral crime, than any crime of which the prisoner accused could be charged. There would be a great temptation to a man to go into the witness box and swear he was innocent even if he were guilty. Then he much questioned whether the Bill would have the effect of protecting the innocent. They should bear in mind that, when once the accused had tendered his evidence, he would necessarily be subjected to a rigid cross-examination by the counsel for the Crown, and it was just likely that an innocent man under such an ordeal, conducted by an acute and experienced lawyer, would become confused—especially if he were a man of simple character—and so create the impression that he was guilty. In this way, therefore, the protection to the innocent would not be so great as it would be to a guilty person who possessed the bold effrontery and hardened conscience that would enable him to stand unmoved through a severe cross-examination. But the strongest argument that could be used against the Bill was that there was no general feeling that such an alteration of the law was necessary. In the absence of such a sentiment it would be better to leave well alone. There was also another objection to the Bill. It would tend to produce unseemly controversies at times between the Judge and the accused, because, if cross-examination were allowed, on many occasions it would become the duty of the Judge to flatly contradict the accused and to engage in discussions of a character to which we had not been accustomed. The Bill would also be introducing the inquisitorial German and French system, whereby the accused was often coerced into a confession of guilt; perhaps he might not be guilty of the offence, but would be actually driven into the confession. Under the German system, the accused was examined privately by the Judge and obliged to give an account of every event of his life, which was scarcely fair or just to the prisoner. As one member of the English House of Commons had said, to adopt the measure would be returning to the practice of the dark ages in England. The difference between the Bill of the hon. member for North York and that of Mr. Ashley was that the latter admitted a clause providing that wives and husbands could respectively give evidence for themselves. The propriety of making that change was discussed by a member of the English House who was opposed to the general principle of Mr. Ashley's Bill.

Mr. CAMERON.

The hon. member for North York seemed to think that step should not be taken, but there could be no question that, if any change in this direction were desirable, the privilege should be extended to wives and husbands. He would suggest to his hon. friend that there was no great feeling in favour of the Bill, or that, at any rate, the time was not ripe for such alteration of the law, as experience did not teach that any great hardship resulted from the existing law.

Mr. BROOKS said he had listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. member for North York as well as those of the hon. gentleman who had just spoken. The former need hardly have apologised for bringing the matter forward, as the research and study he had bestowed upon it had eminently qualified him, as a layman, for the investigation and discussion of the measure. It had been properly said that the proposed change was more of an abstract than a practical question. In our criminal practice there had not been shown any necessity for the measure; no case in Canada had been cited in which an innocent man had been punished or a guilty man acquitted owing to the absence of any such provision in the law. There was now a Bill in the English House of Commons similar to the one introduced a few years ago, the provisions of which were much more extensive than that introduced by the hon. member for North York. The former not only extended the privilege to persons charged with felony and misdemeanour, but allowed wives and husbands to testify and also gave the same right to parties jointly charged with such crimes. When two or more parties were accused, they could be examined in behalf of each other, and no comment was allowed by counsel on the fact that a man had not availed himself of the right to give evidence. He fully agreed with what had been said about the practical result being that a prisoner charged with a crime would have his silence taken as presumptive evidence against him. Not only that, but the prisoner would be placed in a terrible temptation, of an almost irresistible nature, to commit perjury. One of the provisions of the Bill was to the effect that the prisoner so committing perjury laid himself open to punishment. The law then placed the prisoner under a terrible temptation to commit perjury, and indeed almost drove him to commit perjury, and then punished him for doing what he could hardly help under the circumstances. There was no pressing necessity for the Bill, and, as we had introduced the English Criminal Law into Canada, it would be much better to wait until the experiment was tried in England. At present the English Government were discussing the matter, and perhaps the amendment would be introduced. If so, Canada could see how it worked, and if it were satisfactory it could be also introduced here. He was glad that the subject had been brought up for discussion, as it was one that ought to be brought under the consideration of the public and the profession.

Mr. DEVEBER said he failed to see anything in the arguments used by the professional men against the passage of the Bill. He hoped the principle of the Bill would be conceded.

Mr. GUTHRIE said he was inclined to think that the day had come when the change should be adopted. At first, the proposal to allow defendants in civil suits to give evidence had met with much opposition, but after several attempts the law was passed. It had been successful in elucidating the truth, and in criminal cases it would not tend to perjury any more than in civil cases. There was a universal opinion that the change was beneficial. In many cases, as in those of assaults of more or less aggravated character, the prosecutor was influenced by malicious motives, and, being able to give evidence, placed the accused in a position of very great disadvantage. However, he would prefer to adopt the course proposed by the member for North Victoria, and defer further consideration of the matter until we had the advantage of legislation on the same subject by the Imperial Parliament. He gave the member for North York credit for having introduced this motion, and for the able manner in which it had been set forth.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he had been at first prejudiced against the Bill, but he now thought that its passage was advisable. He would refer to a circumstance which had occurred some time ago at Aylmer. Four persons were arrested for assault, when, as afterwards proved, only two were really guilty. There was only one witness of the affair, and on his evidence the Grand Jury returned a true bill against the four. They severed in their defence, however, and the two who were innocent were acquitted. If the four had been tried without severance in defence, they would probably have been all convicted. The great objection advanced against the Bill was that such a law would provide a great incentive to perjury, and this was certainly a very strong argument. But from a moral point of view, the prisoner, who pleaded not guilty when he was guilty, was equally guilty of perjury. It was true that such a law would be an innovation in the criminal law of this country, but this would not be the case as far as the civil law was concerned; and it was universally admitted that the practice of allowing a defendant to give evidence in civil cases had proved very beneficial. On the assumption that the refusal of a prisoner to avail himself of such a privilege would be considered, as it were, prima facie evidence of guilt, he was not inclined to place much dependence; because such testimony would not be received until the defence was concluded, and if the Crown had not succeeded in establishing the charge brought, there would be no necessity for a prisoner to enter the witness box. In any event, the prisoner could not be placed in a worse position than he at present occupied. Besides, if a prisoner declined to give evidence in his own behalf, this fact ought not to militate against him, as the jury was sworn to base their verdict on the evidence submitted; and, if they formed an opinion unfavourable to the accused, merely because he did not give evidence, they would disregard the solemnity of their oath.

Mr. DESJARDINS said he did not think the proposed change would be beneficial, especially as it would prove a great incentive to perjury. A prisoner might also have peculiar reasons for not wishing to give evidence, and his silence would be construed into an admission of guilt.

Mr. KERR said he did not rise to express his views upon the question at any length, but rather to state that he was in sympathy very largely with the views of hon. members who had spoken against the proposition before the House. But, while he made that statement, he did not think he would be just to the hon. member who had brought the question before the House did he fail to express his high appreciation of the very full and able manner in which he had submitted that proposition. It was another lesson to him, as he believed it would be to other members, that on no question, however strongly their minds might be prejudiced in favour of a certain view, should they too fully make up their minds until they had heard all that could be said on both sides. He admired the pluck of the hon. member for North York who, had dared to rise and express views on that important subject with which a large portion of the House might not be in sympathy, and it was perhaps well that it fell to the lot of the hon. member to bring the subject before the House. But while he made that declaration, he was not in favour of the measure which was proposed for their consideration. He shrank from the very thought of too frequently interfering with our laws, more especially with the criminal laws of the country. They were a rich inheritance from the mother country, and it appeared to him that it would be prudent on the part of the Canadian Parliament to follow in the tracks made by the mother country leading the way. The present Bill appeared to be brought forward in the interest of the accused. So far as his experience and observation went, he did not think that practically it would be favourable to that interest, but would prove rather to the detriment than to the advantage of the accused. He was confident that, in nine cases out of every ten, there would either be perjury committed, or, in the event of the accused not coming forward and giving evidence, the impression would be created that he was guilty of the crime with which he was charged. Although previous speakers had expressed their convictions that the law, as it at present stood in regard to civil cases, making the parties to an action or suit competent witnesses in his or her own behalf, had worked satisfactorily, there was no doubt of this unfortunate fact that one of the evils resulting from the law had had been the multiplication of cases of perjury. It was by no means a practice upon which all were united, but it was rather one upon which there was great room for difference of opinion, and on which great difference of opinion existed at the present time. But, if there was temptation for a man to commit perjury in civil suits where there was nothing beyond property involved, how much greater would be the temptation when both character and liberty might be involved. The time had not come when the House should adopt such legislation as was proposed. He was aware that the theories and speculations of to-day, in this age particularly, became the results of to-morrow; but in a matter of that importance Parliament should hasten slowly, and await the fuller discussion which would be given to the question in the Imperial House of Commons, and, as it should finally be decided there, so might this House decide in like manner. He, therefore, submitted that the question with many others of a similar character should be handed over to the serious and careful consideration of the hon. the Minister of Justice, who must of necessity be held responsible in an especial manner for the criminal laws of the Dominion.

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be desirable that on such an important question the House should learn the views of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BLAKE said he was obliged to state to his hon. friend the member for North York (Mr. Dymond), who had introduced the measure, that he was not in a position to recommend to the House the second reading of the Bill at this time. He thought the discussion of that evening would have convinced his hon. friend that the measure was not ripe, even in the opinion of those who thought it would be in a reform, to be placed on the Statute-book. It was no doubt a very important question. The object they had in view in providing for the trial of issues, whether they involved questions of property or questions of personal liberty, was neither to provide for the escape nor for the conviction of either party, but to provide for the ascertainment of the truth by endeavouring to get at the bottom of the facts which were in controversy between the parties. For many years it was insisted that the temptations to commit perjury were so great that it would be wrong on two grounds to permit persons being parties to the case to give evidence: first, on the ground that they ought not to be exposed to the temptation to commit perjury, which would be inevitable; and second, because they would commit perjury so constantly that the investigation of the truth would be rather retarded than advanced by their being called as witnesses. As the hon. member for North York had stated, the earliest attempt to introduce the system into Canada had an ignominious ending. The Bill became law one Session, and, if he rightly remembered, it was repealed the very next Session; at all events it certainly did not live through two Sessions, and that was in consequence of the very strong opposition given to it by many of the Judges, their views preconceived and, as they believed, supported by the short experience of the operation of the law being that it would not conduce to the administration of justice in most cases. After an interval of many years in Ontario that same measure became law. Although the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Kerr) had declared there was a vast difference of opinion as to the working of the law, and he (Mr. Blake) admitted there was some difference of opinion regarding it, he did not esteem that difference as general as did the hon. member. His view was that the opinion in favour of the law enormously preponderated over the adverse opinion. His own conviction, drawn from a tolerably wide experience of the application of the law, was that it had been found exceedingly useful in attaining the object of all trials, namely, arriving at the truth. There were cases, however, occurring every day in civil matters, in which the interests in regard to property and still stronger the excitement occasioned by hostile feelings, particularly in suits between relatives, were so great that the temptations to commit perjury were very great, but, notwithstanding that fact, the operation of the law had been as he had stated. With respect to criminal cases, it was quite true that certain circumstances arose which did not arise, or did not arise in the same proportion, in civil cases. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) had stated one class of cases, fortunately the rarest class, in which there would be no peril to the criminal in committing perjury. It was true that, in cases in which punishment was capital, the terrors of human law were not sufficient to deter the criminal, who was standing on trial for his life or a term of imprisonment for life, from committing perjury. But it would be a mistake to argue that he should form a new law solely with regard to a class of cases which was happily very rare in Canada. Thousands of persons were tried for crime during each year and only, on an average, ten of those were for the crime of perjury. An objection which applied solely to that particular class of crime was not one which could be properly urged as applicable to the whole range of judicial investigation into criminal matters. The question whether the proposed law would bear more in favour of than against the prisoner, was one in which there might be much investigation. His own impression was that in practical operation there would be, as a rule, an unfavourable impression created with regard to prisoners who did not submit themselves to examinations. It was a result regarding which they need scarcely stop to reason, but it was a result which had been found from experience in civil cases. If such were the case, it followed that, as a rule, prisoners would be obliged to give evidence. The question then arose as to whether the law would prove injurious in cases in which the accused was innocent. In the majority of cases it would not be to his injury, but to his advantage. He could conceive of some cases—they had occurred in his own experience in civil suits—in which an innocent man, owing to his nervous habit, great excitement at the time, or unhappy mode of giving testimony, was placed rather at a disadvantage than otherwise; but those cases were so very few that, upon the whole, the innocent party who was telling the truth would be in a better position by having an opportunity of giving evidence. In criminal cases, however, under the present law, following the practice obtaining in England, the jury, as a general rule, presumed that the prisoner was innocent, which circumstance was not unfrequently skilfully used by his counsel, who suggested to the jury what might have been said if the prisoner had been allowed to give evidence as a witness, and that presumption, which was sometimes strained, was, in his opinion, quite as great a security, though not as legitimate an one, as the possibility of giving his evidence. He thought the general impression of those conversant with criminal trials was that there were very few cases indeed in which innocent persons were convicted, and such cases were so rare that they could hardly be taken into account. His belief was that the cases in which guilty persons escaped preponderated very much over those in which innocent persons were convicted, and, believing as he did, that the fear of cross-examination was such that the story of the prisoner, if untrue, would be demonstrated to be so, he thought that this law could not be calculated to be in favour of the escape of the guilty, though he thought the existing securities for the innocent were as powerful as, and perhaps more powerful, than the protection obtained by the prisoner telling his own story. Upon the whole, he believed that the main difficulty in the question was to be found in the question of perjury, in the very great temptation which already existed in civil cases, and still more in criminal cases, not to tell the truth. He was satisfied that there was one class of cases in which the accused might be allowed to give evidence, namely, that of assaults between parties to which there were no witnesses. All those considerations left the question in an exceedingly perplexing condition, and his view was that public opinion was not ripe for the introduction of such a system as that proposed. If there was a practical defect in the criminal law, it was rather that the guilty escaped than that the innocent were convicted. That being the state of affairs, he thought Parliament could wait for some time to come—although he did not say that it should wait for an Act to be passed in Great Britain in order to produce a more logical state of things in the Statute-book, and in order to produce more efficient means of convicting the guilty—before the country tried the measure to which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) proposed to commit the House. He would therefore second the view expressed that the order should be discharged.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. DYMOND said the arguments of hon. members were more favourable to going beyond his proposal than to stopping short of it, and to advocate the examination of wives and husbands of accused persons. He moved that the order be discharged.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at Thirty minutes after Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 9th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

COAL OWNERS' PETITION COMMITTEE.

NAME ADDED.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) moved that the name of the hon. member for Hants be added to the Committee appointed with reference to the Coal Owners' petition.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN RAILWAY ENQUIRY.

COMMITTEE SELECTED.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

"That the House do now name the Committee ordered on the 5th March last to enquire into the matters connected with the Northern Railway and Northern Extension Railway."

Motion agreed to.

Vote taken and the following Committee selected:—Messrs. Guthrie, Archibald, Bertram, DeVeber, Casgrain, Killam, McCarthy, Palmer, and Bowell.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

"That it is desirable that any witnesses which are to be examined by the Committee appointed to enquire into the allegations contained in the report and evidence made and obtained by the Commission of Enquiry into the affairs of the Northern Railway Company should be examined under oath."

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSALS FROM OFFICE.

EXPLANATIONS AND REMARKS.

Mr. VAIL: I desire to say a few words with reference to a personal matter, for which, under the circumstances, I hope the House will pardon me. It will be remembered that a few days ago a debate took place in this House on the question of the dismissal from office of certain men in the county of Victoria. Reference was then made to a letter written by myself to the member for Victoria, and that letter was produced and read in the House. It was marked "private and confidential," but nevertheless I expressed my willingness to have it read here. I find in a paper printed in Toronto—which I understand to be the organ of the Opposition—reference made to this letter, and there is printed what purports to be a perfect copy of it as to both wording and spelling. I have nothing further to say with regard to this matter than this: I do not accuse or charge the hon. member for Victoria of having had any part whatever in this transaction for which other persons are responsible, and I desire, as I think is but fair, that this letter should be laid on the table in order that hon. members may have the opportunity of examining it for themselves and of seeing whether it corresponds with the printed letter.

Mr. TUPPER: I am equally reluctant to take up the time of the House with a personal matter, but I am quite certain that the House will give me the same opportunity that has been extended to the Minister of Militia. On the occasion of the debate referred to, the Minister of Customs stated that the dismissals to which reference was made were made on the report of the Inspector, and the Minister of Militia stated, in his place, that the hon. member for Cumberland ought not to complain as the dismissals were made on the report of an Inspector appointed by himself. I have now in my hand a copy of the papers brought down under order of the House by the Minister of Customs, and these papers disclose the fact that no report was received from any Inspector, and that the only report upon which the Government took action were letters from the two candidates against whom these men had voted at the elections, Mr. Ross, the Collector of Customs at Halifax, and Mr. Tremain, a late member of this House.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John): As this matter has been brought up, I have only to say that, when I made that statement, I said "letters or a report."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: But from the Inspector.

Mr. BURPEE: I called the attention of the House to the fact I have mentioned the same day, and when the hon. member for Kingston made a speech on another occasion, I again repeated it. I then said that I was not prepared to say precisely whether it was done on letters or a report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman stated that it was done on letters or correspondence received from the Inspector.

Mr. BLAKE: I understood the Minister of Customs to say what he says he did state, and not what the hon. member for Kingston says he stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The following is from the Hansard report:—

"Whatever action was taken in the matter was on the recommendation of the Inspector * * * Mr. Campbell's dismissal was recommended by the Inspector and consented to by the gentleman himself, who considered that his services at his business were worth a great deal more to him than his salary as an official of the country."

My hon. friend did state this, and he had no right to shelter himself behind the Inspector.

Mr. BURPEE: I distinctly said what I have stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no doubt that you said it was done on the report or letter of the Inspector.

Mr. BURPEE: I called the attention of the hon. member for Kingston to the matter at the time, and I referred to it the following day. I made the statement I have mentioned in the most distinct manner in my place in the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Minister of Militia is reported in the Hansard to have said:—

"My hon. friend has referred to another matter in connection with the dismissal of Customs officials in the county of Victoria. This I know nothing about; but I think he is the last member in this House who should condemn it, after the Minister of Customs had stated that, to the best of his recollection, they were removed on the report of Mr. Kerr, who, it is well known, was appointed by the hon. gentleman himself."

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton): I have a distinct recollection of the matter brought up—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McDONALD: I am not at all surprised—

Mr. SPEAKER: A question of order has been raised. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. MITCHELL: I move the adjournment of the House, in order that the hon. gentleman may make his statement.

Mr. McDONALD: I have a distinct recollection of what took place when the hon. member for Victoria brought this matter up. The Minister of Customs then distinctly stated that the dismissals were made on the recommendation of the Inspector of Customs for the Province of Nova Scotia, but that he had not had sufficient time to read the report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD; Exactly.

Mr. McDONALD: That was distinctly stated; but, when the question came up the second time, the Minister of Customs qualified that statement.

Mr. BLAKE: I understand it to be the rule of the House that the statement of any hon. member as to what he may have said during a debate is to be accepted as conclusive. I do not understand that this is susceptible of contradiction at the hands of any other hon. gentleman, and still less certainly is it susceptible of contradiction at the hands of reporters, whether official or unofficial, for which no member will allow himself to be held responsible. I took occasion during the debate on the Hansard to say that, for my part, I would not be held responsible for what the reporters at that table may make me say, any more than I would hold myself responsible for what the reporters in the gallery might make me say, and I am sure I would be very sorry to be held responsible for that.

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. the Minister of Customs stated that the dismissal took place either on a letter or a report received by him from the Inspector. The hon. gentleman had failed to bring down those letters as part of the documents which had been laid before the House.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John): That is another matter.

Mr. BOWELL said he was quite aware of that fact. The understanding of the statement of the hon. the Minister of Customs on this side of the House was distinctly that given utterance to by the hon. member for Cumberland. In almost every return he had moved for himself he had scarcely ever received the information asked for.

Mr. MASSON said he could add another instance as to the incompleteness of the returns. He referred to that relating to the Jesuits' Barracks. He did not blame the hon. the Premier for this, as he did not think he (Mr. Mackenzie) intended to deceive the House; but the House was deceived nevertheless.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The House was not deceived.

Mr. MASSON said when he first brought up the question he was met by the declaration of the hon. the Minister of Public Works that the transfer of the barracks could not be made because there were technical difficulties in the way. The return subsequently brought down showed that, immediately after the Session was over, the barracks was transferred without any further correspondence with the Local Government. He again brought the matter up, and it was promised that the correspondence should be laid before the House. When it did come down, a letter of the 5th April was wanting. When he brought this to the notice of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, he said there might have been a mistake, and that it existed in some other correspondence. However, when that correspondence came down, the letter of the 5th April was still wanting. He would say openly and frankly that he did not think the hon. the First Minister wanted to deceive the House, but he really believed that the hon. gentleman had been deceived by somebody.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am very much obliged for the repeated attempts of the hon. gentleman to cast evil imputations on my statements, but I throw back the imputation with the utmost scorn with which it is capable of being thrown back. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that I do not care what his opinion is, and I tell him further that I made no statement at the expense of any party. The statements I made in reference to the matter I believed to be correct. The hon. gentleman and those around him endeavour systematically and continually to give the worst possible interpretation to anything said on this side of the House.

Mr. MASSON: Was there any correspondence going on?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not intend to be catechised by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL said his object in making the motion was simply to give a young member of the House who was sat upon whenever opportunity offered the chance to make a personal explanation. It was better to exercise a little forbearance in such matters, and not compel hon. members to make a formal motion. The hon. the Premier had said the Opposition deliberately misrepresented him. He (Mr. Mitchell) had never done so. As an independent member, he had always considered the motives and dealt with the measures of the hon. gentleman in a fair, honourable and straightforward manner; and he hoped the hon. gentleman would reconsider that statement. He had no disposition to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, nor had he had any experience of its being done.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT called attention to the fact that the hon. member for Victoria (N.S.) was now in his place, and that the hon. the Minister of Militia had moved that the letter should be laid on the table of the House.

Mr. BOWELL asked if it would not have been as well for the hon. the Minister of Militia to have stated the fact that the letter first appeared in a Halifax paper. He was not apologising for any paper, but the evident intention of the hon. gentleman was to cast the whole odium of the publication of the letter on a Toronto paper. The hon. gentleman knew well that it first appeared in a Halifax paper and had been copied by the Toronto paper.

Mr. VAIL said the Halifax paper had systematically abused him for several years, but, when such a thing appeared in a paper like the Mail, he felt compelled to bring the matter before the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL said, when he asked leave of the hon. the Minister of Militia to refer to a certain paragraph in the letter, he only read as little as he possibly could for the purpose of substantiating the statements he had made. He was not willing to make use of the rest of it until occasion required it. If he had read it incorrectly, the hon. the Minister of Militia should have taken him to task for it at the time. He did not think he was now in a position to bring that letter forward and expose the rest of what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. BLAKE said he was sure that, on a moment's consideration, the hon. member for Victoria would recall that statement. It was impossible that the letter could have got into the hands of reporters connected with the press, save by its having feloniously abstracted from its place of keeping, which he did not believe possible; or by the hon. member having given it to some one who had betrayed the trust, or by his having given it to the reporters to publish. The hon. gentleman was at any rate responsible for its publication; he had allowed a forged impression of it to be circulated through the length and breadth of the land for the purpose of disgracing a public man. On reflection the hon. gentleman would be disposed to produce the letter for inspection, but, if he did not, the House would no doubt declare it was his duty to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he had read a portion of the hon. the Minister of Militia's letter, and, if he had misrepresented anything in it, it would appear in the Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, if the reporters took the spelling down, he did not know what they would do for the hon. gentleman's pronouncement.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he would say candidly that the spelling of the published letter was not according to the original.

Mr. BLAKE: Then I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the spelling in the newspaper is not the same as in the letter?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes; it is not exactly the same.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

ROCKWOOD ASYLUM TRANSFER BILL.—[BILL No. 40.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (No. 40) Respecting the transfer of Rockwood Asylum to the Province of Ontario, and to amend the Penitentiary Act of 1875, read the second time and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 64.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright for the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Wood in amendment to the proposed amendment, read.

Mr. BLAIN said he did not think he would be able to consider the question as fully as he intended when he moved the adjournment of the debate; but he would lay before the House the reasons for giving the vote which he intended to give. He did not suppose it was a secret to the House that he had always advocated protection. He was a consistent advocate of protection long before he had the honour of having a seat in the House, and his convictions were so sincere upon that subject that he confessed it made him full of indignation when the question was not dealt with as he thought it ought to be. He would point to the two amendments to show wherein he differed from them; but, before doing so, he thought it desirable that some of the questions that had been raised during the debate should be reviewed. The first was the great bug-bear called free trade—a thing that had a name, but had not an existence. There was no country under Heaven where there was free trade. There was no country of which he had any knowledge—except those so sunk in barbarism that they had nothing to trade—but what adopted the principle of collecting, at any rate, the expenses of the Government from the Customs. It was unfortunate that hon. members read visionary and dreamy works on the subject and took them as authorities, the same as some people took romances as facts. The members of the House ought to be practical men, and deal with the great national interests from a practical standpoint; and they ought not to be misled by the dreams of men who endeavoured to put upon paper a system which never had been in force. It struck him that, when hon. members talked of putting these systems into operation, it was like a shoemaker who made the foot fit the shoe. The policy of “let alone” was a most pernicious one, applied to such a country as Canada, where we had a hard struggle with other countries, where we had such a wide territory, such long distances, and where we were in many other ways so unevenly matched against the nations of the earth. The doctrine was as old as the hills. It was a doctrine which was preached by the slaves that sat by the flesh-pots of Egypt over 3,000 years ago; in Christ’s time it was the doctrine of the devils; and in Louis XIV’s time it was the doctrine of legalized plunderers. He did not know, in the history of that energetic and heroic people, the French, any period, not even that following the battle of Waterloo, in which the national forces were so exhausted as during the reign of Louis XIV. The men who were legalized in order to plunder, when asked what could be done for them, said: “Nothing; let us alone.” There was not a robber or thief in this country but preached the same doctrine. This pernicious doctrine had driven the peasants in the land of his forefathers from their homes and had scattered them to the four winds of heaven, and had left their habitations a desolate and solitary abode for “his lordship’s” deer. Seeing that he entertained that view with reference to the great doctrine of letting everything alone, he had no hesitation in saying that his opinions were still firmly settled upon the necessity of adopting a policy that would afford some protection to the industry of this country. When he came to look at the position in which the two great parties in this country were placed as regarded this question, he found that it was the doctrine of the present Administration, and also of the Opposition, not that we should have free trade, for that did not exist, not that we should have protection, for that had not been claimed by the right hon. the mover of the amendment, but that we should have a tariff for revenue purposes. One could see that, under that principle of raising our revenue, the first consideration was the question of revenue, and the second consideration the question of protecting our industries. It did not necessarily follow that the industries of the country must be considered in connection with the tariff. The hon. the leader of the Government talked free trade and put on additional duties; the right hon. member for Kingston talked protection, and, when he had the power, he reduced the duties. He noticed that the right hon. member laughed. But he (Mr. Blain) was a member of a deputation which waited upon the right hon. gentleman to urge against the reduction of the duty on manufactured tobacco. There were at that time seven tobacco factories in Toronto, and it was pointed out that, if the duty were taken off, there would not be a factory existing in Toronto in six months. And so it turned out. The right hon. gentleman refused to accede to the representations of the deputation, and in six months there was only one tobacco manufactory in Toronto, and that was for the manufacture of black tobacco for the back-woodsmen; and hundreds of people were thrown out of employment, many of whom left the country and went to the United States. The right hon. gentleman still declared that he was a Free-trader—he even did this in the speech in which he introduced his amendment. He (Mr. Blain) had come to the conclusion that it was not a question of protection or free trade with the right hon. gentleman, but of so agitating the public mind that he would again be enabled to occupy the Treasury benches. If the views of the hon. member for Hamilton

(Mr. Wood) were not thorough and honest on the subject, there might be a doubt expressed also respecting his amendment, as it had only a partial appearance. The first part of the right hon. gentleman's resolution asked the House to express regret at the financial policy submitted by the Government increasing the burden of taxation on the people without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries. There was this to say about that matter: While he (Mr. Blain) did not agree with the manner in which the revenue was raised, yet, with that exception, there could be no hesitation in saying that the finances of this country had been ably managed. He was not prepared to vote for the amendment, being coupled as it was with a censure upon the Government. The second part of the resolution said that the deficiency in the revenue should be met by a diminution of expenses, aided by such a re-distribution of the tariff as would benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion. These words "agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests" seemed to take men's ears. If his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works were to strike out of the supplies, from the capital account, $2,000,000, it would simply mean that the tariff should be re-distributed so that the duties should be lower. The right hon. member for Kingston had brought before the House a proposition which he wanted hon. members to think would meet the requirements of the country—that the tariff should be readjusted in order that the small deficiency would be made up. There was considerable force in what had been said that, at this time, when the industries of the country were depressed, it would be infinitely wiser that the enterprises of the country should not be deranged by a reorganization of the tariff, but that they should endeavour to surmount the difficulty in some other way, for it was conceded that it was temporary. The right hon. gentleman had tacked to a general censure of the Government this expression, which sounded well: "As will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Domininn." But there was no principle in the amendment. After the great speeches heard last summer all over the country, this was a most miserable attempt to impose on those who had honest convictions on that subject. It was matter for astonishment that, after the mountain had laboured, they should have such an amendment—an ill-conditioned mongrel instead of a thoroughbred; a thingill-shaped in every possible way,—that the right hon. gentleman should ask the House to accept it as the measure promised, and that he should send it out to the people and ask them to believe he was in earnest, or that anybody could be in earnest who submitted such a motion. It seemed quite clear that the right hon. gentleman intended to put a miserable proposition before the House. It was not fair to deal with the people and with Parliament in that manner, and such men as the hon. member for Hamilton and himself, who had honest convictions. Let the right hon. gentleman come forward with a resolution broadly and plainly declaring that the entire financial policy of the country should be based upon the broad principle of protection, and then they would believe in his honest convictions on that subject. He did not hesitate to say that, while he had always been a Protectionist, he could not vote for the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston; he must vote against it. The next question which fairly came up was that of protection itself. He had endeavored to show to the House that we had no free trade, that there was no such thing as free trade anywhere in the world; he knew he was correct in that view, and he challenged any one to controvert the statement. There was nowhere unrestricted free trade, nor was any nation in a position to enforce strictly free trade. He had shown that the policy of the Liberals and Conservatives had always been, and he believed was at the present time, that the revenue should be raised under a tariff. If such were the case, he could not conceive in what way there could be any material distinction in principle between the two parties. While there might be a cry raised by one party, and gentlemen might find that it strengthened their hands, there was no wide difference between the parties. There was, however, a very considerable number of hon. members who had honest convictions on this matter altogether outside of the question of tariff, who were anxious to adopt a system of legislation which would aid in promoting the interests of the country, laying down and affirming the principle, as far as it was possible to affirm it, that we should attend to our own people and industries, that we should endeavour to prevent this country from being kept in a chronic state of crisis by being troubled with the fluctuating condition of the markets of the world; that we should seek to keep the people within our own territory by manufacturing everything we could manufacture in this country for our own people, so that the producer and consumer might be placed side by side, so that everything required by our own people might be produced by them, whereby we would save the enormous cost of carrying our raw material to foreign markets and the freight of its return as manufactured goods. There was one extreme of free trade, the middle course of a revenue tariff, and the third course, that of protection which was outside of the tariff altogether, which must be taken into account when they considered the industries of the country and not the revenue, although the one might be somewhat connected with the other. They heard an everlasting shout about incidental protection. It was an incidental fraud, for there was no such thing; what was so called simply arose from the fact that the country had to raise a revenue under the tariff, and some branch of industry received an advantage from it. The tariff was not to be credited with that—it was a mere accident. What he and many others desired was that the country should go outside of the revenue and come fairly to the Protectionist view. Under these circumstances he felt it to be his duty to vote against both amendments, and he hoped every hon. member supporting the Government would not view the subject in any other way. If the question had arisen upon a wide Protectionist issue, he would have to consider, as would every other hon. member, whether, under ordinary circumstances, it would be their duty to vote in favour of it from principle, or whether they would fall back on the other consideration, whether it would be desirable that the present occupants of the Treasury benches should be defeated and driven from office. That, indeed, was involved in the present discussion. That amounting to a vote of want of confidence in the Government, the House had to consider the character of the members of the Administration and of the leaders of the Conservative party, and its constitution. That, however, was a very small part of the issues involved, and he was not prepared to say that, upon the miserable amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, he would disorganise the whole business of the country, and drive the present Government from power. It was an insult to the common sense of hon. members that the right hon. gentleman should place before them such an amendment, which it had taken a year to mature, and ask them to change the Administration by adopting it. He would take very good care not to be caught by such chaff. If the amendment had been so drawn as to raise the general question of protection, it would have been a grave issue, but, as it had been submitted, there was no gravity about it, and it was a very small matter. No doubt the Government would find that a feeling was arising among the people that outside of the tariff question they would have to deal with the wide principle of protection. While that question was not before them for consideration at present, he would express the desire that the financial affairs of the Dominion should be settled upon a wide principle of protection that would enable the country to husband its resources. He had thus explained the course he intended to follow and the reason therefor. There was no inconsistency between his present course and that he had always advocated; but while he was as strong an admirer of the principle of protection as ever, he would not vote in favour of either of the amendments before the House.

Mr. BLAIN.

Mr. BERTRAM said he proposed to notice some of the points dwelt upon by the hon. member for West York, who had spoken of the general principle of free trade as a great bugbear and declared there was no such thing as free trade in the world. He agreed with the hon. member that there was no such thing as absolute free trade. But the question in this country was not whether we were to have absolute free trade or absolute protection, but whether we were to have a policy of protection engrafted on a policy of modified free trade. The hon. member for West York, in the course of his remarks, had shown a considerable knowledge of a certain period of French history in the time of Louis XIV, and had spoken of the existence of the system of legalized plunder which existed in France. There was, however, a like period in English history, and when next the hon. member read history he should read that from Queen Elizabeth to Charles I. During that time a system of legalised robbery prevailed, and it was under the strongest kind of protection. The hon. member should also remember the kind of protection which existed in England not long ago, when salt was protected to such a great extent. The question the House was called upon to consider was whether the resolution submitted by the Finance Minister should be read the second time, by which the House could be called upon to further burden the people—because after all that was what it amounted to—by increasing the taxation. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in the course of his Budget speech, informed the House that the country would have a deficit, that the revenue would not equal the expenditure. That was information which every hon. member who had watched the affairs of the country and the course of trade must previously have been in possession of. There was no doubt that, in the history of nations, as in the history of individuals, the income of the nation had its vicissitudes as well as the income of individuals. At one period in our history we might have a time when the values of commodities were advancing, and when lands were rising in price. During such a period, which was spoken of as a period of inflation, there were increased imports which necessarily brought a large revenue. It was a matter of great concern and importance, when they found that the revenue did not equal the expenditure, as to what policy should be pursued in paying off the public indebtedness. The hon. the Minister of Finance had proposed a scheme for raising the necessary amount of money, and that scheme did not commend itself to the right hon. member for Kingston in that he had proposed an amendment. He would not call it a dishonest amendment, but it was an amendment for protection of a certain kind, but it was only very extenuated protection. The right hon. gentleman submitted his amendment in favour of a re-adjustment of the tariff so as to foster the agricultural, mining and manufacture interests. An important industry had been omitted by the right hon. gentleman—the lumber interest—and, if any means could be devised whereby that interest could be assisted or protected, such would be well worthy of the consideration of the House, for it was suffering more than almost any other industry.

Mr. BERTRAM.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was a manufacturing interest.

Mr. BERTRAM said that was true. but he should be glad to know by what tariff arrangement any assistance or protection could be given to it. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton had been characterized, he might almost say slandered, by the right hon. member for Kingston as being a selfish proposition, for it only asked for assistance to manufacturers. The only difference, however, between the amendments was that the constituency of one hon. member was larger than that of the other, the right hon. gentleman, as the leader of the Opposition party, from the exigencies of his position, being obliged to draw his amendment somewhat broader. Protection, considered as such, was the essence of selfishness. An interest could not be protected without selfishly considering that interest, and giving it something at the expense of somebody else. He was much gratified with the eulogium, passed by the hon. member for South Ontario, on the system which he characterised as one of incidental protection and modified free trade, under which the industries of the country had been built up. But that hon. member came to the lamest of all conclusions, by stating that he was a Protectionist because he was tired of the policy the Government had been pursuing—tired of the very policy he had advocated, with this difference, that the Government had increased the duties  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on general manufactured goods beyond that in force under the policy of which the hon. member had spoken. There were many expressions which had been common to the debate. The hon. member for Stanstead declared he desired to prevent the difficulties under which our manufacturers were labouring, and grant relief to struggling industries. Those were propositions which every hon. member would concur in and endeavour to carry out. The question was as to how it could be done—whether the tariff should be  $17\frac{1}{2}$ , 20,  $22\frac{1}{2}$  or 25 per cent., or whether the rate should be retained at  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. That hon. member had further said that manufacturers in this country entered into business at their own risk and peril. The only time in the history of Canada when such might be said was when, in 1866, the tariff on manufactured goods was reduced from 20 to 15 per cent. There was now no difficulty in any manufacturer entering business, knowing most assuredly that the list would at least not be very much reduced. The hon. member had spoken of the sentiment of protection in the United States, and had referred to it as the great Protectionist country, which had developed and flourished under protection, where protection was a vital question. In discussing the question of free trade and protection the hon. member for South Ontario seemed to think those were the only two factors which went up to make the wealth of a nation; that given protection in the one case, or given free trade in the other, the future of the country could be forecast. He (Mr. Bertram) entirely disagreed with that view. He thought that either free trade or protection were only factors, and it might be simple factors in determining a nation's future. It was important to consider what entered into the productions of a country—the life of a nation. First, there was the question of land, and the same conditions could not apply in America, where land was plentiful and cheap, as in England, where it was scarce and dear. The influence of climate had also much to do with the industry of the people and their wealth. The fact of having coal and iron lying in juxtaposition also had an important influence on a country's future. The natural products and geographical position of a country largely determined the industries which were established. Above all the natural causes was the character of the people, and in calculating the future of the United States the ingenuity must be taken into account. The American people were famed above all others for their goods, and for inventing labour-saving machines, and it was within his knowledge that samples of American manufactures had been taken to England, and, on manufacturers being asked if they could produce such goods, so closely was England bound by trades' unions that the manufacturers actually declared they would rather give up their business than attempt to make the kind of goods. All these matters were to be taken into consideration. In another matter, a very remarkable difference was apparent compared with statements made in the House last Session. Why did they not now hear from the advocates of protection doctrines a single word about the great slaughtering process, which had been going on for some time in this country? This was simply because that slaughtering process which, existed last year, existed no longer. While speaking of a question with which he was somewhat familiar, he had last Session taken occasion to state that one reason why iron was being brought into this country in lieu of being imported as it used to be from England was because the crisis had come on in the United States some two or two and a half years earlier than in England; and because, England having a larger market for her iron products, they did not immediately fall in price; and he ventured then to assert that, before another year was over, the price would be so reduced in England that the Americans would be entirely shut out of this market. He appealed to the hon.

member for Hamilton as to whether that prophecy—if prophecy it could be called—had not been verified to the very letter.

Mr. WOOD: No.

Mr. BERTRAM said that no iron of any consequence as to quantity now came into this country from the United States in comparison with what had been brought into it last year at this time. Protection would, without the slightest doubt, create monopolies. Gentlemen conversant with the state of trade in the United States must know very well that rings or monopolies were formed for the purpose, as they said, of regulating the price. This was proved by what had taken place in that country with regard to the coal interest; and, only last fall or last summer, had the price of this article given way, when the producers were competing amongst themselves. It was very plain that, if the United States would adopt the policy of imposing a small duty or no duty at all on coal, then the people residing on the eastern sea-board would be able to buy their coal from Nova Scotia, in place of paying, as they were now obliged to do, not only a fair profit on coal, but a further sum of money, which went into the pockets of the monopolists. This reminded him of the coal oil motion made last Session by the hon. member for Stanstead, to whose speech he had listened with great pleasure. The hon. gentleman had spoken of the coal oil combination as he would desire to characterize many American monopolies, as a system of organized extortion. He had gladly voted with the hon. gentleman at the time, though the Finance Minister had announced that he would bring the matter up this Session; but this was one of the things which protection must and would undoubtedly bring upon the country if they adopted the American protective policy. He had understood the hon. gentleman from Stanstead to state that we had had no deficit in this country from 1862 to 1873. He did not suppose that the hon. gentleman had had the honour of a seat in the House during that period, but he was certain that the hon. gentleman had not consulted the Public Accounts of Canada before he ventured to make such a statement. If the hon. gentleman had done so he would have found that from 1860—and he did not know how much further back—up to 1866, there had been continual deficits year after year; and that it was only after Confederation that the receipts took such a bound as to be sufficient to meet the ordinary annual expenditure. The only year that bore on its face the impression of a surplus was the year 1866, there having been that year a nominal surplus of over half a million of dollars; and, if they took into consideration the item of over accounts, amounting to \$1,395,626.52 for that year, and deduct from it the half million he had mentioned, it would be found that even that year showed a deficit. And curiously enough it was during this very year that the tariff was reduced from 20 to 15 per cent. Then the country came into that era of prosperity which had continued up to the present year. He had taken the trouble of looking into the Public Accounts, and he had discovered one or two notable things. One of the most particular features was that, in 1871, there seemed to be an instantaneous advance in the receipts; in 1870, we had a surplus of no less than \$3,712,479.09, showing an increase in the revenue amounting to the extraordinary sum of \$384,335.16, and to show that this was brought about entirely by the increase in the price of goods and commodities imported, it was sufficient to state that the Customs receipts for that year exhibited an augmentation of \$250,639.58. The next most noticeable feature was the extraordinary jump perceptible in the expenditure for the year 1873-4, which was increased, compared with the previous year, to the extent of no less than \$1,141,668.53. He believed they were all apt, in considering these matters, to exaggerate the faults of their political opponents, and to go to the opposite extreme with regard to the faults committed by their political friends, and he thought that the hon. member for Cardwell had been influenced by this feeling when he had charged the Government with extravagance, comparing, at the same time, the expenditure for 1875-6 with that of 1873-4. If hon. gentlemen would go back a little farther and compare the expenditure of 1873-4 with that of any year since Confederation, they would find a still more marked difference. In the year 1873-4 there seemed to be an advance along the whole line of expenditure; there were advances for Civil Government, for Legislation, for Customs, and for the Post Office Department. The feeling apparently was: "We have money and let us spend it, let us get rid of it in some way or another." He confessed that some little difficulty was to be experienced in making an analysis of the Public Accounts, which were not capable of being examined, as was possible with the provincial systems. They were obliged to take into consideration the facts that, in 1870, Manitoba came into existence as a Province; that in 1871, British Columbia entered Confederation, and in 1873, Prince Edward Island. There was no doubt that these Provinces had cost more per head as regarded population than the older Provinces, Quebec and Ontario, but he would be the very last man to say a word which would be in any way derogatory to these Provinces. If it was in question, he, for one, would be prepared to sanction the expenditure of double the amount that had been expended in connection with these Provinces, rather than have them out of the Union. In 1873-4, the period of inflation seemed to come to an end, and the present Finance Minister, in his first Budget speech, had taken what had been termed a very lugubrious view of the then situation; but to his mind this view exactly met the case; anyone who had taken the trouble to watch the periods which were called good times and bad times must have seen that the period of inflation was at that date very near its culmination. He believed that, before the late Administration had gone out of office, they had announced that it would be necessary to increase taxation on account of the enormous public works and other obligations which they had taken on their shoulders. The Finance Minister in face of a decreased revenue had to provide for increased expenditure, and under these unfortunate circumstances the Finance Minister had been obliged to view the situation, and he supposed that the hon. gentleman had prognosticated a deficit. He thought the hon. gentleman had rightly gauged the position the country occupied, and, owing to the bad harvest of last year, and other reasons, the country was now in a worse condition than otherwise might have been reasonably expected. We had now to consider how the revenue requisite to meet public obligations was to be raised, and, in order to do so, the state of the entire country must be taken into consideration. Was our trade in a normal or abnormal condition; were we importing goods at a fair ordinary price, or at prices lower than the average rate? These matters were to be considered; also the point whether it was necessary to increase the tariff to 20 per cent., and, if so, whether this was to be done as a temporary expedient or otherwise. He believed that the Minister of Finance, in devising means for increasing the revenue, had taken the view—and properly so—that the emergency would be only temporary. This was a very serious question; because manufacturers going into business in this country were obliged to recognize the fact that we had a certain amount of protection, or modified free trade, or whatever it might be called, which was necessary to enable them to continue in business; and it would be a very serious matter if, shortly after 20 per cent. were put on, it was found to be no longer necessary to meet the wants of the country, and the tariff was in consequence lowered. Such action would disarrange trade and disturb the calculations of manufacturers. He was glad to believe that the Ministry of the day had the courage of their convictions; they had proclaimed themselves believers in a revenue tariff, and he for one would not be inclined to give them the support he was now inclined to accord if they had departed from that rule to which they had declared themselves attached before taking office, unless they could prove to the satisfaction of the House that the necessities of the country required an advance of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. in the tariff. He thought that the present depression in a country so young and wealthy as this, would soon pass away; and temporary measures would be sufficient to meet the present exigencies. His hon. friend from Toronto had stated what he believed was true in every particular: That, if the protectionists were willing last year to take a 2½, 5, or 7 per cent. increase in the tariff as necessary under the then circumstances, they occupied to-day exactly the same position they occupied last year, while the state of things across the border had greatly changed, greenbacks having considerably advanced in value. The price of gold this year, as compared with last, gave, at least, 7½ per cent. protection to the manufacturers. It would be well for the Protectionists to wait a little while longer—to possess their souls in patience. In a short time it was likely that greenbacks would become the same as gold, and manufacturers would have a still greater protection than at present. If the hon. the Finance Minister were to notify a council of Protectionists to meet here in order to get a statement as to their wants, the result would be rather peculiar. Each man would produce his own nostrum. His friend from Wellington would state what duty he wanted on corn; the hon. member for Hamilton would tell what he wanted, and other hon. members would give their views on the subject. If the gentlemen could come to any conclusion among themselves, the hon. Finance Minister would be perfectly safe in agreeing to it. But that was almost impossible. The Protectionists were divided among themselves. What was one man's raw material was another's finished product, and it was impossible, unless by legislation which he should be sorry to see enacted, to grant the protection required, unless, as suggested by the hon. member for Kingston, they made a general advance along the whole line. Such a conference as he had referred to would resemble the Council that met on the banks of the Bosphorus to take into consideration the Sick Man's position. Their views were totally different, and the Sick Man was left to himself and was master of the situation. He was afraid if the Protectionists came together that their opinions would be so dissimilar that it would be impossible for them to arrive at any definite conclusion.

Mr. BERTRAM.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, read the third time, and passed.

Bill (No. 8) To change the name of the St. Francis and Megantic International Railway Company to the International Railway Company and for other purposes.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 35) Concerning the Ottawa, Vaudreuil and Montreal Railway Company.—(Mr. Hagar.)

Bill (No. 9) Respecting the Canada Southern Bridge Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

Bill (No. 14) To amend the several Acts incorporating the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway Company.—(Mr. Baby.)

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. PALMER resumed the debate on the tariff. He said that before expressing his own views he would refer to the extraordinary effect which the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston had had upon the hon. member for West York. If the amendment had had the same effect upon the members supporting the Administration, it certainly might be likened in character to the electric eel. The resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston had evidently shaken the resolution of the hon. member for West York. As the hon. member for West Peterboro' had said, there was an attempt to draw the attention of the House away from the point at issue, and to make the House and the country believe that this was in reality a fight between the two opposite principles called free trade and protection. Inasmuch as hon. gentlemen had taken such a wide range, it would be necessary for him to state his opinion clearly as to free trade and protection. As he understood free trade, he was in harmony with the hon. member for North York and the hon. the Minister of the Interior—he was an out-and-out free-trader. He did not think it would assist them in this enquiry to attribute suspicious motives to the hon. the leader of the Government or the right hon. gentleman leading the Opposition; and, when he found the hon. member for West York undertaking to impute motives to the mover of the amendment, he could not avoid thinking that he wanted some other reason for the course which he had adopted towards it than the resolution itself afforded. What cared he (Mr. Palmer) what motives actuated the Ministry or the leader of the Opposition so long as what they proposed would benefit the country? He agreed with the hon. member for West York that it was not sufficient for a man to say that he was a Free-trader or a Protectionist—he had to explain what he meant by these terms; and, more than that, the Government had to devise a policy in the minutest details that would carry forward the public business of the country so as to benefit the largest number of the inhabitants of this country. What he understood by free trade was this: That the trade of the country, or rather the wealth of nations would be more enhanced by the State not interfering with trade at all. By that means, of course, every country would do that which was best adapted to it by the least exertion and expenditure of either labour or wealth, and thereby create the largest amount of products for the use of man. But this was a Utopian idea, and the hon. member for West York was quite right when he said that the thing did not exist. At all events no Government ever attempted to carry on its affairs on this idea. Such a system would necessitate all the necessary expenses for carrying on the country being placed on the accumulated capital of the country. What he considered a pernicious principle was the taxing of articles of universal consumption, to pay the burthens of the State,—that, he held, was not free trade or true political economy. That was in reality putting a burthen upon the energies of the people, instead of making the accumulated capital pay for the necessities of the country. It was wrong to tax the poor man on the same scale as the millionaire; and, if the prime necessities were taxed, it was simply putting upon the poor man that which ought to be paid largely at all events, if not exclusively, by the rich man. He was prepared to support any Administration which would undertake to bring about, with a reasonable degree of success, such a system of free trade as he had referred to. But it was idle for men to talk about such a policy, as that did not depend upon the free will of Canada. The Dominion lay alongside of a country which had adopted an entirely different system. The principle now adopted was that the United States manufactured articles that were amply protected from Canadian competition, and then a bounty was given when they were exported to Canada. The tariff proposed by the Government would not raise our revenue by taxing the articles which could be produced in Canada, but would raise it by taxing the energies of our own people and by making the mechanics and the farmers pay the tariff. This was not a system of free trade which he would subscribe to. The hon. member for North York drew attention to the good display made by Canada at the Philadelphia Exhibition, and seemed to assume from it that the manufactures of this country were in a prosperous condition. He (Mr. Palmer) was glad if this was the case, but it would not seem so from the statements made by hon. members, and he was sure that the manufactures in the part of the country whence he came were in a depressed condition. His own judgment was that they were far from prosperous—that, in point of fact, they were driven out of the country. It could not be denied that it would be a great boon if, without injuring the country, those manufactures could be brought back and put into a prosperous condition again. He was free to admit that it would be hopeless to attempt to foster such manufactures if they could not be successfully carried on in Canada. He did not believe in building up mushroom interests that could not take care of themselves. But let anyone read the history of manufactures in Canada, and then compare it with the United States, and he would find that we had nothing to be afraid of in this respect. This country was as much adapted to manufacturing purposes as the United States, and a policy ought to be adopted which would build up industries and so give employment to a large class of the population. It was said that the manufacturers were selfish. There was little wisdom in sneering at a man and calling him selfish because he was devoting his energy and capital for the purpose of supporting his family or securing a competency. If that was selfishness, we were all selfish; and, in that regard, he would call upon the Government to be a little more selfish for Canada. We wanted Canada to be prosperous, and if we were Canadians, were we not, therefore, selfish? What would people think of a Finance Minister who deliberately said that the Government had no more to do with the prosperity or adversity of a country than a fly on a wheel?

Mr. BERTRAM.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: If my hon. friend wants to know what I did say I will repeat it. But that is not what I said.

Mr. PALMER said that was how he understood the hon. gentleman at the time, and every one would admit that the declaration was true. In point of fact, the Government were like a great many small flies on a very large wheel. In a great crisis like the present, when the country was suffering from great depression, something ought to be done. The people would not be satisfied if the man at the helm of State, in the hour of adversity, when the storm was raging, cried: "I can do nothing; the ship will not steer; she must go on the rocks." And it was no wonder the country cried out: "Let the old pilot from Kingston take the wheel; he can do no worse than you, and he says he will do something." The hon. member for North Norfolk, admitting that we imported $49,000,000 in goods from the United States, still said the people of Canada were so infinitesimal that he doubted whether half a dozen persons on the other side of the line had heard of us. He would like to know where the hon. gentleman was born, as that was a most extraordinary statement. The facts were entirely against it. So far from ignoring our existence, the Americans took so much interest in us that they endeavoured in every possible way to build up their commerce at our expense. The hon. gentleman, however, took a different view of things last year, when his voice was all for protection; he had had a vision, however, and a change had come over him. A great many hon. members on the opposite side of the House had had visions, some of which had been verified. The hon. the Minister of the Interior no doubt had a vision of $8,000 a year, and his hon. predecessor from Prince Edward Island probably had a vision of the Governorship of the North-West. The people, also, had had visions, which would undoubtedly be realized at the next election. The good of the country demanded a change in the fiscal policy which would result in fostering those industries which would flourish in the Dominion. One argument with reference to the sugar interest was that the people got the article cheap, but the policy of the Americans, and one which had been prosecuted very successfully with the assistance of the Administration, was to crush the refining business in Canada and then they could do what they chose with the market. Sugar was cheap this year, but how would it be next? The hon. the Premier had declared that the policy of the Government was incidental protection, and yet had departed from it by his resolutions. Events had shown that this policy was not popular; indeed, the general feeling of the country was in favour of the views of the hon. member for Kingston. Inasmuch as it was admitted that the revenue of the country was not to be raised by direct taxation, but by incidental protection, the only point in dispute was what articles should be protected. As incidental protection was also admitted to be proper for, and beneficial to, the country, why did they hear so much about free trade and protection. It did not follow that the principles of political economy favoured either the one or the other theory. The only matter really before the House was what was the most judicious mode of levying incidental protection. Very few there were who did not believe that the manner in which the duties were adjusted meant weal or woe, to a vast extent, to the country; and surely, under these circumstances, it was the duty of the Government to deal carefully with the points at issue, and of the representatives of the people to give the Government that counsel which they considered advisable in the interests of the country, and the Government should not take ill such action on their part. A few years ago, when it was proposed to tax ships $1.00 a ton, after discussion had taken place in the House and out of it, the Government discovered they had made a mistake, and they altered their proposition; and certainly a similar step could again be taken. It had been asked why did not the hon. member for Kingston frame a tariff, but surely this was too absurd—it was carrying the joke too far. Hon. gentlemen who put this question knew perfectly well that such a course would be unconstitutional. Private members were only allowed to indicate the general policy they thought should be pursued; and, if any such member had attempted to mention a scale of duties, he well knew that the Speaker would at once be obliged to call him to order. Such were the shallow arguments used by the supporters of a policy which could not be defended on its merits. It was for the Cabinet to specify the details of the policy to be adopted, and, if they were not prepared to accept this responsibility, it was time for them to give place to hon. members who would not hesitate to do so. He did not deny that Independent members could give information on various points to the Administration, and this, as far as lay within his power, he was always willing to do; but Independent members could not go so far as to frame the particulars of a policy, or go farther in this direction than had been done by his right hon. friend from Kingston. The Government might safely, however, do this: grant a drawback amounting to all the duties paid on the articles entering into the construction of such ships as were sold to foreigners. A similar policy had been successfully followed in the United States with regard to all branches of manufactures. The modification of the tariff he had indicated was one which the Government could safely adopt. He knew that his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior worked out these principles most scientifically and philosophically, and he asked his hon. friend whether the policy of making people pay duties on articles which were sold outside of this country had any similarity to free trade. He was willing to admit that the readjustment of the tariff was a very difficult question, and he also knew that any one taking it in hand would make mistakes. This was unavoidable. Further, whenever changes were made in the tariff, as an hon. member had remarked, great care should be observed to prevent, as far as was possible, disturbance in trade. Under any circumstances, the Government should not refuse to do their duty and let the ship of State drift on, regardless whither it went. They should be alive to the grave responsibilities of their position. It was wrong for their supporters to plead in one instance that Protectionists were selfish, and in another that the manufacturers were so prosperous as not to require protection. The situation of the country was too evident to make these allegations worthy of consideration. The resolution of the Government was drawn directly in the teeth of every principle of political economy, and of the principles of incidental protection, which they themselves advocated. An increased duty was placed on tea, and, if the Government in this particular desired to tax the people throughout the country as evenly as possible, they had certainly succeeded. If their object was, while depression universally existed, and while labour was worth little or nothing, to place a greater tax on that very labour, they had also done so most successfully; but this was not incidental protection, because a duty on tea, as an hon. gentleman had already pointed out, increased the cost of living. He was prepared to support a policy which tended to make living cheap, and this was one great principle of political economy, but it was useless to live in a cheap country if one lacked the means to purchase provisions and goods which were cheap in price. Could anything be imagined more detrimental to cheap living than the imposition of a tax on tea which every poor man in the country must purchase. The only true doctrine of political economy was to tax the accumulated capital of the country, but to tax the energies of the people in these hard times was bad policy which was entirely indefensible with regard to the principles of incidental protection. He unhesitatingly condemned the present policy of the Administration, and he was quite satisfied that it would also be condemned by the country. An hon. gentleman had said that the resolution proposed diminution of expenditure; but, although he had examined it very carefully, he had been unable to discover that this was the case. If any appeal, which had been made by the Ministerialists when in Opposition, had struck a responsive chord in his breast, it was their outcry against extravagant expenditure. Although he thought that some of their doctrines were not broad enough for the Maritime Provinces, these had been rather sectional. If he read the figures correctly, there was no diminution in the ordinary expenditure. His hon. friend from Cardwell had stated to the House that the expenditure of the Government for the year 1875-6 exceeded by $600,000 the expenditure for 1873-4, the last year the late Administration was in power. It had not been the expectation of the country that this would be the result of the entrance into office of the present Administration. At all events, it had been expected that the Government would keep their ordinary expenditure as low as it had been during the time of their predecessors. Again, the departmental expenses had increased from those of the old Government by $175,000. In his city there was not a single Government official who had not his salary increased. What possible objection could the hon. member for West York have to the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, for the hon. member admitted that the tariff was imperfect, and that our industries ought to be encouraged?

Mr. PALMER.

Mr. PALMER.

Mr. ORTON said it seemed difficult for some of the supporters of the Administration to find out what the summation of the discussion would be. The question was not one between abstract theories of protection and free trade, because the hon. the First Minister had stated it was utterly impossible for this country to carry on its affairs under either system rigidly carried out, and the right hon. member for Kingston had expressed similar views. It would be well to enquire, first, whether the tariff rearrangement could have been made so as to relieve the acknowledged distress amongst the manufacturing, agricultural, and other interests; and also whether the additional burdens had been so placed as to bear upon the various industrial classes of the people with the least weight; whether the whole policy of the present Administration, since they came into power, had not added to, as well as intensified the cause of the present depression; and, lastly, whether it was not within the power of the Government to so economise expenditure as to dispense with additional taxation. The hon. member for Cardwell had successfully shown that this was not necessary, and that the old Government had carried on the country's affairs, in matters immediately under the control of the Government, with \$600,000 less than the present Government. The hon. the Premier had stated that the prosperity of the country was dependent upon the industry, economy, and enterprise of the people, and not upon any action of the Government. This was one of many insinuations which he had heard the hon. gentleman make which cast a slur upon the people of Canada, and which he, (Mr. Orton) as a Canadian, indignantly repelled and cast back upon the hon. gentleman. He could defy contradiction when he said there was not a more industrious, energetic and economical people in the world than Canadians, and he was sure, if the hon. the Premier was personally more familiar with the trials, the hardships, and the self-denials of the industrial classes of our country, and especially of our farmers, he would never have been guilty of making such an insinuation. As an illustration that the Government could do much towards developing the prosperity of a country, he would refer to France. It was well known that, in consequence of the stagnation which occurred in France after the Crimean war, the National Bank of that country was on the verge of bankruptcy and specie enough could not be found to pay for the over-importations. And this led France wisely to throw aside free trade and assume the policy of protection, and it was under that policy the country was enabled, after the Franco-Prussian war, with all her industries crippled, to pay off \$1,000,000,000 of war indemnity in November, 1874. Her National Bank had accumulated deposits. With a capital of 182,000,000 francs, it had the enormous sum of 1,271,000,000 francs in its vaults, and a bank circulation of 2,572,700,130 francs, or fourteen times the amount of its capital account at an average rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and returning a profit on the circulation alone of about 50 per cent. on capital. He also thought it well to refer to the great American Republic. In 1825, when the protection policy was inaugurated, manufactures did not exist to any great extent. Then commenced the period of great prosperity in that country, such progress as had been unrivalled in any country, until the civil war broke out. The hon. the Finance Minister had stated that, if the United States had adopted a free trade policy, it would have been much more prosperous; but it did not lie in the mouth of Canada to tell the United States how to manage its affairs, for, while that country was progressing wonderfully, Canada was going backward. With a national debt—chiefly a war debt—ten times greater in proportion to population than Canada, the United States had, in ten years, reduced her debt one hundred millions of dollars, which would have been equal to ten million dollars for this country, or one million dollars a year. Now, could our Finance Minister show that, with our lesser burdens, this country had been able to reduce her debt one million dollars a year?

Instead of that, we had the humiliating announcement from that hon. gentleman that there was a deficit of nearly two million dollars. It would be well for this country if we could give as good an exhibit as the United States. He contended that, if a wise financial and general policy had been inaugurated, if the Pacific Railway had been boldly proceeded with by a company in the manner first proposed, Canada would have been in a most prosperous condition, and the very depression in other countries would have aided to attract a large immigration, not only from Europe, but from the United States itself. Millions of British and foreign capital would have been brought into this country, and wonderful prosperity would have resulted. The Government also committed a great error when they turned a deaf ear to the appeals of our languishing industries. Delegations were in some instances treated with insulting contempt and, in effect, told to go home and be more industrious. Owing to the doleful tale put forth by the Finance Minister, and to his accusations of extravagance and improvidence against the people, and his prophecies of hard times in store, great prejudice had been created in the old world against Canada. He would read an extract from the Belfast News Letter to prove this.

“The Canadians had been living too fast: quite a common thing in a new country, where broad acres, even broad acres covered with snow six months in the year, are easily pawned for loans of money, and people soon learn to forget the simple habits of the Old Land. The Canadians lived far beyond their means; and now they are forced to descend from their former styles, and to dispense with former luxuries. Intending emigrants connected with agriculture ought to consider these facts very carefully; and if they do they will stop at home till times have permanently improved in the Dominion. It is said that plots of lands, now cleared farms, with all appliances, are really less valuable than if the trees had been allowed to remain undisturbed; even certain towns in former lumbering districts would bring less than if the land they occupy were covered with pine forests, which does not say much for town property or the business carried on in towns; nor for the prospects of trade and manufactures in Canada when all forests shall have been cleared.”

The hon. the Premier said a pro

rective tariff would tax one class for the enrichment of another; but the policy of the Government taxed Canadians for the enrichment of Americans. The New York Post, a leading free trade organ, admitted this. It said:

"By such devices as the drawback on sugar, and by a rigid exclusion of many of Canada's products, we have unquestionably crippled one or two of her industries, and have done her commerce more injury than we have suffered in return, inasmuch as we have had a larger home market for the consumption of our products."

The Philadelphia Ledger furnished the following testimony of the benefits of protection:—

"American enterprise seems to be reaching its claws beyond the border of the States. Again, we hear of the success of Clarke, Reeves & Co., one of our most prominent bridge firms, invading the Dominion of Canada and capturing orders for a large number of wrought-iron bridges, aggregating fully three thousand tons in weight, which will be manufactured at Phoenixville. Thus, one by one, we secure the foreign markets for American industry, but here the poaching is done and the game carried away from John Bull's own hunting grounds."

While our industries were languishing, still business in the United States was reviving, as would be shown by the following extract:—

"National tube works, McKeesport, Pa., working to full capacity. Acme glass works, Stenbenville, Ohio, resuming with plenty of work for the winter. Belcher & Taylor, tool Co., Chicope Falls, Mass., have declared and paid eight per cent. dividend. Ellis locomotive works, Schenectady, N. Y., have been opened with work for 400 men. Miller's Falls Co., Conn., declared 7 per cent. dividend and giving $100 to the Congregationalists. The Merimac Manufacturing Co., of Lowell, Mass., made 849,775 yds. of prints last week, the largest number made in one week since the mills were in operation."

Now let them consider whether the additional burdens imposed by the Government this year were judiciously arranged. What was the effect of the tax on barley? In the first place, by putting a duty on malt, and allowing Indian corn to come in free, they directly reduced the price of Canadian barley as well as all coarse grain, and also encouraged illicit distilling to a very large extent. He had heard the hon. the Finance Minister deploring the existence of illicit distilling in Canada. He did not think he could have devised a means to increase this unfortunate business more than by increasing the duty on malt. It had caused many of the farmers in some of the back townships to connive at and even occasionally engage in carrying on this illicit distilling in order to get rid of their barley and other damaged grain. The price, as every one was aware, this year was very low, and for a large quantity of barley there was no market. If this duty had been placed on Indian corn, instead of on malt, the result would have been to relieve the market of a large quantity of barley for the manufacture of whiskey. In the distillery in Toronto, 3,000 bushels of Indian corn were daily manufactured into whiskey, and a similar amount in the Windsor distillery. They thus saw what an enormous amount of Indian corn was consumed in Canada. If a duty were placed on Indian corn, the barley now rotting in the barns of the farmers would be eagerly sought after by the brewers and distillers and consumed. He wished to discuss this tax upon malt in a temperance point of view, and he thought no tax or action of the Government could have done more harm to the temperance cause than this malt tax, because whatever caused the consumption or gave greater opportunities for the sale of whiskey than existed before must injure the temperance cause. It increased the price of beer, and also induced the hotel-keepers and those who were engaged in selling liquors to dispose of as much whiskey and as little beer as they could help. The consumption of beer was therefore sure to be very materially decreased, and the consumption of whiskey very largely increased. Beer was a much lighter beverage than whiskey, and one that seldom led to intemperance. In Germany, beer was largely consumed, and in that country the Government had taken the management of the breweries under their own control in order to give the people cheap and wholesome beer. Frequently from 10,000 to 15,000 people were congregated together in their various gardens, enjoying themselves and drinking lager beer, and a drunken man was seldom seen in that country. He thought it was very uncertain what amount of revenue the Finance Minister would be able to obtain from this source, because the amount of malt consumed in this country would be very materially reduced, and there would be a temptation put in the way of brewers to use illicitly other articles in the manufacture of beer. He heard an hon. gentleman the other day read a letter purporting to be from a brewer, or a gentleman who he said had been engaged in that business. He was very sorry to hear the hon. gentleman read a letter to this House without either giving the name or being able to state whether that gentleman was now engaged in business or not. But he thought it did not require any great effort on his (Mr. Orton's) part to show that the deductions which he tried to draw from that letter were erroneous. He stated that a brewer could afford to sell beer for the same price with this increased duty. It was strange to him (Mr. Orton) if a duty which increased the cost of production of the article of beer to the extent of ninety cents a barrel or three cents a gallon would enable a brewer to sell his beer for the same price as before. Another reason why the price of beer would be largely increased was that a brewer was obliged to pay the duty on the malt before he manufactured his beer, and when made it often had to remain months and months in his cellar before it was sold, and he lost the interest on his outlay, besides losses in leakage and beer becoming sour. He wished also to point out another fact connected with the malt tax. The duty on malt in this country was twice as much as that in any other country under the sun. The largest duty on malt was in Great Britain, where it was 96 cents a bushel, while the duty now imposed on malt in Canada was 180 cents a bushel. Let them now look at the policy of placing a duty on tea, which was used all over this country, and especially by hardworking labourers and mechanics, by the farmers and by those who were the most industrious of our people; also by the fishermen of the Lower Provinces. All these used tea to a larger extent than the wealthier class. They used it three times a day, morning, noon and night, and they found, by a return brought down, that these labouring classes paid the largest taxes of the people of this country. The tax on tea had been placed in such a manner as to bear more heavily on the poor man than upon the rich; upon the industrious, hardworking labouring man more than upon those who were living upon their wealth or enjoying the luxury of Government offices. The removal of the Excise and the reduction of Customs duty on coal oil was the only crumb of satisfaction which the people of Canada could get out of the present policy of this Government. But the stigma would remain on this Government for many a long day because, when the motion was introduced for the removal of that duty a year ago, they and all their supporters to a man voted to keep the duty on, and the condemnation of their course last year was to be found in their action now. They had caused the people of this country to pay $1,200,000 more for their coal oil than they had a right to pay. Now, coal oil could be bought for 15 cents and more cheaper than during the period when that duty existed, and the fact that 8,000,000 gallons were annually consumed, proved his statement to be correct. This large amount was taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada to enrich a few, those few residing principally in the neighbourhood of the Premier's constituency. He thought there could be no excuse at all for the action of the Government last year. It was true the Finance Minister had stated that it would be a very disagreeable thing to upset the tariff and take this obnoxious and unjust duty off coal oil last year. It would be too much trouble for him to rearrange the tariff in order to remove that evil. He seemed to have the idea that the position he occupied should be one of ease. They found, when he went to the old country to make a loan, this love of ease also prevailed, and the aristocratic Finance Minister would not take the trouble to negotiate that loan himself, but employed a firm—probably a very honourable firm—to both arrange what the selling price of our bonds should be and also what they should give for them. They both bought and sold. It was very strange to him if the people of Canada did not come to the conclusion that this position of Finance Minister was a very expensive one and in some respects a very unnecessary one for this country, if it was necessary to pay him $7,000 a year and his expenses to England every year and lose a quarter of a million on each loan, as had been demonstrated with regard to the last, simply to do what he might do by writing to the Barings or any other agents quite as well as by going himself. He would now endeavour to refer briefly to some remarks made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in a speech which was certainly a very extraordinary speech—peculiarly extraordinary when they remembered the speeches he had made on previous occasions. He was not surprised that it was necessary for the hon. gentleman to educate his constituents with regard to the change of base he was about to make, and for that purpose to rehearse that speech at least twenty times in his own constituency before giving this House the benefit of it. He wished, however, to challenge some of his statements. From having been a lover of protection, the hon. gentleman now seemed to have become an enemy to our manufacturers or any other of the interests of our country, and he had drawn a picture of what it would cost this country to give increased protection to manufactures and had stated that, in order to encourage the manufacture of what we imported from foreign countries and to give employment to 150,000 people as he had stated, this country would be obliged to pay $19,000,000 a year. He (Mr. Orton) did not know what kind of people the hon. gentleman supposed he was speaking to, if he imagined such a statement would go down; he must have thought they were very ignorant, both in the House and in the country, and he doubted very much whether such a statement would go for much even in his own constituency. He forgot to tell the House and the country the enormous benefits which would be derived from these manufactures being made in our own country. He forgot to tell the House that every article of home produce would be largely increased in value; that there would be a more ready market as well as a more varied market for the products of the farm. He also forgot to state that there would be an increased profit and a market for products of every other industry in this country through the existence of these manufactures in Canada. Was it not a well known fact that various towns, cities, and villages had given large bonuses—enormous bonuses in some instances—to have the benefit of a single manufactory in their midst, showing the benefit which manufactures were to the whole population? If he had given them an idea of the profits that would be derived in this way and had then shown the cost, he thought he would have found that there would have been a very large profit, far exceeding the very fanciful cost he had figured up. Then the hon. gentleman sneered at a duty on Indian corn, and said he would like very well to have a duty on Indian corn, but it would be a burden on the people. It had become customary and fashionable on the other side of the House to sneer at the agricultural interests of the country, and no wonder, when the Premier, on every possible occasion set the example to his followers. Last year when he (Mr. Orton) asked for a Committee to consider the agricultural interests, the hon. the Premier said:

Mr. ORTON.

“Why he (Mr. Orton) should endeavour to champion the interests of those who need no champion in this House I do not know. The farmers are thoroughly able to take care of themselves; they are the most prosperous class in the country, and the nostrums the hon. gentleman would prescribe for their protection, I do not think they will have on any account. I have no objection, however, if hon. members desire to serve on the Committee, to give it power to send for papers; but I do not consider that there would be any justification for the expenditure of public money in sending for witnesses to testify what every person who has common sense already knows.”

He did not think that was a respectful or honourable way to treat the efforts of any hon. gentleman representing and trying honestly to advocate the interests of any class of the people of this country. But the hon. the First Minister was obliged to recede from that position in deference to the opinions of some of his own supporters, who were afraid to vote against the Government but did not want to offend their constituents. Still, the Premier had insisted that the Committee should be composed of a large Ministerial majority, and the evidence taken before it was not treated as fairly as it should have been. The majority refused to take any notice of the evidence obtained from an immense number of representative farmers throughout the country, but afterwards a compromise was arranged with the minority to the effect that the evidence should be reported to the House. But, then, the Government majority in the Printing Committee refused to print it. The hon. member for North Norfolk had given a graphic description as to the effect of protection on the country. The hon. gentleman said if a duty was placed upon American wheat and cattle equal to that placed by the United States on ours, a spirit of retaliation would be evoked, and the Americans would probably put a large duty on barley. The duty on barley was now 15 cents, and he thought that was quite high enough to encourage its growth in the United States and shut out our barley, if it were possible. It should be borne in mind, however, that we grew a better crop and quality of barley than our neighbours, and they would be obliged to import ours. Our ancestors belonged to a nation that had carved its own way in the world, and such language as the hon. member for North Norfolk had used was unworthy of a Canadian; any man who loved the mother country and respected her institutions, and any man who loved Canada and her institutions, ought to be ashamed to give utterance to such sentiments. It had been proved in the past that Canada could take care of herself, and that she was able, despite the hostile tariff of the United States, to exist and prosper. We all knew that the United States had tried to force Canada into annexation, but the independent spirit of the people and the enterprise shown by the Government, when the Reciprocity Treaty was abrogated, soon showed that country that we could live without the Americans if we desired. Everyone here, doubtless, wished to live on the best possible terms with the people of the United States, and a fair interchange of products between the two countries would be advantageous to both; but we had waited long enough, and tried, even to the verge of humiliation, to get fair play from that country; but we need expect no favours from the people across the border, and they had everything in their favour as matters now stood between us. But, if a duty was placed upon every description of products which found a market here, we would find a party of farmers in the Western States, and of manufacturers in the Eastern States, and of the miners of Pennsylvania, who would declare in favour of reciprocity, and we might then hope to obtain it. In the course of his argument, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), stated that the farmer would have to pay more for every article he used, and that the products of his farm would be decreased in value under a protective policy. He would quote a few figures on this point, which would show that the position of the hon. member was not correct. In the United States under a low tariff in 1857, calicoes cost 12½ cents per yard; in 1875, under the high tariff, 8 cents; delaines, 1857, 25 cents; 1875, 15 cents; common alpacas, 1857, 75 cents, 1875, 35 cents; finer alpacas, 1857, \$1, 1875, 40 cents; woollen cloth, common, 1857, \$1, 1875, 60 cents; better woollen cloth, 1857, \$1.25, 1875, 75 cents; best woollen cloth, 1857, \$1.50, 1875, \$1.20; shawls, each, 1857, \$12, 1875, \$8; cotton print cloth, 1857, 8 cents; 1875, 4½ cents; knitted undershirts, 1857, \$1.25, 1875, 50 cents. The price of wheat in the United States in 1860, under the revenue tariff, was 98 cents per bushel; in 1870, under the high tariff, \$1.28; flour, 1860, under low tariff, \$5.91; 1870, under high tariff, \$6.11. The average price of flour from 1849 to 1861 under the low tariff was \$6.07 per barrel; from 1861 to 1874, under the high tariff it was \$7.33. Indian meal under the low tariff was \$3.40; under the high tariff it was \$4. Wool, from 1853 to 1858, under a low tariff, averaged 37½ cents per pound; in 1870, under the high tariff, it was 55 cents; in 1872, 75 cents; in 1874, 65 cents per pound. It would be seen from those figures that the argument that farmers would not be benefitted under protection was anything but correct. But, if they referred to other articles used by farmers, it would be seen that the manufacturers of the United States were able not only to provide their own people with cheap manufactures, but to sell their goods in Canada in the face of  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. ad valorem duty. In the year 1875-6 there were imported into this country, of cotton goods, \$2,140,000; hats, caps and bonnets, \$469,654; manufactures of iron, \$678,760; manufactures of leather, \$365,117; manufactures of wood, \$359,995. These comprised the greater part of the goods required by the farmers, and they could be supplied by the United States to our people, in the face of the  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. duty. He would now refer to the exportations and importations of agricultural products between the two countries. He found that we imported last year from the United States, horned cattle to the value of \$164,491, and we exported such cattle to that country, which contained ten times our population; to the value of \$404,381. Had the importations and exportations been proportionate to population, our exports in this respect would have amounted in value to \$1,644,910. The competition, through the importation of animals, &c., from the United States, so far as our farming population was concerned, was ten times greater than that to which American farmers were exposed in our regard. We imported in 1875, swine to the value of \$368,093, and we exported to the value of \$152,963. We imported swine last year to the value of \$152,497, and we exported only to the value of \$13,307. We imported meats to the value of \$1,191,894, and we exported to the value of \$96,180. The duty levied on meats imported from the United States was one cent per pound, and the duty on hams and bacon—which formed the larger portion of our exports of meat to that country—was two cents per pound.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto): The hon. gentleman has been stating the prices of certain articles under the tariff of 1857, and under the higher tariff of a later date, and I wish to ask him if he is prepared to tell us what the price of the raw material was.

Mr. ORTON.

Mr. ORTON said he was sorry he was not sufficiently acquainted with the manufacture of these articles to do so, and besides he did not think it necessary to his argument to be able to give the information desired. We had imported from the United States lard to the value of $312,208, and of it we had exported only to the value of $5,639. We had a duty of one cent per pound on American lard, and the Americans imposed a duty of two cents per pound on Canadian lard. We imported from the United States in 1875 flour and meal to the value of $3,034,683, and of this we only re-exported to the value of $38,000, a mere bagatelle. He ventured to say that if a duty of 50 or 25 cents per barrel was imposed on flour, the millers of Canada would be able to supply fully one-half of the quantity named. This would be the means of relieving the milling interests of this country, which were at present greatly depressed, and of promoting the welfare of numerous other classes in our community. We imported wool to the value of $383,743, and this article was free, and we had exported wool to the United States to the value of $2,836,458; and the American duty on our wool was ten cents per pound, besides eleven per cent. on value; therefore the American farmer not only obtained ten cents more per pound for his wool than the Canadian farmer in that country, but also eleven per cent. on the value in addition. If this was a fair state of things, he did not know what fairness was. It might be said that the American people really paid this duty, but it was to be remembered that the imposition of it placed nearly one million of dollars in the American Treasury, lightening the burdens of the people to that extent. We imported from the United States, oats to the value of $232,294, and we exported to that country, oats only to the value of $34,351. We imported Indian corn to the value of $2,356,377, and we re-exported Indian corn to the value of only $81. We imported wheat to the value of $6,007,167, and of this we re-exported $3,000,000 worth, showing that we consumed three million dollars worth of American wheat in Canada. We exported wheat to the United States to the value of only $1,622,975. We imported barley to the value of $27,598, and we exported barley and rye to the value of over $7,000,000, and this was the only article for which we found a market to any very great extent in the United States. The figures mentioned all applied to imports from and exports to that country. He contended that all this was very unjust to the Canadian farmer, and he trusted that the Government would even yet reconsider the tariff question, though of this he had little hope. If the Government did not change their present ruinous policy and show that they really understood the genius and requirements of the Canadian people, he desired their term of office to be very short. He thought the country should be governed by a Cabinet possessed of broad ideas, and desirous of encouraging all our industries—the coal and mining interests of Nova Scotia, the mining interests of British Columbia, and the agricultural interests of Ontario, besides fostering the development of the vast agricultural resources of the great North-West. He held that a policy which would be just to and yet encourage every class in the country could be inaugurated. The Pacific Railway should also be built, and he was of opinion that this could be done without imposing additional burdens on the people. But as long as the present Administration had depressed every interest in the Dominion, restrained the development of our resources, and damped the energies of the people, the good results to which he alluded, would never be accomplished.

Mr. COOK said, as he had not received a reply to a question he had put to the hon. member for Carleton in reference to his remarks on the question of protection to lumber, he would venture to occupy the time of the House for a few moments in giving his view of that important branch of the industry of this country, for fear that the statements made by the hon. gentleman should leave an erroneous impression on the minds of the hon. members of the House. He could not see how this trade could be protected unless the Government gave each individual member of the lumbering fraternity a bonus, which, no doubt, would be very acceptable, particularly in the present depressed state of the trade. The remedy for the depression was in the hands of the operators themselves, and he believed they were taking advantage of it by getting a reduced stock. He saw by the returns the exports from 1871 to 1875 inclusive, amounted to $125,224,904 to the United States. He found that in 1871 we imported $51,408; in 1875, $396,086; in 1876, $534,000, subject to an ad valorem duty of 17½ per cent. on invoice, which, upon good grades of lumber, was equal to the duties imposed by the United States, the American duties being $2 per thousand. We exported in 1875, $24,781,780 to the American markets, and in 1876, $20,387,000. He found, upon enquiry from lumbermen of undoubted reputation, that the cut of sawn lumber on the Ottawa River proper was, in 1874-5, 300,000,000 feet; in 1875-6, 160,000,000 feet, and the contemplated cut for 1876-7, was 80,000,000 feet. He believed the cut this year would not exceed 50 or 60 million feet, in consequence of the weather. The Gatineau River produced about 50 millions, and Georgian Bay about 80 millions. In Quebec and Ontario we would produce about 250 or 300 million feet this year. This branch of industry usually employed about 250,000 people, and a depression in the trade was felt by the whole country. His hon. friend had something to say about the carrying of Michigan lumber through our canals. Had he lost sight of the fact that, when that lumber passed through our canals, we were getting the benefit of the carrying trade as well as canal dues collected thereon, besides having the advantage of giving the trade to our ocean vessels, and employment to shippers at Quebec? He would inform the House that a very large amount of deals were manufactured in Michigan and Wisconsin and shipped through to Europe by the New York Central Railroad. Did the hon. gentleman wish to drive all the products from the Western States through the American channels of transportation instead of their natural channel, the river St. Lawrence? He would also state, for the information of that hon. gentleman, that most of the lumbermen operating in Michigan, Ohio and Indiana, in square timber, were Canadians—the very men he wished to exclude from carrying their timber through our canals. The amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston was as follows:—

“That the resolution be not read a second time, but that it be resolved by this House that the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burthens of taxation without any compensating advantages to Canadian industries, and, further, that this House is of opinion that the deficiencies in the revenue should be met by a diminution of the expenditure aided by such a re-adjustment of the tariff as would benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing industries of the Dominion.”

He (Mr. Cook) believed the mover of this amendment made a speech when Parliament convened, criticizing the Speech from the Throne, in which he condemned the Government for decreasing the expenditure on Public Works. If he understood the amendment to the resolution moved by the right hon. member for Kingston, it was that the Government should decrease their expenditure. Reverting to his former speech, he found that the leader of the Opposition advocated the vigorous construction of the canals and other public works, so as to give employment to the labouring classes; now he advocated retrenchment, which must result in the stoppage of those works if this amendment should pass; thus showing how hopelessly muddled he was in his policy—one day advocating expenditure, and the next opposing it. He would ask who was responsible for this? Who was the party who inaugurated those vast undertakings, and in the days of prosperity neglected to make provision for their completion? That Government evidently went on the principle: “Let us drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die.” In the remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell, made a few evenings ago, he was glad to hear him say that the expenditure of the Government for 1872, 1873, and 1874 was the result of the out-going administration of the right hon. member for Kingston. He had had the honour of hearing that hon. gentleman repeat a portion of that same speech in the county of Simcoe on several occasions, but one thing that he has invariably stated on the stump was that this expenditure of 1872, 1873 and 1874 was directly the act of the present Government. He hoped that portion of the member for Cardwell's speech would be correctly reported so that the people of that constituency could see the fallacies that the hon. gentleman indulged in while seeking election there. His hon. friend indulged in a good many extravagant assertions when on the stump that were quite in harmony with the pic-nic orations of some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. They found it convenient to make assertions at outside gatherings that they dare not repeat here. Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co., who had acted as financial agents for both the past and the present Governments, were men of undoubted reputation, and all knew the honesty of purpose of the present Minister of Finance, and he regretted that the hon. Member for Cardwell should have attempted to impute motives of wrong-doing to either one of them. The impression that he seemed desirous of conveying to the House was of that character, and he thought he owed the hon. Minister of Finance an apology for his unjustifiable insolence. The hon. gentleman got rather mixed when he attacked this Government for the passage of the Weights and Measures Act, it having been the last production of the hon. member for Cumberland, who constructed it with a view to the possible contingencies of an approaching general election, in order to extend the patronage of his Government. Surely this hon. member for Cardwell did not expect that this Government were going to make appointments from the Tory ranks, and, as for the recommendation to offices under the Crown, he could assure the hon. member that he would never recommend any person who was incapable of performing the duty required, and, knowing the ranks of his (Mr. Cook's) political friends contained all the elements of efficiency, it was not probable he would be called upon to select parties outside his own friends and supporters. As so much latitude had been allowed to the hon. gentleman addressing the House upon this subject, he thought that he could take the privilege of reverting to a question that was not strictly in accordance with the rules—a debateable question now—he referred to the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railroad. Speaking as he did for the majority of the people of the county of Simcoe, they were in entire harmony with that project, and he would correct an error made by his hon. friend from Cardwell some time ago, that he (Mr. Cook) denounced the Government policy on that portion of the Pacific Railway scheme while upon his election tour on former occasions. He would say that he always advocated the Georgian Bay Branch on the stump as he did the general policy of the Government for Ontario and the Dominion at large, because he thought it the most beneficial for the Western Peninsula of this great Province. In advocating the Georgian Bay Branch he had more than one object in view. It was well known by people conversant with that part of the country that there was a large tract of arable land eminently adapted for settlement and cultivation, and capable of sustaining a population of a quarter of a million, to say nothing about the impetus it would give to lumbering in that district. It would also, by tapping the waters of Georgian Bay, give the advantage of lake navigation to Western Ontario which would be a boon to that part of our great Dominion. He would advise his hon. friend from Cardwell, if he intended to measure swords with him (Mr. Cook) in North Simcoe again, to withdraw that part of his statement from his speech made a few days ago, denouncing the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway. In conclusion, he believed the question of protection beyond a revenue protection to be untenable and thoroughly exploded, which the hon. gentlemen would find when they came before their constituents at the next general election. The revenue tariff at present existing gave sufficient protection to manufacturers, and the agriculturists were alive to the importance of the privilege of having a Government that would give them the opportunity of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest markets.

Mr. Cook.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said that, at so late an hour of the evening, and on the third day of the debate, and the subject having, as it had been, discussed by hon. members from every possible standpoint, he was not inclined to protract the debate. But the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), who had just taken his seat, had, on more than one occasion in this House, complained of the treatment he had received by this House in reference to the Report of the Committee on Agricultural Interests, of which he was chairman, and also the interference of the Government in the composition of that Committee. As a member of that Committee, he (Mr. Burpee) felt called upon to make some explanations. The facts were these: That the hon. member proposed the names of 15 gentlemen as a Committee on the agriculture of the Dominion; that only three of these gentlemen were practical agriculturists; that they were from Ontario principally, and from Ontario and Quebec almost exclusively, with the exception of one hon. member from British Columbia. For that reason, he (Mr. Burpee) objected to the composition of the Committee, and the hon. the Premier changed it so as to meet the objection raised. He served on the Committee tolerably faithfully during the Session. Certain questions were formulated by the Committee on subjects connected with agricultural interests, and sent forth to different parts of the country for answers. He might explain that there were only five or six days within which to answer those questions, and that, therefore, it was entirely useless to send them to the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and expect to obtain replies. In fact, a number of questions were sent to those Provinces without avail, because the time was so short as not to give an opportunity to forward answers. Therefore, the agriculturists in that part of the Dominion, who were mainly in favour of free trade according to the general acceptance of that term, had no opportunity of placing their views before the Committee or this House. The answers received, which were from Ontario principally, did not express the full voice of the people of the Dominion on that subject, and the Committee thought that the answers given should not be held to be a fair expression of the opinions of the country. Some hon. members from the Maritime Provinces who had addressed the House, had made some strong remarks with regard to the manner in which the changes in the tariff had been received in their several localities, and in the country generally, so far as their information extended. One hon. member, the member for Cumberland, had stated that there was a universal wail throughout the country when the tariff propositions were announced. His information with regard to the reception of the tariff changes in the Maritime Provinces was of an entirely different character. He had received letters from agriculturalists and men largely engaged in commercial business, of a most satisfactory nature; they expressed themselves entirely satisfied with the change, and declared that the tariff in those Provinces especially had given entire satisfaction as it had been carried out by the present Government during the last two years. The hon. member for St. John had declared that the country was drifting upon a shoal, being without helm or pilot, and the remedy he proposed was to place the right hon. member for Kingston at the head of affairs. The past record of that right hon. gentleman did not warrant any expectation of improvement in the tariff impositions or the general fiscal policy, in the direction indicated by hon. members on the other side of the House. In fact the tariff inaugurated and acted upon by the late Government in the main was not materially different from that now proposed by this Government. The amendment of the right hon. gentleman was professedly in the interest of three industries, viz., the manufacturing, agricultural and mineral interests. Important as these interests were, there were other interests in the Dominion of equal importance. The lumbering interest had been entirely ignored. He would like to know how that industry was to be protected. In many parts of the Dominion the prosperity of the agricultural interest depended very much upon the prosperity or depression of the lumbering industry.

Mr. BURRILL.

Then the fishing interest and other industries had been ignored by the proposed amendment. He contended that if we proposed to protect one industry in all fairness and honesty we must mete out an equal amount of fair play to all other industries. And they would demand at the hands of Parliament such just consideration, and he contended that to protect all interests would be equivalent to not protecting any, as it must increase the prices of all productions and commodities, and, all being consumers, what they would gain on one hand they would lose on the other hand. The only result would be to add materially to the cost of living, and without accomplishing the good claimed. It was true that politicians might take the amendment to the amendment of the member for Hamilton, and in a manufacturing population claim that manufacturers alone were to be protected, and in an agricultural district claim that agricultural productions alone were to be considered, and so misrepresent the intentions of the movers of the amendments now before the House in reference to the different industries separately as would create dissatisfaction in the country with the present tariff regulations and the party in power, and bring back the hon. member for Kingston to the helm of affairs. He did not believe the country would be deceived by such clap-trap. To so manage our fiscal policy as to give the greatest good to the largest number of people was our true policy. If they protected the full circle of interests, they must materially increase the cost of living, which would in turn increase the cost of production, and render this a dear country to live in. It would discourage immigration and have a detrimental effect on the country generally. To do less, if they protected any, would be unfair to other interests, and result in general dissatisfaction.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said it had been well remarked that it would have been better had the debate not taken such a wide range. The amendment was equivalent to a vote of want of confidence, and it was but natural that the gentlemen opposite should embrace the opportunity of formulating charges against the Government and trying to convince the House that the time had arrived when the country would be safer in other hands. The motion in amendment asked the House to refuse concurrence in the propositions of the Government on the ground that the tariff, or the duties which they asked at the hands of Parliament, might have been more fairly distributed, and that the general policy of the Government should have been constructed with the view of fostering the several interests referred to in the amendment. It would be necessary to refer perhaps to the condition of the country and the circumstances under which the Government had been placed for the last three years, and the difficulties from which we were now only just beginning to emerge. It was well known to gentlemen acquainted with financial matters that financial difficulties, arising from over-expenditure and extravagance, were to be looked for about every ten years. In 1837, 1847 and 1857 financial difficulties swept over this country, and, in 1867, a recurrence might naturally have been looked for. But, at that time, the inflation of currency in the United States, consequent upon the great war, enhanced the price of the products of the soil, and for a time averted the calamity in Canada which might have been expected otherwise.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : Do not forget Confederation.

MR. JONES said that was an advantage which the people of the Maritime Provinces helped the people of Canada to enjoy. Had it not been for that result, the old Province of Canada might have had its own financial troubles on its own account. The right hon. member for Kingston, in submitting his resolution, took occasion to pourtray in pathetic terms the hardships which the poor people of this country were going to suffer because the duty on tea had been increased two cents; and the hon. gentleman beside him had opposed the views of the Government as being sectional. A few years ago, when a duty was proposed on shipping material, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) and his friends opposed it as it was a sectional duty, and would more largely apply to the Maritime Provinces. At that time there were large expenditures for lighthouse services, and, if ship-owners got the protection afforded by the lighthouses, it was only a fair proposition that they should contribute a certain portion of the expenses. But the duty on tea could not be considered sectional, as it was an article which was consumed as much in one Province as in the other. Of course it would be better if duties could be done without altogether, but if duties were necessary to sustain our public credit, he did not think they could be raised better on any article than tea. The hon. member for South Ontario said, by the imposition of a protective duty, the imports of goods dutiable to the extent of 17½ per cent. would be largely decreased, and he looked forward hopefully to the time when this decrease would take place. But, if there were a decrease of importations, there must also be a decrease in the revenue. On what then would the hon. gentleman levy duties. If articles now charged 17½ per cent. largely decreased in importations, it was clear that the Government would have to make up the deficiency in the revenue by placing an additional tax upon this very article of tea. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had referred frequently to the position of manufactures in this country. Of course it was to be regretted that manufactures should be suffering from financial depression; but he thought it would be admitted that Canadian manufactures did not suffer more than other branches of industry, or more than manufactures in other countries. On looking at the United States, great distress was found to exist there. In the city of New York—he spoke from memory—there were, only a few months ago, some 60,000 or 70,000 people out of employment; and in many States of the Union, and particularly Massachusetts, workmen were being discharged from large manufacturing establishments, and in the United States there was actually more distress among the labouring people than there was in any part of the Dominion. The hon. member for Terrebonne was always looking to bringing to Manitoba his friends from the United States, who emigrated there a few years ago. A large number of them had already come back to Canada, but why did they not remain in the United States if the protective system had been beneficial, and they could do better there than here? The fact was the Americans had protected themselves out of the markets of the world, and thus many people, who went there hoping to get the inflated prices of a few years ago, had to come back to Canada because they could not get a living. Evidence on this point was furnished by the last report of the Toronto Board of Trade:

“While our manufacturing interests have felt the full force of the financial depression, the operating classes are in general more fortunately situated than are those of the neighbouring Republic or more distant manufacturing districts.”

The House had been led to believe that the city of Toronto, and all the cities in the Upper Province were largely in favour of protection. It might naturally be expected that the Board of Trade, composed as it was of gentlemen selected on account of their financial abilities and familiarity with the wants of the country, would only make statements which they had good ground for, and yet they reported as follows:

“The vexed question of Protection v. Free-trade has been discussed at the Dominion Board of Trade. Particular prominence has been given to it on account of prevailing general depression.

“This Council, while recognizing the full importance of having manufactories in our midst, would deplore the creation of such a tariff as would in all probability promote unhealthy competition, and bring about financial distress. While our tariff has practically been framed for revenue purposes, the industrial interests have not been lost sight of, and it is a question requiring much thought and consideration how far a tariff can be stretched in that direction.”

And Mr. Worts, a leading business gentleman of the Province, in moving the adoption of the report, said he liked its tenor very much, and it was calculated to make business men more Conservative. He would draw the attention of the House to a position which he had mentioned on previous occasion, that the manufacturers under the 17½ per cent. tariff had the advantage of about 7½ per cent. which it cost to import goods into this country, making altogether about 25 per cent., and hon. members must admit that any interest which could not succeed under careful and judicious management, on such a protective duty was not one which they should endeavour to foster. The value of gold had largely declined in the United States, which placed the manufacturers in a much better position than they were twelve months ago. The hon. gentleman had referred to the duty on beer. Under the present arrangement, beer had a protection of 20 per cent. and he thought the brewers should be able to get along fairly with that. But there was one point that he thought the Government might have dealt with in discussing a tariff. There was no doubt that many anomalies existed in the present tariff. If the Government had considered there were certain articles which might fairly have borne a small duty, the general burthen of taxation might have been more evenly distributed. He said that, because the tariff framed by the late Government was for some reason or other very exceptional in its character. Take spikes and iron for instance. Iron paid 5 per cent. duty and spikes 17½ per cent., while galvanized spikes came in duty free. There was another point to which attention had been directed, and that was the sugar duties. He ventured to say it was a question regarding which the people might have expected legislation at the hands of the Government. An article of that importance, from which a large amount of revenue was collected, ought to have been more prominently referred to, considering the opportunity the Government had had for collecting information in regard to it. He was aware that the Government might say they did not feel in the position to try an experiment in the present condition of the revenue—that proposals submitted to them with regard to placing sugar on a different basis were of a speculative character and that they did not like, at this time, at all events, to run any risk. But they might have proposed, if they had taken the trouble to consider the information submitted to them, such a scheme as would have fairly encouraged that large industry. He thought the sugar interest had not been fairly treated in that respect. Every hon. member in business knew that the Government had laid down a rule that certain articles purchased in the United States could not be introduced in this country at their cost price—that the Government had provided that the wholesale prices current on such articles as pianos, organs and sewing machines should not be taken into account in paying the duty; and, if a merchant went to the United States to purchase such articles because he could get them at a cheap rate, when brought into Canada, they were not admitted to duty at the rate they were purchased for in the United States. That might be right or wrong, but he had an idea the Government was rather exceeding its authority in laying down an arbitrary valuation on articles before they were imported. The Government had ample opportunity and power to deal with the goods that came into Canada, but he was not aware that they could fix a value upon an article before it was offered for duty at the custom-house. But it had been done in the interests of Canadian manufacturers. It was done because there was an impression that the people of the United States sold goods cheaper to the people of Canada than to their own people.

An HON. MEMBER: Might not false invoices be used?

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he could assure his hon. friend that false invoices were not used in the cases that had come under his notice, because he knew the market value of the goods. If the Government had applied that same principle to sugar, he would not have complained; but the principle applied to the manufacturers had been refused to the sugar-refiners. The sugar interest demanded some consideration, because, if some legislation did not speedily take place, he was afraid we were going to lose a large trade with the West Indies. That trade, in the Maritime Provinces, at the present moment involved from three to four million dollars a year, but the inevitable result of the present policy would be to drive the whole trade to the United States. We sent our vessels with outward cargoes, which were sold in the West Indies, and they were obliged to take the sugar to the United States to have it refined. Cargoes of sugar passed through the Boston refineries, and in 24 or 36 hours were exported into Canada again under a bounty of 50 per cent. Such a system could not continue very long. In a short time, when the Americans found out that they had destroyed our trade, they would dictate their own terms, and then it would be seen how disastrous the present policy was. Lord Derby, speaking on this question in the House of Lords in 1875, said:

“I think my noble friend put this question a little too much as if it affected, exclusively, the interests of the colonial producer and the sugar-refiner. From our point of view, it is also a question affecting the general interests of the public. We are convinced that any advantage of the cheapness to the consumer, which can be obtained by means of the bounty on foreign sugar, will be temporary only, because if the bounty were continued long enough and raised high enough to drive the English sugar-refiners and colonial producer out of the market, then it follows that the foreign producer would get the monopoly of the market, in which case the price would not long remain at a low rate.”

He had other authorities on the subject, but he would not quote them at that late hour. He would merely say that the convention with France, Great Britain, and the other European Powers covered the difficulty. But it was lately discovered that Belgium was commencing the system of bounties, and the Powers immediately declared themselves free from any understanding on the point. During the last Session of the general Parliament, a Bill was introduced imposing a surtax on all sugars coming into the country equal to the bounty given by the country from which they were exported. On this point, Lord Derby said that if they had any duties in England at all they would be able to deal with the question; but, in the present condition of the English funds, it was hard to ask for the imposition of a duty on sugar when only two Sessions before the duty was taken off, and when there was no necessity, as far as the public funds were concerned, to justify it. The question was now before the Imperial Government, and it would, no doubt, be dealt with at an early day. Unless this Government was prepared to deal with the subject in the same manner as had been done by Germany, and impose a duty on American sugar equal to the bounty, it was no use for them to consider the tariff at all. One hon. gentleman, in referring to the condition of the public mind, said that the Government had not ventured to open the constituency of Halifax because they were afraid that an Opposition member might be returned. There was no one more anxious than himself that his colleague, who had so long and worthily represented the county, should have taken that position, if he had thought it consistent with his own feelings. If, however, the hon. gentleman had done so and there had been an election he would have been returned by as large a majority as he (Mr. Jones) had at the last election. The hon. member for Cardwell had referred to the increased expenditure in various branches of the public service. The expenditure naturally had increased since 1867, but there was no increase in the years to which the hon. member had referred. It was impossible that a new country like this could be governed without there being to a certain extent an increase year by year. The hon. gentleman had referred to the increased expenditure in the Post Office, but he should have remembered that two years ago the postal rates were reduced on letters and newspapers, and that, while the people were largely benefitted, a large amount of revenue was swept away. If the hon. member had been in the House he would have remembered the resolution moved by Sir Alexander Galt, which was equivalent to a vote of want of confidence. The resolution was as follows:—

“That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but be it resolved that this House regards the continued and rapid increase in the ordinary expenses of Government excessive and uncalled for, and believes that, unless more strict economy be observed in the general outlay of the country, great evils will speedily arise.”

Sir Alexander Galt on that occasion pointed out that during the three years which had elapsed since Confederation the expenses of civil Government had increased 45 per cent.; but the hon.

Mr. Jones

gentleman, who usually supported the right hon. member for Kingston, had nevertheless voted against the amendment, and consequently declared that it was right and proper so to increase such expenditure. He would tell his hon. friend that if he desired fully to investigate this matter, he should go back farther than he had done. He was very glad to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell with regard to the Weights and Measures Act, to which, when it was introduced, he (Mr. Jones) had taken exception. He had then requested the Government to delay putting it into operation, and to refrain from putting the country to the expense and inconvenience it would entail. He had considered the Act oppressive, unnecessary and uncalled for. He had said:

“It must be obvious that this was a retrograde step. Our largest transactions were with the West Indies and our neighbours alongside of us, where the wine measure was in use. We had made every effort to assimilate our trade customs with those of our neighbours across the border. We had assimilated our currency to theirs; we had adopted the continental gauge for our railways, and now we were adopting a system of weights and measures, which the old country would be glad to get rid of. We might as well return to the system of pounds, shillings and pence, or hundred-weights, quarters and pounds.”

He was rebuked on that occasion by the hon. member for Cumberland as having abused his privileges, an expression the hon. gentleman was very apt to indulge in. The hon. member said:

“If he had not made any remarks on the subject it was because there was nothing before the House. He looked upon such a discussion as an abuse of the privilege of drawing attention to these matters when the orders of the day were called. When this measure was attacked on a proper occasion he was not at all backward in stating to the House that he held himself entirely responsible as a member of the late Government for this legislation.”

He quite agreed with the hon. member for Cardwell with reference to this Act, a measure which he believed was introduced by the late Government in order to secure extended patronage. It was never carefully considered, and never called for by the people. The ground he had taken was abundantly justified by the feeling of the country in this relation, by the general inconvenience the Act had caused, and by the great anxiety the people evinced to have it abolished. He would give notice of his intention to endeavour to secure its repeal, and he invited the hon. gentleman's co-operation. If the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who had applauded the sentiments uttered by the hon. member for Cardwell, would also lend their assistance, he hoped they would be able to wipe this obnoxious Act from the Statute-book.

An HON. MEMBER: You cannot do it.

Mr. JONES said they would try to do it at all events. Better reasons would have to be given than had been given to justify his consent to the Act remaining in its present state. In the Estimates, $100,000 was asked to provide for the payment of Inspectors and other expenses connected with the working of the Act. He did not hesitate to say that this was a waste of public money. This was one of the measures which seemed to be introduced to order to embarrass business men, rather than with any other object. It had been said it had been put into operation in order that Inspectors might be appointed. He for one would reply that, although with his colleagues he had taken the responsibility of recommending a gentleman for such a position, he was willing to accept, with his colleague, the responsibility of securing the repeal of the Act, and legislating these inspectors, &c., out of office. The hon. member for Cardwell, while referring to the recent loan, had laid down a proposition which, if applied to his own profession, he thought the hon. gentleman would be the first to repudiate. The hon. gentleman was a distinguished member of an honourable profession, to which belonged gentlemen who would scorn to do anything which was not straightforward and honest. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman had laid down the proposition that, if any person came to him and sought professional advice, he would give advice in accordance with his own interests, and with the amount of money which he was to make out of the transaction—this was the logical sequence of the hon. gentleman's argument. The hon. gentleman told them that, when the Finance Minister went to our financial agents in England, they, of course, would give such advice as would be most beneficial to their own interests, because they themselves were taking one quarter of a million of the loan. He would tell the hon. gentleman that Glyn, Mills, and Baring were well known and highly appreciated in the financial institutions of the world, and their reputation stood as high, as regarded honourable dealing, as the reputation of gentlemen who held the highest legal positions in this country, and they would scorn to tender advice which might at all reflect upon them as the agents of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman taking up the same argument which had been used by the hon. member for Cumberland, charged that these gentlemen advised the Minister of Finance to place the loan at 91, and that, in consequence of this fact, the public securities of Canada, which had been quoted at 94, or thereabouts, declined to 92½. The hon. gentleman, if he was familiar with business transactions, must have known that, if this was the effect of placing the loan at 91, that effect would have been much greater if the price of the loan had not been fixed at all.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Five times more was asked for than could be allotted.

Mr. JONES: That was because the price was fixed at the sum mentioned.

Mr. BOWELL: Who would give 94 when they could buy at 91?

Mr. JONES said the effect of the loan going on the market was to bring down the securities of the Dominion to that extent. The best proof that could be given of the soundness of the loan was that these gentlemen, so eminent in the financial world, were willing to put down their names for the quarter of it.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES: Hon. gentlemen exclaimed "Hear, hear," but they must know very well that if a man entered into any business transaction, the best evidence he could give of his faith in it was to invest in it to a large amount. When the Minister of Finance could point to the financial agents of the Government, who were familiar with our position and our resources, and say that they were willing to take one quarter of the loan, it was the best evidence—apart from the loan itself—that could be offered to keep up the credit of the country, and to prevent our other public securities from declining to a lower point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is the best evidence that it was worth more. When these gentlemen took hold of the loan, it was evidently worth more; and accordingly they subscribed to keep part of it for themselves.

Mr. MILLS: The hon gentleman implies that they gave improper advice.

An HON. MEMBER: It was a business transaction.

Mr. JONES said the hon. member intimated that the financial agents gave improper advice. The right hon. member might take whichever horn of the dilemma he liked best. If the hon. gentleman was prepared to say that these agents gave improper advice, this was a proposition which could be discussed. If, on the other hand, the hon. gentleman did not mean this, he ought to say so, because houses like the Barings and the Glyn's were in a position to do this country great service, and it was not well in our interests that insinuations should be made by eminent public men, which tended to cast a slur on those gentlemen. He thought that our financial agents should know what the opinion of the leaders of the Opposition was in their regard.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES said the question to be decided at the close of the discussion was whether the Government should enjoy their confidence. He had listened most carefully to the arguments advanced against the Government, and had come to the conclusion that the affairs of the country had been administered wisely, carefully, prudently and economically. The Government, on coming into power, had been met with great difficulties, the legacies of the late Administration. One of these was the Riel question. While the present leader of the Opposition was pretending, in his own Province, that he was anxious to catch a certain gentleman, evidence taken before a Select Committee showed that at the same time he was furnishing him funds to live in another country. This matter was settled by the present Government, if not satisfactorily, in the best possible manner, and he believed that the settlement was very satisfactory.

Mr. JONES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. It was settled by the Governor-General, without reference to the Government. The Government had nothing to do with it.

Mr. BOWELL: I think that the Government is responsible for the whole of it.

Mr. JONES said the Government had also settled the New Brunswick School Question, which the late Administration had not dared to touch, fearing local influences and religious difficulties. The present Government had indicated the right of the Local Parliament and had invited such an expression of opinion from the Imperial Government as brought this matter to a settlement. Another question related to British Columbia. The late Government, by the aid of a large majority, had forced on the House laws bringing British Columbia into Confederation and committing this country to an expenditure which they themselves now admitted we were incapable of literally fulfilling. The only fault he had to find with the Government was that they had not repudiated the whole transaction.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES: Hon. gentlemen say "Hear, hear."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is coming.

Mr. JONES: I hold that the public opinion of this country would have justified the act.

An HON. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. JONES said that, if the Government had told British Columbia:

"You were brought in under an arrangement of which we did not approve, and one which the people of this country would never have ratified if it had been submitted to them, and while we are not anxious for you to remain in Confederation if it does not suit you, we will not conform to or carry out the agreement of the late Government requiring us to build the Pacific Railway." He believed that if this attitude had been assumed, the people of this country would have approved of it.

An HON. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. JONES said he had mentioned some of the difficulties which the late Government had to meet, and they had dealt with everything in a practical manner.

Mr. BOWELL: Sugar excepted.

Mr. JONES said that, further, every hon. gentleman was familiar with the system of corruption which had prevailed throughout the country during the existence of the late Administration. He knew it well to his cost.

An HON. MEMBER: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. JONES said this lasted so long as the Government had control of the Secret Service money. He believed some of it had been sent to his own county, Pictou, in 1872. He thought it had also been largely sent to Nova Scotia in 1869, when the Hon. Mr. Howe ran his election for Hants. The first thing the present Government had done was to place an Act on the Statute-book which rendered such things impossible. They and their friends had, perhaps, suffered in consequence, but this was only right. They might have overstepped the bounds prescribed by the Act, but the country, nevertheless, owed them a debt of gratitude in this respect. If the Act was properly administered, it made electoral corruption impossible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The late Government passed this law.

Mr. JONES said hon. gentlemen opposite said that the late Opposition forced them to repeal the National Policy, and the late Government had introduced this Election Law because the Opposition had forced it on them; and this was only after they had committed bribery extensively through one or two general elections. The Government had also established the Supreme Court, while the civil and religious rights and privileges of the country had been vindicated and sustained. When party feeling and animosity died away, the people would recognize the fact that public affairs had been fairly and honestly administered. Their whole object had been to elevate the interests of the country.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: And the standard.

Mr. JONES wondered why the hon. gentleman did not also say "big push." The Government could challenge the confidence of their friends in and out of the House, and when the proper time came, they could appeal to the country with the same confidence, and then they would be triumphantly sustained.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he wished to answer the hon. member for Halifax with regard to the sugar question. It appeared that there were advocates in the House for all branches of trade. He thought that the duty on sugar was at all events high enough; and he had understood the hon. member for Halifax to argue that the duty should be increased.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): No.

Mr. ROSS said the sugar refiners had argued that the duty was higher upon the low grades of sugar than upon the higher grades. He had made a calculation which he had verified by the evidence given before the Depression of Trade Committee last year. For the six months ending the 31st of December last, there had been imported from the United States, 11,497,288 lb. of hard sugar, against 4,186,982 lb. from Great Britain; of white sugar, 125,752 lb. from the United States against 7,913,834 lb. from Great Britain; of yellow sugar, 1,631,158 lb. from the United States against 21,797,354 lb. from Great Britain. The total amount imported from Great Britain was 34,323,967 lb.; from the United States, 13,923,494 lb., and from other countries, 9,881,609 lb., making in all for those six months, 58,129,070 lb. of sugar imported into Canada. It therefore appeared that the larger portion of the sugar did not come from the United States. It was said that sugar was higher in price during the last year or two than before, but that was not true. From 1868 to 1872, the lowest price of yellow sugar was 9.35, the highest price 10.15 and the average 9.85. From 1872 to 1876, the lowest price of yellow was 7½ and of white a little more than 9.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): What is the price to-day?

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward): It is about 6s. 8d. cheaper than it has been for years past. On January 15, 1876, the price was 18s. 6d.; on April 12, 19s.; on July 25, 22s. 6d.; on October 19, 24s. 3d.; on October 26, 25s. 6d.; on November 1, 26s.; on November 11, 35s.; on November 16, 32s. 6d.; on November 23, 33s. 9d.; on December 14, 31s.; on December 21, 30s. 6d.; on January 18, 30s. 6d.; and on February 19, 27s. 3d. He thought it was to the interest of this country that sugar should be bought as cheap as possible. He thought there should be no additional duty, and he considered the Government deserved credit for taking the drawback off refined sugar. He thought the change in the tariff was in the interest of the country. There was a great cry about the duty on tea, but it would only amount to an addition of from $250,000 to $260,000 in twelve months. He also gave them credit for taking the duty off coal oil, amounting to about $900,000 a year, which every one used, especially in the rural districts. It was said that a poor man had to pay as much of the 2c. duty on tea as the rich man, but tea had not been as cheap for 30 years as it was to-day. If there was one item more than another on which the duty could be increased it was on tea, and it was a burden which could easily be taken off. He agreed with the increase of the duties on malt, beer and porter, and believed the country would back the Government up in their proposals upon that subject. He had formerly been more or less a Protectionist, and had for many years supported the present members of the Opposition in their policy on that point, but, when he found that they adopted a National Policy at three o'clock, which they repealed at half-past seven on the same day, he got tired of them and would not follow them any longer. He did not think the Liberal party were the means of repealing that National Policy, but believed it was the member for Cumberland, who put the screws on the Government and made them repeal it. He would be very glad to support the proposal of the Finance Minister.

Mr. Ross.

Mr. FLEMING moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn the debate agreed to.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 12th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

REPRESENTATION OF ELECTORS OF STOUFFVILLE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. METCALFE introduced a Bill (No. 70) To preserve to the electors of the village of Stouffville the continuance of their representation in Parliament, to the respective electoral divisions in which they were placed before the incorporation of the said village.

Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT REPEAL BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 71) To repeal the Act 36 Victoria chap. 47, entitled "An Act respecting Weights and Measures."

Mr. MACDONNELL asked if the Bill did not come under Rule 41, which provided that all measures affecting trade should be first introduced by resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER said the question was whether this was one of the meaasures affecting trade contemplated by the rule. His impression was that it was, but he was not prepared to decide positively and the Bill might as well go to the next stage.

Mr. HOLTON said he would suggest that the hon. member for Halifax should withdraw his motion, and reintroduce it when Mr. Speaker was prepared to decide the point.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said, according to the authorities, this was not a question affecting trade. May said:

"Bills relating to weights and measures have been treated as questions of public policy, affecting the whole community, and not merely the interests of trade."

Mr. TUPPER said this subject was considered so important by the Government that it was referred to in the Speech. The motion of the hon. member for Halifax, therefore, was virtually one of want of confidence. He suggested that the hon. member could attain his object, if there was any difficulty as to getting the Bill before the House, by moving a general vote of want of confidence.

Mr. JONES said he was obliged for the advice of the hon. gentleman. He thought this question could be dealt with in the same way as the Insolvent Act Repeal Bill. It was then announced by the Government that, if the House thought fit to adopt the measure, they would not take further action, at the same time intimating that, in the event of the Act not being repealed, they had certain amendments to propose. He proposed to invite the opinion of the House as to the propriety of repealing the Weights and Measures Act. If the motion was not affirmed, he presumed that a notice of motion looking to the amendment of the Act would be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER said May seemed to be very clear on the point, and he thought the hon. member would be safe in allowing his motion to stand. There was, moreover, a case in point in the Journals of the British House of Commons. On the 10th July, 1860, leave was given to introduce a Bill relating to Weights and Measures on motion.

Mr. HOLTON said he thought the reasoning in May rather unconvincive when he said this was a matter of public policy and therefore need not be founded on resolution. Were not trade and commerce matters of public policy?

Mr. SPEAKER said the inference from May was that procedure should be taken by resolution when the Bill applied to some special trade, the buying and selling or exporting and importing of merchandise.

Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 28) Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 25) To amend the Act incorporating the Canada Atlantic Cable Company.—(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 43) To authorize the Union Forwarding and Railway Company to reduce its paid-up capital.—(Mr. Currier.)

SPRINGHILL AND PARRS-BOROUGH COAL AND RAILWAY CO. BILL.

[BILL No. 12.]

(Mr. Domville.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 12) To grant additional powers to the Springhill and Parrsborough Coal and Railway Company (Limited).

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported, with certain amendments.

House resumed.

Bill, as amended, reported.

Amendments read the first and second times and agreed to.

FISH BREEDING ESTABLISHMENT IN CAPE BRETON.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) asked whether it was the intention of the Gov.

ernment to erect, as requested, a Fish Breeding Establishment in Cape Breton.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) : It is not.

DREDGING IN CAPE BRETON.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) asked whether it was the intention of the Government to comply with the request that certain dredging should be done in the localities indicated in Cape Breton county.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I do not know where the localities indicated are. I can merely say, however, as to dredging generally, that the whole dredging power in the hands of the Government will be devoted to the localities which seem most to require it in proportion to trade, and the obstacles opposed to navigation. The attention of the Chief Engineer has been directed towards the localities which have been brought to my notice by members of the House and local petitions ; and, before he leaves the capital, arrangements will be made to have the dredges sent to those places which seem to require them most in his opinion.

QUARANTINE STATION AND HOSPITAL AT SYDNEY.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) asked whether it was the intention of the Government to comply with the request that a Quarantine Station should be established and Hospital erected at the Port of Sydney, Cape Breton.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Such an establishment has already been created there, and the only question which arises is whether that hospital shall be used for persons having infectious diseases, or whether a somewhat small one shall be erected more remote from the population, for the purpose of receiving patients suffering from infectious diseases. It is likely that some provision will be made for that from the vote contained in the Estimates last year.

Mr. MACKAY.

BREAKWATER AT MAIN-A-DIEU

QUESTION.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) asked whether it was the intention of the Government to put a sum of money in the Supplementary Estimates to build a breakwater at Main-a-Dieu, N.S.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I might say that the Supplementary Estimates will disclose that when they come down, but I have no objection to say we do not think that this is one of the places which imperatively requires such a work at the present time.

FOURCHI HARBOUR, RICHMOND COUNTY.

QUESTION.

Mr. FLYNN asked whether it was the intention of the Government to dredge the harbour of Fourchi, in the county of Richmond, this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I can only give the same answer which I gave to the hon. member for Cape Breton. This is a matter which will be reported upon by the Chief Engineer, and we will be directed to a great extent, if not entirely by his opinion.

PORT HOOD HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR REPORTS AND PLANS.

Mr. MACDONNELL moved for all Reports and Plans of Port Hood Harbour in the county of Inverness, made by engineers under the direction of the Dominion Government.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BANK DEPOSITS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for a return of Government Deposits in the different banks of the Dominion for each quarter from January 1st, 1876, to January 1st, 1877, inclusive.

Mr. TUPPER suggested that the return should state the amount drawing interest, and also the rate of interest.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said it would be advisable to have the returns furnished every month instead of every quarter.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an order of the House do issue for a return of the Government deposits in the different banks of the Dominion on the first day of each month, from January 1st, 1876, to January 1st, 1877, inclusive; and also at the agencies of such banks and banking houses in London, and specifying the amounts drawing interest, and the rate thereof.

APPOINTMENT OF J. G. NORRIS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for correspondence with reference to the appointment of Mr. J. G. Norris as Deputy Collector of Customs at Kootenay, British Columbia, with copies of any recommendations on his behalf. He stated that the gentleman who occupied the position prior to the appointment of Mr. Norris was a Mr. Seeley, who, unfortunately, was taken with a very severe illness. About that time a gentleman (Mr. C. T. Dupont) was sent to inspect the Customs Ports between Victoria and Kootenay, and last Session the hon. the Minister of Customs forwarded a letter from Mr. Dupont to himself, stating that he was about leaving for Kootenay, and suggesting that some one should be appointed in his place, and asking him (Mr. Dewdney) to make a recommendation for the appointment. He did so, and recommended Mr. Fernie. Mr. Dupont was then sent to Kootenay (in the meantime Mr. Seeley died) and placed Mr. Fernie in charge of the port, and he remained there for some months, when Mr. Norris appeared with his commission in his pocket, and Mr. Fernie had to leave. This was a great hardship to Mr. Fernie, who had resigned his appointment of some $1,400 a year to take charge of the Customs.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said all the members from British Columbia had signed Mr. Norris's recommendation to the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he was authorized to state that not a single member from British Columbia had recommended Mr. Norris for the Kootenay appointment. He read an extract from a letter from the hon. the Minister of Customs to a Mr. Bunting, of St. John, New Brunswick, in which he stated: "I wrote to the members for British Columbia about your brother, asking them to nominate him, but their answer was that they were committed to Mr. Norris." This he (Mr. Dewdney) stated was false.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA CUSTOMS STATIONS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government and Mr. C. T. Dupont, or any other parties, with reference to his inspection of the several Customs Stations between Victoria and Kootenay in 1876; also, copy of instructions to Mr. Dupont, as well as his report on his return.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE EDWIN LARWILL.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE AND DOCUMENTS.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence and documents passed or written subsequent to the 1st October, 1876, relating to the superannuation, retiring allowance, or allowance made to the widow or relations of Edwin Larwill, a late employé of the Dominion Government, deceased. He said he submitted the motion for the purpose of ascertaining the truth or falsity of the statement made that great injustice had been done to the family of Mr. Larwill. Many years ago Mr. Larwill was recommended for employment in the public service and received a situation, the duties of which he had discharged faithfully and honestly. Latterly, in consequence of his being an old man and in feeble health, it was decided that he should retire from the service, and it was arranged with the Government that he should be paid $1,000. Mr. Larwill left Ottawa for Chatham with the distinct understanding that that allowance would be granted. It appeared that an Order in Council was passed granting Mr. Larwill that gratuity, but before the Order in Council was transmitted to him he died, and his widow, who was residing in Manitoba, was compelled to accept two months' gratuity. That was surely a hardship, and although $800 might probably have been saved to the country, it had been taken from the widow, and the country did not ask such economy at the hands of the Government. If the Order in Council giving such gratuity were passed before he died, the least the Government could do would be to pass the cheque to the credit of the widow and give her the money.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Chatham could obtain the papers he asked for, with the exception of the Order in Council granting two months' gratuity, as there was no such Order. He thought the hon. member had better have left the matter alone. Mr. Larwill was an old member of Parliament whom he had more than once befriended. Mr. Larwill had been unable to do any work for two years; he obtained leave of absence for two months and afterwards for six months, and shortly after he returned he was unable to attend to active duties. Mr. Larwill then asked leave of absence for other three or six months, whereupon he (Mr. Mackenzie) suggested as to whether it would not be better for him to accept a gratuity, and to relinquish all idea of doing further service. Mr. Larwill thought that would be the better plan, and the question of the arrangement to be made was referred to the Department. It was decided that $912, one year's pay, should be given to him, and an Order in Council was passed carrying out the arrangement. Mr. Larwill died seven or eight days afterwards, and the money had been sent, he believed, to his widow some time ago.

Mr. STEPHENSON asked if he was to understand that the year's allowance had been sent to Mr. Larwill's widow.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the necessary order had been given, and he thought the money had been sent. The hon. the leader of the Opposition would agree with him that such money became the property of the estate, and the legal difficulty of dealing with it in that way had probably caused some delay. It was the custom to give two months' pay to every employé on the Civil Service list who left the service. Mr. Larwill was never on the Civil Service list; he was employed about the Parliamentary Buildings. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was personally very desirous to show all possible kindness towards an old neighbour and old political opponent. When the money became the property of the estate in consequence of the Order in Council having been passed before his death, it became a question as to how the money should be paid. If it could properly be paid to the widow, such would be done; if not, to the parties to whom the estate belonged, and he was not able at present to determine the point.

Mr. STEPHENSON.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was a fact that the hon. the Premier and other gentlemen of the same political party joined in a request that Mr. Larwill should be employed and he had been so employed. He was very glad to hear that the grant had been given, and he hoped no difficulty would be found in paying over the money to the widow.

Mr. BLAKE said the question as to the position of the Government with respect to the Order in Council which had been passed had been brought before his attention as legal adviser to the Government. He was of the opinion that the Government had made a bargain with Mr. Larwill by which he was entitled to one year's pay, and that his death did not entitle the Government, if they felt disposed, to withdraw from the bargain, and make the usual grant of two months' pay. The grant, therefore, became an asset of Mr. Larwill, and an asset of his estate.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he was extremely glad to have heard the statements of the hon. the Premier and the hon. the Minister of Justice, because, in his section of country, advantage had been taken of Mr. Larwill's case to attack the Government.

Motion, with leave of the House withdrawn.

PETITION OF ELIZABETH SULLIVAN.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Public Works and the Engineer in charge of the Culbute Canal, in reference to the petition of Elizabeth Sullivan, of the township of Pembroke, in the county of Renfrew, praying for compensation for damages alleged to have been sustained by her, through the construction of a dam at the said Culbute Canal, together with a copy of the Engineer's report on the subject-matter of the said petition.

Motion agreed to.

THE RIDEAU CANAL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. SHIBLEY moved for a return showing the quantity and price of land purchased for the purposes of the construction and maintenance of the Kingston and Ottawa division of the Rideau Canal; also copies of all leases or agreements disposing of any water-power in connection with said canal. He said he had asked for the return because a large number of dams had been erected by the Government across several of the principal streams running through the rear of the county he had the honour to represent, drowning large quantities of land belonging to private individuals, ostensibly for the purposes of the Rideau Canal, but in reality for the purposes and in the interests of a few mill-owners and lumbermen, who controlled the dams and regulated the waters to suit themselves, without regard to the requirements of the canal. The origin of the principal one of those dams, called the Dominion Dam, near Devil Lake, across the outlet of Mud Lake in the township of Bedford, which dammed the water back through several other lakes and streams in the townships of Loughborough, Portland and Bedford, dated back some twenty-five or thirty years. It was first erected and maintained in a temporary manner by a few mill-owners and lumbermen to enable them to run timber and logs, and to create a reservoir for their mills. Finding it difficult and expensive to keep up the dams, and to arrange with a number of persons whose lands were drowned by the dam, and who were kept quiet by annual payments, which, in the case of a Mr. O'Reilly, amounted to the aggregate of $1,250, the mill-owners and lumbermen who erected the dam persuaded the Government in 1871 and 1872 to assume the dam, and consequently to assume the responsibilities of the parties erecting the dams to the persons whose lands were injured. The Government not only assumed the dam and the responsibilities referred to, but they even did more: they raised the dam higher than it had ever been, and consequently flooded the country and the lands of the unfortunate people in the vicinity more than ever; and, although the Government, when assuming the dam, necessarily assumed the responsibility of settling with those whose lands were damaged by it, and although by raising the dam higher they increased the damage, yet strange to say, the payments annually made before the Government assumed the dam to the persons whose lands were drowned were discontinued, and up to this time these unfortunate people had not received one cent from the Government. Last year, however, the Government, finding themselves pressed for a settlement of the claims for damages alluded to, became aware that they were incurring great expense and a heavy responsibility, by keeping up a useless dam, nominally for a worse than useless canal, but in reality for a few mill-owners and lumbermen, and they wisely came to the decision to abandon it. The decision of the Government was not at once carried into effect; the people, knowing the decision, weary of the grievance, and desirous of having the use of their lands during last summer, simply saved the Government the expense of taking down the dam by doing it themselves in the early part of the summer. With respect to the Rideau Canal itself, he submitted that it had outlived its usefulness by a number of years. The construction of the St. Lawrence Canals, of the Grand Trunk, of the Brockville, Perth and Ottawa, and recently of the Kingston and Pembroke Railroad, now finished for forty-six miles, had, in his opinion, so materially altered the state of affairs existing when the canal was undertaken, that the reasons which originally justified its being constructed, no longer existed. The Public Accounts for the last two years showed a lamentable state of affairs as regarded this canal. They showed that, while the receipts for all purposes from the canal amounted to only $8,000 per annum, it cost the people of this country for running expenses and repairs $48,000 per annum, entailing an annual loss of $40,000, with every prospect of the loss increasing with every successive year. Should the Government abandon this worse than useless canal—and they would be compelled to do so sooner or later; the sooner it was done, in his humble opinion, the better, as it was a mere question of time—a large amount of arable land of the very best quality would be reclaimed by letting off the water. He was satisfied that if the return he asked for was granted, it would show the quantity and value of the land which would be reclaimed by the abandonment of the canal to be sufficient to construct and equip a railroad the whole length of the canal, in addition to the saving of $40,000 per annum, which the operation of the canal was now costing the country.

Mr. HAGGART said the dams the hon. gentlemen complained of were almost the only public improvements of utility that the Government had constructed in their section of the country. The Government had taken every means in their power to find out what amount of damage had been sustained by the farmers, and when ascertained they were paid in full. It might be said that the mill-owners were mainly benefitted by the dams, but he thought they were a benefit to the Rideau Canal. He did not think the Government should abandon a public improvement like this simply because the receipts were a little less than the expenditure.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he was surprised that any hon. gentleman should recommend a work of this character to be abandoned. The inlet of the canal was at Kingston and ran 126 miles through fine country to Ottawa, where it connected with the

Mr. SHIBLEY.

Ottawa River, and any one could recognize that it was a valuable improvement. It was built in the year 1840, before any settlers went in upon the lands; or if they did they went as squatters, and did not obtain their patents until 1844 or 1845. The Report of the Engineer, dated March 2nd, 1864, stated:

“A large portion of these lands belong to Government, and of those occupied are principally by squatters. The loss to those who have bought the lots cannot be great, from the fact that the shores of these lakes are so steep that little damage can be done by raising the waters, and the price paid to the Government is only 70c. per acre. On Devil, Big Mud, Birch, Little Mud, Desert and Knowlton Lakes are the only points where any damage can be done, and even these few in number.”

In 1871, Mr. Slater, in relation to low water on the Kingston end of the canal, reported that it was necessary to rebuild the dam at Devil's Lake, which was 50 feet long and 12 feet high, and would cost $200; and that there was at that time only one claimant for damages, and he paid the Government $87 for his land, and had been paid $1,000 by the mill-owners for his damages. On the 25th January, 1872, an Order in Council was passed, granting authority to build the dams at Hunt and Devil Lake, $700 being appropriated for the purpose. Mr. John Porter reported upon a petition to remove the dam at the outlet of Mud Lake, as follows:—

“It is desirable that the dam be retained, as it has a most beneficial effect in regulating the water in the Rideau Canal—when the water is low during the latter part of the summer—supplying a defect long felt in the navigation of the Rideau Canal. That no deeds be granted to any persons for lands adjoining these lakes affected by this dam, without the following proviso:—That it shall be lawful for the Department of Public Works to maintain the waters of the lakes and streams adjacent at the highest level attained at any time previous to the date hereof (October, 1872), without liability for damages to the said grantee, his heirs and assigns.”

Mr. Wise on the 4th of November, 1875, made the following report:—
“In the fall of last year Mr. Luke O'Rielly, living on lot No. 2, Con. X. township of Bedford, county of Frontenac, preferred a claim against the Government for drowning some 88 acres of his land by the construction of a dam at the foot of Mud Lake, commonly called 'Chaffey's Dominion Dam.' As this was only one of many such claims which would be presented by persons residing on these waters, I recommended that before any action was taken, a correct survey and plan should be made, showing the nature and extent of the damage caused by this dam. Mr. Perry, P.L.S., was engaged last winter on this survey, and I have now the honour to enclose his plan and schedule which shows the whole extent of the lands drowned very fully. The history of this dam seems to have been as follows:— Messrs. B. Tett and George Chaffey, who were until lately largely engaged in lumbering operations on these waters, maintained a dam of similar height at the same point for the last 40 years, for the purpose of raising the water to float timber and logs to their mills at the foot of Devil Lake, when these waters fall into the Rideau Canal navigation. From the employment of these mills gave, an inducement to settlers was offered to come into that section of the country to get out logs and square timber, and the dam, during the time lumber lasted, was a benefit to all concerned. In the year 1871 the supply of logs became limited, and Mr. John Chaffey, who then worked the mills, decided to stop his operations, and leased his interests to two sons of Mr. Tett, who now work them. About the same time the supply of water in the Rideau navigation, descending towards Kingston, failed, and an investigation into the cause, with a view to remedy the same, was made by Mr. Slater, the late Superintendent, who recommended that the Government should build this old dam, then much out of repair. This was authorized by letter No. 13,742, February 22nd, 1872. It appears that 20 years prior to the Government rebuilding the dam, a few of the settlers had been pressing Mr. Chaffey & Co. for damages, amongst them Mr. Luke O'Rielly, and to avoid litigation they paid him a yearly rental varying from $35 to $60, in all some $1,100. The settlers now set up the claim that the Government, having rebuilt the dam, should assume the damage it causes. Mr. Perry's schedule shows there is over a thousand acres more or less drowned, by far the largest portion of which was drowned prior to any settlement. From a personal examination of these lands, I am convinced the damage is greatly exaggerated. The land lays so low that it could not be drained and would not be worth the labour of re-claiming, supposing the dam was removed. The shores of all these lakes and streams are precipitous and rocky. The number of old deserted houses testify that as soon as the lumbering interest had given out there was nothing for the settler to live on. The land of Mr. O'Rielly is of somewhat a better description, and a good part of his land is cleared and worked. The land he claims damages for is at present an unimproved swamp, which he purchased with the rest of his farm in 1844 at $1.30 an acre. He now claims to be paid at the rate of $30, having made no improvements, and the timber on it still green and fit for use. The swamp lays from one to two feet above the level of low water in the creek which unites Knowlton and Little Mud Lake. In spring it is flooded to the extent of about two feet in depth, but as the water is drawn down at the dam, it gradually lowers, until in the fall you can walk over it dry. Supposing the dam removed, I consider it would still be liable to be flooded by the spring freshets, and when cleared would only be fit for wild goats. Crown land lots are now selling in that locality for $2 an acre. Should the Government after considering the legal points involved, entertain paying claims on these waters, I would recommend that one or two properly qualified valutors be appointed to assess each particular claim on its own merits, as such high ideas of the value of land in that section of the country as Mr. O'Rielly holds cannot be maintained. The maintenance of the dam is, I consider, necessary to secure the navigation of the canal during periods of low water which experience has shown now occur. The dam piers back the snow and rainfall of a large area of rocky country, and on that account at a minimum of damage. To, however, secure the benefit of this water to the canal at the season it is most required, a paid officer of the Department should be put in charge of it without delay." It appeared that after this report was made recommending the dam to be maintained, the Department of Public Works ordered the dam to be removed. Hearing that this was to be done, he and others from that section opposed it, and, consequently, it was delayed. What then took place? About the end of July, a band of ruffians, armed and otherwise prepared, destroyed this dam, which belonged to the Government and which was under the charge of the Public Works Department; and no attempt had since been made to discover and punish the persons who committed this lawless and criminal act. He also understood that the destruction of another dam, to which allusion had been made, was threatened. One document, dated 29th November, 1875, from the Public Works Department, stated that, in consequence of Mr. F. A. Wise's report of 4th November, 1875, the Government dam at Devil's Lake would be abandoned. Mr. Wise's report, however, distinctly stated that this dam should be kept up for the benefit of Rideau Canal navigation. In another document, dated January 4th, 1876, Mr. Wise sent a sketch of the Government dam; and in a third, dated January 17th, 1876, Mr. Wise recommended that the dam be not removed, but that the stop logs be taken out for a season, which would be sufficient to convince most of the claimants that its removal would not confer any advantages, but, on the contrary, would deprive many of the inhabitants of the means of obtaining a living. On February 7th, 1876, the Public Works Department ordered that no further expenditure should take place on the dam; and on February 17th, 1876, Mr. Shibley wrote expressing his pleasure that the dam was to be abandoned. On March 1st, 1876, letters were written to T. P. Tett, John Chaffey, and others, offering to give them the dam providing they would be responsible for damages. On April 5th, 1876, Mr. Wise wrote as follows:—"Experience has shown that periods of low water now occur which formerly did not, and, if the supply for navigation on the descending level to Kingston is to be efficiently maintained, all the present reserves should be held under control for an emergency of that kind. The damages if fairly assessed should not exceed $3,000." And on April 10th, 1876, Mr. Shibley wrote stating that no action had been taken, and requesting the dam to be removed. He did not think, at all events, that Mr. Luke O'Reilly, who had created the whole disturbance, had any claim on the Government. Some $8,000 or $10,000 were claimed, when it was recommended that only $2,000 or $3,000 should in any case be allowed. He did not believe that any claims should be entertained as this work should be kept up in the interests of the country. The Government had never paid a single sixpence for the canal, which was a gift from the British Government. In the face of the engineer's report to the contrary, an order had been given to have the dam abandoned, and why? On the strength of a petition supported by a member of Parliament. These dams were necessary in the interests of navigation on the canal, and, if it did not pay directly, it certainly paid indirectly; very few of our public works paid in any other manner. This work was of the greatest importance, and yet not one sixpence had been placed in the Estimates this year to keep it in proper condition. He thought, however, he had done his duty to his constituents with regard to this matter.

Mr. JONES.

MR. SHIBLEY said he understood the hon. member for South Lanark to state that all the lands injured by the construction of the Dominion Dam had been surveyed and paid for; he begged to be allowed to put the hon. member right; the fact was that, of all the land drowned by that dam, not one single acre had been paid for. The hon. member for South Leeds seemed to have a great deal of sympathy for the lumbermen and mill-owners, and none at all for the poor men whose lands were drowned. He seemed to think that the lumbermen were great benefactors to the country. He (Mr. Shibley) could not quite agree with the hon. member for Leeds. The lumbermen, not satisfied with buying all the limits, had also, in order to have a monopoly of the lumber business, bought up all the mill sites, although they could not of course use them all; and, when the poor people whose lands were flooded by the dam, and other settlers came to buy lumber, these men, whom the hon. member for South Leeds considered benefactors, actually charged them as much as, and in some cases more than, they got for the same quality of lumber when they shipped it to Kingston. And today lumber could be bought in Kingston as cheap or cheaper than it could be bought at those mills. The hon. member for Leeds had stated that the lands which were flooded by the dam had only cost some seventy cents an acre. He (Mr. Shibley) desired to remind him that these lands were bought some twenty-five or thirty years ago, and he doubted whether or not some of these mill sites, for which so much consideration was claimed, and in which the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Jones) was interested, did not originally cost even less than that sum. The hon. gentleman claimed that the Dominion Dam was necessary for the operation of the canal, whereas it was well known that the dam was not assumed by the Government until 1872, while the canal had been in operation over forty years before that time. The parties who destroyed the dam had been styled ruffians by the member for Leeds; he (Mr. Shibley) desired to say that they were not ruffians, but aggrieved respectable citizens seeking their rights, and he resumed his seat, hoping that the House would grant the return asked for.

Mr. ROCHESTER said that, if these dams were removed, it would prevent the navigation of Rideau Canal. He was very sorry to hear any hon. member state that the abandonment of the canal was only a question of time, as it had cost the country nothing. He certainly thought that the Government would never consent to this being done. It might not directly pay working expenses, but it paid indirectly. As the country became cleared, spring freshets occurred, but they only lasted a very short time. He hoped that his hon. friend from Addington would not endeavour to destroy this canal, which was of great utility. In 1864, he moved for a Committee to enquire into its condition, and the result had been that moneys were voted for the purpose of constructing these retaining dams, and, to his own knowledge, the navigation of the canal had greatly improved since that time, besides furnishing considerable water-powers, which were very important. He thought it was of the greatest importance that the Rideau Canal should be kept open.

Mr. CURRIER said both the navigation and the water-power would be ruined if the retaining dams were not kept in proper order. When the canal was handed over to the Government, it was upon the express condition that it should be kept in good repair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the canal was constructed by the Imperial Government, and the Canadian Government did not pay a single sixpence towards its cost. It was built in the first instance from a military point of view, and afterwards given to Canada by the Imperial Government. He thought the Dominion Government was bound to keep the work in good repair as a navigable canal until it was determined by Parliament to abandon it. This policy could not be altered, whether the canal was remunerative or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE said as a matter of fact the dam referred to did not belong to the Government. It was a private affair, although it had been repaired by the Government. The traffic on the canal was almost infinitesimal, and its revenue was only $8,000. This was not the proper time to discuss the question as to whether it was advisable to continue operations on the canal or not, but he would take the opportunity of saying that the dams merely accommodated private parties, and there was plenty of water in the canal for navigable purposes, though not for mill purposes. A great blunder committed by the late Government was to permit the system of running mills along the canal when the water was wasted and the current made uneven. If parties wanted mill-power they should secure it at their own expense and not at the expense of the Government. The question of abandoning the canal was a serious one, and the Government would not enter upon it lightly. In the course of next year, or certainly the year following, a very large outlay would be necessary for maintaining the canal. It would then perhaps be wise to discuss the question of how the work was to be dealt with in the future. In the meantime, the only object of the Government was to avoid paying for damages for which they were not responsible.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had been informed that without the reservoir it would be impossible for a boat to run on the canal at particular times. If this was the case it was absolutely necessary that the dam should be maintained.

Mr. MACKENZIE said only two or three years had elapsed since the water was affected by that particular dam.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT ON DOMINION DAM, DEVIL LAKE.

MOTION TO PRINT.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) moved for the printing of the report laid on the table referring to the Dominion Dam, Devil Lake, township of Bedford. He said the engineer's report showed that the dam was necessary for the navigation of the canal. In July some ruffians did much damage, wilfully, but the Government had not attempted to get them convicted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he recollected writing with a view to the arrest of the offenders. Whatever opinion there was as to the advisability of spending any more money on the canal, unlawful acts would be punished.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

RETURNS OF HARBOUR MAS- TERS.

MOTION FOR COPIES.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved for copies of returns of Harbour Masters for the year ending December

Mr. MACKENZIE.

31st, 1876, showing the amount of fees collected by such; the names of all vessels from which fees were collected; also any correspondence in relation to the office of Harbour Master for the Port of Little Glace Bay, N.S. He said he desired this information in order that he might ascertain whether those officers were performing their duty honestly and according to law. He understood that the Harbour Master at Little Glace Bay had made a return to the effect that he had collected $122.50 during 1875, when, in point of fact, no fees had been collected during that year. In making such a return the officer would have to swear as to its correctness, and, if the fact was as as he had been informed, the man ought not to be continued in the service of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE said he had been requested by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to state that there was no objection to the return in the regard to the Harbour Master of Little Grace Bay. No foundation had been laid for the other information, which could be found in the departmental report. The statement of the hon. gentleman deserved attention, but it was to be remembered that the harbour masters were paid out of the fees they collected, and it was extremely difficult to understand the purpose for the false return which the hon. gentleman believed had been made.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said if his hon. colleague had undertaken to look at the returns he would have found that those made by the Harbour Master of Little Glace Bay, year by year, were correct. He knew this officer and was satisfied that he performed his duties as honourably and efficiently as any similar officer in the Province. As the harbour masters were paid by fees, he could not understand what the hon. gentleman was driving at.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said, although it was quite time that those officers were paid by fees, yet they were not justified in making false returns. He had a list of captains from whom information regarding this particular case could be obtained, and he trusted the Government would investigate it.

He would like the return of the Harbour Master at Port North Sidney also brought down.

Mr. BLAKE said he was not in a position to agree to that. The return respecting the officer at Little Glace Bay would be brought down. If the hon. member limited the motion as had been suggested, he (Mr. Blake) would mention the matter to his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and if there was no objection the other return would be brought down without a motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY STRIKE.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. TUPPER (in the absence of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD) moved for copies of all Orders in Council relating to the late strike on the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and of all correspondence with the Ontario Government and with the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company on the subject; together with a statement of the steps taken by the Militia Department to aid the civil power in preventing the stoppage of the railway trains and a statement of the cost of employing a militia force for the purpose.

Mr. BLAKE said all the information in the possession of the Government was contained in a recent return.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

BRIDGE AT LONG ISLAND.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Council of the county of Carlton respecting a Bridge across the Rideau River, at the village of Wellington. He said he would like the hon. the First Minister to state when the Government would be prepared to carry out their offer in connection with this bridge.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could see no reason why the Government should be asked to undertake this work, which was a purely local one, and he had therefore declined to recommend any grant by the Dominion Parliament. He had promised, however, that, if the river was dammed back at this point, the Government would pay a proportion equal to the additional extent of the work which the flooding of the river there would occasion. Mr. Wise was sent to inspect the spot, but he had made no report up to this time. When he received the necessary information, he would be prepared to state at a future time what the Government would recommend. They declined to have anything to do with the initiation of the bridge.

Mr. ROCHESTER thought that the Government could not refuse to do their share towards building a swing bridge at this point.

Motion agreed to.

DUTY ON MALT—INSTRUCTIONS TO INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for copies of all instructions issued from the Inland Revenue Department to its Officers throughout the Dominion both by letter and telegraph as to what time the duty on malt was to take effect. He said he had been informed that instructions had been issued prior to the 20th February, when the Budget was brought down, with regard to the levying of an additional duty on malt, and he desired to learn whether this was the case. He understood that these instructions dated back to the 15th of February.

Motion agreed to.

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. FLYNN moved for copies of Orders in Council and contracts entered into during the year 1876, in connection with the enlargement of St. Peter's Canal. He said that last Session he had made a similar motion, urging the Government to enlarge the canal beyond the depth then contemplated, and had been told by the Premier that he would endeavour to secure further information, and that, if this warranted it in the interests of trade, it would be done. Some time in June last, an Order in Council had been passed, directing that the width under contract should be increased 12 feet, but nothing was ordered as to depth. According to the present contract, the canal was only being made 12 inches deeper, providing for 14 feet of water in the canal when completed. Petitions, unanimously signed by residents of Cape Breton and of eastern parts of Nova Scotia, as well as by members of the Local Legislature, had been presented to the House, praying for the enlargement of this important work. He had previously informed the House that the people of Cape Breton were neither satisfied with the depth nor with the width then under contract. It was to be remembered that the canal would be used by vessels engaged in the coal trade, vessels of large tonnage, and requiring great depth of water. The Premier, on a former occasion, had said that he (Mr. Flynn) was wrong in supposing that a greater depth than 14 feet could be obtained in St. Peter's Bay. He also said that only vessels drawing 12 feet could pass the shoals of the bay. This was not correct, although he was not at the time able to state precisely what the depth of water was in the bay; but it was to be presumed from the report of the engineer recommending a depth of 15½ feet, that a greater depth was obtainable. The Premier had quoted Mr. Bayfield, but this gentleman merely remarked that a vessel drawing not more than 12 feet could enter St. Peter's Bay with the aid simply of a chart; he did not declare that a greater depth could not be had. When the residents of St. Peter's and vicinity learned that the only reason urged against further enlargement was that a depth beyond 14 feet could not be obtained, they employed Mr. Worgan to make a survey of St. Peter's Bay which he did some time last summer. He had not the pleasure of knowing that gentleman, but, from all he could learn, his reputation stood high and the accuracy of his survey was beyond question. He should now read his report.

Mr. FLYNN.

“ ST. PETER'S CANAL.

“ TO MESSRS. MURDOCK McRAE, M.P.P., J. MORRISON, D. URQUHART AND OTHERS :

“ GENTLEMEN,—I beg to enclose the following report of the survey made by me with your instructions of the Ship Channel Bar and Round Shoal in St. Peter's Bay.

“ The accompanying plan shows the Channel with the depth in feet at low water, and the shoals in the immediate vicinity of the same. The Channel, it will be observed, is circuitous, but not remarkably so, and there are no existing objects suitably placed for the guidance of ships approaching the anchorage or canal.

“ I find, however, a channel twenty-four feet in depth, to run from the entrance of the Bay to the anchorage, and should recommend that at a future date another survey be made and buoys be laid down, or, better still, that landmarks be placed on shore to avoid the necessity of removing the buoys in winter, for the guidance of vessels through the Channel. In making the survey it was necessary to lay down temporary buoys, and I found that five were amply sufficient to mark the Channel, which would enable ships drawing less than twenty-four feet of water to approach the canal without danger.

“ I may add that I am of opinion that, by means of dredging, the Channel might be made more direct, as the bottom appears to be composed of mud and sand with rock in places. The average rise and fall of water appears to be about four feet, which gives a depth of twenty-eight feet in the Channel at high water.

“ I am Your obed't. serv't.

“ PHILIP H. WORGAN,

“ Comdr. R.N.

“ D. F. Surveyor.”

It would be perceived from this report that a depth of twenty-four feet of water could be had at low tide, and, as Mr. Worgan stated that the average rise and fall of the tide was about four feet, this would give a depth of twenty-eight feet at high water. With these facts before the House, the want of sufficient depth of water in the approaches to the canal could not now be urged as a reason why it should not be deepened beyond fourteen feet. Cape Breton, from its situation, had never shared, to any great extent, in the large sums expended on public works since Confederation, while it had borne its share in meeting the consequent expenditure. After years of agitation, the only public work they had obtained was the St. Peter's Canal, and it was intended for sea-going vessels, which required great depth of water. The depth of the present contract would not accommodate large vessels engaged in the coal trade, and now was the proper time, while the work of enlargement was going on, to consider the question of depth, as the cost of a few feet more would be much less than if done after the present contract was completed. The population of Cape Breton was about 100,000, its people were to a large extent engaged in mining and fishing, and, contributing largely to the revenue, they deserved the most favourable consideration from this Government. If this canal had a sufficient depth of water it would be of great service to the large vessels engaged in the coal trade. They would then be able to go through the Bras d'Or instead of going around by Scattam, which at most seasons was considered dangerous. He had no doubt it would also be the means of inducing people to settle in that portion of the Dominion, where there was plenty of vacant land, and a fertile soil which would well repay the labour of the farmer, while, in the waters of the Bras d'Or, fish of every description were found in abundance. It would also be the means of opening and developing our vast and varied mineral resources, and as a consequence contribute largely to increase the revenue. At the time of Confederation it was felt by many who were opposed to the Union that it would be difficult for the smaller Provinces to obtain that justice to which they were fairly entitled. While he said this was the feeling that influenced many of the opponents of that measure at the period to which he referred, his experience since he became a member of this House, he was pleased to state, had convinced him that no narrow or sectional spirit animated the representatives of the two larger Provinces, but, instead of being opposed to their just claims on the Dominion Treasury, they were willing they should get whatever sums might be considered necessary to facilitate the trade and expand the commerce of the Maritime Provinces, which formed so important an element in the Union. This being the case, no Government need be afraid of dealing with them in a fair and generous spirit. He did not think he was asking too much when he asked that the St. Peter's Canal should be deepened to such an extent as would meet the requirements of the vast trade which must take place throughout the Island of Cape Breton as soon as the coal trade revived from its present depressed condition. This canal could not be considered a local work, and a benefit solely to Cape Breton, for, when completed, it would be open to the commerce of the Dominion and of the world. It was stated here the other night by the member for West Toronto, during the discussion of a motion for the appointment of a Coal Committee, that a steamer had been chartered to carry coal from Cape Breton to Toronto, and flour from Toronto to Cape Breton. If this were the case, an inter-provincial trade might be developed to a considerable extent, and this canal used for that purpose, thereby benefitting Toronto as well as Cape Breton. But, if it were intended to benefit the people of Cape Breton solely and exclusively, he contended, from the extent of their trade and the mineral and other resources it was calculated to develop when suitably enlarged, that they were entitled to it. Millions had been wisely expended on the canal system of Ontario and Quebec, and he believed that the same policy should be pursued towards Cape Breton. If it were, it would be the means of opening up a district rich in fishing and mineral resources, and destined, ere long, under proper and judicious management, to become one of the most important parts of this vast Dominion. He had addressed the House last Session at some length on this subject, and felt it would be unnecessary now to repeat the arguments he then used. He trusted the Government would give this matter their most serious consideration, and hoped it would be a long time before it would again be necessary for him to raise his voice on behalf of this work. He particularly invited the Premier's special attention to this important question, which was of great moment not only to Cape Breton but also to the whole Dominion.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he felt it was his duty not to remain silent when the Government had not seen fit to accede to the request made last Session that the canal should be made as useful as possible by deepening it. Vessels coming from the west and from the United States found it much more convenient to go through the canal than to pass round by the eastern portion of the Island, where navigation was difficult and dangerous. As most of the vessels went to the east for the purpose of obtaining coal he, as a matter of course, felt great interest in the success of the undertaking. Last Session it was a debatable question as to whether 14½ feet was ample depth in the locks, and it was stated by the Government that the quantity of water in the approach to St. Peter's Bay was so shallow that vessels drawing much beyond 14 feet would not be able to pass through. He was then, from the investigations he had made, under the belief that there was water enough in the approach to enable vessels drawing 16 feet to pass through the locks, and he was now fully confirmed by a report of Commander Philip H. Worgan, R. N., now resident at Sydney, and with whom he was personally acquainted and for whose accuracy and ability he could vouch, who stated that at low tide there was a depth of water in the approach of 24 feet. Under these circumstances he hoped that the Government would favourably consider the proposal to make the water in the locks deeper, and thus facilitate the trade not only of Cape Breton but of the whole country.

Mr. TUPPER said no doubt the House would remember that, when this subject was under the consideration of the House on a previous occasion, he had pointed out the unfortunate mistake the Government made in deciding to reduce the dimensions of the canal after asking for tenders for the work on a larger scale, without first asking the consent of Parliament. Although this was a comparatively small case, yet the principle, if admitted, might be dangerous. In consequence of the representations now made, he hoped the Government would submit to the House the propriety of asking for an increased appropriation in order to enable the canal to be made the proper size. For the whole of the past season, and a portion of the preceding season, between 600 and 700 vessels passed through the canal; but the whole of the traffic was now suspended.

Mr. MACKAY.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was sure that neither of the hon. members who had addressed the House would expect him to take the statement of an unofficial person as to the depth of the entrances to the canal. The water channel was marked out in the charts of the coast with sufficient distinctness, although it was possible for them to be wrong. He would cause enquiries to be made as to the statements and theories of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn). It should be remembered that a canal 12 feet deep required 14 or 15 feet at the outside, and a vessel drawing 13 feet would, from a sea wash, strike a bar at 16 or 17 feet. He would give his personal attention to the matter, and perhaps on a future occasion he would have something further to say upon it.

Motion agreed to.

REMOVAL OF MALCOLM MATHESON.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for correspondence with reference to the removal of Malcolm Matheson, Postmaster at Little Narrows. He said he had received a letter from Mr. Matheson, who asserted that he had been in his position a short time but was dismissed on the recommendation of Mr. Ross, because he voted for him (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the hon. gentleman must be mistaken. There was no Postmaster of that name at Little Narrows. The Postmaster's name was Hugh McClasky, who had held the position for several years.

Motion withdrawn.

ASPY BAY HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for the report of Government Engineer, on the practicability of opening Aspy Bay Harbour, Victoria, so as to admit vessels of certain tonnage, in the year 1872. He said it was very important to the navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence that there should be a harbour of refuge near Cape North. Aspy Bay seemed to be the most desirable location, and he would be glad to see this report brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was unable to state whether there was such a report. The motion, however, could pass, and if there was such a document it would be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE WILLIAM GRAHAM.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. TUPPER moved for copies of all correspondence between Sarah Graham, widow, and the Government, in reference to an application for aid in consequence of the reduction of salary and subsequent death of the late William Graham, at that time a messenger of this House. He said Mr. Graham was one of the most intelligent, obliging and attentive of the messengers of the House. He was employed as long ago as 1848, at a salary of $1.50 per day. In 1855, he was regularly appointed a messenger of the House of Assembly, at a salary of $840, and when the Union took place he was transferred to this House, and enjoyed the same salary. In 1868, however, his salary was reduced to $576; but in 1872 it was raised to $696, at which sum it continued until his death. Mr. Graham was taken away rather suddenly, and had left no provision for his family. He took this opportunity of bringing up the matter in the hope that it would commend itself so to the approval of gentlemen on both sides of the House, that the Government would feel warranted in dealing with it as an exceptional case.

Mr. TASCHEREAU said he had great pleasure in testifying to the efficiency and attention of the late Mr. Graham, and he hoped the Government would give the application favourable consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had practically nothing to do with this matter. The salaries of the messengers of the House had always, for some reason or other, been higher than those of similar officers in the various Departments. Even at his reduced salary, Mr. Graham had, at least, $100 per annum more than the highest salary paid to messengers in the Departments. An application was made to himself informally in this case some time ago, but he did not think there was any ground for the Commissioners' interference.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said Mr. Graham had been universally liked, as he was a most obliging, useful and active officer. He thought hon. members would be very glad if the Commissioners would regard this as an exceptional case, leaving aside the question as to what should be the nominal salaries of the messengers.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said no doubt the family referred to was in need, but there were many others in a similar condition. He was surprised that an hon. gentleman, formerly a member of the Government himself, should advocate the taking up of individual cases of this kind in the House. If assistance was accorded simply because a case was supported by prominent members there would be no end to such applications.

Mr. TUPPER said it was not in the power of the Commissioners, however much they might feel disposed, to deal with the case. The only mode by which it could be met was by putting an amount in the Supplementary Estimates. He had hoped that the motion might cause such a favourable consideration of the claim as would induce the Government to take a step of that kind. He was quite satisfied that the Premier would admit that the reduction was a very extreme step. Nothing but strong circumstances could ever justify a Government in reducing an officer's salary after long and faithful service. The opposite course indeed was the general rule. This House had subsequent to that reduction reconsidered the question of increased cost of living and had made large additions to the salaries of public servants generally, of the highest servants of the Crown, and of members of Parliament; but nevertheless the salary of this public officer, though faithful and efficient, had not been advanced to its former amount. He considered that it would be only just to vote to the family of deceased a sum equivalent to that Graham would have received provided that good faith had been kept with him.

Mr. BLAKE said that the grounds urged showed how very serious it would be to grant the request made. The House had been told that for a number of years before Confederation, the Parliament of the old Province of Canada, or the Government of both combined, had fixed the salaries of certain persons at certain rates.

Mr. TUPPER: Allow me to draw attention to the point that this was not only done by the old Government of Canada but also continued by the Government of the Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE: For how long?

Mr. TUPPER: The change took place in 1868.

Mr. BLAKE said that this had been the case for years. During the First Parliament, the expenditure of the House had been arranged by the Committee on Contingencies. He believed that this had been also the practice in the old Parliament. The Committee determined upon the scale of the salaries of the different officers retained, and among them he presumed was the deceased, and their report was unanimously concurred in. This report affected the salaries of 140 persons, he was informed, and yet the hon. gentleman said in effect that a breach of faith had been committed with every one of them. This was a serious indictment to bring.

Mr. TUPPER: I did not strain it to that point.

Mr. BLAKE said this was the logical conclusion. The same argument applied to all. To how many of them would it apply? It might be that it would not apply to certain cases.

Mr. TUPPER: I think that an investigation would show that some cases could not be considered at all. A great number could not be included in this category.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. BLAKE said he believed that, as a general rule, salaries had formerly been too high. He thought that the House would be disposed to sustain the Government in holding that this question, which had been solemnly decided by Parliament in 1868, reconsidered in 1872, and settled on a different basis since, should not be reopened.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAYS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement in detail showing the quantities, description and value of machinery, locomotives, roofs, bridges, turn-tables, nails, spikes and other goods, imported into the Dominion of Canada for the use of the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway, and admitted free of duty, from the 1st of January, 1874, to 1st of January, 1877; giving the names of the parties importing or supplying; where imported from, and port of entry. He said that he made the motion in the public interest. He had asked for these papers last Session, to enable the Government to purchase supplies as cheaply as possible, but they were brought down so late in the Session that his object was defeated, and, when they did come down, he got everything but what he required. He complimented the Premier on his statement that goods were no longer allowed to come in free of duty. No doubt his motion had forcibly brought to mind the fact that traders were, in consequence, disadvantageously situated. He found in the return a statement concerning a roof required for Halifax, and the Premier had informed them that it had been admitted free of duty. He also found that Mr. Brydges, the Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway, directed Mr. McNab, an engineer, to look for a roof in the Dominion and elsewhere, and to go to Philadelphia where Clarkes, Reeves, & Co., commonly known as the Phoenixville Iron Company, made the best roofs, and to purchase from them.

This was about the English of Mr. Brydges' letters; Mr. McNab complied and bought a roof for some $12,800 in gold. No contract was shown to have been entered into; nothing definite was communicated. This was done in September, 1874, and no tenders were invited. Further tenders for the erection of the building for which this roof was intended, were not obtained until September, 1875, a year afterwards. In September, 1874, moreover, iron was high, and, if he was correctly informed, the roof had not yet been placed in position. This was an extremely loose transaction, which did no credit to any one engaged in it. In future, no doubt, public buildings would be commenced at the roofs and finished at the foundations. In addition, a son of the man who directed the purchase was a partner in the company from which the roof was bought. He also knew that, regarding materials obtained for the Prince Edward Island Railway, tenders were invited, but answers were not given to tenderers, and the supplies were obtained free of duty from the United States. How could business be carried on properly when such a state of things was permitted to exist? It might be said it was very hard for the Government to pay duty, but it was simply a matter of debtor and creditor. Many parties who had tendered were not aware of the fact that they would not have to pay duty, and thus they were at a disadvantage with those who did know. The great inducement held out to New Brunswick to join Confederation was that by the building of the Intercolonial Railway there would be a large trade between the Maritime and Western Provinces; the latter sending cereals east, and the former coal and iron west. But it was now found that the New Brunswick coal and iron had to be placed in the warehouse, while American iron came in free. He hoped the papers he asked for would not be kept back for twelve months, and then only be presented in a mangled condition.

Mr. SPEAKER suggested that hon. members in moving for papers should not make the contents of other papers laid on the table the subject-matter of their remarks. This had been twice done that day. It was not only inadvisable but out of order.

Mr. BLANCHET said it would be difficult to rigidly apply that rule. Hon. members were generally allowed, in making motions for papers, to discuss the matter in a very ample manner, and the occasion was frequently taken advantage of to express an opinion as to the general policy of the Government.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he merely referred to previous papers by way of illustration. He thought he had a right to refer to certain information which had been placed on the table of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought it was not desirable, except in a passing manner.

Motion agreed to.

BY-WASH AT LONG ISLAND.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Council of the County of Carleton respecting a bridge over the By-Wash at Long Island. He said at Long Island there was a bridge across the By-Wash which carried off the surplus water from the canal. In the fall of 1869 the boom was removed by the Government officials, and as a consequence, when the freshet came in the spring of 1870, the bridge was swept away. Under these circumstances he thought the Government ought to rebuild the bridge, it having been built by the municipality in the first instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the municipality would have to build its own bridge as other municipalities had to do. He did not think the Government were to blame. However, he would look into the representations made by the hon. member; but at the same time he could not hold out any hope of the bridge being rebuilt by the Government.

Motion agreed to.

THE GREAT SEAL OF NOVA SCOTIA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. TUPPER moved for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Provincial Government of Nova Scotia relating to the Great Seal of the Province that has been affixed to all the documents requiring the same since Confederation.

Mr. BLAKE suggested that the motion should be amended so as to include correspondence between the Imperial and the Dominion Governments.

Mr. VAIL said he hoped explanations would be given. It was a purely provincial matter, and he did not see why papers should be brought down.

Mr. TUPPER said it was a matter of universal notoriety that much excitement had taken place in the Province of Nova Scotia in consequence of it having been ascertained that the Great Seal, directed to be used, had not been used. It became a matter of very great moment that the matter should be thoroughly understood. He did not wish to enter into any discussion until the papers were brought down.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SLIDE MASTERS ON THE OTTAWA RIVER.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved for a return showing:

1st. The names of the Slide Masters in the employ of the Department of Public Works at each of the Slide Stations on the Ottawa River and its tributaries on the 1st day of July, 1876;

2nd. The salary or remuneration paid to each of the said Slide Masters for the year ending 1st July, 1876;

3rd. The number of pieces of Timber and Saw Logs, respectively, passed through each of the said Slide Stations for the year ending 1st July, 1876.

He said he wished to ascertain the remuneration of each man and the amount of work they were called upon to perform. If his information was correct, in some instances large salaries were paid when the duties were light, and in others the remuneration was insufficient for the labour performed.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Motion agreed to.

ST. JOHN RIVER NAVIGATION.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved for copies of all Reports made by the Engineer or Engineers in charge of Public Works on the improvement of the navigation of the St. John River, New Brunswick, since June 1871, as well as the amount of dredging done since that date on the Oromonto Shoals (so called) and the state of the navigation at that point at present. He said there were certain obstructions in the river which a comparatively small amount of money would remove. The existence of those obstructions was a great detriment to the trade of the neighbourhood, and considerable dissatisfaction was being expressed. St. John was the principal river in New Brunswick. It watered a large portion of country, and was the principal thoroughfare for the trade of six or seven counties in that Province. Fredericton was the terminus of the New Brunswick Railway, and the trade of the upper country passed down the St. John to that point, just below which the obstructions were situated. He saw by the Trade and Navigation Returns that 159 vessels loaded for outside ports at Fredericton last year, and that 50,000,000 feet of short lumber was shipped annually from that port. It was important that so large a trade should not be impeded. In the summer season it was no uncommon thing to see seven or eight vessels trying to get over the shoals, and often when the water was low they had to unload a portion of their cargo. He trusted this matter would receive the careful consideration of the Government, and that, carrying out their general policy of aiding works for the development of the trade of the Dominion, some effectual means would be adopted to keep the navigation of this river open.

Mr. PICKARD said this was an important matter to his section of the country, and he was satisfied that the hon. the Minister of Public Works would have to look beyond the engineer's report in regard to improving the channel.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the question arose whether it would be possible to keep the St. John River so deep as to enable vessels going seaward to ascend to Fredericton, or that neighbourhood. The difficulty connected with the navigation of the St. Lawrence was that a sufficient depth of water could not be got to enable sea-going vessels to ascend the river and pass out to the ocean. The utmost depth at present in that river was 10 feet, but it was expected to deepen it to 12 feet, and some urged that 14 feet was absolutely necessary. But with 12 feet of water vessels could only go the ocean by adopting that most inconvenient mode of steering known as the centre-board. There were only 8 or 9 feet in St. John River at high water, and it was impossible to get that depth at low water. The question arose whether the ultimate mode of carrying cargoes on that river would be by means of flat-bottomed boats, such as used on the Mississippi. But every fair effort had been made to maintain the depth of the river. At the particular point referred to there was a channel on each side, one of which was less navigable than the other, and one method suggested for the improvement of navigation was to build a pier from one end of the Island so as to throw the whole volume of water into one channel. It was expected that such a plan would maintain a depth sufficient for ordinary vessels. He had given his personal attention to this matter. One dredge had been kept continually occupied in the river. The Government would do what they could, keeping within an ordinary expenditure, to maintain the depth of water which vessels navigating the river required. At the same time, he himself thought it would be much better if a different style of navigation were adopted, and flatter vessels built. Cargoes might thus be transhipped from the harbour of St. John. In the meantime, he would only say that everything they could do had been done, in order to facilitate navigation by these vessels in this river.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that, of course, vessels carrying coal could not be flat.

The people of New Brunswick felt that navigation had been somewhat impeded, and it was natural that this should be the case, owing to the deposits brought down by the floods. The chief barrier was a line of rocks at the mouth of the Rapids, near Suspension Bridge, under which no large vessel could ascend without striking her tops. As to the use of smaller vessels, the trade must decide.

Motion agreed to.

TOBIQUE INDIAN AGENT.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for returns of copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Tobique Indians, or any person on their behalf, relating to the appointment of a resident agent at that place. He said he had brought this matter up some three years ago, for the first time. These Indians had petitioned and complained very bitterly against the appointment of a commissioner or agent who lived at Fredericton, about one hundred miles from the reserve, as they had, previously to this appointment, been always accustomed to a resident agent, to whom they applied for information and assistance whenever they desired it. Their strongest complaint was that there were no funds out of which any material assistance could be rendered to them because there were no moneys to their credit; and they seemed to understand that one of the great causes of this want of funds must certainly be that a large sum was paid to the agent. He had recommended for agent a very respectable man, who resided on the reserve, and who would be abundantly satisfied with $100 a year. The present agent, who received $400, had besides several other reserves to look after. These Indians had a peculiar claim on the Government, inasmuch as the whole revenue derived from Indian lands in New Brunswick was obtained from this reserve. The Government had been in the habit of granting licenses to parties to cut timber from this reserve, and he thought that this commendable practice should be continued, as otherwise, owing to forest fires, this timber would probably be destroyed.

The late Minister of the Interior had assured him, when he first submitted this matter to the House, that it was worthy of consideration, but as yet nothing had been done, although the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries had expressed himself in a similar sense. He thought that it really involved great hardship. The late Minister of the Interior had stated, as one of the reasons why a change was not made, that he did not like to remove any officer. He (Mr. Costigan) did not desire any such removal, he simply wished to secure a re-arrangement and the appointment of a resident agent at a salary of $100 a year. As to stumpage, the system followed was inconvenient and unfair. Last year some residents on the reserve obtained license to cut timber, paying to the Government $1 per thousand as stumpage. As the best timber had disappeared, this was a high rate, and as the agent, who came to look after it, also collected his expenses, which averaged 98 cents per thousand, the stumpage really cost $1.98 per thousand. He hoped that the Minister of the Interior would take the subject under consideration, and that the propriety of granting the repeated request made in this regard would be immediately recognized.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY FROM QUEBEC TO LAKE ST. JOHN.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CIMON moved for copies of all petitions and correspondence respecting the grant by the Dominion Government of a sum of money to assist in the construction of the Railway from Quebec to Lake St. John.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MAILS.

MOTION FOR TENDERS.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of every tender received since November last by the Postal Department for carrying the Mails in British Columbia, with the names of the tender-

Mr. COSTIGAN.

ers and their securities; also a copy of all telegrams and letters received or sent by the Postal Department respecting the same. He said he asked for this information because there were quite a number of postal routes in British Columbia for which quite a large number of people in various portions of the Province had tendered. He also believed it his duty, knowing what he did about the chief route in that country, to bring this information before the House and the public in such a shape as to enable the House and Government to have the benefit of the assistance he could render in preventing a combination to obtain a large mail contract at a higher price than it might be contracted for under different circumstances. He believed that such a combination had been entered into to coerce the Government into giving a very large sum for carrying the mail between Yale and Baskerville. He had information in his possession to the effect that Mr. Barnard's tender, which he believed was for $27,000, was purchased by a gentleman who had put in a tender for about $18,000 odd dollars, and that another tender for about $19,900 was withdrawn. He had considered it his duty to protest against the contract being given out, and he had also stated he believed the proper time to give out this contract was not the 1st of April, but the 1st July, in order to enable a tenderer to whom the contract might be awarded, who lived in Vancouver's Island, or in some other portions of the Province off the main route, to stock the road. At present, intending tenderers were placed at a great disadvantage, owing to the contractor being compelled to commence carrying the mails in April.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was, of course, no objection to bringing down the papers, but it would be manifestly inconvenient to submit all tenders received for carrying mails in British Columbia. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would not object to restricting his motion to the contract mentioned. The Post Office Department had no knowledge of the collusion to which the hon. gentleman had alluded, and Mr. Barnard had telegraphed a most explicit denial of the allegations.

Mr. DECOSMOS said it so happened that Parker had told him that he had sent in a tender, and that he said a Mr. Williams had asked him (Parker) to sell it out to Barnard for $1,000. Subsequently Parker telegraphed him (Mr. DeCosmos) that he had purchased Mr. Barnard's stage business. Now, Mr. Barnard's tender was $27,000, but Parker's own tender was about $18,000. Parker said in his telegram that the Government were trying to deprive him of the contract at Barnard's price, and asked: "Will you help me." He (Mr. DeCosmos) answered that he would protest against the contract being given at a higher rate than he (Parker) had already tendered for. When he protested against awarding the contract at $27,000 he felt it was his duty to do so, and he considered he had a right, in the interest of his Province, to know the amount and number of the tenders, but he did not consider it right that he should have to wait twelve months before he could find out what the number and amounts were. The Government should have given him the information at once.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he was glad the hon. member for Victoria had asked for the papers and also that the Postmaster-General intended to bring them down. It was true that the hon. member for Victoria had previously made a protest, couched in very strong language, in reference to this contract. It would be found by the correspondence that the hon. member for Victoria had made an accusation that certain parties had conspired to defraud the Dominion Government. He (Mr. Dewdney), a few days ago, had heard of what the hon. member had stated before he left for Ottawa. Mr. Barnard had distinctly denied the accusation and stated that there was a conspiracy between the hon. member for Victoria and others to induce two men, aliens, living out of the country, by false representations as to the value of the contracts, to put in tenders. These two men, upon inquiry, found that the hon. member for Victoria had wanted them to put in tenders on account of his political spleen towards Mr. Barnard; and they also found that there was no money in the contract, or not sufficient to induce them to wish to hold on to their tender, and that there were men in Victoria quite capable of undertaking the contract, who would have tendered if there was as much money in it as represented by member for Victoria. With regard to Mr. Parker, the gentleman referred to by the hon. member for Victoria as purchasing the stage business of Mr. Barnard, it had come to his (Mr. Dewdney's) knowledge that he, Mr. Parker, had offered to purchase out Mr. Barnard's interest in the stage business, and that he had lately examined into the value of his plant, but the negotiations had fallen through.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he had a telegram from Mr. Parker stating that he had purchased Barnard's stage business and tender, and had asked him to assist in getting the contract for Mr. Barnard in order that he (Mr. Parker) might have it. He (Mr. DeCosmos) answered that he would assist him to get the contract at his (Parker's) figures, but not at Mr. Barnard's.

Mr. DEWDNEY said the hon. gentleman had in Ottawa circulated a report that Mr. Parker told him that Mr. Barnard had offered him $1,000 if he would withdraw his contract. This came to his (Mr. Dewdney's) ears a few days ago, and he telegraphed to Mr. Parker and received the following answer:—"If DeCosmos says that Barnard offered me $1,000 or any other sum to withdraw my tender, he tells a deliberate lie and he knows it."

Mr. DECOSMOS reaffirmed his statement, and stated that, as he was going through Washington Territory in 1873, he met Mr. Coggan, an Englishman, who had a stage line, and who wanted to know whether he could get employment for his stage horses in Columbia. Subsequently, he tendered lower than Mr. Barnard had, but did not get the contract, as his securities were Americans. But Mr. Barnard received the contract at a higher figure than Mr. Coggan had tendered at.

Mr. DEWDNEY said if any injustice was done to Mr. Coggan the hon. member for Victoria had assisted to bring it about, because if the records of the Department were examined it would be found that he had recommended the contract to be awarded to Mr. Barnard for $22,000.

Mr. DECOSMOS said, nevertheless, he had not recommended Mr. Barnard as against Coggan; but told Barnard that if he could buy out Coggan, if the tender were awarded him, he had no objection to him (Barnard) getting the contract. He denied that he had gone to Oregon in order, by false representations, to get two men to tender for the contract.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he made the representations by telegrams and correspondence, and the two gentlemen had gone to a great deal of expense and trouble in finding out the truth of the matter.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he had merely told these gentlemen that it was fully in their power to tender for the contract. He had no personal interest whatever in the matter, political or otherwise. If Mr. Barnard or any other man had tendered at the lowest figure and given sufficient security for the performance of the work, he was willing that he should have it, but he would give the House to understand that he would not be a party to the robbery of the Dominion Treasury by such a combination as he believed existed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said, of course, his hon. friend was aware that the letting out of the contract was before he was responsible for the administration of the Post Office Department. The Government would decide the question upon its merits.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he had brought the matter up as he believed there was an attempt to coerce the Government.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Ten minutes after
Eleven o'clock.

Mr. DEWDNEY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 13th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

GAMBLING PRACTICES PREVENTION BILL.—[BILL No. 56.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Mr. BLAKE said he had made enquiry with regard to the suggestion which had been made on this subject by the hon. member for Vancouver, and, from what he had heard, he believed there was no ground for opposition to the application of this measure to steamboats as well as to railways, and accordingly he did not propose to make any alteration in it.

Bill read the third time and passed.

ONTARIO MARITIME COURT BILL.—[BILL No. 41.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE: I do not think that after the discussion which took place on the first reading of this Bill, it is necessary for me at any rate to enlarge on the provisions of the measure which is now submitted for the second reading. Of course any question that can arise, after what has been said in the House on the subject, will necessarily relate to details which may be disposed of in Committee. The House will observe, from the general provisions of the Bill, that it is to a certain extent tentative in its character. The design the Government had in view in proposing particular provisions in it was, as far as possible, to associate a degree of centralization with reference to the rules and regulations applicable to a new and important system of law with a degree of elasticity and decentralization in the application of those parts of the law which for efficiency require to be speedily and promptly submitted on the spot. A provision is therefore introduced for the nomination of judges, deputy registrars and marshals, where, from time to time, it may be found necessary in the interests of trade that they should be appointed; and, in the locality which may be in question, vessels may be summoned, and held to bail, &c. The machinery is necessarily elastic in its character, because, until—as one of the clauses suggests—the effect of the measure is developed by experience, it has been thought prudent to lay down rules with reference to the extended jurisdiction of the judges. These provisions, as I said at the commencement of my remarks, are more fit perhaps to be discussed in Committee; therefore, unless asked to make any further explanations, without further preface I will ask that the Bill be read the second time.

Bill read the second time.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL No. 60.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE: The remarks I have just made with reference to the probable character of the discussion on the measure which has been read the second time will apply to this one. The measure consists of several amendments of detail to the Insolvency Act, and the most important is that which has already undergone some degree of discussion, and on which, no doubt, at the appropriate time, there will be a considerable further degree of discussion, namely, the condition of discharge. It would be hardly useful for me to elaborate the others just now. They comprise such suggestions as practical experience in the working of the Act and the observations of those who have knowledge of its effect have induced me to recommend for the consideration of the House. They comprise, however, a very small part of the suggestions I have received, and I may say that some of those of which I am in daily receipt I may be disposed perhaps to submit to the consideration of the House. Should I do so, I will endeavour to have them placed in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. BOWELL asked whether the Minister of Justice proposed to send the Bill to a Committee.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Bill read the second time.

SALARY OF JUDGES OF ONTARIO MARITIME COURT.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

“1. That it is expedient to provide that the Judge of the Maritime Court of Ontario shall receive no fees, but shall receive a salary of six hundred dollars, free and clear from all deductions whatsoever, per annum, and pro rata for any shorter time than a year, which salary shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, in like manner as the salaries of other Judges.

“2. That it is expedient to provide temporarily that any Surrogate Judge of the Maritime Court of Ontario may, if resident elsewhere than Toronto, receive emoluments out of funds provided by suitors' fees payable under a tariff to be from time to time fixed and altered by the Governor in Council; and that the fees payable by suitors under the tariff shall be paid over, by the officer appointed to collect them, to the Receiver-General, and shall form part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund; and thereout shall be paid the emoluments of the Surrogate Judge.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER asked whether the Minister of Justice had taken into consideration the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that provision should, at the same time, be made for the salary of the Judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty at Halifax.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member for Halifax was aware of the fact that provision was already made by law for the salary of this Judge. What the hon. member for Halifax had adverted to in another connection was the provision proposed in the Estimates for the continuation of the salary of the Registrar and Marshal of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Quebec, and he proposed something with regard to the cessation of these salaries, or of the payment from the public funds. He had not proposed in this measure to charge on the general funds the salaries of the analogous officers of the new Court, which were to be provided for by means of fees.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was rather taken by surprise by the action being taken on this Bill to-day, as the hon. the Premier had stated the House would go at once into Ways and Means to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was the invariable practice to take up any measure which was not opposed, or likely to cause any discussion. He was not aware that the hon. member for Kingston desired that there should be any discussion on this Bill at the second reading.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Minister of Justice gave scarcely any explanation of the Bill on its introduction.

Mr. BLAKE said the Bill could be discussed on the motion to go into committee on Thursday. The salaries of the Judges of Vice-Admiralty in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was $600, and in Quebec $2,000. Although measured by the extent of tonnage in the waters to which the Bill referred, the amount of business to be performed by the new Courts might be supposed to be large, yet it was purely conjectural at present. It was, therefore, not thought proper to go further into the question of emoluments, but to see what was suggested by the practical working of the Courts. He proposed to fill the blank with the words "$600," based upon the salary prevailing in the Maritime Provinces.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if this was the only emolument the Judge would receive.

Mr. BLAKE said the Bill expressly provided that there should be no fees.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is there other emolument of any kind?

Mr. BLAKE: Not for services of Judge of Admiralty. The labours of the office would be lightened by the exercise of their functions by the Surrogate Judges, but in case larger remuneration was required, provision for it would subsequently be made. In Nova Scotia, the Chief Justice was the Judge of Admiralty, and in New Brunswick, the Judge of the County Court of St. John performed the duties. They both received $600.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he presumed the intention was that the Judge appointed to receive this salary would be taken from the Bench, because it was obvious that $600 would be an inadequate salary for a barrister having a large practice.

Mr. BLAKE said a Judge was not appointed in Quebec, and the salary there might be considered inadequate, but it was not found insufficient for procuring the services of a highly competent person. It was obviously inconvenient for the Government to announce their intention in this regard, but he would have no objection to indicating their proposed course privately.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he thought the chief amount of work would be performed by the Surrogate Judges, who would be resident at other towns in the Province—say, St. Catharine's, Kingston, Windsor, or Goderich. The main part of the work would be done at those places, and not at the chief office at Toronto. The Surrogate Judges were to be paid out of fees, but it was not stated what the scale would be. Was the hon. the Minister of Justice able to tell what income was likely to be derived by those officers? He should suppose, in view of the fact that their labours would be heavier than those of the Chief Judge, that they would require higher remuneration.

Mr. BLAKE said the fees at present received in the Maritime Provinces, whether all that could be obtained by proper collection or not, were very trifling. For more than 40 years, in fact, no fees had been received by the Court at Quebec. In one year £80 sterling was received at Nova Scotia, and the average in New Brunswick for the last five years was $50 per annum. It was obvious that those fees were not on a scale that would answer the purpose, and the results were as the hon. member for Frontenac supposed. It was impossible to say what the fees in Ontario would be at present; that would have to be determined as the work in the Court proceeded. He was opposed to the principle of paying Judges by fees. He did not like to put such a law on the Statute-book, except with a clause explaining the reason for, and the temporary character of, the provision. In introducing such a temporary provision, he had also provided that the fees should be paid into the exchequer, and that the emoluments of the Judge, although paid out of such fees, should yet be received out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The emoluments of the Surrogate Judges would depend upon the extent of the judicial functions which were from time to time to be conferred upon them. He did not think it would be prudent in the first instance to confer upon those Judges more powers than were necessary for speedy preliminary action in the arrest of ships, etc. His opinion was that, in introducing new jurisprudence of this description, it was proper to proceed with some degree of caution, and to fix an adequate compensation when knowledge of what was necessary for the correct administration of the Court was obtained. He did not think that the labour would be so very heavy at first as to require any great remuneration. When the Court was thoroughly established, and the extent of extra labour devolving upon the Judges was known, it could be considered whether the interests of the public would be best served by abolishing the fees, or by keeping them as a source of revenue and paying a fixed salary out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he gathered from the hon. the Minister of Justice's remarks that he thought the duties of the Surrogate Judges would be ministerial—to set in motion the machinery of the Court: and that all the cases would have to be taken to the Chief Court for decision. He thought the hon. gentleman would find that that would hardly be the case, because most of the investigations of claims for wages or collisions would necessarily have to take place where the witnesses resided, and the ships traded to. It would be found in practice that but a small part of the work would be done at Toronto. He presumed that the amount of fees to be paid would be fixed by Order in Council.

Mr. BLAKE said he had always objected to Judges being paid by suitors, but the question as to the remuneration of the Surrogate Judges would have to be determined by experience. With reference to the heavy labours of those officers, he might say that in Quebec the evidence was not taken down before the Judge but before the Registrar.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: But the Registrar will be at Toronto.

Mr. BLAKE said Deputy Registrars were to be appointed at all those points. He had a strong impression, however, that in time it would be found expedient to require the Surrogate Judges to take the evidence, but it could not be held from the language of the Bill that they were now required to do so. He would be glad if any hon. gentleman could devise a scheme by which the compensation of the Judges could be fixed; but he did not see how it could be done until after the Courts had been in operation for some time.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second times and agreed to, and referred to Committee of the Whole House on Bill No. 41.

AMENDMENT OF CUSTOMS ACT.

RESOLUTION CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the Customs, 31 Victoria, Chapter 6, so as to make better provisions for the reporting of vessels inwards and outwards.

"The reporting of Railway Trains at frontier ports, &c., inwards and outwards.

"To make better provision for the securing of correct statements of Exports by land and water.

"To provide greater security to the Revenue in connection with the warehouses and warehousing business of Canada; and to consolidate the Act so amended and the amendments made to it by any other Acts; such amendments not affecting the Tariff of duties."

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the first resolution was intended to secure the better reporting of inward and outward vessels, but particularly outward, so as to obtain more extended statistical information with regard to the cargo and manifest. The next resolution referred to imports and exports by railways. At present there was no law providing for manifests of merchandise coming into this country. Whatever was done now was done under no law, but simply by departmental rule without any penalties being attached for violation thereof. The next resolution provided for the better warehousing of goods, instead of their being landed at stations without proper protection, as was sometimes done. And this provision would give merchants power to remove goods from one warehouse to another if they so desired. It was also proposed to make a provision whereby, if a merchant was a defaulter as regarded goods in one warehouse, the Government could hold as security goods in other warehouses which were owned by him.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he thought the hon. the Minister of Customs would have done well had he given some explanations as to matters to which his attention had been previously called. There were many clauses in the Customs Act of 1869, which was brought down en bloc and passed without discussion, which might possibly be applicable to the Upper Provinces, but which were not applicable to the Maritime Provinces. He referred more particularly to the clause as to the drawback. The Act allowed a drawback on all articles, of at least the value of $100, shipped to Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island. Since the Act was passed, however, Prince Edward Island had been admitted into Confederation. The trade desired that the drawback should be applied to other places besides Newfoundland. Nova Scotia did a considerable business with the West Indies, and the present system was found very inconvenient for persons sending goods to the Bermudas or Nassau. He thought it would be desirable for the Government to amend the Act so as to provide that drawbacks on goods of the aggregate value of $100 and upwards should be allowed when the goods were exported anywhere beyond the limits of the Dominion. It was possible that this system would be inconvenient if applied to the United States, but he would suggest that that country be excepted. It was obvious that it was desirable to facilitate the distribution of the largest quantities of goods. Although the duty might not be paid on the goods being reshipped to foreign parts, the country would receive the benefit of shipping and handling them. He would also suggest that the time during which goods could remain in bond should be extended. In England, wines and liquors could remain in bond as long as was convenient to the owner, who could at any time take out any quantity, even to a glassful. The system had been found to work satisfactory, and it should be engrafted upon our Customs laws. He thought the Department should have additional safe-guards, and the resolutions in themselves might be proper; at the same time, he would remind the hon. the Minister of Customs that merchants were much hampered by unnecessary orders, rules and regulations. A short time ago he watched an official handling some packages of tea at a custom-house, on a ship unloading. He was obliged to mark on the packages where they came from, the number of the warrant under which they were passed, and the weight of the packages. It would take a man half a day to mark fifty packages. The drawback question was very important to Nova Scotia, and he hoped the Government would deal with it when they were considering the Customs Act.

Mr. BURPEE.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked the hon. the Minister of Customs to explain how parties warehousing goods would become defaulters to the Government.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the Government did not know positively that any person would become a defaulter. But this had happened in the past, and might again, through the negligence or carelessness of some officer. What the resolution provided for was that, when a merchant was a defaulter in one warehouse, goods which he might have in another warehouse could be held as security. In some cases there were five or six warehouses in one town, and a merchant who was a defaulter in one did not now have his goods in the other warehouse held as security.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there should be no defaulters. If a merchant was a defaulter, the Government should look to the security of the officer who allowed the goods to be taken out before the duty was paid. No goods should be taken out until the duty was paid.

Mr. DOMVILLE: They cannot.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it could not be done by law, but if the resolution were adopted it would look like a sanctioning of the practice. He wished to know whether it was by statutory provision or by regulation that the remaining goods in a warehouse were made liable for the duties on other goods taken out of the same warehouse.

Mr. BURPEE: That is by Statute.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Does not that apply to all the warehouses?

Mr. BURPEE: It only applies to the warehouses in which the default occurs.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he could not understand what would be gained by the proposed change in this regard. In the first place there were the bondsmen of the custom-house officer.

Mr. BURPEE: The law says he will be his own bondsman.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that was where he found fault, as there was a case where the Government had failed to recover on the bonds of those who were responsible. The hon. the Minister of Customs knew that such a case had occurred in the city from which they both came. The case happened four years ago, and not a cent had been paid as far as he could learn, and yet the hon. the Minister of Customs said, when asked about it, that he had not made any enquiries into the matter. Unless the sureties were called upon in case of default being made, the act of signing a bond would be merely a form. How anybody could get goods out of a custom-house without paying the duties he could not understand. However, perhaps there were some things going on which it would not be prudent to bring to light. It would be much better if the hon. the Minister of Customs brought in amendments such as those suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). If a merchant wished to import musical instruments, he had to enter them at an arbitrary valuation, and while perhaps he only paid $250 he would have to enter them at $400, and, according to the Orders in Council, duty on the $400 would have to be paid. This was a matter which should be remedied. The Government should not frame their legislation so much in view of anticipated frauds, as to introduce wholesome laws which would place our merchants on a proper basis.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) explained that it was to meet such cases as that referred to that the resolutions were introduced. The defalcation occurred in 1872, before the present Government came into office. The case went to trial, but for want of evidence it was quashed. In every case, bonds were required from the officers.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that, while the Custom House officer, through whose negligence the defalcation had occurred, had got off scot free, the people whose goods had been taken had to bear the whole loss.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he thought the Government were right in placing a fixed value on pianos coming into this country. In order to keep their shops running, the manufacturers in the United States made Canada a slaughter market, selling goods at from 3 per cent. to 10 per cent. less than in the United States. It was unfortunate that the Government did not apply the same rule to other articles, and thus protect the industries of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if there was any regulation or Act providing that, if a merchant entered goods which he had purchased in cash, for example in New York, a certain additional sum could be added to the cash price in estimating the duties payable.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the duty would be paid on the market value in the country in which the goods were purchased. If the goods were sold to a buyer at a less price than their value in the country in which they were purchased, the Government were right in charging the duty on the price of the goods in the market of the country in which they were sold.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought, from the newspapers, that an order had been issued by which an amount was added to the cash price to bring it up to the credit price.

Mr. CAMERON said that, while formerly the value of goods for Customs purposes was the clear market value, it was changed by the Act 33 Victoria, chap. 9, section 10, which was passed in 1870. The actual and the market value were quite distinct. Since that time, Parliament had thought fit to provide that the hon. the Minister of Customs, with the consent of the Governor in Council, might fix arbitrary values for certain articles, such as sewing machines and pianos. Whether that was a right or wrong provision was open to serious question. The hon. member for Halifax had given the Government credit for having made the alteration to protect the manufacturers. He (Mr. Cameron) was quite satisfied it was not made with any such intention, but it was for the purpose of preventing frauds on the revenue, to endeavour to prevent goods being entered at what were not their true prices; and the Government ought, therefore, to be relieved from the responsibility of having done anything towards introducing a system of protection to home manufactures in making that alteration in 1874. It was stated in 33 Victoria, chapter 9, section 10:

"The value for duty of goods on which an ad valorem duty of Customs is imposed, imported into Canada by sea, shall be the actual value of the goods at the last place at which they were purchased; and the value of such goods for duty, if imported from the United States, by land or inland navigation, shall be the actual value of such goods at the last place at which they are purchased for importation into Canada, and whence they are directly conveyed without change of package to Canada."

The law was formerly that the goods should be charged on their fair market value. It was held that that meant the value of the goods in the principal market from which the goods came. Thus it was contended that rice should be entered at its value in South Carolina, and tobacco at its value in Virginia, because those were the principal markets from which the goods came. The law was, therefore, altered to the actual value. It had been well settled by many decisions in the United States in their Customs Act, using similar words to those in the Dominion Act, that the cash value paid for an article in the bond fide course of business was the true rate at which goods should be entered. He thought the legislation passed in 1874 or 1875, allowing the Government arbitrarily to fix the value of certain goods for duty, was scarcely in accordance with principle. If this abuse existed of goods being entered on undervaluations, the provisions of the law should have been made such as would have enabled Custom-house officers to have prevented such valuations, rather than the Government having the power of fixing a value for Customs purposes totally irrespective of the cost of the article. This they now did especially in the case of pianos, but upon what principle such a course was adopted the Custom-house officers themselves did not know. If the duties were to be charged on the actual price paid in a fair market, that could be easily ascertained, but surely it was a dangerous power to give to officers of Customs that they should be allowed arbitrarily to fix the price at which any particular article should be entered. That power might be so abused that great advantage would be obtained by one manufacturer over another. A case had occurred at Montreal and Toronto where an importer took advantage of the Customs arrangement, and by importing a class of pianos, which happened not to be in the schedule established by the Governor in Council, because they were entered in another name than that of the maker, secured their entry at $140 or $145, while the same pianos entered in the maker's name were charged on a price of $240 or $250. There was no sufficient reason why a special rule should be made in favour of pianos and sewing machines. If there should be an alteration in the law, the hon. the Minister of Customs should take the matter into serious consideration, and any amendment should have a wider scope than the limited one which the hon. the Minister of Customs seemed to indicate.

Mr. BURPEE.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said that under the law of 1874 such articles as pianos and sewing machines were considered exceptional. American manufacturers made special arrangements with Canada buyers, to whom they sold goods at 25 or 30 per cent. less than the prices in the United States. Moreover, machines were sent into this country in many ways, parts of sewing machines being entered as castings, others as steel and woodwork, and the same system was followed in regard to pianos. The Customs Department had obtained from the pianoforte manufacturers of the United States the fairly marked values of the lines of goods. The Government thought they were justified, if the market value in the United States was a fair one, and if the American manufacturers made special arrangements with Canada buyers, in making them pay duty on the price of the goods charged in their own markets. As to the interpretation of the law with respect to the fair market value, it was stated in 33 Victoria.

Mr. WOOD said the action taken by the Government had been the best ever adopted to compel a fair rate of duty to be paid upon the cost of goods imported from the United States. It was well known that manufacturers of pianos, sewing machines and other goods had agents in Canada, and when they sent their goods had them entered far below the cost price and came into competition with Canadian manufactured goods, the home manufacturers complaining that they could not stand against such competition. The matter was brought to the notice of the Government and proper means were adopted to ascertain the facts. The Government thereupon formed a schedule of prices for those goods, so that to-day piano-makers and sewing machine manufacturers in the Dominion were quite prepared to compete with American manufacturers, whose goods were now admitted at the regular market price in their country. But it was not fair that Canadian manufacturers should be called upon to compete with goods which were admitted at 30, 40, or 50 per cent. less than in their country. He was surprised the members of the Opposition, who were always talking of protection, were taking the course of interfering with the arrangement under which justice was being done to our own people. The Government were entitled to the thanks of the country for having drawn up the schedule of prices referred to, with which the Canadian manufactures were perfectly satisfied.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said it was quite evident that the statement he had previously made, that the regulation was made in the interests of the manufacturers, was quite correct. The light in which it was viewed by the hon. member for Hamilton, and other hon. members who advocated protection views showed that such was the natural inference, and that no other inference would be drawn. The Government might have the power to decide, by an Order in Council, the value of an article before it was brought into the country, but he failed to discover it in the Customs Act. There was no Act in force which gave the Government the power to decide the value of an article for the next three or six months. A merchant proceeded to the United States and purchased certain goods, for which he paid in cash the actual market value of the goods at the time. When the merchant presented his invoice to the Canadian Customs authorities and stated that such was the price the goods cost him, the Government had no power but to accept that statement, and levy their duties accordingly. A case of that character had occurred in his own constituency. A gentleman imported a large quantity of hair-cloth from the Pantucket Hair-Cloth Company of the United States, and on presenting his papers for duty, they were refused. That, it appeared, was an article which the Government had interdicted, and he was charged 22½ per cent. duty instead of 17½ per cent. He contended that the Customs authorities in that particular exceeded their powers. While such duties were levied on articles from the United States, German and English goods of similar quality were admitted at invoice prices without a question.

Mr. TUPPER said such a regulation would not protect anybody, because the article was not manufactured in this country.

Mr. JONES said that did not matter. Pianos, organs and sewing machines and other articles, which could be bought in the United States to-day at a certain price, were refused admission by the Customs authority at the rate at which they were actually purchased there. That action was wrong and the Government had no authority to carry it out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said hon. members were endeavouring to find out what the law was, and not discussing what the law ought to be, or whether the hon. the Minister of Customs was carrying out the law in the regulations to which reference had been made. If those regulations were against the manufacturer, no doubt the hon. member for Hamilton would work energetically to have the law altered; but they must first find out what the law was, and then how to amend it. The hon. the Minister of Customs had quoted from an Act which was repealed. The clauses the hon. gentleman had quoted had been expressly repealed and the market value, as his hon. friend from North Victoria had pointed out, was abolished and actual value inserted instead, and such value was the value in cash. A purchaser of tea in New York was told that the price was so much for cash, or so much at three months or at six months. It was absurd to suppose that a man could not buy for cash in New York. It was quite clear from his collation of these Acts that the Customs regulation in this respect was contrary to law.

Mr. CAMERON said a little further ignorance on the part of Customs officers was shown as to what the law really was, because they appeared to ignore altogether the Act of 33 Vic. The 9th section of the Act of 37th Vic. provided for this arbitrary fixing of value by order of the Governor in Council, stating that, whereas difficulties had frequently arisen with regard to determining the fair market value of dutiable goods imported into Canada, being the manufactured productions of foreign countries, &c. This was not the law at the time; it was not the fair market value which was specified at the time the Act of 1874 was passed. Duties were collected on the supposition that the fair market value was the test for entry, when this was not the case at all. The Act provided:

“Whereas, difficulties have frequently arisen in determining the fair market value for duty of goods imported into Canada, being the manufacture or production of foreign countries, or of Great Britain, such as musical instruments, sewing machines, agricultural machines or implements, medical preparations commonly called Patent Medicines, and other similar goods, the prices of which are published by the manufacturers or producers, or persons acting in their behalf, it is hereby enacted that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, fix and determine a certain rate of discount which may be deducted from such published prices of any such manufactures or productions, and the remainder of such published prices, after deducting such rate of discount, shall be deemed and taken to be the fair market values for duty of any such manufactures or productions as may or shall be specified in such Order in Council, anything in this or any other Act to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Whereas the Act of 33 Vic. provided that the actual, and not the fair market value was the test. The hon. member for Hamilton had twitted, he supposed, both himself and one or two other members of the House with being Protectionists, and yet being opposed to power being given to the Government to impose protection. If the Government wished to protect manufactures, they should not do it on the sly, or in any underhand way. If they meant to give protection, they should say so, and introduce a properly protective tariff; but they should not reserve to themselves the arbitrary power of giving indirect protection by making bonâ fide and honest importers pay a duty of 20 or 30 per cent. more than the actual cost of articles. It was said that this power was used to prevent fraud and unfair competition between foreign and home manufacturers, but, if any fraud existed, surely the Customs officers should be enabled to prevent it by a direct, straightforward mode, without resorting to any underhand means. If it was to afford protection, let it be so termed, and hon. gentlemen on his side of the House favourable to such protection as they thought ought to be given would gladly support such a policy of the Government. He did not wish any injustice to be done to bond fide traders, by an arbitrary fixing of the duty on certain articles in a manner inconsistent with the general principle of the law with regard to other articles.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said that the regulation referred to certain articles named, with reference to which the business was almost entirely done by agents in this country. These agents had the privilege of importing goods cheaper than our own merchants could, and the law justified the Department in collecting duties on the fair value of such goods in the country where they were purchased.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT called the attention of the hon. member for Kingston to the Act 37 Vic., 1874, which, if he understood it clearly, re-enacted sections 29 to 46 inclusive of the Act passed in the 31st year of Her Majesty's reign. The clauses said to have been repealed, sec. 8, declared :

"The fair market value for duty of all goods upon which any ad valorem duty of Customs is chargeable under this Act or any other Act, shall be ascertained and determined except as hereinafter provided, in accordance with the provisions of the sections twenty-nine to forty-six inclusive of the Act passed in the thirty-first year of Her Majesty's reign, intitled: 'An Act respecting the Customs'—so much of any Act as is inconsistent with this section being hereby repealed."

Mr. WORKMAN said he was glad that the question had come up. This matter had frequently given rise to a good deal of feeling and discussion as well as legal proceedings in Montreal. It was very difficult for the Government to satisfy all parties, but he thought, nevertheless, that the system laid down with regard to pianos and sewing machines had, on the whole, given a great deal of satisfaction to the importers of these articles, and to honest dealers. It was well known that, before this Order in Council was issued, pianos, in particular, were brought into Canada at one half of their cost value. Honest American manufacturers were willing to pay duty on the full value. He had stated during the previous Session that we required an honest administration of our Customs laws. Goods brought from the United States should pay duty on the cost value there, and any regulation introduced for that purpose would be acceptable to the great majority of honest dealers in Canada. He was aware of the case to which the hon. member for North Victoria alluded. No doubt the Government would meet it fairly and treat it—as should be done—on its own merits. The cash market value system had prevailed to some extent some time ago, but it was well known, then and now, that nine-tenths of the goods purchased in England and elsewhere were obtained on credit. The time given varied from three to four, or six, or even nine months. When they arrived out a cash discount was deducted from the invoice price, and the Government lost the duty on that discount. When this system came into force, everyone apparently bought for cash, and all participated in the benefit afforded by the cash discount, and to a certain extent the revenue was, he would not say defrauded, but exposed to loss. He thought they should try in every possible manner to strengthen the hands of the Government in administering the Customs Laws on a fair and equitable principle; and merchants and dealers who wished to do business honestly, would fully approve of this course.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was free to admit that the clauses which he had quoted as repealed in 1870, were put back, as it were, in the Act of 1874. The law as quoted by the Minister of Customs had apparently been revived.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the regulation was lawful, even without this re-enactment. The actual value was very different from the cash value. The hon. gentleman assumed that these terms were synonymous, but this was not the case. The actual value meant the value in the market where the article was bought, and the cash value was something below the actual market value in the place where they were purchased. Even if the clauses mentioned had not been restored, the Statute of 1870 would not bear the interpretation the hon. gentleman had placed on it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I differ with the hon. gentleman altogether. Business is done in one of two ways, either for cash or by barter. There is no such thing as barter, and, therefore, the actual value is the cash value.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; that is not the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You must know that the element of credit is quite a different thing from value. Credit varies with the individual in a hundred different ways. The actual value is the cash or exchange value, which, as we know perfectly well, is now restricted.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman overlooked the evidence of value altogether. The price was not always to be taken as the value of an article. He would give an illustration: A gentleman of Cleveland bought in Montreal, at auction, a large library, and he wished to enter them at Cleveland at the price actually paid, which was perhaps 20 per cent. below real value; but this was not permitted, the American law containing a provision precisely similar to the one under discussion. Duty was paid on real value. Many instances of this nature could be cited; and on this very principle the action of the Minister of Customs was based. It was competent for this Minister to set aside the invoice price when this perhaps related to bankrupt stock, and not to the ordinary cash market value, and take evidence as to actual value.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was happy to see that his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was a convert to their views. His hon. friend urged that a distinction was to be drawn between the actual price paid in particular cases and the actual value. The hon. gentleman at last recognized the fact that there was a slaughter market and slaughter prices. No doubt, when the hon. gentleman had acquired more experience, he would be as strong a Protectionist as himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said that the difference in prices mentioned did not apply simply to sewing machines and pianos. American manufacturers generally gave special discounts to Canadians to a greater degree than to their own people. He had in his possession a letter from one of the largest manufacturers and dealers in Ontario, who, while urging that they required increased protection as against Americans, stated, in reply to the argument that manufacturers now received additional protection in consequence of the rise of greenbacks in value, that some two years ago, when purchasing in the United States, gold having fallen from 20 to 15 per cent. premium, a discount of 5 per cent. was allowed to meet that contingency. When gold declined to 10 per cent. premium, another 5 per cent. discount was allowed, and now, when it stood at 5 per cent. premium, 15 per cent. discount was given, which was not allowed to American purchasers. Therefore, it did not follow that this system among American manufacturers was confined to these special articles named; and it was done to crush out our manufacturers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said that, at all events, this difference in prices did not apply to dry goods, and he maintained that these represented all the other classes put together. He quite concurred with the right hon. member for Kingston in this respect; he certainly did not see what other term than slaughter prices could be given to the practice of selling pianos here at 50 and 60 per cent. below prices in the United States. He would infinitely prefer that the duty should be exacted on the price charged for the instrument, which should be seized if the entry was incorrect.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said that cotton, like sugar, was staple goods, on which no such discount as he had mentioned could be allowed in any country. He had referred particularly to woodenware, and iron manufactures of different kinds.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he thought, if any merchant presented an invoice at the Customs and swore it was correct, it was the duty of the officer to accept it. In his opinion, the Government were taking arbitrary powers, and the law would not sustain them. He hoped the policy of the Government would be changed in this respect.

Mr. WOOD said a screw manufactory in England had sent out goods to this country at a discount of 25 per cent. less than they exported them to other parts of the world, in order to crush out a similar Canadian industry. He took the liberty to write to the Appraiser at Montreal stating the facts, and the importer was compelled to pay the regular market price. In his opinion, that was according to law. The Government would be derelict in its duty if, in such cases, the tariff was not imposed according to the regular market price.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said this whole discussion simply proved that the protective policy of the Government was inadequate.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he would like to hear some explanation with reference to the clause relating to drawbacks. It was quite evident that only half the legitimate duty was collected under the present system. There were too many ports of entry in the Dominion; it was impossible to collect the duties in all the small ports where goods were admitted. In the large ports, goods underwent the most rigid examination, and it was almost impossible for imports to evade the duty. Goods were sent direct from the steamer to the small inland towns where there was no examination whatever. He did not think that could be remedied unless several small ports of entry were grouped together and placed under one Appraiser. There was a case before the Government in Nova Scotia where the invoice showed £350 and the goods were only entered at £150. Such things were unavoidable under the present system, and he thought it would be an advantage if the hon. the Minister of Customs could devise some means to remedy the evil.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said there was scarcely any other city in the Dominion that made such demands in regard to drawbacks as Halifax. He was willing to discuss the matter with the hon. member for that city at any time, but it would be difficult to accede to what his constituents wanted. There was no doubt a great deal in what had been said with regard to small ports of entry, but he would like the hon. member to propose a scheme whereby the evil could be removed. Hon. members were under the impression that the Government confined the valuation of goods to a few articles only. That was not the fact. Every month they tried to get the best information as to the value of goods in different markets, and more particularly that of the United States, and distributed what information they obtained to the officers with instructions to collect as near the market rates as possible on everything.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said in 1874 there was a great deal of discussion about the Order in Council which allowed certain parts of locomotives to come in at ten per cent., while the locomotive complete and perfect was liable to the 17½ per cent. tariff. He understood, from a statement by the hon. the Finance Minister, that that Order was repealed. If that was the fact, the Government had no right to allow the locomotive to be dissected, but should collect the 17½ per cent. tariff on the whole.

Mr. GOUDGE said he could not allow the statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) to pass without comment. There might be one or two cases where the Customs Act had been improperly applied, but, as far as his judgment went, the law was as properly carried out at the outports as at the city of Halifax. The Collector of Customs at Windsor took every pains that the law should be complied with.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): The Collector of Customs is not the judge; the Appraiser has to pass on such matters.

Mr. GOUDGE said the Collector at Windsor had been in business, and was as capable of examining and valuing goods as any Appraiser. This question was being agitated because the outports were becoming independent of Halifax, and importing their goods direct. He thought the law worked well, and protested against any change.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said he wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the sublime impossibility of making a tax that would suit everybody. The whole system was entirely wrong. There should be no such thing as a tariff or a tax; there should be direct taxation, which would be as near being just as anything possibly could be. But hon. gentlemen talked about a tariff on boxes and a tariff on packages, and that was simply ridiculous; it was simply making a petty shopkeeping business of the Government of the nation. It was all wrong philosophically, mentally and economically. The only way to make the people rich was to give them all the products of the earth at the cheapest possible price. They could not make a national party in Canada without a national currency and direct taxation. He wished to say to every hon. member of thought that, if that was not come to sooner or later, the country would walk into the United States.

Mr. OLIVER said it was currently reported, and he was afraid there was some truth in the report, that the hon. the Minister of Customs would have to multiply instead of decreasing the number of Custom-house officers in the Lower Provinces. It was stated that one-half of the imported goods consumed in those Provinces came in without inspection or paying duty. He thought it would be a great mistake to do away with the inland officers. Those small ports of entry encouraged the merchants of towns and villages in the interior of the country to become independent of the cities. There might be too many of such ports, but it would be a fatal mistake to abolish them, after they had been in existence for so many years.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John), in reply to the member for Frontenac, said the Order in Council respecting locomotives was not repealed. The system adopted in the Lower Provinces was the same as that in Ontario.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was the duty of the House to repeal this Order in Council, and place locomotives on the unenumerated list, on which 17½ per cent. was paid.

Mr. GOUDGE.

Mr. FORBES said he much regretted that the hon. member for Halifax should throw out the slanderous insinuation that the whole of Nova Scotia, with the exception of Halifax, was dishonest. It would seem from what that hon. member had stated, that in every Customs office, except that at Halifax, there was something wrong. The hon. member wanted all the outside ports of entry bundled together and transferred to Halifax. He (Mr. Forbes) challenged the hon. member to name the port at which the irregularities referred to had taken place.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he was misunderstood. It was the principle which he condemned. In large cities, such as Montreal, Toronto, Quebec, Hamilton and Halifax, there were a number of officers who could take the different departments in valuing the goods. But it was impossible for one man in a little outlying port to be sufficiently acquainted with every kind of merchandize as to be able to value it. He did not speak for the benefit of Halifax particularly, but of the whole country.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he agreed with the remarks of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Goudge). The official in his town thoroughly understood his duty, and he, it should be presumed, was a sample of the men in the Customs offices outside of the city of Halifax. He understood the value of most of the articles which came under his notice, and, if there was anything of which he did not know the value he would telegraph to the Department for instructions. He understood the value of articles which came into the Province fully as well as the Collector at Halifax.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): The Collector at Halifax does not value goods.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he trusted that the Government would not alter the present state of affairs as to the outlying ports of entry.

Mr. WORKMAN said he agreed with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr.

Jones). He was satisfied there were ports at which the officers did not have a just appreciation of the value of goods, although he would not name them. He knew one case in which a gentleman had three new suits of clothes brought in a package from England, which had not been duly valued by the officers. It was quite impossible for any one Appraiser to be acquainted with articles which came from all parts of the world. In all large ports, such as Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and Halifax, there were a number of Appraisers who made the valuation of goods a speciality. He heartily agreed with the suggestion for the establishment of proper examining warehouses.

Mr. NORRIS said he believed the officials in the outlying ports were just as honest as those in Montreal and Halifax. If he remembered aright, it was not long since there was a smuggling case in Montreal.

Mr. BAIN said he hoped the Government would consider the matter in a different light to the hon. members who had made representations against outlying ports. His experience was that there were just as experienced officers in these ports as in Montreal or Halifax. The irregularities which had occurred in Montreal did not show perhaps that the officials were incompetent, but that something was not quite correct. The officer who acted at the port which he represented was very efficient, having served an apprenticeship as landing waiter and appraiser before he was appointed, and he was just as competent to perform his duties as officers in larger ports. No officer could gain his knowledge by intuition, and all had to watch the price lists of articles. If the business was concentrated at one point, it might prove a convenience to merchants at that point, but it would be a great hardship to the rest of the country. It was unfortunate there should be that jealousy which had manifested itself during the discussion, and which was always to be deprecated.

Mr. PLUMB said he was very glad that the discussion had taken such a wide range. It was right that the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs should be directed to matters with which he seemed not fully acquainted. The sectional spirit which had cropped up on the part of an hon. member from Nova Scotia was to be deprecated.

Mr. BUNSTER called attention to the injustice which the Bill would inflict upon British Columbia, in that many goods were landed upon its shores, some of them from Her Majesty's ships, to which no invoice price was attached. He did not see any clause which would meet this difficulty.

Resolutions agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Mr. BURPEE introduced a Bill (No. 19) To amend and consolidate as amended the Acts respecting the Customs.

Bill read the first time.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright for the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Wood in amendment to the said proposed amendment, read.

Mr. FLEMING said the hon. the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech had informed the House that, owing to exceptional circumstances, chiefly the depression of trade throughout the country, a great falling off in the revenue had taken place, causing a deficit of $1,900,000. This, no doubt, to the House and the country was a matter of regret, although it was not wholly unexpected; no one who considered the state of the commercial world in general could imagine that we would escape the universal depression. While the deficit was large, they were assured by the Finance Minister that a considerable portion of last year's expenditure was exceptional, and that items amounting to $1,574,000 would not be placed in the Estimates for the present year, and that all which was required of an increase would be between $400,000 and $500,000. The Government had been condemned in no measured language for having brought about this deficit; the supporters of the right hon. member for Kingston had forgotten that in the history of the country, especially of Old Canada, deficits were of no uncommon occurrence. It might be said, so far as the Government was concerned, that this deficit occurred during a period of general depression, that they had to encounter peculiar difficulties, and that there might at least be some excuse for them under the circumstances in which they were placed. But if they would look at the state of the country at the time when the other deficits occurred, it would be found that it was not during a period of depression; but, according to the statement of the right hon. gentleman himself, during a period of unusual prosperity. Surely these hon. gentlemen should remember the position of their leader in a time of prosperity, allowing deficits to occur year after year. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Bertram) had alluded to some of these deficits in his speech the other evening, and, on examining into the matter, he found that, between 1857 and 1866, there were continued and serious deficits, some of them to very large amounts. In 1858, the deficit amounted to $1,132,296; in 1861, the deficit was $2,087,253; and in 1865, the deficit was $1,168,384. During nine years—these years of great prosperity—the deficits exceeded eight millions of dollars. If the present Government were to be condemned for a deficit during a period of depression, surely the right hon. gentleman, whom these hon. gentlemen supported, should be much more severely condemned for permitting such deficits to occur during a period of prosperity. The present deficit the Finance Minister proposed to meet by levying an additional duty of two cents per pound on tea; an additional duty of one cent per pound on malt, and additional duties on ale and beer. He also proposed the removal of some small wares from the 10 to the 17½ per cent. list. While these duties apparently involved additional taxation, the Finance Minister intended to lighten the burdens of the people by reducing the duty of 15 cents on coal oil to 6 cents, and by repealing altogether the Excise duty on this article. These proposals were not, however, acceptable to the Opposition, whose leader had moved an amendment thereto. The right hon. gentleman objected to the resolutions of the Government, and stated that these duties would increase the burdens of taxation. He thought that, if they looked into the facts of the case, they would find that there was really no such addition as was represented. Last year 14,557,851 lb. of tea had been imported into this country; an additional duty of two cents per pound on this quantity would amount to $291,157, a tax of less than eight cents per head per annum, or a tax of about forty cents per annum on a family of five persons. On the other hand, the Finance Minister estimated that eight millions of gallons of coal oil were consumed in the Dominion annually, equal to about two gallons per head. The reduction which had been effected in the price of coal oil, as shown by the state of the market, was at least fifteen cents per gallon; a saving of thirty cents per head, or for a family of five persons of $1.50. Subtracting forty cents from $1.50, showed a gain of $1.10 per family of five persons, proving that the burdens of the people had not been increased. It might, however, be said that the price of beer would be slightly increased, owing to the additional tax on malt. Supposing it was increased two or three cents a gallon, the gain to the country in the reduction on coal oil would more than make up for the increased cost of beer. The right hon. member for Kingston had severely condemned the Government for imposing the additional duty on tea; he had said: "Surely in readjusting the tariff, the gentlemen opposite might have found some other object for taxation, and not have put on so oppressive a duty on a beverage which was almost a necessary of life, especially among the larger portion of the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada, and which, from its nature, being the 'cup which cheers and not inebriates,' was the best antidote to the excessive use of ardent spirits that had yet been found. The hon. gentleman put a specific duty of two cents a pound on tea, which, in addition to the duty on it before, made a duty on it now of five cents. Surely the hon. gentleman might have found some other object for taxation. It was not for the Opposition to suggest what these other subjects should be, but, with the whole question before them, the Government had deliberately chosen to put a tax on tea, which was a harmless beverage, a useful beverage and a necessity of life, and they had imposed it in the most obnoxious manner." After all this tirade against the duty on tea, it was a somewhat singular fact, that in Old Canada, under the régime of this hon. gentleman, our people were compelled in 1862 to pay a duty of nine cents per pound on tea. Not content with this, that hon. gentleman had, in 1866, imposed an additional duty of three cents, making it twelve cents per pound; and yet the hon. gentleman now condemned the Government for having levied an additional duty of only two cents on that article. The hon. gentleman also objected to the duty on malt, as against the interests of temperance. He was very happy to find in the hon. gentleman a new convert to the temperance cause. The hon. member for Centre Wellington had spoken very feelingly about the duty on malt, declaring that it was in effect a tax on the farmers, who, he added, might be tempted thereby to resort to illicit distillation. He rather thought that the farmers of Centre Wellington would not thank the hon. gentleman for that insinuation. The hon. gentleman also said that this duty might tempt the brewers to make use of deleterious drugs in manufacturing. It seemed somewhat strange that the duty should be a cause of temptation to both farmers and brewers. If the farmers got less for their barley, then the brewers buying it at a cheaper rate would not be so tempted, and, if the brewers paid the same price as formerly, then the farmers would not be tempted. In his (Mr. Fleming's) opinion, no reduction in the price of barley would really be caused by the additional duty on malt. The foreign market, taking 92 per cent. of the barley raised, determined the price. The remainder could have little or no effect thereon. How was the deficiency in revenue to be met? The Government had communicated their scheme, but this did not suit the right hon. member for Kingston, who stated that it should be met by a diminution of expenditure. If so, then this must take place either in the public service or in public works. The hon. gentleman had last year spoken against a reduction in the expenditure for public service on the ground that it would impair its efficiency, and this year the hon. gentleman said there was no necessity for the stoppage of the construction of public works, and urged that such a course would only have the effect of increasing the depression, and throwing more people out of employment, and of adding to the gloom now spread over the country. Then it necessarily followed that there must be some slight increase in taxation in order to meet the country's requirements. It was stated in the amendment that the tariff should be readjusted; he understood this expression to mean that the volume of taxation should be kept at the same amount; the burden was only to be shifted from one shoulder to the other. The Government had made a readjustment; they had caused the oil refiner and the brewer to bear an additional share of the load, and the burden had been equalized on the shoulders of the people. It was alleged that we wanted a policy which would benefit our agricultural interests. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) had contended that our farmers were compelled to pay a tax of one million annually to the people of the United States on the wares that we exported to them. It was true that one country might be compelled to pay tribute to another after an expensive and bloody war, as had recently been witnessed in the case of Germany and France, but no power could peacefully do so. This statement was consequently of no value. A great deal had been said about the benefit to be derived from imposing a duty on American grain, but it was evident that the American farmers themselves derived no benefit from this duty on our grain. The United States exported 71,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. All the wheat we could sell to the people of the United States, either with or without a duty, would not affect in any degree the price there. Protection had been advocated in favour of the mining interest. Any one looking at the geography of our country would see that, of all countries in the world, we were most unfitted by nature for a protective policy. Canada was of immense length—length as it were without breadth, and, if one part of it were forced to trade with another part, it could only be at a great disadvantage. Perhaps there was no country in the world better fitted for a protective policy than the United States being comparatively square and possessing within itself every variety of climate, capable of producing almost everything necessary to existence. The settled portions of our country formed but a narrow strip of territory extending across the continent. It would therefore be a great hardship if our people were compelled by law to trade only with each other. Such a state of things could only be tolerated in case of war. Were we to put ourselves into a position which could only be endured if war with the United States had already been declared? So long as there was peace, so long as we could do business profitably with our neighbours, so long would it be our interest to do so. A duty on coal had been advocated in the interest of the miners of Nova Scotia, but it was evident that its effect would only be to impose a tax upon a large portion of the people of Ontario, without benefiting at all the people of Nova Scotia. Allusion had been made to the falling off of the imports from the mother country, and a good deal of feeling had been manifested against the increased trade with the United States; but, if a duty were put on bituminous coal, it would affect the coal brought from Great Britain more than what was brought from the United States. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) in introducing his amendment, stated that he was not in favour of the position taken by the Government, but considered that the interests of the country would be better served by imposing additional duties upon such goods and wares as might be produced in Canada, thereby affording increased protection, while securing the additional revenue required. The first question to be considered here was: How could goods and wares be afforded increased protection, and at the same time an increased revenue be derived from the importation of the same class of goods? The great falling off in importations last year was in the 17½ per cent. list. It was well known that, if they raised the duty, instead of gaining revenue they would lose. The articles on the ten per cent. and five per cent. lists formed the raw materials, and an increased tax on them would injure manufacturers instead of benefiting them. They could not get increased protection and additional revenue at the same time. If additional duties on goods and wares that we produced did not bring the required income, they would still have to fall back upon the tea duty; in fact, Protectionists, according to their own theory, would be obliged to put a duty on those articles which we could not grow or manufacture ourselves, and tea was one of those. A great deal of interest was manifested now by the right hon. member for Kingston in the manufacturing interest, but in 1873, when he was in power, manufacturers were complaining just as they were doing now, perhaps more so. He would read an extract from the Monetary Times of February 28, 1873:

Mr. FLEMING.

Mr. FLEMING.

"It is to be regretted that our woollen manufacturers are just now depressed and in an unsatisfactory state. A good many mills are working only half time, which means we believe from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m., and a number are shut down altogether. The Almonte Mills, which are among the best managed and most extensive in Canada, have adopted the same course as the rest. From both east and west of Toronto the same story comes, so that the causes which have brought this state of things are not merely local."

The Government of the day had a glorious opportunity then, but they had allowed it to escape; and now, when they had not the opportunity, they complained of the present Government for not doing what they would not do when they had the power. Allusion had frequently been made to the people of the United States in the course of the debate. It was said that they were a great people, and that we ought to follow their example. The United States had prospered in spite of protection, and not because of protection. It was said that the United States would not have followed that mode unless it was beneficial: but were the people of the United States always right? It was not very long ago since they had upheld slavery as being right. It would not have been safe a few years ago in Boston to have spoken against slavery. The people of the United States were liable to err. They had erred in the past, and it might safely be affirmed that they might be in error now. There were many influential men in the United States who were proclaiming free-trade doctrines, declaring that if free trade were the policy of the country it would be more prosperous than at the present time. It might be asked why it was that protection was carried on to so great an extent in the United States. An American said in speaking of it:

"Tariff Legislation in the United States did not mean either revenue or protection distinctly, but it was the product of a combination of selfish interests. Salt had a few votes; iron a few votes; leather had a few; grindstones a few; and so on, and they all combined together to set up a system of taxation of the many for the benefit of the few."

During the war it was found requisite to impose heavy internal taxes; as a counterpart it was necessary to put on high import duties in the interests of the manufacturers, but, when the internal taxes were lowered after the war, the manufacturers did not allow the import duties to be lowered, and they had succeeded in carrying their point hitherto. Allusion had been made to the great increase in our trade with the United States as compared with Great Britain. The only thing was that our people had taken advantage of the depression in the United States, and had purchased in the cheapest market. He did not think that was a matter of regret. We imported from Great Britain, when we could do so to advantage. In 1872, when the Michigan Central Railway Company were laying their road with steel rails, they had to pay $97 per ton, while the Canada Southern, a few miles distant, purchased in England at $70 per ton. This showed that the people of this country bought wherever they could buy to the best advantage. Thus, when prices fell in the United States, they bought in the United States, instead of in Great Britain. Reference had been made to a reciprocity of tariffs, a war of tariffs, but it was somewhat singular that no one had proposed to make use of the same tariff as the United States. It was always the United States tariff in a modified form. If it was to be a war of tariffs, we ought to have as powerful a weapon as we could obtain. Being the weaker nation, our tariff ought to be proportionately higher than that of the United States. We ought to make up for our lack of weight by greater momentum. The course taken by the Opposition showed that this idea of a war of tariffs could not be maintained. Allusion had been made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer) to the state of manufactures in this country. He stated that they were in a very depressed condition. It had been stated by another hon. member on behalf of the manufacturers themselves that they were better protected this year than last by at least 8 per cent. If they got along last year without any additional protection, certainly there was less reason for a change in the tariff now than there was last year. He thought it folly to be continually talking and making ado about the people of the United States. We had no occasion either to go down on our knees to them, or to hold up a sword to threaten them. We should simply shape our policy with a view to our own interest. He thought the policy in force at the present time was just what was suited to our circumstances. Allusions had been made to other nations abandoning a policy of free trade and adopting one of protection. Attention had been called to France, but that was a country which had to bear the burden and cost of a severe war. It had to tax itself all it could bear in order to make up the money required in consequence of that war. There was no occasion for us, in our circumstances, burdening ourselves in the same way. The hon. member for Cumberland had made a serious charge against the Finance Minister with reference to the loan effected last year in England. The Finance Minister was denounced because he had employed agents, and the agents themselves were spoken of in language which required explanation. The hon. member for Cumberland spoke of them as "brokers" who fixed a price for the loan in order to put a fortune in their pockets. This seemed a very serious charge. Were these agents, who were employed by the late Government for years, men who would act in this manner? He knew the Minister of Finance would have his attention drawn to this matter. He thought it should not go before the country and across the Atlantic without being thoroughly explained. He had observed an article in the Journal of Commerce in relation to it, written apparently by one conversant with financial matters. The writer said:

"We have no hesitation in affirming that Dr. Tupper wholly misconceives the position of the financial agents. 1st. Neither the Finance Minister of Canada nor of any other country, foreign or colonial, could successfully place a loan on the London money market without the aid of a house of established reputation. The term 'broker' is wholly inapplicable. 2nd. If Messrs. Barings & Glynn were capable of acting in the manner in which Dr. Tupper not only thinks they did act, but that they might with honour and propriety act, then we should say they would be wholly unworthy of the confidence of the Canadian Government. 3rd. The quotations of the Mail and of Dr. Tupper are wholly incorrect. We have taken some pains to verify those given by Mr. Cartwright, and know them to be correct. The blunder on this head we can only account for on the supposition that the current semi-annual dividend, two per cent., was not deducted from the quotations in some price current."

He (Mr. Fleming) would not occupy the time of the House longer. He trusted he had made himself so understood as not to be deemed inconsistent if he voted for the resolution, and against the amendments of the hon. member for Hamilton and the right hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. FLEMING.

Mr. McCALLUM said he did not desire to detain the House further than to say a few words regarding the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood). He was surprised and more over regretted that the hon. gentleman had thought proper to submit that motion, which he (Mr. Wood) considered in the interest of the manufactures of this country. He (Mr. McCallum) doubted whether that large and, he must say, respected class of the population of the Dominion would thank the hon. member for his action, and the arguments he used in support of his motion. They would see by reading his speech that he was more desirous to protect hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches than to foster the industries of the country. There was no doubt but that they would appreciate the able letter that he read to the House to sustain his arguments. He (Mr. McCallum) understood from the letter that the writer was in favour of a duty on malt. The hon. member did not give the House the name of the writer, although the Government knew that some people in the world were in favour of placing a duty on malt. But the House did not know to what country the writer belonged: whether he was an American, a Russian, an Esquimaux, a Hindoo or a Turk. The hon. member did not condescend to tell the House his creed, calling, country or colour. It was not by reading anonymous letters that the hon. gentleman would obtain what he professed to require,—the encouragement of the manufacturing industry of Canada, and of Hamilton particularly. He thought those employed in the agricultural as well as the manufacturing and mining interests would say: "Save us from such a friend and advocate." The hon. gentleman further said that he was opposed to a duty on coal. The imports of coal into this country amounted to $3,320,060. and the imports of tea to $3,480,797. What was the difference between taxing the coal that helped to prepare the tea, and taxing the tea itself? We produced the coal, and he wanted to see our industries fostered. No one would undertake to say we could grow tea. By transferring the duty from tea to coal, a great stimulus would be given to the mining interest, and no hardship would be imposed on any class. It appeared that $19,077,064 worth of articles manufactured in Canada were admitted free. They came in contact with our industries, and it would be a much wiser policy to tax them than to keep them on the free list. He would not address the House either in favour of free trade or protection, as he knew they could not adopt either as he understood the question. We must have a revenue to pay the interest on our debt, expenses of Government, and to make improvements which were beneficial to the country. The Opposition claimed that the revenue should be collected on articles imported that came in competition with those manufactured by our own people. And, because they desired this from the Government, they were told that extreme protection would be a curse and free trade a blessing. But the Opposition did not desire either extreme policy, as they thought it was not applicable to the condition or position of our people. What they wanted was fair trade with our neighbours on the products of the mine, field and forest, which we did not possess at present. But hon. gentlemen on the Government side said they were satisfied with the present state of affairs between this country and the United States; that was to say, they were satisfied with free trade on one side and no corresponding benefit on the other. They were satisfied to give the Americans the benefit of our markets free, or on payment of a small duty, to compete with our own people in our own markets, while the Americans excluded Canadians from their markets by a high tariff. The Government and their supporters called this fair trade and beneficial to this country. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told the House that 17½ per cent. protection was sufficient for the interests of the country, and that the manufacturers were unreasonable in their demands. The hon. member said last Session :

“I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious protection ; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturalist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops. The purchasing power of money is not a correct measure of the purchasing power of labour. A farmer raises a bushel of corn which he sells for fifty cents in a foreign market, and with the proceeds he can buy three yards of cotton ; but supposing the manufactures are brought to his door, and the better market which it creates increases the price to 60 cents or 70 cents per bushel, and although import duties are levied on cottons from Manchester so as to add largely to its price, still he may be enabled to buy four yards of cotton with his bushel of corn instead of the three yards it was able to purchase before, as the purchasing power of his labour is increased.”

The hon. member told the House that the Opposition reminded him of the joke of the tail wagging the dog. But, if that was applicable to the Opposition this year, the hon. gentleman was in that position ; he was a small joint in that tail, and he found out that the tail could not wag the dog, therefore, he was supporting the Government this year, and the dog was wagging the tail. The hon. member further told the House that this country was not known in the United States forty miles from the border. He wished to know how the hon. gentleman got here, and it was imposing too much on the credulity of the House by the hon. gentleman when he said we were not known by a people with whom we bought and sold so much as with the United States. The hon. member told the House the evil effects of protection in the United States, and disastrous results which had flowed from it, by quoting an article from the Springfield Republican, showing that 100 acres of the Savoy farm, with fair buildings and timber, valued at $100,000, recently was bought for $1,200. He (Mr. McCallum) was willing that that statement should go to the country and let the people judge whether that was a fair question as to the effect of protection in the United States. He thought that the hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to serve the Government, had overshot the mark when he gave such a quotation from the Springfield Republican. The hon. member for Norfolk told the House further, that we must be careful in arranging our tariff that we did not offend the Americans, as they would retaliate, and place a duty on lumber. He was sick and tired of the Government paying any attention whatever as to the effect its policy would have on the United States. If it pleased the Americans and they thought it beneficial to their own people, they would place a duty on lumber; but that could not effect this country very injuriously. Of our total exports amounting to $20,337,469, the United States took $4,948,209, or not more than 25 per cent. of the whole. Besides, lumber was a product that could not be grown every year, and the United States were exhausting their forests rapidly, and they would have to obtain our lumber and pay a good price for it, whether they imposed a duty on it or not. His opinion was that the time had come when we should have a policy for this country, and his opinion was shared by many hon. members and a large majority of the people of the Dominion; and, further, that it should be a National Policy that hon. gentlemen opposite had spoken of with sneers during this debate. He held that policy should be moulded, adopted and carried out in the interests of this country, whether it pleased or displeased our neighbours. Further, that policy should secure Canadian markets to Canadians, and, as far as possible, be framed in the interests of the mother country to which we were bound by so many ties, and to which we were under so many obligations. Was the Government ready to adopt such a policy, or had they got a policy? The hon. member for Wexford (Mr. Thomson) said in addressing his constituents that the Government had a policy floating round somewhere, and gave it as his opinion that they would find it and he would have the satisfaction the next time he addressed them to let them know that the Government had found the policy he had spoken of. The Government now found the policy simmering in the tea-pot. He held that for the last three years the policy of the Government had been one of drifting hither and thither to see how they could keep themselves in power. But he did not wish to do the hon. members an injustice, nor did he want to convey the idea to the House that they were wanting in policies individually, although they had not much policy collectively. The hon. the Premier had a policy—a steel rail, Georgian Bay Branch and water-stretches policy, which had cost the country a large expenditure, and the end was not yet. The hon. gentleman had also the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railroad policy; but the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. the Minister of Interior did not agree with that policy. To carry out that policy the hon. the Premier sent a missionary to British Columbia to conciliate the people of that Province, but whether that gentleman had authority to act for the Government or not was not yet known. It was known, however, that it cost the country $6,000. Some were so uncharitable as to say that he was sent there as a political spy. But the hon. the Premier carried that policy through the House against the opposition of the present Minister of Justice and Minister of Interior. But it was defeated in the other House. Looking across at the happy family opposite, he would like to know how they settled that question, whether Mahomet went to the mount or the mount went to Mahomet. The hon. the Minister of Justice had a saving policy, that thirteen Ministers were more than were required by the country when the whole business of the United States was performed by seven Departments. The hon. the Minister also expressed his thankfulness that the Act of Confederation had limited the number in the Province of Ontario to five. Although he gave that policy to the world, yet he was found in Ontario at the first opportunity violating the Act of Confederation and making himself the sixth Minister of the Crown. He was also found in 1874 making himself the fourteenth Minister of the Crown, although he resigned afterwards; and the hon. gentleman's excuse was that he accepted office without a portfolio. His remarks condemning that policy were on record. In a speech at Newtonville, in 1867, the hon. the Minister of Justice said :

"If Premiers were allowed to infringe the Constitution and appoint members of the Executive Council ad libitum they might create any number of offices, appoint members to them, and thus control the House by placemen."

The hon. the Minister of Justice had spoken of him (Mr McCallum) on a former occasion, not very kindly, because he did not keep track of the hon. gentleman's political ramblings. It was hard to keep track of his changes in joining and leaving a Government. In fact the hon. gentleman was playing that little game politically: "Now you see it; now you don't see it." He was the pea under the thimble. The hon. the Minister of Justice had another policy, and that was a disturbing policy—Federation of the Empire, and minority representation. The hon. gentleman announced that policy to the world in a great speech at Aurora, where he went up like a rocket and came down like a stick; and down with him went the hopes and aspirations of the Canada First party. The hon. Minister sat shackled with the chains of office, having given up all his former professions on the questions to which he had referred. But the hon. gentleman had another policy, and that was the Independence of Parliament. The hon. Minister when in Opposition stated these views at Stratford on 10th February, 1870, as follows:—

"I think that instead of relaxing the law relating to the Independence of Parliament, it should be made more rigid. I think no employment should be given to any man in Parliament. The hands of the people's representatives should be free of any favours from the Crown."

Those were the views of the hon. the Minister when he was a leading member of the Opposition, but the House and the country would like to know if those were his opinions still. It was known he had changed his opinions in many respects on other questions, but he trusted not on that important one. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had a policy—a Senate policy. He must say he was not favourable to the policy of the hon. gentleman, but he would like to know if the hon. gentleman had got cured by the acceptance of office of his fit of midsummer madness. The hon. the Receiver-General had also a policy—that of rest-and-be-thankful. The hon. the Minister of Finance had a policy, which he announced to the House in 1874, and it was calculated to do great damage to the credit of this Dominion. That policy was one of deficits, when he undertook to prove to the House there was a deficit of three millions, in order to injure a previous Government, and to build himself up by injuring others. But, thanks to the hon. member for Cumberland, although he trained his guns with a view to injure the Opposition, he fell short of his aim, and had to acknowledge afterwards that he was mistaken. The hon. the Premier formerly said :

"There were only two ways of carrying on a Government: one was by having a Government composed of men who were entirely in harmony on all leading subjects, or by a coalition of different parties who were determined to carry on the administration of affairs in any way they could manage, the only possible way being to bribe a certain number of constituencies. To procure good Government, it is necessary that a Premier should strictly select his colleagues from the party whose principles he intends to carry out. To bring into the Cabinet the member of an opposing party is coalition."

He thought he had shown that the hon. gentlemen had different opinions on leading questions, and, as the hon. the Premier had laid down the doctrine that he could only carry on a Government by bribing a certain number of constituencies, he wished to know in that case what was the amount it took to bribe the constituencies of South Bruce and Bothwell. But he did not suppose the hon. the Premier would condescend to tell the House. The hon. the Premier, in speaking of Conservatives at Hamilton, said they were Tories, and that a Tory was a curious animal who would be a Tory always; that if skinned he would be a Tory, and that if the flesh were removed he would be found a Tory at the bone. He would like to know if the hon. gentleman had put the hon. the Minister of Finance through such a surgical operation. If he had submitted him to such operation, what did he find? He did not think the hon. the Premier would give the House that information. The hon. the Minister of Finance said they had nothing more to do with the prosperity of this country than flies had on a wheel. If they were flies on the wheel they were blue-bottle flies which destroyed the flavour of everything they touched and turned it into ruin and decay. He would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), although it did not take in all the interests, but if this motion was adopted, they could obtain protection for other industries, and remove hon. gentlemen from office. If this amendment was defeated, he would vote for the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. METCALFE said, as the subject of the late Canadian loan had been several times referred to during the debate, he might be allowed to say that he thought it not fair to give quotations from the London papers as to the value or price that could be obtained for debentures. He knew by experience that such quotations were not always to be relied on. Some time ago he had offered in London several thousand pounds of Colonial debentures, and, although they were quoted in the London Times at from 113 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 114 $\frac{1}{2}$ , business done at 113 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 113 $\frac{7}{8}$ , his broker—one of the most respectable in London—informed him that the highest price he could realize was 109. He (Mr. Metcalfe) was rather surprised, and asked him why sales were reported at 113 $\frac{3}{4}$  if 109 were all that could be obtained. He replied that that these securities were held by a few leading capitalists, who manipulated them almost as they pleased. He doubted if real sales had been made. They most likely sold one to another, so that the price could be marked on the board of the Stock Exchange. It appeared, when the hon. the Minister of Finance went to London in November last, that Canadian four per cents. were quoted at from 93 to 94, but any one who offered them £20,000 on the market would have found it difficult to obtain anything like that figure. In fact it would be impossible to sell a large amount without the aid and influence of some of the leading capitalists. He thought on the whole the hon. the Minister of Finance negotiated the loan to the best advantage. A good deal had been said about tenders, and the fact that four or five times the amount offered was applied for, was supposed to have proved that a higher price could have been obtained. He begged to say that he thought it proved nothing of the kind. Hon. members would see that it was to the interest of the firms who had concluded to purchase a large amount, if not the whole, of the two and a half millions, to place them before the public in the most favourable light. They knew that only two and a half millions were to be sold. Could they not, through their friends, apply for ten millions, and then have a notice in the money article of the Times headed: "Great Success of the Canadian loan. Four times the amount offered applied for;" with some further particulars showing them to be a good investment. About that time they would probably find little notices in most of the papers of influence in the provinces, the object being to keep them before the people, maintain the price, and induce parties to purchase. Would any one consider a profit of two or three per cent. was too much for all the trouble and the use, for an indefinite period, of such a large sum of money? He considered they were entitled to every cent they made, and Canada lost nothing by the transaction, as the full value was obtained. He would say that, without the aid and influence of these great firms, the loan could not have been floated. It was all very well for parties to make nice calculations, and show what might, could, would, or should have been done, but let them try it, and they would find their objections, like many of the fine-spun theories that were heard of now-a-days, vanish before a practical acquaintance with the subject; and he had no doubt they would be well satisfied that the hon. the Minister of Finance had obtained a good price, and would be ready to join in congratulating him on the result of his negotiations.

Mr. McCALLUM.

Mr. OLIVER said he considered it to be his duty to address the House, as he represented one of the largest agricultural constituencies in the Province. He joined with the hon. member for North Brant in the regret that we had a deficit, and concurred with him in the statement that he was prepared to bear the announcement, as he believed the country was, and that he expected the deficit to be larger. The deficit had occurred, and it became necessary to adopt some method for the purpose of raising a sufficient amount of money to meet that deficit. He agreed with the hon. the Finance Minister that, of all the last ten or twelve years, the present year would be the most inopportune to change the tariff. The merchants of the country, or at all events those members who represented merchants, stated that the business transactions of the country were in a most deplorable condition—that a great many of our merchants were like Mahomet's coffin, hanging between heaven and earth. If the tariff had been changed this year, it would, no doubt, have resulted in a great many more failures than had occurred. He held it was important that the tariff should be as stationary as possible, as, if it were changed from year to year, it disarranged commercial transactions and tended to destroy confidence amongst commercial men. There were four schemes before the House for the purpose of remedying the evil complained of—that of the Finance Minister, that of the right hon. member for Kingston, that of the hon. member for Hamilton, and that advocated by several hon. members, especially the hon. member for Cardwell, (Mr. McCarthy) which was to reduce the expenditure of the country. As practical men, who desired that the interests of the country should be promoted, it was their duty, on the present occasion, to adopt the most feasible and practical scheme presented to the House. The scheme of the hon. the Finance Minister was that an additional duty of two cents per pound should be placed on tea. Much fault had been found with that proposal, but, while it was always objectionable to impose such a duty, yet, when it was requisite to impose a duty on a necessary of life in order that revenue might be raised, and when such duty was to be raised or imposed upon an article which was not produced in the country, then it was desirable that as many people as possible should be reached. By the imposition of a tea duty, the whole people would contribute to the revenue of the country, and this was an argument in its favour. It could not be maintained by hon. gentlemen opposite that, when the proposed duty was levied, any additional cost would fall on the people. The profits of the retail dealers might be reduced, but consumers would still receive their tea at the present prices. The hon. the Finance Minister had reduced the taxes by $800,000 yearly, by the removal of the duty upon coal oil. That article was to-day selling free on board in the city of London, at 12½c. per gallon, while a very short time ago the price ranged from 40 to 45c. By the increased duty on tea, $250,000 additional taxes would be raised, but, when that sum was deducted from $800,000, it left a clear balance in favour of the people of half a million dollars. It was also proposed to place an additional duty upon malt, regarding which item of the Government scheme much had been said during the debate. It would be imagined that hon. members had great sympathy with manufacturers, retailers and consumers of beer; but no one would believe that, when a traveller entered a hotel and asked for his glass of beer, that he would have to pay anything more than the present price. If there was any article in the country which ought to be more heavily taxed, it was beer. It had been alleged by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) that the additional duty on malt would increase the drinking habits of the people, that it would lead people to drink spirits instead of beer, and that it would thus prove an injury to the temperance movement. He might point out to the hon. the Finance Minister that, in consequence of the movement that was taking place with respect to the temperance question, in a very short time he would have to find some other commodity on which to levy a duty, if he desired to obtain a revenue, for, if the people continued to adopt temperance principles as they had during the past few weeks, the consumption of beer and spirits would almost cease in the Dominion. But he held that the trade of the brewer and maltster was one which could bear a large amount of taxation. The Census Returns for 1871 showed that the brewers' interest on investments in breweries amounted to $133,291; wages paid for the year, $233,143; raw material, $912,180; making a total of $1,328,614, and the value of the material produced was placed at $2,141,229, or 62 per cent. upon the investment. Any interest that could return 62 per cent. upon the investment could well afford to pay an additional duty of one cent per pound upon the raw material. With respect to the scheme submitted by the Finance Minister, he held that it was the most feasible, because it was the one best adapted to the interests of the country at the present time. The House had also before it the scheme of the right hon. member for Kingston, which was to protect or foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing industries, and indeed to protect everything in the country. The question arose whether the manufacturing industries required any protection. It having been stated by the right hon. gentleman that such was needed, the House had a right to expect that he would have been able to show that such industries required protection. It had been declared by some hon. members, particularly by the member for St. John, (Mr. Palmer) that those who were opposed to the protection of manufacturing industries, should prove that those industries were not suffering. That was, however, taking a wrong position, and the hon. member, who was the leader of the bar in his Province, and a lawyer of thirty years standing, should know that it was the duty of the advocates of the manufacturers, and of the manufacturers themselves, to make out a case before they asked the House to undertake to provide a remedy. When any important demand was made upon the Government of the Dominion, a Commission was appointed, and evidence taken, and proof was laid before Parliament, before any legislative action was taken. They had Commissions on every conceivable subject in the mother country, and last year twenty-seven Commissions were sitting at the same time investigating into grievances complained of by the people. We had had Commissions in Canada; among others, one on a demand made for the improvement of the canals, and the Commission which was appointed by the late Government presented to the House a valuable report which proved sufficient to cause the Government to adopt the scheme proposed. A Committee, which was similar to a Commission, was appointed to inquire into the grievances complained of by the manufacturers, and ample opportunity was offered every manufacturer to prove to the Committee that he was losing by the undertaking. Any one who would read carefully the valuable report of the Depression of Trade Committee would fail to find in the whole report a tittle of evidence that manufacturers were losing money by their enterprise. A leading question submitted to each manufacturer who was called as a witness was as to how much money he lost or made on his investment, and there was not a single manufacturer who would answer the question. Unless manufacturers were able to come before Parliament and prove to its satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the people that they were losing money by their enterprises, it would be manifestly unfair to the consuming people of this country to increase, by protection, the price of manufactured goods. We were not called upon to prove that manufacturers were not suffering, but if we were so called upon, it was only necessary to visit the manufacturing cities of Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, London, and other places, and view the surroundings of the manufacturers, their mansions and carriages, to arrive at the conclusion that they were not suffering as was alleged. Again, we found that the export trade in manufactured goods was yearly increasing, as appeared from the Trade and Navigation Returns. Manufacturing was always coupled with agricultural and mining interests in the resolutions adopted by the Dominion Board of Trade, until the last meeting, when agricultural and mining interests were lost sight of, and protection was asked for manufactures alone. The hon. member for Hamilton, during the past Session, had desired to educate the people to believe that a duty placed on imported cereals would benefit the farmer.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. WOOD: I never said so.

Mr. OLIVER said such a statement had been made by several hon. members, if not by the hon. member for Hamilton. Until such time as manufacturers were able to convince the farming community that it was to their interest to have protection, the manufacturers themselves would never have protection. It was not, however, with the view of benefitting agricultural interests that the right hon. member for Kingston introduced them so prominently in the amendment he had submitted to the House. He would mention to those who advocated increased duties being placed on manufactured goods coming into the country that they were doing something which might result in a short time to their own injury. A feeling was arising between the rural districts and manufacturing centres which might prove injurious to the latter in the future, and it was believed that those manufacturing centres desired to pursue the same course adopted by the United States during the last ten years. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) had stated that the imposition of a duty on imported grain would be beneficial to the farmer. He ventured to assert, without fear of contradiction, and the statistics would prove the fact, but the imposition of a duty on wheat and flour would not raise the price of those articles. There were imported into the British market last year, 4,780,000 bushels of wheat from British North America; from the United States, 35,700,000 bushels; from Russia, 16,800,000 bushels, and from other countries, 25,600,000, making a total of 82,880,000 bushels. It was not to be supposed that the 4,000,000 bushels sent from this country to Great Britain would influence that market in any degree, nor that a few million bushels imported into Canada, which had always had a surplus, would affect the price in this country. Any one who entertained such a belief had not studied the question to any great extent. The same argument would refer to flour. The Dominion exported 7,954,496 bushels of grain for the last six years, and 3,410,234 bushels last year. The exports of flour for the last six years was 372,638 barrels, and last year 174,624 barrels. The British market received from Canada 157,949 barrels; from the United States 1,299,200 barrels, and from other countries 1,902,851 barrels, making a total of 3,360,000 barrels from Canada and foreign countries. He held that the importation of wheat into this country, free of duty, was a benefit, for the millers were supplied with material to grind at times when it was impossible to obtain material in the country itself. If the regular supply was taken away from the large mills, they would be compelled to reduce their operations to a considerable extent. It was well known that the large mills situated on our leading railways and canals, particularly on the Welland Canal, imported wheat from the United States. They also bought wheat in every market in western Ontario, in each of which they had an agent, and where those interests were placed the farmers were more likely to obtain the full value for their wheat. If the country took away from the millers the privilege of importing wheat free of duty, they would have to cease operations, and, as the agents would be withdrawn from the local markets, the consequence would be that a great injury would be inflicted upon the agricultural classes. It had been said that the millers should be allowed, if a duty were placed on wheat, to bring wheat into the country in bond. He understood that cattle shipped from the Western States and manufactured into cut meats in the Province of Quebec had to pay duty.

Mr. WOOD said hogs were brought in and shipped without paying duty.

Mr. OLIVER said he admitted there was a return of duty. It was no protection to farmers if wheat was allowed to come in in bond and be manufactured by millers, because, when the price advanced in the local markets to an excessive figure, grain would be imported from Chicago and the Western States. Coarse grains had entered into the subjects discussed. During the last six years, our excess of exports over imports was 52,892,901 bushels of barley, oats, peas, and beans, and the excess last year was 14,625,167 bushels. He held that it was the correct view—that it was impossible for any one successfully to contradict—that, when we raised surplus produce of any kind and sent it to a foreign market, the imposition of a duty upon similar articles coming into this country would not increase their price. As our exports of coarse grains last year exceeded our imports by 14,000,000 bushels, how could the prices of barley, rye, peas, oats and beans be affected by a duty in this country? He had calculated that the price realized from coarse grains exported was from 1½c. to 1¾c. per pound. They all knew that a large portion of the stock brought into this country was imported by farmers in Manitoba and British Columbia, and that the only stock the other Provinces imported was intended for the improvement of our stock. The effect of placing an additional duty on stock would simply be to take money out of the pockets of the farmer, the greater number being new settlers in Manitoba and British Columbia; so that there could be no object in the world for taking such a course.

Mr. ORTON: Is any duty now imposed on animals imported for breeding purposes?

Mr. OLIVER said he believed no such duty was imposed. During the last six years our imports of Indian corn exceeded our exports by 13,423,798 bushels, and last year our imports of this article had exceeded our exports by 1,588,488 bushels, and the price paid was something less than one cent per pound, while we realized from 1½c. to 1¾c. per pound for our coarse grains which went into the United States. He asked any gentleman in the House who had a theoretical or practical knowledge of farming, whether it was not a wise course to pursue to sell our coarse grains at 1½c. per pound, and to buy Indian corn for feeding purposes at less than one cent per pound. This was a money-making operation, and he would not consider any one a good practical farmer, who held a different opinion. It was held that the policy proposed would be a good thing for the countries lying along the shores of Lake Erie. He did not doubt that on ordinary occasions this would be the case, but he submitted that it would be unjust to tax the whole of the Dominion which consumed Indian corn for the benefit of these two or three counties. This was not all; he found in a paper published in Amherstburg the following statement:—"During the months of January and of February of the present year, 40,383 bushels of corn, valued at $19,038, entered at the Amherstburg Custom House, have been imported from the United States for feeding purposes, in the townships on the line of the Southern Railway in Essex and Kent." If a duty of ten cents per bushel had been imposed on corn, the farmers of Essex and Kent, instead of paying $19,000, would have to pay $23,000 or $24,000 for the corn they had imported. The imposition of such a duty would also materially injure his section of the country, which was largely interested in dairy operations. It would consequently, as corn was used in this industry, add to the expenses of the dairy farmers. This would also be the result in the county of Wellington, which was a feeding county. The farmers sold their barley and pease at a high rate, and bought their corn at 45c. or 50c. per bushel. He was told that the lumbermen along the Ottawa and its tributaries, and along the Gatineau, also used corn to a large extent, and hence such a duty would also increase lumbermen's expenses. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) had referred to the exports and imports of wool. The excess of imports over exports during the last six years amounted to 15,113,708 lb. and last year to 714,067 lb. The average price we paid for Cape and American wool was 20c. per pound, and the average price we realized was 35c. per pound. The balance against us in pounds was 15,113,708, and in dollars, $242,406, so that the wool remaining in the country over and above the excess of imports only cost us about two cents per pound. The American duty on Canadian wool was from ten to twelve cents per pound, and if we adopted a similar policy it would increase the cost of our woollen manufactures. The Canadian people need not be afraid of American wool. As he had stated last year, so he stated again: Canadian wool was of a description which would always make it valuable in the United States for combing purposes. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) seemed to join with the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) in denouncing the Weights and Measures Act. Its repeal was asked for by the former, in order to save $100,000. If this step would do no injury to the people, he would agree to it, but we had suffered too much from the want of such a measure to desire its repeal, which was only demanded in the centre of commerce and by the merchants of the country. It was notorious that, for years and years past, our farmers, when they brought produce to market, always suspected that they did not receive proper weights. The Act remedied this state of things, and it was the only law on the Statute-book which protected the farmer's interests. Its repeal would be opposed to the interests of the people. He was not, however, surprised at the member for Cardwell advocating its abolition, because the hon. gentleman understood very little about commercial transactions. The Act, nevertheless, might be simplified and its operation be rendered less expensive. The fact was that when the new standards were introduced old standards were found incorrect. He did not find fault with the hon. member for Cumberland in having placed this Act on the Statute book. The hon. member for Cardwell desired to secure a reduction in the cost of collecting Customs and the Inland Revenue, and of managing the Post Office Department; but the expenditure in these would continue to increase. These Departments could not be carried on for the same amount that they cost ten years ago. Our vast extent of country was developing more and more year after year. New communities were forming in every conceivable direction, and the collection of Customs and of Inland Revenue must constantly be extended. The hon. member for Cardwell recommended the abolition of the Militia system, on the ground of inefficiency, but, though the hon. gentleman was a first-class lawyer, on this subject he preferred the authority of the Major-General, who reported having inspected the infantry corps and batteries of artillery—amongst the former four very fine battalions in Montreal, the Prince of Wales Rifles, the Victoria Rifles, the 5th Royal Fusileers, and the 6th Fusileers, which came up to the highest standard that could be expected from corps such a very short time under arms. The Major-General also reported having inspected the 19th Battalion, at St. Catharine's, the Governor-General's Foot Guards at Ottawa, and the Stadacona Rifles at Quebec, all of which were in a very satisfactory condition. In 1866, during the raids made on Canada, the militia had rendered good service, and it was as efficient now as then. And if, as the hon. member for Kingston had intimated, war broke out in the East, and England were involved in a great struggle, and if raids were then made on Canada, where would be our repelling force if the advice of the hon. member for Cardwell was taken? The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) had invited the Government on three or four occasions to appeal to the country. The hon. gentleman was elated on account of his election, but, if the history of North Ontario was examined, it would be found that at every election in it during the past ten or twelve years a Reformer or Conservative had been alternately returned. At the next election, if true to its record, North Ontario would send a Reformer to the House. The hon. gentlemen also wailed over the bankruptcy of the country. In fact the hon. gentleman's speech had been one of the best ever delivered in the House with a tendency to encourage emigration to the United States, and he had, ever since, expected to see it published in the American papers. Possibly the hon. gentleman might be requested by President Hayes to make a tour as immigration agent to Europe. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) was a Free-trader with regard to every single question, the sugar interest excepted.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): I am a Free-trader in that respect too.

Mr. OLIVER said the hon. member wished to build up a refinery in Halifax, to give employment to a few vessels and a few hundred people. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) also wished sugar to be protected. Canada consumed over 100,000,000 lbs. of sugar per annum, and protection meant the extraction out of the people's pockets of one million dollars per year. The hon. member for South Ontario was very anxious to build up a few merchants in Montreal who would sell tea 10 per cent. higher than it could be bought for now. The imposition of a duty on American tea meant an increase of 10 per cent. in price, or $422,000 that would have to come out of the pockets of the people in a year. The hon. gentleman also desired to see the navigation of the St. Lawrence used for the direct importation of tea. It would only take two good-sized vessels to carry the quantity of tea imported into Canada, and the effect would be to keep one or two Montreal merchants from going to New York to make their purchases and to impose a tax of $422,000 on the people. The hon. member for Kingston had stated that he was in favour of log-rolling—a system which had been in vogue in the United States for ten years—where combinations were formed to raise the prices of products that the rings desired. The hon. gentleman desired to see the manufacturer on one end of the log and the merchant at the other, and the farmer sandwiched in the middle having his substance squeezed out and absorbed by those at the ends. Where was the boasted solicitude for the farmers' interests that the hon. member spoke about at the pic-nics last summer? The hon. member had abandoned the miners and the farmers and adopted the resolution introduced by his hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood). If it was a fact that that motion was the most selfish one ever made, and the hon. member for Hamilton was the most selfish man in the House, it was equally selfish for the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) to favour its adoption. Where was the protection for the farmer if that resolution were carried? It was the old story of putting the agriculturist in place of the cat's paw to pull the chestnuts out of the fire. He thought the people ought to know, at any rate the farming community should, that it was impossible for the House to legislate in this direction without increasing the price to the consuming population. We manufactured goods worth $220,000,000 and imported $50,000,000 more. Suppose five per cent. was put on the imported goods, it did not mean that they alone would be raised that amount, but that the whole of the manufactured goods consumed here would advance five per cent. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) had argued in favour of a duty on coal; very likely some of that hon. gentleman's constituents were interested in cord-wood, and such a duty would advance their interests to a considerable extent. A duty of fifty cents on coal would add $400,000 to the expenses of the people. The increase from the taxes proposed might then be put as follows:—Five per cent. on manufactures, $13,500,000; coal, $400,000; sugar, $1,000,000; tea, $400,000; wool, $35,000; Indian corn, $160,000, making altogether $15,495,000, without any benefit to the people. Besides, if we manufactured all the goods consumed here, a revenue of $13,000,000 would be done away with, which would have to be procured from some source or other. This amount would have to be raised by direct taxation, so that we must add to what would have to be paid by direct taxation the increased price on the goods. If we were bound to manufacture all the goods consumed here, what was the use of the public works? If we were to become a Protectionist country pure and simple, railway, canal, and river improvements should cease altogether, as the people should not be taxed for opening up facilities for the importation of the products of other countries. We were a democratic people, and we did not want to become anything else but a democratic nation. If we wanted a system which would raise up an aristocracy at the expense of the people, then it was desirable that protection should be adopted. But, if we desired the wholesome system of selling in the dearest and buying in the cheapest markets, we wanted as little protection as possible.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had been characterized by some hon. members as being the representative of the brewers. He wished distinctly to state that he was not, nor had been for nine or ten years connected with any brewery or distillery. The House might take it for granted that he was prepared to substantiate any statement he made. In comparing the duty on malt in Canada with that in England, he found that there 36 lb. was taxed 63c., while here the duty amounted to 72c. In Scotland and Ireland the duty on 36 lbs. amounted to 50c. We had always prided ourselves on easy taxation, which, it was claimed, attracted the people from the old countries, but it appeared from those figures that England, Ireland and Scotland were a little in advance of Canada. Then take the United States. The duty was not put on malt in that country, but the beer was taxed. A barrel of 30 gallons carried a duty of $1. Calculating 3 lb. of malt to the gallon of beer, in Canada the duty for the same quantity would be $1.80. The hon. member for Hamilton read a letter the other night which stated that the retailer of beer made $25 on a 30 gallon barrel.

Mr. WOOD: The statement was that a barrel of beer cost the retailer $7.50 and he obtained $25 for it, and that made the difference.

Mr. ROCHESTER: Well, that would give a clear profit of $17.50 on every barrel of beer sold.

Mr. WOOD: I am prepared to prove it, too.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he proposed to show to the House that that statement was utterly incorrect. There were twelve tumblers in a gallon of beer, which was usually sold at 5 c. per glass. Every one who knew anything of beer would be aware that it frothed and foamed up a great deal, and that there was consequently a loss. The price, therefore, might be averaged at 4c. per glass, which would make 48c. on the gallon, or $14.40 for the barrel.

Mr. WOOD: How many gallons to the barrel?

Mr. ROCHESTER: Thirty.

Mr. WOOD: My calculation was based on 32 gallons.

Mr. ROCHESTER said 30 gallons to the barrel was the usual thing. The retailer paid $7.50 per barrel, which would give $6.90 profit, instead of $17.50 as stated by the hon. member for Hamilton. He thought the hon. gentleman ought to put the letter on the table of the House. The intention of the writer was to show that the duty on malt was justifiable. He had done so by misrepresenting the facts, and it was only just that his name should be given. But he (Mr. Rochester) had an idea of the source from whence the letter emanated. He would apply a similar calculation of the profit to the retailer to whiskey. In a gallon of whiskey there were 64 glasses, which at 5 cents came to $3.20. The cost of a 30 gallon barrel was $30.60. It sold at $97.80, leaving a profit to the retailer of $67.20. He thought that not only lovers of temperance but all in the community would agree with him that beer was a much more harmless beverage than whiskey, and that it was the duty of the Government, if either was fostered, to foster the manufacture of beer rather than that of whiskey. From the returns of the last two years, he found that in 1875 the amount of spirits manufactured was valued at $2,977,221.04, and in 1876 it was $3,099,893, an increase of $122,671.96. In 1875 the value of beverages made of articles other than malt was $26,976.56, and in 1876, $14,183.28, a decrease of $15,783.28. In 1875, the value of the malt liquors was $351,385.82, and in 1876 it was $327,709.47, making a decrease of $23,676.35 in two years. These figures must show conclusively that there was an increase in the drinking of whiskey, but a decrease in the consumption of beer. This was a state of things which he did not think the Finance Minister ought to encourage. Returning to the duty on beer and malt in the United States, he would say that every brewer made his malt and brewed his beer and then stowed it away in bonded vaults; and it remained there until he wanted to take it out, he merely paying a duty on what he sold. But beer was a perishable article, and in some years brewers lost thousands of gallons of beer. The difference between the Canadian and American brewers was that the Canadian must pay the duty on his malt before he used it, and in the event of any of his beer souring he not only lost the value of the article but he also lost the amount of duty he had paid on the malt thus wasted, while the American brewer only paid the duty on what he actually sold, the duty being paid by putting stamps on each cask as he took it out of the bonded vaults for sale. Should any quantity of this beer turn sour before it was disposed of, the brewer lost the price of the article, but had no duty to pay on what he lost in this way. Our Excise duty of $1.80 a barrel enabled the American brewer, with only $1 a barrel to pay, to sell for less than the Canadian brewer. Although the Government had bonded warehouses, yet many brewers paid for the malt just as it came off the kilns, in many instances five, six or twelve months before they used it. But all this was not enough, but the Government had to make it more burdensome for the Canadian manufacturer by doubling the duty on malt. He believed it would be found, as it had been found in countries where the duties were made oppressive, that the law would be evaded whenever there was an opportunity. Even were the revenue force multiplied four-fold, it would not be sufficient to look after the brewers in the Dominion. The law would actually drive honest men into being dishonest men with such an exorbitant duty. Many brewers would use other articles than malt. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said the farmers did not want protection. There was great diversity of opinion. Those members representing constituencies in which there were distilleries wanted cheap barley, and those representing constituencies in which there were corn starch factories wanted cheap corn. But it should not be particular localities which should be considered, but the good of the whole country. Under the present arrangement, Canadian farmers were deprived to a large extent of a home market, and could not avail themselves of the American market for a protective duty of 15c. per bushel. He hoped that the Finance Minister would, before this matter was settled, place farmers and brewers on a fairer footing as regarded barley and malt. In fact he had heard from one of a deputation who waited upon the Finance Minister that some change was contemplated. He would next reply to some observations made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) respecting the lumber trade. The hon. member said that four millions of people living alongside of forty millions of people ought to be very cautious and quiet as to what they said and did, and ought to be very careful not to offend our American cousins. That hon. gentleman, he believed, was born in the United States, and he might inform the House that he (Mr. Rochester) was also. There was no member of the House who had a higher opinion of the Americans than he had; he believed there was no people their superior, but Canadians should not be afraid to defend their own interests, nor should they bow down to any one. An American merchant looked after his business closely. He bought in the cheapest market and sold in the dearest, quite irrespective of any policy of retaliation or any sentiments held by the people with whom he dealt. He (Mr. Rochester) would read an extract from a letter written to one of the city papers on the lumber interest of the Ottawa. Although the writer had not subscribed his name to the letter, there were excellent reasons for believing that he was an American. The extract was as follows: -

Mr. ROCHESTER.

“The five Ottawa Valley constituencies, whose commercial well-being depends solely upon the prosperity of the lumber trade, viz:—Ottawa City, and Carleton, North Renfrew, Pontiac and Ottawa counties are looking with great interest to see what action their representatives in Parliament will take to ‘protect’ the industry in whose welfare they have so large a stake. The people of these constituencies very well know that instead of being protected at the present time this industry is taxed about ten per cent. on the value of the manufactured products, and yet the trade has not only abstained from any clamours for protection, in the way of free entry for all articles which rank as supplies, but has not as yet asked for any relief from the burdensome tax laid upon it, which cannot be said to be simply an item in the cost of raw material; for independent of this tax the trade has to pay all the charges incurred by the lumber manufacturers of the United States, with whom those in Canada have to compete, upon most unfavorable terms. They very well know that a single Act of the Congress of the United States could absolutely ruin the lumber trade of the Ottawa Valley, they know that the protection properly so called, while it would do the trade much harm, could do it no possible good for the reason that its market is purely a foreign one, and they consider it an unfortunate coincidence that while the Canadian Parliament is talking retaliatory duties, a motion is discussed in the House of Representatives of the United States asking the appointment of a Joint Commission to consider upon what mutually advantageous terms reciprocal trade relations could be established between the two countries."

The American was a man of business, and was alive to anything which would advance his own interests. The Finance Minister said we ought not to have protection, but he (Mr. Rochester) was strongly of the opinion that our industries and agricultural productions ought to be protected. He did not mean to say that there ought to be a duty on everything; for instance, such articles as we did not manufacture ourselves; but there were many interests which were suffering, owing to the unfair competition with the United States. He was very much inclined to think that our Customs Department, like our Excise Department, required a good deal of reform. Every person knew that the larger the scale on which any article was manufactured the cheaper it could be produced. It was quite a common thing for manufacturers in the United States to make a speciality of particular branches of industry, and use machinery which they advanced to great perfection for every branch. The result was that they could manufacture some goods by the aid of this machinery fifty or one hundred per cent. cheaper than could be done otherwise. Canadian industries would never be prosperous until our manufacturers and agriculturalists were protected. Then our manufacturers would be able to supply themselves with such plant as would enable them to successfully compete with the American manufacturer.

Mr. MASSON said he did not intend to enter into the details of the tariff which had been proposed by the hon. the Minister of Finance. The question had been ventilated by persons who had peculiar training, and were more in a position than himself to discuss it. He rose to place himself, as a member of the Conservative party, right before the House and the country on the question of protection. Perhaps the greatest accusation made against that party was that uttered by the hon. the Minister of Public Works two or three nights ago, when he told his right hon. friend from Kingston that he was actuated by party motives, and that the position he took to-day was inconsistent with the position he had taken in the past. He (Mr. Masson) would readily admit that, if they were not sincere, it would be most impolitic on their part, under the present circumstances, to pretend to have principles which they would not be ready to put into execution if the fortune of politics should require his hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) to change sides and take the place occupied to-day by the hon. the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): No risk.

Mr. MASSON said they had instances of men brought to the head of public affairs in Canada being obliged to set aside the professions they made so strongly when they were on the left of the Speaker. They had this example before them, and, as a politic act, the members of the present Opposition should try to avoid the difficulty in which hon. gentlemen on the other side found themselves to-day. No Opposition was worthy of the name of the Loyal Opposition of Her Majesty if they advocated principles when on the left of the Speaker which they would not be ready to put into execution when they were on the Treasury benches, and had the advantage of being the advisers of the Crown in this country. He (Mr. Masson) had always been sincere on this question. From the very first moment when he entered public life to the present, he had been sincere on the principle of protection. He had advocated it on the Government side of the House as well as in Opposition. In 1874, when the present Government did not dare to put a policy before the people, and candidates had to frame a policy, not knowing what the Government would do, he went before his constituents and in other parts of the country, and stated that there were certain questions on which he would support the Government if they adopted them, and one of those was protection. He said at that time that if the Government would come fairly and boldly forward with a protectionist policy, they would find him support them in those circumstances. In that, as in many other things, he had been disappointed, as the people from Lower Canada—Liberals as well as Conservatives—had been disappointed. He had always believed that the proper policy was that which was given to the country by his right hon. friend the member for Kingston in 1872, when he was on the other side of the House, when he was propounding to this country the policy of the Conservative Party—not a policy of circumstance or of party, but one for the good of the country. That policy he had supported on the Government side of the House and maintained here to-day, and he did not believe the right hon. member for Kingston would repudiate his principles of the past. If he did, he would not find him (Mr. Masson) one of his followers. His hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald), after stating that the policy in England had been a free-trade policy, continued a speech in Toronto Centre, in 1872, in these words:—

“ We did not, however, find other nations following the advice she (England) so freely offered. They thought, as the present Government of Canada thought, that in the adjustment of their burdens, it would be well to put duties upon imported goods and so to frame their tariff that the duties would fall upon articles that could be profitably manufactured in the country. By adjusting the duties in this way the Government hoped that it would protect and build up in Canada manufactures like those that had been generated under a similar system of protection in the United States and long ago in England.”

These were the principles enunciated by his right hon. friend. These were the principles which were adopted by the great part of the people of this country, and he durst say they were then the almost unanimous views of the people of Lower Canada.

Mr. GOUDGE: When were they given?

Mr. MASSON: In 1872.

Mr. GOUDGE: That was the beginning of the policy.

Mr. MASSON said it was not the beginning of his policy. He had held those views ever since he had been in public life. His name had been connected three or four times with the debate on the question of the National Policy. Two or three hon. members of the House had taken the trouble to read the names of those who voted against the National Policy which was brought forward by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), supported by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). It would be remembered that one of the principal features of that policy was the protection of the coal trade of Nova Scotia and of the agricultural produce of Ontario. The policy which he advocated at that time was that they should protect those industries which could be fostered in our own country. He then asked if the policy propounded was fair; if the Province of Quebec produced coal or wheat in sufficient quantity? And his answer was plain—that they could not accept the National Policy propounded by his right hon. friend as a partial policy. They might have accepted it as part of a general policy of protection. If his right hon. friend had come forward and had said this was part of a great policy which was to be placed immediately before the country, they might have adopted it; but he could not submit to a sort of see-saw policy over the shoulders of the Province of Quebec, which was not to be benefitted at all. But, if, not content with protecting the coal of Nova Scotia or the agricultural produce of Ontario, they had come down with a broad question of protection, he would have supported it, and he was ready to do so now. He was not ready to consider either the coal duties or the wheat duties on their own merits alone, but he was ready to consider them all together as part of a broad, substantial, comprehensive policy for the benefit of the whole community, and of the Province from which he hailed. They might say they would not be sectional, but they were bound to consider here the interests of all the Provinces, one as well as another; and, coming from the Province of Quebec, though he considered himself as much a representative of Ontario as Quebec, still he was bound to see that the interests of the latter Province were not cast aside in the interest of other Provinces. They had been consistent, but he would ask if hon. gentlemen opposite had been consistent? He would ask the Liberal party from the Province of Quebec if they had been consistent? When he was fighting and combatting for protection, he gave his support to the Liberal party of Quebec in order to obtain protection for this country. Last year, when he said the Liberal party of Quebec were abandoning the principles which had characterized their policy up to that time, he was told he was mistaken. The Liberal press of Quebec said they never had advocated Protectionist principles; but, no sooner had they spoken, than was heard the voice of the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, an honest and honourable man who did not stoop to party when principle was at stake, Mr. Joly, who, in answer to the taunts which he (Mr. Masson) threw out that they had abandoned their policy, wrote a letter to his hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), and said he (Mr. Masson) was unjust in saying that he had abandoned the principles which had been his life-long principles. He would read the letter to the house. The Gentleman he was speaking of was one whose testimony the Government could not contest because they had asked him to enter their own Administration. Mr. Joly wrote:—

Mr. MASSON.

“QUEBEC, 24th March, 1876.

G. T. ORTON, M. P.,

Chairman Agricultural Committee.

“MY DEAR DOCTOR,—I only received to-day a printed form of questions from your Committee in the labours of which I take a deep interest, and hasten to send you my answers. I am afraid they are rather lengthy, but I must acknowledge that I feel some satisfaction in being allowed to give my views on the subject, however little weight they may carry. It is a sort of protest against the accusation of inconsistency which has been brought against me during this session of the House of Commons, and in the Press, for having given up the main plank of the platform of our Parti National. We claimed, above all things, a National Commercial Policy. My friends have been twitted with having given it up, and I was brought in as the leader of the Parti National; but I have not given it up. If I remember correctly, you helped me in 1873 to obtain the exemption of duty for the Beet Root Sugar manufacture, and I hope you will approve my views on the subject.

“I remain, my dear Doctor,

“Yours sincerely,

H. S. JOLY.”

These were the words of the leader of the Liberal Party of the Province of Quebec. He would probably be asked why the Conservative Party, in the Session of 1873, only one Session after the declaration made by his right hon. friend from Kingston, did not bring in a protectionist policy. He thought any fair-minded man would see that the circumstances to-day were not the circumstances then. The Government then did not come to ask the House to fill up a deficit. The hon. the Minister of the Interior knew well that, at that time, there were no deficits, but surpluses. He knew well that the Government of the member for Kingston instead of increasing the burdens on the shoulders of the people was obliged to reduce those burdens, was obliged to give up the tax on tea, as we had more money than we required, so that there was no necessity for bringing in a tariff, as the hon gentleman had done to-day, unless on the pure Protectionist principle. He contended that the country did not require it then as it did now. In 1872, a Committee was appointed to examine into the condition of the manufactures of the country. This committee went through its work in the most elaborate way, and made an elaborate report. Did they say that the markets of Canada were slaughtered by American goods, or that the manufactures of this country were in a depressed condition as it was admitted by the Minister of Finance they were to-day? No; they said the manufacturing interest of this country was not in an unsatisfactory condition. It was easily understood that he (Mr. Masson) would have preferred that the Government should then have brought in a protectionist tariff, but his right hon. friend did not at that time see the necessity of it; but the necessity was felt to-day. He could give better evidence of that, he could give the opinion of the real leader of the Liberal party from the Province of Quebec, the one who should occupy that position in this House, the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier). He said in his speech last year that the real depression of our industries only dated from 18 months before, consequently, if, according to the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska, the industries of the country were not in a depressed condition in 1873, what reason had they to accuse his hon. friend from Kingston for not bringing in a protectionist policy to save our manufacturers from a depressed state in which they were not? He had been greatly surprised at the position taken by the Government in the present circumstances, and he thought every member of this House had been surprised. It would be remembered that, when making his ministerial explanations a few weeks ago, the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mackenzie) made use of these words: "Upon that," that was the refusal of Mr. Pelletier to take a seat in the Cabinet, "he had the pleasure of offering the position with a seat in the Senate, to Mr. Joly; but he, while entirely concurring in the policy of the Administration on public matters, felt indisposed to accede to the request upon personal reasons which, however, involved no matter of policy in which either the Administration or the House was concerned."

He must say he was disappointed at that statement. He knew Mr. Joly, and he knew that, having written that letter to Mr. Orton, he must, in the most extraordinary way, have altered his opinions all at once, if he could be induced to give to the Prime Minister personal reasons as an excuse for not entering the Administration as constituted, and, at the same time, to state that there was no question of policy which divided them. He (Mr. Masson) had then thought, and, in fact, had said to some of his friends: "The Government are sure to bring down a protection policy," because it was evident that Mr. Joly must have inquired with reference to the question of protection, on which he was so strong; and the Government must have advised him that they were not determined to maintain their free-trade policy. How could they explain that Mr. Joly, an out-and-out Protectionist, could have had no reason of policy for not entering the Government, composed as it was, when it had determined to continue its free-trade policy? He left that to be settled between Mr. Joly and the Administration. He had full confidence in Mr. Joly on that point, and he was sure that he would not have stated that there were only personal grounds if the question of free trade had been explained to him; but that was not all. No one would deny that there was a general expectation in this country, in the Province of Quebec at least, that, if an increase of taxation was required, it would take place on such articles as we produced ourselves. In discussing that question, he was met with the argument: "You would increase the taxation of the country; if the Government wanted more money, they could increase the 17½ per cent. list; but, when they do not require more money, there is no reason to increase the taxation of the country." He was led to expect that, if any increase was required, his Liberal friends from the Province of Quebec would say: "You shall increase if necessary in accord with our principles, that is, on articles we can produce, not on those we cannot produce, which gives no compensation for the taxation on the shoulders of the people." He thought the hon. the Minister of Public Works himself was rather responsible for that erroneous opinion which he (Mr. Masson) had formed. He, who had taunted his right hon. friend the member for Kingston with inconsistency in making use of this as a party question, should have looked at his own record before doing so. He should remember that when he was in a free-trade country he made free-trade speeches. When he was in a protectionist country, he made protectionist speeches, and, when he was in a prohibitory country, like Hamilton, he made prohibitory speeches. In England, in order to flatter the people there, he said it was the duty of the Government to so arrange the fiscal policy as to encourage trade between this country and England. This was a free-trade assertion before a free-trade meeting. When the hon. gentleman—who knew how to suit his speeches to his requirements—came to Sarnia, which was a rather protectionist section, he talked incidental protection, which one of the hon. gentleman's own followers called an absurdity. The hon. gentleman then adopted the principle laid down by the right hon. member for Kingston, holding that if duties must be levied, they must be so imposed as to encourage our manufactures. When the hon. gentleman came to Montreal, where the protectionist feeling was still stronger, he took an out-and-out Protectionist by the hand and had him elected. This showed three different gradations in sentiment. But worse yet was to come; when the hon. gentleman reached Hamilton, he hinted that, if required, he would be prepared to go so far as to levy differential duties and introduce a retaliatory policy. Yet the hon. gentleman taunted the hon. member for Kingston with favouring protection for party purposes. In 1874, in order to secure the election of an hon. member, he said, in Hamilton:

“Our commercial system will always be more or less controlled by the policy of the United States. As we are in immediate neighbourhood to them, they may compel us, for our own protection, to adopt measures not in accordance with what may be deemed correct commercial principles.”

What did this mean? It evidently referred to differential duties.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, no; hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said that, if the hon. gentleman had said so, it would not do much harm. During the debates on Confederation, the leader of the Minister of Public Works had said that the union of so many Provinces would enable us to hold our own against the United States, and that if the latter country did not act towards us as they should, being our neighbours, we should meet fire with fire. A necessity for a change in the tariff now existed—as he and many others believed—in consequence of the policy pursued by the Government. A deficit was admitted. It amounted to nearly two millions. It dated from last year, extended to this year, and would probably continue into next year; it was not temporary. If there could ever be a time when the Government was bound to alter their tariff policy, this should be done when the country required it, and when a deficit existed. He would quote an opinion expressed by the hon. member for Chateaugay, when he and other Free traders were endeavouring to secure the election of a Protectionist in Montreal. The hon. member then stated that anomalies existed in the tariff. If this was the case two years ago, surely, unless the Government were afraid to touch the question or felt that they were unable to grasp it, it was time that these anomalies were corrected. The hon. member for Chateaugay (Mr. Holton) had led the people of Montreal to believe that the anomalies would be corrected last year, but nothing had been done. The hon. gentlemen opposite had a right to ask what the Opposition would do under these circumstances. When the right hon. member for Kingston was called in to form a Government he would of course prescribe.

An HON. MEMBER: He will not prescribe.

Mr. MASSON said it would not be long before the Conservative Party returned to power. If he then had the honour of occupying a seat on the other side of the House, he would support a protectionist policy, or he should not be in Parliament. Duties should be first imposed on articles which we ourselves produced; and the revenue should be so collected as to afford compensation to our people. But what compensation was afforded by a tax on tea, or an Excise tax on malt. These taxes gave no compensation. Hon. gentleman opposite said that a protectionist policy would increase the burdens of the people. The hon. the Minister of the Interior ought to and did know better than this. The hon. gentleman knew that burdens were not imposed on the people by the tariff, but by the Estimates submitted by the Finance Minister; by the extravagant Estimates of 1875; by such things as the increase of Civil Service salaries proposed in 1874, but withdrawn at the solicitation of the followers of hon. gentlemen opposite; by increasing the proportion between the expenditure and receipts of the Post Office Department, which amounted only about $200,000 in 1862 and which now amounted to over $500,000; by establishing the Supreme Court, and by increasing the cost of the Immigration Department when no immigrants were coming into the country. What had the tariff to do with this? It had this to do, and nothing else: to equalize the burdens imposed by the Estimates submitted by the hon. gentleman opposite. It had been said that protection would reduce the revenue. This was an error, as shown by the experience of 1858, when a protectionist tariff was adopted. In 1858, the Customs revenue had fallen from four and a half to three and a half millions, but the Finance Minister did not say: "We must hide our heads till the storm is passed." He sought to save the country from impending evil, and submitted a protectionist tariff. What was the consequence? The revenue was increased and our manufactures flourished simultaneously. The reason was simple; the consuming power of the people was also increased, and consequently more goods could be imported and more manufactured than previously. By increasing the wealth and prosperity of the people, their consuming power was enlarged. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), with all his philosophy, could not show that a man who had the means did not spend more in good than in bad times. This was common sense. Whenever we obtained a protectionist policy, as he hoped would be the case, and attained the condition which England had secured through a protectionist policy, we should be able to adopt England's present system, and tax tea and necessaries of life. A wealthy and prosperous people would cheerfully pay taxes on such articles. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) said that people would be benefitted in having goods offered at cheap prices.

Mr. Masson.

But how long would this be the case? It would last precisely until the time arrived when the Americans had destroyed our industries. The hon. member had given an example of this—selfish though it was. Speaking of the sugar duties, the hon. gentleman had stated that when the Americans had ruined our sugar refineries, they would have their own price. If this was true as regarded sugar, it was true as regarded everything else manufactured.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Every other manufacture is protected 17½ per cent., and I have taken every occasion of saying I did not desire the sugar duties placed on protectionist ground. At present the raw material is legislated against. The duty is higher on the raw than on the refined sugar.

Mr. MASSON said that the hon. gentleman really wished to obtain protection but not on protectionist grounds. The Americans numbered forty millions, and with their waste—only ten per cent. of their products—they could ruin our manufactures and compel our artisans to take refuge in their country. What would be the consequence? The same argument used by the hon. gentleman with reference to the sugar trade would apply to our manufactures generally, and the Americans could dictate their own prices. It was a fallacy to say that cheap articles necessarily benefitted a people. The whole of this question must be determined by the relative proportion existing between the price and the purchasing power of the buyer. He observed the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Fréchette) laughing, but he would give the hon. gentleman the authority of his leader, Mr. Joly, on this point. Mr. Joly laid down that the essential matter at issue was,—whether the prices of goods were proportionate to the means of the consumer. Bread would be dear if its price placed it beyond the reach of the generality of consumers, and cheap if this state of things was reversed. Another essential element was the proportion existing between the results of labour and the prices of commodities; this included the general question of remuneration for labour. He would also quote the opinions of Mr. Joly, the leader of the Liberals of Lower Canada in local politics. Mr. Joly, asked before the Agricultural Committee:

"Is it in the interest of the Dominion that we should continue to admit American produce free, while Canadian produce exported over the border has so heavy a tax levied on it?"

Answered:

"No. It is against the interest of Canada. I humbly think that we should not admit anything free of duty except the raw material required for our manufactures."

Regarding the cheapness or dearness of articles, Mr. Joly said:

"It is true the purchasers, among whom the manufacturers and the workmen ought to count for a very large proportion, may buy a little cheaper than the farmer, but, as a natural consequence, they will have to sell their goods cheaper to the farmer, whose producing power is diminished. It is not by cheapening everything that we can hope to attain national wealth. The dearer we pay the better for us, provided our paying power keeps pace with the increase of price."

Mr. Joly illustrated this in the most happy manner, asking the workman which he preferred—flour at $4.50 a barrel and no work, or flour at $6 a barrel and plenty of work. This was the common-sense view of the whole question.

"Farming and industry are a good strong team when they are driven together, but divide them and you have a one-horse concern, or rather two that will not do anything like the work of a good, strong double team."

This was Mr. Joly's opinion.

Mr. FRECHETTE: We are exactly like the Conservatives of Lower Canada.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MASSON asked how the Government were meeting the difficulty. Did they decrease departmental expenditure? Did they decrease the expenditure of the Immigration Department? What had the Finance Minister offered? The hon. gentleman told them that, in order to meet the crisis, the expenditure on public works was to be reduced. The hon. gentleman had said that this was a momentary depression—a gulf that wanted bridging over. But, taking into consideration the price of labour and the cheapness of money, what would be the policy which would strike any man of common sense. A man of ordinary business capacity would say: "Avail yourselves of the depression; borrow money; go on with the public works we are bound to construct, and so furnish relief for the poor man; it is simply increasing the difficulty if the public works are stopped, and the men thrown out of employment." This idea was not his own; it had been enunciated by one much superior to himself, and one certainly the equal of the hon. the Finance Minister—Sir Alex. T. Galt. What did the Government do? They said: "No; we shall maintain the departmental expenditure and stop the Georgian Bay Branch, and the works on the Canals." A more impolitic decision could not be arrived at. It was a decision contrary to common sense—contrary to the course the municipalities and town councils would adopt under similar circumstances. He lived in a neighbourhood where it was necessary to incur a large expenditure for public improvements, and it had been agreed that this was exactly the time for prosecuting them, in order that something might be saved in the cost and yet afford employment to people who otherwise would have nothing to do. That was the true common-sense policy, and the Government ought to have copied the example of Quebec. The hon. the Finance Minister had said in his speech that railway expenditure had gone on too fast in Canada. That hon. gentleman was not the first to make that remark. It should be borne in mind, in considering this question, that Canada could not be compared to England, or other countries in Europe. A railway in England or France was nothing but a commodity. It could not increase population or wealth to any extent, but could only supply commodities to the people. Canada, however, was in its infancy. We were in the position of a man about to build a house, and must expend more in the beginning than would be required at a future day. The old countries could expect no great development from railways; but we had a vast country which would give a return for the expenditure in future. But it was said the country would run into debt, and the condition of the United States in this respect was held up to our view. The positions of the two countries were entirely different. The debt of the United States did not exist before the Civil War; it was a debt of blood—a mischievous debt incurred by the present generation, and it was nothing but fair that the present generation should pay it. But our debt was incurred for the building of public works from which future generations would derive more benefit than ourselves, and it was not to be expected that the present generation should bear all the expense. We were quite justified in running into debt for such a purpose, as the projected works would conduce to the development and prosperity of the country, and, if four millions of people created the debt, eight millions would pay it. Hon. gentlemen opposite had said that the Government had nothing to do with the prosperity of the country. This principle, however, would not be accepted. The people did not want a Government that confessed its inability to relieve the country in times of crises or difficulty. Why the manufacturing interests of England were created by protectionist enactments.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Oh, no.

Mr. MASSON said the iron trade was created by oppressive duties on iron. How was the sugar-refining trade of France created? It was by enactments of the more protectionist character. If France was the cheapest country in the world, it was owing to the legislation which fostered her industries. The hon. gentleman must know that, centuries ago, a great statesman of France said that it was the duty of the Government to frame a policy which would encourage the manufacturing industries. The hon. member for North Norfolk told the House that the manufactories should increase and prosper gradually by their own strength and should not be fostered. The answer to that statement would be found in the hon. gentleman's speech of last year. In 1858 we had a Finance Minister, equal to and perhaps more courageous than the hon. gentleman opposite, who declared that the revenue had then been lowered so much that it was absolutely necessary to have a protective tariff. Could hon. gentlemen say that Mr. Galt's tariff had no effect on the prosperity of the manufacturers. If it had an effect, it was proof that the action of the Government had something to do with the condition of a country. The hon. gentleman might make as many glittering speeches and philosophical arguments as he chose, but he could not get rid of the fact that Canada prospered under a protective tariff. Indeed, we prospered to such an extent that England claimed we had no right to impose a duty detrimental to her interests; they held that the mother countries had colonies in order that they might consume their manufactured goods and send the raw material in exchange. It was also claimed that the fiscal policy of Canada would ruin the manufacturing interests of the United States. Even the Legislature of the State of New York protested against our tariff, and complained that mechanics at Rochester and Buffalo were obliged to leave and establish themselves in Canada in order to continue their trade. Before then our business was depressed, but, as soon as Mr. Galt put his hand to the wheel, instead of being a mere fly upon it, we began to prosper and manufacturers across the border began to complain that their trade was being destroyed, and that their artisans were emigrating to Canada. He wished to goodness that we had a Government that would do the same thing to-day in order to stop people from leaving this country. He wished there was such a policy that the Americans, rightly or wrongly, would have to complain that their artisans were coming into this country.

Mr. MASSON.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Why, 360,000 went from Canada, between 1860 and 1870.

Mr. MASSON: Do you know the people of whom you are speaking? It was a matter of sentiment and feeling with the French population at that time. They had been induced to believe that the United States was an Eldorado, and, stimulated by men, even from within Canada, they left their country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): They were not all French.

Mr. MASSON asked how it could be explained that in six or seven years 60,000 or 70,000 French Canadians went to the United States. They all at once decided to go to the United States. They had better wages at the time. They prospered for some time, but with that instinct which distinguished them, they became home-sick. They wished to come back to their own country. He admitted that the difference in wages was not so great now as it was then. There was more of an equilibrium. But he was not encouraging them to come back to our cities and manufactures. He was encouraging them to go to other parts, and not to come into those parts where the Government had destroyed the industries. We did not want them in this part of the country. There was no work for them. The only thing there was for them to do was to go and colonize. They could go to Manitoba, where they need not engage in manufacturing industries in order to get a livelihood, but where they could set themselves to the tilling of the ground. It was with this object that he wished French Canadians to come back to Canada; it was not that they should swell our industrial population, for that would only bring disaster upon them. A great many wished to come back, but they did not wish to enter our manufactures, and, if they did, they could not, for we were closing up our manufactures; but they wished to settle upon our lands in the Eastern Townships and in Manitoba. It was the duty of the Government to encourage this feeling, and to get them to go to Manitoba and the great North-West, in order that they might assist to create a great population and to develop the vast resources of that region. He might be wrong in what he had said. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite laughed, but it was easier for them to indulge in this than to prove that he was wrong. The principles which he had enunciated that night were the principles upon which he had entered public life, and he had seen nothing yet to change them. He threw back to the hon. gentleman opposite—but not with scorn, as had been said to him—the accusation that he was making a party political question of this matter. The views he had just expressed were always his views and he would stand by them. If the Conservative party came into power—and they were obliged as an Opposition to forecast and foresee this event—they would adopt the policy which they enunciated now, if the country was in the condition it was to-day, or anything approaching it.

Mr. McDUGALL (Elgin) said at that late hour and under the unfavourable circumstances he would not detain the House long with his remarks. The fiscal policy of this country was a unique one. It was not a free-trade policy like that of England, nor was it a protective policy like that of the United States. There was no fiscal policy, so far as he knew, exactly like ours. Reference had been made over and over again during the debate to the United States and the alleged prosperity in that country. He thought it only fair, when reference was made to that country, that its vast territory, great natural resources and unsurpassed facilities for the development of those resources should be considered. He was sure that hon. gentlemen would admit that the discovery and working of the gold mines of California had a wonderful effect upon the development of that country, stimulating its commerce and its manufacturing interests. The United States had also received substantial support from the large volume of immigration which had flown into it year after year, regardless of what its tariff might have been, whether high or low. This volume of immigration brought to the United States bone, muscle and mind, and also a considerable amount of material wealth. An hon. member had made a reference to the fact that the late President of the United States, in his last message to Congress, had congratulated the country upon its general prosperity; and it was taken as a reasonable inference that this prosperity arose from the fiscal policy of the country; and, therefore, it was urged that a protection policy was the correct one. If this were the case, it was rather singular that the newly-inaugurated President, in his message to Congress, deplored the depressed condition of manufactures and other industries. If, therefore, the logic of the first argument was correct, it was equally right to infer that the depressed condition referred to by President Hayes arose from the system of protection. The right hon. member for Kingston had told them that the Opposition was not obliged to announce its policy. That was a doctrine that was acceded to in England, where responsible and parliamentary Government was carried on to the very highest state of perfection. The Opposition was not prevented from announcing its policy. He had the authority of Lord John Russell for saying that where the Opposition saw fit to announce its policy it must be held responsible for it when it came into power. The right hon. gentleman in his resolution intended to express a vote of want of confidence in the Government as to the imposition of duties on certain articles imported into this country. But that had been widened into a general vote of want of confidence in everything which the Government had done. The right hon. gentleman, it must be presumed, was sincere as to the policy he would pursue. He said there must be a readjustment of the tariff on the agricultural, mining and manufacturing industries of this country, from which he (Mr. McDougall) gathered that these industries were to be taxed. The right hon. gentleman said that these interests were to be protected. But it was difficult to see that it was not purely a system of taxation which the people themselves would have to bear. But he was not going to discuss for the present the view that a readjustment of the tariff, as expressed in the resolution, meant an increase of the burdens upon the people; but he would like for a moment to make a reference to the speech of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson.) That hon. gentleman had announced a most astounding doctrine—the first time he had heard it, and no doubt all hon. gentlemen acquainted with political economy would be astonished at it. The hon. member for Terrebonne told them that, by the increased imposition of taxes on goods coming into this country, the burdens of the people were not thereby increased. He (Mr. McDougall) could not understand what this meant. Surely every man using such an article would have to pay the increased duty, and if that were the case, the burdens of the people must necessarily be increased. The hon. member seemed to think that the people would be much better off if they had to pay a larger price for everything. The hon. gentleman had also referred to France as a wonderful instance of the benefit of protection. But for the purposes of his argument he had made a most unfortunate allusion, for at the time referred to by him the merchants, when asked by Colbert what could be done for them, replied that the best which could be done for them was to let them alone. The hon. member for Hamilton had also introduced an amendment. The House well knew what the views of the hon. member were and that he stated them plainly to the House in such a way that two conclusions directly opposed to each other could not be inferred, as was the case with reference to the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston. That amendment was like the ancient oracle—whoever the devotee was who went to consult it never came away with a broken heart. They could take from the resolution whatever they pleased. It was as wide as it possibly could be, in order to bring all within it. The right hon. member had said that he had caught a great many loose fish in his day; and so it would appear. He stretched out his net and dragged in anything which seemed to come anywhere near his own preserves. Unlike the amendment of the right hon. gentleman, the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton had nothing undefined in it. It was a specific amendment. It was the announcement of a policy complete in itself. He (Mr. McDougall) was opposed to it. He believed it was incorrect; he believed that, whether the Government would gain or lose power by so doing, they should not adopt such a policy. Yet he must congratulate the hon. member upon his sincerity and honesty of purpose. If he was wrong, he did not intend to be so, but believed that he was serving the interests of his country, and more particularly the interests of the city of Hamilton, the population of which was largely engaged in manufacturing. But he (Mr. McDougall) would appeal to the House whether the two amendments were not antagonistic and directly opposed to each other, as different as day from night. The right hon. member for Kingston deplored the condition of this country, and had said that there were only two things that could bring about commercial salvation—either to put him in power, or else to tax nearly everything coming into the country. Directly the hon. member for Hamilton had sat down, the right hon. member for Kingston sprang from his seat before any of his supporters could do so, and said he was prepared to support the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton, which was opposed to the imposition of duties upon agricultural products and to the imposition of increased duties upon coal coming into this country. This was directly opposed to the spirit of the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, who contended that both should be taxed with manufactures. As the hon. member for Toronto Centre had shown, although the nominal duty on certain manufactured articles was only 17½ per cent., yet the actual duty was 25, and in some cases even 30 per cent. If the duties were increased, as urged by the hon. gentlemen opposite, farming implements would have a duty of fully 40 or 50 per cent. placed on them. How then could it be said that increasing the duties would benefit the farmers? The right hon. member for Kingston had shown that he was prepared to change his base, if by that means there was any chance of the amendment to the amendment—which was directly opposed to the policy expressed in his amendment—being carried. The right hon. gentleman and his supporters had held the Government responsible for the hard times, although he had not said so in so many words. It was alleged that the first Minister had done nothing to husband the resources of the country, but had acted in his own interest, and to enable him to retain power. It was well known in Ontario that last year they experienced a very bad harvest. There was every prospect up to the latter part of June that there would be a most bountiful one, and, if that hope had been realized, the Province would have felt its good effects. The deficient harvest caused an injurious effect upon the condition of financial affairs; nevertheless, hon. gentlemen opposite maintained that the hon. the Premier and his Administration were responsible for the hard times. It would have been quite consistent with the arguments of those hon. members to have placed a rider to the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston declaring that the Government was responsible for the bad harvest. A considerable amount of irritation was sought to be raised in the House and in the country in regard to the imposition of an additional two cents per pound on tea. He believed it to be a fact that the Finance Ministers of the mother country, as well as Finance Ministers of Canada, held that taxation should be imposed on articles and revenue derived from what was most generally used and from which the greatest amount of revenue could be obtained with the least inconvenience to those from whom it was gathered. He knew that, on the first blush, quite a specious argument could be made in order to prejudice the people against the proposal, but when the people came to consider the question, as they had done already to some extent, and to reduce the matter to figures, they would find that the imposition of the duty would not be felt. There was not, on an average, upwards of 20 lbs of tea used annually in every family in the country, which would involve a duty of 40 cents; and moreover the Government had seen fit, by a wise and most commendable policy, to reduce the duty on coal oil, which would more than meet the amount paid by each family on account of the increased duties upon tea. He could not well understand the statement of the hon. member for Monck that the members of the present Administration were not in harmony with each other. He had not seen anything except what showed a united policy and sentiment on the part of members of the Administration. There had been no indication to lead to the belief that harmony did not prevail,—probably the wish was father to the thought in the mind of the hon. member. In regard to the Weights and Measures Act, it had been asserted that the present Government was responsible for it and for the considerable amount of irritation which the Act had caused in the country. The hon. member for North Oxford had correctly stated that the late Administration had introduced and carried the measure. The framers of the British North America Act gave the Dominion Parliament the exclusive right to legislate upon that subject, and, if the Weights and Measures Act were repealed, how could provision be made for proper inspection and for the protection of the community. It was not therefore just on the part of hon. members of the Opposition to endeavour to make political capital against their opponents by referring to the unpopularity of the Act, but they should rather aid the Government in amending the Act, they themselves being responsible for this legislation, having initiated it and carried it into effect, and having, as he had been informed, sent a subordinate official to England for the purpose of making enquiries as to proper weights and measures and appliances necessary to give effect to the Act. It came with ill grace from hon. gentlemen opposite to charge the present Government with the unpopularity of the measure and hold them responsible for it. He did not apprehend that the hon. member for Hamilton, with his lieutenant, the right hon. member for Kingston, and the hon. member for Cumberland, would have the pleasure of taking seats on the Treasury benches as the result of the approaching vote. But, if the amendments were voted down, and the panacea proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton not accepted, it was impossible to say what would next be proposed by the hon. member for Kingston, in order to benefit the country, but more particularly to attempt to regain and re-enter the promised land, which, he would take the liberty of predicting, was very far off.

Mr. McDUGALL.

Mr. McDougall.

Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 14th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

PRINTING OF VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved concurrence in the 5th Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament. He said they made two recommendations. The first was that an index be prepared and printed of all Journals and Sessional Papers since 1867; members of the Senate and House of Commons to be presented with one copy each, and six copies to be placed in the Library. Experience proved that the want of such an index had caused great inconvenience. A similar difficulty also prevailed with regard to the Journals of the House. An index in this relation had been prepared by the late Mr. Todd, as far as the year 1867, with reference to the old Parliament of Canada; but it was found by some to be inconvenient, being somewhat cumbersome and bulky. They could simplify this index, making it easy of reference, and forming a volume of reasonable size, without incurring any considerable expense. The Clerk of the Printing Committee had prepared a statement, certifying to the probable cost, which for 400 copies would be $1,322. Each member of the House of Commons and Senate would be furnished with a copy, and a few could be kept in store for future reference; the Library and Departments would also be supplied. They, consequently, recommended, as was done last year, that, after the present Session, the Votes and Proceedings of the House be so prepared and printed that they could be changed into Journal form on the same principle that the Journals of the Senate were now prepared. The Printing Committee's report to this effect last year had been adopted by the Senate, but not by the House. The present form of the Votes and Proceedings was somewhat inconvenient, foolscap in lieu of octavo form being used, and they fitted very ill into private libraries as well as into the Library of Parliament. Besides, by adopting the mode followed in the Senate, it was estimated that they could save in the cost of printing $600 per annum; and the item of printing was becoming somewhat expensive. Objection had been taken to the proposal last year on the ground that inaccuracies might creep into the Journals, but this need not be entertained, as no complaint on that score was made in the Senate. The members of the Senate were each daily supplied with a copy of their Journals, which were afterwards bound and distributed. These were subsequently prepared like the Journals of the House, the only omissions being notices of motions and routine proceedings. He thought that the House would agree that these recommendations were worthy of adoption.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought the Committee should devise means by which the report was to be carried out.

Mr. ROSS said they had not considered this matter. He had, however, consulted with Mr. Hartney, who had led them to suppose that this work would be done without extra expense. The process would be exceedingly simple, and it would readily be understood by any clerk of ordinary capacity within the space of two weeks.

Mr. MACKENZIE did not doubt that this was the case, but he thought officers of the House might be designated as the parties who should do the work. He recommended the chairman of the Committee to consider this point and report upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON asked whether the Votes and Proceedings could be printed after the fashion of the Journals of the Senate at less expense than was the case at present. They were furnished with the Votes and Proceedings in condensed form at 9 a.m.; but the Senate did not frequently sit after 6 p.m., enabling their proceedings to be printed in Journal form with ease. He asked whether some little difficulty would not be experienced in having the Votes and Proceedings printed under the system recommended as early as was now the case.

Mr. ROSS said the Votes and Proceedings were now printed from one form, to use a press term, and the Journals from another form. The matter was consequently set up twice. If the system proposed were adopted, the matter would only be set up once, and $600 would be saved. As to the other point, there would be no danger of delays.

Mr. SPEAKER said that his impression was last Session, as it was still, that the saving of $600 was very small indeed compared with the importance of securing absolute accuracy in the report of their proceedings. The form in which the Votes and Proceedings were printed was, however, a mere matter of taste. The House sat sometimes until two, three or even four o'clock in the morning, and their preparation consumed two, three or four hours after adjournment; and, if they were to be prepared in strict Journal shape, much more care and time must be devoted to this duty. This was, moreover, a speciality which very few clerks were found to possess. The saving of twice $600 might be very easily effected in other ways, which would not affect a matter of such importance. He was decidedly opposed to the change proposed.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he thought the Speaker laboured under a slight misapprehension. It was recommended that the Votes and Proceedings should be so prepared and printed that they might be changed into Journal form, on the Senate principle; and there was no reason why a daily issue should not appear, as at present.

Mr. SPEAKER said the style was a mere matter of taste, which was of trifling importance. The important question was whether the Votes and Proceedings as they were presented each morning, should become the Journals of the House.

Mr. ROSS said they would be open to revision and correction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that errors might creep in under the system recommended, and this might occasion serious consequences to the House and the country hereafter. The saving would be very small, and the inconvenience enormous. The expenses of correction would greatly reduce the amount that could be saved.

Mr. YOUNG said that, under the circumstances, delay in the passage of the report was advisable. Officers had now to remain preparing the proceedings for some two or three hours after the House rose, and it was very evident that, under the plan recommended, these officers must remain for a much longer time. The objections taken to the recommendation were undoubtedly serious.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said it would be convenient to have the report adopted, the last clause excepted. It seemed to him that it was a very difficult matter to change the internal economy of the House; the attempt was made last Session, but the proposal was postponed until the present Session, and now he supposed that the same fate awaited the report. He moved that the report, the last clause excepted, be adopted.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in, excepting the last paragraph, which is as follows:—

“That after the present Session of Parliament, the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons should be so prepared and printed, that they may be changed into Journal form, on the same principle as the Minutes of the Senate are now being done, by which it is hoped economy as well as despatch will be obtained.”

CRIMINAL LAWS EXTENSION BILL.

SENATE AMENDMENT AGREED TO.

An amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 23) To extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island certain Criminal Laws now in force in other Provinces in Canada, was read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER.

BILL FROM THE SENATE.

FIRST READING.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was read the first time:—

Bill (No. 72) To amend the Act to incorporate the Globe Printing Company.—(Mr. Blain.)

STAMPS ON PROMISSORY NOTES AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. IRVING moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 73) Relating to Stamps on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange. He said that doubts had arisen as to the proper time for affixing and cancelling stamps on bills of exchange and promissory notes drawn or made out of Canada and payable in the same; and it was advisable that such doubts should be removed. He understood that this was the object of the proposed amendment, which had been prepared by a legal gentleman of large practice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked in what manner these doubts had arisen.

Mr. IRVING said that a decision had been given in one of the Courts at Toronto, raising such doubts. This had occurred in a case which related to a promissory note which bore one date, while the stamp affixed bore another date; and the plaintiff, who was the holder of the note, was unable to recover, owing to the fact that the stamp and note did not bear the same date, and of course, as far as foreign promissory notes was concerned, this was impracticable.

Mr. YOUNG said he would like to call the attention of the Government to the propriety of having these bills issued with the paper itself stamped. Beyond question, a great deal of hardship had occurred under the present system, as, with regard to bills of exchange and other bills, errors were now sometimes committed in not conforming to the technicalities of the law. These difficulties could be overcome if the bills bore the Government stamp when issued. He had been under the impression, when the law originally passed, that the Government had the power of issuing these stamped papers. Stamped envelopes would also be a great convenience.

Bill read the first time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time.

Bill (No. 75) To extend the Act respecting trade marks and industrial designs to the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 77) To provide for the safe custody of prisoners in places where the common gaols become temporarily insecure.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 78) To amend the law with reference to convictions made by justices of the peace.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 79) To make provision against the improper use of firearms.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 80) To amend the Act for suppressing gaming houses.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 81) To amend the Act respecting larceny and other similar offences.—(Mr. Guthrie.)

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. MILLS introduced a Bill (No. 74) To amend the North-West Territories Act, 1875. He said the object of the measure was to supply rather important omissions with regard to the powers of the Governor in Council. Provision was also made for the better administration of justice in the North-West, re-enacting the provisions of the Police Act of 1873, relating to the summary trial of certain parties by Stipendiary Magistrates. It also provided for the extension of the power to try summarily parties charged with offences, the maximum punishment for which did not exceed seven years in the Penitentiary. Power was also conferred upon the Magistrates to try all other felonies, and the Bill took away the right of appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba, which was found an expensive provision.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) asked whether it was the intention of the Minister of the Interior to introduce a clause in the Bill whereby concurrent jurisdiction should be conferred upon the Magistrates of British Columbia, together with those of the North-West Territories, in the case of offences committed in the districts adjacent to the 60th parallel of latitude and 120th parallel of longitude. A large number of men were now engaged in mining and prospecting for gold in those northern regions, and it was a matter of uncertainty in many cases whether they had gone beyond the boundary of British Columbia or not. It was therefore very important in the interest of good government that some provision should be made for the maintenance of law and order in those remote regions, where doubt existed as to dividing lines between the Territories and British Columbia.

Mr. MILLS said the Bill did not contemplate that. The matter, however, was under the consideration of the Government, and he would decide upon the introduction of a clause to that effect before the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill (No. 76) To amend the Railway Act of 1868. He said the purpose of the Bill was to remove doubts which existed as to the power given by the Act to railways to intersect other railways. The 16th sub-section of the Act provided for intersection on certain conditions—the plans being submitted to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for their approval.

Bill read the first time.

MR. JUSTICE LORANGER.

MOTION TO PRINT EVIDENCE.

Mr. LAURIER moved:

“That the Committee appointed to inquire into the administration of justice in the district of Richelieu, be authorized to have the evidence taken before the Committee printed for the use of the members thereof.”

Mr. SPEAKER said, if the evidence existed in manuscript form, the rule required that a resolution of this kind should go directly to the Printing Committee. If it was a case of emergency, and the House desired it, the rules could be suspended.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska had given no idea as to the quantity of the evidence, and it would be much better to refer the resolution to the Printing Committee in the usual way.

Mr. LAURIER said the members of the Committee had expressed a wish that the evidence, which was rather cumbersome and voluminous, should be printed. They felt they could not do justice to the case unless each was put in possession of the evidence, and as the full Committee could not be present during the taking of the whole testimony he thought it was absolutely necessary to have it printed. He was quite willing that the chairman of the Printing Committee should adopt what course he thought was right. He would state that the evidence was very voluminous.

Mr. SPEAKER said some years ago the Public Accounts Committee, which had made important investigation into some railway matters, submitted to the House the evidence from time to time. He thought a similar course was pursued on the Committee with reference to the North-West case. In both cases the direct action of the House was invoked, and the House, by resolution, authorized the Committee to get the work done in the way in which it was done. But the present case was different, because the evidence was now all in manuscript. Of course, it was for the House to determine the matter.

Motion referred under the rules.

BREAKWATER AT GODERICH.

QUESTION.

Mr. HORTON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to repair the small Breakwater under the Lighthouse at Goderich, placed there to prevent the sliding of the bank, but which had been much damaged by the heavy storms of last season.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the attention of the Chief Engineer had been called to the matter, but, until the resident engineer had made his report, the Government could not give a definite answer.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said his hon. friend the Premier had made a mistake. The Government Engineer was still on the spot, and had discovered that it was imperatively necessary that some repairs should be made. It was the intention of the Department to recommend a sum in the Supplementary Estimates.

RIFLE-REGIMENTS' ARMS.

QUESTION.

Mr. CARON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to arm all the rifle regiments with the short rifle and sword bayonet.

Mr. VAIL replied in the affirmative.

MILITIA GENERAL ORDERS.

QUESTION.

Mr. CARON asked why the Government did not, as formerly, distribute among the officers of the militia force, and more especially among the commanding officers, copies of General Orders as published in the official Gazette.

Mr. VAIL said he was not aware there had been any change made. With regard to General Orders, where they affected the force generally they were sent to the District Staff, the Adjutants, Captains, &c.; but where the orders were merely local they were only sent to the District Staff.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for a Committee of twelve to enquire into the progress made with the surveys of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time. He said that before he entered upon this subject he would ask the indulgence of the House while he made a few remarks with reference to a reply made by the hon. the Premier in answer to a question put to him a few days ago. He asked the Government whether a progress report would be brought down this Session. The answer of the hon. the Premier was that the progress report had been on the table for about five days. On examination of the returns, he (Mr. DeCosmos) found that no progress report had been made. He found that the return was a mere synopsis of the report, included in the report of the Minister of Public Works. Beyond that, he had discovered that the Chief Engineer, and the Chief Assistant Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway were now engaged in preparing a progress report. When he considered the nature of the reply, and the tone in which it was delivered, and the racy laughter which occurred in certain corners of the House, he must say that, although a gentleman might bear Her Majesty's Commission as a Minister of the Crown, it was no guarantee either as to the accuracy of his statements or the polite tone of his replies. In reference to the matter immediately under discussion, he would draw the attention of the House to the second clause in the Speech of His Excellency the Governor-General, in which he said :

“During the recess, I visited the Province of British Columbia, and had much satisfaction in becoming acquainted with the people in that interesting part of the Dominion and with the climate and resources of their Province.”

Following this, there was the following statement :—

“The surveys of the Pacific Railway have been prosecuted with the utmost vigour and at a larger cost during the past than in any previous year ; but it has not been found possible, as yet, to complete the location of the line, and I have consequently been obliged to postpone the inviting of tenders for its construction on the terms indicated by the Act of 1874.”

The next clause was :—

“A further correspondence on the subjects at issue between my Government and British Columbia will be laid before you.”

It would be observed that the clause with respect to surveys was so placed as to convey the idea to the House and the country that it was an utter impossibility for the Government to commence the construction of the railroad on the Pacific Coast ; as they said, the whole of the location line, to connect the Ontario and Quebec system of railways with the Pacific coast, was not yet completed. He would assume that to be the case, although he believed there was a report from Mr. Sandford Fleming, the Chief Engineer, that sufficient surveys had been made to warrant the commencement of the work in British Columbia. In spite of what the Government said about the line of location not being complete, the Government had given out a contract for the road between Pembina and Winnipeg, and between Thunder Bay and Red River. Now, if the Government, before the line of location was completed, could give out contracts for one part of the Dominion, they could do the same, he maintained, in another part, viz. : on the Pacific Coast. If the House would give him a Committee of twelve, he maintained that he could prove there was nothing to prevent the Government, since 1873, from prosecuting the work in British Columbia ; and that, after long years and hard labour, the engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Survey had arrived at correct conclusions as to the route. More than that, he would be prepared to show that the Government had not brought down the reports of the engineers on this point, but had kept them back. He believed he could place before the Committee the engineers, and show conclusively that no other route for the railway ought to be adopted by the Dominion of Canada except the Bute Inlet and Esquimalt route. He observed, in reference to this matter, that the organ of the Government in Victoria, the Colonist, had the following statement, which was, no doubt, inspired :—

“The Fraser River route (to survey which, we believe, the delay is required) should have been surveyed years ago. That it was not is not the fault of the Ottawa Government, guided as they were by their engineers, who always reported, until last summer, that the route was impracticable for a line of railway.”

He had the statement of hon. members of this House, and also the authority of the engineers, for saying that the whole of the survey from Tête Jaune Cache to Burrard Inlet, and from Yale Canyon to Lytton had been completed years ago, although the latter was re-surveyed last autumn.

Mr. DEWDNEY: Who was the authority? Mention the names.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he would do so when it suited him.

Mr. DEWDNEY: I think you might do so now.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he would give the names when the Committee was appointed. The hon. the Prime Minister had declared a Session or so ago, on the floor of the House, that there were only two routes which could be adopted, and that the choice was between them—that the survey had been extended to Fort George and thence to Burrard Inlet, and that the Fraser River route had been abandoned. He would like to have the Committee to find out why the hon. the Premier had stated that one of the two routes referred to would be chosen, and yet why there should be any further surveys as announced by his organ in Victoria. And it was not only the organ which announced this, but from the correspondence between Earl Carnarvon and the Dominion Government it would appear there must be further surveys. He would do more than this. If a Committee were given him, he would show that the Fraser River route was not the route for national defence. If it took the line viâ the Lower Fraser, the Thompson River and North Branch to Tête Jaune Cache, it could be tapped by a branch in the Sumas Country and connect with Puget Sound at the main terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad in Washington Territory. He might tell the House that an application was now before Congress to extend the Northern Pacific Railway, within eight years, from Bismarck to Puget Sound, and they would certainly tap our line in case we brought the road

Mr. DECOSMOS.

viâ the Fraser. If the road was brought by the Lower Fraser, there would be little or no way traffic, not enough to find axle grease for the cars, because there were no resources along the line. But if the road was brought by way of Tête Jaune Cache and Fort George and Bute Inlet, reaching direct from the ocean or Victoria, there would be a very large way traffic. Any one turning up the statistics as to the Central Pacific Railway would find that the largest portion of the nett earnings of that railway was from way traffic. He would state one thing further, and that was that he believed this Government had no intention to build this railroad on the Pacific Coast until the general elections were over—that all the obstacles were got up for delay with this view. He believed that the Government had the power in its hands to commence the construction of the railway years ago. In 1874, the hon. the Premier had stated that the route from Esquimalt to Nanaimo would be commenced, and in December of the same year he agreed with Lord Carnarvon that this should be done. He (Mr. DeCosmos) contended that if the Government had consented to do this at that time, they were quite able to do so now. He need hardly say that the question had been the cause of a great deal of irritation in British Columbia, all of which need not have arisen if the Government had done what was in their power. All that was required in 1874 was some railway iron, a corps of engineers and some navvies. To a large portion of the people of British Columbia the matter was only one of intentional delay on the part of the Government. Another point which occurred to him was this: It was stated by the Government organ in Victoria that it was intended to survey the Lower Fraser River. He would take occasion to place this statement on record, namely, that any money expended for surveys of any portion of the Lower Fraser River in 1877, after the exhaustive surveys of last year, would be a waste of public money. He therefore presented his motion, hoping that the Government would see their way clear to granting it.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said, as seconder of the motion, his object was not to advocate any particular route through British Columbia. He had always maintained, and maintained still, that the question of the route was one which, in the general interests of the Dominion, must be decided by the engineers. But he did object to the paltering policy of this Government from year to year. It was stated in 1875 by the hon. the leader of the Government that the route was almost determined upon, and that there was only a very small link which had to be surveyed in order to render the route complete. They were told in 1876 that that link had been completed, and that the only question remaining was as to the route which should be taken from Fort George to the Pacific Ocean. That he had a preference to a particular route he (Mr. Thompson) was willing to admit. His preference was for the northern route, which would run through a rich mineral country, and by opening up rich veins of gold and silver, would afford employment to hundreds and thousands of miners. This he considered was infinitely more advantageous, not only to the Province, but to the Dominion at large, than the route running along the southern boundary, which was liable to raids from the United States, and along which a line could only be subsidiary to the Northern Pacific Road. Still he was willing to forego his preference, and that any route decided upon by the engineers should be adopted. He was perfectly willing that the Fraser River route should be adopted, if, in the opinion of the engineers, it was the best. The hon. the Premier, speaking on the subject on the 31st of March, 1876, said :

“The route by the Thompson and Lower Fraser rivers, first mentioned, proved by the surveys to be the most expensive one by which to reach the ocean; but this much could be said in its favour, that better grades could undoubtedly be obtained by their taking that cleft and following it down to the sea than by any other route, but an enormous amount of tunnelling would have to be done, as well as a large quantity of other expensive works, such as high retaining walls and deep excavations in the hardest of rock. These difficulties proved to be so numerous and so great that we were, with considerable reluctance, obliged to seek a more favourable route.”

It appeared at that time that the Premier had utterly abandoned the idea of deciding on that route. But why were engineering parties, after surveying the northern route, instructed late in last season to give a casual survey to this route? Why was the House now told that sufficient progress had not been made to enable the Government to invite tenders, which they expected to have been able to do, on the 1st of January; and why were the people of British Columbia to be put off another year, or perhaps a number of years, simply to survey routes which the Government had already declared were impracticable? If this route was considered practicable, it should have been surveyed at the same time as other routes, and if it was impracticable, as was stated by the hon. the Premier, it should be definitely abandoned. Route after route, year after year, were taken up and condemned, and taken up again, delaying the progress of the great national work. Such action led the people of British Columbia to consider that the Dominion Government never intended to perform the work. It would be observed by the despatch from the Earl of Carnarvon that influence had been brought to bear upon him to believe that no route and no terminus had yet been adopted. His Lordship said in the thirteenth paragraph of his despatch:—

“Between the coming spring, however, and the spring of 1878, it may be fairly expected that many points now surrounded with doubt will have become more clearly defined; and I fully hope and believe, that after the very limited delay of a single summer, the Province of British Columbia will find that there is no longer any obstacle to the active prosecution of the undertaking, and I trust that the Province will not fail to perceive with me that its case will be by no means strengthened, if impatience (however natural under other circumstances) is displayed at the non-commencement of a line of railway, the proper course and terminus of which are as yet altogether uncertain; while at the same time an independent observer must admit that the Canadian Government are using every exertion to carry out the work as rapidly as possible.”

He presumed the Legislature of British Columbia had acted perhaps wisely in excusing the Canadian Government for another year from carrying out the work; but he wished to know what guarantee was offered that in another year the Government would be prepared to carry on the work, as they were promised in Earl Carnarvon's despatch. They might be told next year that the surveys were not sufficiently in progress to enable the Government to complete the location of the line; that they had gone over the Fraser River route and condemned it, and were now surveying some other route. They had been told from year to year, that the route had not been permanently located. Last year the hon. the Premier said:

"Our attention was then directed more particularly to the route from Tête Jaune following the Fraser River towards Fort George. The route along this part of the Fraser River, a distance in round numbers of about 200 miles, proved singularly favourable; that is so far as getting a comparatively easy grade was concerned, while the works would not be nearly so rough and heavy. From Fort George there were several routes possible."

It now appeared from the Supplementary Report made by the Chief Engineer, Mr. Marcus Smith, and dated the 31st of December last, that the routes from Fort George to the ocean were surveyed last summer. Some had been given up as impracticable, but the route by Bute Inlet had been surveyed and a trial location made, and had been found much more favourable than was even anticipated by the hon. the Premier in his speech last year. He thought it was proper that the Committee asked for should be granted, in order to show what were the reasons which led the Government to inform the House that they were unable to locate the line, while they stated last year, that the location was almost completed. He found that $500,000 appeared in the Estimates for the construction of the main line in British Columbia. The same sum was voted last year, but never appropriated. That amount might be placed in the Estimates to give an idea that something would be done on the line during the year, while at the same time the Government informed the House, through His Excellency's Speech, that the surveys were not so far completed as to enable the line to be located.

Mr. THOMPSON.

The Estimates also showed that $100,000 was proposed to be appropriated for surveys during the years 1877 and 1878, while $500,000 were appropriated last year. From that reduced sum it would appear that the Government did not intend to prosecute the surveys with any great vigour, or that the surveys were so nearly completed that it would require only a small sum to determine the whole location of the road. Under those circumstances, he considered he was justified in advocating the appointment of the Committee, not to decide as to any particular route, but to determine what had been done, and what could be done, in regard to this important work. In the financial statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, he told the House that the people of British Columbia should be content with what had been done, and that $6,000,000 had already been spent in surveying the route for the Canadian Pacific Railway. He (Mr. Thompson) would like to know what benefit was derived by the Dominion at large from the $119,000 paid to Mr. Foster for useless work connected with the section of the line of which he was the contractor. He would further like to know what benefit had accrued, or was likely to accrue, either next year or during several years to come, from the 5,000 tons of steel rails now lying rusting at Esquimalt and Nanaimo? He hoped the Committee asked by the hon. member for Victoria would be granted.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM said he was glad to know that the selection of a route for the railroad and the site of the terminus would not be committed to hon. members for British Columbia, for if these questions were left to them it would take a long time to settle either the route or the terminus. They all had their opinions, their likes and dislikes. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) could only see three points in British Columbia—Esquimalt, Nanaimo and Bute Inlet; all places outside of those were considered by him worthless. He was not aware when the motion was put on the notice paper that that hon. member intended to take the opportunity in his own peculiar way to condemn the Fraser River route. He expected that it would have been at least left with the Committee to decide the question of route, but the hon. member for Victoria had taken the opportunity to condemn the route which several of the hon. members from British Columbia were somewhat inclined to advocate; he referred to the route which the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Dewdney) and himself had always maintained was the only route for a railway in that Province. The Government had spent nearly a million and a half of dollars in surveying the routes to the north, including Bute Inlet, Dean Channel, and one still farther north. He believed that the greater portion of that money had been thrown away, and that the Government would come back to the old route, which was the only outlet for a railway in the Province, viz: the Fraser River route, terminating at Burrard Inlet. The Government contemplated resurveying that route in 1877, and it was unwise and unpatriotic to throw any obstacle in their way, because he was satisfied, from what he knew of the country, and from information which he had received, that, even if they expended two million dollars in surveys, the Government would still have to come to the conclusion that there was only one route for the railway, and only one port on the mainland of British Columbia where the route could terminate. While he had no objection to the Committee being granted, though the proposal for sending for persons and papers would incur considerable expense, he would like to know what light a Committee could throw on the question. Already the House had the surveys and Government report before them, and he was perfectly satisfied that the Government would do what was right in the matter and not be intimidated or forced to select a route without duly considering the matter, not only in the interests of British Columbia, but in those of the whole Dominion. He knew the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) felt somewhat sore at the just defeat of the Esquimalt Railway Bill in the Senate. He, and many others of the people of Vancouver Island, had been for years endeavouring to rush the Government into the immediate construction of the road, without first discovering a port which would be an outlet and a route for the road. The aim of the hon. member for Victoria had been to get the road to Esquimalt, and there only. He hoped the Committee would not be granted, as there appeared to be no necessity for its appointment.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not intend to be drawn into a general discussion upon the Pacific Railway on the motion of the hon. member for Victoria for a Committee. He must, however, express his surprise at the complaint made by the hon. member at not receiving explicit information. The hon. member had called at his office and he had given him all the information that it was possible to give him, and, indeed, he had received more information than any hon. member in the House. He was not aware that, in stating that the report of the Engineer had been on the table five days, he had shown a want of courtesy towards the hon. gentleman or want of consideration for any person; if the hon. member thought so, he was simply mistaken. He had made a plain statement of facts in as few words as it was necessary to convey them. With regard to the statement that the Government had not used sufficient diligence in prosecuting the surveys, he had merely to note the fact that, during the first half year, hon. gentlemen opposite spent $489,000; in the second year, up to the time the present Government succeeded to office, $561,000. There were expended during 1873-74, $310,000; in 1874-75, $474,000, in 1875-76, $791,000; from June, 1876, to December, 1876, $509,000, or a total expenditure during the five years, of $3,136,615 on those surveys. He asserted, without fear of contradiction, that it would have been impossible for the Government to have shown greater diligence than had been shown up to this moment. He asserted, further, that, but for an anxious desire to conciliate the people of British Columbia, and show them how exceedingly desirous the Government was to meet the just expectations they might entertain, the Ministry would never have prosecuted the surveys with such haste, he might say instead of diligence, because a greater amount of leisure devoted to a careful examination of the country would have enabled them probably to have avoided many mistakes into which engineers must necessarily fall in penetrating an unknown country. He must again protest, once for all, against any hon. member of this House holding him accountable for any statement he might make with regard to engineering operations. He knew nothing about the country himself. All his statements were made upon information furnished him by the Chief Engineer and his assistants. It was well known that, in the survey of a vast country like British Columbia and the North-West Territories, it was impossible for any engineer to be absolutely accurate in the statements he might make with regard to the probable success of a line in any particular direction. For instance, it was supposed, four years ago, by Mr. Fleming, that he would find an almost direct line from Tête Jaune Cache towards the crossing of the Fraser River near Big Bend, while subsequent explorations had shown that a range of mountains, a branch of the Cariboo Mountains, stood in the way, presenting what was practically an impenetrable barrier, of which nothing was known until the country was explored. He durst say that, if he had spoken on this subject in the fall of 1873 or the spring of 1874, he should have pointed out this line as the most direct route that could be adopted. He had stated last year exactly what the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) had said, that the line would be or could be completely surveyed to Bute Inlet, and it was so completely surveyed to-day. It was also completely surveyed to Dean Inlet, and the profiles for these two routes through British Columbia were near completion. Another route which was only partially surveyed ran to Port Essington, which was the most northern port in British Columbia, and which, of all that could be obtained, formed the shortest route to the sea. It was true that in so inhospitable a country—the snow being so deep and the ice so firm in winter—it was likely to be practically out of the question to think of going there, but, with reference to the Fraser Valley, he might simply state, as an hon. gentleman had said, that the Government were reluctantly compelled to seek a more favourable route. They did not indicate, however, by any means, that, under no circumstances which might yet be developed, would they ever resort to the examination of the Fraser Valley again. On the contrary, there was very much to be said in favour of the Fraser Valley. They could, for instance, have navigation on the Fraser River to a point so high in the river as to make that route practically 152 miles shorter than the route to Bute Inlet; and they had extraordinary difficulties to face when they reached Bute Inlet, arising in connection with navigation. The Chief Engineer was investigating that particular point at this moment, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) hoped that the information he was collecting and distributing under various heads would be prepared within a short time in such a shape as to be presented to the House. That information would probably determine the choice of the ultimate route through British Columbia. In the meantime, he had merely to say that it was quite impossible for the Government to accede to this request for a Committee with power to send for persons and papers and to institute an examination of this sort. That could not be submitted to; and he was sure the hon. gentleman who had moved for the Committee would see how utterly impracticable such a scheme would be. Who was to criticize the action of Mr. Sandford Fleming and Mr. Marcus Smith? Who was to find fault with them for their examinations? Were they to have mere politicians undertaking to examine these men and to report to the House as to whether they were right or wrong? This was not a matter of administration at all. It was a matter of engineering. If any member of the House chose to assume the responsibility of saying that the Government had not shown sufficient diligence in prosecuting the survey, let him make a motion to that effect, and they would meet it promptly and show that their conduct was not open to such censure; but for any one to undertake to obtain a Committee of twelve gentlemen in the House to enter upon and critically examine the engineers who had been engaged, with almost carte blanche as to their proceedings, in the prosecution of this survey across the continent was really one of the most extraordinary propositions he had ever heard of. He might say, in vindication of the engineers—and he always endeavoured to vindicate public servants whenever assailed, as long as they were in the employment of the Government, and they could be employed no longer than while they deserve the confidence of the Government—that they had performed an amount of labour which was perfectly incredible. Take the great Indian Railway from Bombay towards Madras. The line was not more than one-fourth of the length of this route, and the only serious obstacles in the way were met in ascending the mountains not far from Bombay; and yet that survey, though through a densely populated country, which was as well known as any part of England or France, had actually consumed more time than had been consumed up to the present in passing over an uninhabited portion of the continent, and in traversing this distance of nearly three thousand miles. It was true that the work had entailed great expense, but that was inseparable from the nature of the country, the kind of labour required, the difficulty of getting supplies, and all other incidents of that sort, which were entirely different from what they would be in a settled and well-known country. He should, of course, take occasion at the proper time to give the very fullest information with respect to everything connected with this road. He believed he did so last year, and he hoped he then satisfied gentlemen on both sides of the House. He thought that the Government had a right to claim the support of gentlemen on both sides of the House in connection with an enterprise which had occasioned so much difficulty, and was sure to occasion so much more difficulty in the future. It was true that some gentlemen opposite had shown a remarkable degree of diligence in endeavouring to pick holes and find fault, and even insinuate that some improprieties of a personal kind to himself had taken place in this connection; and he had to say, once for all, that, if any man here or anywhere else had any charge to bring, let him formulate it in open day and demand a Committee to investigate it. In that case he should have a Committee, and witnesses should be examined on oath. He could only say that no impropriety on the part of the Government had ever taken place in this connection.

Mr. BUNSTER said he was very sorry to see this matter brought before the House so frequently. It was apparent, however, to every intelligent man that justice had not been done to British Columbia with respect to the building of this road. When the Premier stated that everything that was possible had been done, he joined issue with the hon. gentleman, owing to the fact that he believed sufficient information was already in the possession of the Government to justify the location of the line. He was willing to give the Government credit for having sent out rails to British Columbia, but, whether badly advised or not, the Government had certainly not shown the amount of diligence which had been exhibited in connection with other roads. In his opinion there was nothing to prevent the rails being laid long ago, as there was an abundance of timber for ties, and the grade was easy. This survey had been in progress for four or five years, and during the same period the Central Pacific Railway had been built and placed in running order on American territory, while not a blow had been struck towards the actual commencement of the railway in British Columbia. He could not help thinking they had not been fairly dealt with in this matter. When some two or three years ago British Columbia complained of her grievance, and accepted the Carnarvon arbitration, the work should have been begun in earnest at once. The Government had brought down a measure which passed the House but was killed in the Senate, and what had become of that measure? The Government had not again endeavoured to secure its passage, as they should have done. When the English Government was defeated in the Lords on the Paper Bill, they sent it to the Upper Chamber year after year until it was finally carried, and this should have been the course in Canada in the present instance. The people of British Columbia, under the circumstances, had good reason to find fault and to grumble. It would indeed be strange if they did not. They were given no guarantee that the work would be completed. He could not help doubting the honesty of the excuse which Lord Carnarvon had recently made in this regard. They had a right to assume that the Minister of Justice, who had expressed himself so strongly against British Columbia, when he went to England had probably used his well-known power of argument and eloquence to influence the judgment of Lord Carnarvon. If the road had been begun according to agreement, probably this country would not be suffering so much from the present depression in trade. The work would have infused confidence into our mechanics and farmers, and our farmers' sons who were now seeking homes in other countries. Possibly it would have induced some of the 500,000 Canadians who had settled in the United States to return to their native land, for every true Canadian preferred to live under the glorious flag which for a thousand years had braved the battle and the breeze instead of one foreign to them. So long as the Government continued to manifest apathy and disregard on this national aspect of the question, the only practical union of the several component parts of the Dominion, so long would our young men fail to feel confidence as to the future of the nation. It had been well said that without the railway the Dominion was but a rope of sand. He had not yet learned that the Government had applied to the Imperial Cabinet for an Imperial guarantee in order to prosecute vigorously the early construction of the road. Now he would just remind them that it had been shown, on good authority, that our line would shorten the passage across the continent, as far as Eastern trade was concerned, by 2 days and 9 hours; and, while the American through road passed over a range of 8,700 odd feet in height, the highest point to be crossed on this route was 4,000 odd feet in height. This was a material advantage, and while $2.50 was paid for ties on the Central Pacific Railroad, ties on this line would not cost over 12½ cents each. These and other advantages, he was aware, had already been mentioned, but they could not be impressed upon them too often. He was sorry to hear the charge again made that British Columbia was an inhospitable region; he had refuted it before and could again. He was sorry to behold such gross ignorance on the part of members on the Treasury benches as regarded the climate and capabilities of their own country. Canadians who had removed to British Columbia would not return to Ontario in consequence of the great superiority of the climate of the Pacific Province. Indeed the climate here was inhospitable in comparison. He could only say that less ill-feeling would exist among British Columbians, owing to the treatment they had received with regard to the railway, if less hostile language was used in the House with reference to their country. If British Columbia was as powerful as the United States, the Government would soon find the means to enable them to prosecute the work properly, but because they were weak in number—though not in spirit—a different attitude was taken. He hoped to see the day when the bargain made would be carried out. If the present Government did not do so, some other Government would eventually keep faith with British Columbia. American engineers employed on the line had told him that it could be built for less than one half the cost of the American route owing to the condition of the labour market, the depreciated price of iron, the difference in the height of the mountains which were to be crossed, and the lessened price which must be paid for ties. It had been said that $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land had been offered. Unfortunately for British Columbia and the rest of the Dominion that offer had not been made in a proper spirit, or floated properly on the London market, as was the debt recently floated for the Dominion by the hon. the Finance Minister. He held that it was not fair to mortgage the Province until the obligations entered into at Confederation were carried out. He was sorry to hear one of the hon. members from British Columbia say that he was opposed to the granting of the Committee. That hon. gentleman also declared that the senior member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) had three points in his mind's eye. Well, credit should be given that hon. member for it, as the other hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Roscoe) had only one point in his mind, which was not as valuable, as far as accommodating the commerce of the world was concerned, as either of the three referred to. He favoured the appointment of the Committee, because he thought it would throw a great deal of new light on the subject, and probably assist the Government, and help to satisfy the disappointed people of the Province. The granting of the Committee would only be an act of courtesy and justice towards a much-abused people.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he had not heard any argument during the discussion which should induce the Government to grant the Committee. As the House was aware, he had on several occasions expressed his opinion in regard to the route for the railway. As early as 1873, he introduced a resolution asking that the Fraser River route might be surveyed. Among the hon. members who opposed this was the hon. member for Victoria, (Mr. DeCosmos) as well as others from that part of the country. It was, therefore, very unfair for those hon. gentlemen to throw the whole responsibility of the delay of the survey of that route on the Government; they were as much to blame as the Government, as they had done everything they possibly could, from Confederation up to the present time, to prejudice the engineers against the Fraser River route. He had never urged that one route was better than another, but he had always advocated the prosecution of the surveys. It was of the utmost importance that the best route should be adopted. The hon. member for Victoria had stated that, if the Fraser River route were decided upon, there would be no way traffic, and that, therefore, the more northerly route was preferable.

Now, he (Mr. Dewdney) made a trip last summer from Fort George to Tête Jaune Cache, and he found that 150 to 250 miles of that route ran through a very inhospitable country. His impression was that, when the surveys were made, the Government would be forced back upon the Fraser River route. If his information were correct, it would be found that there were a great many difficulties connected with the more northerly route. He would refer to the question of way traffic at a future time. He had statistics to show that the way traffic would be much greater on the Fraser River route than on the other. The hon. member for Victoria believed that the Fraser River country was very difficult. The hon. gentleman made a trip through it once, and, when in one of those nervous conditions in which the House often found him, he jumped out of the stage and, had it not been for his coat tails, would have rolled over a precipice.

Mr. DECOSMOS said that statement was entirely incorrect. He did travel over a height on the Thompson River, but the gentleman who tumbled out of the stage was Mr. Maine, a broker of San Francisco.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he had been misinformed, then; but he had made the statement on the authority of the stage driver. He hoped the Government would not grant the Committee.

Mr. DECOSMOS said the hon. the First Minister had stated that the Fraser River route had certain advantages, one of which was that by starting at a certain point they could make the line 120 miles shorter. He presumed the point referred to was Yale, and he thought it was a mere delusion. He had been over that country several times, and had found that the navigation was very difficult in the summer time, and in the winter the river was frozen over sometimes for six weeks or two months together. What great advantage would there be in having a through railway if it started from a point which could not be reached for a month or two during the year. The hon. the Premier said the Committee ought not to be allowed, because they might catechise Mr. Sandford Fleming and Mr. Marcus Smith. Apparently the hon. gentleman wished the House to infer that the Committee would treat those gentlemen unfairly. But there was another side to the hon. gentleman's argument, which was this: That the Committee might draw out information from those gentlemen that had been withheld for years. They might draw out the information that representations had been made with a view to certain objects, definite or indefinite. He had not one word to say against either of the Chief Engineers, nor did he wish to say anything against the subordinate engineers. The hon. member for Yale said he (Mr. DeCosmos) cast the blame for the delay on the engineers.

Mr. DEWDNEY: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he so understood the hon. gentleman; at any rate this denial only made the matter stronger. He understood the Chief Engineer, as far back as 1874, to state that, if the order were given to commence the railway in British Columbia, they could begin at once. He was sorry that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Cunningham) objected to the Committee. That hon. gentleman might have obtained a great deal more information from the investigation than he now possessed as to the Northern Route, and discover that the line he was in favour of was not so well adapted for commercial and national purposes as he believed. With respect to withdrawing the motion, he would rather it was taken as lost on a division than anything else.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Very well.

Motion lost on division.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MOTION TO APPOINT COMMITTEE.

Mr. CASEY said he had put on the paper a notice of motion for a Select Committee to consider the condition of the Civil Service, the mode of making appointments, and such reforms as might be suggested in the system. He believed it would be necessary for him to give some reasons for asking for the Committee. In doing so, it would be necessary to go to some extent into the subjects which he proposed to submit to it. He held the present condition of the service to be unsatisfactory in several respects. Comparatively speaking, the Civil Service was inefficient. He did not mean to say that there were not efficient men in the service, because it would be impossible to carry on the work as well as at present without a certain number of capable men. But he claimed that the service was not as uniformly efficient as the service of any large corporate body in the country—that the standard was not so high as demanded by banks or mercantile firms. As a consequence the service was necessarily disproportionately costly. It was always more expensive to do a certain amount of work with a large number of inefficient men than with a small number thoroughly qualified for their positions. These defects in the service he attributed to the mode of nominating and examining candidates for appointments. The patronage system had been found wanting in practice here and in the old country, and he also believed in the United States. Appointments by political patronage were certainly unfair in principle to a large portion of the population. Under that system the right hon. member for Kingston and his friends had not the opportunity to appoint any of their supporters, while, along with the other privileges and responsibilities resting upon those on his own side of the House, they had that of making Civil Service appointments. It had been suggested that, when the hon. gentlemen opposite changed places with them, they would meet their reward in this respect. That was undoubtedly true, but one unfairness did not compensate for another. The party now forming a majority of the House would then be in the same position in regard to this matter as the minority now occupied. The system of appointments was unbusiness-like, and was a system which no man would adopt in choosing his own clerks or confidential agents. He would not apply to his political friends to recommend names, but he would undoubtedly use his own discretion and judgment. Having appointed them, he would take cool and deliberate note of their conduct from year to year, retaining, promoting or dismissing them according to his estimate of their efficiency. Such should be the course in regard to the service of the country. It had been held that appointments should be made on the responsibility of the Ministry to Parliament and the people, and it had been urged that a sense of this responsibility would lead the Government to make such appointments as were in the public interest. He thought this was a mere phantom of responsibility. There was no real active responsibility resting upon the Government. There were very few appointments as to which the Ministers could make use of their own personal knowledge, and these few were only in the capital. In regard to all other appointments the Ministry were compelled to rely upon their supporters, both by the necessity of the case and by immemorial custom. The member who recommended any appointment might be said to be responsible. But his responsibility was only to his constituents, those who had elected him, and to whom he would have to look for his future support. He held that it was unsound in principle for anybody to be responsible to parties to whom he stood in the position of a grantor of favours. The member could not be supposed to know everybody who applied to him for appointment, neither could he have a full knowledge of the duties he would have to perform. He could not, either, escape the influence of party feeling to a greater or less degree, and would also be acted upon by personal friendship, gratitude for party services and perhaps by family relations. He assumed in all this that members would not act from unworthy motives, but it was within the limits of possibility that some appointments would be made in order to gain popularity, or as a reward for party services. The latter, however, under the present system, could hardly perhaps be called an unworthy motive, since it had been the regular practice to reward party services by such appointments. He thought it would be admitted that the system had not obtained the most efficient class of men for the Civil Service of Canada. He said this, not for the purpose of making any attack upon the Civil Service, for he considered it was as efficient as could be found in any country where a similar system of patronage prevailed. There were a large number of efficient men in the service, a number sufficient to carry on the business of the country fairly well. But the best men in the Civil Service knew that the average excellence was not what it ought to be, and that the present system was not one calculated to secure efficiency. He had omitted to mention one or two things in regard to the present condition of the service. One of these was the overcrowding, owing to the pressure brought upon Government by their supporters, which compelled a larger nomination of men than would be required for the needs of the country if a proper system of selection was adopted. This had compelled a reduction of the salaries in the lower grades, and it was impossible to obtain good men, as a rule, at the salaries offered. Some of the lowest salaries only ranged from $300 to $350 a year, and the House would recognize the fact that it was impossible to induce men of mature years and judgment to enter the service on such terms. Another evil was the partisan character of the service. When a Government remained in power for a considerable length of time, it was but natural that the various offices should be filled by men of their own political opinions; and an incoming Government found its servants hostile to it, and it was impossible to have that harmony which ought to exist. This difficulty led, in the United States, to the adoption of the "spoils system," which was the dismissal of those who had been appointed by a former Government, and their replacement by friends of the new Administration. This was a logical result of the patronage system. He did not think it unfair, as a theoretical proposition, that a man who had been appointed for political reasons only should follow the fortunes of his party and leave his office when his party left power; but he need hardly say that he was not in favour of introducing that system. It had brought upon the American people the tremendous frauds and corruption which now cursed the Government of that country. To sum up, the patronage system afforded no guarantee of efficiency and imposed on members a responsibility which they were in no way qualified to discharge. He was sorry that the papers asked for had not been brought down before. If they had, he would have been able to make his remarks much more interesting, by illustrating the evils he had alluded to. He would now explain briefly what he intended the Committee should do. He intended to ask for a Committee to investigate the condition of the Civil Service as it was at present, and such proposals as might be laid before it for reforming the system and to report to the House their opinion of the whole matter. The right hon. member for Kingston, when this matter was up a few days before, gave it as his opinion that the motion for a Committee was one of want of confidence in the Government and irregular in point of parliamentary practice. he did not think so, although he had great respect for the right hon. gentleman as an authority on precedent. In 1860, the very same course as that proposed now was adopted by Mr. Pope Hennessy, in the English House of Commons, who moved for a Committee of 15 to consider the existing manner of making appointments to the Civil Service, and to report whether better means might not be adopted for securing the appointment of efficient persons. That Committee sat. The report of the Civil Service Commissioners and other papers were referred to, and it reported from time to time to the House, asking for other privileges. Finally it made a report to the House, which dealt fully with everything pertaining to the condition of the Service, and certain schemes which were proposed. The Committee was appointed without any objection, as far as he knew, on the part of the Government, and he assumed it was a regular proceeding, and that the Government of Canada would be justified in consenting to the course he proposed to adopt. This was not a party question. The Reform party could well take it up, for it seemed to belong to their professions. Conservatives also need not hesitate to take it up, as it was a question upon which all parties could unite for the public benefit. It was one in which he considered he was justified in asking both the Government and the Opposition to assist him. From certain public utterances on both sides of the House and from private conversation he felt that his motion would have very general support. He moved:

Mr. DECOSMOS.

Mr. CASEY.

“That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the present condition of the Civil Service and the method of nominating and examining candidates for appointments, with a view to ascertaining whether better means cannot be adopted for securing the appointment of properly qualified persons and the general efficiency of the Service: with power to send for persons, papers and records; said Committee to consist of Messrs. Archibald, Aylmer, Charlton, Colby, De St. Georges, Kirkpatrick, Killam, Macdougall (Elgin), McDougall (Renfrew), Roscoe, Wright (Pontiac), Church, Paterson, Burpee (Sunbury), and the mover, of whom five shall be a quorum, and that said Committee have power to report to the House its observations on the subject referred to it, together with minutes of the evidence taken before them.”

Mr. MITCHELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time, and passed:

Bill (No. 30) To incorporate the Union Marine Insurance Company of Halifax, Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Jones. Halifax.)

Bill (No. 31) To authorize and provide for the winding up of the Metropolitan Bank.—(Mr. Workman.)

Bill (No. 32) Respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 45) To incorporate the St. Lawrence and Pacific Railway Ferry Company.—(Mr. Jetté.)

QUEBEC BUILDING SOCIETIES
BILL.—[BILL No. 53.]

(Mr. Jetté.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. JETTÉ said the object of the Bill was to grant to building societies in the Province of Quebec the same privileges which were conferred on these societies in Ontario by the Act of 1874. It was intended to prevent the establishment of so many societies as were now organized. Instead of being obliged merely to have a declaration signed by 20 or 25 persons, and registered at the registry office, the promoters of such societies would, under its provisions, be compelled to apply to the Government for letters patent. These societies were also to be prohibited from receiving deposits to an unlimited amount, as had been done in the Province of Quebec for years past. Deposits had been received in such amounts as to imperil the interests of depositors. He knew of one society in Montreal which, with only a paid-up capital of $50,000, had received deposits to the extent of at least $125,000; and the shares of the society could be realized upon at any moment, giving no security to depositors. If the Bill became law, it would only allow building societies with a permanent paid-up capital of $250,000 to receive deposits. The necessity for this legislation was, in his opinion, shown by the petitions sent to the House this Session on behalf of one of these societies, which was in difficulties, praying that the power of receiving deposits be refused it; and asking that, in future, its directors shall have no such power. The Bill was drawn, he believed, in the public interest.

Mr. BLAIN suggested that a great deal of time would be saved if this Bill was referred to the Committee, together with the Government Joint Stock Companies Bill. He also believed that a Bill had been introduced into the Senate, with the object of increasing the borrowing power of these societies very considerably in excess of the powers capable of being granted under the Joint Stock Companies Act, which was before the House.

Mr. BLAKE said the House, some years ago, had affirmed a principle with regard to building societies in Ontario, which of course could be applied to such societies in the Province of Quebec. It had always occurred to him, that it would be a very great advantage if it were possible to deal with building societies by means of general legislation based on principles applicable to all the Provinces in which they were established. He was not aware that in the Province of Quebec, as in Ontario, the old principle of terminating societies had been practically done away with.

Mr. JETTÉ: No; it is not done away with entirely.

Mr. HOLTON said the principle still existed.

Mr. BLAKE said this was the case in Ontario. Practically, there were now no terminating societies in existence; but any common law passed in the House in this regard, should be wide enough to embrace societies of this description. He did not doubt that permanent societies were the true societies, and attention should be more particularly addressed to such legislation as would contribute to the formation and maintenance of permanent societies on a sound basis, and, whatever was the fate of this Bill, it was worthy of the consideration of the House and Committee to see whether they should not make a general law based on sound principles, which would be applicable to all such societies throughout the Dominion. General principles must be common to such transactions in both the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and it was certainly unfortunate that varying laws on this subject should be placed on the Statute-book each Session. For example, an hon. member had alluded to the fact that, in the other Chamber, a Bill was introduced to give additional powers to building societies, and in this House his hon. friend from Peterborough had submitted a Bill giving additional powers to building societies in Ontario. This was not a creditable state of things. They ought to frame one measure broad enough and yet guarded enough to suit the circumstances of all the Provinces in this respect.

Mr. JETTÉ said that two years ago he had introduced a Bill almost identical with the present one, but the Finance Minister had requested him not to press it, because he would probably introduce a Government measure on the subject during the next Session. In the meantime, a Bill had been introduced with respect to building societies in Ontario, and one of its provisions limited borrowing powers to societies having a pretty large capital. This was submitted to vote, and, he believed on motion of his hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) it was so amended as to allow all societies having a paid-up capital of $40,000 to receive deposits. He did not consider this a sound principle; experience had since shown that such borrowing powers should be restricted. He thought that his Bill would certainly meet the exigencies of the situation in the Province of Quebec more than other Bills which had been introduced. They wished to profit by the experience afforded during the past two years, and business was at present so depressed, that no one would complain if the power of borrowing money, and of receiving deposits in this relation, was restricted.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he understood that his hon. friend would be then content with the second reading, and consent to the Bill being considered along with the Government Bill, or immediately subsequent to it.

Mr. JETTÉ: I have no objection to that course.

Mr. OLIVER said it must be understood that when this Bill passed its second reading and was referred to the proper Committee, any hon. gentleman who differed from its principle was not debarred by this fact from urging his objections. He certainly objected to the principle of the Bill, which he would oppose at a future stage.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. BLAKE.

NON-FORFEITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE POLICIES BILL.

[BILL No. 69.]

(Mr. Trow.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. TROW, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said his object was to give policy-holders a guarantee that no advantage would be taken of them by Insurance Companies on account of some little informality or technicality caused by their agents unknown to the policy-holders. The first clause provided that, if a policy-holder had paid a premium for five years, there should be no advantage taken by the company in reference to an improper statement as to his age. He might not have known it at the time, and, as a rule, executors, trustees, or the widow and family, were not in a position to prosecute, but were often compelled to make a compromise and so were defrauded of their just rights. The second clause provided that the company should, within thirty days, pay the amount specified in the policy into the Court of Chancery and that it should bear 8 per cent. interest from that date. He thought the result of this would be to make companies pay sooner than they would otherwise. The third clause provided a security for an assignee who had purchased a policy in good faith, and loaned money to the policy-holder for it, and had paid the premium for ten years with the sanction of the company. He thought in that case he should receive the amount. In other transactions, he was protected by the law, and he thought he also should be protected in insurance matters. Then, many young people were induced by agents of companies to insure their lives, fancying that they might be in circumstances to continue to pay their premiums yearly. But, when they started in life and had a family, they became straitened in circumstances, and were not prepared to pay the annual premiums, and the consequence was they forfeited the amount they had paid. In such a case, the company ought to give a paid-up policy to the value of the amount paid, and that was provided for in the 4th clause. He proposed to make some amendments to the Bill in Committee.

Mr. BLAIN said he thought there was a principle in the Bill which might very well be considered. He believed the better class of insurance companies did not raise these technical objections to the payment of the amount of the policy, after a certain number of premiums had been paid. He suggested that the Bill should be read the second time and referred to the Committee which had now under consideration the Government Insurance Bill.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had no doubt the object of the mover of the Bill was excellent and laudable, but it would be a very serious interference with existing contracts, as it was to affect all policies now in force. It appeared to him that they could not possibly entertain a proposition to introduce quite novel conditions into policies, covering such an enormous amount of money and affecting such an enormous variety of interest as that covered by the life policies in existence in Canada. There was something like $80,000,000 now covered by these contracts, and it seemed to him that they could not vary the terms of existing policies. As to what might be done in the future he would express no opinion at present.

Mr. TROW said he did not wish to interfere with existing policies, but only with those which might be made hereafter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was clear that this measure could not receive the sanction of the Legislature, no matter whether it affected existing or future policies. It was a Bill to declare for Insurance Companies the terms on which they should insure. An Insurance Company made a bargain with the insured, declaring the terms. This measure would simply stop or obstruct life insurance in this country. By the first clause, no matter what fraud or dishonesty might have been practised, the company would be deprived of any defence after the premium had been paid for five years. Another clause provided that, whenever a policy was assigned, if the premium was paid for a certain number of years, the amount must be paid, even if the party had committed suicide. That must be rejected on moral grounds. They could quite understand a party, after paying a premium for some years, committing suicide, after assigning for the benefit of his family. The whole Bill seemed to be an attempt to force insurance companies to issue policies just as this Legislature thought they ought, instead of leaving it a matter of bargain between the insurer and the insured. The fifth clause provided that, after a forfeiture with the thirty days' grace that was generally allowed by all insurance companies, a lapsed policy could be revived any time within a year. One great source of profit to insurance companies arose from the lapse of policies, and that entered into their calculations, and was the means of reducing the premiums on the policies. It seemed to him that the whole Bill would be a most unwarrantable interference with the liberty of contract.

Mr. BLAKE said he thought the observations which had been made would convince his hon. friend that it was useless to ask the House to assent to the second reading. Even if they were disposed to affirm every clause in reference to future contracts, they could not, on very obvious principles, alter the base of existing contracts in these very important particulars. It might be that advantage was sometimes taken of the conditions of policies, but they had been made conditions and they formed elements in the calculations of the companies as to the general rate of premium which they charged. That was part of the profit which enabled them to insure at the rate they did, so that it would be out of the question to alter the contracts as proposed. It seemed to him that the proper course would be for his hon. friend to propose such amendments as he desired, before the Committee on Banking and Commerce or before the House, to the Government Bill on Life Insurance. There was but one ground on which the interference of the Legislature, in such a measure as this, was logically defensible. They had determined that the business of life insurance was one which they should take, to a certain extent, under their supervision.

If they licensed companies to do business, they might see fit to state, to a certain extent, the conditions on which they should do business. It was therefore possible that the Legislature might be induced to impose certain conditions on the companies. He did not know that any serious or widespread difficulties had arisen from the severe use of stringent conditions in life insurance policies; there had no doubt been some cases of hardship, but he believed that the insurance policies under which great hardship had arisen were rather fire than life policies. So serious were the mischiefs considered by the Legislature of Ontario growing out of the very stringent and difficult condition of fire insurance policies, that steps were taken some time ago to form a Commission for the purpose of settling the conditions of such policies. If he remembered rightly it was provided that no other conditions than those made statutable should be binding, unless the Judge, before whom any action regarding the policy came, should determine that they were reasonable. This provision was copied from the law in England with reference to the conditions imposed by railway companies. The English law did not permit railway companies to impose any conditions on the character of the trade, and no such conditions could be enforced, no matter how clearly they might be agreed upon, if they appeared unreasonable to the Judge. He wished to call the attention of the hon. member for Kingston to the fact that—if it was within the range of possibility, as a legislative proposition—if such mischiefs resulted he might be disposed to insert some such conditions; but he did not desire to be understood as saying that most of those conditions might come within the purview of proper legislative interference. Some of them might. He would suggest that the proper course would be to discharge this order, and, if the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) thought any of the propositions were fit to be inserted in a Bill providing for the future conduct of life insurance companies, he might direct attention to the fact in Committee by proposing amendments to the Government Bill.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. TROW said he had known cases of great hardship resulting from the present system. His only object in introducing the Bill was for the interest of the public. He had, however, expected better treatment for the Bill; he anticipated that it would have a fair hearing, or be submitted to the Committee for amendment if necessary. Since it had met with the disapprobation of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake), the hon. the Minister of Finance, and more particularly of the hon. member for Kingston, (Sir John A. Macdonald), who was so strong on protection, he thought he must withdraw the Bill.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

ONTARIO PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES BILL.

[BILL No. 21.]

(Mr. Hall.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

TRANSFER OF THE TRURO AND PICTOU BRANCH RAILWAY.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

“That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to make arrangements for carrying out the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway in pursuance of negotiations entered into with the Government of Nova Scotia, and the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company under the resolution passed by this House on the 19th May, 1874; and for that purpose to provide—

“1. That the said Branch Railway with sufficient land for the purposes thereof and the Stations and buildings thereon, but without rolling stock, may be transferred absolutely to the person or Company constructing a line of railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, and providing sufficient rolling stock and appurtenances for the same, and a proper Steam Ferry across the said Strait, the whole to the satisfaction of the Minister of Public Works.

“2. That temporary possession of the said Branch Railway may be given to the person or Company with whom the Nova Scotia Government shall have contracted for the construction of the said extension to the said Strait, and the establishment of the said Steam Ferry, as soon as such person or Company shall have expended not less than $400,000 on the work to the satisfaction of the said Minister of Public Works; subject to immediate resumption of the said Branch Railway by the Government of Canada and repayment of the net earnings thereof, in case of failure to fulfil the conditions aforesaid, by such person or Company, who shall give proper security for the fulfilment thereof and for the payment of all damages resulting from such failure, to the satisfaction of the Minister; such failure also operating the avoidance of any arrangement for the absolute transfer of the said Branch Railway."

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACKENZIE said these resolutions were proposed in order to carry out the proposal which was authorized in the Session of 1874, by which power was given to the Government to negotiate with a company or individuals who would be willing to construct a railway from the vicinity of New Glasgow, eastwards, toward Cape Breton. An effort was made to obtain an extension as far as Louisburg or some other port in that neighbourhood, but it failed, although certain English capitalists made an offer to carry the extension in that direction. Another attempt was made, based on a second Order in Council, but it also failed because no recognised offer was made from any company to perform the work. It was finally agreed, in accordance with the views of the Nova Scotia Government, that the Truro and Pictou road should be given for the purpose of securing railway extension to the Gut of Canso, they undertaking also to provide steam ferry across the straits. When a similar proposal was under consideration with regard to the Windsor branch, the Western Counties Railway Company undertook under the Order in Council of the 22nd or 30th October, 1873, to carry that out and the negotiations were direct with this Government. In the present case, the Nova Scotia Government advertised for tenders for the construction of the work, and Messrs. Abbot & Co., of Brockville, got a bonus of $7,945 to build the road on condition of obtaining the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch. The Order in Council was recapitulated in the preamble of the Bill which he proposed to found on the resolutions. He would, of course, give any explanations that any hon. member required. Meantime he moved the passage of the resolutions.

Mr. PALMER said he would like to bring to the notice of the House and to the notice of the Ministry the exact position of the question as he understood it. If they were in the position that it was necessary to give this railroad away, in order to get a line from New Glasgow to the Gut of Canso, in his opinion great injustice would be done not only to the island of Cape Breton but to the whole Dominion. That portion of the island in which Sidney was situated was of the very greatest public importance. The harbour of Louisburg was situated on the dividing line of the route between the great ports of Canada on the one side and Europe on the other. The climate of this country was such that the navigation of the St. Lawrence was open only one half of the year. But the northern portion of the island of Cape Breton could be reached as well in winter as in summer, and it was of the utmost importance that a railroad should be carried through there. If, however, the Government gave away the Truro and Pictou Branch, and then only got the road extended to Canso, the result would not be as beneficial as they supposed. He thought the policy of the Government should be to deepen the canals so that vessels could go down to Sidney. He would have liked to have seen the Baie Verte Canal built, but that question was not under discussion now. He thought that the Welland Canal ought to be deepened to 14 feet at the earliest possible moment. He felt confident that the trade done by vessels between 300 and 400 tons burthen would increase to an enormous extent, for they would be in immediate connection with these vast coal fields at this point. He held that there was no part of the Dominion of Canada so far out of the line as the port of St. John, yet he believed that, that being a port where there was great capacity for building ships, no other port was so much interested in this question, for directly trade was commenced on the Baie Verte Canal there would be much demand for ships. He appealed to the members of the Government, and of the House, whether it would not be better, before they made any arrangements in reference to the giving away of this railroad, to endeavour to make some arrangement by which it could be carried to Louisburg or Sidney Harbour. The distance was 82 miles only from Canso to Louisburg or Sidney. If the contractors had the rolling stock, which properly belonged to that portion of the line, they would undertake to build it on to St. Peter, about 35 miles. He held that neither this Government, nor any other Government had the right to give away the property of Canada in order to so largely benefit Cape Breton only. He said this, not from any feeling of hostility towards the people of Cape Breton, but he was sure that they would tax themselves for the purpose of building the balance, which was some 50 miles. It had been proposed that the royalty on the mines, which belonged to the Government of Nova Scotia, should be given towards that portion of the railway. He held that before the negotiation was consummated, the Government ought to be directed to see how far the Province of Nova Scotia would sacrifice its royalty upon its coal, and how far the inhabitants of Sidney and the surrounding towns, would be willing to tax themselves for raising funds in order to carry on the railroad. The result would be that the port would be 180 miles nearer Europe than Halifax, besides the former being a better port, as vessels would not have to go such a long distance in the fog. Steamers could then go into port almost immediately after they made land on the American continent. The distance by rail would be about 100 miles more, and this was a very important matter so far as the mails were concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government could not get the people to build the road themselves, and it became a question whether it would not advance the interests of that place, as he had no doubt it would, by having the road extended to the Straits, and in the meantime ferry across in the expectation of a further extension within a reasonable time.

Mr. PALMER.

Mr. TUPPER said he regretted very much to learn that the Government had not been able to utilize this work for the purpose for which it was intended. He believed every exertion was made which could be made to induce the parties receiving this Truro and Pictou line to extend it. That effort, however, had failed, and he did not know that it would be possible to accomplish anything more than by the proposed arrangement. He rose, however, for the purpose of asking the First Minister whether the company which was to receive this line—although the Government of Nova Scotia held an intermediate position in this arrangement—would have to agree that the charges for transit would be under the supervision of the general Government. He believed that the general Railway Act had a provision that would meet the case. He certainly believed that the general Government should have a voice in fixing the rates of transit. It was possible, and perhaps not in a very remote future, that the views advanced by the hon. member for St. John might obtain a great deal more consideration than they did at present. The time might come when the question of utilizing the very nearest points between this country and Europe would become a much more important question than it was at present. In view of such a condition of things arising, he thought it would be judicious to provide for the transfer of this road back to the Government, if it became desirable in the interests of the whole Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said of course the road would be under the control of the general Government; the tariff of rates and other matters would be subject to the provisions of the general Railway Act. If this were not so, it would be impossible for the road to be run in connection with the Government road. There was no clause in the Bill providing for the re-acquirement of the road. That was a matter which certainly had not been suggested by any party, and therefore it was not made a part of the agreement under which the present company agreed to proceed with the construction of the road. There was a great deal of difficulty in getting the company to proceed with the construction, even under the present arrangement. They insisted in the first place upon getting immediate possession of the Pictou Branch. This the Government declined. They then proposed to give security for the performance of the contract to the Local Government, but this was also declined. It was finally agreed that, upon the expenditure of a certain sum of money, the railway to Truro would be given up, subject, however, to the condition that, if the road was not finished in a certain time, it would be re-occupied by the Government. He thought every precaution had been taken whereby the arrangements might be carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL said the arrangement was one of the worst which the Government could enter into, looking at the future of the Maritime Provinces, although it might be that his views were not in harmony with those of hon. gentlemen sitting beside him. The road was connected with the great Gulf system, the St. Lawrence system, and the Intercolonial Railway, and, this being so, it was very ill-advised to hand it over from the Government to a private company. The whole coal system of Nova Scotia, and also the inter-provincial trade with the west would be affected by this line. If he stood alone, he would vote against the resolution. There was no responsibility upon the Government to extend the railway system of Nova Scotia, and the precedent would be a very embarrassing one for future Governments. He would rather see an additional penny a pound on tea, something additional on whiskey, or an additional  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. additional on all imports, in order to provide funds to enable the Government to go on with the extension themselves, rather than that the line should be given over to a private company. The policy, he held, was a most pernicious one. While he thought the Government were not amenable to reason or argument, but only to a vote which would leave them in a minority, he would oppose the measure at every stage.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member was too late in his objections, for the matter had already been settled. The arrangement had been made under the sanction of the House, and no hon. member at that time voted against the proposal.

Mr. MITCHELL said he never voted for it.

Mr. TUPPER said he was afraid the hon. gentlemen who had made the arrangement had a precedent established by the late Government, of which the hon. member for Northumberland was a member. The hon. member would remember that, before they left office, a similar question came before the late Government, and, after due deliberation, they arrived at the conclusion, which he still thought was a sound conclusion, that the interests of the country would be promoted by utilizing every branch railway for the purpose of extending the railway system. He held that the construction and operation of every mile of railway in the Dominion was a direct benefit to the Government. It was impossible to construct and operate a mile of railway in any section without increasing trade and business, and consequently revenue, and, therefore, the Government had an important object in view in taking measures which would increase the revenue. It was under that belief that the late Government established the policy of utilizing branches or sections of railway, not necessarily required in connection with the great trunk lines of communications, and why they gave the Western Counties Branch to any company which would extend the railway to Annapolis and Yarmouth. He was, therefore, quite prepared to approve of the policy of the Government. He would be glad if a clause similar to that adopted between the Governments of Nova Scotia and the Windsor and Annapolis road when a large subsidy was given by the Province towards the construction of the line, would be embraced in the present arrangement, by which the Government could, if they desired, at any time resume the possession of the road upon certain conditions.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said that, if the present or any Government would undertake to build the road to Canso, and to work it, it would be a profitable enterprise, but the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) would admit there was no great prospect of such a proposal obtaining the sanction of Parliament. The same principle applied with respect to the extension of the road from Newcastle to Canso as that under the late Government with regard to extending the road from Amherst to Yarmouth. There was no probability of receiving funds in Nova Scotia to construct a line to Canso. The people of Cape Breton naturally wanted communication with the capital by the shortest and most direct route. If the Government, by transferring the line, would enable an extension to be made to Canso, whereby the greatest facilities would be given to the people of Cape Breton, it would be a step in the right direction. He was satisfied that the people of Cape Breton and the eastern section of Nova Scotia would be greatly benefited by having the road constructed at once.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he looked upon the adoption of the resolution as a foregone conclusion. The arrangement was adopted by the House only about a year ago; it was not carried out by the Government, but by the good-will and sense of the House. In regard to the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland that the road from Shediac to St. John was transferred in a similar manner to a private company, he might remark that, if such was the decision of the House it was fully competent to take such action. He concurred with the view of the hon. member for St. John that, if it were possible to have the road extended to Louisburg, the natural and proper harbour on the American continent for communication between the two hemispheres, it would be desirable. At all events, they desired to get as far as possible, and, if they reached the Strait of Canso, it would assist in the extension of the road to a more distant point. He objected to the insinuations as to his conduct which had been thrown out by the hon. member for Northumberland, (Mr. Mitchell) and he challenged him to make his statements broadly and openly.

Mr. JONES.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland in his view of the question. He believed the Government should have retained possession of the road and extended it as a Government road to Louisburg, and he regretted that the hon. the Premier had not been able to carry out what was required, though he observed from some correspondence that the hon. gentleman had done all in his power to carry out the project. It was desirable that railway accommodation should be afforded to the people of Cape Breton, who had been deprived of it by the action of the Provincial Government. He understood that the hon. the Premier had used his utmost efforts for a time to utilize the Truro and Pictou Branch so as to secure that boon to the people of Cape Breton, but had yielded his views to those of Mr. Annand of the Local Government and assumed his share of responsibility. Although the population numbered about ninety thousand, they had no railway communication with the rest of the Dominion, from which they were entirely cut off. It would be well if the hon. the Premier could insert a clause in the Bill to give power to this or any future Government to re-acquire the road, and perhaps such an arrangement could be made with the company, even at this late day. He observed that a Minute of Council passed in February, 1876, provided for the building of the road to West Bay, a distance of sixteen or twenty miles on the other side of the Strait of Canso. Tenders were invited by the Local Government last summer with the view of carrying the road thirty-five miles on the other side of the Strait towards Louisburg, provided they obtained the rolling-stock of the Truro and Pictou Branch. He urged the Government to do so now and thus show their good intentions towards Cape Breton. When the road was carried 35 miles into Cape Breton it could be extended to Louisburg. The Government was giving away the road which cost three millions dollars for the purpose of having it extended to the Strait. If they refused to give a subsidy for a road from the Strait to Louisburg, he feared there would not be a railroad through the island for years to come. He hoped that the hon. the Premier would make renewed efforts to have the line pushed to a further point—to Louisburg.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had no intention of making insinuations against the hon. member for Inverness. He opposed the policy of the Administration on the ground that they proposed to surrender a great public work which formed a branch in the communication between Halifax and the west, which would be required in the future. In regard to the hon. member for Inverness, the press said he had a Judgeship in view. Our trade from Lake Erie to Halifax would be embarrassed by the fact that the Government had given to a private company one great link in the communication between Toronto and Halifax; and in the future the Government would be obliged to pay a large sum to re-acquire the property which they were now giving away.

Mr. KILLAM said he was very glad to hear his hon. friend from Cape Breton state that the Government had done all in their power to extend the railway as far as Louisburg. He had taken great interest in the matter from the first, and he had looked into it very thoroughly. The hon. member remarked that the Local Government of Nova Scotia was somewhat to blame for not having taken steps to extend the railway to Louisburg. He was not there to defend the Local Government, but he thought they had done all they could do under the circumstances. However, if the county of Cape Breton and the county of Sydney had made a grant to the extent of $200,000, the county of Richmond $60,000 or $70,000, the county of Antigonish about $100,000, the county of Pictou $200,000 and Halifax $400,000, which it had promised to the Nova Scotia Railway Company, and afterwards repudiated, a sufficiently large subsidy, in addition to what was already received, would have been obtained to build the railway to Louisburg. He only wondered that gentlemen who were so much interested in the road, and who were so anxious to see it built, had not thought of this before. He had brought it to their notice. The Government of Nova Scotia had offered for the construction of the line as large a subsidy in money, land, and minerals as possibly could be expected, and a much larger subsidy than any other Province had given to any railway corporation. He would like to ask the Minister of Public Works, with reference to the Windsor Branch transfer, what temporary arrangements had been made under the Act of 1874, for the working of the line until it was handed over to the West Counties Railway Company; and whether it was distinctly understood that these arrangements terminated when the road was so handed over. He believed that this company was nearly ready to take it over, as the line was about three-fourths completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was scarcely the time to ask such a question. The arrangement was simply that the old lease should continue, until the West Counties Railway Company would be in condition to take the road over. He had a recollection of the company wishing to get possession of the Windsor Branch, before any of their own line was in operation, but this he had declined to sanction. As soon as the road was completed to a point from which it could communicate, even by water, with Annapolis, there would be no objection, he thought, to the Government giving over the road to the West Counties Railway Company, and, when they were prepared to take it and work it under the terms of the Act, the lease would cease to be in operation with the Windsor and Annapolis Company.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he did not think that the people of the island of Cape Breton were entirely satisfied with the transfer of the road, by which the line would be only completed to the Strait of Canso. They had expected greater things at the hands of this and the late Government. But, as neither the one nor the other had seen fit to take the building of the road into their own hands, as far as the port of Louisburg, he presumed they would have to be content with what they had obtained, at any rate for the present. He did not think it wise on the part of this Government to allow the line to go out of their hands. It would have been far preferable, in his opinion, if this line had been undertaken as a Government work, but still the Government had not looked upon the question in this light; he could not but state, however, his appreciation of the earnestness and desire evinced by the Government, and more especially by the Premier, to have the road run as far as possible, and if practicable to the harbour of Louisburg. He did not think the Government looked upon the work from a sufficiently national point of view; and he believed they would, before long, consider the advisability of constructing the line to Louisburg, by means of which we would be brought some 180 miles nearer the northern country than now was the case. A great many arguments could be offered in favour of building the line to Louisburg, but he would not then dilate upon them; this was neither the time nor the occasion for doing so. He was rather amused to hear the hon. members for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and St. John (Mr. Palmer) state they were perfectly willing to have, and desirous of having, the public funds employed to build the line all the way to Louisburg. Why had not the hon. gentleman from Northumberland taken this course four or five years ago, when he could not only have expressed these views, but also produced some practical result. When a member of the late Government, the hon. gentleman should have advocated these views. If this had been done, he was very sure that little difficulty would have been experienced in having this line undertaken as a public work, from New Glasgow to the port of Louisburg. This was the first time he had understood that the hon. gentleman, either as a private member or as a member of the late Government, favoured the building of this line as a national Government work. The hon. member for St. John was also disposed to be very lavish of the country's money, and was of the same opinion as the hon. member for Northumberland. He perfectly agreed with the hon. member for St. John, but the hon. gentleman should have expressed these views when they would have had more weight. The transfer of the branch line was made with the express understanding that it was to be made use of for the purpose of completing the line eastward towards Louisburg. He believed that this was inserted in the Minute of Council. He understood, however, that it was now contemplated to divert the line from the direct easterly course to a southern direction, in order to serve certain local interests. On behalf of his constituency, which was perhaps the most wealthy, and certainly the most populous, as well as the most easterly portion of the island of Cape Breton, he protested against any deviation from the direct line. The deviation in question would also lengthen the distance between the contemplated terminus and the town of New Glasgow. It would also be very detrimental to the future prospects of the port of Louisburg. The Government had agreed to hand over this line and, on this understanding, the contractors had begun operations. Under the circumstances he thought that, after all, not a great deal would be said against this arrangement at present. He regretted that this had not been made a national work, but at the same time the Government, and the Premier especially, had endeavoured to have the line built all the way to Louisburg, with the aid of the resources placed in their hands by the vote of the House.

MR. MACKAY.

Mr. MITCHELL said he wished to correct one or two statements made by the hon. member (Mr. MacKay). He would distinctly state that, when a Minister of the Crown, he had never sanctioned such a transfer of this line, as far as he was aware; if it was done, he had no recollection of it. He could not remember that the late Government had ever compromised themselves as to the giving up of the Pictou and Truro Branch extension eastward to the Strait of Canso. Of one thing he was positive—if any such proposition was made, he opposed it. He had always thought that the Government should have built the Pictou and Truro Branch as an integral part of the Intercolonial Railway, and of the water system rom the St. Lawrence to the great port of Halifax. The hon. gentleman had chosen to allude to his statement that he would rather have had the Government come down and ask for the necessary sum of money, even if it involved some additional taxation, to build the road to the Strait of Canso than to see given up this branch, which he looked upon as an important arterial point connecting the St. Lawrence system with the Dominion system. The hon. gentleman asked why he did not advocate this view when a member of the late Government. But he had never pretended that he had held that the Government should do this. He had, however, said that rather than see the Government give up the Pictou and Truro line, so important in his opinion as a means of intercolonial communication, he would prefer to have money voted for the extension of the road eastward to the Strait of Canso; but he had never for a moment contended that the Government should build this road. He desired, as much as anyone, to see the island of Cape Breton, one of the most fertile and valuable portions of the Dominion, secure railway communication, and every facility the country could reasonably afford to extend to it, with due consideration for other parts of the Dominion, but he did not think that the hon. gentleman had had any particular claims on the late Government, or any reason to ask them to do more than they did for the island of Cape Breton. The island under the late Administration had received its fair share of public improvements, and he thought it came with bad grace from any hon. gentleman to say that the late Government had failed in the performance of any duty which devolved upon them in this regard. He would vote against the resolution if he so voted alone.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he was glad to see that railway communication was being extended, even as far as the Strait of Canso; but he would like to see the railway built as far as Louisburg, which had a fine harbour, open all the year round. This might fairly be considered a national intercolonial work. He quite agreed with what had been said by the hon. member for Northumberland with regard to the giving up of the Pictou and Truro road. He thought that this was a great mistake. Almost all the coal from the coal-fields of Pictou would pass over this line, which, he presumed, was the best paying portion of the Intercolonial Railway. The Government was undertaking to give up a road which had cost two and a half millions of dollars; to a line which was entirely local, and he only hoped that in future when application was made for assistance to Provincial branch railways, the Government would not say they had nothing to do with undertakings of an entirely Provincial character.

Mr. KIRK said the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) should have advocated the extending of a railway from New Glasgow to Louisburg as a Government work when the question came before the Parliament in 1874. When it was found that, owing to the financial condition of the country, the Government could not possibly afford to build the road to Louisburg, the next best thing was to accept the present arrangements. This branch was only forty miles in length, and its transfer had secured the construction of eighty additional miles of road, giving railway accommodation to over 150,000 people. The road would consequently not be thrown away. The Government had taken the necessary precautions to see that the line would be properly worked, and, if this was not done as cheaply as the Government could do it, at all events 150,000 people would be accommodated, and the Government consequently deserved great credit for the course taken.

Mr. DAVIES said that Prince Edward Island desired a complete railway system. He could see no objection to the action of the Government in this connection. It was very well known that the Government had laid it down as their fixed policy not to give subsidies towards railways in the Provinces, and this being the case, railway extension to the Strait of Canso could not be secured without some such inducement as that proposed. This was not part of a main road, but simply a branch. Of course, any company building an eastern extension would not allow the road to lie idle, and, if the road was extended to Louisburg, and this was to be the point for the embarkation of passengers, it would be the interest of the company, as much as it would be the interest of the Government, to keep the line open. They knew that these roads were a very great charge on the revenue, and he did not doubt that these fifty-two miles of railway caused a loss of at least $250 a mile annually, and consequently the public would not suffer, but be the gainers by the transfer.

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill (No. 82) To authorize the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway to the person or company constructing a line of railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, and providing a proper ferry across the Strait.

Mr. TUPPER said he would suggest that the hon. the First Minister should consider the point raised about inserting a clause to empower the Government to resume possession of the road on certain conditions. His own impression was that no objection would be made to such a clause, and it could do no possible harm.

Mr. MITCHELL said he could see no possible object for the clause. It was either right to give away the road or it was wrong. It was his impression that it was a very impolitic step to take—that it was in fact suicidal, and was going to lead to great embarrassment in the future.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he thought it would be dangerous to insert such a clause as had been suggested. They had passed a resolution already in accordance with the Bill and arrangements had been made to carry out the agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter could be considered before the Bill arrived at its next stage. He would, however, make no promise. His impression was that it would be very difficult to insert such a clause just now.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he was very much interested in the welfare of the people of the Lower Provinces, and he did not think that they were going to be benefitted by the steps which the Government proposed to take. He did not think it wise to give away the Truro and Pictou Branch. If a road could not be built in any other way he would have been favourable to a reasonable subsidy, but to take that branch railway and hand it over to a private corporation which had not shown its ability to fulfil its agreement, was, to say the least, imprudent. The hon. the First Minister said the road would cost $2,500,000. Well, suppose it did. A great many railroads required a little assistance, and this was just as much entitled to a subsidy as any other.

Bill read the first time.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS BILL.—[BILL No. 65.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said the Bill explained itself tolerably well. It was one to make general provision for the carrying out of all Extradition Treaties made, or to be made, between Great Britain and foreign states, extending to Canada. There had been for a great many years a measure on the Statute-book relating to extradition so far as the United States was concerned. Attempts to repeal that Act had been made during several Sessions since its passage, but up to this time there had been no effective legislation on the subject. It was expected that the negotiations which had been so long pending with the United States would result in the conclusion of a new convention. In that event the law now on the Statute-book, which was enacted with special reference to the stipulations of the Ashburton Treaty, would at once cease to be operative, and we would be thrown upon the Imperial Act of 1870, which had been recognized in the Legislature of this country on more than one occasion, as inadequate to our peculiar condition. It therefore seemed essential, in view of the probability of the Ashbur-ton Treaty being superseded by a new convention, that this Session should not pass without the enactment of a law which should be operative with reference to that convention. The general lines of the Bill were taken from the Imperial Act of 1870, with several improvements suitable to the circumstances of Canada. The procedure was simplified and made more elastic. There was no condition whatever for preliminary or diplomatic proceedings on the part of the Government, but, following out the lines of the old Act of the Province of Canada, the procedure was entirely judicial until the time arrived at which the magistrate determined whether the prisoner should be committed for extradition. Then the case came before the Government for consideration, and, upon the requisition of the foreign state being received, it was determined whether the warrant should go for the surrender of the prisoner or not. The more complicated double procedure of the Imperial Act, which was entirely unsuited for this country, was not followed out. Upon points which had recently come very prominently into controversy between Great Britain and the United States, the measure did not propose any new departure. It was not, however, in this particular, precisely what he would have desired had he been proposing a measure under other circumstances. But it was not thought expedient, in view of pending negotiations, to propose any departure from the lines of the Imperial Act. Therefore, with reference to dealing with political offences, the provision was similar to that in the Imperial Act. It prescribed that no man should be surrendered for a political offence if it appeared that his surrender was sought in order that he should be tried for some other offence. With reference to the freedom from immunity or prosecution in Canada of persons surrendered by a foreign State, the provision was an elastic one. It was to the effect that no person should be tried for any other offence than that for which he had been extradited. It provided that the stipulations of the convention should be observed and that a prisoner should not be liable to prosecution contrary to the treaty. That was as far as it was deemed prudent to go. Should legislation take place in Great Britain, looking to a general law on this subject, it would be necessary that our law should harmonize with it; but the Government did not think it would be properly discharging its duty without introducing a law which could go into effect the moment the Extradition Treaty was made with the United States, as he hoped it shortly would be.

Bill read the second time.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 67.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the amendments were those which had been proposed mainly by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, which, as hon. gentlemen would remember, had occasioned considerable discussion. He proposed that no company should go into the business of borrowing money until it had a paid-up capital of $100,000 at least, and that it should not borrow more than four times the amount of its paid-up capital. The Bill would be similar to the Ontario and the English Bills, in that companies could take advantage of the general law more than now, instead of being under the necessity of securing Private Bills when they required to change their names. Power would also be given—the clause being taken from the Ontario Act—to allow Supplementary Letters Patent, extending the powers of the company in any provisions which came within the lawful purview of the Act. There were also certain provisions introduced with respect to the word “limit.” There had been some trouble to get minor details in order to facilitate the incorporation of companies, but those had better be discussed in the Select Committee.

Bill read the second time.

House adjourned at

Ten minutes after
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 15th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright for the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Wood in amendment to the said proposed amendment, read.

Mr. MILLS said he had noticed that several hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, while discussing the original motion and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kingston, said that they did not involve any question of free trade or protection—that these questions were apart from the motions which were at present before the House, and that the question, at all events the amendment of the hon. member for Kingston, should be considered quite independent of any consideration of that sort. He had noticed, however, that the hon. member for Kingston did not himself take that view; and he observed that this debate had taken a very wide range, and that, not only had every conceivable question connected with the finances of the country been discussed, but also every conceivable question connected with the present Administration. He did not himself make any objection to the discussion taking this very wide range. He thought, when the amendments made involved the question of want of confidence in the Administration, that it was not wholly foreign to the motion before the House, whatever might be the words embraced in that motion, to consider the general policy of that Administration; and he thought that, when the House was called upon to vote want of confidence in the Government for the time being, they had also before them the question as to what would be likely to be the policy of their opponents were they successful in displacing them on the Treasury benches. They were therefore called upon, he thought very properly, to consider many questions besides those involved in the motion itself. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) gave the House, the other evening, a glowing eulogy upon his own consistency as a public man in connection with this question. That hon. gentleman, in fact, pointed out what he (Mr. Mills) thought most hon. members knew before, that he (Mr. Masson) was content in his consistency—that he was prepared to follow where the hon. member for Kingston might lead. The hon. gentleman told the House that he was not a new convert to the principle of protection—that he was, in fact, an old stager in this respect, that he had considered the subject for a long time, that he had stated it in all its bearings, and that he had long ago come to the conclusion that a protection policy was a policy in the interest of the country. The hon. gentleman told the House what the hon. member for Kingston had advocated in a speech made at Toronto in 1872. The hon. gentleman told the House how the hon. member for Kingston had then—and he read extracts from the speech made at that time—at so early a period in his political career propounded to the people of Canada a protective tariff. The hon. gentleman said that that proposition met with his approval at the time, and that he had always had a very great deal of confidence in the hon. member for Kingston from that time forth.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MASSON: I did not say that. My confidence in the hon. member for Kingston does not date from 1872.

Mr. MILLS said then he was to understand that the hon. gentleman had confidence in the hon. member for Kingston before he propounded a protective policy, and quite, apart from any consideration of that sort. That was not the impression that the speech of the hon. gentleman on Tuesday evening was calculated to leave upon the minds of hon. members of this House, although he thought, if they looked closely into what the hon. gentleman said, they would see that what he now said after all fairly and accurately represented his opinions, that, contrary to what he recently said, he would, as he had before 1872, support the member for Kingston, protection or no protection. The hon. gentleman said it was quite true that the hon. member for Kingston did not undertake to give effect to this policy—that he had practically abandoned it after the elections of 1872 were over; but he told the House that the hon. member for Kingston was quite justified in that course—that a Committee of the House had been appointed on the application of one of the hon. members for Hamilton, which reported that the various branches of manufacturing industries of Canada were in a prosperous condition, and that being in a prosperous condition the hon. member (Sir John A. Macdonald) was quite justified in not proposing a protective policy for the consideration of Parliament. But the hon. gentleman said there was an entirely different condition of things at the present time—that there was a deficiency in the public revenue, that our Customs duties were not so large as they ought to be, that we were deriving less revenue from this source than we ought to obtain, and that, that being the case, he (Mr. Masson) declared that a protective policy ought to be pursued at this moment. This seemed to be the rather inconsequential line of argument of the hon. gentleman. What was his (Mr. Masson's) position? It was this: that the revenue had largely fallen off. Why? Because the importations had decreased; there were fewer goods imported into Canada than in 1872 and 1873; that, in fact, the diminution of importations showed that our commercial men—our traders and the consumers, not our manufacturers—were in a less prosperous condition than they were three or four years ago. This class being in a less prosperous condition, the amount of the imports having fallen off, the hon. gentleman proposed that an increased tax should be imposed on this diminished importation, by which the imports would be further diminished, and by which we would obtain less revenue than we did before. When they looked closely at the statement of the hon. gentleman, they would find that it could hardly be considered a logical one. The hon. gentleman proposed a tax on a certain branch of industry. He said the interests of importers of goods were seriously affected by the depressed condition of trade, that their profits were diminished, that bankruptcy had increased among them, and that, therefore, the House should impose a tax upon the importations in order that a larger revenue might be obtained, and to the end that other branches of industry might be benefitted. The hon. gentleman complained that the Government had not declared its policy; he stated what the views of a gentleman who was not a member of the House were. He said Mr. Joly was a Protectionist, and that, because that gentleman was a Protectionist, either the Government was seriously wrong in offering him a seat in the Cabinet, or Mr. Joly was acting very improperly in not becoming a member of the Administration. Unless this was the conclusion the hon. gentleman intended to draw, he (Mr. Mills) did not see how it was germane to the question before the House. The hon. member complained that the Government had obtained power without having explained its policy to the country. He (Mr. Mills) told the hon. gentleman that his leader, the hon. member for Kingston, declared that it was perjury on the part of a Minister to make known his views to his constituents. It was, of course, improper to allude to a debate which had taken place during the present Session, but the hon. member for Kingston made this statement two or three years ago, and it might be properly referred to now. When His Excellency's Speech was read to the House, the hon. member for Kingston complained that it was improper for a Minister to indicate to the public what his views were on great public questions—that those should only be made known in Parliament, and he pointed out the fact that the London Spectator had censured Mr. Gladstone for going before the public with a well-defined policy, one that they understood, and one of which he asked them either to approve or disapprove. The hon. member for Kingston had laid down a constitutional doctrine out of joint with the times,—a doctrine which might have some value when Glasgow had less than thirty electors and Manchester had none at all; but it was noticeable that the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) differed from his leader, both as to facts and principles. That was the position they had taken. Ministers held it was important that an Administration should have a policy, and they thought it was equally important that the hon. gentlemen opposite should have one. These gentlemen were seeking to supersede them; they said the Ministry was not entitled to the public confidence, and it was not only important that these hon. gentlemen should make out a fair case, but they should also show that they were entitled to the public confidence. These hon. gentlemen should be prepared to state more definitely than did the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston what their views were on this important question. The hon. gentleman called for economy; he said the Government were not sufficiently economical; and he held that they should not begin to economize by reducing the public expenditure of the country. The hon. gentleman said they should begin in other quarters. In fact, like the hon. member for Cardwell, he censured the conduct of those he now associated with and supported, for what they did shortly before their retirement from office. These gentlemen had made numerous appointments—374 to offices wholly new. They added to the salaries of 973 others. The salaries of the new officials amounted to $147,353, and the increases to $104,861—making in all an additional expenditure of $252,214. He thought that the advice given with regard to economy was good advice, and that the Government would perhaps be open to censure if they failed to act upon it. He hoped that this would be so fully considered that these hon. gentlemen would have no reason to complain of the conduct of the Administration in this particular at a later period. The hon. gentleman told them that his hon. friends behind him, who were from Quebec, had a leader in the House and a leader out of the House. So had the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman had a leader in the House, the hon. member for Kingston, and a leader out of the House in the Province of Quebec, who was now seeking re-election in the county of Charlevoix. He knew the hon. gentleman might not have a great deal of admiration for his leader out of the House, but he knew that this gentleman had made vigorous efforts to maintain his position. That gentleman had received from a public contractor 32,000 good reasons, worth a dollar each, to enable him to maintain his position.

Mr. MASSON rose to a question of order. He said he thought that the hon. gentleman should not refer to the subject of the $32,000 concerning Mr. Langevin, who was not in the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said such a question of order usually affected only members of the House.

Mr. MILLS said that charity covered a multitude of sins and the hon. gentleman had a great deal of charity. No doubt the hon. gentleman was anxious to conceal the faults of the gentleman who had led him so long and so successfully. The hon. gentleman had assured them that the Government's acts were wholly wrong during the present period of depression. The hon. gentleman held they should increase the expenditure. The hon. gentleman's theory was that, the more straitened your circumstances, the more extravagant you should be; the more impoverished the people for the time being, the more necessary it was to increase their burdens. The hon. gentleman told them that our expenditure was not like the expenditure of the people of the United States; that theirs was an entirely different expenditure; that it was proper enough for them to undertake to pay off expenditure incurred and undertaken to prevent the dissolution of their country, because that expenditure was incurred for very improper, or at all events for unproductive, purposes; but that our expenditure was wholly different, relating as it did to public works, and that our public works were going to be exceedingly productive; that this would both directly and indirectly contribute largely to the wealth and prosperity of this country; and, therefore, that we ought to expend money without stint or without any hesitation. He did not altogether subscribe to the views of the hon. gentleman. It seemed to him that, when we would have to borrow money to expend on these public works, and would have interest to pay, all of which must necessarily increase our burdens, we ought to be at least in some degree certain that we would be enabled to meet our increased liabilities, and that it was not the best period to become extravagant when our circumstances became straitened. The hon. gentleman said that posterity ought to bear these burdens, and that we ought to shift the load to the shoulders of those who came after us. He would remind the hon. gentleman of the observation made under similar circumstances by the Rev. Sydney Smith: "While we are in charge of the ship, we can make her sail as we please; we can give directions to those that are under us. We have the right to control the vessel as we please, but when we leave it, and when others have taken possession of it, we may leave them as much good advice as we please, but we ought not to leave them commands." This was his opinion with regard to the policy which the hon. gentleman recommended to them. He thought it was their business to see that they would, at all events within a reasonable period, be able to meet the liabilities which they themselves incurred. He did not know that the hon. gentleman claimed to be a Communist, or that he advocated communism openly and avowedly; but the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman was communistic. The hon. gentleman said the Government was responsible for the hard times, and that when people were out of employment it was the business of the Government to find and give them employment. The hon. gentleman said: Why hundreds of people will be thrown out of employment if the public works are not carried on as extensively during a period of depression as during a period of comparative prosperity. The hon. gentleman held they were responsible if they did not give employment to these people, and that, if the Government only paid them money, they would be enabled not only to support themselves and their families by what they obtained from the Public Treasury, but also that he would somehow or other be enabled to increase the balance which they did not consume to such an extent as to give back into the Public Treasury more than they had received. The position of the hon. gentleman was this, that parts were not only greater than the whole, but also that any one part was greater than the whole; the balance unexpended, that those people by economy might be able to save from their earnings for the purpose of purchasing for consumption of goods imported into the country, would yield to the Public Treasury more than they were paid for wages upon Public Works, undertaken at the public expense. The hon. gentleman told them to look how France prospered by a policy of protection. He referred especially to the duties on sugar imposed in France. But it was not the protective policy of France that built up her sugar industry, but it was the navy of England. The French ports were blockaded. It was not the Government of France or the decrees of the Emperor Napoleon, but the Government of England who blockaded the ports of France, and who made it impossible for the French people to import sugar. Necessity compelled them to provide that for themselves which they could have obtained more profitably under other circumstances from the West Indies. He would first state a fact to the hon. gentleman, which, if questioned, he would be able to establish beyond the possibility of being controverted. It was this—if the money that the French people had paid in the form of protective duties on sugars were invested at five cent., it would purchase one-third more sugar than the whole French Republic produced at this moment. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) said they ought to adopt a National Policy. He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman. He thought we should adopt a National Policy; and that we were numerous enough and had self-respect enough to adopt a policy that might properly be entitled a National Policy; but he did not think that the peddling policy recommended to this House by the hon. gentlemen opposite was such a policy. He contended they should legislate for the whole people. A policy which provided for the singling out of not two per cent. of the population of this country for special legislation was not entitled to the appellation of a National Policy. It was an abuse of terms to apply so dignified a term as National Policy to a policy of this sort. The hon. gentlemen proposed a few cents duty on coal, a few cents duty on corn, and a few cents duty on flour, and they called this a National Policy. It was a policy which might injuriously affect many, and which would benefit very few. It was very difficult to classify the hon. gentlemen opposite. They knew the difficulties naturalists found sometimes with regard to different classes of plants, which gradually shaded into each other. Now, these hon. gentlemen, while quite agreed that the tariff was all wrong, and that the policy which ought to be adopted also ought to be in some respects protective, were not at all agreed as to the grounds upon which they asked for the change or what the change should be. The hon. member from Kingston told them he was a Free-trader in the abstract. He was not metaphysician enough to tell, and the hon. gentleman had not condescended to explain to the House, what he meant by it. He was sure that if the hon. gentleman said that morality was all right in the abstract but that it was not right in practice, he would be speaking about as rationally as when he talked about protection being right in the abstract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say that.

Mr. MILLS said he corrected himself. He meant to say free trade; because he should remember that the hon. gentleman was always inconsistent. Could there be free trade without articles in which trade could be carried on. When you had no commodities and interchange of commodities, he supposed you had no trade; and you could not have free trade in the abstract. They could have an imaginary line in geometry; and Plato told them that they ought to study astronomy without stars; but how they could have free trade in the abstract and not in the concrete, was altogether beyond his comprehension. The hon. member for South Ontario told them he was an admirer of a free-trade policy, or of what he called the modified free-trade policy of 1854. This was the period of reciprocity. If he understood the hon. gentleman aright, he said that if we had reciprocity with the United States he would become a supporter and advocate of that reciprocity, and he would prefer reciprocity to protection.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): Yes; certainly.

Mr. MILLS: Then I correctly understood the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GIBBS: Allow me to put the hon. gentleman right on another point. When I spoke of modified free trade, I did not speak of the policy of 1854, but of the policy of Sir Alexander Galt, introduced in 1858-9.

Mr. MILLS said he understood the hon. gentleman to refer to the policy of Sir Alexander Galt as a policy of modified free trade. The hon. gentleman also expressed himself in favour of the policy of 1854, and told them how under that policy manufacturing industries sprang up.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): I did not speak of 1854. I spoke of the policy of Sir Alexander Galt in 1858-9 when manufactures sprang up and prospered.

Mr. MILLS said he certainly understood the hon. gentleman to say also that these manufacturing industries sprang up under the policy of 1854.

Mr. GIBBS: No, I did not.

Mr. MILLS asked if he understood the hon. gentleman to maintain that manufacturing industries did not prosper between 1854 and 1865.

Mr. GIBBS: I argued that they prospered under the policy of Sir Alexander Galt and not before that. Previously, we had very few manufactures in the country. Under that policy, manufacturers commenced operations and under that policy manufactures did prosper. I hope I have now made myself sufficiently intelligible.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman, then, having expressed himself in favour of reciprocity, could not argue that we could not fairly or successfully compete with the Americans, or that in consequence of superior wealth they would be able to crush out our manufactures, if we had absolute free trade with the United States. The hon. gentleman's position was wholly different from that of the hon. gentleman who had spoken on the other side of the House, who maintained that we were not in a position to compete with the manufacturers of the United States; that we required protection; that protection was a good thing in itself; that it brought the purchaser and consumer near together; that it did away with the cost of transportation upon goods interchanged, and that, under such a policy, not only were population and capital augmented, but that the whole country was more prosperous than it would otherwise be. The hon. gentleman was precluded from taking that position. If he understood aright, the hon. gentleman favoured a policy of retaliation, and urged that we should do towards the United States what they did towards us. The hon. gentleman asked the Government to discriminate against the people of the United States, or, in other words, to adopt a retaliatory policy of which the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had been for many years the exponent in the House.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): The exigencies of our position require us to adopt that particular line.

Mr. MILLS said then the hon. gentleman, as he understood it, withdrew his position, and said that free trade would not be a good thing, and that the exigencies of our position made it absolutely necessary that we should have a protective policy whether we got reciprocity or not. The hon. gentleman referred to Sir Alexander Galt, and spoke in very strong terms of the ability of that gentleman, and he read a letter from him in order to place his opinions before the House.

He (Mr. Mills) must say that he was not an admirer of authorities; he considered it of more importance to look at facts and reason than at the ipse dixit of any man, however able or eminent. He admitted, however, that the opinions of Sir Alexander Galt, being as he was for many years the Finance Minister of Canada, were entitled to a great deal of consideration. Since the hon. gentleman was a worshipper of authority, he would read to him an extract from the Budget speech of Sir Alexander Galt of 1866, and this was at a period when the Government were called upon to consider whether or not they should adopt a protective policy. The hon. gentleman at that time might fairly be taken as speaking not only his own views but the views of the hon. member for Kingston. At that time, the hon. member for Kingston was not a Free-trader in the abstract but a Free-trader in the concrete. Sir Alexander Galt at that time spoke as follows:—

"I think it must be admitted we have a choice between two systems. We have the choice of the American system or of the European. The making of that choice I do not think we can well postpone. I do not see how we are to avoid the difficulty we now experience. If we take the United States system of protective duties, of protecting every branch of industry, we shall, to a certain extent, assimilate our system with theirs—a course which I do not think the people of this country would approve. On the other hand, if we adopt what I call the European system—because the policy of England is now being generally adopted by other European countries—if we adopt that system as opposed to the American system, then, I think, we shall stand in the position of offering to the people and the capital, which for various causes are now seeking new homes and employment, a country possessing more advantages than any other on the continent. I do not believe that the United States can continue for any great length of time to absorb the redundant population of Europe, subject as they are to very high rates of taxation. If, on the other hand, we in Canada, or, I would rather say, in British North America, are able to offer these people land of equal fertility, and at least equal security for life and property, and if, at the same time we can show them that every article that enters into ordinary consumption can be bought very much cheaper here than in the United States, I think we may reasonably hope to be able to attract to our shores much of that immigration which of recent years has swelled more than anything else the wealth and prosperity of the neighbouring Republic. We are entering on a new state of political existence. If there is any prominent feature in the future we have designed for ourselves, it is the establishment of a separate and distinct nationality; and this can only be accomplished in one way. If we are in every respect to copy the policy of our neighbours across the line of 45°, the natural course would be to become one with them. But if, on the other hand, we believe, as we do all believe, that the continent of North America is sufficiently extensive for two nations, two empires, then it is time that, taking lessons from the great authorities on political economy who have shed light on the commercial transactions of Europe during the last few years, we should endeavour to so adjust our system that we may be able to invite immigrants here, telling them that this is a better country, and governed by wiser principles, than the country along our borders."

To show that there could be no doubt as to the views entertained by Sir Alexander Galt at the time as to the impolicy of retaining a system of incidental protection, he (Mr. Mills) would read the concluding paragraph of that Budget speech :

"Finally, I think it will be well if in the last session of the Provincial Parliament of Canada, we shall have been able to approximate in some measure to that system of political economy which is bearing such magnificent fruits in the mother country—to remove some of the burdens which weigh on the industry of the people, and to open new markets for their products."

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) : Sir Alexander Galt said in 1875 he was tired of it.

Mr. MILLS said he had seen no statement of Sir Alexander Galt's that was wholly irreconcilable with the views he expressed in 1866.

Mr. GIBBS : There it is.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman would have an opportunity of answering him during the debate. Sir Alexander Galt not only expressed these views in 1866 but in 1870, and, when the Postmaster-General introduced a resolution for more extended commercial relations with the United States, the hon. gentleman deprecated any attempt at what he called an "unwise and unstatesmanlike course" which the hon. gentlemen were advocating at that time. Every one in the House remembered the fierce attack made upon Sir A. T. Galt, then the member for Sherbrooke, by the hon member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper),—how he denounced the hon. member, and how the hon. member for Kingston later on fiercely denounced the policy which the hon. member for Sherbrooke of that day recommended. The hon. member for Sherbrooke told the House that a more unwise and unstatesmanlike course could not well be conceived than that which was recommended. The hon. member for South Ontario said that the Government had now adopted a "cringing" policy towards the United States, that it was not an open or a manly policy, that it was a policy dictated not by courage but by cowardice. If the hon. gentleman could show that it was in the interests of this country to change the tariff in the direction he indicated, and that nothing else would so extend the commerce of Canada, he (Mr. Mills) would be a convert; but the hon. gentleman did nothing of the sort. The hon. gentleman mistook assertion for facts. He had not given the House a single fact which would go to show that the policy he recommended would contribute to the prosperity of the country, or even to the prosperity of any class of our population. To speak of a "cringing" policy was rather a strong expression to be used by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman seemed to have forgotten what happened in 1872. He seemed to have forgotten that a treaty was then negotiated by a Commission at Washington, the hon. member for Kingston being one of the Commissioners. He seemed to have forgotten the terms and provisions of that treaty; he seemed to have forgotten that he himself advocated, supported, and defended those provisions. It was a very tender subject for the hon. gentleman to touch upon. If there was any subject which he (Mr. Mills) would be disposed to avoid, under those circumstances, had he taken the course of the hon. gentleman, it would be a discussion of our relations with the United States. He would rather discuss any question, whether theoretical or practical. The hon. gentleman seemed to have forgotten that the navigation of the St. Lawrence was conceded to the United States contrary to the express promise made by the English Government. Earl Grey expressly pledged the word of the English Government that the navigation of the St. Lawrence would not be conceded to the United States without the sanction of the Parliament of Canada. But that promise was disregarded. The hon. member for Kingston was supposed to sit on the Commission as the guardian of the interests of this country, but he seemed to forget that there was any such a country as Canada at all. If the treaties of any other country similarly situated were looked into, it would be found that the navigation of rivers was reciprocal. If the people above had the right to use the river below, so had the people below the same right to use the river above. The rights of the riparian proprietors were mutual. The people of Chicago and Milwaukee could use the St. Lawrence for all time, but we were only allowed to use the tributary streams running into the United States for ten years. Then the hon. gentleman secured the right to navigate certain rivers in Alaska. It so happened that we had this right for all time by virtue of a treaty with Russia. This right was conceded by yielding to Russia the disputed territory on the coast. The United States, therefore, acquired the country subject to this right. But, by the Washington Treaty, the United States had the right to use the rivers in British Territory conceded to her, which Russia had not, while we did not secure any rights which we had not before. The hon. gentleman obtained a promise from the Americans to use their influence to secure the use of the canals in the United States contiguous to our frontier, for which he conceded to the United States the right to navigate not only any canal in any part of the Dominion then built, but any which might be built in the future, however far they might be from the frontier. The hon. member for South Ontario at that time had an opportunity of showing his interest in the welfare of this country, but he then really supported the interests of the people of the United States. And now, when the interests of Canada were not to be promoted by a certain policy, he proposed to be very courageous. The hon. gentleman told the House that the present Government had ruined the sugar trade of Canada.

Mr. MILLS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS: The hon. member for Kingston says: "Hear, hear:" it is to be trusted that he will hear and understand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have tried to understand my hon. friend for a long time, but have failed.

Mr. MILLS said it was a very important element in coming to a right conclusion that the matter should be sufficiently considered. He had listened very frequently to what was said by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question, but he had never yet been able to hear a single statement of facts which went to establish the position which they took on this matter. When the sugar question was under the consideration of a Special Committee of the House—and he certainly had no prejudice against the sugar refiners of Canada—a Mr. Drummond appeared on behalf of the single existing sugar refinery in this country. Mr. Drummond made two or three statements which the Committee had an opportunity of looking into. One statement of Mr. Drummond was that sugars of an inferior grade paid higher duties than those of higher grades. The Committee took the Trade and Navigation Returns and looked at the prices at which they were entered at ports of entry, and they did not find that the evidence which they obtained at all supported the statements made by that gentleman. It was found that sugars below number 9 paid, when the duties were reduced, an average ad valorem duty of 39 per cent., and from 9 to 13, an average duty of 43 per cent., and then from 13 upwards an average duty of 44 per cent. And so it was not found that the inferior grades paid a higher duty than the higher grades. And the statement made by that gentleman was, in regard to the duties of the United States, that the drawback to the sugar refiners was really a bounty. So far as could be ascertained the facts did not seem to warrant that statement. He (Mr. Mills) had looked at almost everything which had appeared on the question in this country, whether published originally here or copied from foreign newspapers, and he found nothing which tended to establish that proposition.

Mr. FARROW: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he had seen the quotations from the Manchester Sugar Cane in his Committee.

Mr. MILLS said he had seen the article referred to, which he understood was written by Mr. Drummond, but which in no respect controverted what the Depression Committee stated in their report last year. He would refer to sugars from Nos. 7 to 10. The American Commissioners said that the refiners produced out of 100 lb. raw material 70 lb. of white sugar which would pay a duty of 3c. per lb.—which was $2.10 for the 70 lb.; 13½ lb. of yellow refined sugar of inferior quality, which would pay a duty of 2½c., which would be a total duty of 33¾c.; and besides 11½ lb. or one gallon of syrup, which would pay 6½c. duty. In all, these articles, if exported from the United States, would receive a total drawback of $2.50. That was a sum exactly equal to the duty paid on 100 lb. imported in the raw state. The only way the American refiners could obtain a bounty upon the sugar that they exported was by producing a larger quantity of refined sugar than was here stated. It had been stated by Mr. Drummond, and the statement had been repeated in the House that they received a bounty of 55 cents on the 100 lb. raw. If this were so, they must obtain upon the product of 100 lb. raw material, ranging from 7 to 10 Dutch standard, $3.05. Now, the highest amount allowed as a drawback was 3c. per lb. upon those varieties of white coffee sugar, which was the best sugar that could be made from the inferior grades of raw sugar. Now, 101½ lb. of white sugar would be necessary to produce a drawback of $3.05 at 3c. per lb.; but it was impossible to get this quantity out of 100 lb. of raw. Surely no hon. member would be so devoted to the principles of protection as to say that this could be done. Supposing that the proportions of the inferior qualities were such as the American refiners and American commissioners said they were, it would be necessary that they should produce 88 lb. of refined white sugar, 13½ lb. inferior quality and 11½ lb. of syrup to obtain $3.05; or in other words it would be necessary to produce 112½ lb. of sugar and molasses out of 100 lb. of raw. This, no hon. gentleman would believe to be possible. No. If the duty were distributed proportionally for the grades, 116½ lb. would have to be produced out of 100 lb. of raw sugar in order to give a bounty of 55c. He believed there was but one way in which it was possible to obtain a bounty, and that not of such an amount as had been represented in the House. It was well known by those who had examined into the qualities of raw sugar that the centrifugal sugars of the West Indies contained about 98 per cent. of pure saccharine matter or crystallizable sugar; some perhaps as high as 99 per cent. Those sugars had never been imported here, but they were unquestionably the best for the consumer. The crystallizable matter was certainly, if they were to accept the testimony of chemists, of superior quality to that found in inferior grades. Sugars were imported into the United States and Canada by colour. It was said in some instances the superior grades might be coloured so as to be imported into the country as inferior grades, and consequently pay a smaller duty than they otherwise would have done, but that never could make much more than 10 per cent. upon the amount of sugar of superior quality that would be obtained, while, of course, there was a proportionate diminution of sugar of inferior quality; thus, it would make at most 4c. or 5c. on the hundred weight, between importing this sugar and the sugar of inferior quality. He observed that the opinion of Secretary Bristowe had been referred to, to show that it was an irregular system to levy duties by colour, and that they should be levied on the amount or quality of crystallizable material contained in the sugar. That statement had been put forward by Mr. Dunstan, and he (Mr. Mills) was perfectly certain that no one who considered the question would think that it was a fair or proper system in the interest of the consumers. He would endeavour to make the point more plain to the apprehension of the House. The sugars that were formerly refined by Messrs. Redpath & Co., and such sugars as were imported from Greenock in Scotland, did not contain more than 83 per cent. of crystallizable sugar, while the centrifugal sugars of the West Indies contained as high as 98 per cent., and the duty paid by each would be in the same proportion, thus there would be charged the same duty upon the white refined sugar as upon the raw centrifugal sugar imported from the West Indies. If such a policy were adopted, it would completely exclude from consumption in the country all raw sugars of high values. If the Government should interfere at all in the interest of the people with the view of excluding some of the varieties and including others, their object should rather be to exclude the inferior varieties that entered into consumption than those of superior quality. The hon. member for South Ontario had alluded to Sir Alexander Galt's policy of what he called modified free trade. The hon. gentleman had used that expression in one sense while Sir Alexander Galt used it in an entirely different sense; the hon. member had used it in the sense of increased duties, in the sense of increased protection. Sir Alexander never used it in that sense. Sir Alexander Galt explained fully to the people of Sheffield, when the tariff of 1862 was attacked, what he did mean. He told them that the public debt had been incurred for the purpose of facilitating transportation in the country and thus cheapening transportation; that the taxes that were imposed upon the imports were levied for the purpose of paying the public liabilities that had been incurred for the purpose of improving the means of transportation; that, if those public works had not been undertaken, the cost of transportation would have added more to the price of goods than the duties imposed, and therefore the people of Canada, consuming English goods, paid less for those goods including the duty than they would have paid if the public works had not been undertaken, and that he (Sir Alexander Galt) considered that it was practically in that respect a free trade system—that the policy adopted was a policy of modified free trade. That was he thought in 1862.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said that when the Chamber of Commerce of Sheffield made objections to the tariff was in 1860.

Mr. MILLS said he would read from a speech made by Sir Alexander Galt in 1870. Sir Alexander Galt said:

“That so far as we can judge of the intention of the Government, their policy, in this respect, is one which I am bound to say is one which does not meet my approval. We have indications that they are disposed to enter upon a policy of retaliation—a policy which I believe to be hostile to the best interests of this country, and calculated to produce results disastrous to our future prospects. My own belief is, as I shall endeavour to explain, that the great interests can only be promoted by the most unrestricted intercourse with foreign countries.”

Sir Alexander Galt further observed:

“There appear to be two courses open to us at this moment, and I think it of the utmost importance that we should make a wise selection between them. The one is a policy of restriction and retaliation; the building up of a ‘Chinese wall,’ as the hon. member said the other night, between ourselves and other countries. The other is the policy of developing our trade with foreign countries, of adopting free trade as far as is consistent with revenue purposes and seeking to give our country that trade with other markets we are now so much in want of.”

He thought these extracts showed that the hon. member for South Ontario misinterpreted the views of Sir Alexander Galt.

Mr. BOWELL: Now read Sir Alexander Galt's letter of 1875.

Mr. MILLS said he had not the letter at hand, and moreover the hon. member would be able to read it himself. It was, however, quite clear, if Sir Alexander Galt expressed at a more recent period any opinions adverse to those, they had simply Sir Alexander Galt against Sir Alexander Galt, and, when they had equal quantities on opposite sides of the equation, hon. members knew what the effect was.

Mr. TUPPER: Second thoughts are best.

Mr. MILLS said those opinions he had quoted were the second thoughts of that gentleman. They knew that Sir Alexander Galt adopted a somewhat different policy in 1859. When called upon in the House to defend that policy in 1870, Sir Alexander Galt stated why it was that he had adopted that policy eleven years before. He said that he had been forced into it by his colleagues, especially by the right hon. member for Kingston; and while, as a Minister, he was not disposed to repudiate his share of responsibility, he was not disposed individually to be held responsible for a policy of which he did not approve. The hon. member for South Ontario had informed the House that the Government had acted very improperly in imposing the duty upon tea, that they ought to have imposed it on something else; and in fact that they were discouraging our foreign trade. He had examined the Trade and Navigation Returns for the past year, and found that the Dominion imported 5,000,000 lb. of tea from Great Britain, 5,000,000 lb. from the United States, 1,086,000 lb. from China, and 2,250,000 lb. from Japan. That was to say, from China and Japan, where the teas were grown, we imported about 3,400,000 lb., nearly one-third the amount consumed in the Dominion. The remaining quantity would perhaps freight three ships from those countries. If hon. gentlemen opposite would look at the question, they would find that, according to their view, the whole prosperity of the country depended on whether three ships more were engaged in the tea trade between China and Japan and this country. He favoured the duty on tea, not only because it was proposed by the Government of which he was a member, but for this reason: That the whole fiscal policy of England for the past half century had been to get rid of taxes that imposed large burdens on the people, but which did not go into the public Treasury. They were told by M. Sully, a very able Finance Minister of France, that there was a duty collected in France which contributed 40,000,000 fr. to the treasury, but which took 300,000,000 fr. out of the pockets of the people. The whole efforts of financial reformers in Europe and especially in England had been to adapt taxation so as to take from the people only those taxes that went into the public Treasury. Every change that had been made in the tariff in England during the last thirty years had been made with that object, and the reforms of Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe pointed in that direction. But hon. gentlemen opposite told the House that all those financial reformers were wrong. At the same time, they had not shown that the circumstances of this country, in that particular, differed from those of England. It was impossible to show it; in the nature of things, the principle was the same everywhere. The hon. gentlemen opposite said that it was a wise policy, to do what? To impose taxation on the people in such a way as to levy large taxes which would not go into the public Treasury, and so make the people prosperous. When the Government placed a duty on tea, they imposed a tax on an article the revenue from which would all go into the public Treasury; but, if they were to tax some of the articles which hon. gentlemen opposite would tax, such would not be the case. If a tax was imposed on certain articles, they would not only increase the price of those articles on which the tax was collected, but the price of everything manufactured in the country of a similar kind, and the revenues would not go into the public Treasury, but into the pockets of the manufacturers. The consumer was thus compelled to pay just as much additional price as the amount of profit added to the taxes upon imports of the same class to those engaged in manufacturing industries. A few manufacturers for a short time made large profits, and the advantage they derived was obtained at the cost of all other industries. Hon. gentlemen opposite had become wonderful admirers of the people of the United States. They said: "Look to Washington, see what they are doing there; they have adopted a wise policy." They appeared to imagine that the people of Canada were unable to think and judge for themselves, and the country did not possess men capable of forming correct conclusions, such as were arrived at by Congress. But Congress was impelled to the conclusions at which it arrived by the force and influence of certain interests. Hon. gentlemen opposite asked the House to look to them and follow their example. He remembered when hon. gentlemen were not such admirers of the people of the United States; when they believed there were men of sense, thought and reflection in England; that there were statesmen in England, and men qualified to form a correct conclusion as to what was the best financial policy to adopt. Now, they told Parliament to look to the United States. In the case of the Washington Treaty, hon. gentlemen opposite legislated in the interest of the Americans, and they now asked the House to adopt the policy which would promote the interests of the United States, but certainly not the prosperity of the Canadian people. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Donville) had asked that the Government should protect the different manufacturing interests of the country; but it was difficult to understand how to protect them. There were various ways in which a people might get gain: by profits in trade, by wages for labour, by rents and also by gifts and by plunder; and this was the policy which hon. gentlemen now suggested. They might disguise it as they pleased, but that was what it meant and nothing else. It meant taking from the pockets of every consumer a sum to be given to some one person; and the system by which this was done was a system of plunder. In what manner could it add to the wealth of the country. Our wealth was increased by the industry of our population and by profits arising from that industry; and by a protective policy they simply gave to certain interests an amount of profit beyond their legitimate share. They took from the averages of profit a certain sum and conferred it on particular interests, and diminished the profits of the remainder to the extent to which they aided such interests. It was not in the interest of the country that the Government should interfere and direct the investment of capital into certain channels. There never was a country which, if left alone, failed to find profitable employment for its capital, and, while its capital might be misdirected by such Government interference, it could never add to the general prosperity of the entire population. Hon. gentlemen opposite had stated that they would aid struggling industries, while at the same time the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) stated they did not intend to ask one dollar more of taxes, but they would readjust the tariff and re-distribute the taxes so as to secure the object aimed at by the hon. member for Kingston—namely, to aid certain manufacturers. Hon. gentlemen might not get one dollar more into the public Treasury, while, at the same time, they imposed larger taxes. If the people knew that hon. gentlemen opposite intended to impose taxes to the amount of 28 millions instead of 15 millions, and that only 15 millions would go into the public Treasury, the balance passing into the pockets of certain capitalists, they would not support such a proposal, and yet that was precisely the proposal of hon. gentlemen opposite, disguise it as they might. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) spoke the other night as if taxation was a pleasing thing in itself, and as if the people could be made prosperous by simply imposing more taxes upon them, without reference to the wisdom of the expenditure. That was not his opinion. His view was that taxation was only beneficial as it was wisely and properly applied; that the taxation, therefore, would not add to the prosperity of the country in the sense used by the hon. gentleman. If we were to impose a tax to-morrow beyond what was required to pay the interest on the public debt, and beyond what was required to meet the expenses of Civil Government, it must be for some public work or undertaking; and then, in proportion as the work was useful, yielded a revenue, diminished the cost of transportation and equalized prices, it might be a benefit to the country. But it would be some time before those advantages could be accomplished. How the imposition of a tax was going to relieve the depressed condition of the trade and commerce of the country he could not tell. The proposition would not bear one moment's examination. It was absurd upon its face to state that, from the very fact of a tax being imposed, it would work a beneficial change in the actual condition of the country. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) said that the Finance Minister laid down the doctrine: the more we imported the better we were off. That might be true, if what we imported were paid for. Our prosperity was in a great measure indicated, where the trade was unhampered, by the extent of our importations. It was with a wealthy and prosperous nation as with a wealthy and prosperous individual. A man with a large fortune expended, purchased and consumed more than one with a small fortune. If we imported largely and our importations were paid for, it was an indication of our prosperity. It did not so much make us prosperous as it indicated the fact, and, further, it contributed to our prosperity in so far as we could import the articles we did import cheaper than we could produce them. We sent abroad the products of our most efficient industry—those things which were produced with the least labour and capital. What were they sent abroad for? To purchase those articles which, with the same amount of labour and capital, could not have been manufactured here in equal quantities. To undertake to produce those articles which we imported would be to withdraw labour and capital from its most efficient purposes, and to apply them to those purposes for which they were less efficient; and the very fact that we were called upon to interfere to transfer the capital and labor from one to the other was an evidence that we were misdirecting them. In his own opinion, the true principle of taxation, so long as we retained indirect taxation, was this: that we should seek to distribute taxes fairly over the various Provinces of the Dominion, impose them in such a way as would make the population pay in proportion to their ability, and that there should be no increase in the price of any other articles than those on which the tax was imposed—otherwise a larger amount of taxation would be drawn from the people than found its way into the public Treasury. A system of indirect taxation must always be less expensive. In 1875 our revenue from Customs was $15,300,000. For the collection of this, $683,000 was paid, and, if we charged 12 per cent. for insurance and profits, we might add to this $1,841,000 more, or, in other words, in order to collect what would be $14,661,000 available for public purposes we imposed a tax of $17,185,000. We produced in this country goods similar to those paying the 17½ per cent. tariff amounting to $76,000,000 yearly. If those goods were increased in value to the extent of that 17½ per cent., a further tax on the people of $15,225,000 would be imposed. He did not say that these goods were increased to that extent, because in many instances the home competition was such that prices were brought down to some extent; but they could not fall below the cost of production. But this reduction in price did not hold good in regard to all the industries, for many of them were new.

MR. TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS.

An HON. MEMBER: Which?

Mr. MILLS asked if the hon. gentleman could tell the House how many gasfitting establishments, how many manufacturers of tubing there were in Canada. If he reflected, the hon. member would see that there were a large number of articles which would be increased in price almost to the full extent of the tax. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite would say that in so increasing the cost they were aiding our struggling industries.

Mr. CURRIER said he would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question, but before doing so, he would have to make an assertion. He had learned that a certain company in Ottawa had obtained offers for cast-iron gas pipes and that the cheapest one was from Philadelphia, whose price was $31.50 per ton, which was considerably below any offer from England. He would like the hon. gentleman to point out how it was that, although the Americans had a high duty upon gas pipes, they became no dearer to the consumer.

Mr. MILLS said he supposed that there might be very serious depression, or there might be home competition in that branch of industry. He had a letter which he submitted to the House last year from the Hon. Mr. Wells, in which that gentleman said: "We have entire industries closed. We find that with a protection of 60 per cent. on silk, manufacturers of silk call for further protection." We might impose a very large duty upon particular articles that were largely imported from abroad, and afford an opportunity for enormous profits to the producers at home. The tendency would be for a large amount of capital to be withdrawn from other industries and invested in the pet of the Government. Other branches of industry were largely injured thereby, but there was no doubt that the favoured manufacturers made enormous profits for a time, and those profits were a sufficient motive for larger investments—for the multiplication of manufacturers. The result was they became so numerous they competed against each other and overstocked their own market and caused a fall in prices. If the hon. gentleman would take the average cost of that class of goods in the United States for a number of years, he would find that the price was much greater than what he had quoted. Look at the boot and shoe trade in Canada. It was protected by a duty of 15 per cent., which gave it an enormous advantage over the shoe trade of New England. About $16,000,000 worth of boots and shoes were manufactured in Canada every year. The foreign producers were practically excluded from the Canadian market, and yet there was a larger number of failures connected with the boot and shoe trade last year than with any other industry in Canada. The hon. gentleman would perhaps be able to tell him how protection aided this struggling industry. How it was that under a tariff that excluded the foreign producer altogether the trade was so much depressed and there were so many failures in the trade. It was because the effects which had flowed from a policy of restriction in other countries had actually followed from the adoption of that policy in Canada. The hon. gentleman had said that what was good for the United States was good for Canada; that protection had been good for the United States and therefore it would be good for us. Now he (Mr. Mills) might say that what was good for England was good for Canada; that England had been prosperous under a free-trade policy, and therefore we ought to follow her example. There could be no question that England had prospered, but he denied that the United States had prospered under a protective tariff. Take the matter of cotton goods alone. In 1860, under a revenue tariff, the United States had exported manufactured cottons to the extent of about $11,000,000, while under the protective tariff they never reached higher export value than $9,000,000, and that was reached in 1875. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) informed the House that no country had ever become prosperous, or capable even of adopting free trade, except through the adoption of a protective policy in the first place. The hon. gentleman might be correct in saying that every free-trade country once had a policy of protection. There could be no doubt whatever that very erroneous, very imperfect notions on political economy and national finance were entertained at one time. It was the opinion at one time that a nation could only be prosperous at the expense of another; it was believed at one time that it was impossible to carry on a trade that would be mutually beneficial; it was believed at one time that a public debt could be paid by a sinking fund. A great many notions were entertained at one time that were now exploded. But he denied that England had been enabled to adopt a policy of free trade because at one time she had a policy of protection. On the contrary, he believed, what had been stated over and over again by the most eminent statesmen and writers on political economy, that in proportion as England prospered under a system of protection, she prospered in spite of it and not on account of it. This was asserted by Lord Lansdowne and Lord Liverpool fifty years ago, the latter of whom, in a most elaborate speech, showed that the manufacturing industries of England had prospered, not in consequence of protection, but in spite of it; and that it was for the interests of the country, at as early a day as possible, to adopt the views then recently promulgated by Adam Smith. The farming population of England afforded a good illustration of this doctrine. That class were to-day far more prosperous than they were when the Corn Laws were in force. Land had increased in value, its cultivation had increased, the wages of the labourer had advanced fifty per cent., and the means of subsistence had been improved thirty per cent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: But gold has depreciated.

Mr. MILLS said the purchasing power of gold had diminished, but he contended that the men were able to purchase more of the necessaries of life with a day's wages now than before the repeal of the Corn Laws—that they lived in greater comfort, and were in every way more prosperous. What were the views of the Protectionists of that day? They said the farmers would be unable to compete with the cheap lands of America. But none of the mischiefs predicted by Lord George Bentinck and others had resulted from free trade.

Mr. ORTON: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the agricultural population of England is as large under free trade as it was under protection.

Mr. MILLS said if the hon. member would look at the last Census returns he would see for himself. He did not propose to answer any further questions. He was quite ready when he closed his observations—if the House chose to permit any hon. gentleman to ask him any questions—to answer them. While he had so far submitted to this course which was adopted towards himself on almost every occasion he addressed the House on this subject, he did not find the hon. gentlemen opposite disposed to submit to similar interruptions from him, and consequently he was disposed to adopt in this matter the policy of retaliation. These hon. gentlemen told them that England could afford to adopt the policy of free trade, because she had more capital and cheaper labour than almost any other part of the world. Now, these hon. gentlemen overlooked this important element in this line of argument: it had no value from their own standpoint, unless England, by adopting such a policy, could induce other countries to follow her example. If protection was a good thing in itself, it was good for England as well as for every other country, unless England, by adopting the free-trade policy, could ensure or entrap other countries into following her example. If this were a sound principle—and he did not see how it could be questioned—England ought to retaliate on the United States. She ought to do what these gentlemen said ought to be done in Canada. She had the same motive, and even a greater motive, because her commercial relations with the United States were more extensive than ours. But they found that no statesman in England was unpatriotic enough, or unscrupulous enough to submit for the consideration of the Imperial Parliament the proposition seriously submitted by hon. gentlemen opposite for the consideration of this House. One hon. gentleman told them that the balance of trade had been strongly against us for many years; that we were purchasing more from the United States than we were selling to them; that our imports from that country were more than our exports to it; and they referred to this as though it were a misfortune, and a great evil—one that ought to receive the serious consideration of the House, and for which they ought at once to provide an efficient remedy. He did not so understand the matter; he never supposed that the fact of the balance of trade being against the country was any evidence of loss by the transactions of international trade, but the contrary. It always had seemed to him that, if any conclusion was to be drawn from this circumstance, it was rather to be drawn in favour of the country against which the balance existed. Reference might be made to the case of England. In 1860, England imported goods to the value of £210,000,000, and exported to the value of £135,000,000, a balance of £74,000,000 being against her. In 1865, this balance amounted to £105,000,000; in 1870, to £103,000,000; and in 1875, to £130,000,000. So that in the fifteen years ending in 1875, the balance of trade against her averaged yearly about £100,000,000, or during that period it amounted to £1,500,000,000 sterling. If indebtedness or losses were to be measured by the extent to which the balance of trade was found to exist against her, England ought to be impoverished by this time, owing to her trade relations. She would then have been £1,500,000,000 poorer in 1875 than in 1860. He would give an illustration: Suppose a vessel left Halifax laden with fish and lumber to the value of $100,000. She went to the West Indies, and her cargo was sold for $130,000 worth of sugar, coffee and spices. She took these to England, and sold them for $100,000 in cash, and $60,000 worth of woollen goods, which she brought to Canada. The balance of trade in this transaction would stand: Exports, $100,000, and imports, $160,000, showing a balance of trade against Canada of $60,000. The extent to which the balance of trade was against us would be measured by our profits on our commercial transactions. He did not say this was true in every case. He saw the hon. member for Kingston agreed with him in this observation. The hon. member saw it was quite possible that a country might have a large balance of trade against it, and yet that this balance of trade was an evidence of its prosperity. It must be so in all cases where the balance was not the result of credit, which could not be the case for many years in succession. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) had given the House a very great deal of information with regard to the advantages farmers would derive from a protective tariff. The hon. member for Kingston had fully considered, of course, the interests of our farming population, and provided in his resolution for due consideration being given to their interests. But he thought the hon. gentleman would have a very great deal of difficulty in convincing our farming population that any duties imposed on the products of other countries would be in any way advantageous to them. He did not think farmers ill-informed enough with regard to their own interests and the principles of political economy to suppose that any taxation of the agricultural products of the United States or of other countries could in any way benefit them. The doctrine laid down in England was that taxation imposed on imports was paid by the consumers of these imports; and, if that was the case, the taxes imposed by the Government of the United States on Canadian products was paid by the consumers of these articles in the United States; and, if a tax was imposed upon articles entering into consumption in this country, imported from the United States, it would be paid by the people of Canada. How was the farming population to be made prosperous by increasing the prices of such articles? How were farmers to be benefitted by such a policy? In 1875, we sold to the United States 5,400,000 bushels of barley for $5,359,000. This barley was taxed by the American Government, he believed, 30c. per hundred pounds. Who paid this tax,—the brewers of the United States or the farmers of Canada? Beyond question, it was paid by the brewers. The very object of imposing this tax was to increase the price of barley produced in the United States; and how did it increase the price except by generally increasing the price not only of what was grown at home, but also of that which was imported from abroad? This was the object in view.

Mr. MILLS.

An HON. MEMBER: The farmers lose fifteen cents per bushel.

Mr. MILLS said our farmers lost nothing. He might repeat for the benefit of the hon. gentleman a story he had previously related. A farmer of Essex county went to Windsor with $500 worth of barley. He found barley was worth $1.70 a hundred pounds at Windsor and $2.00 at Detroit. He thought the Windsor dealers were trying to cheat him, and he took his barley to Detroit, but had to pay 30c. per hundred pounds duty. He was very indignant, and said he never would support a Government that would not retaliate, and in argument with a brewer held that the Canadian farmer paid the tax on barley. He said it was very improper not to place a tax on American cereals coming into Canada. He worried over the subject and in the night dreamed that when he came back to Windsor, he was compelled to pay a tax of 30c. a hundred pounds on his corn, which had been put on by the Government on seeing how meanly the Yankees had treated him in taxing his barley; so they punished him by making him pay 30c. per hundred on his corn; this was just the way the hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to punish the Yankees. They proposed that the Canadian consumer of American cereals should be made to pay the taxes. How would we be benefited by a retaliatory tax on barley? He believed we did not import a single bushel of barley from the United States last year.

An HON. MEMBER: Yes, we did.

Mr. MILLS said he could find no such entry in the returns of 1875. We had sold to the United States 100,000 bushels of malt for $109,000, and the tax levied on it only increased the price to the American consumer. It made no difference to the Canadian exporter. We sold them 100,000 bushels of beans, and we did not import a bushel from them. We sold to Great Britain, in 1875, 2,247,000 bushels of pease for $2,138,675, and we sold to the United States 579,000 bushels of pease for $502,176; and we got, a cent, from the American purchaser, the price we received from the English purchaser. Pease entered free into England, and they were taxed fifteen cents in the United States. Who paid the duty? If the duty was paid by Canadians, then pease would be fifteen cents lower when sold to Americans than when sold to England. It was the consumer and not the purchaser who paid taxation. He would take a single case. The American Government taxed broadcloth 60 per cent., and the Canadian Government taxed it 17½ per cent., and Americans and Canadians went to purchase in the same market. Did the American pay less than the Canadian for his goods? Did the English seller tell the American

Mr. MILLS.

he would sell him broadcloth 43 per cent. less, because it was taxed 43 per cent. in the United States more than it was taxed in Canada? No; they paid the same price. We sold to the United States last year 1,350,000 bushels of oats, and to England 1,500,000 bushels, and obtained the same price from the purchasers in each country. If there was a difference, it was dependent upon the point of transportation. We sold largely animals to both countries. We exported to the United States 4,299 horses, for which we received $442,000. We imported 1,580 horses, for which we paid $82,000. From Ontario we exported 2,167 horses for $243,000, and Ontario imported 174 horses, valued at $19,000 in round numbers. We exported 25,357 head of cattle to the United States, for which $601,148 were paid, and we imported 6,397 head, principally into Manitoba and British Columbia, at a cost of $164,491. We imported into Ontario only 369 head of cattle, and Ontario exported during the same period 14,919 head to the United States, for which we received $301,349. It was preposterous to talk about adopting towards the United States a policy of retaliation. We exported last year to the United States 85,628 sheep, and we imported thence only three sheep. How did the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) propose to protect the Canadian farmer? He said the Canadian farmer was cheated by the American people and wronged by the American Government; that we sold them 85,628 sheep last year, and that, owing to the duty, our farmers lost money in consequence; that we ought to retaliate; and that we ought to impose such a tax on these three sheep so as to make the Americans pay as much. He thought that, if we adopted such a policy, while we might exclude the three sheep, we would be in some danger, in the estimation of all well-informed people, of making donkeys of ourselves. It was also proposed to tax the wool trade by taxing wool. He had spoken with many manufacturers of tweeds and flannels in Canada, and what was the result? He found that they did not manufacture tweed from Canadian wool at all. It was unsuitable for the purpose. The kind of sheep the Canadian farmer raised to the greatest advantage did not furnish the kind of wool suitable for the manufacture of woollen tweeds. We could not abandon the raising Leicester, Cotswold and Lancaster sheep, and introduce Merinos and other fine-woolled sheep, because our climate was not suitable for them. Both had been tried in this country.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MILLS: Yes; they had been found unsuited to our climate, while the long-woolled sheep came to maturity in a single year. The result was that they could be readily disposed of, and the farmer was not obliged to winter them. The flesh of fine-woolled varieties were of very little value, and they yielded a very much less quantity of wool, which also brought a smaller price. In addition, the carcase of the long-woolled sheep was valuable. In 1875, we sold Great Britain 10,000 lb. of wool, and the United States 2,636,521 lb. We imported from the United States about 4,885,818 lb. We obtained for our 2,636,521 lb. $917,000, and we bought the 4,885,818 lb. for $14,673, securing two pounds of wool for every pound sold, and having over $100,000 profit on the transaction. Fine wool not only made better and more saleable cloth, but it also brought a price which cloth made from long wool would not bring. They would produce a variety of tweed cloths which they could not sell abroad, and which their own people would not purchase. We were producing superior goods at a much cheaper rate than they were producing in the United States, and we were even sending to the American market, notwithstanding their high tariff. It was true that when it was washed it was very much reduced in weight.

Several HON. MEMBERS: 60 per cent.

Mr. MILLS: No; not 50 per cent. This was the way these hon. gentlemen proposed to benefit the farmers and manufacturers. They proposed to put a duty on wool which would prevent manufacturers importing foreign wool and would interfere with the manufactures of flannels and tweed goods in Canada, and then they proposed to interfere with the market of the farmers and to say that they should not produce the variety of sheep most profitable,—that variety of sheep which furnished to the manufacturer of tweed goods the raw material which he required. But hon. gentlemen could not succeed in convincing Canadian farmers that such a policy would be to their interest. The hon. gentlemen had recommended to the consideration of the House the policy of the United States. The United States had had a protective policy for nearly twenty years. They had carried out that policy more systematically and more universally than perhaps any other country that had adopted such a policy. Now, what had been the result of that policy, at the end of these 20 years? It was that while of the exports $522,000,000 had been the products of agriculturalists, only $58,900,000 was the product of those manufactures which had been protected. The United States had been constantly compelled to devise means to exclude English manufactured goods from their markets. The result was this: that, out of something like over $220,000,000 of American products sent to English markets, only $6,000,000 worth were manufactured goods, and the rest were products of the farm. In that country, older than ourselves, wealthier than ourselves, having an advantage over us in point of climate, and with a protective policy that had been tried under the most favourable circumstances for nearly a quarter of a century, it was found that, notwithstanding all interferences of the Government, which had been most active and persistent, they had not succeeded in misdirecting capital to such an extent as to produce 10 per cent. of the products of industry in the form of manufactured goods. He thought we could not well have a more complete instance or a fairer trial which testified so much in favour of free trade. The House was told that the Government had greatly injured the country by allowing the American products to be admitted to our markets. He would just briefly call the attention of the House to our trade with England and the United States, for the four years ending December, 1876. In animal and cereal products of various kinds, there was imported into this country, during these four years, the value of $19,430,000; and we had exported to England during the same years, animals and their products to the extent of $33,638,000. If we looked at our trade relations with the United States for these four years, we would find that we had imported from that country of animals and their products to the value of $14,730,000, and exported to the value of $19,844,000. Then, when we looked at the products of agriculture, we found that, during these four years, we had imported from England to the value of $1,943,000; and we had exported to England to the value of $58,675,000; or we had exported agricultural products into England during these four years last past, more than we imported from that country, to the value of $56,750,000. Now, when we looked at the agricultural products exchanged between Canada and the United States, we found that we imported from the United States to the value of $55,000,000, and we exported to the value of $34,224,062; or we imported into Canada during these four years, $20,822,754 more than we exported to that country. It was important to notice what we did with this surplus of importations from the United States. It would be found that it was largely made up of breadstuffs, flour, meal, Indian corn and wheat. With regard to barley, peas and oats, we exported to both countries more largely than we imported from them.

Mr. ROCHESTER: Do you allow for corn?

Mr. MILLS: We imported from the United States more than we exported $6,069,000 flour, and $23,057,000 wheat. That was, in all $29,000,000 more than we exported. We exported to England more than we imported from that country $5,344,000 flour and $36,500,000 wheat. That was, we exported to England $12,500,000 worth of these products more than we imported from the United States. Now, these figures showed that we were largely engaged in the carrying trade—that we imported a large quantity of wheat and flour from the United States which was not consumed in Canada, or if it was, it displaced an equal quantity of Canadian products; the latter was sent to the English markets. No man in Canada would send articles to England unless he expected to make a profit out of the transaction. The hon. gentlemen opposite could not succeed in a policy in which it was affirmed that the Canadian merchants and millers had $29,646,000 employed in the grain trade which they said should not be so engaged, and the profit of which they ought not to have. These persons had engaged in the carrying trade for their own benefit, but they had also been benefitting the whole country; for what was the prosperity of the country if not the prosperity of individuals? They prospered. They were Canadians. Every dollar they made by the trade was a dollar added to the wealth of the country. With regard to the corn trade, in 1874, we imported into Canada to the value of $2,676,751, or 5,331,000 bushels. We exported 2,680,000 bushels of corn in that year. We therefore consumed of the corn which we imported into Canada, 2,651,000 bushels. We paid for the whole 5,331,000 bushels $2,676,000, and we ourselves for the 2,651,000 bushels received $1,708,000. We bought the corn at about 40c. a bushel, and we sold it for 60c., leaving that which we had on hand at a cost of less than 30c. a bushel. According to the hon. gentlemen opposite, those who had carried on this trade and imported these cereals, had seriously damaged the interests of the country. In 1875 our trade relations were somewhat similar. In 1876 we imported $2,356,000 worth of corn, or 3,335,000 bushels. We sold to Great Britain 2,000,000 bushels, for which we received $1,439,000. The result of that transaction was this: We bought the whole for 60c. a bushel; we sold two-thirds for 71c. a bushel, leaving the cost of that which we retained at 55c. a bushel. It was perfectly clear that those who imported the corn profited very largely by the transaction. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite said the Government ought to impose a duty for the purpose of encouraging farmers to engage in producing coarse grain to be consumed in Canada. Instead of importing corn for the purposes of distillation, we ought to produce rye for that purpose. We produced barley and peas because we could produce them cheaper than we could corn. We could buy two bushels of corn for one bushel of peas or barley.

Mr. MILLS.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: No, no.

Mr. MILLS: Hon. gentlemen said "No, no." That might not be so at some one particular time, but he was taking the average price as it ranged for the last four years. He was taking the Trade and Navigation Returns, and from them it appeared that corn was from 35c. to 50c. a bushel, and barley or peas from 75c. to \$1. He said that as an agriculturist. There was another consideration, that of distillation. A bushel of corn cost but little more than half a bushel of rye. 18 lb. of rye would produce a gallon of whiskey, and 15 lb. of corn would do the same thing. The effect of the exclusion of corn and the production of rye in this country would be that the Finance Minister would be obliged to make a reduction of at least 50 per cent. in the Excise duties on whiskey, in order to prevent smuggling from the United States, and he did not know that the reduction would accomplish it. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) had referred to the demoralizing effects of bad whiskey in his Province, and he promised to bring about a moral reform by the production of a better quality, but the matter would be still worse if the proposed change were made. The hon. member for Terrebonne, (Mr. Masson) in speaking of the large French-Canadian emigration to the United States, said this was caused by the failure to protect the manufacturing interests of Canada. The hon. gentleman was reminded, and he admitted it, that there was as large or a larger French-Canadian population in the United States between 1860 and 1870 than at the present time. On looking at the American census, it would be found that out of 4,000,000 population of Canada, some 493,000 had emigrated to the United States. The argument of the hon. gentleman was that, if a highly protective policy had been adopted and foreign goods were excluded, the population would have kept within the country. He (Mr. Mills) believed that the contrary was the case, and that, had there been a highly protective policy, there would have been a far larger expatriation. A large number of these people were agriculturists and went to the United States to settle on the prairies, where they could get cheaper lands than they could at that time in Canada. In New England there was a highly protective policy. But had the population remained there? No; they had gone to other States. The New England States had a smaller population than Canada, and yet nearly 600,000 had left and gone to other States of the Union. If, then, the hon. gentleman was to account for this emigration of the Canadians to the various States of the adjoining Republic, he must do so on other grounds and in some other way than by attempting to attribute it to the fiscal policy of the country. He found that, in 1875, we had exported of the products of mines, \$3,878,000; of fisheries, \$5,380,000; of forests, \$24,781,000; of agricultural products, \$29,958,000; of manufactured goods, \$2,250,000; so that, out of \$70,000,000 of products of Canadian industry exported, only \$2,250,000 were manufactured goods. These gentlemen told them they should adopt a policy which would keep the gold in the country, which would keep our money at home, that would give employment to a larger population than might wish to engage in agricultural industries or the various manufacturing industries which were now in a prosperous condition. But they forget that we had no gold in the country except what was brought into it; they forgot that gold was an imported article; that it was received from abroad in exchange for something produced in Canada; and that, if our exportations could be prevented, it was very doubtful whether there would be any gold to be kept in the country. Let him call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to our importations of raw material which these gentlemen said ought to be taxed. We had imported of cotton wool, \$533,000; of wool, \$1,373,000; of pig iron, \$1,229,000; of rags, \$80,000; of coal and coke, \$3,000,000; of unmanufactured India rubber, \$277,000; of bristles for brushes, etc., \$49,000, of broom corn, \$123,911; of hides, \$41,000; of furs undressed, \$83,000; or, for some seven or eight branches of industry, raw material of the value of nearly \$7,000,000. How were these to be paid for? We exported of manufactured goods to the value of \$2,293,000 only, so that we had  $4\frac{1}{2}$  millions of dollars charged against us for these raw materials alone, that were to be paid for in the products of some other industry than this. If these hon. gentlemen were to carry out their views, seeing the small extent to which we exported manufactured goods, it was obvious that the manufacture of goods would be further diminished. A tax on raw material implied an increase on the cost of production, less ability to compete in a foreign market, or to obtain a foreign market, and, if those views were carried out, instead of our manufactures becoming more prosperous, they would be less prosperous, and further taxation would be necessary.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS resumed. He said the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) had made a few observations on the state of Canada some years ago and at present, which he intended to answer before, but they had escaped his attention. The hon. gentleman informed the House that the manufacturers of this country grew up when the American War was at its height and American currency was depreciated, and that in consequence, they enjoyed a much larger protection than they would under any tariff they could hope for at the present time. He would leave out the question, which would certainly be a debateable one, between the hon. gentlemen and himself, as to whether depreciation of American currency gave any protection or not. In his opinion it did not. When American currency depreciated in value, the price of all commodities in the United States increased apparently proportionately, and it was a delusion to suppose that prices measured by a gold standard were at all affected by depreciation or change in the ordinary currency of the country. But leaving that question out of view altogether, supposing the hon. gentleman's views were indisputable in regard to that point, still it did not account for the general prosperity of the manufacturers of the country at that time. If the hon. gentleman looked at the various branches of manufacturing industries in Canada, he would find that many of them did not compete with American products at all—for instance, mill castings, edge tools, woollen goods, woven or knitted, etc. Those competed not with the United States, but with the manufacturers of England. It was obvious, when we found those branches that met with competition from the manufacturers of England had prospered quite as much and had progressed quite as rapidly as those the hon. gentleman said were protected by the depreciation of American currency and the civil war, we must account for this prosperity on some other basis. A sober, industrious people became prosperous more rapidly under some circumstances than under others. They became prosperous in proportion as Government left them alone, as they were not interfered with, and as they were permitted to apply their capital to those branches of industry from which, in their judgment, they would realise the greatest rewards by the proper application of their labour and capital. In Canada some industries that had never been protected and had never asked for protection from the Government up to this hour, were prosperous. We found also that a great many of those who had been asking for a higher tariff were really prosperous. He referred particularly to the manufacture of castings. A number of gentlemen were before the Depression Committee last year who stated that, when they began the manufacture of stoves, ploughs, agricultural implements, etc., they had but small capital, and that all the capital they possessed had been produced from the profits of the business in which they were engaged. Many of those who began a quarter of a century ago without a dollar were to-day worth a quarter of a million. He did not think that men who had prospered to that extent ought to press upon the Government the propriety of making changes in the tariff, not for the purpose of raising a larger revenue, but in order to exclude competitors from the Canadian market so that they might realize larger profits. We found that the farmer who went into the backwoods, who obtained land worth one dollar an acre, perhaps on credit, and after thirty years of unremitting toil succeeded in making his farm worth $3,000, asked no favour from the Government beyond protection to his life and property; and it seemed to him most unfair that parties should ask the Government to impose a tax upon the various articles which the farmer found it necessary to purchase, who, starting at the same time as he, were now worth $250,000, while he only had $3,000 as the reward for his labour. This was asking the Government to tax the poor in order that they might become poorer, and that the rich might enjoy not only the profits produced by their own skill and industry, but in order that they might enjoy a share of the profits of the men who worked and received but little reward for their labour. He did not pretend to say that one branch of industry was likely to yield very much more than another, but, so far as he could ascertain of the number of employers, about one to twelve invested in manufacturing industries. Perhaps the agricultural population would average the same amount of wealth to the same number. But there was this difference—that with the agricultural population the wealth was diffused. The $100,000 was not in the hands of one but of 25 men. In the manufacturing portion of the community this condition of things was reversed. But of 25 men, one only possessed $100, and the other 24 were without any accumulation of capital at all. It never could be in the interests of the country, even if it were wise to adopt a protective policy, to impose a tax with the view of preventing the diffusion of capital, in order that it might be concentrated in few hands. When a period of depression first came, who first felt it? It was the men without capital, who depended upon their daily earnings for subsistence. The policy that was commended for the consideration of this House was one which would change this order of things—that would impose a fine on that portion of the community amongst whom capital was diffused, in order that it might be concentrated in fewer hands. In his opinion, in so far as the tariff had been modified this year, it was modified in the right direction, in a way that would only take from the people such a tax as actually passed into the hands of the Administration. It would not relieve wealth at the expense of poverty. He believed we would receive far greater benefits from such a course than by any unjust, unwise and oppressive policy which would aid a portion of the community to get rich rapidly at the expense of those possessing small capital. When the country was very largely indebted, when its circumstances were such that they had to resort to almost every system of taxation, direct and indirect, in order to preserve public credit and carry on the Government, a Finance Minister was necessarily the custodian of mischiefs. He had to impose a very considerable burden on the population of the country, but it was his business to see that that burden was as fairly imposed upon all classes of people as possible. If the views of hon. gentlemen opposite were carried out, it was not his business to become a kind of ministering angel seeking to alleviate the burdens of the people, but he was rather a demon who would impose misery and oppression upon those least able to bear it. He did not think that the predictions of the hon. gentleman opposite with regard to the unpopularity of the policy of the Administration would prove to be well founded. He had no doubt that they would like to see their predictions verified. He had no doubt they would like to profit—he would not say by their mistakes—but like to profit politically even by the misfortunes of the country.

Mr. MILLS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, no.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman said "Oh, no," but he (Mr. Mills) said a tax imposed for the benefit of one portion of the community at the expense of the rest was a tax calculated to bring misfortune to the whole population. It did not alleviate, but was calculated to aggravate, the misfortunes of the people. But he was perfectly willing hon. gentlemen opposite should console themselves even with an idea of this sort. The hon. gentleman opposite was rather like an individual suffering with pulmonary consumption, who fancied every day that he was getting better. The hon. gentleman thought that every day he was becoming more and more popular—that by-and-by he would be worshipped by the population of this country. But he (Mr. Mills) thought the hon. gentleman's case was every day getting worse and worse—that the disease was mortal, and that, although he and his friends were tenacious of life, yet, after all, they would not be able to hold out very long against the good sense of the people. He had no doubt that the hon. gentleman would find that the discussion of this subject would not tend to impress people with the views promulgated in his resolution. He had no doubt that the agricultural portion of the community were sufficiently alive to their own interests, to know that a tax imposed for the benefit of the few was unjust, and that they would therefore not support the policy dimly shadowed forth by the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) said that the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat had spoken of the wide range the discussion had taken. He was sure that the hon. gentleman would not blame the hon. members of this side of the House for that. If the hon. gentleman would look back he would find that this wide range of discussion was due, in a great measure, to the hon. members for North York (Mr. Dymond) and for North Norfolk, (Mr. Charlton) who both diverged very widely from the subject at issue and took occasion to throw charges across the floor of the House. He agreed with the hon. gentleman that the Government ought to have a policy and that the Opposition also ought to have a policy. And he thought the country would see that both parties had a policy—the one diametrically opposed to the other. The policy of the Ministry was to levy taxation to raise revenue, without any regard to the question whether the raising of that revenue was going to be injurious to the interests of the country or not. The policy of the Opposition, on the other hand, was to raise the revenue and at the same time to encourage the various industries in which our people were employed. Now, he apprehended that the people would understand clearly the difference between the two policies. The hon. gentleman said that the time of depression was not the time to undertake the construction of public works—that that time was not opportune for raising the burdens of the people. He agreed with the hon. gentleman that when there was a depression it was not wise to impose additional burdens on the people if it could be helped; but, if it was necessary in the interests of the country to construct public works, he would ask if there could be a more opportune moment for doing so than when the construction of those works would aid the industries of the country? That was what the people desired to be done now. The hon. gentleman also said that it was difficult to classify members on the Opposition side of the House; he wanted it to be inferred that they were not agreed upon anything. But the hon. gentleman should remember that those who lived in glass houses should not throw stones. It was true that there might be a difference of opinion on the question as to the best mode of giving protection to our manufacturing and other industries, but he would ask that hon. gentleman how his views coincided with those of the hon. members for Montreal (Mr. Workman), and Hamilton (Mr. Wood), or the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). When the hon. the Minister of the Interior quoted Sir Alexander Galt's views, as expressed a great many years ago, he totally ignored the views that gentleman now held. Sir Alexander Galt, having seen the folly of the opinions he had entertained, like a wise man, and not like the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House—who because they had said they were Free-traders, must, under all circumstances, be Free-traders—had changed them, and did not now believe that the policy he had once supported would be in the interests of the country. The hon. gentlemen opposite contended that what was suitable for one country was suitable for all countries; circumstances made no difference in their estimation. A country with a sparse population and a small amount of capital was placed by these hon. gentlemen on the same footing with a country possessed of great wealth and a dense population. He held it might as well be said that, because we wore fur coats in the winter, we should also wear them in summer; and, on the same principle, it might be urged that, because we wore heavy clothing, the same clothing should be worn in India. The circumstances of a country and of a people must be taken into consideration in their government; but these hon. gentlemen thought nothing at all of either circumstances or surroundings; because free trade was suited to England, they maintained that it must be suited to the Dominion. The hon. gentleman had said that his hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) was a Communist. Now, what, he would ask, did free trade among nations mean if followed out to its legitimate conclusions? It almost meant Communism, and because of this he sometimes doubted the correctness of the theory. It meant the abolition of national distinctions, and that each nation should strive to do the best it could for the good of the whole, without looking after its own particular interests; and this was Communism as applied to individuals. The hon. gentleman stated that the interests of this country were sacrificed by the Washington Treaty, which gave away the navigation of the St. Lawrence. He would like to know why our canals were deepened and enlarged, if it was not for the very purpose of securing the passage of the trade of the great West and North-West through them to Montreal and to England. If the free navigation of the St. Lawrence had been given away, what did this amount to? The free use of our canals had not been extended to the Americans, whose shipping, in passing through them, paid the same charges as our own; therefore, he apprehended that, in this relation, no great sacrifice of Canadian interests had been made. Of course, it might be said that the free use of the St. Lawrence might be prejudicial to our interests in the event of war; but when war broke out, all treaties made with the country with which we might be at war would cease to exist; therefore, in case of war with the United States, this treaty would be of no effect. The hon. gentleman had spoken as if imports or exports were evidences of wealth. He held that neither of them could always be so considered. Imports, as the hon. gentleman had said, might be evidence of indebtedness, and this he believed was the case of this country to a very great extent. Our imports last year exceeded our exports by fourteen millions of dollars, the former being ninety-four and the latter eighty millions of dollars. During previous years the differences were at times much greater. How were the differences made up? They must signify indebtedness in some way or other. He believed a large portion of it was paid in this manner: Our Trust and Loan and Credit Companies borrowed money from England, by means of which mortgages on Canadian town and city property and farms were secured, and the money raised upon them was sent back in the shape of bills of exchange, thus helping to pay Canadian indebtedness. He apprehended that no hon. gentleman would say that this was evidence of wealth on the part of Canada. Exports might also be no evidence of wealth. The comforts enjoyed by a people, which they paid for, really showed what their true wealth was. We might export what we ought to consume, and what was necessary for the comfort of the people, to pay our indebtedness to foreign countries; and, therefore, he held that neither imports nor exports could fairly be taken as evidences of the wealth of a people. The hon. gentleman said that the consumer always paid the duty; this was a fallacy. He admitted that, when an article was brought into a country where it was not produced, the duty on it was a tax on the consumer; but, when an article was imported into a country in which it was produced, and in which the amount of such imports was not so large as to control or make any very material change in the market, he held that the consumer did not pay the duty. In illustration, he would allude to Canadian barley. American barley was sold in the United States for 80c. a bushel, and Canadian barley brought in that country the same price. Canadian barley was, however, subject to a duty of 15 or 20 per cent., and, therefore, he held that the Canadian producer paid this duty. If the Canadian barley had not been taken into that market, it was possible that American barley might there have brought a higher price. In this case it was clear that the Canadian producer paid the 15 or 20 per cent., as the case might be, to sustain the Government. The hon. gentleman had told a story about an Essex farmer who had sold his barley in the United States and bought corn there, but he thought it could be shown that in both cases this farmer had the duty to pay. In the one case he was the producer and the other the consumer, and therefore his position was changed. In taking his barley into the United States he had the duty to pay, which, as was before shown, was paid by the producer, and in bringing back corn for feeding purposes he was the consumer, and would have had to pay the duty if one had been imposed. Corn was grown to a very limited extent in this country, and its price was, in a great measure, regulated by the price of the American article, and would have been increased in cost by the amount of the duty. He held, therefore, that it was not correct to say that in all cases the consumer paid the duty. It was also argued that, if we bought so much corn at 40c. per bushel and sold it again at 60c. per bushel, therefore we were richer as a people to the extent of the difference between these two prices. But, if we sold that corn out of the country at 60c., we had to pay the transportation and other charges upon it to the market where it was sold, and consequently we did not make the 20c. If it was sold in this country, we were no richer; it would be only transferring wealth from the pocket of the man who paid the 60c. to the pocket of the man who bought it at 40c., so that on the whole the country would be no richer by that transaction; and in the other case the country would be only richer to the extent of the difference between the cost price, 40c., with the charges for transportation added to it, and the 60c. It might also be that we were sending out a superior article, and bringing in exchange an inferior one. The hon. gentleman had spoken of the advantage enjoyed by the Canadian farmer in feeding his beeves with American corn, because he could sell pease at a higher price than the corn cost; this was questionable. For instance, the farmer, on computing the profit he made upon his beef, must put the cost of the production of a bushel of pease against the cost price of any other grain with which he fed his beeves. If he could raise pease at 30c. a bushel, and feed his beeves with them, the cost of feeding would be so much less to the extent of the difference between 30c. and 50c., the price of the corn; so, instead of selling the pease at a good price, the farmer got this price in the sum received for his meat. It was a fallacy to say that the Canadian farmer, by selling his pease at a high price, though they cost less than the corn with which he fed his beeves, made more than if he fed them with the pease directly. He thought the hon. gentleman most unfortunate in his attempt to show that the Canadian manufacturer had less to compete with regarding American manufacturers than with English manufacturers. What articles were chosen for the purpose? Edge tools, above all things. Every hon. gentleman must know that, if there was one thing more than another in which the American could out-do the English manufacturers, it was in edge tools. American axes, chisels, etc., could not be touched by the British article as far as quality was concerned. And to show that Canadian manufactures were flourishing, what manufacture had the hon. gentleman selected?—

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. WALLACE.

the manufacture of stoves and agricultural implements, etc. Every one knew that the manufacture of such articles enjoyed protection in addition to the duty, because they were of little value in comparison with their bulk, and because of the great cost of their transportation. These hon. gentlemen proved too much. They proved in one instance what they said in another case was untrue. The hon. gentlemen said that the Canadian farmer realized as much for his pease in the American as in the English market last season; but the gentlemen opposite were always averring that the English market regulated the price of such articles; therefore, according to their own showing, it was clear that the English market did not always regulate the price of pease. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had said that the Government had fallen heir to difficulties bequeathed them by the late Administration. The hon. gentleman referred, as the first of these difficulties, to British Columbia, and the terms made with that Province. He believed, however, that every hon. member on the other side of the House had been as desirous to see British Columbia enter the Union as were the supporters of the late Government, so that the difficulty could only relate to the terms of Union. But these hon. gentlemen had not observed those conditions; they had voided the old contract; they had made a new agreement on their own account, and consequently these terms were not a legacy bequeathed to them by the late Government. The hon. member had also spoken of the Manitoba troubles as another legacy; but he would remind the hon. gentleman that he and his friends caused these troubles. When the negotiations for the purchase of the North-West Territories were in progress, the hon. gentleman opposite had declared that the inhabitants of that country were being sold; that their interests were not considered, and that they were being deprived of their rights, thus creating the difficulties in question. It was unfair, incorrect and unjust to say that these troubles were a legacy bequeathed by the late Government. The hon. gentleman also said that the Government was not responsible for the present depression. He admitted that this depression was perhaps beyond the control of this Government, but he did not doubt that it was, in some degree, the creature of the Government in this way: our industries were controlled, in great measure, by legislation, and the Government had not done the very best that could be done in this relation. They had undertaken such legislation, but, in nine cases out of ten, their legislation had injured rather than benefitted our industries. The hon. gentleman alleged that the depression was consequent upon the American War, and the inflation growing out of a depreciated currency. If this was correct, why was not the depression greater during, or immediately after that war? Why had such a length of time elapsed before it reached its present height? If it was caused by war, it could not be due to the American War, because that war had closed a number of years ago, long before the depression began. It could not be due to the depreciated currency, because the depreciation was much greater when there was no depression than it was now. It must have been owing to other circumstances. The hon. gentleman said the old Government had nothing to do with the prosperity of the country which existed between 1867 and 1873. If Governments had nothing to do with retarding or making prosperity, he would ask why the hon. gentlemen, when in Opposition, were so anxious for a change of Administration. They led the people to believe that the country was going to ruin, and they asked to be allowed to show how prosperous they would make the condition of things. Was that true, or were the hon. gentlemen trying to get control of the Government under false pretences? The hon. gentleman said that protection meant an increase in the price of everything. If so, it was very strange that in a country where there was such a heavy protective system as in the United States they could send so many manufactured goods into free-trade England. The hon. gentleman then spoke of the lumber trade. He said it was one of the most important industries in this country. He (Mr. Wallace) was not going to undervalue the lumber interest. There was a large amount of wealth in it and it gave employment to a great number of hands. But, after all, it was not one of the most important interests in the country. The timber wealth had been growing up for centuries, without any labour being spent upon it. A great deal of it was exported in logs and in round timber, and the exportation of these could not be a very important industry.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Where?

Mr. WALLACE said he knew that it was so in the county he represented, and in the county of Kent. If the lumber was manufactured into furniture or implements of husbandry, or if ships were made of it, then it would be a much more important industry than it was at present, important as he admitted it to be. Then the hon. gentleman had spoken of American domestic manufactures, and said that the export of American manufactures bore no proportion to the whole of the manufactures; and yet the American people had to pay a tax upon those domestic articles which they consumed as well as upon foreign articles. But he (Mr. Wallace) did not think this susceptible of proof. He would say that the aggregate happiness of the human race might have been just as great if the $4,000,000,000 worth of goods manufactured in the United States had been manufactured in the looms and workshops of Great Britain, France, Germany and Belgium, but no man would deny that, if this had been done, the American nation would not be so great as she was to-day, and there would not be those hives of industry which now existed. There would not be the New Yorks, the Chicagos, the Philadelphias, the Baltimores, the Lynns, the Lowells, if the old policy that the colonies should manufacture nothing, not even a hob-nail, for themselves had been carried out. Speaking about corn, it had been stated that the duty on it only affected the section of country in which the corn was produced; but this was a very narrow view. A large portion of the corn was used for distilling purposes, and another large portion was used for food; and when American corn came into Canada it entered into competition with the Canadian farmer—not only with his corn, but it reduced the price of his oats and coarse grains. He was astonished to hear, as he had heard the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a representative of the Canadian people, undertake in the House of Commons of Canada to belittle the people whom he represented. It was said that this country was unknown in New York, and that, if we attempted to regulate our policy in the interests of Canada, we must be careful, we must beware lest the United States adopted a retaliatory policy in return, and put a duty on our lumber and prevented the Canadian lumberman from going into the American market; and lest also they would reduce the price of Canadian barley by growing barley themselves on the prairies. He would like to know whether the Americans had stopped growing barley on their prairies in order that Canadians might have a good price in the American market, or had kept up the price of American lumber in order that Canadian lumber might have a better price. Americans bought from Canada because it was to their interest to do so; nothing more. It mattered not what policy we adopted, they would not adopt a retaliatory policy unless it suited their purpose, and if it suited them to adopt a retaliatory policy, they would do so, no matter what we did. The hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) said: "You must speak with bated breath for fear of the Americans, and not let them know what our policy is." He (Mr. Wallace) would ask whether the Canadians existed by sufferance of the Americans, and whether we were their vassals? It was disgraceful that a representative of free men should say Canada ought not to do what she believed to be for her interest, for fear of the American people. If we were free men, then we should legislate so as to promote Canadian interests, without reference to what Americans thought or what they might do. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had had a fling at the right hon. member for Kingston, but it would be well for that hon. gentleman, or the foremost of his friends, after being in political life as many years as the right hon. gentleman had been, if they stood as high in the estimation of the people of this country as the hon. leader of the Opposition did. It was not that the right hon. gentleman was blameless that he said this, but because, although he made no professions to be more honest or pure than other men, yet no one pretended to say that he had done a wrong to the country to benefit himself. The hon. the Premier had said the prosperity of the country was independent of either side of the House. With this proposition he quite concurred. No legislation could enact prosperity; the elements of a country's greatness existed independent of legislation; it consisted of its natural resources and the industry of its people. Industry, prudence and economy would create wealth and prosperity, while indolence, waste and extravagance would always create poverty and misery; but, while legislation could not of itself create prosperity, it could, if wise, promote it; whereas, if it was unwise, it would retard and check it, and this was what the Opposition contended the legislation of the present Government had done. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said the present Government had so arranged the tariff that the taxes on one article did not increase the price of another. This he (Mr. Wallace) held was impossible, inasmuch as every article entered into either the food, fuel or clothing of the producer and increased the cost of his living, which, as a matter of necessity, added to the cost of his productions. In a country like Canada, where so much business was done on credit, which was a sort of circulating medium, a feeling of confidence was absolutely necessary. But the course of the Government had been such as to stamp out confidence. The Finance Minister, when he came into power, undertook to re-arrange the tariff, and such was his policy that deputation after deputation waited upon him to protest against his action, and the confidence among business men was destroyed entirely. And the thing which had produced great alarm was the black picture the Finance Minister had drawn of the future prospects of this country. These causes had tended to aggravate and intensify the existing distress if they did not create it. The Government now refused to do anything to help our languishing industries; and in this they were as culpable as the man who would see another drown without making any effort to save him. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite had attempted to define the policy of the Opposition as one of rigid protection. But it was not proposed to protect the people from themselves, nor was it proposed to create monopolies or rings. Our own manufacturers had a very unequal match to fight. Not only were they met with an exceedingly high duty in the United States, but in that country a drawback was allowed on all articles imported into Canada, which would be dutiable if exported from Canada into the American market. Old establishments with large capital, had always the advantage over young establishments with small capital. The Canadians were willing to compete with those disadvantages: but they were unwilling that they should be overwhelmed with the additional disadvantage of high taxes, which met them when they entered the American market, and they were unwilling to be compelled to compete with the degraded labour and cheaper money of some of the European countries. It was declared that the Protectionists were entirely wrong in their views. The whole system of Government was, however, one of protection; it was the protecting of the right against the wrong and the weak against the strong. The hon. the Premier had declared that protection was of the dark ages. It was the essence of civilization. The higher the civilization, the greater would be the amount of protection which the Government would afford the people. The first step from barbarism was protection. Hon. gentlemen opposite talked much about making Canada a cheap country to live in. If that was all that was desirable, our civilization was a blunder indeed, a crime against humanity, because the effect of civilization was to make living more expensive. But those

Mr. WALLACE.

hon. gentlemen who talked loudest about making this a cheap country, did not themselves wish to live cheaply. They wanted good houses and clothing and to fare sumptuously, but that some one else should be able to live cheaply. He desired not only that Canada should be a cheap country to live in, but that it should be a country where the industrious man had most of the comfort, and indeed of the luxuries, of life. That should be the aim of statesmen, rather than trying to make this a cheap country. If cheap living was all that was required, surely it could be had, when the aborigines lived by the chase and did not till the soil. To return to such cheapness of living meant barbarism. He believed that free trade was a great and grand idea, but its advocates claimed for it too much credit. They went back to the period of the inception of free trade, and pointed to the advance made in the trade of the world since that time. It was a factor in the world's prosperity, but it was only one with a number of concurrent causes. The world's trade would not have made such rapid progress as it had done, if there had not been the discovery of steam and the great inventions in machinery. The discoveries of gold in California and Australia had also stimulated industries; and, therefore, it was not true to say that the great strides in the world's industry had been due to free trade alone. Free trade would have done little for the great West if there had not been railways to carry produce to the eastern markets, and to carry the manufactures of the east in exchange for the products of the west. The country would not have been so rapidly developed except for the railways. There were concurrent causes with free trade, whereby the world's business had made great strides during the last century; but that progress was due as much, and perhaps more, to causes other than so-called free trade. The people of the country should understand the difference between the political parties, and it was this: that while the present Government levied taxation solely with a view to revenue, without having any regard as to how it would affect the industries of the country, the Opposition, while levying taxation for the purpose of raising revenue, at the same time desired so to levy it as to stimulate and encourage Canadian industries. This was the course which every lover of his country should adopt. He believed hon. members would show themselves to be true patriots, as having the true interests of the Dominion at heart, if, instead of striving, as the Government were now striving, to make this a cheap country to live in, they would seek to make it a country where the industrial people would be best clothed, best fed and best housed, of any country in the world.

Mr. PATERSON said there was one aspect of the question he wished to present to the House, which had not been brought out as clearly as he desired it. The House was discussing a question in regard to which one party was committed while the other party was fighting with a free lance, not being committed in any way. It was the duty of the Government to bring down to the House a policy and that they had done, as their policy was now before the House and the country, and hon. members knew what were the intentions of the Government in regard to the tariff; that the tariff would be retained as at present, with the exceptions proposed by the hon. Minister of Finance within the last few days. It became the duty of hon. members, in determining whether the Government was entitled to their confidence or not, to consider whether any better policy than that of the Government had been enunciated. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition stated that they had a policy. There appeared to be a policy floating about in the brains of the Opposition, which, when presented to the House, it was said, would exceed that of the Government as light did darkness, but it had not yet been presented. He had listened attentively to the speeches of Opposition members and had endeavoured to ascertain what was their particular line of policy. One hon. member adopted a line of policy in favour of a prohibitory tariff, but he was followed by another hon. member who was careful to repudiate any such sentiment as being held by the Opposition. Some hon. members of the Opposition informed the House that they would have a tariff levied on such articles as were produced in the country, thereby to obtain revenue and promote the industries of the country. That was the view taken by the last speaker, who was in honour bound to support the Administration of the day in their policy, for that which he had enunciated was the policy of the Government. If there was trouble in understanding the views of the Opposition, it arose from the fact that those gentlemen were afraid to attach themselves to anything definite. They introduced resolutions which meant nothing. They endeavoured, by resolutions, in which were words without meaning, to have the House committed to one principle—a declaration of want of confidence in the Government. It might suit hon. members who had no confidence in the Administration to vote for such resolutions, but, if they wished to seek the support of those who were not devoid of confidence in the Government, then they must give reasons why the Administration should not be supported and submit a policy so that hon. members might determine between the two parties. The tariff was a question that had been very much mixed up with other matters in the speeches of hon. members of the Opposition. They were fully aware that the Government was charged with the duty of raising a revenue; certain expenditures were incurred by the country and certain works had necessarily to be prosecuted, and it was therefore necessary for the Government to devise ways and means whereby they might raise a revenue. There were two ways open to the Government to do this. They might take the principle of direct taxation as the basis, and levy taxes directly as did the municipalities; or they might obtain a revenue from duties levied on goods imported into the country. He thought that direct taxation, while it had some advantages, especially that of cheapness, was a principle not considered as at all practicable by either of the great political parties, and neither party thought of acting upon it. It had been decided by common consent that revenue should be raised by a tariff—duties being levied upon goods imported into the country. That point being determined, it became a very serious question with the Finance Minister to determine from what class of goods the revenue should be raised. Different countries had adopted different plans in regard to that matter. In England, the Finance Minister raised all the revenue required from a very few articles. The United States adopted an entirely different policy and imposed a heavy Customs duty on almost every article imported. In Canada, we had adopted the policy that prevailed in the United States to a great extent qualified. It differed from the policy of England inasmuch as the duties were imposed on a long list of articles; it differed from that of the United States in that, while it resembled that policy in the number of articles upon which duty was levied, the rate of duty was very much less. The true and proper policy for this country to adopt and maintain was that which was pursued by the Government at the present time. The Government had taken this wise precaution: that, in obtaining revenue by a Customs tariff, they had an eye to the material well-being of the country as well as to revenue. It was a baseless charge made by the last speaker when he said that the Government were bound to raise revenue, no matter what might be the effect on the national industries. He (Mr. Paterson) would not support any Government which, in raising the revenue, did not exercise care in regard to the business interests of the country. He maintained that the Government had the public interest at heart, and they had framed a tariff and adopted a policy which, while securing revenue, would minister to the well-being of the Dominion. They had seen fit to impose duties on imported manufactured goods, and the effect of that wise and efficient policy had been that, while they had secured revenue, they had fostered, stimulated and encouraged our manufacturing industries, until Canada to-day, in proportion to her population, stood in a proud position with regard to manufactures. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) had endeavoured to distort the argument used by the hon.

member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and tried to make it appear that he had adopted a line of argument exalting the United States at the expense of Canada. If he rightly understood the hon. member for North Norfolk, he spoke in regard to imposing retaliatory duties on United States products, and, like a wise man sitting down to count the costs before he entered into an enterprise, he asked the House to consider whether four millions were able to fight successfully forty millions of people. That was not belittling his country. The men who were belittling Canada and exalting the United States at its expense were those men who were continually declaring that our manufactures were crushed out of existence, that in this country there was not energy and ability sufficient to enable us to compete with the manufacturers of the United States—men who made that statement in face of the Canadian exhibit at Philadelphia and our success there, when we showed that not only in the department of education, but in agriculture and manufactures, this Dominion occupied a proud position among the nations. What was the result of that Centennial Exhibition in regard to our manufacturing interests? Did not hon. gentlemen know that commissioners from distant countries were led to visit Canada by the very fact that at that Exhibition they observed Canadian manufacturers competing with American manufacturers in quality of goods, and underselling them in price? To-day, a large and growing market was being opened up in the Australian colonies from the exhibit of Canadian manufactures made at Philadelphia. In the face of those facts, hon. members of the Opposition, in mournful tones, were belittling this country, saying that we were not able to compete with the United States unless two and a half per cent. more protection were given to every manufacturer living in our midst. No doubt there was somewhat of depression existing, but it was not confined to manufacturers. The statistics of failures showed a larger proportion among importers than manufacturers. It was true that manufacturers had suffered with the rest of the community, but it was not correct to say that they were being crushed out, and were unable to bear the strain now upon all classes. He believed in protection to manufactures, and he made a speech last year when a Committee was moved for in regard to the depression of trade, in which he took the ground that it was the duty of the Government to consider manufacturing interests in framing any tariff. He took that ground now. He supported the Government last year, because he was convinced they had the interests of manufacturers at heart, and he supported them now because he was satisfied they had the same interests at heart they had then.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings): You will support the Government whatever policy they adopt.

Mr. PATERSON said the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) seemed to think that he had some confidence in the Government. He would tell him that he had a great deal more confidence in them than in the hon. gentleman; and when he looked on the Opposition benches and thought of the remote possibility of those gentlemen crossing over to the Ministerial side of the House, he confessed that it was a calamity which he hoped would never overtake this country. He believed that the policy of the Government was one which ought to be adopted and maintained. He believed it had been maintained, and that any hon. gentleman who was well disposed to all the interests of the country would support the Government in maintaining that policy in the future. The hon. the leader of the Opposition asked that he should be judged by words, but he (Mr. Paterson) judged by the action of the Government in reference to this matter. To speak about manufactures being depressed, or in difficulties, did no good; but the Government that would take action, and by that action give relief, ought to be encouraged. What were the facts of the case? What was the action of this Government? Had they shown a want of interest or care for the manufactures of this country? What was the very first thing they did when they came into office? They found the public Exchequer run low owing to the extravagance of their predecessors. They found that there were engagements entered into that would more than consume the revenue on the basis of taxation then levied, and it became necessary, in order to meet those engagements, that additional taxation should be imposed. What was the result; a total disregard of the manufactures of the country? No; in raising that additional amount they had put  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on manufactured goods, thus securing more revenue and at the same time giving increased protection. What was the course of hon. gentlemen opposite on that occasion; what was the course of the hon. gentlemen who claimed to be the manufacturers' friends? The hon. member for Cumberland rose in his place and denounced the hon. the Finance Minister for attempting to enter the thin edge of the wedge of protection. He (Mr. Paterson) was cognizant of one interest which, under that tariff, had received from the hands of the Government 100 per cent. more protection than it had under the previous Administration. Deputation after deputation waited on the late Government to secure some protection, but all in vain. It was, however, conceded at once by the hon. the present Finance Minister, because he saw that that industry was not in as fair a condition as other industries in the country. He remembered that when the hon. the Finance Minister brought down the tariff to the House on that occasion, 5 per cent. protection was placed on pig iron. We had, within six miles of Ottawa and in other parts of the Dominion, large mountains of iron ore, equal in quality to that of any other part of the world. This had to be taken to Cleveland to be smelted and then brought back in the shape of pig iron to Canada to be worked up. The hon. the Finance Minister thought that the manufacture of pig iron should be stimulated in this country. With that object in view, he put a duty of 5 per cent. on pig iron. But the tariff was denounced. Large deputations of manufacturers waited upon the hon. the Finance Minister and urged that such a duty would be ruinous to the iron interests of Canada. The hon. the Finance Minister showed a regard for the country's welfare and well-being, and he listened to the representations, reconsidered his tariff and struck off the duty he proposed to put on pig iron. He (Mr. Paterson) would ask the manufacturers who had proved himself to be their friend? Whether they did not think better to support an Administration which treated them in that way or whether they were disposed to support an Administration which denounced the Government for raising the tariff to  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. when they thought the interests of the revenue required it. He had no faith in the motion offered by the hon. member for Kingston. Last year that hon. gentleman had been kind enough to refer to him and say that his amendment would give the hon. member for South Brant an opportunity to show the interest he felt for the farmers and manufacturers. The hon. gentleman had given many opportunities to the hon. member for Brant to observe his line of policy in this House, and he (Mr. Paterson) could only assure him that no clap-trap motion should lead him away from the support of the Government. They wanted resolutions introduced by hon gentlemen whose professed dealings with the question would warrant the House in believing they had some honesty in introducing them. His views with reference to that amendment were very much strengthened by events which preceded as well as succeeded it. The House would remember that the resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton recited that it was in the interests of Canada that differential duties should be levied—in other words that the home Government should be memorialized for power to impose differential duties on goods coming from the United States. That resolution also embodied an expression of confidence in the general policy of the Government. What were the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston? In reference to that resolution, some of the hon. gentleman's supporters told the House that they did not believe in putting heavy duties against England but that they favoured putting them on against the United States. Every one of them voted the resolution down, and why? The hon. member for Kingston gave the reason. It was not because of the differential duties. He said that a resolution had been introduced calculated to give every consideration to the manufacturers, but, while the hon. gentleman found fault with the financial policy of the Government in his resolution, he, in the next place, expressed confidence in the general policy of the Government, and therefore he could not support the proposition. The tariff was of no consequence. Manufacturers were of no consequence. He would have gone for the whole thing or anything, but there was that expression of confidence in the general policy of the Government, and therefore he could not support the amendment. When the hon. member for Montreal introduced his resolution for greater protection, the hon. gentleman denounced it as one-sided. He held that it was proposing to give undue advantages to one class at the expense of another and was therefore unwise and unjust. Then in the motions now before the House they had another illustration of the policy of that hon. gentleman. He had moved:

“That the said Resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved: That this House regrets that the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burthen of taxation on the people, without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries; and further, that this House is of opinion that the deficiency in the revenue should be met by a diminution of expenditure, aided by such a re-adjustment of the tariff as will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion.”

That last sentence, according to the organ of the hon. gentleman, and according to the sentiments uttered by his supporters in this House, composed the grand National Policy of the Opposition. Now, the hon. member for Hamilton moved that that grand resolution be struck out and that something else, entirely different and foreign to it, should be substituted. The hon. member for Kingston indignantly commented upon that resolution. He characterized it as selfish and one-sided—as a policy that was enunciated in the interests of the manufacturers only —that it was for the special benefit of a few manufacturers of Hamilton, but still the hon. gentleman said he intended to vote for that resolution. No question more clearly illustrated the policy of the Opposition than did their course upon the coal oil question. It would be remembered that the duty on coal oil was 15c. per gallon, and that there was an Excise duty upon it of 5c. per gallon. About the close of last Session, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) moved that the import duty on coal oil should be reduced from 15c. to 7½c. per gallon. The hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan) made a speech on that occasion to show how unjust such a step would be to the refiners of coal oil. But what was the conduct of the Government in regard to that matter? The hon. the Finance Minister said that that interest had an undue amount of protection, and that he would deal with it this year, but that, in dealing with it, the interests of refiners must be guarded. That hon. gentleman had fulfilled his promise; he had given a sufficient protection to the refiners, while, at the same time, he reduced the cost to the consumer. Upon that occasion, however, the whole Opposition were found voting with the hon. member for Stanstead. He (Mr. Paterson) wished to correct himself in that statement, as the name of one notable member of the Opposition, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, was not to be found on the division list. He had a very distinct recollection that, up to the very moment the division bell rang, the right hon. gentleman was in his seat. Surely there was something strange in his name not appearing in the division list. That was the right hon. gentleman's opportunity to show that he desired to do something to relieve the manufacturing industries. The motion was made to wipe out one of the great industries of the country, but did the hon. gentleman oppose it? Nothing of the kind. Though in the House at the time the division bell rang, he fled the scene when the vote was being taken: “paired” with himself was the word to use in characterizing this action on the part of such a prominent member. But “shirked” was the term which would be applied to such conduct on the part of a less distinguished member. That was the action of a statesman who proposed to give back prosperity to the country by protecting its industries. Canada expected that her statesmen, if they were mistaken in their policy, should, at any rate, be men not afraid to stand by and avow their policy. The country wanted statesmen at the head of affairs who, although mistaken on some points, were not afraid to maintain their expressed policy. He (Mr. Paterson) thought he had successfully proved that he had taken the right step for the protection of the manufacturing interest by supporting a Government who made it their aim, in a revision of the tariff, to attend to the whole interests of the community. The hon. member for Kingston told them that while he should vote for a resolution which gave protection to manufacturers alone, he believed it was selfish; and that the protection ought to be extended also to the mining and agricultural interests. But, as the resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton reflected somewhat on the Government, and would be apt to gain one or two more votes than his own, he decided to sacrifice the farmers and the miners. But the hon. gentleman said he would again introduce his resolution, but the country would estimate it at its proper worth when they found the hon. gentleman had attempted to vote it down himself. What had been the course of the hon. member for Kingston in regard to the agricultural interests. Neither by resolution or speech had he expressed himself in favour of putting a duty on flour. They did not want resolutions which meant nothing, and they wished to learn what duties it was proposed to put on flour and grain. The hon. gentleman might not be able to state this in his motion, but he could not be prevented from doing so in his speech. They desired to learn the duties proposed on flour, wheat and corn in order that they might judge the question intelligently. The hon. gentleman had not committed himself in this connection. He would call the attention of the House to the course pursued by the hon. gentleman in this regard last year. It would be remembered that the hon. gentleman while going through the country, had endeavoured to make farmers believe that he favoured a tax on grain and a policy beneficial to them; he had not said so distinctly then, or in the House, nor did the resolution say so, and they must know what the resolution meant. A Committee had been asked for last Session by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) to ascertain whether it would be in the interests of the farmer to levy a duty on grain, and this motion prevailed. He had favoured its appointment, and he had said he had understood that the House would be petitioned in this respect. The hon. member for Kingston had declared that he was loaded down with letters demanding such a course. He had thought information on these matters desirable, and he had said he had as yet been unable to ascertain how a duty on grain or wheat could enhance its price, when we exported a surplus. But, before that Committee had appointed its chairman, the hon. member for Kingston, who had voted for it, introduced the celebrated resolution which he, or rather some of his supporters, said favoured a duty on grain. He had to remind the House that the hon. member for Kingston, in the course of his long political experience and while leader of a Government, had imposed, on one or two occasions, duties on grain. In 1867, the Finance Minister had introduced a tariff in which provision was made for a duty on flour and coarse grains, but not on wheat; but in the spring of the very next year a motion was made for the repeal of this policy, and the hon. member for Kingston then said that these duties were imposed to show the Americans that we were independent of them; but, as they had been found to work against the prosperity of certain sections of the country, their repeal was a step in the right direction. Such duties were again imposed in 1870; but in 1871, during the absence of the hon. member for Kingston, the members of his Government and their supporters again repealed the duties on grain. Such had been their course with reference to this matter; and he wanted to know whether the present policy had more stability, and whether it was a scheme to benefit the agricultural interest, or devised merely to assist in their transference to the Treasury benches. They would, in this regard, have to take bonds from the hon. members for Cumberland and for Kingston, before they could permit them once more to take office,—that they would not themselves assist in strangling the policy which they had declared to be in the best interests of the country. He did not propose to discuss whether duties on grain would be in the interest of the farmer. He contended that this question was not declared in the resolution. The hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had said he was charged by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with the introduction of a log-rolling system, and the hon. gentleman had not denied it, but rather had gloried in what would be considered a disgrace in connection with a municipal council. The hon. gentleman had also gone on to tell how he would make the log roll; he would put the miner at one end, the manufacturer at the other end, and the farmer at the middle, which would be the heaviest part. This was protection to the farmer, who would be made to lift up both the miner and the manufacturer. He held that any member who had no confidence in the Administration, whether Protectionist or Free-trader, or modified Protectionist or modified Free-trader, could vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston. The great Free-trader, the hon. member for Queen's, (Mr. Pope) could vote for it without hesitation. He expressed no confidence in the Government and nothing more; and, by a parity of reasoning, it was equally incumbent on every hon. gentleman who had confidence in the Government, to vote against the resolution. If the Government was unworthy of their confidence, their support should be withdrawn; but he wished to know, if that was the case, why this was not shown. He approved of the course of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) who had called upon the Opposition to formulate, in the House, the charges they had made against the Government throughout the country, and to prove them before a Committee of investigation; until such proof was made, it was the duty of the supporters of the Administration to stand by it. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier), who was a strong supporter of the hon. member for Kingston, had said that if half of the charges made against the members of the Government by the Opposition were true they should be in the Penitentiary,—that the members of the Government should not only be out of office but also in the Penitentiary. Did not this imply that these charges were so base that they could not be believed or could it be expected that they could be believed? Never had the Opposition been subjected to such charges as had been hurled against the Government of the day. One was that the Prime Minister was a poor man when he took office three years ago, and that to-day he was a millionaire, though it was well known how the hon. gentleman entertained his friends and political opponents as well. This charge implied wilful corruption, but they were not prepared to endorse any such insinuation. If charges could be made, let them be preferred. The hon. the Premier had challenged his opponents to establish them, on the opening of Parliament, and on his own account he (Mr. Paterson) renewed his request. If the First Minister was corrupt, they should know it; and, if the Minister of Justice had ever been guilty of taking public money in order to bribe a criminal charged with murder to evade justice, and at the same time had gone through the country and exclaimed: "Would to God I could catch him," he wished to know it, and if he did, he participated in his guilt by supporting him. He did not maintain that the Ministry was perfectly infallible. They might have made mistakes, but he did claim for them honesty and integrity of purpose and ability. In proof thereof, he pointed to the valuable laws which they had placed on the Statute-book, and for which they had fought while in Opposition. They had provided for simultaneous elections, and to their honour it was to be said that, scorning to follow the practice of the hon. member for Kingston, they had acted on this principle in 1874, when no such law existed. A pure Election Law had also been enacted, and an improved Insolvency Law as well. They had established successfully the Supreme Court, which had been previously proposed but not brought into operation, and the country was now enjoying the advantages conferred by the existence of this distinguished tribunal. The administration of the Departments had been admirable and efficient, and he urged hon. members to give to the gentlemen who conducted the affairs of the country a fair and honest support for what they had accomplished. He would ask the House to consider the herculean task placed upon the shoulders of the hon. the Premier. He was saddled with liabilities and responsibilities which he had not incurred, and he was hampered with the claims of British Columbia, and with all the hasty, ill-considered and ill-devised bargains made by the previous Government. There was something like fair play in Opposition. He believed it was the right of the Opposition to find fault; but he did not think the Opposition should blame the Government for matters for which they were not responsible. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs,) lamented the absence of patriotism, evinced by the Government, and he called upon the Government to resign; but the Government did not vacate their seats in response to his appeals. If the hon. member for North Ontario laid so much stress upon patriotism, he might show it by purchasing only those articles made in Canada, even if they were dearer than those made in the United States. A great many members had alluded to the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk made last year. It had been charged upon that hon. gentleman that his speech last year was a strong protection speech, and that this year he had entirely changed his ground. It might be that the hon. gentleman had made a mistake, but it might be that he was consistent. The position taken by the hon. member last year was that the protection to manufactures was in the interest of the consumers as well as of the manufacturers to a certain extent, and that this protection was given by the policy of the Government. Precisely the same views had been expressed by him this year. He held it to be the duty of the Government, when raising the tariff, to levy upon manufactured goods and to protect manufacturers in this country. Garbled extracts of the speech of the hon. gentleman had been made, but those who took the speech as it was delivered, would find that that speech of last year and the speech he had delivered this year were identical in principle. What did the hon. gentleman say in that speech?

Mr. PATERSON.

"I had believed that protection, to a certain extent and certain limits, would benefit the country."

And this was the policy which had been inaugurated and maintained by this Government. The hon. member went on to say:

"Although protection has conferred great benefits upon the United States, I think it can be clearly shown that the amount of protection in that country has been altogether greater than necessary for the purpose of promoting its interests; and, in consequence of that, over-protection, monopolies and rings were created, and a gambling element was introduced into all business transactions."

The hon. member used precisely the same language in his speech this year. Further down he went on to say:

"I am satisfied that the manufacturers of the United States, through lobbying, obtained vastly more protection than they were entitled to, or the country should have granted."

The hon. member for North Norfolk said that this year. His speeches would be found to be a strong argument in favour of maintaining the present policy. He (Mr. Paterson) agreed with the hon. gentleman that the policy of the present Government was one which would secure the revenue, and, at the same time, promote the interests of the country; and, therefore he would give them his support.

Mr. McNAB said, as a farmer and as representing a farming constituency, and believing that the sentiments which he held were held by the great bulk of the farmers of Canada, he felt it to be his duty to offer a few observations to the House, and in doing so he would not endeavour to discuss the general policy of the Government or attempt to discuss the consistencies or inconsistencies of any parties in the House, but he would endeavour to look at the matter from a rational and common-sense point of view, and to look at the two fiscal policies which were submitted for the consideration of the House, and to choose that which was best calculated to promote the interests of the country. The original motion and the two amendments now in the Speaker's hand indicated two very distinct policies. The motion of the Minister of Finance proposed a revenue tariff, or, in other words, he proposed to put duty on dutiable goods as lightly as possible, so that it was sufficient for the revenue, without regard to the protection of the interest of any one class of the community, while at the same time it would provide incidental protection to the extent of 17½ per cent. upon the industries of Canada. The amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) proposed the principle of protection as the basis of our fiscal policy. In other words, it proposed that the Customs duties should be imposed upon imported foreign goods to such an extent as would enable the Canadian manufacturers to charge higher prices, and to carry on their business more profitably, and to secure to the manufacturers of Canada the whole of the consumers of Canada as their customers. He presumed it would be admitted as a sound principle that that was the best fiscal policy which benefitted the largest number of the people—that the guiding principle of the Government, as well as of the House, ought to be the old motto, the greatest possible good to the greatest number. He intended to look at the population of the Dominion and its various classes, and then to see how the different policies enunciated would affect them. It had been estimated that the manufacturers of this Dominion represented about one-twentieth of the entire population; and, if were added to them all those engaged in the various branches of commerce, as well as those engaged in the various professions and other callings other than manufacturing, they would in all make one-tenth of the entire population, leaving nine-tenths engaged actively in pursuits of agriculture. It had been the habit of Protectionists to say that manufactories built up the farmers, and that the manufacturing interest built up the farming interest. It had been also said that cities and towns which were largely interested in manufactures built up the country. From his point of view, the reverse of that statement was the fact. If the towns and cities of the Dominion were by some accident wiped out to-morrow, the country would be still able to prosper, and would create and build up new towns and cities. But, if a similar accident were to befall the country, the cities and towns could not sustain themselves, much less could they create and build up a new country. It followed, therefore, that the agricultural interest was the great interest of this Dominion. The artisan took the products of other men's hands and gave them the finishing touch. But the farmer went directly to the soil and brought from it, by hard labour and careful industry, the prime necessities of life, without which no community could long subsist. Therefore, whether they looked at the large numbers engaged in the agricultural industry, or at the character of the work itself, they were forced to the conclusion that the great agricultural interest was the predominating interest of this country; and that upon it must every other interest ultimately depend for its success. If these statements were correct, they might then enquire what fiscal policy was best adapted to promote that great interest. In pursuing that enquiry, he thought it would be fair and reasonable to appeal to the experience and judgment of practical farmers themselves. It had been the habit sometimes to look upon farmers as of secondary importance. He had been taunted with being a rough and horny-handed farmer. In his late election contest he was taunted with that statement, but he accepted the taunt as the highest compliment. He was not ashamed to have his hands soiled with honest labour, especially with agricultural labour. He felt it no disgrace to belong to that noble class who traced their origin to the very commencement of time. He felt, as he had said, that it would be fair to appeal to the judgment of practical farmers, in this House and outside, as to which of the two fiscal policies he had endeavoured to indicate was best calculated to advance this great agricultural interest, upon which the other interests so much depended. The system of high protective duties meant, if it meant anything at all, an increased value to the manufactured articles of this country. It meant that the manufacturers of goods, implements, &c., would be able to command a higher market for their manufactures. If it did not mean that, it was of no benefit at all to manufacturers to get protection. So evident was this that the more honest Protectionists admitted freely that protection meant that they would get higher prices for their goods. Then it followed that an increased cost must be given to every article consumed by the farmer. As a practical farmer, he appealed to every farmer in this House and the country whether the secret of successful farming did not lie more in the farmer being able to keep down his annual expenditure than in the amount he might receive from the surplus products of his dairy and farm. If it was true that a highly protective tariff tended to increase the cost of the farmer's living, and that the success of farming lay in keeping down the cost, it must be evident to every reflective mind that protection was a bad system for the farmer. He was free to admit that it might be a benefit to the manufacturer for a certain length of time. It would give a stimulus to the manufacturing industry. The manufacturer would be able to command a higher price, because the Canadian farmer with his family must purchase from the native manufacturer, as he had not the opportunity of getting foreign manufactures. He (Mr. McNab) might not seek to go any further to establish his case, but the manufacturer would say that protection would, notwithstanding, give a set-off to the farmer in the way of an increased price for his surplus products. That was the rock upon which Protectionists split. There was the great mistake which Protectionists and hon. members who advocated protection made, as he believed, in consequence of a want of the practical experience which practical farmers had as to the difficulties of carrying on the system of agriculture. If it could be demonstrated that the farmer would be equally well off by giving this advantage to the manufacturer, he would be quite willing to let the manufacturer have that advantage. But hon. members who had preceded him had shown that we were an exporting country in regard to all those cereals, a tax on which they said would benefit us. He argued that any amount of duties which might be placed upon American coarse grains, cattle, horses, sheep, swine, etc., would not affect in any degree the value of our agricultural surplus products, because they did not come into competition with us. Only three sheep had been imported in a year; no horses, cattle, oats, barley, or beans worth speaking of, were taken into Ontario, though some had gone to the new Provinces. Whatever duty therefore was placed upon those articles, it would not affect our prices or add anything to the revenue of the country. The conclusion was therefore forced upon him that the result of protection to the farmer would be only injurious. He thought he could also show that in the end it would be injurious to the manufacturers themselves. He intended to cite hon. gentlemen opposite as his witnesses, and establish the case by their own evidence. Hon. members were pointed by Protectionists to the United States as a country of unexampled prosperity. They were pointed to the manufacturers of the United States as having a degree of prosperity which was unequalled, and they were told that that was owing to the system of high duties in force there, and to the tender fostering care of a good paternal Government. They were told that in Canada they were injured because they had not these high duties, and because they lacked a careful, fostering, paternal Government. That was a very fine picture, and it was a pity that hon. gentlemen should themselves, by ruthless hands, destroy it. But, while they told them that these manufacturers enjoyed these high privileges under that system of protection which they so much admired and owed it to the good paternal Government, they told them in the next breath that, notwithstanding these advantages and privileges, the manufacturers of the United States had to fly from that grand principle and come to this cold sterile country, cursed with an unpaternal Government, and make it a slaughter-market, and sell at ruinous prices to the farmers of Canada, who were nine-tenths of the people of this country. In the name of common sense, he would ask, was it an injury to the consumers of Canada that cheap goods were placed within their reach; and that they had not that high protective tariff which would prevent their neighbors from offering them cheap goods when they wanted them? By their own evidence, gentlemen opposite showed that the want of this high protective duty in this country was a positive benefit to farmers; it proved, also, that this grand protective principle did not secure all that they pretended it would secure. Under the most favourable circumstances, it had driven their manufacturers to seek a market in another land. There was an old law of nature that like causes produced like effects, and that was true all the world over. All true principles would bear extension. If, in the United States, from the testimony of hon. gentlemen opposite, which he assumed to be true, they had shown that the grand protective principle had not secured for the manufacturers a home market for their home products, but that they had been obliged to come into Canada to seek a market, he argued that, if high duties were introduced into Canada, they would produce similar results, that by a sort of hot-house growth they would overstimulate the industries, and in the end be injurious to the farmers and manufacturers alike. All this must be regulated by the old law of supply and demand. It was impossible to remedy the evil by legislative enactments. He wished to draw attention to the fact that there were no advocates of free trade in this House. It was impossible at present to apply it pure and simple to this country. He was an advocate not of free trade, but of a revenue tariff. He was opposed to a protective tariff, which would be injurious in the first place to the farming interests, and in the second place to the manufacturing interest, as well as all other interests. Notwithstanding what had been said in favour of a revenue tariff, it was stated that the farmers, for some reason, were favourable to introducing the protective principle in the fiscal policy of this country. He, as a practical farmer, denied the allegation, and hon. members opposite had failed to prove the statement by evidence. He proposed to show, by certain circumstances and evidence, that the statement was incorrect, and that the farmers would not have protection as the basis of a fiscal policy. The late election in South Wellington was one instance. That was a great agricultural country, and there the protection horse was gallantly trotted out, saddled and bridled, and well mounted. The Opposition candidate challenged the contest to be fought on that issue. The challenge was accepted, and the result was to send a living witness in the person of his hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) that the farmers of that county did not believe in that principle. In the good old county of Bothwell, the same result followed. That was the issue upon which the election contest was fought, and the result was to send the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) here as a living testimony that the farmers of that county did not want protection, and would not have it. In the good old county of Glengarry, which he (Mr. McNab) represented, the protection theory was trotted out under circumstances the most favourable for that principle. His opponent was a gentleman of ability, character, and standing, who had not been mixed up in the county, municipally or politically; who had never provoked a single prejudice, but came into the contest with a sheet of clean paper, without a single fault. Not only that, but he was very numerous and influentially connected in the county. In almost every concession, he found his first, second, third, and, he supposed, fifty-third cousins. Not only was this the character of his opponent, but he (Mr. McNab) was honoured with a very strong outside influence against him. He had the pleasure of meeting the pleasant countenance and smiling face of Mr. Thomas White, of Montreal, who was a very eloquent man, and had the faculty, in a high degree, of presenting a weak case in the most favourable light. He had also the member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), and they all knew that he had the faculty of looking so grave and demure that he would almost convince anyone that he himself at least was firmly convinced of the correctness of his positions, whatever difficulties others might have. He had also Mr. Davidson, a gentleman of influence in Montreal; Colonel A. Stephenson and some French friends, and also the local member for the neighbouring county of Prescott, who had a large medical practice in Glengarry; and a number of merchants, also from the county of Prescott, who were Protectionists, and did a large trading business in the rear of the county of Glengarry. All this influence was used for weeks before the election against him, and in favour of the Protectionist candidate, Mr. McLennan. But the result showed that the honest and independent electors of Glengarry could neither be cajoled nor coaxed into a belief of the protection theory, and the result was that he (Mr. McNab) was returned by a handsome majority as the representative of a revenue tariff as opposed to a protection tariff. Prince Edward Island had also spoken out on this question. The hon. member for Queen's county (Mr. Pope), who strongly desired the defeat of the Government, was forced, by the strength of public opinion in that Province, to declare himself in favour of a free-trade policy as against a protection policy. He was very much amused the other evening at the very pathetic appeal of the member for Kingston in behalf of the farmers of Canada. He was extremely obliged for the kind sympathy the hon. gentleman had shown towards the poor farmers; but it very soon became evident that his sympathy was more apparent than real. The hon. gentleman sang a lament upon the fact that the farmers would be called upon to pay two cents more for their tea; but, while the hon. gentleman was thus lamenting, he was quite willing that the farmer should be taxed for the boots on his feet and the coat on his back, the hat on his head, the dresses of his wife and daughters, and every article of furniture in his house, and every agricultural implement in his field. The hon. gentleman was quite willing to tax all those articles, but he lifted up his hands in holy horror at the proposition to put two cents on tea. He (Mr. McNab) had made a calculation and found that the additional impost on tea would at the outside add only eight cents a head per year to the expenses of the farming population of Canada, or an average of 40c. for each family. In imposing that tax, however, the Government had relieved the farmers of an impost of 30c. a head on coal oil, or an average of $1.50 per family. That article could now be bought in the county in which he lived at from 25c. to 30c. a gallon, while two months ago, it was selling at 60c., in consequence of the high tariff. If any proof more than another were required to show the evil results that would follow from high protective duties on manufactured goods, this fact in relation to coal oil would demonstrate it beyond a doubt. As a practical farmer, he hoped the day was far distant when hon. gentlemen opposite, with all their plausible reasoning, would be able to persuade the farmers of Canada that protection would be beneficial to their interests. They owed to the lawyers, doctors and other professional men in the House a debt of gratitude. Those hon. gentlemen had done great service to the country, and no doubt many of their names would go down to posterity as worthy of being honoured and revered; but, without disparagement to those gentlemen, he must say that it would be no injury to the House as a body if the agricultural element was more largely represented in it. In the youthful stage of the country the farmers had neither the means nor the leisure to give their sons that training which would fit them for such public positions, but, as the country grew older and more wealthy, the agriculturists would undoubtedly give to their sons such training as would prepare them to discharge the highest duties connected with the public affairs of the country. He trusted that the House, and especially hon. members who represented agricultural constituencies, would pause before voting to introduce a fiscal policy which was false in theory and would be in the end wholly ruinous to all classes of the community—a policy, as had been aptly expressed, which would organize a system of legalized public plunder.

Mr. McNAB.

Mr. McNAB.

Mr. WORKMAN said the importance of this question was sufficiently proved by the fact that it had monopolized the attention of the House for the last week or ten days. It was a question of such nature that, although he was rather indisposed and scarcely able to speak, he could not allow himself to give a silent vote upon it. When he had the honour of occupying a seat in the House last Session, he took a deep interest in, and, as far as laid in his humble power, advocated, the policy of protection. While he felt the same interest and while he appeared as the advocate of protection to-night, he was at the same time quite willing to admit that the current of public opinion was not so strongly in favour of it now as it was then. At that time, in the large cities there was a pronounced opinion that pervaded nearly all classes in favour of very high protective duties on manufactured goods. He was living in a community where that opinion was expressed in his presence, and he came in contact daily with manufacturers, merchants and mechanics; and he was bound to say that there was a considerable modification in the tone of public sentiment on that question. That modification probably arose from two or three causes. In the first place, what was last year termed the slaughtering system of the United States had, to a very large extent, ceased. Last year, Canada was over-run by American goods forced upon our markets, and sold at prices far below the cost at which they could be produced here. That had been changed, from the fact that gold to-day was not so valuable, as compared with the American currency, as it was twelve months ago. There was an approximation between gold and United States currency of eight to ten per cent.—that was, we had to pay today in New York or in Boston $100 for what last year could have been obtained for $92. We had also to pay 17½ per cent. duty on American prices, and that increased the cost of goods delivered in Canada. In the next place, he was glad to see that the Customs authorities had inaugurated a better system for collecting the duty on goods coming from the United States. In nearly all the principal cities the duty was now collected upon the whole value of goods, which system also tended to decrease the competition that was felt so injurious to our interest last year; besides, there had been an increase in the price of many articles in the United States. Several of the staple articles in which he was interested—iron, cut nails and spikes—which were formerly sent into Canada in very large quantities, had this year almost entirely ceased to be imported. Those articles were either supplied by our own people or were imported from England, so that the competition of the United States in that direction had almost ceased. He believed that it was also the case in certain articles of dry goods and prints. He was informed by gentlemen in that trade that there was not so much competition as last year. Notwithstanding all this, he should have been pleased indeed had the hon. the Finance Minister announced to the House a small increase on the duties which existed. He would have liked to have seen the 17½ per cent. duty increased to 20 per cent. He thought a moderate increase would have met the just wants of the farmers, manufacturers, importers and merchants, and given general satisfaction to those parties who heretofore had been so much dissatisfied. The Government had not done so, and for that reason he could not vote with them on this occasion. He would vote for the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton, because he believed it was a straightforward, candid and open motion, and one that expressed in clear language the position that some other Protectionists and himself occupied in this House. Before proceeding any further, he would like the permission of the House to refer to a question somewhat personal to himself. In his absence, a letter was written by an old friend of his, Mr. George Stephen, of Montreal, which was published in two or three newspapers. He had the authority of that gentleman for stating that the letter was written under a misapprehension of certain expressions he made use of in reference to the coal question. He thought it only just to explain to the House that what was imputed to him on that occasion and printed in the Montreal newspapers was incorrect. The reports in the Globe, Mail, and Ottawa Citizen were quite different. He had been furnished with the report of his remarks from the Hansard, and what he did say on the 2nd of March, in regard to Mr. MacKay's motion, was:

Mr. McNAB.

"I am a manufacturer, and a Protectionist to a moderate extent, and looking at the question from that point of view, I cannot agree to the imposition of the proposed duty on coal."

The words "partial Protectionist" had been incorrectly put into his mouth, On account of this phrase Mr. Stephen, who took exception to it, had soundly rated him in the newspapers. He thought that Mr. Stephen had made a great mistake in transgressing the bounds of common courtesy in order to attack him in his private business transactions and to impute to him motives which were groundless. He was, however, quite willing to acquit Mr. Stephen of any desire to injure his private character. The sentiments he had expressed were entirely in harmony with what he had stated on the floor of this House on the 29th February, 1876, when he had had the honour of moving a resolution favouring protection. He had then said he had always been to a moderate extent a Protectionist, but he confessed the prevalent sentiments among his constituents in Montreal West went beyond the ideas he had favoured on this question. The proposal to place a duty on coal was not new to him; it had occupied the attention of the House five or six years ago, when he opposed it in every possible way. He had visited his constituents a short time since, and as far as possible he had made himself acquainted with their views on this question. He had also requested a very intelligent mechanic and small manufacturer to ascertain the opinions of the people on it, and he had received in reply last Monday the following letter:—

MONTREAL, March 12th, 1877.

DEAR SIR: I have seen quite a large number of manufacturers and mechanics in this city and ascertained their views in relation to the proposed duty of fifty cents per ton on coal as advocated by several members of Parliament; and I have found them all most strenuously opposed to any duty being placed on coal. They tell me that they cannot see the justice of taxing an article so much used in manufactures and for domestic purposes also, and they believe that such a duty would work most injuriously, especially in the two Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I may add that I thoroughly coincide with them in this view. Most of the mechanics I have seen are, owing to their great intelligence and influence amongst their fellow workmen, representative mechanics, and, therefore, they express the sentiments of the large majority of the employes of Montreal and its vicinity."

He thought he was quite justified, under the circumstances, in opposing the motion of the hon. member for Kingston. He had found that at least nineteen-twentieths of the manufacturers of Montreal whom he had seen took the same ground. He was also opposed to the imposition of a duty on grain of any kind, especially wheat. When a duty had been placed on wheat some years ago, he had been continually besieged with complaints, owing to the annoyance caused in the transshipment of grain in Montreal. Great delays were occasioned, and demurrage was frequently claimed. As the then representative of Montreal Centre, he was supposed to have been instrumental in having the duty imposed, which was not the case. The changes now made in the tariff, he confessed, did not satisfy him as much as could be desired. He regretted the increased tax on malt, which would add to the price of a popular beverage; this duty was equal to 76c. on every bushel of malt, and it was higher and more oppressive than any similar duty in any other country. He could have selected twenty articles now on the free list, on which could be imposed duties which would have altogether obviated these changes. The additional two cents per pound on tea was a mere trifle. He did not believe that it would increase the cost of tea to the consumer.

He would have preferred to have seen iron tubes and piping placed on the 10 instead of the 17½ per cent. list. He could not see why these articles had remained so long on the free list; we did not manufacture them and they ought to contribute to the revenue. As a manufacturer, he believed the free list was much too extensive. It might with advantage be curtailed very materially. If the Ministers of Customs and Finance had accepted his advice, this would have been done, but they had not seen fit to do so, which he much regretted.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why do you not vote against them?

Mr. WORKMAN: I will do so on this occasion; and, if my vote would turn them out of office, I would cast it against them to-night.

An HON. MEMBER: But you know it will not do it.

Mr. WORKMAN said he was well aware of this fact. He had tried it last year. A manufacturer had told him he was perfectly satisfied with the increased duty on thread and spools from 10 to 17½ per cent., and the imposition of 10 per cent. on the raw material. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McNab) had said that the imposition of what he called Protectionist duties increased the price of goods to the farmer.

An HON. MEMBER: That is so.

Mr. WORKMAN said he was prepared to prove the contrary. He could show by figures and by reference to his books and those of other merchants that to-day the farmers of Canada were buying much better scythes, forks, reaping machines, chains, spades, shovels, &c., at much lower prices than when the duties were only 2½ per cent; therefore, the argument he had alluded to was a perfect fallacy. As a manufacturer, he was satisfied with the present protection, which had greatly stimulated our industries, but other manufacturers wished to secure more protection, and consequently, he was obliged to support the movement. His own opinion, however, was that if an industry could not exist under a 17½ per cent. tariff, its doors ought to be closed.

Mr. WORKMAN.

An HON. MEMBER: You do not believe that.

Mr. WORKMAN repeated that this was his opinion as well as the opinion of Mr. George Stephen. A large majority, however, did not take the same view; therefore he was prepared to advocate a twenty per cent. tariff, but beyond that he was not inclined to go. He believed the hon. member from South Ontario agreed with him in this opinion.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): It depends on what the articles are.

Mr. WORKMAN said he referred to the present 17½ per cent. list. He highly approved of the manner in which the recent loan had been negotiated in London. The price obtained was most satisfactory. The firms of Barings and Glyn's were preëminent among the banking institutions of London, and they would scorn to give such advice to the Finance Minister as would enable them to make money dishonestly out of the transaction. If they merited the imputations cast upon their good faith, they should no longer be the agents of the Government. As to the ordinary quotations of stocks in the newspapers, they were not to be depended on with regard to large loans. The whole country ought to be and was satisfied with the price obtained. The Finance Minister should receive their thanks for having placed the loan on such favourable terms, and for having, as it were, re-established the credit of Canada at the very highest point.

Mr. FARROW said that, in 1874, the Government added $3,000,000 of taxes to the people of the country. Since they had been in power, they had been three times to the old country to borrow money, and had increased the public debt to about $45,000,000. The Government seemed to fight hard for office and the country knew it. The hon. the Minister of the Interior rose at about three o'clock, and spent all the evening talking about something of which he knew nothing, and respecting which no person seemed to understand what he was saying. He (Mr. Farrow) had wondered why the people of Bothwell had elected him, but the reason was now apparent; the electors could not understand what the hon. member said; and, therefore, they thought he must be a clever man. He (Mr. Farrow) was a representative of one of the wealthiest constituencies in Ontario. In his constituency there were various industries—agricultural, mining and manufacturing. He considered that the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston was just the motion which would suit them, and, if any hon. member could give a conscientious vote upon it, he could do so. He could not conceive of any of his constituents being opposed to it. His constituents had a large interest in the salt trade, and the hon. members for Centre Huron (Mr. Horton) and South Huron (Mr. Greenway) knew how that industry had been struggling. They had been struggling and crying out for years against the unjust tariff, for, whilst the Canadian salt dealers had a duty of 35c. a barrel placed on salt exported to the United States, the latter country was allowed to send salt into the Dominion free. Canadian salt manufacturers asked that the same check which was put upon them should be imposed on American manufacturers. The proposed tariff was only one which a mixer or a muddler would have framed. Take the duty on malt for instance. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Greenway) said he wished the Government would put such a duty on malt that beer could not be manufactured. But, as long as people would drink, it was certainly better that they should drink the mildest of liquors, and that the duties should be placed on ardent spirits that killed at sight. Would hon. gentlemen say that they had reached the maximum of taxation on whiskey, rum, gin and brandy? In his opinion, they had not begun to touch it. Previously, there was a tax of $1 on what represented a barrel of beer, but now the tax was $2 a barrel. There was also a license of 50c. a barrel, which made the total direct tax $2.50 per barrel. In the United States the total duty on beer was only $1. The Government contended that, if they slightly increased the duty on whiskey, there would be much smuggling from the United States. If this were so, the policy of the Government completely precluded the idea of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. It was a direct stab against temperance. In 1873 the Premier was one of the greatest temperance men in this country. His followers, of whom he had a great many, were temperance men. The Grand Lodge was sitting at Toronto, and they sent Mr. Knowlton to interview Mr. Mackenzie, and Mr. Knowlton came back with a glowing account of the hon. the Premier's intentions. The hon. the Premier assured him that he was an abstainer and a Prohibitionist, and would do all he could to obtain a Prohibitory Liquor Law. This statement fired the heart of the late respected Mr. Malcolm Cameron, who told the people there, when his election came on, to accept the hon. the Premier's statement; Mr. Cameron was afterwards disappointed. The Premier and his followers came into power. Their majority was about 114. Now was the time to carry this great measure. But how did the Government act in 1874? They went to work very zealously and expended $1,200. They could have gone into the Library and obtained books which would have given them all the information they required, and the report of the Commissioners did not throw any new light on the subject, although it was favourable to the working of the Maine Liquor Law. In 1875, Mr. Ross, of Middlesex, the champion of the temperance cause, became ashamed of the Government, and he sought by some means to cover up their retreat by the following motion submitted on 15th March, 1875:—

“That the House go into Committee on resolutions declaring the expediency of the total prohibition of the importation and manufacturing and sale of spirituous liquors.”

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) brought the Government face to face with the darling project of their lives by moving the following amendment:—

“That in the opinion of this House a prohibitory liquor law is the only effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance, and that it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable."

It was now or never, because the Premier had a good majority at his back; it seemed as if he surely would put the measure through this time. But no; he weakened in the knees, and there was no power on earth which could bring him to the sticking point. One of his supporters interposed to save the Government and moved the following amendment:—

"That this House do further resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the means best calculated to diminish the evils of intemperance."

But that brought the question right back to where it was in 1874, and, to prevent the affair going to pieces, Mr. Ross then moved:

"That having regard to the beneficial effects arising from prohibitory liquor laws in the States of the American Union, in which the same were fully carried out, the House is of the opinion that the most effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance is to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors."

The hon. member for Hastings then moved:—

"That it is the duty of the Government to prepare a measure at the earliest possible date to carry the principles of prohibition into effect."

It would seem as if it was impossible for the Government to escape, but the hon. member for Chateaugay (Mr. Holton) objected on a point of order and the objection was sustained. If the real honest people of this country hated anything it was hypocrisy. It was because of this that the Government's majority of over one hundred had fallen to one of something like forty—scarcely that number. On the 12th of March, 1876, Mr. Malcolm Cameron said:

"They had promised the people that they would let them have a plebiscite, but then came to the conclusion that it was not constitutional."

Who told them that a prohibitory law was not constitutional? It could not have been the Supreme Court, for it was not then existing; it was, presumably, the hon. the Minister of Justice. But he would now turn to the question more immediately under discussion. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had spoken about our sugar refineries, and he had asked the hon. Minister across the House whether he had read the Manchester Sugar-Cane. The hon. Minister said he had. It would seem, however, that the hon. Minister knew more about the subject than did the Manchester Sugar-Cane, although that journal was edited by men who devoted their whole time to the sugar question. The Sugar-Cane had the following on the question of the American bounty, and how it affected Canadian manufacturers:—

Mr. FARROW.

"The committee who are so fond of quoting the report of the American experts, ought also to have read it sufficiently carefully to see that if 70 lb. of undried white sugar is a proper quantity to be produced from 100 lb. of the lower class of raw, 60 lb. of the same sugar, minus one or two per cent. of moisture, is much too small a quantity of hard sugar to be produced, even by the same class of raw; and, therefore, utterly fallacious, when taken as the yield of the higher class and used as a basis on which to calculate the drawback. The whole thing is so transparent a take-in, that it is very unfortunate that Mr. Drummond did not point it out, which he could have done without committing himself to any opinion as to the yield of raw sugar. The best and probably only opportunity for stopping this American subsidy, which is likely seriously to injure the British sugar trade before long, is for Canada to take stringent measures against it. But how can this be hoped for, when the members of this Committee worry, puzzle and brow-beat the person most competent to give information; just as if the American refiners had been brought before the law courts in Canada, and those who interrogated Mr. Drummond were counsel for the defendants cross-examining the plaintiff's witnesses."

That journal further said:

"These gentlemen may be very able politicians, but they were evidently unfitted for the very simple arithmetical task undertaken by the Committee. We hope, in the interest of free trade, that the Canadian Government will make another effort to obtain a simple answer to the question:—With the present duties in the United States, by how much is the drawback $3.60 per 100 lb. of refined sugar too high? On getting a correct answer to that question, and on the use the Canadian Government may make of it, will depend the answer to the further question: whether they prefer to have free trade in sugar, or to support subsidies to foreign trades and prohibition to their own."

The sugar question was one which affected the whole people of Canada. It might be a difficult question as to what had been the causes of drying up our revenue from sugar, but the fact stared them in the face: that the action of the Government had turned the manufacturers out of business. In Montreal, 400 families had been thrown out of employment, and taking each family as representing five individuals, the gross number was 2,000. It was well known that the drawback gave a bounty to the American refiner of 50c. per 100 lb. of refined sugar. In consequence of our refineries being closed, sugar had advanced from one cent to one and a half cents per lb. There was consumed in Canada twenty-six pounds per head, and taking the population at four millions, the gross consumption would be 104 millions of pounds, which, at one and a half cents per pound, the additional price paid, would mean one and a half million dollars lost to the country every year. So long as the refineries at Halifax and Montreal were closed and our trade with the West Indies was suspended, the country would have to bear that loss. The sugar trade represented about 250 cargoes, which would mean that number of additional cargoes of lumber, fish and coal, sent from the Dominion, or 500 cargoes both ways for our shipping. That trade was now done by the Americans from Boston, Philadelphia and New York, and while the Dominion Government were playing into the hands of the United States, they would not move a little finger to remedy the grievances of the Canadians. He thought the people would not long tolerate such action on the part of the Government. Before leaving home he addressed a meeting of the farmers of his constituency, forming the very cream of Huron, and laid before them his views on protection, and, although one-third of them were Reformers, they were in accord with him, and not a voice of dissatisfaction was raised. If the hon. the Minister of the Interior visited the riding of North Huron and proclaimed such doctrines as he had propounded before the House, he would be hooted. The hon. gentleman had declared that the farmer did not lose 15c. on every bushel of barley sent into the United States. When an American farmer obtained a dollar for a bushel of barley, he took that dollar to his family; but, if a Canadian farmer obtained a dollar for a like quantity, he had to pay 15c. to the American Government in the shape of duties. If anything was midsummer madness, it was the view held by the hon. the Minister of the Interior. He (Mr. Farrow) had received a letter from a farmer in the county of Lambton, the hon. the Premier's constituency. The writer, who seemed to be a Protectionist, illustrated the case thus: A drover bought a drove of cattle in that riding and took them over into the United States. He paid $1,000 duty on them and sold them on the other side at the market price—who paid the duty? The drover had some strange idea that he lost $1,000, and the United States Custom House authorities had also the idea they had received $1,000, that it had gone into the public Treasury, and that the American people had that much less taxes to pay. Canada sought reciprocity with the United States in raw materials and agricultural products. It was absurd to talk about protection raising the price of an article. The hon. member for Montreal West had proved that in his branch such was not the case, and the same fact could be proved in many ways. In 1858 the price of stoger boots was from $4 to $5 per pair, but, when Sir Alexander Galt brought in his tariff resolution in 1858, which was called a protective tariff, the price fell, until to-day a pair of boots of that class could be purchased at from $2 to $2.25, and the best at $2.50. Much had been said in regard to slaughtering American goods in Canada, which had been done to the disadvantage of our manufacturers. It was an easy matter for the Americans to manufacture for forty-four millions, instead of forty millions, the additional amount required not involving any great expenditure. When they found they had a larger quantity of goods than was required for their own people, they came to the conclusion, rather than reduce the prices in their own markets or stop their manufacture, to send the surplus across the line. This was especially the case in the furniture business, as goods of that class were being slaughtered in all Canadian towns, Toronto suffering severely in that respect. But the United States did not alone slaughter goods. England did the same. When Lord Brougham found out that manufactures were being established in this country, he declared that it must be stopped, and the best way to do so was to glut the market with goods even if they were sold at a sacrifice, and thus starve out the Canadian manufacturerers. It was true that such a system would keep goods at cheap prices for a short time, and that, during the season of slaughtering, goods might be had a little cheaper; but, as soon as our own manufactures were killed off, the foreign manufacturerers would increase the price of goods, and the Canadian people would have to pay the piper. It was argued by Free-traders that protection caused carelessness, that it tended to enervate the manufacturer, and lead him to make an inferior article. He would ask hon. members who had visited the Centennial Exhibition, if, on comparing the products of the United States with those of Great Britain, such a theory held good. A gentleman present from London, on comparing the mowers made in the United States with those made in England, decided that the American machine was 35 per cent. cheaper and 15 per cent. better quality than the English article. That difference was due to the protective policy of the United States. All that was asked in the amendment before the House was that this country should have fair play with the United States. We had been begging from, and bowing down to, the Republic for better trade relations ever since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty. Canadians had humbled themselves before their neighbours, had asked them in every way to grant improved commercial relations; but the Americans had replied in the negative every time. It was proposed, when some of the members of the Dominion Board of Trade attended the convention of the National Board of Trade held at St. Louis, that the Custom-houses should be abolished on both sides of the line, and that we should charge the same duties as the United States on goods coming from England. But every sensible man knew that the Dominion could not take such action, that it would be discriminating against

Mr. FARROW.

England, and that Canada might as well separate at once as do that. He believed this country should adopt a manly course towards the United States, and say to them: "As long as you tax our agricultural products, we must tax yours in return." This was the reason why he, as a farmer and a representative of an agricultural constituency, would vote for the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. GILLMOR said the hon. member who had just sat down was a most bitter opponent and had tried to say some bitter things. He supposed hon. members had seen one of those long narrow-necked bottles—the less there was in them the more fuss it made in getting out. This subject had been carefully discussed and he did not propose to trespass long on the patience of the House. He seldom took up the time of the House. He had always been in his place and he calculated that he was a pretty good listener. This, however, was a question regarding which he felt called upon, in the interests of his constituents, to make some remarks. The resolution offered by the right hon. member for Kingston contained two propositions. One was the principle of protection, and the other was a vote of want of confidence in the present Administration. The first proposition had been so ably discussed that he would not trouble the House long on that point. The resolution proposed to introduce a National Policy. He had not the honour of a seat in Parliament when the National Policy was introduced, but he remembered very well its effects upon the people that he represented. It evoked a universal feeling of disapproval—in fact that policy had no sympathisers in his section of the country. He did not believe it would be to the interest of his constituents if such a policy was again introduced. He did not believe that protection would benefit the Dominion as a whole. Protection was selfish in every respect. For himself, he was in favour of free trade so far as he understood the principle. Protection was wrong theoretically, and bad in practice. The amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) was decidedly more selfish than that offered by the hon. member for Kingston. He could not better describe that amendment than by citing a prayer which he had heard of and which was a very selfish one indeed. A devout man undertook to pray. He said: "Lord bless me and my wife, my son John and his wife—us four and no more; Amen." The right hon. member for Kingston's amendment was not quite so selfish. He would take in a few more than himself and wife, and his son John and his wife. The hon. gentleman was going to take in the manufacturing, mining and agricultural interests. The hon. gentleman had probably concluded that if he got all those interests on his side he would have a majority and that was all he was aiming at. A vessel was once cast away on an island on the coast of Maine. The captain met a man and asked him: "What do you do for a living here?" "Well," said the man, "we make our living sometimes by skinning strangers, but, when we cannot find any strangers to skin, we skin one another." That was precisely the policy introduced by the hon. member for Kingston. In order to carry out that policy, the hon. gentleman was going to take in everybody, and his followers would probably have to skin one another. There were other interests in the Dominion besides the manufacturing, mining and agricultural. The constituency which he represented was largely interested in lumbering, fishing and agricultural interests, and he did not believe that any of those interests would be benefitted by protection. His constituents were able to manage their own affairs, but were unwilling to be taxed for the purpose of helping Montreal and other manufacturers. It was pretty well established that trade was generally depressed. No interest, however, had suffered more than the lumbering interests, and none contributed more to the revenue than it. Everything that entered into that business, from the time the first blow was struck in the forest, until the products left the shore, had to pay duty. It appeared to him it would be a great injustice for the people engaged in that industry to have to help manufacturers, miners, and agriculturists out of their present difficulties. Standing behind this building, one could see more than one hundred million feet of lumber. Could any depressed manufacture present a harder case? Then there was the fishing interest, which had contributed as much under the Washington Treaty as any other. The very thing that the men engaged in that industry valued the most—their inheritance—was given away to the Americans. Our fisheries were now occupied by Americans to the exclusion of the native-born fishermen. He had listened very attentively to the arguments brought forward in behalf of protection. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had made a speech which the Opposition could not get over. Almost every hon. member on the other side of the House had referred to that speech, which was proof that it was a convincing argument. They talked about his illustration of the dog wagging the tail and the tail wagging the dog. If they could wag their tongues in making such a speech as the hon. member for Norfolk made, they would have something to be proud of. He (Mr. Gillmor) believed that the cause of the present depression was outside of any legislation of Parliament—outside of the acts of the former or the present Government. He believed this depression resulted, in a great measure, from individual extravagance, over-trading, over-speculation and over-manufacturing. The manufacturers of Canada had had more protection than he would have given them if he had power. There was no reason in the world why our people should not sell in the dearest and buy in the cheapest markets, and, if a country could not grow under that system, it could not under any other. He knew it was difficult to introduce free trade to its fullest extent, but the tendency of the Government was to work as near as possible on free trade principles. A great deal had been said about protection in the United States. He would not trouble them with any extended remarks on that point, but he thought the country would have been in a better position to-day if the Government had adopted a different policy. He would take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to the following extract from a Boston newspaper:—

“Protect everything and you protect nothing. But the logic of protection tends necessarily towards universal protection. You claim protection for the manufacturer of iron, or cotton cloths, on the ground of ‘high wages’ and ‘high interest’ in the United States. Every other manufacturer immediately demands it for the same reason. How shall it be refused, since these reasons apply equally to all? Then powerful interests combine, and form lobbies, and a new tariff is carried through Congress, which gives enormous profits to some industries, and destroys others; and yet no one can tell beforehand what will be the result. The network of such a system is too complicated and entangled for any conjecture, and yet this is done by those who claim to be men of experience, to be acquainted with facts and figures and who sneer at Free-traders as sentimentalists; call their statements flippant, and their plans based on ‘merely theoretic grounds,’ or on abstract principles. According to the present English Customs tariff, only seven or eight articles pay duty. The chief duties are on tea, coffee, cocoa, tobacco, wine, and spirits; and the whole tariff can be written on a piece of paper not larger than the hand. According to the United States codified tariff of 1874, more than a thousand different articles pay duty. What is the result? Expense and labour at the Custom House; increased danger of cheating, bribery and corruption there; difficulty in telling what is really protected, and what not; heavy taxes on consumers, which do not increase the revenue; injury to ship-building and commerce; vexatious delays and troubles to importers; constant over-charging of duties, and false charges of dishonesty against honest merchants; encouragement to knavery and discouragement to integrity; the ruin of some home industries in the attempt to protect others; prices needlessly increased; duties antagonistic to each other, and which neither produce revenue or protection; and, in spite of all the advantages enjoyed here in our abundance of land, plenty of raw material and the energy and enterprise resulting from free institutions, a general depression of business throughout the country. It may be wrong to use the word ‘villany’ in relation to such a system as this, but certainly the temptation to do so is very great.”

He heard the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) state the other night that Mr. Madison was a Protectionist. He was always pleased to hear that hon. gentleman speak, but he thought he was mistaken on that point, as would appear from another paragraph in the same paper:

Mr. GILLMOR.

“For Mr. Madison spoke the truth when he said in the first Congress, ‘that if industry and labour are left to take their own course, they will generally be directed to those objects which are the most productive; and this in a more certain and direct manner than the wisdom of the most enlightened Legislature could point out.’ What Mr. Madison said in 1789, Mr. Gladstone said in 1856, as Chancellor of the Exchequer. ‘Statistics,’ says he, ‘which are open to the world, show the immense extension which our commerce has attained under and by virtue of freedom of trade, and the great advancement in the condition of our people over the inhabitants of foreign countries. What it cost us to achieve this blessed change; what time, what struggles, what interruptions to the general course of legislation; what animosities, what fears, what risk of convulsions. These were the fines and penalties we paid to our long adherence to folly.’”

That would be the course if a National Policy was introduced into this country. But, if this amendment was carried, another consideration was involved. It was a vote of want of confidence, and the hon. member for Kingston would immediately take his place in the land of promise; the land for which he and his followers seemed to be sighing. He believed it was a laudable desire for any man to covet places of honour, trust and responsibility; particularly when he had the qualifications needed for the situation. There were certain qualifications necessary for those who presumed to occupy such exalted positions as Ministers of the Crown. Intelligence, of course, was necessary; oratory was necessary. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House possessed those qualities to a very considerable degree. They had had a great deal of experience in the science of Government; but there was a quality of much more importance than those he had enumerated, and that was the quality of honesty. His hon. friends on the Opposition benches were very fond of pointing to the United States as an example of the glorious results which accrued from a protective policy. His hon. friends were fond of imitating the United States in protection, but they ought to imitate that country in the system lately adopted of looking into rings; they ought to follow it with regard to the recently introduced practice of hunting up corruptions. Hon.

gentlemen opposite had long held positions of trust and of power in this country. But the House knew something of their history, they knew something about their policy; they talked about free trade and protection, but we might look through the history of the late Government and we would find that the policy that occupied the most of their attention, the policy which they were most anxious to carry out was that of keeping themselves in power. Hon. gentlemen opposite were tired of the cold shades of Opposition. They wanted to taste the sweets of office again; they wanted the people's money again. He had in his hand the report of a Sub-committee of Public Accounts appointed to enquire into the expenditure connected with Penitentiaries, from which he would take the liberty of quoting. This record would be found in the Journals of 1875-6. He would, by permission, read that part of the report which referred to enquiry into the purchase of a quarry by the late Government at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary in Quebec:

"With reference to the purchase of a quarry for the use of the Penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, it appears from evidence adduced that the quarry in question was offered in writing to the Government by its original proprietor, Mr. F. X. Auclair, late in the month of October, 1872, for the sum of $9,000; that no answer to this offer was received; that early in the following month of December, Mr. E. H. Lemay purchased the quarry from Auclair for the sum of $9,000; that, later in the same month, of December, valutors were appointed by the Government, or by the directors of Penitentiaries, under instructions from the Minister of Justice, to report on the value of the quarry, which was variously estimated by these valutors at $29,750 and at $25,750; that the quarry was offered by Lemay to the Government for $18,000, at which price it appears finally to have been accepted by the Government in the month of January, 1873, and a vote for the money was obtained at the next Session of Parliament; that Mr. C. A. Dansereau, chief editor and co-operator of La Minerve, a journal published in Montreal, took an active part in the negotiation of the sale of the quarry to the Government by Lemay, and in consideration of his supposed influence, or the influence of his firm and journal, he was to receive, individually, according to Lemay's evidence, but for his firm, according to his (Dansereau's) own evidence, one-sixth part of the profits arising from the transaction; that, over and above one-sixth share of the profits so stipulated for, Dansereau demanded of Lemay the sum of $2,000 for an election fund, which he (Dansereau) says Lemay had previously agreed to pay, and that this demand was made pending the election in the county of Laval, in October, 1873, and the money was intended to be used in connection with that election; but it does not appear that Lemay ever paid this sum of $2,000, or any portion thereof. It seems to be established beyond dispute or doubt that double the sum was paid for the quarry than it was offered and might have been purchased for; that the sale by Lemay was effected through the influence of Dansereau with the Government, and that a considerable portion of the sum paid for the quarry in excess of the price at which it was offered to the Government by Auclair was intended to be used in promotion of elections in the interest of the political party then supporting the Government."

He (Mr. Gillmor) supposed the last portion of this extract afforded a crumb of comfort to the hon. gentlemen opposite, as it did not appear that the money was actually paid to these parties, but no thanks to the Government; they took the money from the public Treasury for that purpose, they paid $18,000 for a property that had been offered to them for $9,000. With the offer of nine thousand dollars in their possession, under a hypocritical pretence and in order to deceive this country they went through the sham process of naming Commissioners to go and value the quarry. Was there ever a greater humbug than the report they made? And why did they not pay the price the valutors put upon it? They, no doubt, wanted to show their wonderful economy, so they would only give $18,000 for it, and in doing so they had absolutely plundered $9,000 from the people of this Dominion. Some hon. gentleman spoke of the present Government as a band of organized hypocrites. An organized band of hypocrites would not describe the late Government in this quarry transaction; it would require a different term to describe it and one that the rules of Parliament forbade. The idea of such men daring to charge hypocrisy or corruption on any class of men. The present Government should handle these gentlemen without gloves. If he (Mr. Gillmor) could for a moment suppose the present Government would not prefer to commit suicide rather than do such an act, he would at once cease to support them. He (Mr. Gillmor) had no doubt the late Government had to be very particular when at the Council Board to make a minute of the appointment of these Commissioners, and of the value they put upon the property, and of the amount they finally concluded to give for it, viz., $18,000; but he ventured to say no record would be found of the original offer of $9,000. It was a clear case of public plunder, and a betrayal of the confidence the people of this country had placed in the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, and he knew of no case but one of deeper dye, and that was recorded in the 26th chapter of Matthew. He would trouble the House with extracts from another report of a Committee in the same journal of an equally corrupt character, and of greater magnitude.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. GILLMOR said he would dispense a dose to the Opposition before he closed that they would find it exceedingly hard to digest. The plot in this affair was laid in Nova Scotia, the actors were of the hon. member for Cumberland's supporters, Mr. Alpin Grant being one of the principal ones. The firm that acted as middle men in this transaction was Fraser, Reynolds & Co., hardware merchants of Halifax. The witnesses before the Committee, from whom he quoted, were Mr. Brydges, Mr. Cudlip, Mr. Sadler and Alpin Grant. He would commence at the 4th paragraph of the report:—

"4th. That Alpin Grant provided the bulk of the capital required by the firm, and that W. B. Reynolds ceased to be a partner in the firm at the end of 1873, drawing out, when he retired, the sum, in goods and cash, of $14,000.

"5th. That the firm commenced to supply goods, but only in small quantities, to the Government in Nova Scotia in 1870, and continued to do so up to the time of the amalgamation of the Government railways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in November, 1872, and thenceforward until the end of 1873, and that the enquiry of your sub-committee has been limited to transactions which took place within the last named period.

"6th. That the railway business was given to the firm solely from political considerations, Mr. Alpin Grant having, as he states in his evidence, urged his claims to patronage 'on the ground of his political position, and not at all on account of his acquaintance with hardware business.'"

MR. GILLMOR.

The following extracts were chiefly from the evidence of Mr. Cudlip, the Inspector of Customs, whose mercantile experience eminently qualified him to investigate this transaction; and, although there were depths of infamy and frauds practised upon the revenue which he failed to find out, yet sufficient was proved to show the depths of political degradation to which they had descended. Mr. Brydges stated:

"Again, in their account for April, 1873, in one item of 20 boxes of M. F. charcoal tin plates, which is charged at $305, I find the invoice for those 20 boxes of tin, which, including freight to Halifax, is £42, or $204. In the same account engine oil is charged at 50 cents a gallon, when the invoice from Boston shows that it was charged to them at 32 cents, United States currency, at Boston. I have ascertained from large importing houses in Montreal that the difference between United States currency and gold will about equal the cost and charges of importation. In this case, therefore, 50c. a gallon was paid to Fraser, Reynolds & Co. for what cost them 32c. a gallon. Twenty tons eleven cwt. of iron is invoiced to Fraser, Reynolds & Co. from Liverpool late in March, 1873, of various sizes, at a total cost of £227 lls. 6d., to which add £31 for freight, making a total of, say, £259, which is equal to about 2½c. per lb. In their account for April bar iron is never charged at less than 4½c. per lb., and in one case it is as high as 6¼c. per lb. In their account for May there is one item, for bolts and nuts, amounting to $2,295.98. I have the original English invoice of these bolts and nuts, amounting to £219 12s. 11d. The weight of them was 7½ tons; the freight upon which, at 30s. a ton, would be £11 5s., making the total cost say £231 laid down in Halifax, which is equal to $1,122.66, or less than half the amount charged to and paid by the Government. I feel, therefore, entirely justified in the statement that if the goods included in Messrs. Fraser, Reynolds & Co.'s account had been purchased, as they ought to have been, upon proper commercial principles, i.e., paying no more than the fair value of the articles, with a reasonable profit to whoever was employed as the importing agent, all the articles included in their account could have been purchased for a sum certainly not less than $23,000 below the amount paid to Fraser, Reynolds & Co., provided they paid no duty. If they did pay duty, the articles could have been purchased for at least $20,000 less than was actually paid to that firm."

The following is from Mr. Cudlip's evidence:—

"I have partially gone through the accounts of Fraser, Reynolds & Co., confining myself entirely to those goods imported free and specially for the Intercolonial Railway.

Many of the invoices being missing, as before stated by me, I have confined myself also to those goods imported for which invoices were at hand. Low Moor iron, imported in January, 1873, shows a profit of 59½ per cent. on the cost, landed in Halifax. Bar iron, for best refined, cost, landed in Halifax with duties paid, 3½c. per lb., and is charged at 4½ to 5½c.—a profit of over $20 per ton. In February Low Moor iron again appears charged at a profit of 60 per cent. In April I find tin plates costing, landed, $10.48, charged at $15.25 per box, an advance of 46 per cent. Also, 15 brls. paraffine engine oil, costing 32c. in Boston, and 29½c. gold, landed in Halifax, charged 50c., a profit of 62 per cent. In May I find an invoice of 13 casks bolts and nuts, costing £219 12s. 11d. sterling, and with freight and all charges paid $1,132.57, landed on the wharf in Halifax. These goods are charged to the railway on 21st of May, amount $2,293.98, an advance of $1,161.41, equal to 102 per cent. I observe that there is charged 318 lb. more weight than invoiced. In June, 30 rubber car springs, imported from Boston and charged at 65c. per lb., an advance of 50 per cent. over cost landed in Halifax. In June also, 400 brass tubes imported from England cost £450 14s. 11d. sterling, and with freight and all charges added, $2,238.66. They are charged, on the 25th June, at 50c. per lb., amount $4,895.50—a profit of $2,656.84, equal to 118½ per cent. The iron imported in May, cost with the freight and all charges added, 3½c. per lb. Landed in Halifax, the lowest price charged is 4½c. and 4¾c. per lb., up to 5½c., an advance of 45 per cent. and upwards. Iron being a staple article, and sold generally at a very moderate profit, comparison with the sales prices of other houses in the trade can very easily be made at any time with advantage. In July, 200 seamless tubes are entered at Customs, as costing £235 0s. 2d. sterling, and charged in account $2,539, a profit of over 100 per cent., as in the June parcel. I have no English invoice of this parcel. Low Moor iron in the same month is charged at an advance of 57 per cent. over the cost landed in Halifax. In July, 10 brls. paraffine oil, costing $140.94 landed on the wharf, is charged at $281.40, a difference of 100 per cent. In September, 32 car springs were imported costing $686.96, landed, and charged at $974.30, an advance of 41 per cent. Also, 202 car springs costing, landed, $959.81, and charged $1,516, an advance of 58 per cent. In the same month a locomotive plate is charged $287.65 which cost landed, $119.82, an advance of 140 per cent. In August, 15 brls. lard oil, imported, cost $353.64 landed, charged at 97½ c., $628.38, an advance of 85 per cent. In November, lard oil is charged again at the same price, showing an advance on the cost of 70 per cent. In October, 36 axles were imported, costing, landed, $861.02, charged at $1,442.91, an advance of 68 per cent. The small item of fog signals in November is charged at 61 per cent over cost. All the above have been referred to in the report of Mr. Brydges, dated 21st November. All were imported duty free for the use of the Intercolonial Railway and so entered by Fraser, Reynolds & Co., except the bar iron, the duty on which was paid, and the amount of which is taken into the cost of importation. I have examined some other invoices. In February, I find copper wire charged at an advance of 90 per cent. over cost, landed; also 9 bundles of steel, charged at an advance of 55 per cent. over cost, landed; 10 brls. tallow at an advance of 35 per cent. over cost; another parcel of copper wire at an advance of 65 per cent., and shovels—imported for the railway—at an advance of 95 per cent over cost, landed; and sheet iron, specially imported, charged at an advance of 100 per cent. over cost, landed. On March 25th, I find 2 cases plush charged as imported under a commission of 5 per cent. with the charges added; the amount of sterling cost is stated as £154 ls. 3d., whereas the value stated in the Customs entry is put down at £111 ls. 8d., overcharge of £42 19s. 7d. sterling, or $210.11. There is no invoice to be found of above. In April, I find 7 bars imported, charged in account 6½ c. an advance of 45 per cent.”

About the richest thing on the record was the following extract from Mr. Grant's evidence. He said:

“I was a good deal disappointed to find that Dr. Tupper was not as much delighted at hearing that I had gone into business as I expected; he said he was always afraid of parties going into trade who were not regularly brought up to it and that I was risking all my means and all my credit, which was a fact.”

This was about the thinnest covering of a dirty transaction that he (Mr. Gillmor) had ever seen, and there could hardly be dirt enough thrown to blind the people's eyes in this affair. There was not much danger of Mr. Grant losing his money under the paternal care of the late Government; as for his credit, the evidence was quite sufficient to ruin both his credit and that of the Government who aided him in this wholesale plundering of the people. Mr. Sadler said in his evidence:

“Mr. Carvell took no action when I showed the accounts to him; he said there had been no agreement made about prices and he did not see how he was going to dispute the prices. I understood from that there was to be no complaint made when Fraser, Reynolds & Co. over-charged. When I spoke to Mr. Carvell about their accounts, I was given to understand that they were not to be criticised. I do not remember his giving any particular reason why they should not be criticised. I spoke to Mr. Carvell several times with reference to these assumed over-charges, and always with about the same result."

Those transactions were only cited to show that the policy of the late Government was a regularly organized system to raise money to hold a majority in this House and in this country, and, if he thought the leaders of the Reform party could for a moment think of entering upon such a course of systematic corruption, he would leave them and take shelter under the wing of the leader of the left centre, who, like the "last rose of summer," sat "blooming alone." He knew his hon. friend in New Brunswick, and knew him to be a thorough Liberal, and he must have felt sadly out of place during his connection with that party. Had it not been for the large amount of money raised in that way, their party would have been beaten in 1872. Could such corruption exist in the present party, then he would say consign them all "to the vile dust from whence they sprung, unwept, un-honoured, and unsung." He (Mr. Gillmor) believed the late Government had levied contributions from contractors, and every other source, to carry elections.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not so.

Mr. GILLMOR said he believed it was, and that had it not been for the funds sent into his county he would have sat in the Parliament of 1872. He blamed no Government for giving their patronage to their friends; it was the duty of any party; but the labour or materials should be furnished at fair market prices. The late Government might attempt to shelter themselves under their ignorance, but as guardians of the people's rights they should, and, he believed, did know, of these transactions. Gentlemen aspiring to such exalted positions as Executive Councillors, ought to be men of the highest integrity. Talk about the purity of the Bench, and of Courts—Governments were the power who appointed Judges, and established Courts of Justice. It was only the natural result of such a course to lead up to the Pacific Scandal. That was the time the devil entered into the swine and they ran violently down the hill into the sea. The swine were drowned, but the devil was here still, showing himself in the Secret Service money, and the Northern Extension Railway transactions. The right hon. member for Kingston was quite an actor. Whenever he got cornered, he commenced to put on the pathetic. They had seen a piece of such acting the other night in reference to the Northern Railway affair; there was an amount of money in the hands of that company which belonged to the people of this country, and ought to have been in the public chest, and the Government should have seen that it was put there; but what was done with it, and how was it used? The right hon. gentleman wanted a member returned to sustain his Government. The candidate was posted off to Algoma, and elected at an expense of nearly six thousand dollars of the public money; this was done to carry out the policy of the Government of the right hon. gentleman. It was not enough to provide for the hon. gentleman while living, but $2,500 must be taken to aid a testimonial for the support of the hon. gentleman's friends after he was dead. He knew nothing about all this—of course not; but he knew it now, and let him or his friends return it; and return all that had been wrongfully taken from the public, and then go and hang themselves, as Judas Iscariot did; and they would, at least, leave on record an evidence that they felt some remorse. Such a course would be more appropriate than the one they are now pursuing. This Northern Railway was the medium for still another work of corruption. One thousand dollars more was taken for a subsidy to the Mai newspaper.

Mr. GILLMOR.

An HON. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. GILLMOR said the hon. gentleman who groaned on the Opposition benches, was, perhaps, hungry; and this reminded him that the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Palmer) advised the present Government to give up the ship and let the old pilot from Kingston take charge of her again. The hon. member who groaned so piteously was one of the sharks who used to follow the Government ship when the old pilot was at the helm, and used to feed upon the offal thrown over to take such fish; and not only was the garbage thrown over, but quite too much of the good provisions, furnished by the people of this country, were thrown overboard for a similar purpose. He would warn the Government that the leaders of the Opposition had declared war, and that they were governed by none of the rules of civilized warfare,—they would take any and every unfair advantage. They were now poisoning every avenue of information that went through their press—assertions without a shadow of foundation in truth, malicious falsehoods, and all manner of mean insinuations; for example, the letter which was read in the House the other night by the hon. member from Victoria, N. S., which he received from the Minister of Militia. This letter was mutilated and the spelling so changed as to make the public believe that the Minister of Militia was illiterate, and not capable of dictating or writing an intelligent letter, and he was astonished that not a man on the Opposition side had the manliness to rise and disapprove of such conduct, but seemed rather to glory in it. Some of his constituents, seeing some of the charges made in Opposition journals, asked him, before leaving home, if he thought the Government would stand through the Session. He told them, if half that was said against them was true, they ought not to stand, but he had no hesitation in saying they were deliberate falsehoods; but he said, if they were true, the Opposition could formulate the charges, and examine into them by Committees with the power to bring evidence, and, if the Opposition failed to do so, they might conclude there was no truth in them, as the Opposition would be only too glad to prove their charges if they could. The hon. gentlemen in opposition were remarkably courageous on the stump at pic-nics and dinner parties, apparently longing for an opportunity to meet the Government in order to slay them, but since they had met they reminded him of two men he once saw, one of whom was really savage for fight, until he met his opponent. Some parties interfered to prevent the row. The man most anxious, apparently, to fight said: "Two of you take hold of him, one can hold me." Such had been the attitude of the hon. member for Kingston, so far as any of his pic-nic charges were concerned, since the Session opened. They charged the Government with incapacity. He (Mr. Gillmor) had seen nothing of the kind. The Government contained men who would do credit to any country, and the Opposition leaders know, to their sorrow, that the present Government were deficient in none of those qualifications necessary to the discharge of the duties of their office; and, were it possible, nothing would please him more than to have the constituents of the Dominion assembled here, to hear the Premier riddle, from top to bottom, the best man the Opposition could produce. Yet, he did not expect perfection in any Government, or any human institution. The best were liable to errors of judgment—liable to make mistakes. For such acts as these, he would make great allowance towards any Government; but acts of deliberate political dishonesty, this country could not afford to overlook; and no man or body of men could afford to purchase positions of power, honour or trust at the sacrifice of principle. Dealing, as the Government were, with political opponents, who spared no means, fair or unfair to defeat them, he believed it to be their duty to the country, truthfully, honestly, but faithfully to give to the country, from the records, an account of their malpractices; and if, with the information fully and fairly before them, the country chose them as their rulers, all right; but let them not be deceived. Political party prejudice was one of the greatest evils we had to contend with in this country. The right hon. member for Kingston had repeatedly stated that he was conscious of being a strong party man, and no one who was acquainted with the policy of that gentleman would doubt his assertion. It was to be regretted—

"That, born for the universe, he narrowed his mind,

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind."

His strong attachment to party was manifest when he gave to British Columbia, with a population of ten thousand, six representatives in the Commons, and three in the Senate. Considering that representation was based, as far as practicable, on population, that transaction was most unjust to other portions of the Dominion. He (Mr. Gillmor) represented 28,000 or more, nearly three times the population represented by the six members for British Columbia in the Commons, and three in the Senate. There were ten thousand inhabitants in British Columbia with three Senators, while twenty-eight thousand in Charlotte county had none. What better evidence could be adduced to prove that it was the policy of the late Government not to study what was right and fair, but what would maintain their party in power. It was like the advice given by the dying man to his son: "Get money, my son, get it honestly if you can, but get it at any rate." These were the gentlemen who had all the advantages of education, who represented the different religious denominations in this country, who, at prayer time, were so devout and performed so regularly their genuflections. He was satisfied their successors were a different class of men; they came into power at a time most unfavourable. No doubt they had made some mistakes, but they had not been guilty of dishonesty. The depression in all branches of industry, which extended almost everywhere, had tried their skill and ability, and the fact that today they commanded a majority in the House, and, he believed, in the country, was an evidence of superior ability. Their predecessors had rolled up a public debt, and had bound the country in further public works, so that it required eight to nine millions now to pay the interest on that debt, so that only a small amount, under reduced revenue, could now be appropriated for general improvements. Reference to increased expenditure in some Departments had been made, but it could not be supposed that, in opening up new Provinces, and extending mail communication, and other public accommodation, there would not be some increase; but, in doing this, no corruption could be found. It was hardly necessary for him to inform the House that he would vote against the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, as well as that of the hon. member for Hamilton.

Mr. GILLMOR.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he thought he might fairly crave the indulgence of the House while he made a few observations. The question, as it presented itself to his mind, was not one between free trade and protection. He maintained there was not such a question in its entirety before the House. The hon. the Premier had not announced himself an out-and-out Free-trader, and the right hon. gentleman who led the Opposition had declared that he was an Incidental Protectionist. The question they had to consider was whether the deficiency in the revenue was to be met by the imposition of Customs duties on articles which could not be produced in Canada, or whether that revenue was to be obtained by the imposition of duties on articles which could be produced within the limits of this country. In considering the question, he thought it was necessary to take into consideration the position in which we stood in reference to the country which lay alongside of us. He thought it was an absurd proposition to treat this question in an abstract point of view. We had to consider our position in regard to the neighbouring Republic, and, looking at the question in that point of view, considering that the United States levied a very high rate of Customs duties on everything sent in there from Canada, he thought we would be adopting a policy in our own interest in levying upon such goods a similar duty to that which they levied upon us. Hon. gentlemen might call it a retaliatory policy if they would; he was in favour of adopting it, and believed that a policy of differential duties would be in favour of this country. They had been warned by hon. members, and notably by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that they must approach this question with hesitation, and must be very careful how they framed their policy with reference to the neighbouring Republic, as the effect might be to induce them to impose such duties as would materially injure the interests of the people of this country. He (Mr. Charlton) told the House that the United States was the only market for our sawn lumber, and that, if we imposed differential duties on articles coming from that country, the effect would be that they would impose such duties on our lumber as would prohibit us from sending it into that market. Looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns of last year, he found that the whole quantity of sawn lumber exported to the United States was $3,696,911 worth, while we exported to other countries $3,397,380 worth. It was quite true that some years ago we sent into the United States a very large proportion of the lumber manufactured in this country. In 1873, they took from us 53 per cent. of the whole of our products in sawn lumber, but the policy of protecting their own interests had caused a diminution in our trade in that particular article with that country. Had the lumber interests of the United States suffered as ours had? Whilst the Michigan mill-owners and lumber-dealers were in a position to cut us out of the market of the Eastern States, they were also, through that system of protection which had been so much abused in this House, in a position to compete with us in the English markets. He had received a letter from a gentleman in Quebec stating that, in the old country, "deals are very hard to sell in consequence of the serious interference of those going and to go from Michigan." While some hon. gentlemen had told them that the imposition of duties on agricultural products would not enhance the price to the farmers of this country, other gentlemen had told them that they must not impose duties on agricultural products, in the lumber interest; that lumber would be increased in cost in consequence of the enhanced price of those articles. The only article of an agricultural character which entered into the production of lumber now imported from the United States on any extent was pork, and the duties on that article were at present exactly the same in Canada as in the United States. That was all they wanted. If hon. gentlemen would impose duties on the manufactured products of the United States equal to what they charged on our products, we would be perfectly satisfied; but, looking over the exports of lumber from the United States, he found that a very large quantity was sent to the sugar producing countries—to the British West India Islands, to the French West India Islands, to Cuba and to Porto Rico. They had exported during the year ending 30th June, 1876, $3,500,000 worth to those islands, which was nearly equal to all that we exported to the United States. This lumber was mostly composed of sugar-box shooks, staves, headings, etc. If the Government of this country were to adopt such a policy with regard to the sugar trade as would enable us to trade directly with the sugar producing countries, we might ship a very large proportion of the lumber now shipped from the United States; and, if their policy was to encourage manufactures, we should have factories springing up all over the country, and homes springing up for the employés; and whatever we might lose in trade with the United States would be more than made up by the increase in our own consumption. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), the other day, speaking of a duty on Indian corn, said it would be against the interests of the lumberer, as it was largely consumed by the lumber interest of the Ottawa River. That was entirely incorrect. Under 1,000 bushels of Indian corn was consumed per annum in the Ottawa district, in the lumber trade. He believed that the interests of this country would be better served by the adoption of the policy propounded by the leader of the Opposition than of that brought down by the gentlemen on the Treasury benches. He believed the Government of this country, of whatever party it might be, ought to adopt such a policy as would enable Canadians to sell to themselves, and until such a policy was adopted by the Government of this country, different from that which gentlemen on the Treasury Benches were now following, he believed the country would not attain to the position which the energy, the ability, and the perseverance of its people justified them in expecting it to attain.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he had had no intention of troubling the House, but, after the very excited speech which the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) had seen fit to inflict upon the House, he could not sit silent and hear his Province held up to the opprobrium which that hon. gentleman had thrown upon it. That gentleman represented, by the accident of a snowstorm he was told, a certain district, and he came forward before the House and said he represented a larger population than the whole people of British Columbia, while the district which he (Mr. Thompson) represented alone was larger than the whole Province of New Brunswick. When he stated that the members from British Columbia were bought to support the late Government, he would tell him that they were bought to support no Government, but came here as an integral portion, as they supposed, of the Dominion of Canada, and now they were told by representatives of older Provinces that they were interlopers, that they were people who came here to drain the revenues of the older Provinces. They, with their six members and three Senators, paid almost half the revenue that New Brunswick paid with its sixteen members and ten Senators. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would think British Columbia had some right to be represented. He had not the books with him, but, during the last year New Brunswick paid about $1,200,000 of revenue, and British Columbia paid over $500,000. He should like to know what right that hon. gentleman had to abuse them and their Province, and accuse them of being bought to support any Government. What right had he to talk in his excited style about what they were and what they were doing, and what he and his pure-minded people were doing? Was this the principle to be supported in this Federal Constitution? He asked if men from one Province were to come here and revile other Provinces, and say the smaller Provinces with the smaller representations were to be defrauded of their rights. He asked if this was the way to cement the Union between the Provinces and build it up from ocean to ocean. He was surprised that a gentleman of the hon. gentleman's experience, who, he believed, had been a member of the Government of his native Province, should come here and talk about his little paltry islands and the population there, and say that British Columbia was not entitled to the representation it had. They had not come into the Union with a representation guaranteed to them. They stood on their rights and they asked for no more. He had not intended to speak on the subject before the House, but he would say that he disapproved entirely of the principle which had been brought forward by the Finance Minister. He was in favour of protecting home industries and no more. He was not in favour of putting protection upon a particular article unless we could manufacture it in Canada to more advantage than we could import it. The hon. gentleman, with his wisdom and financial ability, had placed a duty of 2c. a pound on tea. That was an article we did not grow in Canada, but he thought it was a very easy thing to tax. Then he put a duty on malt. We did manufacture it, and therefore he was going directly against the interests of the Dominion. He was placing a duty on one article which as far as his (Mr. Thompson's) Province, and, he thought, all the Provinces were concerned, would be a very great detriment to the trade of the Dominion: he meant tubing. We had no manufactories of tubing for boilers, and he was told that it was found cheaper to go to the other side and build the boilers and machinery in the steamboats there, and then to bring them in and register them at a nominal sum. He had a letter which he received last week. A gentleman went last year into an enterprise in British Columbia to build a large steamboat that had cost him about $100,000. He found there were no foundries there sufficient to build his machinery. He could not get the machinery in California or in Canada, so he went to England and ordered the machinery there. It arrived in Victoria last month, and upon that alone he had had to pay $5,600 in duties. If he had gone to the American side, he could have built for probably half the amount and then have brought the steamboat over and registered it for a nominal sum as a British bottom.

Mr. WHITE.

Mr. ROBINSON said he had been a little astonished to hear the speech of his hon. friend from Montreal West (Mr. Workman), who said the advocates of protection were not as numerous now as they were last year, and the principle itself was not as strongly advocated. The men who assembled the other day, however, in the Dominion Board of Trade—quite as great merchants as his hon. friend himself—had congratulated the country upon the increased attention which the principle of protection was receiving in Canada. He (Mr. Robinson) represented a city constituency, and many of those whom he represented were naturally interested in the manufactures of this country, and desired to see a law sanctioned by this House which would promote the interests which were dear to them. They thought that, of all the departments of commerce, that which had suffered most, perhaps, was manufactures—not due to the depression altogether, but to the fact that they were subject to competition with imported goods coming in without paying duty, while the excellent goods which they manufactured themselves, when they attempted to export them into the United States, were met with a hostile duty, which admitted of no profit to them. They did not believe, therefore, in a policy which gave to foreigners greater privileges than to the natives themselves. They thought it unjust, and naturally enough they protested against it. They believed rather in that national system which had been spoken of in this House, and of which the manufacturers had a very good idea. They knew that a revenue must be had to carry on the Government of this country, but they thought the revenue should be raised with greater fairness; that the duties should be placed heavily on those goods which were imported from abroad, which the people of this country could manufacture themselves, but lightly on those which they could not manufacture. What the manufacturers objected to was that they were now placed entirely on the defensive. No one who was placed on the defensive could do his duty to himself as well as if he had a fair and open field. The time had gone by, some thirteen or fourteen years ago, when the question of free trade was so popular, and those who advocated another system were laughed at, if not sneered at. It was the national belief of the United States and Australian colonies, and he believed he was justified in saying that it was about to become the national belief in Canada, that this was not the time for those who held protectionist views to be laughed at, as they were some years ago. He wished to point out what free trade had done for the manufacturers of England, and what protection had done for the United States; and, in this connection, he would quote from a pamphlet written by a Manchester gentleman:

“There cannot exist the least doubt but that our manufacturing position is on the wane. In reference to the cotton trade, the United States and Foreign Europe have already more than overtaken us, and instead of these countries being, as formerly, to a great extent dependent upon us for a supply of goods, they are actually sending the same description of goods here. The same may be said of almost every article upon which hand or mechanical labour is employed.

It has been estimated, by parties who are competent to give an opinion, that we have, by hostile tariffs, been excluded from trading with countries representing over 60 millions of people, and that mostly, if not entirely, since the inauguration of our so-called free-trade policy. Our trade with Russia and Austria, so far as our manufacturing industry is concerned, is in much the same position as it is with Germany, occasioned by the imposition of hostile tariffs; and, by our one-sided policy, we are inducing these countries to extend and increase their manufacturing industries, sending their manufactures into this country, free from duty, to compete with our own.

It (free trade) has already struck down the silk and ribbon trades of Macclesfield and Coventry, the iron trade districts, and also many minor branches of trade, bringing to poverty and ruin millions of our population. It is now undermining that magnificent industry, the cotton trade of this district, on which our position as a nation so largely depends.”

That showed the effect the competition of the manufacturers, protected by the United States, had already had on the English market. In referring to this question, an English journal said:

“That a delegation, representing the trade of England and Scotland, waited upon Lord Derby formerly. They reminded him that in 1861 the duty was taken off from paper in England, and free trade established; that America, and most of the countries in Europe, had protective systems, some of them a double acting one, mainly on exports of raw material and imports of paper; and that, under the present system, the paper trade of England cannot exist at all, and that an effort must be made to get other countries to cut down their duties."

That was just our position in relation to the United States. But he would cite an extract from the Sheffield Telegraph, concerning another deputation:

"That there was keen competition with Sheffield by American manufacturers, who not only supplied their home demand, but were pushing Sheffield in the British Colonial markets, notably Australia and Canada; also, that all hope of Sheffield again supplying America with goods, to any extent, especially with Bessemer rails, was at an end, and that now they must look to their laurels elsewhere. Canada was overrun with American merchants. Its Sheffield hardware trade was hopelessly gone. Sheffield wanted 'reciprocity,' and complained greatly of the one-sided arrangement that kept England out of America, but opened all English markets to America, so that England took every year large quantities of American manufactures."

He would now quote from the Colliery Guardian of last August, which stated:

"That two years since we were sending 10,000 tons of our railway iron monthly to the Americans, and that if anyone had predicted, in the summer of 1874, that within two short years this important branch of our iron exports would be utterly paralyzed, he would have been voted a madman. Yet, such a result had been witnessed."

That was quite an alarming state of things for us, with our small capital and population. He thought he had shown to the House what free trade had done for England; he had given his authorities, which consisted of extracts from influential newspapers and reports of deputations which had waited upon the Imperial Government to urge that measures should be adopted for the relief of certain industries. If he chose, he could produce the speech of Sir Robert Peel himself in introducing the question of free trade to the attention of the British Parliament. That gentleman said that he could not hold out hopes that free trade principles would prevail among the other European countries. Time was too short, however, to go into that branch of his argument. He would, however, quote another extract which he thought would interest the House, inasmuch as it contained information as to the point whether free-trade had extended over the European continent, and was in favour now with the English people. A gentleman who had been engaged in the iron trade for the last twenty years, Mr. George T. Clark, wrote to the London Economist, a great free-trade paper, as follows:

"Unfortunately, foreign countries are all at this time far behind England in their appreciation of the benefits of free trade. To it almost all foreign nations are at the least indifferent, and all foreign Governments, whether monarchical or democratic, are opposed."

But he had yet another authority on this point. The President of the Cobden Club, the Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, at the last meeting remarked:

"My friend, Mr. Potter, said that the 'Cobden Club' was the nucleus of free trade sentiment all over the world. Gentlemen, there is no other nucleus."

• For a moment he would advert to the question of what protection had done for the United States. An English publication, referring to the same subject, said:

"That the American Government had done them vast injury by protecting American manufacturers until they have met the wants of their own market, and are reaching after ours. That the manufacturers of Sheffield were not the only ones in Great Britain who were beginning to feel that a little protection must be a good thing. That the paper makers, the sugar refiners, the cotton manufacturers and others were appealing to the Home Government for some form of protection against foreign competition."

He had other extracts, but they all pointed in the same direction—to the wonderful progress the United States had made under a protective policy. He read an extract from a pamphlet which, he said, contradicted the theories of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was shown that it was the producers in Lancashire who paid the duties. The Government of the United States had pursued a healthy policy. They had incurred a very large debt, the interest of which was perhaps more than that of the English debt, and, by the aid of protective duties, they had been able to pay the interest during the last eleven years, and at the same time pay off $400,000,000 of the debt. Their imports during this period, moreover, had not decreased.

but, on the contrary, doubled. A similar policy in this country would be attended with similar results. He had heard a member of the United States Senate strongly advocate the English policy with regard to the encouragement and protection of the shipping interests, by means of bonuses or bounties to the extent of something like five millions of dollars. Under this system, the Senator stated, in the Island of St. Thomas nine or ten lines of steamers had been created, and these lines controlled the commerce of Mexico, the West Indies, Central America and some other countries. The United States possessed a population of forty millions, while we had only four millions—one-tenth of their number—and, consequently, one-tenth of their products would suffice for our wants. The policy of forcing goods into other countries was one which people engaged in trade always pursued if possible. This country had been used as a slaughter market by American manufacturers; and he was witness of one case of this sort in Toronto, when furniture, to the value of $12,000 or $15,000, was sent into that city from Rochester. It would be all very well if Canadians could retaliate, but this was impracticable. He contended that we occupied a humiliating position with regard to the United States in this respect. If we did offend the United States by adopting a retaliatory policy, we must, after all, look after our own interests. It would not be the first time that one country had been notified by another that they must, for their own protection, adopt prohibitory duties. As to the sugar question, it was to be observed that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) was opposed to the policy of the Government in this particular; and this was a matter of the greatest consequence. He saw by a return of a Board of Trade that, if a proper fiscal policy was introduced, it would lead to the consumption of 50,000 tons of sugar manufactured in this country. For every ton of sugar made, a ton of coal would be consumed, and consequently this would require the purchase of 50,000 tons of coal. This industry would, in various ways, give employment to 30,000 people, and, amongst other things, 350,000 barrels would be needed. He did not approve of the financial policy of the Government; nor did he favour the imposition of extra duties on tea and beer. If a number of items had been placed in a hat, and shaken up, and items taken out at random, the result would have been equally happy. Lord Derby had made the remark with reference to another Government: What is the use of gentlemen being upon the coach box unless they know how to drive; and what is the use of their knowing how to drive, unless they knew where to drive to? He thought the Government was exactly in this position. They were on the coach-box but they neither knew how to drive nor where to drive to. He thought the time was coming when the people of the country would strongly question the wisdom of the measure brought down by the Finance Minister.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn the debate negatived.

Question put, and amendment to the amendment negatived, on the following Division:—

YEAS :

Messieurs

Baby	Macdonald (Kingston)
Benoit	McDonald (Cape Breton)
Blanchet	McDougall (Three Riv.)
Bowell	McKay (Colchester)
Brooks	Macmillan
Brown	McCallum
Cameron	McGreevy
Campbell	McQuade
Caron	Masson
Cimon	Mitchell
Colby	Moffat
Costigan	Monteith
Currier	Montplaisir
Cuthbert	Mousseau
Daoust	Norris
DeCosmos	Orton
Desjardins	Ouimet
Devlin	Palmer
Dewdney	Pinsonneault
Domville	Platt
Donahue	Plumb
Dugas	Popej (Compton)
Farrow	Robillard
Ferguson	Robinson
Flesher	Robitaille
Frazer	Rochester
Gaudet	Rouleau
Gibbs (North Ontario)	Roy

Gibbs (South Ontario) Schults
 Gill Stephenson
 Haggart Thompson (Cariboo)
 Harwood Tupper
 Hurteau Wallace (S. Norfolk)
 Irving White (East Hastings)
 Jetté White (North Renfrew)
 Jones (South Leeds) Wood
 Kirkpatrick Workman Lanthier Wright (Ottawa)
 Little Wright (Pontiac).—78.

NAYS:

Messieurs

Appleby Holton
 Archibald Horton
 Aylmer Huntington
 Bain Jones (Halifax)
 Barthe Kerr
 Béchard Killam
 Bernier Kirk
 Bertram Laflamme
 Biggar Lajoie
 Blackburn Landerkin
 Blain Laurier
 Blake Macdonald (Centre Boldue Toronto)
 Borden Macdonnell
 Borron Macdougall (East Elgin)
 Bourassa McDougall (S. Renfrew)
 Bowman MacKay (Cape Breton)
 Buell Mackenzie
 Burk McCraney
 Burpee (St. John) McIntyre
 Burpee (Sunbury) McIsaac
 Carmichael McNab
 Cartwright Metcalfe
 Casey Mills
 Casgrain Oliver
 Cauchon Paterson
 Charlton Perry
 Cheval Pettes
 Christie Pickard
 Church Pope (Queen's, P.E.I.)
 Cockburn Pouliot
 Coffin Power
 Coupal Richard
 Cunningham Ross (East Durham)
 Davies Ross (West Middlesex)
 Dawson Ross (Prince Edward) Delorme Ryan
 De St. Georges Scatcherd
 DeVeber Scriver
 Dymond Shibley
 Ferris Sinclair
 Fiset Smith (Peel)
 Fleming Smith (Selkirk)
 Flynn Smith (Westmoreland)
 Fréchette Snider
 Galbraith St. Jean
 Geoffrion Taschereau
 Gibson Thibaudeau
 Gillies Thompson (Haldimand)
 Gillmor Thomson (Welland)
 Goudge Trow
 Guthrie Vail
 Hagar Wallace (Albert)
 Hall Yeo
 Higinbotham Young.—109.

PAIRS.

YEAS:

Messieurs

Brouse
 McCarthy

NAYS:

Messieurs

Cook
 McGregor.

Question on Sir John A. Macdonald's proposed amendment put.

Mr. DeCosmos.

Mr. ORTON moved in amendment

“That all the words after ‘resolved’ in the said amendment be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—‘That this House expresses its regret that the Government have not seen fit, with a due regard to all other industries, so to arrange the Customs tariff as to relieve the farmers of Canada from the unjust effects of the one-sided and unfair tariff relations which exist between Canada and the United States in reference to the interchange of agricultural products, and at the same time place this country in a better position to negotiate a fair and just reciprocity in the interchange of such products between Canada and the United States.’”

He said he had been constrained to place this amendment before the House, because, notwithstanding that the facts established by the evidence taken before the Special Committee on Agriculture of last Session showed that legislation was required in the interest of the farmer, and unmindful of the fact that the policy of the Government in this matter had met with the decided disapproval of agriculturists throughout the country, as evidenced by the late elections in North and South Ontario, Cardwell and South Wellington, and even the recent local election in South Waterloo. And, regardless of the unquestioned influence which the decreasing prosperity of our farmers had had in intensifying the general depression in our manufacturing and other industries, yet the Government had not seen fit to introduce any legislation having for its object the welfare of agriculturists, but had only further increased the already heavy burdens on the people and more especially on the farmers by increased and vexatious taxation, such as the duty on tea and malt. He would refer to some of the points brought out last year by the Agricultural Committee. It was then conclusively proved, by a majority of three to one representative farmers throughout the country, that great injury had been caused to the agricultural interests of this country through the unfair tariff rate which existed between Canada and the United States. (Interruption.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will insist upon order being kept.

Mr. SPEAKER called the House to order.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was no wonder that hon. members were impatient. The debate had lasted five days and the hon. member for Centre Wellington had already made a speech on the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: And now he is speaking on the amendment he offers. It is his right.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I don't deny his right. I only ask whether it is reasonable that hon. gentlemen should be required to listen to the same speeches over and over again?

Mr. MITCHELL: I rise to move the adjournment of the debate, the hour is so late. I can tell the Government they will not get a division to-night.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could quite understand that the hon. the Premier was anxious that the debate should come to an end. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) and his hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) both made motions in favour of protection to the manufacturing interests. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) now made a motion with reference to a branch of industry to which he was more especially attached—the agricultural interest—and he had a right to be heard, and as respectfully treated as the hon. member for Hamilton; and the interests of the farmers were not to be set aside in this manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not deny the hon. member's right to speak. But I said it was unreasonable that he should make the same speech twice. It is rather remarkable that the hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Centre Wellington are to take charge of the farmers. Other people have charge of the farmers as much as they have.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not more so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A great deal more so. At the same time, I must admire the versatility of the hon. member for Kingston in making an amendment to his own motion.

Mr. ORTON said it was not the right hon. member for Kingston's amendment. It was not his intention to inflict a repetition of any former speech on this House. He was about, when he was interrupted, to state the important facts that were laid before the consideration of the House through the instrumentality of the Agricultural Committee of last Session. The evidence went overwhelmingly to show that the markets in this country were seriously depressed through their volume being reduced by the introduction of large amounts of farm products from the United States, while Canadian farm products were to a great extent debarred entry into the American markets, and in some articles almost completely stopped. The evidence also went to show that the market for the Canadian farmer was still further reduced by the fact that the Government discouraged the manufacturing industries of our country, and it was shown that it was important, in order to advance the interests of the agriculturist, that the manufacturers should receive fair play. He would now refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1875, from which it appeared that we imported from the United States, of agricultural products, animals and their products, to the value of $18,806,865, while all the market that we could obtain in that country, with ten times our population, was to the value of $12,164,128, leaving a balance against us in agricultural products alone of $6,642,737. And this balance against us was not made up in other ways, for, while our total exports to the United States were to the value of nearly $26,000,000, our imports from that country amounted to $46,000,000, leaving a total balance against us and in favour of the United States of no less than $20,000,000. Therefore, not only in agricultural products, but in manufactures, there was a large balance of trade against us. He would also refer to the amount of revenue paid on agricultural imports to assist in carrying on the affairs of the country. The duties paid to Canada from agricultural imports coming from the United States in 1876 amounted to $135,149, and for this the Government gave to the Americans our markets in agricultural products. But we had to pay to the revenue of the United States, in order to obtain there a market for a smaller amount of our agricultural productions the sum of $2,961,809, which relieved the farmers of the United States of taxation to that extent. These were facts which weighed seriously upon the thoughtful men of our country. As an instance of the unfair competition against which the Canadian farmer had to contend, he would state that, if a Canadian and a United States farmer both went to the same American town to sell a car-load of barley, say of 500 bushels, the Canadian had to take $75 less than his American cousin for his barley, and the latter could chuckle over the fact that he not only got more for his barley, but that the Canuck had paid $75 of his taxes for him; but, if a United States farmer came across the border to the markets of Windsor or Chatham, or any other Canadian market with a car-load of Indian corn, he could get the same price as the Canadian in his own market, and the latter had the further mortification of feeling that, not only the price of his own corn was reduced by the glut of American corn, but that all his coarse grains were reduced in value without the satisfaction of the American farmer paying one cent to the revenue of his country. This was a great injustice, more particularly so to those counties of Canada where corn was grown. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said there were only three sheep imported into this country last year. He (Mr. Orton) found by the returns that sheep were imported into Canada from the United States last year to the value of $23,000 worth. He challenged the hon. gentleman as to this return.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. member for Bothwell was speaking of Ontario.

Mr. ORTON said, if the other statements of the hon. member for Bothwell were equally incorrect, there was not much reliance to be placed upon his statements or his arguments, which were applied to the whole Dominion, as he and the House understood them. In regard to the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior that there was no barley imported into this country from the United States, he found by the Trade and Navigation Returns that there was no less than 30,000 bushels brought into Canada. A like statement was made by the hon. Minister with respect to beans; yet the same returns showed that beans to the value of over $9,000 were imported from the United States. He mentioned these facts and challenged contradiction in regard to them, to show the House and the country what weight should be attached to the remarks of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. He desired to further illustrate the question as to the interchange of animals and products between the two countries. When a Canadian farmer entered the American market he had to pay a duty of 20 per cent. on his animals; but when the American farmer came here he was only charged ten per cent. To illustrate this injustice, he would say that when a carload of sheep was taken from Canada, $100 had first to be paid into the United States Treasury, and to that extent lessen the taxes of the American farmer; but the latter might come into the Canadian market with a carload of hogs and only pay half that amount into our Treasury, and, at the same time, by his cheapened western pork, reduce the legitimate value of the Canadian farmer's pork, as well as other meats, in his own market. Was this just? He had called attention to the large quantity of corn brought from the United States into Canada, and it had been argued that it was an advantage, not only to the people generally, but to the farmers, which he denied, as the greater portion of the corn consumed here was used in the manufacture of whiskey. He felt that, if there was one matter on which the Government might have aided the temperance question, it was on the matter of corn. But their policy with respect to it was entirely opposed to temperance principles. Every arrangement of the tariff was directly opposed to the aspirations of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). It had been said that it would pay the Canadian farmer to sell his barley and import Indian corn. He desired to call the attention of the House to the facts of the interchange and to show that last year barley for feeding purposes was cheaper than the Indian corn of the United States to the Canadian farmer. The price of barley in Canada had not averaged over 50c. this last season. He would give to the House the opinion of a farmer residing in the township of Wellington on this subject, an old Reformer, who had spent a large portion of his life in trying to place in power the present Administration. The letter, which was published in a paper in the county, said:

Mr. ORTON.

"I would say that barley is quoted at 45c. to 55c. in the market reports; and as a stained sample is as good for feeding as a bright sample, we will take the average price 50c. and compare it with corn. According to analysis, 51 lb. of barley is equal to 56 lb. of corn; 51 lb. of barley at 50c. costs 53c., while 56 lb. of corn costs 56c.; therefore, barley is three cents a bushel cheaper than corn."

Mr. GUTHRIE asked the name of the writer of the letter.

Mr. ORTON said it was Mr. Bathgate.

Mr. GUTHRIE said that gentleman had been a Tory all his life.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said the gentleman was the most violent opponent Mr. Guthrie had.

Mr. ORTON said that, up to the last election in South Wellington, the gentleman, as well as all his friends, had been most enthusiastic supporters of the Reform party. He would refer to the exchange of pease between Canada and the United States, in order to show how erroneous were the views of hon. members opposite in that regard. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had stated that a bushel of pease would buy two bushels of corn. There was no practical farmer who would take that as a just and fair calculation. He wished to show the cost to the Canadian farmer when he sold his pease and bought corn. First, the farmer had to defray the cost of taking his pease to market and bringing back corn, which might be placed at 5c. per bushel, which must be added to the price of the Indian corn; and then, it was well known that every bushel of pease weighed 60 lb., while corn weighed only 56 lb. to the bushel; a pound of pease was also, as proved by analysis, more nutritious as food than a pound of corn. Therefore, it would take  $1\frac{1}{2}$  bushels of Indian corn at least for a bushel of pease; that was to say, that one-eighth of the price of a bushel of corn must be added to the exchange. The average price throughout Canada of Indian corn during the last six or seven years, was 50c. per bushel; it would, therefore, be necessary to add  $6\frac{1}{2}$ c. to the 5c., which would bring the price of the corn to  $61\frac{1}{2}$ c. The average price of pease during the last five years had not exceeded 68c. per bushel. There was, also, the loss which Canadian farmers sustained through the competition of corn with Canadian barley, rye and other grain, to be taken into consideration. On an ordinary farm of 100 acres, a Canadian farmer would have 300 bushels of oats to dispose of, and that was taking a very small average. Taking the loss of 5c. per bushel, he would be out of pocket \$15 from the competition of Indian corn admitted free. There was also the question of barley. During this year, when our farmers were dependent to a large extent on what they obtained for their barley, other crops having been a failure, distillers would have used the barley in manufacturing whiskey, for it could be bought as cheap as the Indian corn and would make as good whiskey, except for the fact of corn being admitted free. It was fair, he thought, to say that the farmer lost 5c. per bushel, and it was a fair average to estimate that every farmer would have a surplus of 200 bushels of barley, which would cause him a loss yearly of \$10 by the present arrangement. He need not refer to the articles of Canadian rye, corn and hay, upon which there would also be a loss. Under those circumstances, he failed to understand that we were in any degree obtaining a profit from the interchange. It had been stated during the debate that the price of lumber and of manufactured goods would be increased if a duty were placed on American products, because it would raise the price of farmers' products to the consumers in Canada. That was a very strange argument to be used by the same hon. members who had been labouring to show that farmers would not obtain any larger price for their products if duties were placed on United States farm products, as the country to which our surplus went ruled the price. If a lumberman or manufacturer was compelled to pay higher for agricultural products, the farmer would surely reap the benefit and be able to pay more for his lumber or manufactures. But, if the price of food was not increased to the lumberman and manufacturer, the price of the production of lumber and manufactures would not be increased. It was contended by representatives from the Lower Provinces, that the people engaged in the fishing industries could not permit the cost of living to be increased. But that was not placing the question properly before the House. In order to illustrate the point he wished to make, he would refer to the article of wheat, to show that, though the trade price might not be increased to the consumer, the price might be increased to the producer. It was a well-known fact that a home market was the most profitable, no matter what industry was considered. Every manufacturer knew that a market for his goods at his own door was the best market that could be obtained. If a manufacturer obtained such a market, he could then afford to extend his operations and send goods to foreign markets, because, the larger the production, the less the cost. So it was with regard to flour. If the Canadian miller possessed exclusively the Canadian market, he would get his returns much sooner than when he depended to a large extent on the European market; he would thus save interest besides risking less. Therefore, even though he only obtained the same price in the Lower Provinces for his flour as he would in Liverpool, he could still afford to give a larger price to the farmers for their wheat, by turning over his money oftener, and still reap a nice profit. The House had heard a great deal about the importance of our carrying trade, and that the fact of our allowing American flour and wheat to come into Canada free benefitted our carrying trade to an enormous extent. He wished to direct the attention of the House to the facts in connection with that matter. In 1875, the flour and meal imported from the United States was \$3,000,000 worth, of which only \$58,000 worth was re-exported to foreign countries. Therefore there was no profit for the carrying trade on that article. Of wheat, we imported \$6,000,000 worth, and re-exported only \$3,000,000 worth, and this, if required, could be carried through our country in bond. Another injustice to the Canadian farmer was the fact that the flour of the United States was carried to the Lower Provinces at a cheaper rate than that of the Canadian millers, and it was easy to understand that such an arrangement worked to the general disadvantage of our industries. It would be difficult for hon. gentlemen opposite to convince the farmers, in view of this fact, that protection would not benefit them. The great bug-bear which frightened many hon. members from supporting a protective policy was the cry that it would increase the taxation of the people. It was said that putting a duty on American products would simply be the excuse for manufacturers to raise the price of goods used by agriculturists. He had listened with pleasure to the straightforward and manly statement of the hon. member for West Montreal (Mr. Workman) on this matter, who showed clearly that the expense of articles used by our farmers would not be increased by protection. Hon. members on this side of the House did not desire to augment the bulk of taxation, but simply to put a duty on such articles as were produced in Canada, and remove them from such articles as were not produced. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Fleming) said the duty placed on cereals by the United States was no benefit to the farmers of that country. He (Mr. Orton) could not understand how any one could take that position. A duty on Canadian barley, for instance, must have a beneficial effect on the American farmers, in giving them 15c. more per bushel than the Canadian farmer; and the same argument applied to coarse grains generally. He failed to see the force also of his argument, that the revenue could be reduced by placing a duty upon agricultural products. It had been stated that the price of tea would not be increased to the consumer by the duty placed on that article. We did not produce tea in Canada, and there was no possibility of its being reduced in price owing to home competition in its production, which often took place on other articles. It was a palpable absurdity to say that a duty on an article we did not produce would not raise the cost to the consumer. It was also a fallacy to say that beer would not be increased in price by the additional Excise duty on malt. There could be no doubt that any augmentation in the cost of manufacture would ultimately affect the price to the consumer, and the additional duty was a serious embargo on the consumption of beer, and an encouragement to whiskey-drinking, and, therefore, an injury to the Canadian farmer who grew barley. Again, referring to Indian corn, he might say that not one out of a hundred farmers in the county of Wellington, or in the country, bought Indian corn for feeding purposes. Those who did so, were chiefly rich farmers who lived near railways, and could afford to speculate, and could obtain it at no great cost or trouble. But were the interests of ninety-nine farmers out of each hundred in the country to suffer serious loss owing to the competition of Indian corn with their coarse grains in order to occasionally benefit a few speculators. He agreed with the Premier when he stated it was very unjust to enrich one class at the expense of another. But he believed even the few rich cattle-feeders referred to, if they studied the matter closely, would find that they could raise cattle-feed cheaper than they could buy it. It had been said in the House that to impose duties on American products would drive us farther away from the prospect of obtaining reciprocity; but, if Canada could submit to any greater humiliation than had been submitted to already in the attempts made to secure reciprocity, he thought she would occupy a more degraded position than it would be desirable or possible for any free people to endure; and he thought that, in saying this, he represented the sentiments of every true Canadian. The imposition of duties on farm products, at any rate as far as it concerned the farmers of the western States who obtained a large market in Canada, would assist us in securing reciprocity by creating a parity there whose interests would favour reciprocity. The move in this matter must, however, come, not from the Dominion, but from the United States—that was, if we had a proper regard for our own self-respect. It was utterly impossible for our Government to go again through the farce of sending a Commissioner to Washington to negotiate a Reciprocity Treaty. The Government and country had already been treated with such indignity as would not likely be submitted to again in this matter. He had always held it was unfair and unjust to protect manufactures and other industries, without also affording the legitimate benefits that accrued from such a policy to our agriculturists. In voting for the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton, he had felt that it was simply an amendment in accord with the motion which proposed to do justice to every industry in our country—manufacturing, mining and agricultural. It was a step in the right direction, though it was not conceived in a fair spirit towards the other interests of the country. Even if carried, it would only have had the effect of expelling from power a Government that had neglected generally our agricultural, manufacturing and mining interests. He hoped that every representative of agricultural constituencies, at any rate, would vote for his amendment, and do justice to one of the most important interests of the country.

Mr. TUPPER suggested to the Premier that it was a gross breach of the arrangement entered into on both sides of the House to prevent these very late sittings, to sit to this hour (3.45 a.m.). Half-a-dozen gentlemen had risen to address the House on the question before them, and it was quite impossible to close the debate at this late sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a very early sitting.

Mr. TUPPER said hon. gentlemen opposite seemed very much inclined to treat with derision the proposal to give the same consideration to the agricultural interests of this country that was given to other interests. He did trust that the House would not be forced to sit at such very unreasonable hours. He had no hesitation in saying that this was a course which had led to very lamentable results in the past, and he hoped they would be protected from the continuation of such results. There were gentlemen who, in his judgment, would have now been alive and well, and capable that night of discharging their duties to the country, if they had not been compelled to remain in that Chamber at unreasonable hours. He trusted that they would have a full and fair opportunity for discussing the most momentous question ever before the House. He hoped it would not be necessary to say more, and that the Government would not attempt to force the House to continue a late sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied that, whatever might be said about the question, the hon. gentleman might depend upon this: the House would treat with derision the attempt of two doctors to constitute themselves the champions of the farmers. The House would undoubtedly treat with derision the attempt of two doctors to constitute themselves the representatives of the farmers. The farmers were represented twice over on the other side of the question, and to assume that, because the gentlemen who pretended to speak for the farmers were opposed, the farmers were treated with derision was a piece of mockery.

Mr. ORTON: The evidence is before the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So was the hon. gentleman before the House, but that did not improve the House very much. With regard to the question of adjournment, he would merely call the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland to the fact that this discussion had proceeded for five days, and that it would be absolutely necessary for the Government to ask for another day in the week if this discussion was to be interminable. The hon. gentleman himself had no doubt acted with great forbearance in not speaking very long.

Mr. TUPPER: I have not made a remark.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman spoke on the question.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. TUPPER: Not since this motion was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had been quite moderate, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) had spoken less than one-half the time consumed by the hon. gentleman. Those who sat on the Ministerial benches had taken up very little time. It was quite evident that, since the discussion on this motion had occupied six days, it was very difficult to get on with the business. He would take steps to secure another day for Government business.

Mr. BORRON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate negatived on the following Division:—

YEAS:
Messieurs

Baby	Macdonald (Kingston)
Benoit	Macdonnell
Bernier	McDougall (Three Riv.)
Blanchet	McKay (Colchester)
Borron	Macmillan
Bowell	McCallum
Brooks	McGreevy
Bunster	McQuade
Cameron	Masson
Campbell	Mitchell
Caron	Moffat
Cimon	Monteith
Colby	Montplaisir
Costigan	Mousseau
Cuthbert	Orton
Daoust	Quimet
Davies	Palmer
DeCosmos	Pinsonneault
Desjardins	Platt
Dewdney	Plumb
Domville	Pope (Compton)
Donahue	Pope (Queen's, P. E. I.)
Dugas	Robinson
Farrow	Robitaille
Ferguson	Rochester
Flesher	Rouleau
Fraser	Roy
Gaudet	Schultz
Gibbs (North Ontario)	Smith (Selkirk)
Gibbs (South Ontario)	Stephenson
Gill	Thompson (Cariboo)
Haggart	Tupper
Harwood	Wallace (South Norfolk)
Hurteau	White (East Hastings)
Jones (South Leeds)	White (North Renfrew)
Kirkpatrick	Wright (Ottawa Co.)
Lanthier	Wright (Pontiac).—75.
Little

NAYS:
Messieurs

Appleby	Huntington
Archibald	Irving
Aylmer	Jetté
Bain	Jones (Halifax)
Barthe	Kerr
Bechard	Killam

Bertram	Kirk
Biggar	Lafamme
Blackburn	Lajoie
Blain	Landerkin
Blake	Laurier
Bolduc	Macdonald (Centre Toronto)
Borden	Macdougall (East Elgin)
Bourassa	McDougall (S. Renfrew)
Bowman	Mackay (Cape Breton)
Brouse	Mackenzie
Buell	McCraney
Burk	McIntyre
Burpee (St. John)	McIsaac
Burpee (Sunbury)	McNab
Carmichael	McNair
Cartwright	Metcalfe
Casey	Mills
Casgrain	Norris
Cauchon	Oliver
Charlton	Paterson
Cheval	Perry
Christie	Pettes
Church	Pickard
Cockburn	Pouliot
Coffin	Power
Coupal	Richard
Cunningham	Robillard
Currier	Ross (East Durham)
Dawson	Ross (West Middlesex)
Delorme	Ross (Prince Edward)
De St. Georges	Ryan
DeVeber	Scatcherd
Devlin	Scriven
Dymond	Sibley
Ferris	Sinclair
Fiset	Smith (Peel)
Fleming	Smith (Westmoreland)
Flynn	Snider
Fréchette	St. Jean
Galbraith	Taschereau
Geoffrion	Thibaudeau
Gibson	Thompson (Haldimand)
Gillies	Thomson (Welland)
Gillmor	Trow
Goudge	Vail
Guthrie	Wallace (Albert)
Hagar	Wood
Hall	Workman
Higinbotham	Yeo
Holton	Young.—112.

PAIRS.

YEAS:	NAYS:
Messieurs	Messieurs
Brouse	Cook
McCarthy	McGregor.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TUPPER said he would like to say on the question of the adjournment of the House what he had said before. It was a manifest breach of the agreement entered into on both sides of the House that they should sit until such a late hour. He had listened patiently to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House through the debate; he would have been very glad to have had the opportunity of addressing the House himself, but he was anxious to forward business as much as possible. He had listened with a great deal of pleasure to the hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches who had addressed the House for three or four hours that day on this question, and he must say that, during the period he had had the honour of a seat in the House, he had never witnessed such a spectacle before as one Minister occupying almost the entire day and then the Government to commence banding their supporters together in order to force a division at four o'clock in the morning. He might say, with reference to the remark which had fallen from the First Minister, that he treated with derision the attempt of two doctors to represent the farming interests in this House, that the hon. gentleman forgot the position he occupied in the House when he ventured to throw so undeserved an insult across the floor of the House to any gentleman. Long before that hon. gentleman held any public position in this country, he had had the honour to represent as able, as intelligent and as independent a farming constituency as the agricultural constituency which that hon. gentleman represented. The hon. gentleman had no right to use the expression which he had employed; and the hon. gentleman forgot what he owed to the House as well as what he owed to himself when he undertook to reflect upon any gentleman selected by the independent suffrages of his countrymen to represent them in Parliament. If a farming constituency second to none in Canada in point of intelligence and independence selected him as their representative, he had a right to claim the respectful consideration of the House for any views he might present to the House in support of the gentlemen who sent him there. He thought the hon. gentleman would have learned a lesson from the past, in reference to his treatment of the agriculturists of this country. The hon. gentleman had adopted the same course in the House a year ago, and what did he gain by it? It had been resented in a most marked and distinct manner when that hon. gentleman went into the constituency of South Ontario, one of the finest agricultural constituencies in the country, during last season; he was told how he had treated the agricultural interests in the House, and how he had treated one of the ablest and most independent and most intelligent representatives of the agricultural interests in the House, the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton); and the hon. gentleman was reminded of the ribald and unfair treatment to which this hon. gentleman (Mr. Orton) was subjected, and the derision with which that hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had attempted to treat him as the representative of the agricultural interests in this country; and the hon. gentleman made his defence. But, when the verdict was taken, the hon. gentleman found that, in the constituency in which he, a short time before, had a large majority, that majority had been reversed; and the hon. gentleman had to suffer the penalty of that course which he had pursued on a former occasion. When the agriculturists found that the hon. the Prime Minister of Canada so far forgot himself as the hon. gentleman had done, they would resent the slight placed upon them. That conduct was not to be regretted by the Opposition, from a party point of view, for it was such conduct which had made the hon. gentleman lose that position in the country which he formerly held. But it was to be regretted that the hon. gentleman should descend from his high position, and indulge in conduct which was unparliamentary and discreditable to himself and the Party which he led in the House. It was the first time in the history of that Parliament, within his (Mr. Tupper's) experience, that a Government majority had been used as the hon. gentleman had seen fit to use his majority. The course he had adopted was not one which would meet with the approval of the country. No hon. gentleman on the other side who had a remark to make or an argument to present during the debate, could say that he had not been listened to with the most patient and earnest attention.

Mr. DYMOND: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to answer him?

Mr. TUPPER: Yes.

Mr. DYMOND: Then I say that for a whole hour the hon. gentleman's leader was doing his best to instigate his followers around him to interrupt me whilst I was speaking.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. TUPPER said all he could say was, if the hon. gentleman did create some little excitement—and he thought there was just as much in his own neighbourhood as in the ranks of the Opposition—it was due more to the style of remark which the hon. gentlemen adopted than to any other cause. He (Mr. Tupper) was speaking of any hon. gentleman who had an argument to present to the House.

Mr. DYMOND: Or a remark to make.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not think the case in point affected his statement. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) took a very extraordinary mode of addressing the House, and when he had indulged in a very remarkable exordium, he prepared himself to listen to the argument, but he was astonished when he observed the hon. gentleman take his seat, and the speech which had been looked forward to with great pleasure and great satisfaction had not yet been delivered. He did not think any party in any Parliament had given a more patient or careful consideration to the remarks of the party opposite, than had been given during the present debate by the Opposition to the views presented by the hon. gentleman sitting on the Government benches. Under those circumstances, there was no reasonable excuse for the hon. gentlemen adopting the course they had. As the hon. the First Minister well knew, the speech he made was one calculated to call for a reply from himself. A large number of hon. gentlemen had asked him if he was not going to reply, and he said he would not if he could avoid it, although the hon. gentleman in his speech—he would not call it a harangue—had made some very extraordinary statements.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not speak ten minutes.

Mr. TUPPER said he was afraid that statement was very incorrect. He thought it would be very difficult to crowd the speech into half an hour. The hon. the First Minister had paid him the compliment of saying that he exhibited great forbearance, and he was sure that the Opposition had not taken up one moment of time unnecessarily.

Mr. MILLS: The hon. gentleman has spoken twenty minutes just now.

Mr. TUPPER said during the whole evening he had been endeavouring to obtain a division on the question, and he thought he would defer his remarks to a future date. He could not understand why, at four o'clock in the morning, a majority of the House should be used to force a discussion, and that in opposition to a distinct understanding that the sittings should not be continued to the undue length to which they had been continued last Session. He appealed to the hon. the leader of the Government, as he had appealed to him before, not to force the House to sit to an unreasonable hour in the morning. The hon. the First Minister had said he could stand it, but other hon. gentlemen could not. The House had to mourn the absence of some gentlemen who, a year ago, were bright ornaments in Parliament, but who were not in their places through, in a great measure, the hon. the Premier forcing the House to sit until unreasonable hours. A chairman of the Committee of the Whole was once kept in his chair for six hours, and his life was sacrificed in consequence of it. He wanted to know whether the lives of the members of the House were to be treated as a matter of no moment.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Shame.

Mr. TUPPER said he called "Shame" on those who forced a course upon the House which had been attended with such dire results. It was an unfair use of a majority to use it in that manner. It was true the hon. gentleman opposite had a mechanical majority, as Mr. Disraeli said, which it appeared could be wheeled into line, however oppressive or unjust the act might be. But that majority was rapidly fading away, and the independent yeomanry of the country would resent the course pursued that night. He trusted the House would carry the motion, and at that hour, half-past four in the morning, allow the debate to be adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, while the hon. gentleman had been complaining of being kept in the House to such a late hour, he had occupied more than half an hour pouring out a tirade of shameful abuse. The hon. gentleman, apparently, was incapable of understanding what fair play or fair debate was. His reputation for that conduct, however, was such throughout the country, that it was a matter of little consequence what he complained of in the House. It was not right to complain of anything of which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had said. He would appeal to Mr. Speaker as to whether he had used a single unparliamentary expression. He had said that the hon. member for Cumberland and his brother doctor (Mr. Orton) had no right to pretend that they alone represented the farmers in this House; and he would say so again.

Mr. TUPPER rose to a point of order. The hon. the Premier had no right in dealing with a statement made to change the statement he (Mr. Tupper) made, which was that the hon. gentleman had treated with derision the claim.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that was not a point of order. He could quite understand the anxiety of the hon. gentleman to save himself in the gross attacks he had made. The hon. gentleman had used the most violent language possible within parliamentary bounds. He would repeat that the two doctors had no right to pretend that they represented the farmers in the House.

Mr. DOMVILLE rose to a point of order. The hon. the Premier should distinguish an hon. member by his county.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could easily understand that hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to prevent him from getting a hearing. He knew their tactics; he had known them for many years. The hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Centre Wellington misrepresented the farmers. The policy which they were seeking to impose upon the country was the most disastrous one which could overtake the farmers, and the Government were bound to protect the farmers from the assaults the hon. gentlemen were making upon them. He would have no trouble whatever in satisfying all the farmers in the country on that point. The farmers were not so ignorant as the hon. gentleman and his colleagues seemed to think they were, and, if he imagined that the farmers, any more than the members of this House, were taken over to the Conservative side by the tactics of which they had witnessed such a specimen to-night, he was never so much mistaken. He had said that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had caused the death of several members last year. He had supposed that it would be impossible for even the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) to cast such a shameful imputation against any one. He (Mr. Tupper) had forced them to sit there last year once until half-past four o'clock, in consequence of his speaking three hours against time, and that was the only occasion of a very late sitting. He pursued that course night after night with a view to compel the Government to adopt his views, and they were compelled in self-defence against his course and that of his colleagues to expedite public business by sitting to a late hour. The hon. gentleman supposed that, because he had a somewhat loose tongue, he could insult the majority of this House whenever he pleased.

Mr. PLATT: Keep your temper.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) imagined, because he was allowed a latitude which no else would be allowed, that he could insult the majority as he had to-night. He never was more mistaken. He had said that the Government had lost election after election. They had lost thirteen seats and gained six, which was precisely the ratio of the numbers on each side when Parliament opened.

Mr. TUPPER: Name the six you gained.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he might name them at an early day. The hon. gentleman should keep his temper; he had had his speech and he must behave himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must request the hon. member for Cumberland not to interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, after the hon. gentleman's display of temper, he did not wonder that he manifested that impatience, interrupting as constantly as if he was for the first time in public life. But he would not be allowed wantonly to trample upon the feelings and rights of the majority in this House, and they did not want a lecture upon political or other morality from the hon. gentleman. They were quite capable of managing their own affairs and business without any advice from the hon. gentleman. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had risen to suggest an arrangement for an adjournment when the hon. gentleman stopped him by calling for the yeas and nays. He got nothing by that. If he had allowed him (Mr. Mackenzie) to proceed, the House would have been adjourned, and they all would have been home long ago, but he wished to have an opportunity to display that spleen and ill-feeling towards the majority of this House, which he was evidently unable to control and keep within decent bounds. He had said that he (Mr. Mackenzie) took a long time in speaking. He had spoken after the member for Kingston, perhaps for fifteen minutes, certainly not more, so that no possible complaint could be made of his occupying too much time, and he was sure that the hon. gentleman did not hear one single expression in that speech to which he could take exception. He might controvert the principles advanced, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) expected that they should be controverted, though, if the principles on the Ministerial side of the House ever had a triumphant vindication, it was in the debate now proceeding. The hon. gentleman had stated that his hon. friend from North York (Mr. Dymond) not only had no argument to advance but no remark to make. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would dignify the speech of his hon. friend as an argument, but even the hon. gentleman would admit that the member for North York made a remark. No one was interrupted that he knew of on either side, except his hon. friend from North York and the gentleman who persisted in inflicting his speech upon the House twice.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. TUPPER: Mr. Robinson.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was true he was slightly interrupted, and he was good enough to say that he accepted it as good-natured banter, not as an interruption at all. It would be well if the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) would accept things in the same way, and give up accusing hon. members. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had asked the Speaker twice to mention any unparliamentary expressions which he had used. The hon. member for Cumberland had been called to order repeatedly, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) had not. At the same time, he was resolved that the hon. gentleman should not trample upon the rights of the majority; and the rights of the minority should have the same consideration. The Government would not now offer any opposition to the adjournment.

Mr. MITCHELL said the course of the Government had been injudicious, and he hoped they would learn a lesson, and be willing, in future, to adjourn the House at an earlier hour.

Motion to adjourn the House agreed to.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 16th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS BILL.—[BILL No. 65.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 65) To make provision for the Extradition of Fugitive Criminals.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said the 1st section contained definitions with respect to the Imperial Act. He had, however, renewed the phraseology a little. There was also included the definition of the word "Judge," because Commissioners might be appointed as well as Judges, and in subsequent portions of the Act the word "Judge" alone was used.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 2nd section simply provided that proceedings commenced under any other Act or Law should be continued under that Act or Law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Under the old law?

Mr. BLAKE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 3rd section repealed the law referred to in the 2nd section.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 4th section provided for the application of this Act. It provided, however, that it should not go into operation until the operation of the Imperial Act should have ceased or been suspended in Canada. They had express power to legislate on this subject. The second sub-section referred to doubts which had been raised with regard to the trouble that had arisen between the United States and England as to the operation of the Act of 1870. The 4th sub-section ought to be marked the 3rd. It embodied practically a provision of the Imperial Act, and it was a limiting or restricting clause with reference to Orders of the Privy Council, and it was intended to harmonize our legislation with theirs. He proposed a mere formal amendment in this relation. Hon. members would observe that sub-section 4 of the next section really ought to be sub-section 4 of this section, and he proposed to transfer it. Provision was made with reference to Orders in Council but not with regard to their publication.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said Section 5 provided for the application of the Act, which depended on an Order in Council. The second sub-section simply provided for the laying before Parliament of Orders in Council. The third sub-section, which was adopted from the Imperial Act, provided for the publication in the Canada Gazette of arrangements or Orders in Council. He proposed to strike out the 4th sub-section of that section, as it had already been transferred.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 6th section was practically the provision which existed in England touching the event of the surrender of a fugitive, if it appeared that his offence was political, or that proceedings were taken against him with the view of punishing him for a political offence. This he had already explained.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 7th section extended to cases in which the crime had taken place before the coming in force of the Act, and related to the criminal jurisdiction of the Courts of the country. This was practically adopted, with some slight modifications, from the English Act.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 8th section provided for the appointment of judicial officers to carry out the provisions of the Act. The terms were similar to those contained in the present Canadian Act. It also contained provisions touching habeas corpus proceedings.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said the 9th section referred to documents and proofs. Of course a departure from the general law with regard to this class of cases was allowed. The only alteration he proposed was to insert in second line of sub-section B the words, "or affirmation." He had throughout recognized the fact that affirmation might be employed.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said that the 11th section related to the issuing of warrants. The report of issue with certified copies was to be sent to the Minister of Justice, who was made directly responsible in those cases, as was the case in England with the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Section agreed to.

On Section 15,

Mr. BLAKE said it described the mode of requisition and was a little different from the English Act. The Imperial Act granted power to the consular officers, but it was obviously inconvenient in matters of this character, which sometimes involved delicate investigations, for such officers to make the application. He thought, as a rule, the consul resident at Ottawa should take charge of this matter. It was also provided that the application should be made by any Minister of State.

Mr. BLAKE.

Section agreed to.

On Section 16,

Mr. BLAKE said it defined the proper alternatives upon which an order might be refused. The first and second provisions related to political offences. The third was of a general character, and gave the Minister of Justice power to order the discharge of prisoners under certain circumstances.

Section agreed to.

On Section 17,

Mr. BLAKE said it contained provisions for security against hasty surrenders, and for cases in which a criminal might be charged with a Canadian crime. It was practically similar to the English law.

Mr. DEVLIN asked if it was left to the Minister of Justice to determine whether the offence was of a political character, or whether it was left to the Judge.

Mr. BLAKE said prior sections provided that the Judge should investigate that matter, and that the fugitive should not be surrendered if the offence was a political one. But diplomatic power to surrender was vested in the Ministry, even after the Judge had given his decision.

Section agreed to.

On Section 19,

Mr. BLAKE said provision was made that anything found in possession of the prisoners should, as far as practicable, be given up.

Section agreed to.

On Schedule 1,

Mr. BLAKE said the list was substantially the same as contained in the Act of 1870, with the exception that there were provisions applying marine offences to the great lakes as well as to the high seas, and a further exception in regard to accessories before and after the fact.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend the Acts respecting the Inspection of Steamboats—31 Vic., c. 66; 32, 33 Vic., c. 39; and 37 Vic., c. 30—by diminishing, in certain cases, the number of boats, life-preservers, fire buckets &c., which steamboats are bound to carry under the said Acts, and to relieve them from certain other obligations now imposed on them; and also to substitute for the yearly rate or duty now imposed on them for the Inspection Fund, an inspection fee of eight dollars for each inspection, made imperative by the Act 31 Vic., c. 65, on passenger steamboats exceeding one hundred tons burthen, and of five dollars for each such inspection on all passenger steamboats of one hundred tons or less, and on all other steamboats.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said it had been found necessary to make changes in the Act. It would, perhaps, be more convenient to discuss the proposed changes on the Bill rather than on the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL said he saw from an advance copy of the Bill that the amendments were mostly verbal, with some slight alterations in detail, which, so far as he could see, were calculated to facilitate trade and business. He concurred in the view of his hon. friend that the Bill had better be discussed.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked if it was proposed to provide for the inspection of steamboats in Manitoba.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said there was already a provision in the law relating to inspection in that Province.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked if the inspector had been appointed.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I think he has, but I will make inquiries and inform my hon. friend.

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Mr. SMITH introduced a Bill (No. 83) To amend the Acts relating to the inspection of steamboats.

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

IX.—IMMIGRATION AND QUARANTINE.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee).

55. Immigration and Quarantine..... $120,550

Consideration of proposed vote resumed.

Mr. POPE (Compton) called attention to the increased expense of maintaining immigration agents at Chicago, Detroit and other points in the United States. He found that these agents were not well received in the United States, and believed it would be better to pay the men a commission.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT stated that the Government intended abolishing the Detroit agency, and had given the gentleman in charge there notice of the discontinuance of his office. The agency at Chicago was but a temporary one. The one at Worcester had proved of considerable utility in regard to Icelandic immigration to Manitoba.

Mr. RYAN asked whether the Government intended to appoint an agent at Duluth on behalf of Manitoba. A good live man, not afraid of his work, could do much good in preventing new comers from being taken away by the Americans. The agent should have authority to run down the line when he heard of the arrival of immigrants and to go with them as far as Moorehead, the head of navigation on the Red River. He had not pressed this subject before as there had been in the Province a season of depression.

Mr. SINCLAIR remarked that he saw that $800 was put down for the expenses of an agent in Prince Edward Island. The agent, however, was not appointed, and he hoped the Government would soon appoint him. There was a large emigration of young men from Prince Edward Island to the United States, and if an agent was appointed he could give them such information as would induce them to go to our Western country.

Mr. BLANCHET drew attention to the fact that the two physicians appointed to attend to sick immigrants at Point Lévis, resided on the opposite side of the river, and that sometimes there was much suffering on account of sick immigrants having no one to look after them. He suggested that one of the physicians should be required to live on the Lévis side.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT promised to confer with his colleagues on the matter.

Mr. WALLACE said he considered the appropriation would be a waste of public money, when we had so many people in Canada who could not obtain employment. In Toronto he had heard lately of a man starving to death. Neither did he see why the Government should be trying to induce people from Ontario to settle in Manitoba when there was such an unjust discrimination towards them as compared with foreigners. In this connection he would read part of a letter from a gentleman from Ontario who had gone to Manitoba with the view of settling there:

"I have been here now six months, and am highly delighted with the country, and have made up my mind to settle; but the difficulty I find is that on every side I find reserves for Half-breeds, Indians, Icelanders, Norwegians, Danes, Frenchmen, and God knows who, but none for us poor Ontarians. If we want to settle we must go fifty or sixty miles from a settlement, and then, perhaps, as in the case of many others, when our old friends and neighbours come to join us, they find the lands around in reserve for some speculator to colonize. I have now waited in hopes that those reserves would be thrown open this winter, as promised by Parliament last Session; but if they are not opened this spring I will go back and settle on land offered me as I came through in Minnesota; and take my word for it, many others intend to do the same."

Mr. TROW said he felt surprised at the narrow view taken of the subject by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace). Instead of decreasing the amount for immigration, he (Mr. Trow) considered it should be increased, if we could thereby secure the proper class of immigrants. There were large tracts of land in the North-West, in Quebec and in Ontario, which wanted filling up with settlers. The extraordinary progress made by the

Mr. SINCLAIR.

Western States was due to the extent to which immigration was pushed. There were, at least, in the United States, 8,000,000 people of European birth, and the Irish alone, with their descendants, numbered between 14,000,000 and 15,000,000. About twenty years ago, the State of Minnesota contained only 5,000 inhabitants, but to-day it had, he presumed, about 750,000. It would be found, and he spoke from personal investigation, in Toronto, Stratford and other western towns—he could not speak as to the eastern towns—that most of the destitution existed among people who had lately come from the United States. The immigrants who had been induced to come to this country from year to year had found ready employment. According to the report of immigration agents, agricultural labourers and domestic servants were in great demand in Western Canada, and would be even more so in a few weeks hence. He was surprised that the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) should have read such a letter as he had done to the House. It was written from a very unpatriotic standpoint, and must have emanated from some person who had strange ideas in regard to his duty to his country. From Manitoba to the slope of the Rocky Mountains we had sufficient arable land fit for settlement to make twenty-two States as large as Illinois, and a very large portion of the land was as productive as that of Illinois. A few years ago there were only a few lumbermen in Minnesota, and twenty years ago they had to take produce from St. Paul and other points eastward to supply the lumbermen. That State now exported over 35,000,000 bushels of wheat yearly. Passing along the Red River they found in British Territory an alluvial deposit more fertile and better adapted for farming purposes than in Minnesota. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) had referred to French immigrants, regarding whom he would read the following report:—

"The courageous settlers at Dufferin and the vicinity have publicly expressed their entire satisfaction; we, in our turn, request you to communicate to our countrymen what we think of Manitoba.

"Since our arrival we have been sufficiently initiated, as respects everything with which immigration is concerned, to form an opinion as to the truthfulness of the reports contained in our newspaper and communicated to us by our delegates and friends of colonization in this country.

“If some few people, whose expectations were too great, have gone back upon the pretext that the resources and advantages of Manitoba had been exaggerated, we have to say, on the contrary, that by so doing they were guilty of great injustice to those who received us in so brotherly a manner, and to the country, possessed as it is of so rich a soil.

“More than this, we should not be surprised to see those self-styled disappointed persons return before long in the train of others.

“It has been correctly stated, the steady farmer who knows how to work, and is willing to do so, is sure to succeed. Farms are sold at excessively low prices, and the yield is enormous. We consider that we are doing our countrymen a service when we request you to reproduce in your excellent paper, so devoted to Canadian interests, the accompanying article from the Métis respecting the crops of 1870.

“It will constitute the firmest, most convincing and least suspicious plea in support of the cause which we favour. The remarks of the French organ in Manitoba, concerning the few persons who return, most frequently for the most frivolous reasons, are very judicious. We endorse them in every respect and unite our voices to that of the Métis in saying to our countrymen:—

“If you are tired of the noise of the shop, if your prospect where you are is not a smiling one—if, in a word, you are willing to work the soil and to devote yourself to agriculture, come to Manitoba.”

That report was signed by forty or fifty of those emigrants who had formerly been in a state of starvation, under the excessive protection of the United States, but were now enjoying comfortable homes, though they had been in the North-West only two years and received only one crop. The destruction caused by the grasshopper plague had been very discouraging to immigrants, but in all human probability the plague would not be repeated for many years. With such fertile lands at our disposal, where the people could obtain a livelihood with a little labour, and the exercise of that thrift and economy which was necessary in settlers in a new country, it was the duty of the Government to encourage all persons out of employment to proceed westward, and settle in Manitoba and the North-West. According to the estimate of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States, every immigrant, in perfect health and capable and anxious to work, was worth $1,000 to the country. It must also be remembered that many immigrants brought considerable means with them. In 1875 the immigrants arriving in Canada brought in cash and personal effects about $1,500,000; and last year, even with the small immigration, nearly $1,000,000. If any hon. member who doubted the wisdom of the policy of bringing out immigrants would take a trip to Manitoba and visit the comfortable homes of the Mennonites, in their twenty-five or thirty little villages, where they grouped together as was their custom in Russia, he would be satisfied as to the advisability of the action taken. Those settlers had obtained only one partial crop, on account of the unusually heavy rains in the west. But those immigrants, with whom the hon. member for Compton had had much to do, and the circumstance was to his credit, were now fairly settled. He believed it was the duty of the Government to encourage the immigration of Mennonites because the 6,000 now in Manitoba formed only the nucleus of what would be a large settlement. He had seen many letters sent by Mennonites to their friends in the county of Waterloo, stating that they had every prospect of prospering. There was no doubt that, with a little Government encouragement, an additional number of that body would go out to the North-West, and indeed there were now in Waterloo 100 of those who came out to go to Manitoba, but remained in that county. In a very few years the Manitoba Mennonites would be able to pay off the Government loan, with interest. It was, in his opinion, the duty of the Government to encourage the immigration of a large colony from Southern Russia to Manitoba, to develop and improve the country. The Icelandic emigrants had suffered the severe misfortune of an attack of small-pox. A few had been discouraged, and this had in turn discouraged their friends at home from emigrating to this country; but no doubt, in a year or so, a large body of that class would proceed to Manitoba. As the Canada Company increased the price of its lands to a high figure, so that poor people could not purchase it, so was it in Manitoba, where lands were being concentrated in the hands of a few, instead of being sub-divided and given to all who wished free grants. The policy adopted in the United States was to give very large tracts of lands to railway companies, the result being that they became immigration agents, and had agents themselves in every town in Canada. The moment an immigrant landed at Point Lévis, American emissaries endeavoured to induce him to proceed to the United States, and offered greater inducements, including free railroad passes, than this country was prepared to offer. Those agents had, however, succeeded in obtaining very few of the immigrants who had been aided by the Dominion Government. When he visited Prince Arthur's Landing three years ago, the moment the steamboat landed American agents went through the steamboat to ascertain if any passengers were going by the Dawson route, and they endeavoured, by pointing out the dangers of the road, its remoteness from settlement and inadequate facilities for travel, to induce the immigrants to take the American route by Moorehead, and at every station on the route they were trying to persuade them to settle in Minnesota, Dakota and other western territories. The moment a good settlement was established on our waste lands, the value of the land was increased 100 per cent., and as the Government possessed such splendid tracts of land they should introduce the system pursued in the United States. He would even go further than many hon. members and offer inducements to immigrants who remained in the country for the first year. The amount expended for immigration purposes did not exceed last year $11 per head, while other years it ranged from $5 and $6 to $7, the last named amounts including special grants to the Mennonites and Icelanders. Each immigrant paid to the revenue of the country during the first year more than the whole expense of bringing him out. It was right that we should endeavour to gather into our midst the surplus population of the old country. He denied that the farmers in Western Canada were suffering from the depression. It was very rare there was a total failure of crops in this country; the only example in many years had been the last crop. If there was another good crop, he had no doubt the farming community would be in as prosperous a condition as at any former period. They had no reason to complain, because in this country there was a good climate, good institutions and large tracts of rich, arable land.

Mr. Trow.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said the only class of immigrants we required were those who would settle on the wild lands. If Canada was made a good country for the labouring man, the surplus labour of the old world would find its way here. He doubted if the population during the last two decades had advanced in proportion to the natural increase of the people; and he held that a large portion of the money expended on immigration was wasted, because the country paid the expenses of bringing out immigrants who, in a short time, went to the United States. He had read the letter to the House in order to inform the Government that the manner in which land grants were managed tended to drive out settlers instead of encouraging them. He had a high opinion of the fertility of the soil in the North-West, but it was found impossible by the immigrants to obtain lots there.

Mr. TROW said the fact that lands had been badly managed was not due to the present Government.

Mr. WALLACE said he did not attribute the blame to either Government; but, if such was the fact, the evil ought to be remedied. The question was not with whom the evil originated, but by what means it could be cured.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that no doubt the large reserves in Manitoba proved a great difficulty in the settlement of the Province. He would not condemn any person on that account, but the fact that large tracts of land were set apart for the Hudson's Bay, Half-breed and other reserves caused considerable difficulty in the way of settlers going to that country from Ontario. He was not aware that the present Government had set apart any distinct townships, except for Icelandic and Mennonite immigrants, and they had cancelled considerable numbers of special grants of land.

Mr. POPE (Compton) asked to whom those grants of land which had been cancelled were given.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that applications had been made by emigration companies in Scotland and elsewhere for land, they offering to bring out a large number of emigrants; but, as their promises were not fulfilled, the grants made were subsequently cancelled. As regarded the general immigration policy, he entirely agreed with the proposition that, in the present circumstances of the country, agricultural labourers and perhaps a certain number of female domestic servants formed the classes of labour which could be most profitably brought into the country at the present time. It was probably a wise principle to pursue the system which had been adopted with regard to certain particular classes, such as the Mennonites, who wished to go together and to settle en bloc; and, but for the unfortunate loss of the crops in Manitoba, he had reason to believe that the experiment would have been eminently successful. He gave to the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) and to his colleagues all possible credit for what they had done in this regard. It had cost the country a good deal, but he thought it was worth the money. It was said they ought to reduce the expenditure under this head, and they had done so. If the sum set apart for quarantine was deducted from the sum total, it would be found that the figures for keeping up immigration agents and keeping faith with the Mennonites, was very moderate. The sum total was $230,000, and, as about $43,000 was required for quarantine and similar purposes, this left about $187,000, a large proportion of which was accounted for in reasonable detail above, for the general immigration service including $110,000 for the transport of Mennonites. They did not want to spend this sum unless it was required; but they could not tell exactly how much might be required for transportation of Mennonites. They were not inclined to make the expenditure unless immigrants came, and unless they appeared to be of a satisfactory character to their agents. He did not see how they could make any reduction with regard to the expenses of what were known as travelling agents and their contingencies. He was as anxious as any hon. gentleman to be economical, but, if they were to keep up the immigration service at all, he did not think it reasonable to ask the Government to reduce the present vote.

Mr. MONTEITH said he was strongly in favour of encouraging immigration, but the immigrants that were required were those that would settle with us and were adapted to such a life. He thought it was well known that we were losing very many of our best settlers in the West. A large number of them had left Ontario during the past four or five years, and gone to the Western States and California. He held that something should be done by the Government and the House to retain in our midst people who were useful as tillers of the soil, and who were inured to hard labour. Such persons who came to this country years ago were anxious to obtain more land, and consequently they sold their improvements and in some cases went to Manitoba. We ought to throw inducements in their way, and reduce the expenses of the trip. He had heard an hon. member not long ago speak in high terms of the Dawson Route and the famous water-stretch; the American Republic informed immigrants that this was a most dangerous route. He thought a little more money should be spent upon it in order that but they were also told that agents of emigrants might reach our own lands through our own territory. Every thing possible should be done to induce classes of people like the Mennonites and Icelanders to come to this country; but the persons who were at present brought from England, Ireland, Scotland, and Germany were of no great benefit to the Dominion. Those who were possessed of means would settle in the older districts, and the best thing that could be done would be to induce people who already lived amongst us, and who wished to remove, to settle within our boundaries and under the old flag. He favoured reducing the amount of the vote, because we were not getting value for the money spent in this regard. Reference was made to the class of immigrants they had in the town of Stratford. Some of them might have come from the United States, but they were of no use to themselves, and of very little use to others. He was almost opposed to the immigration system. The settlement of our own territory should be encouraged, and the best encouragement and inducement in this regard was to commence the Pacific Railway at the east end, and work westward. If this was not done, immigrants would go by the way of Duluth, and many of them would certainly be prevailed upon to settle in the Western States. He was aware of the fact that a number of people from his section of the country had gone to Manitoba, and he knew they were doing very well; but the great difficulty encountered in this relation, was the inevitable expense on the trip. The Western States could be reached more cheaply; and he believed that the general choice of immigrants was to remain in American Territory. He knew of numbers who had, somewhat recently, left his part of the country. They had wished to go to Manitoba, but had settled in the United States. What was the reason? He presumed that, in the first place, they were afraid of the grasshopper plague; but he hoped the time would soon come when this would no longer exist; and then there was the cost of transportation. All that could be done to induce our surplus population to settle in our own territories should be accomplished. The fact was we sent to England, Scotland, Ireland and other parts of Europe for immigrants, and whom did we secure? All the agents could discover about the streets of Liverpool, London, Dublin and Glasgow willing to make the voyage. We did not require this class at all. The men needed were only those with enough energy and industry to turn their hands to anything available in order to make a living, improve their position, and support their families. This class would be of real benefit to the country. He hoped they would be secured. The idea of spending over $200,000 under the present system was absurd; and how many of the persons sent to Canada remained amongst us? Of course Icelanders and Mennonites came in bodies, but others remained only as long as it suited them, and when they became discontented they crossed the line.

Mr. MONTEITH.

Mr. SCHULTZ said it was a matter of regret that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture was a member of another branch of the Legislature, as the hon. the Minister of Finance, who represented him in this House, could not possibly be expected to know all the matters of detail of that Department, and had thus been led into statements, one of the inaccuracies of which he would point out. He had understood the hon. Minister to say in reply to the speech of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) that the reservations complained of by the hon. gentleman's Manitoba correspondent were a legacy of the late Government, and for which the present Administration were not accountable. Now, the facts were that, while the late Government did make the Half-breed Reserves and some others, yet the greater part, in extent at least, had been made by the present Government. The Railway Reserve was a very large one; it existed as a standing grievance and drawback, as he had pointed out last Session and this, and he had believed the Government to be convinced of that fact last Session, when they introduced and carried to its final stages a Bill to relieve, at least in part, the difficulty. It really made no matter now, however, who caused these or any other evils; it was the duty of the Government of the day, aided by the Parliament of the day, to redress grievances when shown to be serious in their character and hurtful to the general good. As the colleagues of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture had shown some want of knowledge in the affairs of a Department, the administrator of which was not in this House, it might be well to remind hon. Ministers generally of some facts in connection with this all-important subject of immigration. In the first place, our interests in this matter must be felt to be great when we reflected upon the enormous extent of territory we possessed. Canada had an area of 3,500,000 square miles. The United States had an area of 3,390,000, and all Europe was computed to have only an area of 3,650,000 square miles. Having a country greater in extent than the United States, inferior but slightly to the combined areas of the countries of Europe, we were naturally impelled to the consideration of the economization of such portions of this immense region as were likely to reward the effort. If the ruler of France was right when he characterized the cession of his North-American possessions as "the transfer to England of a few acres of snow," then it would be wise to let matters take their course. But what were the facts in regard to the agricultural value of a great portion of that immense region? A good authority, in making an estimate of the agricultural value of our western prairies, as compared with the part of the United States lying immediately south, said :

"Fully one half the area of the United States lies west of the 98th meridian. Having four to five months—the agricultural months be it remembered—without rain or with an insufficiency it is mostly devoid of vegetation except the cactus in the south, and artemisia, or sage of the desert, in the north—true indices of a rainless region. As an agricultural country it is worthless, except where artificial irrigation can be made to supply the deficiency, supposing water could be got for that purpose. Even then the saline properties of the soil would, over vast areas, be destructive of vegetation. Professor Wharton, an American writer, some fifteen or twenty years since, maintained that they had reached the limits westward of arable land; and this is the test mory of every traveller over those regions. Emigration must now turn north-westward, from the country of summer droughts to that of summer rains in the great fertile valleys of British America. Sir John Richardson (Arc. Exp., vol. ii., p. 267) informs us that wheat is grown with success in latitude 60 deg. 5 m., near the borders of Great Slave Lake, where the summer temperature is 65 deg., that of London being 61 deg. Bishop Taché found it growing up to 62 deg. on Great Slave Lake, and farther west it ripens at a higher latitude. It grows freely on the banks of the Saskatchewan in latitude 54 deg., and luxuriantly in the valleys of the Assiniboine and Red Rivers. Sir John Franklin found Indian corn ripening in latitude 54 deg. west of Winnipeg. Barley ripens well at Fort Norman in latitude 65 deg. (400 miles north of the Orkneys and the capital of Sweden, and 350 miles north of the capitals of Norway and Russia). South of latitude 60 deg. 5 m., where 'wheat ripens well,' we have an area in Canada probably greater than the entire arable land of the United States, and yet 5 deg. north of this barley ripens, potatoes and turnips grow, and the luxuriant pastures invite the bison and the deer. No doubt when these northern countries shall have been cleared of the forest and the land drained, these plants will here, as in Europe, go to a much higher latitude. We know that where wheat ripens in such a climate, we have the best region for the grasses, cereals, coarser grains, and root-crops generally. It is true that the climates east of these posts, nearer Hudson Bay, are less propitious. The cold arctic currents which sweep around that bay and down the coast of Labrador, lower the temperature. But these arctic streams come to us burdened with a superabundance of food in the countless swarms of fish which, after feeding their numerous enemies in northern seas, supply luxuries for millions of the human family in the temperate zones. We surely have enough agricultural land, and can well afford these north-eastern preserves for fishing and hunting grounds, and as nurseries for hardy seamen."

There was corroborative evidence of those facts in the report of Professor Macoun and of other Government officers charged with the duty of ascertaining the facts of the case; and it was now an established fact—an all-important fact—that we had in Canada a larger wheat-growing area than was possessed by the United States, and than was, in fact, owned by any of the countries of Europe. Those facts brought with them their responsibilities. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches were the trustees of great interests in that respect. They were the administrators of an estate of the people of Canada, great in extent and valuable in resources, and hon. Ministers must not feel annoyed if he (Mr. Schultz) enquired a little closely from the published reports of Ministers before the House into the manner in which they had discharged that trust. It was obvious that the possession of that magnificent wheat-growing region in the North-West was useless without the adoption of proper means for its colonization and development. At the outset, fortunately, a wise policy was inaugurated by the preceding Government. The system of surveys of the United States had been adopted and improved upon; their system of free grants had also been adopted, and, owing to the fact of our lighter taxation, our healthier climate, and our better security to life and property, we had advantages to offer the foreign immigrant greater than those which had attracted so many millions to the shores of the United States. When the present Government came into power they found this initial work done. They found also that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), then Minister of Agriculture, had matured a scheme for European immigration, the success of which since was the best tribute to its excellence. That hon. gentleman found that in Russia there were settlements of men of German race who felt it necessary to seek new homes. Those men had their eyes fixed upon that home of thousands of their native race—the United States, when the then Minister of Agriculture, the present member for Compton in the face of difficulties created by a Government jealous of interference with its subjects, in the face of utter ignorance of even such a place as Canada, and the interested representations of American agents, succeeded in getting these communities to visit the North-West. So wise was the management, so fair the conditions offered, that the movement resulted in success, and, for the first time, Canada fairly entered the marts of the whole world in fair competition with the United States for the agricultural emigrant. So long as his successors followed in the footsteps of the hon. member for Compton, they had been successful; but a departure from the policy inaugurated by him seemed to be at hand. We got those Mennonites by giving them assisted passages, and granting them the same rights of homestead and preëmption as were enjoyed by British subjects; and now, when it appeared from the reports of our European agents that other farming immigrants could be got upon the same terms; now, when we wanted consumers for our over-production of manufactures; now, when, or never, we wanted the North-West filled up, they found the vote for immigration purposes cut down $60,000, and the reduction proposed to be made in the very matter of these assisted passages. Such a policy he felt to be suicidal, and against every interest of the Dominion of Canada. As to the possibilities of European immigration, he would beg to refer the House to the excellent report of Mr. C. J. Dore, who represented in a highly creditable manner our emigration interests in London, printed in the Minister of Agriculture's general report, on page 129, under the caption of "Swiss Emigration." Mr. Dore said:

Mr. SCHULTZ.

"Having received a notification that an important conference was about to meet for the purpose of considering in extenso the subject of Swiss emigration, at Berne, on the 4th October last, I deemed it advisable, in the interests of the Dominion, to ask your permission to attend.

"Having obtained your consent, I left London for Berne, where I arrived on the day preceding the first meeting of the conference. On the afternoon of the 4th, through the kind offices of Madame Von Koeber, I obtained an audience of the President of the Swiss Republic, Mr. Wehlti. He informed me that he took great personal interest in Canada, and considered it by far the best field for the emigration of his countrymen. He further informed me that his Government would take no part either in encouraging or discountenancing emigration, but they deemed it their duty to exercise a proper surveillance over it, and to provide against the chance of Swiss subjects being deceived and imposed upon. With the welfare of his people in view, Mr. Wehlti said he should be disposed to look favourably on any fair scheme of colonization proposed by our Government. He referred to the statute about to be passed by the Swiss Parliament, dealing very severely with shipping agents who had plundered and victimized the Swiss people. Mr. Wehlti stated that the Swiss emigration to South America had been brought about by false representations of interested agents. The results of that emigration was disastrous, but he thought there was a wide field open for a substantial and trustworthy offer.

"The President expressed his willingness to advocate the claims of Canada in any way he could legitimately, provided he was convinced of the bona fides of the Agents we sent.

"I further informed the President that I should report his opinion to the head of my Department, and expressed a hope that the two Governments would arrive at an understanding upon the subject, which would be mutually satisfactory and advantageous."

It thus appeared that our agent in Switzerland had not only brought about this very desirable state of affairs in that country, but she had rendered most important services in that branch of our immigration interests, where the services of a lady would be invaluable—that of a class of women for domestic servants, a want so greatly felt in this country. It would be seen that Mr. Dore recommended as follows:—

“It would be well to make Switzerland the centre of our operations in mid-Europe. It is favourably situated for commanding France, Berne, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, the Tyrol, the Provinces of Austria as far south as Trieste, and for aiding, if not influencing emigration from northern Italy.”

It was easy to understand the value of that suggestion. There was a Government unlike that of most of the countries of Europe, not only not hostile to emigration, but willing to assist it, if satisfied of the good faith of the agents and the desirable character of the country to which immigration was solicited. From that centre it was evident that, if a liberal policy was pursued, we might get what we wanted, a large farming population from Europe. Mr. Dore suggested, evidently with a view of satisfying the very reasonable doubts of the President of the Swiss Republic, that “we should invite some of their leading writers to visit Canada to judge for themselves of the prospects and resources of the country.” No intimation had yet been given by the Government of their intention to act on that suggestion, and he feared that the decrease in the Estimates meant a decrease in the efforts usually made to secure even the ordinary number of immigrants, and he would earnestly urge that, since the suggestions of Mr. Dore would entail no very great immediate expense upon the Government, they should receive favourable consideration. In reference to what had been said by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), he must refer for a moment to the valuable service which that hon. gentleman in his capacity as chairman of the Immigration Committee had rendered. That hon. gentleman had, during a visit to Manitoba, taken the utmost pains to inform himself of everything good, and had, in connection with the immigration interests of that Province, acquired an amount of information which was now bearing good fruit in the admirable manner in which he had presided over the Immigration Committee. That hon. member in his speech bore testimony to the value of the Mennonites as immigrants, and urged the Government to increase instead of decreasing the amount to be devoted to the payment of assisted passages. He (Mr. Schultz) quite agreed with his hon. friend from Perth, and, if more than his testimony was needed, they had the report of Mr. Klotz, Canadian Agent at Hamburg, who, in the course of his report, on page 89 of the Department of Agriculture's Report, stated:

“The amount of money exchanged by Mennonites under my supervision, and after the ocean fare had been paid, amounted to 215,000 rubles. Besides this amount I have lately received from South Russia, for transmission to Manitoba, 50,000 rubles, which I have exchanged for drafts on the Bank of Montreal, and remitted the same according to instructions to the respective parties in Manitoba. This makes the total amount brought to Canada by the Mennonites during the year 1876, 265,000 rubles, or about $170,000 gold.

“The above-mentioned emigrants, with few exceptions that died during the journey, have safely arrived at their destination.

“All told, within the last three years, and through my agency, 6,175 Mennonites have been shipped at this port for and are now settled in Manitoba. And the total amount of cash brought by these people to said Province amounts to considerably over six hundred thousand dollars.”

Now, it would appear from that report, that those immigrants brought into Manitoba an amount of about one thousand dollars per family. They were agriculturists par excellence—the men who had, under similar conditions as to soil and climate as the North-West Territories, in Southern Russia, grown that famous Black Sea wheat which for years had stood first in the estimate of European consumers. Honest, industrious and moral, they were the types of the class we needed, and hon. members found, from the statement of the chairman of the Immigration Committee, what it cost to get them. That hon. member had told the House that the average cost of our ordinary immigrants was seven dollars; that, owing to exceptional arrangements being made, the Mennonites had cost us eleven dollars, while he stated his belief in the abstract value of an individual immigrant to be $800 or $1,000. Here we had in the case of the Mennonites six thousand consumers brought into the country at a cost of eleven dollars per head. It was possible to increase that immigration, if the proper steps were taken, almost indefinitely, but he (Mr. Schultz) regretted that he could see no disposition to do so. When hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches were in Opposition, he never knew of their opposing that part of the scheme of the Canada Pacific Railway which referred to its value as a colonization scheme. Since they had come into power, they had had an opportunity of carrying out their ideas of colonization in this way; but, as yet, not a foot of the line was built west of the Red River; and, instead of devoting money to that purpose, it was being frittered away in Georgian Bay contracts, or sunk in canals at Fort Frances, in the mad attempt to make broken stretches of water serve the purposes of a railway. In reference to the remarks of his hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), he heartily sympathized with the correspondent whose letter he had read. He (Mr. Schultz) had dwelt upon similar grievances felt by his constituents, in moving, early in the Session, in the matter of the Railway Reserve. One cause, possibly, of that unfortunate state of things, was the cutting down of the Estimates for surveys during the past two years. The Mennonites, had their surveys gone on, might have settled farther to the west, where there was equally good land, and left more area for the expansion of the settlement which had been formed from Ontario and other Provinces of the Dominion. Another class of immigrants we might hope to get, if proper means were employed, was a portion, at least, of the large emigration, which had taken place in former years to the United States. French-Canadians from the Eastern States, and Ontario emigrants, who had helped to fill up the Western States, were equally desirable; and, when hon. members reflected upon the altered conditions in their case, they would see how easily the change might be effected. Those Canadians, particularly those from Ottawa, were attracted to the Western States during and shortly after the American war. The scarcity of labour consequent upon the absence of able-bodied men and the superior advantages presented by a prairie over a wooded country, were sufficient inducements to cause the large emigration of Canadians to those States. Now, the conditions were altered. Township, county, State, and general taxes consequent on the war, had ground down the farmers to the utmost limit, and the possibility of getting the same advantages of a prairie farm free under the old flag, where taxes were merely nominal, the necessaries of life cheap, property secure and the country progressive—those causes had resulted in the prosperous colony of Emerson from Wisconsin, and the large bodies of Canadians who had come in from Iowa and other Western States. It would easily be seen that desirable immigration was possible. We had the country to give them. We might get them at a slight expense, and with the Government must rest the responsibility of the policy they adopted. They were trustees for the people of Canada of that splendid heritage; to them would belong the praise for the success of any scheme which would fill the North-West with a farming community, while on them must rest the odium, if, under circumstances so favourable, they failed to allow the North-West country to fulfil its manifest destiny of becoming the greatest wheat-producing portion of the continent, or the world.

Mr. SCHULTZ.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said no doubt it was a question of very grave importance as to what policy the Government should pursue with respect to the settlement of the North-West, but he thought the House would agree with him as to the inexpediency of the Government encouraging a large immigration at present until they were more certain that the very grave difficulties of last year would not occur again. Last year it was his painful duty to ask an appropriation for the relief of starving settlers, to the amount of $60,000.

Other expenses of a very formidable character had been thrown on the Government, owing to the misfortunes which had overtaken the Icelandic settlers. He hoped that the glowing prophecies which had been made from time to time as to the future of the great North-West Territory might be verified to the full. No doubt its future, to a great extent, depended upon that part of the country having a large and industrious population. But at the present moment, when there was a chance of another visit of the grasshoppers, and of the Government having to pay large sums to keep the people alive, he did not think it prudent that immigration should be stimulated to any great extent. With regard to the reservations, the present Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, last year, was disposed to throw them open for settlement, but the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) objected to the measure, and he (Mr. Cartwright) thought, on the whole, the right hon. gentleman was right. The present reservation policy had been inaugurated by the late Government and continued by the existing Administration, who held themselves responsible for it. At the present, an enormous amount was being expended in the North-West—some $800,000—which was rendered necessary if the Pacific Railway was to be built. He did not think he would be making a mistake if he said that $1,250,000 had been expended in that direction. He did not think he would be justified in recommending an expenditure of any further sum.

Mr. BOWELL said the question which he was about to ask had been asked the other night by an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, but he could not catch the answer, and he would, therefore, have to repeat the question. The question was in reference to the reduction of the agency in Belfast, and why this agency had been selected any more than any other.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not reduced; it is simply transferred.

Mr. BOWELL: Where?

Mr. MACKENZIE: To the "Salaries and travelling expenses of immigration agents, $13,000."

Mr. BOWELL: But what position has it held in the past? Was it a special item taken for that service, and if so, why has the change been made?

Mr. POPE (Compton): To make it appear there was no excess in the expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That officer was appointed originally without any vote being taken by the late Government. And the vote was put, and is now put in with all the others, in order to show that there is no difference in the status of the respective officers.

Mr. BOWELL: Am I to understand this was done to satisfy the complaints that have been made by different newspapers and writers?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. BOWELL: Then why is an officer of the Department instructed to answer these newspaper attacks in reference to this particular agency?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because he was asked to reply.

Mr. BOWELL: By the newspapers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, by me.

Mr. BOWELL: That is what I say. Then the country is to understand that, when a certain class of newspapers in the country think proper to attack the Government in any particular policy, or in reference to one of the immigration agencies, one of the clerks of the Department is to be a newspaper correspondent and answer the attacks?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Whatever you choose.

Mr. BOWELL: Past experience has taught us that you will do what you like whether it is in the interest of the country or not, when you desire to make any party or political capital out of it. I must confess that was just about the answer I might have expected under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will give any answer or explanation that the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. BOWELL: The only difference is that the hon. gentleman inserts some interjectory remarks, which, if they came from anybody else, and were applied to him, would be considered discourteous and impertinent. I think the country will object to any distinction being drawn between any of these agencies.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had been placed upon an equal footing.

Mr. BOWELL said the course pursued by the hon. gentleman, in instructing an employé of the Government to answer newspaper attacks, was an exceedingly bad one. He himself had no sympathy with the attacks made upon either the Belfast or the Dublin agency. He knew, from a little personal experience, that the agents in both places fulfilled the duties of their office, and were constantly employed in endeavouring to send emigrants to this country. He observed that the expenses of this Department had been increasing continuously since the hon. gentlemen opposite had been in power. All who had been to the old country lately knew that the press, the clergy, and landlords were opposed to immigration to Canada, and therefore a decrease in the expenditure for immigration purposes might well be considered by the Government, by dispensing with some of the agencies in England and Ireland.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

MARY JANE BATES DIVORCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. TROW moved the first reading of Bill (No. 85) (from the Senate) For the relief of Mary Jane Bates.

Mr. SPEAKER ordered the members to be called in.

Mr. HOLTON said this motion could not be made unless the Standing Orders of the House were suspended. They required that at half-past seven the House should proceed to the reading of Private Bills. The mover of the first reading of this Bill would therefore have to allow it to stand until a later period of the evening.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. SPEAKER said he agreed with the hon. member that it was really out of order to do anything within the hour after the re-assembling of the House on this day until they had got through with Private Bills.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is not this a Private Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was not on the order paper at all. He read the rule on the subject as follows:—

“When any Bill shall be presented by a member, in pursuance of an Order of the House, or shall be brought from the Senate, the question ‘That this Bill be now read a first time’ shall be decided without amendment or debate.”

Mr. MASSON said he would be willing to meet the view of his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), but, as the question had been put and the members called in, it implied that, if they were out of order, there was a universal consent.

Mr. SPEAKER said the rule must be set aside by a positive resolution.

Mr. BOWELL read the 82nd rule, as follows:—

“When members have been called in preparatory to a Division, no further debate is to be permitted.”

Mr. HOLTON said a question of order was always in order. It might be convenient in this case, perhaps, to take the vote, but he should object in future cases.

Question put, and motion agreed to, on the following Division:—

YEAS:

Messieurs

Archibald	Kirk
Bain	Little
Bertram	Macdonald (Centre Toronto)
Biggar	Macdougall (East Elgin)
Blain	McDougall (S. Renfrew)
Blake	McKay (Colchester)
Borden	McCallum
Borron	McQuade
Bowell	Metcalfe
Bowman	Mills
Buell	Mitchell
Burk	Monteith
Burpee (St. John)	Norris
Burpee (Sunbury)	Oliver
Cameron	Orton
Carmichael	Pettes
Cartwright	Plumb
Casey	Robinson
Charlton	Ross (East Durham)
Christie	Ross (West Middlesex)
Church	Ross (Prince Edward)
Cockburn

Davies	Schultz
DeCosmos	Scrifer
DeVeber	Smith (Peel)
Domville	Smith (Westmoreland)
Dymond	Snider
Farrow	Thompson (Cariboo)
Ferris	Thompson (Haldimand)
Fleming	Thomson (Weland)
Flesher	Trow
Forbes	Wallace (Albert)
Gibbs (North Ontario)	White (East Hastings)
Gillmor	White (North Renfrew)
Guthrie	Workman
Hall	Yeo
Higinbotham	Young.—74.
Kerr

NAYS :

Messieurs

Barthe	Holton
Bécharde	Hurteau
Bernier	Jones (Halifax)
Blanchet	Jones (South Leeds)
Bolduc	Lajoie
Bourassa	Lanthier
Campbell	Laurier
Caron	McDonald (Cape Breton)
Casgrain	McGreery
Cimon	McIsaac
Costigan	Masson
Coupal	Pope (Compton)
Currier	Robillard
Desjardins	Robitaille
Devlin	Rouleau
Flynn	Short
Fréchette	Taschereau
Geoffrion	Wright (Ottawa).—37.
Gill

Bill read the first time.

Mr. TROW moved :

“That the said Bill, and the evidence and papers accompanying the same, be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Trow, Macdougall (East Elgin), Oliver, Kerr, Brooks, Gibbs (South Ontario), Young, Kirkpatrick and Mitchell.”

Mr. BLANCHET contended that Private Bills should be referred after the second reading.

Mr. BLAKE said the rule did not apply to this class of Bills, as there was no Standing Committee charged with their consideration, and it had been the invariable practice to refer these Bills to a Select Committee after the first reading. The question whether or not a particular case was one in which a divorce should be granted depended upon the report and evidence furnished by the Select Committee.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was rather inclined to think there were reasons for pursuing a different course on Bills of this class than on ordinary Bills, as they involved treatment of a quasi-judicial character.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said it was clear that every Private Bill should be referred after the second reading.

Mr. BOWELL said Rule 54 did not apply. Such a Bill should be referred to the Standing Orders Committee.

Mr. BLAKE said he was informed the Bill had been read the first time.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that, under Rule 59, the Bill could not be referred to a Special Committee.

Mr. BLANCHET said the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. BLAKE said it had been stated that this Committee had already reported upon it.

Mr. SPEAKER: My present view on the subject is that I will follow the practice of our House at present. The point of order can be raised again. I shall look carefully into the whole matter and satisfy myself on the point. If the hon. gentleman charged with the Bill moves that it be referred to a Select Committee, I am inclined to hold—provisionally, of course—that he is in order.

Motion agreed to on the same Division.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 52) Further to amend the Act to incorporate the Canada Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Domville.)

Bill (No. 57) To authorize the Royal Canadian Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 46) To incorporate the Union Cable Company.—(Mr. Jetté.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported:—

Bill (No. 34) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ottawa Agricultural Insurance Company.—(Mr. Rochester.)

GLOBE PRINTING COMPANY
BILL.—[BILL No. 7.]

(Mr. Blain.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAIN said the Globe Printing Company, in its petition, represented that it was desirous of establishing offices in various places outside of the Province of Ontario, and it prayed that such power be granted. The charter of the Company, he believed, was granted by the old Parliament of Canada. The Company also desired to increase its capital stock, and such power, of course, was given to all companies that applied for it.

Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY.

IX.—IMMIGRATION AND QUARANTINE.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

55. Immigration and Quarantine..... $120,550

Consideration of proposed vote resumed.

Mr. BOWELL said, when the House rose, he was calling attention to the remark of the Finance Minister that they had made all the reduction in connection with this item that was possible; and to the fact that the expenditure, so far as it affected the staff, was increased; while the reduction had been made where, if money was to be voted for immigration purposes, it ought to be increased, provided that we had work for more immigrants in the Dominion. He did think that, if the attention of the Government was drawn to this particular item, there was plenty of room for retrenchment, more particularly in connection with the English office. He had hoped that after the resignation—he believed that was the term which was used, although it was very well known that he got a slight intimation that he was no longer required—of the late Agent-General, Mr. Jenkins, that the extravagant habits he had introduced would have been dropped, but he noticed that the vote was the same. He did not think the same extravagance prevailed to the same extent under the present agent.

Mr. SPEAKER.

The Government could not have selected a better man for the management of that agency. It was well that the Government had changed the location of the office. An office in a small fashionable street in London was not likely to attract the class of people who emigrated. Considering the difficulty of obtaining immigrants at present, steps should have been taken to reduce the expenses in every possible way. But he did not accept the theory laid down by his hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace)—that the system should be abolished altogether. He believed there was plenty of room in the country for a good class of immigrants, but he deprecated any attempt to send newly-arrived men into the back country where they had to clear the land, for they scarcely ever succeeded, and it was cruelty to do so. If we wanted to receive some benefit from the amount of money expended, the only way of doing it was to prosecute our public works in such sections of the country where the men could ultimately become permanent settlers. In Manitoba and the great North-West there was plenty of room, and, if the Government would push on the construction of the railway, the country would soon be settled in the manner that he had suggested. We should first get immigrants into the country, and then find them something to do, and they would ultimately become permanent residents. If the practice that had prevailed for many years continued, of bringing many men who knew nothing of the habits of the people, and were unaccustomed to the manner of land clearing, we might be sure they would remain but a short time. He did not desire to argue this question any further. From what had come under his own observation, he was convinced that the ideas he had suggested formed the only correct mode of this system of immigration. Unless we were prepared to adopt some such system as that, the sooner we cut down the staff one-half, the better it would be for the country. He did not desire to be understood as arguing for the abolition of the London agency altogether, but, under the present cir-circumstances of the country, and the lack of employment for immigrants from any part of the world, he looked upon it almost as madness to vote and expend such large sums of money.

Mr. McCALLUM said it was undoubtedly very desirable to open up the great West, but he thought we should first find something for the people to do. In discussing this question, we should consider whether enough value was got for the money expended. He was of the opinion that the return did not warrant the outlay. This question, however, was very closely connected with the one under discussion yesterday, inasmuch as, if our industries were not prosperous, we could not give employment to people from other countries. The first question an emigrant asked in the old country was: "Can we get work?" and the next: "What will you pay for it?" Under the régime of the hon. gentlemen opposite, we had absolutely nothing to offer immigrants. It might be said that this was a cheap country, but what was the use of cheapness when work could not be obtained? A man once said that he could have bought the city of Chicago for a pair of boots. His companion said: "You are foolish in not taking it." "But," replied the first, "I didn't have the boots." That was the way in which this question stood; but, while taking this view, he thought it was necessary we should keep up the organization and hope for better times.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said he proposed to treat the subject of immigration from a different standpoint from that taken by other speakers. In the older settled portions of the country, habits and prejudices had been established which could, however, be overcome in the vast prairies which lay to our west, between us and the Pacific Ocean, and to the development of which we must look for the future prosperity and greatness of this country. Some years ago he had looked upon the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a dangerous proposition for the future prosperity of the country, but he had since seen reason to change his views upon that subject. A great free port on the Pacific Ocean was necessary to the progress of the Dominion of Canada. Holding that opinion, he had concluded that the true process of building the Pacific road, and making a network of railways over all the prairies of the west, was to lay the foundations of a new Carthage on the Pacific Ocean. To do that, that country must be relieved of taxation and tariff imports, and the Government should build, as the first link of the Pacific Railway, a road across the Rocky Mountains, a distance of some five hundred and fifty miles, to the level of the prairie. That done, private enterprise with a certain acreage of land grants would make a network of railways over those prairies, including what is to be called the Canadian Pacific, without involving the Dominion of Canada in any cash expenditure for these purposes. The giving away of all the lands on the prairies for railway construction, providing such construction populated the country, was literally giving away nothing because the only value to the nation was the value of the population settled upon the lands.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was sure the House had listened with a great deal of interest to the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who last spoke, it being unfortunate, however, that his voice was so weak that the connection of his remarks had been lost to a great extent. He (Mr. Mitchell) would briefly refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz). That hon. gentleman, from his great practical experience of the wants of the North-West, was entitled to have much weight attached to what he said. The one great objection which the hon. gentleman had to the policy of the Government was, that they were not appropriating a larger amount of money than they were for the purpose of settling that portion of the Dominion. He (Mr. Mitchell) felt of a practical turn that night, and sympathized with the view taken by the Finance Minister. Looking at the great amount of money the Government had expended in the North-West, and the present condition of our finances, he did not think it wise or just to that section of the country which would have to bear most of the burden to increase the vote. He agreed with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) that it was most desirable to have this country settled. In place of 25,000 immigrants, the number brought to Canada last year, he would like to see 100,000 settle amongst us yearly. He was satisfied that at least 50,000 could be settled yearly in the North-West Territories for the next ten years without overcrowding it, or creating the difficulties which the Finance Minister had mentioned. But they had something else to look at than the question of settling this western country. How could the resources of the country admit of the expenditure of a sum greater than was proposed? Looking at the records of the past five or six years, he found that, in 1872, under the reign of an Administration which was alike a credit and an honour to the country—he said it with all humility—the London office had cost $67,809. In 1873 this expenditure amounted to $138,019; in 1874—the first year of the Administration of the hon. gentleman opposite—$149,000; and in 1875, $177,000. Looking at results, he found that, in 1872, with an expenditure of $67,000, 52,000 immigrants were brought to this country; the other figures were as follows: 1873, expenditure $138,000, and number of immigrants 49,000; 1874, expenditure $149,000, and number of immigrants 40,649; 1875, expenditure swollen to $177,000, and number of immigrants 10,499, including passengers for the Western States. The total number of settlers coming into the country in 1872 was 36,000; in 1873, 50,000; in 1874, 39,000; in 1875, 27,000; in 1876, 25,673. In 1875 the expenditure was nearly three times as great for the London office as in 1876, while the number of immigrants which came into the country had decreased from 36,000 in 1872 to 25,633 in 1876. It was a remarkable thing that the number of immigrants had decreased almost in proportion to the increased amount of money expended on the service. He found in the statement he had in his hand that the salaries in connection with the London office in 1872 amounted to $4,236; in 1873, to $4,679; in 1874, $5,055; in 1875—the second year of the present Administration, when the number of immigrants had decreased by nearly two-thirds—the expenditure in connection with this office alone had swollen from $4,236, the figure in 1872, to $16,002.48. Looking at these facts, he found they were asked to-day to appropriate for the immigration service $230,550 as against $177,000 in 1875. He could not but say that the sum seemed to him to be very considerably increased, and, when he took into consideration the fact that last year, according to the returns, the number of immigrants that came into the country was very small compared with the enormous amount of money it had cost to bring them here, he did not quite agree with his hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) that any larger sum should be placed at the disposal of hon. gentlemen who had shown so little capacity to judiciously expend the money voted in connection with this branch, and such small results for the large sum expended. He believed in the immigration service, and in the voting of a reasonable sum of money for the promotion of it, but he did not believe in squandering the money as the Government had done in this relation. They had swollen the expenses of the London office from $4,000 to $16,000, and that too without securing any adequate result. Within two years from the time that this magnificent establishment had been built for their plenipotentiary at London, they had recalled that gentleman, almost dissolving the whole establishment, and reducing it to the scale on which it had been placed by his hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) during his administration of that Department. It was a source of satisfaction, when they heard the late Government attacked, and comparisons made between the manner in which the public service had been performed under the Administration of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) and the manner in which it was conducted to-day, to look back at the records of the years he had mentioned to make comparisons, and to contrast the results. Taking this Department alone, they found what a very small number of persons had been brought into this country at much greater expense compared with the number which had been brought into the Dominion under the former régime with a much smaller expenditure. Comparing the percentage, he found that the rate paid per head was three times as great now as it was in 1872. He was not going to ask for the reduction of the vote, because he believed that the service was desirable; but what the House had a right to ask, and what the country would expect, now that the attention of the Government had been called to the very great discrepancy existing between present and past results, was that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House should see that greater results were accomplished with the money placed at their disposal. Although the appropriation was very large, in view of the present condition of our finances and resources, yet the service was of such great importance that the vote was justifiable. He certainly endorsed the views of the hon. gentleman from Lisgar on that point. Every reasonable effort should be made to fill up with population our great western country, which would, in future, become the most important granary of the Dominion. He had been told by hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, that they could not see how they could reduce the expenditure unless they cut down the expenses of some of the travelling agents, but it appeared to him that a reduction could be made in the expenditure in connection with the working executive. If it cost $130,000 to bring into the country during one year 67,000 persons, surely it should not cost over one-half of that sum to bring 25,000 immigrants into the Dominion. He thought the Government could reduce the executive staff of the Immigration Department, and that this service could be performed so as to produce greater results with the same sum of money than had been accomplished of late years. He requested the Minister of Finance to turn his attention to this matter. The cost per head could certainly be lessened. He would not follow his hon. friend from Compton over the ground he (Mr. Pope) had traversed, clearly and lucidly explaining the cost per head of bringing immigrants into this country. The management of that Department by his hon. friend from Compton had been able and remarkable, and, if the Cabinet did not understand how to conduct this business, he had no doubt that his hon. friend from Compton, with his usual generosity, would be very glad to furnish them information, and charge nothing for it. More economy, more judgment, and more discretion should be shown by the Government in this relation, and greater results should be accomplished.

Mr. POULIOT said he thought this expenditure could be greatly reduced. He spoke for the Province of Quebec. Immigrants came out, it was true, but to a great extent they passed through his Province and went to the United States. This money could be otherwise expended with greater advantage to the country in general, and more particularly the Province of Quebec. Persons who now lived in the Dominion were worth as much as immigrants, and something should be done to induce those who were leaving us to remain in some part of our vast territories. Means should be given to enable these people to remain, to live on their farms and to establish themselves properly. They were worth as much attention as were strangers, who were brought at great expense from distant lands. The present system was a bad one, and a proper class of persons were not brought into the country. Agents were paid so much per head as if they were buying cattle. This money should not be paid until it was found that the immigrants were suitable, and that they would remain in the Dominion. In the case of certain Frenchmen, the country had been put to the additional expense of returning them to France.

Mr. MASSON said he hoped his hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would become a convert to their ideas. His hon. friend should inform the Minister of Finance by what means the Canadian population could be retained on their own soil; and, if his advice was not followed; his hon. friend should go into Opposition. He had paid a great deal of attention to the remarks of his hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow), and he hoped the results of an increased vote, which the hon. gentleman talked of, would be to the advantage of the country. His hon. friend had been rather severe on the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), who counselled a curtailment of expenditure in this relation, and if his hon. friend reflected a moment, he would see that the hon. member was completely justified by the action of the officers of the Government and of the Finance Minister himself. These gentlemen were those who had injured our immigration system. The late Agent-General, under the Administration of this Government, had informed the world that the condition of Canada was such that it was not advisable for emigrants to come here. This was the first blow struck at the system, and, coming from the highest official of the Government in Europe, it must have exercised an immense influence. The Government had struck the system another blow in sending back to Europe persons who had emigrated to the Dominion, under the pretence that Canada was not fit for them to live in. He had always hoped that, if immigrants could not well settle now in the older Provinces, they could settle on the great prairies of the North-West. If anything could destroy the confidence of intending emigrants to Canada, it was the assertions of our employes and the warnings of the Finance Minister who often took a gloomy view of questions relating to this country, and who had drawn a gloomy picture of the North-West troubles and of Manitoba. He was among those who were not in haste to acquire the North-West Territories, and, if he remembered aright, he voted against their immediate acquisition; but was not the Minister of Public Works one of the strongest advocates of this step, and did he not draw a most glowing picture of that country and its capabilities? The hon. gentleman voted for their acquisition, and he must have desired to see these territories utilized. He thought it was a misfortune, when Canada was struggling to get emigrants and when so many difficulties stood in the way of European emigration, that the Government should advise the people of Europe and even their compatriots in the United States to be careful how they determined to go to Manitoba. The French Canadians who had proceeded to Manitoba from the United States had written to their compatriots at Worcester telling them that the North-West was a glorious country. The hon. the Finance Minister had stated that it was proper to restrict the emigration to the agricultural classes and female servants. He largely agreed with the hon. gentleman in that view; but the very fact that the hon. the Minister of Finance admitted that the immigration should for the present be restricted led him to inquire why a reduction in the vote for that branch of service had not been reduced. If the Government understood the wishes of the people on this point, they would reduce the expenditure on immigration, and that in regard to the payments made to highly salaried officers. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz), had spoken of the difficulties which stood in the way of emigrants from the older Provinces finding locations in the North-West, and complaining that the greater portion of the best lands of those territories was taken up with reserves. It was well known that the people of Manitoba desired the limits of the Province to be extended. If the Government were embarrassed in finding locations within Manitoba for immigrants from Ontario and other Provinces, the boundaries might be extended some miles westward, and other townships surveyed and laid out, which townships might be thrown open to the best immigrants from the older Provinces of Canada and from Europe. There was room in the North-West for many colonies, and he hoped the Government would not go back on the policy which had been pursued, but that they would extend that policy and give the utmost facilities for the establishment of colonies in the North-West. It had been stated in the report of the Agent-General that there was a colony of Tyrolese in Michigan, and the Government had been informed that, if they wished, he would obtain information as to the best means of inducing those people to settle in Canadian territory, as they were greatly dissatisfied with their location in the United States. He wished to know whether any steps had been taken to secure that immigration.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No steps are being taken at present.

Mr. MASSON said the House had reason to find fault with the Government on that account, for the information was given to them in January, 1876. The report said :

"I may say before I conclude that I learned from one agent of two parties—one consisting of 1,000 Tyrolese, and the other a large village of Bavarians, who he said had written to him upon the subject of emigration. I am informed that a number of these Tyrolese some time since were induced to go to Michigan and have been severely disappointed. I will obtain the address of this colony and forward it to you with the suggestion that a special agent should be sent here to visit those persons, and ascertain whether they, like the Icelanders in the United States, would be willing to emigrate to Manitoba.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John): There is a gentleman there now for that special purpose.

Mr. MASSON said he congratulated the Government on the fact that an agent was sent in 1877, but they should not have allowed a whole season to have elapsed without taking action.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he supposed the hon. member for Terrebonne wished them to be sent to Manitoba.

Mr. MASSON said he did not know whether they should be sent to the North-West or not.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the agent was sent to the colony in 1876.

Mr. MASSON: What time in 1876?

Mr. BURPEE: During the summer months.

Mr. MASSON: Is his report before the Government?

Mr. BURPEE: No.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said that every hon. member recognised the necessity of economy in view of the reduction of revenue, but he hoped the Government would be able to find some other means of effecting that economy than by reducing the vote for immigration purposes. They were agreed as to the importance of filling up the country as rapidly as possible, and it would be a misfortune, not only to the North-West, but to the country at large, if the efforts were relaxed to send emigrants there. One of the great wants of the North-West, was undoubtedly, better facilities for getting into the country. He hoped they would soon have a new approach, and a better mode of entering, by way of the United States and Pembina. Recent legislation in Minnesota had been such as to clear away many of the difficulties to the completion of the railway to Pembina; and the Dominion Government would, no doubt, be prepared to do their part of the work, and connect Pembina with Winnipeg. While this road was most desirable, it was even more important they should have a rail route by way of Lake Superior, so that immigrants might not be subjected to the temptation to remain at points on the journey, to which they were at present exposed. But it was not alone necessary to give immigrants facilities to get into the North-West; they should also give them every opportunity to acquire lands when they arrived. It was most unfortunate that Manitoba was, as it had been termed, one great reserve. Almost every section was reserved, not for settlement, but to keep out settlement. Some one-third of the whole nine million acres in Manitoba was virtually a reserve at this moment; that was to say, that all the lands easily accessible were taken up. He did not direct attention to that point in order to find fault with the present or the late Government. It was to be regretted that occasion should be so frequently taken to convert almost everything which came before the House into a party question. He found fault with neither Government, and held that they should endeavour to make the best of the present position. The people of Manitoba thought both Governments rather dilatory, but he knew how very different it was to be responsible and irresponsible, and how much easier it was to criticize than to carry out an undertaking. He was willing to give the Government credit for a desire to do all they could do for the settlement of the country. He felt satisfied that the hon. the Minister of the Interior was at present using every means to effect that purpose, and he hoped one great cause of delay would be speedily removed; that a large portion of what were known as the Half-breed Reserves, consisting of one million and a half acres of land, than which, he ventured to say, nothing more fertile or better adapted for agricultural purpose was to be found on this continent, would be allotted to these people who were entitled to it, and when it once passed into their hands it would go into the possession of farmers. There was also the great Railway Reserve, which the Government might, and, he thought, ought to, allow emigrants to enter, but it should be provided that any land on the line of the railway should only be taken up for actual settlement and land speculators be strictly excluded from it. The number of reserves allowed to remain so long unappropriated and the enormous area of land locked up in the hands of speculators had unquestionably greatly retarded settlement, and might not improperly be termed a curse to the Province, for, wherever, within many miles around Winnipeg, immigrants wished to take up a free grant of homestead, the land proved to be either a Half-breed Reserve, taken up by scrip, or otherwise set apart, so as not to be available for their use. In the United States, settlers were allowed to take up land on the lines of the railway, 160 acres in some sections, and 80 acres where the land was more valuable. He would suggest to the Government to consider whether they could not adopt some such plan. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) as to enlarging the limits of Manitoba, it was well known that the people of the Province were most anxious that this should be done, and he would be glad if such enlargement were made with the least possible delay; but there were even now no obstacles placed in the way of settlers obtaining homesteads outside of the Province. A long way to the west of Manitoba the lands were now surveyed; 150 miles west the lands were laid out in sections where immigrants could settle, and be under protection of the Dominion Government although not under the Provincial Government of Manitoba. There were now three Governments in the North-West—those of Manitoba, the North-West Territory, and Keewatin. So that, practically, the difficulty suggested by the hon. member was not of so much moment as at first glance it might appear to be. At the same time he would repeat that, so soon as it could be properly carried out, they would be very glad to have the limits of the Province extended. The Mennonites were a most thrifty, industrious class of immigrants, and it was fortunate for Manitoba that it had obtained them, especially at such a small expense. At the same time the Government should not rest satisfied with what had been done. It would be equally becoming and desirable that the Government should extend what assistance they could render to those of this country and to our fellow-subjects at home who wished to go to the North-West. Economy might be exercised in some other direction than that of reducing the immigration vote. There were upwards of two hundred members of that House, and some eighty members of the other branch of the Legislature, each of whom received what was called an indemnity, or compensation for services; might it not be possible, in this direction, to effect a saving of $200,000 or $250,000, which could be very profitably used for immigration purposes? Perhaps hon. gentlemen would, without any hesitation, agree to that suggestion; the hon. gentleman from Temiscouata said he would be most happy to do so, as he (Mr. Smith) would be. Besides that mode of economy, there were no doubt many others. As he had stated, the means of getting into the North-West were very inadequate, but he thought that, by way of the Dawson Route, when improved—as was now being done—a good many immigrants might be taken in, even before the through railway was completed. Much was said about the absurdity of utilizing the water stretches; he thought the Government should make use of them as far as practicable, while pushing on the railway operations, and he hoped the time was not far distant when there would be an easy and speedy mode of ingress to Manitoba by the railway from Fort William. He hoped that as soon as possible all the lands in Manitoba would be placed in the hands of actual settlers, as far as it could be done, and that, instead of reducing the amount devoted to immigration, it would be augmented, for money so spent would return good interest in the greatly increased prosperity it would bring, not only to the North-West, but to Canada generally.

Mr. PLUMB said he thought it would be admitted on the other side of the House that the Opposition had shown every disposition to deal liberally with the items before them; but they had noticed the great increase of expenditure and the great falling off in results, and, while they were willing to grant the sums required in the Estimates for immigration expenses, they desired to secure the worth of the money. We found that the cost of bringing each immigrant into the country had increased from four dollars a head in 1872 to twenty dollars a head in 1876, and he found also an item in last year's expenditures of $5,398.88 paid for taking back to their native country 230 immigrants, principally from France. Something was evidently wrong in a system which could give immigrants a claim upon the Government to be sent home at the expense of the Government, and regulations should be made to prevent a recurrence of this circumstance. We now wanted farm settlers and farm labourers, and men of these classes should be encouraged to come to us, and every reasonable facility and inducement should be held out to them. The Finance Minister had spoken discouragingly of the immigration policy, but it could not be supposed that the Ministry desired to abandon the system. It was evident that in some degree the increased cost of emigrants per head could be accounted for by the expense of inland transportation, and the great distances to which many of them had been conveyed since the opening up of the country west of Lake Superior, but this could only in part explain the enormously increased ratio of expense. It was to be noted also that, while very large sums had been paid through the London Agency for the dissemination of information for the benefit of the intending immigrant, in many of the principal countries of Europe, which were important sources of supply, that information was grossly deficient. The Agent at Antwerp, for instance, in his statement which they found in the Report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1876, stated that among the chief requirements for stimulating emigration might be cited "advertising in order that the public may be informed of the profits that immigrants find in Canada, and the happy results obtained by those who settle in that country." He also said that "Canadian petroleum, as such, is unknown on the European continent, and that the name of Canada is never mentioned in connection with this important branch of trade." It seemed strange, considering the costly efforts of the late Agent-General in this direction, that such ignorance of our resources still prevailed in the countries which we were led to believe were actively canvassed in our behalf by himself and his agents. It was apparent that our chief point of settlement was and would continue to be Manitoba, and he regretted to hear from the hon. members for South Perth (Mr. Trow), and Selkirk (Mr. Smith), that so large a part of the land of that Province had been taken up in advance of settlement, as he understood, three millions out of the nine millions of acres which constituted the entire area of the lands of the Province, leaving but 50 acres each to 125,000 settlers. He trusted, in view of encouraging the settlement of that Province, the railways leading to and through it would be vigorously pushed forward. Railways were the precursors of the settlement of the rich farming lands of the West, and this had been abundantly proved in Iowa and Minnesota, where settlement had immediately followed the construction of the various lines in those States, and where wild lands along their courses were selling rapidly at prices varying as high as ten or twelve dollars an acre. The railway was the most useful and effective emigrant agent, and, as such, its construction should not be for a moment delayed. He trusted that the discussion upon the item before the House would have the effect of impressing the Government with the necessity of a vigilant and rigid economy in making the expenditure which they embraced, and that beneficial results would follow.

Mr. BLAIN said he wished to draw the attention of the House to a class of immigrants who had hitherto received but little attention from the Department. He referred to the small tenant-farmers, who were being driven from their farms in the old country in order that a larger quantity of land should be placed under one management. Those men must either turn labourers for the large farmers, go to the large cities and endeavour to obtain employment in the workshops and factories, or leave the country. As a rule, they were pretty well educated, were thrifty and accustomed to work, and he did not think there was any other class of immigrants so desirable to obtain for Canada. The following extract from a letter put this question very forcibly :

“ Great numbers of small tenant-farmers are constantly, of late, being got rid of by their landlords, as they wish to have larger farms, two, three or four being often thrown into one ; then, again, the small farmer finds he cannot compete satisfactorily with the large one, as he has to keep up the same appearances to as great an extent as his richer neighbours ; and the increased rents, taxes and expenses of all kinds in this country, come more heavily upon him. In fact, in many cases, those people have told me that they have been losing money of late years. I have had great numbers of opportunities, which I have taken advantage of, to become on friendly terms with this class ; they are hardy, industrious and persevering people, and there could be no better class as settlers in this country. They and their families are, as a rule, all accustomed to hard work ; just as much so as the agricultural labourer, because it has required all their efforts to pay rent and keep clear of debt ; then they have capital more or less, which is a very material consideration in the case of people settling in a new country. Some have not much, but they will have all the way from a few pounds up to several thousand pounds. I speak of the class of those renting farms, having from say thirty or forty up to 150 acres. Then there are others, either small owners of the land they farm, or the sons of large farmers, who would also be affected, I have no doubt, by what I propose.”

Mr. PLUMB.

He had given some attention to the question of the settlement of the North-West, but he would not discuss it at length on this occasion. He thought he had established some time ago that, by giving the facilities which could be given for carrying freights, by the construction of the railroad from Thunder Bay to Fort Garry, and with the improvements on our canals, we would be able to lay down grain from 500 miles west of Thunder Bay on the Liverpool market at five cents less per bushel than competing countries. In view of this fact, and on account of the great impetus which would be given to immigration, it would be wise for the Government to hurry on the construction of the road.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the class of immigrants referred to was undoubtedly a desirable one, and the London agent was now taking steps to disseminate information respecting Canada and its advantages among the tenant-farmers. Such immigrants were specially adapted to take possession of partially cultivated farms which many old settlers were willing to exchange for lands in the backwoods.

Mr. RYAN said he rose to make a few comments upon statements that had been made by different members during the course of the discussion. The member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) had called the attention of the House to the very numerous reserves existing in Manitoba, and had read a letter to himself from an Ontario emigrant in Manitoba upon the subject. It was quite true that the reserves were too numerous and extensive, and that the letter read by the hon. gentleman was a very fair expression of the provincial sentiment on the subject. As a Manitoba member, he desired to thank the member for South Norfolk for directing the attention of the House to the subject, thus strengthening the hands of the provincial representatives. The letter read by him was in all probability a letter written by one of the settlers of Marquette. Before leaving to attend the Session, his (Mr. Ryan's) constituents had instructed him to do everything in his power to open the reserves.

He did not doubt that other Manitoba members came similarly instructed, and, although the House was well aware that they had never lost an opportunity to urge this course upon the Government, yet so little had, until very recently, been accomplished in the matter, that their constituents had begun to lose confidence, either in the ability or the power of their representatives to induce the Government to move in the matter, and had adopted the expedient of writing to the representatives of the different constituencies of Ontario in which they had formerly resided. From the tone of the discussion which had just taken place, it was quite evident that public opinion in the House was quite alive to the urgent necessity of opening the reserves. He thought, while saying this much, that it was only fair to the new Minister of the Interior to bear testimony that, since his assumption of office, there had been no lack of diligence, and many of the preliminary difficulties to the opening of the reserves had been overcome. When the hon. gentleman assumed office, very little of the Half-breed scrip had issued; now it was almost all issued. The hon. gentleman had also thrown open the Indian Reserve north of the Assiniboine, some 18 or 20 miles south-west of Portage la Prairie, and, if the Danish Reserve on the west shore of Lake Manitoba was not already thrown open, it was on the eve of being opened. He had also the authority of the Minister of the Interior to state that the Government were prepared to issue, as soon as they could be prepared, after the close of the Session, the patents to all the half-breed children over age, which would have the effect of throwing fully, if not more than, one-third of the Half-breed Reserves into the market for sale and settlement. If, in addition to this, the Minister of the Interior would only take some steps to throw open the Railway Reserve for actual settlement only, he would deserve well of the Province. The Railway Reserve took up a very large portion of the Provincial lands. These lands were undoubtedly good, as were nearly all the lands of Manitoba; but for railway purposes they were no better, nor were they more fertile than lands further west, which could be more easily, and with less interference with present settlement, reserved for railway purposes. He could not urge too strongly upon the Government the necessity of doing what he advised in this particular. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Monteith) had stated that many of his constituents had emigrated to the Western States of America. While he (Mr. Ryan) did not doubt the truth of this statement, it was also equally true that some of these Ontario men, after remaining some time in the Western States, returned again to Canada. Among his constituents in West Marquette were many families originally from Ontario, who had tried the Western States, and, after residing for some time in Kansas, in Iowa or Missouri, as the case might be, had gone to Manitoba, and were dwelling there in content. As a Canadian, he was proud to say that we need not fear a careful and impartial comparison of the advantages which were offered to the emigrant by the Western States and Manitoba respectively. The advantages preponderated in favour of Canada. Our lands were immeasurably more fertile than any open for homestead settlement in the Western States. Our climate was more invigorating and healthy; our institutions were certainly, so far as Canadians were the judges, far superior to those of the United States; and, while there was at least equal liberty north of the 49th parallel of latitude, there was certainly a greater amount of security to life and property than existed south of it. If constituents of the hon. member for North Perth emigrated to the Western States of America, it was certainly from a want of correct information, and he would advise him to distribute among intending emigrants in his riding some of the very excellent pamphlets respecting Manitoba and the North-West Territories, for which the country was much indebted to the active and efficient chairman of the Immigration Committee (Mr. Trow), the member for the South Riding of the county of Perth. If intending immigrants read these pamphlets they would turn their faces not to the west, as the hon. gentleman complained, but to our own great North-West. The Mennonites had been frequently mentioned during the discussion. They were frequently mentioned whenever Manitoba matters were under consideration, and always in terms of the highest eulogy. He was satisfied they were an excellent class of settlers, and that the Government had deserved well of the country by their energetic action, which had resulted in securing to Canada so numerous and valuable a body of settlers. But, as the only member on the floor of the House who had been elected by settlers who came originally from Ontario and the other old Provinces of the Dominion, he felt it to be his duty to the men who had elected him to speak out plainly upon this subject. It was customary in this House to speak of the Mennonites as the very best settlers in Manitoba, as excelling all others in frugality and industry. On a former occasion he had heard the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) inform the House how the Mennonites had, within an almost incredibly short time of their arrival in Manitoba, been found selling butter and vegetables in Winnipeg.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he desired to set the member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan) right. He had stated that the Mennonites had sold butter in Winnipeg; he had not said on the occasion alluded to that they had sold vegetables.

Mr. RYAN said, if the hon. member for Selkirk had not stated that the Mennonites had sold vegetables, he might correctly have said so, and he (Mr. Ryan) would say it. He did not desire at all to detract from the merits of the Mennonites, but what he did desire to do was to protest against their being regarded as superior to Canadian settlers. He was bound to say that, although the Mennonites were good settlers, the Canadians were even better. One hundred Canadians would do more to increase the revenue, to build up manufactures, to build cities, to cultivate the soil, and to lay the foundations of the new Canada broad and deep in the great North-West than double the number of Mennonites. It could not be otherwise. Canadians had for a couple of generations enjoyed the benefits of a most admirable system of education. It would be unfair to expect that the Mennonites, who were not equally fortunate, would equal them in intelligence or enterprise. The first generation of Mennonites would, with their habits of frugality, accumulate money, which the succeeding generation would expend with intelligence and enterprise in works of public and private utility, when the education of a quarter of a century had Canadianized them.

Mr. McCALLUM: Hear, hear.

Mr. RYAN said he heard the member for Monck say "Hear, hear," which reminded him that they were agreed in their estimate of the Mennonites. But, while they were in unison so far as to prefer the Canadian settlers, they were not agreed in all particulars. For instance, the hon. member for Monck was inclined to regard the Mennonites with less favour because they were conscientiously opposed to fighting. He (Mr. Ryan) did not regard this conviction as worthy of disapproval or as at all calculated to render them less valuable citizens. The only war to which we could possibly be exposed was a war with the United States. The consequence of such a war would be so lamentable that no member ought to contemplate the possibility of it; and he believed that, in considering the qualities of immigrants, we could very well afford to leave their fighting capacity out of the question. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) had objected to the location of the Mennonite Reserve, on the ground that the lands included in it were such as to be at once required for free settlement. He (Mr. Ryan) did not think the location of the reserve was, under the circumstances of the case, censurable. We had, in making the location, to consider not only where we could best spare the land, but also where they were willing to take it. Canada and the United States had been both competitors for the Mennonite colonies. They had sent out commissioners to see both countries and compare their respective advantages; and, after having made the comparison, they decided in favour of Manitoba, provided the reserves chosen by them were made. After considering the circumstances of the case, he knew of no location possible in Manitoba or the North-West Territories which the Mennonite commissioners would have been willing to accept, which would have interfered less with free settlement than the reserves actually made. The hon. the Minister of Finance had referred to the very large amount of disbursements in the North-West, and made special reference to the cost of surveys. It was true that the surveys had cost a great deal. Had a proper economy been observed, the amount of work done by surveyors could have been procured at a much less cost. Both the late and the present Governments deserved blame in the matter. Each member knew what would be a fair equivalent to a surveyor for a season's work. He would assert, without fear of contradiction, that the prices paid surveyors were extravagant, and much greater than would have been paid by a private individual. In Manitoba, surveyors who got fair townships made frequently from five to seven thousand dollars net in one season. This fact was conclusive, and he hoped that the Government, in granting surveys in the future, would keep it in mind. The hon. the Minister of Finance did not think the times favourable for pouring a large volume of immigration into Manitoba. One of the reasons for his opinion was the uncertainty of the movements of the grasshoppers. Last Session, he said, the Dominion Government had been called upon to make a large advance to purchase seed-grain for immigrants; and, if he (Mr. Ryan) did not misunderstand the Minister of Finance, it would not be in his opinion advisable to stimulate immigration in any very considerable degree until we had some certainty that the grasshoppers would not again ravage Manitoba. He merely wished to say in reply that, if the Finance Minister was waiting until it became certain that grasshoppers would not return to Manitoba, before he poured immigrants into the North-West, he would probably have to wait for ever. He regretted very much the tone the Minister of Finance had adopted in the discussion, and believed his remarks were calculated to do very serious and lasting damage to the cause of immigration. The grasshoppers came and disappeared in obedience to certain natural laws. We could tell what the operation of these laws had been for about three-quarters of a century, because for that length of time we had the history of the grasshopper invasions of the Red River Settlement. During the period referred to, they had visited the country four or five times, staying a longer or shorter period upon each occasion. We could not take bonds from them to stay away; but we were justified in assuming that, in obedience to the natural laws which produced and destroyed them, their visits would not be more frequent in the future than they had been in the past; because the physical condition of that portion of the continent which was their home had not materially changed during the last century. Assuming this much, then, there was not the least reason to be alarmed for the future of Manitoba; its advantages were so many and so great as to allow a very liberal margin for the damages to be apprehended from the grasshopper. It was not for him (Mr. Ryan) to dictate to the Government what amount they should put in the Estimates for immigration. They knew best what amount they could spare, and he hoped they would put every dollar they could spare—that they would even strain a point to make the item as large as possible. If we were obliged to retrench anywhere, there were other expenditures that would admit of pruning more than this one. We could better, at the present time, dispense with the services of a stipendiary magistrate, or some other high official in the North-West, even a Lieutenant-Governor, than with those of the immigration agent. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had stated that he was in favour of the establishment of reserves for the encouragement of colonies of immigrants. He (Mr. Ryan) would agree with him, provided the lands reserved were not those likely to be shortly required for the purposes of free immigration. Before concluding, he would again urge upon the Government the very great necessity for an immigration agent at Duluth. He would only be required during the summer months, and the amount of good done, and the number of immigrants saved would more than compensate the country for the small expenditure that the appointment would entail.

Mr. RYAN.

Mr. MASSON said Mr. Jenkins, in 1776, had reported that a colony of 1,000 Tyrolese, and a village of Bavarians had written him on the subject of emigration. He understood that nothing was done in this regard.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Nothing was done.

Mr. MASSON said he considered the Government still more blameable.

Mr. BUNSTER said he found an item of $1,000 for an agency in British Columbia. The amount seemed small, but nevertheless it would buy a great many ties for the Pacific Railway. He did not consider the agency worth the money. British Columbia had tried the agency system, and found it of little value. They had agents in London and San Francisco, but they had abolished the appointments. He saw over $8,000 was set down for the agent, clerks and messengers at the London office, but he ventured to say that one half of the emigrants sent out were stolen by American agents. The item was exorbitant; at least $200,000 should be sufficient for the purpose. He hoped that the Government would do away with these agents, reduce the item, and devote the saving to the building of the Pacific Railway.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he observed that $800 was set down for an agent in Prince Edward Island. It might be the Government's policy to pay the passages of persons who were leaving the country, but of this he was certain, that the island did not require this agency. The object undoubtedly was to reward some Government supporter. There were no large tracts of wild land in his Province and immigrants were not now disposed to clear sway the virgin forest. They wished to settle on the prairies. If anything was to be done in this connection the local Government should take the matter in hand. They would be very glad, however, to receive in such a case a proportionate amount towards the payment of expenses, and if money could be spared, it was greatly needed for their public works.

Mr. RYAN.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the appointment was not made. The item was set down, as they thought was only proper, to be used in case the local Government decided to assist them in importing immigrants.

Mr. POPE said there was no need of a Dominion agent to conduct immigration to these lands.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I have no objection.

Mr. POPE said that no money had been spent in his county by the Government since Confederation, save for a little dredging.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No public money has been spent in my county since Confederation.

Mr. POPE said he thought the item uncalled for.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will strike it out.

Mr. POPE: We do not want to see money foolishly spent.

Mr. MACKENZIE: None has been paid in this regard.

Mr. POPE: I hope none will be paid.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk), with reference to a remark which had fallen from his hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Ryan), said he had never spoken disparagingly of Canadians or any other nationality. On the contrary, he believed the Canadian settlers in, and those who came from Great Britain to, Manitoba would compare favourably with any settlers in the Dominion. While they were very glad to have such a useful class of immigrants as Mennonites sent them, their first duty, however, concerned their own people.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes after
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 19th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

WALTER SCOTT DIVORCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the first reading of Bill (No. 84) (from the Senate) For the relief of Walter Scott.

Question put and motion agreed to, on the following Division:—

YEAS :

Messieurs

Appleby	Kirk
Archibald	Kirkpatrick
Bain	Little
Bertram	Macdonald (Kingston)
Blackburn	Macdonald (Centre Toronto)
Blain	Macdougall (E. Elgin)
Blake	McDougall (S. Renfrew)
Borden	MacKay (Cape Breton)
Bowman	McKay (Colchester)
Brouse	McCarthy
Burk	McCraney
Burpee (St. John)	McLeod
Burpee (Sunbury)	McNab
Cameron	McQuade
Campbell	Mills
Carmichael	Mitchell
Cartwright	Moffat
Charlton	Monteith
Christie	Norris
Church	Oliver
Cockburn	Palmer
Coffin	Paterson
Cunningham	Pettes
Davies	Platt
Dawson	Plumb
DeCosmos	Pope (Queen's, P.E.I.)
DeVeber	Robinson
Dewdney	Rochester
Dymond	Roscoe
Farrow	Ross (W. Middlesex)
Ferris	Schultz
Fleming	Scriver
Flesher	Sinclair
Forbes	Smith (Peel)
Galbraith	Smith (Westmoreland)
Gibbs (North Ontario)	Snider
Gibbs (South Ontario)	Thompson (Cariboo)
Gibson	Thompson (Haldimand)
Gillies	Thomson (Welland)
Gillmor	Trow
Goudge	Vail
Guthrie	Wallace (Albert)
Hagar	White (N. Renfrew)
Haggart	Wood
Higinbotham	Workman — 92.
Kerr
Killam

NAYS :

Messieurs

Bannatyne	Irving
Benoit	Jones (Halifax)
Bernier	Lajoie
Blanchet	Lanthier

Bolduc	Laurier
Bourassa	Macdonald (Cornwall)
Brooks	McDonald (Cape Breton)
Caron	MacDonnell
Casgrain	McDougall (Three Riv.)
Cauchon	McIntyre
Cheval	McIsaac
Cimon	Perry
Colby	Pope (Compton)
Coupal	Pouliot
Currier	Power
Daoust	Robillard
Desjardins	Rouleau
De St. Georges	Short
Devlin	St. Jean
Fiset	Taschereau
Flynn	Thibaudeau
Fréchette	Wright (Ottawa Co.)
Gaudet	Wright (Pontiac).— 47.
Hurteau

Bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER said, since the conversation on Friday evening regarding proceedings on Divorce Bills, he had looked into the matter and had found that it was the practice to refer such Bills to a Special Committee after the first reading. He really could not find upon what ground that practice rested, unless it was owing to the fact that for a number of years it was the custom in the old Parliament of Canada. The practice in the British House of Commons was to refer Divorce Bills after the second reading. Notwithstanding that they had a Divorce Court in England, the Commons still had this standing Committee on Divorce. It was quite competent for this House to adhere to its own practice, and perhaps it would be convenient to do so.

Mr. BLAKE said it was contemplated in the first set of rules of the House to make the reference after the second reading. This was, however, subsequently altered. The House began by referring after the second reading. The rule was then altered to the first reading, afterwards back to the second, and again to the first. They had no Standing Committee to whom those Bills might be referred for the purpose of making quasi-judicial investigation, which it was within the competency of the House to make. The Committee generally contented itself with perusing the evidence sent in by the Senate Committee. While they had the general practice of referring Bills after the second reading, he did not think it was necessary to alter a practice which had the sanction of ten years' existence.

Perhaps, when other matters in connection with the rules were considered, it might be determined whether this rule should be changed or confirmed by a special rule.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had prepared rather an interesting memorandum on the subject, which he would read:

"Up to 1867, in the old Legislative Assembly of Canada, all Private Bills were referred to Committees after second reading. Divorce bills were so referred. (See Beresford's case, 1852.) In 1867, the practice was changed, and Bills referred after first reading. Divorce Bills, consequently, followed this practice. (See case of J. R. Martin, 1873.) In 1874, practice was again changed, and Bills referred after second reading. In 1875, a Bill for the relief of T. W. Peterson came up, and was referred after first reading, as had been done under previous practice since 1867. No question then rose as to the propriety of the practice. In the Senate, as in old Legislative Council, Divorce Bills are always referred after second reading. In England, Divorce Bills have always been referred after second reading to a Select Committee."

Mr. MILLS said a Divorce Bill could not be considered precisely as any ordinary Bill would be, and it would be hardly proper to call upon the House to vote for the second reading of the Bill before a tittle of evidence on which it was founded was before them. If, after the first reading, it was referred to a Committee whose business it would be to enquire into the evidence and report, the House would be in a position to consider the matter properly.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he quite agreed with the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Bothwell. There was nothing, however, in the Rules to the effect that the Bill should be referred after the first reading, and all Private Bills were referred after the second reading.

Mr. MILLS: All Private Bills go before a general Committee, but this course cannot be pursued with respect to this Bill.

Mr. POPE (Compton): The Rule does not speak of any particular Bills.

Mr. CAUCHON said that, on the second reading, the principle of a Bill was affirmed or it was rejected. Here, however, a question of fact was concerned, and not a principle. If the facts in the opinion of the members did not justify divorce, of course the Bill would not stand or go to the second reading.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not agree with the hon. member from Compton, that they had no power to refer after the first reading.

Mr. POPE said there was no rule to this effect.

Mr. BLAKE said it seemed the simpler method to adhere to what had been sanctioned by their practice.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that the Bill, evidence, and papers be referred to a Special Committee, composed of Messrs. McCarthy, Cameron, Robinson, Trow, Young, Oliver, McDougall (South Renfrew), Kerr and Kirkpatrick.

Motion agreed to on the same Division.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 34) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ottawa Agricultural Insurance Company.—(Mr. Currier.)

PICKERING HARBOUR AND ROAD JOINT STOCK COMPANY.—[BILL No. 26.]

(Mr. Gibbs, South Ontario.)

BILL RECOMMITTED.

House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 26) To vest the property and powers of the Pickering Harbour and Road Joint Stock Company in Joseph Harris McClellan.

Mr. BLAKE said, as he understood it, this company was incorporated under an Act of the old Parliament of Canada. It was proposed to invest its powers in an individual, and the Ontario Legislature had passed an Act with this object in view. Doubts, which, in his opinion, were well founded, had been raised with regard to its validity; and it was now proposed to legalize and confirm that Act, and vest the property in Mr. Joseph Harris McClellan. What was worthy of consideration was how far it was expedient to grant to an individual powers usually bestowed only on corporate bodies having perpetual succession, which they could always reach, and to which certain responsibilities were attached. Mr. McClellan might leave the property to heirs, to whom the conditions on which it was vested might not apply. It seemed to him that, if they adopted the principle in question, it must, of course, be general in its application. They could not deny to one privileges which had been granted to another.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he thought the second clause of the Bill had reference to this objection.

Mr. BLAKE said he had read this clause; but it was to be remembered that there would be no continued entity to which they could look for the performance of the duties in question, though the powers requested were granted. What seemed a proper course was that a new company, in which the property might be vested, should be formed. If that would suit the views of the hon. member for South Ontario, it would be infinitely more satisfactory to refer the Bill back to the appropriate Committee.

Mr. GIBBS accepted the suggestion.

Progress ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Progress reported.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) moved that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Private Bills.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

SPRINGHILL AND PARRSBOROUGH COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 12.]

(Mr. Domville.)

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. BLAKE said it seemed dangerous for them to permit the Bill to pass in its present form. The Bill, by an alteration, he believed, made in the appropriate Committee, went on the theory, as the ground-work of action by the House, that the line of railway to which it referred was a work for the general advantage of Canada, and it made such a declaration. It would obviously follow, as far as he could judge, that they could not refuse to make such a declaration at the instance of any other private railway whatever. He thought such a declaration should only be made when it was strictly true. There was a sense, of course, in which any railway was for the general advantage of Canada, but this was certainly not the sense in which these words were used in the British North America Act. There was another ground—if the allegations of the Bill were true, as they must believe under the circumstances—on which the Bill could be entertained, and this was that the company was not merely a railway company, but a railway and coal mining company, which desired to own ships running from Dominion to foreign ports. Such an enterprise took it beyond the legislative powers of the Province, and therefore on this ground it did not seem improper that incorporation or the necessary powers should be granted by the House, whichever mode might be thought most convenient. He suggested the same mode which had been adopted with reference to the previous Bill,—that it should be referred back to the Committee with the view of having such amendments made as might obviate the objections to its passage in its present shape.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the railway itself was to the general advantage of Canada, but, however this might be disputed, it could not be denied that the enterprise would be so when the powers asked for, additional to those granted by the local Government, were obtained. Where a Local Legislature passed an Act for simply local purposes, with certain privileges and conditions, it was a question whether the general Government might so add to the powers of that Act as would destroy its entity in a local sense. The corporation, as it existed, was created by the Local Legislature. But, supposing the corporation exceeded its powers, then it would be liable to have its corporate Act taken away from it. The question for consideration was whether this Government could enlarge the powers of an Act passed by a Local Legislature, contrary to the will of that Legislature. If this were done, the entity of the Act would surely be destroyed, for the Act would be a creation in the first instance of the Local Legislature, and the latter could repeal it if they wished. The question was an important one, and he thought it advisable that the Bill should be referred back to the Committee for consideration.

Mr. BLAKE said there were two courses open: to grant additional powers to the local Act, or to take the Act within their own jurisdiction and create a new corporation out of the old one. He was not yet prepared to assent to the opinion that this Government could grant additional powers to the Act of the Local Legislature.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I said there was doubt about it.

Mr. BLAKE said he was strongly of the opinion that great inconvenience would result from such a course. It ought to be laid down as a general rule—which, however, had its exceptions, perhaps—that any corporation created by a Local Legislature coming to the general Government for new powers, ought to have its corporate Act again created in the whole by the latter authority. It would be observed that the clause which spoke of matters for the general advantage of Canada was confined to works, and that the other purposes and powers proposed to be given would not in themselves assist the argument that the railway was for the general advantage of Canada, either practically or in point of logic, although perhaps the power to sail ships to foreign ports would furnish a peg on which to hang this argument, as that was a power which could not be given by a Local Legislature.

Mr. PALMER said he thought some of the powers asked for would be clearly out of the power of the Local Legislature to grant. But the original object of the corporation was clearly within the jurisdiction of the local Government and out of the jurisdiction of the general Government. But it was very questionable whether the general Government could give a corporation created by the local Government power to give promissory notes. It would not be a corporation created by this Parliament at all, and he did not see how this Parliament could give such powers as would destroy it altogether, as a corporation created by a local Act. He did not believe it right by a mere declaration to assume jurisdiction, when there was not jurisdiction without that declaration. He thought it would be advisable to refer the matter back to Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said it was necessary to consider whether the Act could be taken charge of by this Parliament, or by subsequent legislation by the Local Legislature. It was perfectly competent for this Parliament to declare that this work was for the general advantage of Canada, and thus to bring it within its jurisdiction. He thought it proper that the Bill should be referred back to the Railway Committee.

Mr. DOMVILLE said under the British North America Act this Parliament only had the right to legislate for railways and steamers under certain conditions. When the Bill was first introduced, it was not declared that it was for the general advantage of Canada, but it was found that this would have to be inserted for this Parliament to deal with the Bill. He had been led to believe that the Bill, in order to pass, would have to contain these words.

Mr. BLAKE said he was afraid the difficulty could not be got rid of by making an undue declaration.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.

THE FISHERIES COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL asked whether the Government was prepared to state whether the American Government had appointed their Fishery Commissioner as provided under the Treaty of Washington, and if so, who was he; also whether the British Government had appointed their Commissioner; if so, who was he; also whether the third Commissioner had been selected or appointed and by whom; and if appointed, who was he?

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the British Commissioner had been appointed, as was well known.

Mr. MITCHELL: We do not know it officially.

Mr. SMITH: This Government is not in a position to name the American Commissioner. The same observation applies to the third Commissioner. As soon as the information is ready, it will be brought down to the House without any further motion.

THE ST. ISIDORE MAIL.

QUESTION.

Mr. ROULEAU asked whether it was the intention of the Government to issue orders that the mail despatched from Quebec for St. Isidore, county of Dorchester, should be left at St. Henri, county of Levis, to be from thence forwarded to the said parish of St. Isidore.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the change could not be decided upon until the Government had some information as to how it could be made.

JUDICIAL STAFF OF MONTREAL DISTRICT.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for all Orders in Council and correspondence since last Session between the Federal and Quebec Governments concerning the Judicial Staff of the District of Montreal.

Motion agreed to.

INGONISH HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR PLANS AND REPORT.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for plans of contract for building Ingonish Harbour (being part of contract); also a report of Engineer agreeing to curtailment of said original plans and specifications, and the correspondence on that subject, how much had been paid for the contract, and how much for extras, and how much was claimed for extras; how many feet did the finished work extend seaward that the original contract and plans contemplated; how much had been paid to Superintendent McLeod for superintending said work. He said it was now a month since he first moved in the House for the plans and specification, and although the hon. the Premier promised to bring the information down, he had not done so. It was now four or five months since he made the charge before his constituents that there was something wrong about this contract, and he had taken the first opportunity he constitutionally could take to verify his statement. In reply to a motion for full particulars, he got a parcel of papers, from which it would appear that the essential information which he required had been intentionally kept back. This was the fourth time he had had to apply for the information. He had received a letter from a gentleman who did not know of the present motion, stating that 160 feet of partly-built work was in the harbour, forming a serious obstruction to navigation. He thought the Government should give the information he asked for, in order that it might be seen whether there was any truth in the charges he had made against them.

Mr. BLAKE said he had given instructions to have the return prepared immediately.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK AND INTER-COLONIAL RAILWAYS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. Fiset moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, on the subject of the arrangements effected with the latter, permitting the carriages of the Intercolonial Railway Company to run over that section of their railway between Rivière-du-Loup and Point Levis.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER AT UPPER ST. FRANCIS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for copies of all correspondence in the possession of the Government regarding the dismissal of the postmaster of Upper St.

Francis, in the county of Madawaska, in the Province of New Brunswick. He said he had submitted the motion because he had received a letter from the late postmaster, complaining of the treatment he had received. It appeared the postmaster had been dismissed, and received instructions from the Post-Office Inspector, calling upon him to hand over the papers of the office to his successor. There was, so far as he (Mr. Costigan) was aware, no cause for complaint, and the postmaster always appeared to discharge his duties in a satisfactory manner; and, if there was any serious charge to be brought against him, an opportunity should have been afforded to repel the charge. The fact that the Government acted without knowledge of the matter was shown in that they appointed, to take charge of the post-office, a person who did not reside there, and who did not desire the position. The change was not made in the interests of the people of the district, but in order to serve the interests of the mail contractors. Inasmuch as the new postmaster did not wish the office, and the late postmaster still remained in charge, it was desirable that instructions should be sent to him to continue to discharge the duties, unless some serious complaint had been made against him.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said no complaint had been made against the postmaster, and he had not been dismissed. The action taken was on a report made by the Inspector of New Brunswick, growing out of representations that the post-office might be placed in a more convenient position. The annual revenue of the office was $2.18, and, as the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., had stated that the postmaster who was appointed was not acting, his representations would be communicated to the Inspector, with a view to have any inconvenience rectified, if such existed.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF MINORITIES

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. DEVLIN moved:

“That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into and report upon the expediency of providing some system by which a more equal and just representation of all the electors, minorities as well as majorities, may be secured, and that with this view they be respectfully requested to investigate the system originated by Mr. Thomas Hare.”
Mr. COSTIGAN.

He said the motion which he now submitted for the judgment of the House had for its object a reconsideration of the existing Electoral Law with a view of ascertaining whether it could not be so amended as to give greater power and influence to the electors of the Dominion in the selection of their representatives than they could now possibly exercise in that direction under the present system of voting. The question embraced in the proposition had not, he was aware, received much attention among the Canadian people, and would, in all probability, have remained wholly unnoticed were it not for its timely and happy introduction by a very distinguished personage, to whose remarks upon the subject he would have the pleasure of adverting hereafter. But, although the right of minorities to proportional representation could scarcely be said to have engaged attention in Canada to any very great extent, it had, nevertheless, been the subject of earnest discussion for many years in Europe and in the United States, and it might now be fairly said, after a full and critical examination of the advantages claimed for that measure of relief, that it came down to us supported by the opinions of eminent statesmen, and endorsed with the enlightened approval of very many of the most distinguished political writers upon Representative Government. As the election law appeared upon our Statute-book at the present time, it was well known that the sole power to rule, to make laws, to impose taxes, to regulate trade and commerce, and all the great and conflicting interests which came within the jurisdiction of the governing body was vested exclusively in the hands of the party which happened to command a majority, leaving the minority without representation, without a voice in the councils of the country, compelled to submit to any and every measure which the will or caprice of that majority, no matter how small, might see fit to impose on them. Mr. Hare said:

“Looking at the place which representative institutions are manifestly destined to occupy in the government of mankind, it becomes necessary to consider whether means cannot be found to eradicate the vice from their constitution which deprives the State of the benefit of the judgment of, it is to be feared, a large number of the most calm and dispassionate, as well as of the most thoughtful and instructive of its people.”

The problem was how to make representation in fact what it was in name, to make it universally truthful, and give to the best elements in every constituency their best and most perfect form of expression. The founders of our parliamentary system, if that appellation could be conferred upon any class of men in any age, did not contemplate, and could not provide for the differences of opinion to be evolved in the progress of civilization. Nor could they have foreseen that the will of a vast proportion of those whom they had entrusted with franchise would have been wholly disregarded. It was obvious that the traditional method of filling the English House of Commons, which was followed in Canada at this day, suitable as it was in earlier times, when a few master minds directed all public affairs, and the people came together not to reason but to confirm what their leaders had done or proposed to do, was unsuitable at this day. The principle to be kept in view in forming the representative assembly was that full play should be given to the expression of all opinions and sentiments, so that they might be admitted to the test and scrutiny of discussion. The electors of Canada might well be described as the scattered inhabitants of an extensive country, possessing knowledge and powers of thought infinitely varied and diffused, and to expect that the electoral forms of a rude and illiterate age would gather for the national benefit the fruit of that expanded intelligence was, said Mr. Hare, “as reasonable as to suppose that the vast manufacturing results of to-day would be produced by the primitive loom and hammer.” He believed it was that conviction which led the hon. the Minister of Justice to deal with that all-important question in his great speech at Aurora, and to condemn the present system of elections as one totally unworthy of a liberty-loving, intelligent and enlightened people. He hoped, now that that hon. gentleman occupied a position which enabled him to give effect to the opinions enunciated by him upon that subject, he would bring his matchless eloquence, his powerful reasoning faculties to the support of the motion he (Mr. Devlin) had now the honour to bring under the notice of this House, in the hope that it might ultimately lead to the adoption of such a measure as would secure to the now virtually disfranchised minorities, as well as to the majorities, a fair, reasonable, just and proportional representation in the councils of the country. Speaking upon this subject at Aurora, the hon. the Minister of Justice said:

“I believe we might effect immense improvements upon the present system of popular representation. For my own part, I have been for some time dissatisfied with our present mode of popular representation, as furnishing no fair indications of the opinions of the country. I do not think a system under which a majority in one constituency elects a member, the minority being hopelessly helpless without any representation of its own at all, is a good system. I have been collecting statistics on this subject, and it is extraordinary to what extent the popular voice as shown in the popular vote differs from the expression of that voice in the Legislature. Our principle of government is that the majority must decide. Upon what is it founded? Well, you cannot give a reason except this, that it is necessary—it is the only way in which government can be carried on at all. But, if the minority must on this ground of necessity bow to the voice of the majority, the majority is all the more bound to see that the minority has its fair share of representation and its fair weight in the councils of the country. The majority must recollect that it may become the minority one day, and then it would like to have its fair share in those councils, and such disparities as these are not likely to induce a feeling of cheerful submission on the part of the minority. We say we have representation by population; but we have not representation by population unless the population has a representation in the Legislature equivalent to its strength at the polls. My opinion is that it is not houses and stocks and farms that are represented, but human beings with immortal souls. These are the true subjects of representation, the sharers in the owners of political power, and I think a scheme ought to be devised, as a scheme has been devised, to give them a fairer representation. I say the system under which we now live is inadequate to the purposes of the age, the complicated interests of society, the various views entertained by various sections of people, the enormous divergency which exists, the fact that you cannot accurately or reasonably approximate at the polls by the return of members to Parliament. These considerations are sufficient to condemn the existing system and send us on a search for a better. That better can I believe be found, and, if it is reserved for this Province or this Dominion to set the example of finding it, a great benefit will be conferred by us on the cause of freedom throughout the world. I believe that Mr. Hare's system or some modification of it, a system by which each voter may vote for any one he pleases, and give his vote, should it not be required for his first choice, to second, third or fourth candidates in the order of his preference, would result in the return, by unanimous constituencies, of men having the confidence of those constituencies and of just so many men on each side as the strength of that side at the polls would justify. We shall have to settle, before long, the question of the parliamentary system of the future. As the late Prince Consort said some years ago, parliamentary systems are on their trial.

When we provide a plan by which every man shall be represented, by which each side of opinion shall be represented in proportion to its strength, we shall have avoided the difficulties which result from the artificial divisions which we make, and which render the expression of opinion by the returns essentially different from that shown at the polls."

This unreserved endorsement of the justice of the principle he (Mr. Devlin) was endeavouring to impress upon the House—this lucid and candid expression of opinion in favour of the right of minorities to proportional representation by so wise, so prudent and so far-seeing a statesman as the hon. the Minister of Justice—must be taken as a deliberate and solemn protest on his part against the present one-sided system of electing representatives. Most heartily did he concur with that hon. gentleman in saying that, when the Dominion replaced it by a better system, by one that would strike off the legal shackles which cramped political thought and fettered political action, giving to every elector in the Dominion the right to vote for the person whom he might think best qualified to represent his interest—when this needful and happy change should have taken place, then, indeed, our Dominion might triumphantly point to her example as a brilliant advance in the science of Government—then might she proudly and confidently assert that by her action she had conferred inestimable benefit on the cause of freedom throughout the world. It was proper, however, that he (Mr. Devlin) should here remark that the policy thus propounded by the hon. the Minister of Justice was not allowed to pass unchallenged. Its wisdom was questioned, the necessity for its adoption denied, and its adaptability to the end in view declared unsuitable and impracticable, and why? Because, said the opponents of the scheme, minorities were represented and had always been represented, and, in this way, if Liberalism was triumphant in one constituency, Conservatism was victorious in another, and thus were things equalized, and minorities represented. It required a very brief examination of the grounds upon which this defence of our electoral law rested to prove conclusively that the argument urged in support of it was as untenable as it was dangerous in principle. As a matter of fact, it was not true that the opinions suppressed by the electoral voice at one place were expressed in those of another. It had been truly said by Mr. Hare that the separation of parties according to localities did not even approach completeness, and that the number of localities in which any given opinions prevailed was not proportioned to the general prevalence of these opinions. A distinguished writer, replying through the Edinburgh Review to these objections, said:

MR. DEVLIN.

"It is this supposed system of balances and counter-balances, which is the ignis fatuus of the politicians of this century and the source of wranglings and jealousies without end. It recedes as they pursue it, and no sooner do they imagine that its elements are caught and fixed upon their canvas, than they are gone like a dissolving view."

To contend, therefore, that, although the opinions and sympathies of a minority were set at defiance in one place, it was a sufficient justification for this state of things that persons whose opinions corresponded with those of that minority might form a majority in some other place, and that they then succeeded in suppressing the voices of those whose opinions were in harmony with the victorious party elsewhere was to set up one great evil as a compensation for another.

"Can it," said the reviewer, "be seriously argued that to balance one great mischief against another is as well and as safe a mode of proceeding as an honest endeavour to avert both."

If so, political action, instead of being the result of a steady and legitimate adoption of means to an end, was converted into a game of chance, of speculation, in which the failure on one card was to be compensated by success on another. In 1870, when the general question of representation was before the United States House of Representatives, Mr. Marshall, of Illinois, a gentleman of great distinction, speaking of the rights of minorities to proportional representation, made these remarks:—

"It is sometimes said that the man who is elected is the representative of the entire people of his district. This is an absurdity; he is not in any proper sense the representative of the elector who voted against him, but his antagonist. He is antagonistic to him in principle, in purpose and in his ideas, in regard to the mode in which the Government is to be administered. Under the present system, the minority cannot in any just sense be said to have any representation at all. They may go to the polls, it is true, but nine times out of ten it is a mere mockery, and they vote, knowing that their votes will give them no voice in the enactment of the laws by which they are to be governed."

This, he maintained, was an indisputable truth, and applied with as much truth to Canada as it did to the United States. In fact, every one knew that, as between a Liberal and his Conservative constituents, and as between a Conservative and his Liberal constituents, there was no such political relationship as should exist between a representative and his constituents. In the United States, where this question had been considered by some of the brightest minds of that great country, a table was recently made, showing the number of voters represented and unrepresented in the 40th, 41st, and 42nd Congress, which showed the following astonishing result: Of the voters represented in the 40th Congress, there were 2,335,617; unrepresented, 1,669,956. Divided into parties, there were unrepresented, 1,242,115 Democrats, and 427,841 Republicans; the result being that the Republicans elected 143 members, and the Democrats only 49. In the 41st Congress the number of voters represented was 3,524,335; unrepresented, 2,552,078. Of those without representation there were 820,827 Republicans, and 1,731,254 Democrats; which enabled the former to elect 159 members, and the latter 83. There was about the same proportion in the 42nd Congress, thus showing that 58 per cent. of the voters secured all the representation, and 42 per cent. none. For every 100, therefore, who approached the poll, 60 secured the benefit of the suffrage, and 40 had none whatever. Mr. Garfield, speaking in the House of Representatives on this subject, said that, to his mind, the weak point in a representative Government, as now organized and administered, was that it permanently disfranchised a large number of voters.

"Take," he said, "my own constituency. I have seldom been returned by less than 9,000 majority. There are 10,000 Democrats in my district who have been voting there for the last forty years without any more hope of returning a member to the floor of Congress than of returning one to the Commons of Great Britain."

He would now consider how the electoral law worked in England. Mr. Hare stated that in the general election of 1852 in England the aggregate number of votes polled by the majorities where the seats were contested was 291,118, while the minority polled 199,994. These figures, Mr. Hare said, might with sufficient accuracy be taken as represented by three to two, and, if the same calculation was extended to the whole constituencies and taken as expressing the silent and suppressed differences of opinion where no contest was attempted, it would appear that 500,000 electors were not represented except by a fiction of law. Thus, in England, as in the United States, no less than 42 per cent. of the electors were unrepresented. Referring to this fact, Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his book on "Representative Government," said:

"Is it not a very great grievance that in every Parliament a very numerous portion of the electors, anxious and willing to be represented, have no member in the House for whom they have voted."

He (Mr. Devlin) was glad to say, however, that since that time the principle of minority representation had been acknowledged and incorporated into the English Constitution. In July, 1867, a Reform Bill being then before the House of Commons, it was moved by Mr. Lowe, as an amendment :

“That at any contested election for any county or borough represented by more than two members, and having more than one seat vacant, every voter shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of candidates to be elected, and may give them all to one or distribute them among the candidates as he sees fit.”

This amendment was lost, 173 voting for it, and 314 against it. When this Reform Bill came before the House of Lords for consideration, Lord Cairns moved an amendment to the effect that in every county or borough represented by three members no person should be allowed to vote for more than two candidates. This amendment gave rise to an animated and interesting discussion. It was supported by Lord John Russell, Earl Spencer, Earl Stanhope, Earl Cowper, Lord Carnarvon, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, and was carried by 142 against 51. In the House of Commons, notwithstanding the adverse vote upon Mr. Lowe's motion, it was carried by a majority of 49, the vote standing 253 against 204. On that occasion the Right Hon. Mr. Lowe said :

“There is a sort of worship of the majority which, after all, is a mere political superstition. The idea of true representation is to leave no part of the constituency unrepresented, and if you can find the means, or if the means can be found for increasing the number of members, and then adapting the system to that increase so as not to disfranchise the minority, but give some representation to the whole constituency; then, so far from regarding that as an innovation upon the Constitution, I think we ought to hail it as an advance in the science of Government.”

The London Times, commenting on the amendment, stated :

“The idea of modifying our electoral machinery so as to secure, in constituencies represented by three members, the proportionate representation of both the great divisions of party is working its way by its own inherent justice. Everywhere it has been confessed that the adoption in one form or another of the cumulative principle of voting was essential to maintain the character of our institutions, and that measure alone could re-distribute the electoral power which all prescient statesmen regard as being the inevitable result of our Representative Government. Time will establish the true principle more and more firmly in the judgment of the nation, and those who fight against it fight against light.”

Subsequently, in the Sessions of 1870-1871, a most strenuous effort was made to repeal the clause in the Bill; but, so far from the attempt proving successful, the principle received a further extension, by the introduction of cumulative voting in the election of School Boards; “which,” said the Minister of Justice, in his ever-memorable Aurora speech, “resulted in the election of a dignified Parliament, which may vie with the Parliament of the Empire in ability, in proportion to its numbers.” Thus had the principle of minority representation been ratified and confirmed in England; and, as he thought he had shown, sanctioned by authority, which had the highest dignity. It was only necessary that he should further remark, in connection with the action which England had taken on this subject, that the supporters of the scheme had been fully satisfied with the results of the elections which had taken place under the amended law; for, as the Times had well said: “The principle of minority representation is working its way by its own inherent justice,” thus demonstrating to the nations of the world “that those who fight against it fight against light.” England, however, had not been the first country to recognize the principle of minority representation. That honour belonged to Norway, for he found, on reading up this subject, that a very distinct plan of minority or proportional representation was contained in her system, dating as far back as 1814. Next in the order of precedence came Denmark, followed by legislative adaptations of the principle, to a greater or less extent, in—as he had shown—England, Switzerland, and several States of the American Union; and, even where minority representation had not become law, it had, nevertheless, received the greatest attention, as for instance in France, Germany and Italy. He would call the attention of the House to an election held in Illinois, which showed, beyond doubt, the practicability of the scheme, and its advantages; and he thought that, if hon. members would reflect upon the question, they would see that it was one of those measures that must tend to promote the prosperity of the country in which it was enforced. In Illinois the principle of minority representation had been subjected to a practical test. The cumulative system of voting had been adopted and incorporated into the constitution of this State, giving to every voter the right to cast as many votes for one candidate as there were representatives to be elected, or to distribute them among the candidates, if the voter preferred that course. If three members were to be elected, he could give all his three votes to one candidate, or divide them as he desired. At an election held in 1872, under this system, the number of representatives to be elected was 153; and, if each party were to be properly represented in the House, there would have been 85 of a Republican majority, and 68 of a Democratic minority. The Republicans carried 33 districts, and, under the old system, would have had 99 members, and the Democrats carried only 13 districts, and would have had 54 members. The result was thus described in the Cincinnati Gazette:—

Mr. DEVLIN.

“For the first time in the history of political organizations each party is represented from every portion of the State, and the aggregate representation is exactly in proportion to the numerical strength of each; thus the Republicans have elected 86 members, and the Democrats 67. In seven districts in which there were 58,335 voters, 18,420 were unrepresented under the old system, while, under the new system, 1,128 were alone unrepresented.”

The Chicago Times commenting on the election, stated:

“Such practical demonstrations of the eminent justice of proportionate representation in its natural results speak more convincingly in its favour than whole volumes would do.”

The Chicago Daily Tribune, in concluding an article eulogizing the system, stated: “The principle of minority representation has been fully vindicated”; to which the World added: “We may expect to see a principle which has given so much and such general satisfaction incorporated into the various State constitutions.” In the Parliament of New South Wales a Bill was brought before the Legislative Council in 1862, adopting the principle of minority representation in the Upper House. It was referred to a Select Committee, which reported unanimously in its favour; and he should take the liberty, even at the risk of wearying members, to read a few extracts from the report because it explained the modus operandi of the measure, and indicated the advantages which, in the judgment of the Committee, were likely to flow from the adoption of it. The report stated:

“As respects the mode of voting, your Committee have given much consideration to the plan now commonly known as that of Mr. Hare, and which has lately attracted considerable notice among leading political writers in Europe. Its leading feature is the representation of all the electors in the proportion of the numbers of their respective parties and sections, instead of the representation of the majorities prevailing in each local electorate, while leaving the defeated minorities wholly without representation. Under the present system, if one interest or prejudice be prevalent in a majority of the electors in twenty constituencies, twenty members may be elected to represent those majorities, although the minorities may, collectively, amount to a figure not far short of the successful majorities. A difference of one vote in each electorate might determine the election, and twenty votes might thus determine the fate of twenty elections, thus leaving thousands of electors forming the minorities without a single representative. This is doubtless an extreme supposition, but the merits of any system may fairly be illustrated by what it tends to when carried out to its utmost length. The system of Mr. Hare provides a remedy, and, while it renders this injustice to minorities impossible, it equally maintains the just rights of majorities. It establishes a true representation of the whole society, with its various interests and opinions represented in due proportion and the manner in which this is effected is extremely simple. Supposing the number of voters to be 30,000, and the number of members to be thirty, each 1,000 voters, called a quota, is considered to be entitled to one member. Instead of a local electorate inhabited by 1,000 electors of divided opinions, and comprising a minority which is outvoted in that particular electorate and left wholly without representation in the Legislature, each member's constituency will consist of 1,000 electors coinciding in the choice of a representative irrespective of their places of residence. For this purpose, the whole Colony will form a single electorate, the electoral districts of the Assembly being adopted solely for the purpose of more conveniently making up the roll and polling the votes. Each elector can thus ensure the return of at least one candidate by associating himself with a sufficient number of fellow-electors, wherever resident, to form a quota. But if the vote of each were limited to the naming of the one candidate he prefers above all others, it is evident that more than the quota would often concur in the choice of a popular candidate, and thus lead to a loss of the votes over and above the required number. To prevent this, each voter is entitled to name several candidates in the order of preference, so that, if the vote be not required for the first on the list, it is counted for the second, and if it is not required for the second, then for the third, and so on, to ensure its being made, ultimately, contributory to the election of some candidate of his choice."

The Committee concluded its report in these words:—

"The idea of Representative Government in the writings of statesman has long been the representation of classes or interests in due proportion, so as to render the legislation the true epitome of the political opinions of society. Hitherto, nothing but an approximation to this idea has appeared possible, and Mr. Hare's system, for the first time, proposes to make it a reality."

The Bill thus reported passed the Upper House and received two readings in the Lower House, but, the Ministry having resigned before the third reading could be obtained, the measure fell to the ground. He might remark in concluding this branch of the subject, that in the Parliament of Victoria an attempt was also made to amend the electoral law in the same direction. The measure was warmly supported by the Attorney-General of the day and others, but it was defeated because it was confined to a few districts instead of being intended for the whole colony.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DEVLIN said that, having spoken so much of the progress of minority representation in other countries, he would now beg the indulgence of the House for a few moments longer, while he tried to present the question from a strictly Canadian point of view, and endeavoured to show the political status of minorities in the Dominion of Canada; and, for this purpose, he would ask:

Mr. DEVLIN.

Was our electoral system more perfect than that of our neighbours upon the other side of the line, or more just and equitable in its recognition of minority rights than the representative systems which prevailed in the countries referred to? To that question he unhesitatingly answered that, in his opinion, our system was productive of as great, if not greater, injustice than the worst of them; and, under its operation, minorities need never hope for representation, proportionately or otherwise. This, he admitted, was a bold and, apparently, a somewhat audacious statement; but it was capable of verification by any person who would take the trouble to examine carefully the foundation upon which our electoral mode of procedure rested, and by any person who took sufficient interest in the matter to consider attentively the monstrous inequalities that marked the boundaries of the several constituencies into which the Dominion was told off. Take, for example, Montreal Centre. Its population exceeded 30,000, and its registered number of voters exceeded 6,000. It was the chief seat of the manufacturing industries, as well as of the trade and commerce of the country; and yet Montreal Centre, with all the great interests it had at stake, was entitled to send only one member to the floor of this House; while that spoilt child, British Columbia, with a total population of 10,607, sent six members; and Manitoba, with a population of 11,058, sent four members.

Mr. SCHULTZ: I rise to a point of order. Manitoba has a population of 35,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. DEVLIN said he did not include the Indians. Both of those Provinces only had a population of 21,665, and had ten representatives, while Montreal Centre, with a population of 30,000, only had one representative. Thus, upon any question affecting the prosperity of Montreal Centre, that constituency might find itself outvoted by the representatives of British Columbia and Manitoba, who could bring an influence to the support or defeat of any measure before the House ten times greater than could be exercised by Montreal Centre. He could, of course, refer to many other constituencies where the electoral inequality was as strikingly great, but he had preferred to speak of Montreal Centre because he could do so more confidently than he could of any other constituency. Indeed, it might be truly said of all our electoral divisions that they were rude and reckless contrivances, evidently planned and apportioned without any just regard to the strength of their population or the number of their voters. Therefore, he said that, under our electoral system, we could have nothing approaching to a state of true representation. Most certainly British Columbia and Manitoba had no reason to complain of the want of minority representation, but he did not want it inferred from these remarks that he envied the full enjoyment of the power which the members from those Provinces were entrusted with. He hoped they would use it with wisdom, moderation and discretion, and what he had said was dictated solely by an honest desire to exhibit to the House, and through it to the country, the unevenness and the injustice of our electoral system, and hence the absolute necessity of a radical change in the law governing the election of its parliamentary representatives. But he would refer to the position of the minorities in the other Provinces of the Dominion. He had taken the elections of 1867, 1872 and 1874 for the purpose of ascertaining how the majorities and the minorities stood towards each other. He found that, in 1867, there were 137 constituencies contested. The aggregate number of votes polled by the successful candidates was 151,745, and the minority polled 110,009 votes, without, however, being able to return a single member. In 1872, there were 148 constituencies contested. In that election, the majority polled 174,346 votes, while the minority polled 128,007 votes, without, however, being able to return a single member. In 1874, there were 152 constituencies contested, and there were 176,900 majority votes and 130,765 minority votes. The total majority votes polled were 502,991, while the minority votes were 368,783 ; in other words, 368,000 persons recorded their votes in three elections without being able to return a single member. Was that right? Was a law which excluded so large a number of the electors of this country from representation one that ought to be maintained on the Statute-book? But the opponents of the scheme he proposed would say: "What matters it that 500,000 of the electors were represented while 368,000 were not represented at all? What matters it that 56 per cent. of the electors were represented and 44 per cent. did not have one representative? Why complain that two out of every five electors were disfranchised, as they were, indirectly, under our present system?" For, it would be said here that the rule of the majority must govern, and it was the duty of the minority to yield. But, in reply, he would quote John Stuart Mill. Mr. Mill said:—

"Does it follow that the minority should have no representatives at all? Because the majority ought to prevail over the minority, must the majority have all the votes, the minority none? Is it necessary that the minority should not even be heard? Nothing but habit and old associations can reconcile any reasonable being to the needless injustice. In a really equal Democracy every or any section would be represented, not disproportionately but proportionately. A majority of the electors would always have a majority of the representatives, but a minority of the electors would always have a minority of the representatives. Man for man they would be as fully represented as the majority, and unless they are there is not equal government, but a government of inequality and privilege. One part of the people rule over the rest, leaving a part whose fair and equal share in the representation is withheld from them, contrary to all just government."

And such was the humiliating position in which the minority of this Dominion found themselves placed to-day. Without any representation in the law-making body, and virtually deprived of any voice in the Government of the country, they were, as the Minister of Justice said, helpless and hopeless, perhaps not victims but subjects of the majority. The oppression of the minority under our electoral system was strikingly apparent everywhere, but nowhere more than in the leading Province of Ontario. According to the last census, the population of Ontario was 1,620,851, the elements of which might be summarized as follows:—English, 439,429, represented by twenty-four members all English and all Protestants; Irish Protestants, 285,280, represented by twelve members all Irish Protestants; Scotch, 328,829, represented by forty-two members, all Scotch, and all Protestants with one exception, the hon. member for Cornwall. He disliked very much mentioning the word "Protestant" in a discussion of this kind, but hon. gentlemen would see in a moment that he had reason for so doing. Of French-Canadians, there were 75,383, represented by one member, a French-Canadian and a Catholic. Of unnamed nationalities, there were 217,708, represented by, he presumed, the six members who, he noticed, were not credited with any particular creed or nationality and by the three others, two of whom were set down as of German extraction and the third as of the United States. The same census stated that there was an Irish Catholic population in Ontario of 200,000. How many representatives of their creed and nationality had they got in this House elected from Ontario?

Mr. DYMOND: Eighty-eight.

Mr. DEVLIN: The answer, I grieve to say, is—not one; and why not one?

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings): Because the majority of the Irish Roman Catholics vote for Scotchmen.

Mr. DEVLIN said it was about time they commenced to vote for themselves. Could any good and valid reason be given for their total exclusion from participation in the Government of this country? He asked hon. members to reflect upon the position in which this large body of their fellow-citizens was placed. Let them place themselves in their position. What would they think if the Scotch or the English had no representation in this House? They would not submit to it, and there was no reason why the Irish Catholics should be placed in an inferior position. Had they cast off their allegiance? Had they committed treason against the State, that they should be treated as an outlawed class, denied the privileges of the Constitution, compelled to wear the badge of inferiority, and forced to submit to political degradation, for that was what it amounted to, when they saw eighty-eight members from the Province of Ontario in this House and not one Irish Catholic member. What was the cause of this? Was it due to the law? No doubt it was to a certain extent, and to a very great extent, due to this cause, but it was not wholly so. His opinion was that the indifference of the leaders of both the great parties which divided this country into what might be styled two hostile camps had contributed to the proscription of the Irish Catholic people in Ontario to a great extent; because he could not believe that they would be as they were to day, and as they had been for many years, in a state of political bondage, if the leaders of the Reform and Conservative parties, the men who directed public affairs in this country, made a serious effort to secure for them some representation in the Councils of the country. But he unhesitatingly asserted on the floor of this House of Commons that, as the law now stood and was taken advantage of, the door of the Chamber might be labelled with these words:—"No Irish Catholic from Ontario can enter here." This was regarded as an intolerable grievance and one that demanded an immediate and effective remedy; and no one need feel surprised if, at the next general election, which was not far distant, the entire strength and influence of the Irish Catholic body in this Dominion should be found arrayed against the party, whether Reform or Conservative, which refused them a fair and reasonable share in the representation of the country, and refused to place them, in this respect, upon an equality with the rest of their fellow-citizens. Let him for a moment invite attention to the marked difference between Ontario and Quebec in this matter of representation. The population of the Province of Quebec, according to the last census, was 1,196,115. Of that number, 1,019,850 were Catholics and 171,000 were Protestants. Quebec was represented in this House by sixty-five members, thirteen of whom were Protestants, one of them a member of the Ministry,—the hon. the Postmaster-General. And let it be observed that they were elected by constituencies in many of which the Catholics had a majority of the vote. If, therefore, the example of Quebec were more closely followed, if her liberal and enlightened policy in this matter were more generally adopted, 500,000 Irish Catholics, whose hearts and homes and interests were fixed in this Dominion, would not find themselves to-day with only seven representatives on the floor of this House. If the minority of which he spoke had its fair share of representation, if it had its fair weight and influence upon the floor of this House, it would occupy a very different position. A few days ago, he heard that a deputation waited upon the hon. the Premier, asking for increased representation in the Cabinet; but it was impossible. This Government had given as much representation in that way as the late Government had given; as much as could be expected with the number found in this House. They had one representative, and that was all they ever had, and all they ever would have, until they increased their representation in the House of Commons. He must say, however, that, if they were to have only one member in the Cabinet, and he thought they could not expect more, his opinion was that that member ought to have a seat on the floor of this House, and not of the Upper House. He contended that here, where the wants of the people were made known, where their grievances were redressed, or ought to be if they were not; here, where their voice commanded attention and found expression, should, in his humble judgment, the Irish Catholic Minister be found to take his stand, if he sincerely desired to advance the interests of his co-religionists in this Dominion. He asked this House, he would appeal to its wisdom and patriotism, to regard this question not from a party, but from a national point of view, and he trusted that hon. gentlemen who might perhaps feel that he ought not to have introduced the religious question into this discussion would do him the justice to admit that the question which he had briefly brought under the notice of the House was the subject of discussion through the country, and that ventilating it here, in the brief manner he had attempted, might be productive of beneficial results. He would conclude by saying that our Dominion was young, full of hope, full of promise, and full of vigour, possessing advantages which no other country, perhaps, could equal. Let it then be their duty to show their appreciation of the blessings which the bountiful hand of Providence had conferred upon them, by dealing out equal, even-handed, impartial justice to all creeds and classes that might dwell within the borders of the Dominion.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. DYMOND said he was not one of those who would be at all disposed to discourage the introduction to the consideration of this House of such topics as the one which the hon. gentleman had discussed so ably; in fact, they must all feel grateful to the hon. member for the great care and attention he had brought to bear upon this subject, and the clear and lucid manner in which he had laid his arguments before them. He should be glad if he could allude to that speech in terms of un-mixed praise; it had but one blemish—one, he thought, which must have struck somewhat painfully most of those who observed it. He had hoped that his hon. friend would have discussed the question in the spirit of a philosopher, as John Stuart Mill might have discussed it, and did very ably discuss it on the floor of the British House of Commons. He regretted the hon. gentleman had thought it necessary to introduce a sectional and sectarian element into the controversy. He repudiated utterly the opinion that the representation of the people in that House was to be founded on old world nationalities. He supposed he (Mr. Dymond) was the latest importation from the old country within the walls of that Chamber, but he should be ashamed to come there and pretend to speak or vote in the House of Commons of Canada simply as an Englishman. His hon. friend seemed to imagine not merely that there should be a representation of political minorities, but a representation of national minorities, that the Irish Catholics should have a certain number of members, the Scotch Protestants a certain number, the Englishmen a certain number, and so on through the whole tale. If they were for one moment to deal with the political issues which came before them in that sense, they would, in an attempt to obtain what the hon. gentleman called justice, simply realize a confusion worse confounded. He denied altogether that the Irish Catholics of Ontario were unrepresented here. Let him appeal to gentlemen on both sides of the House. Whose vote was it they tried hardest to obtain when an election was coming on? Whom was it they charged each other with especially trying to conciliate? He was afraid that sometimes even their strong political convictions gave way to an earnest desire that they might win the favour of the Catholics of Ontario. Some of his (Mr. Dymond's) warmest supporters were Irish Catholics, and he was not sure if his hon. friend, with all his ability, and Irish nationality to boot, were to enter the field against him, that he could not carry off their vote, even against the member for Montreal Centre. Discussing this question in a perfectly impartial sense, not attempting to dogmatize upon it, reserving to himself the right to be convinced at any future time by the arguments of his hon. friend or any one else, he thought there was a fallacy underlying the argument and position of those who had advocated the views the hon. gentleman had expressed, both in England and in this country. They were aware that, both there and here, some of the ablest minds had agreed in the opinion which the hon. gentleman had expressed, and he (Mr. Dymond) once had the honour, in the old country, of warmly supporting at least one candidate who was a warm advocate of the minority vote—Mr. Thomas Hughes, better known as an author as "Tom Brown,"—and they could discuss such a question without being bound, for all time to come, by the opinions they might express to-day. He thought his hon. friend did not quite realize the character in which he and other members of this House stood in their position as representatives of the people. He seemed to regard a member of Parliament as a mere delegate, sent by a certain section of the community, to speak in its name and vote in its behalf on the floor of

Mr. DYMOND.

Parliament. But, just as he (Mr. Dymond) claimed to represent a Roman Catholic population, so far as it existed in his constituency, just as his hon. friend from Montreal Centre desired, he was sure, to represent every Protestant in Quebec and Ontario, they were all here, not as the representatives of the mere constituencies from which they came, but as the representatives of the whole country. His hon. friend ought to remember that it was their duty to study the interests of British Columbia or Prince Edward Island as closely as they studied those of Ontario or Quebec. If they looked at the legislation which took place in the House of Commons, did they find, as a rule, any great division of opinion? Did they always find men divided into two hostile forces? Let them take the political measures passed since the present Parliament assembled in 1874. Was there any great difference of opinion about the Election Law, the Controverted Elections Act, the Supreme Court Act, or as to the principle of the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill which was passed in that year? There had been, it was true, differences of opinion about an Insolvency Law; but, even there, parties were broken up, and Conservatives and Reformers voted together on a common platform. There were, in fact, no hard and fast lines in politics in this country. They were not divided into two hostile camps, with Reformers on one side and Conservatives on the other, by a line which neither could pass over. There was a great political element in this country, which was neither absolutely Conservative nor Reform, which fluctuated from side to side, which voted for the man it liked best or the Government which gave it the best measures. On the hon. gentleman's proposition, they ought to have some men representing Conservatives, other men representing Reformers, and men representing those who had no political opinions at all. That would be the mode by which, logically and exactly, they were to arrive at the proposition which he laid before them. He did not think, taking practical experience as a guide, that any party had any special reason to complain, assuming for a moment that they did form two political parties, of the position it had occupied in this House during the period since Confederation. It was true that, taking the numbers of the vote, bringing everything down to figures, a certain number of electors seemed to be unrepresented, and a certain number to be over-represented, but at two general elections certainly, where the Ministers of the day were returned with large majorities to support them, those of 1867 and 1874, the result was probably a fair and just expression of the general opinion of the country at the time. It was true that changes took place between 1867 and the general election which next succeeded. It was equally true hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that certain changes had taken place since the general election of 1874. Was that to be regretted? Not at all. It was a fact that, when one party was in a minority, it had to exercise a greater degree of political vigilance; that it had to educate itself up to a point which the majority previously had attained; and this was, he ventured to say, one of the merits and excellencies of our political system. He did not want to see the representation of the country neutralized by those fine and delicate adjustments. In a system of responsible government, it was well that the Ministry in power should be sustained by a large majority. It would be impossible, under our system, for any Government to carry on the business of the Administration successfully unless sustained by a considerable majority in that House. His hon. friend from Montreal Centre had alluded to the minority system in England. In 1868 he (Mr. Dymond) had an opportunity of witnessing the practical working of that system. Hon. gentlemen would probably be aware that it prevailed in England to a very limited extent. There were a few constituencies only in which elections were conducted on that principle under the Reform Bill introduced by the Conservative Government in 1867. It was true that the cumulative system had since been introduced in the case of school board elections, but the purpose for which those elections took place was totally different from political contests, and he did not think the two cases could be regarded as by any means parallel. What happened in the city of London in 1868? That city returned four members, usually Liberals. The Reform Bill of 1867 gave every elector the privilege of voting for three persons only, but such was the majority of the Liberal party in London at that time that they were able to elect three Liberals, although two Conservatives were in the field. The fourth man, the late Baron Rothschild, was defeated by a small majority. A few months afterwards, however, the Conservative member died; there was another election, and Baron Rothschild was returned by acclamation, the minority principle thus breaking down; and similar results were liable to take place in any other constituency where there was a minority vote. He did not think the representation of Great Britain was affected by more than one or two members owing to the adoption of this minority system. But suppose the system was in vogue here; Montreal, instead of being divided into three constituencies, would form one large constituency returning three members, each elector being entitled to vote for two candidates. Suppose his hon. friend was the third successful candidate—the Liberal or Reform candidate—the other two being Conservatives. When the readjustment of the Cabinet to which his hon. friend had alluded took place, no doubt he would be invited to take a seat on the Ministerial benches. The consequence would be that he would have to vacate his seat, and then, instead of being re-elected, he would be defeated, because the Conservatives, having a majority in the whole city, would elect their candidate and defeat his aspirations. He believed that the remedy for inequalities in the representation would be found not by an exact and complicated system, but by an approximately just and simple arrangement similar to the one at present prevailing in Canada, only carried out with, perhaps, more care as to the adjustment of the electoral vote in the constituencies. By having constituencies of moderate size, each returning one representative, they obtained, when the general election came, what they wanted, not, it was true, an exact representation of a party vote, but an expression of the general voice of the whole country, even supposing it happened that the moiety did not obtain a fair representation in any one Parliament. Their Parliaments did not last very long, and, if it were necessary in order to keep pace with changes in public opinion, they could be shortened. His (Mr. Dymond's) own conviction was that, under the proposition laid before the House by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, their system of responsible government would be utterly impossible. He saw the logical difficulty he created by making that admission. But they had not to deal with such matters in a theoretical sense, and could not afford to be too logical. If they had parties so evenly balanced, if they were to create constituencies which were to be so carefully adjusted that every man calling himself a Conservative, on the one side, was to have his representative, and every Reformer, on the other, was to have his representative, the probability was that they would destroy that which they especially intended to conserve. They would preserve some party lines nominally in the country and destroy them in effect in the House; and the result would be that, instead of having responsible Ministers, supported by majorities in the House, they would have men compelled, on many occasions, to seek the support of members on both sides. The Ministers would become, as in the United States, simply the administrators of public affairs, and the great constitutional experiment they were now engaged in would prove a failure.

Mr. CASEY said this was a question which might be discussed without entailing any immediate action. It was well that such questions should be discussed in the House and the country for a long time before any definite action should be taken. As the poet said, ours was a country in which “Freedom broadens slowly down

From precedent to precedent.”

And, as another distinguished individual, a native statesman, remarked, “Statesmanship should be well discussed before being crystallized into the form of law.” This was a subject which would bear such discussion, and might some time or other be crystallized into law. The system referred to by his hon. friend from Montreal Centre was based on a theory which was almost universally accepted—that the people should be consulted about all questions of legislation. It was, however, impossible that the people could be individually consulted about such matters; therefore the system of representatives was introduced. Hon. members were not sent to the House as representatives of the whole country in a vague, indefinite sense, but because they were supposed to be in sympathy with some geographical section of the country or some particular class, and were returned to Parliament that they might act as their constituents would act in regard to the measures under consideration. Still, he did not say that a representative was bound to reflect the sympathies and sentiments of his constituents, when opposed to the general interest; he was bound to take cognizance of the whole country, but his raison d'être was his entertaining the views of the people whom he represented. The majority must always rule. The correct system of representation would be to ascertain the feeling of the majority of the whole country. As the hon. member for Montreal had pointed out, there were a great many anomalies in the representation of the country. At the election of 1874, one member was returned by a total vote of 75. In another constituency 2,500 electors voted for a candidate who was defeated. In ten constituencies where the minorities were the largest, the average was 1,900; in another ten where the majorities were the smallest, the average total vote of the successful candidates was under 400. It would appear, therefore, that 4,000 electors had ten representatives, while 19,000, who happened to reside in larger constituencies, were wholly unrepresented. This arose in a measure from the geographical or numerical inequality of the constituencies; but it did not follow that, if the constituencies were equalized in this respect, the evil would be removed. Taking ten constituencies of almost the same size in the election of 1874, he found that in seven one party was successful with a majority of 569, while in the three others, which went with the other party, the aggregate majority was 2,008, the result being a majority of four for one party in the House and of over 1,400 for the other in the country. Any system based upon geographical or numerical limits could not secure a correct settlement of the difficulty. In cases where there were more than two parties the matter would become even more complicated than it was at present. A candidate did not necessarily represent the opinions of every member of his party. He was the choice of a majority of the party, the minority acquiescing more or less willingly in his candidature. If his party happened to be the majority in the constituency he was elected, and the result of the present system was not to ascertain the total majority of one party over the other, but to ascertain what was the balance of majorities in the different constituencies throughout the country. A large minority were undoubtedly unrepresented. All those who voted for an unsuccessful candidate were unrepresented. It was not fair to argue that a minority in one section were represented by the choice of the same party from another section. The constituents of his hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), had he happened to be defeated at the last election, would scarcely feel that they were represented in all religious, political and national matters by the successful member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), who was a member of the same party. This evil had been experienced in England as well as in Canada, and various expedients had been resorted to to obviate it. The minority system as introduced there, it must be admitted, involved many inconveniences; but the system referred to by the hon. member for Montreal Centre was a totally different affair. Mr. Hare's system was that of proportional representation; he did not claim representatives for individual minorities in different constituencies, but the representation of bodies of electors throughout the country who happened to agree in their political views. As Mr. Bright once aptly expressed it, this was a system which proposed that everybody should be represented and all such things as majorities and minorities should be done away with, and that the absolute majority of the whole country pro and con. should be ascertained. Within our party lines were included many smaller divisions—religious, political, etc.; and those classes were at a great loss to obtain proportional representation. Some such plan as advocated by Mr. Hare would probably enable those classes by concerted action to secure such representation in the halls of the Legislature. It was no new idea to speak of class representation. The principle had been admitted in England. Members were given to the Universities and constituencies were arranged in such a manner as to give representation to certain classes. Manchester, for instance, was regarded as representing a certain commercial class, and it was arranged so that proper representation should be accorded to that class. Certain towns in Scotland, again, were connected together, under the name of contributory burghs, in order that a fair representation of the sentiments of the people might be secured. The first idea of representation in the British Parliament recognised this principle. The divisions of Lords, Commons, Knights of the Shires and Knights of the Boroughs were intended to represent the land-owning, agricultural and commercial classes of the country, and did so fairly enough at that time. Classes were now much more cut up than in those days, and they were not adequately represented. It was to remedy this state of things that the principle of preferential voting, which was the basis of Mr. Hare's system, was brought forward. He would merely mention that it enabled the voter to cast his vote for the candidate he preferred above all others, while at the same time it would be counted for those he preferred in a lesser degree if not required to elect his first choice. The machinery for counting votes was so arranged as to transfer votes from one candidate to another as required. Perhaps an illustration given by an American author would be the best that could possibly be given. Suppose the candidates were standing together on a large plain, and the electors of the country personally present. They attended in groups around their favourite candidates. A certain number of votes were sufficient to elect any one candidate, and, when this number was obtained, the remainder attached themselves to another group and so on until each candidate came out with an equal or nearly equal body of voters standing about him, and forming his constituency. This was the idea aimed at in the proportional system. Each member, under its working, would be sent to the House by a constituency of equal size with those of all other members, and composed of electors who became his constituents by their own free act. Not only so, but no residuum of electors would have the misfortune of not having their votes counted for any representative, or at least no large number of them. He would repeat he was very glad that the matter had been brought up. He hoped that the House in general would give it every attention, and not consider it a mere hobby. He thought it deserved a great deal more attention than that would entitle it to, and he trusted that the Government would see their way to allow its discussion in some such shape, either before the House or a Committee, as would best encourage it, and induce the country at large to become interested in it. He did not profess that his views in favour of this system were absolutely unalterable. The theory seemed, however, to be good. There might be difficulties in the way of applying it to this country, and these might be greater than they appeared at first sight. This question of its practicability was a proper one for consideration by the Committee.

Mr. DYMOND.

Mr. DECOSMOS said the speech of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) was in the right direction. It would attract the attention of the people of this country, and it might lead to a better representation of the electors. He hoped that the system in question would be placed on our Statute-book. His hon. friend from Montreal Centre had referred to British Columbia. The hon. member said he did not wish to offend the British Columbia representatives in the House, but that he merely brought the matter forward to show what a large disproportion existed in the representation of the country. He thought it was a great act of statesmanship, on the part of the late Government, in allowing British Columbia six representatives on the floor of the House of Commons. He did not believe that British Columbia would have joined the Union had this concession not been made; when they considered that, in a short time, the Province would have a population of 120,000, they would arrive at the basis of representation made when the Act of Union was arranged. The Province of Quebec was the key and initial point of our representative system as he understood it. A constituency containing 20,000 persons was entitled to send one member to the House. The Province of Quebec had 65 members, and, although its population increased, the representation would never change. When British Columbia came into the Union, this was understood. If the railway had been proceeded with, as was at the time—in 1873—expected, with the prestige of the British name for good faith, on the supposition that the Canadian people and the people of Great Britain were one and the same, he believed that their white population, instead of being small as it was to-day, would have been doubled now. He could assure the hon. gentleman that his statistics with regard to the white population of British Columbia were incorrect. He believed they had at least 15,000 white people, instead of 10,600. The hon. gentleman quoted figures with reference to his own constituency and his own Province, but it was to be remembered that, when the terms of Union were under discussion in the Province of British Columbia, the large Customs revenue to be handed over to the Dominion was considered a basis for representation. And this, on the basis of the Customs paid by the Eastern Provinces, entitled them to a population of 120,000. While the hon. member (Mr. Devlin) was speaking, he had turned to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and he would show from these to the hon. gentleman and to the House the relationship British Columbia bore with regard to exports, imports and Customs duties to the other Provinces. British Columbia in the year 1875-6 exported one-eighth as much as the great Province of Ontario; one-twelfth as much as the great Province of Quebec; one-third as much as the Province of Nova Scotia with her 400,000 people; one half as much as New Brunswick, with her 350,000 people; three times as much as Manitoba, which the hon. member said had only 11,000 white people, and a number of Indians; and nearly three times as much as Prince Edward Island — long settled — with her population of 100,000. Her imports to-day were one-twelfth of those of Ontario; one twelfth of those of Quebec; one-third of those of Nova Scotia; one-half those of New Brunswick; nearly double those of Manitoba; and more than double those of Prince Edward Island. The Customs duties were one-ninth of those of Ontario; one-twelfth of those of Quebec; two-fifths of those of Nova Scotia; very nearly one-half of those of New Brunswick; twice those of Manitoba; and two-fifths more than those of Prince Edward Island. He took it that a population, exhibiting such industry and bearing such a relation to the older Provinces with regard to consumption and payment of duties, was certainly entitled to much greater consideration than the mere numbers of its people might seem to justify. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) had made unpleasant allusions to his Province, and he hoped that hon. gentleman would bear in mind what he had quoted. He took this occasion to remind the House that, within a few years, they might have a population of 120,000; and he was prepared to predict that, ten years after the Pacific Railway was built and placed in communication with the railway system of Ontario and Quebec, they would export and import nearly as much as did the whole Dominion of Canada to-day. The history of California proved, most conclusively, that western people imported more, consumed more and exported more than any other people, for their numbers, in the whole world.

Mr. CASEY.

The exports of the State of California, last year, amounted in value to $35,000,000, exclusive of the gold and silver crop, which was worth $93,000,000. This was an indication of what our Western Province would do. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) had alluded to the remark made by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, with respect to the representation of Irish Catholics on the floor of the House. He (Mr. DeCosmos) thought this was a proper subject for the House to consider; they should endeavour to have every class properly represented in the House. If, owing to the manner in which the country was divided into districts, and to the non-representation of minorities, certain classes had no representation in this Chamber, he regarded it as a wrong, and he would cheerfully aid in securing them proper representation in any way which was in his power. The Irish population, now so excluded in Ontario, were also entitled to that representation in the Cabinet which they undoubtedly deserved. No Government could be fairly representative unless all classes were represented. Did the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) wish to imply that the Roman Catholics in this country would be of one opinion, even under the minority system? He could easily conceive that they, as well as other classes, would be divided in this regard; and consequently, the Government would, under such a system as now obtained, have Catholic supporters as well as opponents. He hoped that the speech of the hon. member for Montreal Centre would be circulated from one end of the country to the other; and that it would bring about a proper class representation on the floor of the House.

Mr. BUNSTER said he wished to direct the attention of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) to the terms of Union which gave British Columbia three representatives in the Senate and six in the House of Commons, such representation to be increased according to the provisions of the Act mentioned. He would also call the attention of the hon. members from Montreal Centre and Charlotte to the Pacific Railway clause. If its provisions had been carried into effect according to solemn agreement, he was certain that his Province would to-day have been entitled to additional representation. They had been treated in a strange manner by the Government of the day. The Carnarvon terms had not been observed; and, when defeated in the Senate on the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Bill, the Government had not—as they should have done—sent this Bill up again year after year. If hon. members would only think of the injustice done to British Columbia, he thought they would refrain from vilifying it. Hon. members from that Province had a right to sit on the floor of the House, and still they were insulted by the statement that their Province was over-represented, and the spoiled child. This would be all very well before a justice of the peace.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. BUNSTER said that, when great injustice was done them, they could not do less than resent it. He thought they should not be subjected to continual attacks in this connection.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not think the motion in its present shape should be adopted. His hon. friend the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) would have observed from the conversation which had taken place in the early part of the debate that it was unnecessary and improper that a Committee should be struck with the object of enquiring into a particular plan or system. He noticed that the form in which his hon. friend had placed the motion was such as would not have attracted such favourable attention as it would under other circumstances. The motion would be more acceptable to the House if it called for enquiry, while it did not commit them to the proposition that the present system was unequal and unjust.

Mr. DEVLIN said he was willing to alter his motion in that respect.

Mr. BLAKE said he thought it was less the proper function of a Committee of this House to enquire into the merits of a theoretical plan than to enquire into the practical working of existing systems, leaving to individual members, and to the public at large the discussion of the former branch. It was not his own intention to introduce an amendment, for a reason he would explain afterwards. Were he moving a resolution, however, it would be to ask for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into and report upon the practical working of the plans upon which people were now and of late years represented in Parliament in other countries, with the view of remedying some of the alleged defects of our existing system. This would not prejudice the justice of our system, while, at the same time, it would permit an enquiry to be made. He did not intend to address the House at any length upon the very important question which the hon. member for Montreal Centre had brought up. That hon. gentleman had referred to his own (Mr. Blake's) opinions, and had quoted some of the passages of a speech he had delivered. Subsequent thought and reflection had not caused him to change these opinions. He was strongly convinced that an enquiry, if there would be time for it at this stage of the Session, would produce startling facts to the members of the House as to the practical working of the present system. Speaking from recollection as to the practical working of the present system in times past, when he made some investigation into the subject, he would say, as he had said before, that it did not merely afford no guarantee that the opinions of parties, as expressed at the polls, would be represented in the House proportionately to their strength, but no guarantee that the ruling party in the House was not in an absolute popular minority in the country. His investigations as to the elections of 1867 convinced him that the Liberal party had a slight popular majority, as to the Province of Ontario, and under a system of minority representation would have had a slight majority in the House. Of the 82 members who were returned, a popular vote would have returned 42 against 40. As a matter of fact, the return was 49 for gentlemen opposite, and 33 for the Liberal party. In the speech alluded to, he had also referred to two other remarkable instances of the utter failure of the present system in producing a return to the House which was approximate to the strength of opinion at the polls. These instances were drawn from Nova Scotia. The first case occurred in 1867, when the Province returned eighteen members against union, and only one in favour of that scheme, and the gentleman who was the one exception was returned by a very narrow majority. If the return to Parliament was to be taken as the expression of the people of Nova Scotia in reference to this matter, their opinion must be held to be next to unanimous. It was eighteen to one. But the best calculation which he could make—although he did not speak so positively as he did with reference to his own Province—led him to the belief that the real popular expression of public opinion was about twelve to seven, if both sides of the question had been heard. He would instance, also, the last general election in that Province, in which nineteen were returned in favour of the Government, and one in Opposition, and one gentleman, his hon. friend from Cape Breton, (Mr. McDonald) as an Independent member, who, however, soon went over to the enemy.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Mr. McDONALD: As an Oppositionist also.

Mr. BLAKE said he had early given his hon. friend up. But there was no doubt whatever that nineteen to two was not the real expression of the opinion of the people of Nova Scotia on that occasion. The real expression was not so favourable at all as that to the Government. And, as to the Province of Ontario, the same observation applied. Those who investigated the subject would find that the popular vote was not so strongly in favour of the Government as was the return to this House by any means.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE said hon. members might cry "Hear, hear," but he was making observations on a subject which concerned all parties, and he was quite prepared to render his assistance—no matter if it was not to the advantage of his own party—to the elucidation of this great problem. If it was found that the members returned even approximately represented the strength of the political opinions at the polls, they might fairly say that they would not go in search of new electoral machinery. But a Committee investigating the subject would find that, even in this simple form, the simplest form in which the matter could be considered, assuming that there were only two parties, the system under which they were acting did not meet the requirements. It by no means answered it, and the way in which he had put the matter was the lowest form in which he could do so. But there were other considerations which ought to be brought into the question. It would be ignoring the present condition of public opinion and the spirit of the age if they were to suppose that, at at this time, and under the present circumstances, there would not be an increasing divergency of opinion. There were various questions, some of which had been touched upon that night, on which strong opinions were held by small minorities, it might be by intelligent minorities of the population, and these opinions ran a great risk of being unrepresented under the present system, and the country was also in danger of these opinions sometimes exercising, under the present system, too great a power over the returns to this House. There were occasions upon which those who represented a particular view took up a social subject which they deemed of more importance than any other, and upon which party lines were not drawn, and they might procure this particular view to be over-represented as far as pledged candidates were concerned. On the other hand, there were cases in which such persons were extremely liable to have no advocate on the floor of the House, and that which they might conceive to be the most important thing in the political world, to be the one thing needful, they might not have a single man to say a word for on the floor of Parliament. Then, again, he could not conceive it to be a healthy or wholesome condition, as his hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) had observed, that a minority in a certain constituency might be doomed to never having a representative. He could point to constituencies where the returns had been invariably on one side of politics for a quarter of a century. That was a condition of things which ought to be remedied if possible. What was the ideal of the representation of the people in Parliament? It was this: that those, who, owing to their distance from the scene of action, their engagement in other avocations, were unable to meet on Salisbury's Plain, and do the business of the nation, as of old, sent a man to represent them and to do their business for them. That being the ideal, they ought to struggle to attain something like the ideal. It could not be attained absolutely, but that was no reason why it should not be attained approximately. His hon. friend from North York (Mr. Dymond) said it destroyed the principle of responsible government. He did not understand how this could be—how, the more the popular opinion was represented, the more was responsible government destroyed. It might be that, under this system, and in certain circumstances, the House would be more equally divided than it was at present. And his hon. friend had alluded to this possibility, and said it was important that the Government should have a strong majority. But it was also important that the Government should be strong in the House just in proportion as it was strong in the country; and he would remind his hon. friend from North York that a majority obtained under the proposed system, while perhaps it would not be so strong in numbers, would yet be firmer in opinion, and there would not be the spectacle of the peculiar movements of hon. gentlemen who had weak knees, arising from the fact that they represented fluctuating constituencies. He thought that the alterations in the constitution of the constituency would far more than counterbalance the difficulty which the hon. gentleman suggested on a possibly equal division. But there was no reason to know that the House would be equally divided under a system in which the people would be justly represented. There were strong differences of opinion, and these were varying the members of the different Provinces. It was only in a case in which the popular opinion was equally divided that, under the proposed system, the representatives of the House would be about equally divided, and that was a difficulty which they would have to meet when it arose, a difficulty inseparable from an equally divided public opinion. He did not see why, if the public opinion was equally divided, the representation should not also be equally divided. Much error upon this subject had been occasioned by the use and abuse of the phrase "representation of minorities." This was not a phrase of which he was very fond himself. He believed "proportionate representation," or "representation in proportion to views" would be the better term, and would be less liable to misapprehension. But, in the sense in which he had used that phrase, there was nobody in the House who would for an instant object to the justice of the system. The very principle upon which the House met recognized the right of the minority to representation, as well as of the majority; and that the minority ought to be in Opposition, while the majority formed the Government. And the suggestion was made that, in some rough and ready way, a distant approximation to the just representation of minorities and majorities was made. But this suggestion was based on an incorrect idea of the basis of representation. Supposing that those who objected to what was called the representation of minorities carried their own system to its logical conclusion, what would be the result? It would be that the whole country should be made one vast electoral district, in which they would all vote for their choice of all the candidates, and a majority, if by but one, of the whole popular vote, would return the whole delegation to Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. POPE (Compton): That is not the proposal of my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin)?

Mr. BLAKE said certainly it was not. The result of this would be that the majority of one vote would return the whole House of Parliament. None of them would agree to that. They had in fact been gradually getting rid of some of these evils. They had abolished the joint representation of large cities, such as Montreal, Toronto, and Quebec; because, amongst other reasons, the system gave to a possibly very small majority in each of these districts the power of returning the whole three members in any district. But what was attempted to be accomplished by this insufficient mode had not been accomplished, and therefore he said it was worthy the attention of this and of every other deliberative body, whether there might not be some plan whereby, without incurring the risk and dangers he had referred to, the ideal of representation might be carried out. His hon. friend from North York (Mr. Dymond) had suggested some difficulties, and he asked what would happen when a minority representative died, and he thought in this contingency a great injustice would be done. The majority of the constituency necessarily would elect the member, the hon. member said; of course he would be of the right stripe of politics. But did not his hon. friend see that, in bringing forward that argument, he acknowledged the injustice of the present system, and yet he would perpetuate that injustice.

Mr. DYMOND: I did not say it was an injustice; I only gave it as an illustration.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman had argued that, because a perfect system could not be reached, an approximate perfection should not be sought. His (Mr. Blake's) view was that, although perfection was not possible, yet that was no reason why they should not strive after improvement. But he might say that he had never believed in the English system, though he believed that, clumsy and imperfect as was the system applied to the large boroughs and counties, it was better than our present system, because, as the hon. member for North York had acknowledged, it had given Conservatives in the boroughs, and Liberals in the counties. True, that was all the effect in a party point of view, but it had a satisfactory effect for those who desired that the people in each locality should be represented by men of their choice. It gave the boroughs a representative according to the choice of the people of the boroughs, it gave the counties a representative in accordance with the choice of the people, not absolutely but suo modo, better than formerly. If the system were adopted of grouping three, five or seven districts for electoral purposes, then, in case of one member dying, it was true they would still have a majority vote in the single district in which the election took place, but it would not necessarily follow that the proportions would be disturbed. Of course, accidents would sometimes disturb the proportion over the whole group, and sometimes, not inevitably, the accident of death would produce injurious results. But he discarded the argument of the possible failure of the plan in case of the accident of death. When that happened, the system would not be worse than that of to-day, and, when it did not, it would be a better system. Let them hope they would live and adopt the system. He had made these few observations under some sense of embarrassment, not at all embarrassing to his own position on that subject and his own opinions, as it was well known he was free to maintain them, but because, from circumstances which they all regretted, it was his misfortune to be leader of the House that evening, and he necessarily had to speak not for himself only, but for the Government. He would support any motion which might be made in the sense he had suggested. He did not think it would be fitting to ask the House to record upon its journals a view which might not be entertained by the majority—which he assumed was not entertained by the majority—that the present system was unjust and unequal, as they knew it was; but, if his hon. friend from Montreal Centre would modify the motion in some such sense as he had suggested, and propose such a reference as he (Mr. Blake) had ventured to submit, he would give it his hearty support, although at that stage of the Session he was afraid the labours of the Committee would not be prosecuted with that effective result they might have attained had circumstances permitted his hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) to have made his motion earlier.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said the motion of the hon. member for Montreal Centre was to the effect that there was a large minority in the country unrepresented, and that, speaking from a national point of view, it was desirable that that minority should have representatives in Parliament. The speech of the hon. the Minister of Justice had no reference to that motion; but it was not important as indicating the opinion of the Government on the question raised. He (Mr. Pope) sympathised largely with the hon. member for Montreal Centre. He would be glad, if it were possible, that there should be a representation obtained which would quiet the apprehensions that the people were not properly represented, whether Irish Roman Catholics or any other body, and if the hon. member for Montreal Centre could devise any means by which that could be accomplished, either through a Committee or otherwise, it would receive his support. He did not understand how, when the question of electing representatives had been left to the people, provision could be made for the representation of minorities. He had, however, no objection to minorities being represented, if a feasible plan could be found for carrying it out. There had not been any agitation on the subject; indeed, nothing had been said about it, except in a speech delivered by the hon. the Minister of Justice, which was a very good one in its way; but it had very little effect on the country, which did not think the speech sufficient as a basis on which to raise an agitation. But the question raised by the hon. member for Montreal Centre had agitated the country. It had sunk deep into the hearts of many people, and, if there were any way of settling it, he would render any aid in his power to that end. Let hon. members, however, not be led away by side-issues raised by the hon. the Minister of Justice. He felt that the hon. member for Montreal Centre represented a considerable population in the country, who were entitled to the consideration of the House. It was difficult to reach a solution of the question which would be satisfactory to those people and prevent an agitation, and it should be the first duty of every hon. member to so conduct the legislation that there would be no room for agitation, but the people would be satisfied and contented.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member for Montreal Centre might alter his motion in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Mr. DEVLIN moved :

“That a Select Committee of nine members be appointed to enquire into, and report on the practical working of the plan under which the people are now represented in Parliament; and of the systems which have of late years been adopted in other countries, with a view to remedy some of the alleged defects of the existing plan.”

Motion agreed to on a Division.

EMIGRATION AGENTS IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for copies of all the correspondence between the Government or any of its Departments and the emigration agents stationed in Ireland respecting the sending out of emigrants from that country to Canada, and the manner and under what circumstances pecuniary assistance could be given and to what extent, and whether by all the agents or only one of them; also for copies of the instructions given to said agents as to the discharge of their duties and the places fixed for their headquarters, also all correspondence had with the agency in London respecting the sending out of Irish emigrants to Canada, and all correspondence regarding the removal of the agent who was stationed in Manchester to Belfast, and regarding the removal of the agent who was stationed in Cork to London, and regarding the powers conferred upon the agent stationed in Ulster.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said all the correspondence would be brought down. The motion conveyed the impression that some special arrangements had been made with agents on the other side. No special arrangements had been made, and no special pecuniary aid given; all the aid given was from the office in London in the shape of passenger warrants.

Mr. DEVLIN said the question could be discussed when the papers were brought down.

Motion agreed to.

WELLAND AND ST. LAWRENCE CANALS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BLAIN moved for returns showing the increased quantities between twelve and fourteen feet depth of water in the Welland Canal, and also the St. Lawrence canals and rivers, in the following materials, namely:—Masonry, dredging, earth excavations, rock cutting (one above water, two below water), timber, plank; also the prices upon which the calculations in the engineer's reports are based; also, the soundings of the river and lakes which have been made for the purpose of obtaining fourteen feet of water.

Mr. BROUSE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOURS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for copies of all papers connected with the enquiries sent to the Admiralty in England, and the answers thereto, respecting the harbours of British Columbia. He said that certain officers of the Imperial Navy had been investigating the ports of British Columbia, to find out which was best adapted for the terminus of the Pacific Railway. It would be of great service if the progress report of the Chief Engineer could be laid before the House prior to the discussion on this subject.

Mr. BLAKE said the correspondence was in such a condition that it could not be brought down.

Mr. DECOSMOS said in that case he would ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING-DOCK.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for copies of all correspondence, by telegraph or otherwise, respecting the Graving-dock at Esquimalt since July, 1874.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE AND DESPATCHES.

Mr. DECOSMOS said, with a view to obtaining information with respect to the Pacific Railway, he begged to move that a copy of all correspondence between Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Dominion Government since 1871, respecting Imperial financial assistance in aid of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, be laid before the House. He wished to ascertain whether there was any correspondence with respect to obtaining an Imperial guarantee to aid in the construction of the railway.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the only correspondence that he knew of was already in the possession of the House. It was that which took place between the late Government and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, at or after the time of the Washington Treaty, with respect to granting £3,600,000 sterling for the double purpose of aiding the construction of the railway and the enlargement of the canals.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of all despatches sent, since 1876, to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and especially a copy of all the despatches on which Lord Carnarvon's despatch of December 18th, 1876, is founded.

Mr. BLAKE said, in the absence of the hon. the First Minister, he was unable to say what answer should be given to the motion. He would, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

THE NEWCASTLE FISH-BREEDING ESTABLISHMENT.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BURK moved for a return, showing the title held by the Government to the land and other property connected with the Fish-breeding establishment at Newcastle, Ontario, with quantity of land so held; also the actual amount expended on buildings or other permanent improvements on said lands.

Motion agreed to.

MONEY PAID TO C. J. BRYDGES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. PALMER, in the absence of Mr. DOMVILLE, moved for a statement shewing the sums of money paid C. J. Brydges for the year ending 30th June, 1876, showing salary whilst Intercolonial Railway was under construction, and salary for management, also expenses of his offices at Montreal, Ottawa and Moncton and amount of his travelling expenses for same period.

Motion agreed to.

SUPERANNUATION OF COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT WHITBY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) moved for copies of all correspondence relating to the superannuation of Wm. Warren, Esq., late Collector of Customs for the Port of Whitby, Ontario; also copies of Petitions, Inspectors' Reports, and Minute of Treasury Board, showing date of such superannuation. He said he desired to call the attention of hon. members to some facts connected with the superannuation of this gentleman, and thought he would be able to establish that a very grave injustice had been done to a worthy and efficient officer, as well as a most estimable citizen. Mr. Warren was a personal friend of the late Mr. Baldwin, from whom he received his appointment. He had held the office of Collector of Customs at Whitby for 32 years, and had discharged the duties honourably and creditably, and summary dismissal in 1875, without any cause being assigned, had occasioned a great deal of surprise. He (Mr. Gibbs) had yet to learn that, because a person had been in the public service for a large number of years, and simply on account of his arriving at a certain age, it was a sufficient reason for his being superannuated without a moment's notice, and without any investigation as to his fitness or unfitness for the duties of his office. By papers brought down, it would be seen that a petition emanated from certain persons in the town of Whitby, asking that another person should be appointed to the office of Collector, and stating that the memorialists understood that Mr. Warren desired to be superannuated. But, as soon as it was known that Mr. Warren had no such desire, another petition was sent to the hon. the Minister, asking that he be retained, and stating that the former petition had been signed under a misapprehension. On the 18th November, 1874, shortly after the second petition was sent to Ottawa, Mr. Warren addressed a letter to the Department, in which he stated that, although 74 years of age, he was as able to perform the duties of the office as he ever had been, and requested that he might not be superannuated for a few years. It was true that an Inspector, in August, 1874, reported that Mr. Warren was an able officer, but that "he was too old for the duties required of him;" but the people of Whitby, at a subsequent date, had expressed confidence in the Collector's ability to discharge his duties thoroughly. In a private letter to him (Mr. Gibbs), Mr. Warren stated that during the 32 years of his service, with the exception of four days' leave of absence in 1862, he had never been off duty for a single day. With regard to his physical condition, his eye was undimmed, and his ear neither dull nor heavy. Mr. Warren himself wrote that he was strong and active, and could walk 20 miles in as short a time as any man in Canada. While he had nothing to say against Mr. Warren's successor, he would take the opportunity of stating that, however efficient this gentleman might be, he believed that the duties of that office could not be more efficiently performed than by his predecessor. He understood it had been urged by the late member for South Ontario, that Mr. Carson had claims on the Reform Party for services rendered during several elections in the riding, and, while he had nothing to say against the bestowal of a reward for such services, he held that a gentleman of Mr. Warren's position and standing, who had so long and faithfully performed the duties of Collector of Customs at Whitby, ought not to have been summarily set aside to make way for a political partizan. Members of both political parties in Whitby felt that a great injustice had been done this gentleman, and he considered it his duty to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact. He desired, if it was possible, to have the injury which had been inflicted remedied. Perhaps, as had been the case with regard to a grievance mentioned in connection with the county of Victoria, Nova Scotia, the Minister of Customs had not had time to read the documents relating to this dismissal, but he was sure that, if the hon. gentleman had read them and paid them the attention they merited, he would have caused a special report to have been made him with reference to the manner in which Mr. Warren's duties had been performed and prevented the summary dismissal that had taken place. The first intimation Mr. Warren had received was contained in a telegram dated 2nd August, 1874, and this was followed by a letter, the only notice he had obtained of any charge having been brought against him. He trusted that the Minister of Customs would do Mr. Warren that justice which the circumstances of the case demanded.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he did not know what papers could be brought down in addition to those which had already been brought down. Of course, if there were any others they would be submitted immediately. He had not a word to say against Mr. Warren's respectability or ability to fill the office, but, as the gentleman was over seventy-five years of age, it had been thought desirable to superannuate him. An Order in Council directed that officers, after they reached the age of sixty-five, had to be reported on year after year—as the hon. member for South Ontario must know—in order to assure the Government that they were fit for active service. Mr. Warren's case was somewhat exceptional; while doubtless able to do indoor work, he was not in a position effectively to perform the out-door service frequently required of a Customs Collector in a small port, owing to advanced years; such collectors were often also obliged to act as preventive officers and landing waiters. Under all the circumstances, this gentleman's age and his thirty-two years' service formed a reasonable excuse for superannuation. Scarcely one out of fifty collectors in small ports were capable of performing their duties properly after they attained the age of seventy or seventy-two.

Mr. BOWELL asked if he understood that the Order in Council mentioned applied to the whole Civil Service.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That is the rule applying to all officers claiming superannuation.

Mr. BOWELL: But it appears that this gentleman never claimed superannuation.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: All officers are entitled to superannuation.

Mr. BOWELL: That is another point.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: It is precisely the point in question.

Mr. BOWELL said one thing was quite clear. It was necessary in the town of Whitby to provide a place for a political partizan, and it had been shown that a capable officer had been superannuated with this purpose in view. If the rule mentioned was carried out in all the Departments, why had a gentleman between 64 and 66 years of age been appointed recently to the postmastership of Port Hope, a position much more onerous than the Collectorship of Customs in the small town of Whitby. It was quite evident that the rule was not observed.

An HON. MEMBER: I deny it.

Mr. BOWELL asked who denied it. The gentleman who was appointed. He had a few moments previously received a letter stating that, on the assessment roll, the gentleman appointed Postmaster of Port Hope represented himself to be between 64 and 65 years of age. He had nothing whatever to say against the respectability or the capabilities of this gentleman, but he did affirm that the law providing for the superannuation of members of the Civil Service had been most outrageously—if he might use the term—and repeatedly abused in order to make vacancies for those who had done political service on behalf of the Reform Party.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he believed that the Postmaster of such a town as Port Hope was not entitled to receive or claim superannuation. He had no personal knowledge with regard to Mr. Warren, but he thought that every hon. gentleman would agree with the remark made by the Minister of Customs—that at the age of 75 no gentleman, no matter what might be his physical vigour, could discharge the duties necessarily imposed on the Collectors of Customs at small ports, as efficiently as a gentleman sixty-five or seventy years of age. He feared that very considerable loss resulted from the fact that a very great number of these officers were far too old to fill properly the offices they held, and, if he was correctly informed, nearly two hundred Customs officers averaged something like seventy years of age. So far from being blameworthy as regarded superannuations, it was only a disinclination to swell the list that prevented the Government from superannuating a great number of other officers. If the Superannuation Act had been in force for twenty or twenty-five years, the diminution from death would by this time have balanced the increase of superannuated officers; but, as it was only introduced four or five years ago, it was quite clear that, as a large number of officers had been appointed at advanced periods in life, it was utterly impossible to avoid a considerable increase in superannuations from time to time. Mr. Warren's case must necessarily rest on his extremely advanced age, which rendered it impossible for him to discharge the duties of Collector of Customs under the circumstances mentioned.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would like to know whether reports of Inspectors as to the fitness of this gentleman to discharge his duties had been received during the nine years previous to his dismissal; and also whether the Minister of Customs could give any information as to any particular falling off in the activity, mental vigour or physical powers of Mr. Warren during his last year of office.

Mr. BLAKE: It is well known that men grow more vigorous as they grow older.

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought the hon. gentleman's sarcasm was ill-timed.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he had not examined the Inspector's reports during the past nine years. He did not think that Mr. Warren was taken by surprise. The matter had been talked of for several months prior to the superannuation, and he believed that Mr. Warren expected it. He held that this gentleman was a fit subject for superannuation.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he did not know why it was urged that Mr. Warren was incapable of discharging the duties of Collector of Customs. There was a landing-waiter at the town of Whitby, and Mr. Warren's duties were confined to office work, though he was quite able to do a great deal outside if required. The statement he had read to the House was dated two and a half years ago, and it still held good. Mr. Warren had never had any intimation that he was going to be superannuated. Mr. Warren's letter to the Department was dated November, 1874, and the Treasury Board took action in the following July, very much to that gentleman's surprise, as it was not expected that, after the remonstrance and petition, signed by members of both political parties and sent in from the town of Whitby, testifying to his fitness and ability, the Government would have taken any action in the matter, at any rate until a special inspection had been made in this relation.

Mr. ROSS (East Durham) said he had never referred to this before. Whoever had written the letter had done so because he himself was disappointed in not getting the office. He (Mr. Ross) did not lay any fault to the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), for his remarks. The gentleman who held the office was active, efficient and honest. He was a man who would not abstract the funds.

Mr. COOK remarked that perhaps the hon. member for North Hastings would favour the House with the date of the gentleman's birth.

Mr. BOWELL said the gentleman in question could do that himself. The hon. member for East Durham was entirely mistaken as to the person who wrote the letter. It was not written by a disappointed office-seeker, but by a gentleman who was of the opposite side of politics and knew he could not possibly get the position. He himself had never said anything against the character of the gentleman who held the office, but he had called the attention of the Government to the fact that, while they superannuated one man, they placed another in his position who was 64 or 65 years old.

Motion agreed to.

CARRYING MAILS BELOW QUEBEC IN WINTER OF 1876.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for a return of the expenditure incurred by the Post Office Department for carrying the mails below Quebec while the Grand Trunk Railway was stopped by snow during the winter of 1876.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 20th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

THE VETERANS OF 1812-15.

Mr. ST. JEAN moved that the returns of the Militia Department showing the names of the veterans who had proved their right to partake in the sharing of the grant of $50,000 voted last Session in favour of militiamen of 1812-15 be printed for distribution among members of the House in order to complete the return submitted last year.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the Printing Committee had not recommended the printing of this return, owing to the fact that it was almost similar to last year's return. If his hon. friend moved that the names of veterans not contained in the report of last year be printed, he did not know but that this would be printed, although he was under the impression that the Committee would abide by their recent decision.

Mr. BLAKE said it was within the competence of the Printing Committee to modify the return asked for, and grant only the portion of it which was really necessary.

Mr. VAIL said the report in question was very voluminous. The information desired could be obtained in a very few minutes by an examination of the papers which had been laid before the House.

Mr. TUPPER said he believed that a large number of persons, who thought their claims were as just as many that had been allowed, had failed to secure grants. Parties who were instructed to furnish certain evidence had been unsuccessful in obtaining grants after the required evidence was furnished; therefore, great necessity existed for the publication of the names of all who had participated in the vote. One Mr. Smith in his county made application in this relation, and was told to furnish evidence that he had been drilled. This was supplied, he believed, and then Mr. Smith was informed that the regulations of the Department did not permit a grant to be made under the circumstances. This was felt to be a great hardship, because a number of persons occupying precisely the same position were said to have been paid.

Mr. BLAKE said, as he understood it, the question was only as to the publication of certain additional names.

Mr. VAIL said it was quite true, as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had remarked, that a great deal of difficulty was experienced in getting the names of persons fairly entitled to participate in the grant. The intention in the first place was that these should be only those who had served under arms. A number of applicants lived in Nova Scotia, and, as far as he could learn, none of them had so served, they had only been enrolled as militiamen. He was not prepared to say that one or two who were not fairly entitled to participation in the grant had not been placed on the list, but, as soon as the circumstances were discovered, payment was stopped. The matter was still under consideration. If they found that men in Ontario and Quebec who occupied the same position had been paid, of course the claims would be allowed. If paid at all, this must be done out of the grant for the coming year.

Motion referred under Rule 94.

PROCEDURE WITH GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

REMARKS.

Order 25 on the paper read.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said they had been in the habit, as a matter of courtesy, of allowing the Government to stray over the orders commencing with the last and ending with the first. He would give hon. gentlemen opposite fair notice that they might find it to their advantage to insist on the rule that Government orders should be treated as were other orders, according to their regular precedence.

Mr. BLAKE said that, ever since he had been in the House, the rule on this subject had been the same. The hon. gentleman opposite, while he led the House for several years after Confederation, had always followed the present practice. He hoped that the custom would not be altered without reasonable notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called attention to the 24th rule.

Mr. BLAKE said he was quite aware of the fact that this order had existed since Confederation. It had not been observed, however.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not then intend to press the matter.

Mr. VAIL.

Mr. BLAKE: I hope the hon. gentleman will give us two days' notice of his intention.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have given full notice.

QUEBEC HARBOUR AND PILOTAGE ACTS AMENDMENT.

RESOLUTION CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend the Acts for the improvement and management of the Harbour of Quebec, and the Pilotage Act of 1873, (1) By altering the rates payable on tow boats and steamers plying in or to the Harbour of Quebec, and making better provision for ensuring the payment of the Harbour dues; (2) By empowering the Harbour Commissioners to impose penalties not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding sixty days, for infraction of their by-laws; (3) By enabling the Commissioners, in their discretion, to fine a pilot not exceeding $100, instead of suspending or dismissing him for certain offences; and (4) By authorizing the Commissioners to substitute rates per ton, weight or measurement for those now imposed, or otherwise to commute the same, but not to exceed the amounts now authorized, except with the consent of the Governor in Council.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he understood the changes contemplated had received the approval and concurrence of all the Harbour Commissioners. The latter had at present no power to fine pilots, and it was proposed to grant power to fine instead of suspending, if this was desired. Dues were now levied entirely ad valorem, and experience seemed to show that it was at least desirable to make some of them specific; they would, however, not be higher than those at present in force, and they would be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would like to hear explanations with regard to the necessity of making these changes. The present law was adopted after very grave deliberation, and after months of negotiation. The President of the Council and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Langlois) had taken very deep interest in the matter, and a delegation of pilots had, at the time, remained in the capital for about two months; and he thought that an Act prepared with so much care should not be changed without substantial reasons. He particularly objected to a change in the tariff of charges for these reasons. The mercantile community of the city of Quebec, one of the chief commercial entrepôts of the country, had complained seriously and grievously at Boards of Trade and in the press of the system adopted with relation to the Harbour Trust of that city. He believed that the Government had not selected Commissioners who had the confidence of the mercantile community, and accordingly he would like the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Thibaudeau) to explain the reasons why these changes should at present be made.

Mr. THIBAudeau said he was not then prepared to do so. He would, however, be glad to comply with the request when the Bill came before the House.

Mr. CARON said he would like to know whether the Quebec Board of Trade had expressed their opinion on the subject.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was not aware of this being the case. He presumed, however, that the Quebec Board of Trade was cognizant of the changes proposed. At all events the Bill would be published and the public would have abundant opportunity to become acquainted with its details.

Mr. MITCHELL said no doubt the proposed legislation was introduced at the instance of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. Still, someone ought to have been prepared to give to the House information on the subject. Commercial men were vitally interested in the pilotage system. It was very inefficient and was the cause of numerous suits and much loss of money. The law was by no means perfect. He would not oppose the proposition to grant power to fine pilots. If his hon. friend from Quebec East could not then furnish the information desired, they ought to defer consideration of the matter. He had suffered severe losses in connection with these matters, and the commercial community had also suffered owing to the inefficiency of pilots and to the failure to punish them for neglect or ignorance.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he understood that the changes proposed were unanimously approved of by the Quebec Board of Commissioners, and generally by the people of that city. He had heard of late no complaints regarding pilots, and the only change in this regard had reference to the imposition of fines. The toll on boats, he believed, was now one-tenth of one per cent. ad valorem, and he was informed by the Chairman of the Harbour Board that the change proposed in this respect would probably increase the revenue about $4,000 a year. The tolls were to be imposed on weights and measurements, instead of on the ad valorem principle.

Mr. CAUCHON said there were two distinct propositions affecting two distinct interests; one concerned the improvement of the harbour, and the other the pilots. The President of the Quebec Board of Harbour Commissioners (Mr. Dobell) and Mr. Shehyn, the Vice-President, the Commissioners and the members of the Board of Trade were cognizant of these propositions, and, if they were opposed to their opinions and interests, they would have no doubt made representations in this connection. Besides, if this was the case, there was plenty of time for the Board of Trade to protest. There were difficulties connected with the collection of the revenue, because the meaning of the law was not well understood. In amending it in accordance with the resolution, it would be made clear and distinct. The pilots had not been consulted with regard to the clause affecting them, but they would have plenty of time to consider the question and petition against the Bill if they found that it was not agreeable to their sentiments. As regarded the other provisions, he might state that the President and Vice-President of the Board of Trade were in favour of them.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked who was responsible for the delays in loading vessels at the port of Quebec. The stevedores got possession of the material and the vessel, and often kept her waiting several days through not proceeding with their work. Shippers often had to pay demurrage on this account. He would like to know whether the Harbour Commissioners were responsible for this.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I do not think they are responsible.

Mr. ROCHESTER said it would be a great boon to shippers if the Government would effect a reformation in that respect. He had frequently had to pay demurrage owing to those delays, and there seemed to be no redress. He believed there was a ring among the stevedores, and he thought the Government ought to interfere to correct the abuse.

Mr. MITCHELL said there was no provision in the law which gave the Commissioners power to deal with that matter. He would like to know whether the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intended to alter the rates payable by tow boats or steamers, by increasing or decreasing them, and also what "the better provision for ensuring the payment of the harbour dues" was. If his hon. friend stated that the authorities were favourable to the second and third clauses of these resolutions, he was satisfied on those points. He would not, however, consent to the fourth clause, even if he stood alone in his opposition to it. His hon. friend had not stated whether the rates under this clause would be increased or decreased by the proposed alteration. There had existed a provision for years with regard to the levying of dues on tonnage, which was an outrage upon the commercial and shipping interests of the country. He thought it was time it should be stopped, and while in office he had endeavoured to remedy the evil. He thought he had got the Harbour Commissioners in the position that all dues collected for the purpose of improving the harbour and protecting shipping would be applied in a manner that would prove beneficial. But that was impossible now, with the Commission constituted as it was. He (Mr. Mitchell) knew that Mr. Dobell had been overruled in the Commission on questions relating to improvements.

Mr. ROCHESTER.

Mr. CAUCHON: I do not deny that; but there is no difference of opinion in the Trust on this question.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU said the Bill had been drafted since he left Quebec, but he had every reason to believe that it was in accord with the wishes of the Harbour Trust. There were no less than six merchants on that Commission, and he thought the commercial interests were safe in their hands. The object of the Bill was to increase the revenue of the harbour. Since the passage of the Harbour Trust Bill the importation of goods from England via Portland had increased rapidly, and dues were only imposed on goods coming to Quebec by sea. It was sought, under the proposed amendments, to levy toll on goods coming from the United States and England via Portland and the Grand Trunk Railway, by which arrangement it was thought that the revenue of the port would be increased by about $4,000. He was not prepared to give as full an explanation at this moment as was required, but he would consult his fellow-commissioners and would give further particulars at another stage. With regard to the pilots, it had been found inconvenient to deprive them of their branches for a year or eighteen months, and so take from them their means of earning an honest living. It was thought that the same object of making the men more careful would be secured by the imposition of a fine.

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought the explanation of the hon. member for Quebec East ought to convince the House of the impropriety of going on with the resolution. It had been stated that the object was to place a duty on goods coming by way of Portland. He thought this was misleading the House, as the resolution read:

"By authorizing the Commissioners to substitute rates per ton weight or measurement for those now imposed, or otherwise to commute the same, but not to exceed the amounts now authorized, except with the consent of the Governor in Council."

The principle of the measure, as stated by the hon. member for Quebec East, was unjust and unfair; it would be levying duties on parties who would not be benefitted by the improvements.

Mr. THIBAudeau said on the Commission there were Mr. Shebyn, another gentleman and himself, who were three of the largest importers by Portland, and they were quite willing to submit to the dues for the advantage of the Harbour Trust.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that when the Bill was introduced, his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) could make his objections, and the House might perhaps sustain him. There could be no impropriety in allowing the resolutions to pass. He understood the Chairman of the Harbour Trust to say that they desired to levy a toll on goods going to the United States that crossed the harbour, but it would be for the House to say whether it would authorize this to be done or not.

Mr. MITCHELL said the whole southern portion of the Province of Quebec had its country produce brought across the harbour, and surely it was not intended that charge should be made for crossing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not feel himself competent to discuss the merits of the resolutions, and, therefore, he would not do so. But he differed from the view taken by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the House would not be bound by the resolutions in any way. If this was so, there was no use going into Committee. The practice of the House was founded upon reason. Whenever a Bill affecting trade and commerce was brought up, the reasons for the proposed alterations must be discussed fully in Committee; and then, if the Committee thought it expedient to make the alterations, the resolutions were reported to the House, and the House concurred in them before a Bill, founded upon these resolutions, could be introduced. If those propositions were sustained, then the House had already affirmed the principle of the Bill founded upon them, and, consequently, could not throw out the Bill. There might be quibbles as to the details of the Bill, or a certain clause, providing the machinery for carrying out the Bill, might be attacked; but the House, if it adopted the resolutions, was tied hand and foot to the acceptance of the Bill. If his hon. friend was not prepared to bring all his information down, the House should not be pressed to pass the resolutions.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was not prepared to controvert the doctrine set forth by the hon. member for Kingston, but he would ask whether that hon. gentleman undertook to say that every member was bound to every provision of the resolutions after they had been passed by the House. He did not think the action of any hon. member would be restricted by the passage of the resolutions. The House could affirm the principle that it was advisable that certain changes should be made; but any member could then object to any special clause of the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not if he agreed to the principle of the resolutions. He may object to details, but he is bound to the principle.

Mr. SMITH said he did not think every hon. member was bound by every statement in the resolutions.

Mr. MITCHELL said he understood that, unless a division was called for on the resolutions, every member was bound by the principle of the resolutions. If he called for a division, then he would have an opportunity, on the subsequent introduction of the Bill, to vote against any part of the Bill if he chose. He understood that the object of a portion of the resolutions was to empower the Harbour Trust to fine or suspend pilots, instead of dismissing them, for certain offences. The Act 36 Vic., chap. 54, contained a list of pilots' offences, which would be found as follows:—

“(1.) Commits any fraud or offence against the revenues of Customs or Inland Revenue, or the laws relating thereto;

“(2.) In any way, directly or indirectly, concerned in any corrupt practices relating to ships, their tackle, cargoes, crews or passengers, or to persons in distress at sea or by shipwreck, or to their moneys, goods or chattels;

“(3.) Lends his license;

“(4.) Acts as pilot whilst suspended;

“(5.) Acts as pilot when in a state of intoxication;

“(6.) Employs, or causes to be employed, on behalf of any ship of which he has the charge, any steamboat, boat, anchor-cable, or other store, matter or thing, beyond what is necessary for the service of such ship, with the intent to enhance the expenses of pilotage for his own gain, or for the gain of any other person;

“(7.) Refuses or delays, when not prevented by sickness or other reasonable cause, to take charge of any ship within the limits of his license, upon the signal for a pilot being made by such ship, or upon being required to do so by the master, owner, agent or consignee thereof, or of any officer of the pilotage authority of the district for which such pilot is licensed, or by any other principal officer of Customs; subject always, in the case of a pilot for and below the harbour of Quebec, to the laws relating to the Corporation of Pilots for and below the harbour of Quebec;

“(8.) Attempts, upon being so signalled or required, to make any special bargain for salvage;

“(9.) Unnecessarily cuts or slips, or causes to be cut or slipped, any cable belonging to any ship;

“(10.) Refuses, when requested by the master, to conduct the ship on board of which he is into any port or place into which he is licensed to conduct the same, except on reasonable ground of danger to the ship; or

“(11.) Quits the ship which he has undertaken to pilot without the consent of the master, before the service for which he has been hired has been performed.”

The hon. the Minister of Militia would see that he had already the power to impose a penalty, as provided by the Act, for the commission of any of these offences, of $200, with the liability also of suspension or dismissal.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): Read Section 71.

Mr. MITCHELL read that clause as follows:—

“If any Pilot when on board any ship for the purpose of piloting her, by breach or neglect of duty or by reason of drunkenness, either

“(a.) Does any act tending to the immediate loss, destruction or serious damage of such ship, or tending immediately to endanger the life and limb of any person on board such ship, or

“(b.) Refuses or omits to do any lawful act proper and requisite to be done by him for preserving such ship from loss, destruction or serious damage, or for preserving any person belonging to or on board of such ship from danger to life or limb, he shall, for each such offence, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding twelve months, with or without labour; and, if a licensed pilot, shall also be liable to suspension or dismissal by the pilotage authority of the district for which he is licensed.”

Mr. MITCHELL.

He understood the hon. the Minister of Marine to state that the subject of the resolution was to enable the authority, in place of dismissing the pilot, to impose a penalty of $100, although the Act he had just quoted imposed a fine of $200. He knew he would be saying what a great many of his friends would not care about hearing, but he had had some experience of the inefficiency of the pilots of the St. Lawrence, and he felt it his duty to speak out. He strongly objected to the penalty being reduced from $200 to $100, especially considering the fact that complaints were increasing. There was as much drunkenness and want of experience now as there had existed ever since he knew anything about the matter; and, therefore, he believed the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries slightly misled the House, he would not say intentionally, in stating that his object was simply to relieve the commissioners from the necessity of imposing greater penalties. If, as the hon. the Minister of Justice had said, the 70th Section was cumulative, he had no objection to go to that extent, but he did not think it was cumulative. Instead of the penalty being reduced, he would like to see it imposed with more force when necessary. His experience was that the clause as to the penalty had been a total failure.

Mr. CAUCHON said he thought the hon. member for Northumberland was mistaken in his remarks as to the pilots. The Bill was framed by him, and he was perfectly satisfied with the result of the amendments. He (Mr. Cauchon) maintained that the pilots of Quebec were as efficient as the pilots of any other port in the world. He did not think the hon. gentleman had been just to the pilots; there had been no complaints against them that he was aware of. He intended, as far as lay in his power, to keep the pilotage of Quebec as efficient as possible. He had brought in the Bill requiring seven years' apprenticeship, while, before, pilots had only to cross the Atlantic twice, and he had also required that they be educated fairly and know English; so that every attempt had been made in that direction, and if anything more could be done he was ready to do it. It should be remembered that the pilots of Quebec had many difficulties with fogs and other things which pilots of other ports did not have.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was not responsible for the Bill, although he was in office when it was introduced. The Bill was a compromise. It was not such a one as the Department believed would make the system efficient, but it went as far as the Government could carry it.

Mr. CAUCHON said that the hon. gentleman, with the then Government, were responsible for the Bill, as they agreed to the amendments, which were adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL said the Bill was a compromise, and not one satisfactory to the Government of which he was a member.

Mr. BLANCHET said it was well known that the pilots of Quebec were daring, plucky, always ready to do their duty, and steady. It was also well known that the distance they had to make was greater than in any other port in the world.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do not say they are always steady.

Mr. CHEVAL referred to the fourteenth clause of the Registration Act of 1874, and asked why old vessels were not registered the same as new ones were required to be. He was part owner in a vessel, and under the new registration he had to pay $245 for dues, where he formerly had only paid $36.

Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member appeared to charge him with having been responsible for the Act of 1874, whereas the present Government were responsible for it, the late Government having resigned in 1873.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the Act would be found in the Statutes of 1874, but it was passed by the Dominion Parliament in 1873.

Mr. CHEVAL said the Act did great injustice. Under the old law, vessels of the same measurement were registered at the same number of tons; but a new steamer which would now be registered at 476 tons, would have been only 36 tons under the old arrangement. Thus, it would appear that, when lock dues were paid by measurement, a new boat would pay four times the sum charged for an old boat of the same dimensions, which was undoubtedly a gross injustice. He did not know whether the Act had been passed to oblige the Richelieu Company, but it looked suspicious.

Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member (Mr. Cheval) appeared to think there was something to be complained of in Section 14 of the Statute of 1874, which was passed in 1873, but reserved for the approval of the Imperial Government. The object of the clause was to assimilate the registration throughout Canada with the registration of the United Kingdom. He had no interest in the Richelieu Company, or in any member or stockholder of it, and, in submitting Bills for the consideration of Parliament, he had never been influenced either by private interests or the interests of corporations, but his sole object had been to make the legislation as complete as possible. The Act did not give any preference to old over new ships. It provided that, for certain purposes in Canada, every ship must be registered. Vessels were not required to be re-registered except they were about to proceed to sea, the object being that when vessels proceeded to foreign ports the measurement and registration should agree with that of the mother country. If the hon. member (Mr. Cheval) imagined that in submitting the measure he sought to serve any corporation or any individual interest, he was entirely mistaken.

Mr. CHEVAL said he did not accuse the hon. gentleman of doing so.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) had not fully apprehended the section he had quoted. Before the passing of the Act, vessels in Canada were measured under the rules provided by the Shipping Act of 1854. The Act passed by the late Government in 1872 provided that prospectively every ship should be registered according to the rules of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. But a vessel registered under the old system did not require registration under the new law, consequently a vessel under the old registration had less tonnage than under the new. A great injustice had thus been done to owners of new vessels which came under the new system of registration, because they were registered at higher tonnage than old vessels of the same dimensions, and had therefore to pay more canal duties. Before the close of the present Session, he proposed to introduce a measure that should regulate the irregularity and injustice complained of.

Mr. MITCHELL said the law provided that, whenever a vessel proceeded to sea, it should be registered under the Act for the purpose of obtaining uniformity with British registration, and in process of time the whole tonnage of Canada would thus be brought in. The difference between the measurements under the old and the present law, especially in regard to sailing vessels, was not so great as had been indicated. He was not sensible of having defended a clause which was evidently bad. If this was the case, his hon. friend should turn to the hon. gentlemen whose devoted follower and blind supporter he (Mr. Cheval) was, for relief. These hon. gentlemen had been three years in power, and they could carry any measure they proposed. The law, which had been in force for three years, had only come into effect after the resignation of the late Ministry.

Mr. CHEVAL said the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had promised to amend the Act in the direction he had indicated was desirable.

Mr. MITCHELL said he withdrew opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BLANCHET: Do I understand that the right of suspending is granted by the Government?

Mr. BLAKE: No, it is not.

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported.

Mr. SMITH.

TRADE MARKS ACT EXTENSION BILL.—[BILL No. 75.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 76.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said it was introduced to remove a doubt existing as to whether the Provincial Railway Act extended to the case of a railway incorporated by the Provincial Legislature, crossing a railway incorporated by the Legislature of Canada. The 15th section of the Act related to crossings and the 16th Section provided for the hearing of parties concerned in such cases, and the report of the Privy Council thereon; but a doubt had been raised in the connection mentioned, and it was wished to extend the power given by law in this regard.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SAFE CUSTODY OF PRISONERS BILL.—[BILL No. 77.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said representation had been made to him on behalf of the Government of the Province of Ontario that there were several instances in which, partly owing to extensive repairs being required, and partly to new structures being needed, common gaols in certain districts would become insecure and unfit for a time for the detention of prisoners. The Bill provided for the issue of a proclamation by the Lieutenant-Governor under such circumstances, declaring gaols temporarily insecure, and naming gaols in adjoining districts or places for the confinement of prisoners. After the publication of this proclamation in the Provincial and Canada Gazettes, such prisoners might be tried in the districts to which they might be removed, although Judges had the right to order their trial to take place in their own districts. In some cases, it might be possible to leave some prisoners in the gaols alluded to, though it would be desirable that serious criminals, and further committals should not be so confined, and provision was made for the transfer of the latter to secure prisons on order of the Lieutenant-Governor. Subsequent proclamation would be warrant for the re-transfer or transfer of prisoners to their proper gaols. The last clause provided that nothing in this Act should affect the previous Act of 1868, giving authority to the Government of Canada with respect to the cases of persons confined for high treason and felonies, if they thought proper to order the transfer of such prisoners from less to more secure gaols. He thought that this power should be preserved.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

APPEALS FROM JUSTICES' CON-VICTIONS LAW AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 78.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said the purpose of the Bill was to amend an Act which had been amended more than once. It was intended to relieve some existing defects in the law. An attempt had been made last Session to remedy defects existing with regard to British Columbia; but he did not then propose to press this Bill beyond the second reading, in order that he might receive further information from British Columbia on the subject of appeals. The Bill of last Session provided for appeal to general Quarter Sessions, but it was found that there were no such Sessions in that Province, and therefore this provision was inoperative. When appeals were granted to the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia, no County Courts existed in that Province; but, as these Courts now existed there, it was proposed to give such Courts general and appellate jurisdiction over magistrates' orders. A clause also related to Manitoba. The Act, as it stood, provided that, unless otherwise directed in the special Act under which convictions took place, appeal was permissible. He had inserted in this Bill the additional words: "Or unless some other Court of Appeal have jurisdiction in the premises as provided by the Act of the Legislature of the Province within which such conviction takes place." It appeared to him that provision could more properly, in this as well as in other cases, be made by the Local Legislatures, and that it was desirable to infringe less on the apparent powers of these Legislatures in that particular. They had the power to put any law in force in Canada, but he thought the hon. member for Kingston would agree with him that, so long as the Local Legislatures carried out the laws and established the courts, it was convenient to adopt the general principle of permitting them to establish and organize courts. With this object in view, he had inserted the words quoted. The provisions of this Bill would cease to apply upon a law being put into force in any Province.

Bill read the second time.

IMPROPER USE OF FIREARMS
BILL.—[BILL No. 79.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said that, some years ago, the question as to whether any legislation on this subject should be made had attracted the attention of an eminent legal member of the House in the early years of Confederation. The Bill then proposed, however, did not meet with favourable consideration. Representations had been made to him, in his official capacity, on several occasions, as to the expediency of introducing some repressive measure, and there could be no doubt that the practice of carrying fire-arms was becoming too common. He thought they were carried by two classes who ought not to carry them—the rowdy and reckless characters, and boys and young men. The revolver was almost part of their ordinary equipage. A proposal was made, if it was not improper to mention it, in the other branch of the Legislature, and now pending, with reference to an alteration of the law in this particular, but it did not appear that such extensive provisions as were there proposed might be fairly submitted to the House. Although a law on the Statute-book declared it a misdemeanor to carry several weapons, such as the dirk, knife, loaded cane, &c., yet they could not conceal from themselves the fact that the particular weapon referred to—the revolver—occupied a somewhat different position. It was used sometimes by travellers, sometimes by nervous people and good citizens; and what he was apprehensive of was this: If they passed a general law prohibiting every person from carrying revolvers, reckless characters, who intended violence, would not care about the law, and would carry small concealed weapons; while the sober, law-abiding citizen would be unprotected. The result might, accordingly, be worse than if they had no law at all. With these facts in view, he had endeavoured to form provisions which might meet the reasonable exigencies of the situation, as would be found to be the case in the first three clauses in the Bill. The fourth clause pointed to an entirely different question. The first clause provided that whoever should present a pistol, without reasonable cause, at anyone, might be bound over to keep the peace for six months; this was to apply when no unlawful intention was proved or presumed, to which cases subsequent sections applied. While, not only could a pistol not be carried without some reasonable excuse, but, also, a person so bound over, if unable to give sureties, might be committed for a period not exceeding thirty days. The second case was that of a person arrested on a warrant for an offence, or while in the act of committing an offence, and he was made liable to a fine, or imprisonment not exceeding three months. That was calculated to strike the class of offenders who ordinarily carried fire-arms. The third section provided against a man having a pistol upon his person with intent to do injury to some other person, and a higher fine and a longer term of imprisonment was provided for. At the same time, however, discretionary power was reposed in the magistrate or Judge to infer whether the carrying of the pistol was prima facie evidence of the intent. It had occurred to him that in many cases it would be impossible to prove the intent until after the act had been committed, and it was not unreasonable to give the power to infer such intent, which power he did not think was likely to be abused. The fourth section dealt with an entirely different class of cases, but it was one which was felt necessary as a preventive measure. The whole community was shocked now and then by reading of deplorable accidents occurring through the practice, which he might call criminal, of persons pointing weapons, supposed to be unloaded, at others. It was important that this class of offences should be recorded on the Statute-book as criminal, as such a result would tend to check this dangerous practice. When once it was marked and stigmatized as an act of a criminal character, such accidents would not occur so frequently. The Bill made it a criminal offence, and affixed to it a moderate punishment. The last section provided for the procedure and mode of trial. There was also a section which provided for the destruction of the weapon found upon the party convicted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the first clause would be very hard to work. If a party had a reasonable cause to apprehend an assault or personal injury to himself or personal property, he ought to go at once and take proceedings before a magistrate, and have the party from whom he dreaded the injury held over in security for his good behaviour. This, he thought, would have the effect of inducing law-abiding men to lay aside their pistols, although they might have apprehensions of attack from some quarter. The rowdy element, the wilful law-breakers, would understand this, and would take advantage of it. There would be a greater inducement for that class to carry arms, and he really thought the law might have the effect of disarming the person who ought to be armed, and arming the rowdies. There was also another objection. The Bill provided that a party who had no reasonable cause to fear an assault, and who was found with a pistol on his person, could be bound over to keep the peace. Carrying a pistol was not a breach of the peace, and the man might still carry it after being bound over.

Mr. BLAKE: Under a subsequent clause it is provided that the pistol shall be destroyed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, if the man got another pistol, and afterwards broke the law, his sureties could not be punished, because carrying a pistol was not a breach of the peace.

Mr. BLAKE said what was intended was that the breach of the peace should not be committed by carrying a pistol. The honest man who carried a pistol under apprehension of attack was not likely to commit a breach of the peace.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the third clause went a little too far. It provided that:—

“Whosoever has upon his person a pistol, with intent therewith unlawfully and maliciously to do injury to any other person, shall be liable, on conviction thereof, to a fine of not less than fifty, or more than two hundred dollars.”

It must be proved that there was an intent to injure a particular person. How the fact of a man carrying a pistol could be prima facie evidence of intent to shoot a particular person he did not really see.

Mr. BOWELL: The clause makes it so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was creating an intent by law which might never have existed in the mind of the party arrested. He might intend to shoot another man, or another man's dog. As to the fourth clause, he agreed with the hon. the Minister of Justice with regard to its necessity, and did not think that the punishment was too large or introduced too soon. It was grievous to read in the newspapers of persons carelessly, mischievously, and wantonly pointing firearms without knowing whether they were loaded or not, and destroying valuable lives.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said he thought if the punishment by fine was done away with altogether it would be better. The fine was no punishment to a rich man. He thought the Bill ought to provide for imprisonment in each case.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he would be very sorry to place such power in the hands of country justices because he thought it might be abused. He thought the power to fine or imprison should be in the Bill, but should not be absolutely compulsory on the part of the justice. He had not sufficient confidence in the discretion of this class of judicial officers in many instances to allow him to consent to place such extreme power in their hands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Bill mentioned “lawful excuse.” Suppose that, in a theatrical performance, one actor pointed a weapon at another, would that be a lawful excuse?

Mr. BLAKE: The actor must have a sham pistol.

Mr. BOWELL said this law put extraordinary powers in the hands of the magistrates. While he was convinced for many reasons that there was absolute necessity to prevent people from carrying firearms, still this measure amounted to total prohibition. According to the first clause, a man carrying a pistol must have a reasonable cause of fear of an assault. If he did not show such cause, he would have to give surety for six months. As pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston, a man might still continue to carry a pistol, but, if he did so, would not the third clause apply? The Bill declared that carrying a pistol upon the person was prima facie evidence of intent to do harm.

Mr. BLAKE: It may be inferred; that is the language of the section.

Mr. BOWELL: Who is to judge?

Mr. BLAKE: The jury. With reference to what had been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Mackay) he might state the procedure was the same as that referring to offences against the person, of an injurious character. If the accused so desired, he could be tried only before the justice of the peace, but, if he objected to that tribunal, his offence was treated as indictable, and he was tried by a jury. That answered part of the difficulty that the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had suggested. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) suggested that imprisonment only should apply to offences of this character, but he (Mr. Blake) thought that was not desirable, as it would alter the general principle of the law, were they to apply a less degree of elasticity to the punishment of such cases than was applied to other minor offences. If they were to suppose that only the rich man would be fined, and the poor man imprisoned, the former would be comparatively easily punished; but let them hope that the magistrates would not so forget their duty, and would apply the punishment with respect to the crime, and not with respect to the resources of the criminal. The suggestions of the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) were certainly of some moment. He had felt it very difficult to present to the House a measure which should be effective in the direction in which legislation was required, and which would not be open to some objection or other. But this was not a mere brutum fulmen, as the hon. member supposed. The object was that, when a person was unable to give a reasonable excuse for carrying a pistol, he should be bound over to keep the peace and destroy the weapon. If the man afterwards proceeded to break the peace, whether with a pistol or not, they had his sureties to fall back upon. If he was a respectable person, he would no doubt give bail, but if a rowdy he would probably get a slight imprisonment. He (Mr. Blake) desired to go as far as possible to prevent apprehension on the part of nervous, timid people who had not such a well-defined cause of dread that they could go and swear an information and who would feel uncomfortable without a weapon. Many rightly entertained those apprehensions, and had not legal evidence to support them, and to swear out information would probably only result in greater malice on the part of their enemy at some future season. There might be times when a party would feel himself made powerless by the law unless there was some provision to enable him to arrest and punish a reckless, rowdy person carrying a weapon. The fact of a man having a pistol was not to be inferred, but it might be inferred as prima facie evidence of intent to do injury. Undoubtedly, legal, cogent proof of this would be required before the conviction. These were the reasons which induced him to submit a measure on this subject, but he admitted that it was a very difficult one to deal with. He did not intend to push it through now, and would take pleasure in receiving suggestions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, whereas, one magistrate might require absolute proof that the carrying of fire-arms was necessary, another might be satisfied with a reasonable excuse. The Bill would be wide enough to take in both. Much of our territory was on the outskirts of civilization, and it would seem that, for a man to carry a pistol there, he must have a reasonable excuse, just as he would in a city.

Mr. PALMER said he heartily approved of the object of the Minister of Justice, but there was one clause in the Bill which seemed an extraordinary one to him. The ordinary principle of criminal law was that no man was to be adjudged guilty until he had been proved guilty. But a section of this Act made certain things prima facie evidence of the particular fact, and then threw it upon the opposite party to disprove it. He had never before seen an attempt made to draw this distinction between these two points. He liked a rule of criminal law to be universal in its application. Notwithstanding the anomaly he had referred to, he heartily approved of the general principle of the Bill, as he did not believe it was necessary at all in this country to carry fire-arms.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) suggested that it should be provided that no person should be permitted to carry fire-arms unless he had a licence from the official duly appointed.

Mr. MASSON said he thought the whole difficulty would be met if a person could make his proof of necessity before the act rather than after it, as was done in France and some other countries. There, every person who feared for his life could make an affidavit before a magistrate or other authority, who would give him permission, if he saw fit, to carry fire-arms for his own protection.

Bill read the second time.

SUPPRESSION OF GAMING HOUSES AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 80.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

"1. That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, and to provide for the imposition of a license duty of thirty dollars on each importer and manufacturer (not a manufacturer of beer, wash or spirits, or a rectifier of spirits) of stills, worms or other apparatus suitable for the manufacture of beer, wash or spirits.

"2. That it is expedient to fix the following as the fees payable by maltsters for licenses:—

"(a.) For a first-class license, which shall entitle him to work a malthouse having a capacity to produce 2,000 centals, and upwards, of malt during one month's working, $200.

"(b.) For a second-class license, which shall entitle him to work a malthouse having a capacity to produce 1,500, and not more than 2,000, centals of malt during one month's working, $150.

"(c.) For a third-class license, which shall entitle him to work a malt-house having a capacity to produce 1,000 centals, and not more than 1,500 centals, of malt during one month's working, $100.

"(d.) For a fourth-class license, which shall entitle him to work a malthouse having a capacity to produce 500, and not more than 1,000, centals of malt during one month's working, $50.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said the proposition was really to reach those who manufactured illicit stills. He thought the license duty of $50, as originally proposed, was too much, and consequently he had changed it to $30. As some difficulty had been raised with reference to the definition of the words "fermented tun," they were struck out. As altered, he did not think that the resolution was in any way objectionable. Under the similar system in force elsewhere, Excise duties were imposed to reach the illicit distiller. It was proposed to make four, instead of three, classes of licenses. The price of a first-class license was not increased; it remained at $200. A holder of such a license must have capacity to produce 2,000 centals and upwards of malt during the month. It had been found that under the present system this duty was enforced on every maltster, and this was manifestly unfair. A person manufacturing 2,000 centals of malt during the month would be obliged to pay $150 for his license; a person producing 1,000 centals during the same time, and not more than 1,500 centals, must pay $100; and the fourth class license was fixed at $50.

Mr. HOLTON: What is the estimated result of the change?

Mr. LAFLAMME said it might cause a slight decrease in the revenue. It was intended to meet the circumstances of the smaller brewers. Under this system, five or six brewers would take out first-class licenses, while, up to the present time, the number of these licenses taken out was much larger.

Mr. MITCHELL said small brewers might remark: "Small favours thankfully received." This seemed to be a step in the right direction, as it relieved small men at the expense of larger ones.

Mr. HOLTON: It is a very desirable reform on the legislation of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am very glad to see any evidence of reformation among the great Reformers on the other side of the House. I have not seen much of it yet.

Resolutions agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, DRINK AND DRUGS BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to amend the Act to impose License dues on Compounders of Spirits, to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, and to prevent the adulteration of Food, Drink and Drugs by adding the following words to the definition of adulterated Food or Drink, contained in the first section of the said Act:—Or from which any essential constituent part or ingredient has been in whole or in part abstracted."

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said, according to the present law, adulteration was defined to mean merely the introduction of foreign ingredients, while food could be adulterated by the subtraction of ingredients. This resolution obviated the difficulty mentioned.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 86) To amend an Act to impose license dues on compounders of spirits; to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, and to prevent the adulteration of food, drink and drugs.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. LAFLAMME.

INSPECTION OF GAS AND GAS METERS ACT AMENDMENT.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

"1. That it is expedient to amend the Act to provide for the Inspection of Gas and Gas Meters, by repealing the 25th section thereof and substituting the following in lieu thereof:—

"25. It shall be lawful for the Inspector appointed under this Act, at the request of any purchaser or undertaker, who shall give twenty-four hours' notice, in writing, to the other party to the contract, at all reasonable times to enter any house or shop, store, yard, or other place whatsoever within his district, where any meter, stamped or unstamped, is fixed or used, and to remove such meter, doing as little damage thereby as may be; and if, upon examination and testing, it shall appear that any such meter is incorrect or fraudulent, such meter shall not be refixed or used again, unless and until altered and repaired so as to measure and register correctly and stamped.

"(2.) And the cost of such removal, alteration, repairs and stamping shall be paid by, and may be recovered from the party against whom the decision is given.

"2. That it is expedient further to amend the said Act by adding the following subsection at the end of section thirty-one:—

"(2.) Such tests shall be made at least once in each week, and in addition to such weekly tests, additional tests may be made when the quantity of gas made by any undertaker may be deemed sufficiently large to render such additional tests necessary; such necessity being determined by departmental regulations or order in that behalf.

"3. That it is expedient further to amend the said Act by adding the following subsections at the end of section thirty-five:—

"(2.) The fees so determined as payable for testing the illuminating power and purity of gas, when such tests are made in pursuance of any general regulations in that behalf, shall be paid by the undertaker.

"(3.) When any purchaser requires to have a special test made as to the illuminating power or purity of gas, the fees chargeable for such test shall be paid by the party who requires it to be made."

(In the Committee.)

Resolution 1 agreed to.

On Resolution 2,

Mr. LAFLAMME said the effect of the amendment was to abolish the daily test provided for in the Act.

Mr. MITCHELL asked if the amendment would give permission to any gas inspector to enter his house and inspect his meter. If so, he would object to it.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the inspector would not visit the hon. gentleman's house unless he was sent for. If the hon. gentleman was satisfied with the quality of his gas, he need not trouble himself about the inspector.

Resolution agreed to.

On Resolution 3,

Mr. PLUMB asked the meaning of the word "undertaker."

Mr. LAFLAMME: He is the producer of the gas. He is so termed in the original Act.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would like to ask a question bearing on the first resolution. Would a neighbour, who was also a "purchaser" of gas, have the power to send an inspector into his (Mr. Mitchell's) house for the purpose of annoying him?

Mr. LAFLAMME said the hon. gentleman would see from an examination of the language of the Act and of the proposed amendment that the inspector simply went at the request of two parties—one the consumer and the other the furnisher of gas.

Mr. MITCHELL said that construction was a rational one, but an entirely different construction could be given to the law. He suggested that the words should be altered to make the meaning clearer.

Mr. MITCHELL said he wished the ambiguous phraseology corrected, as he did not want any person to come into his house from 7 to 10 o'clock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, while the criticism of the hon. gentleman was hypercritical, the language, no doubt, could have the construction placed upon it which had been suggested.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he would be willing to amend the Act in the direction referred.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported.

BREACHES OF CONTRACTS BILL.

[BILL No. 66.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said there existed upon the Statute-books of Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island, laws passed before Confederation making breaches of contract criminal. But the view upon which those laws were founded were not now generally held. He saw no justification for holding ordinary breaches of contract on the part of servants to be criminal any more than any other breaches of contract, and that view had been adopted in England, and recent legislation had been in that sense. There was a later law in the Province of Quebec, making certain breaches of contract civil offences. It was not the intention of the Government to interfere with that law of Quebec, but it was, in a great measure, to remove well-founded doubts throughout the country, as to whether certain breaches of contract were crimes, that the present Bill was introduced. The first clause amended the laws of the Provinces, passed before Confederation, which made those breaches of service crimes, so that they would cease to be crimes. But the rest of the Bill provided that certain wilful and malicious breaches of contract were to be held to be crimes, and punished as such. That portion of the Bill was divided into three sub-divisions. The House would be asked to declare it a crime when any person had a reasonable cause for believing that the consequences of his breach of contract would be serious bodily injury, danger to human life, or destruction of valuable property. He need use no argument to enforce the statement that any wilful breach of contract involving such consequences should be treated as a crime. The second sub-division would refer to breaches of contract on the part of people who engaged to supply places with gas and water, and who wilfully and maliciously broke their contract, thus causing wide-spread inconvenience, and perhaps serious injury to health. Such a breach, he thought, they were warranted in stigmatising as criminal. The third sub-section referred to breaches of service on the part of employés on railways on which Her Majesty's mails were carried, or on which passenger or freight trains were run. In these modern times, the enormous inconvenience of stopping the whole system of communication between one part of the country and the other was very apparent, and he was justified in holding that any man who produced that result by wilfully breaking his contract was guilty of a crime. The principle of that portion of the Bill was similar to the English Act. But he wanted to avoid class legislation, and therefore he had made the law applicable to others as well as to workmen engaged on railways. For instance, if a coal merchant agreed to supply the Gas Company of Ottawa with coal, and although he had the coal in his yard yet refused to deliver it at the price stipulated because the market price advanced, and if the city of Ottawa was left in darkness on account of the Gas Company not being able to get coal, then the contracting coal dealer would, by the law, be held liable as a criminal. The third section explained the meaning of the word "malicious." The fourth section gave the accused power either to be summarily tried or to have his offence treated as an indictable offence.

Mr. BROOKS said the Bill was one of the highest importance and would be approved by the House, especially after the occurrences of the past winter, when the whole of the business of the country was, by reason of a combination among certain classes of labour, suspended for a certain period. No one could disagree with the principles of the Bill, so far as that portion of legislation was concerned; but in Quebec there was an impression among some members of the legal profession that a practical difficulty might arise out of the title of the Bill, viz.: "An Act to repeal certain laws making breaches of contract for service criminal." Upon examining those laws, especially in Quebec, he found a portion of the laws to which the Bill applied in the Statutes of Lower Canada chapter 37, and referred to in Sections 3, 5 and 7 of the Bill. The Legislature of the Province of Quebec

Mr. BLAKE.

since Confederation had chosen to adopt new legislation, and had declared by an Act passed in 1871, and 33 Victoria chapter 20, the two first sections referred to in the present Bill repealed. But, on comparing the sections which had been repealed with the sections of the Act of the Local Legislature, he found that, as to the offence being declared a crime, there was no distinction whatever between the legislation. The second section of the Act, Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, merely declared that the party guilty of certain acts was liable upon conviction before a Justice of the Peace to a penalty not exceeding $20. The seventh section of the Act would be repealed by the present measure. The preamble of the Bill declared that those breaches of contract were matters which should be considered as civil charges. No doubt, under the British North America Act, Provincial Legislatures had the right to legislate upon those subjects. There was a feeling entertained throughout the Province of Quebec that the declaration made in the Bill might seriously affect the working of the Masters and Servants Act, which, as far as it related to ordinary domestic servants, he considered to be one of the greatest importance. The penalty of imprisonment he deemed to be important in order to enforce the law, for without it the Act might as well be repealed. It was well known that servants were indifferent to being condemned to pay a certain sum of money, and it was only by having the summary means of punishing by imprisonment, as he believed they could do under the local law, they were able to compel the fulfilment of engagements. That applied particularly to farm servants, who were employed for, say, six months. It was well known that during a portion of the time the labour of the farm servant was of comparatively little value, while at another period that labour possessed great value; and if, at such time, the servant was able to leave, suffering no other penalty than a loss of wages, the employer would be placed at serious inconvenience. While there was no objection to the Bill, the title might raise apprehensions that there might be a conflict of authority with Provincial Legislatures, the first section of the Bill repealing the sections of the Act which made the offences criminal. He referred to the matter in order that there might be no conflict of jurisdiction where Provinces had passed local Masters and Servants Acts, and that Parliament might not legislate in such a direction that the people could not obtain the remedy which they derived under local laws.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) suggested that provision should be made to include in the Bill arrangements, both written and verbal, and it should be made to include mail contracts.

Mr. IRVING said it did not appear to him that the Bill would be received by a large class of persons throughout the country with the same feelings of gratification with which it had been received by the House. If the Bill were passed in its present shape, it would hereafter receive an amount of consideration outside of Parliament of which hon. members would eventually hear something. As one familiar with that branch of law, he thought that the present laws upon the Statute-book were amply sufficient, for all practical purposes, and that, whatever objects were sought to be attained by the present Bill, the substitution proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice for the present law was by no means satisfactory. As a matter of fact, in the cases growing out of the difficulty of which they had heard so much recently, those who broke the contracts, if they were broken in the sense in which the Bill before the House now proposed to reach them, could have been punished under either the Masters and Servants Act or under the provisions of the General Railway Act. He would have to draw the attention of the House to what some of those provisions were, and it would be found that those provisions, so far as the complexion that the debate had to some extent taken, owing to recent events, was concerned, were absolutely sufficient. The General Railway Act authorized every railway company to make by-laws for the regulation of conductors and other officers, and to impose penalties for the contravention of those by-laws. It also said how offences against the by-laws might be proved, and then went on to say at section 7:—

“ If any officer or servant of, or person employed by any railway company, wilfully or negligently contravenes any by-law or regulation of the company lawfully made and in force, or any order or notice of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and of which a copy has been delivered to him, or has been posted up or open to his inspection in some place where his work or his duties, or any of them are to be performed, then if such contravention causes injury to any property or to any person, or exposes any property or any person to the risk of injury, or renders such risk greater than it would have been without such contravention, although no actual injury occurs, such contravention shall be a misdemeanour, and the person convicted thereof shall, in the discretion of the Court before whom the conviction is had, and according as such Court considers the offence proved to be more or less grave, or the injury or risk of injury to person or property to be more or less great, be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, so as no such fine exceeds four hundred dollars, nor any such imprisonment the term of five years; and such imprisonment, if for two years or upwards, shall be in the Penitentiary.”

Therefore, if there was any breach of the rules of the company committed by any employé, there were punishments now to be enforced on the Statute-book which were ample and sufficient, and in some respects more severe than that proposed in the present Bill. If it was merely with respect to breaches of contract and the difficulties of recent events that the law was to reach, he thought he had shown that existing laws fully met the case. The law bristled with enactments which punished in every possible way which the ingenuity of law-givers and law-makers could devise the stoppage of, or interference with, trains or any offence of that kind committed by servants of the company or the class of persons mentioned in the Act. With regard to combinations of men or difficulties growing therefrom, the law said:

“ Whosoever in pursuance of any unlawful combination or conspiracy to raise the rate of wages, or of any unlawful combination or conspiracy respecting any trade, business or manufacture, or respecting any person concerned or employed therein, unlawfully assaults any person, or in pursuance of any such combination or conspiracy, uses any violence or threat of violence to any person, with a view to hinder him from working or being employed at such trade, business or manufacture, is guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be liable to be imprisoned in any gaol or place of confinement, other than a penitentiary, for any term less than two years, with or without hard labour."

There was another class of legislation of which, in the past, they had heard a great deal—the Criminal Law Amendment Act, relating to violence, threats and molestations; in which it was enacted that whenever a person used violence to any other person, or injured property, or intimated to such other person a threat to use violence towards him, or systematically followed such other person from place to place, or acted in a disorderly manner in such regard, or beset the house or place where such person resided or worked, or carried on business, or happened to be where any of these matters were done with the view of compelling any person to abstain from doing anything which he had a legal right to do, or to do anything which he had a legal right to abstain from, such person was liable to be punished in a very severe way by fine or imprisonment. This being the present condition of the law, he saw no useful end to be obtained by more legislation, and no reason for aggravating a certain class of men by now passing a law which, whatever they might say, or in whatever language it might be couched, was aimed at a particular class, in consequence of recent difficulties. Whatever were these events of which they had heard so much in the earlier part of the year, or whatever were the domestic difficulties between the Grand Trunk Railway and its men, the House was hardly in a position to pronounce conclusively or satisfactorily an opinion upon them, because they had seen nothing but the statements in the newspapers in this regard, and upon these, every one knew, under such circumstances, very little reliance was to be placed. But they did know, according to the newspaper view, that these men or their representatives were for three days in Montreal endeavouring to bring about a settlement; and they failed because their views were not even properly discussed. They also knew, the newspapers had stated that, for many days, if not for many weeks before the strike took place, unless the men's views were to some extent met, a strike would take place; that the men complained of a breach of contract towards them; that they gave notice to the railway company that they were not prepared to submit to a reduction arbitrarily imposed; and that, if their demands did not receive something like satisfactory consideration, they would stop work. These facts were for some weeks notorious before the actual crisis was reached. He therefore maintained that it was difficult to say who was right and who wrong, not having any authoritative or proper evidence before them. Everyone must know that there were two sides to the question. Up to the period of time when the strike took place, much provocation was given; whether that provocation was justifiable or not and whether the railway company had unfairly endeavoured to induce the men to accept wages below what they ought to have been, they could not decide here. At the same time it was said—but it was only fair to say it was also contradicted—that, whatever reduction was made in salaries, 35 per cent. of that deduction would pass into the pockets of the heads of departments. Hence, he for one was not surprised that the men should have been nettled, and that they should have done, what would be done by every hon. member in the House, endeavoured to obtain the best bargain they could. Whatever might have been the difficulties, the House could not decide upon them. In one matter, however, they had the authority of certain remarks made in the other House—that the men, at all events, when the strike did come, were willing to carry the mails from one end of the country to the other, but the railway company would not accept their services even to that limited extent. In other railways, and notably in the case of the Great Western Railway, which to some extent, was as important as the Grand Trunk Railway, during the twenty-four years of its active operations, such matters as a strike or unheeded remonstrance to the authorities or conduct whereby the men were driven to desperation had never occurred, though the changes of management during this period had been frequent. During this strike, he was informed, the acts of violence that had taken place had been very greatly exaggerated. The blue-book relating to disturbances on the Grand Trunk which had been issued might be read. In it, Mr. Coleman, the Crown attorney, dealt with this matter in these words:—"The reports of actual violence were much exaggerated." The Major-General—and it was gratifying to be able to refer to the report of a man who was above political influence and who belonged to a profession whose honour was as bright as their swords—in his report spoke of the matter as being magnified or exaggerated, and stated that the odium cast upon the local authorities, and, to some extent, on the militia, was undeserved, and that the men behaved as well as the circumstances permitted. It was probable that the authorities at Belleville and other places had been taken by surprise. This was no more than was likely. No member of the House had ever known of such an occurrence; the situation was novel and embarrassing for magistrates. Seldom did riots take place, even in England, as was the case at Bristol, but the magistrates were charged with having been to blame. Men had been arrested at some places along the line, and, notwithstanding that bail was refused, the company would not prosecute. The only inference to be drawn was apparently that the men were right and the railway wrong. This was the practical result, or else the company would have vindicated their position by pressing the prosecutions which had been instituted. He would allude to the difficulties of the position of the men, against whom this legislation was aimed. He, of course, referred more especially to the engine-drivers, who were skilled labourers, and to whom the term, men of science, was not too high a term to apply; who had sprung almost invariably from the position of labourers; who, by their attention to their business, by natural taste and adaptation for the work, and by the ability with which God had blessed them, had learned to manipulate the delicate movements of the locomotive engines, and who had attained perfection in this relation by experience, by slow observation, and by long service. These men seldom acquired sufficient experience to manage a locomotive, and sufficient skill and ability to act properly under the difficult circumstances in which they were often placed, until they had attained middle age,—a period of life when, if thrown out of employment, it was not easy for them to turn round and get other employment. Men hardly knew what a complicated thing a railroad was. They hardly seemed to reflect that a railway, whether by day or night, was beacons and buoys from end to end by switches, and sidings, and whistle posts, and semaphores and parti-coloured lamps. It was one thing to manage an engine and another thing to manage a locomotive running at the rate of 40 miles an hour. A man might be a sailor and sail a ship, who was quite incapable of taking a vessel into port. To do so, he must know the way in which the harbour was beacons and buoys. These men, to some extent, resembled pilots. They acquired an experience and knowledge which was perfectly wonderful to the uninitiated. In the dead of night they approached towns at the rate of 40 miles an hour, with the glimmer of lights around them, with perfect confidence and great courage, while the lives of hundreds were depending upon their attention and fidelity. With regard to men of this character they were now called upon to legislate, and in relation to what they considered their dearest rights, which were to be twisted and tossed from one side of the House to the other with hardly a single voice raised on their behalf. These men were not only like pilots, but also, in some degree, like sailors, who went for long journeys, and who had always been a class which received and were entitled to the anxious and protecting care of Parliament, and hon. members ought to be more careful to refrain from driving them into hostility. Hon. members should remember how much they owed to these men for their ability and for their courage. Hardly a railway accident or collision took place but they gave striking examples of heroism and bravery. Almost exactly twenty years ago, the Desjardins accident occurred, and it was as deplorable as the recent Ashtabula disaster; and then the engine-driver could have saved himself had he chosen to abandon his train, but instead he had stuck to his post and whistled to alarm the passengers, thereby enabling many to escape. The same thing had recently happened again, and such instances were frequent. Their conduct and courage had always been admirable, so that no class of men should stand relatively higher in the esteem of the country, and no men should be more particularly cared for. If they differed with their Superintendent and left one railroad, they could not get employment on another line unless they brought a certificate that they had not gone on bad terms. There was a combination and trade unionism on the part of their employers, quite as strict and stringent as any employés' trades union. Under such circumstances, they were obliged to leave Canada and go to the United States, though they had settled here and become attached to their work; although they regarded their employment and their engines with almost the same affection that the sailor showed for his ship or for the sea. If killed, compensation could not be recovered from their employers, though they were in no way to blame for the disaster. So, if, in a fit of spleen or temper, as had been charged — but which he did not admit to be correct — they had recently forgotten themselves, a blow should not be aimed at them for which there was no reason. If these men had broken their contracts, they were liable even to five years' imprisonment in the Penitentiary. But he did not believe that they would have been punished had the prosecutions been pressed, for the circumstances were such that no grand jury would have found true bills. He did not consider the Bill by any means perfect or satisfactory. He considered it, moreover, inopportune, because they were legislating under the influence of a panic, and it was unnecessary. There had been a struggle between labour and capital, and it was the duty of Parliament to protect the labourer against the capitalist as well as the capitalist against the workman. It was the duty of Parliament to erect such a tribunal that parties charged with and charging breaches of contract, could go before it and endeavour to bring about arrangements whereby the value of capital should not be injured on the one hand, nor the value of labour, which was of equal worth to the country, on the other hand. They had not in this House such a high opinion of the skill or ability with which railways were managed in this country as to take the statements of any railway men as absolutely correct. There was no such general confidence in Canada in railway management generally, and, although English newspapers contained constant reflections upon our railway management of Canada, yet every one knew that the management complained of was really that of men sent out from England, and not the management of the men of this country. In conclusion, he remarked that an Act of this kind was incomplete which did not provide some kind of conciliatory tribunal, and which did not declare that the breaches of contract for which those punishments were to be inflicted should be such that he who ran could read; that, if a workman should be punished for a breach of contract, it should be so clear that he could understand his liability, and remonstrate against difficulties which might arise without exposing himself to dismissal because he diffided. He could not allow a measure so unjust as this to go unchallenged, and he would take the liberty of dividing the House on the question. He moved:

Mr. IRVING.

“That the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day three months.”

Mr. BLAIN said he hoped the House would pardon him for rising to say a few words on this subject. Before he left home a deputation of engineers, fearing that some such legislation as that proposed might be introduced, waited upon him and requested him to state their side of the case. He felt sorry that they had not a better representative, for he was not as well posted in regard to the matter as he would have liked, but with the indulgence of the House he might be able to show that those men had a case as well as the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He could not help thinking that, if this strike had not occurred, this Bill would not have been brought forward; he therefore felt that, while the conduct of the managers of the road was fairly before the House for discussion, the conduct of the men and the interests of the public were also before them for consideration. To his mind, the Bill was a direct attempt to break up the association known as the Locomotive Brotherhood. It was not the duty of the Government to interfere with the management of the people, and the moment we struck off the right of the people, no matter in what walk of life, to combine, it was a curtailment of the liberty they were entitled to under the Constitution. The organization which, he had no hesitation in saying, the Grand Trunk was trying to destroy was one which had elevated the engineers, and enabled them to spend hundreds and thousands of dollars in aid of the widows and orphans of those who belonged to it. The association was founded on this principle: That no man should be a member unless he was thoroughly qualified in his trade, and was of a sober, industrious, and moral character. Every man could not become a member, and there were large numbers of persons connected with the trade, both in Canada and the United States, who did not belong to the association. It had been stated that the strike took place at the dictation of a man living outside the Dominion. He desired to disabuse the minds of the House on that point. The locomotive engineers in this country must themselves decide as to whether they should strike or not, and it was only after they had determined what course to pursue that the services of the head of the association were called into requisition. So, instead of this strike taking place at the instance of a foreigner, said to be antagonistic to the interests of the railway, it was at the instance of the men themselves, who felt they were called upon to strike in their own defence, and that of the association. The constitution of the society would show a great deal more than he had stated, and would speak for the men with more eloquence than he could. In addition to the ordinary operations of the association, a life insurance branch had been established, whose disbursements, up to the present time, amounted to $1,000,000. Considering the character of the society, and in view of all the circumstances, he had no hesitation in saying that it was not the duty of the House to attempt to break it up. When all the facts surrounding the case came to be examined, it would be found that the entire difficulty originated with the Grand Trunk Railway Company; and he might just remark here that, while the Bill made the men criminals for breaches of agreements, nothing was said about any punishment to be inflicted on the authorities of the Grand Trunk, no matter what violations of contract they might commit. The railway had systematically violated the contract entered into with the engineers, and it was that which caused the strike in January last. Prior to 1875, the men found it necessary to see the managers with regard to some disagreements. A conference was held, and, in March 1875, the following contract was drawn up and signed:—

“At a conference held in the General Manager’s office, with a deputation representing the enginemen and firemen of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the following propositions, as a basis of payment of wages, were agreed upon:—

“First. That the rate of wages paid per trip and per day remain as at present, except in the cases referred to below.

“Second. That a list of names of first and second-class engineers and firemen be made up at once, and those found eligible for promotion on the 1st of April should be advanced at the proportion of one-fourth each, on the 1st of April, 1st of May, 1st of June and 1st of July, according to seniority. Also, that all first and second-class engineers and firemen not having completed their 12,000 miles on the 1st of April, to date the commencement of such mileage from the 1st of February; the 12,000 miles to be computed on the usual basis of trip mileage.

“Third. That one-quarter day be allowed to engineers and firemen coming on duty for a train which is cancelled after coming on duty.

“Fourth. That all way freight trains be paid at the rate of one trip and a quarter per trip, no allowance being made for detentions.

"Fifth. All special trains to be paid at the rate averaging between the time of the longest and shortest through freight trains, on a list to be made out from time to time.

"Sixth. All construction trains to be paid at the rate of $2.50 for third class engineers, $2.20 for second class, and $2.00 for first class, per day of twelve hours. An allowance at the agreed detention rate being made per hour for all over twelve hours. All wood trains to be paid at the usual daily rate of twelve hours, with the pro rata allowance for overtime.

"Seventh. That trip tickets be signed on coming on duty, and all detention time be paid less one hour as usual, but the rate per hour for detention time to be, for third class engineers, 10c.; for second class, 9c.; for first class, 8c.; second class firemen, 7c.; first class, 6c.; all claims for detention time at the end of a trip to be made on a separate form for that purpose, to the foreman, who will consider and allow them on satisfactory evidence of their correctness.

"Eighth. That in case of engineers running to the Don, or immigrant shed, with stock or freight, one quarter day extra be allowed.

"Ninth. That $2.00 be allowed per day for third class, $1.90 for second class, and $1.80 for first class engineers, for going to Stratford or Montreal, for engines which have been under repairs, and that no other shop time be allowed.

"Tenth. That the third class trip rates be altered, as follows: Montreal to Cornwall and back, passenger, $2.80; Stratford to Fort Erie, freight, $3.15; Toronto to Galt and back, mixed, including all extras, $4.00; Montreal to Richmond and back, freight, $3.80.

First and second class engineers and firemen, rates in proportion.

Signed on behalf of the whole staff of engineers and firemen employed on the Grand Trunk Road.

" P. M. ARTHUR,

" J. BIRSE,

" S. PHIPPS,

" R. LIDDELL,

" J. GERMAIN,

" J. FARNSWORTH.

" HERBERT WALLIS,

" Mechanical Superintendent."

Under the terms of this contract there were three grades of engineers and two of firemen, who were to be paid according to the terms agreed upon. As soon as the Grand Trunk, however, felt that they could strike a deadly blow at the association, they began systematically to violate the agreement. Within three months after the above contract was ratified, the railway authorities inaugurated another system, insisting that there should be four classes of engineers and three of firemen. Instead of giving to the public the advantages of the services of experienced men, who knew nearly every foot of the road from Montreal to Sarnia, they endeavoured to employ an inferior grade of engineers. Legislation which would enable any company to force upon the public an inferior class of engineers, especially when such large interests of lives and property were at stake, ought not to go upon the Statute-book. The men remonstrated against this violation of the contract, but, instead of giving them any satisfaction, instead of endeavouring to adjust the claims advanced, the managers of the company did everything in their power to carry out the system they had introduced in violation of the contract in order that they might dismiss first one man and then another, until they got rid of all their employes belonging to the Locomotive Brotherhood Association. When those difficulties had assumed a tangible shape, and when the men were making efforts to avoid a strike, the Grand Trunk authorities, instead of trying to arrange matters, insisted that they had a right to do what they pleased. Perhaps they had that right, but it could not be claimed that they had a right to violate a solemn contract. A difficulty was raised about the men seeing Mr. Hickson. Telegrams had to be sent to New York, deputations had to be sent from Toronto to Montreal, and every possible obstacle was thrown in the way of the men in their efforts to bring about harmony and reconciliation. But, even when the men found they were forced, in self-defence, to strike, instead of doing it at once, they informed Mr. Hickson that, unless their reasonable demands were agreed to, they would cease work at a particular hour. At a conference held in the Reading Rooms, Point St. Charles, Montreal, January 6th, 1877, between Herbert Wallis, Mechanical Superintendent, P. M. Arthur, G.C.E., and a delegation representing the engineers and firemen on the Grand Trunk Railway, it was resolved:

Mr. BLAIN.

"That the agreement of March 1875, be considered binding, with the following modifications:

"First. That all engineers and firemen respectively be divided into two grades, the rates of pay of each of the grades being the same as the present first and second grades in the service as already agreed upon in March, 1875.

"Second. That all shunting engineers be paid at the rate of one dollar and seven-y-five cents per day for the first year; after which, there being no serious report against them, they shall be advanced to two dollars per day if they remain on the shunting engines, and if they be put out on the main line, the rate of pay shall be first class.

"Third. That all engineers and firemen be advanced from second class rate to first class after they have worked in service one year.

"Fourth. That all men entitled to promotion from December 1st, 1876, date their promotion from the commencement of that month.

"Fifth. That all general cases of dispute, not decided by the Mechanical Superintendent, be arbitrated by a committee of engineers before the General Manager, whose decision shall be final.

"Sixth. That all men discharged by the Company be reinstated; also, that the conduct of all the men who left their work in accordance with general orders issued relative to the strike be overlooked, and all warrants issued against the latter men be withdrawn. This does not, however, refer to men having been guilty of personal violence.

"Seventh. That all road engineers doing shunting at terminal stations be paid at the rate of twenty cents per hour.

"HERBERT WALLIS,
"Mechanical Sup't.

"Approved :

"J. HICKSON,
"Gen'l Manager.

"Montreal, January 6, 1877."

It was not an exaggerated demand, but it was one which the company had now complied with. Instead of desiring to place the company to any inconvenience, the men stated to Mr. Hickson that they would strike at a certain hour, if their reasonable demands were not met. But the company made no arrangements, and Mr. Hickson sent out trains ten minutes from the hour when the men stated they must strike. The men were obliged to strike all together to a minute. As was shown by one of the men at a meeting in Toronto, if they had not done this, trains would have been wrecked, and, probably, hundreds of lives lost. The same difficulties which occurred at that strike would arise in any other case of a large strike, were it on the canals or in the Post Office Department. If the question of strikes was to be taken hold of, no one class of men should be singled out. The country should know whether men, who chose to band themselves together for their mutual elevation and support, were to be subjected to such class legislation. He would be prepared to show, before a Committee, that the Grand Trunk authorities were the parties responsible for this strike, and not the engineers. If the responsibility of the strike rested upon the Manager of the Grand Trunk, then, instead of criminal laws being passed in order to degrade the men, criminal laws should be passed making the manager responsible.

Mr. MACDONNELL said the provisions of the Bill met with his entire approbation. He was greatly surprised to see the course pursued by the two hon. gentlemen who had preceded him. They belonged to the legal profession and it might be expected that they would pursue a very different course. The Bill, as far as the House was concerned in its consideration, had nothing to do with the Grand Trunk Railway, although the strike might have been the occasion of the Bill. But hon. gentlemen must know that it was a very obscure individual in Great Britain who gave rise to the Habeas Corpus Bill. The principles of that Bill were discussed without any reference being made to this individual, and so the principles of the Bill just proposed should be discussed without any reference to the Grand Trunk strikers. The House should consider the Bill apart from any occurrence whatsoever that might have suggested it. The Bill was worthy to be considered by the House. It proposed to punish any person, who, having a position of trust in which he had control over life and property, wilfully and maliciously betrayed that trust, whereby great injury to property and to life, and, perhaps, loss of life, resulted, as a criminal. Would the two hon. gentlemen who had previously spoken say this was wrong? Did they desire that these men should escape any punishment? The law said that malice must be proved. In legal language, malice was a condition in which a wrongful act was committed intentionally, without any good cause or justification. The hon. member for Hamilton said this was a struggle between capital and labour. Labour was as much dependent upon capital as capital was upon labour, and this Legislature was bound to devise laws for the government and protection of both. The hon. gentleman said this law, if placed upon the Statute-book, would not touch the railroad engineers. Then, he virtually threw up his whole case. If the law would not apply to them, why complain about it? He would especially support the Bill for the reason that there was no law on the subject in Nova Scotia which met the case.

Mr. SCRIVER said he had listened with a great deal of surprise to the addresses of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) with reference to the conduct of the engineers of the Grand Trunk Railway. Their speeches certainly seemed like attempts at special pleading. He was not present as an apologist of the Grand Trunk Railway, nor of a body of men who had been spoken of as entitled to the respect and protection which they could fairly demand at the hands of this House. Had the hon. gentlemen forgotten the incidents of the strike? Judging by what the two hon. gentlemen had said, the engineers were injured innocents. They had suffered wrong at the hands of the Grand Trunk Company, but had themselves committed no wrong. It had evidently been forgotten that some of these men conducted themselves in a way which he did not fear to stigmatize as unfeeling and brutal. The hon. gentleman from West York cast the blame upon the Railway Company for not making provision for the strike. But the engineers gave Mr. Hickson no opportunity to do so. They gave him a very short notice that they were going to strike. He did all he could. He engaged men at the different stations to take the places of the engineers in case they should strike. But, in many instances, these men were brutally assaulted. The great fault he (Mr. Scriver) had with the men was that they were almost universally members of a great body, governed by an irresponsible head, a man who did not even live in the country. It was said that the strike was made by the engineers themselves. This might be the case, but it would not be denied that the hour of striking was fixed by this irresponsible head. A similar circumstance had occurred in the neighbouring country, where the engineers had struck on a line running from Boston to Portland, and this strike was arranged by the same man who had arranged the Grand Trunk strike. This strike in the United States was considered so important that it had attracted general attention, and the Railway Commissioners of Massachusetts had made a very thorough and decided report upon the question, recommending that legislative action be taken to prevent a recurrence of the evil. He heartily supported the Bill.

Mr. MacDONNELL.

Mr. BOWELL said he must express not only surprise, but amazement at the speeches of the hon. members for Hamilton and for West York. If they had been on the stump, or speaking in the manufacturing workshops of Hamilton in view of the "toting" up of the voters after an election, then their object might be understood.

Mr. BLAIN: I have not one engineer in my riding.

Mr. BOWELL said those hon. gentlemen had certainly dealt with the subject in a manner that ill became those sent to a legislative body like this House to pass laws in the interest of the community generally. He had no desire to be considered the advocate or defender of the Grand Trunk Railway management in anything connected with its dealings with its men, and more particularly with the subject under discussion. But, when acts of a lawless character had been perpetrated in open day—and in the middle of the night—by a band of men, he was surprised that these acts should find defenders in the legislative halls of the country, and that those who committed them should be eulogized above their fellows. It was asked what had the locomotive engineers done that they were to be specially legislated against? He had no hesitation in saying that they, and those who aided them, had done almost everything they could do in violation of the law.

Mr. IRVING: Those acts were done by the bullies of Belleville.

Mr. BOWELL said, if the logic of the hon. gentleman was no more sound than there was truth in this statement, not much reliance could be placed on it. It ill became that hon. gentleman to make charges against respectable people when he knew nothing whatever of the circumstances further than what he had read in the newspapers and from other statements written under circumstances which he (Mr. Bowell) did not now desire to characterize. The engineers not only struck work, for which he was not going to find fault, nor would he argue that question, but they prevented other men from working; and many men who attempted to run trains were fired on with pistols by members of the Brotherhood, or by those who sympathized with the organization. And all this was done at the instigation of a man named Arthurs, who, when out of the country, was irresponsible to the laws of this country.

An HON. MEMBER: A Yankee.

Mr. BOWELL said whatever might have been the fault of the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway, they certainly did make an attempt to carry on the business of the road. They not only sent men from all parts of the country to the different stations to replace the strikers, but they actually put one or two engine-drivers upon the train leaving Belleville to act in the place of those who might desert their employment at nine o'clock, no matter what point the train had reached. At nine o'clock, some of the engineers not only stopped their trains, but in some instances uncoupled them from the engines, and left the trains upon the track and the passengers to the mercy and inclemency of the weather in mid-winter. The night on which the strike took place was during the most inclement season of the year; and cars filled with passengers, women and children, old and young, of all classes, were left during one of the most severe nights in the winter, for many hours, nearly for days, before the train could be moved; and yet those acts were justified by hon. members of the House, and the men committing such acts were eulogized as saints and martyrs for their country. Not only so, but when a train was forced through by the aid of the military, and arrived at the station, the men were stoned, and attempts made to disable the engine and throw it off the track by means of sliding bars; and when they succeeded, with the aid of the volunteers stationed on each car, and by guarding it on all sides, the strikers again put something on the track and threw the engine off. The moment the men attempted to replace the engine on the track, they were fired at from behind the sheds. Yet hon. members justified the action of the men who committed those deeds. He had examined the Major-General's report, since it was referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), but he failed to find in the report any such language as had been attributed to that officer. He could not understand how it would be possible for the Major-General to state that the reports were exaggerated, not having any knowledge of the matter further than the reports sent to him by the militia officers.

Mr. IRVING said that on page 47 it was stated that the whole affair had been magnified.

Mr. BOWELL said he admitted that the County Attorney said in the report that the actual violence was much exaggerated. But, when he informed the House that that gentleman was not at the station during the time when the worst outrages were committed, he might be excused for saying that he did not know what he was writing about. He might say more about that gentleman, but he would not do so. The objection that he entertained to the Bill before the House was that it appeared not to meet the object those hon. members who had taken part in the discussion seemed to think it was intended to meet. He did not understand the logical position of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), who stated that the law, as it stood, was not only more strict but provided heavier penalties for the commission of acts of violence than did the present Bill, and yet, at the same time, he appealed to the House in a pathetic manner to give the Bill the three months' hoist and keep the law on the Statute-book, which he said would punish men more than the proposed measure. He objected to the Bill because it was not sufficiently stringent to suppress such acts of violence as those to which he had referred. What punishment could be too great for a man in charge of an engine and cars who, at the most inclement season, stopped the train in a snowstorm, and ran away with the engine, leaving men, women and children without fuel, and without the means of reaching the nearest station, 12 or 24 hours in the storm? The paltry punishment of $100 fine or three months' imprisonment would not have that effect, and a term of five years in the Penitentiary would not be too severe for the perpetrator of such an act. Those men who had abandoned their engines and left the passengers as he had described, afterwards with pistols and bludgeons not only destroyed the property, but actually fired at the men who attempted to place the engines on the track after they had been thrown off, and any men who attempted to take an engine out of the yard. He would have expected that, when such a Bill as the present one was submitted to the House, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) would, in the interests of those whom he seemed to represent, have received it with pleasure; but the hon. member had denounced the Bill as class legislation, on account of the penalties it imposed, and yet he had read the present law to show how much more strict the punishments were under it. If he (Mr. Bowell) voted for the three months' hoist it would be for the opposite reason to that given by the hon. member for Hamilton, and he trusted that, if the hon. the Minister of Justice desired to meet those cases and to deal out due punishment to men who committed those acts of violence, he would so amend the law as to make its violation not probable in the future. It had been said that the people in the municipality of Belleville, and the magistrates there did not do their duty on the occasion referred to. It had also been asserted by many people that the volunteers did not do their duty. It was, however, very difficult for the volunteer force in Belleville to do its duty upon that occasion, particularly as it appeared by the Brigade-Major's report and the report of the Commanding Officer that not only had the force no winter clothing, but no ammunition, although the Commanding Officer had applied to the Department over and over again and his applications had been neglected or refused. The only ammunition which the force had had for a long time was some for practice at their butts, which was purchased with their own money. It was true, and he said it with pleasure, that the Queen's Own of Toronto behaved admirably under the peculiar circumstances; they arrived between twelve and one o'clock in the morning, when it was dark, and they could scarcely see any one. They were stoned, all kinds of missiles being thrown at them, and were actually fired at from behind the sheds. Yet they behaved like old soldiers and veterans, and no words of praise and commendation could be too strong in regard to their behaviour. They were not better armed than the Belleville local force, but they were better clothed and they had ammunition with which to act,—which they did with decision. As soon as they mounted the engines and ran them down to the other station, the engines were permitted to go. But, as soon as the volunteers retired, other men along the line prevented the engines from proceeding. The strike extended from Island Pond to Sarnia, along the whole line, and yet the magistrates and the local authorities of Belleville had been denounced, not only by the press but by the public, because they were not able to combat those difficulties. The moment a train passed outside the limits of Belleville it entered another municipality, and if the Government—although they said they had no law to justify them in sending out the militia force and taking possession of the whole line—had acted with the same decision as did the authorities in Michigan under similar circumstances, and placed a guard of men on every train and forced its way through, there would have been much less difficulty experienced. He would, no doubt, be met with the objection that the law did not give the Government such power, but, in view of the peculiar difficulties which beset them, trains being scattered along the whole line, he was of opinion that the country would have justified them in any such action taken under the circumstances. The law should give power, if it did not at present do so, to the several Governments to take such steps under such circumstances as would effectually prevent such an outbreak. He knew that, under the present law, municipal authorities had the power to call out the military to suppress a riot; but, as the strike affected every municipality along the whole line in Ontario and Quebec, each municipality would have been compelled to call to their aid some military or other force to prevent the strike and the violence continuing. The Government sheltered itself under the Militia Law, and stated they had no power to take action; and it was amusing to read how the hon. the Minister of Public Works had instructed the Attorney-General of Ontario as to what he should do, and referred him to the law on the subject. The hon. Minister appeared to be not only active and energetic in his own Department, but even able to instruct the Attorney-General of Ontario as to the manner in which he should discharge his duties. He (Mr. Bowell) held the view—and everyone who had anything to do with the difficulties would come to the same conclusion—that the law should be so amended as to enable the Government, when such a strike took place, to call out not only the local forces, but the whole military force, in order to force Her Majesty's mails through the country. It occurred to him that some such provision was contained in the Post Office Act; if there was no such provision, the sooner it was inserted the better. Unless the hon. the Minister of Justice was prepared to so amend the Bill as to take that power, and to make provision for the condign punishment of men who acted as the Grand Trunk strikers and their aiders and abettors had done during the past winter, followed up as they had been, by similar acts in different parts of the continent, the Bill would be waste paper. The Bill appeared to be an attempt to place the engineers in a better position than before, and, if the member for Hamilton was correct, a disposition was manifested not to punish them as severely as under the old law. It was true that some of the strikers were arrested and not punished. One was arrested in Belleville and sent to gaol, but he was not punished, because the men had such control over the managers of the Grand Trunk they dared not punish them. The company, having no power placed at their disposal, either by the Government or by the local authorities, to enable them to quell the riot, they had either to allow the road to be closed for weeks, perhaps months, or to come to terms; and the company had consequently to succumb to the strikers, who were led on by foreigners.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BLAIN said the demands were perfectly just.

Mr. BOWELL said he had always supposed that an employer had the right to engage men and retain them in his service so long as they were willing to remain and he was willing to pay them the money they asked. So soon as the employés became dissatisfied with their portions and could not accept the wages paid, they were at liberty to leave and seek employment elsewhere; but he (Mr. Bowell) had yet to learn that in this or any other civilized country men had the right to band together and demand from their employer such wages as they chose to ask, and, when their demands were refused, to stand at his door with pistols and prevent his work proceeding, their places being filled by other workmen. That might be the doctrine of the hon. member for West York, but it was one which would not be supported either by the House or the country. He hoped that in dealing with the question the Government would place a law upon the Statute-book that would prevent in the future any such occurrence as that which had recently taken place, which tended to the injury of the country, and that, in their own interests, the Administration would take power in that or some other Act to suppress a revolt—for it was nothing less—similar to that which had occurred during the past winter.

Mr. BABY said he rose to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the point as to whether the Bill did not come into conflict with Provincial rights. There was at present a law in Quebec under which the Masters and Servants Act would be very effective. That law was found in the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, the second and third provisions of which the hon. Minister of Justice repealed by the present measure. Those sections were amended by the Local Legislature of Quebec in 1870, and extended, and it was declared in that Statute that those, as well as other sections, should form part and parcel of the law. Many members of the Bar of Lower Canada thought the Bill would cause a conflict with local jurisdiction. The hon. the Minister of Justice had admitted that Provincial Legislatures had the right to execute laws in that respect, and, if such were the case, they could also enact penalties for infringements of the law. He hoped if the Bill passed the hon. the Minister of Justice would provide against any conflict of jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBINSON said his sympathies, not only from what he had heard from the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), but from what he had previously known, were with the locomotive engineers and not with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and, therefore, he would be very glad to vote for the amendment. Few hon. members had had a more extensive acquaintance with that body of men than it had been his good fortune to possess. As President of the Northern Railway for thirteen or fourteen years, he was naturally thrown into contact with these men. The society of engineers, which had hundreds if not thousands of members scattered over the continent, from Oregon to California and from California to Quebec, was a very numerous body, and held an annual meeting or convention in the United States or Canada. He had the good fortune to preside over an annual gathering of that respectable body of men while he held the office of President of the Northern Railway, and he never met a more manly, intelligent and respectable body of men than the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Mr. BOWELL.

He believed that these engineers had as many lives perhaps under their charge, if not as valuable cargoes, as captains of steamships. The only difference between the two classes was that the captain of a steamer who brought his vessel safely through a tempest was praised, while the captain of the locomotive performed his perilous duties comparatively unnoticed. They certainly deserved the consideration, if not the sympathy, of the House. He believed that the whole difficulty which led to the strike was due to the treatment the engineers had received in 1875. This naturally irritated them, and he was convinced, after having perused the correspondence, that the one side was as much to blame as the other. The men had acted in a manly, straightforward common-sense manner, and the answers they had received had been curt and unceremonious. They were simply informed on one occasion that Mr. Hickson was in New York—no more. If the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway had shown a little more judgment, this serious trouble would have been avoided. To show that he was not alone in this regard, he would mention the fact that their case had been ably presented to the City Council of Toronto, composed of 27 or 30 members, who had concluded that the engineers had as much justice as had the company on their side. These men had made up their minds that they were being driven to the wall, and treated unjustly, and that they were fighting for their livelihood, without a chance of common justice or fair representation being afforded them. The Brotherhood was numerous and respectable. He thought they had acted as spirited men would under such circumstances. They had the sympathy of the Council and of the great majority of the people of Toronto, and he thought they should also have the sympathy of the country and of the House.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that lumbermen engaged their employes at some distance from where they were to work, and frequently found it necessary to advance them money. The latter often deserted their employment, and it seemed to him that, unless there was some way other than that of punishing such persons by a fine, as proposed in the Act, employers were exposed to serious loss. Imprisonment should be ordered if the fine were not paid.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he was rather surprised at the amendment moved by the hon. members for Hamilton and West York. He agreed that railway employes and engineers were, on the whole, a very intelligent body of men, who merited commendation for their industry. At the same time he was not prepared to say that if they engaged in lawless acts, their former respectability was any justification in this connection. The discussion had taken a wider range than the measure warranted. It did not propose legislation with regard to law-abiding but law-breaking citizens. Did the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) mean to say that men guilty of acts mentioned in the Bill, would be justified in committing them? The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had stated that on the occasion of the strike passengers were detained and their lives exposed to danger; and this he was sure would not meet with the approbation of hon. gentlemen opposite. If men were allowed to take the law in their own hands and settle their grievances as pleased them, on the same argument all the laws in the country might be abolished; and any license would be justifiable. When the men in question had read and pondered over the measure, they would be prepared to assent to its propriety. He held that the measure was not at all out of place. If men broke the law they should be punished, and if they suffered under grievances, they should appeal to the law. Innocent persons should not be compelled to suffer, as had been the case a few weeks ago. This law was necessary.

Mr. KERR said some such measure should be at once placed on the Statute-book. He sympathized neither with the Locomotive Brotherhood nor with the Grand Trunk Railway authorities. He considered that if any class of men had grievances there were legal means for obtaining redress. It would never do for the House, which was the fountain head for the laws of the country, to countenance anything like a repetition of such conduct. He had not only been indignant, but humiliated to think that this was possible in Canada. Our laws were sacred, and they could not be broken with impunity. Within a few miles of Cobourg, near his own residence, a large train, filled with men, women and children, had been stopped at the dead of night, when the strike began, within a wood, at some distance from any dwelling house, and there they were left until morning, when they were driven to town. He was told that there were children and delicate females on the train whose lives were almost sacrificed that night, and he felt that, if there was not a law on the Statute-book to prevent or punish severely conduct of that kind, it was the duty of the Government at the earliest moment to frame such a measure, and he believed that such a measure was now proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice. When the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), was speaking eloquently, as he always did, he (Mr. Kerr) had hoped that he was the only hon. gentleman in the House who entertained such views as he had enunciated. When that hon. gentleman was followed by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain), he (Mr. Kerr), thought he was the last person who entertained such views; but he was amazed when that hon. member, to a certain extent, not only excused, but justified the conduct of those men. He did not care how respectable the strikers were. Respectability should never be pleaded when it set itself in defiance of law. He was rather in accord with the views of the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), when he denounced such conduct; and he was sorry that the highly respectable members for Hamilton and West York had seen fit to differ with the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Justice. He was sorry that the remarks of those hon. gentlemen would go abroad throughout the length and breadth of the country, because he feared they would have anything but a salutary effect. He was sure hon. members would agree with him that any attempt to break the law and order of the country should be discountenanced. As a result of this evil example, the operations of the Midland Railway were stopped for a few days. A little strike was organized, and the consequence was that business and travel were greatly inconvenienced. Without setting his face against the Locomotive Brotherhood or in favour of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, he sincerely hoped that the House would declare that law and order must be maintained at all hazards. He hoped the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton would get an infinitesimal vote and that the Bill before the House would be overwhelmingly sustained. It was just as much in the interest of the Locomotive Brotherhood that law and order should be preserved as it was for anyone else in the Dominion.

Mr. IRVING: The Midland people struck because you would not pay pay their wages.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he thought the hon. the Minister of Justice deserved the thanks of all law-abiding people as well as of this House. He was surprised that hon. members, especially those for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), West Toronto (Mr. Robinson), and West York (Mr. Blain), should encourage such outrageous conduct on the part of the engineers as took place in January last. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would make the law strong enough to punish those men. He agreed thoroughly with what the hon. member for North Hastings said. It would be a good thing if the law was strong enough to send the strikers to the Penitentiary for five or ten years, and he suggested that those hon. members who encouraged them should go to the Penitentiary along with them.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not think that the time spent in the discussion of this Bill had been lost. He was satisfied that hon. members would agree with him in the opinion that no question of a more delicate nature than this could come under the consideration of Parliament. Any question that touched the delicate relations of the employer and the employé, of capital and labour, was of very great importance and required the utmost calmness in its consideration. The Bill before the House had been assailed on two grounds. It had been assailed by the hon. member for Hamilton in a very able speech, in which he attacked it as class legislation. He believed there was no hon. member in the House who would not agree with that hon. gentleman that class legislation was to be deplored, unless it was found to be absolutely necessary — that nothing but the most stringent necessity could warrant legislation which was intended, not for the general public, but was aimed at a particular class. Great as was the difficulty caused by the strike on the Grand Trunk, and unpleasant as were its consequences, he did not think that a sufficiently strong case had been made out to warrant class legislation. Then the Bill was very successfully attacked by the hon. member for Hastings on the stronger ground that, if such legislation were required, the measure was altogether insufficient for its intended purpose. It was one that would be viewed with great hostility by the class against whom it was levelled, and would have an exasperating influence upon them. But the Bill was also objectionable inasmuch as it would fail in the object it sought to attain. He thought it would prove just as obnoxious to the employer as the employed, and that it would be regarded as entirely inadequate by the persons whose interests it was designed to promote. What was the cause which induced the measure? A great artery of communication was interrupted, but, if the laws on the Statute-book had been vigorously enforced and the Government had been equal to the emergency, no necessity would have arisen for the legislation proposed. He had read the Bill with some care, and he failed to find anything except a number of provisions which appeared to him to be adequately provided by existing law. We had been voting $1,000,000 annually for the last ten years to clothe the Government with power to deal with such emergencies, and it was a scandal and not at all creditable to the Government or the country itself that, after such an enormous expenditure of public money, the whole Government of the country should be paralysed by a mere handful of people who chose to take charge of the Grand Trunk Railway, to stop Her Majesty's mails, and to bring the whole business of the Dominion to a standstill. What did the Bill provide in order to meet such emergencies? The only important provision it contained was the following:

Mr. KERR.

"Whosoever being under a contract of service or otherwise—

"(a.) With a railway company, bound, agreeing or assuming to carry Her Majesty's mails, or passengers or freight; or

"(b.) With Her Majesty, or any one on behalf of Her Majesty, or of the Government, in connection with a Government railway on which Her Majesty's mails, or passengers or freight are carried,

"Wilfully or maliciously breaks any such contract, knowing or having reason to believe, that the probable consequences of his so doing, either alone or in combination with others, will be to delay or prevent the running of any locomotive engine, or freight or passenger train or car on the railway;—

"Shall, on conviction thereof, be liable to be punished by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour."

Did that clothe the Government with any power they did not already possess? He asked the hon. the Minister of Justice and independent members of the House to follow him while he read the law now on the Statute-book. The seventeenth clause of the Act for the regulation of the Postal Service was as follows:—

"To obstruct or wilfully delay the passing or progress of any mail, or of any carriage or vessel, horse, animal or carriage employed in conveying any mail, on any public highway, river, canal or water communication, shall be a misdemeanour."

Was there anything stronger in the proposed measure than that, which characterized the very thing that took place as a misdemeanour? But how was that misdemeanour to be punished? On page 57 of the Statutes of 1875 they found the following provision:—

"And every such offence declared to be a misdemeanour by this Act shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court before whom the offender is convicted."

And the 30th section of the same Act provided:

"Any imprisonment awarded under this Act shall be in the Penitentiary of that part of the Dominion in which the conviction shall take place, if for a term of or exceeding two years; and if the imprisonment awarded shall be for a less term, it may be with or without hard labour in the discretion of the Court awarding it."

So that the existing law was more stringent and effective than that proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice. The punishment in the measure before the House was a fine of $100. Now, it was stated that the Locomotive Brotherhood had the means of ensuring to all parties engaged in the strike, the payment of a large salary down to the 1st of April; and he would like to know how much it would inconvenience the Association to pay fines of $100 for fifty or one hundred of its members. The Government had every means at their disposal to prevent the stoppage of public business and to punish the offenders, but, after spending $10,000,000 on the Militia, the country had the satisfaction of knowing that, when a detachment was required, the men either had no clothing or no ammunition. The existing law was sufficient for the emergency, and it was the fault of the Administration that it was not carried out; and the House was now called upon to cover up that failure by the enactment of a new law, which was to lead the people to suppose that existing legislation was not sufficient to meet the case. He did not wish to express a single word of sympathy for the parties engaged in this interruption of business; he did not go into the question of what grounds of complaint there were on one side and mismanagement on the other, but urged that the law on the Statute-book was sufficient for every emergency of the kind. As to the cruelty involved by the stoppage of trains between stations and at inconvenient localities, he wished to say a few words. He understood that the parties who intended to strike gave notice of their intention, and that notice was so precise as to state the very time at which the strike would take place. If he was correct in that, he thought it relieved the parties charged with cruelty of a great deal of the onus of that charge. A strike on a great line of railway was different to a strike of any other kind, and in order to avoid the destruction of property and imperilling of life, it became necessary that the strike should take place simultaneously all over the line. If one train stopped and another ran, he could not see how collisions and destruction of property and endangering of life could be avoided; at any rate no such consequences could result if operations on the road ceased to move simultaneously. He did not offer this as any justification for the parties engaged in the strike, but he thought that to a certain extent what had been regarded as an act of great cruelty was a necessary and essential part of the course these parties had decided to carry out. After what had been stated it would be much better were further time taken to mature the measure. If it were necessary to deal with the subject at all, he believed it should be dealt with in a much more extended and comprehensive form than the proposed Bill provided, which would entirely fail in its object. Under those circumstances, whether the Bill was regarded as class legislation or as legislation unequal to the emergency, if such an emergency was forced upon the House, it would be well to take more time for its consideration. That should especially be done as the difficulty which the Bill was intended more particularly to meet had been tided over, and the Government had received a hint as to the necessity of having more efficient measures provided for the enforcement and administration of the present laws. The laws already on the Statute-book would be weakened by the Bill, while the House would be committed to class legislation. It would entirely fail to satisfy either employer or employées.

Mr. BLAKE said he would add a few words to what he had already said, before the debate closed. He would inform his hon. friend and the House that he would take a more convenient season, if the Bill received its second reading, to explain the details. He believed the difficulties mentioned by the hon. members for Sherbrooke (Mr. Brooks), Joliette (Mr. Baby), North Renfrew (Mr. White), and Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay), had been already met. They were questions of detail which could not be explained now, but which, if not satisfactory, could be amended so as to meet the House in the particulars to which they referred. He would turn to the main attack made upon the Bill by the hon. member for Cumberland. He would commence by saying that the measure was not designed to meet all the difficulties in which the country found itself plunged by the Grand Trunk strike. The House might at once dispose of the consideration of the various questions to which the hon. member for North Hastings and other hon. gentlemen had alluded, as relating to occurrences in the strike, because the measure, whatever its merits or demerits, did not profess to deal, and in his opinion ought not properly to deal, with matters which were entirely foreign from those with which its provisions dealt. The Bill did not profess to deal even with a strike, or to interfere with the freedom of the employé to leave the service of his employer at any time when his contract had expired. It professed in general terms to say that, save under special circumstances, breach of service was not a crime. It professed to define certain breaches of contract, or in the event of certain breaches of service, when they involved consequences of such moment and were connected with such results as might, in the opinion of the Government, fairly be called crimes, to define and punish them as such. To deal with such a measure was an entirely different question from such as to how to avoid a breach of contract, or how to treat a riot, how persons obstructing railway engines were to be treated, how persons who made murderous assaults, as alleged, were to be treated, or how the militia of this country was to be called out in aid of the civil powers. Did the measure attempt to deal with all these questions it would be preposterous; it would be an absurd mixture of entirely disconnected matters. As had already been intimated to the House, the events which occurred subsequent to the strike were intended to be met, as would also appear by the notice upon the paper. The proposed legislation in the latter direction might not satisfy hon.

Mr. TUPPER.

gentlemen opposite. It was difficult to satisfy them. With one breath they would say the pressure was too small and with another breath it was too great. He did not expect to satisfy them. What the House was dealing with at present was the simple and single question of whether it was fit to declare that breaches of contracts in general, whether of service or otherwise, should be regarded as crimes, and whether certain breaches of contracts should be declared as crimes, and certain punishment should be provided for them. The hon. member for Cumberland had referred to a clause in the Post-Office Act. He would yield with unfeigned deference to that hon. gentleman's legal powers of constructing an Act of Parliament; but he must confess that the hon. gentleman's construction of that clause had surprised him. He (Mr. Blake) had read it with great attention, and he did not believe it applied to this case at all, to the removal of an engine in any shape or way. So convinced was he of this, that a notice had been put upon the paper to so amend the Post-Office Act as would make that special clause applicable to that very class of cases. If there were, as he was aware there were, cases in which offences might come within the letter of his proposed Bill, but were punishable by another and more severe law, then, in such case, other laws would be expressly preserved. The Bill was expressly designed to preserve all punishments over all crimes which might otherwise, or by some construction, be comprehended within the offences punishable by the Bill; provided always, however, that no person should be punished twice for the same offence. He did not propose to discuss the respective attitudes of the Grand Trunk Railway or the locomotive engineers. He agreed with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) as to the character of the rules of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. He felt it was his duty to see the rules, and so far as he had seen them, they appeared to be most wholesome and excellent rules. But with the use or abuse of the rules, or the utility of the organization—and he had no doubt it had been useful—or with its abuse, the House had nothing to do. The question to be dealt with was whether the House was determined that breaches of contract, whether of service or otherwise, on a railway carrying mails, passengers and freight, where such breaches of contract were wilful and malicious, and when made with the knowledge or belief that the consequences would probably be of such a character as to stop or impede traffic—whether such breaches of contract were to be looked upon as crimes, punishable by a moderate punishment. The hon. gentlemen who objected to that proposition had, by their silence, admitted that the other classes of breaches of contract dealt with in the Bill, should be regarded as crime; as for instance, such a breach of contract as would deprive the city of Ottawa of water or gas for a day or night. Nobody had said a word about that. But he did not know whether such a thing as he had supposed with reference to the railway would not cause far greater inconvenience and difficulty to the public, and greater expense and damage to a company, than would arise in a case such as the latter. There was no attempt to interfere with the right of the employés to combine. His view was that employers and employés should stand equal before the law in that respect. It was one thing for the law not to interfere with any breach of contract when the loss was only a pecuniary one to the employer and employé, but it was another thing with the breach of contract involving serious inconvenience to the public, a probable danger to life, and great damage to valuable property. He saw no reason why such cases as those should be excepted, any more than those to which hon. gentlemen had not objected. He would declare that, in his opinion, it would not be right to permit another Session of Parliament to pass without some legislation directed to the prevention of such breaches of contract as those which had occurred on the Grand Trunk Railway. It was now said there was no breach of contract, that the men were not under contract. If it were so, then the law would not touch them. It was cases of breach of contract, and those alone, that the law was intended to meet. He ventured to affirm that the intelligent employes of this country would not disapprove of the law.

Question put, and amendment lost, on the following Division:—

YEAS :

Messieurs

Baby	Little
Benoit	Macdonald (Kingston)
Blain	McDonald (Cape Breton)
Blanchet	Macmillan
Cameron	McCallum
Campbell	McCarthy
Caron	McQuade
Cimon	Masson
Cuthbert	Monteith
Daoust	Montplaisir
Desjardins	Mousseau
Domville	Pinsonneault
Ferguson	Plumb
Fraser	Pope (Compton)
Gaudet	Robinson
Gibbs (North Ontario)	Robitaille
Gibbs (South Ontario)	Rochester
Gill	Rouleau
Haggart	Stephenson
Hurteau	Thompson (Cariboo)
Irving	Tupper
Jones (S. Leeds)	White (E. Hastings)
Lanthier	Wood.—46.

NAYS :

Messieurs

Appleby	Hall
Archibald	Higinbotham
Aylmer	Holton
Bain	Huntington
Bannatyne	Jones (Halifax)
Barthe	Kerr
Béchar	Kirk
Bernier	Kirkpatrick
Bertram	Lafamme
Biggar	Lajoie
Blackburn	Landerkin
Blake	Laurier
Bolduc	Macdonald (Cornwall)
Borron	Macdonald (Centre Toronto)
Bourassa	MacDonnell
Bowell	Macdougall (E. Elgin)
Bowman	McDougall (S. Renfrew)
Boyer	McDougall (Three Riv.)
Brooks	MacKay (Cape Breton)
Brouse	McKay (Colchester)
Buell	McCraney
Burk	McIntyre
Burpee (St. John)	McIsaac
Burpee (Sunbury)	McLeod
Carmichael	McNab
Cartwright	Metcalfe
Casey	Mills
Casgrain	Mitchell
Cauchon	Moffat
Charlton	Norris
Cheval	Oliver
Christie	Paterson
Church	Perry
Cockburn	Pickard
Coffin	Platt
Colby	Pouliot
Cook	Richard
Costigan	Ross (W. Middlesex)
Coupal	Ross (Prince Edward)
Cunningham

Mr. BLAKE.

Currier	Ryan
Davies	Scatcherd
Dawson	Schultz
Delorme	Scrifer
De St. Georges	Shibley
DeVeber	Short
Dewdney	Sinclair
Donahue	Smith (Peel)
Dymond	Smith (Selkirk)
Farrow	Smith (Westmoreland)
Ferris	Snider
Fiset	St. Jean
Fleming	Taschereau
Flesher	Thibaudeau
Flynn	Thompson (Haldimand)
Forbes	Trow
Galbraith	Vail
Gibson	Wallace (Albert)
Gillies	Wallace (S. Norfolk)
Gillmor	White (N. Renfrew)
Goudge	Workman
Guthrie	Wright (Ottawa Co.)
Hagar	Yeo.—125.

Bill read the second time.

House adjourned at Ten minutes after
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 21st March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BOUNDARIES OF MANITOBA
BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. MILLS introduced a Bill (No. 87) Respecting the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba. He said the Bill made slight alterations of the boundary of the Province, but it would not either enlarge or diminish its area. The change was for the purpose of giving facilities for registering patents within the Province. The British North America Act authorized Parliament to make such alterations, with the consent of the Local Legislature. That consent had been obtained. A Bill had been passed by the Legislature which had received the assent of the Lieutenant-Governor, and, although he (Mr. Mills) had given notice of this measure some time ago, he had deferred taking further action until the local Bill became law.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked what would be the increase of the area of the Province as proposed by the Bill.

Mr. MILLS said there would be no increase. The Bill moved the eastern boundary a little further west and the western boundary was moved to correspond. There was practically no change in the area of the Province. They had adopted a boundary which neither divided the townships nor the sections. It was to avoid such divisions that the change was made.

Mr. SCHULTZ: Then it makes no division except as concerns the matter of registration in the Province?

Mr. MILLS: No.

Bill read the first time.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION COMMITTEE.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Mr. CASEY, in the absence of Mr. DEVLIN, moved:

“That the following nine members, viz: Messrs. Devlin, Kerr, Kirkpatrick, Caron, Frechette, Gilmore, Costigan, Borden and the mover (of whom four shall form a quorum), be appointed to compose the Select Committee to enquire into and report on the practical working of the plan under which the people are now represented in Parliament; and of the systems which have, of late years, been adopted in other countries; with a view to remedy some of the alleged defects of the existing plan; as ordered by the House on Monday last, the 19th instant.”

Motion agreed to.

FLOATING CORD-WOOD ON THE RIVER ST. FRANCIS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. GILL introduced a Bill (No. 88) To regulate the floating of cord-wood on the River St. Francis. He said the Parliament of Quebec had passed an Act regulating this matter, but, as the stream was navigable in some parts, it had been thought advisable to apply to this House for legislation.

Mr. BLAKE said there was, of course, no objection to the Bill going to the first reading; but he might mention that a very large number of Bills had been passed by Local Legislatures to regulate, not merely the floating of cord-wood, but of timber down various navigable rivers. An important question was involved in such legislation, and some question existed as to the precise powers of the Local Parliaments in reference thereto. It was necessary that the matter should be well considered before the House passed any measure of this kind.

Mr. PALMER said the question involved in such legislation required very grave consideration. He had a motion on the paper in regard to such rights on a New Brunswick river, which he would discuss when the order was called.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the subject was one deserving of careful consideration. At this late period of the Session, however, the question could not very well be discussed at length. Next Session a Special Committee might be appointed to go into the whole question.

Bill read the first time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time.

Bill (No. 89) To provide greater convenience and safety for passengers on railways in Canada.—(Mr. Trow.)

WALTER SCOTT DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING ORDERED.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that Bill (No. 84) For the relief of Walter Scott be read a second time to-morrow. He said the report of the Select Committee had been presented to the House, and he supposed that it was necessary to make his motion in order that the Bill might go to its second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER said that he found on looking into this matter that, in the Peterson case, the procedure was really under the system previously adopted, of having the Bills referred to the Standing Committees after the first reading. Todd's "Private Bill Practice," which was written about that time, stated that Private Bills reported by Standing Committees were placed on the order paper on the day following the receipt of the report. He thought that, if this precedent was to be followed at all, it should be followed all through, and the Bills allowed to go for a second reading as a matter of course.

Mr. HOLTON said that practice had been changed since the volume mentioned was written.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was aware of that. He thought that if they were to follow the practice in the Peterson case, it would be better to follow the practice throughout. It was as well to have a distinct understanding on this point.

Mr. HOLTON said his impression was that Divorce Bills were purely and simply Private Bills, and must follow the rules respecting such measures. The rule formerly was to refer Private Bills to appropriate Committees after the first and before the second reading, but the House changed back to the old system of referring after the second reading. He thought Divorce Bills should be subject to the same rule.

Mr. BLAKE: Do I understand you to say, Mr. Speaker, that, following the practice in the Peterson case, the Bill goes on the orders for second reading without motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes; that was the practice.

Mr. BLAKE said that the House could not act very well on a rule which was no longer in existence. Of course, the House might follow a precedent as far as it was competent to do so, if it were a convenient one; and they were not disposed, at any rate, not without enquiry and consideration, to say that it was inconvenient to follow this precedent. When they came to consider how the Bill was to take the next stage after the report of the Committee, he was afraid that, if the precedent turned out not to be supported by authority at all, they would not be called upon to follow it. If there were, as he did not conceive there was, any grounds whatever upon which a Bill could be placed on the order paper after reference without motion, he thought it was merely founded on the practice in one or two isolated cases. He thought the motion of the hon. member for Cardwell was a correct one. Of course, they had to deal with the difficulty in which they found themselves, but they ought not to repeat what he could not but regard as the mistake made in the Peterson case, allowing the Bill to go on the order paper for a second reading, without a motion and without a general rule authorizing that procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed with the Minister of Justice. The hon. member in charge of the Peterson Bill had naturally moved for the successive stages, and the House had allowed it to pass, not being particularly interested in it. Thus, this case became a solitary instance of such action, as he understood it. He thought they had better keep to their rule, for fear of doing real injury to the party concerned in the Bill, and still there was a great deal of truth in the observation made by the Minister of Justice the other day, — that this was a judicial proceeding, and that it looked rather like an anomaly for them at the second reading to affirm the principle of a Bill before receiving the report of a judicial Committee on the facts on which it was based. Nevertheless, on the other hand, they had their own rules with regard to Private Bills, and the only consequence of passing the second reading then was, that every hon. member understood he was quite free to vote as he pleased regarding this class of Bills.

Mr. HOLTON said that the motion was only that the Bill be placed on the orders for second reading to-morrow.

Motion agreed to on a Division.

MARY JANE BATES DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING ORDERED.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved that the Bill (No. 83) For the relief of Mary Jane Bates be read the second time to-morrow.

Mr. BLANCHET said, in his opinion, it would be more correct to move that the Bill be put on the order paper for the second reading to-morrow. The present motion implied an Order of the House.

Mr. BLAKE: So it is always.

Mr. BLANCHET said he did not like to be pledged to the second reading. He thought the motion should be altered as he had suggested.

Mr. HOLTON: It is the same thing.

Mr. SPEAKER: The same rule applies to all other orders.

Motion agreed to on a Division.

QUESTIONS PUT BY MEMBERS.

Mr. SPEAKER asked for an expression of opinion with regard to questions put by members, which were directed to stand—in this case owing to the absence of the Minister of Public Works.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought they should stand over, when they were not put in order to meet the convenience of the Ministry.

Mr. BLAKE said his own opinion was that they should be put over to another day, when the Government requested them to stand.

AUDIT OF ADVERTISING ACCOUNTS.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

Mr. PALMER, in the absence of Mr. DOMVILLE, moved for a copy of Order in Council of 17th December, 1875, relating to the superintendence and auditing of advertising accounts; also a statement showing how much advertising was not brought under superintendence and audit contemplated by Order in Council, by whom such advertising was ordered, and by whom done from 1st January to 31st December, 1876. He said he believed the motion was made owing to the statement in the report of the Secretary of State that a portion of the public printing had not been audited. It appeared to him that this required some explanation. He could not understand why such a course should be adopted.

Mr. BLANCHET said, if permitted, he would move in addition for a return with regard to the total amount of printing done; the names of persons to whom it was given; the conditions under which it was entered into, and the amount and value of work done.

Mr. SPEAKER: That relates to the printing of all the Departments.

Mr. BLANCHET said it might be included in the same motion.

Mr. BLAKE said it would be recollected that when his hon. friend from Temiscouata made a similar motion it was objected to, and the inconvenience of such a course pointed out.

Motion agreed to.

SALE OF POSTAGE STAMPS IN ST. JOHN POST OFFICE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. PALMER moved for all communications received by the Postmaster-General or any other Department of the Government from the St. John Board of Trade on the subject of the sale of postage stamps in the Post Office at St. John. He said his constituents had considerable interest in this matter. The present Government, after opening the post-office in St. John had done away with the sale of postage stamps in it, and this occasioned very great inconvenience to the public—particularly as many residents of St. John were engaged in a seafaring life, and their wives and daughters were engaged in frequent correspondence with absent members of families. He had been told that postage stamps were sold in the Halifax Post Office. One person in St. John had offered, if a place were given him in the building, to pay for it and sell these stamps on the ordinary conditions. He understood that the St. John Board of Trade had made a representation to the Government on the subject, and he wished to know what action had been taken by the Ministry or the Postmaster-General in the premises. The space required in the post-office would only need to be something like 6 feet by 4 feet; no loss would be sustained by the Government, and the public would be greatly inconvenienced if this was granted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the late Postmaster-General had revised the order of his predecessor in this respect. It seemed very absurd that the only place where postage stamps could not be obtained was the post-office. This was the cause of great inconvenience to travellers and to those who went to the post-office to learn what postage they had to pay. He never could understand why it should not be the primary duty of the post-office to furnish postage stamps. He had always thought the order ill-advised, and he hoped the Postmaster-General would look into the matter.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said no course could be pursued by the Department with regard to any matter, which might not be the subject of criticism. The greatest advantage, perhaps, of the system now in force was its uniformity. He thought sufficient reason existed for the change that had been made in this regard. Objections had been made to the sale of postage stamps in post-offices; it took up a great deal of room, and it was very inconvenient. Strangers naturally stopped at hotels, and they did not generally post their letters. Occasional inconvenience might now be occasioned, but it was not sufficient, in his opinion, to justify a change. No representations had been made to him in this relation.

Mr. PALMER asked whether his information that postage stamps were sold in the Halifax post-office was correct.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said it was not. Employés had sold postage stamps in the office at Halifax, but the practice was felt to be objectionable. The postmaster there was, however, permitted to keep stamps in the office for the accommodation of strangers, but their sale in the building was in no way to be encouraged. They were trying to harmonize the system, and to make any change without good reason would be blameworthy. He was quite sure that if postage stamps were sold in all post-offices, the practice would lead to far more serious complaints than were now made.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the Postmaster-General was in error in thinking that the present arrangement was satisfactory. So far as he was aware, precisely the contrary was the case. He did not, however, blame the head of the Department for the arrangement, because he believed that it was one of those arrangements which were carried into effect on the recommendation of Post Office Inspectors. He remonstrated with the Inspector at the time the regulation was carried into effect, and pointed out the inconvenience which was likely to occur, and, in fact, which had occurred not only to strangers to the city, but to those who were not familiar with business. People not in the habit of writing letters or receiving much correspondence would naturally think that by going to the post-office they could get the requisite stamps to despatch letters. There might be a great advantage in securing uniformity. He thought the hon. the Postmaster-General would admit that representations had been made to him from Halifax, at least, as to the inconvenience of the system now in force there. He was glad to hear the hon. the Postmaster-General state that the system was only tentative, and he had no doubt that, from the additional representations which would come in from all parts of the Dominion, the Department would revert to the old system, by which the public would be much better served.

Mr. HOLTON said the system of prepayment was of very recent origin,—hardly a year old; and it was since its introduction that the difficulty, if there were a difficulty, and the inconvenience, if there were an inconvenience, had been experienced, with reference to stamps not being sold within the walls of the post-offices. His own observations in Montreal, where a large new post-office had been recently opened, was that the public interest would be much subserved by facilities being given for procuring stamps within the post-office itself. They need not necessarily be sold through the post-office employés, as he could see very great objections to this being done. He did not know what the accommodation as to the sale of stamps was in large cities outside of Montreal and Quebec, but he thought there was room in each of those offices for a stamp office; and, he presumed, it was the same in Halifax, Toronto and many other cities. He was quite sure the hon. the Postmaster-General, now that his attention had been called to the matter, would make such enquiries as would lead him to adopt any modification of the arrangements which the public convenience might call for.

Mr. CURRIER said there were great complaints in Ottawa because postage stamps could not be procured in the post-office. It was true, vendors were not far off, but it was really a great inconvenience to strangers, and particularly to ladies, to have to go outside the post-office for stamps. As to the post-office clerks selling stamps, he could not understand why the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) should object to such an arrangement.

Mr. HOLTON said the present system contemplated the avoidance to the largest extent possible of post-office employes handling money, and he thought that was a sound policy. He knew there were defalcations of all sorts and irregularities with respect to payments under the old system. The ordinary clerks of the post-office ought not to be vendors of stamps.

Mr. CURRIER said it was extraordinary that post-office clerks could not be trusted with a dollar's worth of stamps. They would have to buy them from the Government in the first place, and he presumed a business-like account could be kept between them and the post-office.

Mr. WORKMAN said he coincided with what had been said by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), and the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier). He knew that a considerable amount of inconvenience existed in Montreal for want of a room in the post-office where stamps were sold. He hoped the hon. the Postmaster-General would receive the suggestions offered in the friendly spirit in which they were made. There was ample room in the large city office for a stamp room.

Mr. CARON said he concurred in the views expressed by the hon. member for Chateauguay. It seemed to him impossible to discover a reason for a system which obliged the public to go some distance from the post-office in order to buy stamps required for posting letters. That was a very great inconvenience, especially when the senders of letters were in a hurry. He knew that in the city of Quebec it was very difficult for strangers not acquainted with the city to procure stamps. Last Session he had an opportunity of bringing up the subject in a different form, and now, that this year there was an almost universal expression of opinion against the existing system, he hoped the hon. the Postmaster-General would consider the matter with the view of remedying it. Of course there were many offices where stamps were sold.

Mr. HUNTINGTON explained that he had referred to city offices.

Mr. PALMER said he thought stamps were sold in Charlottetown (Prince Edward Island) post-office.

Mr. PLUMB said much of the difficulty arose from people not knowing the number of stamps required; and then, after the fact had been ascertained at the post-office, the stamps could only be procured outside. Where letters could be registered, there, he thought, postage stamps ought to be sold. He trusted the suggestion so generally made would be adopted.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he was very glad to hear the suggestions which had been made, as no doubt hon. members were better acquainted with the feeling in their respective localities than he was. The statement of the hon. member for Chateauguay showed a proper appreciation of the practical difficulties in the way of post-office employes selling stamps, and he agreed with him that such a system was not a good one. There was a manifest reason for this, as hon. members would at once see. As to the advisability of stamps being sold in city offices, he had no controversy upon that point. There was no rule of the Department against this being done, but the difficulty was that no appropriate place could be set apart in the large city offices without the room devoted to the public being seriously infringed upon, unless a large expense was incurred. But he hoped that a system so young and new would not be condemned because it was not thoroughly perfect.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said, at Charlottetown, stamps were sold in the post-office by the clerks, and this was a great public convenience. He did not see why the same practice could not be followed in other places.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said it was just as proper for clerks in city offices as it was for country postmasters to sell stamps.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the gentleman in St. John who had been referred to was no doubt qualified for the duty, but he seemed to be under the apprehension that, if he sold stamps in the post-office, nobody else ought to keep them in stores, but his wishes in this respect could not very well be met.

Mr. FARROW said that the difficulty sometimes arose from postmasters in the country running out of stamps, and he suggested that other persons besides should have the right to sell them. He also recommended the American plan of stamped envelopes, as the mucilage on ordinary stamps was often inferior, causing the stamps to come off, and the letter, as a consequence, went to the dead letter office.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said this kind of envelope was being prepared.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that, in St. John, New Brunswick, a large flour firm dealt in stamps, which was a great anomaly. He did not wonder at efforts being made to have stamps sold in post-offices, for under the present system the mercantile community suffered much inconvenience.

Mr. PALMER said he agreed with the hon. member for Chateauguay that it would not be good policy for the post-office employes to sell stamps. Since the present Government had come into power, they had effected a great many reforms, and he hoped the convenience of the public would be still further met.

Mr. YOUNG said this was a question to which there were evidently two sides. He was afraid the hon. member for St. John had admitted too much in admitting that post-office employes should not be entrusted with the sale of stamps.

Mr. PALMER said the Government should not adopt that system if they could help it.

Mr. YOUNG said it had been generally admitted by hon. members that the system should not be adopted. But it should be borne in mind that the mere selling of postage stamps would not be remunerative enough for any private person to engage in it, but this difficulty might be met by allowing the sale of stationery also in the post-office. He thought the inconvenience had been greatly exaggerated.

Mr. ROBITAILLE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said very unjust aspersions had been cast upon the character of post-office clerks, in assuming that they were not as honest as country postmasters.

Mr. BLAKE said country postmasters bought the stamps.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said in like manner the receiving clerk could be made an agent for the sale of stamps. He could assure his hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Young) that the public inconvenience had not been exaggerated.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the sale of postage stamps should be under the direct control of the postmasters, by which arrangement the officials would be at hand during almost all hours. The proposition made by hon. members meant that the country would pay a considerable percentage to persons stationed in the post-offices to sell stamps. The work could be done more cheaply by the Government officials than by outsiders.

Mr. MACDONNELL said the argument of the hon. member for Halifax would apply to large cities where the salaries were sufficient to enable the postmasters to keep clerks and have their offices open day and night; but, in country offices where the postmasters were paid the trifling commission of 40 per cent. upon receipts, they all sold stamps at present. The offices could not be kept always open with clerks in attendance unless the Department adopted some other plan of paying postmasters in country districts than that which now obtained. The officers of no Department were paid so inadequately as those of the Post-Office. The answer always given to that allegation was that the revenue arriving from the Post-Office service was not sufficient to pay postmasters properly. But that was no valid argument. If it were applied to the Militia, Customs or other Department, and it were decided that the salaries of the officials should be paid in proportion to the income of the Department, those officials would be paid quite disproportionately to other officials. The time had come when the claims of the postmasters should receive that attention from the Government which they deserved. The postmasters in cities and towns where the revenues were large were paid as well as other officials, but in country offices they were only paid a commission, and it would be inconvenient for them to be obliged to keep open their offices to late hours. The Post-Office was a Department which should not be dependent for the remuneration paid to its officers on the amount of revenue received. It was practically an institution for the education of the people. While the country postmasters were inadequately paid, receiving only $200 per annum, they were obliged to attend to their offices during the day, and remain until a late hour during six nights in the week, to receive and despatch mails. The consequence of that insufficient remuneration was that scarcely a day passed but they heard of some defalcations in the post-office. While the positions of officials were such as to offer no consideration or inducement for men of ability and honesty to occupy them, the Post-Office Department would remain in its present unsatisfactory state.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the departmental rule was that stamps should not be sold by employés of the Department. He relied for assistance in the administration of the Post-Office Department on the able assistants it possessed, and was largely influenced, as any hon. gentleman would be, by the wise counsels they sometimes gave. The Department did not propose that employés should sell stamps, but was quite willing that other persons should be in the post-offices to sell stamps. There was great force in the complaint of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), that country postmasters were, in many instances, an ill-paid class of men. While he desired that the officials should be better paid, the question was one of expense. Some people now thought the Post-Office service too costly. If, however, a thorough service was provided, the people would have to pay for it. There was no difficulty in making it popular and in rendering it very convenient and useful.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERY REGULATIONS IN RESTIGOUCHE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. PALMER moved for copies of the Commission or other document appointing John Mowat a Fishery Officer in the county of Restigouche, in the Province of New Brunswick, and also all regulations or instructions defining his powers or the limits of his jurisdiction, and all instructions, if any, to him to seize the boats fishing beyond three miles from the sea shore.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF DAVID H. WATERLEY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. PALMER moved for a copy of the Commission, or other documents, appointing John Dewe Post-Office Inspector, and also of all orders defining his duties and functions, and within what limits he was to exercise his said office; also copies of all instructions, if any, that he received from the Postmaster-General to make any enquiry into the conduct of David H. Waterley, a clerk in the post office at St. John, or to dismiss the said Waterley from his said office. He said this was a most painful case. When Mr. Dewe, Post Office Inspector, was at St. John, the postmaster there made a charge that Waterley had stolen money from letters in the post-office. An enquiry was refused Waterley, and he had written to the hon. the Postmaster-General asking that an investigation should be made. Subsequently, money was abstracted from letters, and a year afterwards another employé was prosecuted and convicted, and was now in the Penitentiary. Waterley was a young man, with a wife and two or three children, he had long been in the employment of the Government and bore a high character, and, except for the conviction of the other employé, his character would have been destroyed. He wished to know the authority under which action had been taken in the case, for the Government had done enormous injury to a most worthy man.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had no objection to the first part of the motion. Mr. Dewe was appointed by Order in Council in the usual manner. The circumstances of the case in question were very painful. Money had been lost in the St. John post-office, and it was the duty of the Department to endeavour to stop the speculations. Mr. Dewe, the officer of the Department, went there and held an investigation, the result of which was that he suspended the gentleman, in whose interest the motion appeared to have been brought forward. That gentleman subsequently brought a suit at law against Mr. Dewe, and, while the suit was pending, it would be very improper to bring down copies of instructions. He ought to say a word in that connection in reference to the very delicate duties an officer like Mr. Dewe, who was a very distinguished and able officer in the Department, had imposed on him, and to ask for the suspension of the opinion of the House in regard to the case. It often occurred in the Post Office, as in trade, that the officers of the Department became aware that money was being stolen. It was not known who was guilty, and it was not impossible, for human judgment was not always infallible, that an Inspector might go too far in conducting his investigation, and might hit upon the wrong man. But Inspector Dewe had made a reputation for great fairness and skill in the discharge of his delicate duties, and it was not at all established that the present case was one for which he should be condemned. He was told, but he had no official knowledge of the fact, that the Court in which the case was tried had decided on some particular motion that the Inspector was not liable for any words uttered or deeds done while in charge of the post-office to any one suffering loss, as the person referred to in the motion was alleged to have suffered.

Mr. PALMER said the hon. the Postmaster-General was not quite correct as to the legal decision to which he had referred. It was that if the Inspector held an inquiry which was distinctly authorized by law, then what was done in the course of that inquiry was privileged. Waterley was not allowed to make a defence. He was told: "If you stole the money, confess it; and we will forgive you, and not punish you." If that was what the hon. the Postmaster-General called an inquiry, he did not call it such. All he had heard respecting Mr. Dewe, was to his credit; except his action in the present case. He hoped the Government would send an official to St. John, to inquire into all the circumstances; and, if they did not disclose a case of the most terrible injustice, he would never say another word on the subject. The Inspector, thinking Waterley was the guilty party, told him he was the person who took the money, and he could prove it; and that, if Waterley would confess, the offence would be compounded. The young man, knowing he was not guilty, told the Inspector it was a mistake, and asked for an investigation, but it was refused. If the other employé had not been convicted, Waterley would probably have been compelled to enter a lunatic asylum. The young man could not go back with the feelings that he entertained, with the thought that, day by day, he might have to experience this same sort of treatment. He wished to say that he did not want any private instructions. The power of the Inspector depended on instructions; he could not hold an enquiry, except into some matters, unless it was founded on instructions. All he desired was the authority on which the officer acted.

Mr. PALMER.

Mr. BLAKE said he understood that legal proceedings were pending in this case. He did not know whether his hon. friend was professionally connected with that case or not.

Mr. PALMER: I am.

Mr. BLAKE said, as soon as those proceedings outside the House were completed, there would be no objection to the hon. gentleman, in his parliamentary capacity, moving for the papers. He thought the House would agree with him, however, that Parliament was not to be invoked for the production of papers for the furtherance of the law-suit against a public officer. If the instructions were essential to the prosecution of this action or the defence of Mr. Dewe, the Courts were open to the hon. gentleman, and no doubt by process of law he could get whatever papers were material. But it was to the Courts the hon. gentleman should apply. Parliament was not to be made the handmaid of the ordinary Courts of Justice, and its proceedings were not to be used in order to facilitate the proceedings of such Courts.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would do everything in his power to put this action in a proper shape. The young man was very respectable, and, whether the charge was true or not, he had suffered a great deal of hardship. He was prepared to believe there was some mistake. Money had been lost since the young man left the office; in one case $100 was missed. Mr. Waterley was debarred from obtaining any other employment while this charge was hanging over him, and he wanted a chance to refute it. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would do everything he could to facilitate the case. If the young man was innocent, he ought to be cleared, and, if guilty, let him be punished.

Mr. PALMER said Mr. Waterley was charged with doing an illegal act, and he in turn declared that he acted under the direction of his superior officer. That left the young man in the position that he did not know whether the Government was responsible or not. He (Mr. Palmer) thought Mr. Waterley had a right to the papers under the circumstances. He denied that the papers could be obtained through the Courts. There was no power in New Brunswick to make an order on Ottawa.

Mr. BLAKE: That is the fault of the Local Legislature.

Mr. PALMER: I do not think that the Local House could alter it.

Mr. BLAKE: A commission could be issued.

Mr. PALMER: Yes, but what authority would it have to induce this Government to produce papers? A public employé had been distinctly charged with a serious crime, and, when he came to Parliament to ask for papers necessary to show whether he was guilty or not, he was refused on the ground that he had a law-suit pending. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would alter his mind on this point. He did not think that Mr. Dewe or any member of the Government ever intended to do Mr. Waterley any wrong; but, while admitting that, he thought Mr. Dewe had sacrificed the reputation of this young man to his own pride, he thought the officer had done very wrong, and it would be a crying shame if Mr. Waterley had to go down to his grave with this blot on his character.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not know what instructions there were, nor was he aware of their tenor or effect at all. His objection to bringing this down was on account of the general principle. If those who were interested in the young man had applied directly to the Government for the papers which they thought could properly be produced, the application would no doubt have been referred to him, and he would have considered it and acted in the spirit in which he generally acted in such cases, viz., to suggest the communication of anything which might fairly be communicated in order to assist the party to all he had a right to. That was the course which the hon. gentleman should have taken in his professional capacity, and he would suggest that he should adopt that course now. They would then get rid of an unfortunate precedent, as it was certainly not the function of Parliament to produce papers in this manner. The Government would consider the application, and would communicate such papers as were proper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer) should be satisfied with the promise of the hon. the Minister of Justice, and should make application for the instructions in the manner suggested. He could quite understand and appreciate the position of the hon. the Minister of Justice that the House should not be made the means of eliciting evidence for lawsuits. He presumed there was some means by which papers could be obtained through process of court. The case was one of terrible hardship, but he was bound to state that he had been well acquainted with Mr. Dewe for a number of years, and he knew him to be not only a very able officer, but a most estimable man in all the relations of life. He was quite sure that, whether right or wrong, Mr. Dewe acted from a sense of duty.

Mr. MITCHELL said, with due deference to the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Kingston, he begged to differ with them as to the rights of subjects in Parliament. He believed that the records of the Departments were open to the inspection of every man through his representative in Parliament. This House was the medium through which every subject of Her Majesty had a right to obtain such information connected with any of the Departments as might be fairly and properly communicated. The question was not whether the information could be given or not—the question was whether the hon. member for St. John had the right to apply for it in the manner that he did. He (Mr. Mitchell) held that the hon. gentleman had the right as a British subject to come and obtain the information he required through Parliament.

Mr. PALMER said he was quite satisfied with the hon. the Minister of Justice's proposition, and he would, therefore, amend his motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an order of the House do issue for copy of the Commission or other documents appointing John Dewe Post Office Inspector; and also of all orders defining his duties and functions, and within what limits he was to exercise his said office.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SURVEY EMPLOYÉS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. COOK moved for copies of all papers, orders and correspondence with the Minister of Public Works, and the engineer staff of the said Department in connection with the engagement of employés for the Pacific Railroad survey, and the routes (if any) they were instructed to take; also correspondence and orders from the same source to their agents in reference to the carrying of emigrants, Government employés and freight coming under the direct control of the Government by the Sarnia and Collingwood route since 1874.

Mr. DYMOND moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

DEEP SEA WEIRS OR POUNDS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DAVIES moved for returns of the number of persons who have obtained licenses or permission from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to erect deep sea weirs or pounds for the purpose of capturing fish at the head-lands or capes of the Maritime Provinces. He said that a considerable population on the north and south shores of Prince Edward Island depended upon the deep sea fisheries as their principal means of subsistence. These fisheries were prosecuted by them in small boats and schooners, the latter being frequently fifty tons burthen. Great dissatisfaction prevailed among these fishermen, owing to the fact that an American firm had erected on the grounds—prior to Confederation—two pounds or fishing weirs, which were most destructive to fish in their operation, and last summer this feeling was intensified, owing to the erection of a pound at Cape George, a point contiguous to the Nova Scotia coast. It was understood that this had been done by permission of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. This was a subject of very considerable importance. The impression was that these pounds destroyed large quantities of what were termed mother fish while going to their breeding grounds. And it was well known that fish were less abundant there now than formerly. The general belief was, moreover, that line fishing did not decrease the quantity to any appreciable extent. For the establishment of pounds, a head-line was selected, a fence was run out for 400 yards or 600 yards into the sea; against this fence seines or nets were placed, large poles were driven down at the end of it, and fish while passing along the coast to their spawning grounds, struck the fence and followed it, being thereby entrapped in vast quantities. These pounds were the means of catching salmon, herring, codfish, haddock, bass and other fish, besides a multitude of the smaller species which served as food for the larger ones. Beyond doubt, our waters could be depleted of fish. They knew that the lobster fishery on the shores of the Bay of Fundy, in the United States, had been destroyed. Some thirty or forty years ago, large factories had been erected there for the curing of lobsters, and a large business was done. No attention was paid to the preservation of the fish during the spawning season, and the consequence was that these waters were fished out. These firms had consequently transferred their base of operations to the Gulf of the St. Lawrence and the shores of Nova Scotia. He was very glad to see that the Department was enforcing regulations as to the close season. These pounds ought to be prohibited absolutely. In confirmation of his views, he would read a few extracts from the works of an eminent author on this question. This matter had been brought under the notice of the American Government, and it was then found that great difference of opinion existed in this relation among fishermen. Those who owned pounds asserted that the quantity thus caught did not perceptibly diminish their numbers, and again, others affirmed the exact contrary, and also that, owing to this system, large numbers of fishermen had to take to other pursuits to make a living. The following Bill was therefore introduced into the House of Representatives by the Hon. H. L. Dawes, and became law on the 9th of February, 1871:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"Joint resolutions for the protection and preservation of the food-fishes of the coast of United States.

"Whereas, it is asserted that the most valuable food-fishes of the coast and the lakes of the United States are rapidly diminishing in number, to the public injury, and so as to materially affect the interests of commerce and trade: therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the President be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the civil officers or employés of the Government, one person of proved scientific and practical acquaintance with the fishes of the coast, to be Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, to serve without additional salary."

Prof. Baird was appointed, with full power to prosecute investigations, and he reported:

"I also made the acquaintance of several gentlemen of literary ability and research, who had previously given much attention to the various questions connected with the fisheries, and who had in a measure become champions of the opposing sides, and obtained from them elaborate arguments on the subject. That of Mr. J. M. K. Southwick, of Newport, in behalf of the traps and pounds, will be found on page 76, and of Mr. George H. Palmer, of New Bedford, and Mr. J. Talbot Pitman, of Providence, as opposed to the continuance in the interest of the line fishermen, on page 88 and 196. As already stated, the objects of the investigation, as authorized by Congress, were, first, to determine the facts as to the alleged decrease of the food-fishes; secondly, if such a decrease be capable of substantiation, to ascertain the causes of the same; and, thirdly, to suggest methods for the restoration of the supply. A fourth object, incidental to the rest, was to work out the problems connected with the physical character of the seas adjacent to the fishing localities, and the natural history of the inhabitants of the water, whether vertebrate or invertebrate, and the associated vegetable life; as also to make copious and exhaustive collections of specimens, for the purpose of enriching the National Museum at Washington, and of furnishing duplicates for distribution in series to such suitable collegiate and other cabinets as might be recommended for the purpose."

The conclusion he came to was this:

"That, in regard to the decrease of the fish-bearing in mind that the present report has more particular reference to the south side of New England, and especially to that portion of it extending from Point Judith on the west to Mono Bay Point on the east, including Narragansett Bay, Vineyard Sound, Buzzard's Bay, Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket—I have no hesitation in stating that the fact of an alarming decrease of the shore fisheries has been thoroughly established by my own investigations, as well as by evidence of those whose testimony was taken upon the subject. Many persons are in the habit of considering that the fish supply of the sea is practically inexhaustible; and, therefore, that a scarcity of any particular location is to be referred rather to the movements of the fish, in changing their feeding grounds capriciously, or else in following the migration, from place to place, of the food upon which they live. This may be true to a certain extent, as we shall hereafter show; but it is difficult to point to any locality where, near the shores of the New England States at least, under the most favourable view of the case, the fish are quite as plentiful as they were some years ago; and still more, where, by their overlapping the original colonists of the sea bottom, they tend to render the abundance appreciably greater than usual. And, furthermore, if the scarcity of the fish be due to their going off into the deep waters of the ocean, it is, of course, of very little moment to the fisherman that they are as abundant in the sea as ever, if they do not come upon the grounds as will permit their being taken by his lines or nets. It is by no means to be inferred that as to the scarcity of fish that fewer are actually caught now than formerly at any time; the contrary, perhaps, being the case, since by means of the improved methods of capture, in the way of pounds and nets, an immense supply is taken out at certain seasons of the year, so as frequently to glut the markets. The scarcity referred to is better shown by the great difficulty experienced by line fishermen in securing a proper supply throughout the year on grounds where they were formerly able to catch all they needed for their own use and for sale. The evil effects of the state of things here indicated, are felt in many ways. Primarily on the part of many fishermen, resident on the coast, who have been in the habit of making a living by the proceeds of their occupation, not only supplying themselves with food, fresh and salt for the year, but also making a comfortable living by sales of their surplus. At the present time this resource is cut off to a great degree from this class of people in many places on the Massachusetts coast where, as on Nantucket, Martha's Vineyard, and elsewhere, the deprivation from the loss of profits by fishing is being most seriously felt. The result, of course, of the inability to make a living in this manner is to drive the line-fishermen to other occupations, and especially to leave the State for other fields of industry. In consequence the population is reduced, and the community feels this drain of some of its best material in many ways. Furthermore, property depreciates in value, farms and houses are abandoned, the average of taxation is increased, and many other evils, readily suggesting themselves, are developed. Again, an important stimulus to the building of ships and boats is lost in the decreasing demand for vessels of various grades; and, what is more important to the country at large, the training of skilled seamen with which to supply our national and our merchant marine generally is stopped, or more or less interfered with. It is well known that the line-fisheries, in their different manifestations, have always been looked upon as of the utmost importance in a politico-economical point of view, for which reason bounties were paid by the General Government; and, although these have been lately withheld, it may yet be necessary to restore them in order to regain our lost ground."

The following was another extract:—

"It is an established fact that salmon, alewives, and shad, both young and old, have been caught on certain spawning beds, and after being properly marked and allowed to escape, have been found to re-appear in successive years in the same locality. The principle is rather more difficult to establish in regard to the purely marine fishes; but experiments have been made by competent men on our coast and elsewhere, which prove the existence of the same general principle in relation to them. Thus, I was informed by an intelligent fisherman living at Rockport, Massachusetts, that he had himself, on several occasions, marked young and old halibut, and during several seasons they had been re-taken on about the same grounds. A second law, equally positive, with a great variety of fish, is that they pass from their spawning grounds to the sea by the shortest route that will take them out into the deeper waters, where they spend the winter; and that coming and going to a given locality, they follow a determinate and definite line of migration. Having in mind these two propositions, we shall then better appreciate what takes place when fish are disturbed or caught up during the breeding season. Should nets be set along their line of travel before they have spawned, so that when they strike the coast they are immediately arrested, first at one point and then at another, running a continued gauntlet of dangers in their course to their final destination; and should an appreciable proportion of them be caught before the eggs have been laid or fertilized, it is very easy to see why the stock should rapidly diminish. It is not a sufficient argument in reply to this to point to the enormous number of eggs laid by a single fish in each season, amounting in some instances to perhaps from five thousand to hundreds of thousands, or even millions, since this immense fecundity is an absolute necessity to preserve the balance of life under water. The eggs and the young fish furnish the appointed food to an immense variety of animals, many species of fish as well as crustaceans and other animals depending entirely upon them for their support. As most fish require from three to five years of growth before they are capable of reproduction, and in many cases remain in the open sea until this period is reached, it will follow that for several years after the establishment of an exhausting fishery the supply may appear to be but little interfered with; since there are several successive crops of fish to come at the annual intervals, and not until the entire round has been completed do these injurious agencies begin to present the evidence of their severity. It is easy therefore to understand why, after five or ten years fishing, the supply of fish in a given bay, or along a certain stretch of the coast, will be reduced to a very considerable degree, and although it may be perfectly true, that the sea is practically inexhaustible of its fish, yet if the fish of a particular region are cleared out, there is no hope that others will come in from other localities. It should therefore be understood the exhaustion of a local fishery is not like dipping water out of a bucket, where the vacancy is immediately filled with the surrounding body, but it is more like taking lard out of a keg, when there is a space left that does not become occupied by anything else. The principle may safely be considered as established that line fishing, no matter how extensively prosecuted, will never materially affect the supply of fish in the sea. As a general rule, fish, when engaged in the function of reproduction, will not take the hook, whatever may be their abundance; but, as soon as the critical season has passed, they feed very voraciously, and then can be readily caught by skilled fishermen. It therefore would be no evil should every full-grown fish, of three to five years old and upward, be lifted from the sea after the close of the spawning season, since the following year we may look for a new generation coming to exercise the functions of reproduction, and ample provision will thus exist for a renewed supply from year to year. As already explained, the case is entirely different when these first are caught before they spawn, all the evils that we have depicted following in the train of such thoughtless destruction, precisely similar to killing off all the mature hens in a farm-yard before they have laid their eggs, and then expecting to have the stock continued indefinitely. As well might the farmer expect to keep up his supply of wheat, year by year, while he consumed all his grain, reserving none for seed, and without the possibility of obtaining it from any other source."

Prof. Baird went on to say :

"In the event, however, of the refusal of the States to establish the very limited close time suggested, I would recommend the passage by the United States of a law absolutely prohibiting until further notice, the erection of fixed apparatus for taking fish, after a period of one or two years on the south side of New England and on the shores of Long Island, which constitute the spawning grounds of the shore-fishes referred to. Although this would be a serious blow to the pound and trap interest, yet the grace allowed would permit the owners to use up their material in the way of nets, and render the enforcement of the law less onerous. The restoration of fish to their original abundance would be thus accomplished in a much less time than by any merely palliative measures; and there no reason to anticipate that there would be in the meantime any material decrease in the supply or any rise in the price of fish to the consumer. There would still be open to the fishermen the use of seines, gill nets, etc., which would capture fish in large quantity without overstocking the market; and the inducement to the use of the hook and line would furnish employment to large numbers of persons now needing it, while the markets would be more regularly and equally supplied. The wholesale cost of fish would probably be somewhat increased but the competition being distributed among a large number of persons would prevent an excessive charge by the retail dealers; and the only difference would be that a few men would not make large fortunes in a short time, as they are now in the way of doing."

In 1871, this enquiry was not completed; and in 1872, after another year's observation, Prof. Baird stated :

"In view, therefore, of all these facts, I have no hesitation in saying that all the arguments presented in the earlier part of this report, in favour of regulating the fisheries on the south side of New England by law, are enforced by the experience of the season of 1872; and that it is too evident that, unless some protective measures be adopted, the fisheries in these waters will be practically destroyed in a very short time. The result will, of course, bring it its own relief in time, since the cessation of trapping will permit the fish to recover their ground; but several years will be required for this, and, doubtless, as soon as there is any show of increase, the traps will be again brought into use. In consequence of an unavoidable delay in the publication of the present report, I have been enabled to include in it the results of inquiries respecting the fisheries on the south coast of New England, during the season of 1872; having revisited many of the localities of the investigations of 1871, and sending an assistant to others. I found what I had expected, that, with the exception of the scup, fishes of all kinds in Vineyard Sound and Buzzard's Bay were as much scarcer in 1872, compared with 1871, as they had been in that year compared with the preceding one. The testimony everywhere, with scarcely an exception, both from line-men and trappers, was that the whole business of the fishing was pretty nearly at an end, and that it would scarcely pay parties to attempt to continue the work on a large scale in 1873."

He supposed that we looked forward to the organization of a navy, but, unless our deep sea fisheries were protected, a valuable training school for seamen would be irretrievably lost. It was of very great importance that these fisheries should be protected. Every good fisherman earned from $300 to $500 a year. Unlike the farmer, everything that he consumed was taxed, and a fisherman earning $500 a year would probably pay from $50 to $60 a year in taxes on his provisions and clothing. It was therefore very necessary that these fisheries should be fostered. He hoped that the Department of Marine and Fisheries would give this matter full consideration. One of the pounds was erected in Prince Edward Island prior to Confederation by two enterprising Americans, men who had done a great deal for the fishing interest of the Island. But this was no reason why the fisheries should be destroyed. The pound put off Cape George was looked upon with great distrust. This was a prominent point where a multitude of fish passed, and it was asserted that mackerel and other fish struck the pounds and got frightened, and left the ground. Whether this was the case or not, he knew that mackerel were scarce last year. He hoped the Government would prevent more pounds being licensed.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the subject was one of very considerable importance. The observations of the hon. member deserved consideration, and the gentleman he had quoted was perhaps the highest authority on the continent. There was no objection to the motion.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he thought the hon. gentleman had done great service in bringing this subject before the House. He was sure there was no question that could come before the House that deserved greater consideration at the hands of hon. members. They all knew the value of our fisheries and the efforts that were being made by the present Government, and that had been made by the late Government, to sustain them, in clearing the rivers and in affording food for the fish. The value of that great branch of our natural products was fully admitted, and, therefore, everything that tended to guard and protect the fisheries must be worthy of attention. He knew that, in his Province, steps had been taken to clear the harbours and rivers of all obstruction so that the fish might approach them. Everything had been done that was possible to prevent the fish being driven from our shores. He thought the Government should hesitate before granting similar licences to those referred to by the hon. member who had just sat down.

Mr. FORBES said, when a trap had been set outside the harbour in his district, the prejudice against it on the part of the fishermen was enormous. The fishermen generally were hostile to it. There was nothing but a universal cry that it would destroy all the future prospects of plentiful fish. But a sudden change came over the people when it was observed that the trap did not have its supposed effect. In fact, it was discovered that bait for the deep sea fisheries could not be procured by other means than the trap. It was a known fact that fish, especially herring, did not frequent the Nova Scotia coast last year as they had done before; they had almost deserted the coast, and men with the old-fashioned nets could not catch anything for bait. During last year the trap had been placed near the headland, inside the bay, and the fishermen were supplied from it with bait. The consequence was that there was an increase in the catch of cod because the fishermen had the bait which was caught by the trap, which they otherwise could not have; and now the fishermen in his locality were largely in favour of traps, and last year he presented petitions signed by almost all the fishermen in favour of the traps for the purpose of catching bait. It was all very well to tell the House that Professor Baird and other parties were opposed to the setting of these nets, but it was a peculiar fact that the American Government had not acted upon their suggestions. These traps were up and down the American coast in all directions. If Canadians did not set traps to catch the fish the Americans would catch them. If there was a general law between both Governments to sweep away all these traps, then our fishermen would have the same chance as the American fishermen. He held that we had an equal right to use traps with the Americans. He was in favour of fostering the fishing interest, and one way in which this could be done was by encouraging the putting down of these traps. The two traps put down off Prince Edward Island before Confederation were objected to; but possibly they did not give the same accommodation to the deep sea fisheries as the traps in his locality did. There was a time when the harbours and rivers were rich in fish, but this time had passed, and fish were now getting scarce. He thought no better investment could be made by the fishermen than investing in these traps for the purpose of securing bait for the deep sea fisheries. Of course the traps must destroy some fish, and every appliance put into the water must destroy some. The prejudice against the traps was on the part of men who did not know their real value. He hoped nothing would be done to prevent the setting of traps until it was shown positively and substantially that the American Government would enter into an alliance or arrangement with the Dominion Government to stop the use of traps, but he very much doubted whether the good sense of the American people would allow them to do this. While all the information possible should be obtained, he thought a wrong would be committed in prohibiting the traps. Still, he believed they should be under control, and that they should only be set in certain places, which should be chosen by parties perfectly conversant with the habits of fish. He did not think it right, for instance, that traps should be set on spawning grounds.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. PERRY said his experience was that the herring came down in the spring of the year, and, when they struck anything in their course, they would run into it in a body, and in this way they ran into the traps. The result was that the owner of the traps monopolized the whole bait, and men who fished in the ordinary way could catch very little. What was caught in the traps was used to catch larger fish, which were, in many instances, brought on shore merely for manure. The traps tended to divert the natural course of the fish, and, when this happened, the fish would not go to that particular ground year after year. He knew that herring had not been caught for eight or nine miles from these traps by the common nets. He knew from experience that, since these traps were set, the fisheries had largely decreased. The whole thing was a monopoly, and enabled a few parties to get a larger amount of money against the interest of the general fishermen, who were not able to compete with the large merchants. He contended that it was wrong to lay these traps around Prince Edward Island. He hoped that some enquiry would be made, so that the small traders might not be imposed on by the large merchants. The traps had driven salmon and trout away from coming into rivers, and year after year they were decreasing in numbers. Fish should be caught after spawning, but the trouble was that the traps caught them before they had spawned. He had every reason to believe that the Department would not grant new licenses until they had made the necessary enquiries, and he had no doubt they would do everything in their power to protect the fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 42) To authorise the town of Kincardine, in the county of Bruce, to impose and collect certain tolls, at the harbour in the said town.—(Mr. Gillies.)

Bill (No. 72) To amend the Act to incorporate the Globe Printing Company.—(Mr. Blain.)

Bill (No. 22) To incorporate the Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry.—(Mr. Rymal.)

PROTECTION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA MINERS BILL.

[BILL No. 68.]

(Mr. Bunster.)

Mr. BUNSTER, in moving the second reading of the Bill, stated that he had for some time been requested by the miners of British Columbia to bring this Bill before the House. They were no insignificant body, as the House would see when he mentioned that British Columbia sent away more coal than any other part of the Dominion, in proportion to their exports, but the owners of the mines all lived in England, except a few, and they did not give proper ventilation to the mines or take proper precautions in leaving sufficient abutments to prevent the mines tumbling down. The Bill provided, as the miners desired, for the appointment of an inspector to be paid by the owners, so that it would not entail expense upon the Government. If they were left without that inspector they would be constantly liable to lose their lives. Several accidents had occurred, much to the detriment of mine-owners, who had, in consequence, not been able to fill their orders for coal. He hoped the Minister of Justice would see that this measure was necessary in the interests of humanity.

Mr. BLAKE said it had been his duty to inform his hon. friend the other day that he feared there were some grave difficulties in the way of of the House acceding to the Bill. There was nothing in the subject-matter or in the provisions of the Bill, which seemed to be connected with civil rights and police regulations, which would bring it within the jurisdiction of this Legislature, and another member from British Columbia had informed him that the view taken in the Province was that it was a matter for the Local Legislature, and that, according to his information, a Bill was being introduced into that Legislature this Session to accomplish the object. It appeared to him that, if they undertook the supervision of the coal mines of British Columbia as was proposed, it would be a serious infringement of local rights, and an extension of their jurisdiction beyond the powers which the Constitution had conferred upon them. Independently of this it appeared to him that the Bill had not complied with the orders of the House, since it proposed to exact a fee, and also fines and penalties, and it was neither initiated by a resolution nor were the clauses providing for the fine or penalty introduced in blank. Under those circumstances, the Bill ought not to receive the assent of the House. He suggested that his hon. friend should withdraw the measure and leave the Local Legislature to deal with the subject, which seemed to be directly within its province.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said there was a Bill on the Statute-book almost similar in character to the one before the House. He referred to the Steamboat Inspection Act. In that Act, the House took upon itself to legislate and direct how steamboats should be run, and how the boiler should be inspected, who should look after the machinery, etc. The right was conferred upon the Governor in Council to appoint inspectors of steamboats, who were Dominion officials. But, not only did the Government thus give the inspector control over the steamboats and vessels which were inter-provincial in their character, but also over those which plied in all the Provinces of the Dominion and upon the navigable rivers of the country. He failed to see how it was we could have jurisdiction in the one case and not in the other. It seemed to him that attempts were often made to shorten and to circumscribe the powers of this House, and to allow Local Legislatures to act in connection with matters which seemed to him to be purely within the province of this House. Where it was clearly and plainly the duty of Local Legislatures to pass certain laws, then nobody would wish to infringe upon their privilege; but, when it was doubtful whether those bodies had the right to pass such Acts, he thought they should assume that this House had control of the matter. He did not see that any good reason had been given why the House should not pass a measure of this kind, except the objection that the Bill had not originated in Committee. With all due deference to the opinion of the hon. the Minister of Justice, he must say that the Bill met his approbation. The Province of British Columbia did not hold the same position towards her mines as the other Provinces did toward theirs. The mines of Nova Scotia were entirely under the control, and were the property, of the Province, and they had the right to appoint inspectors and persons to see that they were worked in such a manner, not only that danger should not accrue to the lives of the workmen, but also with a due regard to economy. But the mines of British Columbia were differently situated. They were not the property of the Province, but were the property of the the owners of the soil, and the Legislature of that Province had never attempted to interfere with the working of the mines. It would thus be seen that there was a great distinction between the position of the coal mines in Nova Scotia and those in British Columbia. He held that they had just as much right to enact laws for the protection of the lives of miners as they had to pass laws for the protection of people travelling on the railway trains. The same power that gave them the right to legislate in connection with boilers and steam machinery also conferred upon them the power to protect persons engaged in mining in British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE said the subject of navigation and shipping, which, of course, included steamboats, was expressly within the exclusive legislative authority of this Parliament. He presumed that it was in view of that fact that the House had passed the law referred to.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked if the hon. the Minister of Justice had asserted as a matter of law that this House had no right to pass such an Act.

Mr. BLAKE: I do not assume to decide anything in this House. It is my duty to express an opinion, and submit it to the House.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he could not discover that this matter properly came within the rights reserved to Provincial Legislatures. He did not know any portion of the 92nd section of the British North America Act that assigned this matter exclusively to the Legislatures of Provinces.

Mr. MILLS said that, if the hon. gentleman looked at the latter part of the 92nd section, he would find it covered this case. The Local Legislature had clearly control over matters relating to the protection of life and property, and could make all regulations with a view to maintaining order and preventing disaster.

Mr. BUNSTER said the House would pardon him if he declined to do what the hon. the Minister of Justice wished him to do in this matter. He was sorry to find that any member from the Province of British Columbia had taken the liberty to go to the hon. the Minister of Justice and object to this measure, without being manly enough to come to him (Mr. Bunster) and ascertain whether the Bill could not be amended so that it might be allowed to pass. He knew that one hon. member was largely interested in the coal mines in British Columbia and did not want the Bill to pass because it would affect his own interest. He thought that was wrong. It was not a proper thing for that hon. gentleman to do.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. member himself came to me.

Mr. BUNSTER: I came to know if you would allow the Bill to pass.

Mr. BLAKE: So did the other hon. gentleman.

Mr. BUNSTER: As I undertood it, the hon. gentleman went to the hon. the Minister of Justice in opposition to the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman did not say one word in me in opposition to the Bill.

Mr. BUNSTER said then he misconstrued the language of the hon. gentleman. Reference had been made to the powers of the Local Legislature. Now, that body felt great difficulty in touching this question, because a large belt of land between Esquimalt and Nanaimo had been reserved for railroad purposes, and they refused to have anything to do with it. The Dominion had a great many valuable lands in that section, which would build the road in fact. He saw one hundred acres of land sold by public auction for $35,000, which could not be bought today for $135,000; and there was a great deal more land of that character. A large number of men were employed in coal mines, and accidents were occurring daily, owing to the absence of inspection. He was satisfied that many accidents would be avoided, and many valuable lives saved, if the Bill was allowed to pass into law. He would like the hon. the Minister of Justice to inform him which was the proper and best way to bring down this matter, so that it could be acted upon by the House. The miners of the Province deserved some little consideration, and he hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would take a more merciful view of the matter; and, if the Bill was not drawn in accordance with his wishes, he would do a great deal of good to British Columbia if he would introduce one which would effect the same object.

Mr. BLAKE said he would only be too glad to forward the prosecution of this or any other measure which he thought would be advantageous to the Province, if it came within the scope of Parliament. But, as he had already stated, he did not see his way clear to getting over the difficulty. It would do no good to pass that law in regard to a subject over which they had no jurisdiction. He suggested that the Local Legislature was the proper body to meet this question. The miners were represented there—probably not so ably as they were in this House, but their interests would, undoubtedly, be looked after.

Mr. MACDONELL said he hoped the hon. member would withdraw the Bill. The matter was clearly within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature, and it would not be well for the House to interfere; especially when the rights of other Provinces had been recognized in this respect.

Mr. BUNSTER said he supposed, from what the Minister of Justice had said, he would be obliged to withdraw the Bill. While he did so, he would explain that, if the Local Legislature of his Province did not in the meantime take action with regard to the matter, he would next year again introduce it.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

REPRESENTATION OF STOUFFVILLE ELECTORS BILL.

[BILL No. 70.]

(Mr. Metcalfe.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. BUNSTER.

LARCENY ACT AMENDMENT BILL. [BILL No. 81.]

(Mr. Guthrie.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. GUTHRIE said the Bill extended the provisions of the Larceny Act to persons guilty of the fraudulent conversion of moneys to their own use, who were officers of Courts. It proposed to make it a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment, for an officer of a Court of Justice who, by virtue of his office, collected or received moneys to which suitors were entitled, to fraudulently convert them to his own use, and refusal or neglect on his part to pay it over to the person entitled to it by law should be prima facie evidence of guilt. There was no reason why this should not be the law; and experience had shown that it was necessary. It was true that bailiffs and sheriffs gave security, but that of the former only amounted to $200, and that of the latter, to $4,000, while both classes of officers often held moneys far exceeding in value the amount of their bonds. The Bill was also in the interest of the officers concerned, because it would remove a strong temptation to misappropriate property entrusted to their care. He moved that the Bill be read a second time, and also that it be referred to a Select Committee composed of Messrs. Irving, Cameron, Macdougall (East Elgin), McCarthy, Fraser, Scatcherd, Brooks, Laurier, Appleby, McIsaac and himself. He would also remark that authority for the last, the prima facie clause, was to be found in a similar clause contained in the Post-Office Act.

Mr. BLAKE said the Committee should be careful to see that the terms of the Bill were applicable to the various Provinces, as he was informed that in Quebec a judicial deposit system was in force, the Government receiving the moneys in question and paying them out.

Mr. BROUSE would like to understand whether lawyers who collected money for poor clients and did not pay it over came under the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. SNIDER said, if lawyers were so included, he would have no objection to the Bill. His long experience showed him that lawyers were worse paymasters than any other section of the community. He did not favour class legislation. If the change he mentioned was not made, he was inclined to move a three months' hoist.

Mr. GOUDGE asked what officers were referred to.

Mr. GUTHRIE said he had reference to executive or ministerial officers of Courts of Justice. The law as it stood applied fully to the cases of lawyers to which allusion had been made; they could be most summarily punished. There was a general clause at the end which he was sure would include the great mass of cases; but he, for one, if hon. gentlemen thought that lawyers were not sufficiently included in the Larceny Act, was perfectly prepared to support any measure which would meet the case, as he believed there was nothing more desirable in the interest of the legal profession than that it should be purged of dishonourable members.

Bill read the second time, and referred.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Mr. Casey's proposed motion that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the present condition of the Civil Service, and the method of nominating and examining candidates for appointments, with a view to ascertaining whether better means cannot be adopted for securing the appointment of properly qualified persons, and the general efficiency of the service; with power to send for persons, papers and records; said Committee to consist of Messrs. Archibald, Aylmer, Charlton, Colby, De St. Georges, Kirkpatrick, Killam, Macdougall (Elgin), McDougall (Renfrew), Roscoe, Wright (Pontiac), Church, Paterson, Burpee (Sunbury) and the mover, of whom five shall be a quorum, and that said Committee have power to report to the House their observations on the subject referred to them, together with the minutes of evidence taken before them, read.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had moved the adjournment of the debate in order that he might express his opinion upon the question submitted by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey.) He did rise for the purpose of opposing the hon. gentleman's motion, because he thought an enquiry into the condition of the Civil Service was one that might be prosecuted with advantage alike to the public and to those gentlemen who composed such a large portion of the population of this city. He knew that one of the great difficulties which Ministers and members experienced was the distribution of what they considered favours in the way of public patronage or appointments to office. While some men might look upon a position which gave the power of making appointments as a very desirable one, yet he, from several years' experience, knew that it was a position of exceeding great difficulty in making the selections and in resisting claims presented by supporters on the part of their own friends, who might or might not be fit for the office. His hon. friend had stated that the Civil Service was not in a satisfactory condition, and that there was a large number of persons who were unfit for the offices they held, and that it was desirable that the Civil Service should be purged by meeting, in some way, a difficulty which existed, not only as it stood to-day, but with reference to the future. He was not going to permit his hon. friend to make what he believed an unfair reflection upon the Civil Service of Canada. He had had some experience in relation to this matter. When he came into Parliament in 1867, he had to organize a Department. It formerly existed as a fragmentary portion of the Board of Works, and was looked upon somewhat as the fifth wheel of a coach. He recollected that several hon. gentlemen referred to the Department in terms something like that, but he believed they had lived to recant their opinions, whether they expressed them or not. To-day he might fairly challenge any hon. gentleman to say that the Department to which he referred, that of Marine and Fisheries, which he had the honour of organizing, and which was now so worthily handled by the hon. gentleman who succeeded him, was not efficient or a credit to Canada. When he left the Department—and he believed the same state of things had continued—the various gentlemen who presided over the several branches and their subordinates were a credit to any Department in any country of the world; and, when the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) made such sweeping charges as he had, he committed a very great injustice. In the other Departments, men were found who occupied high positions and who would have done honour to almost any position in any country in the world. There were men among them who had devoted their leisure hours to writing the history of their country; others had turned their energies and talents to the production of biographical works which were a credit to Canada; while others had specially devoted themselves to the study of financial affairs, so that they could assist the Ministers when they required information for themselves, or statistics and statements for the House at a moment's notice. He thought before the discussion was through, his hon. friend would retract the injustice his remarks had implied upon the Civil Service of Canada. He would challenge him to point to one single branch that was inefficient. That the Civil Service demanded some consideration in the matter of appointing, he would not attempt to deny. He could admit it might be possible to consider whether a better system might not be adopted, but he was not prepared to admit that the necessity arose from any inefficiency in the staff as it had existed for the last ten years. He was not going to say there were not drones in the service. Probably there were. Perhaps some of the men would be found, in the absence of their chiefs, loitering at the corners of the streets; but they were the exception. He would support the motion for a Committee, but not on the narrow grounds stated in the resolution. He would suggest that the view taken by the hon. member for Elgin would not tend to bring about that cordiality and coöperation between the staffs and the heads of the Departments which was so much desired. He had no fault to find with the resolution in itself, only that it did not go far enough. He did not exactly gather what the scope of the investigation was to be. If it was proposed to adopt a system of competitive examinations, as in England, he did not think the condition of this young country was sufficiently advanced for such a system. We were not like England, where a class of men were educated and trained for the Civil Service from their boyhood. While he was prepared to admit that great evils had arisen from the present system of appointments, yet he did not think the difficulty was insuperable. When he was head of a Department, he laid it down as a general rule that he would not appoint a person to office where he did not think him fit. Of course he knew that Ministers would favour their friends, but of this he did not complain, so long as the public service did not suffer. He believed, as a rule, heads of Departments made appointments chiefly because of efficiency, rather than of party allegiance. Viewing the appointments for the last ten years, he could not say that the Civil Service had suffered from improper appointments to any appreciable extent. If his statement was correct, his hon. friend did not have much ground upon which to make the statement he had. While a Committee was moved for, it should be defined a little more clearly what was contemplated—whether it was proposed to adopt the English system in its entirety, or only a partial system of examinations, such as might be applicable to a new country like Canada. He was not prepared to say that it was necessary for a man to be able to write chapters of Latin and Greek, or to work out intricate questions in geometry or conic sections, in order to fit himself for a position in the Civil Service, as was required in England. This country was too young for such a system in its strict applicability. What he chiefly wished to call attention to was that the resolution did not go far enough, in that it did not ask for an enquiry into the question of the remuneration civil servants were entitled to. He did not ask that the Committee should recommend an increase, for they could not do that constitutionally, but there were many ways of reaching the same object without violating the rules of the House. In 1873, the Ministers' salaries were increased from $5,000 to $7,000, and the members' indemnity from $600 to $1,000, and the salaries of the civil servants were increased from 25 to 30 per cent. When their salaries were fixed, labourers were only getting 80c. a day, and everything was cheap. But, although labourers' wages had risen to $1.50 or $2.00 a day in summer time, the salaries of civil servants had been increased very little. When this matter was discussed in 1873, it was agreed that $75,000 should be appropriated in bonuses, pending the passage of an Act to be considered at the next Session of Parliament for the purpose of making a permanent advance. That vote was given to enable the Government to readjust the salaries, and it had been repeated for three years. Parliament at the time gave a guarantee that the salaries of civil servants should be raised permanently, and it was not right that the Government should not have yet brought down the Act authorizing the same. For 1876-7, $35,000 had been voted for bonuses, but it had not yet been distributed. By their position, civil servants were prevented from entering into any other pursuit, and as they only had their salary to depend upon for a living, it was but right that their remuneration should be commensurate with their necessities. He trusted that the Committee would enquire into this matter.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said what had been said by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) had been endorsed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who had indeed gone further than the other hon. gentleman had, for the hon. member for West Elgin had not applied the term "drones" to the Civil Service.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not make use of this expression.

Mr. McDOUGALL reminded the hon. gentleman that he did. The remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin were such as any man of candour and intelligence would make. It would be absurd to say that there was no room for improvement in the Civil Service, and there certainly could be no objection to a remedy being applied to the evil. His hon. friend had objected to competitive examinations.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; but only to the extent to which it prevailed in England.

Mr. McDOUGALL said, if his hon. friend from West Elgin had proposed a system cut and dried, there would have been no reason to ask for the Committee. It was very possible that a scheme suitable for England would have to be altered in its details for this country. According to the present system, members who did not nominate their friends for office laid themselves open to a charge of ingratitude, and those who were most pressing in their claims upon members for positions, or who had what was commonly called "plenty of cheek," were generally most unfit for the office. Of course, a member might refuse to make an unfit recommendation for office, but it sometimes required a great deal of moral courage to do so. It was maintained that there was a form of examination at present. He might fairly say that that examination did not trouble, to any great extent, the slumbers of any candidate for office. He might properly allude to the testimony of officials in Great Britain with regard to the competitive examination system. All there agreed that the system had proved a success; and that it had caused the Civil Service of Great Britain to be much improved. If it could not be shown that the adoption of the English system, or some modification of it, would not have the same results here as in Great Britain, then it might fairly be contended that it deserved a trial. If the mode of introducing persons into the Civil Service was by examination, it would tend to lessen party feeling in this country. He did not say that it would be advisable that all party feeling should be removed, which would indicate a want of interest on the part of the people in public affairs. There must always be a party of progress and a party of obstruction. No matter what might be the certain special differences in various countries, there must always be two political parties. The feeling which arose in connection with legislation and administration were quite as strong as were required in this country. While the present system existed, namely, to appoint persons to office on account of their connection with one of the political parties, it was quite likely it would be forgotten that officials were employed merely for the good of the country and to carry on its affairs. Unfortunately in many cases people thought—it was true they were the ignorant portion of the community, but still a considerable portion—that a Government was instituted for the purpose of giving offices to their friends. A competitive system of examination would tend to abolish that system, and would, therefore, be productive of good. It was fair to assume that the persons employed to determine the merits of candidates and their character, would do service to the country. If that system were inaugurated, hon. members would be released from the claims made upon them in regard to appointments, for, although, in most cases, they bore them willingly, still such applications tended to diminish the usefulness of hon. members. As a supporter of the Government, he was, however, not so unreasonable as to imagine that, merely because he thought this system would be useful in the interests of Canada, it should be adopted at a moment's notice. It was a matter of importance that the system should be made as perfect as possible before it was adopted. At the same time, those hon. members who had confidence in the Government, must look to it to initiate the steps to carry it out. Unless the Government objected in principle to the scheme proposed, they should do what was in their power to have it placed in as perfect shape as possible, and made the law of the country. He trusted the question would receive the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. AYLMER said that, as his name had been proposed as a member of the Committee, he would address a few words to the House on the subject under discussion. He had, in common with many hon. members, heard opinions expressed at different times with respect to the working of the competitive examination system in England. He desired to call the attention of the House to a few points on which he had practically observed the working of the competitive system as applied to the English service. That system had been in operation in England for upwards of twenty years. When it was first adopted, it was predicted that the keen competition which would naturally follow from the introduction of the system would lead to great physical degeneracy in the candidates who would present themselves for examination. But the actual test had proved that such had not been the case. He had personally observed the working of the system more particularly in connection with two branches of the public service in England—the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, the cadets of which had to undergo a very keen competitive examination at Woolwich Academy. It had been found, he thought, since the plan of competitive examinations had been introduced, that the standard of education of the cadets had been very much improved, as also had the physique of the cadets. It might, therefore, be argued that this would be a good system to adopt in the selection of candidates for appointments to the Canadian Civil Service. What was more required than a system of selecting any exceptional ability in the candidate was some system which was more likely to exclude exceptional stupidity. There was one aspect in which the competitive system would prove a grievous hardship in this country. It had been found in England that the system almost restricted successful candidates to the sons of wealthy parents. In a country like Canada, it would be very wrong to legislate in favour of the rich people. The system of competitive examinations required a particular form of education, the expense of which only wealthy people were able to bear. When the competitive system was introduced in England it was expected that it would be otherwise, that the rich and upper and middle classes would be shut out by the number of applicants which would come up from the lower classes to fill the public offices. It had been found, however, that only the wealthy classes were able to educate their sons to the point at which they were able to be successful in the examinations. He believed it was a fact that, out of a thousand or more men who graduated from Oxford and Cambridge and other English universities, not a single candidate ever presented himself at those competitive examinations. There was another point in connection with those examinations. It was well known that there was always a very large number of candidates in excess of the number required, who presented themselves for examination. The training which the men had received did not qualify them for any other position in life, and the unsuccessful candidates who did not obtain positions in the service were, therefore, unsuited to any practical purpose in life. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. McDougall) had very properly remarked that it would be necessary to select only men of good character. Under a competitive system in this country this would be a matter of great difficulty. If the door was thrown open to open competition, there would be great difficulty in securing men of proper character, or at any rate, there would have been great difficulty in excluding men of bad character from competing at those examinations, for it was an easy matter to obtain a certificate of character. He did not pretend to be at all conversant with the Canadian Civil Service, but it appeared to him that no conspicuous ability was required on the part of the officials. It would be very objectionable to men educated to a high standard and submitted to a severe test, that they should be occupied with the routine work of the public offices. It would be likely to give the country a body of discontented men, who were dissatisfied with their positions, and who felt that their talents and education were being thrown away. No doubt many views might be taken of the question; those points had occurred to him, and as his name was suggested as one of the Committee, he had laid them before the House. He trusted the Committee would be granted, because he thought the work marked out for the Committee to perform was very necessary, and he hoped their labours would meet with the approbation of the House.

Mr. McDUGALL.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he felt some disappointment on hearing from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Aylmer) that he thought a competitive system was only to guard against exceptional stupidity. He saw no reason why the Canadian Civil Service should not approach closely to, if not reach the standard of the Civil Service in England; and at all events the House should adopt means to elevate it to that position. He had heard two good authorities speak on the competitive system in England; one was a Commissioner of the Civil Service, who held a very high position in this country at one time; the other was the head of one of the public Departments, that of India, and he spoke in the highest terms of the system of competition adopted there and the results which had followed from it. The latter gentleman had been greatly prejudiced against the system in the first instance, but experience had established the fact that those who had been appointed to offices in India under the competitive system had proved to be quite equal to those appointed under the former system. They should endeavour to place the Civil Service of Canada in a creditable position—he did not mean to say it was not in a creditable position now—but they might very well take a leaf out of the practice in England in that respect, and take a step towards having the best educated men, all other things (character, of course) included, in the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. CURRIER said the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) had made the broad statement that the Civil Service as at present constituted was inefficient. He did not propose to discuss the question as to whether the system should be changed from what it now was to the competitive system, as it prevailed in England; nor did he propose to stand up as the champion of the Civil Service as constituted.

He had had considerable experience of members of the Civil Service since he had had the honour of a seat in Parliament, and, so far as he knew, they seemed to be efficient. They were also men of high attainments and education. Certainly, a great deal could be said against the present system of political nominations, but he did not see how it could be done away with in this country. The remuneration was not, perhaps, as well distributed as it ought to be, and it might be that the salaries were not high enough; but again, in view of the hardness of the times and the reduction in the cost of living, this was made more even. Their position was not so much affected in consequence as the position of business men; some of them were well paid, and others ill paid. They had been, moreover, disappointed, as bonuses had not of late been distributed, as was at one time intended by the House. He was very much inclined to believe that the Civil Service in Canada compared favourably with that of any other country. He did know what his hon. friend from West Elgin expected to do with the Committee, but he hoped, at all events, that it would be of some good.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government had no objection to granting the Committee. No doubt his hon. friend from West Elgin and the Committee would carefully consider the whole subject. He was not quite sure that the effects of the competitive system in England had been all the original promoters of that scheme claimed for it, though, doubtless, it tended to keep out of the Indian Civil Service, a great many of a class who ought never to have been found in it. Under the present system, no matter what Government was in power, a certain number would creep in, not so much on account of their own merits as the political influence of their friends; and if this went on beyond certain limitations, the efficiency of the service would always be very seriously impaired. Our service unquestionably contained many men who would do honour to any service in the world, though many of its members, in his opinion, could not obtain as good remuneration as they now received in any other employment. As to the statement that the faith of a Parliament was pledged to bonuses being given, he would observe, in the first place, that the condition of things in 1877 and 1873 differed very materially, since, under the operation of the statutory increase, almost every one of these gentlemen had received a large increase of salary,—$200 or thereabouts, in most cases; in the second place, that the cost of living at present was not as great as it was in 1873; and in the third place, that almost every class throughout the country had suffered very much from the hardness of the times, being obliged, in a great many instances, to reduce their expenditure. Those who received fixed incomes had no great reason to complain of their salaries, in view of the present state of the public finances. When the Bonus Bill was introduced by the Government, a rather strong feeling was shown against the increase of Civil Service allowances; and, in deference to this sentiment, the Bill was withdrawn. No doubt the report of the Committee would be very interesting. Similar Committees had been granted in other countries with Parliamentary institutions, and the Government were not disposed to stand in the way of the appointment of this Committee.

Mr. CURRIE.

Mr. MITCHELL said the point he had endeavoured to make was this:—When the bonus regulation was adopted, the salaries of Ministers was advanced from $5,000 to $7,000, and of members from $600 to $1,000; while Judges' salaries had been largely increased. If the hon. gentleman's argument with regard to hard times applied to the Civil Service, why should not a Bill be introduced to reduce the salaries of Ministers, members, and Judges.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said this might be taken into consideration. The salaries of certainly nine-tenths of the Civil Service, it was to be remembered, had been added to by the statutory increase. While the Estimates were under discussion, many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House seemed disposed to complain rather severely of the increase in this regard.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why should not the money, voted last year for bonuses, be distributed?

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said that the Committee should define the difference between the inside and the outside services. He had always understood that the former were those employed in the city of Ottawa alone, but he found that many of them had received no bounty, and were not considered as belonging to the inside service.

Mr. WORKMAN said he hoped that the appointment of the Committee would be attended with beneficial results. The patronage system was a mistake, and its abolition would delight him. Members of Parliament, as a rule, were not best qualified to recommend parties applying for Government situations. He thought that the competitive system would work very well, though it need not be so stringent as it was in England. It would, certainly, be better than the present system. He was aware that the Civil Service in Ottawa was very efficient, but he would regret to see a great many members of the outside service placed in positions of trust at the capital.

Mr. CAMERON said that one of the greatest evils connected with the service was that the Civil Service Act was not strictly adhered to. When any particularly good appointment was to be made, somehow or other the regulations were violated and some political hack, or, at all events, some one aided by political influence obtained the berth. This ought not to be the case, for the result was to destroy the spirit of emulation and hopes of preferment among faithful and efficient officers. He was not a believer in the competitive system. He thought that, in England, in every Department where it was tried, it had proved a failure.

Mr. CASEY: I do not think that is the case.

Mr. CAMERON said his hon. friend had no doubt read a great deal about it, made a hobby of it, and considered it perfect; but all he had read had convinced him that the system had not improved the service. The great evil was the withdrawal of promotions to valuable positions from good officers. This was wrong and unjust.

Mr. CASEY, in reply to observations made, said he would not retract his opinion that the Civil Service was not as efficient as it might be, and sufficient reason existed in this respect alone for asking for the Committee. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) seemed to think that he had spoken slightly and almost insultingly of the members of the service. He had had no such intention. He quite agreed with a great deal that had been said about many members of the service, who would be a credit to any profession or Civil Service in the world. Efficient men would get into the service under the system of patronage, for the Government, guided by the instinct of self-preservation, would secure a sufficient number of employes to serve them with a moderate degree of efficiency. The average of the service was as high as that of any other country where the same system prevailed. It was much above the service in the United States, and probably even above the average of the service in England before the introduction of the competitive system. He did not think, however, and he had official documents to back up the assertion, that our Civil Service was equal to that in England at the present time. The report of the first Civil Service Commission spoke very plainly on the subject, indeed much plainer than he had done in discussing the Canadian system. It said:

“Those whose abilities do not warrant an expectation that they will succeed in open professions, where they must encounter the competition of their contemporaries, and those whom indolence of temperament or physical infirmities unfit for active exertions are placed in the Civil Service, where they may obtain an honourable livelihood with little labour and with no risk; where their success depends upon their simply avoiding any flagrant misconduct, and attending with moderate regularity to routine duties; and in which they are secured against the ordinary consequences of old age, or failing health, by an arrangement which provides them with the means of supporting themselves after they have become incapacitated.”

These were strong words, and although he did not wish to apply them to Canada, yet he maintained that, to a certain degree, the same evils existed here. In concluding this branch of the subject, he would merely say that persons were not to blame, whether efficient or not, in accepting Civil Service positions for political reasons. It was to be expected that men would accept such positions when they were offered. He found fault with the system, however, which not only allowed, but had a tendency to promote, inefficient appointments. The present system of political patronage also had the effect of introducing more men into the service than were actually required. It was suggested that the Committee should enquire into the question of remuneration. The Committee could enquire into that matter as far as the existing state of things was concerned, but he did not think they could make any recommendation as to an increase in the salaries. In the lower ranks of the service he thought the salaries were insufficient, but the higher positions were amply remunerated. The evils connected with this matter of defective remuneration arose from the overcrowding of the service, which was a direct result of party patronage. Individually, he thought that the appointments should be left to a Board, not composed of politicians or selected for political reasons, which should select members of the Civil Service according to their qualifications and independent of their political proclivities. He hoped that the Committee would be able to consider and report a scheme for that purpose. His own opinion was that the system of competitive examination, which had proved so successful in England, was the best that could be adopted. It was suggested, however, that under such a system there might be some difficulty in excluding men of bad character from the service. He did not think this objection a very serious one. In England candidates were required to furnish satisfactory evidence respecting their character, and the Commissioners, acting in a judicial capacity, without any prejudices in regard to the parties under examination, could apply a much severer test of character than a man who had to select from his friends and supporters. He thought the chances of men of improper character entering the service were less under the competitive than the present system. In his opinion, men who were educated sufficiently to pass the examination, were more likely to be of good character than men of less culture. As a rule, it had been found that men of good education were of good character. The hon. the Minister of Finance had said that he was not sure that the verdict of opinion in England was altogether in favour of competitive examination. In this connection he might cite a letter from the Marquis of Salisbury to the Governor-General of India bearing on the Indian Civil Service; and bearing date 24th February, 1876:

“With respect to the principle of competition itself, the evidence you have collected sufficiently shows that it cannot be disturbed without injury to the public service. The expressions of opinions which I have received from competent judges in England lead me to the same conclusions. Of its success as a mode of selecting persons to serve in the Indian Civil Service, there seems to be no reasonable doubt. The ability which it collects is not the same in kind as that which distinguishes the service appointed under the previous system, and there may be truth in the allegation for which some of your officers contend, that under it, instances of the most conspicuous ability are more rare. But this difference, so far as it exists, may be reasonably attributed to a different cause. Great powers are developed by great occasions, and these have been of very rare occurrence since the present limits of the Empire have been reached. On the other hand, it is generally admitted that, if exceptional powers are rarer than in olden times, exceptions of an opposite kind have almost disappeared. Some writers speak in their reports of the physical inferiority of the candidates selected under the new system. On this point a conflict of testimony exists. While the evidence of actual observers, supported by the comparative sick-leave statistics, appears to incline to the less favourable view, there are distinguished medical witnesses in England upon the other side. The question appears to require further examination. It is possible that sufficient weight in the competition has not been given to physical qualifications, but this charge, if true, would not be an objection to the principle of competition, but rather to the mode in which it is applied. On the whole, your Excellency's personal testimony, based on a wide experience of the public service, and the prevalent opinion among the officers whom you have consulted, sufficiently establish that selection by competition has been successful in furnishing an efficient Indian service, and whatever defects may be noted, are not such as to justify any fundamental change of system.”

That last sentence was an answer to all the objections urged against the competitive examination system. The hon. member for Northumberland said that the intricate examinations of England would not be suitable to Canada. This was true enough. A mode of examination could, however, be adopted which would suit the educational condition of the country. The examination might go into subjects of a practical nature, and be so arranged that no undue advantage would be given to any class. In the part of Canada with which he was acquainted there was every opportunity for the poorer classes to obtain a good education, and many persons of humble parentage had become distinguished for their ability. Take the class of school teachers, for instance. They were, as a rule, not wealthy when they started in life, but it would be interesting to note how many school teachers had attained positions of considerable eminence in the country. One, at least, of that class was now in the Cabinet. If those men could take high positions in politics, he did not see that competitive examinations would at all interfere with their advancement. The Civil Service employé in India was not a mere copying or registering clerk, or a mere machine in the Department. He was a man to whom often judicial and diplomatic responsibility attached, and from whom a large amount of physical exertion in a trying climate was required. It was found, notwithstanding these high requirements, that the system of competitive examinations produced a much better class of men, physically and mentally, than could be hoped for under the patronage system. He had noticed that a discussion had taken place in the English House of Commons recently in regard to introducing this system of selecting candidates into the diplomatic service, which was admittedly the most difficult branch to apply it to. This fact proved conclusively that the system had worked satisfactorily in England. One of the objections raised by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Aylmer) was that the system give rise to a species of "cramping" which was not at all desirable. He had no doubt that evil could be remedied by amendments in the system. Indeed, the English Civil Service Board was now engaged in considering such amendments. The hon. gentleman also urged that we did not require too highly-educated men in the service, since they would be out of place and discontented. There was a great deal of force in the remark. We did not want men too highly educated, but we wanted men as well educated as could be procured for the salaries paid. In the event of a re-organization of the service, it would probably be recommended that the purely mechanical work should be delegated to the men of inferior education, at low salaries; while men of superior qualifications would be entrusted with the more difficult or professional work of the Departments at higher rates of remuneration. His objection to the present system was that it not only, as a matter of fact, made the service less efficient than it ought to be, but that it could not be expected, however well carried out, to secure the men best adapted for the various positions. Whatever system was eventually adopted, it should be with the object of making the service a high class profession—one into which it would be as great an honour to be admitted as into the legal, medical and engineering professions. It should be made one which young men would find it advantageous to enter; one in which promotion would be by seniority and merit combined; one in which, not to speak of superannuation, they would be able to make provision for old age; and, in short, one in which the ability, enterprise and intelligence of the country could find as satisfactory an outlet as in any other walk in life. Those were his aspirations with regard to the future of the service. He had no unfriendly feelings towards those connected with it at present; his only object was to elevate and improve it. He urged the House to give the matter serious consideration, and to follow the example of our serious, matter-of-fact cousins in England in adopting a system which would undoubtedly work a vast improvement in the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 49.]

(Mr. Cook.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. COOK said, in 1874, the Government of the day thought it necessary to pass a law by which parties could vote without being intimidated, and for the better securing of elections from fraud. He believed at the time that the Bill was for the benefit of the object it had in view; but, when he came to think over the matter, he felt sure that it afforded great means to bring about a fraudulent election. As he had explained before, in reply to a question from the right hon. member for Kingston, if a member wished to attain his election by fraud, or a person was particularly interested in a particular candidate, it was quite possible for him to evade the law. The returning-officer was, generally, a man of respectable character, and had a high appreciation of his oath, and the fraud was possible without his connivance at all. A man on receiving the ballot paper in the envelope could put the ballot into his pocket and hand the envelope, without the ballot, to the deputy returning-officer, who would deposit it in the box. He could then go out of the polling booth and secure a party whom he wished to purchase, and give him the abstracted ballot marked. The man who had been purchased could enclose the marked ballot in the envelope, and return the first man his own blank ballot. By this means, a vote could be secured from the opposite side, making two upon a division. Supposing there were thirty polling places, and five votes were purchased at each, the result would be as follows:—One vote on the first ballot paper taken away would be lost, but the other four would be gained, which would on the whole make 120 purchased votes, which, upon a division, would be 240. He thought a change should take place at once. We were having constant elections from time to time. Since 1874 the aggregate number of elections was 74, being nearly one-half of the total number. In 1874, there were 28 elections; 20 of them being on account of decisions of the Courts. The Opposition gained one and the Ministry gained one, leaving the House the same at the close of the year as it was at the commencement. In 1875, there were 22 elections voided by the Courts, five members of the House accepted office, and one resigned, making 28 elections altogether. There was a Ministerial gain of three, and an Opposition gain of five, making a comparative gain on the whole for the Opposition of two. In 1876, there were four elections voided by the Courts, four members of the House accepted office, and three resigned, making eleven elections in all, on which the Opposition made a clear gain of six. In 1874-5-6 there was a gain for the Opposition of nine. The county of Charlevoix was just in the throes of an election, and it was possible that other elections would take place shortly. It was therefore important for the purity of elections that the law he proposed should be allowed to pass at this stage of the Session. He was satisfied that every hon. member would agree with him that the ballot system ought to be such that no advantage could be taken of it. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. BLAKE said he had always been of the opinion that the envelope was not an improvement, and that some scheme might be and ought to be devised by which the complication of putting the paper in the envelope—altogether separate from the difficulties referred to by the hon. member who had just sat down—could be removed. The difficulties of the ballot system had been especially brought out in one of the Australian colonies, where it was notorious, before the ballot was adopted in England, that fraud could be practised. He was entirely in sympathy with the effort made to effect a change in the depositing of the ballot. Although there would probably be some elections between now and the next general elections, yet the Government had not seen fit to accede to the proposal of making changes to Election Law piecemeal. When the Election Law was changed, it should only be after some well-considered and well-devised system had been presented. A convenient time for the change would be at the next Session of Parliament, when the House would have derived much more experience of the working of the present law. He was, therefore, obliged to ask his hon. friend to adopt the same course as the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Richard) had adopted—to have the order discharged upon the assurance that the Government were considering the matter, and that, if possible, a Bill to meet the difficulty would be introduced next Session.

Mr. CAMERON called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to another grievance. In Ontario, there was a law that, when the majority was small, the votes had to be recounted by the County Judges before the official return was made. Had this law been in force in the Dominion he would have occupied his seat at least one Session before he did. It was not right that deputy returning-officers should be invested with such absolute powers as they now had. As a rule, deputy returning-officers were partizans—it was almost impossible to appoint non-partizans, and they should have their authority very circumscribed. As a rule, they were men of little education, and of no judicial experience of that character which was required to decide the really difficult question as to whether a ballot was properly marked or not. He had prepared a Bill which would hand that over to the County Judges in case of a close election; but, on the statement of the hon. the Minister of Justice that the Election Law would be amended next Session, he would withdraw it, with the hope that his suggestion would be acted upon.

Mr. BLAKE said he was glad to receive any suggestion on the Election Law, as it was a question of great difficulty. He should be glad if the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) would communicate the substance of the Bill to him if he did not introduce it.

Mr. CAMERON said the Bill was merely a transcript of the Ontario Act, with the necessary modifications to suit the Dominion Constitution.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at Ten minutes before
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 22nd March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

MONTREAL HARBOUR TOLLS BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend the Act 36 Vic., cap. 61, respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, by repealing the existing Tariff of Tolls and Dues on vessels using the Harbour, and on merchandize and other things landed from or shipped on board such vessels, from the first day of April next, and substituting a new Tariff, which will then be submitted for the consideration of the Committee; and by giving the said Commissioners power from time to time to alter or modify the said Tariff with the consent and approval of the Governor in Council.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the resolution contemplated two changes. The first related to the readjustment of the tariff for the harbour of Montreal. The most material change concerned dry goods. At present, at this port, these were subject to one-quarter of one per cent. duty on value, and the effect was said to have been to divert this trade from the St. Lawrence to other channels. The Harbour Commissioners, with the concurrence of the commercial community of Montreal, he believed, thought that in the interest of the city a change was necessary. It was proposed, in consequence, to alter the ad valorem to a specific duty, to be collected on weight or measurement. The other change would empower the Harbour Commissioners, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to change, modify, alter and re-alter the tariff as experience might suggest to be expedient and desirable. That this was really an improvement it was unnecessary to argue, in his opinion. It seemed too troublesome to require the Commissioners to come to Parliament to secure modifications in the tariff. The Harbour Commissioners, who represented the commercial interests of Montreal, and the representatives of Montreal in Parliament approved, he understood, of the contemplated change.

Mr. MASSON asked why these propositions had not been submitted in the resolution.

Mr. SMITH said they were too voluminous. They would appear in the Bill.

Mr. MASSON said that the adoption of the resolution signified approval of its principle. Hence full details should be submitted to the House at the outset.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this approval was not obligatory.

Mr. MASSON said, if the present procedure was continued, there would no longer be any use in considering such matters in Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, to his personal knowledge, within a couple of years back, the present tariff affected injuriously the commercial interests of Montreal.

Mr. HOLTON said this tariff was adapted to trade interests in Montreal when it first came into force many years ago. This state of things no longer existed, and the Board of Trade had not only asked for a change, but urged that they should have the power of changing the tariff when they deemed it necessary, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. He thought that all interests were abundantly protected in the propositions submitted. This being of the nature of a local measure of taxation, he had some doubts as to whether it should be considered in Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said both tariffs, the present and the one proposed, might be printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

Resolutions agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 90) Respecting the tolls of the Harbour of Montreal.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. SMITH.

GAMING HOUSES SUPPRESSION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 80.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 80) To amend the Act for suppressing Gaming Houses.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said he proposed to fill up the blank in the 4th clause with the words: "Not less than $20 or more than $100;" and to add to the clause the words: "And, in default of payment, imprisonment in the common gaol for a term not exceeding two months, provided always that such persons shall not be liable on trial to be examined under the 6th section of the Act by this Act amended."

Amendments agreed to.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendments read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Resolution declaring it expedient to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, reported from Committee of the Whole on March 20th, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 91) To amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue.

Bill read the first time.

GAS AND GAS METERS INSPECTION BILL.

FIRST READING.

Resolutions respecting the inspection of gas and gas meters, reported from the Committee of the Whole on March 20th, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 92) Further to amend the Act to provide for the inspection of gas and gas meters.

Bill read the first time.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 83.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the Bill was to remedy certain defects and ambiguities in the law suggested by the practical working of the Act of 1868. The amendments were in the interest of the steamboat owners, who agreed with the provisions of the proposed measure.

Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright for the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Orton in amendment to the said proposed amendment, read.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said that the readjustment of the tariff in such a manner as to protect, more efficaciously than was at present the case, our agricultural, mining and industrial interests, was aimed at in the motions of the hon. members for Kingston and Centre Wellington, then before the House. He was of the opinion, as an hon. member had already very properly remarked, that the question at issue was a national one. It was from this point of view that it should be regarded by the House and by the country. It was not one concerning which political parties should battle, but it was exclusively national; it should be debated with a view to the general public interests, and he demanded of the Government—at all events of the representatives of the Province of Quebec, who were members and supporters of it—and who had advocated protectionist views, why a protective policy had not been adopted in the common interests of the Dominion. He had always understood that, under a constitutional régime, changes of Government only took place on matters affecting principles, in the best sense of the word; but hon. gentlemen opposite, since they had attained power, had utterly disregarded this rule. The body political resembled the body corporal; and when any of the parts of the human body were attacked by disease, all the rest suffered in consequence. This was equally the case with the body social; when any of the arteries of business—whether agricultural, or industrial—were disordered, the whole body also suffered. The great majority of the people of this country—even including the Maritime Provinces—felt that the only remedy for the present state of things was protection. Even the hon. members for Halifax and Cape Breton asked for protection. Almost every one admitted that protection was necessary, and there was great reason for it. Many circumstances and many facts proved that it was not only a political, but also in some sort a social necessity. In the first place a great crisis and a great depression was spread throughout the country, and had existed for several years. With reference to this crisis they had heard warnings from several public men, but notably from the Finance Minister when delivering his Budget speech in 1874-5, when, moreover, he demanded an increase of taxation to the extent of several millions. This crisis affected everybody; the farmers obtained less for their produce, and manufacturers everywhere within our borders had almost ceased to manufacture, or, at all events, they only turned out a small quantity of goods compared with their productions during former and more prosperous years. On every side, business was stagnant and unsound. On the other hand, the Government, in place of arresting the descent of the country into general bankruptcy, had done everything possible to make things worse, by increasing expenditure to an extravagant degree. These hon. gentlemen, on reaching the Treasury benches, had fattened themselves at the expense of the public misery, and, above all, thrown fat things in the way of their friends. He was not the least in the world of the opinion that the Government was entirely responsible for the present sad condition of affairs. Governments were, and above all this Government was, far from being an instrument in the hands of Providence—unless indeed it was an instrument of punishment; but they could say without hesitation that the Government could have softened the blow, and ameliorated the present state of affairs. Yet nothing had been done since the Government had acceded to power. This was not the manner in which serious and real statesmen should have acted. These hon. gentlemen had done nothing either to prevent, resist or diminish the effects of the existing depression. During the space of nine years, ending on the 30th of last June—between June, 1868, and June 30th, 1876,—we had imported goods valued at about nine hundred millions,—$398,718,133—and exported goods to a value exceeding six hundred millions — $586,434,704. Thus the balance of trade against us during this period of time reached the figure of $212,000,000. During the previous years, the balance of trade was also against us, but naturally not to so great a degree, as our population was not at that epoch of our history so large as it was to-day. The first cause of the present crisis was the extraordinary increase of imports over exports. Much had been said in reply to this, and it had been argued that the fact of a people or nation importing much more than it produced and exported was of no consequence, from the point of view of the political economist. This assertion, to a certain point, might be relatively true, but, nevertheless, strong proofs to the contrary, as far as we were concerned, existed. That allegation might hold true with regard to an old country, but in this country we could not heal the wound caused by such an excess of imports over exports without doing injury to ourselves. We had to pay, for the goods imported, the freights gained by our shipping classes, the money loaned to our country for public improvements, and to our private citizens by English capitalists. These loans, coupled with the money brought here by immigrants, represented the balance against us of $212,000,000. The time had now arrived when this debt was to be paid, and the money necessary had to be found. The consequent interest had to be paid, and the means to be collected together. He believed that the excess of imports over exports had now reached their highest point. One had only to look into the official Gazettes of the various Provinces to find an immense number of current bankruptcies. This was the case in all our Provinces, but particularly in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. These bankruptcies were occurring daily; and why? The reason was simple: During the past several years, the excess of imports to which he had alluded had existed, and goods were to a certain extent forced upon the merchants of the Dominion; men lived beyond their means; and, at the present hour, perhaps three-quarters or four-fifths of the property of the country was mortgaged against existing liabilities. We had, however, reached a limit in this regard—to a certain extent at least—and this was due to exhaustion of credit. So much for this state of things; and the sole remedy for it, in the wisdom of nations, as was shown by the history of all countries that had played an important rôle in the world, was protection. This was wise. Persons who for a long series of years had lived on means they had not really possessed were obliged to reduce their expenditure, and produce for themselves what they could no longer purchase elsewhere. All peoples who had attained a great degree of prosperity had reached it by means of protection. They always began their careers by this method which was so simple and so natural; and as much as this was possible they kept their capital at home instead of sending it abroad. They began by producing sufficient for their own wants, and, having reached this point, they began to sell to others. Such had been the case with England, and to such a policy was due its great good fortune and immense wealth. Capable of doing an extraordinary amount of business and favoured by great cheapness of labour after having reached this happy point, England said in effect to the other nations of the world: "I can now enter into competition with any people; and, having found this out, I open my doors to you, and do you now open your doors to me." The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had demonstrated the immense benefits which had accrued to France, owing to her protective policy, due to the great genius of Colbert. He would cite extracts from a remarkable work published by Mr. Cary with regard to the effects of protection in France:

"Colbert opened the way for the national labour in a manner at once wise and regular, and to his measures are due the facts that France ceased to be exclusively agricultural, and became enriched by the new value given to her land, and to the labours of her people."

And a little further on:

"Louis XIV might with truth and justice say that, in giving him Colbert, God had done much for the prosperity and glory of his reign. France might add that she owes to his wise counsels the wonderful development of her industry, and that this, in turn, owes to them the strength which now permits it to reduce the barriers by which it has been protected."—Principles of Social Science, by Cary, vol. 2, pp. 46 to 47.

Pierre Larousse, another author, went further and established the fact that duties were not properly speaking levied in the interest of the public Treasury, but in order to create, to encourage, and to protect national industries. He stated:

"Customs duties have for their object not the interest of the public treasury, but the interests of native agriculture, trade, and industry; they form not a tax but a premium of encouragement for native productions."—Pierre Larousse—Sayings of the nineteenth century.

He did not think it was in the least degree in the world denied or attempted to be denied, that protection had made France what she now was—powerful and prosperous. Protection had been followed by precisely the same effects in England, which had become prosperous only after she had recourse to this means, even to a most extravagant point; enormous penalties having at one time been inflicted on those who introduced foreign products into the kingdom. No one denied this. The effects of the system in France had been splendid, and they had struck with admiration all those who were interested in this fine and great country. France had encouraged at any price, her silk and other manufactories, and her various interests, including those relating to agriculture. The result had been that she had made immense progress in these respects, even greater than the world had realized. Everybody knew of the terrible war in which she had recently been engaged, and of the milliards she had to pay; and yet, in 1875, so elastic and so supple was she in resources, and above all with reference to her agricultural and industrial interests, owing to an extraordinary and powerful protection, she had accomplished real prodigies. She had not only paid off her debt, but she had produced so much corn, and wine, and silk, that the English market had felt it. In this connection he had read a magnificent article in the London Times enumerating the extraordinary advantages enjoyed by France, and extolling the activity and industry, and economical spirit of the French people, and stating that if such a people would follow a proper policy during twenty years, they would become the first people in the world, and play in Europe the first rôle to which they had been accustomed. This was what one of the most powerful organs of public opinion in England said of France in 1875. And when the political economy and history of France was studied, this great prosperity and good fortune, and these great riches would be found to be due to the doctrines of the great Colbert. He had heard some hon. member during the debates on this subject last year say that France was become Free-trade, and that she was no longer Protectionist. This was not the case; but supposing that France had adopted the theories of free trade then she would only have done what England had done. Once having rendered herself capable of being mistress of the markets of the world, and once more able to proceed more cheaply than a great number of other countries, like England she would have consulted her own interests, and assured herself of the retention of her superiority by saying to other countries: "I now open my doors to you; open your doors to me." In 1860, France, however, was far from becoming Free-trade. She negotiated a treaty, but, so far from an arrangement having been made for the free interchange of products with England, duties imposed by the terms of this treaty on certain English goods amounted to 40 per cent. He would read an extract from a paper written in this regard, exposing the advantageous results of the treaty as far as France was concerned:

"The Treaty (of 1860) confined itself to the removal of prohibition, which besides them had few defenders, replacing them by taxes which were extended to 30 per cent., that is to say, an excessive figure equivalent in the majority of cases to prohibition. * * * With the exception of iron goods, which were taxed at the rate of seven francs per 100 kilogrammes and this represented about 40 per cent. on the price of the most ordinary qualities, the treaty was limited to laying down the principle that the duties to be paid on English productions entering France, should not exceed 30 per cent. * * * The Anglo-French convention was followed by negotiations opened with the majority of the Governments of Europe. Between 1861 and 1867, France entered into commercial agreements, successively with Belgium, the German Zollverein, Portugal, Austria, and the Pontifical States. Each of these conventions stipulated for the exchange of reciprocal trade and navigation facilities, France conceding the lowered tariff which had been granted to England and obtaining a decrease of taxation upon her productions.—Extract from an article written by C. Lavalée on Commercial Treaties and Customs Tariffs in the Revue des Deux Mondes.

This Treaty was founded on Protectionist principles. Many articles were taxed thirty per cent. and others as high as forty per cent., and, in face of these facts, they were told to follow the example of the French people, that France had declared for free trade and submitted to the adoption of the English policy; and all this when in opposition, to the Protectionist tariff of that country, we had only a 17½ per cent. tariff. Protection had caused the good fortune and prosperity and power enjoyed by the the great and magnificent American Republic. He had already had occasion to cite words spoken by one of the greatest of American statesmen, and he would repeat them in the House.

MR. MOUSSEAU.

That great tariff which was termed the American system was adopted in 1824, after ten weeks of debate, in the course of which the most remarkable and the most eminent of the then American statesmen, such as Benton and Clay, and others of equal power had spoken. Several years later, a second and similar battle had taken place with regard to the same tariff, which many then wished to have remodelled. This was in 1828. Mr. Clay then said:

"Protection has been for the United States the sheet-anchor of its prosperity and the mainspring of its progress. The seven years which preceded the adoption of the protective tariff of 1824 have been most disastrous, while the seven years which have succeeded have been the most prosperous the United States ever witnessed. Protection for any country signifies prosperity."

It was important to go back to the period when the tariff in question was adopted—when this policy which was called the American system was inaugurated in the United States. That period resembled the time when the present Minister of Finance uttered his famous complaints, and had additional taxation to the extent of three millions placed upon the shoulders of the people of this country. In the United States in 1824, as in Canada to-day, great depression existed; trade was arrested; and, as in this country now, bankruptcies prevailed most extensively. Two, three, four, and even ten, occurred daily; and Congress then, as Parliament now, was called upon to render assistance to unfortunate debtors and defrauded creditors. With permission of the Speaker, he would read an extract from the speech of Mr. Clay when he made his motion in support of the great protective measure introduced in 1824 in the interests of the United States. It was delivered during the Presidency of James Monroe. This was what that great statesman then said, and his remarks were applicable to the present condition of Canada, and corresponded to the observations of the Minister of Finance in 1874:

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain perishing in our barns for want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies; by a universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of wages of labour; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honours and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money, by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor; and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation, which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per centum within a few years. This distress pervades every part of the Union, every class of society; all feel it, though it may be felt at different places, in different degrees. It is like the atmosphere which surrounds us: all must inhale it and none can escape from it. A few years ago the planting interest consoled itself with its happy exemptions from the general calamity; but it has now reached this interest also, which experiences though with less severity the general suffering. It is most painful to me to attempt to sketch, or to dwell on the gloom of this picture. But I have exaggerated nothing. Perfect fidelity to the original would have authorized me to have thrown on deeper and darker hues."

In a word, this description applied with perfection to this country; and from that time they changed the principle on which duties were levied in the United States. Previously, the Americans had imposed duties for revenue purposes; the securing of revenue was the great object in view, and protection was incidental. But, in framing the tariff of 1824, this principle was reversed, and protection was made the rule, revenue having become an incidental object. It was then stated:

"Revenue the object, protection the incident, had been the rule in the earlier tariffs; now that rule was sought to be reversed, and to make protection the object of the law, and revenue the incident."

And further:

"That the free-trade system, which is proposed as its substitute, ought really to be considered as the British Colonial system."

He did not believe that he was a false prophet, or that he spoke as a pessimist, when he said that we in this country had arrived at this state of things.

We had reached a point in our history which corresponded to the year 1824 in the history of the United States. Our debt had been largely added to; our public expenditure had been increased in the same proportion; we had imported more than we could pay for; and we were, in consequence, obliged to put an end to this state of things, and we should endeavour to find out whether we possessed the materials necessary to supply the goods which we had hitherto purchased elsewhere. With the aid of the arms of protection, we should keep amongst us capital and our population. It was worthy of remark that the struggle with regard to protection prevailed in the United States in 1828, in 1832, and in 1834. Renewed efforts were made on the one side to diminish the tariff, and on the other side to further increase it; and those who advocated absolute protection succeeded in carrying their point by an immense majority. With reference to a great variety of articles, the duties were advanced from 25 to 50 per cent. At the same time, several resolutions were adopted in State Legislatures in favour of the protection movement; and in these resolutions were to be found many arguments which applied perfectly to the existing condition of this country, and which ought to encourage the House to take advantage of our present misery to so re-adjust the tariff that it would tax more heavily what we could manufacture and even cheapen necessaries of life. They could justly modify the tariff in a protective direction, since Confederation had been accomplished. As he had already had the honour of saying in this Chamber, the demand for the introduction of a protective system had been made year after year. It had been urged that duties should be levied on foreign products and foreign manufactures we could ourselves supply, and above all that such duties should be applied on English manufactures. The reason therefor was very simple,—while a mere colony, we were assisted by English capital and aided by England, but, when Confederation was brought about, the situation was very different. England then said to the Dominion of Canada: "You can now walk alone;" and from that moment we had conquered the right of levying duties on English as well as American merchandize. They heard the other day a philosophical and distinguished member of the Government say that England had marched with the United States in the history of protection; and Thierry, from whose work he had quoted, had perceived that, in England as everywhere else, the first principle forming the real foundation of her commerce and immense prosperity had been protection. Many people were of opinion that England owed this great prosperity to free trade, but the contrary was the case; England had reached the proud position of one of the first nations of the world in consequence of a protective policy, in consequence of her excellent seamen, and above all, in consequence of the discovery of the route by the Cape of Good Hope to the vast trade of the East. After the discovery by the Portuguese of the route to the East round the Cape of Good Hope, she managed, by her great length of sea coast, and by the great aptitude of her people for seafaring pursuits, to beat the Portuguese and Dutch in the struggle for the eastern trade; and this eastern trade filled the coffers of her merchants and her people with wealth. The magnitude of this trade enabled her to become a manufacturing country, and the wealth got by this trade gave her the capital required. She was more favourably situated than any other country for the eastern trade, so long as the bulk of it passed by the route of the Cape of Good Hope. She kept it yet, notwithstanding the Suez Canal; she opposed it because she knew it might give all the countries along the Mediterranean a fair chance for successful competition. Her wisdom, the great sagacity of Disraeli, prompted her to get the control of that great international highway. We, on this side of the waters, could never expect, at this stage of the history of the world of commerce, to grow into great wealth by such a stroke of fortune as the discovery of a new route of commerce from which we could exclude all others. We must, therefore, take the ordinary course, and protect our infant industries. When, in future times, the commerce of the East passed over our Pacific Railway, we would be prepared to do it or participate in it; and, by that time, we should, probably, have grown sufficiently into a manufacturing country, and should be able to cry "Free trade" with all nations. This, he should suppose, would be about the time the hon. the Premier's great grandson occupied his seat and his position in this House. Thus England had succeeded in becoming a great nation, and in monopolising the commerce of the east. Her coffers had been filled and, to a certain extent, her people had been millionaires. Then she became the first nation in the world—but this was not due to free trade. The present policy of England had not been adopted all of a sudden; the Imperial Parliament had not hastily opened the doors of England to the world, in connection with her present policy. War or struggles took place in the House of Commons before it was adopted, and very violent attacks were made upon the policy of Sir Robert Peel. He would read an extract from a remarkable letter, written on the 10th of June, 1848, to Lord John Russell, as follows:—

"The doctrine of free exchange or unrestrained competition between nations, may be said to constitute the entire basis of that legislation. It has long been maintained by a certain section of the modern school of political economy that this principle of universal competition is the true path to the material prosperity of nations; and after much contention this principle has been adopted by the British legislature. If, therefore, it is right, it must necessarily admit of receiving full effect; if it is wrong, the farther it is carried out the more disastrous must be the results.

"Now, it is obvious that this principle of competition is one derived from the notion of self-reliance or self-dependence. The State which adopts it necessarily presupposes that it is at least on a footing of equality with all others; for we cannot imagine any nation deliberately to expose itself to the rivalry of a neighbour its superior in all great branches of industry. No nation will, in fact, adopt it unless it expects to derive immediate advantage from the change, because the commercial spirit which necessarily directs the legislator upon this point is the one of all others which leads to speedy results; and this consideration ought amply to account for the rejection of our free-trade principle by the statesmen both of Europe and America. Our legislators considered, whether justly or not I shall stop to enquire, that we had nothing to lose and everything to gain by a free competition with foreign States, while they seem to think they have much to lose and nothing to gain by a free competition with us.

"The capital employed in purchasing foreign goods for home consumption, when this purchase is made with the produce of domestic industry, replaces also by every operation two distinct capitals, but one of them only is employed in supporting domestic industry. The capital which sends British goods to Portugal, and brings back Portuguese goods to Great Britain, replaces, by every such operation, only one British capital, the other is a Portuguese one. Though the returns, therefore, of the foreign trade of consumption should be as quick as those of the home trade, the capital employed in it will give but one-half the encouragement to the industry or productive labour of the country.

"The British Government,' says M. Say, seems not to have perceived that the most profitable sales to a nation are those made by one individual to another within the nation, for these latter imply a national production of two values, the value sold and that given in exchange.' How far this remark may be applicable to the recent commercial policy of the British Government, I shall leave your Lordship to determine; but it is almost superfluous to observe that the opinions of these two authorities—and none higher can be produced in their respective countries—are obviously and necessarily inconsistent with the principle of free-trade, or universal competition. If the home trade is more advantageous than the foreign, why allow the latter in any instance to replace the former? For even if foreign nations, as was predicted, were to reciprocate with us, which they do not, the free exchange of our produce with theirs would, according to the opinions of Smith and Say, be only as advantageous as if an exchange took place within the nation itself.

"It is to be observed that the first victims of free-trade are the weaker and more dependent interests of the state, viz., our working classes at home, and our colonists abroad."

This applied to the false arguments used by Free-traders with regard to the balance of trade, and to those who treated lightly the matter of our purchasing elsewhere what we could easily manufacture to our great advantage at home. In fact, England had proclaimed free trade when she was sure that she could successfully compete with her neighbours; and even when she did so, the other nations of the world, by means of a protective policy, encouraged their industries and their manufactures, which else would have suffered severely from foreign competition. Poor families were now lacking bread and employment in Canada; and they were obliged to leave the country and expatriate themselves, because the protective policy which the country had demanded had not been accorded by the Government. The legitimate complaints of these people and of these families were even turned into ridicule, and the cry for protection was disregarded, though for many people it meant work and bread. Many had spoken of the treaty negotiated between France and England in 1860, but since then Europe had returned to the protective system. And the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, Sir Stafford Northcote, had said at a great public meeting in England in this regard:

"I have come to the conclusion that those countries themselves are as deeply interested as England can be in the maintenance of a liberal policy, and that if we could only get out of the heads of these nations the idea that England was pressing this matter for English and selfish purposes, if we could only get them to look at the question from their own points of view, we might feel well assured that they would come to a right conclusion. It is not by dwelling on the increase of English exports that we shall disarm the prejudice of local coteries abroad. The facts mentioned by Mr. Grant Duff show the grave bearing this question has on commercial interests in this country. But the larger fact which advocates of free trade must bring home to the Continental mind is that these increases of English trade imply a vast increase to the trade of other countries.

"The sudden spread of representative institutions through Europe during the last twelve or fifteen years is suggested as the source of this renewed strength of this protection. 'Sinister interests' may have thus found voice, but it remains to be seen whether they have found also political power and permanent influence. No doubt in Italy Protectionist opinions have acquired a very alarming authority. In Austria too they seemed at the commencement of the year to be carrying all before them."

The Imperial Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavoured to make the European nations believe that England had adopted the Free-trade system for the good of other nations, but the fact was that this Minister was frightened at the policy of these other nations, and he did not wish Austria, France, and other countries, to adopt the principles of protection in order to prevent English products from reaching their markets and entering into disastrous competition with their productions. The London Times stated in this relation :

“ It cannot be too often recalled that the interest of England in the progress of free trade, so far as she has a special interest, is solely due to the accident of her advanced manufacturing industry at the present time. The theory of free trade does not secure her any superiority over other nations.”

This was what the organ of public opinion in England said. There were two great reasons accounting for the position England held to-day. She possessed the commerce of the East, and owing to the enormous energy of her people and the cheapness of her labour, and coal and iron, she had the advantage over many other nations. These were the immense elements of her prosperity and superiority, and this enabled her to make disastrous competition with other nations and to open her doors to them. He would ask whether the Dominion occupied a similar position. We were a young colony, and almost a primitive people, and it was utterly impossible for us to imitate the policy of England; on the contrary, we should adopt a protective policy in order to furnish ourselves with what we required. This was an important debate as far as the interests of the country were concerned. This famous system of free trade had at length ended in frightening the English themselves. They were forced to come to the succour of workmen, and to endeavour to meet the disastrous competition to which they were exposed from France and the United States in their own market. The London Times on the 1st inst., mentioned the cry of distress raised by the people, but it did not dare to give the real reason for the inferiority of England in this respect. It did not desire to state why France and the United States were in a position to compete with England. It would not admit that England was absolutely a victim to the system of free trade—despite the fact that at the present hour the United States and France were selling their most important productions in the English market cheaper than they could be manufactured in England. The Times said :

MR. MOUSSEAU.

“ We hear ominous complaints that we are undersold in cheapness and surpassed in the excellence of our manufactures; there are numerous explanations of these facts, but none of them are satisfactory.

“ After all allowances are made, the manufacturers of arms in the United States are proved to be real competitors with us in the markets of the world. Nor is this the only branch of industry in which their rivalry is felt. Even in the matter of textile fabrics they are found to bid against us in neutral markets where no hostile tariffs yield any discriminating duties in their favour. That this should be the case in Canada may be partly explained by the contiguity of the Dominion, but it is true of more distant parts, where we might be supposed to have natural advantages.

“ We know that our markets are regularly supplied with articles manufactured in, and imported from the United States. A singular illustration of this successful rivalry has been recently forced upon the attention of all who are interested in current political events. The Porte has been providing for future contingencies by laying in supplies of arms and ammunition, and in order to obtain them has gone across the Atlantic. How are we to account for this fact, except upon the hypothesis that rifles and cartridges can be bought cheaper and better in Rhode Island than in Warwickshire? We may retain the command of the world in the manufacture of iron-clads, but we do not possess it in the manufacture of small-arms; and if we have lost it in the latter case, how long can we hope to keep it in the former?

“ The problem is, perhaps, political rather than educational, and it deserves the closest attention of those who are interested in the future well-being of the nation. It is most important because it is not to be denied that the advantage we have hitherto possessed in the command of cheap power naturally tends to diminish with coming years.”

This was the situation. Englishmen were always invoking these humanitarian authorities and these free-trade philosophers as a duty, but they dared not admit what was the real cause of the evil, or what was the real cause of the inferiority of England in this respect; but the world would draw the natural consequences from the facts, and everybody would agree with him that, if England to-day occupied such a position, it was because it was held that free trade should continue to perpetuity. France had been selling products of iron and steel in England at lower rates than they could be procured for and manufactured in her own market. He held that no lesson ought to be more instructive to the people of this country than the lesson given in the above extract from the Times, the great organ of public opinion in England. He had, hitherto, spoken of disagreeable matters, but his topic would now brighten. He would show to the House that the doctrines he had enunciated were those which had been maintained by hon. gentleman opposite, and by means of which they had attained power; and with which—exhibiting an extraordinary degree of hypocrisy—they had carried the famous election in Montreal West in 1875. When it was seen that these were the doctrines of these hon. gentlemen, he thought it would be difficult for the great majority, if not all, at least of the hon. members from the Province of Quebec, to abstain from voting for the motions of his hon. friends from Centre Wellington and Kingston. He would read an article written by a young and distinguished Liberal, L. O. David, who had been a contributor to a journal with which he himself had been connected. This article was a portion of a lecture delivered on the subject of the necessity for protection to our national industries. The Liberals of the Province of Quebec had warmly embraced the Protectionist programme, and it had been proclaimed repeatedly on the hustings, at the doors of churches and at public meetings. It was enthusiastically adapted as part of the programme of the Parti-National—and it was declared, in this article, that the pursuit of agriculture alone would not suffice for a country like the Province of Quebec. The article concluded as follows:

“Agriculture could not suffice for us in a country where the climate was so severe, and the increase of population so extraordinary. It is impossible for a people, which, during one half of the year, eats what it has produced during the other half, to enrich themselves. The best proof that agriculture was not alone sufficient, was that French-Canadians by thousands left their homes every year to seek for employment from foreign manufacturers. Would they not remain in their own country if they possessed there what they sought elsewhere? People were required here, it is said, and this is no doubt the case, and this state of things will be much worse still in the future if this current of emigration is not arrested. But when are labourers needed above all in this country? During the summer, for three or four months; and is it to be believed that the labour of three or four months, or even of six months, will be sufficient to support families possessing ten or twelve children? To keep these crowds of emigrants who are leaving us, provide manufactures and employment and you will have workmen; the prosperity of Lower Canada will be revived, our agriculturists will be more prosperous, and all classes of society will be richer and happier. * * * Another picture which should alarm us to an equal degree, and give us a sorrowful impression as to our situation, is comprised in the comparison of our imports with our exports (the former, during the nine years ending 30th June, 1876, amounted to $898,718,138, and the latter to $686,434,704, giving a balance against us of $212,293,434). The less we produce the more we consume. Our agricultural and forest products no longer sufficing to pay for our imports, we are obliged to pay for their excess over exports in gold. Having neither gold nor silver for the purpose, it is necessary for us to borrow it. We resemble the father of the family who is so senseless as to expend $1,000 a year while he has only an income of $500 a year; at the end of a certain number of years the sheriff seizes his property, and what becomes of him? He will go to the United States.”

The Nationalists had at length attained power, and on their wings the Government had acceded to office, but they had done nothing in the promised direction. The elections had been run on the protection question; and Mr. Joly, leader of the Liberals in the Province of Quebec, declared himself squarely in its favour. In the elections of 1871, 1872 and 1874, protection was the policy of the Conservative, Liberal and National parties in the Province of Quebec. Many of the Liberals had stated, during these elections, that the misfortunes of their Province were due to the fact that Sir George Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald had not given protection to the industries of the country. Even in Quebec, during the Session of 1871, the hon. member for Arthabaska had discussed the question of protection, although this was useless and out of place, as the Local House of course did not control the revenue of the Dominion; and another hon. gentleman, on the opposite side of the House, had written letters on the same subject in favor of protection to a paper which he had had the honour of editing. In 1872, the discussion of this question was more apropos, as it took place during the Federal elections. In all counties and in all the parishes, the Nationalists only advocated protection. The New Brunswick school question was touched upon, it was true, but the question which took the first place was protection. One of the finest speeches he had ever heard the hon. member for Montreal East deliver was given on St. James' Square, in front of St. James' Church, Montreal, at that time, and then the hon. gentleman declared in favour of protection and charged the responsibility for the serious emigration of the French Canadian people to the United States, and for the distress which seemed to afflict the Province, upon Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier, because they had not granted the country protection. The hon. gentleman also assured the workingmen, who gave him a handsome majority at the election, that once on the floor of the House his eloquent voice would be heard in behalf of protection. Meanwhile, hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House seemed amused, but, if they voted against the motions before the House, the electors, when the elections again came on, would by no means forget their conduct. The most curious spectacle was afforded in 1875, when the election occurred in the constituency of Montreal West. Montreal West was opposed to the policy of the Government, but they did not wish to see Mr. Tom White returned; and what did the Government do? They knew that no advocate of their policy could be elected in the constituency, and there one of the great faults committed by the Administration was perpetrated. They had recourse to dishonourable and disgraceful tactics. The present representative of the constituency was brought out as a Protectionist candidate, and the electors were told: "Do not vote for Tom White; he is in Opposition, and if you vote for him you will not secure protection; but vote for Mr. Workman because he is a Ministerialist, and if you vote for him you will obtain protection and bread." This unworthy farce, this shameful piece of hypocrisy was carried to a conclusion, and the First Minister had lent himself to it in leaving it to be inferred that he (Mr. Mackenzie) was favourable to the news expressed by his candidate. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had been, moreover, one of the speakers at the meeting of the Protectionist and Ministerial candidates. The manner in which this election was conducted was a great public scandal. What he reproached the Parti-National and the Liberal Party—as they called themselves—for was their having two different policies. In the country and in the town these policies varied. In the faubourgs of Montreal and in other cities, manufacturing centres, they cried à tue tête that Protectionists should be elected, and in the country they denounced protection on the ground that it would increase taxation. Their hypocrisy was extraordinary and a scandal. They should have been honest enough to express their opinions on all occasions. The very same persons who had advocated protection in Montreal, had in his own hearing condemned a Protectionist policy in the county of Argenteuil. He had heard the hon. member for Jacques Cartier say, in the course of a fine speech delivered in the county of Bagot last year, that the protective system was a bad one because it increased taxation; but, in the cities, these same gentlemen loudly maintained that protection caused prosperity and was a benefit. The policy was intended to flatter the ears of workingmen in the cities, and the other policy was designed to gratify the residents of the country. The same policy was pursued in the county of Argenteuil, when it was proposed to bring out Mr. Thomas White against the present member for that county. The same hypocrisy and the same disgraceful scandal was there exhibited in his own presence. The Nationalists had drawn the chestnuts from the fire, and those chestnuts the Liberals had eaten. They became indignant at this treatment, and the Liberals made of them, in consequence, Senators, Judges and employés, filling to repletion the public offices. The solid fact remained. The Liberals won the elections, though by false pretexes and by abusing the public confidence. Had anything so base—any tactics so discreditable—been shown in the political history even of the United States, where so much immorality was displayed during electoral campaigns? He held that they were not even there equalled in enormity. What had been the policy of the Government in this regard? Since 1874, without reasonable ground, they had increased the taxes by three millions. It was true that the First Minister came to Ottawa to elevate the standard of public morality; this was the hon. gentleman's mission, but if the hon. gentleman could give no better examples than he had given of his intentions in this respect, the hon. gentleman had better abandon that doctrine. And the sooner the hon. gentleman did so the better it would be for the country. In the Province of Quebec they found themselves in a curious position, and he wished to know exactly what arrangements the Liberals had made with the National Party. Were they to be content with sending the latter to the Senate, or was the public confidence again to be abused? It could not be denied that the Nationalists, with the Liberals in their rear, had run the elections of 1871, 1872 and 1874, on false pretences; and they had conducted themselves in a demoralizing and dishonourable manner—both for the party and for the Government who approved of such a course being taken. An attempt had been made to frighten the people with the declaration that protection would increase prices. He was glad and proud that the Province of Quebec, which he had the honour to represent, had afforded a reply to this assertion. The French-Canadian Conservatives had supported great public enterprises. In 1871, one million had been voted by the Province, in rural constituencies, to the North Shore Railway; and later, as a loan could not be raised for the purpose in England, the Province had advanced several millions to provide the railway communication required. The agriculturists of the Province had supported this policy with pleasure. The generous and patriotic majority which had an eye to the public interests was opposed in this relation—by whom? By a small band of Liberals and Nationalists, who sought to frighten the Conservative electors with the phantoms of bankruptcy, of a public debt, and of increased taxation; but this argument was worthless, and more, it was insulting to intelligent electors of the Province. The same policy was pursued in the past, when the old Province of Canada voted millions for railways. During the past twenty-five years this had been the cry of the Liberal Party, while the policy pursued by them during the past few years would lead to their overthrow at the approaching elections. The objections to protection did not appear to have any effect in the country. These objections were drawn from Adam Smith and Jean Baptiste Say. In illustration he would read the following:—

Mr. MOUSSEAU.

“It might be said, perhaps, with the support of Adam Smith and Jean Baptiste Say, let us makewar upon the views of exaggerated Protectionists; and also it was the maxim of every head of a family not to attempt to do at home what it would cost him less to buy. The tailor did not make his own shoes, but he bought them from the shoemaker. To this he would reply that, the proposition in the first place was absurd, that both Free-trade and Protectionist doctrines were exaggerated, and that the beggar did not purchase even what was fabulously cheap.”

The logical conclusion from free-trade theories would be that a country would never be able to manufacture for herself, she could never dream of doing aught save buying from others what she could make more cheaply for herself. The doctrines, both of protection as in the United States and of free trade as in England, were too often exaggerated. It was necessary to keep midway between the two extremes. Again, if money to buy from foreigners was lacking, a country was obliged to manufacture for herself, and we precisely occupied such a position to-day as regarded our economical and social system. From the Trade and Navigation Returns could be seen what extraordinary advantages this country would obtain from a serious protective system. We imported merchandize which we could manufacture, and of which we possessed the raw material in abundance. We imported over three million dollars worth of coal annually from Great Britain and the United States, while the Maritime Provinces had an immense supply of this valuable fuel; we could furnish from our own mines a part of, if not all, the coal which we consumed. The hon. members for Halifax and for Cape Breton had voted against the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton, but he supposed they would vote for the motions of the hon. gentlemen from Centre Wellington and Kingston, unless, while they clamoured for protection for their own interests, they did not desire to extend reciprocal advantages to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The question should be made a broad one, as it was properly to be viewed from a national standpoint. We imported goods to the value of many millions, all of which we could manufacture more cheaply than we could purchase them for, to the great advantage of the country besides. We had excellent iron—some of the finest in the world. By its manufacture we could give employment to our own people who required it so badly, and benefit the country, retaining our own capital in our midst; and yet we imported iron to the value of above seven millions of dollars. The manufacture of such a quantity would furnish bread for a very considerable number of families. Allowing from $200 to $250 for each family, it would give employment and support to members of from 17,000 to 20,000 families, comprising some 100,000 persons. All that was necessary was to place a sufficient duty on iron. We imported metals from the States to the value of $1,594,637, and of pig iron we imported 623,847 quintals, or 311,922 tons, for which we paid $570,648. By a judicious arrangement of the tariff, certain imports which injured our industrial and other interests would be diminished, a sufficient revenue derived, and the country made prosperous. If the matter was carefully studied, such a desirable result could be arrived at, and our manufactures would be suitably encouraged. Meanwhile, what were hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House doing? Did any one Minister rise and endeavour to show that the plan he proposed was impossible? Not at all. They, nevertheless, advocate free trade. They had studied the works of Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill and other free-trade writers, and, on their authority, they addressed the House. He, however, desired to know exactly how much iron we used; how much we could make of it; how much we could produce of it; how many families the employment, thus afforded, would support; and how many manufacturers would be aided by a protective tariff in this connection. The calculation appeared to be very easy, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, with the information at their disposal, could easily make it. But did any of these hon. gentlemen seek to supply such information? Certainly not. No one among them rose to show to the House that it was impossible to keep amongst us a large number of people, who, in default of work in their own country, were obliged to go to a foreign country in search of employment, if our manufacturers were assisted by a judiciously arranged tariff. The manufacture of the articles we imported would provide the employment so generally desired, and effect the results he had mentioned. We had raw material of the best quality, and of iron, in particular, we had some equal to any in the world. Nevertheless, hon. gentlemen opposite, owing to negligence, want of spirit and a lack of patriotism, did not wish to busy themselves with these questions, nor did they try to legislate in the interests of the country and introduce an intelligently devised tariff, which would be suitable to our condition, instead of being favourable to the interests of the United States and of England.

Mr. MOUSSEAU.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said that, before the House rose, he had, by means of figures taken from blue-books, shown what benefits could be obtained from a protective system. He had also shown what was the American system adopted in 1824; that even in France and in England protective systems were in vogue in the infancy of their industries, and that, after pursuing wise and moderate, and sometimes even an extreme protective policy, which secured their own market to themselves and made them prosperous, great countries gradually abandoned such a policy and adopted the doctrines of free trade pure and simple, as was the case in England. He had proved, he was certain, to the satisfaction of every one, that this country was ripe for protection. The hon. member for Kingston in 1872 had declared that the policy of his Government would be Protectionist, and, in 1871, both the Conservatives and Liberals and Nationalists in the Province of Quebec had adopted protection as one of the planks in their programmes. We had woollen and cotton manufactures, and it had already been shown that cotton could be manufactured with profit in this country, and much could be done in this regard if proper protection was granted. In Montreal, thanks to the spirit and patriotism of M. Victor Hudon, a cotton factory was established, and the cotton goods there manufactured were equal if not superior to those imported from England and the United States. There were also the manufactures of wood and wool, for which we possessed the raw material in abundance; and of which in the manufactured state we imported great quantities having an enormous value. In this country, during the past twenty-five years, a universal, a terrible and almost demagogic outcry had been raised by the Liberals against all taxation. He remembered the first Liberal political speech to which he had listened, and its character had frightened him. He heard of nothing but bankruptcies, ruin, taxation, imposts, misery, and the poor people. It was almost heartbreaking. Sir John A. Macdonald was pictured as a crocodile, who imposed oppressive burdens upon our people. During twenty-five years such things had been said of the Conservatives in this country; and it was the time today for the Liberal and Nationalist members from the Province of Quebec to show the sincerity of their past protestations, and to prove that they did not partake a little of the crocodile nature. Last year an enquiry had taken place into the agricultural interests of the Dominion. During this investigation his hon. friend from Chambly, who thoroughly understood what those interests were, had given wise and practical testimony in this connection. It would be seen, on examination, that we imported tobacco to the amount of many millions of pounds; and it was to be remembered that to the protection of her agricultural interests, notably the cultivation of the sugar beet, France owed much of her good fortune. Those acquainted with the matter knew that the soil of the Province of Quebec, at least, was lessening in fertility. In consequence of the continued raising of cereals and hay the land had become impoverished, and it was requisite that a new system should be adopted, and that, by a species of rotation, the condition of the soil should be changed and rendered more fecund. By encouraging the cultivation of the sugar beet and other agricultural products this would be accomplished. A wise readjustment of the tariff would effect these, among many other beneficial results, and, instead of importing what we could easily and cheaply produce, we would raise them and add to the numbers and prosperity of our agricultural population, besides enabling the soil to be practically renewed and re-fertilized by the system of a judicious rotation of suitable crops. He respectfully submitted, further, that all this could be done if the tariff was properly arranged, without increasing the taxation of the country. Duties should be levied upon what we could produce, thus encouraging our mining and industrial interests, and, besides, on all articles of luxury. The people, as a consequence of such a system being adopted, would not suffer more from the burden of taxation, while they would draw from it immense advantages. Millions which were now sent out of the country to the benefit of foreign manufacturers and foreign peoples, would then be retained in our midst to the advantage of our own population. He would now turn to another branch of his subject. He liked, above all things, to return to a consideration of the attitude taken in this regard by the hon. member from Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier), of whom everyone said he would become a Minister of the Crown in the future, when the Government were able to relieve themselves of the presence of the President of the Council by sending him to Manitoba or somewhere else. He was sure that such a change would be hailed with pleasure by the House and by the country, and above all it would benefit the Administration. The hon. gentleman had taken a strong position with regard to the principle of protection, though his advocacy of it would be more efficacious and more prominent if the hon. gentleman would cross to the other side of the Chamber. In 1871 the hon. gentleman began his public career in the Provincial Parliament of the Province of Quebec, where, though his advocacy of the question could be attended with no practical effect, he saw a brilliant career before him, and he laid the base of the programme he intended to pursue in public life. The hon. gentleman then warmly and eloquently supported a protective policy, and he was sure that the hon. gentleman would now vote for the motions of the hon. members for Centre Wellington and Kingston. The hon. gentleman stated, in the speech he delivered on this important question in the Quebec Parliament:

“Whoever has reflected upon the situation of this country, otherwise than on paper and in his closet—whoever has been able to examine closely into the condition of our industrial and agricultural interests, at present vacillating and timid in their operations, and of our manufactures which are backward, must admit that the brilliant description of the proposer and the seconder of the address is only a mirage and not the reality.”

He stated further :

“The Ministry could admit with reason that it alone should not bear the consequent responsibility, but this responsibility rests upon the entire nation.

“The principal cause of the evils from which we suffer, is that, up to the present time, the production of this country has not been equal to its consumption.”

The hon. gentleman had correctly described the condition of the country and our needs, and he had, with reason, compared our present situation with that of the United States in 1824, as described by Mr. Henry Clay. Another hon. member, the gentleman from Megantic (Mr. Richard), had written articles on the subject of protection. In 1873 this hon. gentleman had argued that by such policy we should endeavour to repair the disasters caused by our great excess of importations over exports, and in 1873 the hon. gentleman, on the eve of the opening of Parliament, stated :

Mr. MOUSSEAU.

“I conceive the difficulties which it is necessary for him to conquer; but, on the other hand, in taxing certain products exempted from imposts, the increase of consumption by the augmentation of population, or the improved condition of our industries, would produce, as it seems to me, sufficient compensation.

“This was, beyond question, proved to be the case in the United States, which have prospered while protecting their industries, and at the same time diminishing their debt incurred during the civil war at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, without taking the interest account into consideration. We have lost, owing to our unwise policy in this relation, 75,000 consumers, who benefit by their presence the American Republic, without regarding the foreign immigration, which our system obliges to pass through Canada to settle over the border.

“Our policy, in my opinion, should be protection for every manufacture for which the raw material, is exempt from duties, or the levy of purely fiscal imports upon all foreign raw material, which we could advantageously manufacture; and low duties for every imported article which is to be consumed without being manufactured.”

The words used by the hon. gentleman were extremely wise and appropriate, and no doubt this hon. gentleman would also vote in favour of the motions of his hon. friends from Centre Wellington and Kingston. The hon. member from Megantic also wrote in this relation :

“Protection by lessening our fifty millions of importations, would leave in the country a balance in our favour, from which everybody would benefit. But the class which would be benefitted in the clearest and most general way would be the agriculturists, aside from the industries necessarily local and ordinarily of minor importance. Certain manufacturing interests belong to us, or could be located amongst us with advantage, viz., manufactures of wood, iron, wool, cotton, cheese, beet-root sugar, etc., etc. If there is one of these in connection with which cheapness might be a principle consideration, it is the iron industry; nevertheless, the United States have sacrificed cheapness in this relation in order to promote this important enterprise. As our position is somewhat identical with the United States, we have the same grounds for adopting such protection. If it is wished to form an idea of what has been the protection in the United States, let us hear what Henry Clay states as one of their great illustrations:—"Protection has been for the United States the sheet anchor of its prosperity, and the main spring of its progress. The seven years which preceded the adoption of the protective tariff of 1824 have been most disastrous, while the seven years which succeeded have been the most prosperous the United States have ever witnessed—protection for my country means prosperity."

The hon. gentleman had evidently studied the question in the most thorough manner. And it must be admitted that to-day we had the same motives as the American people for adopting a protective policy. The Government had increased the tariff to a certain extent, but these changes had not been made in a judicious manner. He had combatted them, and he would still condemn them, not only in the House but also before the country. The choice of the articles on which the duties had been increased was ill-advised, and it was not made in the true interests of the country. The hon. member for Megantic had pronounced squarely on this question, and, despite a past vote, he appeared to be still a good Protectionist. He had not yet lost the hope of seeing the hon. gentleman pass to the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman had stated in this House, with reference to the changes in the tariff:

"He regretted he could not endorse the tariff of the Minister of Finance. Instead of taxing tea and coffee, the articles we cannot produce, the Finance Minister should have placed his duties on articles which could have been manufactured among us, in which case not only would a revenue have been secured, but our manufacturers would have that protection which they needed. He especially dwelt on protection to our agricultural products, which were essential to the opening of our country and was the prelude to our embarking, as we should do, in our manufactures. He combatted the arguments of the member for Bothwell; and, with regard to the position of the United States, held that without protection it would never have been the country it is to-day."

