Mr. CAUCHON said he was not in Parliament as the representative of any particular class of his electors, but he came there to do justice to every man, and at the same time to the public, and to consider and deal with the various questions brought forward in a spirit of fairness and justice. He was ready to take his full share of responsibility for the proposed legislation in regard to the cullers. He had had many conversations with the cullers and the lumber merchants, and it was after full consideration of the whole question, during two or three years, they had come to the conclusion that the proposal was a fair one. As $450 was the average earnings of the cullers, though some who were favoured made more money, while others earned scarcely anything, though equally competent, $700 was a fair remuneration to propose. He had received letters from friends asking that the amount should be placed at $1,000 or $800. Of course, if he had the right to put his hands into his neighbour's pocket he would be glad that the cullers should be paid even $2000, for nothing would be more agreeable to him than that the constituents should become rich. When he entered the House he was supported by members of the Quebec Board of Trade, and by nearly the whole of the constituents of the Quebec Centre, but he never promised the Board of Trade that he would follow all their wishes. He would only follow them when their recommendation was in accordance with what he considered was right. In proof of the fact that the proposal was not unfair, he might state that he had received letters from men sending recommendations and asking that they should be retained on the list.

Mr. BLANCHET said that when the Bill was allowed to be read the second time the hon. the Premier said he would be ready to consider the recommendation of the member for Quebec East (Mr. Caron.)

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BLANCHET said the hon. the Premier had stated that he would take into consideration, and very likely favourably, the recommendations of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Caron). He wished to know what new light had been cast on the subject. He was afraid there had been the combined influence of lumber merchants who had seats in the House. While he was glad that the hon. members for South Renfrew and Carleton possessed such influence with the Government, he should prefer it to be exercised in another direction and not against the interests of his constituents and those of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Caron). He feared it would be impossible to have the Bill amended on account of the influences being too strong, but he thought the lumber merchants themselves would be the first to regret that they had not allowed a trifle to be added to the salaries of the cullers.

Mr. KILLAM said he was not sufficiently posted in regard to the duties of cullers as to know what remuneration they should receive; but he knew that whenever a question arose affecting any of the constituents and votes of hon. members from different portions of the Province of Quebec, those hon. gentlemen were always ready to attend to their interests in a particular way—that they should do as little work as possible and receive as large pay, if it came out of the pockets of the rest of the Dominion. He felt bound to say that unless hon. members from the Province of Quebec came to look at those questions in a different light, the trade of Quebec and of the Dominion through Quebec would seriously suffer. The expenses on lumber and ships at the port of Quebec were becoming exceedingly heavy. The cost of loading ships at Quebec was such that ships were obliged to obtain three or four cents per ton more for freight on lumber to enable them to make as much as they did seven, eight or ten years ago. They all knew the reason. It cropped out in every item of legislation regarding Quebec. It was the same spirit which induced opposition to the steam ferry in winter between Quebec and Lévis. It was the same spirit which led the labourers of the city of Quebec and adjoining country not only to object to, but to prevent the employment of steam engines in loading ships, and those persons who controlled the labourers, having a monopoly of the business by means of the Association, kept the wages at such a rate that the cost of loading ships was about double what it should be. He believed that a labouring man should be well paid for his services; but when an organization like the Ship-loaders' Association had control of the port and managed the business, whereby the expenses of every vessel entering the port was increased 25 or 30 per cent., it was time the country looked into the matter. In the views of the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Caron), and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blanchet), in regard to culling and pilotage prevailed, the question would be a serious one for the country and would have to be taken in hand.

Mr. COOK said that when a few days ago the Bill was up for the second reading, he advocated it in the interests of the country. At that time the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. White) said that he (Mr. Cook) was not engaged in the square timber trade. Even if he was not so engaged, he had some sympathy with it, and if he had no sympathy, he had a right to express his views on any question brought before the House. On examining the Bill, he observed that it was framed entirely in the interests of the Ottawa lumbermen. The fourth clause set forth that the reduction upon the timber to be measured was only on white and red pine. It was well known by everyone having an acquaintance with the square timber business of Quebec, that ash, elm, oak, tamarac, and other kinds were also received at that port, and were as much entitled to the reduction as the timber of the Ottawa valley. He was satisfied that the timber of other portions of the country was as much entitled to reduction as that of the Ottawa valley. Hon. gentlemen might contend, as they had done, that it cost more to measure St. Lawrence timber.

In his opinion it did not cost as much, because large rafts were sent down, and wherever a raft had to be measured it had to be prepared by the owner, and there was no difficulty occasioned to the culler. It was easy to cull the St. Lawrence timber, also, because the timber was much larger, and when the culler measured a stick the quantity was as great as that of two sticks of the Ottawa Valley timber. He hoped the promoter of the Bill would take that matter into consideration, and either include St. Lawrence timber, or strike out the clause entirely and have the point left to an Order in Council, when they could contest the question as to the rights of the Ottawa valley and those of other portions of the Dominion.

Mr. CARON said he was surprised to hear the statement of the hon. the President of the Council, that he did not represent any class whatever, but that he was in Parliament to do justice to all classes. He would, therefore, call on the hon. Minister to do justice to that class—the cullers, to inquire into the question, to take up the petition of the Quebec Board of Trade, and all information which had been received from the Province of Quebec, and to say whether the cullers had really been dealt with in a spirit of justice. He could not understand the statement of the hon. President of the Council, that the cullers were perfectly satisfied with the proposal. He did not know what information the hon. gentleman had received, but all the information he (Mr. Caron) had received was that the cullers were thoroughly dissatisfied. He believed that the cullers might be satisfied with the remuneration of $700, except for the fact that cullers of square timber were called upon to disburse between 28 and 30 per cent. of their salary. The remuneration was not sufficient to induce efficient men, who possessed that education which was necessary for a proper performance of the duties, to enter into the business. He was well aware that men to cull timber could be obtained for any price Parliament might choose to pay; but they should legislate to improve, if possible, the culling of timber, and endeavour to get into that business a class of men who would command the confidence of the timber trade; but if the trade would not pay reasonable remuneration to those men, the trade could not expect to enlist into the culling business a class of men who would obtain the confidence of the lumberers.

Mr. BLANCHET said he did not support an increase in the amount of salary proposed because the cullers lived in Quebec or Lévis, but because he thought, in the interests of the lumber trade, the men should be well paid, so as to secure skillful cullers. The hon. member for Yarmouth had taken a wide range in his remarks. He (Mr. Blanchet) would not discuss the question as to whether an association like the ship labourers association at Quebec was right or wrong, for it was not the time to discuss that point; but if the wages paid for loading vessels had been increased, it was not injurious to the shipping, because vessels were now loaded in a much shorter time than formerly. Some few years ago three weeks were occupied in loading a vessel, but now only eight or ten days. They did not hear any complaint in the port of Quebec about the wages paid to ship labourers, except, of course, by interested parties like the hon. member for Yarmouth, (Mr. Killam.)

Mr. CURRIER said his hon. friends from Bellechasse (Mr. Blanchet), and Quebec (Mr. Caron) had complained of the $700 it was proposed to allow cullers; but, at the same time, they knew very well that the cullers only received $407 per annum, and this increased their pay from $407 to $700. Of course he wanted to get the work done as low as possible, but, nevertheless, he liked to see men obtain fair wages. It seemed to him that $700 would be fair remuneration; and the cullers would be satisfied with it, because it placed them in a much better position than they now occupied. The cullers now received $17,400, and under this arrangement reducing the number one-half, to eighteen, to be paid $700 each, superannuating others with $200 each per annum, they would receive $17,500. The lumbermen were consequently saving nothing at present.

by the operation. Nine-tenths of the cost of culling, of course, came out of the pockets of the lumbermen. He would like to ask his hon. friend if any interest was secured on the accumulated fund while in the public Treasury.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. CURRIER said his hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Cook) argued that the measurement of timber on the St. Lawrence ought not to be any higher than on the Ottawa, but it took cullers double the time to measure the rafts of oak, elm and birch, and even of pine, which came down the St. Lawrence that it did to measure the rafts on the Ottawa. The former rafts were built three tiers deep and had to be counted off, and altogether broken up for the purpose; consequently, the cullers lost half their time. He thought that no complaint should be made because there was no alteration in the fee for measuring hardwood. He suggested an amendment to the second clause, but withdrew it.

Section agreed to.

On Section 4,

Mr. LAFLAMME said he proposed to amend it so that instead of the measurement of white and red pine being established at three cents per ton, the Governor in Council could increase or diminish the charges, so as to equalize the cost and meet the amount of the expenditure.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said he would like to know whether the Government intended to pass an Order in Council with reference to this matter. It was of little use for them to give time and attention to it if it was to have no effect. Ever since he had been in the House—since 1870—constant promises to reduce the fees had been made by the Governments in power, but this had never taken place, owing to the conflicting interests involved and the pressure brought to bear on them. It was extremely difficult for the Government, under the circumstances, to make any change. The measurement of timber would soon commence, and the rates with which it began must be continued throughout the whole season.

Mr. CURRIER.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the alteration was made on the ground that, if the Bill provided a tariff, it should be complete, and not for merely one class of timber. This seemed reasonable.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he regretted exceedingly the change proposed. The calculations made by the gentlemen interested in the trade had led them to believe that the payment of three cents per ton would be sufficient to pay the amount of charges, which should be made on the average to cullers. The expense of measuring timber on the St. Lawrence was necessarily very much greater than it was on the Ottawa River. The cullers lost a good deal of time while the rafts were being canted and prepared for measurement. This matter was fully understood and discussed in the conferences which had taken place between lumberers and those who represented the cullers. He hoped that the clause would not be amended as was proposed.

Mr. McDOUGALL said he thought the Bill could be left over for further consideration, in order that a complete tariff might be brought down.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that, as the fees for culling square timber were to be paid by the lumber merchants, it was understood that they should be so regulated that the expenses would be covered by them. The clause remained exactly in the same position it was when they had originally discussed it. The only elimination related to the words determining the fees to be charged on squared red and white pine. This he had remarked at the conference, was useless, because the Governor in Council had still the power to raise or decrease the amount of fees to be collected. The fees to be obtained should, as nearly as possible, be made to meet the expenses of the office.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he had pointed out to the respective Ministers of Inland Revenue since 1867, that a very large amount had been collected from the lumbermen in addition to the necessary expenses of the office. In point of fact they had been taxed during the past year to the extent of between $3,000 and $10,000 per annum. They desired a rate to be fixed, the basis of it being the quantity of lumber measured during the past five years, so that this special tax on the trade should not be continued; and that the amount to be collected, should, as nearly as possible, cover the expenses of the office, and do no more.

Mr. LAFLAMME said, there was an excess of receipts over expenditure, but from this must be deducted a large amount of outstanding claims which were due, and part of which would not be collected.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) : They are all good.

Mr. LAFLAMME: They are not all good, and some are in the hands of lawyers in Quebec for collection. As the hon. gentleman from Renfrew had stated, the intention of the Department was not to impose a higher amount than was necessary to meet the expenses of the office, and this Bill and the Order in Council were shaped in the same direction.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he understood the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to say that the fees were placed in the hands of lawyers to be collected. Was he to understand that a further tax was to be placed on those who did pay their measuring charges to meet the deficiency caused by those who did not pay.

Mr. BLAKE: Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL said the point taken by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) was well put. Persons might suppose that the charges imposed on the shipping interest did not affect the producer of lumber; but it was his opinion that every item put on the shipment of lumber affected even the labourer in the woods. In those advanced days of legislation Government should obviate any undue burdening of one industry. He considered it was bad to make laws by Order in Council, and considered the present system ought to be changed. He thought that the taxation on this interest should only cover the expenses of the office, and that upon that basis alone the fees should be imposed.

Mr. CURRIER said every cent of the $500,000 belonged to the lumbermen. It would be more satisfactory if the three cents a ton were left to meet the expenditure of the office.

Mr. MITCHELL thought his hon. friend (Mr. Currier) and himself meant the same thing. He thought an additional clause should be put in the measure to the effect that the tax might be increased or lessened according to the requirements of the trade.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said he thought that the 3c. a ton on white and red pine would be sufficient to pay all expenses. He thought it was only fair that the reduction should take place this year. It was not right that it should be postponed for another year.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the size of timber was constantly varying. Ten years ago the size of old timber from the west was considerably in excess of that obtained from the Ottawa valley. The conditions might now be different; he had no doubt they were different, and they might change again in the course of a few years, and the timber in the Ottawa valley might be much smaller than it was now, as the old timber became exhausted. There could not be found the sort of timber there was in New Brunswick 30 or 40 years ago, and the cost of measuring heavy timber was much less then than the cost of measuring light timber was now, when it was taken by weight. It was, therefore, an inevitable necessity that there should be a discretionary power to change the tolls both in the canals and slides and in culling timber. It would be anomalous that there should be a specific rate for a certain kind, and that the other kinds should be left to be regulated by Orders in Council.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

INSPECTION OF PETROLEUM
BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to provide for the inspection of Petroleum by properly skilled persons, more especially with respect to its being explosive or non-explosive, and to define the test by which this shall be determined,—to prevent the sale for consumption in Canada of any petroleum not inspected, by imposing a penalty on persons offering it for sale, except only for exportation, and by subjecting it to seizure and forfeiture:—and, to provide for the payment of fees not exceeding three cents for the inspection of any package containing not more than ten gallons, and five cents for every package containing more than ten gallons and not more than forty gallons, and so in proportion for any greater quantity."

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said, while the duty on petroleum had been changed, there was no provision for inspection. The intention of the Government was merely to have oils inspected so that it might be shown what oils were explosive and what were not explosive, for the better protection of life and property. The fee was very light, as the House would see—only 5c. per package.

Mr. TUPPER: I don't understand how the alteration in the duty can make this Act necessary. I presume under the old Act petroleum is still inspected.

Mr. LAFLAMME: That Act was abolished by the alteration in the tariff, consequently there would be no power unless the proposed Act was passed to inspect petroleum.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The design of the Bill is to provide for inspection simply for safety. Both imported and Canadian oils would be inspected.

Mr. TUPPER: But we had that under the law before.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But that was under different conditions. The Bill prescribes as little formality as possible. It will certainly give satisfaction to the trade in that respect. It is absolutely necessary that there should be inspection of some kind. The standard fixed upon was 105° to which there could be no objection.

Mr. KILLAM: I am not aware that imported oil was inspected in Canada before. I understood that imported oil is inspected where it is refined.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is exactly the same as under the old law. Imported oils should be inspected.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: That is what the Canadian refiners want.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): Will any revenue be derived?

Mr. LAFLAMME: No; the fee is merely for the purpose of paying the cost of inspection.

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill, (112), to provide for the Inspection of Petroleum.

BRITISH COLUMBIA JUDGES TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES
BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to provide that the County or District Court Judges of the Province of British Columbia may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada; travelling allowances to be from time to time fixed by the Governor in Council."

(In the Committee.)

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill, (No. 113), to provide for the payment of travelling allowances to certain Judges of British Columbia.

THE NORTH-WEST TROUBLES—
W. D. O'DONOUGHUE.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Order for the House to go again into Committee of Supply read.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved in amendment :

"That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved,—That in pursuance of an Address, passed by this House on the 13th day of February, 1875, full amnesty was granted to all persons concerned in the North-West troubles, for all acts committed by them during the said troubles, save only Louis Riel, A. D. Lépine, W. D. O'Donoghue, and a partial amnesty was granted to Louis Riel and A. D. Lépine, conditional on five years' banishment from Her Majesty's Dominion, thereby leaving the said W. D. O'Donoghue as the only person liable to the extreme penalty of the Law for all acts committed by him during the said troubles. That this solitary exception has created dissatisfaction among a large class of Her Majesty's loyal subjects of the same nationality as the said W. D. O'Donoghue, and that, in the opinion of this House, as all disquiet and fear of disturbances have long since ceased in the North-West Territories, it is just and proper that the said W. D. O'Donoghue be placed in the same position, with regard to the said troubles, as Louis Riel and A. D. Lépine."

He said he was sure the House and the Government would not feel at all surprised at his making this motion at the present time. It would be in the recollection of the House that when the subject was under consideration last year, he said it was his intention, so long as he continued to occupy a seat in this Parliament, to make this a cause of complaint, and that he would continue to urge that justice should be done. He had taken the opportunity to urge that justice should be done by the House in this matter. He believed that in the House, and out of the House, it was generally admitted that there was no reason why such an extreme measure of punishment should be inflicted upon only one man of those who were implicated in the troubles of the North-West. If there had been any good reason at the time, the fact that all these troubles had ceased, that all excitement had subsided, was evidence that there was no reason now why the amnesty, or partial amnesty, which was granted to Riel and Lépine, should not be extended to this man, O'Donoghue. It had never been shown that he was more guilty than any other of the persons who were concerned in the troubles of the North-West. It was claimed by himself and many of his friends that he was less guilty, that he was not concerned in some of the troubles which had taken place there. It would be necessary, he (Mr. Costigan) thought, for the Government or the House to show that O'Donoghue was more guilty than any other person—in fact, that he was the greatest criminal in that country, seeing that he had been singled out to be dealt with, as he had been dealt with. After all, the crime of this man from the first had been that he became a settler of that part of the country. He was living in Manitoba at the time when these troubles first took place, occupying a respectable position. The cause of these troubles was well known in this House, and he had never heard anyone inside or outside of it attach very great blame to the population of that country for taking steps to secure their rights, which were in great danger. In the first place, the people who felt most aggrieved at that that time were the French half-breeds. Their rights were being ignored, and they took the best steps, in their minds, to secure these rights, and to secure the liberties which they thought were being wrested from them. When they were organized for this purpose, this young man, a young man of talent and ability, was led by his warm heart and disposition to sympathize with them, and from that time until the present day in no instance had he shown a want of faith, in no instance had he failed them in anything he could do to advance the common interests of that Province. The hon. the Minister of Justice would, perhaps, as he had last year, tell the House that the only reason this gentleman had excluded from the benefits of amnesty was that he took part in the Fenian Raid, assisted in organizing a raid outside of this country to make an attack upon this Dominion. He (Mr. Costigan) had stated at that time that even if this were correct, even if this man O'Donoghue were guilty of having participated in the Fenian raid, he would not have then committed such a crime as would entitle to such an extreme course as had been pursued towards him. He thought he was justified in taking this position in face of the facts to which he might refer. He would suppose, for an instant, that this were true, and he only supposed it, because he was not prepared to admit that O'Donoghue organized the Fenian raid in the sense which was implied.

Mr. BLAKE: What sense?

Mr. COSTIGAN said that, admitting that he did so, what reason could justify the fact that he was banished for all time out of his country, his property, a large amount, wrested from him, and enjoyed by others, and himself branded in the eyes of the public as a murderer, and treated by hon. members of this House as a ruffian? They knew that a Fenian raid had taken place in this country, even in the Province of Ontario, and that, unfortunately, lives were lost in those raids,—these things were to be regretted; they knew also that for those who were arrested and tried, the clemency of the Crown was asked and obtained, and that in no case was the law carried out in its rigour against them except in this one case, in which he (Mr. Costigan) was prepared to argue this man did not act as a Fenian.

Mr. BLAKE: How did he act?

Mr. COSTIGAN said he had before stated that, in order to justify their extreme course, the Government must prove that he did take that position, to show that they had reason to try him as a Fenian. Was he ever tried as a Fenian?

Mr. DYMOND: Will he come and be tried?

Mr. COSTIGAN said he should like to ask if the Government were dealing with a Fenian invasion? Was it not with the troubles which existed at that time that they were dealing? He could understand if the Government had come down, and said: "We will grant an amnesty, a partial amnesty, if you will, to Lepine, Riel and O'Donoghue, and put them on the same footing; but, inasmuch as we suspect—because we have not proved it—that O'Donoghue took part in the Fenian invasion at that time we will hold him responsible for his acts in that." He could understand the reason for such a course as that; it would be holding

Mr. COSTIGAN.

O'Donoghue responsible for whatever action he took at the time; but the Government held him responsible, not only for being a Fenian, but for all the acts committed in the North-West Territories. He was charged with the crime of murder, and the whole consequences of that act were still held over his head.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. COSTIGAN said he thought that the few remarks he had made on this question had been so delivered that hon. members could grasp the reasons he had advanced for expecting a vote of the majority of hon. members in favour of the proposition before them. He had said he could see no reason why this man, O'Donoghue, was held more responsible for the North-West difficulties than Riel and Lépine. He found that the only reason assigned by the Government at the time for this, was that he (O'Donoghue) had engaged in this raid into the country, and therefore this man was more guilty or less entitled to the clemency extended to the other two persons named. He had stated that in every case, where more serious offences than this had been committed, the clemency of the Crown had been extended to them; and that several Fenian invasions had taken place into this Province, which had caused more serious results and loss of life, had not been followed by so severe a punishment as was dealt out to O'Donoghue. In this course no serious consequences had resulted, and, therefore, O'Donoghue should not have been dealt with in this manner. Although the Government might not have singled this man out because of his nationality or had any particular dislike to him on this account, he could not bring himself to believe that if O'Donoghue had belonged to any nationality having an influence in this country he would not have been treated in so exceptional a manner; and he was not alone in this opinion. When the amnesty was granted the Government were in a difficult position. It was true that owing to certain features and transactions in these difficulties, a great excitement had been raised throughout the whole Dominion, and particularly in the Province of Ontario, many of whose people, and indeed members of the present Government, doing much to increase that feeling of excitement. They knew that the Minister of Justice himself had appealed to the feeling of the people of that time and spoke loudly for vengeance to be brought down on those who had participated at least in some of the acts then committed. While there was a large portion of the people of this country who felt that the rigour of the law should be exercised against these men, there were also others who believed that the people of the North-West had great reason to resist the authorities and insist upon knowing the position they would occupy before they surrendered their rights as a people. The Government found it absolutely necessary to grant some measure of pardon, and this they were compelled to grant to Louis Riel and Ambrose Lépine, conditional on five years' banishment. He had sympathized with these people, and advocated a lenient course towards them. He fully sympathized with the people of the Province of Quebec, who felt a particular sympathy with regard to these men, and who desired to see them dealt with as leniently as possible. The Government, he believed, felt that they were then between two fires; if they refused to meet the wishes of the people of the Province of Quebec, with reference to Riel and Lépine, they felt that even their own supporters would not continue to support them, although they were satisfied to give much less, perhaps, than the majority of these people demanded, and while they were disposed or rather compelled to yield to the necessities of the time and the pressure brought to bear upon them, they also felt that another class in the Dominion would not be content unless some persons were banished; and he thought this was perhaps the reason why, this man, O'Donoghue, a stranger in the country, unknown and having no influence in or outside of the House, which the Government feared, was treated in such a manner, insisting upon the rigour of the law being carried out in this respect. There was no doubt about that. He was more convinced of it now than ever before; and he saw no reason why the Government would not now, when troubles had ceased, and no danger of rebellion or trouble in that country existed, and when there was no further excitement in this country, and when men of every nationality and creed in it—and outside of the House at any rate, if not in it—of every shade of politics, say honestly and candidly that they perceived no reason why this man should have been dealt with in such a manner, and adopt the course recommended. He contended that so long as the present state of things continued, serious dissatisfaction must exist among many residents of the Dominion, who were as loyal to the country, to say the least of it, as any other portion of the population. He knew it had been said that it was unfortunate to raise a question of nationality in this chamber or outside of it. They saw daily articles in leading papers condemning the practice of discussing any question from this standpoint; and he had been somewhat reluctant to introduce and discuss this matter, knowing that it must so be treated; but while he thus felt, he found that he must pursue this course. The true policy to make us all Canadians was not to write in the public journals and make speeches, saying that they must be Canadians in sentiment, that they were one people, and that in the interests of the country they were not to be Scotchmen, Irishmen, Englishmen, or anything of the kind, but simply Canadians. He believed in this policy, and it was his desire that they should be all Canadians; and while Irishmen were as well prepared and as willing to contribute their mite towards the defence of the country if in danger, as any other nationality, they desired to be equally treated. The position he at present occupied, was forced upon him when Irishmen looked around and saw that they were not considered as Canadians, and the public positions of the country were not open to them, as to other Canadians; at many times they did feel that they occupied a humiliating position. In some cases, they were told that they were not Canadians but only Irishmen. They had felt this for years, and if the House of Commons and the Government and the public journals wanted Irishmen in the country to stand up and speak and act as Canadians, they must first lead them to believe and feel and have confidence that they would be treated as were other residents of the Dominion. This was what they wanted. They did not desire to raise a nationality cry. They had nothing to gain by it. It was only when the position was forced upon them that they resisted what they considered was an injustice to their nationality, and because they were treated, not as Canadians, but too much as Irishmen in a Canadian country. They were, sometimes, called upon to speak and raise their voice in this relation, and, whenever he should be so called upon, he should speak in that tone. There was no necessity for people to say that this caused excitement. He knew of no reason why it should. When, on public occasions, they made known what they considered their grievances, he could not see why gentlemen entertaining different views could not listen to them with patience, and meet them in a fair and frank way. He saw no danger at all in discussing this point fairly. It was in the interest of the country that this should be done; and if grievances existed they should be removed. He took it that this was a case in point. This man had been banished from the country for ever, and stripped of his property which was not inconsiderable. Perhaps this latter fact might explain the peculiar interest that some persons took in opposing this amnesty. The Hudson Bay Company either directly or through some of their agents, held a tract of land inside the limits of the city of Winnipeg, which was worth over a million of dollars, and O'Donoghue claimed to be the rightful owner of this property. Of course, having been banished from the Dominion for all time, it had been taken possession of by persons who claimed to have a better right to it. He was not in a position to discuss this matter, nor was O'Donoghue in a position to defend his rights. This was another reason why he felt that this man had been treated too harshly in being driven from the country of his adoption among strangers, stripped of his property and branded as a murderer. It had been said that because this man had not asked for mercy in direct terms, he had no claim on the sympathy of the House; but this person claimed that an injustice had been done him. It would be difficult to know what course this unfortunate man should have taken. One hon. gentleman said, because he had not asked for mercy, it should not be given; and another hon. gentleman, that he (O'Donoghue) would be a coward to sue for mercy at the hands of the House after the acts he had committed. O'Donoghue simply asked that justice should be done him.

Mr. BLAKE: Justice?

Mr. COSTIGAN: What is that?

Mr. BLAKE: Is it justice you said?

Mr. COSTIGAN said, in a legal sense probably the Minister of Justice would construe this in a different sense to what he meant, but he called equal treatment to all men justice. He did not know how the hon. gentleman considered this proposition. Not that he asked for amnesty—they would say nothing about that; but the House declared that W. B. O'Donoghue, who was not charged with any greater criminality than those who were pardoned, should be held no more responsible than they. He wished for no more and no less. He desired them to be placed on the same footing; and this he called justice. He thought he had a right on this vote to expect the calm consideration of the hon. members, particularly from the Province of Quebec on both sides of the House. Those hon. gentlemen had obtained a measure of mercy at least for Lépine and Riel, and O'Donoghue was no more guilty than they were. The man's only fault and criminality lay in his sympathy for these men in Manitoba by whom he stood in their hour of peril, risking his life for their common interests. Surely also the same measure of leniency and justice should be meted out to him (O'Donoghue) as had been done to the others. He hoped hon. gentlemen would not, on this occasion, pay too strict attention to the order which they might receive from the Minister of Justice. He hoped that hon. members generally would vote for the motion. Last year, hon. members had told him they were favourable to this motion, but after they were told to treat it as a vote of want of confidence, which they must vote down, they had done so. He was told that this was not a vote of want of confidence, at all events it was not so brought; nor was this the case last year; but it might be so treated, and only in this way could it be defeated. He was satisfied that two-thirds of the members would vote for him, if the Government left it an open question. He simply asked for fair play. If it was voted down he would make the motion next year; and, if the same fate then befell it, he would bring it up year after year until he obtained justice. The difficulties had blown over, and, as the excitement had calmed down, O'Donoghue should be placed in the same position with Riel and Lépine. He did not think that the question of politics should be introduced in this regard; and he was perfectly satisfied that if the verdict of the House was given on the pure merits of the case, it would be in his favour.

Mr. POWER said he believed he had felt as much sympathy for O'Donoghue as the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan) until he was shown a letter written by him (O'Donoghue) to a member of that House, in which he gave as a reason why the Government should allow him to come back to this country, that he would be able and willing to give evidence against Riel and others. When he (Mr. Power) saw that letter, he came to the conclusion that O'Donoghue had been treated as he deserved. He referred to this matter now with reluctance, and only because he believed it necessary that something should be done towards saving the House from being bored by a discussion the sole aim of which was political. The object of the resolution was to make political or electioneering capital, but he could assure the hon. mover and his friends on the Opposition side of the House, that they would be mistaken in the result, for his countrymen never sympathised with those who offered themselves to become informers.

Mr. RYAN said the subject was one directly affecting his Province, and, although he had not intended to speak, yet as the hon. members for Lisgar and Selkirk were not in their places, he felt compelled to say a few words. He regretted very much that the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Mr. Costigan) had chosen to introduce the question a second time, because the discussion could do no possible good, and might do much harm. It would certainly take up the time of the House at a very late stage of the Session, which time was very urgently required for the discussion of other more important and more practicable questions. When the subject of amnesty was being discussed during the Session of 1875, he (Mr. Ryan) took the position that there were no valid reasons for granting an amnesty, either pure and simple or qualified, to those persons whom the Court of the highest civil and criminal jurisdiction in the Province of Manitoba had pronounced guilty of murder. None of the arguments adduced by the promoters of amnesty during that debate; nothing that he had learned or heard since that debate; nothing that had transpired since then, had sufficed to convince him that he was mistaken or to induce him to alter his position. But, although the action of the Government in granting even a qualified amnesty was, in his opinion, without justification, yet he thought that the logic of the hon. member for Victoria was unsound, when he accused the Government of unfairly discriminating between Riel and Lépine on the one hand, and O'Donoghue on the other. The hon. member for Victoria had contended that, in order to justify the discrimination made, it would have been necessary to prove, by undoubted testimony, that O'Donoghue had been guilty of treason by participating in the Fenian raid of 1871. It was not necessary for their justification that the Government should go so far, although they could, if they chose, furnish such proof. All that was necessary for them to do, to justify the discrimination made, was to show that certain extenuating circumstances existed in the cases of Riel and Lépine, which were wanting in the case of O'Donoghue. That such extenuating circumstances did exist was beyond dispute. When Manitoba was threatened with a Fenian invasion in 1871, Riel and Lépine had offered their services and bore arms in defence of their Queen, and O'Donoghue had taken his place in the Fenian ranks, if indeed, he was not the Fenian leader. This was the natural and conclusive reason for the discrimination made between the parties. The hon. member for Victoria had undertaken to speak for the Irishmen of Canada, although it was not, perhaps, quite clear that he was peculiarly entitled to speak for them.

Mr. COSTIGAN: The hon. member for Marquette will permit me to put him right. I did not assume to speak for the Irishmen of Canada.

Mr. RYAN remarked, that the hon. member for Victoria said he did not assume to speak for the Irishmen of Canada. He (Mr. Ryan) understood him to do so. The resolution of the hon. member alleged that the exclusion of O'Donoghue from the qualified amnesty of 1875, "has created dissatisfaction among a large class of Her Majesty's loyal subjects of the same nationality as the said O'Donoghue." Was not this assuming to speak for the Irishmen of Canada? While neither the hon. member for Victoria nor himself had the right to speak for the Irishmen of Canada, they were respectively entitled to speak for the Irishmen in their own constituencies. Speaking for the Irishmen of Marquette, he desired to say that they had no sympathy with traitors or persons justly open to the charge of murder.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings): Hear, hear.

Mr. RYAN said the hon. member might cry "hear, hear." Did he mean to dispute the accuracy of his statements? If he did, he would have the opportunity of doing so in a more intelligible manner. He (Mr. Ryan) regretted that hon. gentlemen who, in 1875, had stood shoulder to shoulder with him in opposing amnesty, had, without any intelligible reason, changed their position, and were now found crying out for amnesty. They had contended in 1875 that the circumstances did not justify the granting of an amnesty to any of those guilty of the Scott murder. They had contended then that it was a violation of justice to grant even a qualified amnesty to Riel and Lépine. The circumstances of the case were, so far as the merits of the case were concerned, unchanged. What was unjust then was unjust now. The violation of justice in granting a qualified amnesty to Riel and Lépine could not justify a second violation in granting a similar amnesty to O'Donoghue, nor could it indeed justify a change of opinion upon the subject of amnesty, unless those who changed their opinions were prepared to assert that two wrongs made a right. He did not believe that the Irishmen of Canada were willing to amnesty treason or murder when committed by an Irishman. Irishmen claimed no special liberty to violate law and escape punishment. The hon. member for Victoria had contended that O'Donoghue was innocent of the crimes charged against him. If he were innocent, he needed no amnesty. Strong in the consciousness of his innocence, he could return to Manitoba and stand his trial. There were Irishmen enough in Manitoba, and if not enough of Irishmen, there were enough of those who loved British fair play, to see that he got a fair trial. An innocent man needed no more.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) said, if he thought that O'Donoghue had anything to do with the death of Scott he would not vote for the motion. From all information that he could obtain, however, he believed that O'Donoghue had nothing to do with the death of that man, but that, on the contrary, he protested against it. He was extremely sorry that men, claiming to be Irishmen, should stand up in this House and try to place an additional black mark on his countryman's brow. He belonged to a society that would stand as firm for British connexion, and constitutional liberty, and to what they considered right and proper, as any other men in the country. They found no fault with him for voting, last year, in favour of an investigation into O'Donoghue's case, and if found innocent, and deserving of an amnesty, they would not object to it. He gave Frenchmen, Scotchmen and Englishmen credit for standing up shoulder to shoulder to help each other, but Irishmen were the very men who opposed each other, as has been illustrated by their action in regard to this man. It was no wonder that Irishmen were hewers of wood and drawers of water so long as they would not assist each other. For himself, he did not care what church a fellow countryman worshipped at; he considered that it was his duty to do what he could to take the mark off an Irishman's brow who had done nothing to deserve its remaining there. He could not understand why O'Donoghue was not placed in the same position as Riel and Lépine; he believed that he would make a useful citizen, and that he had done nothing to deserve perpetual condemnation as an outlaw. He believed that if the hon. the Minister of Justice would say that hon. members could vote as they pleased on this question, there would be a large majority in favour of amnesty. If the Government would state that they would deal with this question as with Riel and Lépine, his hon. friend (Mr. Costigan) would withdraw the motion. The hon. the Minister of Justice had been very liberal with his pardon; out of eight persons condemned to suffer the extreme penalty of the law, only two had expiated their crimes on the scaffold. The hon. gentleman had allowed men to escape who had committed ten times worse crimes than O'Donoghue, and he did not see why this man, whom no one could say had spilled a drop of blood, should not be amnestied.

Mr. RYAN: If he has not spilled a drop of blood, why does he not come back?

Mr. WHITE said O'Donoghue could possibly come back and be a member of this House when the hon. gentleman was no longer a member. He knew that the election of the hon. member (Mr. Ryan) was owing to the support of his fellow countrymen, and his course on this occasion ill-became him. So far as O'Donoghue was concerned, the crime of which he was charged, was raising Fenians in the United States and bringing them into Manitoba. If there was one thing more than another that we, as Canadians, should be pleased with, it was that so-called Fenian raid of O'Donoghue, as it showed the American people that the Fenians could not raise strength enough to injure this country. The Fenians were encouraged by the United States people; they were fed and clothed by them. On account of the damage done to the American commerce by the cruisers sent out by some of the people of Great Britain, the Americans encouraged the Fenians. The Canadians acted very differently, for, during the American war, we kept volunteers along our frontier to keep parties from the South going into that country from here. And well the Americans repaid this country. The very moment the American Civil War was over, they encouraged the Fenians to come here and disturb our peace. He did not believe the Fenians would attempt to make another raid, as they saw they had not sufficient strength, courage or organization to injure this country. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would deal with O'Donoghue as he had with Riel and Lépine. The Minister of Justice could, by intimating that he wished it, secure the passage of this motion, and the people of the country would give him credit for doing so. The remarks of the hon. member for Marquette were unnecessary and unbecoming. Why could not Irishmen agree as other nationalities did? They seemed so strictly loyal that they seemed anxious to condemn one another. If Irishmen were true to themselves, and stood shoulder to shoulder, they would occupy a much better position than they did to-day. It might be said that he was forced to speak as he did, because of Roman Catholics who were his constituents. But this was not so, for in the last election, out of 600 Roman Catholic voters, all voted against him except some twenty or thirty. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would take a statesmanlike view of this matter. He was proud to see that hon. gentleman occupy the position he did. Perhaps, if he was leading the Government he would give him his support. He hoped the Minister of Justice could see his way clear to do them justice in this case, and not allow one man to suffer alone for the sins and crimes of others.

Mr. BANNATYNE said he more than regretted that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan) had spoken in the way he had. They all knew there were mistakes made at the time of the trouble, both here and in the North-West. He had no hesitation, however, in saying, as he said last year, that if it had not been for O'Donoghue the crime so lamented would never have been committed; and, if it had not been for the hon. member for Selkirk and others connected with the Hudson Bay Company, that country would never have belonged to the Dominion of Canada. But he thought the time had come when we should attempt to obtain peace and unity. He, for one, would be perfectly willing to see a full and complete amnesty granted to every one of the men. That they were murderers, he did not believe. They were forced to take the position they did. They might have gone too far, and it was unfortunate that they did. No hon. member could now say they were not justified in taking the action they did at first. If they committed acts that were to be regretted, it was because they were driven to do so by people who came into the country. He would be very happy to see a full and free amnesty for all, O'Donoghue not excepted. It was time we should have peace and that these things were forgotten.

Mr. MASSON said he believed his record with reference to the North-West troubles was a clear one. He had no idea of being inconsistent with himself all through these troubles, and he did not think he had been. He had always believed that the affair was most unfortunate, and that the people had good ground for being dissatisfied; and he thought after events showed that they were entitled to a full amnesty, even O'Donoghue, whom he believed to be the sole instigator of the insurrection. But what was the use of discussing past events? The Conservatives from Lower Canada had asked for a complete amnesty. When they asked for it they expected that O'Donoghue would have been included with the others. They never accepted the qualified amnesty of the hon. gentlemen opposite, because they thought it would be a condemnation of the whole position they had taken. But the question was carried by the various elements which composed the majority of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Conservatives of Lower Canada held that all those who participated in the troubles should be treated in the same manner. The Government had decided to discuss the question of the North-West troubles entirely independent of anything that occurred afterwards, but that the amnesty should only be partial, on account of promises made to the persons so amnestied. If this paltry amnesty had been promised to Riel and Lépine, so also had it been to O'Donoghue. If it was on the public ground that the sponge should be passed over the troubles and peace restored, that the partial amnesty had been granted, it should, on the same principle, have been extended to O'Donoghue. Harmony could not be secured by making a discrimination between the parties. They should have been treated exactly in the same manner. If the Government resisted this motion, and decided that the amnesty should be only granted to particular parties, they would force the House to vote this illogical proposition: That O'Donoghue should be exempted from the amnesty, because, forsooth, he had been implicated in troubles which occurred two years afterwards. That was not common English fair play. If he were guilty he should be punished with the others, if they were punished; but, if they were acquitted, he should be acquitted with them. If it was said he had been guilty of a crime posterior to the troubles in the North-West, and not connected with them, then he was judged guilty without being formally accused. If the amnesty was refused, from the single fact that he had been engaged in the Fenian invasion of 1871, then he was declared guilty of a crime for which he had never been tried; instead of taking the broad English principle that a man was to be held innocent until he was proved guilty. The Government said he was guilty of bringing the Fenians into Canada; but, unless the amnesty was granted for his participation in the North-West troubles he could not be tried, and therefore could not be held guilty. If he came back, he could be arrested both on account of the North-West troubles and on account of the Fenian invasion. He thought the time had come when the Government should get rid of this trouble. Let the Government forget and sponge out the troubles of the past, and let O'Donoghue be treated like the others. Let the Government say to O'Donoghue that they would let him come back and have a chance to be tried for his connection with Fenianism. Last year he was not in a position to vote for the motion of his hon. friend. Anybody that would read the motion last year would see that the whole question should be re-opened. He had rested the ground of amnesty to Riel and Lépine not solely on the fact that they had helped to repel the Fenian invaders, but principally upon the fact that there had been a promise made by the Ambassador of the Government, which promise had never been countermanded. He saw nothing inconsistent in his vote then and the vote he proposed to give to-day, and he would give that heartily and without hesitation, believing that O'Donoghue should have the amnesty with the others. He was sorry that the vote of amnesty had not included O'Donoghue. The hon. gentleman who seemed to wish to resuscitate the whole difficulty would, if he turned to his own Province, see that the whole population desired an amnesty, and wished the subject not to be spoken of any more. The hon. gentleman did not know the feelings of his own Province; he did not represent the feelings of his own people.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said it was to be regretted, and deeply deplored, that such questions as that now under consideration should be brought so constantly before the House as they had been—questions which tended to keep alive a spirit of ill-will and enmity among the people of the North-West.

There was good cause for making a distinction between O'Donoghue and other persons who were implicated in the insurrection in the North-West, at the time amnesty was asked for Riel and Lépine. At that time he very cheerfully joined in voting for the amnesty. Last year he did not vote for amnesty to O'Donoghue, because he presumed, from all he had heard of O'Donoghue's conduct and actions in the North-West, that he did a very great deal more to cause and perpetuate the insurrection than all the others put together. Further, they knew, and he had an assurance of the fact, that Riel and the others were simply opposed to the entrance into the country of the Canadian authorities, and proofs had been produced to show that they were quite indisposed to accept any connection with the United States; not only so, but they repelled any advances made to them from the United States. In proof of this, they found that, after remaining away a short time, these men returned to their houses in Manitoba, showing that, from their point of view, they felt justified in having done the acts which occurred under their Administration or management in the North-West. O'Donoghue, on the other hand, left the country and remained out of it, and all the time he was plotting treason against the Queen. In that circumstance there was a very great difference between the parties. He did not think that the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson)—while he agreed with the hon. member in many respects—was very logical in the arguments he addressed to the House. One of the principal reasons advanced for granting an amnesty to Riel and Lépine was, that they had done everything they possibly could do to oppose O'Donoghue when he made the raid on Manitoba in 1871. They had the authority of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan), which was corroborated by what he (Mr. Smith) had heard in the North-West,—and the circumstance was more than probable,—that, but for O'Donoghue's presence there in March, 1870, the country would not have had to deplore the death of Thomas Scott. Even now he (Mr. Smith) could not advocate an amnesty for O'Donoghue. It was said that O'Donoghue had had no opportunity to take his choice. He had had an opportunity to remain in the country or leave it. He might have then surrendered himself to trial. They knew that the one member of those implicated in the troubles who did stand a trial, viz., Lépine, was condemned to death, and it was very probable, from the evidence brought forward against O'Donoghue, that the sentence on him would have been the same as on Lépine. While it was desirable that there should be an end of those troubles in the North-West, still the House should remember that one was a pronounced traitor, while the others were standing up for what they believed to be their rights on coming into Confederation. For those reasons he could not vote for the motion.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said his opinions on the question were well known. When the discussion regarding Riel and Lepine took place in the House he held that they had committed an act for which they should be punished, and he agreed on the course taken to bring them to punishment. But there was a time when it was better for the future of the North-West and the Dominion at large that the people should forget past deeds. When the time had come that it was no longer necessary to hold those men up as an example or suffer further punishment, he was prepared, and had been prepared for some time, to give his vote and voice in favour of the occurrences of the past being forgotten. The Fenians who invaded this part of Canada had been allowed to go free, and the same leniency should be extended to O'Donoghue. Last year, he regretted that the amnesty given to Riel and Lépine was not full and complete. He thought so still, and believed that the country would never be satisfied with anything short of this.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he had voted against every motion which had been brought forward to grant an amnesty to either Riel, Lépine or O'Donoghue. O'Donoghue was doubly bad, for he had headed the Fenian raid on Manitoba. The hon. member for Provencher had declared that O'Donoghue was not present at the murder of Scott. But the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) knew that O'Donoghue was present at and planned the murder. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) had said that the Fenian Raid in Manitoba was a farce. He asked that hon. member whether the Fenian Raid was a farce when some of the best blood of the young men of the country was spilt in its defence. He was surprised at such a statement being made by the hon. member. He was the first to call attention that an hon. member was sitting in the House who was connected with the murder of Scott. He would vote as he had done during the previous year, but never in favour of granting an amnesty to any of those men.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) said his statement was that the Fenian raid into Manitoba was a farce. He said so still. He did not say a word about the time when the Fenians came to Fort Erie. The last Fenian raid was a farce, and proved that the whole Fenian organization was a farce.

Mr. LITTLE said he saw some force in the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan), relative to O'Donoghue being placed on an equal footing with the other offenders, Riel and Lepine, because the hon. member had voted that an amnesty should be granted these two offenders. But, he (Mr. Little) did not give such a vote. He did not believe in this House whitewashing any individual of his crimes, whether political, criminal or otherwise. He admitted that these misguided men were only puppets, used by the wire-pullers of that time and locality, who, to suit their mercenary and political ends, prompted Riel, Lepine and O'Donoghue with others to raise the disturbance. O'Donoghue should do something to show himself worthy of pardon; should be tried in Her Majesty's courts of law; evidence and witnesses should be produced to show that he was not so bad as represented; he should state who or what persons or Company prompted him and others to commit the outrages. It was not for the House, without evidence, to grant even a conditional pardon. He did not believe in the Government granting or ordering committees of investigation on criminal cases, or political crimes. We had the courts of law open. Already this Session, thousands of dollars would be expended on an enquiry into the affairs of the Northern Railway Company, which, he believed, had complied with all the terms of the late agreement with the Government, and owed them nothing, except what in good time it is hoped it will repay. The Government through its Committee was now investigating its financial affairs, for what purpose? Not for the benefit of the Dominion, but to the injury of the line. Last night he had to vote on a matter he did not approve of. He neither liked the amendment of the hon. member for Middlesex, nor the original motion introduced by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz). He could not support the amendment, from a remark made by the right hon. member for Kingston, in relation to it, viz: "As it affirmed that the House had already taken some steps towards securing prohibition," when the House had taken no action whatever; and if he (Mr. Little) had had an opportunity, he would have voted against the original motion also. But to-night he was obliged to vote, he presumed, with the Government, judging from the action they took last year, for, as yet, the Government had not spoken. Nationality with him was not the question; a crime was a crime by whomsoever it was perpetrated. No one admired more than he did the late D'Arcy McGee, one of the first statesmen in Canada, who fell while endeavouring to build up our Dominion, and it was a source of satisfaction to him (Mr. Little) that D'Arcy McGee expired, holding the same principles that he (Mr. Little) upheld, and the great party to which he belonged. Yet the Hon. D'Arcy McGee was of the same nationality as O'Donoghue; but their principles were not the same. With him (Mr. Little) and the Liberal Conservatives, principle was before party. He had conscientiously opposed an amnesty in any shape being granted by this House to those offenders; last Session he took the same ground, and he saw no reason now to change his opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL said that any person who had taken any prominent part in public affairs should give his reasons for the vote he was about to give. When this question was up last year, he had felt it to be his duty to vote for amnesty; and on the ground which he would state. There was a time in the history of the North-West, and its relations to this Parliament, when it might have been very questionable whether any proposition of this kind ought to have been sustained. Had it been made immediately after these occurrences, he would have refused to grant an amnesty. But we had acquired a great territory in the North-West, which was to be built up; and it ought to be the object of all statesmen and of this Parliament, as he was sure it was the desire of the people of Canada, to cause peace, unanimity and good feeling to prevail throughout that whole section of the country. What was, and what had been the result of this agitation, regarding O'Donoghue, Riel and Lépine? They had never had peace here or there, until a conditional amnesty had been granted the two latter. While he deprecated the occurrences in question, and denounced what he believed to have been a vile act—the taking away of the life of Thomas Scott—he felt that vengeance was not for them. They had a duty to perform. They had to protect the authority of the law and punish criminals, but they had not to perpetuate vengeance. This House had by its solemn act pardoned these offences. They were looked upon by some as acts of rebellion, and by others, and by a large section of the people living in the North-West, as a vindication of the rights of the people. Although he was a member of the Cabinet under whose administration these troubles arose, and though he could not do otherwise than look upon them as acts of rebellion against constituted authority, he must say that his sympathies had always been excited in favour of the men, who believed, as they did, that they were attempting to impose a Government upon them without their approval and without consulting them. If these men had resisted, in a constitutional way, what they considered the unjust attempts of Canada, they would not only have had his sympathies, but also his support. These days, however, had passed and gone. The feelings of animosity and antagonism created in the country by their acts, had, in a great measure, disappeared. The population of the North-West had become largely increased by the exodus from this part of the country, and by immigration from across the water of people who know nothing about these difficulties, and cared less; and under the circumstances, he thought that this Parliament could fairly and constitutionally wipe out the remaining vestige of this trouble. O'Donoghue might have been equally chargeable and responsible for the inception of the trouble, for its continuance, for its maintenance, and for its results; but, in the interests of public peace and order, and of the maintenance of the harmony that ought to exist, and which it ought to be the desire of Parliament to promote, as Riel and Lépine had been pardoned conditionally, he could see no reason why the same leniency and consideration should not be extended to O'Donoghue. He rather agreed with his hon. friend on his right who said that the resolution reflected upon the action that had been taken; but Parliament should promote peace, and endeavour to procure a peaceful solution of all these difficulties, and wipe out the smallest vestige of them that existed. When they looked at the history of the mother country for the past three or four centuries, and the difficulties which had there occurred, they would find that men whose lives had been in jeopardy, and around whose necks the halter had almost been placed, had subsequently occupied distinguished positions in the annals of their country. In our country, and in Australia, similar instances had occurred. Allusion in this regard had already been made to the late lamented D'Arcy McGee, against whom similar charges had been preferred. Irishmen had acted wrongly, but in good faith. They had been misguided. No substantial benefit was to be derived from a retention of these feelings, or the keeping alive of the charges made in connection with these troubles. It was to be regretted that these acts had occurred, but they should not cultivate sentiments of animosity between one and another class in this country. He had voted last year for amnesty. He would do so again. He felt that O'Donoghue should be treated in the same way with Riel and Lépine. They heard it said that this man should not be granted a conditional amnesty because he had been connected with a Fenian raid; but this was no reason for such a course. All men should be treated alike, and they should not pre-judge and convict a man without giving him an opportunity for having a fair trial. No matter how much mistaken with regard to the course they had pursued, so long as Riel and Lépine were entitled to amnesty so was O'Donoghue, and they should give it to him. If this man was guilty of other acts than Riel and Lépine were guilty of with regard to the promotion and inspiring of an invasion of the country by Fenians, let him come back and be arraigned for inciting such an insurrection and take the consequences; but they should not say, that while an amnesty was granted to the leader in an insurrection, it should be refused to a subordinate. This was most unjust to O'Donoghue, whom he was not going to defend. It was a matter of common justice to treat this man as had been treated his two accomplices. They should give O'Donoghue a conditional amnesty, and if he chose to come back and place his neck in danger of the halter for rebellion to the Queen and the constituted authorities of the country, and take his trial, let him take the consequences.

Mr. PALMER said he represented a constituency, where a large number of descendants of U. E. Loyalists lived, and consequently as he intended to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria, he could not give a silent vote. He considered that the circumstances surrounding the case were very extraordinary. After a number of years had passed since the occurrence of these events in which this person had unquestionably taken a criminal part, it was even still difficult, with the most minute enquiry, to find out what were the real facts connected with the whole transaction. This being the case with persons who had occasion and were able to investigate the matter, it was astonishing that throughout the length and breadth of Canada, the common people had very little knowledge of what were the real facts. There were many who sincerely believed that the officers of the Hudson Bay Co., when they found they were to lose an easy and lucrative position, in which perhaps it was easy to gain a livelihood, were unwilling to permit Canada to possess that country. He did not say this was so; he had no means of learning it; but he did know that, throughout the length and breadth of the land, a great number of people believed that this was the real foundation of all the trouble, and that O'Donoghue, Lépine and Riel were mere tools in the hands of the persons mentioned, while they committed crimes which, in his constituency, would be considered the last that should be forgiven—treason against the Crown. But, although this was so, yet what did they find? That in this country there were different nationalities, French, Irish, Scotch, and English. He hoped that these people would forget, in the course of time, their origin, and simply claim to be Canadians. This was, however, not the case at present, and it was necessary to endeavour, as far as they could, to blot out distinctions of every kind and nature. It was completely proper for those who represented different nationalities to advocate the rights of their countrymen, because the latter looked to their representatives to secure justice. This was the case with Irishmen, scattered not only through this land, but everywhere; and they knew that, while Irishmen were generous, they had of course their strong national feelings. He held that no man concerned in such troubles was entitled to an amnesty. This was granted simply because these men had been misguided and because their crimes were not of so base a nature as those of ordinary criminals. The feeling which made a man risk his life for some fancied wrong, he did not care how misguided the man might be, was not the same as that baseness which induced a man to murder another for mere pelf. The latter was totally unfit to live; but to the other, on his discovery of the fact that he had been mistaken, and that the cause he had looked upon as holy was wrong, and that he had been misguided, mercy could be extended. Such persons became the most loyal of men, and the truest of friends. Such had history been with reference to all crimes of this description. Great men whose voices had been heard in this legislative hall, had taken up arms against the sovereign of Great Britain; had left the country, and had been amnestied; and these men had committed a crime which was unquestionably as heinous in its nature as that which O'Donoghue had ever committed. Why was it necessary to amnesty them at all if they were not guilty of treason against the crime with reference to the Fenian raid? Surely O'Donoghue was not more guilty than the others who had been pardoned. They all knew that no blood had been spilled in connection with this raid, and as his hon. friend from East Hastings had said, it was a mere farce. He did not at all palliate the act. This was entirely wrong; but it was better for peace and quiet to grant an amnesty. Again, as they were pardoned if they returned to this country, there was no reason why they should not tell the whole truth with regard to this transaction; and the country would be gratified to know that the officers of the Hudson Bay Company were free from blame, if such should be the issue. If on the other hand, these officials had created this difficulty, they would meet with the just execration of the people of this country. Many people besides Irishmen thought that the person in question was kept out of the country to prevent his story being told. Whether this was true or false, he had heard it stated in the House by the hon. member for Lisgar. The country would gain by knowing who was really to blame in the matter. He thought that the motion of his hon. friend had nothing to do with the Fenian raid; it simply asked amnesty for the same acts which Lépine and Riel had committed. How could this man come back under the present circumstances? If he did so, he would be tried, and properly so, for the acts he had committed. If O'Donoghue was guilty of a crime from which Riel and Lépine were free, if he returned after such a motion was carried, he (O'Donoghue) could be placed on trial for such offence. If the passage of the motion would incite Fenianism or disloyalty, or the committal of treason, he would be the last to vote for it, but he could not see the slightest evil that could possibly arise from it. They were only asked to do justice and extend fair play to three persons engaged in the same act. Two of them, who were of another nationality, had been pardoned; the same clemency had been refused to the third, who was of a different nationality; and he could perceive no reason why this should be done. He would vote for the resolution of his hon friend from Victoria, New Brunswick.

Mr. BLAKE said there was one part of the discussion which he had heard with pain and grief. The hon. members who moved and seconded the resolution described the people who inhabited this country, as Frenchmen who stood shoulder to shoulder, Scotchmen who stood shoulder to shoulder, Englishmen who stood shoulder to shoulder, and Irishmen who did not stand shoulder to shoulder. As a Canadian of Irish descent, when he heard those sentiments he looked around the House to see where there was a place for a Canadian. The hon. gentlemen did not think that there was any such thing as Canadian sentiment or nationality. Was this the way such questions were to be met here? Was this the way in which patriotic sentiment was to be made to glow? It was utterly impossible. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) deprecated raising this question; but, if he did not wish to raise it, why did he do so? He would prove to the House that the mouth of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) was closed on this subject. The Government measure in this respect met his hearty approval. The condition was that a complete amnesty should be given to all persons concerned in the North-West troubles, except to Riel, Lépine and O'Donoghue; and to

Mr. PALMER.

Riel and Lépine on condition of five years' banishment. The hon. member for Victoria said this man was banished in reference to what was called the Fenian Raid, and that he had no connection with it. There was a ground existing with reference to Riel and Lépine which did not exist in O'Donoghue's case. In fact O'Donoghue was largely responsible for the extreme condition of affairs which led to the outlawry of Riel and Lépine. He always believed that O'Donoghue was one of the principal actors in that crime, although he did not think his guilt was much greater or less than that of the other two persons. But as it had been denied that there was any Fenian raid, he would have to cite the evidence which was taken before the North-West Committee. Archbishop Taché said :

"After leaving Fort Garry, I met some of those who were called Fenians. I met O'Donoghue himself three days' distance from Fort Garry. I made a point of speaking to him on the question, and I showed to him not only the impropriety, but the criminality of the thing. He denied to me having any intention of making an attack upon the Province of Manitoba; he said he was merely leader of a party of emigrants who were going to Manitoba, and that he had come to an agreement with the railway companies to get a reduction in the passage for these emigrants. He also stated that he would convey them to their destination and go back at once to secure other emigrants to Manitoba."

Father Richot, in the course of his examination, said :

"I wrote a letter to the Lieutenant-Governor upon the occasion of the O'Donoghue raid. I have a copy of the letter which I can produce. The Lieutenant-Governor then wrote me a note stating that he desired to see me. * * * His Excellency said he wanted to know what attitude the French population would take on the Fenian invasion."

Sir John A. Macdonald said :

"Among other subjects that we discussed, was the Fenian raid that had been put down in October, 1871. I spoke to him of information that had been received by the Government, that Riel and Lépine, although professing to act against the Fenian movements, were really in concert with the leaders of that movement. * * * At that time the situation of the country was very different to what it is now. The feeling of bitter hostility between the races was then at its height, having been greatly aggravated by the Fenian invasion."

A letter from Mr. W. H. Watt, of Pembina, stated :

"This place was, this morning, at 7.30, taken possession of by O'Donoghue, O'Neill, Donnelly and Curley, who had 35 men as followers. They were driven out by Colonel Wheaton, of the United States Army. He captured O'Neill, Donnelly and Curley, with ten of their men, also all their ammunition and arms, at least what they did not carry off with them. O'Donoghue left his cloak-overcoat, and since his flight from the fort has been captured by some of the Half-breeds on this side of the line."

Then the proclamation of Lieutenant-Governor Archibald contained the following passages :

"From the moment when the rumour of a Fenian raid assumed a character to be relied upon, my great anxiety was that our people, irrespective of past differences, should present a united front to the band of miscreants—the scum of the cities of the United States—who were collecting on our border for purposes of plunder, robbery and murder.

* * * O'Donoghue escaped to this side of the line, but was arrested in the course of the evening by some French Half-breeds. During the night, under a mistaken view of what was best to be done, he was taken to the frontier and placed in the same custody as the other prisoners, by parties who acted very naturally under the circumstances, but still in a way to be regretted. * * *

If among these people there were, and I believe there were, some persons whose exceptional position might have led O'Donoghue to look for their support, it only adds to the value of the demonstration, and removes the last hope of the miscreants who have invaded your soil that they would receive sympathy or aid from any branch of the population. * * *

I regret to have to inform you that, on the same day, the United States civil authorities at Pembina, to whom Colonel Wheaton was obliged to hand over his prisoners, discharged these marauders, for reasons that I am unable to comprehend, and that one of them, O'Donoghue, still remains in the neighbourhood of Pembina, awaiting an opportunity of renewing the attack."

The following was an extract from Lieutenant-Governor Archibald's speech from the Throne :

"I have reason to congratulate you on the attitude assumed by all classes of the people on the occasion of the recent Fenian raid."

The following was an extract from the address of the Legislative Council in reply :—

"We feel that your Excellency could have no more signal proof of the soundness of the policy of forbearance and fair-play towards all classes of the people, than was afforded by the attitude of the whole population on the occasion of the recent Fenian raid."

But he would not go on. He had given enough extracts to show this House that it was not misled when he characterized this transaction in which O'Donoghue was engaged in company with O'Neil, as a Fenian raid. The hon. gentleman said that O'Donoghue was sacrificed, that he was treated unjustly, that his property had suffered, and that he ought to be permitted to return to attend to a large tract of land in the North-West which he claimed. But what the hon. gentleman asked was, that O'Donoghue should be placed in the same position as Riel and Lepine, in that, by the proclamation issued in pursuance of an address by this House, they were amnestied. As to Riel, he was condemned by a process of outlawry, the proclamation amnestying him after five years' banishment. As to Lepine, he had been tried and convicted and was under sentence of two years' imprisonment at that time, and the pardon, of course, could only be a conditional one. But he claimed to accept the condition, and served out his time and, therefore, the amnesty did not reach him, he preferring to remain in prison for two years to five years' banishment. Riel then was the only case that had to be considered. Even were O'Donoghue placed in the same position as Riel he could not return to Manitoba as an amnestied man, because that privilege was not accorded to Riel himself, his term of banishment not having expired, so that this question of property would remain in the same position as it now was, were O'Donoghue treated like Riel, for he could not return to Manitoba till after five years had elapsed. The hon. gentleman had spoken as if Riel and those placed in the same category with him, were enjoying present rights and privileges not accorded to O'Donoghue. But this was fallacious, because, were an amnesty given to O'Donoghue to-morrow, on the same terms as it had been given to Riel, he could not enter Manitoba, and his property would have to be attended to, and his residence fixed by the same considerations by which they were governed to-day. The hon. gentleman said that an injustice was done to O'Donoghue because he might return at any rate at the end of five years if he were amnestied. He (Mr. Blake) undertook to show by the most conclusive evidence, to which the hon. gentleman had given the attestation of recording it on the Journals of this House, that it was not the want of an amnesty that prevented his returning to Manitoba. He would refer the House to the hon. gentleman's motion of last year, moved on the 23rd March. In that motion was recited a letter from O'Donoghue to the Speaker of this House, in which he declared that he was entirely ignorant of, and had nothing to do with, and was quite irresponsible for the death of Scott, and that if it was not for the so-called Fenian raid, he would long since have demanded a trial as to his action in the North-West. It would be seen by this that he did not want an amnesty for his participation in the North-West troubles, but for his action in the Fenian raid. That was what prevented his coming to his adopted country.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) : That is correct.

Mr. BLAKE said they knew now what was desired: that, under colour of a motion to grant a like amnesty to that granted to Riel and Lepine in connection with the North-West troubles of 1869-70, the House was asked to amnesty O'Donoghue for his participation in the Fenian raid. One man was arrested by reason of his connection with that raid. He was a British subject, and, had it not been for the present painful discussion, he would not mention his nationality, but he was a Frenchman. His name was Louis Latonne. He was arrested, charged, tried, convicted of high treason and sentenced to death. His sentence was commuted to twenty years' imprisonment, and subsequently to twenty years' banishment. There had been no appeal. No Englishman, Irishman or Scotchman had asked for the remission of his sentence, so he was not embraced in the motion of his hon. friend. O'Donoghue, in a letter formally addressed to Mr. Speaker as the organ of this House, had told him in the strongest and plainest terms, by his own statement, that he did not care for amnesty, that he was not prevented from entering Manitoba by reason of the North-West troubles, but that it was the Fenian trouble that prevented him from going there. But it was said this was not really a Fenian raid, but was part of the original organization, part of the old troubles of 1869-70. He (Mr. Blake) did not hold O'Donoghue's crime the less on this account. At that period, a Constitution had been given to the North-West. The rights of the people there had been vindicated. They had the blessing not merely of popular representation, but also of a Legislative Council nominated by the Crown. Under these circumstances, with the full form of the British Constitution mirrored in their small society, these men, in October, 1871, attempted to renew the old rebellion, by the concurrence of others and of O'Donoghue himself. And this was the man who said he did not ask for any favour of the Canadian Government, that he had meted out to him the full measure of their injustice, and that the world should know, in his own good time, the full particulars of the whole matter; this was the man who said he did not require amnesty, and that he would come back were it not for the Fenian raid; this was the man who now found an advocate in the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan). Would the hon. gentleman give the House to understand that O'Donoghue had withdrawn from the position he had before taken and that he would now accept amnesty, and then that he was not afraid to meet his trial as a Fenian invader? The hon. member said: Try him for that. But O'Donoghue did not want to be tried. The hon. gentleman said that the last motion made upon this subject was voted down as one of want of confidence, and that the followers of the Government were appealed to to treat it as such. The hon. gentleman did not correctly recollect the circumstances of the debate; no such appeal was made, nor was it necessary. The motion was not treated as a motion of want of confidence by either side, and this was evidenced by the fact that 30 supporters of the Government voted with the hon. gentleman, and 26 of the members opposite voted with the Government. To call such a motion one of want of confidence was quite out of the question. The motion was treated upon its merits. He did not think the present was the proper time to bring forward such a motion. There had been plenty of time allotted to ordinary business in which it might have been brought up, without occupying the scanty time remaining of the Session. The hon. gentleman from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had announced a change of base.

Mr. MASSON: I have not changed.

Mr. BLAKE said, of course, the hon. gentleman would say so. He said he always voted for amnesty, but could not vote for the motion last year because it called for an enquiry into the facts stated by O'Donoghue. The hon. gentleman was willing, however, to assume the facts.

Mr. MASSON: No.

Mr. BLAKE: Then the hon gentleman does not believe this letter?

Mr. MASSON: Of course, I do not.

Mr. BLAKE said, in that case the hon. gentleman added the character of a liar to O'Donoghue's other good qualities. It now turned out from what the hon. gentleman said, that the letter upon which an enquiry was asked, was a tissue of falsehoods—as he himself believed; and yet, the hon. gentleman was willing to vote in favour of the man who was impudent and mendacious enough to write it.

Mr. MASSON: I did not mean an enquiry at all.

Mr. BLAKE: No, he meant justice without an enquiry.

Mr. MASSON: No, but because an amnesty had been promised him.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Mr. MASSON: You voted for it.

Mr. BLAKE: No. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) had been good enough to allude to him as having facilities for taking the course of mercy on this subject. He would be willing to meet the challenge in respect to his share in the administration of his Department when the proper time came, but he hoped the hon. gentleman would make himself more familiar with the facts in the future than he had shown himself that right. It had been his (Mr. Blake's) painful duty and great misfortune to have had occasion to advise or be responsible for, during the course of his short tenure of office, no less than seven capital cases, instead of two, as stated; and he could assure the hon. gentleman that when he had hesitancy, it was not so much with regard to commutations as with regard to executions. There was another difficulty to which it was his duty to call the attention of the House. At the period at which this proclamation took place, as for several years before, it had been the custom of the Colonial Government to use the prerogative of mercy by making the condition of punishment mere absence from the dominions of Her Majesty. But about that time the attention of the Colonial Secretary was called to the difficulty arising out of the remonstrances of one of the Australian Colonies, against criminals being sent there from another country. The result was, that the position was taken, which he believed to be impregnable, that it was not fitting to thrust upon other countries criminals who were unfit to live among our own people. He had, however, endeavoured to secure exemption from this rule in the case of political offenders, as the same reason did not obtain as in the case of criminal offenders, and as this mode of punishment sometimes was the most convenient mode of dealing with such cases. That subject was still under discussion, and was not now settled; and, were it to be settled, the precise mode in which it should be settled would, of course, require to be considered before the arrangement could be held to include such a particular case in all its aspects as that of O'Donoghue. If, under these circumstances and at the present moment, the Government were prepared to say that the time had arrived when a decision could be taken on the subject, that difficulty would stand in their way, unless some means could be devised of practically putting O'Donoghue on the same footing with Riel and Lépine. It was the opinion of the Government that, without naming such a time or declaring any decision, the time had not arrived for taking any action on the matter; and, that no real injustice—according to the sense in which the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Mr. Costigan) used that term, in which he (Mr. Blake) did not agree with him—was done O'Donoghue at the present moment. Even if the motion were granted, O'Donoghue would not be, for years, in a position to return to Manitoba, and, therefore, no injustice—in the hon. gentlemen's sense—was done by not granting it at this time.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings): Then we may take it for granted that it will be granted by-and-by.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman would take nothing for granted from him. When he was prepared to make such a statement, he would do so in unmistakable terms; but he made no such proclamation or announcement to-night. Taking the exceptional circumstances under which Riel and Lépine were amnestied, which the Government had thought, and, he believed, still thought, had weight, they had not thought fit to agree to the present proposition, and would resist the motion of the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, in the first place, he did not see why the Minister of Justice felt so deeply pained at the allusion made to the different nationalities, which occupied that country. It was a fact that, while we are all Canadians, or ought to be, we all had different origins, and should be proud of them. The Englishman, being a portion of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, would be proud of being a free-born Englishman; the Scotchman, his own countryman, was proud of his own nationality—sometimes, it was said, too proudly—and they all knew the patriotic feeling of an Irishman for his nationality. These feelings always worked for good in the mother country, and they worked for good here. They found Englishmen working for and looking after their countrymen, because they were Englishmen; and so with Scotchmen and Irishmen; and instead of its being a feeling to be deprecated, it is a loyal feeling which ought to be encouraged. Coming to the motion before the House, he would look at the position of the parties. They had three persons named in the resolution, Riel, Lépine, and O'Donoghue. All three were, he fancied, beyond a doubt, engaged in the insurrection and disturbances in the North-West. They stood upon a par there. All three were equally guilty of taking up arms against Her Majesty in the legal sense, though some of his hon. friends on that side of the House would say they were not so guilty in a moral sense. Lépine, besides, was found guilty by a court and jury, of his countrymen, of murder. A process was issued against Riel by the Attorney-General of Manitoba, for the same crime, but he fled from justice, and after legal notice, was outlawed for murder. The Attorney-General and the Government of that country, did not think, he presumed, that they had evidence against O'Donoghue for murder, either to issue a process or to proceed to outlawry. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had yet to learn that the Governor, or Government, or Attorney-General, or any of the authorities there, found they had evidence sufficient to issue a process against O'Donoghue, or to carry out that process to outlawry for murder. They stood, then, all guilty of this insurrection; two guilty of murder, for outlawry was equal to conviction. They were bound to believe that the third man was innocent, because no action was taken to establish his guilt. Comparing, therefore, the position of these three men, O'Donoghue did not stand in a worse position, in any respect, to say the least of it, than the other two. On the other hand, he stood in an infinitely better position in the eye of the law, because he was neither found guilty nor outlawed, nor charged, so far as he (Sir John A. Macdonald) could learn, by legal process; and he stood equally with them, having committed no greater crime, having taken no other action, no other treasonable step or course, than they, in regard to the rising in the North-West. Under these circumstances, why should not O'Donoghue be placed with respect to those troubles in the same position as the other two men? He was not worse as a traitor, a rebel, a person rising in armed insurrection against the Crown than the other two. Then why should he be dealt with differently from the others? The resolution did not ask for the pardon of O'Donoghue, if he was guilty of any subsequent offence, such as this subsequent Fenian raid, which the hon. the Minister of Justice had taken so much trouble to prove he was mixed up in,—the attempt of 1871. That was not asked for. If he were guilty of that, let him be tried for that if he came into the country; but it was outside of this question, and of the causes of dissatisfaction specified in this resolution, which was not so much addressed to the case of O'Donoghue as to the deep-seated dissatisfaction of persons who fancied that the treatment of this man in an exceptional manner was because of his nationality. The dissatisfaction had been intensified because, from various concurrent circumstances, rightly or wrongly, a large class of their fellow-subjects believed that this man was made an exception of on that ground. They did not say or perhaps believe that it was because he was an Irishman, but they thought it was because he was not a Frenchman, which came to the same thing, because the strong influence within and without the Cabinet was not experienced in his favour which was exercised for two men of another nationality. Whether that were well founded, or altogether baseless and a mistake, or had an element of truth in it, the dissatisfaction was certain, and not so much in Manitoba and the North-West as in other parts of the Dominion. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) knew, and other members of this House knew, that it existed among that nationality in the Province of Ontario, and it was an ever-continuing source of irritation and indignation in their mind that this man was made the solitary exception in regard to this rising in arms: that one measure of punishment was dealt out to the other men, while he was excluded from all hopes of mercy and amnesty. They believed it was unfair and unjust, and that feeling of dissatisfaction and of discontent would continue to rankle in the mind of that nationality until the cause was removed. And why should it not be removed? With respect to the Fenian raid, his hon. friend had alluded to a letter of O'Donoghue's; he had read a portion of his letter, and had called him by a term which was very strong—used against a man writing in his position—an exile. The Minister of Justice had called him a "liar."

Mr. BLAKE: What was the term the hon. gentleman applied to a Lieutenant-Governor?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that whenever he used that language he thought he could defend it. He was speaking, not of a man who was a Lieutenant-Governor or a Minister of Justice either, but a poor exile, who had written a letter, which, though a very intemperate one, was an excusable one; and the hon. gentleman might well have spared the taunt he had thrown out. The Minister of Justice should have read the whole passage. This man denied that it was a Fenian raid, and alleged that it was the continuation of the original insurrection. Thus, he contended that his conduct across the line was a continuation of the original insurrection, carried out by the same parties, acting in consort. But if that were not so, if he was separately to be held responsible for his conduct in the Fenian raid, let it be so. If he were tried for being concerned in a Fenian raid against Canada, and found guilty, the country would acknowledge the justice of his sentence. This resolution did not say anything about that, but only referred to the offences of which Louis Riel and Lépine were amnestied on the condition of an exile for five years. Let them place O'Donoghue in the same position, and not leave him unamnestied for ever and ever for that offence, when the others, in three short years more could return. The head of the republic, Louis Riel; Lépine, his Adjutant-General, could return in three years more, and hold up their heads in Manitoba, and perhaps come and represent it in the House. Mr. O'Donoghue was banished for the term of his life, from his home and from his country. It was the height of injustice; there was no excuse, no justification for it, and he saw no reason why his hon. friend the Premier should not assent to the proposition to put this man in the same position as the other two, so that at the end of three years he could, if he chose, return and run his risk upon the same terms. Having committed the same crime, he should receive the same punishment as the others, and should get the same mercy. As to this being a vote of want of confidence, that was folly. No one could pretend that. The whole principle of motions made in Supply was this: that it was the right of the subject to take this time to bring forward any grievance he may have. The Commons were originally summoned to say how much money should be granted; but it had come to be the practice to discuss any questions of grievance on motion to go into Supply, and it was certainly no expression of want of confidence. It might be that a vote of censure was a vote of want of confidence; but the fact that a statement of this kind, asserting a right or claim, or a grievance of any kind, was made, was no matter of want of confidence. Again, in England, it was a matter of almost continual recurrence for motions of this nature to be offered. If they were carried, the Government accepted them—the House had decided—and then the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the Speaker do leave the Chair, and the House went on as before. As an hon. friend reminded him, his hon. friend the member for Victoria, N. B., had made a motion in precisely the same spirit as this one, when they (the late Government) were on the other side of the House; but they had not received or considered it as a vote of want of confidence. They knew that his hon. friend had confidence in them. He (Mr. Costigan) made the motion and it was carried. So every one knew that the Government of Lord Palmerston had nine of such motions made in one Session. They were not intended as votes of want of confidence. A charge of inconsistency had been made against his hon. friend (Mr. Costigan) because he voted for the resolution of 1875; but hence it was not to be supposed that the hon. gentleman was to be held responsible for the truth or falsehood of every allegation contained in the long recital which was the basis of this resolution. The hon. gentleman could not be cognizant of this long recital of details, and the resolution ended by recommending that there should be an immediate amnesty for everybody excepting three persons; and that there should be an amnesty for two of these at the end of five years. His hon. friend, at the time, like a sensible man, had taken the advice of his great countryman, O'Connell, who was always glad to take a step in advance. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) took what he could get, and voted for a general amnesty for the whole people, and a modified amnesty for Lépine and Riel, and he (Mr. Costigan) now came to carry out constitutionally the object he had honestly and faithfully been working for, as was his original idea, and hope and wish, to the full extent—the securing of a complete and thorough amnesty for all the parties concerned. One word more: He would vote for this resolution, and on the ground mentioned in it, that there was no disquiet in that country, or in this country, and no fear of disturbance in the future. They had to thank Providence that what had threatened to be a long and lasting trouble and a long and lasting embarrassment had passed away, and that the people of the North-West were now as law-abiding as the people of Ontario and Quebec. Under these circumstances, if it was believed, as he did in his heart of hearts believe, that there was a real feeling of dissatisfaction—and he would mention it plainly—among the Irish people of this Dominion, because they thought that this man, their countryman, with whom they sympathised, had a good case, and had been left out in the cold, to use an American expression, and condemned to spend the rest of his life in a foreign land, when the other two men would, in three years, return to this country and assume the position of British subjects and free men, enjoying their property and rejoining their families and friends. As he had said before, one of the two had already been elected to this House, and, he dared say, they would find both of them yet sitting in the House; while this other man, O'Donoghue, would stand looking wistfully across the Line, seeing his lost friends and his conspirators on this side of it, enjoying all British subjects could enjoy—all their hopes, and, if they liked, all their ambitions. This was not fair play. He appealed to the common sense and good heart of the House, and asked if it was not fair play to vote for the resolution to grant fair play and justice to these three men.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman say why, when he had the opportunity, and sent secret service money to Riel and Lépine, he did not give O'Donoghue a small share.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: And that is the First Minister's speech in answer to this appeal for mercy to this man.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has no faith in his appeal, and he knows that very well.

Mr. BOWELL said he had not given a vote on the question of amnesty or any question affecting the North-West Territory since he had had the honour of a seat in the House without giving his reason for it, and upon the present occasion he proposed to follow the same course, particularly as the aspect of affairs had somewhat changed. He must express his surprise in connection with others, at the tone which had characterized the utterances of many members who had spoken on the question, and not less for the reasons that some of them had given for the course they intended to pursue. On former occasions, it had either been his good fortune or his misfortune, to differ from others on this important matter, and the vote he should give to-night would be cast for other reasons than those assigned by any hon. gentleman who had preceded him. He had witnessed, however, even in the inception of this debate, the same reasons given for the course members intended to pursue upon this question that had been stated on former occasions, more particularly by those gentlemen who were supposed to be either directly or indirectly connected with the North-West troubles and difficulties. He had not been surprised to hear the hon. member for Selkirk give the reasons he did, nor to hear the reasons advanced by the hon. member for Provencher, for the course he (Mr. Bannatyne) intended to pursue. He could easily understand that where there was any danger or likelihood of even a probability arising as to evidence being given that might implicate those who were not yet directly implicated in these difficulties, those gentlemen who were at least interested to a greater or less extent in these difficulties, should prevent, to the best of their power, any person coming into this country who might shed some light on that question; but he was surprised, and very much so, at the remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax, (Mr. Power). The only reason that hon. gentleman had given for opposing the motion was because O'Donoghue had stated he was desirous of returning to this country in order to give evidence against others who had not yet been implicated in the troubles in the North-West. If there were those in the country, who, though occupying prominent positions, should be punished in connection with these difficulties, and if any of the Hudson Bay Company officers had instigated these troubles, he thought it would be well that the country should know who they were that should bear this responsibility. His hon. friend from Marquette had told the House what he (Mr. Bowell) at least had not learned before—and he thought he could say, without egotism, that he had devoted some little time to the study of this question—that O'Donoghue was a party, directly, to that foul and bloody murder which took place in the west, but adduced no evidence to sustain his assertion. Had he done so, there would have been no difficulty in dealing with this question, so far as he (Mr. Bowell) was concerned, as he would vote against him without a moment's hesitation. He had, however, been unable, though he had taken some trouble in the matter, to ascertain the truth of this statement; and he had yet to learn that this charge was based upon fact, or that the question of nationality was a reason why a man should be convicted or amnestied, pardoned or elevated to office. He deprecated the introduction of the question of nationality or religion as much as any man possibly could, having, outside of the House—and he thought he had inside of it—but at all events on every occasion in his own constituency, and otherwise, raised his voice against the claim which any particular nationality or creed set up for office or for any other position. He had deprecated this when these amnesty resolutions were introduced; he had ventured the opinion last year, and he repeated it now, as he had seen no reason to change his mind—that had O'Donoghue been, to use the language he had employed in 1875, when discussing this question, of the same nationality as those who were amnestied and pardoned, he (O'Donoghue) would not have been made a solitary exception. He was not surprised at the tone assumed by the Minister of Justice. It was a tone which the hon. gentleman generally employed, more particularly when he (Mr. Blake) was hurling his taunts across the floor of the House. It would, indeed, be somewhat surprising if any member who dared to have an opinion different from that entertained by that hon. gentleman, and dared to give expression to it, was not treated in the same insolent manner in which the hon. gentleman treated every man—he would, if the word insolent were objectionable and unparliamentary, withdraw it, and, in a more parliamentary manner, declare that it was objectionable for the Minister of Justice to treat every man who deemed it his duty to express an opinion in opposition to or in contradistinction to him, to hurl such epithets at them as he did. The hon. gentleman had no right to assume the position he had, and to tell him (Mr. Bowell) that he had expressed opinions which he never had uttered; nor was the hon. gentleman justified, either by fact or by the documents from which he (Mr. Blake) had read—the account of the investigation into the troubles of the North-West Territory, of which he (Mr. Blake) was a very prominent member, and of which he (Mr. Bowell) was a very humble one. What he (Mr.

Bowell) had said, and what he would repeat, was, that O'Donoghue might have been a Fenian as well as a rebel. He had never stated it to be his belief that he (O'Donoghue) was not. He had never expressed an opinion that would lead anyone to believe, as far as he was concerned, that O'Donoghue was less guilty than Riel and Lépine, so far as related to the outbreak in the North-West; but he had never seen any evidence showing that O'Donoghue was a direct party to the murder, and such evidence had never been produced in the House or in the Committee. The contrary, indeed, had been established. What he had said he now repeated: there was no evidence in the document from which the hon. gentlemen had quoted, to prove to the contrary—that though O'Donoghue might have gone into the United States for the very purpose of raising a body of men to invade British territory, he did so with the knowledge, consent and authority of those with whom he had formerly acted in rebellion; and in order to show this, he would read what had already been read once or twice in the House, the affidavit of a Frenchman who was present on a Sunday, before church, at St. Norbert, and who heard the conversations and discussions between Riel and his friends which arose on this very question of the raid into the North-West Territory. He knew that some hon. gentlemen had said that this man was unworthy of belief and characterless, but he had never yet found anything to establish that this was the case, save mere assertions. The affidavit ran as follows:—

“I, Francois Charrette, of the parish of St. Norbert, make oath and say: That, at the church of Pere Richot, on Sunday, the 8th October, 1871, I was present and, in the morning, before service commenced, I heard Louis Riel say to a number of Half-breeds, who were assembled outside the church, ‘You see,’ said he, ‘that our friend O'Donoghue is taken prisoner at Pembina, he has always been our friend, and we should fight for him and try to get him released.’ Pierre Delorme said: ‘Our O'Donoghue is a prisoner and we can do nothing, as the English are stronger than we; but the best thing we can do is to go and see the Governor and to offer him our services, to show, as we can do nothing for O'Donoghue, we are all on his side now.’ To this, Riel agreed, and they all went away to see the Governor. From what I have heard Riel and others say, I know that it was the intention of him and his party to join O'Donoghue and the Fenians."

This affidavit of François Charrette was sworn to at Winnipeg, on the 12th of October, 1871, before J. H. Ashdown, J.P. Taking the subsequent events in connection with this Fenian invasion, everything would show that these men were all implicated in, and supporters of, the movement, and there was no doubt but that when O'Donoghue came to the frontier, it was with the distinct understanding that he should be met and assisted in this incursion by Riel and his followers. It had taken the Minister of Justice half his time to disprove what really was not contained in the resolution and what the House was not asked to affirm; there not being a word in it about pardon for the crime of the Fenian raid. It was true the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) had referred to this matter in his speech by declaring that O'Donoghue was no worse than Riel and Lépine, but those who voted for the resolution would affirm only what it contained, and not what the mover of it had given as his opinion. The Minister of Justice had tried to divert, designedly, he (Mr. Bowell) believed, the attention of the House from the facts at issue, as embodied in the resolution. What they had to decide was simply, whether the House was prepared to affirm that W. D. O'Donoghue should be placed in the same position as Riel and Lépine, so far as related to the North-West troubles, without considering in any way the Fenian raid. If this man was guilty of being a Fenian and had transgressed the law in that respect, he was subject to the laws of this country, and if he came into it, he must take the consequences. He had stated and now repeated—he did not believe there was a man in the whole of this broad Dominion who would have objected to a general amnesty if blood had not been spilt, and more particularly if it had not been shed in the manner it had been. O'Donoghue must take his own responsibility for any crime he might have committed after he left the country, and which had no connection with these troubles. If O'Donoghue could show that this raid was an offshoot and part and parcel of the insurrection, all these men who had been pardoned were equally guilty, and connection with the raid would not be a separate and distinct crime, but one coming within the meaning of this resolution. If it did not, as the Minister of Justice contended, then the House was not asked to pronounce an opinion on it, and it was trifling with the question to drag it into the discussion. The hon. gentleman laid a great deal of stress on the alleged fact that Riel and those with whom he was associated, had offered their services to the Governor of Manitoba, when the raid took place. Dates, however, show this to be a fallacy. It was on the 5th March the fiendish attack was made, and on the 7th they were driven from Canadian territory, and yet it was not until the 12th following, after O'Donoghue and his friends had been driven out of the country, that Riel and his fellow patriots offered their services to Governor Archibald. How that act could be made a justifiable reason for the amnesty granted, he could not comprehend. Still, he and his followers were reprieved, while O'Donoghue was made a solitary exception of, on the ground that he was a Fenian; but, whether he was a Fenian or not, the resolution did not propose to deal with anything of that kind. The simple proposition before them was whether it was just and proper that one man, who was no more guilty than those who had been amnestied, should be selected and doomed to perpetual banishment, while those who had added to their other guilt that of murder were either pardoned or banished for only five years; that was what they had to consider and nothing more. After making enquiries into the case of O'Donoghue, and having found he was not a party to the murder of Scott, he was prepared to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria, and he was also prepared to justify that vote before his constituents. He had voted against the resolution last year because it reflected upon members of the House, which he did not think either right or proper, and therefore should be opposed; but now it was a fair proposition and he trusted, however strong his feelings were and had been in regard to the North-West troubles, that he could at least take a dispassionate view of the question four or five years after the difficulty occurred, and do an act of justice. He cared not one rap for a man's nationality or his religion; he wished to see equal justice meted out to all. O'Donoghue was no more guilty than the other parties, and he saw no reason of justice in placing him in a worse position than Riel and Lépine had been placed, so far as it related to the troubles in the North-West territory. That far he was prepared to go, but no further, and not even that far if he had one tittle of evidence to show that O'Donoghue had been a party to the murder of Scott.

Mr. YOUNG said the best evidence of the character of this vote was to be found in the speeches of the hon. member for Kingston, and the hon. gentleman who had just resumed his seat. Both speeches, towards the close, were explanatory of the reasons why the hon. gentlemen would vote for the resolution; both seemed to think it was desirable to explain the extraordinary vote they were about to give. A more extraordinary motion than this he never saw moved in the House, and he thought his hon. friends on the other side must be hard up for subjects out of which to make political capital when they moved to amnesty a man who was guilty of participating in a Fenian raid on the peaceable people of this country. If there was anything hon. gentlemen opposite had been noted for it was their loyalty; if there was one thing more than another for which the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had been distinguished, it was his intense loyalty; and yet that hon. gentleman and his colleagues had advocated the amnesty of a Fenian. He thought the case of Riel and Lépine was different from that of O'Donoghue, and for this reason: That they objected to the entrance of Mr. Macdougall into their Province because they maintained that certain rights to which they were entitled had not been confirmed to them. He said at that time, as he said now, that those gentlemen were justified to a certain extent, but not to the length to which they went, because the trouble was owing to the blunder of the late Government in sending worn-out politicians from Ontario to rule over this people without their consent. He thought he was correct in stating that the main consideration in granting the partial banishment to Riel and Lépine was, because, at a critical moment, when the Province was attacked by Fenians from the United States, they offered their services to repel the invasion. The fact that the Crown accepted their services on that occasion constituted a reason why they should not be treated in the same way as O'Donoghue. In addition to that person being engaged in the rebellion, he had collected a force in the United States, and proceeded to attack the Province of Manitoba, hoping that the rebels would assist him in wresting it from the British Crown, and annexing it to the United States, and he thought the hon. gentlemen who were now advocating an amnesty were acting quite inconsistently with their past record. He was of opinion, all things considered, that O'Donoghue was not entitled to amnesty at the hands of the House.

Mr. ST. JEAN said he had been opposed to a general amnesty from the first, and the discussion to-night had shown him that it was his duty to vote against the motion. If the hon. member for Victoria had brought up the motion in another shape, on another day, he might have supported it; but, all circumstances considered, he felt it his duty to oppose the motion.

Mr. FARROW said the question had narrowed down to a small point, and he certainly differed with the hon. the Minister of Justice's idea as to justice in this matter. It seemed to him the whole question was in this shape: Riel and Lépine invited Gen. O'Neill to come over the line into Manitoba with a band of Fenians, and being pretty wide awake they decided at the eleventh hour, in order to secure pardon for their misdeeds, to offer their assistance to the Government to repel the invaders. But those Frenchmen, who were as guilty as O'Donoghue, were amnestied and this poor Irishman was condemned to perpetual banishment. It could not be proved that O'Donoghue had anything to do with the murder of Scott. He wished to do right to all classes, and he certainly thought that O'Donoghue had been badly treated. He would, therefore, vote for the resolution.

SUPPLY.

XI. MILITIA.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

70. Pay, maintenance and equipment of "A" and "B" Batteries Garrison Artillery and Schools of Gunnery, Kingston and Quebec..... $115,000

Mr. LANGEVIN asked the reason of the $5,000 increase on last year's vote.

Mr. VAIL stated it was because of small increases to officers, &c., to the extent of $3,340. The balance went to make up the Estimates of last year, which were slightly short.

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought there ought to be a large reduction, because the expenditure was useless in the present condition of our finances. He knew of six young men who studied at the batteries and then went to the United States, and this practice was pretty general. Young men who entered the schools were either too idle or too useless to find other employment for themselves. The necessary details of the expenditure of last year should have been given in the Public Accounts.

Mr. CARON said he thought no money was better applied than that to "B" Battery at Quebec, and he presumed the same was the case with respect to "A" Battery at Kingston. During the winter months, many young men out of employment took advantage of the schools, and thus got a fair military training. The commanding officer of the Battery was well known in military circles.

Mr. DOMVILLE remarked upon the large expenditure for fuel and light.

Mr. VAIL said, the winters being cold, a large expenditure was necessary. Everything was purchased by contract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD enquired whether the contracts were made at Ottawa.

Mr. VAIL: Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that hereafter they should be made at Kingston and Quebec, on the ground of cheapness. He approved of the militia being kept up to a high state of efficiency. If it was worth while having a militia force at all, it should be well organized. Still, the Government should be ready to furnish all information, as there was no appropriation which was looked upon with such suspicion by the public, as that for the militia. For instance, the Government should be able to show how it was that so large a sum as $13,000 was required for fuel and light.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that a large quantity of fuel was necessarily used at the barracks at Kingston and Quebec.

Vote agreed to.

71 Military College.....$35,000 00

Mr. LANGEVIN said that when the vote was before the House last year, he called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the regulations with respect to the Military College. His observations received the attention of the hon. the Minister and the Government, and shortly afterwards a new set of regulations were ordered. They did not, however, go so far as he (Mr. Langevin) desired, in order that the young men of Quebec Province might be induced to compete at the examinations and become cadets. Out of the 26 who had submitted themselves for examination, 17 were from Ontario, 4 from Quebec, 4 from New Brunswick, and 1 from Manitoba; 15 of those admitted were from Ontario,

3 from Quebec, 3 from New Brunswick, and 1 from Manitoba. Of the three admitted from the Province of Quebec, only one was a Frenchman. According to the population of the Province, they should have about six cadets at the College. In the interest of the French-Canadians he asked that the regulations should be amended so that they would be put in a fair position with other races. At present, one of the qualifications required was English grammar, and writing English correctly, in a good, legible hand, from dictation. He suggested that the regulations might be amended to provide that a French-Canadian should know his own language correctly, and write his own language correctly, and know the English language sufficiently to be understood. Very few French-Canadians, from 15 to 20 years, would be able to comply with the regulation in its present form.

Mr. BABY said he concurred fully with the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin). Should the country become engaged in a war, at any time, it would have to rely for troops, to a considerable extent, on the French-Canadian population. If there were soldiers, there must be officers to command them, and the soldiers would prove valuable only as they had confidence in their commanders. He must admit that the Province of Quebec—as he had heard were the countrymen of the Premier—was a little clannish.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are quite mistaken.

Mr. BABY: We are to some extent clannish and diffident, but not prejudiced.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is exactly what we are.

Mr. BABY said that if the officers commanding inspired confidence among the soldiers they would no doubt render very great service. He did not need to look back to the record of what his race had done for the glory of the British flag in this country—for everybody knew it—when led by officers who spoke their own language, and in whom they had perfect confidence. This college should be so conducted that their young men could enter it and prepare for service, should such an emergency arise.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could only state that the Government was exceedingly anxious to adopt such regulations as would suit all classes of the population. There was, no doubt, a great deal in what the hon. gentleman had said. The regulations had been changed somewhat, as the hon. member for Charlevoix had advised last year, and if this did not suffice, they must make another attempt to do so. The Government would lose no opportunity or avoid any effort necessary to accomplish the object they desired—to have in the school French-Canadian students to a number at least equal to their proper proportion. He quite agreed with almost everything the hon. gentleman had uttered as to the desirability of accomplishing this result. He took a special interest in this institution, for it was a penchant of his; and he had no doubt that it would succeed. It was admirably managed by officers brought from England, and he would be very glad if the French-Canadians would visit the institution before they returned home, to see for themselves the progress that had been made. He had no doubt the Minister of Militia would take note of all that had been said, and endeavour to meet the objection made, which seemed to be a fair one; and instead of submitting dictation in English, cause it to be submitted in French. At the same time, it would be quite apparent to every one, that a fair knowledge of English was almost, if not absolutely necessary, to enable the French-Canadian students to make due progress and keep their ground with the other students.

Mr. TUPPER: What is the present number of its students?

Mr. VAIL: Twenty-nine.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Seven entered lately.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked whether, if the regulations were changed in the direction mentioned, an opportunity would within four, five or six months be given to young men from the Province of Quebec, to compete for entrance into the College without waiting for one, two or three years?

Mr. VAIL said they were now sending out advertisements relative to examinations to take place six months hence. They intended to have two or three more examinations at the termination of the period. The hon. member for Charlevoix would remember that when he made his suggestions last year, he (Mr. Vail) had gone over the examination papers with him; and he would ask the hon. gentleman to come to the Department, when he (Mr. Vail) would be very happy to consider the different subjects, and any further alterations proposed. Their object was to secure a certain number of students from each Province—Quebec to have its share. There were none at present from the Provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

Mr. LANGEVIN: What is the full number?

Mr. VAIL: Twenty-nine.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Fifteen of the students are from Ontario.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The maximum number of students is laid down in the Act.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that only three of the students came from Quebec. He wished a chance to be given to this Province to have its full proportion.

Mr. VAIL: If students do not offer, as the Act provides, then the number is filled up from the other Provinces.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds): What is the total number that can be admitted?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that 100 is the maximum at the end of four years, and, after that, one quarter of their number will go out yearly.

Mr. JONES said the college was a very good institution, and very well managed, but it appeared that, for the amount of money expended on it they were receiving at present comparatively little value. Only 18 or 20 students had been in it until lately, and now the number was only 29. He attributed the increase to the fact that the examinations were made less stringent. In the first instance, these had been too severe. If properly administered, the college would be of very great advantage to the country. He desired to know whether the examinations had not been changed. He thought they should be the same for every cadet, and such as to admit into the institution gentlemen of fair and ordinary education.

Mr. VAIL said the Act only permitted the entrance of 22 students during the first year. A very large number of applications were then received, and they, therefore, desired to secure the entrance of the best. Possibly the examination papers were then a little difficult. They had since been altered somewhat, but the young men who passed under them intended to have passed when the first papers existed.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he was glad to know that the Government and Premier took such an interest in the College, which, in the course of time, would have the results attained by similar institutions in England and the United States. During the American civil war, almost all the prominent officers on both sides had graduated at West Point.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Estimates provided for sixty instead of twenty-nine cadets; and if the former number enter, as each cadet paid $250, $200 on entering and $50 afterwards, this would effect a considerable reduction, and if that number did not enter, the expenditure would not be so great as it otherwise would be.

Mr. COSTIGAN said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the fact that he had received from a former volunteer officer in the Engineers, a letter complaining of the treatment he had received and asking for certain papers to be laid before the House. He mentioned the matter in order that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Vail) was so disposed the papers might be brought down before concurrence. The papers included a report made on the 26th of June last, by Sergeant-Major Hurd and requisition written by this officer on the 13th of last March, and a letter on the same subject, dated March 16th, 1877.

Mr. JONES.

Mr. BLAKE: Send across a memorandum of the papers you desire.

Mr. MITCHELL called attention to page 164 of the Public Accounts, and suggested that next year, it would be better to separate the items of which the gross sums now entered were made up, as to travelling expenses, furnishing guards of honour for local legislatures, &c., in order that they might better judge of them. On the next page, $968.75 was entered for the supply of wood to the detachment stationed in a small building on St. Helen Island. The island had an abundance of wood upon it, and the charge was something outrageous.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That wood is never cut for fuel.

Mr. MITCHELL said the decaying wood would keep the place in fuel. If three times the market price were paid, it was utterly impossible that so much money could have been expended for this purpose.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That includes the fuel for the building in Montreal.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then you should say so.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The item is entered for Montreal.

Vote agreed to.

72. Military Schools, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.....	$10,000
----------------------------------------------------------	----------

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought those schools ought to be done away with, as they did no good whatever.

Vote agreed to.

73. Pay and maintenance of Dominion forces in Manitoba.....	$35,000
-------------------------------------------------------------	----------

Mr. SCHULTZ said that before this item passed, he desired to call attention to a grievance felt by discharged volunteers in Manitoba, in regard to the manner of their payment, and certain vexatious conditions and restrictions imposed upon them in the matter of the execution of Bounty Warrants, which, to a certain extent, formed part of their pay. The volunteer force in Manitoba was composed generally of the very best class of men. The inducement of serving their Queen and country in the new Province, had been found sufficient to tempt men who were classically bred, and of the best families, into the ranks of the force. These men who had faithfully served their country during the period of their enlistment, now felt that they had been in some points, badly treated; and in the absence of the hon. gentleman who had special charge of their case, he would merely call attention now to their petition to this House, and trust to that hon. gentleman to bring the matter up formally at concurrence. The volunteers in question had presented to the House, this Session, the following petition:—

"To the Honourable the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled.

"The petition of three ex-staff sergeants of the Provisional Battalion of Infantry in garrison at Fort Osborne, Manitoba, who were duly appointed at a meeting of the non-commissioned officers and men discharged from the said garrison July 1st, 1876 (held in Winnipeg the following 3rd of July; present: his Worship the Hon. W. N. Kennedy, the Mayor of Winnipeg, in the chair), to petition the Government with respect to the grievances of the said discharged volunteers, and to take such other action as might be required: Humbly sheweth,

"1. That your petitioners and their late comrades were discharged one calendar month and three days before the twelve months' service for which they were attested had expired, at one week's notice;

"2. That they were all men of good character, and had served Her Majesty loyally and faithfully;

"3. That a new order of the Dominion Lands Department, of which no public notice had been given, prevented the volunteers so discharged from disposing of their interests in their land grants, which had always been permitted previously;

"4. That the ex-volunteers were thus deprived of the opportunity of obtaining money for the purchase of civilian clothing, and otherwise greatly inconvenienced;

"5. That their land warrants were not given them until six weeks after the date of their discharge;

"6. That they had to incur the personal cost of board and lodging during this period;

"7. That, owing to the issue of Half-breed scrip in the meantime, when their land warrants did arrive, they were worth only fifty ($50) dollars, having declined fifty per cent. in value during the interval;

"8. That the attaching by Parliament, during its last Session, of a new condition to volunteer land warrants, whereby all warrants issued subsequently should be receivable at the offices of the Dominion Lands Department to the extent of twenty per cent. only of any single township, which condition should in equity not have been made applicable to the land warrants of volunteers then in the service of the Government, as being an alteration, without their consent, of the equivalent promised for their services on enlistment, tended further to diminish the market value of their said land warrants;

"9. That the fifty ($50) dollars realized by the sale of each grantee's land warrant was scarcely more than sufficient to defray the cost of board and lodging incurred while awaiting its arrival, and it would not compensate for the loss of time incurred;

"10. That each individual accordingly suffered damage as follows:—

By depreciation of his land warrant.	$50
Estimated cost of his board and lodging.....	45
For loss of time at $13 per month (private's pay), or more, according to rank.....	20
Total.....	$115

"11. That the officers affected by the said reduction of the garrison received three months' notice that their services would not be required after the 1st of July; and, further, a bonus of six months' pay according to rank on quitting the service, but the non-commissioned officers and privates were thrown upon the world at one week's notice, without any bonus at all, without their land warrants, and deprived (without warning) of the privilege of disposing of their interest in the same;

"12. That, on a reduction taking place on a previous occasion, the non-commissioned officers and men discharged received a bonus of two months' pay according to rank, and the privilege of disposing of their interest in their land grant was not interfered with;

"13. That your petitioners and their comrades were not afforded an opportunity of joining the Mounted Police Force, which many of them desired to do, although recruits were being enlisted in Canada at the time of their discharge; but their officers affected by the reduction were, in addition to the bonus of six months' pay already referred to, either provided with civil employment or reinstated in their military rank, the only exceptions being Lieutenant Nash, who declined reinstatement, and Quartermaster Stuart.

"Your humble petitioners therefore pray that they and their late comrades may be treated with the same consideration and liberality as their officers, and that your Honourable House approve of their being granted six months' pay according to rank, and pay according to rank and an allowance of one dollar per diem, in lieu of rations and quarters, for the period during which they were kept waiting for their land warrants; also the sum of fifty ($50) dollars each, in compensation for the depreciation in the pecuniary value of their land warrants resulting from the delay in issuing the same, and from the attaching by Parliament of the new condition hereinbefore referred to without the consent of the parties primarily interested.

"And your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

"Volunteer grievances."*

This petition, it would be remembered, was ruled out of order on account of the framers of it inadvertently bringing its prayer into collision with the rule of the House preventing petitioners asking directly for money. However, another petition similar in form, but without the objectionable portion, was duly received by the House. He (Mr. Schultz) felt that no hon. gentleman could give these complaints the slightest consideration without feeling the justice of the arguments offered and the reasonableness of the request made, and trusted that, although the hon. Minister of Militia had, in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Selkirk, pronounced against the claims, yet he (Mr. Schultz) trusted that more mature consideration, and consideration of the facts of the case, might change his opinion and lead him to grant simple justice to a class of men who had, by their conduct in the force and since, secured the respect and esteem of their fellow-citizens in Manitoba.

Mr. VAIL said the Department had given this matter a great deal of consideration. He had sent all the papers to the Adjutant-General at Winnipeg and asked for a full report. He was satisfied himself that the men had no cause for complaint, as everything that could be done was done for them. They had every opportunity to enlist in the Mounted Police if they chose to do so, but they did not avail themselves of the chance. He was satisfied that if his hon. friend was acquainted with all the circumstances he would agree with him that they had no cause for complaint.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) asked what authority had been given for raising militia companies in Manitoba.

Mr. VAIL said they had authorised the raising of two new companies of late, and application had been made for a third.

Mr. BOWELL said one item had escaped his attention. It appeared that a charge was made for guards attending the opening of local legislatures. Was it usual for the Dominion to pay the expenses of this?

Mr. VAIL: Yes, it has been a standing order since Confederation.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said very great exertions had been made to reduce the expenditure. But the grasshoppers had devoured the entire crops for forage. The total charge for the force last year was $369,000. No doubt the amount was very large, but it had been found almost impossible, in that distant country, to keep the expenses for forage and transportation down. Year by year, as settlers went to the neighbourhood of the forts, there was good ground to suppose that the amount would be decreased. In a year and a half or two years it was expected that forage could be obtained from settlers around Fort McLeod.

Mr. TUPPER called attention to the case of a young Nova Scotian, named Nash, who was killed at Fort McLeod while in the discharge of his duty. His mother being a widow, the case was a particularly hard one, and as he was within a few months of having served the three years necessary to entitle him or his relatives to 160 acres of land, it was thought the grant might be made.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT promised that the matter should be taken into consideration.

Mr. BOWELL said, on looking over the Public Accounts, he had come to the conclusion that the expenses for forage were very heavy.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that this was owing to the grasshoppers having devoured everything in the vicinity.

Mr. BOWELL drew attention to the statements made on good authority that the discharged volunteers in the North-West were refused admission into the Mounted Police. Many of the Volunteers had their way paid to Ontario and Quebec, where they enlisted in the Mounted Police, and their passage was paid back to Manitoba Volunteers would make good policemen or soldiers, and he thought it bad policy to pursue the course he had referred to.

Mr. MACKENZIE said his impression was, that the first body of men in the volunteer force who were dismissed were offered positions in the Mounted Police.

Mr. VAIL said he thought the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) was mistaken, although there might have been one or two such cases.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would take especial care to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the statement of the hon. member for North Hastings.

Mr. ORTON enquired whether any portion of the item was intended to recompense those in the Mounted Police who had received injuries while on service.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said contingencies might perhaps cover that.

Mr. ORTON presented the case of a sub-constable named Hayes, who had been injured so as to necessitate his coming home, and in consequence of which injury he had not been able to work for five months. He (Mr. Orton) thought some compensation ought to be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, of course, if the name was given to the Government, they would look into the matter, and grant a compensation if it was warranted by the circumstances.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he quite agreed with the proposition that the discharged volunteers should, if possible, be taken into the Mounted Police Force. He believed the statement made by the hon. member for North Hastings in this respect was correct. He did not exactly know of his own knowledge, but it would be remembered that this formed one of the grievances complained of by these ex-sergeants of volunteers. Presumably, these men were better fitted for the Mounted Police than raw recruits obtained from different parts of Ontario. The First Minister would find in the report of the Minister of Justice that when the first part of the force went up, the commander of that force showed that of those who enlisted at Toronto and elsewhere, representing themselves to be good horsemen, only about five per cent. found themselves on arriving at Fort Garry able to mount a horse at all. He trusted that in future dealings in the cases of the discharged volunteers in Manitoba, every facility and encouragement would be given them and to the Mounted Police. In regard to the pay of these forces, the Public Accounts showed that a very large proportion of their pay had been made through J. G. Baker & Co. of the Hudson Bay Co. He could not understand why it was incumbent on the Department to make these payments through these particular parties. By some understanding with the parties in charge of particular posts, J. G. Baker & Co. were allowed to deal with the men, and allowed them to contract debts, and then, instead of the payments being made direct to the men, they were made through this firm, who were themselves in a position to deduct the amounts due from the men's pay. This had given rise to a good deal of dissatisfaction and on the face of it, it looked as if, with a paid paymaster and with facilities for the transmission notes to that territory, payments should have been made direct to the men and not through any of these other parties. In the matter of the very large cost of forage, if he understood the Minister of Finance correctly, forage was likely to cost more this year than last. If that was the case, he thought this item ought to have very strict investigation at the hands of the House. When he had had occasion to speak of a payment of $31,000 for forage to J. G. Baker & Co., the Minister of Justice stated that this amount was a very large one, but explained the circumstances to a certain extent, under which it was rendered so much, and said he trusted it might be very materially reduced. From the Minister of Finance, however, they learned that it was likely to be increased. He should like to know in some way how this amount was expended. It was stated to have been by contract. Where, he would ask, were tenders for this contract asked for? Who were the persons who tendered for the supplies besides J. G. Baker & Co.? Who were these J. G. Baker & Co., that they should be so indispensable to the Government of Canada in the North-West? They found them in everything in the Public Accounts. At page 135 they found payments to M. C. Page for services as Solicitor and Counsel for the prosecution in the matter of the Cypress Hill massacre, $2,272.49. They seemed to be the Attorneys or Proctors of Attorneys in the United States for the Government. There were other items amounting to $12,266 in connection with this Cypress Hill massacre case, which was a humbug from beginning to end, and was perhaps started by this J. G. Baker & Co. for their own emolument. And what was the result? After the ill-will of the neighbouring State of Montana had been raised, when the matter was brought before the Courts of Manitoba, it was found that there had been no reason for the prosecution from the first. If the North-West was to be an outlet for the spending of Dominion money in that way, there could not be too close an investigation of each individual item of the accounts, and of the manner in which it had been spent.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he would move to strike the item for Mounted Police out, if there was to be peace and quietness and no danger of a Fenian raid in Manitoba.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it did not apply to Manitoba at all. The territory was a thousand miles long and four hundred miles broad, and ranged from the Rocky Mountains to Manitoba. The Cypress Hills massacre was under the Department of Justice, and their officers there represented that the outrage on some unoffending Indians called for some exercise of diligence to bring the offenders to justice, and the action of the Government had, at all events, convinced the Indians and the American outlaws along the frontier, who had been concerned in the outrage, that the Government would not spare any expense to punish such an atrocious crime, as it undoubtedly was. As to J. G. Baker & Co., the Government had had very great difficulty in having the horses supplied in that difficult country systematically with rations. These people had given great satisfaction in effectually supplying the stations—and as an officer had reported repeatedly—at cheaper terms than he could get them elsewhere. He believed that Col. McLeod had informed the Government that he had caused advertisements for tenders to be issued in American papers, principally, of course, because it was a better base of operation than Manitoba. That was the reason why the American firm was employed.

Mr. SCHULTZ said his hon. friend did not understand enough of the details of this matter to be able to answer proper and pertinent questions put in regard to these items; therefore, until they could have some Minister able to answer these questions, it would be better to let the item stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought the question had been answered. The member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) had said that no tenders were asked for in Manitoba. There was no opportunity of getting supplies there.

Mr. SCHULTZ: I did not say so; the questions have not been answered.

Mr. TUPPER asked what were the questions that had not been answered?

Mr. SCHULTZ said he desired to know under what circumstances a contract amounting to $31,428 had been awarded to J. G. Baker & Co.; where the advertisement was published, who tendered, and for how long the advertisement was published.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said these questions ought to be asked in the Public Accounts Committee. The hon. gentleman was asking in reference to a certain contract for the year ending 30th June, 1876. These questions were usually demanded in the Public Accounts Committee. The instructions of the Government to the officer in charge were to obtain contracts at the cheapest rates he possibly could for the forage required for the various forts where the Mounted Police was stationed. At present a great number had been stationed near the American frontier to keep watch on the movements of the Sioux and other hostile Indians, some of whom were now encamped on our territory. J. G. Baker & Co. resided within a short distance of the front where our men were concentrated. Whether they would receive a contract for the year for which the Government were now asking supplies, would depend upon the views of the officer in charge.

Mr. MITCHELL said that while he agreed that it would have been more convenient if the member for Lisgar had asked for the information in the Public Accounts Committee, still it was quite proper for him to ask for it here. It was necessary to know how the tenders were issued in order to know whether it was proper to grant this amount this year. The right of members to criticise keenly and closely every vote of money asked for, should not be limited.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government were quite disposed to give all possible information; but as to these supplies at Fort McLeod, they were entirely away from the possibility of getting supplies there from any other place than they had obtained them. Col. McLeod, who was an officer high in the confidence of the Government, was necessarily entrusted with the getting out of tenders. He had no doubt his hon. friend could bring down Col. McLeod's report. The Government were very desirous to do the best that could be done. The member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) must have been joking in speaking of there being easy means of conveying money through this territory. It had been a matter of serious difficulty to get money through to these posts, and arrangements were made with these men to take the responsibility of conveying money for a time. The arrangements were all tentative. He (Mr. Mackenzie) did not believe that it was all a humbug to look after the Cypress Hills massacre. We owed to ourselves the protection which we pretended to give to the Indians, and one source of less expense to us than to the United States in the territories, was the fact that the Indians had confidence in our sense of justice. Governor Morris had told him that when he was talking over one of the treaties with the Indians, Col. White came into the room with some of these whites handcuffed for trial, at Winnipeg, and the effect of their being taken through the room impressed the Indians with a sense of the justice and power of the Canadian Government more than anything else could have done; and to do that to these people who were guilty of that massacre—

Mr. SCHULTZ: Not guilty.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was due to themselves. Several of these men were traced up to Montana, where they were obliged to employ legal assistance. The guilty men were brought before a Commissioner, and no doubt if extradited and tried, they would have been convicted, judging from the evidence in their possession; but the Commissioner having been over-awed by a mob, they escaped. He was quite certain that the country had gained in honour for the very vigorous efforts made to punish this shocking outrage. If they had lost $10,000 in endeavouring to find out and punish the guilty parties, he thought it well spent.

Mr. MASSON asked whether any report concerning the discipline and inefficiency of the Mounted Police would be brought down. A report on the matter had been made last year by Major General Smythe, who had informed them that the men did not even know how to saddle a horse. This was a most extraordinary statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that the statement is wrong.

Mr. MASSON said the Premier implied that Major General Smythe, who was sent by the Government to organize and inspect the Mounted Police, had reported about what he (Major General Smythe) knew nothing. He did not complain of the expenditure on this Force. It had done good service in the North-West. The case alluded to was not the only one in which the Force had exhibited want of instruction, for two years ago, men who had served for two years in it, had left without one of them having fired even a blank cartridge.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That saved the ammunition.

Mr. MASSON said he thought that these important matters should not be trifled with.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he would like to call attention to the statement made by the First Minister with regard to the expenditure touching the Cypress Hill massacre case. He thought that perhaps there was a little bit of romance in it. The Premier had told his story very prettily about the effect the action of the Government had had on the Indian tribes, when these persons were taken through the Indian camps handcuffed. Of course the hon. gentleman had very naturally endeavoured to throw a halo of romance about the affair, but the facts unfortunately were not in accordance with the romance of his hon. friend. The facts were simply these: the men knowing perfectly well their innocence before they came before the British Court of Justice, were in no danger of harm whatever; and they were not handcuffed at all until they came near Manitoba; and so far did those who were in charge of them feel that they were innocent, and believe in their innocence, that being expert hunters, these men were furnished with rifles and sent out to kill buffalo for the party. He had only one word to say with relation to the expenditure for supplies for the Mounted Police; if they passed this item, it ought to be with the understanding and the assurance of the Government, that as these supplies could be furnished from Manitoba, advertisements for tenders for them should be published in the principal Canadian cities. At all events they should have this assurance before consenting to pass the item.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he saw an item of $6,850 charged to J. D. Baker & Co. for twenty-seven horses, the average cost being $254. He could inform the gentleman in charge of this Department that good horses could be bought 50 per cent. cheaper in British Columbia. Another item stated that 100 head of cattle had been purchased at an average cost of $50—and there were cattle raisers in his district who would guarantee to deliver 100 or 500 head to the Mounted Police, at Edmonton, or at any place in the North-West, for less than that figure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will be very glad to get them where they can be obtained cheapest.

Mr. MASSON asked if a report concerning the Mounted Police would be submitted before concurrence.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not aware of the existence of such a report. Col. French had left the Force some months ago, and Col. McLeod had visited the posts. He presumed that there must be some report from this office, but there was none from Col. French. Major-General Smythe's visit had not been an ordinary one.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he wished to support the Premier's views regarding the expedition sent to bring to justice the perpetrators of the Cypress Hill massacre. From what he had heard he felt satisfied that it had the very best effect in that country.

PROVINCIAL GREAT SEALS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 115), Respecting the Great Seals of the Provinces of Canada, other than Ontario and Quebec. He said he was about, in a few moments, to lay on the table a supplementary return to an address for correspondence on this subject, which would bring that correspondence up to the present date. He thought the House would be much better able to understand the occasion which had given rise to this Bill after the correspondence was before them. This measure was introduced not without some hesitation and reluctance, entertaining, as he did, the opinion that there was very strong reason to believe that the power to deal with this matter resided elsewhere; but the consequences which might ensue on allowing this Session to pass without taking action in the matter would be such, if the opinions elsewhere were well founded, that the Government had been induced to bring in this Bill. The measure proposed to enact that the Lieutenant-Governor of each Province, in Council, had the power of appointing and altering the seals of such Province, and of validating instruments under such seals. It was the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England, officially communicated to the Government, that the power to deal with this question rested, not in the Local Legislature, but in this Parliament; and if that opinion were maintained, and on the strength of that opinion the legislation asked for by Nova Scotia were not granted, this Parliament would be responsible for a great deal of the uncertainty and disquiet existing in that Province, if it did not pass some such measure as this. He proposed to act in a manner which could do no mischief, and would give the power to the Provinces which it was universally conceded each Province should possess, and place them all on the same footing.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

MOTION.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

"That for the remainder of the Session, Government business shall have precedence on Mondays."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said this was equivalent to saying that the Government should have the exclusive right to use and control all the days for the remainder of the Session, because Wednesdays were not given to private members after six o'clock when they got into Public Bills and Orders, and these were pretty well disposed of. The real matters of importance for the rest of the Session, for members not connected with the Government, were contained in the Notices of Motions, and the door would be shut down on such motions at the very last moment when the guns were firing to announce the approach of the Governor. Legislation was being more and more absorbed by the Government of the day, and perhaps wisely. He thought, therefore, that his hon. friend should not ask for Monday. Let him take Wednesday instead, and then the Government would have all the days except Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the truth was that, although the Government had had certain days nominally on the paper, the Opposition had taken possession of all the Government days so far, and the Government had had only the fag end of their own days. It had been quite clear for the last two weeks that it had been almost impossible to get any business done. The Session was now exactly the same age as the whole of last Session and the Session before, and surely ten weeks was enough in which to bring forward any matters of administration, unless the Opposition meant to conduct the business of Parliament altogether. There must be a limit to everything, and he thought he was only asking what members on both sides of the House would consider reasonable.

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought the Government were asking what would not be approved of by the country. It was never contemplated that the Government should absorb five and a half days out of six, or more than that. He had never known a Government to take the whole time of the Session as this was practically doing. It was putting a complete stop to the grievances of the public, or the business, or public questions which members might think it right to bring under the notice of Parliament; and he thought the Government would even now hesitate in taking from the Opposition the only day they had to present to the House and to the country points they might consider necessary—though, if they did, let the responsibility be upon their heads of shutting the mouths of members on the Opposition side of the House. The hon. gentleman opposite should not close the mouths of the Opposition, which had pursued a fair course. They had criticised pretty freely public affairs, but this was their duty. They were sent to the House for the purpose of criticising the conduct of the Administration and the distribution of the public monies. They had a perfect right to do it, and his hon. friend had no right to complain, because, on going into Committee of Supply, the time of the House had been taken up with the discussion of questions of public interest. He, with due deference to the judgment of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, did not think that this time was lost. If deprived of Monday, their only resource would be to take up the motions and discuss them in this way, and public business would not be thus promoted.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he hoped that the remonstrance addressed to the Government would meet with some consideration. If the motion was carried, the effect would probably be that only one or two notices of motion could be reached on Wednesday next, and the balance would be thrown over for another week. He trusted that the Government would, at least, grant part of the day. Notices of motion would have to lie over altogether if this was not done.

Mr. BERTRAM said it was hardly fair for the Government to take away the small portion of the time left to members of the House. He would have no objection to the motion if it granted to members half of Wednesday. There was one notice of motion on the paper in which he was interested, and if this motion was carried, they would not probably get down to it during this Session. He hoped that the Government would consider the matter.

Mr. POPE (Compton) trusted that the Government would now yield the point. The country did not care how long they stopped there, as they were already entitled to all the money they could receive. The country would not object to their stopping to take care of legislation. He did not think the Government would be supported in the course they proposed to take, outside the House. The Government had now five days in the week, and this was all that they should expect.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said, if his recollection served him aright, the late Government, on similar occasions, towards the close of the Session, had their business take precedence on every day. He would not say that this was the case in 18.2-73, but it was done in some of the previous Sessions.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): But with the consent of the House.

Mr. MASSON said it had then only been done during the last week of the Session. He thought that an entente cordiale should be established, and that the Government should yield something to the Opposition. There was nothing to be gained by adopting the present course.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes. We can gain a great deal.

Mr. MASSON: Yes—annoyance.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was a common and usual occurrence. The Government was not personally interested in shortening the Session by a day; still they were bound to conduct the business of the House, both in accordance with the views of members generally, and of the public. The hon. member for Compton had threatened them with public opinion, but they understood public opinion quite as well as hon gentlemen opposite. However, he was bound to give fair deference to the views of the Opposition in this matter. There was nothing on the notice paper which they desired to prevent being passed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of course not.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no objection if the House generally desired it, to take Wednesday, instead of Monday. The Government business had to be done, and it was in the interest of the House to see it done. They courted fair criticism and favourable consideration, but not a hypocritical one to their measures.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hypercritical.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman can spell it as he pleases. He should amend the motion so as to read that, during the remainder of the Session, Government business should have precedence on Wednesdays.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his recollection was that, formerly, when it was stated the Session would soon terminate, then, by general consent, the whole time was given to the Government; but the Minister of Finance had just introduced a very important Bill, and the Minister of Justice had also just introduced a Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman must recollect that there was a reasonable Opposition in the House at that time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was then a reasonable Opposition, but now there is a rational one.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That for the remainder of the Session, Government business shall have precedence on Wednesdays.

Order for the further consideration of the Bill, read.

Mr. JETTÉ said he noticed that some changes had been made in the jurisdiction of the Court, and he would like to know how far they would affect the jurisdiction of the Vice Admiralty Court of the Province of Quebec. From a return which had been made, he found this subject was discussed as far back as 1861, in a letter sent by Mr. Justice Black to the authorities in England. It appeared that the Lords of Admiralty expressed the opinion that Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction could be granted to the Canadian Parliament, but that it should not be by an Imperial Act, unless it was passed with the explicit concurrence of the Canadians themselves. From this, it would seem that, if the House were to express an opinion that we ought to have full power to adjudicate in such matters, the Home authorities would grant such powers. He had no objection at all to the Bill before the House, which he considered a very good one, but he found that the jurisdiction of the Court of Quebec did not go as far as was necessary to govern the entire Province. There was a restriction that the jurisdiction of the Court should extend no further than the ebbing and flowing of the sea and high-water mark. The jurisdiction under this provision, therefore, did not extend further than Three Rivers, and the space between that city and the Provincial line of Ontario would remain without any Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction at all. It was important, he thought, that Montreal, Sorel, and the ports on the entire course of the St. Lawrence should come under the jurisdiction of such a Court. Their Provincial legislation was in such a shape that they could accept immediately legislation looking to that end. In defining the jurisdiction of the Superior and Circuit Courts it was provided that they should not infringe upon the jurisdiction of the Court of Vice-Admiralty. Many cases happened in Montreal in which a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction could be extremely useful, and he trusted those suggestions would receive the consideration of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BLAKE said the jurisdiction of the Court of Quebec was not interfered with by this Bill. With reference to the question of jurisdiction above tide-waters, there was no doubt that the commission read as the hon. gentleman had stated. The Imperial Act upon this subject, however, gave a jurisdiction which was not confined to tide waters; and the learned Judge of that Court held, and had exercised it in several cases, that he had jurisdiction above tide-waters. The Judge held, he presumed, any ambiguity or limitation which might be created by the Commission, was overborne by the language of the recent law. For instance, he would exercise jurisdiction in a case of a collision happening at Hull, on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River. Practically, it was known that there was a concurrent jurisdiction in some class of cases, although there was not the convenience of jurisdiction in rem. That circumstance added to the inconvenience and difficulty which existed when the Court was far removed from the scene of the accident. There was no doubt whether the Court had the jurisdiction which it was contended it had, and which he rather thought it had, or whether it had not, so long as the seat of the Court was at Quebec, its procedure, which was the only procedure possible under the Imperial regulations, it would not be a practical advantage to the people of Montreal. The attention of the Government not having been called to this, and no representations having been made as to the want of such a Court at Montreal, and that question being somewhat complicated by the fact that there existed a Vice-Admiralty Court for the Province of Quebec, although, perhaps, its powers were defective, and the machinery provided by the Imperial Act not suitable, it was not thought proper to complicate this measure by any attempt to introduce another jurisdiction, on Canadian authority, into the Province. His own opinion was that such an attempt would be extremely unfortunate. They could not attempt to alter the Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction which now existed per se. There were two courses open: one to procure by representations to the Home Government such legislation as would make the Court suitable to the exigencies of the Province; and the other, to procure the abrogation of the Court which existed under Imperial legislation, and legislate according to our own views in our own Parliament. An attempt to establish a second Court having concurrent jurisdiction in the Province of Quebec, would be fraught with complications and difficulties which would be serious to grapple with; and, therefore, while he invited rather than deprecated an expression of opinion as to what was desirable, he would strongly counsel the House against any such attempt. His own strong opinion was, that the time would shortly come when public feeling would be in favour of legislating for ourselves. When this Bill passed and became law would be a reasonable time to consider the alternatives he had suggested. He would not say that the clauses of the Bill with reference to jurisdiction were precisely what he would like. They might have been drawn in plainer and more extensive terms; but they were as plain and as extensive as he saw his way clear to propose at the present time. It was not desirable in this Bill to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Courts existing, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had listened to the explanations of the hon. the Minister of Justice with a great deal of interest, but he regretted that the hon. gentleman had not seen his way clear to bring in a general measure, such as that outlined, for the purpose of making the law uniform. He held it was very unfortunate that, in one part of the Dominion we had a system under the control of Great Britain, while, in another part, we had a system subject to the control of the Dominion. It was not at all too soon that this legislation had been initiated, it having been anxiously looked forward to by the people interested in maritime matters in Ontario. So far as his experience went, the system in Quebec was not satisfactory. He supposed the reason why the Minister of Justice had not introduced a general measure was, that there was not sufficient time to enable him to get the consent of the Imperial authorities to the change. But, now that his attention had been called to the matter, it was to be hoped that he would next Session place before the

Mr. BLAKE.

House the result of his correspondence with the Imperial authorities, and place them in a position to create a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction more suitable to the circumstances of Canada, and under the control of Canada. He begged to call the attention of the House to the 10th Section of the Bill, in which were introduced some of the worst features of the present Admiralty Law. One anomaly was that, when experts were called by the Court, their simple ipse dixit was taken, without their being placed upon oath, and without being subject to cross-examination. They were taken in secret conclave, and the persons interested had no opportunity of cross-examining them, or of finding out upon what they based their opinions. This system was fraught with the greatest evils to suitors. He did not see why a similar course should not be applied to Admiralty Courts in this particular, as was applied to Civil Courts.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman was mistaken as to the practice in the Civil Courts. In those Courts, the Judge had the power, which was not unfrequently exercised, to call in scientific persons, who would give their opinions to the Judges. The difficulty was to prevent such evidence being tinged with partizanship, as would possibly be the case were the hon. gentleman's suggestion carried out. He (Mr. Blake) would not pledge himself to anything without further consideration. If the system, as embraced in the new Bill, were not satisfactory, it could easily be altered by Parliament. One of the great advantages of the change of jurisdiction was, that it placed the matter in their own hands.

Mr. MITCHELL said whatever might be the practice of Equity Courts, he thought the principle of our Common Law Courts should be embraced in the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON said the plan in Chancery Courts was that the expert placed his opinion in writing, which was argued upon by the respective Counsel.

Amendments read the second time and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

THE LOAN OF 1876.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said, in accordance with his announcement a few nights ago, he rose to call the attention of the House to the manner in which the loan was negotiated by the Finance Minister, in the city of London, in the month of November last. In doing so, he would state at the outset that he would have been glad to have been spared the necessity he felt was imposed upon him of bringing up this matter. It would have afforded him great pleasure to have been able to compliment the Finance Minister upon the successful manner in which the loan had been conducted. That course was pursued by the Opposition last year, and, he and the hon. gentlemen on his side of the House would have been gratified were they able to repeat such an expression of pleasure. All party feelings in connection with a matter of this kind must be held in abeyance. It must be a matter of satisfaction to hon. members to be informed that the securities of this country had been placed at the best possible advantage in the markets of the world, and particularly in London, where nearly all our loans were negotiated. He proposed to make a few observations upon the mode in which this loan had been floated, and he proposed also to offer a resolution for the consideration of the House which would embrace two propositions: First—That the method adopted of floating the loan was unwise and inexpedient; and Second—That the consequences entailed a pecuniary loss to the Treasury of this Dominion. In the first place, he would call the attention of the House to the document he held in his hand, it being a return to an order of the House, dated 19th February, 1877, of the prospectus issued and moneys advanced in London at the date of the last loan, a statement of the time allowed for the reception of tenders and the period when the respective tenders were closed, and the several amounts applied for by parties tendering and the amounts allotted to them respectively. He need scarcely say that this loan was for a considerable amount, £2,500,000 sterling, that it was for 30 years, interest at 4 per cent., and another condition was that one half per cent. was to be employed annually in the purchase of these bonds so long as they remain at, or were below par. The loan was placed upon the market at the fixed sum of 91 per cent. It was a remarkable fact in connection with this matter that, although it had been before the House for the last six weeks, up to the present time no one had been officially notified as to what the actual sum was which was realised at 91 per cent. with the allowances of accrued and accruing interest granted to the purchaser. Members of the Opposition had affirmed that it was a certain amount; but the Finance Minister had made a counter statement that it was not correct. But, for some reason or other, the Finance Minister had seen fit not to reply either to any of the criticisms which had taken place in the House with regard to the manner in which the loan was conducted, nor as to the nett sum realized. It must have occurred to anyone who listened to the hon. gentleman's Budget speech that he must have had a very difficult task, and that, from the outset, he must have been awakened to the responsibility of his position in negotiating the loan. But when he returned to Canada and heard the criticisms upon the transaction, he must have felt that he could not successfully reply to them. He (Mr. Gibbs) had almost come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman had abandoned the case, as he considered the position taken by the hon. member for Cumberland, the hon. member for Cardwell, the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) and of others who had spoken on the subject, was unassailable. The terms of the loan were:

" 5 per cent. on application.
15 do on allotment.
20 do on 31st January, 1877.
20 do on 27th March, 1877.
20 do on 25th May, 1877, deducting the half-year's coupon due 1st May, 1877, less Income Tax.
11 do on 25th July, 1877.
91 per cent."

A number of calculations had been made both by the Press—none of which he had seen since he came to the

Mr. Gibbs.

House—and by hon. members, the result of which was a statement made by one and another, that the actual amount obtained for the loan was 89½ per cent. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had said it was about 90; to that statement the hon. the Finance Minister replied that he was incorrect. He (Mr. Gibbs) had made a calculation which he would be very glad to submit to the hon. the Finance Minister—though, no doubt, the hon. gentleman had himself made calculations. He (Mr. Gibbs) claimed the following results, and looked at it thus:—£91 should be paid on the 1st November, 1876, as the interest dated from then, but it was not really paid until the following dates:—

8 days thereafter	£20 =	160	8th Nov., '76
92 do	20 =	1,840	31st Jan., '77
147 do	20 =	2,940	27th Mar., '77
206 do	20 =	4,120	25th May, '77
267 do	20 =	5,340	25th July, '77

$$14,400 \div 91 =$$

158½ days' interest, average at 4 per cent., would be 1,575, or £89,425 = £89 8s. 6d., or if paid under discount at 3 per cent., would be 1,18125, or £89,81875 = £89 16s. 4½d.

Taking the most favourable view of the transaction, supposing that the the purchasers of the securities paid all the money down, and were entitled under the terms upon which the loan was floated to a rebate of 3 per cent. for immediate payment, the interest to which they would be entitled would be 1,18125, making the nett result £89 16s. 4½d. By another calculation, which he thought would commend itself to any person who would give attention to it, the same result was obtained.

Average of each £100 drawing in interest at 4 per cent. :—

	days.	s.	d.
£20 paid Nov. 8th, 1876; a gain of interest on £100.....	8	1	9
£20 paid Jan. 31st, 1877; gain of interest £80 from Nov. 8th, 1876.....	84	14	8
£20 paid Nov. 27th, 1877; gain of interest £60 from Jan. 31st, 1877.....	55	7	2
£20 paid May 25th; gain of interest on £40 from March 27th.....	59	5	3
£11 paid July 25th; gain of interest on £20 from May 25th....	61	2	8
<hr/>

Which, deducted from £91 left £89 8s. 6d. nett; or, if paid in advance, under rebate of interest at 3 per cent.,

it would nett £89 16s. 4½d. These calculations were made from Laurier's interest tables. However, he was quite ready to have those statements criticised, and the House and the country would be only too happy to know what amount had been received according to the calculations of the hon. the Finance Minister himself, and those who successfully floated the loan for him. Hon. members might ask themselves the question, in the first place, why was the mode of floating the loan changed from that of the previous year? The hon. the Minister of Finance, perhaps, might reply that the loan which he floated in the previous year, being secured and having the guarantee of the Imperial Government, he was enabled to place before the English capitalists in a more favourable light, and that the last loan required different manipulation. The hon. the Finance Minister was good enough to say in his Budget Speech that he regretted that no hon. member opposite him occupied the position of an ex-Finance Minister, and, consequently, the arguments he addressed to the House were not so readily received, and perhaps not so readily comprehended, as they would have been had any such person occupied a seat on the Opposition side of the House. It so happened there was only one hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) in the House who had occupied the position of Finance Minister in this country, and he (Mr. Gibbs) certainly expected that hon. gentleman would have risen on so important a question which had engaged the attention of the House for so long a time, and have endorsed the course which the hon. the Minister of Finance had pursued. The House would be very glad yet to hear the hon. member for Chateauguay, and to hear from him that the amount received from the loan was the very best that could be obtained under the circumstances. The hon. the Finance Minister had stated that he encountered much difficulty when he went to London to negotiate the loan, because he was introducing a new system, for the first time, on the London market—a loan which bore 4 per cent., and he took credit to himself that, upon that occasion, he obtained for Canada the largest possible sum obtained for Canadian securities when the securities were of the character of those he offered in November last.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said his statement had been misapprehended. He had spoken of the whole series of loans beginning in 1874.

Mr. GIBBS said he took the hon. gentleman's speech as the authority. The hon. gentleman had said the difficulty he felt in regard to placing the loan was not simply in obtaining the best possible amount under the circumstances, but he had also to guard himself against the possibility of failure. He (Mr. Gibbs) thought any person having anything to do with financial or even business matters, could readily appreciate the feelings which appeared to have weighed very strongly with the hon. Minister when in London. He had to provide: first, that he should obtain the highest possible sum for the securities offered; and second, that there should be no possibility of failure, and that, accordingly, he should guard himself at every point. The question was not simply whether he obtained the best possible terms under the circumstances, but the question to which the House and the country desired a reply was, whether the hon. the Finance Minister had obtained the largest possible sum which it was in his power to obtain, and that he had placed the securities on the market on the most advantageous terms to the people of this country. He thought at a time like that which prevailed in London in November, when there was a plethora of money, when the banks were groaning with deposits and gorged to repletion, when people were seeking safe investments in every quarter, and those desiring to place their money where they could obtain it at a moment's notice could only obtain from the banks three-quarters of one per cent. interest per annum, it was the best time of all times for the hon. the Minister of Finance to have taken the course he did not take, viz., to have offered the loan to public competition. If there was any doubt whether the whole sum would be realized, it must be remembered that there was no hurry, that the money was not wanted immediately. The hon. the Finance Minister had told the House the other night that the money was required to meet obligations of the country falling due, some in July next, as well as to make provision for the construction of public works. If such was the case, there was no haste in placing the loan, and the hon. the Finance Minister was justly chargeable with having been unwise in the course he pursued, so far as it affected the interests of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his Budget speech, referred to what other countries were doing, mentioned the price at which the securities of the countries were quoted, and what sums were realised for various foreign loans. Although the House had heard from hon. members the best possible quotations which could be obtained—the quotations of some of the leading papers in the city of London, which were reliable, not only in regard to questions affecting Canadian securities, but regarding all securities placed on the market—the hon. gentleman declared to the hon. member for Cumberland, who quoted from them, that they were incorrect and that he did not care what they said. He hoped the hon. the Finance Minister, before the House had finished the consideration of this subject, would furnish that information which it appeared could not be supplied by any other hon. member. The following quotations were from the Times as to the value of Canadian and Australian securities on 21st Feb., 1877:—

“Canada 4 per cents., 30 years, of 1874-75, 93½ to 94½, with business done at 94½, equal to 93 nett. South Australian, 98 to 99. Colony of Victoria, 98½ to 99.”

The following quotations were from the London Stock and Share List, published by H. H. Whittenhall, of 3rd November, 1876:—

“Canadian Securities, 30 years to run at 4 per cent. from 1874-75, with business done at 94½ to 93¾. South Australian 4 per cent., 97½. Colony of Victoria 4 per cent., 97½ to 97¾.”

It appeared to him that when securities of that kind were offered at that price, a margin of one and a half or two per cent. would have been ample, that purchasers of the securities would have been perfectly satisfied if the price had been placed at two per cent. below market quotations at wholesale. Those securities, at a time when there was such a plethora of money, would have been readily purchased by persons who desired to make investments, and he thought that the hon. gentleman upon that occasion was under a feeling of uncertainty which misled him. In making that statement he was not going to attack the character of those gentlemen who had managed the financial affairs of Canada in England in years past. No hon. gentleman had denied their high character; but he was surprised when the hon. the Finance Minister, in his speech, should begin to excuse what had been done in London, and when he called on hon. members on his (Mr. Gibbs') side of the House to denounce what had been said with respect to the conduct of the financial agents in London. Up to that time nothing had been said in the House with respect to that matter, and no matter what had been said outside, the hon. gentleman was not warranted in importing into his speech the remarks he had made with respect to the action of the London agents on that subject. The hon. member for Cumberland had spoken at some length on that particular point. He (Mr. Gibbs) would not detain the House by recapitulating what had been said by that hon. member. But he deeply regretted the mode in which the hon. the Finance Minister had disposed of the loan, because it involved a loss of not less than 2 per cent. on the whole amount, which, on a loan of £2,500,000, meant a loss of £50,000 to the public exchequer of the Dominion. The hon. the Minister had himself said that the manner in which the loan was floated was a fair subject for criticism. The hon. gentleman had also said that, as regarded himself, he did not care what was said, and that he was able to defend himself; further, that he did not care what was said with respect to the London financial agents, because no criticisms could affect or hurt them. If that were the case, hon. members might have criticised their acts with a little more freedom. Without importing the financial agents into the debate,

Mr. GIBBS.

he would repeat that the hon. the Finance Minister was himself responsible to Parliament and the country, he being in London to receive advice and give instructions for all that had taken place with regard to the floating of that important loan. The House had been informed that the hon. gentleman had to guard himself against the possibility of failure. He quite believed it. If an hon. gentleman could be sent to London, who had cause to indulge in that feeling more than another, it was the hon. the Finance Minister. That hon. gentleman, as those hon. members who were in the House at that time would remember, was in the habit of making, during successive years, doleful complaints—he was almost going to say lacrymose statements—with regard to what would happen in the not very distant future; and when in London, no doubt, that fear of the future occupied his attention far more than the hope of placing the loan at the price at which he had hoped to place it when he left Canada. He was not, therefore, surprised to hear the hon. gentleman now state that he had to guard himself on that particular point. It was fortunate for the hon. gentleman that, in placing a 4 per cent. loan for the first time on the London market, with the difficulties surrounding it, that he was not met with the active as well as the passive opposition of those who were in the habit of dealing in Canadian securities. It was exceedingly fortunate, too, that the hon. gentleman went into the London market at a time so opportune as was November last. He trusted the hon. gentleman would never meet with greater obstacles in floating a loan than he did on that occasion. If ever there was a time in the history of this or any other country when securities such as those which Canada offered should have realised their highest price, it was certainly the period at which the hon. the Finance Minister entered the London market for the purpose of floating those particular securities. It was matter for regret that the House had not been furnished with more information in regard to the transaction, and that the returns brought down had not been so full and ample as the circumstances of the case demanded; but there was one sentence in the return which had been brought down, which was a sufficient condemnation of the manner in which the loan was negotiated. The only information, as far as he was aware, which they possessed in regard to the amount which was applied for when the loan was placed on the London market, was supplied by the London correspondent of the Toronto Globe. That gentleman wrote that three times the amount of the loan had been applied for. The hon. gentleman had said that the subscription list was to be opened on Tuesday, the 7th November, 1876, and to be closed on Thursday, the 9th of November, at 4 p.m., but that it was really closed on Wednesday, the 8th November, at 2 p.m.; yet, instead of taking two days to obtain all he wanted, they were told by outsiders that the amount was taken up within twenty-four hours from the time the loan was put on the market, and before the subscription list was closed; that he (Mr. Cartwright) had then got all the money he wanted, and that if he had required three times as much more, the monied men of England were quite ready to give it to him.

AN HON. MEMBER: At that price?

Mr. GIBBS: Of course at that price. The number of allottees was 566; there were no less than 566 parties to whom this particular loan was allotted. How many more were refused he was unable to say, because the House was not yet furnished with the information. The hon. gentleman might have been justified in refusing to give the House the names of the persons who had applied for the loan; there might have been some reason for this, but at present he could not see why this information had not been given, in order that the House might have had the benefit of having all the facts before them while they discussed the question. It would have been some source of information, and it would have been gratifying to the House and country to know that the position of Canada was so satisfactory that they were enabled to obtain, within twenty-four hours, a sum of money amounting to seven or eight millions sterling, if they required it, and on the terms at which the Finance Minister of the Dominion of Canada saw it right and proper to offer the securities. He said it was not fair to compare the securities which were offered by other countries with the securities which Canada was offering on the London market at that particular time; but they might, however, look at the securities offered by some of the other British Colonies bearing also four per cent., and having the same length of time to run as had this particular loan. He found that a South Australian Colony loan of £1,812,000 sterling, at four per cent., was quoted at 96½ and 97½, with business done at 97¼. Another loan of the Colony of Victoria, £4,500,000 sterling, was quoted at 97 and 98, with business done at 97½ and 97¾. The hon. gentleman had taken a good deal of pains to let the House know that it was not possible to obtain so much for these securities wholesale as retail, and also to inform them that while the financiers of the city of London were opposing the four per cent. loan he (Mr. Cartwright) was then floating—

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I do not wish to be misunderstood. The statement I made, as will be easily seen by reference to the Budget Speech, was this:—"At the first introduction of the four per cent. loan of 1874, I had to encounter a tacit and decided opposition." But I did not extend that statement to the loan of 1876.

Mr. GIBBS said this was the case, and the hon. gentleman said that other countries would be following the example which Canada had in this instance set. Well, he found on looking the matter up, the colony of Australia had borrowed £500,000 sterling a short time ago, and about the very time when the hon. gentleman was making his Budget Speech he believed; but instead of following the example of the hon. gentleman, she had placed the loan for competition, inviting tenders, and instead of offering it at 91, as the hon. gentleman had done, with a loan bearing the same rate of interest, they found that 209 tenders were received amounting to £2,967,300 sterling, at prices ranging from £96 10s. to £100.

Mr. GIBBS.

The average price for the £500,000 allotted, was £97 10s. per £100. Tenders at £97 9s., and above, amounting to £483,500, were allotted in full, while those at £97 8s. 6d. would receive about 53 per cent., of the amount applied for. Whether the hon. gentleman considered that he got the highest possible amount for this loan or not, he (Mr. Gibbs) thought that the hon. gentleman was no prophet. He did not see that the colony mentioned had followed the hon. gentleman's example. She did what he had supposed the hon. gentleman himself would have done; and he confessed when the statement first appeared made by the Canadian papers, that the hon. gentleman had placed the loan on the London market at a fixed sum, he could not credit it. He was unwilling to believe that in a time like that, and this of all other times, the hon. gentleman should have made the mistake he did. He believed that the hon. gentleman had committed a serious error on that occasion. He should and could not say anything else than this: he believed that the hon. gentleman had taken every opportunity to make himself familiar with what was going on in London at the time, and acquainted himself with what was being done by other countries,—the hon. gentleman was able to draw his inferences therefrom; and he regretted exceedingly that the seductions of those who had surrounded him were so great that he (Mr. Cartwright) was induced to yield to them, causing the sacrifice of a sum of money not less than that which he had stated, and which had already been mentioned by previous speakers who had touched on this subject. It was true that there were no gentlemen on that side of the House who occupied the position of ex-Finance Ministers, and if any of them had held such a position, they would not have committed the vulgar error, the hon. gentleman had said, of looking at the old, musty English newspapers to obtain their quotations and draw their own inferences from them. They had, however, the very best information that could possibly be obtained on this subject. They had the very best authorities, open to anybody, as to the value of these and of other securities; and they had come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman, on that occasion, had adopted a means which was not conducive to the best interests of the people of this country, and, in so doing, a very large sum of money was lost to the public exchequer. If none of them had had the honour of occupying the position of Finance Minister, which the hon. gentleman regretted, he thought there were very few in the House who were unable to comprehend the difference between 93 and 91 per cent., and between 95 and 93 per cent. He would not say that there was one on the floor of the House who could not readily understand what the difference would have been if the hon. gentleman had obtained what the other colonies that had offered the same securities, had secured, and who was not able without any difficulty to make accurately the calculation regarding the loss the country had sustained by the course the hon. gentleman had pursued. He regretted, as he stated at the outset, that he had been obliged to bring the subject up; but he had come to the painful conclusion, when the hon. gentleman delivered his Budget Speech, that not only had he a very serious and difficult task before him to make the House believe that he had done the very best it was possible under the circumstances to do, but also that before the hon. gentleman concluded his speech, he himself (Mr. Cartwright) felt what every member of the House felt who had listened to it attentively—and he himself was seriously impressed with the idea on looking, perhaps, at subsequent events, and making the allowances necessary in doing so—that he had committed a very great blunder in the method he had pursued in reference to this loan. He moved, therefore,

“That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the course adopted by the Minister of Finance in placing the late Government loan of £2,500,000 sterling on the London money market at a fixed rate of 91 per cent., with allowances of accrued and accruing interest, thus reducing it to about 90 per cent., was an inexpedient course in itself, and also resulted in great pecuniary loss to the Dominion.”

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he entirely agreed with the hon. member for South Ontario, that holding the opinions he (Mr. Gibbs) did, and which he presumed other hon. gentlemen held, it was their bounden duty to place on record a motion of this kind; and he had himself intended, at some fitting opportunity, to have again called the attention of the House to this matter, and to have intimated very distinctly to the hon. gentlemen opposite that he thought, after the statements they had made, they were bound to take action. It was his earnest desire that they should do so; and also that he should again have the opportunity of reviewing the whole question, because he knew it was most desirable, not only in the interests of the Government but also of the country, that public attention should be again called in a formal and explicit manner to all the circumstances surrounding the contraction of this loan. Nor, save always and excepting the inevitable loss of time, could anything have occurred which would have given him individually, and the Government collectively, more pleasure than the opportunity which the hon. gentleman had afforded them. They desired to meet the several issues the hon. gentleman had raised promptly, squarely and explicitly. Those issues, as he understood them, were three in number, two being of fact and one of policy. The hon. gentleman, in the first place, challenged his statement as to the real quotations of the former loan, and also as to the general value of retail quotations on the London market. He also challenged most distinctly, although disclaiming any intention of doing so, the honour and probity of the agents of the Government of Canada, and their conduct in this matter.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): No, no.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes; most distinctly and explicitly.

Mr. GIBBS: No.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he should show this before he closed his remarks. And lastly, the hon. gentleman, as he had a perfect right to do, had questioned the expediency of the particular mode of issue which he (Mr. Cartwright) had adopted on that occasion.

Now, he had nothing in the world to complain of as to the manner in which his hon. friend had treated this question. As he had said, holding the opinions the hon. gentleman held, it was his undoubted duty to bring the matter up in some such way as this. But he, in all courtesy, gave the most unqualified contradiction to the hon. gentleman's statements of fact, and also took issue with him most decidedly as to the expediency of the action of the Government on that occasion. He upheld the policy of the Government at all and every point at which it was assailed, without the faintest reserve or the faintest limitation. He was going, and he must crave the indulgence of the House, in so far as he was obliged necessarily to do it at some little length, to analyze the evidence on which the hon. gentleman's statements were based, and to make a somewhat more detailed statement to the House of the reasons which had induced him to take the action he did, and he should then, with perfect confidence, leave it to the House and the country at large to say whether or not the Government and himself were justified in the course they had adopted. Now, there was one slender particle of foundation for the allegations the hon. gentleman had made, and one slender particle only. The hon. gentleman had based his whole attack upon the price asked for this loan, on the retail quotations which were obtained during an exceedingly short period, to wit: a very few days of the latter portion of October, and in the early days of November, for very insignificant fragments of the old loans. He called particular attention to this fact, that the whole force of this attack was based on five or six days', or at the most eight or ten days' quotations affecting very small amounts of the old loan contracted in 1874-5, and would say at once that, so far as he was aware, the hon. member for South Ontario had stated correctly enough the quotations which were given in Whittenhall Share List and some London papers of these dates. He had no objection whatever to the figures as given by the hon. gentleman, but he wished to know if the member for Cumberland agreed with these statements, as otherwise he must call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member for Cumberland, in his speech, as recorded in the Hansard, had stated that the figure of 95 ex div. was obtained.

Mr. TUPPER: No.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I am quite willing to accept correction.

Mr. TUPPER: I may say to the hon. gentleman that the same paper I quoted from is the paper quoted by my hon. friend in the speech he has just made.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the House to this matter, because it is so stated in the Hansard, at least I verified the quotation a few days ago. He is reported to have said:

"I am able to show that the value of the loan put on the market at 4 per cent., Canadian Debentures, were sold at 94½ to 95, and at that, ex-dividend."

Mr. TUPPER: I gave it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was not a matter of any importance, as far as he was concerned, but it was desirable that a statement of this kind should not remain on the Journals uncorrected if the hon. members for Cumberland and South Ontario were agreed, and based their attack on the quotations contained in Whittenhall's Stock List, and also he had no doubt repeated in the other London journals. He desired, however, to clear up one misapprehension. He had not at all meant to say that these quotations were not correctly given, but, simply that the quotations obtained in the casual entries in stock lists of that kind were entitled to less regard as compared with quotations given in such papers as the London Economist and the Investor's Manual, for this reason: it did occasionally occur, and in this particular case it had occurred, that casual stray quotations of a particular stock were made for a few days in excess of the true value, and when it was known, as known it was no doubt, to the editors of journals like the London Economist and the Investor's Manual, that these were due to a purely accidental and transitory cause, they were in the habit of taking the true quotations and of paying but little regard to the casual and accidental quotations. And therefore, it was that he said, and he now repeated, that it was always safer to rely upon the quotations which were found in such journals as the Economist, in preference to those which appeared daily in the newspapers, which might be true, but were very often of no real, practical value. In estimating the real market value of any stock, he thought the common sense of the House and the country would go with him entirely in saying, that we ought not to look at mere temporary quotations for three or four days, but rather to the quotations which had prevailed for months before and for months afterwards. If the House would look at the appendices to the Budget Speech they would perceive, given in considerable detail, under schedule A. and B., the quotations from which the accrued interest had been deducted, and would see that all through the months of July, August and September, and up to the very closing days of October, our Canadian 4 per cent. loan issued in 1874, ranged from £90 6s. 8d., to £92 with an entrance value of 93½ in the closing days of October. After that date, the moment the loan was fairly on the market the actual values—and this referred to the old issue and not to the new—ranged from about 91½ to 91¼; and he maintained, and was prepared to prove, that this represented the true, genuine market values of this security, and not the exceptional and temporary quotations, produced by causes which he would presently explain in detail, on which the hon. gentlemen had based their attack. If hon. gentlemen had only looked, as he thought in a matter of this importance they might have looked, at the prices of consols, of our guaranteed Four per cents., and of our Five per cents., during the interval from July to November, they would have seen that there was no increase whatever in those important lines of securities within that period. Our four per cent. guaranteed bonds, in June, ranged from 106½ to 106¾; in July 107½ to 108½, which quotation they maintained in August and September; and in October they were 105½ to 106½, which was almost precisely the same value as they maintained in June, allowing for interest. Our Five per cents. ranged from 104 to 105 in June; from 105 to 106 in July; much the same during August and September, falling back in October to 105. Consols, in like manner, were 96½ in July, 96¼ in August, 95¾ during September, and 95¼ on the 28th October. Without in the least wishing to reflect on hon. gentlemen opposite, he thought had they taken the trouble to examine the ranges of Canadian securities, or looked at the ranges of consols, which were the barometers of the money market, they would have seen that the increase which took place in Canadian Four per cents. between the months of July and November was purely exceptional, and it might have suggested to their minds that there were probably some special causes for the rather remarkable increase in the value of the Four per cents., which took place about that period. It was necessary, perhaps, that he should make a statement to the House in some detail of what those causes were, and why it was that he did not pay particular attention to those casual quotations to which he had alluded. With respect to this, the House would remember that it was not always expedient for a Minister of Finance, or any man entrusted with the negotiations of affairs of this kind, to go into any very great or lengthened details as to the special causes which might have operated in increasing the price of any special security. He desired to state that those causes were perfectly legitimate, but, at the same time were such as he would not have drawn attention to had it not been rendered necessary by the language and attacks of hon. gentlemen opposite. Early last year it had become quite apparent to him that a serious deficit was to be apprehended on the transactions of the year 1875-76. As soon as he saw that the harvest in this country was likely to be a bad one, he perceived—partly for that, cause and partly on account of the very unsettled state of things in Europe—that it was exceedingly desirable that, if possible, a loan should be contracted in the autumn. He thought he would not have been justified in the public interest in putting it off until after the close of the present Session; and, accordingly, he opened negotiations in July with their London Agents, and also with some other friends in London, with a view to ascertain what was the prospect for floating a loan successfully at that time. In the month of June, 1876, and also in the month of July, as any hon. gentleman could see for himself by a reference to the share list, our securities were ranging at something like £90 6s. 8d., deducting accrued interest. Soon after those negotiations opened he received information from the parties with whom he was in communication, that there was a very considerable amount of issues of the previous loans remaining on the market and still unabsorbed, and until they were absorbed it was not probable that he would succeed in floating another loan on anything like favourable terms. The very first step to be taken, therefore, was, if possible, to get this unabsorbed issue removed in order that the way might be cleared for the issue of the new loan, and he at once took measures to induce the agents to exert themselves for this purpose. He was very glad to state that those gentlemen responded at once most heartily and cordially to his request. They did exert themselves, and took all possible means to that end. They used their personal influence, which, as every hon. gentleman knew, was very large, to the utmost, to induce bond fide investors of high character and position in London to take up this unabsorbed amount, which, as, he remarked, was hanging over our heads, and was greatly damaging our chance of effecting a loan. In this they succeeded, and in so doing they rendered a very important service to the people of this country. Now, the result of the operation was two-fold. In the first place, as everybody who was familiar with Stock Exchange operations knew, in a comparatively small market such as the Canadian securities could afford, bond fide investment to any considerable extent would always increase the nominal price for the time. This gave two considerable advantages. We got rid of the floating stock, and the actual bond fide price of the stock was raised from 90½ to 91½ or 92, and we secured also an exceptional temporary advantage, which amounted to 1½ more. It would have been utterly preposterous for him, when he knew that this was going on, and what those transactions were, and how it came to pass that there had been a rally in our stock which had forced it to a value somewhat beyond that which it fairly bore in the market—it would have been preposterous for him to have taken those temporary, casual quotations as any guide in his future operations, particularly when it was necessary to float such a large sum as £2,500,000 on the London market. In order to fully understand the position of affairs, he must necessarily recall to the attention of the House the fact that, although in 1874 he succeeded in placing a loan of £1,000,000 sterling on the London market, the result showed that there was a considerable indisposition to absorb that amount. It was a positive fact that hardly any of the parties who took the first loan succeeded in saving themselves. A great many of them lost money; and he asked the House with what possible chance of success he could have gone into the London market, and on the strength of an exceptional quotation, demanded a sum which he knew to be in excess of the true market value of our loans, and demanded that of men, a great many of whom he knew had lost by participating in the loan of 1874. It would have been utterly impossible to have repeated that operation, and it would have been utter folly in him to have regarded those casual quotations as authorizing him to demand a sum which he was quite aware could not be obtained from the ordinary investors in that security in London. The hon. gentleman had stated that, in consequence of this mode of issuing at a fixed price, we had sustained a considerable loss, which he put as high as £50,000. If the hon. gentleman would look at subsequent quotations of the share list from that date to the present, he would see that although those quotations embraced the old issue, which, as everybody knew was a more favourite investment than the present, he would see they had not touched the net sum of 92, deducting accrued interest. The average retail price had been 91 to 92, and the sellers, if there had been any, would have been compelled to take the lower and not the higher sum. At this moment (and he would take the authority quoted by the hon. gentleman — Whittenhall's Share List) although there was as nearly as possible 2 per cent. accrued on our securities; the very last business done in them was done at 94; in other words 92 was the highest price they had touched under the very latest quotations from London, and that, be it remarked, was the retail price for small quantities which it would be utterly impossible to obtain on a large wholesale transaction. The hon. gentleman asked why the mode of issuing the loan had been changed. The mode of issue was not changed. This loan was issued in precisely the same way as that in 1874. There was no comparison, no possibility of comparison, between Canadian securities and the mode of dealing with them when they were unguaranteed, and the mode of dealing with guaranteed securities which bore the endorsement of the British Government. The hon. gentleman spoke of the plethora of money in London as being a reason why he should have disregarded all ordinary precautions, and invited tenders and have trusted, as some other countries had trusted, to the chance of floating our loan in this fashion. The reason of this plethora of money in the London market was, that almost every form of credit in England was seriously endangered, because credit throughout the British empire had been shaken to its very foundation, and because it was a matter of extreme difficulty to obtain securities which would suit the temper of the English people, smarting as they were then from losses sustained in almost every conceivable direction. The House would see the force of this argument best if he showed how the situation was viewed by agents of other countries, acting at the same time and almost under the same conditions as ourselves. It so happened that the kingdom of Norway issued a loan, for a smaller amount, within a day or two of our own. Its agents offered the loan at a fixed price, precisely as he had. It must be remembered that Norway was as far as possible removed from any chance of being involved in European complications, that it had a most excellent record in the London market, and that it was able to exhibit an extremely prosperous financial position. The Norwegian Government had everything that could be supposed to recommend its security to the London market. Nevertheless, they offered  $4\frac{1}{2}$  bonds at the fixed price of  $96\frac{1}{2}$ , giving the usual allowance, which, as the House would see, was several per cent. more in favour of the buyer than our 4 per cent. at 91, and the fact of their doing so was surely no small argument in favour of the course adopted by him. The hon. member for South Ontario further declared that there was no hurry in issuing this loan. He (Mr. Cartwright) took issue with him most emphatically upon that point. He was astonished that anybody of the intelligence of the hon. member should make such a statement. Had the issue of that loan been delayed for forty-eight hours, it would, in all probability, have been utterly impossible for him to have issued it at all. From that time to this, as anybody who chose to look at financial authorities could see, and as he had been receiving advices all along, the London market had been in the greatest confusion and uncertainty. People had been most reluctant to invest their money in anything, and very few loans indeed had been brought out. The hon. gentleman had seen fit to accuse him of being subjected to undue influences. Whatever those influences were, they must have emanated from agents of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. GIBBS: Not necessarily.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: From what other quarter? The hon. gentleman having publicly accused him of being subjected to undue influences, ought to state what they were. Well, he had not the faintest hesitation in saying that he acted in this matter, though not in obedience to the suggestions of Messrs. Baring and Glynne, yet, after full conference with them, and that they were very strongly of the opinion that they could not possibly, with safety, attempt to raise the loan at any higher rate than 91. As to that point there need be no doubt whatever. The hon. members for Cumberland and South Ontario appeared to think that Messrs. Baring and Glyn had given him certain advice so as to put money into their own pockets. These gentlemen had acted as agents for Canada for the last twenty-five years. Canada was their client, and they were bound by every possible tie of honour and good faith to give them the best advice they could, and no man would be more ready to condemn than himself, any advice which would be contrary to the interests of Canada. They received a considerable sum of money every year, as the agents of Canada, for transacting the ordinary financial business of this country. There was a relation of trustee and client, and they were bound to give him, or any other Finance Minister of Canada, the best advice in their power, as he believed they had always done, and particularly in the present instance.

Mr. GIBBS: They ought not to have bought any of the securities.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: He would repeat that they did not buy any of the securities at their own instance, but at his direct request. He took the responsibility. He thought they should back their own opinion. They announced that they were prepared to recommend the purchase at 91. The hon. member spoke of these agents as if they sacrificed their duty to their interests. Putting it on the very lowest ground, they could not afford to do so. If it were suspected on the London Stock Exchange that they had given injudicious, let alone dishonest advice to a client like Canada, their loss would be hundreds of thousands of pounds. Their house was one of those most largely employed in Europe for the negotiation of loans, and it would not be worth their while to allow any suspicion to attach to them for a paltry £4,000 or £5,000, that being the amount, as intimated by the hon. member for South Ontario, which they might have gained on the portion of the loan they took. The loss of the account of Canada itself would amount to more than this; and he could tell the hon. gentlemen they should not hold the position of agents to Canada for one half hour longer, if he believed they had given dishonest or injudicious advice in this matter. It was only due to them to state that, whereas they would have had, under the ordinary rules and constructions in such matters, a perfect right to the subscription of £500,000 at least—that being the sum he had insisted that they should subscribe—the moment they found that the loan was largely subscribed to, they informed him they were prepared to put the whole subscription at his disposal, stating that they did not want to make any profit out of it, and that they were ready to dispose of the whole; and, as a matter of fact, they resigned one half of their subscriptions of their own free will. The hon. gentleman had been pleased to say that he did not wonder that he went to London impressed with the possibility of a failure, bearing in mind the doleful utterances he had often given vent to on the other side of the House. Well, he dare say, they would all admit that the position of Finance Minister in this country for the last three or four years had not been an easy one. No other Finance Minister in Canada had been called upon to raise such a large sum of money in such a short time. Hon. gentlemen who understood the position of the country would not wonder that he felt it his bounden duty not to neglect any reasonable precaution, rather than to hazard the failure of a single loan. Had he done so the loss to this country would not have been thousands of pounds, but hundreds of thousands of pounds. The hon. gentleman desired to know the exact amount that was tendered for during the two days the loan was open. Speaking from memory, it was about £6,250,000 sterling. The hon. gentleman said this was a proof that the people of England were willing to give £7,000,000 or £8,000,000, or much more, if they were asked to do so. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten that it was the almost universal custom in London for parties tendering to tender for a considerable amount more than they intended to subscribe, and that no safe indication of the sum available could be deduced from that circumstance.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT resumed. He said that when the Speaker left the Chair, he had been alluding to the liabilities which had to be provided for between the years 1874 and 1880. Of these he had already given a very full list in his Budget Speech, and he would, therefore, for the moment, content himself with reminding the House that these aggregated no less a sum than $90,000,000, chiefly to be provided for in the way of loans in four or five years. This was a very important factor in considering the position. The duty of a Minister of Finance under such circumstances was by no means confined to negotiating one loan, nor was it legitimate for him to run the risk in such a case which it might be legitimate to run in negotiating one single transaction. He was bound to consider not only the existing loan, but also the effect his proceedings would have upon the loans he was about to contract within a very short period. He had found, as he had mentioned to the House, that the price obtained by us for the loan of 1874, which was a price we had fixed ourselves, inasmuch as there were no quotations of Canadian Fours to guide us at that time, was one that could not be maintained. We found great difficulties in our way in inducing the English investing public to absorb that loan. For many months it was at a discount. It was only by negotiations stretching over several years, by obtaining Acts from the Imperial Parliament, by getting many of the leading firms in London to concede advantages to us by taking our securities as floaters, and in other ways, that we succeeded in removing the obstacles in the way of placing these securities in the position which he thought they ought to occupy in the market. Possibly he ought to explain that. Besides obtaining an Act from the Imperial Parliament, it was necessary to obtain the consent of the Treasury to allow certain portions of our sinking fund to be invested in the purchase of our Fours, and also that it had been necessary to arrange that the sums hitherto used in the purchase of Fives should be used in the purchase of those four per cent securities. In all these matters he had found the agents co operating heartily and zealously. He ventured to say that, in all the points, this country received very valuable service, as it had a right to expect, from the agents of the Dominion. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, in addition to quarreling with the price at which the loan was placed, had taken very violent objection to the fact that it was issued at a fixed price. If his hon. friends would look at the quotations he had given in the Budget Speech it would be found that no attempts had been made to impugn the accuracy of those quotations. These proved that every foreign country which negotiated a loan in London for several years preceding had negotiated at a fixed price, and that almost at the same day and hour another Government, standing in very good favour in London, negotiated a loan on terms less favourable than ours at a fixed price. If they looked at the transactions in funding the United States loan, they would find that that Government adopted a fixed price. The only exception was one which really proved the rule—that of some of the Australian Colonies, which had recourse to the mode of tender. If he was charged with not answering the arguments which the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) and other hon. gentlemen advanced, he might say that he declined to do so, because he thought they had been very well and fully answered by hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House who had spoken on the subject; and because, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman opposite, when he was told that it was an argument against the floating of twelve and a half millions of dollars at a fixed price, that it was not the mode adopted by village municipalities in this country to float their debentures, he did not think the attack worthy of much argument. He was not aware that the Dominion of Canada could be administered like a village municipality, or that the rules which would apply to the floating of $40,000 or $50,000 would apply to the floating of 12½ millions in the English markets. As to the actual allowances made on the loan, as spoken of by the honorable member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), he had not had time to examine these in detail, but his recollection was that the calculation made at the time was that the loan would nett £90 1s. and some odd pence. He could easily verify that. For all particular purposes, he was willing to accept nearly the rate named in the resolution, or named by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), a little over 90. These allowances, as the House knew, were invariably made by every country issuing a loan, whether by way of fixed price or tender. When the hon. gentlemen made it a charge against him (Mr. Cartwright) that he had deemed it necessary to defend the agents of Canada against the aspersions thrown against them throughout the country, bearing in mind how wide-spread they were, and that they were, to his knowledge, unfair and unjust, he would have been wanting in his duty to allow the Budget Speech to pass over without bearing testimony to the honour of those gentlemen and the soundness and accuracy of their judgment on that occasion. He had been given to understand that it had been made, though not on the floor of the House, an argument against issuing a loan at a fixed price, that it was a suspicious circumstance, and that a Minister of Finance so inclined might put a large sum in his pocket by doing so. If ever there was an absurd statement on the face of it, that was the most absurd. If a Minister of Finance were dishonestly inclined, what possible opportunity could he have in that way, compared with the knowledge which a sealed minimum gave him. Using a sealed minimum, a Finance Minister could put any amount of money he was pleased to ask into his pocket; but he could not possibly do it without the extremest danger of detection when the loan was issued at a fixed price. He was bound to say that he had not heard on the floor of this House that any gentleman had imputed any dishonesty to himself in this connection. He entirely acquitted hon. gentlemen opposite of anything in that regard. Hon. gentlemen opposite had called attention—and they were quite right in doing so—to the fact that the Australian Colonies were able to obtain very considerably better prices for their securities in London than we were, and he would just say that it would be a most astonishing circumstance if they were not. The position of the Australian Colonies, as every one knew who had had experience of the London Stock Exchange, differed materially from that of Canada, and had many points of advantage over us. He (Mr. Cartwright) held that the securities of Canada, in the long run, were as good as those of any Colony whatever. He held that Canada possessed all the elements of durable prosperity, but Australia had for many years back been a more favourite English Colony than Canada. A very large number of the Australian settlers were Englishmen, having extensive connection with England; their exports were enormous in proportion to their population; they were 6,000 miles away from any danger of collision with any one, and that always was, and unfortunately for a long time would continue to be a matter of considerable weight in estimating the relative values of securities. Then, happily for themselves, the Australian Colonies had no Pacific Railway to hang as a dead weight over them. They had displayed unusual prudence in their public works. It was known that almost alone of Colonial enterprise, Australian public works had paid an interest on their investments. Therefore, when they asked for money to carry on public works, they had a great advantage. In London there was an association known, he believed, as the "Ten Associated Australian Banks," and they were always ready to come to the assistance of Australian financiers if they found any difficulty in floating their loans. There was also an unusual number of wealthy Australian capitalists settled in England, who had, naturally enough, very great preference for investing their money in Australian securities. A number of these were resident in London alone, and their incomes were very large. He knew several of them with incomes ranging from £30,000 and £40,000 to £50,000 a year, and it was a vast advantage for a Finance Minister to deal with capitalists of that kind. Moreover, the Australians had been careful not to commit themselves to any great public works at the time great masses of indebtedness were maturing, and, as in all these respects, thanks to their own good sense and good management, they had had a very great advantage over us, it would be a matter of just astonishment if Australia was not able to command at this moment a better price for her securities than we were enabled to get. The moment we were relieved from our difficulties, the moment it ceased to be necessary for us to pay off these masses of indebtedness, the moment we had disposed in some way or other of the Pacific Railway, he had no doubt our securities would rise in the market, and would command as good a price as the Australians. But now, borne down as we were, bearing in mind that nearly $150,000,000 of English capital invested in private enterprises in this country was making no return, and remembering what a mill stone that had always been round the neck of Canadian credit, it would be a matter of surprise if we, with all these disadvantages, could stand on as good a footing as our Australian fellow-colonists. If he had possessed the same advantages, if he had known that there were wealthy Canadians resident in London, ready at an hour's notice to take up any loan he might offer, he could have asked for tenders. It was known, however, that scarcely one penny of the Canadian 4 per cents. was held by Canadians. He was sorry for it, but it was useless to be blind to these facts, and so long as they existed the Australians would have a considerable advantage over us in their dealings in the London money market. It might appear that he had laid too much stress on the importance of our loan being well held. He had attached, and did still attach, great importance to placing our loan in such hands that it would not be operated with on disadvantageous terms, as the last loan was, and in such a way as to injure the credit of Canada. That was why he deemed it desirable to obtain the co-operation of the agents, and to get them to take a portion of the loan. In 1874, if he had neglected that precaution, and had not induced the agents to take a large proportion of the loan, it would have been impossible to maintain the price of the stock, even at the comparatively low figure which it touched. Now, let the House consider calmly the state of Canada's credit to-day, and consider, in the face of the deficit of very nearly two millions of dollars, the fact that Canadian credit stood the shock unharmed, and was as good to-day as it ever was in London.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The right hon. gentleman cried "hear, hear," but it was very satisfactory to them to know it was so, and it would be very imprudent and impolitic in them not to remember that this was largely due to the fact of the loan being very unusually strongly held at this moment. So far from the £50,000 having been realized, which hon. gentlemen were pleased to say, he had lost on the loan, he had the best possible authority for stating that a very considerable proportion of the loan had not yet been absorbed. He trusted this would speedily be done, for the good and sufficient reason that he had always felt, as he had pointed out to the House, it was of the very greatest importance that before a new loan was issued, the last should be, if possible, absorbed; unfortunately this had not yet taken place, and this fact was the best possible proof that the loan was sold at the highest rate it ought to have been sold for. Now, as to the future. The hon. gentleman proposed, if his motion carried, to lay down a hard and fast rule so that, for the future, no Canadian Finance Minister, no matter under what exigency or under what circumstances, should venture to depart from the plan of inviting competition by tender. In the public interest he protested as strongly as he could against any such resolution. He said it was inexpedient and impolitic to the last degree, and though circumstances might occur undoubtedly under which he should feel it to be his duty, as had been done by him before, to invite propositions by tender, yet they must be governed by circumstances existing at the time, and by a number of considerations which it was utterly impossible for the House to define, or even to know beforehand. They went to borrow in practically a foreign market, and they must conform, to some considerable extent at any rate, to the customs and habits of the market; and they could do nothing more injurious to the credit of the country than to lay down a positive rule, which no Government would feel justified in departing from: that under no circumstances should they permit a Minister of Finance to exercise his discretion either to invite tender for a loan or to offer it at a fixed price. However, as far as he himself was concerned, he would venture to promise his hon. friend from South Ontario that his resolution, unless it was carried, should do no harm. He would do, as long as he had the honour of holding his present position, and of enjoying the confidence of his friends here, exactly what he believed to be in the best interests of the country, and if he thought that these could be best served by asking for tenders, he would do so; and if, by inviting propositions for subscriptions at a fixed price, he would take this latter course. He would do what he believed to be best, and he would leave his vindication to time and to the country. Before he sat down he would like to say a few words on the position in which they would have found themselves had no loan been effected in November last. Our expenses, as every hon. gentleman knew, had been very great during the past few months, and every hon. gentleman must also be aware that the condition of things in Europe was perilous in the extreme, and that war might break out at any moment. All those who were best able to judge of the position of affairs, regarded them with the deepest disquietude. Within a very few hours he had received a telegram from a high authority in London, warning him that war was imminent. Had he neglected to effect this loan in November last, he would have had to have gone in the course of a few weeks to London to effect a fresh loan. Under these circumstances, their cash in hand would have drawn to a very low ebb, and they would have been confronted in London with the knowledge of a very considerable deficit and the prospect of a great European war, the end whereof no man could perceive. Now, he ventured to say, that had he gone under these circumstances, there the question would not have been whether they would get 91 or 92 for their loan, but whether they would succeed in placing the loan on that market at all. He did not propose to detain the House much longer. As he had said at every possible point, every question of fact, and every question of policy, he was in direct issue with the statements and arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. His statement in this matter, as he represented, was this: in the first place, he said that in June and July last the actual price of their securities was barely £90 $\frac{1}{2}$ , that they were slow of sale at that rate, that a large amount was pressed on the market and unabsorbed, that it was owing to the exertions of their agents and other friends that this state of things was overcome, that this large amount was absorbed, and that a very considerable rise, natural and genuine, in the value of the loan had in consequence taken place. He appealed, in support of that assertion, to the self-evident fact that the other securities, such as their guaranteed Fours, and their other securities of a like character, including, he believed, Australian securities, had all remained stationary at the same price, as in June and July, making the necessary deductions for accrued interest. Had there been any general influence affecting the whole market, these securities must have risen in price in just the same way and to the same degree as their Four per cents. But these securities did not rise, and that fact alone would have been sufficient to show to a careful observer that there had not been such influences at work. Now there was no stock-jobbing in this; these were perfectly legitimate influences; he had had a perfect right to ask their agents to do their best to remove the unabsorbed amount pressing in the market, and they had had a perfect right to do so. Their agents complied with the requisition, and he repeated that in so doing they rendered a very important service to the people of this country. He further maintained it was a very fortunate circumstance for them that they were able to float their loan precisely at the moment they did, and that neither within ten days before, nor within eight and forty hours after the loan was floated, could they have obtained, as a matter of fact, as good a price as they did. And, further, that the price obtained was the best ever received for a purely Canadian security. This was his statement of the case as regarded himself and the Government. As to the Opposition, his charge against them was, that they had mistaken casual and accidental quotations produced by special causes, which could not have endured for many hours longer, for real and genuine quotations. He attributed no blame to them, until, at any rate, explanations were given; but he was speaking of matters with which he was familiar, and of transactions which had been going on for months between himself and their agents; and he repeated that the quotations which had misled the Opposition were purely accidental and temporary, and could not have been relied on, and were no sort of guides to the price at which a large loan could have been placed on the London market. He further charged them with having misunderstood and altogether misrepresented the position and duty of the agents of Canada. Had Messrs. Baring and Glyn done what they were alleged to have done, they would have committed a very grievous wrong, dishonouring themselves, and bringing down swift and sure punishment on their heads, because not only would they under such circumstances have lost the agency of this country, which certainly they would have justly deserved to lose, but such conduct would also have very greatly shaken their own reputation and standing in all European Exchanges; and when he heard hon. gentlemen say, that it was possible for firms like Baring & Glyn, holding the position they did towards this country, to make £50,000 or £5,000, or any sum of money, he did not care whether large or small, out of Canada, by giving improper advice to the Finance Minister of the Dominion whose agents they were,—he said it was utterly impossible for him, and, he should have thought, also for any hon. gentleman there, to understand what possible code of equity or of honour these hon. gentlemen professed to be guided by. If that were an honourable, an honest act, he would like to have defined what was a dishonourable and dishonest one. He further charged the Opposition with having wholly misstated the position of the Government, and under-rated the importance to Canada of effecting this loan at that time, the liabilities of the country, and the necessity of taking precautions in every possible shape and way to guard against so great a disaster as the failure of any one of the three loans of 1874, 1875 and 1876 would have been. When the Opposition charged him with having been imprudent and foolish in adopting the fixed price instead of asking for tenders, he replied that they had entirely lost sight of the fact that it was the custom of the London market to give a very decided preference to loans issued in that way; and, as he had said, he was bound in all reasonable ways, and to all reasonable extent, to neglect no precaution, to do all he fairly and honourably could to recommend our securities to favourable acceptance by the English public and English investors. He had no more to add to the remarks he had made, except this: he had again to thank his hon. friend from South Ontario for bringing this matter up. The hon. gentleman had saved him from speaking of it at some later period of the Session, as he had been fully resolved to do, if the chance had not been afforded to him as it had been that night.

Mr. TUPPER said the House had indulged him with the opportunity of discussing this matter at very considerable length on a former occasion, when it became his duty to offer some criticisms on the Budget Speech of the Finance Minister, and, consequently, it would not be necessary for him to trespass on their patience to any great length at that moment. The more so, as the Finance Minister, in his opinion, had scarcely placed the necessity upon any hon. member of the Opposition to occupy a great deal of time in the examination of the statement the hon. gentleman had just made. Why, when the hon. gentleman had risen in his place and expressed such intense delight and satisfaction at the opportunity given him (Mr. Cartwright), in the presence of the House, and in the face of a very interested and very anxious country, to vindicate the policy he had pursued, he (Mr. Tupper) had hoped that they would have heard from the hon. gentleman something which he had not already addressed to the House; but in his long and elaborate effort, and extenuation of the course he had pursued, he (Mr. Tupper) would be supported by the judgment of the House and of hon. gentlemen who supported the Government, when he put the question to them whether the hon. gentleman had thrown an additional light on this question, and whether he (Mr. Cartwright) had done more than simply give again to the House the extended statement made when the hon. gentleman first addressed the House on this subject. Now, it would become his duty to examine again some of the observations which the hon. gentleman had made, and draw the hon. gentleman's attention and the attention of the House to some of the inconsistencies which had presented themselves to his mind, concerning the speech the hon. gentleman had just delivered. The hon. gentleman told them he had had a most arduous duty to perform as Finance Minister of Canada, and of the immense difficulties he had had to encounter in going to the money market of the world, and in negotiating loans for the Government of Canada. Why, did the hon. gentleman forget that the credit of Canada had been steadily rising for ten years, or for seven years back at least, when he went into that market, and that day after day the position of Canada had been brought more prominently to the notice of the world, and that day after day her credit had risen. When it first became the hon. gentleman's duty to go there, no easier task had ever been presented to a Minister of Finance, because all he had to do in order to place Canada in the front rank with countries entitled to the best credit on the London market, was to give a fair, honest and true narrative of the position which Canada attained under the Administration of his predecessors; and the hon. gentleman had done his duty in this respect honestly and faithfully, showing by facts and figures, that no man could controvert, that if there was a country in the world entitled to confidence in that money market it was Canada. He could not, therefore, understand why the hon. gentleman's difficulties had been so great on the former occasion, and they were still less in 1876. He would tell the hon. gentleman why? It was because the money market presented a condition more favourable for the negotiation of loans, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, than any Canadian Finance Minister had ever found it before. The hon. gentleman had told the House, what every person knew, that when the hon. gentleman went to London he found the whole financial condition of the country in such a disturbed and excited state that no one would lend money on the ordinary forms of credit. It was only such security as the Canadian people and Government had to offer, that would induce monied parties to loan money. The hon. gentleman was obliged to admit the accuracy of the statement of the hon. member for South Ontario, that the banks were then literally bursting to repletion with money at the time the hon. gentleman was called upon to negotiate this loan; money could then be obtained and readily secured at three quarters of one per cent. per annum, in London. The hon. gentleman said that he was most prudent in seizing upon just the particular crisis, and that if he had not seized upon it at the moment and the hour—and if he had been 48 hours earlier or 48 hours later, he would not have accomplished the loan. Did the hon. gentleman not know that he (Mr. Cartwright) had told them before that if Lord Beaconsfield's speech had then been made, and the letter of the Czar published, this would have frustrated his efforts to put the loan on the market? And did the hon. gentleman forget that after that speech was made and the letter published, the point to which the hon. gentleman had depressed the securities of Canada, which—Four per cents.—were then selling in London for from 93 to 94 $\frac{1}{2}$  or 94 $\frac{1}{2}$ , by placing this loan on the market at 90 was recovered from? The hon. gentleman knew right well that having himself given to the financiers of the world his statement, as Finance Minister of Canada, that people were paying too much for Canadian debentures, and that securities for which 94½ was given, were only worth 90, and that, notwithstanding the depression in these securities, which consequently took place,—their prices had gone back far beyond the prices to which the hon. gentleman had depressed them by stating the value which he attached to them. The hon. gentleman said they must not take the quotations of the hour—and that if they wanted to know what securities were ordinarily worth in London, they must search back for five or six months in order to get at their true value; but did this statement commend itself to the judgment of the House, or of any man in the country, when the hon. gentleman himself said that 48 hours would make a tremendous difference in the value of the securities of Canada? The hon. gentleman could not escape in this way from his dilemma; and he would tell the hon. gentleman why. He would take the hon. gentleman's own principle, and not only the fact adduced as to the value of these debentures at that moment, and not only the prices they were bringing in the money market of the world at the time the hon. gentleman fixed their value below 90, but he would ask the hon. gentleman to look at the London Times, which the hon. gentleman would hardly say was astray in its quotations, of February 21st, 1877, months after this loan was placed on the market, and months after the Finance Minister of Canada had told the financiers of Great Britain that Canadian debentures were not worth 90, and that he would fix the price below 90 in offering them for sale. And the hon. gentleman would find in this issue of the Times, that, notwithstanding these facts, Canadian four per cents. were sold at 94½ on the 21st February, 1877. Not only that, but he might say there was accrued interest. Well, take it off, and the nett result would be something like 93. What did 3 per cent. on £2,500,000 Canadian debentures represent? It exhibited to the purchasers in a few months £75,000 sterling. Every person who had been watching the position that our debentures occupied in the money market knew that they had gone back to the price at which they were when the hon. gentleman was unfortunate enough to depress them by fixing a price vastly below what was just and reasonable. The hon. gentleman had told them they must not take the price at which a single debenture or small parcels would sell. He admitted that that would be quite true in the ordinary condition of the money market; but that was not an ordinary condition of the market, but one in which large parcels would have brought more than small. It was a time when people had millions to dispose of and were looking for the means of disposing of their capital advantageously. At the time this loan was made £2,500,000 could have been placed at as a high rate as small parcels were bringing. The hon. gentleman shook his head, but he would give him proof of this statement. They had not only theory but practice to substantiate this. Almost at the identical moment when the hon. the Minister of Finance was attempting to defend himself in regard to this transaction before the House, Australia was negotiating a loan. The hon. gentleman said they should not look at that country; but in his Budget Speech he quoted Australia to show it had attempted to put a loan on the market by open public competition, and had failed; and his argument was that, as Canada was similarly situated to Australia, he also would have failed to consummate his loan had he put it up to open competition. But almost at the moment the hon. gentleman was delivering his Budget Speech, the financial agent of Australia was in London negotiating a loan of £500,000. The 4 per cent. debentures of Australia were selling at from 96½ to 97½, business done at 97½, just as our debentures were at 94½ when the hon. the Finance Minister put his loan on the market. Did the financial agent of Australia fix the price? No. He understood the condition of the money market, and the necessities of his country, and the responsibility which rested upon him to make the most of her debentures, and he put it up to open public competition, with the result that instead of having £500,000 sterling offered, he had nearly £3,000,000. And on what terms? Their debentures were selling at  $96\frac{1}{2}$  to  $97\frac{1}{2}$ , business done at  $97\frac{1}{2}$ , and his lowest offer was  $96\frac{1}{2}$ . From that they went up to par, and the whole £500,000 was taken at an average price of  $97\frac{1}{2}$ , or one-quarter per cent. higher than business was done in the sale of their debentures. So that swept away all the ground from under the hon. gentleman's feet. He failed to see how his hon. friend was going to extricate himself from the position the resolution affirmed—that the policy he adopted was an unfortunate one, and that the result was a large loss to Canada. The hon. gentleman had complained about being prematurely judged before he returned to Canada. Who was it that gave the country the history of this transaction? It was the Toronto Globe, which had a correspondent in London, who described the whole transaction. This correspondent claimed, for he did not understand the subject, that the loan had been most successful, because more was offered than the hon. gentleman had asked for, and because he had been obliged to close his loan in consequence of the plethora of money floating in upon him long before he had declared the loan should be closed. But the hon. gentleman said all the bankers approved of it. The hon. gentleman had made a fatal mistake in that. He (Mr. Tupper) did not wish to say anything against Glyn, Mills, & Co., or Messrs. Baring. In criticising his speech, the Monetary Times fell into the blunder of stating that he had blamed the hon. gentleman for using the financial agents in the negotiations. He did not do so; he never dealt with the question of commission, whether the loan was obtained by fixed price or open competition; nor did he object to the eminent house of Glyn, Mills & Co. being used. He never said that it would be wise to dispense with their services. What he said was this, and he left it to the judgment of the House, whether it was common sense or not—that the buyer was not a safe man to fix the price. The hon. gentleman said: "They are trustees for Canada, and we are their clients." Then he (Mr. Tupper) said: "The hon. gentleman was right in 1875 when he put at the foot of the prospectus the statement that the financial agents would take no part of the loan."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That was a guaranteed loan.

Mr. TUPPER said that did not touch the principle of the loan except in this respect, that it enabled us to command a higher price than otherwise. But why did the hon. gentleman do that? The hon. gentleman put his loan up to open competition, and when he stated what he had done to the House, he (Mr. Tupper) expressed his gratification at the mode in which the loan was placed on the market. He mentioned this to show that he was not actuated by a spirit of fault finding, but that he was ready to give the hon. gentleman his meed of praise when he adopted a course which was in the interests of the country; and, if he felt compelled to censure this transaction, it was because the hon. gentleman had left no alternative. If they allowed a Finance Minister, in negotiating a loan, to arrange with the buyers who shall get it before the tenders are sent in, they placed in his hands a means of corruption to an enormous extent, and a means of defrauding the country to an incalculable amount. According to the hon. gentleman's own story, other persons were consulted besides our financial agents in this matter.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: They did not take a penny of the loan.

Mr. TUPPER: Did not Morton, Rose & Co. take some?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I do not think they did?

Mr. TUPPER: Do you not know that they did.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I do not think so.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman said he did not think so. This firm were on the closest terms of intimacy with the hon. gentleman, and held intimate relations with the Government of Canada in connection with this transaction. If the hon. gentleman did not know whether they took any or not, he (Mr. Tupper) did. They had asked for the names of the parties who had obtained this loan, but were refused the information. The hon. gentleman had the list in his office.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I have not the names in my office; I told my hon. friend so before.

Mr. TUPPER said if the hon. gentleman did not have the names, it was because he chose to leave them behind for fear he should be asked for them. In 1874 he offered a motion. It was withheld, but the hon. gentleman gave vastly fuller information than he had on this occasion. Information of the amount, tendered for and the prices was then given. Now, we had simply a statement that the agents of Canada advised the hon. gentleman, who seemed so innocent of the true nature of this transaction that he had actually informed the House that it was at his earnest solicitation the agents consented to accept any portion of the loan. Did the hon. gentleman mean to say that, high as was his position, and acute as his financial ability was, that Glyn, Mills & Co. and Messrs. Baring, the first financial men in the world, were going to be advised whether or not they should take £500,000 of a loan.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Certainly.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman no doubt believed this, or he would not say so; but he was astonished that he (Mr. Cartwright) could be beguiled into the belief that they would invest money contrary to their judgment in order personally to oblige the Finance Minister of Canada. That statement was an attempt to practice on the credulity of the House to an extent that no hon. gentleman had ever ventured before. The agents made no less than £10,000 through the rise, which was a nice afternoon's work—a nice little arrangement with the Finance Minister of Canada in the cool of the afternoon. Besides, when the securities went up to the rate they are at now, £5,000 more profit must be added to this; and was £15,000 a matter of insignificance to this hon. gentleman? A wise, clear-headed and cool Minister of Finance would take the advice of those agents in connection with the fact that they wanted to invest half a million themselves, and give it what weight it was entitled to. The hon. gentleman told the House that there was a difficulty in the way of the loan, owing to unabsorbed bonds. He would like to know what bonds were unabsorbed. In response to the order of this House, the hon. gentleman laid upon the table returns showing the condition of the loan of 1874, and that disclosed no difficulty—it showed no necessity for the hon. gentleman to go upon his knees to the financial agents of Canada and beg them to save its credit by investing money in a security they did not believe in. The hon. gentleman said he gave this large amount to Barings & Glyn to the exclusion of other parties who had tendered in open good faith. This, he (Mr. Tupper) thought disposed of the question of the unabsorbed bonds. The hon. gentleman said that the agents advised him that he could not get more than 91. Then he (Mr. Tupper) wanted to know why he could not get 91. The hon. gentleman had put out a prospectus which practically brought the security below 90, as he had admitted. The hon. gentleman admitted that he could not question the accuracy of the calculation made by the hon. member for South Ontario as to the rebate of interest.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I did not admit the accuracy. I stated that I had not got time to go through the calculation. I did not in the least admit the accuracy.

Mr. TUPPER said at all events the hon. gentleman said they need not dispute about the amount of that calculation. He said he would undertake to challenge the accuracy of that calculation.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I told the hon. gentleman, and I now repeat, that the value was £90 1s. and some odd pence; that was near enough for the purpose of the calculation. I did not admit that the calculation was correct.

Mr. TUPPER said the calculation presented by the hon. member was at £89 8s. 6d., so that there was a very considerable margin. He should think that, surrounded as the hon. gentleman was with any number of gentlemen who were very expert in making calculations of this kind, during the two hours of recess he could easily have made a calculation had he been very anxious to do so. The hon. gentleman, therefore, admitted that he put the loan upon the market practically at about 90 per cent. He (Mr. Tupper) had stated on a former occasion that it was below 90, and he thought it would take a very able actuary to get the amount above that. But he would give the hon. gentleman the benefit of the doubt. The hon. gentleman would see that there was a loss of 3 per cent. upon the £2,500,000. The House had been implored not to pass this resolution as it would tie the hands of the Finance Minister, and the House had been told that, when the Finance Minister went to England to make a loan for Canada, he would do as he pleased. When the hon. gentleman first went to England he acted in this manner, but, being reproved, the next time he acted according to the wishes of Parliament, and when he returned he was complimented. Then he went back to the old system. In point of fact Canada had an autocrat who was above the House, and above financial authorities of this and every other country. If the hon. gentleman were permitted to manage the financial affairs of Canada very long, we should be brought to a condition in which we would be forced to resort to the system of fixed rates. This resolution drew no hard and fast lines. It simply condemned the transaction, and added what every man who ran could read, and all who read must know, namely, that Canada had, owing to this unfortunate course, lost a large sum of public money. The hon. gentleman made one new statement. He said he went to London unexpectedly. He went there because, he said, in another year Canada would not be in as good a position to go into the market and negotiate a loan as it was last Fall. But this was not stated to the House in his Budget Speech. Then, the hon. gentleman made his calculations and admitted that there was a deficit of \$2,000,000 last year, but he professed that by means of the \$500,000 additional taxes, he had provided for any deficit that would otherwise exist in the current year. He (Mr. Tupper) wished to understand whether the hon. gentleman was then dealing candidly with the House when he said the worst was over, and why he did not say that the effect of the bad harvest would make itself shown in the present financial condition of the country. It was delusive to say that the loan was at 91 when the Finance Minister meant 90. There was another point. Not content with giving the rebate of interest of one per cent. back to the people who paid the 91, he provided that a sinking fund of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum should be inserted in these debentures. So that purchasers had a binding contract with Canada that it should pay them year by year for these debentures 97 per cent., providing the debentures had risen to that amount and had not gone above par. That provision in the prospectus had increased the value of the securities very considerably. He (Mr. Tupper) would now refer to the only country quoted by the hon. gentleman as a precedent to follow. Norway went into the London market at the same time as the Canadian loan was placed, the Norway loan being at a fixed price instead of at an open competition. The hon. gentleman said that Norway had a most excellent record, and that it was in a position to secure the very best terms in the London market. The hon. gentleman occasionally questioned quotations. But there was one paper which he would not question as an authority on financial matters, and that was the London Economist. He (Mr. Tupper) would read a few extracts from an article in the Economist, written at the time this Norwegian loan was placed upon the market:—

Mr. TUPPER.

“For the year ended July last, according to a short pamphlet just issued, it was estimated that the revenue would amount to £1,380,000, and the expenditure, including extraordinary payments for national defenses, to £1,670,000, thus leaving a deficit of £290,000, which was to be made good out of the former surpluses. * * * There have been extraordinary receipts and disbursements, the most important of them being the receipt of the balance of 1874 loan, amounting to £658,000, and the expenditure of about £593,500 on the construction of railways; and, taking all these into account, the gross expenditure for the year amounts to £2,200,000, showing a deficit of about £636,000, if we include, to use an Indian phrase, "Public Works Extraordinary."

* * * For the current year the ordinary revenue is estimated at £1,557,000, and the expenditure at £1,708,000."

He only read this extract to show how far the hon. gentleman was justified in taking Norway as a precedent. He did not intend to pursue this subject further. It was not necessary. Enough had been said to satisfy hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that every line contained in the resolution was true; that the course pursued had been an unfortunate one in the interest of Canada; and that the country had suffered much loss. If this was true, there never was a time when it more behoved hon. members to give a fair and honest and independent support to the candid and straightforward proposition of his hon. friend from South Ontario.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for Cumberland had a singular idea of the relations which the financial agents of Canada in England bore to the Government of this country. He told the House that the hon. the Finance Minister should not consult them with regard to the value of securities put upon the London market. It must seem to that hon. gentleman that it would not be an improper act, a dishonest act, for these agents to lead the Finance Minister astray. In fact, he said that, while the Finance Minister was in England, Canada had no financial agent there but the Financial Minister himself. The hon. gentleman said it was a highly improper transaction if the Finance Minister undertook to sell Canadian securities at a fixed price. The hon. gentleman forgot that he himself was in England in 1865, on behalf of the Province of Nova Scotia, and had communication with those same gentlemen, Messrs. Baring and Glyn, and consulted them as to the price it would be possible to realize upon the securities of the Province, and also upon the manner of putting them on the market. In fact, he did everything which he now said was highly improper for the Finance Minister of Canada to do last Fall.

Mr. TUPPER: I think the hon. gentleman is taking a great advantage in making a statement upon my own authority, without stating, at the same time, that when these gentlemen stated the highest price for these debentures, I refused to sell them at all.

Mr. MILLS said this was because the hon. gentleman's Province would not sanction the transaction. There was no doubt, however, that he attempted to persuade these agents to take the debentures at a certain price; and, therefore, his mouth was stopped as to objecting to the Finance Minister doing the same. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had told the House that that loan was an improper transaction. But the hon. gentleman had forgotten that the hon. the Finance Minister had a difficult undertaking, that the hon. the Finance Minister was the first Finance Minister of Canada who had succeeded in establishing a credit at 4 per cent., and that he had succeeded in obtaining more favourable terms than any of his predecessors.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh.

Mr. MILLS said the right hon. member for Kingston would no doubt be able to tell the House in what respect he (Mr. Mills) was mistaken, and as to which of his colleagues had floated a 4 per cent. loan or made a loan on more favourable terms than the hon. the Finance Minister. The hon. member for Cumberland had said that it was an improper way to effect a loan. It was very extraordinary that, with the single exception of the Australian loan, during the past twelve or fifteen months not a single loan had been effected on the London money market on any other plan than the one adopted by the hon. the Finance Minister. Were the representatives of all those countries corrupt, or was the policy adopted in every case an improper one? The hon. Minister of Finance had pointed out the difference between the position of South Australia and Canada. Australia was more secure than any other country; there was no danger of its being attacked if England became involved in war. Canada was in a different position, as had been frequently pointed out by capitalists in England.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had himself declared when speaking of the position of Nova Scotia, that the colonies of British North America did not occupy such a favourable position as other portions of the Empire, in consequence of their proximity to the United States. Yet the hon. member had quoted what Australia had done, without taking into consideration its exceptional position. Conclusive proof of the favourable terms obtained by the Canadian Finance Minister were shown by observing the price which Canadian securities had realized since the loan had been effected. If there had been a corrupt bargain, an improper collusion between the Finance Minister and the London agents, the moment the loan had been effected the price of the Canadian securities would have risen rapidly in the London money market. If the securities had been sold below their market value, their price would have risen, and the purchasers would have made a large profit. The reverse proved to be the case. The prices at the end of last month were from 93 to 94, which, deducting accumulated interest, was but little in advance of the sum received by the hon. the Finance Minister. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) told them that the financial agents of the Dominion were quite willing to mislead the Minister of Finance, and damage the interests of Canada. This was not the position taken by the hon. member in 1865, when he sought the advice of these men. Keeping in view the fact that these securities had not risen in value since the loan was effected, and that this mode was now generally adopted, he considered that the Minister of Finance had done wisely in negotiating the loan as he did. As to Norway. Since 1870, Norway had a surplus; and, consequently, the member for Cumberland had misled the House. He believed both the House and the country would approve of the manner in which the loan had been negotiated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had always thought that this country enjoyed responsible Government and a responsible Finance Minister. They now found that they were mistaken.

Mr. MILLS.

The true Finance Minister of the country was two very respectable and very great houses. The whole argument used by the Finance Minister, in favour of the course, was this: the Barings and the Glyn's had both advised it, and it would be exceedingly wrong in the House to cast a stain on the honour of the Glyn's and the Barings; and if it was insufferable to do so with regard to men of such high standing, the greatest merchants and bankers in the world, what then was the use of a Finance Minister going to England at all? What was the use of having a Finance Minister? According to the hon. gentleman's own statement, as far as this loan was concerned, the hon. gentleman was certainly the fly on the wheel, and of no value, and the hon. gentleman's opinions were of no consequence. Because Messrs. Glyn & Baring advised that this loan should be placed on the market at a fixed price, this must be done; and the fact that they were asked to take or took a portion of it was clear proof with hon. gentlemen opposite, of the justice of the advice and of the accuracy of the opinions of these houses, who backed their own opinion by subscribing to the loan. Was such an argument ever heard before? Would that go down in or out of the House? Why, the hon. gentleman had no right to defend himself by quoting the advice of others, unless his personal good faith and honour were attacked. Then a Minister had a right to get the opinion of experts or subordinates or agents, who understood the subject and who could show the bona fides of his actions. In every other case, except when charged with mala fides, Ministers must stand by the goodness or the badness of their measures, and they could not shelter themselves behind the advice of agents or subordinates. And what was the boast of Lord Althorpe? He thanked God that during all the time he had been Minister he never quoted the opinion of any prominent officer or sheltered himself behind any servant of the Government. The sole question at issue was this:— Whether this was a judicious or unwise transaction; whether it was for the advantage of or for the disadvantage of the country. They had no right to be bored by the expression that the Barings and the Glyn's and the other friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite had given them their advice. The hon. gentleman had no right to insist that argument on the House. The hon. gentleman was a responsible Minister; responsible for the course he had taken; and they held the hon. gentleman and the Government responsible for what had been done. It was futile and unconstitutional and improper for any Minister to try and divide that responsibility or shelter himself behind agents, however respectable they might be. Responsible Ministers ought to take advice and information from all proper sources, but when they had taken any course, political, financial or commercial, or otherwise, they must make the advice on which they acted their own, and hold themselves responsible for it. They could not, and ought not, to quote the advice of others. The proposition of the hon. member for South Ontario was twofold. In the first place, it was stated that the course of fixing the price of the loan was in itself inexpedient; and in the second place, that this had caused a large financial loss. Both were true. The first was true as a general rule; and the second was positively a matter of fact. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had stated—and the hon. member for Bothwell, who usually did not so servilely imitate—had only repeated, though much less fluently than the Minister of Finance, that the majority of other countries were in the habit of going into the English market, and offering loans at a fixed price. But what was the reason of this? Every one knew that the credit of these countries was not good, and that they must borrow money. They were afraid to throw their loans on the open market and do as Canada ought to have, and as Australia had done. These countries must have the money and they had to pay the price. If Turkey wanted money she would give 12, 14 or 20 per cent. The Khedive of Egypt must do the same thing. Russia was nowadays at the mercy of the lender, and must see if she got money at all, that the price was fixed at such a low rate as would induce speculators to deal in what was, to a certain degree, discredited stock. The only ground on which the rate was fixed, preventing the country from securing the highest price in the market by open competition, was the fear of failure. Why, when Turkey went into the market the dread was great that the loan would be discredited altogether, and that they would not get a sixpence. Spain was in the same position. He was happy to see that Italy promised to have next year, for the first time in her existence, a surplus; but she had had continual deficits. Italy was a discredited country, and she was obliged to go into the market, and offer such terms as would induce, by a higher rate of interest, investors to come forward. This was only done where danger of failure was feared. The hon. gentleman had admitted as much. The only argument the hon. gentleman used was that he had accepted the advice of Messrs. Glyn and Baring in favour of a fixed rate. There was evidently fear of total failure. He did not wish to speak with any disrespect of the hon. gentleman, but he believed that what had led to this state of things more than anything else was the fact that the hon. gentleman had not mastered either the position of Finance Minister, nor had he mastered, nor did he understand, the credit of Canada in England and the markets of the world. There should have been no fear of failure. There was no reason for it. The very fact that investors rushed for the loan when put on the market at that price showed that the credit of Canada stood so high that there was not the slightest fear of failure. South Australia did not have such a Finance Minister as Canada. She had a man in office who knew the value of his own country's resources, and how she stood in the English market—as they believed and knew, despite the Finance Minister, Canada stood in that market—and they found that South Australia floated a loan of £500,000 sterling at four per cent., the lowest bid being 96½ per cent. and the highest being 100, par. This was what was done when there were no Barings and Glyn's to stand in the way with their advice. The whole of this loan was taken up at an average, as he understood, of 97½ per cent. while the Canadian loan was put down to 90.

Mr. MILLS: Why did the late Administration have an agent and pay him one per cent. commission, when we do not need agents at all?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, the hon. gentleman must know every one of the Australian Colonies had an agent, and these agents were more important in England than were the Barings and the Glyn's. They held a diplomatic position as quasi Ambassadors, and were so received in England. The Messrs. Barings and Glyn were merely financial men who managed the financial affairs of Canada in England, but they had no agents in the sense the Australian Colonies had agents. Whether it was an Australian loan or a Canadian loan, the agency or commission had to be equally paid. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) shook his head, but he evidently knew nothing about it. The hon. gentleman did not know that there was such a person as an Australian agent.

Mr. MILLS: If the hon. gentleman's position is a sound one, we should negotiate loans universally in the way he proposes, and no agents are required. I asked the question why, under these circumstances, the late Government always paid a commission of one per cent. to those gentlemen?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said they paid for the arrangements made with regard to the carrying out of transactions relating to Canada. So it was with Australia and the Dominion. The question of commission had, however, nothing to do with the price of the loan as placed on the market. This was £89 8s. 6d. He thought that after a very careful calculation, the hon. gentleman would find that the value per £100 was £89 8s. 6d., and the commission was paid aside, while South Australia obtained per £100, £97 10s., and paid her agents besides. No doubt this was the difference between going into the open market and tying their hands, owing to a distrust of their own credit. This was the consequence of the course taken by the hon. gentleman, who had no excuse for limiting Canada's credit in this manner, and for not giving a chance for competition, unless he had certainly reason for fearing a failure. Now, the evidence was all the other way. The rush to take up the loan at 91 showed clearly that if it had been left open to competition a higher and a better price would have been obtained. An enormous loss had consequently been sustained by the country. The hon. gentleman laughed, but the Premier had become so accustomed to large figures lately, in the Estimates, that he thought nothing of the loss of £200,000 stg. This was a mere bagatelle; as much might be given away on a railway contract in a month; but, nevertheless, was a considerable sum of money for the people who made their calculations, and who thought there was some correspondence and relation between the quotations in the financial columns of the Times and the truth; and they would see that instead of £200,000 they had lost very nearly twice that amount in reality. This had resulted not only in a loss, but also in creating such feeling of discontent in the country that he ventured to say, the country would never suffer such a loss again. The hon. gentleman said that they were charging Messrs. Barings & Glyn with dishonourable dealing; but these houses were either trustees, or they were not trustees. If they were not such, they ought not to have floated the loan, or given advice; and if they were, they ought, at least, not to have taken any of the bonds. They should not have put themselves in a suspicious position. His hon. friend had showed this in his reference to the prospectus regarding the previous loan, in which it was stated that the Canadian agents in England would not have anything to do with it, or enter into competition for it. The whole world was let know that, for this loan, there should be open competition, and no preferences given. The hon. gentleman must know that the country had suffered great loss in connection with this last loan.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not a single dollar has been lost.

that the loss was only £250,000 at the very least. They could hear from England as well as hon. gentlemen opposite; and it was known, and a matter for laughter on Lombard street, that the Finance Minister of Canada had been bubbled in this regard. It was said that others had made the profits; and what gentlemen other than the Messrs. Baring and Glyn were let in on the ground floor? What other individuals and titled individuals were allowed on the ground floor? He would like to know it. It was recognized in commercial circles that the loan was put on the market at so low a price that Canada had lost a great sum of money; and this country would believe it. The hon. gentlemen had said this was all very well; but it showed that the hon. gentlemen opposite did not understand the position of a great country like this. The hon. gentleman said that the Opposition alluded to the plan used by village municipalities in Canada in placing loans on the market; but these municipalities in the management of their small financial matters ought to be governed by the principles of common sense, and so ought the Minister of Finance. He thought that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had a little of the practical shrewdness of some of the county reeves and county treasurers; and if he had, he never would have made this wonderful mistake in running down the credit of our own debentures and of selling them at a price below their value. With the credit Canada possessed it was more than absurd to imagine that there was any danger of these debentures being thrown back on their hands unsold. As his hon. friend had said, there was a plethora of money in England at that time, and there were two causes for this; in the first place there was want of confidence in business relations, and a check and depression in business, and the banks were overrun with deposits; and, in the second place, there had been a failure among all the great countries and borrowers of Europe. Russia's credit had fallen, and she could not get a pound in England or Holland. Egypt was gone, Turkey was gone, and Spain was gone, and Italy had run its loans up to the very highest point.

The credit of the Continent of Europe was exhausted, and there were no borrowers as there were five years ago. Money-lenders were looking now to the United States and Canada, and they saw how there was a rush for United States bonds at the present time, in consequence of there being no means of investing in the shares or in the stock of European nations. Therefore, from those two facts, from the stagnation of business, and that the banks were overrun with money for which there was no legitimate investment, the two propositions of the resolution were established. He could not understand how any hon. gentleman, looking at the facts in the case, could say that those propositions were not well founded, well based, and could not be controverted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not propose to pay any attention to the hon. gentleman's financial criticisms. The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) was utterly ignorant of figures. It was quite true that his hon. friend was ignorant of certain manipulations of figures, and long may he remain in ignorance of such manipulation of figures. His hon. friend opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald) said it was very wrong in the hon. the Minister of Finance to trust to the advice of subordinates, to get the views of those subordinates, or to shelter himself behind those subordinates; and, in this respect, he classed the highest financial authorities of England, who acted as the agents of Canada, as subordinates.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: An agent is always subordinate to a principal.

Mr. MACKENZIE said those gentlemen who acted as agents were in no sense subordinates, or under the control of the Government of Canada; they occupied a position independent either of Canada or any other country for which they acted, and their advice was asked simply because of the high position they occupied in the money markets of the world. They found, however, a few days ago, a very distinguished gentleman sheltering himself behind the advice and authority of the Chief Clerk of one of the Departments of Canada.

The hon. member for Cumberland declared that it was ample authority to take away money out of the bank without an Order in Council or any authority whatever, but simply because the Chief Clerk of the Finance Department said so. And those were the men who told the Government that they were not to consult their financial agents in England because they were subordinates. During the term that he held office, the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) sent two Finance Ministers to England, and, in both instances, those gentlemen took and acted upon the advice of those "subordinates."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is a mistake. It happens to be the reverse of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is nothing of the sort; you will find that it is no mistake.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: How does the hon. gentleman know? He cannot prove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was another phase to this matter. The hon. the Finance Minister had succeeded in effecting the most successful loan that ever was made by Canada, and the only thanks that he got for it now was to be abused and rated by hon. gentlemen opposite because he did not do better. The rate of interest now was very much lower for the entire debt than it was when his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) assumed the direction of the financial affairs of the country, and that was owing to wise management and excellent manipulation of the loans effected in England. But the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald), with that reckless manner which he adopted in trying to make a point, said that the hon. the Finance Minister and his loan were now the laughing stock of Lombard Street. Let the hon. gentleman state what authority he had for making that statement. Did he mean that they were to take his word for what was prevalent in Lombard Street, or that Lombard Street was supposed to delegate to him its opinion on this or any other loan. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had been a diligent reader of the financial articles of the great English journals, and he had failed to observe anything to indicate such a state of affairs. But the hon. gentleman claimed to have special knowledge of financial matters, and enlarged for fifteen minutes on the fact that at the time the loan was made there was a plethora of money in the banks; in fact, that every place was overflowing with money, and that the hon. the Finance Minister had merely to lay his hands on it—to put salt on the tails of the money-changers, and he would have got all he wanted. If the hon. gentleman had an intimate knowledge of the money market, the manner in which it was affected, and the cause of money and commercial panics, he would know—and he (Mr. Mackenzie) appealed to the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) if it was not the case—that it was precisely at times when there was a plethora of money that it was most difficult to obtain a loan.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario); Everything depends upon the security.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Exactly; and there was such a particular determination on the part of the money-lenders to have the best securities that they were suspicious of all securities, and wherever there was a suspicion of securities it was a peculiarly difficult time to effect a loan. A high financial authority in London, in a private letter to him (Mr. Mackenzie), said the hon. the Finance Minister could not have effected a loan a week before or a week after he did. This was the real truth in regard to the plethora of money; and if the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had been as well up in financial matters as he pretended to be—although he was bound to say the hon. gentleman had had considerable latitude in those matters and avoided coming to close quarters—he would not have been so extravagant in his language on this occasion. The hon. gentleman said Canada had lost £200,000 through this transaction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was surprised the hon. gentleman did not make the sum three times as large;

he had only to name a larger sum to make us poorer. The hon. gentleman had only to stretch his imagination a little to make us as poor or as rich as he pleased. Australia received more favourable terms than Canada, simply because of the peculiarities of the country. It was remote from all danger of invasion. It was not a country that could be well attacked in time of war; indeed, there was not a nation on the face of the earth that could, by any possibility, send a force to attack Australia. Neighbours, as we were, to a great and powerful Republic, although there was no immediate danger of war, no hostilities likely to arise, the country was subject to a great many conditions which might arise in the United States, and which might affect more or less our commercial prosperity, and, consequently, our power and ability to pay. This undoubtedly exercised a prejudicial effect on our securities, and, with that extreme sensitiveness always felt in the money market, it affected us much more than circumstances warranted or justified. But he only rose to call attention to one or two points which the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) brought out, and to sum up the debate in this way: that at the present moment the credit of Canada stood higher than it ever stood; that the last loan was the best ever effected; and that his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) had succeeded in reducing the average interest upon the public debt to a lower point than it ever reached before.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he believed the hon. Minister of Finance had made a mistake in this matter; but his hon. friend for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) and himself differed as to the nature of that mistake. The great mistake the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had made was in excusing that which really required no excuse. He believed that the loan was one of the best ever effected. In 1875 the Australian colonies put a loan on the market by tender, giving a minimum; but they were unable to get it taken up; and the only way they could possibly get it floated was by the formation of a syndicate and paying a handsome sum. It was almost invariably the case that if a loan was placed on the market it did not come up to the price of preceding loans, and he could see nothing extraordinary in the method in which this loan was operated. One of the Russian loans fell 4 per cent. below a previous loan of the same nation. He had heard it mentioned by many gentlemen of high financial standing, that the loan, instead of being a failure, was a very great success. No doubt the Finance Minister made enquiries of others besides these agents.

SUPPLY.

XII. PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS
CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

75. Intercolonial Railway completion..... $75,000 00

Mr. TUPPER said it would be of interest if the Minister of Public Works would state what the total cost of the work was.

Mr. MACKENZIE said for all purposes, up to the present time, it had cost $22,112,083, to which there had to be added $675,000. For grading alone there was $11,266,560. But the amount paid for the Eastern extension, that was made part of the Intercolonial Railway, east of Moncton, was not embraced in that. That extension cost $944,923; but that particular item was not divided so as to show the exact cost of grading etc. The details of the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway were as follows:—

Mr. SMITH.

Grading and snow-sheds.....	$11,581,653
Rails and fastenings.....	2,905,729
Tracklaying and ballasting....	1,445,369
Sleepers.....	363,884
Iron bridging.....	789,723
Rolling stock.....	1,988,657
Engineering.....	1,285,780
Management.....	187,651
Buildings and water supply....	762,564
Right of way and land damages.	360,762
Eastern Extension Railway....	944,923
Telegraph lines.....	16,830
Deep water connection, Baie des Chaleurs.....	1,497
Rimouski branch and pier....	27,625
do Mail tender.....	19,169
Stewiacke branch.....	9,400
Paymasters.....	37,267

Total estimated cost up to 30th June, 1878..... $22,732,083

EXTENSION TO DEEP WATER AT ST. JOHN.

Expended up to 31st December, 1876.....	$141,265
Wharf.....	175,000
Engineering.....	10,000
Dredging.....	20,000
City of St. John, for land.....	40,000
Freight shed, grading, rails, coal-drops and cranes.....	23,000

Total estimated cost.. $409,265

HALIFAX EXTENSION.

Deep water wharf.....	$150,068 75
Grading, tracklaying, etc.....	206,670 84
Brick freight house.....	29,576 96
Brick passenger station.....	85,440 74
Land and damages.....	192,124 00
Car shed.....	5,194 39
Temporary passenger station..	644 29

Total cost to 31st Dec., 1876. 669,719 97

Balance available on 1st Jan., 1877, and required to 30th June, 1877.....	18,429 80
Supplementary Estimates, 1876-77. (Contribution to Powder Magazine).....	20,000 00
Vote, 1877-78, for completion..	75,000 00

Total estimated cost..... $783,149 77

He would say that they would be required to ask a considerable sum in the Supplementary Estimates, the purpose for which he would explain when they were brought down. It was found that the through traffic had increased so much last Fall beyond what was expected, that they were obliged to hire a large number of cars from the Grand Trunk Railway, for which they paid a certain sum per month.

Mr. MITCHELL: How much?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought it was between $1,000 and $2,000 per month; at any rate it was the ordinary rate paid by companies for using cars of other companies. At times, the Grand Trunk used some of their cars, for which payment of course was made; but the balance was always largely against the Intercolonial. It had been decided to build 700 more freight cars, the cost of which would be somewhere about $370,000. Of the vote now asked, $71,000 was for finishing the grading and wood sheds, and $4,000 for finishing the Rimouski pier to accommodate mail steamers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That will complete the road, except the amount represented by the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes. The deep water terminus at St. John had been commenced. The tender which was accepted was at about $174,000. Hon. gentlemen would observe that only a vote of $100,000 was asked for this work. A considerable portion would be used for bridging and making approaches. This work would take two years to complete, but only $100,000 was expected to be used this year.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not intend to detain the Committee at this stage of the proceedings, but he would venture to congratulate the Government and the House upon the fact that this road had approached the near completion which the proposed vote would represent. He was quite satisfied that the statement the First Minister had just made, that the enormous amount of traffic that had presented itself for the road required the Government to make provision for some 700 additional freight cars, was an evidence that they might fairly expect a very large amount of business over the road. He was quite sure that those who had paid any attention to the question would come to the conclusion that this road was one of the best and most substantial that had been constructed in America, and he believed, notwithstanding the large amount it had cost the country, it had been as cheaply constructed, all things considered. He was very glad to know that the Government upon the completion of the road had contracted to bring the mail by that route instead of as heretofore, by way of Portland. He knew enough upon this subject to state that the result of the experiment had been most satisfactory, so far as tried. He had had an opportunity of conversing with the Post Office Inspector as to the comparison between the voyages made to Halifax and Portland, and he stated that by the former route mails could be delivered at Montreal from Liverpool 22½ hours, or practically, a day sooner than by way of Portland. The average time saved would be even greater than this in the future. So far as they had had the means of judging, the road was a great success, and there was every reason to believe that a large and important saving would be made in the mails between the mother country and Canada. He was quite sure the House would be very glad to vote the $75,000 additional, or anything that it would be necessary to ask in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he must join his congratulations with those of the hon. member for Cumberland, upon the success which had attended the experiment of landing the mails at Halifax. The people of Canada would rejoice that they at least had the means of reaching the Atlantic coast by rail through their own territory; at least, they had the means of making themselves independent of a foreign country in this respect. He thought the Government deserved great credit for the efforts they had made. As had been already stated, the mails had been landed at Halifax and carried over the Intercolonial very satisfactorily; but it was to be hoped and expected that, looking to the future, and the proximity of the port of Halifax to England, some efforts would be made to make that port one of the great connecting points between the old and new world. He would like to ask the First Minister whether the attention of the Government had been directed thereto, and whether the intimation, given some time ago, that several steamship companies had been looking to Halifax as a terminal point on this side of the Atlantic, for landing the mails for Australia and the Continent, had been under the consideration of the Government. This was a very important question, and, if carried out, would add much to the prestige of Canada and to the usefulness of the road, if any such arrangement could be made without sacrifice to the public interest. He believed it was within the range of possibility that such an arrangement might be arrived at, if a proper understanding were come to between the steamship companies and the Imperial authorities. He was sure the House would be obliged for any information the Government could give in this matter.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK called attention to a line that was still a part of the route, the Truro and Pictou Branch, the Bill for the transfer of which had passed the House but a short time ago. The attention of the House was called by the Government to the promise that was made two years ago as to the transfer, but no mention was made of the fact that a large sum of money had been spent upon the road during the interval. It appeared from the report of the Superintendent of Railways that the sum of $60,000 was spent during the last financial year upon that branch, and also that it was relaid with steel rails for 40 miles. It was extraordinary that the House should be asked to give away this branch, when, during the last two years, it had cost something over $300,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he really was not aware how much had been relaid with steel rails. The renewal had been going on steadily every year all over the route, about the same quantity of rails being relaid every year for the last three years. When the House came to the vote for the working of railways, he would bring down an exact statement. Wherever the rails were defective they were relaid with steel rails, whether on the Pictou Branch or any other branch.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: How about the cash expended on the road?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government were bound to keep the road in running order, the same as if they had intended to retain it for all time. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax, he had merely to say that projects had, at various times, been brought forward by gentlemen interested in steamship companies. A year ago last June a gentleman came to Ottawa, representing New York and English capitalists, and wished to make arrangements with the Government, whereby it was proposed that steamers should sail weekly or tri-weekly, and in five years they would be prepared to run every day, between Canada and Great Britain and Ireland, for certain subsidies by the United States, British and Canadian Governments. The Government were willing to discuss the project, but they were not prepared to take any action until some definite propositions were put forward by the English and United States Governments. Some schemes had been published in the newspapers since then, and the discussion of the question had simply shown that, if connection was made at St. John, passengers and mail matter landing at Halifax, from 20 to 24 hours would probably be gained in reaching New York. He had no doubt that this would come before many years had elapsed, but at present they could see no immediate prospect of this result. They were, however, in correspondence with the Post Office Department of Great Britain, with the view of landing all United States mails at Halifax, and they had made an offer to convey them to our borders within a specified time, and also to convey the Australian mails to the west end of the Province within a specified time; and in both cases they could make an objective point, say New York or Detroit, much more quickly than it could be made through the United States. He could not, with propriety, say any more at present, except that the Government were anxious to accomplish the desired result.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he did not think a very satisfactory explanation had been given by the First Minister as to the Truro and Pictou Branch. The money spent upon that Branch would have covered the additional taxation upon tea and malt. He would like to know what the Government were going to do with the mail tender at Rimouski, for which $19,000 was given. He would like to know whether it was going to be replaced by a new one, or whether the old one would continue to be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We intend to use it.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had always objected to the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch in toto. He thought it one of the greatest mistakes the Government had ever made. The House had no idea when it sanctioned the giving away of the road, that special improvements had been made upon it. It looked very much as if it was the price paid for Nova Scotia's support.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said, if his hon. friend had listened to the discussion the other night he would have gathered that the Government had been in correspondence, or had been in communication with the Local Government, and with the contractors, with the view of the extension of the road from New Glasgow to the Gut of Canso. He thought his hon. friend would admit that it was of the highest importance that railway communication should be opened through that section of the country. As there was no possibility of the House being induced to vote money for the purpose of extending the Intercolonial Railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, it was a wise policy on the part of the Government of which his hon. friend was a member, and also of the Government of the present day, to encourage the project by all means within their power without any sacrifice of the public interests. The giving away of the Truro and Pictou Branch was an aid thus far to the project, which would be a great advantage to the country, and contribute materially to the income of the Intercolonial Railway. The Government were compelled to keep up the line in proper working order and to change the gauge, and the expenditure on this score was entirely in the public interest.

Mr. MITCHELL entered his protest against the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch. He objected to it, especially as it had been done just after the iron rails had been taken up and the line relaid with steel rails at an expense of $300,000.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) enquired whether it was not the policy of the late Government to dispose of this road.

Mr. MITCHELL denied that such was the case. He would never have consented to it.

Mr. McISAAC said that, after what had occurred in the Senate a few evenings ago in connection with the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch, he was surprised to hear the hon. member (Mr. Mitchell) renew the attack on the Government. When the Bill authorizing the transfer was before the House, every member of the late Government in the House, except the hon. member for Cumberland, voted against it, and some of them, especially the hon. member for Northumberland, spoke fiercely against it. On that occasion only two of the avowed supporters of that Administration voted in favour of the Bill, viz., the member for Cumberland and the member for Cape Breton. In the face of that fact, when the Bill was passing through the Senate, a prominent member of that House, among other arguments used by him in support of the measure, declared it was the policy of the late Government not only to give the road itself, but the rolling stock as well, to aid the Eastern Extension. He (Mr. McIsaac) wished to ascertain beyond a doubt which House correctly announced the policy of the Opposition, when in power, on this matter. There was no subject of greater interest and moment to eastern Nova Scotia than the Eastern Extension, and the people of that highly important portion of the Dominion had a right to know, and desired to know, who were the real friends of the scheme, because the best friends of that scheme were their best friends. He called on the Opposition if it was their policy to subsidize the Eastern Extension by means of the Truro and Pictou Branch or otherwise, to say so distinctly, and not a man among them answered affirmatively. Even the hon. member for Cumberland himself declared that he was in favour of the transfer now, and that, in a qualified manner, by adding new stipulations at this time of day, when the work was under contract and construction, which if passed would result in further delay, if not in entire defeat of the project. He had heard no one say it was their intention to build the road either to the Strait of Canso or to the Atlantic entirely at the expense of the Dominion. If that intention had been entertained, the seven years of plenty, during which they held power, and their large majority in the House, would have rendered it easy to carry it out. When they felt they had means and strength enough to build a road through the wilds of the North-West and the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific, it would not be difficult to believe that they could and should extend the line from New Glasgow to the Atlantic through the finest and richest portion of the Dominion. He did not speak from any party spirit, he was actuated by no motive but a desire to see the work completed as speedily and as successfully as possible, and to let the people of eastern Nova Scotia understand whom they should thank for the great facilities so long denied them. On taking his seat in the House, he felt it his duty to his constituents and his Province to support the party he considered willing and able to secure the boon so much desired by that section of the Dominion.

Mr. LANGEVIN corroborated the statement of the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell.) It was not the policy of the late Government to part with the branch and the feeders of the Intercolonial. He was favourable to the proposed extension to the Gut of Canso, but at that date, 1871, he considered that the time had not come for the Government to take up the matter. He was sure that, had hon. members known that the road was to be transferred during the present year to another company, hon. members would have objected to it, and he would have opposed it. The company could not have expected steel rails to have been laid down on the road.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was impossible to lay steel rails here and there. Rails of such a pattern as the old ones would have to be used for such a purpose, and they had no new iron rails. If this had not been done damage to life and property would have probably been done to three or four times the amount which would have been saved, had the Government not adopted the course they did. They were obliged to keep up the road and they could not foresee how it was to be utilized.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that old iron could have been used to repair the road, The Opposition had voted against the Bill in question. He was, as he had always been, favourable to a road being built to the Gulf of Canso and extended to Louisburg. This branch was worth about two millions of dollars, and the improvements made, nearly $300,000. It was one of the best roads in the country. The Government should not refuse to the Province of Quebec everything they asked for. They had asked for aid to the St. John Railway, but they had not obtained it. There was also the Quebec and Woodstock Railway, only a portion of which had been built owing to the want of means; and it should also have assistance. They desired only fair play for the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said that application was made to the late Administration for the transfer of this branch between Pictou and Truro, and that it was then stated that the policy of the Government was to hand it over and build a line between New Glasgow and the Strait of Canso.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will state distinctly that was not our policy.

Mr. MACKAY said many hon. members would recollect the circumstance. Further, the late Government was disposed to build a road to Louisburg. That, he took it, was within the memory of the members of the late Administration. It was certainly brought to their notice, and it was their policy. The member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had said he regretted that the road had been transferred. Why did he regret it? He (Mr. MacKay) was convinced, and he thought it could be proved, that while that hon. gentleman was a member of the late Administration, he was perfectly satisfied that it should be transferred for the purpose of building to the Strait, and the only reason why it was not done was, that some members from Nova Scotia wanted the road built all the way to Louisburg, and to extend it to the Strait of Canso. The present Government were only carrying out the policy which was adopted before. The member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) had said he believed the transfer had been made in order that the members from Nova Scotia should be kept together to support the Government. He was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman make such a statement. The members from Nova Scotia were not much interested in the transfer of this road. The members from Cape Breton had been opposed to the present Government transferring the line, because they thought they ought to build it to the port of Louisburg as a public work. The object of hon. gentlemen on the other side was to make political capital out of the transfer, so as to say, "This has been handed over to the Province of Nova Scotia; see the concession made to Nova Scotia, and, in consideration of that, the Government are receiving a certain amount of support." All this existed only in the fertile imagination of the hon. member for Northumberland.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had already stated that no such policy as the transfer of this road had been determined upon by the late Government, and his hon. friend from Charlevoix had confirmed his statement. The hon. member had not the slightest foundation in fact for the statement he had made in this House. No such subject was ever considered by the late Administration, much less determined upon, and the hon. gentleman had not a tittle of foundation for his statements. He (Mr. Mitchell) believed it was a false policy to give away that road—one fraught with great danger, because the next application would be from New Brunswick for the Saint John and Shediac road, which they would not be able to resist. He (Mr. Mitchell) had always been favourable to the extension of the road to Louisburg, but there was nothing incumbent on this Government to build that road, while it might be, and was desirable, in the interest of Nova Scotia. He found his hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDonald) who voted with the Opposition as a rule, got up to oppose him, and his hon. friend and colleague in the late Government, the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) opposed him. The hon. gentleman from Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) had the other day attacked him personally in relation to that road, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the others, every one of them, would speak in favor of the transfer of the two millions of property in favour of Nova Scotia purposes. It was ridiculous to speak of this as not being in favour of Nova Scotia. Why was it asked for?

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said, a resolution was passed by the members from Nova Scotia and was presented to the late Government. If he recollected rightly he was one of the delegates, and Mr. Stewart Campbell was another, and the members of that delegation were given to understand that the matter would be favourably received, and that the transfer would be made in due course.

Mr. MITCHELL asked if the hon. gentleman's statement was any proof. He had never denied that the member for Cumberland's measure gave the road over to extend the road in Nova Scotia. He (Mr. Tupper) had very liberal views as to Nova Scotia, but that was no proof that it was the established policy of the late Administration, because a delegate had waited on some members of it. He (Mr. Mitchell) had never heard of any such delegation.

Mr. BOWELL said it seemed to him that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) were more desirous to make a little capital out of this than anyone else who had spoken. The object of the member for Halifax clearly was to show that the late Government were the enemies of Nova Scotia, and that its true friends were those who now occupied the Treasury Benches. It would appear that this was the method adopted by the Government to subsidize Nova Scotia. He did not see why our property should be given away to one particular province, or why the Government should show partiality in this matter. The whole principle was wrong, and he protested against the transfer.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he considered this giving away of rails and the transfer of this road a gross imposition on the public. They ought to have particulars as to how the money on the Intercolonial Railway had been expended. A contract for turn-tables was given to the highest tender, and when they were supplied it appeared that they were of the manufacture of the lowest tenderer.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not take the statements of the hon. gentleman as facts. If he wished any information on any point he would be glad to give it.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had asked for a great deal of information, but had never got the details he wanted, and he was, consequently, obliged to take what information he could get outside.

Mr. McLEOD said if there was anything the Government deserved credit for it was the economy they had exercised in the management of the Intercolonial Railroad.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said he was glad to see that enterprises in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were to receive assistance from the Government. The member for Halifax intimated that Quebec had no branch lines of the Intercolonial; but the line between Metapediac and Passepiac, in the Province of Quebec, might be called a branch or feeder of the Intercolonial. It had already received a subsidy from the Local Legislature, and the preliminary surveys and location had been calculated. He did not begrudge what was given to other roads, but he hoped that a line of this importance would also be aided. The trade of the district was very considerable. He would like to know whether the wharf at Rimouski was completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this pier would be finished in accordance with the plans of Mr. Schreiber, the Chief Engineer of the railway. He was not an autocrat, and he could not give or withhold assistance from the railway in question. The subject had never been discussed by the Government.

Vote agreed to.

76. Intercolonial Railway Extension into Halifax...	$75,000
77. Intercolonial Railway to deep water at St. John, N. B.....	100,000
80. Lachine Canal.....	1,000,000

In reply to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. MACKENZIE said the works were all under contract, with the exception of the second basin, which the Government did not intend to place under contract at present. The work under contract would amount to $4,470,999, and the total expenditure up to 31st Dec., 1876, was $1,604,999. He might say the Government would require a supplementary estimate for the current year. They had now spent the entire amount of last year's vote, or nearly so. They had continued the works on a supplementary vote, which he would explain when they came to it, in order to carry out the contract for the current year.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Will the hon. gentleman explain the position of the Government in reference to the western end of the canal?

Mr. MACKENZIE said, it was proposed at one time to make a new entrance above Lachine; that was given up, and the contract was for an entrance near the old basin.

Mr. MASSON asked what quantity of land had been purchased from the proprietors of the Saint Gabriel Locks, for the purpose of enlarging the canal, and what price had been paid for that land?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Various prices.

Mr. MASSON said he meant the land to which he had referred the last year, when the Premier stated that only about thirty feet would be taken on one side or the other. He asked if, notwithstanding that statement, the Government had not purchased a large quantity of land near Saint Henri, Tanneries West, from the same proprietors?

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had not. They simply bought enough to make the canal the width they decided to make it up to Coté Saint Paul. What he stated last year was that there would, in some places, be very little to purchase, while, in others there would be from twenty to seventy feet width, because the boundary was unequal. Early last summer the member for the district and other delegations were anxious to make the canal twenty-five feet wider.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the depth?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Fourteen feet for the permanent structure, but now twelve feet. Land was valued by the valutors, I think, at twelve cents per foot.

Mr. MASSON: What was the price asked?

Mr. MACKENZIE said they never had a price asked and they never asked the price, or had any offered them. They directed the valutors to make a valuation.

Mr. MASSON: Do I understand that there was no offer made of the land at the price to which the land had risen at the auction which occurred in Montreal?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think not; I have no recollection of seeing any offer.

Mr. MASSON: Do I understand that there never was any portion of the land purchased or offered to the Government at the price at which it was sold by auction—that is, at the maximum, about thirty-five cents per foot?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no recollection of such an offer.

Mr. ROBITAILLE: There is no doubt such offers were made to some of the officials living in Montreal; whether they reached the Department or not I cannot say.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The entire amount paid for land was $331,874.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was suggested last year that the canal should be deepened to sixteen feet.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nineteen feet.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; to enable sea going vessels to go up the Saint Gabriel locks.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government could see no reason for taking that depth beyond the railroad crossing. It would be easy, perhaps, to make it fourteen feet, but to extend it to nineteen feet would be to extend the harbour for the city of Montreal.

Vote agreed to.

81. Cornwall Canal..... $100,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was merely the revote of the money unexpended last year.

Mr. MITCHELL remarked that there was no vote for the St. Lawrence Canals.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not proposed to ask a vote, except for the Cornwall Canals.

Vote agreed to.

82. Welland Canal..... $2,000,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said the entire cost of the canal so far, together with the works now under contract, was $6,961,851.

Mr. LANGEVIN: How much has been paid out?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The total expenditure up to the 31st December was $5,025,452. In January there was a balance of $326,000 available, which is now more than spent. We will probably have to get a supplementary estimate of $250,000 to carry us on.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Besides the contracts in hand, at what do you estimate the cost of the remaining works?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is estimated that the canal will cost $9,225,000 to obtain a depth of twelve feet, and $12,250,000 to get fourteen feet.

Mr. McCALLUM asked if the Government intended to sink the culverts in the feeder; $150,000 had been expended on the feeder, and it would only require a small sum to sink the culverts.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is under consideration.

Mr. McCALLUM said it had been under consideration for a long time. It would be in the interest of the country to sink those culverts.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would probably be able to say something further on this point at a future time.

Mr. McCALLUM said that as the expenditure of $20,000 would give two feet more of water for twenty-one miles, he thought such expenditure would be in the interest of the country. In order to secure the trade of the west, the Welland Canal should at once be deepened to fifteen feet.

Mr. MACKENZIE : That would take too large a sum of money.

Vote agreed to.

83. St. Anne's Lock.....$40,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had come to the conclusion that they must have a new entrance and a new lock altogether, but they thought they could get on at present with some slight repairs to the old pier. The expenditure of $40,000 would finish the work in the immediate vicinity.

Mr. LANGEVIN : This is for the new channel ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : Yes.

Mr. McCALLUM asked when the Welland Canal would be deepened to twelve feet ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : It will not be completed until the spring of 1879.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked with regard to the vote of $160,000 last year for St. Anne's lock, whether a contract had been given out ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : Not for the lock.

Mr. LANGEVIN : How much money was expended ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : Only 29,000 up to the 1st of January last.

Mr. LANGEVIN : For deepening the channel ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : No.

Vote agreed to.

84. Carillon and Chute à Blondeau..... $120,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said the probability was that the Government would very soon be obliged to take this work out of the hands of the contractors, Jones and Cook, who had failed to come to time with regard to any part of it. No difficulties had been met with that could not have been foreseen. The character of the bed of the river was very easily to be ascertained. The entrance to the lock was pretty well advanced ; but little had been done on the dam. Lumbermen were complaining of it very much as an obstruction. The old slide had been damaged considerably last season. It had become necessary to take decisive action.

Mr. LANGEVIN : What is the amount of contract ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : $570,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN : How much has been spent ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : $304,900.

Mr. LANGEVIN : How much of last year's vote is unexpended ?

Mr. MACKENZIE : On January 1st there remained $267,000. The sum of $120,000 was as much as could be spent on the work this year. A large amount of timber was on hand, and, as it would soon decay, the work must be proceeded with.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he hoped the work would be pressed forward as rapidly as possible.

Vote agreed to.

85. Improving approach to Culbute Canal..... $40,000

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said experience had proved that his declaration in 1876, that the work should be located in the south instead of the north channel was correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the precise mode of expenditure would be subject to examinations made by engineers.

Vote agreed to.

86. St. Peter's Canal..... $80,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said the work had been under contract for a year and was progressing. The estimate for last year was $50,000, which had been expended. The work was being cheaply constructed. There was fourteen feet water on the mitre sill.

Vote agreed to.

87. Miscellaneous work on Canals..... $10,000

88. Public Building, Ottawa, grounds..... 35,000

Retaining walls, gates, footpaths, painting, &c. 2,600

Extension, West Block... 135,500

In answer to Mr. PLUMB,

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had been endeavouring to find a fountain to agree with the general style of the buildings.

In answer to Mr. CAMERON,

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was their intention, after consulting authorities, upon such grounds as these, not to plant any trees in the grounds, though they intended to fill up the spaces between the blocks with trees.

Mr. MASSON: Is this the last estimate for the Western Block, and what is the total amount? It was understood it was to be $500,000, and it seem to have far exceeded that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The amount submitted in the Estimates last year was $296,000. I do not remember the amount before that, but my impression is it was $48,000 or $49,000.

Mr. MASSON: $90,000, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; there was the excavation. I think it will come within the original estimate.

XII. PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS—
CHARGEABLE TO INCOME.

Ontario.

90 {	Guelph Custom House, Excise and Post Offices.	$2,000
	Kingston Military Col- lege, repairing fortifi- cations.....	40,000
	London Military Grounds, fencing and wood-shed.	3,500
	To pay for site of Ottawa Post Office, Custom House and Inland Rev- enue Office.....	7,000

Mr. MITCHELL enquired whether the expenditure for repairing the Kingston fortifications could not be dispensed with altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there were very extensive military works there, and all the military authorities of the country considered it necessary to maintain them. They were built by the Imperial authorities, having cost millions, and it would look very bad if the Canadian Government did not keep them in repair. It was necessary to expend a large amount for the fortifications at Kingston and also at Quebec. This year $70,000 had been received from the sale of lands that were given with the works.

Mr. MITCHELL said the military schools were part of a system which, sooner or later, would have to be reconsidered and probably abandoned. He might be in advance of some hon. gentlemen in entertaining this opinion, but he would bide his time until public opinion changed.

Mr. MASSON asked how much it would require to finish the schools.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Probably $12,000 or $15,000 more.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman gave $100,000 as the cost last year. This showed the importance of having an estimate of the total cost of a work before giving a vote for it. The moment the first vote was given they were committed to the completion of the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he quite agreed with this principle. There were certain difficulties in the way of estimating the final cost of this work.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he agreed fully with the remarks of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson). When the hon. the Minister of Public Works was in Opposition he always insisted upon such information, and he (Mr. Langevin) always endeavoured to give it.

Mr. STEPHENSON said it was understood two or three years ago that the Government would put a sum in the Estimates for the construction of post offices in towns of certain size, such as Chatham, St. Catherines, Brantford, Windsor and Belleville, all of which returned a large revenue to the Department, and were important centres of trade. Besides, they were localities where were stationed Customs and Inland Revenue officers, who collected very considerable sums of money, and, in the event of Government buildings being erected at these points, accommodation could be provided for all the Government officials located there, which would not only serve the public, but facilitate the labours of the officials themselves. He would, therefore, ask if any provision was made for such works in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had not given up the idea he had mentioned, but they only erected public buildings for their own convenience, and not for the sake of any particular locality. The places which seemed most in need of them, having the largest number of officers and the largest revenue, were Windsor and Brantford. The matter was under consideration. The Government was obliged to be as economical as possible. The principal places for revenue and business were Windsor, Brantford, St. Catharines and Belleville; they did a much larger business than Chatham.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I think not.

THE QUEEN VS. WILKINSON.

MOTION TO GRANT LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

"That the petition of J. A. Wilkinson, Publisher, of Bowmanville, for leave of absence to be granted to the Hon. R. J. Cartwright, Minister of Finance, to attend on Tuesday next, the Assizes at Cobourg, to give evidence in the case of the Queen vs. J. A. Wilkinson, be received."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I object.

Mr. BOWELL: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman objects?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

Mr. BOWELL said he had followed, as nearly as possible, the English practice in these matters.

Mr. HOLTON said he thought they had something to say in the matter. It would be manifestly inconvenient in the public interests to permit the

Mr. STEPHENSON.

Finance Minister to absent himself at the present time.

Mr. BOWELL gave notice that he would make the motion on Monday.

MR. CURRIER'S SEAT FOR OTTAWA.

MOTION TO REFER.

Mr. LAURIER said he begged to make the following statement.—

"That it appears from the Public Accounts laid before this House in the Session of 1875, that, some time in the year 1874, the sum of $4,417.18 was paid to the firm of T. W. Currier & Co. out of the public moneys, for lumber supplied to the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. Whereas it also appears that divers sums of money were also paid during the same year, out of public moneys, to the firm of Batson & Currier, for lumber supplied to the Department of Public Works; and that he is credibly informed and believes that he can establish that the moneys paid to the said firm of T. W. Currier & Co. were so paid under contracts and agreements between the said firm and public officers, to wit: the Board of Directors of Penitentiaries; that the moneys paid to the said firm of Batson & Currier were so paid under contracts and agreements between the said firm and the Department of Public Works; and that Joseph Merrill Currier, Esq., a member of this House, was, at the time when the said contracts and agreements were entered into, and the said payments made, a member of each of the said firms, and also a member of this House for the Electoral Division of the city of Ottawa."

Upon this statement he begged to make the following motion:—

"That it appears from the Public Accounts laid before this House in the Session of 1875, that, some time in the year 1874, the sum of $4,717.18 was paid to the firm of T. W. Currier & Co., out of the public moneys, for lumber supplied to the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary; it also appears that divers sums of money were also paid during the same year, out of public moneys, to the firm of Batson & Currier, for lumber supplied to the Department of Public Works; and that Mr. Laurier, a member of this House, has stated in his place in the House that he is credibly informed and believes that he can establish that the monies paid to the said firm of Batson & Currier, were so paid under contracts and agreements between the said firm and the Department of Public Works, and that Joseph Merrill Currier, Esq., a Member of this House, was, at the time when the said contracts and agreements were entered into and the said payments made, a member of each of the said firms, and also a Member of this House for the Electoral Division of the City of Ottawa; it be Ordered, That the matter herein stated, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they be directed to enquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and to report the result of their enquiries; and whether the said Joseph Merrill Currier has vacated his seat ”

In making this motion, he believed it would be proper to abstain from making any comments. He had informed the hon. member that he would then move in the matter.

THE SEAT FOR LINCOLN.

MOTION FOR NEW WRIT—REFERRED.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the other day he gave notice of the following motion of privilege:—

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new Writ for the electing of a member to serve in this present Parliament for the Electoral District of the County of Lincoln, in the place of James Norris, who, since his election for the said Electoral District, has entered into a contract for the public service.”

As far as he could judge from the papers, there was no doubt that this gentleman's seat was vacated. He presumed that the return of contracts connected with the Pacific Railway, which was made on the 26th March, was accurate. It appeared from this return that several parties, of whom James Norris was one, formed the Lake and River Steamship Company, which entered into a contract with the Government. Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co. were the attorneys of the Company, and their power of attorney read as follows:—

- “These presents witness that:
  - 1st. The Lake and River Steamship Company, a body politic and corporate, having its chief office and place of business in the City of Hamilton, and Province of Ontario, proprietors of propellers ‘Lake Ontario’ and ‘Lake Erie,’ herein acting and represented by Adam Hope, Esq., President of said Company, and J. C. Harvey, Secretary of the same;
  - 2nd. John C. Graham, of St. Catharines, in said Province, principal owner of and Manager for the propeller ‘Argyle’ and consort ‘Maggie McRae’;
  - 3rd. Sylvester Neelon, of St. Catharines, aforesaid, owner of the propellers ‘Europe’, ‘Ocean’ and ‘Dominion’;
  - 4th. James Norris, of St. Catharines, aforesaid, owner of the propellers ‘Scotia’, ‘Clinton’ and consort ‘Grimsby’; “5th. And D. Butters & Company, of Montreal, owners of the propellers ‘California’, ‘Columbia’ and ‘Canada’.

The constituents herein have constituted and appointed, and do, and each of them doth hereby constitute and appoint, Messrs. "JAMES DOUGLAS,
"Mayor of the Town of St. Catharines."

Here was a contract, executed in the most formal manner, between the Crown, on the one part, and a co-partnership of individuals, of whom the hon. member for Lincoln was one. It seemed it was not a matter of doubt at all, and that this motion was a proper one for him to make. If there were any doubt that the James Norris mentioned in the papers was the hon. member for Lincoln, it was a matter which might fairly go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but if there was no such doubt it appeared to him the motion was a strictly proper one. Under those circumstances he moved the motion of which he had given notice.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had chosen to make a motion different from that which was made a moment ago in the case of another hon. member, who, it was alleged, was also a contractor with the Crown. He thought it would have been better had the hon. gentleman followed the example set by the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier), and sent this where the other case was sent. The hon. gentleman did not allege that he knew personally that this was the same James Norris. The hon. gentleman had not named a distinct allegation, nor had he even said that he was prepared to prove the case which he believed to exist; he had only produced certain papers which primâ facie perhaps bore out to some extent the conclusions he had arrived at. He thought it better that a motion should be made to send this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and he would, therefore, move:

"That all the words after 'that' in the said motion be expunged, and the following words substituted therefor:—The attention of the House having been directed to a statement, that James Norris, member for the Electoral District of Lincoln has entered into a contract for the public service, the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to enquire into the said allegation, report the result of such enquiries, and whether the said James Norris has vacated his seat."

Amendment agreed to, on a division.

THE SECRET SERVICE MONEY.

MOTION TO ADOPT REPORT.

Mr. YOUNG moved the adoption of the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said when this subject was before the House previously, he had occasion to explain everything that he considered affected himself. The statement he made then had since been extended into evidence before the Public Accounts Committee. He had nothing to add to what he had said before the Committee. He considered that the report did a great injustice to the late Government and a still greater injustice to himself and an hon. gentleman who was in another branch of this Legislature. But he left the matter altogether to the House and afterwards to the country.

Mr. CHARLTON said he was sorry that the right hon. member for Kingston entertained the opinion that the report just presented to the House was unjust to himself or to any other person. The object in drawing the report was to arrive at a conclusion which the country would accept as a conclusion arrived at free from partizan bias or partizan prejudice, and a conclusion that was borne out by the facts. So far from the report doing an injustice to the hon. member for Kingston, or any other member, it seemed to him that it erred, if it erred at all, in not having characterized certain transactions as they should have been characterized. The report alleged that certain irregularities had existed in the management of the Secret Service Fund. He proposed to call the attention of the House to some of the irregularities that had been disclosed in this investigation. The first was as to the fact that entries made in the Public Accounts, ostensibly representing sums of money expended on Secret Service, were, not on one or two occasions, but on every occasion, incorrect, and calculated to mislead the country. As a specimen of the general incorrectness he would instance the first entry, which represented that an expenditure of $15,086 had been made for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1868, but the bank account showed that there had been an actual expenditure of $21,991 during that period. And the irregularity was, that $8,398 of monies belonging to the late Province of Canada, was appropriated to the Secret Service Fund without the authority of Parliament, without even the authority of an Order in Council to do so. Another irregularity was an utter disregard of the provisions of the Orders in Council with regard to the expenditure of this money. The terms of the provision in this respect would be shown by the language of the first Order in Council, directing the deposit of Secret Service money to the credit of the Sub-Committee of Council, which was identical in its provisions with all subsequent Orders in Council, and which directed as follows :—

“The Committee of Council respectfully recommend that the sum of fifty thousand dollars be appropriated of the vote for Secret and Detective service for 1868, and that a warrant do issue in favour of the Receiver General, with directions to place the same on special account with the Bank of Montreal, in the names of the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Militia, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Internal Revenue, whose certificate that the same or any part thereof has been disbursed for the service of the country shall be a sufficient discharge and voucher for the payment of the same.”

But in not one instance was the expenditure of money certified by vouchers of the Sub-Committee of Council. And the irregularity was the fact that $15,584, belonging to the Secret Service Fund, was diverted from the fund and applied to purposes not warranted as expenditure for Secret Service purposes. Another irregularity was the fact that in no case were unexpended balances at the end of the fiscal year returned to the Treasury. At the end of 1868 there was an unexpended balance of $28,900; in 1869, $3,379; in 1871, $50,754; and in 1872, $47,000. These unexpended balances should have been treated as lapsed balances. The Sub-Committee had no authority under the law to expend them without a revote of Parliament. Another irregularity was, that in the first years the sum had been placed at the disposal of the Sub-Committee for Secret Service, the Government professed to give in the Public Accounts the expenditure annually made of this fund and the balance remaining unexpended; but they departed from that course in 1871. Another irregularity was, that while the Public Accounts Committee in May, 1872, passed a resolution requiring that thereafter there should be a confidential audit of the items, yet the Sub-Committee of Council neglected to provide for such audit and actually destroyed the vouchers relating to all the expenditures made subsequent to the date of that resolution of the Committee on Public Accounts. Another irregularity was, that when the late Government went out of power they neglected to pass over to their successors in office the balance of the Secret Service money then in their hands. The law in relation to this was :—

“If any officer or person has received public money for the purpose of applying it to any specific purpose, and has not so applied it within the time or in the manner provided by law, or if any person having held any public office and having ceased to hold the same, has in his hands any public money, received by him as such officer, for the purpose of being applied to any specific purpose to which he has not so applied it, such officer or person shall be deemed to have received such money for the Crown, for the public uses of the Dominion, and may be notified by the Minister of Finance to pay such sum back to the Receiver-General, and the same may be recovered from him as a debt to the Crown in any manner in which debts to the Crown may be recovered, and an equal sum may, in the meantime, be applied to the purpose to which such sum ought to have been applied.”

This law was violated by the fact that the money was not passed over to their successors in office, but remained on deposit subject nominally to the control of the Sub-Committee of Council. The most serious irregularity was the fact that after Sir John A. Macdonald had ceased to be a member of the Sub-Committee of the Council, after he had ceased to be a Minister of the Crown, he assumed the authority of withdrawing $6,600 for the purpose, as alleged, of paying certain outstanding claims. Another irregularity was the recklessness of the treatment of vouchers. The right hon. gentleman said it was necessary to confide in the fewest possible number of persons, because lives might be involved in the publication of that knowledge. And yet he informed them that on two occasions these vouchers which might implicate persons, and perhaps involve them in disaster or lead to their death, were sent for by some persons, who it was not remembered. The vouchers were taken to the office of the Minister of Justice. What was done with them could not be remembered; who took charge of them could not be remembered; and he was unable to tell whether or not they were destroyed. If it was necessary to conceal these vouchers it was highly improper that they should be treated in such a careless manner. The report stated that the English law and practice applicable to Secret Service moneys, was :

“When money is issued from the pay office to the Secretary of State as Secret Service money, the Secretary of State gives a receipt under his own hand for the money which is issued to him.”

It also recited that :

“(2.) By 22 Geo. III., c. 82, it is provided by section 24, as follows:—And from preventing as much as may be all abuses in the disposal of moneys issued under the head of Secret Service money, or money for special service, be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that it shall not be lawful to issue or imprint from the Exchequer, or order to be paid by a Treasury Warrant, or under sign manual or otherwise, to any Secretary or Secretaries of the Treasury, or to any other person or persons whatsoever, from the Civil List Revenues, for the purpose of Secret Service within this Kingdom, any sum or sums of money which, in the whole, shall exceed the sum of ten thousand pounds in any one year. And it is also provided that when the Treasury issues or directs the payment of money from the Civil List revenues for foreign Secret Service, the same is issued and paid to one of His Majesty’s principal Secretaries of State, or to the First Commissioner of the Admiralty, who shall, for his discharge at the Exchequer, within three years from the issue, produce the receipt of His Majesty’s Minister, Commissioner, or Consul in foreign parts, or of any Commander-in-Chief other commander of His Majesty’s Navy or land forces to whom the said money shall have been sent or given; that the same hath been received for the purpose for which the same hath been issued; which said receipt shall be filed in the Exchequer in order to charge the said Foreign Minister or other officer with the same, and the said receipt shall be sufficient to acquit or discharge the said Secretary or Secretaries, or First Commissioner of the Admiralty in the said account at the Exchequer. And any Foreign Minister or other officer who shall stand charged at the Exchequer for or by reason of any Secret Service money by him received, shall stand discharged and acquitted thereof, if, within one year after his arrival in Great Britain, he shall either return the said money into the Exchequer or make oath before the Barons of the Exchequer, or one of them. And also, whenever it shall be necessary for the principal Secretary of State, or First Commissioner of the Admiralty to make payment of any money issued for foreign Secret Service, or for Secret Service in detecting, preventing, or defeating treasonable conspiracies against the State in any place within the Kingdom, then it shall be sufficient to acquit and discharge the said Secretary or other Minister for him or the Under Secretary of State in the office in which such Secret Service money hath been paid, or the Secretary of the Admiralty, to make out before the Barons of the Exchequer, or one of them, or before the Cursitory Baron.”

The report also recited that :

“Under the Canadian law and Orders in Council and the resolution of the Public Accounts Committee of May 29th, 1872, the practice should have been as follows:—

“(1.) The Ministers in whose names the fund was placed, should have certified that the money paid therefrom had been disbursed for the service of the country.

“(2.) The amount disbursed during the fiscal year should have been entered in the Public Accounts for the year, as expended for Secret Service.

“(3.) The amount unexpended at the end of the fiscal year, remaining at the credit of the special account of the Sub-Committee of Council on Secret Service, should have been treated as a lapsed balance, under the Act 31 Vic., cap. 5, sect. 28, which, without making any exception whatever, provided that: ‘All balances of appropriations which remain unexpended at the end of the financial year, shall lapse and be written off.’

“(4.) Any moneys standing to the credit of any Sub-Committee of Council on Secret Service, should have been treated as remaining at the credit of the Sub-Committee, notwithstanding any change in the persons of the Ministers composing the Sub-Committee, and thus, in case any such persons ceased to hold office, his interest in or control over the moneys would thereon end, and his successor in office would succeed in his rights and responsibilities in this as in other respects. The same rule would, of course, apply in the case of the resignation of all the members of the Sub-Committee.

“(5.) If, however, it were supposed that owing to the form of the deposit or otherwise, any member of the Sub-Committee retained after his resignation control over the fund, or in case any portion of the fund had been before his resignation placed in the individual control of any member of the Sub-Committee for expenditure, but had not been actually disbursed, such individual could not, after his resignation, have any right to disburse the fund, but would be bound to hand it over to those who had succeeded to his responsibilities.”

By the testimony of Sir William Dunbar before the Public Accounts Committee of the Imperial Parliament, in 1870, it was shown that the mode of discharge provided under Act 22, Geo. III, c. 82, for Secret Service moneys charged upon Civil List Revenue, was taken to apply to the annual votes of Parliament, and had been the course taken for the last 70 or 80 years. By the testimony of Right Hon. Edward Hammond, Under Secretary of State, taken before the same Committee, it was shown that the English practice was “that the (Secret Service money) account of an outgoing Secretary of State is rendered immediately, and then the new Secretary starts with a fresh account, carrying on, as the first item on the debit side, the money which has been transmitted to him by the previous Secretary of State.” (Report of 1870, vol. 10, p 50.) By the Imperial Accounts it was shown that the amount expended for Secret Service was entered in the Public Accounts for the current fiscal year. With regard to the mode of treatment of Secret Service Accounts, he (Mr. Chariton) would refer briefly to British practice. From 1700 to 1782, Secret Service moneys were issued without account. In 1782 the Civil List Act of Geo. III was passed. Afterwards powers were conferred upon Commissioners of Audit to call all public accountants to account. The provisions of the Civil List Act of Geo. III, 1782, regarding discharge, were fully enforced in 1797, when it was discovered that £1,740,000 had been issued and remained unaccounted for. It might be unnecessary to refer at length to the correspondence between the Treasury and the Auditor-General's office, which had resulted in the present satisfactory mode of audit of Secret Service accounts. Regarding unexpended balances, Sir William Dunbar, in his evidence before the Public Accounts Committee in 1870, held that they might and should be surrendered, and the Committee reported in favour of such annual surrender. (Report vol. 10, 1870, p 4.) In July, 1870, during a debate upon Secret Service matters, Mr. Gladstone stated that in future, unexpended balances of Secret Service money should be surrendered to the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year (Hansard, vol. 203, p. 691), and such balances had since that date been surrendered. He had pointed out that, in accordance with Canadian Law, they should have surrendered to their successors in office the unexpended balance of Secret Service money in their hands at the time they resigned. He pointed out that, according to British usage, they should have taken that course. The first finding of the Committee, as shown in the report presented to the House, was as follows:—

“(1.) That the course pursued, and hereinafter specified with regard to the Secret Service moneys, was highly irregular and a breach of the duty of those concerned therein.”

Was that false? Did that do any person gross injustice? In the first place, it could not be denied that the course pursued was highly irregular. It was irregular in not accounting for the money as requested by the Order in Council, upon the authority of which the money was paid. It was irregular inasmuch as the entries made in the Public Accounts were delusive and incorrect. It was irregular because money was drawn from the fund for purposes that were not authorised by the Order in Council placing that money on deposit in the bank. It was a breach of duty, because $8,398 belonging to the late Province of Canada was illegally taken, without the authority of Parliament, without the authority of the statute, without any authority whatever. It was a breach of duty, because the expended balances were not surrendered, were not treated as lapsed balances in accordance with Canadian law. It was a breach of duty as well as an irregularity, because the prescribed form of certificate of expenditure was in no case given. It was a breach of duty, because the account was not closed and the balance of Secret Service money in the hands of the late Government handed over to their successors in office when they resigned. It was a breach of duty, because Sir John A. Macdonald, the member for Kingston, in the ultimate disposal of that fund, usurped the functions of a Minister of the Crown and member of the Sub-Committee of Council on Secret Service matters, in that he assumed to deal with money over which he had no more control than any other private member of the House. The excuse given for the course taken was not a valid one. The right hon. gentleman had no right to assume to carry out contracts which he had made as a Minister of the Crown; whenever he ceased to be a Minister the obligations incurred, whatever those obligations were, passed to his successors. He (Mr. Charlton) held that the first finding of the Committee was not too strong, but was moderate and just; that the Committee was warranted in affirming that the transactions were highly irregular, and that they were a breach of duty. The second finding of the Committee was as follows:

"(2.) That steps should be taken for the recovery into the public chest of the said sum of $6,600."

If, by Canadian law, and by English precedent as well, that money should have been dealt with only by Ministers of the Crown—then the money was illegally withdrawn. If the money was illegally withdrawn, then it should be refunded. It had been shown that the money was illegally withdrawn, and it followed, as a natural conclusion, that the verdict of the House should be that it should require the money to be handed over by those who withdrew it illegally. The third finding of the Committee was:—

"(3.) That no accounts having been kept, and the cheques or papers having been lost or destroyed, a satisfactory audit of the Secret Service expenditure has been rendered impossible."

It had been held that an audit could not be reliable and satisfactory without the proper papers and vouchers, and that it would be useless to attempt to make such an audit. In regard to the fourth finding, with respect to the Auditor-General, the conclusion stated was arrived at by the Committee with great reluctance; but it was felt that the facts of the case rendered it necessary to make some allusion to the Auditor-General, and the allusion had been made strictly in accordance with facts, and the Auditor-General was left to the Government to deal with. With regard to the fifth finding, he apprehended that no question could arise as to the propriety of providing statutory safeguards, in case at any future time it should be held necessary to place in the hands of any Government sums of money to be expended for Secret Service purposes. The Secret Service transactions themselves formed, in themselves, a sufficient argument to prove that some such safeguards would be necessary in the future. With regard to a Secret Service Fund, it might well be doubted whether, under ordinary circumstances, such a fund was necessary in this country. England, with her vast complications of foreign relations, with Ministers at every Court, and Consuls at every commercial city, found it necessary to expend only £20,000 or £30,000 per annum on Secret Service, and it was surely necessary that Canada should expend in that direction a very small sum indeed, if indeed such expenditure was required. He would say, in conclusion, that so far as requiring the amount of $6,600 to be refunded to the public chest was concerned, it would work no hardship to any one if that money had been paid in the service of the country in a proper way. The inference the country would draw from the mode in which the $6,600 was taken from the Secret Service Fund would naturally be, that the right hon. member for Kingston did not care to entrust to his successors the secret of the expenditure of that sum, and that the expenditure was an improper one. Had it been a proper expenditure, why should the right hon. gentleman have hesitated to confide to his successors in office the nature of that obligation against the Secret Service Fund? And if the payment was a proper payment, all the hardships that would be incurred by carrying out the recommendation of the Committee, would be that the amount would be temporarily withdrawn from the hands of those who now possessed it and afterwards paid back to them. If it was an improper payment, whoever committed the impropriety had robbed the State, and to oblige him to refund the money was simply to compel him to disgorge his spoil. He (Mr. Charlton) held, therefore, that the report worked no injustice to any one and that it was, in view of the facts disclosed, absurd to characterize it as either cruel or unjust; that every finding was warranted by the facts disclosed during the investigation by the Committee, and that the House was dealing with a question which required it to place upon record a salutary and truthful verdict, which required it to set the stamp of disapproval on the act of any ex-Minister of the Crown who assumed the right to control public money and to pay out public money, and to carry out contracts which he could only deal with as a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said he had followed the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in which he had stated, among other things, that the report erred in being too mild; that the entries in the bank account were incorrect, that the unexpended balances were not surrendered; that unexpended balances should be treated as lapsed balances. He had referred to the resolution of 1872 as to a confidential audit. He had spoken of vouchers being destroyed, of the right hon. member for Kingston having chequed out $6,600 after he ceased to be a Minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman had read extracts from the report of the Committee on Public Accounts for 1870, vol. 10, page 47; but he had read such portions as told against the right hon. gentleman, and he had not referred to those which told in his favour. He had read extracts from the evidence of Sir Wm. Dunbar, and another important point in the evidence of the Right Hon. Edmund Hammond, for forty years Under Secretary of State. Nor had he referred to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. They found the following from the report of the

“On account of the vote for this service, the first which has been rendered in the form of an appropriation account has been transmitted to this Department by the Treasury for the financial year 1868-9. But I find myself unable to certify to its correctness for the following reasons:—

“1st. Because the account is unaccompanied by any voucher or other documents in support of the expenditure stated to have been incurred.

“2nd. Because the sum entered under the heading expenditure would appear to represent merely “Issues or Advances,” and not actual payments within the financial year in accordance with the requirements of the Appropriation and Exchequer and Audit Department Acts.”

Then followed a lengthy correspondence on the matter, in which it was claimed by the Earl of Clarendon that the position claimed by the Board of Treasury was inconsistent with the provisions of the Civil List Act, was not practicable in execution, and would be contrary to public policy and tend to contradict the principle on which a certain sum of money was placed at the disposal of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for secret services, and, in regard to the application of which, subject always to eventual accountability to the comptroller, and auditor of the exchequer, it was essential that the greatest reserve should exist so as to avoid any clue being afforded as to the particular objects to which that money was applied. It was, doubtless, for this reason that the provision was introduced into the Civil List Act of George III, under which the Secretary of State was not required to account for money paid to him on account of Secret Service within a shorter period than three years after the issue, and that Her Majesty's Ministers abroad were not required to account earlier than within one year after their return to England. Then followed a proposal to separate the Home Secret Service from the Foreign Secret Service, and undertaking that the utmost secrecy would be observed. Then followed this reply from the Treasury:—

“NOVEMBER, 1869.

“I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you, with reference to your report of 31st

March last, and previous correspondence, that their Lordships have had under their careful consideration the subject of the Appropriation account of the vote for Foreign Secret Service, and have come to the conclusion that in voting money for Foreign Secret Service, it was not the intention of Parliament that the disposal of money of this nature should be made the subject of Appropriation Audit. And they are of opinion that the issue of such money by the Treasury to the High Officers of State, to whom its disposal is confided, must be regarded as payment within the 24th sec., 29th and 30th Vic., cap. 39.

"I am to state, further, that the Law Officers of the Crown who have had the matter fully submitted to them for their opinion, have arrived at the same conclusion.

"The accounts of the late Secretaries of State for Home and Foreign Affairs, and of the late First Lord of the Admiralty, transmitted by you to the Department, are returned forthwith.

"JAMES STANSFELD.

"The AUDITOR-GENERAL."

It might appear very strange that he should stand in his place as he did, and address the House on this subject. It might have been supposed that the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition would have risen to address the House on it, but they had not seen fit to do so. He had been returned to the House as an Independent member, and yet he had given every vote he had cast this Session to the Government of the day—not as party votes, but as votes which he gave (however he might differ with others on this point) endorsing the policy of the Government. It might seem somewhat strange that he should occupy the position he did, and yet he felt that beneath this action there were hidden matters that were of the deepest interest to the country. He was present in the House as a member when the first vote was given in the House for Secret Service money, when $50,000 were asked for. He was speaking only from memory, but his memory led him to believe that this was voted with the utmost readiness. The country was in danger when the request was made that $50,000 should be placed at the disposal of the Administration of the day for Secret Service purposes. What did the Act say with reference to this fund? And for what was the money granted? For the detection, prevention and defeating of conspiracies; and he asked if there was a member of the

Mr. McDONALD.

House bold enough to say that conspiracies might not have been detected and prevented and defeated. When they considered the whole amount of Secret Service money that had been spent, was it not within the range of possibility that the detection and the prevention of one such treasonable act might have saved many, many millions, and perhaps the loss of many thousands of lives to the country. He regretted very much the fact that this measure had then come up so unexpectedly, the amount of preparation he had before him, and which was placed in this way, referred him to questions and books, without which he could not lucidly put the matter before the House. He had intended to have read questions 866, 899 and 939, and would plainly say that these questions and answers were in direct conflict with the statements made by the hon. member for Norfolk. The explanation was obvious: the information was taken before the Committee of Public Accounts, and the testimony of the Right Hon. Edmund Hammond was in direct conflict with the testimony of Sir Wm. Dunbar, whose evidence was chiefly read. He had pointed out distinctly to the hon. member for Norfolk the discrepancies in conversation. They were quite obvious to his own mind. Both gentlemen were possessed of strong minds and were fond of their own opinions, and, as these answers indicated, each anxious to maintain his own idea. The Right Hon. Edmund Hammond's evidence was in direct conflict with the statements made by Sir William Dunbar; he spoke of the Secret Service account never being surrendered; and for this reason "inasmuch as that money has been granted for Secret Service purposes." They had taken an oath to expend that money for Secret Service purposes; their oath bound them to spend it for the object for which it was received, and it could not therefore be surrendered. This was one other statement he would have been enabled to show from this particular statement. He did not feel called upon to stand up and defend the right hon. member for Kingston; he was not prepared to blacken a man when he was down. He was not called upon to associate this; investigation with the Pacific Scandal, or with the corruption of constituencies throughout the country, or to question the hon. gentleman's veracity, or to associate this matter with the many black deeds the hon. gentleman was charged with having committed; nothing at all of the kind. There was a certain amount of evidence submitted before the House. It had been charged that day, broadly, and in the plainest possible terms, that the hon. gentleman had misappropriated this money; but he asked any man acquainted with the English language to find proof of it in the evidence submitted to the House. The hon. gentleman said this: that he hoped that in this country there would be no need of Secret Service money. He hoped there might not be such need; but did the hon. gentleman forget that, during the last ten years, this country had passed through a crisis when threatened with the Fenian invasion. Did the hon. gentleman forget that, during all this period of ten years, they had a rebellion in the North-West; did the hon. gentleman forget that, during periods of such excitement and such fear and such trouble, the most delicate negotiations were rendered necessary; and did the hon. gentleman forget that information which might have tended to save the country, would not be given under such circumstances unless received under the pledge of closest secrecy? He desired to dissociate from this matter the right hon. member for Kingston altogether, and the hon. gentleman who to-day filled the office of Prime Minister, fairly and honestly, and with the confidence of the country, as he believed, however much those who sat on that side of the House differed with him in this view; he stated he said nothing but what he firmly believed. He wished only to think of the office of the First Minister itself, and he asked whether they were tending to promote public morality and the public good when they assumed that the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), who was deemed fit by the representative of their Sovereign to form an Administration and carry on the affairs of this country, must be so corrupt that the money invested in, given in, and committed to his charge for the most sacred purposes, he was prepared to pilfer. There was one point upon which he must, as he had stated on another occasion, and in another place, speak plainly. His own opinion was, and yet, perhaps, there were matters in this intricate subject which would seem to throw doubt on this fact, that it would be possibly within the range of possibility that an out-going Minister might not have to account for the funds entrusted to him for three years, and yet, in another place, it was distinctly and plainly asserted that an out-going Minister should hand over—and the word “immediately” was used—the money which he might have received, so that the first entry which might appear with the new Minister might be the money received from his predecessor. He wished to put himself perfectly right, and to meet all the conflicting views that appeared on the subject, and take the one that was most against the ex-Minister whose case was under consideration; and, taking that view, he could not but disapprove of the course the hon. gentleman had adopted in not immediately consulting with his successor in office; and in not immediately making him acquainted with the peculiar nature of the fund, and in not immediately asking him that the obligation which had been incurred, should, through him, be discharged. If he were to fail in doing this, he should be doing the House and himself an injustice. And what did the report say? True, it cited some portions of British precedents that told most against the retiring Minister, but it did not set forth the principles of British precedent and practice which told most in favour of that ex-Minister. It did not give the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England, who held that what related to these matters should not be revealed; and it did not give those views, all of which, he maintained, would tell in favour of the hon. gentleman; and finally, having cited British precedent, which it claimed the hon. gentleman had broken, it closed by saying that it was necessary to have some legislation for the guidance and direction of those who might be entrusted with Secret Service money. Had the considerations of the Committee been confined to the matter of the $6,600, the report would have been less objectionable. If an ex-Minister of the Crown who had been entrusted, as he had before stated, with the most delicate functions, was to be told, after the lapse of ten years, that all these matters were to be brought up and made public before the Public Accounts Committee, this would defeat the very object for which the Secret Service Fund was voted. He had placed his views, though very imperfectly, before the House, and owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case, the labour he had bestowed upon it had been, to a certain extent, thrown away. These circumstances had placed him at a serious disadvantage; but if it should ever happen that this country was involved in trouble, and if it ever came about that the high officer leading the Government of that day, whoever that officer might be, should find it necessary to come and ask the country to put at his disposal a sum for Secret Service to secure the safety of the country, for the prevention, for the detection, and for the defeating of conspiracies, then he should be glad that in this Legislature he had raised his voice, holding that the integrity, and the honesty, and the purity, and the patriotism of such a Minister ought to be a guarantee for his right and faithful discharge of that sacred duty.

Mr. YOUNG said he had had no intention of saying a single word with regard to the report of the Public Accounts Committee submitted to the House, had it not been for the way in which the hon. member for Kingston had characterized it as cruel and unjust to him. The hon. gentleman did not raise such strong objections when before the Committee, and instead of the report being open to such criticism he did not believe that there was any hon. member who was present and heard all the evidence who did not believe it was one of the mildest reports, considering the facts, that had ever been submitted. When the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) himself submitted a report to the Committee, in which it was admitted that the conduct of the right hon. gentleman was illegal and irregular, he thought hon. members opposite were debarred from claiming that the statements in the report were unfair or overstretched. The investigation was carried on in a very different spirit to what leaders of the Opposition had shown in their attacks on the Government in this House. They had drawn upon their imagination more than upon facts and made charges which were largely unfounded; but the large majority of the House had firm faith in the honesty and ability of the hon. gentleman who controlled the affairs of this country. A very different spirit was manifested by the majority of the Public Accounts Committee. They calmly considered every point, and had brought in a report so true to the facts that not a material point was challenged. That was the very best evidence that the report was drawn in a fair and judicial spirit. There was very little difference of opinion between himself and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) on several points which he had brought forward. The hon. gentleman told the House that in England the granting of the Secret Service money was considered as a payment of it, and that the money in this instance might have been used to prevent conspiracies. No one denied that. It was really not pertinent or material to the point at present under consideration. The hon. gentleman said it had been charged against the hon. member for Kingston that the money had been misappropriated—the hon. gentleman even used the word pilfered. He (Mr. Young) was not aware that any one had made such a statement as that; but he did not think that the hon. member for Centre Toronto would deny that when this money was chequed out of the Bank of Montreal by a gentleman who had ceased to be a Minister of the Crown, and had no more control over it than any person walking the streets of Ottawa, the constitutional practice was broken by the act. The hon. gentleman would not deny that this was a great breach of duty. He (Mr. Young) could imagine no greater offence than a private individual, who had ceased to be a Minister of the Crown, to undertake to cheque that money out of the bank. What were the facts in the case?

Mr. McCALLUM asked if the hon. member was in order, having lost his right to speak in not doing so when he made his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER said, on looking over the authorities, he was satisfied the hon. gentleman was out of order. When the mover of a motion of this kind did not choose to speak at the time he made the motion he (Mr. Speaker) thought he had lost the right to address the House.

Mr. YOUNG said he felt bound to submit to Mr. Speaker's ruling, and he thanked hon. gentlemen opposite for the generosity they had shown at the very beginning of his remarks. No doubt they were glad of the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. WORKMAN said this question was one which ought to be treated with a great deal of coolness by the House on account of the high position which the hon. gentleman concerned had for a long time occupied. To him it was a very simple question indeed, and he would like as much as possible to divest it of the complication which had been attempted to throw around it by hon. gentlemen who had spoken in this House and before the Committee. A great many English authorities had been quoted on this subject, but to his mind it was quite unnecessary to go to those authorities at all. He had the honour of occupying a seat in this House when certain sums were voted for Secret Service, and the audit of this money came up before the Committee on Public Accounts, and formed a very important question of discussion for one or two years. After a great deal of discussion and debate, on the 23th May, 1872, the following resolution was unanimously passed by the Committee, and presented to the House the same afternoon:—

“That inasmuch as such large sums as $75,000 have been voted for Secret Service money, of which there is no audit as in the case of other expenditure, this Committee is of opinion that an account of all sums hereafter spent for Secret Service should be kept, as in England, in a book specially prepared for the purpose, and that this book should annually be inspected by a confidential Committee, of whom two shall be members of the Opposition of the day.”

That resolution was passed and agreed to by the Ministry of the day, and it ought to form the basis on which this transaction should be viewed. But what was the case? The late Government remained in power for eighteen months after the passage of this resolution, but so far as he was aware, there was no audit of this fund. About a year afterwards the Government resigned, and left office with a considerable balance of Secret Service money in the Bank of Montreal, unknown to their successors. What was the straightforward, honest course of the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) under the circumstances? Looking at the matter in a business way, it was his duty to have gone to his successor and stated to him candidly and openly: “There are $35,000 Secret Service money in the Bank of Montreal. It is true there are certain amounts that I believe are pledged for certain settlements, and I wish to get your advice and consent to the settlement of those accounts, as the rightful legal custodian of the money.” That would have been the honest, straightforward and correct way in which to have acted. But what was the fact? This large sum of money was allowed to remain in the bank, and negotiations were carried on with the Auditor-General without the consent or knowledge of the responsible Ministers of the day, and after a certain amount of negotiations—he scarcely knew an appropriate word in the English language by which to characterize them, but in the United States they would use the word “dodging”—by some arrangement, the Auditor-General was induced to write a letter to the manager of the Bank of Montreal, by which the hon. member for Kingston was enabled to draw $6,600 from the bank unjustly, illegally, and entirely unconstitutionally. He thought that was a position which would not be defended for a moment; to his mind the whole transaction was illegal and unjust. He thought the report was at fault, inasmuch as it did not deal strongly enough with this transaction. It could not be said that the right hon. gentleman was ignorant of the usages of the law and the constitution; no man was better acquainted with the laws and usages that ought to govern retire-ing Ministers, and no man, therefore, could escape less from the blame than the right hon. gentleman under these circumstances. It appeared to him that when the hon. member for Kingston said the report was a cruel injustice to him, he was a little ironical. He (Mr. Workman) thought the hon. gentleman had perpetrated a cruel wrong on his country. When he looked over the account, he found that, from 1866 to 1871, about $115,000 were spent for Secret Service purposes; the whole amount voted was $140,564. Now, they did not ask for an audit of that amount; they did not ask for particulars; but they claimed that the money had no right to be withdrawn from the bank by the hon. gentleman, as his legal authority over the fund had expired. He, therefore, thought this report would receive not only the approval of this House, but the approval of a very large majority of the people. He hoped that one result of the investigation would be the arrangement of some satisfactory and proper audit of all Secret Service moneys hereafter granted. He hoped, however, it would never be necessary to make any grant, as he believed a great deal of the money that had been paid was paid to improper parties. Not that he wished to say the Government of the day had improperly paid it, but a great many people got up reports about Fenian invasions and other troubles in order to extort money from the Government.

Mr. ROCHESTER: The hon. gentleman, I think, is drawing on his imagination for that statement.

Mr. WORKMAN: No, sir, I am not; I know it to be the case. If there had been any complications in the nature of conspiracies when the late Government retired, it was their duty to communicate them to their successors. The Queen thought the present Ministry competent to succeed the former, and they were, therefore, competent to be the executors of their business, and the custodians of the public money, public confidence and the secrets of the Administration. It was, therefore, entirely wrong that this money should be withdrawn without the consent of the Ministry of the day. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) said he did not wish to blacken the character of the hon. member for Kingston. He hoped that no hon. gentleman wished to blacken the character of that hon. member; but in doing so they would not follow the example the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) set in his crusade through the country last summer. What was the hon. gentleman's course during the whole of that crusade? It was one systematic attack of the grossest, of the most irregular nature on the character of the Administration and members of this House—most unjustifiable and disgraceful attacks on gentlemen who were not present to defend themselves. In proof of that he would read from the Toronto Mail what the right hon. gentleman said of him (Mr. Workman) at South Simcoe on the 27th June:

"In the House, Mr. Workman moved his resolution with regard to the tariff; and Mr. Mackenzie and all his Government voted against it, and Mr. Workman had to sit down, having been elected under false pretences; and there he would still sit voting for the Government, and eating humble pie, and pointed at by every man in Montreal who voted for him as a cheat and a swindler."

That was the language which the right hon. gentleman used in reference to him behind his back. A copy of the newspaper was sent to his wife in order that this might be seen. He immediately wrote to the right hon. gentleman asking him if this was a correct report of what he had said, and requesting an immediate answer; but the right hon. gentleman never answered the letter. He could go on a public platform and denounce a man who was not present as a cheat and a swindler, and yet he would refuse to answer his letter. What was the natural result of such conduct? Why, at the first place he met the right hon. gentleman, it would have served him right to knock him down. That would treat him as he deserved to be treated, and would be the natural result of such conduct. He could tell the right hon. gentleman that, instead of being pointed at as a cheat and swindler, he had received the thanks of gentlemen who voted against him for the straightforward, manly course he had pursued during that very Session; and he had letters from half a dozen gentlemen of as high position as the hon. member for Kingston, commending his action. As the right hon. gentleman has refused to give any explanation, he thought it right to mention the matter now and place himself right before the House. He could tell the hon. gentleman that if such language was to be used by a gentleman occupying such a high position, the result might soon be disastrous to the peace and welfare of the country; it would bring us back to the state of society which existed in the Southern States, and at Washington, when one member went up and struck another on the floor of Congress, and injured him to such an extent that his life was despaired of, and the offence was not so bad as that of which he complained. If hon. gentlemen opposite indulged in pic-nics, they should bridle their tongues so that they might use the language of gentlemen, and not that which characterized low and disreputable dens of infamy.

Mr. SPEAKER said when he decided the point of order against the hon. member for Waterloo, he did not understand that the hon. gentleman was exercising his right to reply. The rules of the House gave the hon. gentleman the right to reply. This was one of the cases in which the hon. gentleman would have the right to reply. He had thought the hon. member was continuing his original speech.

Mr. YOUNG said when he had been called to order he was noticing some remarks which had fallen from the hon. member from Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald). He must say, whilst no one had a greater respect than he had for that hon. gentleman, he could not share his judgment in the manner in which he had spoken of the report. A gentleman to whom the House looked as the very highest authority as to constitutional matters, and with regard to the practice in England,—the Librarian, had stated that in every essential particular this report was in accord with English practice. It had been drawn with the greatest possible care, and could not be charged with unfairness from a constitutional or Parliamentary point of view. In 1872 he (Mr. Young) was struck with the large amounts taken for Secret Service by the Government of the day. There might have been, and no doubt was, some necessity for a Secret Service Fund. But the amount was large. On looking at the Public Accounts he saw that $175,000 in all were taken out of the public chest, of which $149,420.96 were actually spent. It was a remarkable fact that not a single precaution was taken by the late Government to accord with English practice, or to keep any record of the money whatsoever, or to leave any trace as to how the money was expended. He did not refer to the production of receipts of persons who had received money, but to the fact that there was no system of auditing whatever. It could not be denied that hon. gentlemen opposite were fully acquainted with English practice, yet there had not been one single safeguard adopted in the disbursement of the money. In England, as was well known, a record was kept of all moneys that were expended; and he would ask why the right hon. gentleman had departed from the practice in that respect? Then the right hon. gentleman at a time of great political commotion, during the crisis of 1873, went to the Bank of Montreal and got complete control of all the vouchers that had been given in connection with the expenditure, and afterwards they were either destroyed or placed where they were not forthcoming. It was therefore out of the question to characterize this report as being extreme. In England there were two Departments which controlled the matter of expenditure, the Exchequer Department and the Treasury Department. When a Secretary of State required a portion of the grant he sent an order to the Treasury, which made an order upon the Exchequer Department, and the money was then paid to the Secretary of State. He gave his receipt or voucher for that amount to the Treasury Department. This money, as a rule, went to Ministers in foreign countries, who, when they returned to England, were required within one year to make oath before a Baron of the Exchequer that they had expended the money in the way it was intended, for the interest and benefit of the country. Such a course ought to have been pursued in this country. Instead of that, however, no record whatever was kept. Furthermore, it was found that the late Government took the whole grants in some cases out of the hands of the Auditor-General at one time, instead of taking them by sums as they were required. In 1871, when the vote of $75,000 was taken, it was all taken out of the hands of the Auditor or the Receiver-General, and it was written off in the Public Accounts as if the whole amount had been expended. When this matter was brought before the Public Accounts Committee by him (Mr. Young) in 1872, it was unanimously agreed that for the future no amounts should be paid out that were not audited by a Confidential Committee, on which should be two members of the Opposition. So that all money paid after 1873 should have been audited, but they had not. He could not admit it was possible to get rid of this duty, which had been unanimously approved by Parliament, by saying that the obligations had been contracted before 1872. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that this fund had not been abused, that it had not been used for political or any other improper purpose, he must say the hon. member for Kingston had not acted with his usual astuteness. He was unable to understand the course which the hon. gentleman had pursued, if those were the fact. No other reason whatsoever could be imagined why, when the change of Government took place, the hon. member for Kingston should not have transferred the $32,000 to the incoming Government, and have left them to settle with parties who had claims. And it could not be overlooked that $6,000 had actually been paid since the change of Government took place. The House was also informed that $600 were yet to be paid by the hon. member for Kingston to the hon. member for Compton. They knew what that service was, and, with all desire to be charitable, could not but look upon it as a suspicious circumstance, that while a statement was made as to this claim, nothing could be elicited in regard to the $6,000 paid to Senator Campbell. He did not wish to be understood to say that this $6,000 was spent for improper purposes, but in the light of recent developments respecting the Northern Railway, if such were not the case, there should be a full statement as to the purpose for which this money was paid. The most important point was the violation of the constitution, which had been of the gravest character, in that money belonging to the Crown had not been chequed out by the Government of the day, the responsible advisers of Her Majesty, but by a private individual, who had ceased to be a Minister of the Crown. It was impossible to acquit the hon. member for Kingston of a knowledge of the gravity of the act he performed when he signed that cheque. As was known, Mr. Drummond had told the Committee that he raised objections to paying this money on the ground, that the sanction of the Government of the day ought to have been obtained in some way. No attempt was made by the hon. member for Kingston to get that sanction. Such were the facts brought out before the Committee on Public Accounts, that it was absolutely necessary to assert the true constitutional doctrine—that no money belonging to the people of Canada should be expended unless with the approval of the sworn advisers of Her Majesty. When they knew that a wrong had been done it was their duty to set it right, and it could not be set right without the $6,600 unlawfully chequed out, were returned to the Public Exchequer. After that was done, the Government would, no doubt, be prepared to settle all proper claims. He had no desire to say anything that was unkind or uncharitable. When he moved the adoption of the report he did not intend to say one single word; but he could not sit silent and hear an hon. gentleman characterize the report as cruel and unjust, when he (Mr. Young) felt sure the public would consider that it did not characterize with sufficient severity the irregular and illegal proceedings referred to.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS COMMITTEE.

MOTIONS TO EXAMINE ON OATH.

Mr. IRVING moved :

“That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to whom it has been referred to enquire into, and report upon the facts in the Reports, Returns, and vouchers laid upon the Table, touching the payment of public monies to the Hon. T. W. Anglin, Member for the Electoral District of Gloucester, for printing and stationery for the Post Office Department, should be examined on oath.”

Motion agreed to.

Mr. IRVING moved :

“That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom it has been referred to enquire into, and report upon the allegation that James Norris, Member for the Electoral District of Lincoln, has entered into a contract for the public service; and whether the said James Norris has vacated his seat, should be examined on oath.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Does the hon. gentleman move that as Chairman of the Committee?

Mr. IRVING: No; as an individual member.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think it would have been more proper for him to have the consent of the Committee.

Mr. BLAKE said a similar motion had been made before. The question was whether it were the the sense of the House that the examination should be under oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had a right to make the motion, but he thought it was an extraordinary thing that the Chairman of that Committee should make the motion without consulting it.

Mr. BLAKE said the law under which they were acting was passed last Session; it was a new law, and there was no practice under it. He saw no convenience, however, in compelling the Committee to meet and report before a motion of this kind could be made.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. IRVING moved :

"That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom it has been referred to enquire into and report upon the allegations of Mr. Laurier, a Member of this House, in his place, this day made, that Joseph Merrill Currier, a Member of this House for the Electoral Division of the City of Ottawa, was, at the time of a certain contract, entered into between the firm of T. W. Currier & Co. and the Board of Directors of Penitentiaries; and at the time of a certain other contract entered into between the firm of Batson & Currier and the Department of Public Works, and in respect of which contracts public monies were paid to the said firms for lumber supplied, he, the said Joseph Merrill Currier, at the time of the making of the said contracts and the said payments was a member of each of the said firms, and of this House; and to report whether the said Joseph Merrill Currier had vacated his seat, should be examined on oath."

89. Improvement of navigable rivers ..... $34,500

In answer to Mr. MASSON,

Mr. MACKENZIE said the sale of chains had been advertized, but there seemed to be a difficulty in getting a price. It had been in contemplation to remove them to some other part of the country, in order to get a sale.

Mr. BLAKE.

In answer to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think they would want all this money, but they had to take the vote in case they should require it. They had the power to sell chains and anchors under the Act of 1874. The Harbour Commissioners had them in charge to realize the most that could be realized; but, even if nothing were realized, it would be absolutely necessary to take them out of the harbour of Quebec. They hoped, in about a year, to clear out the greater portion of the obstructions. The expenditure last year for this purpose was a little over $1,200; it might, or might not, reach the same amount this year; but they intended to clear the river while they were at it.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked if it were intended to devote any money to the improvement of the Saint Andrew's Rapids, in the Red River.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was impossible to answer the question, because they had no precise information as to those rapids. Instructions had been given to have that place surveyed, in order to ascertain what it required to make the necessary improvement.

Mr. CIMON asked for what the first item, $10,000, was intended.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no details to give. It was designed to meet cases which might occur, but which were not at present expected.

Mr. CIMON said he would be glad if the First Minister would pay some attention to the constituency of Chicoutimi, which he represented. Petition after petition had been sent from it seeking for improvements which were desired on the River Saguenay. He had called the First Minister's attention to the fact that dredging in the river was necessary, but no attention was paid to the request. The trade of the port in question was very large and it was yearly increasing, and it suffered severely owing to the fact that these improvements, which would cost very little, had not been made. He believed that his constituency was neglected because he opposed the general policy of the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman ought not to say so. He

(Mr. Cimon) would find, if he looked at the votes, that the largest votes were expended in constituencies which always were represented by Conservatives. They were obliged, owing to financial circumstances, to avoid all expenditure which was not absolutely necessary. Petitions were frequently received for improvements, but they were not always complied with, of course. For instance, such a petition had come from his own county, but no vote was, on that account, granted. He asked for the forbearance and indulgence of constituencies represented by hon. gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House, as they had a good deal of difficulty in making the revenue and expenditure meet.

Mr. MASSON said the Premier was always open to conviction. For instance, a couple of years ago, a vote of $27,000 had been made for the County of Charlevoix, in answer to an appeal from Mr. Tremblay, then its representative. A great future was before the Saguenay region, which was possessed of a fine climate and excellent facilities for settlement. He was not sectional, but he hoped that the First Minister would decide upon improving the navigation of the River Saguenay.

Mr. BERTRAM said that sometime last Fall, a steamboat had stuck fast for two or three weeks on a boulder in the river near his constituency. He was not inclined to be sectional, but it seemed to him that constituencies of Western Ontario hardly received fair treatment in the expenditure of the public money. The steamboat proprietors had spent a considerable sum of money in improving the navigation of the river in question, and, though he had asked for aid in removing these boulders from the Government and was refused, he would now again ask the Government to take this matter into consideration.

Mr. TROW said that glowing accounts had been received before the Committee on Immigration and Colonization concerning the Saguenay section. He had been surprised to learn that a large tract in that region was suitable for settlement and that its climate was preferable to that prevailing around Quebec. The only difficulty in the way of settlement, was the want of communication, and a little encouragement in this direction from the Dominion Government would be of great advantage. The land about the Saguenay was arable and fertile, and he hoped that the Government would aid any enterprise which would benefit the section in question.

Mr. BABY said the climate of the Saguenay was very fine, and there was a great future before that part of the country. Its trade was increasing year after year, and he hoped that money would be expended in improving the navigation of the river.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he again begged to remind the House that improvements were urgently required in the River St. John, which was the principal river in the Province of New Brunswick, and the second, he believed, in the Dominion. It ran for over three hundred miles through British territory, and it branched into the State of Maine. Fredericton was situated about eighty miles from its mouth, and this was the head of the deep water navigation. The trade done on the river was increasing annually, and vessels sailed from it to the United States, and to the West Indies. Last year 59 large and 640 or 650 small vessels were discharged at, and distributed from, St. John, and he hoped that the Government would find it in their power to do something for this particular river during the present Session. The Local Government, prior to Confederation, had employed a dredge in it, but this dredge had since been handed over to the Dominion. The expenditure of only a moderate sum was required to keep it navigable for vessels of from 8 to 12 feet draft. This was an extremely important matter. He would be perfectly satisfied if the Government would do what they could in this matter.

Mr. DESJARDINS said he must thank the hon. member for Perth for taking the broad ground that he had in regard to the River Saguenay. If the river was improved as suggested, it would lead to considerable settlements in that section and give it the importance it ought to possess on account of the quality of its soil and resources.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he concurred in the views expressed in regard to the desirability of improving this river. It would not require a large amount of money to make the river better for purposes of navigation. There was another point to which he desired to call attention. A steamer grounded last season five miles above Father Point, and he suggested the propriety of sending a dredge there to deepen the channel.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the vessel alluded to grounded during either a snow storm or fog through having got out of the channel. There was no difficulty at all on account of the water.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he believed that some little improvement in the upper portion of the Saguenay would undoubtedly lead to a large settlement in that section.

Mr. MACKENZIE, said of course, nothing would give him greater pleasure than to be able to spend money on the various districts which hon. gentlemen had mentioned; but it would be seen from what he would read that such expenditures had increased, and that there must be restrictions placed somewhere. In 1868, 1869, and 1870 hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then in power, did not spend a dollar on the improvement of rivers. In 1871, there were spent $4,983; in 1872, $2,985; 1873, $20,180; 1874, $49,432; 1875, $100,916; 1876, $49,098. On harbours and rivers there were spent, in 1868, $8,627; 1869, $4,142; 1870, $2,796; 1871, $21,351; 1872, $178,312; 1873, $351,699; 1874, $351,606; 1875, $436,955; and 1876, $605,700. This showed a progressive increase to an alarming extent in the expenditure for public works, many of which were formerly wholly maintained by local efforts. It was quite evident that they must, to a considerable extent, restrict this expenditure as far as possibly could be done, consistently with that regard to life and property which the creation of and protection of harbours might fairly represent. His hon. friend behind him spoke of the River St. John. It was important, no doubt, to the trade of the interior of New Brunswick that a greater depth should be got in the river, but at the same time there was no danger to life and property from the water being shallower than it was desirable to have it. The dredge, however, had been kept down there doing nothing else but clearing the river. The only way of keeping down the expenditure was by refusing votes, except in cases where great harbours which were essential to the trade of the country were to be protected. Thus, for instance, for the last two years there had been building a breakwater at St. John at a cost of $224,000; but that harbour was pretty much the only important one in New Brunswick. If he saw any absolute necessity or possibility of meeting the wishes of the hon. gentlemen, the Government would take the matter into consideration. It seemed impossible at present to meet all the demands for dredging rivers when only local benefit was proposed.

In reply to Mr. PLUMB,

Mr. MACKENZIE said the United States authorities had voted over $1,000,000 for the improvement of navigation on Lake Huron, within their territory. That Government had made a proposition for joint improvements to be undertaken, and the Canadian Government had replied that they would pay for the improvements proportionate to the marine of Canada frequenting the waters. No arrangement had been come to, however. There was not much to do at the Neebish Rapids, and it was thought the vote of $15,000 now asked for, would be sufficient to complete the improvements in the channel traversed in common by the vessels of both nations.

Mr. DEWDNEY remarked that the Cowichan River, B.C., for which $1,500 was asked for the removal of obstructions as a navigable river, was not a navigable river. He remembered signing a petition to the Ottawa Government to remove some obstructions, so that logs could be floated down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he understood, from the report of the Engineer that the Cowichan was navigable.

Mr. MITCHELL said he noticed that there was no appropriation for the Miramichi River, N.B., for which he would like to know the reason. He did not think it fair that the improvements on the St. John River should monopolise all the money for the navigable rivers in New Brunswick. There were six dredges in the Dominion, and three of them were placed at the St. John River. For ten years he had been endeavouring to get the harbour at the mouth of the Miramichi dredged and made safe for vessels. Last year a dredge was sent there at the end of July, but it was taken away at the beginning of October. If the river were dredged for two seasons, vessels drawing 21 and 22 feet of water could go up. Last year there was a grant of $3,000, and, paltry as this was, he hoped it would be renewed. He entirely approved of the vote of $15,000 for the removal of chains and anchors. The hon. the First Minister had stated that the Government could not sell those that had been raised on account of dealers having combined for the purpose of securing them at a low rate. But this was not the reason. In Great Britain no vessel could leave port without having her anchors and chains tested, for which a certificate was given; and as the Government did not certify to the anchors and chains which they removed out of the St. Lawrence, dealers would not buy them. He would suggest that they be sent to Liverpool or London and tested, or else means should be provided for testing them at Quebec. If this were done, and certificates were issued, he had no doubt the anchors and chains could be sold.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not necessary that anchors and chains used on the lake steamers should have certificates attached.

Mr. MITCHELL said those raised from the St. Lawrence were not suitable for lake steamers.

Mr. McLEOD said as far as his judgment went there was no necessity for the appropriation asked for by the hon. member for Northumberland. There was little necessity for dredging Miramichi River bar compared with the need for the works in different parts of New Brunswick. That bar was covered by about 20 feet of water, and the vessels frequenting the river were about 500 tons burthen, drawing 16 or 17 feet, and, therefore, there was no immediate necessity for dredging operations being prosecuted there. He remembered endeavouring to obtain from the late Government an appropriation for the improvement of Richibucto Harbour. The then hon. the Minister of Marine said such could only be done on imposing an extra tonnage tax on vessels frequenting the port, and an additional tax of ten cents per ton was afterwards imposed. A similar appropriation was afterwards given to Miramichi, but the tonnage dues were allowed to remain at two cents per ton. That was a sample of the partiality shown by the hon. member for Northumberland. He hoped the hon. the Premier would send a dredge to a place where there was more necessity for it than at Miramichi River.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the Miramichi had been blocked with logs last year for the first time during the memory of the inhabitants.

Mr. DEWDNEY said there was a dredge lying useless in British Columbia which might be transferred to the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. COSTIGAN advocated the claims of St. John River, and said it was entitled to receive full and fair consideration at the hands of the Government. He considered the upper portion of the river should be improved. This was the only claim they had on the Dominion Government, who had assumed the responsibility of improving river navigation. It had been overlooked, however, and they had been left entirely out in the cold. Not one dollar, to his knowledge, had been spent on the upper portion of the river since the accession of the present Government to power, though it was better entitled to such expenditure than the lower part of the river, where large sums had been spent. He did not think any difference existed among hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick on this point. Every other county in the Province had railway communication, and they had been obliged to contribute to the building of those railways; but their only means of communication had nevertheless been neglected. He hoped that a moderate sum for the improvement of the upper section of St. John River would be placed in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. FERRIS said he did not think that St. John River had had its fair share of public money. The expenditure of $20,000 or $30,000 a year on it yearly for a few years, would, no doubt, enable large vessels to reach Fredericton. It should have some little consideration. The inland counties received a very small share of public money.

Mr. DELORME enquired whether the improvement and dredging of the Richelieu River towards Lake Champlain was to be continued during the present year.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had to remove some boulders a little above the dam, and maintain the ordinary depth of water. Dredges would be sent there very early in the season.

90. Public Buildings, Ontario $52,500
91. Public Buildings, Quebec.. 40,000

Mr. SCHULTZ said an item under the heading of Roads and Bridges, Lake Superior and Red River route, had been dropped. The sum of $25,000 was asked under it last year, and he desired to learn whether this or an increased amount would be brought down in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are not keeping up the road at all.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he understood, when the vote was asked for last year, that it was required in part for a traffic bridge, to afford facilities for a depot on the Pembina Branch of the Canada Pacific Railway. He thought that the Premier had then denied that it had any connection at all with the Lake Superior and Red River route. The late Government had on two occasions voted under this head, $50,000, and the present Administration, during the first year of its existence, voted the same sum, though it was reduced to $25,000 the year following. A bridge of some sort was very necessary; and if a railway bridge could not be had at Winnipeg, a traffic bridge at least should be built.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. DESJARDINS asked what had been done regarding the excavations for the Examining Warehouse at Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would enquire and give information on this point on Monday or Tuesday next.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Is this Examining Warehouse occupied?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not.

Mr. LANGEVIN; How far has the work progressed?

Mr. MACKENZIE said about $20,200 was required; but, as there was a small balance on hand, he thought that $17,000 would be sufficient for the purpose. The balance due on the contract on the 1st of January was $32,140, and $35,600 would be required for fittings, heating and machinery. The architect's commission was $4,000, and other items rendered necessary the expenditure of $11,500; total needed, to date, $82,600. It was estimated, however, that $17,000, the new vote, would be sufficient to cover the entire expenditure.

Mr. LANGEVIN: What was done with the $110,000 voted last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It will all be expended on the 30th of June.

Mr. LANGEVIN: What is the $20,000 set down for fortifications at Quebec required for?

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was difficult to state precisely what was to be done, but walls and casemates were to be repaired in Quebec and Point Lévis. At the latter point, the buildings, which were unfinished, had not been built suitable for our climate. The sum of $20,000 would be necessary for this purpose.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he had mentioned last year that the vote of $5,000 in this connection was wholly insufficient. Instead of $20,000, $30,000 or $40,000 were now likely to be required. Prompt expenditure would save money, as the longer decaying buildings were neglected, the greater were the damages which were sustained.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the repairs needed were general in their character. The $3,000 set down for Grosse Isle would, in part, be used to build a large shed that had been blown down some time ago. He had examined the fortifications in question, and he was satisfied that no more than $20,000 would be necessary for these repairs.

92. Public Buildings, North-West Territories..... $30,000

Mr. TUPPER asked if this expenditure was at Battle River.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was.

Mr. TUPPER said he thought the expenditure made at Fort Pelly would be to a large extent thrown away.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think so. They did not intend to keep a large force at the seat of Government, because it would be flanked on the north-east by Fort Pelly and the main body would be at Fort McLeod generally.

Mr. MASSON asked how many Mounted Police were at Fort Pelly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Somewhere about 70 men.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether it was the intention of the Government to expend this amount by asking for tenders for the work or to do the work themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they could not do it any other way than it had been done.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that he thought the Premier was committing a very grave error in not doing the work in the ordinary way by contract. The evil of the present system was shown in the case of the Fort Pelly Barracks, where the buildings had been built hastily, badly, and out of green, unserviceable lumber, and the consequence was that they were now utterly unfit for the purposes for which they were intended. The site was badly selected in the first place; selected without a knowledge of the locality, and placed in a position most unfit to be the centre of Government of the Territory, and equally unfit for the location of any portion of the Mounted Police Force. Notwithstanding these facts, no less a sum than $33,966.94 was to be found in the Public Accounts in connection with this utterly useless public work; and while it was true that the Lieutenant-Governor has passed the winter in one of the buildings, yet it was perhaps due to the exceptionally mild character of the winter that they had not heard of a frozen official in that region. Now, it appeared that they were asked to spend a large amount for buildings at Battleford, and it would seem they would likely have similar results. The site had been hastily chosen—chosen without any knowledge of the physical surroundings of the place; and it may be, when the country is better known, that its locality has been chosen as badly as was the site of the Fort Pelly Barracks. However, this was not the point that he wished specially to arrive at. The point was whether it was better, in the interest of the country, to spend these amounts in the North-West without the safeguard of proper tender and contract. It would be found that the effort to build up this place by a Government agent had already been a partial failure. The Premier having faith in his brilliant schemes of utilizing the magnificent water stretches of the North-West, and believing the representations of the hon. member for Selkirk that the Saskatchewan was a navigable stream, ordered, or at least permitted, the transportation at very great expense of one of the boats of the Dawson Route from Lake of the Woods to the Red River. There the machinery was put in, and the boat steamed through Lake Winnipeg to ascend the Saskatchewan and be employed upon its upper waters in connection with the lumber supply of Battleford. What was the result? This magnificent water stretch of the Premier's, this navigable river of the member for Selkirk, could only float the twenty ton boat in question about sixty miles above St. Andrew's Lake, and there she stuck and had to be left. He thought that while it cost much to do it, yet, perhaps, this expenditure was repaid in demonstrating the utter fallacy of the so-called magnificent water stretches of the North-West, and save thousands in absurd and futile attempts to economize them, when to do so delays the building of the railroad, and keeps out the colonization which must take place if there was a way of getting into the country. He (Mr. Schultz) could not allow the item to pass without entering a protest against the proposed manner of expending it, and trusted that this reckless expenditure of public money in the North-West would cease, and these public improvements made in the usual and only safe form of public tender and contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not admit the impropriety or bungling the hon. gentleman referred to.

Penitentiaries.

95. {	General Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces	117,000
	St. Vincent de Paul.....	16,000
	British Columbia Penitentiary .....	7,000
		<hr/> $140,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces was built in the vicinity of Dorchester; the land, about 600 acres, and the buildings on it, costing about $14,000. The contract was originally let at about $120,000. There had been expended, or would be at the end of the financial year, about $82,000. The amount now asked would about finish the work.

Mr. LANGEVIN: How much will the whole work cost?

Mr. MACKENZIE: About $150,000, besides the account of the Architect. The amount for St. Vincent de Paul was altogether a re-vote. A wing had to be built, and a part of the building used as a chapel had to be adopted for the purpose of confining prisoners. Last year $20,000 was asked for, of which $4,000 was expended, leaving the $16,000 to be revoted. The vote for the British Columbia Penitentiary was simply required for its completion.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked whether the building was erected where it was intended, at New Westminster.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. SCHULTZ.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Will it be occupied at the end of the year?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes. It is proposed in the future that the votes for the several Penitentiaries should be taken separately.

Mr. DESJARDINS remarked that the warden had recommended that the cells be increased to 300, and that there be provisions for the classification of the convicts.

Mr. MACKENZIE said these recommendations had been met. Most of the work on the Penitentiaries was preformed by the convicts, where practicable and safe.

		<hr/> Total.....

Mr. MACKENZIE remarked that the price of gas was higher in Ottawa than in any other city in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL pointed out the large expenditure in respect to Rideau Hall, as shown in the Public Accounts, viz.: $36,506.92, besides the $5,000 for fuel and light. He thought we should go back to first principles, and that the Executive should not be so extravagant in such a young country.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he agreed to a very considerable degree that it was very desirable that the expenditure should be sharply looked after, but much asked for this year was for the maintenance of the grounds. When the present Government came into power the expenses in this Department were $60,000, so that there was now a considerable decrease.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is surely wrong in saying that the late Government paid $60,000.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he could prove his statements by the Public Accounts. Much of the amount asked for now was for permanent improvements.

Mr. MITCHELL said there was another item somewhere else of $10,000 for gas and fuel. In his opinion, though he was not able to substantiate the statement, the cost, including salary and expenses, must be something like $130,000 a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this vote was asked for taking water-pipes from the city across the river, and up to the buildings, and they would save a good deal of money upon that, though the original outlay was heavy.

Mr. MASSON asked what part of the furniture and heating was for Rideau Hall.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the expenditure was all over; there was none at Rideau Hall out of that. Last year they had taken $10,000 for Rideau Hall for the specific purpose of erecting some buildings, and making some repairs. This year they did not intend to spend any money there, except on some ordinary repairs in the house, which they took out of the general vote. So there was a reduction, not of $12,000, but of $22,000.

Mr. MASSON said he hoped the Premier did not think he objected to making that building worthy of the country. The Government should do everything they could to keep up the establishment in a manner worthy of the country; and of the high personage the Crown sent to this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE said if those amounts seemed somewhat extravagant, there was a great deal of what might be called, not extravagance, but munificence, in the way in which the house was maintained inside.

Mr. MITCHELL said this was all very fine talk. His hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) talked about the maintenance in a proper manner of the house of the representative of Her Majesty, and the Premier talked about the munificence which characterized the establishment. He acknowledged the advantage of finding a generous man at the head of that establishment; but when they found $3,000 in one item alone, and $2,000 for gas, and $5,000 for fuel and light, $525 for shovelling snow, scattered through the Public Accounts, it was difficult to find out what the establishment really cost. The building alone did not cost less than $50,000 or $60,000 a year. It was all very well to talk about munificence, but the country wanted a more economical administration of affairs. It was the duty of this House to endeavour to lessen the expenses when the country was suffering, as few countries have suffered, from depression. It would be better if the premises were torn down, and a house far more economically built here or on Major's Hill, which would cost much less. He was glad to hear that nothing was to be done in the way of permanent improvements this year. Everything that had been done disfigured the building. If $70,000 or $80,000 would pay for the whole thing he would be satisfied with it, and would think we got off cheap, but he did not think $150,000 would do it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I think my hon. friend is astray.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will you give us the information in the Public Accounts?

Mr. MASSON said he thought the cause of the great expenditure on Rideau Hall was owing not so much to the inhabitants, as to the bad disposition of the building.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said it was never meant to be a Vice-Regal residence. He had travelled a good deal, and had seen our establishment at Rideau Hall, and his idea of it was that it was badly built, difficult to keep, and, looking at the interior fittings, he thought there was nothing more than was required. It would have been far more advantageous for us if we had had a better building.

Mr. MITCHELL asked the Minister of Finance to compile the expenses of Rideau Hall.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the bulk of the information was in the Public Accounts, and there had been considerable reduction. In 1873-4, $50,000 was expended for a similar purpose for which $36,000 was now asked.

Mr. MITCHELL: What was it in 1874-5?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I cannot say.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the Minister of Finance, in comparing this expenditure with the year 1873-4, should remember that at that time the Government were building a reception room, a new building altogether. The expenditure was large, as it was a large and good building. He agreed to a very great extent with his hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) in reference to this item. They were bound in honour to pay the salary fixed by Parliament to the Governor General, but they must give him also a proper residence, in accordance with his high position, and that must be properly furnished. As new buildings had been added to that building they had to be furnished and kept up, and therefore the expenditure was increased under that head. This sum of $5,000 for fuel and light was put in the Estimates for the first time in 1872, because they found that the expenditure was such that it was out of the question to expect the occupant of that residence to pay it out of his salary. If that residence were only for the use of the high personage who inhabited it, it would be a different thing; it was not only so, but to receive the distinguished men who visited the capital, and Parliament assented unanimously to the placing of that item in the Estimates. It was necessary to place the grounds in order in winter as well as in summer. These expenditures were absolutely necessary, and he did not think that any body could find fault with them. It was true, it was a large sum of money, but we could not have a Governor-General without paying for his residence, and his salary, and his fuel and gas, and he believed they also paid for the water. He did not know how the water was now furnished.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said this particular item of $5,000 was simply for the purpose of introducing water from the waterworks.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was for laying the pipes. The Water Works Commissioners paid a proportion of the five-inch pipe to enable them to take water to the village of New Edinburgh if they desired to do it. The Government had made an arrangement for the supply of water, whereby the Commissioners supplied Rideau Hall and grounds, and the Post Office, etc., for the sum of $9,000 a year. There was a contract which had been laid on the table in due form for that, and they were able now to dispense with the engine. The water seemed to have cost a good deal for all the buildings, but they found the exact cost for these buildings alone to be something like $5,000, and the supply was very difficult to obtain. They felt that it cost them probably in the neighbourhood of $7,000 on the average at the very least, without counting the price of a new boiler which they would have had to get next year, the old engine being inadequate. The Commissioners demanded, in the first place, $10,000 for the buildings on the Hill alone, and adhered to that demand. He (Mr. Mackenzie) broke off the negotiations and determined to make arrangements for new waterworks of their own, and, at last, the Commissioners proposed to furnish Rideau Hall and these buildings for $9,000 a year, which the Government decided to accede to.

Mr. LANGEVIN said it was a large sum, but he thought, under the circumstances it was a reasonable sum. Though they might pay extra, it was worth it, for the officers and Ministers themselves should have good pure water. The water before was very bad, and a number of officers and members of Parliament had contracted diseases by using it. Last Session members of Parliament contracted diseases which brought them to their graves from the foul air, bad water, and, perhaps, late sittings contributed to that result. The sum of $9,000 was a very reasonable one, especially when water was not only to be furnished to these buildings but to the East and West Blocks, and also to the Post Office and Rideau Hall.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was for the workshops and every building they had or might have on their own ground in the City of Ottawa. Although the amount seemed large, it was smaller than what was charged in almost every other part of the Dominion. They had to pay for a building in Halifax, $600 a year; and if they applied this figure to the size of these building and Rideau Hall, they would find that it was, at least, one-half dearer than the charges here. The waterworks in this city had cost an immense sum of money, and water was necessarily dearer than in other more favourably situated cities. All private citizens paid a larger amount in proportion than the public, compared with the value and size of their buildings.

Mr. TUPPER wished to call attention to an error in the Public Accounts, which was calculated to mislead. On page 24, under the head of Rideau Hall, entries for rent, repairs and furniture incorrectly appeared. The items with reference to Rideau Hall, began on page 262.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the expenses in this relation had amounted to $120,000 per annum, and this was more than the country could afford and more than had been intended in 1867. Hon. gentlemen opposite had then urged that the $50,000 for salary should cover everything except $5,000 for fuel.

Vote agree i to.

97. Harbours and Breakwaters,
Ontario ..... $28,500

Mr. BROWN said he hoped that the Government would see the necessity of expending something on the channel opposite the harbour of Trenton. The municipality of Belleville had expended all they felt able to give, he did not doubt, on this object—$36,000. Six boats daily and other boats called there.

Mr. GREENWAY said the municipality in which the harbour of Bayfield was situated had expended large sums on it. Further expenditure was now required, and it was represented to him that $2,000 would be sufficient to protect the work already performed.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked for explanations regarding three new items.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, as to the $12,000 for Kincardine, a heavy storm had last year torn away the whole north-west side of the pier. The local authorities had exhausted their powers of taxation, but a Bill had been passed this Session to enable them to levy additional rates, tonnage dues, which it was thought would enable them to maintain the harbour in future. They had already expended about $50,000, and the Government $35,947 on it. Mr. Kingsford estimated that the repairs now required would cost from $16,000 to $18,000. The local authorities would find the balance. He did not know much about Trenton, including Nigger Island, but it was at the head of the Bay of Quinte. The work here, he believed, was entirely dredging. The vote was $4,000. The village of Newcastle had spent on its harbour $46,000, and had never received any public money, and the pier was now somewhat dilapidated. The village was utterly unable to afford any more taxation for this purpose, and the vote proposed was $5,000. In cases where people had taxed themselves so very severely it was fair to ask for a small sum, not to create any new works, but simply to aid in maintaining existing works. The revenue of this harbour was about $2,500. A vote of $2,500 was asked for Morpeth on Lake Eric, solely on condition that the Municipal Council of the place should give as much more for the purpose. He was informed that about $10,000, received in the distribution of the Ontario Municipal Loan Fund, had been placed at the disposal of the Council to this end. The Local Council had, many years ago, spent $12,000 or $14,000 on Bayfield Harbour; and in 1874, to put it in complete repair, Parliament voted, he believed, $33,000, on condition that the village would give another $10,000 in cash. The Government had spent nearly the whole sum and obtained the $10,000. Further improvements were required; and having had a conference with the municipal authorities about them, it was agreed to assist them in doing a certain amount of work. This village was taxed very heavily indeed, having expended not far from $30,000 on the harbour. He was informed by the Chief Engineer that the outlay of a comparatively small sum, to fill up a breach at the end of the pier, a distance of sixty yards, would effectually secure the harbour. He thought this could be done out of the vote for general repairs.

Mr. BOWELL asked whether Newcastle Harbour was in the hands of a private company.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that the Municipal Council owns it.

Mr. BOWELL: I was under the impression that it was owned by a company.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps; I will not be absolutely certain on the point.

Mr. BOWELL said unless the principle of granting subsidies was adopted, it would be well to strike out all such votes. Two or three years ago a very large amount was granted to the private company which owned Oshawa Harbour, when, he had good reason to know that the property was paying a very large dividend. It might be for good and sufficient reasons, but it did seem strange that when the representative of the constituency changed, the sums in the Public Accounts appeared to change. After the defeat of the late Mr. Cameron in South Ontario, a sum was put in to assist in improving and extending the breakwater, &c., in the Oshawa Harbour, when it was paying to the stockholders no less than 16 per cent. annually. He stated this on the best authority. He did not think that money could be more properly expended than in improving inland navigation, but it was not right to expend public money on private property, which was paying a very large dividend.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he quite admitted that; but he had heard, for the first time, that the harbour was paying a dividend.

Mr. BOWELL: I said so at the time this grant was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was represented to him very differently. When private companies were interested in this way they often relieved the Government from expending money for improvements or maintenance. He could only say that no part of this vote would be expended until they were perfectly satisfied on the point raised.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he thought the Government ought to take the Belleville, Napanee and Picton harbours into favourable consideration. He noticed there was nothing provided for them in the Estimates.

Mr. HORTON asked the hon. the Minister of Public Works if he intended to put a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to complete the improvements on the Goderich Harbour, which, in its present condition, was unsafe.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was quite sufficient shelter at present in Goderich Harbour for vessels going in. No doubt a great deal of dredging could be done to advantage, but he must point out that their duty was simply to afford shelter and not water-ge, and the Government thought Goderich Harbour could stand without an additional estimate this year.

Mr. FARROW said if the hon. the Minister of Public Works could see his way clear to extend the present pier at Port Albert a little, it would accomplish all the inhabitants desired.

Mr. MACKENZIE said at Belleville the water was very shallow, and it was very difficult to maintain the depth. What was wanted was a little dredging, which they hoped to accomplish to some extent. Considering the efforts the people had made themselves, it was nothing but fair the Government should render them a little assistance.

Mr. MITCHELL said it looked very suspicious that the constituencies of the supporters of the Government monopolized the grants in his Province. He hoped to do away with this anomaly if the Government would consent to give something to Miramichi Harbour.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this could not be done, as the work was not necessary.

Mr. STEPHENSON said before this item passed, he begged to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the fact that there was no life-boat, or, indeed, any Government boat, supplied to the lighthouse-keeper at the Rond

Eau Harbour of Refuge. Such a boat was very much required there, not only for the accommodation of the light-house-keeper, but was absolutely required in the public service, for it was well known that every season, more or less, vessels were stranded on the Point, and frequently lives were lost and valuable property sacrificed, which, in the future, might possibly be avoided, were the proper appliances given to the Government official there, to meet any such distress as might arise.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was pleased to have this matter brought up, and promised that this case should be looked into, and a life-boat supplied as soon as possible.

Monday, 16th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

IMPROPER USE OF FIRE-ARMS BILL.

SENATE AMENDMENT CONSIDERED.

Mr. BLAKE moved the first reading of the amendment made by the Senate to the Bill relating to the improper use of fire-arms. He said that the additional clause entered by the Senate, provided that nothing in the Bill should affect any soldier, sailor or volunteer in Her Majesty's service, or constable or policeman carrying loaded pistols in the discharge of his duty.

Amendment read the first time.

Mr. BLAKE moved that the amendment be amended by inserting the word "or" after the word "sailor."

Motion agreed to.

Amendment read the first time and the second time, and concurred in.

THE QUEEN VS. WILKINSON.

MOTION TO GRANT LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOWELL said that, as a matter of privilege, he took the present opportunity to move the motion of which he had given notice on Saturday last, for leave of absence to the Hon. R. J. Cartwright, to attend the trial of the Queen versus Wilkinson.

Mr. SPEAKER: How does the hon. member make this a question of privilege?

Mr. BOWELL: As a matter affecting, not the seat, but the right of a member of the House to attend on a subpoena served upon him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not given the matter any consideration; but I cannot, at present, look upon it as a question of privilege.

Mr. BOWELL: It must be patent to the House that, if it is not moved now, it cannot be made at all so as to be of any use, as the trial is set down for to-morrow, the 17th inst.; and as it is not probable that I can reach it in the regular order until next Monday, if it is not a question of privilege—as I claim it to be—I think it is a question, as affecting a member, which should be raised in the House. Of course, I bow to your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am quite satisfied, at this moment, that it is not a question of privilege. I will think it over, however.

Mr. BOWELL: I will let the matter stand until to-morrow or this evening.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman will look up authorities, showing how it is to be regarded as a question of privilege, I will be obliged to him.

Mr. BOWELL: I have looked up May, as to the right of giving leave of absence to a member of the House, but I cannot say that I have referred to the particular point you have called attention to. I did not suppose that there would be any particular objection to the motion.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

QUESTION.

Mr. TROW asked whether it was the intention of the Government to abolish the collection of postage from the publishers of newspapers in the city, town, and county of publication.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: The Government has no such present intention.

THE ENGLISH MAIL TRAIN.

QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL asked why it was that the mail train which left Halifax on the arrival of the British steamer did not carry and deliver an English mail for Miramichi and other important centres of trade and commerce along said line.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: In answer to my hon. friend, I will say that if the postal points indicated by him, or any other points of importance, have not been served by this train, the reason probably is because the system is a new one; and if it should be found that any accommodation such as has been hinted at in my hon. friend's question can be given next year, it will be looked into. The only reason for its not having been done probably is, that the way mails have not been given so much attention to at first as other mails.

QUEBEC JUDGES' SALARIES.

QUESTION.

Mr. BROOKS asked whether it was the intention of the Government to take any steps during the present Session to increase the salaries of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and of the Superior Court for the Province of Quebec, and particularly those residing in the larger districts or any of them, so as to make them equal to the income of the Judges of the Superior Courts in the Province of Ontario from whatever source obtained; or to bring in any measure increasing or altering the salaries of such Judges.

Mr. BLAKE: The Government has no such intention.

MAIL SERVICE IN THE COUNTY OF BRUCE..

QUESTION.

Mr. GILLIES asked whether it was the intention of the Government to extend the mail service twice a day to Paisley, Port Elgin and Southampton, as at present enjoyed by Walkerton; and if not, why not.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: In answer to that question, I may say that it is not the present intention of the Government, and the reason is, because it would cost a great deal of money.

SLIDE-MASTERSHIP OF BLACK RIVER.

QUESTION.

Mr. FARROW, in the absence of Mr. Wright (Pontiac), asked whether it was proposed to make any alteration in the Slide-mastership of the Black River, County of Pontiac; and if so, for what reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE; I am not aware of any change that is to be made. There is a complaint, however, that the present Slidemaster, Mr. John Anglin, has absented himself last summer from his work; and if that is true, there will be a change.

Mr. TUPPER: Unless he shows good reasons.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course.

LOGAN'S FARM AT MONTREAL.

QUESTION.

Mr. DESJARDINS asked whether it was the intention of the Government to transfer any portion of Logan's Farm, at Montreal, for the benefit of the educational institutions there and if so, to what corporation, what portion, and what extent of the said farm, and on what conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I presume the hon. gentleman is aware that the Government sold to the Government of Quebec a quantity of land for the purpose of building a Normal School, but I am not aware of any other application except that; and it was settled some months ago.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SURVEYING STAFF.

QUESTION.

Mr. BUNSTER asked whether it was the intention of the Government to cause instructions to be given to the Engineer-in-Chief of the Canadian Pacific Railway Survey to have the surveying staff about to be sent to British Columbia during the present season, retained in the Province until such time as all work on which they may be engaged shall have been completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No instructions as yet have been given for the season, but we only expect work to continue during this season. We expect the work to be completed, the Fraser River and other routes being practically settled and completely surveyed already.

IMMIGRATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. BUNSTER asked whether it was the intention of the Government to include in the Supplementary Estimates about to be submitted, an appropriation proportionate to that made in favour of other Provinces, in favour of encouraging immigration to the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are no appropriations for any of the Provinces. The appropriation is a general one.

HOMESTEAD SETTLEMENT—RAILWAY RESERVE.

QUESTION.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether it was the intention of the Government by Act of Parliament or Order in Council to allow of homestead settlement in what is known as the Railway Reserve in the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry that the Minister of the Interior is not in his place, but I may say that it is not the intention of the Government to have any Act passed during this Session for regular settlement on these reserves; but as to the precise mode of permitting settlement in the reserves the Government have certain powers. The matter has been under their consideration, and it will continue to receive the attention it deserves.

TRANSPORTATION OF MOUNTED POLICE, EMIGRANTS, ETC.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. MCCARTHY moved for all orders and instructions made or issued from the Departments of Justice and Immigration directing or referring to the route of travel to be followed by the Mounted Police and Emigrants for Manitoba and the North-West during the years 1874-75 and '76; and for a statement shewing the amount paid for the fares of the Engineering Staff and other employees on the Pacific Railway Survey, for the Mounted Police, for Emigrants and any other persons whose fares were paid by the Government per Lake Superior Line and the Beatty Line respectively during the years 1874-75 and '76; also for freightage for the carriage of goods and supplies by said lines respectively during the same period, and statement shewing separately the amount paid for any of the above persons who, although carried from or in the neighbourhood of Collingwood, were sent over the Beatty Line via Sarnia. He said he had intended to propose this as an amendment to the motion made by the member for North Simcoe on Easter Monday, but, unfortunately, he was not present. He understood that on that occasion the hon. the Minister of Public Works said no instructions were issued as to the route to be taken by employes. It had been the subject of great complaint in the town of Collingwood, that since the hon. the Premier assumed the direction of public affairs, that the Mounted Police, emigrants and employes of the public service had almost invariably been sent to the North-West by the Sarnia line of steamships, instead of a fair proportion by the Collingwood line. If there were no instructions issued, he did not understand how it was that one line got so much more of the Government trade than the other. He found from the Public Accounts that last year the Sarnia line received $3,348.52 for this service, while the Lake Superior line only received $1,228.20. From the same Accounts for 1875-6, he found that the Beatty line were paid $6,452 for the carriage of emigrants to the North-West, while the Collingwood line received nothing whatever. He maintained that, as far as the distance was concerned, the advantage was considerably in favour of the route per Collingwood, and there was no reason why the Sarnia line should be favoured to the exclusion of the other. It was extremely important in the interests of the country that both lines should be retained, and that the Government patronage should be fairly distributed between them. But the Collingwood people complained of more than this. They complained that on two different occasions, when engineers were in that town waiting to go by the Collingwood line of steamers, they were ordered to go by the Sarnia line of steamers. He found also that on the 29th June the following letter was written to an employé of the Public Works Department, who was in charge of a party going to the North-West:—

“ On the other side you will find a list of the firms from which supplies for the parties employed by you this summer are to be purchased, and you will be careful to see that nothing they can supply is purchased elsewhere, the prices of course being reasonable; and you will also have the kindness to send the parties to Thunder Bay by the Sarnia line of steamers.

“ Yours truly,

They were obliged to accept the statement of the hon. the Premier, but it appeared from this that such instructions were given and closely followed out, and that the Collingwood line had in consequence been virtually starved.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the great body of the police, including horses and equipments, were sent out by rail, and took no boats at all. He reiterated what he had said before. He had not given instructions in favour of the Sarnia line, nor was he aware that any such instructions had been given. A good deal of the extra traffic of the Sarnia line ought to be accounted for parties going direct on the Grand Trunk Railway wharf at Port Edward. So far as he was aware, the Collingwood line got a larger amount of work from the Government during the last few years than the other; but whether or not, it was a matter not controlled by himself, and no instructions had ever been given by him in favour of the Sarnia line.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be interesting to know what kind of management there was in the Departments of Justice and Public Works when such a letter could be issued without the knowledge of the chiefs. Mr. Rowan was a high and most respectable officer who stood well in the confidence of his Department and the Government. He was a man of caution and prudence, and would not give an order of this kind without instructions from somebody. Among the men from whom supplies were purchased, were Adam Hope & Co., Chas. Cameron & Co., Simpson, Stewart & Co., Angus Sutherland, John J. Mackenzie. He had no doubt that every one of those men were strongly opposed to the election of the two hon. members for Hamilton. The issuance of such instructions was an act of disinterestedness that he had never seen equalled by any Government, and it would be interesting to know who was responsible for the order. It was ordinarily supposed that the best way to get supplies at reasonable time was by tender, but here were instructions to purchase directly from certain parties. This might form the subject of a little inquiry by the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Kingston might wish to obtain information as to who furnished supplies in 1872 and 1873. He took the responsibility for 1874, 1875 and 1876, but who was responsible for the orders given in those former years? The supplies then were, of course, given out by contract. The present Government had made a practice of receiving quantities of staple supplies by tender.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) said when the hon. leader of the Government was elected he promised to raise the standard of public morality; he pledged himself to the public tender system. But the hon. gentleman now wished to shield himself by saying he had simply done what his predecessors did. That was not reform, or if it was it must be called dishonest reform, and he thought the country was pretty well sick of such reform. The hon. the First Minister should be consistent and not try to defend his acts by saying other people had done likewise; he should stand up like a mechanic, like a man, and defend himself, instead of saying "I only did what you did."

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had been for weeks trying to get information with regard to the Intercolonial, but could not. Money had been spent of which no trace could be found, and contracts had been given without tender. He knew of a firm in St. John which had supplied 100 tons of spikes without any tender, which were not required, they being kept in store for a long time.

Mr. SPEAKER called the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he hoped when the papers came down it would be found that the hon. the Minister of Customs had nothing to do with a Government contract.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) rose to a point of order. He distinctly denied that he had a contract with the Government.

Mr. PLUMB said it was surprising and very significant that when the Government were attacked, they always replied by pointing to transactions of the previous Government. This was a sign that the Government were sensitive upon the matter. When the papers came down, he hoped it would be shown how far the present Government had carried out their programme of reform and economy.

Mr. TROW said the discussion seemed very refreshing. It boded the close of the Session when hon. gentlemen opposite had so exhausted their plans of attack, that they had to give their attention to a few pounds of tea and pork supplied to the West. He was surprised at the statement of the hon. member for Cardwell, with reference to emigrants. Most of them went by Collingwood although Sarnia had nearly twice as many boats. He thought the hon. gentleman would discover that Collingwood, boats had a larger proportion of the trade than they were entitled to.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF MR. CURRIER.

Mr. CURRIER rose to a question of privilege and read the following, addressed to Mr. Speaker:

"OTTAWA, 16th April, 1877.

"The Honorable the Speaker of the House of Commons, Ottawa:

"SIR,—I have the honour to state to you that on the 12th instant I received notice from Mr. Laurier, a Member of the House, that he intended to make a statement on the floor of the House to the effect that firms of which I was a member had entered into contracts or agreements with the Government or Officers thereof for supplying lumber, which statement the honorable member made in the House on the 14th instant, and thereupon the said matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

"Until the receipt of that communication I was not aware that the business transactions therein referred to had taken place, and I never personally took any part whatever in reference to them or any of them.

"I have, however, now ascertained, on enquiry into the circumstances, that the firm of T. W. Currier & Co. (of which I was at that time a partner, though not an active one) on 21st May, 1874, received an order from the Director of Penitentiaries for goods for the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary amounting to $4,777.10, which were supplied in June, 1874, and paid for in July, 1874. I also find that the firm of Batson & Currier, of which I am a member, fulfilled several small orders for lumber for the Library of Parliament between January, 1874, and 1875, amounting in all to $357, but in each case without my personal cognizance.

"Being advised that I may have by these transactions unwittingly vacated my seat in the House of Commons under the provisions of the Independence of Parliament Act, I feel it my duty to notify you of the facts for the information of the House, and to place my resignation in your hands.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

(Signed) "J. M. CURRIER."

"TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FOR THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

"I, Joseph Merrill Currier, of the City of Ottawa, in the Province of Ontario, Lumber Merchant, who was duly elected a Member of the said the House of Commons for the Electoral Division of the City of Ottawa, do hereby declare my intention to resign my seat in the said House of Commons, and do hereby resign the same.

"As witness my hand and seal this 16th day of April, 1877.

(Signed) "J. M. CURRIER. (L.S.)

"Witnesses,

(Signed), "HECTOR CAMERON,
"ALONZO WRIGHT."

He said he felt it due to himself to state in his place in the House that until he received the communication from the hon. member for Arthabaska, he had no knowledge of these transactions. After receiving the notice, he enquired into the facts, and found, as he had written, that the statement made by the hon. member was substantially true; and not wishing to hold his seat while there was a doubt as to his right of doing so, he had arrived at the conclusion to tender his resignation.

(Mr. CURRIER then withdrew.)

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa County) said with the permission of the House he would like to say a few words. This was certainly one of the most painful moments of his life. For 13 years the hon. gentleman who had just quitted his seat had sat by his side. Old members of the House would remember the peculiar circumstances which existed at Ottawa at the time of the removal of the seat of Government. The place was a new one and crude in every respect; and the special object of his hon. friend and himself was to try and make things as pleasant to the members as possible. A more kind, amiable and honorable gentleman never existed than the hon. gentleman who had just tendered his resignation. Every one in the House would believe that the hon. gentleman stated what was strictly true when he said he knew nothing of these transactions. Every one who knew him knew that his word was to be implicitly relied upon. He (Mr. Wright) thought it unfair after the Government had purchased this lumber from the hon. gentleman's firm without his knowledge, they should use that fact as a means of unseating him; and it was an especial act of cruelty to give him so little notice. He himself (Mr. Wright) had asked the hon. gentleman who brought in the motion for one day's delay, and the hon. gentleman would have been pleased to do so, but he could not go in opposition to the will of the Government. The Ministry would not allow time to be granted. Considering how fairly and faithfully he and his hon. friend stood by the hon. the Premier at a time of some difficulty and under very trying circumstances, when they might have played a sharp political game had they desired to do so, he did not think the hon. gentleman had been treated properly. He did think that a day's respite might have been given him before the hon. gentleman had been placed in his present awkward position. In adopting the course he did, the hon. gentleman had acted in a fair and gentlemanly manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had no right to charge the Government with having anything to do with the matter. As a matter of fact, he was not aware of the transactions until some members called his attention to the entries in the Public Accounts. He quite agreed with what the hon. gentleman had said regarding Mr. Currier, and he had given him credit for his good qualities on many occasions. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wright) must be aware of the ferocious disposition manifested towards other hon. gentlemen who had been supposed to have violated the Independence of Parliament Act—attacks which were extraordinary, savage and unprecedented. In those cases, hon. members were not to be allowed to have trial. But this was not the case here; the hon. member was not called upon to vacate his seat, but the matter was simply referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There was a motion to unseat the hon. member for Lincoln without bringing the matter up for trial before a jury. When he ventured to move an amendment to put in a few words of sympathy and kindness for that hon. gentleman, he was greeted with shouts of laughter. Gentlemen opposite seemed to enjoy the predicament in which that hon. gentleman was placed. The whole matter, as to both sides, had given him the greatest possible pain. There was nothing he would not do to assuage the difficulty and pain which the hon. gentleman must necessarily feel under these circumstances. He was sure Mr. Currier knew this very well. He could not conceive how the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright) could make a speech reflecting upon him as he had done.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had the plain permission of the hon. member for Arthabaska to make the following statement. He asked that hon. gentleman if he could give Mr. Currier until Monday to come to a decision. The hon. gentleman told him that he could not without consulting the Premier. He consulted the Premier, who could not give a decision, but referred him to the Minister of Justice. Immediately after, he (Mr. Wright) got a note from the hon. member, which was very laconic, and evidently showing the tone of the Minister of Justice, it stating, "I will go on"; and he did go on. When he spoke of the Government giving the contracts to Mr. Currier's firm, he did not mean the Premier personally.

Mr. MACKENZIE said neither he nor the Minister of Justice knew anything about the contracts. With regard to the motion itself, Mr. Currier had two days' notice.

Mr. WRIGHT: Only one day.

Mr. MACKENZIE said at all events notice was given, and the motion indicated that the matter should be sent to the same Committee as the other cases had been already sent. It was quite right that all the cases should be sent to the same Committee and treated alike.

Mr. LAURIER said he endorsed with much pleasure the statement of the hon. member for Ottawa county, with respect to Mr. Currier. His personal relations with that gentleman had been of the most pleasant nature, and it was with mortification that he moved in the case and adopted that course which duty pointed out. It was no more pleasure to him to move against Mr. Currier than it had been pleasure to the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Bowell) to move against Mr. Speaker, or the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) to move against Mr. Norris. They acted in accordance with their sense of duty. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright), he might state that he first called the attention of the hon. the Premier to the fact that Mr. Currier's name appeared in the Public Accounts as having received money from the Public Treasury. During the recent debate on the motion of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Bowell) he showed the hon. the Premier the item in the Public Accounts. He (Mr. Laurier) followed up the matter, and having investigated it he sent word to Mr. Currier on Thursday last, informing him that on the following day he (Mr. Laurier) would make the statement which he made subsequently. On the following day he met Mr. Currier, and asked him if he had received his note. He said "Yes," and asked him (Mr. Laurier) to defer the matter until the following day. He said he would do so with great pleasure. On the following day he was asked by the hon. member for Ottawa County again to defer action. He replied that he could not do so without consultation. After having a consultation he came to the conclusion that it would be better to proceed with the matter at once. In justice to the hon. the Premier and the hon. the Minister of Justice, he might state that while he took their advice they left the matter entirely to him, and he was moved to act at once as the Session was rapidly drawing to a close, and the investigation by the Committee might otherwise be prolonged until it might, perhaps, be too late to come to a conclusion during the present Session. He was bound and he was glad to acknowledge the courtesy of the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright), who was popular with both sides of the House on that account; but he had gone a little too far in the statement he had made to-day. The hon. member said he would make the statement he had made, and asked for the postponement of Mr. Currier's case another day, to which he (Mr. Laurier) consented. He was not aware that the conversation went any further. The hon. member would agree that he was right in that particular.

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa County) said he intended to ask the permission of the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) to state all the circumstances of the case; otherwise he would not have done it. If he (Mr. Wright) misunderstood the arrangement he regretted it.

Mr. LAURIER said he did not intend to impute intentions to the hon.

member for Ottawa County, but he wished to state the facts. He told the hon. member for Ottawa County, in answer to a request that the matter should be further postponed, that he (Mr. Laurier) must have a consultation on the question. He consulted the hon. the Premier and the hon. the Minister of Justice, who left the subject in his (Mr. Laurier's) hands, and he assumed full responsibility for the action taken.

Mr. CAMERON said the hon. the Premier had contended that the Opposition had acted in a ferocious manner, because they had maintained that the seat of the hon. member for Lincoln should have been proclaimed vacant, and a new writ issued, instead of the case being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the hon. gentleman had further contended that all cases should go to that Committee. He demurred altogether to that proposition; it was not in accordance with English usage, nor was it what was right. In England when a gentleman found that his seat in the House of Commons was liable to be impugned, when he found he had even unconsciously committed a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, he resigned his seat. It was the duty of an hon. member who feared he had committed a violation of the Act to take legal advice, and if his case came within the law, to adopt the course—which was the proper one—adopted by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he must protest against the language of the hon. the First Minister. It was quite uncalled for in reference to the action taken by him (Sir John) in reference to the hon. member for Lincoln. He had placed a notice on the paper that waited for a considerable time, and he had fully followed out the precedent of the Rothschilds' case. He quoted from authorities to show that any member might resign his seat on giving notice in writing of such intention, and that a writ ought to be issued forthwith on such resignation.

Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member had the option of resigning his seat either by a written resignation or an oral statement. He had resigned in the latter mode, and any other resignation would be superfluous.

Mr. IRVING said that if the hon. member for Ottawa City (Mr. Currier) had been guilty of an infraction of the Independence of Parliament Act, then, according to the language of the Statute, the gentleman had no seat to resign. The course to adopt would be to refer the question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ascertain whether Mr. Currier had the power to make such resignation or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member had undoubtedly a right to resign.

Mr. BLAKE said it was provided in the 9th section of the Act that any member had the power of resignation, but the 9th clause provided that no member could resign while his seat was being lawfully contested. In this case the matter had been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to ascertain the truth of certain allegations, and until the report of that Committee was had the hon. gentleman had a perfect right to resign his seat, even although it should be subsequently proven that he had no seat to resign, and that he had had not, in fact, any seat to resign for several years past. This fact, however, did not discharge the Committee of their duties in the investigation of the case, and he presumed the Committee would make the same investigation and report to the House as if the resignation had not taken place.

ROYAL CANADIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

Mr. BARTHE moved for copies of all the reports which the Royal Canadian Insurance Company may have made, with copies of any order requiring the said Company to make such reports: the whole in conformity with 36 Victoria, Chapter 99, Section 16,—and 31 Victoria, Chapter 42. Also, copies of all reports respecting the business carried on by the said Royal Canadian Insurance Company, in the United States of America; the whole in conformity with 31 Victoria, Chapter 48, of the Acts of Parliament of Canada, and the forms B. and C. of the said Acts. He said that a very important amendment of the charter of this Company had been made during the Session, and the shareholders were interested in having the reports published. These reports had not appeared in the newspapers, and he desired that the shareholders should have all possible information on the subject.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had no objection to the motion, but he was not quite certain whether the terms of the Insurance Act required copies to be furnished of the business done by the Company in the United States. If it did, he could give them; but if it did not, he could not.

Mr. BARTHE: The reports are made to the Governor in Council.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Some of them are, I know; but, as to the business of the Company in the United States, I am not so clear. The motion will pass with the understanding that, if the law permits, they will be brought down; and if not, not.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' PILOTAGE TARIFF BY-LAW.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES moved for copy of an Order in Council of 5th March, 1877, approving of a By-law of the Montreal Harbour Commissioners in reference to the Tariff of Pilotage between Quebec and Montreal.

Motion agreed to.

PAYMENT BY STEAMERS AT ST. OURS LOCK.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

Mr. CHEVAL moved for statement shewing the amounts paid by the steamer Chambly and the steamer Cultivateur, at the St. Ours Lock on the River Chambly, during the season of 1875.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SURVEY.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for a statement of the number of miles surveyed and the expenditure for such surveys on the Pacific Railway Survey, as follows:—

"1. The total number of miles surveyed, distinguishing between exploratory or track surveys, preliminary surveys, and location surveys.

"2. How many miles of preliminary surveys, exploratory or track surveys and location surveys have been made on each of the following sections:—

"1st. From the Valley of the Ottawa to where the main line or lines strike that portion of the main line from Thunder Bay to Red River.

"2nd. From Prince Arthur's Landing to Red River.

"3rd. From Red River to Tête Jaune Cache.

"4th. From Tête Jaune Cache to the Pacific Coast.

"5th. All surveys made on Vancouver's Island.

"3. The cost of the above descriptions of surveys between each of the above points."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course, as I stated formerly when the subject came up about a similar matter, the exact cost cannot possibly be given, but only an approximate estimate of the cost of the particular classes of the surveys. One survey may be very costly and another very cheap, and as the cost, I presume, is not divided up or an account kept regarding each party, it will be utterly impossible to give more than an approximate statement.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION.

MOTION FOR ACCOUNTANT'S REPORT.

Mr. McCALLUM moved for a copy of the report, memorandum, or minute made by the accountant who assisted at the investigation by the Royal Commissioners into the affairs of the Northern Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion. I have already stated, in reply to a question from the hon. member, that there was no formal report that could be presented to the House, but merely certain letters and memoranda which were for the private information of the Government. I must ask him, therefore, to withdraw his motion.

Mr. McCALLUM said he thought it very desirable that this memorandum should be laid before the House. It had been prepared by a public officer, paid for out of the public money, and it was desirable to have it, as he believed that it would throw considerable light on the question of the settlement with the Government by the Northern Railway Company of Canada. When the Committee to enquire into the Company's affairs was struck, he believed the Minister of Justice said that if he (Mr. Blake) had had information that the Company was as able to pay as had turned out to be the case, they would have made a better settlement; and he understood that this memorandum would show that the Government was in possession of information at that time, which exhibited the exact position of the Company, but had not acted upon it. This was his information. Of course, if it was insisted upon, he might as well withdraw his motion, for, if he did not, it would be voted down.

Mr. BOWELL said he had been led to believe that this report had been made and handed to the Chairman of the Royal Commission appointed to investigate into the affairs of the Company; and also that this professional accountant who was in the employ of the Government, had been sent by the Government to assist and aid in unravelling the mysteries which were supposed to surround the Company's accounts. He understood that the report of this employé had been placed in the hands of the Chairman of the Commission, and by him, he supposed, sent to the Government, upon which, he presumed, they acted, when they decided to carry out the provisions of the law which enabled them to accept the £100,000 stg., in lieu of all the claims of the Government. What he thought the hon. member desired to ascertain, and what he considered the House as well as the country was entitled to, was to know whether there was anything in this report made by that professional accountant which would justify the Government in refusing to carry out the terms of the law as to the settlement with the railway company. It had, he knew, been the rule in the past, that when the leader of the Government stated that a report was private and confidential, a member of the House should withdraw such a motion. This memorandum, he had good reason to believe, occupied some twenty or thirty pages, and contained a full report of the results at which the accountant had arrived after an investigation into certain papers and documents placed in his hands by the Railway authorities under the instruction of the Commission. Not having seen the report, of course, they could not understand why there should be any objection to its being laid before Parliament. If it contained the information he had been led to believe was the case, he thought that the House would be justified in doing precisely what it did in 1873, and refuse to pass any Bill to aid the railway or give it any further advantages until the indebtedness to the Government had been paid. What was, moreover, of importance was that the original shareholders should be placed in a better position. It was quite clear that the management of the road had been such as to debar the original shareholders from participating in any of the profits whatever, and if Parliament could, by any means, or by any information placed in its power, put these shareholders in a better position than they had heretofore occupied, or if the information contained in this memorandum or report was of such a character as to justify Parliament in compelling the bondholders to give to the shareholders certain rights and privileges which they had not heretofore, so as to receive some return for the money they had invested in the undertaking, then he thought it was not only proper but necessary that this information should be laid before Parliament so that they might be enabled to judge its contents, and act accordingly when they came to legislate on the Bill that was to be submitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had already told the hon gentleman, or the House at least, that he had been advised by the Department of Justice, that none of the irregularities which had been gradually brought to light during the year would justify the Government in refusing to receive the money prescribed in the Act of 1875, so that no report or memorandum of any person whatever could have any possible effect in this regard. As to the report bringing to light anything else, he was not aware that it did. There were several letters, one very long document and several shorter ones, some of them being communications sent to himself and others to the Commissioners; but there was nothing in them that could, by any possibility, affect the question that the House had had to decide, or rather had previously decided. Some were confidential papers, intended purely for the service and consideration of the Government. His hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) reminded him that the hon. gentleman had said that this was the result of an investigation into the books of the Company.

Mr. BOWELL: I did not say that. I mentioned such papers as had been placed in the possession of the accountant, who I know had no access to the books.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had had all these papers in their own possession. The memorandum was merely a compilation of figures about certain matters that had no possible bearing on the question.

Mr. McCARTHY said that this accountant had been examined before the Northern Railway Committee. He supposed that he was not then at liberty to refer to any statement this witness had made, but he rose merely to suggest the adjournment of the debate until the report as to the evidence was submitted to the House, which would then be able to judge whether the statement made before the Committee was such as would warrant the calling for the report or memorandum, or whatever it might be. He moved that the debate be adjourned until the report of the Committee came down.

Mr. BLAKE: It is not in order.

Motion negatived on a division.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BERTRAM moved for a return of—

“All monthly measurements and estimates for the various kinds of work done on Section No. 16, Intercolonial Railway, while under contract to Messrs. King & Gough, and subsequently under contract to J. C. Gough, showing the actual quantities and kinds of work executed and returned, the amounts made out for same at schedule rates for each month by the Divisional Engineer in charge, and the amount for each month respectively certified by the Chief Engineer of the Railway, or paid by the Commissioners of the Railway, and paid to the contractors or contractor or their agents.

“The amounts of all sums of money paid by or through the Government, or its agents on behalf of, or in liquidation of debts due by the firm of King & Gough, or J. C. Gough, on account of contract on Section No. 16, to whom paid, on whose authority the sums were paid, and the nature and extent of the service or work done therefor after the contract had been taken by the Government from J. C. Gough.

“The quantities of work done by the Government or its agents after the contract had been taken from J. C. Gough, showing the monthly estimates for the various kinds of work actually done, and the amounts of money paid for such work and to whom paid.

“The number of structures now built in first and second class masonry, paving, etc., in each, and the extent of the opening or waterway of each structure now on the section, the quantity of rip-rap done on the section, of concrete used, the quantity or length of fencing done, cattle guards built, with the items of cost for each.”

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no objection to the motion passing, but it was so very particular in its terms that there might be some difficulty in complying literally with it. The work done after the contract was taken away from Messrs. King & Gough was probably not measured. He thought they could only give the measurement of the work done by the contractors and deduct that from the total quantities. The work done by the Government was paid for by day wages, and the men were also paid large arrears due them for actual labour performed. They would make the return as intelligible as possible.

Motion agreed to.

SUNDAY TRAFFIC ON CANALS.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. BROUSE moved :—

“That it be resolved that for the better observance of the Lord’s Day and in the interests of morality—vessels propelled by steam and carrying passengers, may be detained from proceeding on their voyage through the Canals from the hour of 6 a.m. until the hour of 9 o’clock p.m. on the Sabbath day.”

Mr. MACDONALD (Cornwall) said the motion made by the hon. member for South Grenville, if carried and acted upon, would have the effect of changing the present regulations in force on the Cornwall Canal, and, he thought, not in the interest of morality. Two years ago a prominent gentleman of Cornwall determined to put a stop to the Sunday labour then performed on the Cornwall Canal; but, before taking proceedings, made known to the Superintendent his intention, who communicated with the Commissioner of Public Works, who gave directions that the Canal should be closed from 12 o’clock Saturday night until 12 o’clock on Sunday night, which orders had ever since been strictly adhered to. It had been stated that detention of vessels at the entrance of the Canal during the Sabbath had the effect of demoralizing the boat men. It was, however, not within his knowledge that such was the case; on the contrary, with the best opportunity of observing, he had not known a case of drunkenness or any other immorality. He (Mr. Macdonald) considered it unfair to make the Canal employees return to the old system of infringing upon the Sabbath, and for that reason he hoped the motion of the hon. member for South Grenville would not carry.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was one of those matters on which he would be very glad to get the opinion of the House. A great many suggestions were continually made to him as to the time when canal traffic should commence and cease.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: What is the practice now?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Welland Canal was absolutely shut on Sundays.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

On some of the Lower Canadian canals, vessels were allowed to pass through by daylight, and others were kept open all the time. There was great difficulty in regulating this matter. Sometimes a perishable cargo would be brought up, and a special order had to be procured to prevent its detention. It was the desire of the Government, as far as possible, to conform to public opinion where it did not involve a wilful violation of Sunday observance. He thought it would be a calamity to have the canals open during the day, although it had been argued that the present system led to disturbances by the sailors.

Mr. LANGEVIN said when he was at the head of the Department of Public Works, numerous requests were made for the closing of the canals on Sundays. He tried to satisfy that portion of the public who made the demand; and if the canals were not closed altogether, they were used as little as possible. He agreed with the hon. the Minister of Public Works that the subject was a difficult one to deal with. If any rule was adopted, he thought it should be that no vessel should be allowed to enter the canal between certain hours, but that any vessel in the canal at the time should be allowed to go through.

Mr. BROUSE said he had not intended to make any remarks, because he thought the motion would speak for itself. On a former occasion he presented a petition signed by eighty captains of vessels using the Welland Canal, which stated that it would tend to the better observance of the Sabbath, and also in the interests of morality, if they were allowed to have control of their men during the hours of daylight on Sundays. Frequently the men went on shore and indulged in liquor to a large extent, and instead of the vessels proceeding on their voyage at twelve at night they were delayed until twelve o’clock next day. It cost large amounts to run some of the vessels using the canal, and every encouragement should be given to the persons who invested their money in the carrying trade. But he had a higher motive in bringing up this matter, which was to secure the better observance of the Sabbath.

At Williamsburg and Edwardsburg, canal boats proceeded through all day, and the men had no opportunity of attending church. At the Welland Canal, on the contrary, boats were prevented from passing. He had introduced the resolution with the view of making the system uniform.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought this was a matter which ought to be left in the hands of the Government. It was a matter of administration and not of local legislation. There were very many considerations involved. Of course, every one would agree that the sanctity of the Sabbath should be observed as much as possible. Still it was impossible to frame a hard and fast rule. Every vessel might have its own circumstances. The nature of the freight might be such that it would not be safe to detain it. In fact there might be a hundred different considerations which the House could not weigh or know. It was to the high credit of the First Minister that he was known to possess very rigid views on this important matter of the strict observance of the Sabbath. The hon. gentleman would certainly be safe in leaving the matter in the hands of the First Minister, especially as canals came particularly under his jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLTON agreed with the view of the right hon. member for Kingston. He did not think it advisable that the matter should be pressed to a vote.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

RAILWAY COMPANIES TRAFFIC RATES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. IRVING moved :

"That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution :—

"That it is expedient to make provision for the more effectual securing the observance by railway companies of the law requiring equality of treatment in the management of traffic and imposition of rates and tolls; and more especially the due observance of the requirements of sub-section 2 of section 48, and of section 12 of the Railway Act of 1868; and to vest in the Exchequer Court of Canada the power necessary for enforcing such observance."

He said he desired to call attention to the subject of the collection of tolls by railway companies, and their non-observance of the spirit of the law bearing upon that subject, which was contained in two parts of the Railway Act. In one part of the Act it said that the same toll should be payable at the same time and under the same circumstances upon all goods and by all persons, so that no undue advantage, privilege or monopoly may be afforded to any person or class of persons, by any by-law relating to the tolls. In another place it stated that railway companies must afford each other every facility for the forwarding of traffic, without preference or favour; and shall not give or continue any preference or advantage or any favour to any particular company, or any particular description of traffic, etc. As he understood it, this law was practically disregarded. Notwithstanding the very great injustice to the commercial class, they were unable to bring about any change. During the last 25 years in which railways had been in operation in Ontario, he was not aware of but three cases in which this question had been discussed. It was beyond the reach of individual merchants to bring railway companies to book in reference to the difficulties which they experience, on account of the great expense in comparison with what might only be a small item in itself, but which, in a year, would aggregate to something considerable. So, practically, there was no remedy whatever. In past Sessions, efforts had been made by hon. members to bring this matter before the attention of Parliament and the difficulty that had been met with was, that it was thought that if Parliament made any change in reference to tolls, it would be an interference with the vested rights of the bond-holders and capitalists interested in railways. The same difficulty had presented itself to him; but in recent times legislation in England had successfully got over that difficulty by means of giving to the public a complete remedy whereby complaints could be adjudicated and arranged at a very trifling expense, without undue interference to the railways at the same time. As illustrating the evil, he would point out that flour was not carried at as cheap rates from Ontario to the Maritime Provinces as it was from Chicago. This discrimination interfered with the progress of Canadian trade while it was also a disregard of the law. Were the law carried out it would be a greater protection to the Canadian miller than an extraduty on each barrel of flour.

After Recess.

Mr. IRVING resumed. He said in another instance, it was declared to be an undue preference where a railway company, with the object of discouraging the construction of a competent line, carried slate for certain quarry owners, who agreed to send all their slate over the railway company's line for a fixed number of years at a less rate than they charged for the same service to the complainant quarry owners, who were offered, but refused, to bind themselves by such an agreement. Another instance, which was the last he should bring to the notice of the House, was where rebates were allowed to brewers at certain rates, and rebates also to timber merchants by the same railway company—a case where Commissioners directed a change in the rebate with regard to assimilating such rebates when amount charged seemed not proportioned to the services rendered. These several restrictions were no more than imposing on the railway company obligations to carry out the existing law; and none of the decisions which had been given interfered with the principle that a railway company might fairly discriminate between those classes of trades which gave so large an amount of business, and those classes of trades which only employed them to a moderate and a very much less extent. In view of the probability of amalgamation which, he need hardly say, almost always followed upon railway extension, the larger railway companies swallowed up the smaller ones, and probably even contemplated amalgamation themselves. it was all the more necessary that the country generally should understand the condition of the law, and the remedies to which they were entitled, and which it was the duty of the Legislature to provide. The railway companies, for over twenty-five years, have been struggling with through traffic, at very low rates, to the injury of the local traffic, which was carried at much higher rates; and after twenty-five years' experience in the country, look at the result of the railway policy by which they themselves governed their business. He thought that it was not stating the result too strongly against them by saying that their management had not been by any means successful. Their own proprietors in England were not satisfied with the difference they had made in struggling for through traffic. He might quote a very few words from one of the leading stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, at the recent meeting in England, in which he very properly, as he (Mr. Irving) thought, pointed out that a great part of the difficulties and want of success in the Grand Trunk Railway Company was, that they had been struggling and striving to make money on through traffic at prices which were inadequate to pay their working expenses. This prominent proprietor told the shareholders themselves that the reason their management had not succeeded was, that they had been struggling for prices far inadequate to the services they were called upon to perform. The same company which charged 1*l.* per ton per mile, or even less, for through traffic, thought nothing of charging 5*c.* or more for local traffic. The reason was that if the railway companies took the same trouble to develop the local traffic that they took in regard to through traffic, they would, in the long run, have done better for their shareholders. They had pushed this discrimination in respect to large traffic—that was, through traffic, instead of the smaller—that was, local traffic, far beyond and contrary to the laws under which they were chartered; and, inasmuch as the Imperial Parliament had checked and, within legal bounds, modified the exercise of the powers of railway companies in collecting tolls, so ought this Parliament in the same way erect a tribunal to examine into such cases as were unreasonable and modify them in a like degree. He would propose that it should be—and this was taking up the spirit of the English Act—in the power of the municipality, or corporation, or of ten traders in any locality, or of a Board of Trade, to propose rates that, under the circumstances, would be fair; and if those rates were not acquiesced in, that they should be referred to this tribunal for determination and decision. That was the principle which now governed those questions in England. Where there was a large railway with a large through traffic, and a small railway having local traffic which served a particular neighbourhood, or where there was a railway which touched a particular point at which there was no competing railway, the trades at these competing points were wholly at the mercy of the larger railway company. When the small company proposed to the larger company a reasonable rate, if it were accepted the matter ended; if the larger company did not accept the rate tendered it, it was referred to a tribunal for a decision. He had somewhat modified the English law on the subject, because he had proposed in the Bill, which he hoped might be allowed to pass, founded upon these resolutions, to guard against anything which might be called vexatious as against the railway companies. He proposed that no one should be able to commence a suit without having an order from a Judge of one of the local Courts, that it was a very reasonable case which should be brought before the tribunal. That, he thought, would impose a fair safeguard in favour of the railway companies. To what tribunal would it be fair and convenient to have these matters referred? At the present time some objections, which he had pointed out, were supposed to exist in regard to cases being dealt with by Justices of the Peace summarily. He need hardly say how very inadequate, how very improper, it would be for justices of the peace to enter upon a very difficult and delicate duty such as this, and indeed so far would an order made by them be beyond their ordinary information, that although this Statute had to some extent been fifteen or twenty years on the Statute-book, he believed it had never been invoked in any instance in this respect. In England, for twenty or twenty-five years, the jurisdiction was confined to one of the Courts of Common Law, but there the Judges admitted that they were not experienced, and had not a knowledge of the subject, and were not capable of dealing with the Act satisfactorily. In 1873 a Railway Commission was created, which had since, apparently, dealt very satisfactorily with this question at large. Now, it would not be convenient or desirable that in this country an expensive tribunal of that kind should be created; but he submitted that at the present, and for some years to come, the Court of Exchequer would have ample time and leisure to dispose of and determine all cases of this kind, which, by experience in England, were not very numerous; because being more or less connected with one principle, so far as this class of cases was arranged to fall within the principle of the laws now on the Statute-book, there would be very little litigation. He, therefore, thought that this was a case of such wide-spread interest, of such important consequences, that it would be satisfactory that the resolution he would now move should be accepted, and that a Bill should be permitted to be introduced upon the basis of this resolution. He need hardly say that, at this late period of the Session, it could not be expected that the Bill could go any further; but it appeared to him to be a very desirable thing that the commercial class should know that such a Bill as this was a matter which was open to argument, and which, at another Session, they might again bring forward, and be able to treat with a more general opinion, in reference to the solution of the difficulty, than could now be supposed to be exercised, when it was brought before the House for the first time. He, therefore, moved that the House go into Committee on the resolution he had read.

Mr. OLIVER said this was a question of very great importance to the people of this country, a subject which ought to receive every consideration in this House, as it was, to a large extent, receiving the consideration of the people. He had brought this subject before the House on two or three different occasions, but, unfortunately for him, it was left over when it went before the Committee. He did not know what was the reason, but it appeared to him that this was a very convenient way of removing measures which were not agreeable to hon. members,—to have them sent to the Committee and left there. He was much pleased to see that his hon. friend from Hamilton had taken this matter under his consideration, for they were all well aware that no hon. member understood the railway system of Canada better than this hon. gentleman, who had been for many years connected with a leading Canadian railway. He hoped that when the hon. gentleman re-introduced this measure next Session it would be fully discussed and carried into effect. There were various instances in which the people of this country were dealt unfairly with by the railway companies. He found that the greatest justice was done Canadians by a railway built and owned by Americans—the Canada Southern Railway Company. This was one of the very best railways in the Dominion. The Northern Railway charged 6½c. per ton per mile between Richmond Hill and Toronto, a distance of 18½ miles; and from Meaford, a distance of 115 miles, 3½c. per ton per mile. The Midland Railway charged 7½c. per ton per mile for 18 miles, and for 86 miles, 3½c. The Great Western from Windsor to Clifton, 229 miles, charged 1⅞c., and to Hamilton, 189 miles, 2⅞c., and from his own town to Clifton, 90 miles, 3⅞c., and to Hamilton, 50 miles, 4c. per ton. The Grand Trunk from Chicago to Portland, 1,145 miles, charged $18 per car; from Cincinnati, $16 per car; from Sarnia, $25; from Toronto, $22, and from Montreal to Portland, 297 miles, $18.60 per car. When he introduced this measure on a previous occasion, it was stated, he thought, by the Minister of Public Works, that railway company had a perfect right to charge a lower rate at a competing point than at a non-competing point; but he did not think that the railways of Canada should be allowed to do so, for the reason that the country had largely subsidized these railways. They had given to companies certain rights and privileges—the right to pass through the properties of private individuals, to expropriate them, and to take them at a valuation, besides subsidizing them to a very large extent. The Grand Trunk had received $15,000,000, and the interest paid by the country on the bonds issued amounted to as much more. A debt of 1¼ millions due by the Great Western had been cancelled, and a debt of $2,000,000 due by the Northern Railway had been cancelled by a settlement recently arranged. Considering that the whole people of Canada were taxed to pay this, he thought it was unfair that these companies should grant privileges to one particular section over another. For instance, shippers and manufacturers at the City of London could send their goods to foreign and Canadian markets very much cheaper than from non-competing sections, as the Grand Trunk and Great Western both ran through that city; and yet the residents of London did not pay more towards these subsidies than other less favoured sections; so he held that a remedy should be applied. It was also stated that railways ought to have the power of reducing their rates when exposed to competition by way of water communication, but the same arrangement held good in this regard. They could all see in the Public Accounts and the Estimates, the enormous sums which they were voting to expend for the improvement of navigation, and these payments were not confined to districts around competing points; so he held that the people who resided at non-competing points should share in the benefits at present enjoyed by competing points. It was said it would be cruel, at the present time, to so deal with railways, that they were not now paying, and that if any legislation took place with regard to rates they would pay still less; but he apprehended that every one in the country knew exactly why this was the case. They knew that the traffic from the Western States was carried at ruinous rates by Canadian lines, and that the charges from Chicago to the Eastern and our own markets could never pay any company. Another reason for this state of things was the extravagance and mismanagement of the lines. They were aware, from observation, that a great many railway officials, and all such officials who had a controlling influence over the lines, had amassed considerable fortunes. Another revelation had recently been made, and it was apparent that as long as railways were conducted in the present fashion they would never be profitable. They had had an investigation into the Northern Railway, and they saw how the money earned by it had been spent. It had been taken for charitable purposes, to subsidize newspapers, to elect members for various constituencies to this House, and he doubted not to the Local House as well; to provide pleasure steamboats and to build fashionable hotels; and railways so managed could never pay. Canadian railways would pay better if they were properly managed; but so long as they were conducted by Boards in England, 3,000 miles away, where the great bulk of the stock was held, they could never be properly managed. This was not the only way in which the people paid large sums for the promotion of these railways. The enormous charges they had made at non-competing points had induced, and, in fact, compelled, the inhabitants to build railways to equalize the rates. In his section, a cross-road from Port Dover to Lake Huron had been built, and something over $150,000 had been voted by the county for the purpose. This county had also given a bonus of $200,000 to the Credit Valley Railway. This was not because they had not already sufficient railway accommodation, but because the railways charged too much for it. They had, in fact, ample railway accommodation, and they had voted this $350,000 for the purpose of equalizing prices. He held that, as they had given large subsidies to the Great Western and Grand Trunk, this state of things should not be allowed to exist. This was not the worst of it. When they desired to remedy this evil, and build railways in order to equalize rates, these trunk lines used every influence in their power to defeat this object. The agents of the Great Western and Grand Trunk had both been employed to defeat the bonus by-laws when submitted in his county; and he was told that when the recent by-law was voted upon in Toronto, the people of that city had had to contend with the adverse influence of the Great Western and Grand Trunk Railway Companies. He might state other instances. It was well known that the county of Oxford was one of the largest produce sections of the Dominion; and he knew that the shippers of dairy produce there, in order to get a cheap rate of shipment to Liverpool, had to team it a distance of 20 or 30 miles to the city of London, though Ingersoll and Woodstock were much nearer. In looking over the reports submitted to the stockholders in London (Eng.) a year ago, he found the statement that eight trains a day were run on the road to convey the traffic coming from the Western States, and two trains for the local traffic. The former paid 60 per cent. of the whole earnings, and the latter 40 per cent., so that here was positive proof that the people of Canada paid nearly three times as much for freight as the people of Chicago and the Western States did over Canadian lines. When the Bill, based on his resolution, was before the Committee, the Chairman had suggested that the railways of Canada ought to be placed under a Department and a Minister of the Crown. He cordially approved of this idea. We had some 800 or 900 miles of railway under the control of the Minister of Public Works, belonging to the people of Canada, while about 2,000 miles were under the control of private companies and the supervision of this Minister, and he hoped that at no distant day, a great many miles would be added to the railway system of Canada under the immediate action and supervision of the House, as the property of the country. It was impossible for any one man to manage the vast public works now being carried on, and the railway system, and he did think that there ought to be a Railway Department. There were one or two departments, in which there was very little to do, and which could be spared very well, or could be very well converted into a railway department without injury to the public service; and he was sure that it would be a boon to the Minister of Public Works if this were done. Any one could see the position in which the Canadian people were placed when a rise in the markets took place in Europe or in the Eastern States. This was illustrated three or four years ago, when all the available railway stock was used for the purpose of conveying the freight of the Western States to the markets of Europe and the Eastern States; when a complete block took place upon the Canadian lines, and when it was impossible for the local produce of the country to be conveyed to its destination. This measure had engaged the attention of the House and of the various combinations which existed in the Dominion. On one or two occasions the Board of Trade had the subject under consideration, and they passed a resolution in favour of the Government taking steps to regulate and equalise the rates from one end of the country to the other. At a manufacturers' meeting in Toronto two years ago, it was stated, by heavy manufacturers—Mr. Hayes, of Toronto, for one—that furniture made in New York could be carried from the factory to any part in Canada at a lower rate than the manufacturer in Canada could deliver his products at the same point. It would be well for the manufacturers to pay a little more attention to this, because if the products of the United States were made to pay an equal railway rate with Canadian products, it would act largely as a protection to our industries. If there was one protection the farmers desired and needed more than another, it was protection in the way of lower rates for carrying their products to the markets of the world. Some time ago the millers had a meeting in Toronto and passed a resolution asking the Government to take steps for the purpose of rectifying this grievance; but, unfortunately for the people, in place of urging this resolution on the Administration they changed their policy and urged protection. If they had urged the reduction of the rates, and had succeeded in getting a measure to effect this passed through the House, there was no doubt they would have benefitted to a much greater extent than if they had got what they really wanted. In his section they did not feel the hardship much, on account of having three competing railways; but it was, nevertheless, of the deepest importance that this matter should be regulated in the interests of the whole country. They all admitted the great amount of good done by the railway system of Canada, and that the farmers had benefitted largely thereby; but that was no reason why one farmer should have to pay more for the conveyance of his products to the markets of the world than another. For instance, the products delivered in the City of London were carried to the markets of Canada, Europe, and the United States at nearly one-third less than if they were taken from a non-competing point. This was a disadvantage to towns surrounding London, as the farmers would always go where they could get the best prices for their products. It was only necessary for the capitalists of a place like London to have a perfect understanding with the railroad companies in order to get cheap rates; indeed, they could afford to give them a bonus in consideration of low rates. He held that under the present railway system a vast injustice was done to a large majority of the people, and that it was the duty of the Government to step in and grant some relief. He was perfectly well aware that it was impossible this year to bring the resolution to anything like a determination; but if the Bill were printed, it would afford hon. members and the people an opportunity to thoroughly consider the subject before next Session. He hoped that at the earliest possible time his hon. friend would re-introduce the measure, and that before the end of next Session it would come to maturity. He was much pleased the hon. gentleman had taken the measure under his particular charge, and he promised him that if he could do anything in the way of assisting or promoting the measure, that assistance would be cordially given.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said he was aware that this subject was of vital importance to the mercantile, manufacturing, and farming communities, but there were a great many difficulties in the way of remedying the evils complained of. The Boards of Trade and Millers' and Manufacturers' Associations complained very justly at the low rates at which the products of the United States were brought into Canada. For instance, furniture was carried over the Grand Trunk from Buffalo to Ottawa at a less rate than it could be conveyed here from Toronto. There was the same difference against our people in the carrying of wheat and flour. He had no doubt that the Government might compel the Grand Trunk to carry at relative rates per mile within the Dominion, but they could hardly step in and say, "You must not carry wheat and flour from Chicago and other western points to the seaboard at less relative rates than you convey the same freight from Toronto." That would be almost prohibiting them from doing any foreign business, which it would be inadvisable, considering the fact that the Canadian traffic was not, at present, large enough to keep the line fully employed. The only way of preventing injustice being done to our interests was to place those products in the same position as the products of cattle. But he did not consider that the Grand Trunk charges on Canadian produce were excessive. The trouble was that our roads were compelled, in consequence of the extreme competition of American companies, to carry at a sacrifice from western points.

Mr. STEPHENSON said there was no doubt that many of our manufacturers and farmers were suffering from this discrimination in freights. The United States manufacturers could send their goods to Canadian markets at a less rate than the Canadian manufacturers could land theirs at the same points. If there was any system whereby comparatively even-handed justice could be done, it ought to be adopted.

Mr. TROW said he thought the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) was entitled to the thanks of the House and country for bringing forward the resolution. It was necessary that the Government should give the matter their serious consideration. Within the past eight or ten years $30,000,000 had probably been spent in Ontario on railways. He knew that the English bondholders did not receive much remuneration for their outlay, but it was also a fact that preference was given to through foreign traffic. From some points west of Toronto, where the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways were nearly united, grain was carried at a cheaper rate east than from some places 40 miles this side. He thought a resolution of this kind should be placed in such a form that it could be thoroughly ventilated before next Session, in order that there might be an intelligent verdict given upon the grievance, if such existed.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said the through lines should be allowed to settle through rates themselves. He could not imagine that his hon. friend was in earnest in proposing that municipalities should settle the local rates. It was absurd to think of such a thing. The Grand Trunk and Great Western local freight was carried as cheap as in any other country, and through traffic was carried cheaper; and here was the difficulty. All railway companies had to submit their traffic rates to the Government, and this was about as good protection as could be desired. He thought the law had better remain in its present position, than to be changed in the manner proposed. There should be no doubt on the matter, and the Government should express their opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman who had brought this subject before the House had, at various times, as also his hon. friend from Oxford, referred to the necessity of adopting something like the Minnesota or New York law, which compels a pro rata rate. The present system in Canada might be described as one that fixed the maximum rate, but permitted the railway companies to go as low as they pleased. The question was not whether some places were getting freight far too low, but whether any place was paying too high rates. His hon. friend from Oxford had pointed out the desirability of the Government having control over the railway system, and expressed the hope that the time would not be far distant when the Government would own many hundred miles more of railway. If the hon. gentleman knew the difficulties there were in working a railway, he would not seek to impose a few hundred more miles of railway upon the Government. He differed in toto from the conclusion of the hon. gentleman. He had arrived at the conclusion that no Government should have anything to do with the governing or control of commercial affairs; and there was no more reason why a Government should work a railway than a cotton mill. They were both commercial enterprises, and both had better be managed by commercial men. The cause of the exceeding low rates from the west was simply on account of the keen competition. There were four great lines from the centre of the wheat-growing district to the Atlantic sea board. One route to the ocean was by way of Baltimore, which was the shortest of all the lines, taking Chicago as a common point, or any point to the south; and the farther south the shorter was the distance to the sea by way of Baltimore. Another route was by the Pennsylvania Central; then the New York and Erie, and then the New York Central. Some of these lines had great advantages over the Canadian line, the Grand Trunk, which was the longest of all from Chicago to Portland, or to any point where the sea-board could be reached except, perhaps, Montreal, and that, of course, was only available in the summer season. On the New York Central, and partially on some of the other routes, there were lines of rail laid wholly devoted to freight purposes, and by keeping a constant stream of freight cars upon the freight tracks, which are double, the same as for passengers, they were enabled to carry at much less than could possibly be done on a line like the Grand Trunk, where there was only one line of rails where, the passage of trains had to be governed by switches. They knew as a fact that, during the keen competition last year cars of grain and flour were carried from Chicago to Portland or Boston for $12. That was a rate which would not pay expenses. Our people had to pay as much as that for a distance of forty or fifty miles. But it was not to be expected that our roads should by any possibility be governed by such absurd through rates. The subject which the hon. gentleman proposed for the consideration of the House was in fact a revolutionary one. It was one which, if carried out to its logical conclusions, would ruin many of our railway systems. It would be impossible to carry out the proposals which the hon. gentleman seemed to advocate. He (Mr. Mackenzie) admitted that there might be some necessity for reform. There might be some necessity for the Government to interfere in some respects, but he thought it was better, as far as possible, to avoid any interference with the railway rates if they were established upon a fair basis. The law at present required that all railway companies under the jurisdiction of the Government should have their rates approved of by the Governor in Council. It was the maximum rate which was regulated, but the Governor in Council had no power to establish a minimum rate. Unless there was a fixed rate established by the Government, it appeared to him that the object of the hon. member for Oxford could not be attained. On the Intercolonial Railway, which was the property of the Government, they were obliged to carry from Rivière du Loup to Halifax at a rate very much less, indeed, than from St. John to Halifax, or, perhaps, from St. John to Moncton. This was because they had to carry at such rates as they could obtain from the Grand Trunk, otherwise they would get none. The Grand Trunk could take its freight as cheaply to Portland as to the water terminus of the Intercolonial. The Government had to compete with American lines, and had, therefore, to regulate its rates accordingly. In the summer, also, they had to compete with the St. Lawrence and Gulf boats. The resolution, prima facie, was one to be commended; on its face it seemed to be manifestly fair; but it was one scarcely practicable. While he did not object to a discussion of the subject, or even to the resolution being adopted if desired, he thought all the railway corporations should have due notice of the proposal before a Bill was brought in, so that they might be prepared to state their views before Parliament next Session. While more had to be paid from Chatham east than from Windsor east, this was because the latter had to compete with American lines. The same rule applied to other competing points, and they must make fair allowance for the difficulties railway corporations had to encounter in consequence of competition for through traffic. He had only to say, further, that he was quite disposed to give due consideration to that or any proposal of the kind that might be brought forward; but he thought there was too great a tendency at present to force upon railway companies that policy which in Minnesota had partially closed some of their lines and had compelled some of the companies to suspend operations, as the rates forced upon them made it utterly impossible for them to pay expenses. He was bound to give any proposal made by his hon. friend due consideration, and admitted that if anything could be introduced which would remedy the difficulty without destroying the revenue of the railroad corporations, it would be a great reformation. He would consent to the resolution on the understanding that it was only for the purpose of introducing the Bill so that it could be considered at the next Session.

Mr. IRVING explained that he had opposed the Minnesota or pro rata principle as applied to railway companies. The principle embodied in his Bill was not to destroy the power of the railway companies to fix their own rates, but to have the companies not unduly discriminate between traders and stations. The Bill was based on the English Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the Government would allow the resolution to pass on the distinct understanding that the Government was not in any manner pledged to the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and agreed to.

Mr. IRVING introduced a Bill (No. 116) to make provision for the more effectual securing the observance by Railway Companies, of the law requiring equality of treatment in the management of traffic, and imposition of rates and tolls.

Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time.

Bill (No. 117) to amend the Act to incorporate the Manitoba Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Thompson, Haldimand.)

QUEBEC HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for copies of the Petition of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec; praying for the guarantee of the Government for an additional sum of $250,000, in order to complete the improvements in the above mentioned Harbour of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

WORKS AT RIVER ST. CHARLES.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for a statement of the tenders sent in to the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec for the projected works in the River St. Charles, the said statement to include the original tenders, the supplementary tenders, the names of the contractors and of their sureties, and the name of the person or company who obtained the contract, with the names of the sureties.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he must ask his hon. friend not to press the motion, as these contracts had not yet been let. It would be most unfair, under the circumstances, to ask the Commissioners to supply this information.

Mr. BLANCHET said it was mentioned some time ago that the Commissioners had given out the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not correct.

Mr. BLANCHET said that if this was not the case, he would withdraw his motion; but he hoped that the hon. gentleman would not say that he asked for a return when it was not announced that the contract was awarded. He would not press his motion under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was not aware of any public notification; but I know it is not given out.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

ADMINISTRATION OF HARBOUR BOARD OF MONTREAL— TOWN OF SOREL.

MOTION.

Mr. BARTHE moved for copies of all petitions, correspondence and Orders in Council relating to complaints made against the administration of the Harbour Board of Montreal in connection with the town of Sorel and the works for deepening Lake St. Peter; also copies of all documents transmitted to the Government respecting the bad administration of the aforesaid works, the arbitrary dismissal of Pierre Côté and Pierre Charbonneau, and of any other employé; of all correspondence and documents relating to the dismissal of Captain Charles Armstrong; of all documents relating to the appointment of Messieurs McCarthy and McKenzie, and of any other employé at Sorel in connection with the works of the harbour—which documents, as well as those hereinafter mentioned, should be found in the office of the Montreal Harbour Commissioners, and of which the Government is entitled to have communication, inasmuch as the latter provides each year a very large amount of public money for the carrying on of those works; also copies of any report made by Mr. John McCarthy or any other employé of the Montreal Harbour Board at Sorel, showing why the pay of day labourers and of many others employed by the month or by the year was reduced, while that of the said Mr. John McCarthy was increased from $600, which his predecessor, Mr. Pierre Côté, had, to $2,000; also copies of any contracts in relation to the leasing of the wharves, lands, shops, &c., of Messrs. John and Daniel McCarthy either with the Government or with the Harbour Board of Montreal; also of all instructions given either by the Harbour Board of Montreal defining the duties of the aforesaid employés, Messrs. McCarthy and McKenzie or of any other subordinate employé, in the carrying out of the said works; also, copies of all contracts awarded to any person whomsoever for the repair of dredge-boats, the erection of any building, the repairing or building of engines, machinery and boilers, the purchase of wood and of coal or any other contract generally; the names and residences of those who obtained such contracts and works generally, with or without tenders, mentioning the amounts of each such contract; also the amounts paid since 1875, whether by contract or otherwise, for provisions, bread, meat, groceries, &c.—for the board and maintenance of the men employed on the said works, and to whom such payments were made.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this brought up the question to what extent the Government could call upon Commissioners whose only connection with the Government was, that five of them were appointed by the Government in consequence of their guaranteeing the interest on a certain expenditure on the river, to give such information. This would indicate a minute surveillance over the works the Commissioners carried on, and this was a responsibility which they could not assume. It would be extremely inconvenient to consider that this should be exercised. All he could say was that they would transmit the motion to the Commissioners, and ask for such information as the latter could give. He had no reason to doubt that the greater portion of it would be complied with, but he himself and Parliament should guard against assuming a minute supervision over all the details of the work done by the Commissioners.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE AT ROND EAU.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for copies of all correspondence with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any other Department, relative to the supplying of a life or other boat for the public service at and in the vicinity of the lighthouse and piers at the harbour of refuge at Rond Eau. He said he moved for these papers from a deep sense of duty, because last fall he had visited this lighthouse, and he had found that a necessity existed there for the maintenance of a lifeboat or some other boat. It was some time before he could reach the lighthouse, which was situated some five or seven miles from any place where boats were kept, and he could not see why it should be so neglected. It was isolated completely, being situated on an island at the entrance of the harbour, which was about seven miles long and three miles wide. For many years, and in fact every year, more or less, vessels were stranded on Rond Eau Point, and it was absolutely necessary that the person in charge of the lighthouse should be in a position to go to the aid and, if possible, relieve those who were in distress under such circumstances. This was an important point, and a large amount of money had been expended there. He also thought the lighthouse-keeper should be supplied with every facility for making himself as efficient as possible in his particular department. Having a large degree of confidence in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who had ever shown him the utmost consideration, he believed it was only necessary to have the matter properly brought before that gentleman in a fair and candid way to induce the Government to take such steps as would meet the exigency of the situation. He was sure that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was disposed to do what was pointed out to him as being requisite, on becoming acquainted with the facts, and, on looking into the circumstances, would be inclined to furnish the appliances necessary to place the lighthouse keeper at the Rond Eau in a position to meet the requirements of the trade and navigation of that important section of the Dominion.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that the matter having been brought to the attention of the Government, arrangements had been made to place a life-boat at this station on the opening of navigation.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Under the circumstances, I will withdraw my motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

FISHERIES IN THE NAPAN AND BLACK RIVERS.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for all reports to Council by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in relation to the Bass and Gasperaux fisheries in the Rivers Napan and Black River, Miramichi, and the shores in the vicinity of the same; also, all Orders in Council made thereon since 1st January, 1874; also, all reports made by the Overseers of Fisheries and by the Inspector of Fisheries in relation thereto; also, all letters and correspondence had with the Department in relation to the said subject. He said that this object was not in any way to condemn the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Department for the policy pursued by the Government with regard to these fisheries, as he was not in a position to form an opinion on it. His own impression and feeling was that the Department had desired to do what was right, and for the best interest of the fisheries, which were very important, involving the question of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Perhaps there was none other as valuable in the Dominion. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had sources of information, of course, in this relation, which he did not possess; but his constituents had requested him to ask for these papers in order to enable them to judge of the opinions of the officers of the Department as to whether the policy pursued was right or wrong. This was a reasonable request; and after the papers were brought down he would be able to form an opinion on the matter. It was a question of vital importance that these bass fisheries should be cultivated and sustained.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was aware that there was a good deal of feeling in the hon. gentleman's county on the subject; but he was satisfied that the course adopted was a sound and prudent one.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOUR MASTER AT PORT COLBORNE.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for all Orders in Council relating to the creation of the office of Harbour Master at Port Colborne, and to the appointment of Charles H. Carter to such office, and all correspondence with the Superintendent of the Canal and other persons on the subject of such appointment, together with a copy of the Regulations for the management and protection of the Canals and Harbours. He said he was told that the case stood thus. No harbour master had formerly been appointed at this port, but the Government, for some reason or other, took this step and named a political friend to the position. This particular friend was interested in vessels which passed through the canal, and he received a salary of $600 which was not of the slightest value to him (Mr. Carter.) But still he was the owner of a large number of tugs and it was important that he should be the Superintendent, and manage the whole affair, and he transferred the tugs to his sons. This was directly contrary to the 31st section of the regulations of the Department for the management of the Welland Canal, which provided that no man in charge of any work should have any interest in teams, boats, tugs, etc., used on the canal. He was told that Mr. Bodwell and Mr. Norris, member for Lincoln, protested against this appointment, and he would like to have an explanation from the Minister of Public Works on this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would bring down the papers. He was assured that Mr. Carter was not the owner of the tugs, nor had he heard before that they had been transferred to anybody. It was necessary to have a harbour master at Port Colborne, and Mr. Carter was appointed. Whether it was the best appointment or not he did not know, but he heard nothing against it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if Mr. Bodwell and Mr. Norris did not both protest against the appointment.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no recollection of their doing so, but he could not state positively at present.

Mr. McCALLUM said he agreed with the hon. the Minister of Public Works that it was necessary to have a harbour master at Port Colborne. There had been one there for a great many years, but he was transferred from the position to inspect the works in order to make room for Mr. Carter. A great injustice was done to Mr. Hamilton by removing him from the position of harbour master. The inspectorship would only continue for two or three years, and then he would have to go about his business; whereas Mr. Carter would probably hold the position of harbour master for life. It was well known that Mr. Carter owned tugs at the time of his appointment, and if they were not in that gentleman's name now, he (Mr. McCallum) had no doubt that he still owned them. It was in the public interest that no man interested in tugs on the Welland Canal should hold such an office.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said there was nothing in this cry against Mr. Carter owning tugs, because that gentleman had actually retired from business at the time of his appointment. Mr. Carter was a man of the highest respectability, integrity and truthfulness, and he would do nothing which was not in accordance with the strict discharge of his duties.

Mr. PLUMB said the gentleman whose name was brought forward in the resolution was, up to the time of his appointment, the proprietor of tugs doing business on the canal—at any rate, he owned them up to two or three days before his appointment. Those vessels were still doing business on the canal, and it seemed a little extraordinary that immediately Mr. Carter took the position of harbour master, they should be quietly transferred. This was undoubtedly done in order to render himself eligible for the office. If the representations made in regard to this case were true, it demanded a searching inquiry.

Motion agreed to.

PURCHASE OF IRON.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. PLUMB moved for return of all iron purchased by any of the Departments of the Government for other than railway purposes, the person from whom purchased, the prices paid, and whether the same was purchased by tender or otherwise and for the purpose for which said iron is required.

Motion agreed to.

MILITIA STAFF OFFICERS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for all Orders in Council appointing staff officers in the Militia since 1st January, 1875, and all reports by the Major-General commanding, and all letters and papers relating to the appointment and removal of staff officers in the Militia since 1st January, 1875.

Motion agreed to.

POSTMASTER OF JONQUIÈRES.

Mr. CIMON moved for: 1st. Copies of all correspondence respecting the appointment of Mr. Benjamin Lagacé, as Postmaster of Jonquières, in the county of Chicoutimi; 2nd. Copies of the latest tenders for the conveyance of the Mails between Chicoutimi and Jonquières; 3rd. Return showing to whom the contract for the said conveyance of the mails was granted, and in consideration of what sum of money it was taken, and whether the contract was given to the lowest tender.

Motion agreed to.

BOOMS AND PIERS ON THE GATINEAU.

Mr. CAMERON moved for a copy of the report made by a Select Committee of the Senate during the session of 1875, on the subject of the construction of the booms, piers, and other works on the Gatineau. He said it had always been contended by the hon. gentlemen opposite that one of the strong points on which they appealed to the public opinion of the country was, that all public works should be let by tender and that the lowest tenderer should honestly receive the contract. After investigating this matter with all the attention he could bestow upon it, he had come to the conclusion that that principle had been violated in the present instance, and he thought that the House should be in possession of the information upon which he had come to that conclusion. The facts were briefly these: An advertisement was published requiring tenders to be sent in for certain works in the shape of piers, booms, &c., on the Gatineau. There were six tenders in all sent in. The lowest was W. Palen, at $15,862.86; the next was J. Harvey, at $16,059.18. The others were:—No. 3—Murphy & Braden, $16,550.50; No. 4—Thomas Pidgeon, $17,193.29; No. 5—Robert Stanley, $19,131.79; No. 6—J. Lyons, $19,415.01. It would now be noticed that J. Lyons' tender was the highest. The four highest tenders were received at the office of the Minister of Public Works some time at twelve o'clock, noon, on a certain Saturday. It also appeared by the documents which he had asked for, that by usage of the Department of Public Works, tenders mailed before twelve o'clock on the day on which tenders were to be received, were considered as being in time, although it may have taken twenty-four hours before they could reach the office. The documents also showed, and the evidence was overwhelming, that the two lowest tenders were mailed before twelve o'clock on the day on which tenders were to be received. The four highest tenders did not, on their face show the gross amount for which the work was to be done. They had to be what was called "extended." On the Monday morning it came to the knowledge of the Deputy Minister of Public Works, that two other tenders had been received, which were not extended. They were stamped "P.M." on the envelope in which they were enclosed, Mr. Palen's being one of these. But the Deputy Minister of the Post Office Department reported that he was satisfied that these tenders were mailed before 12 o'clock. In consequence of that information the Deputy Minister of Public Works caused these two tenders to be opened, and the result was to show that Mr. Palen's was the lowest of all the tenders that had been sent in. Mr. Merrill, the Superintendent, upon ascertaining this fact, sent for Mr. Palen on Monday, the 9th, and informed him that he had the contract, and that he must proceed without delay to execute the work, as the state of the weather rendered it imperative that the work should be done at once. In consequence of this direction from Mr. Merrill, Palen commenced immediately to make the necessary preparations to carry on the work, and continued to employ men and teams, and provide material, until Monday, the 16th, when he received the first official information that the contract had been awarded to another party, and at once ceased to work. After that, some influence was brought to bear upon the Department to reconsider the question as to whether these two lowest tenders had been mailed in time or not. Amongst the documents he asked to be brought down was a letter, from a then Minister, addressed to the Assistant Engineer of Public Works, as follows :

"DEAR SIR,—The bearer is Mr. Lyons, a contractor in this city, who, I think, has tendered for the construction of the Gatineau booms. Mr. L. is well recommended, and is able, I think, to fulfil a contract if the work is given to him.

"Yours truly,

"(Signed) A. A. DORION.

"T. Trudeau,

"Assistant Engineer."

Strange to say, this letter had no date. There was, also, another letter without date :

"DEAR TRUDEAU,—Mr. John Lyons has a number of friends in the city who would be gratified by our giving him some work. Can we employ him to construct the Gatineau boom ?

"Yours truly,

"(Signed) R. W. SCOTT."

Another letter had a date, and the date on this was more significant than the absence of a date in the two former letters :

"We, the undersigned, are acquainted with the bearer, Mr. John Lyons, of Ottawa, contractor, and know him to be a good and competent person to fulfill whatever undertaking he tenders for. We have confidence in his sobriety and honesty of purpose and industry, and he has our earnest wishes for his success in what ever undertaking he enters upon.

"Ottawa, January 14th, 1874.

(Signed)

"W. H. WALLER,

"JOHN P. FEATHERSTON,

"WM. FINGLAND,

"DR. P. ST. JEAN,

"FRANCIS McDougall,

"CHARLES BATE.

"The Hon. R. W. Scott."

All the gentlemen here named were friends of the Government, with one exception, and it should be remarked that Mr. Lyons had always, hitherto, taken a prominent part in politics against the Government. Mr. Lyons turned out to be the highest tender for the work. Representations were made to the Department that something was wrong, and it ought to be considered whether or not the two lowest tenders had not been mailed in time. The Department considered the matter from Monday until Thursday, but did not take the smallest amount of evidence to ascertain whether these two lowest tenders had been mailed in time. The Government suddenly decided that they were mailed too late, and they gave the contract to Murphy & Braden for $16,550.50. But a still more strange circumstance happened afterwards. It turned out then that Lyons was a partner of Murphy & Braden. He (Mr. Cameron) felt that a constitutional principle had been violated, and that an injury had been done to an individual. The Senate Committee, after investigating all the facts, deliberately reported that Mr. Palen was honestly entitled to the contract, and that it should have been given to him. A minority report was made in which it was not even questioned that Mr. Palen was entitled to the contract, and it was recommended that he should have $1,000 paid him as recompense for not receiving it. The minority report did not commit itself to the sum of a thousand dollars, but still admitted that he was entitled to some compensation. After these reports were made, he was requested to send in a statement of the amount of the outlay he had made. He did claim the profits and the actual outlay of a thousand dollars, or thereabouts. He (Mr. Cameron) presumed it was on that evidence that the sum of a $1,000 should be paid, ignoring the claim for profits, that he thought should have been paid, if he were entitled to the contract; if he were not, it was doubtful whether he should have had anything at all. After that, the Department of Public Works took the matter in hands, after some considerable trouble he believed, and after some time they offered to pay him the small sum of $200, not stating the principle on which they had arrived at that calculation, but saying "There is the sum, take it if you like." The House ought to have documents so that they might see whether the hon. gentlemen had fulfilled their promises as to giving contracts to the lowest tenders, and also whether people engaged in the public service could be convinced when tenders were asked for, that the contracts were honestly awarded to the party who tendered at the lowest price.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had fallen into two or three mistakes. In the first place, this was all before the House. If he would turn to the journals of last Session he would see that a motion was made, and the papers brought before the House.

Mr. CAMERON: I was informed it was allowed to stand over on the request of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not at all. He would say again, as he had said twice before, that the Government did award the contract to the lowest tender. This person's tender was not in time, as would be seen. The Secretary and Deputy Minister opened the tenders which were in in time; the other two tenders were received by the Secretary on Monday, and there seemed to be a possibility at first that they were in time. It was agreed between the Deputy Minister, the Secretary, and himself that it would be well to open them. No tender was awarded to any person; but Mr. Merrill, on Tuesday, on his own responsibility, informed Mr. Palen that he was lowest. He had no right to do that; it was not any part of his duty to do that. The proper course was for the Secretary of the Department to intimate to the one whose tender was accepted, and not for a mere foreman or the manager of a work, such as was Mr. Merrill, to do anything of the kind. They had reason to believe that Mr. Merrill had been meddling in contracts in the same way, and when he (Mr. Mackenzie) sent for him, he called him to account for this. He quoted from his evidence given before the Committee last year to show the ground on which he acted. He knew nothing about the parties; but he did know that Mr. Palen urged his claims on the ground of being a supporter of his (Mr. Mackenzie.) Palen was the only one who did so urge. When the member for Cumberland put a motion on the paper last year, he had stated that he would consider this, and this only. Mr. Merrill stated to Palen on Tuesday that his tender was the lowest, —unofficially, improperly and without authority. He was notified on the Thursday that it was not the lowest, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) agreed that if Palen could establish what he had expended or done between the time of his improper notification by Merrill and his proper notification, it should be paid him. Mr. Trudeau examined into all his vouchers and accounts and found they amounted to $192, and he was paid that, on the principle that he might have supposed that Mr. Merrill had authority to make the statement, although that was difficult to imagine; but he (Mr. Mackenzie) was willing to go to the utmost length to that extent. There was one very curious matter in connection with these tenders to which he would call the attention of the House. John Harvey and Palen were the two whose tenders were put in too late. This John Harvey was the same person who was employed in Arnprior, and was here tendering for this work instead of attending to his own work.

Mr. ROCHESTER: Was he under Government pay at that time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I understood so.

Mr. ROCHESTER: I thought he was only employed during the summer?

Mr. MACKENZIE: He must have been under pay before the boom could be constructed.

Mr. ROCHESTER: That must have been in the winter.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the ground on which this tender was refused was the same as that on which they had refused tenders for almost every work,—the mails coming in too late; and unless they adhered rigidly to this rule, there would be no security to contractors. Those parties who put in their tenders before twelve o'clock on Saturday night, might have their tenders examined in Mr. Merrill's office, and information might be given.

Mr. ROCHESTER: Does the Government expect the tenders to be in the Department, or in the post office, by that time?

Mr. MACKENZIE said they expected all tenders to be sent to the Department. It was as easy to go to the office of the Department of Public Works as to go to the post office, and the usual plan was to take them to the Department. It was nearer, probably, to go to the Department, than for many people to go to the post office. In any case, tenders were to be received up to noon, but they were not to be received after noon. These two tenders referred to, were marked in the post office, "afternoon." The proof of that was, that they were not received with some others that were mailed. If they were in time, how was it they had not all come together? He was perfectly satisfied, after examining into the matter and conversing with Mr. Merrill, that these parties put in their tenders too late; that they got information improperly, and that this was the natural result of a system which would allow tenders to be accepted when they were put in too late. As to the report from the Senate, it was not, perhaps, very usual to refer to the proceedings at Committees; but he might say that he went there at the request of the Committee to be examined, and he found the Chairman of that Committee, Mr. Reed, at the head of the Committee, with Mr. Palen beside him, and the two conducted the examination between them. Anyone could infer from that what sort of an examination it was, and what sort of a Chairman of Committee.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked if the tenders were mailed in the post office in Ottawa by twelve o'clock, whether they should be delivered to the Department of Public Works on Saturday. He thought Mr. Griffin's evidence was somewhat different from what the Minister of Public Works had stated: that information could have been taken from Mr. Merrill's office to Mr. Palen, or any other individual tendering after, as he understood, Mr. Merrill had received the tenders from the Department to make up. He could not conceive how the Minister of Public Works could say that. If his memory served aright, it was on Saturday afternoon that Mr. Merrill received the tenders, and on Monday that he returned them to the office, after they had been made up. Mr. Merrill had, he believed, been an officer of the Government for over twenty years as Superintendent of the Public Works on the Ottawa, and, perhaps, altogether, for nearly thirty years; and he had not heard of any charge which had been preferred against him. He did not know that there had been anything wrong, and it was a very serious matter, after a man had spent his life in serving his country, that a charge of that kind should be made against him by the First Minister when he was out of service, having been superannuated. He did not think that the Minister was borne out in saying, or even insinuating, that Mr. Merrill would, under any circumstances, give any private information out of his office. Only five, six or seven days' notice was given for these tenders, the reason being that the season was so far advanced, and the boom must be got in before the ice went out of the Gatineau River. Mr. Merrill, he believed, stated that he saw Mr. Palen after he had made the tenders up, and told him that he had the contract, or that his was the lowest tender; and Mr. Palen on that, without any further notice, went to work, put on a large number of men, contracted for his timber, and was going on with the work next day, which was absolutely necessary in order to complete it before the ice would break up. From all he knew of it and the letters read, he must say he thought there was something which was not altogether right in connection with the award of this contract. He was sorry to say so; but he knew it was currently reported that such was the case. He believed it was mainly through the communications and interferences, personal and verbal, if not by letter, of a gentleman who had sat in the House, but who was now deceased, that the change was made, and that the stoppage of the work commenced by Mr. Palen was ordered. Under the circumstance, the least that the Government should do would be to reimburse this contractor for his outlay. Possibly Mr. Merrill might have exceeded his duty in giving notice to Mr. Palen, who sent in the lowest tender; but he thought that, as a general thing, Mr. Merrill had been a trusted officer, having given out contracts previously in many instances, and he (Mr. Merrill) evidently thought he was not doing wrong when he gave Mr. Palen such notice.

Mr. CAMERON said, in reply to the Minister of Public Works, he would state the evidence was quite clear that it was the practice of the Department to receive tenders mailed on the day on which tenders were called for. Mr. Trudeau in his evidence said:—

“As a general rule, we allow an additional day to give time to drain the post offices at a distance.”

Several tenders were so put in, and even in Ottawa it was the practice to drop tenders into the Post office, and not deliver them at the Public Works Department. Mr. X. Griffin in his evidence stated the practice as to the mailing of tenders, and also expressly that the letter addressed to the Department of Public Works was received. There was also the following letter received from the Deputy Postmaster General:—

“POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
“OTTAWA, 9th February, 1874.

“MY DEAR SIR—Mr. Wm. Palen states that he dropped into the receiver's box of the Ottawa Post Office on Saturday last, a little before twelve at noon, a tender addressed to your Department; then he shortly afterwards came up to this Department to see the Postmaster General, and mentioned that he had so tendered. The Honourable Mr. Macdonald remembers that Mr. Palen did so call and make mention of his having tendered. This was between twelve and one o'clock on Saturday. Mr. Hopkirk, the Postmaster General's Secretary, also remembers Mr. Palen's visit, and that it was about half-past twelve on Saturday. Mr. Palen states that after posting his tender he went back to the Russell House, and was some time there before he came up to the Postmaster General. The circumstantial evidence is therefore somewhat strong that the tender was posted as stated, though not taken out of the post office receiver until after twelve, as shewn by the postmaster's stamp.

“Yours truly,

(Signed) “W. H. GRIFFIN.”

Surely after the receipt of this letter from the responsible head of the Post Office Department, it was the duty of the Department of Public Works, to institute an investigation as to the time when the tender was mailed, and not to decide summarily that it was not mailed before noon because the letters “p. m.” were on the envelope. He supposed that the letters were not promptly taken out of the receiving box; and, under these circumstances, letters posted before noon might be so stamped. This was no evidence as to the time of mailing; and, if it was the practice to accept tenders if posted before twelve, when this letter was received from the Deputy Postmaster-General, the least that could have been done would have been to investigate the matter. The Department, although not only Palen but also Harvey and other tenderers, swore that the letter was mailed before noon and before the gun fired, and although that the Deputy Postmaster-General certified that the tender was mailed before twelve,—yet saw fit to reject these tenders and summarily decide that the letter was not mailed before twelve; and not only had they ignored positive and sworn testimony, but they considered that suspicion existed against an officer of the Government (Mr. Merrill) for having proved false to his duty, and given information on which Palen put in a tender lower than the previous ones; and on this mere suspicion, against the sworn evidence of Palen and Harvey, they rejected these tenders and favoured the man who sent in the highest tender, and who became the partner of the man who was accepted as having sent in the lowest tender. And as these two were rejected under such circumstances, hon. members had to consider a suspicion, not resting on a merely vague surmise such as that entertained by the Minister of Public Works, who inferred that Mr. Merrill had proved untrue to his duty—but on good, substantial grounds, even if for a moment they laid aside the letters written by Ministers of the Crown—that political influence had been brought to bear in awarding this contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman considered himself justified in stating that more regard should be paid to a suspicion directed against a Minister of the Crown than to one against a public servant.

Mr. CAMERON: I say nothing of the kind; but more regard should have been paid to sworn evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman knew that there was no sworn evidence until months afterwards. The hon. gentleman had said that, despite sworn evidence before them, they had decided in this way. This was the colour the hon. gentleman had chosen to give the transaction; this was the sort of fair play the hon. gentleman was disposed to extend to them; this was a specimen of it. But what were the facts: Mr. Braun, who received the tenders in the first place, stated:—

“On Saturday, the 7th February, 1874, at noon, several tenders were received, as called for by the notice (paper A.) On Saturdays, during vacation, the public offices close at one o'clock.

“On the day referred to, after one o'clock, I was still in the office, and Mr. Merrill, the Superintendent of the Ottawa River Works, called to know if the tenders had been opened.

“The rule of the office in opening tenders, unless in case of emergency, is not to open them till next day; the reasons for that is, that tenders may be dropped into the local post office in the morning, when they are stamped ‘A.M.’ and not be received in the office till the afternoon.”

“The outside general mail is received at the Post Office Department, and is there distributed to the Departments; but the local letters are called for by messengers at the post office.

“I replied to Mr. Merrill that they were not. He said the case was urgent, and no time was to be lost; upon which I took the tenders, some four or five, to the Deputy Minister, and stated what Mr. Merrill had said, upon which he decided that we should open the tenders, which was done.”

That was, they were opened an hour after they were received. Mr. Braun further stated:

“As these tenders were at schedule prices and had to be extended, we handed them to Mr. Merrill for that purpose. On the Monday morning, among the letters brought to me from the General Post Office, were two letters addressed to me with this in loration: ‘Tender for Gatineau Boom.’ On receiving letters or tenders I stamp them with a stamp bearing the date of the day of the month that I receive them. I looked at the local post office stamp and saw that both bore the date 7th, P.M.

There was more than this. The Montreal mail always came about five o'clock in the afternoon, but these tenders did not come with this mail on that day. They were only received on the Monday morning following; and they bore the stamp of Saturday afternoon. Beyond all doubt, they were posted in the afternoon too late to be brought to the office with the Montreal mail. This was the evidence upon which the hon. gentleman, for the sake of a little paltry political capital, endeavoured to make an unfair, unjust and scandalous statement. Mr. Braun also said:—

“The same morning Mr. Palen called at the office and asked about his tender, but I answered that I had received no tender from him.”

Such was the statement of the Secretary of the Public Works Department. Then Mr. Trudeau stated, “Harvey's tender is also marked Ottawa Post Office, P.M.” Mr. Merrill had expressed some surprise that there were no more tenders, appearing to know that another tender which was not there, was to have come in. The next they heard of it was on the following Monday, when, in order to be scrupulously careful, and not to do wrong, as he had heard it asserted that the letters were posted in time, he said to Mr. Trudeau, that, perhaps on the whole, they had better open the tenders, and give them the benefit of the doubt. Then came the information that Mr. Merrill had immediately rushed to tell Palen that he had received the contract. Such a thing had never been done before. He had never previously known of a subordinate going and volunteering such information to a contractor. It was quite unprecedented.

Mr. ROCHESTER: But there was necessity for pushing on the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was nothing. It was no more the business of Merrill than of the hon. gentleman to act so; and this had induced the belief on his part that some one who had seen the tenders opened on Saturday had given information on which other tenders were based. There being a possibility that this could have been done, they had adhered rigidly to the rule of the Department—not to look at the tenders received too late. He was never better satisfied with any action than with this in his life.

Mr. CAMERON said the hon. gentleman had accused him of making a scandalous charge, and, therefore, he thought that a personal explanation was due himself. The hon. gentleman had charged him with political partizanship, but he wholly denied it. If he had said anything scandalous—and this he denied—it was conclusive that the hon. gentleman and other hon. gentlemen opposite had made scandalous charges without any foundation for them. If he had done so he would only have been following the example of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had called the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) to order for using the term, and he must also call the hon. member to order.

Mr. CAMERON said he had not heard Mr. Speaker call the hon. gentleman to order. He had ventured to reply, and the hon. gentleman had contradicted his statement, that there was sworn evidence before the hon. gentleman. The affidavit of Mr. Palen was dated the 12th of February, before the contract was given out, as he understood the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. CAMERON said this was the case. Tenders were called for on Saturday the 7th, and on the 8th or 10th, on Monday or Tuesday, Palen was told he had the contract, and on Wednesday or Thursday he went on with the work, and on Thursday, as a doubt was suggested, he sent in an affidavit; and only on the Monday following, the other men went and insisted on going on with the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was awarded on the 10th.

Mr. CAMERON said there was no evidence of this. Mr. Palen's sworn document was sent to the Department of Public Works on the 12th of February. This affidavit showed what were the facts. On the 13th, the following day, the affidavit of Harvey was made, and the hon. gentleman opposite had also Mr. Griffin's statement, which he had read, and which was dated the 9th, Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That amounts to nothing.

Mr. CAMERON said that on these documents at any rate, Palen ought to have been given the opportunity of proving when his own tender was mailed, before, on suspicion, the contract was taken away from him by the Government, and given to another; and when they found that this contract was awarded practically to a man who had the recommendations of Cabinet Ministers, and who, between the 14th and 28th of January, changed his politics, becoming a supporter of the hon. gentleman opposite, he held that there ought to have been something stronger to rest upon than the suspicion on which the charge was made against Merrill.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked whether it was not customary for men wishing to tender to call at the office for the information they required before making out tenders.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this depended on where the plans and specifications were to be seen.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked whether it was not customary for them to call at Mr. Merrill's office for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they called wherever the plans and specifications were placed for examination.

Mr. ROCHESTER said in this case the plans and specifications were at Mr. Merrill's office. This was the reason why Mr. Merrill knew that more tenders were sent than were received.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is irregular to make a proposal to send to the Senate for papers which are already in our possession.

Mr. CAMERON: I was not aware of that fact.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE QUEEN VERSUS WILKINSON.

MOTION FOR LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

"That the Hon. Richard John Cartwright have leave of absence to attend the Assizes now being holden in the Town of Cobourg, in obedience to a subpoena served upon him to give evidence in the case of the Queen, on the prosecution of Hon. John Simpson, against James A. Wilkinson."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it might be as well to inform the House that several days ago he received letters, both from Senator Simpson and the legal representative of Mr. Wilkinson, desiring his attendance at Cobourg; but to both parties he had replied, that in the state of public business this was utterly impossible. To attend the Court at this time, could not be done without the greatest possible inconvenience to the business of the country; and he had, consequently, declined to go. As a matter of fact, although an attempt had been made to serve a subpoena on him in the corridors of the House—and he rather thought this was a breach of privilege—he did not think that any subpoena had been served on him, nor did he think that there was any sort of precedent for expecting a Minister holding his office, at this time in the Session, to absent himself from attendance on Parliament for any such purpose. As a matter of course, if the law permitted, it would give him much pleasure to be examined by a Commission here, which was done in one or two cases; but he thought the House would see that to attempt to establish such a precedent as this motion would do, would be attended by the greatest possible inconvenience.

Mr. CAMERON said it was perfectly impossible to have the hon gentleman examined by Commission, inasmuch as the jury would be sworn to-morrow morning. If the hon. gentleman would agree to the motion it would only involve one day's absence. Of course, it was a matter of the greatest importance that the duties of the hon. the Finance Minister should be discharged here, but this trial was also of grave importance to the people. It was desirable to understand whether there was any foundation for all this talk of corruption in high places, and if the hon. gentleman could throw any light on the matter it was his duty to give evidence at the trial.

Mr. BOWELL said he was not aware that granting leave to any hon. member to obey the summons of the Court compelled him to go. The right to punish bailiffs or anyone for serving subpoenas on members of Parliament within the precincts of the House had long been given up. On this point May said:—

"Various other cases subsequently occurred, in which the parties who had served subpoenas upon members of both Houses were committed or otherwise punished for their contempt. But of late years, so far from withholding the attendance of members as witnesses in Courts of Justice, the Commons have frequently granted leave of absence to their members, on the express ground that they have been summoned as witnesses, and have even admitted the same excuse for defaulters at calls of the House. * * * As the withdrawal of a witness may affect the administration of justice, the privilege has very properly been waived."

He thought it was quite clear, according to the latest practice in the Imperial Parliament, it was not considered a breach of privilege to serve a member with a subpoena.

Mr. HOLTON: Within the walls of the House?

Mr. BOWELL said he would not make that point. The authorities did not say anything as to the locality in which the subpoena should be served. His reason for submitting the motion was to further the ends of justice, and it was done at the request of the person prosecuted for criminal slander. He had no desire to be kept here longer than was absolutely necessary; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) must remember that liberty of speech was at stake in this matter, and if the evidence of any hon. member was of weight he should attend and give that evidence. If the information the hon. gentleman had given to the House had been given when he first presented the petition, he did not know that he would have proceeded further with this motion. He took the course which he deemed to be in the interests of justice and in the interest of a man who had been prosecuted, and, without the hon. gentleman's evidence, might be punished.

Motion negatived on a division.

DAWSON ROUTE SUBSIDY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for Returns of all monies paid to Carpenter & Co., together with Orders in Council recommending such payment on account of the Dawson Route Subsidy, up to 31st March, 1877.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL PAY LISTS.

MOTION FOR COPIES.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for Copies of the Departmental Pay Lists for the months of October, 1873, and March, 1877.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there were so many of those pay lists that he could hardly see the necessity for this. Besides, the month of October, 1873, was an ominous one. It would be interesting to have November, 1873, included, and, with that addition, he had no objection to the motion passing.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION FOR STATEMENTS.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the Clerk do lay on the Table a statement showing the ages, names, present salaries, and length of service of each officer and permanent Clerk in his Department; also, the ages, names and salaries or daily pay, with date when pay commenced, of the Sessional or Extra Clerks at present employed in the service of the House of Commons; also, a statement by the Sergeant at Arms shewing the ages, names, salaries or daily pay and length of service of Officers, Messengers and others in his Department, whether employed permanently or otherwise.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes before
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 17th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

NEW WRIT.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that a vacancy having occurred in the representation, by the resignation of J. M. Currier, Esq., Member for the Electoral Division of the City of Ottawa, he had, in conformity with the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 5, Section 12, issued his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out a new Writ of Election, for the said Electoral Division.

GODERICH HARBOUR WORKS.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Order for the House again to go into Committee of Supply read.

Mr. FARROW said, before Mr. Speaker left the Chair, he wished to call attention to a matter respecting the Goderich Harbour contract. He thought he would be able to prove to the House that this was no ordinary matter—that it was a matter that came home to the Government; and that it was a matter that the country had a great interest in, because, he contended, a vast amount of money was expended needlessly, uselessly, and unjustly in connection with this work. They all knew that times had been hard in Canada. The country had been crying out about hard times for the last three years, and, during the past year, the times had been still harder, on account of the failure of the crops. When the people experienced hard times they acted wisely, because they paid great attention to their expenditures, and whenever they found a leak stopped it. They began to live more economically; they began to husband their resources so as to outlive the hard times. To illustrate, he considered the country had acted like a ship in distress at sea. When it was found that a voyage was going to last six weeks which was only expected to extend over four, the crew were immediately put on short allowance so that the provisions might last out for the voyage. If they did not do that the most dreadful famine would occur. The country had acted on that principle throughout; but, he was sorry to say, just the contrary could be said of the Government. While the people had been living economically, and husbanding their resources, the Government had been wastefully expending the public money, and he hoped to show that in this particular instance they had thrown into the hands of a pet and supporter no less than $30,000 of the hard earnings of the country. During the early part of the Session they heard a great deal about the charges made at picnics last Session. Hon. members opposite had said a great deal about meeting those charges. Why did not they meet them fairly, squarely and honestly, like men? Referring to certain charges made against him by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), the hon. Premier, in a speech at Watford, said: "I shall make that hon. gentleman answer this on the floor of Parliament." The hon. gentleman had not fulfilled that promise, and at this late stage of the Session he thought every one would agree with him that the hon. gentleman had no intention to do so. The right hon. member from Kingston charged the hon. the First Minister with having given contracts to tenderers that were higher than others equal in ability and financial standing. It would be remembered that early in the Session he moved for papers respecting this contract. From those papers he found that a Mr. Tolton tendered for this work at $182,630; then came Mr. Neilson, at $200,375; Mr. Ellis, $212,155; and then the successful firm, Moore & Co., $212,540. This tender of Moore & Co. was about $30,000 higher than Mr. Tolton's. On the 28th February, 1874, an Order in Council was passed, awarding the contract to Mr. Ellis, of Toronto, Messrs. Neilson and Tolton being passed by. But, strange to say, four days afterwards the following telegram was sent by Mr. Braun to Mr. Moore:—

"Are you prepared to deposit 5 per cent., and are your securities men of large means and property?"

The firm replied in the affirmative—he wanted the House to bear that in mind. On the 2nd March, Messrs. Moore & Co. sent a telegram to Ottawa stating that one of their firm would go to that city and make arrangements, and immediately after that an Order in Council was passed, giving the contract to this firm. The House would bear in mind that they had here an answer by telegram, saying that they were able to deposit 5 per cent. as security, and to give good security. When this was examined, however, these men were not able to make the money deposit, but in lieu of it they offered a property they represented to be worth $14,000. The Government very wisely—and he gave them credit for it—sent one of their agents to a barrister named Ellwood, at Goderich, and asked him to value the property and report on the title. He was acquainted with Mr. Ellwood, who thoroughly understood the value of property in that section, and the House would be astonished to learn that this gentleman estimated the property to be worth only about $4,500 instead of $14,000, while there was also a mortgage on it of $1,400. Moore and Company then put in a little more property, situated in Walkerton, in addition, and obtained other valuers, according to their own thinking, it seemed, from the return, and these persons valued these two properties at $7,500. The Government then, in lieu of keeping to the first proposition as to the 5 per cent. on the contract price, accepted this property worth $7,500, something like $3,000 less than was originally intended. He now come to the most important part of the affair. The House would recollect that when he moved for the papers, the Premier appeared to be a little alarmed, and, he might say, the Minister of Justice was also a little concerned. The Premier at once saw his dilemma. In looking over the transaction, the hon. gentleman observed a discrepancy of $30,000, and wrote to his officer to ask how it came to pass that Mr. Tolton did not obtain the Goderich Harbour contract. This little matter had, nevertheless, cost the country $30,000. Mr. Page replied, stating that the first reason was—that this man was unknown to the Government; the second, that his tender was too low—a very strange reason he might remark; and the third, that if this man had got the contract, he might have been ruined, and the Government might have thereby sustained loss. He wished to examine these points briefly. He did not altogether blame Mr. Page for insincerity. When Mr. Page wrote that this man was unknown, they made no effort to find out who he was. This seemed strange to him, because Mr. Tolton had already executed one contract at Meaford Harbour for the Government, to their satisfaction, and the man's name was in their own office. Mr. Tolton was a man who carried out faithfully and well all he undertook; and how could the Government, under the circumstances, say he was unknown. Mr. Tolton might have been partially unknown to Mr. Page, but not to the Premier, as he would prove. He would further show that the tender was not too low. Before this tender was sent in, Mr. Tolton asked Mr. John Brown of Thorold, how much he would charge for 400,000 yards of dredging, and Mr. Brown had replied, that he (Brown) would make a clear profit of $12,000 on the dredging, and a proportionate profit on the iron work, because the contract for supplying the ironwork for Meaford Harbour was let to one Lockerby, who was eager and anxious also to secure the contract for the supply of such work for the Goderich Harbour job at the same figure. Therefore he asked whether this tender was too low. In the next place, why should the Government be so much concerned about any possible loss that might befall Tolton when they were offered abundance of security. People generally did not so act under such circumstances. If Tolton had attempted to do the work at too low a figure, he would have received only 90 per cent. for work done, and besides having this performed so cheaply, in case of failure, the Government would also have had the ten per cent retained; therefore the Government could not have suffered any loss as far as he could perceive. He considered the argument in question a blind, which was unworthy of consideration. He contended that Mr. Tolton was well known in his own locality as a contractor, as a grain buyer, as a capable man, and as a faithful and experienced man. In the face of these facts how would the country view this transaction. In one sense, the Government knew not the man; but they knew the other men into whose hands they were going to place thousands of dollars of the country's money. It might be asked why the Government gave this contract to men who tendered at a figure $30,000 higher than Mr. Tolton, who was financially able and in a position to give better security. Mr. Tolton could have furnished security to the amount of $50,000 more than the others, and his sureties were Sheriff Tuttle and his brother, who lived in the township of Eramosa and was worth $80,000, while the three other men could only furnish security for $7,500. Why did the Government do this? Thereby hung a tale. It would be recollected by many members of the House that the Minister of Justice ran for election in Bruce in 1867. However strong politically the hon. gentleman might have been afterwards and now was, the hon. gentleman was not at that time so strong because he was very nearly defeated, only obtaining a majority of seven. This very man, up to the time of that election had always been an out and out Conservative, but then he turned his coat and afterwards boasted that his friends had become supporters of the present Minister of Justice for whom he had secured many other votes. If it had not been for this defection from the Conservative party, the hon. gentleman would at the time have likely been defeated. One good turn deserves another; and when this little job or contract came on the carpet, Moore was of course anxious to secure it, and he accordingly went to the very best source to gain support—the present Minister of Justice, who he (Mr. Farrow) believed, was not in the habit of writing letters to parties wishing to be advanced. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman wrote to Mr. Moore a very carefully worded letter as follows:—

“TORONTO, Jan. 2nd, 1874.

“MY DEAR MAACKENZIE,—David Moore, of Walkerton asks me to inform you that he is about to tender for the Goderich works, and I do so accordingly. I told my friend Moore that an introduction was unnecessary, as you would let the work fairly without respect of persons.”

No doubt the Minister of Justice wrote that letter in the interest of the country. But if an introduction was useless and unnecessary why was it written at all. It must have been a certain preliminary leading to an introduction of some kind or other, and no doubt somehow or other it had a certain influence in the direction intended. He had no objection to the Government giving positions to their friends: for “to the victors belong the spoils.” But when money was to be expended on public works, advertisements ought to be issued, and the men who offered to do the work, whether Conservative or Reformer, at the lowest price, should, other things being equal, receive the contract; and the Government which did not so act was reprehensible. He believed that the present Government had violated the principle of the contract system, and he therefore moved the following resolution:

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That by a Return to an Address from the House of the 21st February, 1877, dated the 8th March, 1877; for copies of all Orders in Council having reference to the Goderich Harbour Works, in 1874, together with a copy of the notice or advertisement calling for tenders for such work, the tenders received in response and Reports in relation thereto, with the contract entered into for the performance of such work, it appears:—

“That in all 16 tenders were sent in, for the performance of said work, averaging from $182,630—to $301,185. The four lowest tenders, being as follows:—

John S. Tolton, Walkerton.....	$182,630
George Neilson, Belleville.....	200,375
W. H. Ellis, Toronto.....	212,155
Moore, Clendenning & Wilson, Walkerton .....	212,540

“That on the 23rd February, 1874, an Order in Council was passed, setting forth the fact that 16 tenders had been sent in, and containing as follows:—‘That W. H. Ellis, whose tender is third lowest, and when extended is found to amount to $212,155, appears to be in a position to execute the work satisfactorily, and that his sureties appear to be good and solvent, and recommending that the tender of Mr. Ellis be accepted, and that for the due fulfillment of his contract satisfactory security be required on real estate, or by deposit of money, public or municipal securities, or bank stock, to the amount of 5 per cent. on the bulk sum of his contract.’

“That four days later, on the 27th February, without any information in relation to the said Ellis having, as appears by the Return, been furnished to the Department, a telegram to the following effect, was sent by Mr. Braun, Secretary of the Department of Public Works, to Messrs. Moore, Clendenning & Wilson:—

“‘Your tender for Goderich Harbour Works is among the lowest; are you prepared to deposit 5 per cent. of contract amount, and are both your sureties men of large means and property,’ to which telegram Moore & Co., on the 28th day of February, replied as follows:—

“‘Prepared to make deposit and go on with Goderich Harbour Works; can give satisfaction as to standing of sureties.’

“That on the 7th March an Order in Council was passed on a memorandum of the Minister of Public Works of the 5th March, stating:—‘That Mr. Ellis has left the country, and recommending that the next lowest tender, that of Messrs. David Moore & Co., whose tender, when extended, amounts to the sum of $212,540, be accepted.’

“That on the 20th March, 1874, a letter was addressed to J. Y. Elwood, Esq., of Goderich, instructing him to examine titles, and state value of property offered by Messrs. David Moore & Co. as security, and to say what it would bring at Sheriff’s sale.

“That on the 28th March, the said Elwood reported to the Department of Public Works, that the property offered was worth from $5,000 to $5,500, less a mortgage upon it of $1,400.

“That by a schedule submitted by other valuers appointed by the Government on the 11th June, 1874, it appears that properties valued at $11,800, less $3,400, incumbrances, were accepted as security, the security having been fixed by the Department at $7,500, being $3,127 less than 5 per cent. on the bulk sum of the contract.

“That on the 16th day of February, 1877, after notice had been given of the intention to move for the papers, a letter was addressed by Mr. Page to Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of Public Works, in answer to enquiry from him, explaining the reason why the tender of John S. Tolton had not been accepted, the reason being that the tender of John S. Tolton was at that time looked upon as so low that some trouble was taken to ascertain whether he was a person acquainted with such work; but no information could be obtained about him, and that it would be injudicious to entrust the execution of such work to him, as it probably would result, not only in a loss to the Government, but also prove ruinous to the man himself. But there does not appear to have been any correspondence in relation to the said John S. Tolton, or any reference to him or to the reason for ignoring his tender at the time the contract was let.

"That on the 22nd February, 1877, the Hon. E. Blake addressed a note to the Hon. A. Mackenzie, requesting that a letter written by him on the 2nd January, 1874, might be included among the papers, which letter was in the following terms:—

" 'TORONTO, January 2nd, 1874.

" 'MY DEAR MACKENZIE,—David Moore, of Walkerton, asks me to inform you that he is about to tender for the Goderich Works, and I do so accordingly. I told my friend Moore that an introduction was unnecessary, as you would let the work fairly without respect of persons.

" 'Yours truly,

" (Signed) 'EDWARD BLAKE.'

"That, notwithstanding the statement in the letter of Mr. Page to Mr. Mackenzie, it appears from a statement made by an honorable member in his place in this House, that the Hon. Minister of Public Works had information connected with the said John S. Tolton, the following telegram having been addressed to him by Mr. David Stirton, at that time a Member of this House:—

" 'GUELPH, January 4th, 1874.

" 'To the Hon. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa :

" 'I understand that John S. Tolton, of Walkerton, has tendered for the Goderich Harbour Works. Mr. Tolton is a thorough practical, honest and reliable man, financially able, and accustomed to the construction of Public Works. The securities named are reliable, sound men.

" (Signed) 'D. STIRTON.'

"That it appears that the tender of John S. Tolton was improperly ignored, and that the country has lost thereby the sum of $29,525.

"That in the opinion of this House, the Government in thus awarding this contract, are justly censurable for violating the principles of the contract system, and causing serious loss to the country."

Mr. MACKENZIE said, so this was the response to the challenge he had made to the hon. gentlemen opposite to make good their picnic speeches. He accepted that response, and was quite prepared to show that not only had the Government employed "a continuous system," to use the language of the hon. gentleman, of setting aside the lowest tenders and of finding some excuse to give contracts to their political friends, but he was prepared to show that the Government had succeeded beyond all former Governments, or at least beyond the late Government, in awarding the largest number of the lowest tendered contracts in the public service. Of this particular contract he would say a few words in the course of a few minutes. In 1870 the entire number of contracts let was 52; of these 25 only were let to the lowest tenderers. In 1871, 75 contracts were let, of which 46 were let to the lowest tenderers; in 1872, 77 contracts were let, of which 38 were let to the lowest tenderers; in 1873, 76 contracts were let, of which 43 were let to the lowest tenderers. In 1874, the first year of the present Administration, 90 contracts were let, of which 59 were let to the lowest tenderers; in 1875, 73 contracts were let, of which 58 were let to the lowest tenderers; in 1876, 30 contracts were let, of which 23 were let to the lowest tenderers. The percentage let to the lowest tenderers was as follows:—In 1870, as to numbers, 48 per cent.; as to amounts, 16 per cent. In 1871, as to numbers, 61 per cent.; as to amounts, 37 per cent. In 1872, as to numbers, 49 per cent.; as to amounts, 32 per cent. In 1873, as to numbers, 57 per cent.; as to amounts, 22 per cent. In 1874, the first year of the present Government, as to numbers, 63 per cent.; as to amounts, 43 per cent. In 1875, as to numbers, 79 per cent.; as to amounts, 78 per cent. In 1876, as to numbers, 77 per cent.; as to amounts, 92 per cent. But he had another statement still to give. In this he left out all of the lowest tenders that were passed over, for reasons attributable to contractors, because sometimes the lowest tenders were not accepted on account of the lowest tenderers withdrawing their tenders. Leaving out all such, he gave the results in this way: In 1870, 52 contracts were let altogether, and of these 32 of the lowest were accepted, or 62 per cent. were given to the lowest tenderers. The total amount of contracts let was $9,135,430, of which $2,455,000 was given to the lowest tenderers. In 1871, 75 contracts were let altogether, and of these 58 of the lowest were accepted. The total amount was $4,027,000, of which $1,765,000 was given to the lowest tenderers. In 1872, 77 contracts were let, of which 50 were given to the lowest tenderers. The total amount was $1,695,000, of which $846,000 was given to the lowest tenderers. In 1873, 73 contracts were let, of which 53 were given to the lowest tenderers, representing a sum of nearly $2,000,000, out of $6,000,000. In 1874, the first year of the present Government, there were 90 contracts let, of which 70 were given to the lowest tenderers. The total amount was $5,500,000, of which $2,987,000 was given to the lowest tenderers. In 1875, 73 contracts were let, of which 69 were given to the lowest tenderers, the other four being given to the next lowest. The total amount was $9,269,000, of which $9,097,000 was given to the lowest tenderers. In 1876, 30 contracts were let, of which 25 were given to the lowest tenderers. The total amount was $4,665,000, of which $4,297,000 was given to the lowest tenderers. He directed the officers of his Department to prepare, carefully, tabular statements, showing, in every case, during the past seven years, the names of the parties who sent in the lowest tenders, and every particular regarding them; and from them it would be seen, at a glance, how far the Government had carried that principle practically into operation. The tables to which he had briefly adverted, and given the general results, showed that the Government had devoted themselves with great anxiety and assiduity to giving out contracts invariably to the lowest tender, where such could be done consistently with the interests of the public service; and that the Government had done that to a much greater extent than did the late Government. Those statements he would submit, of course, to the Press, in order that they might give them to the public. He did not know of a single instance where the Government deviated from that rule for anything but public reasons. It was true they had been told in one case—the case mentioned last night—that a person was passed by because he was not of the same political faith as the Government; but he (Mr. Mackenzie) had been able to show, and to prove, that that person was the only one in his (Mr. Mackenzie's) office who declared he was of his own political faith. If a political friend obtained a contract, it was said to be due to the fact that he was a political friend; and, if a political opponent received a contract, it was alleged to be because he had to be bought over. Such was the various reasons assigned. When the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow), or some other member, called attention to the matter, he (Mr. Mackenzie) had no recollection of the circumstances, and he asked Mr. Page to put him in possession of the reasons why Mr. Tolton was passed over. Mr. Page wrote the following letter:—

“ OTTAWA, 16th February, 1877.

“ HON. A. MACKENZIE,

“ SIR,—In reference to your enquiry this morning as to why the tender of John S. Tolton for Goderich Harbour Works was not accepted in January, 1874:

“ I recollect distinctly that, after the tenders were opened and extended, I was called into your office and shown the list, and observed that Mr. William Sutton, Sheriff, Walkerton, was one of the sureties. The same gentleman was one of the sureties for Harvey & Korman, who had the contract for the new entrance channel and part of the dredging at Goderich in 1871-72.

“ I was subsequently informed by this firm that Mr. Sutton, although appearing as a surety, was in some measure a partner, and was so very sharp and troublesome that they had to buy him out in order to get along in anything like a satisfactory manner. Korman also left the firm, and the works were completed by Mr. Harvey and Paul Ross, the latter being the surety for the firm. John S. Tolton's tender was at that time looked upon as so low that some trouble was taken to ascertain whether he was a party acquainted with public work; but no information could be obtained about him. The other surety offered was Henry Tolton, a farmer of Eramosa. Judging from the tender (which appears as if it were in Mr. Sutton's handwriting) that Mr. Tolton might also be a farmer unacquainted with the class of work required, which, it may be observed, consisted of a double line of pier work 60 feet apart, the north or river pier being 2,300 feet long, for which a channel had to be dredged, the pier work sunk and carried to the full height the same season in which it was commenced, requiring considerable plant, knowledge, means and energy. I therefore advised that, from the low rates of the tender, the person, so far as could be ascertained, being unknown as a contractor, together with the circumstances previously mentioned, that it would be useless to entrust the execution of such works to him, as it probably would result not only in a loss to the Government, but also prove ruinous to the man himself.

"Yours, &c.,

"JOHN PAGE."

That being the opinion of the Chief Engineer it was accepted and acted upon. But it would be said there was another person, Mr. George Neilson, who was next to Mr. Tolton in the amount of tender, the sum being $200,375. Mr. Neilson was passed over because he was their defaulter on two contracts, one on the Intercolonial and one at Port Colborne, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) had made it a rule of the Department that where contractors failed to carry out work, their tenders should not be considered until satisfactory arrangements had been made with regard to the works undertaken. Acting on that principle several tenders had been altogether rejected. The Messrs. Hatch who failed on the contract for the post office building in Ottawa tendered when the work was re-let, but the Department declined to receive or consider their tender. Mr. W. H. Ellis was the next lowest, and he was communicated with at once, but for some reason Mr. Ellis declined to answer any letters. Messrs Moore & Co. were next in order, and they were communicated with. He was altogether unaware as to who the gentlemen were, knew nothing about them, never heard as to their political antecedents, who they were, where they lived, or what connections they had in any respect whatever. Those gentlemen were as much strangers to him as any of the other tendering parties; indeed, the only party tendering whom he knew was Mr. Neilson, who was very well known to him, and whom he would have been very glad to have seen receive the contract but for the circumstances mentioned. He had, therefore, merely to say that in this, as in all other contracts, the Government had acted in the most perfect good faith, trusting necessarily to a very large extent, and especially at that time, having newly assumed the cares of office, to the reports of officials, more perhaps than might have been necessary at a later period. The hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) had indulged in various speculations as to what advantages his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) thought might be derived from giving the contract to those parties, and to various other circumstances to which he (Mr. Mackenzie) would not allude as not being pertinent to the matter in hand. He declined to discuss mere probabilities and dreams of the hon. member, and he simply declared that in this, as in all other matters of a similar kind, the Government acted, first, with the most perfect good faith, and, second, with a single eye to the public interest, that being the chief matter to be attended to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the statistics given by the hon. the Minister of Public Works as to the percentage of lowest tenders accepted by the late and present Government would be of some use to the country and some information to the House. He did not, however, see what bearing that information had on the case under discussion. Every contract must stand on its own merits; whether the course of the Government or Department of Public Works was right or wrong was to be determined simply by the facts of each particular case. The facts of the present case were those: Mr. Tolton, who had put in the lowest tender, was a Government contractor at the time he tendered for the Goderich Harbour works. He was a contractor employed under Mr. Page on the harbour works at Meaford. He was known to be a contractor. It was proved he was a wealthy, responsible and competent man; and why, then, did he not receive the contract? The hon. the Premier had read a statement made the other day by Mr. Page, stating his recollection of what happened in 1874. Where was Mr. Page's report of 1874? And if Mr. Page did not know in 1874 who Mr. Tolton was, why, the hon. the Premier should have told him. The hon. gentleman had received a letter and telegram from Mr. Stirton, who was known to hon. members as worthy of confidence for his veracity and shrewdness, and the Government had so much confidence in him that they gave him an office at Guelph. Every one knew "honest James Stirton," and no one knew him better or valued him more than the hon. the Premier. That hon. gentleman was informed by Mr. Stirton that Mr. Tolton was a good, competent and wealthy man, and that his sureties were men of wealth. The hon. gentleman possessed that information, but he did not convey it to Mr. Page, who was wandering in ignorance all the time. As Mr. Page was a respectable person, no doubt his statement was true, and probably he had forgotten that Mr. Tolton was employed on Meaford Harbour Works. The difficulty experienced by Mr. Page with regard to Mr. Tolton, would have been at once removed if the hon. the Premier had handed over a telegram he had received from Mr. Stirton. Why were those circumstances withheld from Mr. Page? It was difficult to understand why Mr. Moore should be favoured. The letter written by the hon. the Minister of Justice was highly creditable to him—it was a letter which Mr. Moore had a right to ask from him. Mr. Moore supported the hon. the Minister of Justice, as a candidate for North Bruce, in 1867. He was, therefore, a friend of the hon. gentleman, and had a right to receive a letter stating all the hon. gentleman could honestly state. The hon. the Minister of Justice was not in any way personally responsible for the loss of those $29,000 to the country. What became of the letter sent by Mr. Stirton, he did not know, but it was of comparatively little importance, because the letter was an expansion of the telegram, which distinctly informed the hon. the Premier in regard to Mr. Tolton. The hon. the Minister of Public Works was justly chargeable with having given a contractor $29,000 more than the sum for which another competent man would have executed the work. He submitted the case to the House as it appeared from the papers submitted, and he held that no hon. member could honestly say that under the circumstances Mr. Tolton should not have received the contract. Messrs. Harvey & Kormann had the contract for the completion of the outer works in Goderich harbour, a much more difficult work than that on the inner harbour, because the outer work was liable to be injured by storms, and indeed they knew that Messrs. Harvey & Kormann sustained pecuniary loss by portions of the work being destroyed by that time. Yet, though Mr. Kormann retired, Mr. Harvey and his surety, Mr. Ross, finished the work, and had made no claim on the Government for extras. The specification showed that for the same description of work the tender of Mr. Tolton was from ten to twenty per cent. higher than that of Messrs. Harvey & Kormann. With regard to the statement he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had made that the Department had acted with undue favour towards some of its own friends, there was one instance: it had been shown that Mr. Moore was a political friend, and that no doubt $29,000 had been lost to the country, and before the Session closed he would feel it to be his duty to submit to the House other cases of a similar character. The House and the country could come to no other conclusion than that $29,000 of the public money had been thrown away.

Mr. BLAKE said he would confine himself entirely to the personal matter. He desired to state to the House his political relations with the persons who were interested in the contract,—the only test which could be applied to such a case. The persons who were interested in the contract were Messrs. Moore, Clendenning and Wilson, of Walkerton. It was true that in the general election of 1867, when he stood for the Local Legislature in that constituency, he received the support of a very considerable number of gentlemen who had formerly belonged, and professed to still belong to the Conservative party. Upon that occasion he was elected by a very narrow majority over the Liberal candidate, who was defeated by 150 votes, a Conservative being elected to the House of Commons. The vote was, therefore, in his case not wholly a party one. Among the gentlemen who gave him their support on that occasion were Messrs. Moore, Clendenning and Wilson, all gentlemen belonging to, and not altogether without note, in the ranks of the Conservative party.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

On the next occasion on which he stood for the Riding, viz., at the general election of 1871, Mr. Moore voted for, and Messrs. Clendenning and Wilson against him. The next election in that Riding in which he was concerned was in the Fall of 1871, upon his accepting office, when he was elected by acclamation. The next election was the general election in 1872, upon which occasion Mr. Moore voted for him, Mr. Clendenning voted against him, and Mr. Wilson did not vote. The next election was in the Fall of 1873, upon his resignation, on again accepting office, at which time he was elected by acclamation. The next election was in January, 1874, shortly after the month on which the letter to which reference had been made was written. Mr. Moore told him that he and Clendenning and Wilson were about to tender for the work, and he (Mr. Blake) told him what was said in the letter. He was not influenced by the circumstance that Mr. Moore was a political friend. He knew that the whole of those persons were respectable citizens of his county, and he did not conceive that the question of a man's political relation to his member or to the Government ought in the slightest degree to affect his having every fair consideration with reference to the letting of contracts. Upon that principle he acted. Mr. Moore having been the person who came to him, he wrote the letter for him. Had Mr. Clendenning, Mr. Wilson, or Mr. Tolton come to him he would have done just the same thing. He was content that any letter he had written, or any expression that he had made with reference to the letting of any contract from the time he might be supposed to have any influence in this matter, should be made public, and it would be found that they had all been in the same fashion. He was convinced that his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) would let this and all other contracts fairly, without respect to persons. He told Mr. Moore that he might depend on that, and nothing more; and he told his hon. friend precisely what he told Mr. Moore, so that he might understand, as distinctly as Mr. Moore and his partners, that his (Mr. Blake's) opinion was that contracts should be let fairly, without respect to persons. That was the last communication he had with any person in regard to this subject. He knew nothing more about it. He observed that the Order in Council awarding the work to Mr. Ellis, was made upon the 13th February, ten days before the time he left the Government. Neither by letter nor by word of mouth had he any other communication with any person on this subject. Either this letter and the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Farrow's) insinuations were relevant, or they were not. He was glad to notice that the hon. gentleman had indulged in insinuations which, in effect, the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had repudiated. The hon. gentleman introduced this letter for the purpose of supporting his argument and bearing out his insinuation. Inasmuch as that insinuation had been made, he thought fit to make this short, simple, plain statement of the facts. He saw that the hon. gentleman, by the course he had adopted, was endeavouring to have the House vote him guilty of some unworthy conduct, and with this statement he would leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) charged that the public money had been unnecessarily expended in this case, and that the contract was awarded to a person who was not the lowest tender. The hon. the Minister of Public Works denied that, and claimed that from 1870 to 1873 the late Government did not give a larger percentage of contracts to the lowest tenders than the present Government had done since 1873. That statement did not justify the hon. Minister in his argument. In the matter of the Gattineau boom contract, which was discussed the other day, the hon. the Minister of Public Works laid down the principle that tenders could not be considered even if they were received one minute after twelve o'clock, and, acting on that principle, he excluded certain tenders for that work. He wished to refer to the building of the Marine Hospital at Sydney, Cape Breton, for which several gentlemen tendered. According to a Minute in Council passed February 2nd, 1875, the contract for this work was awarded to Mr. Toole, who was the second lowest bidder, on the ground that it would be impossible for the other man (Mr. McKean) to perform the contract for the sum for which he tendered. Shortly after that, owing to some influence being brought to bear on the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the contract was taken from Mr. Toole, and awarded to Mr. McKean. It would have been supposed then that the building would have cost no more than the sum for which Mr. McKean originally tendered for, but owing to an extension of time granted this gentleman, and his being also the Government Superintendent of the work, it cost only $400 less than if Mr. Toole had constructed it. This would show that the Government did not, to say the least, act with commendable discretion in such matters.

Mr. LANDERKIN said as the parties to whom reference was made in the amendment lived in his section of country, he could speak with some personal knowledge of this subject. He understood the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) to say that Mr. Tolton was a wealthy man, a man of undoubted means, superior in financial ability to Messrs. Moore, Clendenning and Wilson. The hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) also made a similar statement. He (Mr. Landerkin) was very much surprised to hear those hon. gentlemen make those statements. Those persons who knew all the parties would perhaps be much more astonished. He (Mr. Landerkin) believed he was quite safe in asserting that the financial position of Messrs. Moore, Clendenning and Wilson was quite safe and reliable.

Mr. FARROW: Yes, now.

Mr. LANDERKIN: And when the contract was entered into. The observations of the hon. member for North Huron were intended to mislead the House and the public. He had not a word to say against Mr. Tolton, but he thought the Government acted wisely in giving the contract to Moore & Co., although their tender was somewhat higher. It was well known in the section from which he came that Messrs. Moore & Co. were highly deserving and capable of fulfilling their contract. The early and satisfactory completion of this contract had justified this good opinion of them. For himself he never advocated that the lowest tenderer should always receive the contract. Every person knew that the adoption of such a system might, at times, be very prejudicial to the public interests, and he believed it was the duty of the Government to exercise discretion in giving contracts. He never found fault with the late Government for exercising discretion in this particular, but he was aware that the present Administration had, as a rule, favoured the lowest tender. In one instance, where a friend and supporter of his tendered in reference to mail service, although his tender was only $1.00 higher than the successful competitor, the contract was not given him. He knew another case where a difference of $5.00 gave a contract to a political opponent, when one of his supporters had tendered. The charge was made to show that the Government had given this contract to their friends, although the Chief Engineer stated that the reasons why Tolton's tender was not accepted was, because it was too low, and that he was unwilling to accept Sheriff Sutton as security, as he, when a security in a former contract at Goderich, had given so much trouble that the Department was not willing to accept him for this one. An attempt had been made to show that Moore's property was only worth $4,500, and was encumbered by a mortgage. To show how deliberate an attempt this was to lower Mr. Moore's financial standing, he had only to state that a portion of this property was sold a short time ago for over $12,000.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he would not have spoken on the subject had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. MacDonald), who had taken an unfair advantage of the Government, in bringing the charge he had, when the Government had no opportunity of placing the facts before the House. He understood the hon. gentleman to complain of the Government for having given a contract for building the Sydney Marine Hospital to a party who had sent in the lowest tender, and for having been guilty of the gross outrage of not having awarded it to a friend of his own, whom the hon. gentleman characterised as a Liberal Conservative, inasmuch as this person tendered for a considerably larger amount. It seemed to him that this was hardly a legitimate matter for complaint. The Government were bound, as a duty they owed to the country, to give the contract to the person who would perform it properly and efficiently, and for the very lowest sum. The hon. gentleman also said that the eventual cost of the work was nearly as great as if it had been awarded to the person alluded to; but the hon. gentleman in this was exceedingly inaccurate, for he believed that the work was completed for the exact amount named in the successful tender, which was some $2,000 less than the tender to which the hon. member had reference, and other amounts which might have been added, he thought did not exceed $120 or $130, and this was for what the Superintendent of the Works declared was extra work outside of the contract. The hon. gentleman also said that the Government had given an extension of time, and afforded Mr. McKean certain concessions to which he was not entitled. The extension was granted, but the hon. gentleman had not mentioned that the contractor was ready to go on with the work, but was prevented doing so on account of the neglect or negligence of some persons to purchase the land necessary for the purpose. The work was thus delayed for two or three months, and the Government had, in justice, consented to an extension of time for one or two months. The hon. gentleman said that the contractor superintended his own work; but this was inaccurate. A person was appointed by the Government to perform this duty.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackay) had declared that he had been extremely inaccurate in his statement; but the facts were these: one tender was for $3,890—

Mr. MACKAY rose to a point of order, as the papers in question were not before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has no right to answer; but he would have a right to explain any misrepresentation or misunderstanding.

Mr. TUPPER said he thought his hon. friend (Mr. McDonald) had a right to explain, as the accuracy of his statements was called in question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think not. The rule of Parliament is that when an hon. gentleman is misunderstood by anybody following him, or if anything is misrepresented he has a right to explain and state: "I did not say so," or "I meant to say so and so;" or "what I stated was this;" but he cannot reply.

Mr. McDONALD said the hon. gentleman had distinctly stated that he was inaccurate in saying that the contractor had superintended his own work.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did or did not the hon gentleman say so?

Mr. McDONALD: I did say so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the hon. gentleman has no right to raise the question.

Mr. McDONALD: I give the report of the Minister of Public Works as my authority.

Mr. ORTON said he was very sorry to hear the hon. member for South Grey refer to the present financial position of Mr. Tolton, with whom he was well acquainted; and he could only say that at the time this contract was let, Mr. Tolton was considered to be wealthy, while his brother was possessed of considerable means. At the present time, the former was not so well off as he had been, but he did not occupy the position which the hon. gentleman tried to make appear. After this contract was awarded, he (Mr. Tolton) had engaged in other business, and bought a mill,—milling had not been a good business in this country for some years back. Mr. Tolton had lost a considerable sum of money. He thought it could not be denied that the hon.

member for North Huron had established that there was ample evidence in the possession of the Minister of Public Works, when the contract was awarded, to show that Mr. Tolton was a reliable man, and thoroughly competent to do the work; and, in the face of all this, it was distinctly proved that the Minister of Public Works and the Government were responsible for having wrongly spent $30,000 of the people's money. The hon. member for North Grey had alluded to the wealth and standing of Messrs. Moore, Wilson & Clendenning; but it was a somewhat remarkable fact that, when this contract was let, these gentlemen could not find landed or any other security for $10,000. He could now state, on good authority, that so far had been this job that one of these gentlemen had been since enabled to purchase a property for no less than $52,000. It was evidently a very profitable and agreeable thing to be a friend of the Minister of Justice. Another significant fact had been disclosed in the discussion. The Minister of Justice was not then a member of the Government; and it was well known that when out of the Government the hon. gentleman was anything but a source of strength to the Administration. Viewing this circumstance in the light of other facts of which this House were well aware, such as the skill and tact shown by the Minister of Public Works in the first formation of his Government in attracting friends, as exhibited by the manner in which the hon. gentleman obtained the friendship and support of the Prince Edward Island representatives, it might seem to some minds that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had an object in view in acting so as to please and gratify the Minister of Justice by giving this contract to the hon. gentleman's friends. He was very glad that the matter had been brought up, and he considered that the hon. member for North Huron had thoroughly established his case.

Mr. McCALLUM said that in his section of the country this work was regarded as having cost a great deal more money than it ought to have done. In the first place, mistakes had been made in the engineering work; and in the next place, the people at all events in his section, believed that great favouritism had been shown in the letting of the contract. He was amused to hear the defence of the Minister of Public Works, who, when charged with the waste of $29,000, justified himself by saying that the former Government had done similar things. But this was not what the hon. gentleman had advocated when in Opposition. The hon. gentleman had acceded to power in order to put an end to favouritism. He did not at all approve of the policy of the Government with regard to the awarding of contracts for public works. This policy tended to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. In the first place, it was required by the present system that a deposit of 5 per cent. of the whole cost should be made; and though a contractor were pretty well off, he might not be able to raise the money. The furnishing of good securities, besides the retention of 4 per cent. on the whole cost of the work under contract, ought to be sufficient. How was it in this case? Land of insufficient value had been accepted as surety, and, in some instances, railway stock, very much watered at that, had been so taken from favourites of the Administration. The latter had been the case, he believed, in connection with the Georgian Bay Branch Railway. That Mr. Moore was rich had nothing whatever to do with the case; he might well be so if he obtained $29,000 more than the work was worth, and this was the question at issue—that the people of this country, through the action of the Government, had lost $29,000, which, taken out of the Public Treasury, had been placed in Moore's pockets. And what did the hon. member for South Grey say? That he knew two or three instances in which the Government had accepted the lowest tenders, and only in one or two instances were the cases mentioned. He protested against contractors being required to make a deposit of 5 per cent. on the whole cost of a work before it was commenced. This placed too much power in the hands of the Government; and no Government should have it, as this allowed them to decide in favour of their favourites, and he was informed many such instances of favouritism had occurred in the awarding of contracts for the enlargement of the Welland canal. When it was said that Mr. Tolton was unable to complete the work, who was better authority for his position than Mr. David Stirton, a former member of the House, and an honest man, whose word, as well as his signature, would be taken in any part of the country, and who had since been honoured by getting an office from the Government. The Minister of Public Works was condemned by his own action, in endeavouring to show that other Governments had done nearly the same thing. He would not have done justice to the people he had the honour to represent had he not expressed his disapproval of the hon. gentleman's course in this matter.

Mr. DYMOND said the first question which suggested itself regarding this subject was—what was the ground work of the motion. When they listened to the speeches of the mover and of the hon. member for Centre Wellington and remembered how the matter had been discussed in the Press, they found that the turning point of the whole case, and the main cause assigned for the motion, was the fact that the Minister of Justice had some motive or other which induced him to place the claims of Messrs. Moore, Clendenning & Co., in a favourable light before the Minister of Public Works. In short, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) was charged with corruption and the spending of $30,000 more than was necessary, in order that a political friend of the Minister of Justice might be gratified. The answer to the hon. member for North Huron and the hon. member for Centre Wellington was found in the language of the hon. member for Kingston. The only evidence of any corrupt contract with Moore, Clendenning & Co., was to be found in the letter read by the mover and written by the hon. the Minister of Justice, which the right hon. member for Kingston said was eminently creditable to the writer. That disposed of the ground-work of the whole charge, unless there was something outside of the information that had been placed before the House. Nobody supposed that any Government would recklessly give away $30,000, unless there was some motive for doing so. The hon. gentlemen were judging the Government by their own measure. The hon. the Minister of Justice said that Mr. Moore had been a Conservative; but Mr. Moore, it seemed, had intelligence enough, which was highly creditable to him, to vote for that hon. gentleman. But Mr. Clendenning was still wandering in the dark labyrinth of Conservatism and voted against the Minister of Justice. Mr. Wilson, however, was such a good friend of the present Government that he did not vote at all. So the Government, if they acted corruptly, gave $10,000 to oblige a friend, and $20,000 to bribe two opponents. The right hon. member for Kingston said this was one of a series of cases to be brought before the House in order to sustain the allegations which he had made in his speeches last summer, when he said: "Let any Conservative try to get a contract, let any Conservative apply for an office, he would not get it." But here were two Conservatives at all events who got a contract. Here at all events was fair play. The right hon. member for Kingston found fault with the hon. the Minister of Public Works for not following the advice of Mr. David Stirton and for following the counsels of the Chief Engineer, Mr. Page. If the contract had been given according to Mr. Stirton's advice the Minister of Public Works would be denounced as a corrupt man, and now he was denounced for not doing so. What was a Government to do under such circumstances? When the present Government were in opposition there were witnessed no such unfairness, false charges and trumpery allegations. Had this been the case they would not have received the general support of the country which they now had.

Mr. WHITE said it was not a case of Conservative against Reformer, but as to whether the Government had not given a contract to a man who had tendered $30,000 above the lowest tender.

Mr. CAMERON asked whether, as the lowest tender was not accepted, the leave of the Governor in Council had been had to award it to another person.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it had been.

Mr. CAMERON said then this placed the responsibility upon the Government, and not upon Mr. Page. He understood that Mr. Tolton had contracted for some works at Meaford Harbour, and therefore must have been an experienced contractor.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was subsequent to the present transaction, and the work was under the local authorities and not the Government.

Sir. JOHN A. MACDONALD explained that the basis of his assertion that Mr. Tolton had a contract at Meaford Harbour, was a letter which he received from that gentleman, in which he said:—

SUPPLY.

XII. PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS CHARGEABLE TO INCOME.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

98. Harbours and breakwaters
Quebec..... $22,000

In reply to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. MACKENZIE said the pier at Rimouski had been assumed by the railway. Some of the other piers were quite dilapidated, and the engineer reported that it would require about $20,000 to repair them.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the pier at Islet was not wanted, or needed to be repaired. It had never been built high enough to prevent water at high tides, or during high winds, being carried over it. For that reason, at certain periods of the year, the pier could not be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the pier at Islet would take $17,000, that at Berthier, $3,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he regretted that the Minister had not been in a position to ask a special vote to continue the pier at Baie St. Paul, in the County of Charlevoix. It was a work which was begun, and he thought it was only proper that it should be completed. There was another wharf at St. Cimon, at the other end of the county, but he did not press that.

Vote agreed to.

99. Harbours and Breakwaters in New Brunswick $97,000

Mr. MASSON said that last year the Minister had told the House that the amount asked for would be sufficient to complete the work at Saint John.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I cannot have said that.

Mr. MASSON: I noted it down.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was impossible. This was a work under contract, the amount being $224,000, and whatever balance is required to complete the contract must be paid.

Mr. MASSON: $339,000 has been paid for that work.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But it has not all been expended. The contractors had got on with their work very well; perhaps it is one of the best works in the Dominion. I think the amount of the estimates was $224,000. Mr. Perley's estimate was $240,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN: How much has been expended on it now?

Mr. MACKENZIE said that up to the 7th of December the expenditure was $138,664. The appropriation for 1876-7 was $65,000, and the expenditure $63,795. The total amount required for completion was put down at $92,000, making $230,000, including the amount for engineering and inspection.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked what steps had been taken to put the Harbour of Saint John into commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not in a position to say anything about St. John harbour. The first movement was made by the Board of Trade, an irresponsible body with whom the Government could have no communication, as the harbour was the property of the City Council; but there was a general desire to have it placed in Commission, and it was probable that it would be carried out next Session.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked if the present vote would complete the work?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not quite.

Mr. McLEOD said he regretted to find that the Government had not considered that there was any county in New Brunswick outside of St. John, which required an appropriation. It seemed that Gloucester was the only one entitled to any consideration. So far as the trade of that county was concerned, it had, perhaps, less trade, less exports, less tonnage going to the principal port of shipment than any other county in New Brunswick. He saw by the Estimates that $9,000 was appropriated for a wharf at Clifton, Gloucester County, the locality furnishing an equal amount. He understood that that was a wharf which the Government proposed to purchase from the parties who had erected it for their own use, and, he supposed, applied to carrying on their own private business. Then there was another vote of $1,000 for Grande Anse, Gloucester County. Last year the sum of $3,000 was appropriated for the same purpose, on the ground that the locality would furnish an equal amount. He believed the locality had not furnished an equal amount. So far as his county was concerned, the harbour of Richibucto was in want of improvements.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he felt bound to back up the member for Kent (Mr. McLeod) in asking for anything that New Brunswick was entitled to, and a little more. He had no doubt that the county viewed with pride the able legislation which that hon. gentleman had taken part in during this and the last Session, and the many speeches which he had made on the various questions of the day. He thought the Premier should reconsider the matter, and when he brought down the Supplementary Estimates do something for that county.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the $7,000 for Shippegan was simply a re-vote to enable the work there to be finished. It was the building of a long pier near the upper end of the peninsula, and was not intended for any local benefit at all, but to enable vessels frequenting that quarter to obtain shelter. The amount of the contract was $18,700, and $9,110 had been expended up to the 31st December. It was intended to extend the length of the pier 120 feet, and to construct an L of 200 feet, the locality bearing half the expense and agreeing to transfer all the rights connected with what had been built to the Dominion. The vote of $1,000 was to finish the small harbour.

Mr. DOMVILLE called attention to the harbour of Shediac, which he thought had hardly accommodation enough for vessels discharging cargoes there.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was proposed to build an L to the end of the East pier there, which, it was expected, would remedy the difficulties existing there at present. With this improvement and a little dredging they would be able to maintain from 14 feet to 16 feet of water. No portion of the vote for Richibucto was expended last year, because the engineer reported that it would require $150,000 to make the harbour what it should be. They did not feel justified in entering upon any expenditure there when the sum at their disposal was calculated to do so little good; and they preferred waiting to ascertain with more particularity whether something could be done next year upon some other plan which would preserve the harbour and at the same time keep the ground clear. The harbours of Bathurst and Richibucto deserved attention from the fact that they paid a large amount of harbour dues. They really paid for harbour improvements, and if the Government did do something they might be obliged to modify the charges on shipping, which were felt somewhat severely at present.

Mr. LANGEVIN said, in the matter of harbour improvements, the hon. the Minister of Public Works seemed to have looked specially to the counties represented by his friends. They had no shelter on their coast, and it was not proposed to build anything. This was rather unfortunate, as a great many vessels traded in that neighbourhood.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, for the last three Sessions, hardly a dollar had been taken for the south shore, whereas a considerable amount was expended on the north shore. The hon. gentleman appeared to wish that, repeated constantly, no other counties but Charlevoix should have any attention paid to them.

Vote agreed to.

		Belliveau Cove .....	3,000
		General repairs.....	10,000
			$31,500

Mr. MACKENZIE said a number of breakwaters and piers had suffered damage from storms, and the Government had resolved to ask for this $10,000 for general repairs, to be employed in preventing the destruction of some of those works. It had been a very general experience that the works undertaken during the first six or seven years of Confederation were done on too slight a plan. The works, for instance, in one harbour, which cost altogether a large sum of money, were almost entirely destroyed by a gale in 1873. Some works at Liverpool also had been damaged by a heavy sea; and this had been the case at various other places. He felt it necessary to ask for a general vote to make these repairs. There was no part of the New Brunswick coast so exposed as the coast of Nova Scotia to the action of the waters of the Gulf and of the Atlantic. In New

Mr. DOMVILLE.

Brunswick the only exposed portion lay between the harbour of St. John's and the boundary line. This was the only harbour in that neighbourhood where any expensive works were to be done; but they did not propose to do anything there at present.

Mr. LANGEVIN: This is not to be a permanent vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. FORBES said they felt very much the want of the improvement proposed. The breakwater to which the Premier had alluded had been exposed to serious injury from storms. If repairs were not made during the coming season, a large part of the superstructure would be probably carried away. He was very much pleased to see this vote placed in the Estimates, as the expenditure of a few dollars in time in the past would have saved considerable expense; and he had no doubt that this expenditure would prevent the work being further injured and prevent a greater charge on the revenue.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the entrance of Miramichi and Gloucester was very much exposed. He would call attention to a breakwater at Escuminac Point, a place of refuge for the fishermen on that coast. They ran in there from the herring bank when a storm arose; and this was really a very exposed place. He had seen as many as 300 or 400 fishermen there at one time, and a small sum expended in making a breakwater at this point would do immense service in affording shelter, and preventing the loss of many lives. Some years ago, as many as 80 or 90 fishermen were lost in a gale in this neighbourhood, in one night. He hoped a vote would be put in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose he had mentioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that hardly any of these votes were for new works. The $5,000 for Antigonish was to enable them to complete the dredging at a certain pier up to a certain point. This would be sufficient for many years; and other parts of the coast would yet be equally well attended to. The works at McNair's Cove had failed once or twice.

The vote was for general repairs to the breakwater, which had almost been destroyed by a heavy gale last Fall. It was completed in December, 1873, at a cost of some $29,000; and to prevent its utter destruction this vote of $5,000 was asked for. In White Point, Queen's County, and Jordan Bay, Shelbourne County, a great many of the smaller craft found shelter occasionally. He did not think that these works required transfer. To many places in Nova Scotia the Local Government had granted sums to aid in the construction of breakwaters and shelters required for vessels, and they had occasionally supplemented these votes. These were public works. There were no tolls collected on the wharves. At some expensive places tolls were established. They proposed that tolls should be established in various other places for the maintenance of piers. The invariable rule was that they should not build wharves or piers and breakwaters unless they were for the benefit of sea-going vessels. He considered that all these were now public works.

Vote agreed to.

101. Harbour and breakwater,
Prince Edward Island. $30,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the vote of $20,000 for Colville or Scuris Bay was part of the vote required to execute a contract entered into two years ago. The cost of it was estimated at schedule prices at about $67,000. The amount expended last Session was $35,500, and this left a sum of about $3,600 in hand, which would shortly be spent. They hoped that this $20,000 would complete, or very nearly complete, the work—the construction of a new breakwater. The railway was brought to the side of a shallow stream running into the bay, and the depth of water was not more than seven or ten feet at this particular point. When the pier was finished, the depth was 17 or 19 feet, and when the work was completed, they hoped to have about 20 feet. This was one of the few really excellent harbours of the Island. The Malpeque breakwater, for which $10,000 was asked, was a new work in an old harbour. The Island was shaped like a crescent, the concave side being to the north, and the result was that the north coast was visited by violent storms, which concentrated towards the centre; and when vessels were caught from the west or east end during a gale, it was very difficult for them to escape, unless shelter was afforded. There were three principal harbours on this shore—Massapeque was the best and largest, but its entrance was somewhat difficult on account of a double bar. Malpeque was comparatively easy of entrance; and for St. Peter's Bay, a vote of $5,000 would be proposed in the Supplementary Estimates in order to secure a fair entrance. It would then be one of the best harbours on the coast.

Mr. POWER said Colville or Souris Bay opened to the south, and it had been the case that there was no shelter for vessels to anchor there. It had a depth of about 16 or 20 feet, and it now was a good sheltering place. He believed that the work proposed would be of great advantage to that part of the country. The terminus of the railroad was at the eastern end of the Island. Malpeque and Colville Bay were two of the best harbours on the Island.

102. Slides and booms,..... $5,000.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he had questioned the Minister of Public Works last Session as to the necessity of constructing certain works at the Rapides des Rochers, and of removing certain rocks from the channel at Cap Gravel. If he understood the hon. gentleman aright, he was told that the former were recommended by the Superintendent or the Engineer in charge. As he saw, however, that the vote was reduced instead of being increased, he wished to enquire whether it was the intention of the Government to have these works constructed during the present year.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are certainly not included in this vote, at all events. I would not like to say absolutely that it is not our intention to do so; but I will be able to give the hon. gentleman an answer in a few days.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

103 { Dredge vessels..... $22,000
Dredging ..... 92,000

Mr. MITCHELL said it would be very desirable if the vote for the Maritime Provinces was separated. He would again call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the Harbour at the mouth of the Miramichi. He thought one of the dredges should be sent to the bar for a few days. The work of dredging there so far was satisfactory, but it would be useless unless it was completed all across the bar. It was not right that two of the dredges should be stationed all the time at St. John's Harbour.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the two dredges were only at St. John's Harbor during the winter, and one of them would be leaving on or about the 20th instant.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) enquired whether a dredge could not be sent to Lingan, as there was some dredging much required at that place to permit vessels in the coal trade passing. He understood that a telegram had been sent by a Mr. Coffin from one of the Departments to the agent of the Company who worked Lingan mines, asking for information for his (Mr. McDonald's) colleague on this matter. This telegram, whether authorized by the Premier or not, led to the belief that the Government intended to send the dredge there soon. He hoped they would do so.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked why no provision was made for continuing the dredging at Victoria Harbour. When British Columbia entered into Confederation it was expected by the people of Province that they would receive their full share of harbour improvements. They handed over to the Dominion Government dredging material which cost $100,000, and it was now laid-up doing nothing. He believed an order had been sent from the Department of Public Works to stop all improvements there. When it was considered that Victoria harbour alone paid half as much customs' duties, within a fraction, as the whole of the Province of New Brunswick, and two-fifths as much as the great Province of Nova Scotia, and that there were a great many large foreign ships calling there, it would at once be seen that there was cause of complaint against the Government, and against the Minister of Public Works in particular. He believed the Dominion Engineer had represented the necessity of the Government dredging a portion of Victoria harbour along the front of the wharves, where the mud was carried down from the streets of the city, and also that the rocks should be removed. It was absolutely necessary that something should be done in a short time to keep the harbour open. The harbour had answered all the purpose of their commerce for the last twenty years, and would still do so for a long time to come; but some small sum of money ought to be spent in dredging it. It had been alleged by the Mail Steamship Company running into Victoria that they could not get into that harbour. That was a mistake. They could do so, although there were difficulties to contend with. The first difficulty was the filling up of the harbour, and then there were the rocks which wanted removing. He sincerely trusted that the Minister of Public Works would give some explanation why these improvements had not been carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE said as the hon member had remarked, vessels of almost any size could get into Victoria harbour without any danger or difficulty, at present, and it could not be expected that the Government would spend money merely for spending's sake. It could scarcely be expected that the Government could remove the mud and filth that flowed from the city. That should be done by the local authorities. The Dominion Government merely removed bars, &c. The rocks referred to must, undoubtedly, be removed. There was, at present, a vote unexpended which could be applied to the removal of the most dangerous of the rocks. As to the harbour of Ligan, that was only a small place, and the Government did not feel justified in asking the $30,000 or $40,000 which would be necessary to cut the canal through the mud, in order to accomplish what was desired.

Mr. LANGEVIN suggested that, in future, the amounts for the several Maritime Provinces for dredging should be stated separately.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would not like to bind himself not to change the situations of the dredges when necessity arose.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked where the $10,000 for the Province of Quebec was to be expended.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Chiefly between St. Johns and St. Ours.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked whether there was an appropriation to remove the mud bank below Father Point.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied in the negative.

Vote agreed to.

106	Arbitrations and Awards.....	15,000
107	Maintenance and repairs of Steamers Napoleon III, Newfield, Druid, Glendon and Sir James Douglas .....	100,000

Mr. PLUMB asked how much of the proposed vote would be devoted to repairs on the steamer "Glendon."

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that some reference was made last year in regard to that steamer, and he was now in a position to make a statement with regard to her purchase. Every precaution was adopted before the purchase was made, and a report was made by Mr. Wm. Smith, the efficient Steamboat Inspector of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That officer reported that the vessel was suitable for the service for which she was required; that she was able to steam at seven knots an hour, and that she was worth $25,000. He, as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, offered $20,000, and it was accepted. The "Lady Head" was transferred from Halifax to another service, and the "Glendon" replaced her; and he had received a letter from a competent official at that city, stating that the vessel was very useful, and that such a ship was required for the buoing and lighthouse service. The Department proposed to expend $12,000 on repairing her.

Mr. PLUMB asked how much had been spent on repairs since the vessel was purchased by the Government.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the vessel had cost for repairs much more than was expected, but if hon. members would read the report of the Steamboat Inspector, they would consider him justified in purchasing her at the price.

Mr. CARON said that if he correctly remembered the discussion of last year, it was then stated that the vessel had proved unequal to the work for which she was purchased.

Mr. SMITH said he would leave the House to determine whether he was justified in purchasing the vessel for $20,000 after they had read the Steamboat Inspector's report, which was as follows:—

"The freight steamer "Glendon" was built at this port (St. John, N. B.) and was completed and employed in August, 1872. The hull was built under the inspection of Mr. Thos. H. Sime, surveyor for Bureau Veritas. The engine, boiler, &c., were furnished by Messrs. Geo. Fleming & Sons, engine builders, St. John, N. B.

"Present Condition.—The steamer's hull is in very good condition, does not leak, is considered strong—it has not shown any signs of strains or weakness. [Note.—The hull of this steamer was slightly damaged the first season she ran, by touching Musquash Head, but was thoroughly repaired and made stronger than before under inspection.]

"The engine is of the inverted cylinder condensing type, such as is usual in single engine screw steamers, the pipes are copper, cocks brass, jet condenser; the machinery is in good order. I consider it reliable from its strength, and the satisfaction it has given during the last two years. [Note.—Several changes have been made in the strength of parts of the machinery since it was first put into the boat. These changes added to the strength, and were made the first season the steamer ran.]

"Outfit—The outfit is of the usual kind for freight steamers. I enclose a printed paper shewing the outfit in detail.

"Speed—This steamer makes her greatest speed with an ordinary cargo, say 300 tons of coal and 300 barrels freight. Her speed with this load is seven knots per hour; her speed light is not quite so fast, as the steamer is out of trim. 309 tons of coal, not including the coal in bunkers, or 2,000 barrels, is the quantity she can carry, and be in good trim and seaworthy.

"Consumption of fuel, coal in bunkers, &c.—The steamer burns eight tons of soft coal in twenty-four hours' steaming, when making a speed of seven knots an hour. [Note.—This steamer's boiler is better adapted for hard than soft coal. Hard coal has been used on her as fuel, except on a few occasions. The soft coal used was "Picton," and did not give as good results as the hard coal. The furnace bars were not properly set for the soft coal. I consider the boiler fittest for the hard coal, but changes in the furnace bars would give better results with soft coal than have been obtained. The bunkers stow 30 tons of coal. This quantity has steamed this vessel 100 hours. The boiler has been repaired this winter, new pieces have been put in the tops and sides of furnaces; the boiler is in good order, and with care and the usual repairs done each season, would make it last two years at a steam pressure of 30 pounds per square inch, the full pressure required to make the speed stated. She has never leaked. The shell has wasted 1-32 of an inch since first put in the steamer; its thickness at first was 5-16 of an inch.

"I enclose a statement procured by me from the Surveyor of Bureau Veritas (who inspected this steamer) showing sizes, strengths, and the kinds of timber fastenings, spars, etc. The steamer has very little cabin accommodation, and this is in two deck houses—one forward, one aft.

"The number of crew required to navigate the vessel is eleven all told, without working cargo.

"The spars are of pitch pine, rigging wire; the steamer has three masts, called a three-masted schooner, is provided with sails, etc., for this rig. I do not consider the model of the vessel a good one; she is not at all handsome in looks, but is fit for the business for which she is intended—freight carrying. The present value of the steamer, in my opinion, is about $25,000. It is said she cost $30,000, but I think a similar vessel could be built for less than $30,000.

"There are some changes that can be made on this steamer if required for service by the Department, such as housing in the deck cargo winch, alteration of rig, etc."

Upon that report, he thought it would be in the interest of the Department to purchase this steamer; but she, unfortunately, turned out unsuitable for the service, and had to be devoted to the service in which she was now engaged at Halifax.

Mr. PLUMB said it was evident from the beginning that the purchase of this vessel was a mistake, and the report which the hon. Minister had read only justified the opinions expressed on that side of the House. Even with this amount expended on her for repairs, the "Glendon" would still be useless for the service she was now nominally supposed to be used for.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he had stated distinctly that the "Glendon" was very useful at her present work. Their agent at Halifax reported that, with the necessary alterations, the "Glendon" could be made a valuable boat.

Mr. SMITH.

Mr. BLANCHET said the only conclusion to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's explanations was, that the Government were trying to make the best of a bad bargain.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said if he had known as much about the "Glendon" before he purchased her as he did now, he would not have bought her. But he wanted to show to the House that he was exonerated from blame; he had no other object in view but the public interest. Finding the boat unsuitable for the service for which she was intended, they had endeavoured to utilise her in other work and had succeeded.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said it was well known that the "Glendon" was not adapted for the service before she was bought by the Government. A very fine steamer the "Beaver" which would have answered all the requirements, could have been obtained for $28,000 to $30,000.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said persons who were acquainted with the qualities of the "Beaver" did not give her as high a character as the hon. gentleman did.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked for an explanation of the increase of $20,000 over last year's vote.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said last year his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) was desirous of retrenching in every particular, and he had endeavoured to cut the expenditure, but had found it difficult to economise with steamers of this description. He found that $80,000 was insufficient to maintain the steamers, and from the reports of their agents it would appear $120,000 would be necessary. He had desired to ask for $100,000, and would endeavor to make that sum suffice.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said he thought it would be better for the hon. Minister to ask for a vote at once which would enable him to meet the requirements of the service. By economising on the steamers now, they would probably go to destruction in a few years, and then there would be the expense of renewing them, which might be avoided by keeping them in a good state of repair.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he agreed with this principle, but he thought they would be able to get along with the sum asked for.

Mr. BUNSTER said the sum of $10,000 for the "Sir James Douglas" was reasonable.

108. Steam communication between Halifax and St.

John, via Yarmouth... $10,000

Mr. LANGEVIN: Is this service performed by contract?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Certainly.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked whether it was let by public tender.

Mr. FORBES: No.

Mr. DOMVILLE said this ought to be done.

Mr. FORBES said this service was let by contract when the vote first passed, and had been so continued ever since.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Is this service performed by contract?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

Mr. LANGEVIN: It appears that the contract has been continued without calling for new tenders.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Tenders were asked for last year.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Was there a new contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think so.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he would call attention to the dropped item of $39,541.67 moiety which had been payable to the Allan Line between Halifax and Cork. He thought the probability was that present negotiations with the Imperial Post Office authorities regarding the establishment of a weekly line between England and Halifax and for the landing of the Australian and American mails, had something to do with this omission. If not, he ventured to hope that the Government would reconsider the question, if the negotiations in question were not crowned with success. The people of the Maritime Provinces would be deprived of a very great convenience if the fortnightly boats between Halifax and Liverpool during the summer months were withdrawn. If the amount omitted were placed in the Estimates for the six months during the summer, he thought this would ensure the running of fortnightly boats to Halifax during that time. He believed that the people of the Maritime Provinces generally would be very much disappointed if the Government did not take this view of the matter. If the communication which had existed for the past thirty years was removed, it would cause serious inconvenience and embarrassment those engaged in commercial pursuits and the public generally.

Mr. FORBES said this sum could, with great benefit to the country, be used to subsidize a line running between the Dominion and the West Indies. The prospects for the encouragement of this trade was one of the inducements held out for the entrance of the Lower Provinces into the Dominion. These Provinces were now suffering severely for want of such communication and this need was increasing every day. The sum in question with another small grant, would undoubtedly build up, and largely benefit the trade of the Dominion. He hoped that the Government would take the matter in hand.

Mr. DOMVILLE said it might be well to consider the advisability of continuing a subsidy to the Allan Line, but he did not think it would be any use to provide a sum of money for mail communication with the West Indies. Such mail facilities as already existed were ample for the purpose.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that it was just to bear in mind that the Government had gone to very large expense in connection with the Intercolonial Railroad, and were now incurring a very considerable expenditure to establish winter communication via Halifax. He was afraid that this expenditure would be very considerably in excess of the sum here saved. Negotiations were in progress with the British Government that they hoped would make of Halifax a port of call for steamers of a very superior class. If he remembered aright, the steamers employed on this service had been discontinued, as the British Government had withdrawn their subsidy, but they were not a very fast class of vessels.

Mr. JONES: They do very well for the purpose.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: What length of time do they take to pass between Halifax and Queenstown?

Mr. JONES: Ten or eleven days.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Twelve days, I think.

Mr. JONES said they were satisfied with the speed. The people of the Lower Provinces were under the impression that the Intercolonial Railway was provided for the convenience of Ontario and Quebec. He would have liked a little more direct assurance as to the policy of the Government in the event of the negotiations mentioned, failing. He hoped that the Government were not so undecided on the point as to be unable to let them know whether, in the event of the negotiations failing, they would be able to continue the Allan Line during the summer months.

Mr. FORBES said instead of a fortnightly communication between the West Indies and Nova Scotia, there was only a monthly communication.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he understood there was a fortnightly communication.

109. Steam Communication on Lakes Huron and Superior $12,500
110. Steam Service between San Francisco and Victoria, British Columbia.. 54,000

Mr. DECOSMOS said he wished to call the attention of the Government to the non-fulfilment of the contract in connection with this service, and he wanted to see right done to British Columbia in the matter. This estimate was false on the face of it. There was no steam service between San Francisco and Victoria in accordance with the true intent and original meaning of the Treaty of Union between British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada. The contractors take their steamers to Esquimalt, three miles from Victoria, and take freight and passengers round to Victoria in steam lighters. In many instances, great loss occurred to merchants in Victoria on account of the contract not being carried out in accordance with the terms of Union. Passengers landing at Esquimalt had to pay their own fare to Victoria by land, or else to wait for hours for the steam lighter. Sometimes the Victoria mails were detained for hours at Esquimalt. A great injustice and cause of complaint was that British Columbians were refused berths according to the terms of contract. The steamer's state rooms were divided up, one for Portland, Oregon, one for Washington Territory and the third for British Columbia. He could produce affidavits from respectable men in British Columbia who had to pay in San Francisco $40 instead of $25 in order to take a berth to Victoria; in other words, buy a Portland ticket at $40 because they refused a Victoria ticket. The contract was really farmed out. The original contractor disposed of his contract to the Pacific Steamship Company, and he, in conjunction with three others, received $16,000 clear, $4,000 each, and then the contract was not carried out as it ought to be. The service was originally intended to promote the interests of British Columbia as a part of Canada; but it was now, and had for a considerable time been, used to build up Puget Sound to the loss of British Columbia. The steamships on arrival called at Esquimalt, and then went to Puget Sound. Instead of getting all their coal at Nanaimo, as they ought to do, they got it on the American side, although occasionally one got its coal at Nanaimo. The fact was that this contract was now being carried out to the injury of the people of the Province and of the Dominion, and to the great inconvenience of merchants and travellers. Last week there was a petition signed by between 600 and 700 merchants, and other citizens of Victoria, asking that the steamships carrying Her Majesty's mail between San Francisco and Victoria should be compelled to enter Victoria Harbour. There were loud and deep complaints in consequence of the violation of the contract, as they felt that considerable injury was being done to their trade. A year ago the contractors sent a letter over here, which was considered by the members for British Columbia. Their proposal was that they (the members) should recommend the Government to consent to their carrying the mails three times a month all the year round, instead of twice in winter a month and four times in summer, and if they would do so they would bring their vessels into Victoria harbour and get their coal at Nanaimo. This was agreed to by the British Columbia delegation and the Postmaster-General, but the agreement was not carried out by the contractors. It had been alleged that steamships could not get into Victoria harbour, but this he most distinctly denied. When the contract was first entered into the "City of Panama" entered the harbour all right and she could do the same now.

Mr. BUNSTER said there was a desire on the part of American capitalists to crush out British Columbia. The contract was obtained under false pretences. Owing to an injudicious pilot a vessel did once run upon a rock in Victoria harbour; but there was plenty of room, and the Government had promised to blast the rock. In consequence of the steamers not calling at Victoria, goods had to be handled twice, which was of course detrimental. And the lighters in which the transportation from Esquimalt was made were old colliers, not fit for carrying merchandise. Although the British Columbia coal was 22 per cent. better than the American coal, the companies bought the latter. He believed the Government thought they were giving the contract to a purely British Columbian Company. But it was not so, it belonging to San Francisco. The Chief Factor of the Hudson Bay Company was insulted by being informed that he could not get as good a berth as the people going to Washington Territory and Oregon; and, rather than stand this insult, he went round overland at a great expense. That was not the way to have our citizens treated. It would be well for the Government to take into consideration the manner in which our people were dealt with by parties who claimed that they always got the advantage of the Dominion, and, in this case, prided themselves that they had the advantage. The sum of $54,000 was no small item for the House to deal with, and, when so much time had been wasted on trumpery items, he thought the House would bear with him on an important matter of this kind. If hon. gentlemen would pay more attention to matters of this kind, they would have more money to build the Pacific Railway with. A couple of enterprising British Columbians had built a first-class boat, which was now in the harbour of Victoria ready for service; and there was a company in British Columbia with capital enough to build, not one, but two boats. The deposits in the Dominion Savings Bank in that Province would compare favourably with those in any other Province, in proportion to the population. There was enough money there, but what the people required was to be encouraged, to see that they would have an equal chance with, or a preference over foreigners, though we could not condemn the Government for giving the contract to the parties who got it. The Postmaster-General—now the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario—said he would give the preference to a British Columbia company, and so it was given; but, unfortunately, that company had not a boat at that time and did not carry out the pledge given to their partners. Hence, they had to suffer the disadvantage of having less accommodation than was given to Chinamen. Another difficulty had been that their perishable goods—fruit and other things—had been carried to the American side. When the citizens and Her Majesty's navy in Esquimalt wanted these things they were carried to the other side. There was a provision in the contract that these vessels were to make eight or ten knots an hour. If they would do that, they could make the trip in three days. The average time was four days, and that would not be anything like ten knots an hour, while boats here ran fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen knots an hour. He thought it was desirable that the contract should be let to a British boat, and that we should not again be swindled, as we had been, and our citizens insulted.

Mr. DEWDNEY said this question was brought up in this House last year by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. De-Cosmos), who had stated that the boats were insufficient and unsafe; and that the captain told him that he was afraid to go back again to Victoria unless he insured his life for $10,000. He (Mr. Dewdney) had enquired into that statement, and had found that the captain had been making fun of the hon. member. He was proud of his boat, as he ought to be, as it was one of the best sea-boats on the Pacific Coast. The complaint was also made by the member for Victoria that the speed did not reach ten knots.

Mr. DECOSMOS: When was this complaint made?

Mr. DEWDNEY: Last Session. He could not say what was meant by a ten-knot boat, but the boats running from San Francisco to Victoria were considered, by nautical men, as ten-knot boats. Captain Seabury—captain of one of those boats—said, in a statement which he (Mr. Dewdney) had in his hand, that his steamer, since he commenced to run between Victoria and San Francisco, had made the trip in an average time of 79 hours. He believed that would be perfectly satisfactory to the Department, and that it was as fast time as was made four years ago across the Atlantic. He believed that, only a short time ago, arrangements were made with Sir Hugh Allan, in order to ensure safety, that steamers should not go over an average of ten knots an hour. The Pacific coast was very foggy and dangerous, and it would be the height of injudiciousness to ask any contractor to carry out the contract of ten miles an hour in a dense fog—in fact he believed the nautical running regulations would not allow a ship to go over half speed in foggy weather on a rocky shore. The member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) had mentioned the name of Mr. Graham, who could not get a berth on this steamer, and had to go overland. He did go overland; but a few days ago he (Mr. Dewdney) had received a letter from Victoria stating the circumstances which brought that about. He had taken his stateroom on the steamer, and was given one of the best on the boat for himself and family. Unfortunately, small-pox broke out, and he took the first chance he could get and went overland. That was the story of Mr. Graham. With regard to the steamer running to Esquimalt, he thought the people of British Columbia, as well as Victoria, ought to have something to say. The Victoria Harbour was not capable of accommodating the large vessels now carrying our mails. The "Panama" once tried to get in and ran on a rock.

MR. DECOSMOS: And the pilot was discharged.

MR. DEWDNEY said plenty of other pilots had run her since, but they had never attempted to take her into Victoria Harbour. If there was a breath of wind the vessels could not be handled in that little harbour. He thought it was not fair to the travelling public to endeavour to force the Government to give the mail contract to small steamers capable of entering Victoria Harbour when they had a chance of accommodating fine steamers, of which anyone might be proud, at Esquimalt. There was a little inconvenience incurred in going to Esquimalt by land, for the distance of a mile or two, but all the merchandise (and passengers when willing) was transported at the expense of the Company, in tug-boats. As to the spoiling of some fruit and other perishable goods which he believed was taken across to Puget Sound on one occasion, the owners of the steamers paid for the loss, and in every case where there had been any misunderstanding of that kind, the Company had made it good. There was a great deal of correspondence in the Departments in regard to all these matters, but he believed the representations made by the contractors had turned out to be true, and the allegations against them to be not true at all, and the explanations to be satisfactory to the Department. There had been difficulties in shipping coal for these large ships on account of the wharves not being prepared to load such large vessels; but they had taken large quantities, and did so now every month, from the Provinces. The petition which the hon. member for Victoria spoke of with 600 signatures lately received, contained, he was informed, very few names of prominent men in Victoria, the rest being a lot of boys and aliens with no interest in British Columbia or Victoria; but he (Mr. Dewdney) knew that a petition was signed by almost every responsible merchant in the city of Victoria stating that the service was perfectly satisfactory and far better than had ever been given before. The steamers were first-class, the mails were carried very regularly, the boats were run well, officered well, and, in the event of any ruffianism occurring, it was immediately put down.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the discussion would be sufficient to satisfy the House that there were differences of opinion among the members from British Columbia in regard to the service which had been criticised. The Government could only have one object, which was to secure, under the obligations they had undertaken to British Columbia, the fairest and best service for that Province. His hon. friend for Victoria moved for papers the other day in reference to this subject, and he might think there was some delay in their not being brought down. He could tell his hon. friend that since that time, a clerk had been constantly employed in copying the voluminous correspondence, and it would probably take three or four days more before it would be completed. The contract was made after tenders had been advertised for, and it was given to the lowest tenderer. The amount paid seemed to be a large sum—it was almost half what was paid for the Liverpool service—but, whatever it was, it was a contract into which the Government had entered, and which, unless there were some grounds for breaking it, must be fulfilled. Up to the present moment they had been unable to see any necessity for breaking it, and, while he had listened to the representations made on this subject, he had been unable to form any conclusion on the subject. The contractor was here last winter, and all the complaints made against the service were represented to him, and he was informed that the object of the Government was to carry out the benefits which the contract was intended to confer upon the people of British Columbia. He was told, moreover, that the Government would regard with no leniency whatever, the least disposition they could discover to deal unfairly with the British Columbians, and that they would take all the means in their power to break the contract if they found a disposition to discriminate against our fellow countrymen in favour of foreigners. The difficulty in arriving at a conclusion was so serious that the Department would have to send an experienced officer to British Columbia to examine into the matter.

Mr. BUNSTER said the Company agreed to enter Victoria harbour, and by their failure to do so they entailed great inconvenience and expense on travellers. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Dewdney) said the boats were well officered. Well, the captains were gentlemen, and the mates probably understood their business, but the balance of the crew were Chinamen. He hoped the hon. the Postmaster-General would send out an officer to investigate, for it would then be found that his statements in regard to this matter were correct, and that there were evils which required remedying.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he was very much surprised at the statement made by the hon. the Postmaster-General, to the effect that the difficulty was so serious that an officer would have to be sent to the Province to enquire into it. He could only say that such a course would only be a waste of public money. Section 4 of the Terms of Union read:—

“The Government will provide an efficient mail service fortnightly by steam communication between Victoria and San Francisco, and twice a week between Victoria and Olympia, the vessels to be adapted for the conveyance of freight and passengers.”

He would like to know what necessity there was to send a gentleman out to interpret that section. That term of Union instead of being carried out was being violated; there was no steam communication—no Dominion mail service—between Olympia and Victoria. When Lord Dufferin visited the Province, the service between San Francisco and Victoria was improved a little, and they had made shorter passages since that time. The hon. member for Yale said ships could not enter Victoria harbour during a high wind, but high winds did not prevail all the year.

Mr. DEWDNEY: I said a light breeze.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he denied that most distinctly. He had the statement of the Captain of the “Dakota,” which was to the effect that they could enter the harbour at any time, providing they had a tug to assist them entering at some places. The remarks the hon. member for Yale had made with regard to the petition were calculated to mislead the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dewdney) also stated that he had seen a petition to the effect that the vessels were first-class. He (Mr. DeCosmos) believed that that petition confined itself to the seaworthiness of the boats. There were from 36 to 50 Chinamen on board each vessel, which fact could not be regarded as desirable in any respect.

Mr. DEWDNEY said one of these steamers had arrived at Victoria from San Francisco in 68 hours 10 minutes, the shortest trip ever made, and one hour less than the time occupied in the passage of the warship “Amethyst,” conveying the Governor-General, from San Francisco to Victoria.

| 112. Winter service by steamer between Prince Edward Island and the mainland | 20,000   |

Mr. PLUMB asked, whether the “Northern Light” had been successful.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said she had been wonderfully successful. He was satisfied that this service could not be done for less than $20,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN: What did it cost last season?

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): We have not received the bills and do not know as yet.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Is this service done by contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is only one steamer on the route, and this is a grant for it.

Vote agreed to.

114. Steam communication between Grand Manan Island N.B., and the mainland, ... $ 1,500

115. To provide for the examination of masters and mates..... 4,250

116. For purchase of life-boats, life-preservers and rewards for saving life..... 4,000

Mr. LANGEVIN said that some of the boats on the north shore of the St. Lawrence were not fit for use.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he would make enquiry in the matter.

Vote agreed to.

117. To provide for investigation into wrecks and casualties and collection of information relating to disasters to shipping..... $ 500

118. Expenses in connection with Canadian register and classification of shipping, 500

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether any regulations were introduced for the classification of the shipping of the North-West. It was as yet not very considerable, of course, but still there was quite a little marine springing up on the inland lakes.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the vote was intended for another purpose, having reference to sea-going vessels.

Vote agreed to.

119. Montreal Water Police.. $14,090

120. River Police, Quebec..... 23,500

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the vote was increased as they had recurred to the vote of a former year. They found that this was necessary.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he was very glad to find this done. The force was a credit to the Government.

Vote agreed to.

121. Removal of obstructions in navigable rivers ..... $500

122. Salaries and allowances of lighthouse keepers ..... 146,881

Mr. DOMVILLE said there was a large increase for Nova Scotia, while the increase for New Brunswick was very small. He had annually called the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the necessity of building a lighthouse at Palmer's Point on the St. John River.

Mr. SMITH said more lighthouses were built on the Nova Scotia than on the New Brunswick coast, because more were required there.

Vote agreed to.

123. Maintenance and repairs,..... $253,263

Mr. LANGEVIN remarked that the increase, $40,263, was very large.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the amount last year was $50,000 less than it was the year before.

Vote agreed to.

124 For completion and construction of lighthouse and fog-alarms, $30,000.

In reply to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the Government were building no more lighthouses, only completing those in progress.

Vote agreed to.

XV. FISHERIES.

Salaries and disbursements of Fishery Overseers and Wardens:—

	Ontario .....	$11,600 00
	Quebec .....	11,500 00
	Nova Scotia, including Inspector and Clerk	14,400 00
125	New Brunswick, including Inspector and Clerk.....	10,130 00
	Prince Edward Island	1,740 00
	Manitoba .....	200 00
	British Columbia.....	1,000 00
126	Maintenance and repairs of steamer for protection of Fisheries.....	20,000 00
127	Fish-breeding, fishways and oyster beds.....	20,000 00

Mr. PLUMB said he had watched with much interest Mr. Willmot's fish-breeding experiments at Newcastle, and the question arose whether the artificial breeding had been of any benefit. No vote could be asked or would be more cheerfully granted than for anything which went in the direction of increasing and improving the stock of fish. There was no doubt whatever that Mr. Green, of New York, had succeeded to a certain extent in stocking the rivers flowing into Lake Ontario and the Lake itself with shad. Probably the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries could give some information in regard to the results obtained.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the increase in the vote was owing to the fact there were three new establishments to maintain. A report would shortly be made which would give the hon. gentleman all the information he desired. He would merely say that great good had been done so far through this instrumentality.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said he would like to know what was the policy of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in regard to the oyster beds—what portion of money was spent for their protection?

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was not prepared to state at this moment, but he would make enquiries.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the oysters were diminishing, and it was very important they should be protected in some way.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said this was a difficult matter to deal with, as parties in the neighbourhood of the beds claimed certain rights.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the Government and Parliament had not hesitated to deprive persons living along the banks of the rivers of their rights to fish, and it was just as necessary that steps should be taken for the protection of the oyster beds. They were protected in other countries.

Mr. PLUMB said unless some protective measures were adopted the oysters would disappear in the same manner as the lobsters were disappearing.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said the lobster fishing would be destroyed unless something was done to protect it. The protection of fish was at the outset unpopular, but it became popular as soon as the fishermen found that it was in their interests. He had strongly supported the measure. In some instances, however, as in case of high tide, it was impossible to tie up nets as was required, at six o'clock on Saturday evening, to so remain until six o'clock on Monday morning; and he thought that some regulation should be introduced to prevent difficulty in such cases. He held that oyster beds should be protected as they were being ruined under the present system; but he was aware that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not occupy an independent position in this regard. He would be most happy to aid the hon. gentleman as far as was in his power to protect these beds. He had intended to move for a Committee in the matter, but he had not done so owing to the manner in which he had been treated last Session—as to limitation of expenses—by the Premier with regard to the Committee appointed to enquire into the important subject of telegraph communication in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence.

THE SEAT FOR LINCOLN.

RESIGNATION OF MR. NORRIS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I, this evening, received the following letter:—

“OTTAWA, 17th April, 1877.

“To the Honourable
“The Speaker of the “House of Commons,

“SIR,—Some twelve years ago several Steam-boat proprietors, of whom I was one, formed a line of steamers upon the Lakes called the Merchants' Line, each proprietor retaining the ownership of his own vessels.

“In the year 1874 an Incorporated Company called the Lake and River Navigation Company, brought their vessels into the line, and it was called the Merchants and Lake and River Company. The Agents of the line at Montreal were Messrs. George E. Jakes & Co..

"Some time in the winter of 1875 Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., of Montreal, as well as a number of other persons, applied to the Merchants Line for rates for the carriage on their account of steel rails to Lake Superior, saying they had tendered, or were about to tender to the Government for the contract. The rate of five dollars per ton for the net carriage was given them as the price at which the line would carry the rails, subject to certain charges. On the 12th of May, 1875, Messrs. Jakes & Co. on behalf of the line entered into an agreement with Messrs Cooper, Fairman & Co (who represented that their own tender at $6.20 had been accepted by the Government) to carry the rails at the rate previously named to them of five dollars per ton, subject to certain charges.

"It now appears that Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., represented to the Government that they were acting for the Merchants Line. For this representation they had no authority whatever from me, or as far as I know from any one else. They had never been in any way agents of the Line.

"Immediately after the agreement with Cooper, Fairman & Co. of the 12th of May, the carriage of the rails commenced under that agreement, and it appears that after several cargoes had been delivered the Secretary of the Incorporated Company, Mr. Charles J. Hope applied to Cooper, Fairman & Co. for payment of freight due his Company, and not obtaining a settlement, wrote a letter to the Secretary of Public Works of the 22nd of June, 1875.

"This letter was written without my knowledge, and the statement contained in it, that a tender by Messrs. Jakes & Co. on behalf of myself and others had been accepted, is incorrect.

"Some time afterwards I was informed that in order to enable the line to obtain the freight due them by Cooper, Fairman & Co., it was necessary to give the latter a power of Attorney to draw the amount from the Government, and the instrument of the twenty-third of July, 1875, was presented to me for signature, as intended to confer such authority.

"Under this impression I signed it without reading it, considering it a mere formality, and without imagining that I was thereby apparently authorizing a contract to be made on my behalf with the Crown.

"The whole business was done under and pursuant to the agreement of Jakes & Co. with Cooper, Fairman & Co. I never intended to become or supposed I was in any manner a contractor with the Crown, or with any one save Cooper, Fairman & Co.

"I am to-day advised that I may by these transactions have unwittingly vacated my seat in the House of Commons, under the provisions of the Independence of Parliament Act, and feel it my duty to notify you of the facts for the information of the House and to resign my seat, and accordingly, I, James Norris of the City of Saint Catharines, in the Province of Ontario, Shipowner, who was duly elected a member of the said House of Commons for the Electoral Division of the County of Lincoln, do hereby declare my intention to resign my seat in the said House of Commons, and do hereby resign the same.

"As witness my Hand and Seal, this 17th day of April, 1877.

"JAMES NORRIS.

"Witness,—

"G. CASAUDT,
"THOS. OLIVER."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I feel I would not be doing justice to an old friend and colleague in the Legislature, in the person of Mr. Norris, if I did not say that from the first to the last of this business to which he has referred, he never had any communication with myself directly or indirectly as to the carrying of these rails, nor was I aware of the position which the hon. gentleman occupied in that connection. I consider Mr. Norris to be one of the most conscientious and upright men I ever knew, and one who, above all others, is above doing anything that would be either mean or improper. It is a matter to myself of the greatest possible regret that he should have been placed in the position he is now in by a mere accidental circumstance, over which he undoubtedly appears to have had no control, and at least no personal cognizance. And I am quite sure I reflect, at all events, the opinions of a very large majority of the members of the House who have associated with him, in giving expression to these views regarding his political and personal character.

MANITOBA JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 117.]

(Mr. Thompson, Haldimand.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he regretted that this matter should be introduced so late in the Session. It would be noticed that powers were asked for to run a line parallel for a long distance with the Canada Pacific Railway, 30 miles only between them.

Mr. CAMERON said the Bill would authorize the Company to become gigantic land speculators.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Railway Committee could eliminate the objectionable portions of the Bill if necessary.

Mr. SCHULTZ said the road must be against the interests of the Canada Pacific Railway.

Mr. MILLS remarked that the North-West could sustain more than one railway.

Bill read the second time.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes after
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 18th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. TUPPER said he thought it only right to give notice to the Minister of Public Works that he proposed to move to-morrow, or when it would be most convenient, the following resolution, when going into Committee of Supply :

"That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, that this House cannot approve of the policy and course pursued by this Government with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway."

Mr. MACKENZIE said that perhaps he had better first give his explanations, to-morrow, concerning the Railway.

Mr. TUPPER said he would then move his motion on Friday or Saturday.

DISTRIBUTION OF OLD RAILS.

Mr. BOWELL said he would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the return brought down yesterday, in connection with the distribution of old rails, loaned or given away under a resolution passed last Session. He had asked for the return on the 15th February last, but the return submitted was very brief, though so long delayed. He would not find fault with this if it contained all the information he had asked for. He moved :—

"For a return shewing the quantity of iron rails removed from the Government railways, railway companies to which they have been loaned, the date of such loans, the counties and districts through which the said railways run, the quantity loaned to each railway company, the terms upon which such loans have been made, the nature of the security given by each railway to secure the return of said iron rails, the names of the directors of the companies respectively to which iron rails have been loaned, together with all correspondence between the Government and any company or individual making application for such loans."

The only information given related to the railway companies, to which the rails were given, the counties and districts through which the lines run, the quantity loaned, and the names of the Directors. There was a most extraordinary statement in a letter of Mr. Brydges, who, he supposed, was the General Superintendent of Railways, as follows :—

"There is no correspondence that I am aware of, in connection with these matters."

He was not aware that he or the House had asked for any correspondence had with Mr. Brydges, who seemed to arrogate to himself the right to say what should come to the House. He supposed that the Government knew whether there was any correspondence or not. Mr. Brydges was trifling with the House, in his opinion. He had good reason to believe that very important correspondence had taken place in this regard.

Mr. TUPPER said he himself had had a somewhat lengthy correspondence with the Government on the subject, which would come under the head of "individual" mentioned in the end of the motion. He was extremely anxious that this correspondence should be brought down, as he thought he had very great reason to complain of the action of the Government in this matter. At all events, he desired to show that he had not been wanting in the performance of what he considered to be his duty. He could not understand the statement of Mr. Brydges because the Minister of Public Works had informed him that his application had been referred to this official. A Company in his county had requested him to communicate with the Government on the subject. He perceived that the motion did not embrace the Order in Council, which decided to what Companies the old rails should be given; and he would be extremely obliged if, before they came to concurrence on the Intercolonial Railway item, this Order in Council was laid on the table.

Mr. SCHULTZ.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought he had stated the number—70—of miles of rails distributed, and the names of the railways to which they were sent; but this information could be easily submitted.

Mr. BOWELL: All the railways do not appear in the return.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Two or three do not appear, because they have got none yet.

SUPPLY.

XVI. GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS AND OBSERVATORIES.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

133. Grant for Meteorological Observatories, including instruments and cost of telegraphic weather warnings.. $37,000
134. Geological Survey. .... 50,000

Mr. TUPPER: Is this all transferred to the Department of the Interior?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes; it is entirely in the hands of my hon. friend.

Mr. TUPPER said he was extremely glad to observe that the former doubts of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) regarding the constitutionality of this appropriation were entirely removed.

Mr. MILLS said, while he entertained precisely the same views as formerly in this regard, he recognized the fact that as the question of jurisdiction had been directed by one Legislature, and as others who might claim jurisdiction in the matter were silent, time and practice had determined the interpretation of the law. This was a well recognized principle under the American Federal system, and he knew of no reason why it should not prevail here. As the particular practice in this regard had fixed the jurisdiction here with the acquiescence of the Local Legislatures, he did not undertake to disturb this state of things.

Mr. TUPPER said he would like to have an explanation as to what was to be done this year.

Mr. MILLS said this was not as yet absolutely determined. The Director of the Geological Surveys, however, thought—and he was inclined to concur in this view—that they should make explorations concerning the coal fields of the North-West Territories, near the Rocky Mountains, and the mineral resources of the eastern shore of Hudson's Bay. This would not interfere with the ordinary work undertaken in the various Provinces.

In answer to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. MILLS said the appropriations hitherto made were found insufficient to meet the expenditures. The vote of $27,000 was to meet the expenses of the Commission and surveys. They had come to an understanding with the Government of British Columbia that this Commission should continue to sit until the reserves in the vicinity of settlements were located. Those some distance away from settlements and where the Indians were not likely to be reserved for some time to come, would be dealt with in future. British Columbia bore half the expense.

Mr. LANGEVIN said this vote was very large for the purpose, and inasmuch as it was only half what would be actually expended, he thought it would be better to stop the Commission and give a sum of money for the purchase of lands for the Indians.

Mr. MILLS said this vote covered not only the expense of the Commission, but that of the surveys. The labours of the Commissioners would probably terminate this season.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked if a large sum for this purpose had not been expended without the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MILLS said he thought there had been no expenditure without the sanction of Parliament. When the serious difficulty occurred between the white population and the Indians, some expenditure was incurred, but that could properly be charged to "unforseen expenses." Up to this period about $10,000 had been expended by the Local and Dominion Governments on this service. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) he thought had made an absurd proposition to the Committee. The Commission was the only fair means of settling the disputes. There was not a single instance of the Crown taking possession of a foot of territory to which the Indian title had not been extinguished; but it had been the general rule in British Columbia to deprive the Indians of their land without paying them for it. When they found that the reserves were too small for the Indians and they were being subjected to a great many hardships at the hands of the whites, when the Indians complained of their burying places being ploughed up and desecrated, it was absolutely necessary this matter should be dealt with; and it had been dealt with, he believed, in a way that was satisfactory to the Indians and to the Government of British Columbia. The best security that there had been and would be no improper expenditure, was the fact that both Governments shared in the expense.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman might have used some other word in speaking of his argument than "absurd." He never applied such an epithet to anything the hon. gentleman said, and there was no argument in the employment of such terms. He (Mr. Langevin) discussed those matters dispassionately, and with a view of obtaining proper information and facts. The Government had no right to incur any expenditure without the sanction of Parliament. When the trouble arose they could have told the Indians a Commission would be appointed to examine into the matter as soon as Parliament voted the money, and the Indians would have been perfectly content, because they knew when the Crown of England promised anything it was sure to be performed. He thought it would have been better to purchase land to add to the reserves than to have gone into this expenditure. $5,000 had already been spent by each Government, and now it was proposed that this Government should spend $27,000 on the Commission, making $32,000 in all, besides the $27,000 additional to be spent by the Local Legislature of British Columbia; and even at that, there was no promise that the matter would be ended with these expenditures. This Commission had been the talk of the whole Province of British Columbia, and it was held that it was a most expensive institution. It would have been a great deal better had the Indian claims been met at once.

Mr. MILLS explained that a considerable portion of the $27,000 was for the purpose of surveys.

Mr. ROSCOE said the Commissioners had caused much expense to the Local Government by the use of the Dominion steamer "Sir James Douglas," and he thought they should have the use of it for nothing.

Mr. DECOSMOS said the Local Government had made it a penalty for any person to interfere with an Indian burial ground, and if the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior in this matter was correct, it was also true that the offenders were liable to be brought before a magistrate and punished. He thoroughly agreed with the statement made by the hon. member for Charlevoix. He viewed the action taken by the Canadian Government with reference to the Indian Department as most tyrannical. By virtue of the Act of Union the trusteeship of the Indians was to be assumed by the Dominion Government, and a policy as liberal as that which had been pursued by the Local Government was to be continued. In fact, it was to be the same policy as much as possible. But instead of that, no sooner had the Indians become the wards of the Imperial Government than claims were made for more land. The Government of which he was the head, in British Columbia, had agreed that 20 acres of land should be set apart for each Indian family, and that was a sufficiently large quantity to meet their requirements. The matter had occasioned so much difficulty between the two Governments, that the Dominion Government threw out the threat of appealing to the Imperial authorities. From 20 years' experience with the Indians and British Columbia affairs, he could say that the Indian Commissioners at Vancouver and New Westminster could have discharged all the duties that were now being discharged by the gentlemen who had been appointed by the Dominion and Provincial Governments, at an expense of $10 a day, with $5 a day travelling expenses, besides the use of a small steamer. He believed the short and easy mode of disposing of the difficulty would have been for the Dominion Government to have purchased from the Provincial Government the land over and above the 20 acres for each Indian family, and then their surveyors could easily have marked out the territory. The present policy of buying out the Indian title was like a jeweller giving a child a ridiculously small sum for a valuable jewel it had, the child itself not knowing its value. British Columbia had always dealt liberally with the Indians, with respect to land, and in no instance had it attempted to take away a single right from the Indians. He did not know from what fund the Government could appropriate the money to meet the expenses of the Indian Commission, except out of the amount appropriated for 1877-8. He hoped that the Minister of the Interior would close up the Commission as soon possible.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he perfectly agreed with some of the observations of the hon. member for Charlevoix. He agreed that it would have been better had the Government given the Indians what they asked for the land. The arrangement, however, was made by the Government of which the hon. member for Victoria was the leader. But, because his Government did not have the consequent patronage, he had always used every argument to prejudice the minds of the people of British Columbia and the Government against the members of the Commission. He (Mr. Dewdney) did not see why there should be any question as to the amount spent towards the Commission. The previous vote had not been expended, as the surveyors could not go into the field and settle the claims. With regard to the future, he hoped there would be some new arrangement. He was glad to see that the present Government of British Columbia had endeavoured to reduce the expenditure. Under the present system, he did not think the claims could be settled in ten or fifteen years, at the rate they were being settled now.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he thought it would take, at least, five years, if not ten years, to settle the claims by the present Commission. As he was coming to the sea coast, three months ago, on his way to Ottawa, he was met at Soda Creek by a deputation of Indians. They stated that their reservation was barren, and that unless the Government gave them a new reservation or supplied them with tools and means to irrigate their land, they would have to take forcible possession of the farm of a gentleman living in the vicinity, unless he would supply them with provisions and clothing from his store. Previously they had depended to a great extent upon the salmon in the Fraser River for sustenance, but this year there was no run of salmon, and they were in a starving condition. The situation was a really critical one, and he hoped the Government would see that the Commission attended to the matter, otherwise there might be bloodshed; and he hoped also, that the Commission would settle all the claims as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. DECOSMOS denied the statement of the hon. member for Yale, that he had endeavoured to prejudice the minds of the people of British Columbia and the Government against the Commission. He had, however, endeavoured to point out the true course which should be pursued. He would repeat that this Commission was wholly unnecessary, and that the two Commissioners at Victoria and New Westminster could have discharged the duties. The Commissioner at the former place had hardly anything to do, although he was an able officer, and the same was the case with the Commissioner at New Westminster.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he had not accused the hon. gentleman of attacking the Commission, but the Commissioners, on account of his Government not having the power to appoint them.

Mr. DECOSMOS said the hon. gentleman had made another statement which he distinctly denied. He could only tell the hon. gentleman, when he stated that if the Government of which he (Mr. DeCosmos) was a member, had made the treaty or convention that it would have been all right,—that the management was made by the Walkem Government, of which he was not a member. He could assure the hon. gentleman that such was the fact, for he had a letter from one of the members of the Executive Council, and a party to the arrangement, viz., the ex-Chief Commissioner of Lands and Works, who stated that it was never contemplated by the Government to incur a greater expense. The Chief Commissioner would have acted as Joint Indian Commissioner, and there would have been no additional charge, except some travelling expenses. More than that, he (Mr. DeCosmos) was here when the arrangement was made, and, when he heard of it, on his return to Victoria, he condemned it then and there. Two of those Commissioners had been his personal friends for years—the one from the mainland, and the other from the Island. They were gentlemen whom he respected; and with the other Commissioner he had always been friendly, differing only on political subjects.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD inquired when the arrangement with the British Columbia Government was made.

Mr. MILLS said he could not at the moment state the precise date, but it was sometime in September last.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that any agreement made with the Government of British Columbia for a Joint Commission with regard to the settlement of the land question, must be laid before Parliament. The House was now asked to vote $57,000 to carry out an agreement made behind the back of Parliament, in vacation, which had not been submitted to Parliament, with the terms of which they were ignorant, also as to the manner in which the Commissioners would be paid, and as to whether Parliament possessed any authority to pay these Commissioners.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. the Minister of the Interior was not responsible for the arrangement; of course he (Mr. Cartwright) was responsible. He was not very familiar with the details, because at the time the arrangement was made he was en route to Europe, but, to the best of his recollection,—and he spoke under correction—it was this: As the right hon. member for Kingston and other members were aware, the land question in British Columbia had been a vexed question ever since the time of union being effected. Loud and numerous complaints had been made to the Dominion Government by the Indians and their friends in British Columbia. As he understood the case, the Indians of British Columbia were not a nomad race to anything like the extent of the Indians on the other side of the Rocky Mountains, but depended much more on the cultivation of the soil for their subsistence. In many places the Indians cultivated the soil. The territory occupied by the Indians was coveted by white settlers, and it was well known that white settlers did not respect their rights. Numerous, frequent and very urgent representations had been made to the Government, of the ill-feeling which was growing up between the Indians and white settlers in many places. It was on that ground that the Government, deeming the matter urgent, did consent, at the instance of the British Columbia Government, and after the return of His Excellency from his trip to that Province, to take steps to prevent any mischief arising. Any money vote that might be necessary would be embodied in the Supplementary Estimates, and the authority of Parliament asked. Any papers required would be brought down. He denied that any cheap arrangement for the purchase of the land, as suggested by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), could be effected. The Indians demanded four or five times the quantity of land that the British Columbia Government was willing to assign to them. As to the plea that lands at distant points might be allotted to them, it should be remembered that the Indians required land near where they were at present.

Mr. MILLS said that the report of his predecessor last year contained the agreement which the Commission would be appointed to carry into effect. He believed the arrangement was to appoint three Commissioners who would be paid $10 per day, the expense to be borne by the two Governments. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had made a series of assumptions, none of which were borne out by the facts. That hon. gentleman had said that it would be cheaper to pay the British Columbia Government for the land than to undertake to survey it. But the Government, even if the land were purchased, would have to survey the territory. White settlers had entered upon lands at fishing stations along the sea coast, which had been claimed by the Indians for ages.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Where?

Mr. MILLS said if the hon. member would move for the papers he would easily understand how the difficulty had arisen. White settlers in some instances had rented Indian lands on which considerable labour had been expended, and afterwards entered the lands in the Land Office, and difficulties between the Indians and whites had thus arisen; and it was only because of the confidence of the Indians in the Agent, and their belief that the Canadian Government would at an early day consider their case and maintain their rights, that bloodshed was prevented. Another difficulty arose. Hon. gentlemen opposite had declared that the Canadian agents should attend to the matter. Those agents had much work to perform in addition to such labour. A body of Indians went to Victoria from Queen Charlotte Islands, and the women were induced to remain there. The agent could not get the Indians to return. Small-pox broke out among them. The municipal authorities maintained that the Dominion authorities had no right to interfere; but the Indians, who were in a dying state, were driven out of the municipality, and the Dominion Government had been obliged to provide for them out of unforeseen expenses. A party of fifty died in the Pest House. Indians not affected with the disease were compelled by the municipality to accompany those suffering from the disease to the hospital, and thus the disease spread among them. Many of the Indians of British Columbia were husbandmen or stockraisers, and it was absurd to suppose that they would rest satisfied with twenty acres of land for each family. It was absurd to suppose that the Indians would tamely submit to be ousted of their lands in the neighbourhood of favourable fishing stations. It was in the interests of the country as well as of the public revenue that the question in dispute should be settled at the earliest possible day in a manner that would satisfy the Indians that their rights would not be improperly interfered with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Government had no right to inaugurate a new policy in regard to Indian lands without having first obtained the assent of Parliament. At the time of the union of British Columbia with Canada it was speedily provided that the Indians of the Pacific Province should be treated in a similar manner to that in which they had been dealt with previously. That Province did not exact from the Indians the surrender of lands in the same formal manner as had been done in the old Provinces of Canada. If the Dominion Government had continued the same practice as that which obtained in British Columbia when it was a Crown colony there would not have been any trouble. It so happened that, immediately after becoming a portion of the Dominion, interested persons put it into the heads of the Indians that they owned the whole country. In consequence of this, he was afraid that his hon. friend (Mr. Mills), with his doctrinaire studies, would sacrifice a great deal in order to carry out the symmetry of some proposition, and philosophize upon the subject and about the Indians, instead of dealing practically with the matter, going into the question of abstract rights.

Mr. MILLS : No ; not abstract rights.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that there was an arrangement and agreement made between British Columbia and the Dominion Government

Mr. MILLS.

He took it that the just rights and claims of the Indians had been perfectly safe, whatever they might have been. The hon. gentleman had no right to make this arrangement, or cancel anything that had not been granted before, until an Act of Parliament to authorize it was passed.

Mr. MILLS : Will the hon. gentleman tell us what was conceded ? I do not know of anything conceded.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had understood the hon. gentleman to state that there would have been bloodshed had not the Indians got certain lands surveyed. They continued to claim more lands, and the hon. gentleman gave these lands away.

Mr. MILLS : I can tell the hon. gentleman that they claimed lands of which they had been fraudulently deprived ; and, as trustees of the Indians, we had a right to see that they were protected.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that as their guardians the Government had certainly a right to protect the Indians in the lands they actually occupied and used. This arrangement was made last summer, and the salaries of the Commissioners appointed were $10,000 a year, of which this country he supposed had to pay one-half. The first thing done should have been to bring this matter down by Message, stating what the policy of the Government was and securing the sanction of Parliament to the vote. It was not enough to insert this sum in the Estimates.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he thought that this information had been given to Parliament before, and he found that this was the case. In the report for the year ending 30th June, 1876, a long correspondence was communicated and the action finally taken by the Government on the 5th November, 1875, was detailed. This report was laid on the table last year, so that opportunity had been afforded for learning the intentions of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it appeared that the agreement was made on the 1st January, 1876, Parliament rose in April, 1876, and yet no intimation of the facts had been given last Session.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Oh, yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: No. The hon. gentleman had stated that the money was taken out of unforeseen expenses, but they could not then have been unforeseen. There ought to have been a vote taken in Parliament. The appointments were made in May, 1876.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That information was contained in the report brought down last year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: But there was no formal action by Parliament on it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I understood the right hon. gentleman to complain particularly that no information of all these negotiations had been supplied.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did so.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: In the report presented last year there are several communications, and one in particular to which I would call the hon. gentleman's attention—it is dated Department of the Interior, November, 1875, reciting in full the whole arrangement made between the two Governments and signed by the Minister of the Interior. I merely mention this to show that there was an opportunity for Parliament informing itself as to what was intended to be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was no vote, however.

Mr. MILLS said that this was a mere matter of administration, and not of public policy. There was no difference between running a line between an Indian reserve and any other land, and surveying other portions of the country. He held that the Government of Canada had no power to deprive the Indians of any right in the soil existing prior to that, by any arrangement with British Columbia. The whole history of the policy of the British Government agreed with this action; and there had been decisions from the highest tribunals declaring that this point was determined. Under the Act of Confederation they were not merely the guardians of the Indian Reserves, but also the guardians of the Indians; and this, he apprehended, embraced any right which the Indians might have in any territory coming into possession of Canada, and the title of which had not been extinguished. The Indians of British Columbia, in this respect, stood on no different footing from the Indians of the North-West Territory.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had not held that a policy respecting the Indians of British Columbia, different from that followed with regard to Indians in other parts of the Dominion, should be pursued. No formal surrender had been obtained from the Indians of British Columbia. This information was furnished by the Commissioners who came here for that purpose. Dissatisfaction had arisen among the Indians of that Province since the Union, in consequence of their having been incited or aroused to assert certain rights which they had not previously enjoyed. He did not wish to see the Indians deprived of or denied any right they possessed; but things should not have been allowed to go on without formal assent or denial of them, as had before been happily the case. The arrangement in question was finally closed on January 8th, 1876; and yet it had not been brought before Parliament for its sanction, nor was a vote taken for the payment of the Commissioners.

Mr. MILLS: The Commissioners were not then appointed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said they were appointed in May. The Government had waited until the House rose before doing so, and had paid them improperly without the authority of Parliament, out of the item for unforeseen expenses, which was not intended for any such purpose.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he took occasion to allude to an observation that had fallen from the Minister of the Interior. He had no doubt that the hon. gentleman had endeavored to discharge his duties with relation to the Indians of British Columbia with the best intention; but he (Mr. Mills) was laboring under a misapprehension. The hon.

gentleman said that fishing stations on the coast had been taken away from the Indians. Such might be the case; but he was acquainted with the whole coast of Vancouver Island where there were settlements, and he was not aware of a single fishing station along this line of settlement that had been taken from the Indians. He also knew the coast on the opposite side of the Island, and at Burrard Inlet, and he was not aware of a single fishing station that had been taken away from the Indians in this section. Around the mouth of Fraser River and around the American Boundary, Indians resided; but he was not aware of a single fishing station that had been taken away there. This being the case, it seemed to him that some one had been making to the Minister of the Interior statements which were without foundation. With relation to another matter: the quantity of land cultivated by the Indians was stated to be very small indeed, but the Indians behind the mountains were what he might call civilized. They owned horses and moved from place to place on horseback; but this was not the case with the Indians on the coast, who moved from point to point in canoes. If disposed to engage in the raising of stock, it might be necessary to give to the Indians more land; but the moment they entered into this pursuit and showed a desire to take a civilized position, the Government of British Columbia was empowered to treat them as were treated the residents of any civilized country without any charge to the Dominion Government whatever, and to supply them with the land they required.

Mr. TUPPER: There are increases in all these items. Are the Indians increasing in number?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I rather think not. As far as experience gives any light on the subject, tribes in point of numbers remain about stationary; and, of course, if epidemics arise amongst them, their population rapidly decrease. If they do increase, we must pay so much more, as we are obliged to pay so much per head.

Mr. MILLS said that considerable sums which were voted last year had not been paid. It was as well to inform the Committee that the amount of appropriation now asked for was merely an estimated amount. They had not had accurate data at which to base their calculations. Since the time the estimates were made no then they had received further information which showed that the number of the Indians was considerably larger than they had supposed. An unexpired balance had stood over from last year, and the unexpired balances amounted to $64,645. The same policy had been pursued with reference to the money voted from year to year as Indian appropriations as that which prevailed in the old Province of Canada. The hon. member for Kingston knew that then such unexpired balances at the end of the financial year did not lapse into the public treasury, but were treated as portions of the Indian Fund. In 1871-2 the estimates for Indian purposes approached $35,834.79, and the expenditure was $52,761.94. The hon. gentleman had, in this case, certainly done what he now complained they had been doing in British Columbia without the authority of Parliament. In 1872-3, the appropriation was $36,918.66, and the expenditure, $28,145.49; in 1873-74 the appropriation was $107,000, and the expenditure, $82,000; in 1874-5 the appropriation was $178,000, and the expenditure, $151,000; and in 1875-6 the appropriation was $223,000, and the expenditure, $203,000, so that the accumulated and unexpired balances, during the past five or six years, amounted to $64,645. If they had paid, as expected, all the Indians last year under the Treaty, they would have paid 150 more Indians under the first Treaty, $1,800; 20 Indians under the second Treaty, two years' unpaid annuities, $200; and 546 Indians under another Treaty, $2,730. Under Treaty No. 6, 2,500 Indians, as yet, had received nothing, but they were entitled, as their first payment, to the following amounts : to $30,000 at $12 per head ; to $325 for 13 chiefs, one year in arrears, at $25 each ; and to $780 for 52 headmen, at $15 each ; so that, in this one matter alone of annuities, the expenditure of nearly $36,000 was concerned that ought to have been paid last year, but which had not been paid. As they could not state the exact number of the Indians or tell the exact amount that would be required for annuities, in addition to the sum placed in the Estimates, they expected to use, for the purpose of paying Indian expenses, and purchasing agricultural implements and seed, grain, etc., to which they were entitled under the various treaties, at least $36,000, and other sums to be taken out of unexpired balances. It was therefore important for the Committee to know that in addition to the estimates now before them, there was a sum of $64,000 unexpended from former years, on which the Department expected to draw.

158. Provisions for Indians assembled to receive annuities under the above mentioned Treaties .....	13,000

Mr. MASSON said last year it was stated that the Government would reduce this expenditure.

Mr. MILLS said this year they had a larger number of Indians to deal with than last. They had 13,000 to deal with under 1, 2, 3 and 5. and they estimated that the expenditure for provisions would be 50 cents a day for two days, which would make $1 for each Indian.

Mr. MASSON said it was understood that the Government would not keep the Indians so long, and that the expenditure would be reduced. What precautions were being taken in that direction ?

Mr. MILLS said the facilities were no greater now than they were before.

The Indians would have to meet at points distant from settlements, and two days was the shortest possible time in which they could be got rid of. This practice of providing for the Indians for two or three days was inaugurated during the negotiation of the first treaties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said when the Canadian Government was treating with the Indians they had to keep them in good humour. It seemed strange that this large sum should be thrown away, but it might be difficult to introduce a reform in this respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this practice seemed to be actually essential, as part of our treatment of those people, and, however costly, it could not be got rid of.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said during the negotiation of the first and second treaties there was a great deal of feasting and many things were given to the Indians which were utterly useless to them. The Indians knew of this, and it would be impossible now to discontinue the practice.

Mr. SCHULTZ said no doubt the country paid too much for this purpose. Last year he called attention to this matter, and the then Minister of the Interior stated that he had good reason to believe that considerable reduction could be made in this expenditure ; but not only had no reduction been made, but an increase was proposed. The reason given by himself last year for this expenditure was that the Indians were not properly notified when the payments were to be made, and in consequence reached the agencies sometime before the annuities were distributed. There was no doubt that the Indians must receive food at the time they were receiving their money, and, although he thought this vote was more than ought judiciously to be used, he was quite content to vote for it, because he saw a disposition to reform on the part of the present Minister. He saw, from a Manitoba paper, that the Government were advertising for tenders for supplies, and that pointed to the fact that previously some one had made large sums by supplying the provisions.

There was no check on this service, and the consequence was the enormous appropriations Parliament had to vote. As soon as the local agents were appointed, the Indians would be paid almost at their own hunting grounds, and this sum would not be required. In view of the fact that supplies were to be furnished by contract, he had no hesitation in allowing this vote to pass and leaving the matter in the hands of the hon. the Minister of the Interior.

NORTH-WEST SUPERINTENDENCY.

160. Annuities under Treaty No. 4.....$21,745

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked what was the cause of the falling off in this vote.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Indians were paid more the first time after the ratification of a new treaty than afterwards.

Mr. MILLS said he had read a statement showing that even in this item there were some amounts which did not properly belong there. For example there were $18,000 still due to certain parties for annuities for the first year.

Vote agreed to.

161. Annuities under Treaty No. 6..... $48,150

162. Agricultural implements, ammunition, &c., under Treaties Nos. 4 and 6 (in last year No. 4 only)..... 27,236

163. Provisions for Indians assembled to receive annuities under Treaties Nos. 4 and 6 (in last year No. 4 only) 16,400

164. Salaries and office expenses ..... 17,000

165. Probable cost in connection with new Treaties..... 60,000

Mr. PATERSON asked how many new treaties would be necessary, and when they would take effect.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) asked whether new treaties would be carried out this season, and if so at what time.

Mr. MILLS said the Government did not propose to make any treaties with the Indians north of those included in Treaty No. 6. There was a section south-west of the North-West territory, at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, where there were between 3,000 and 4,000 Indians in a territory of some 35,000 square miles, where it was intended to make a new treaty. It was certain the $60,000, in itself would not be sufficient to cover the expenses of that treaty, but they would be covered with the unexpended balance of former years. A large number of settlers were going into that part of the country, and it was desirable that the Indian title should be extinguished. It was also intended that the latitude and longitude of Fort McLeod should be fixed.

Mr. TUPPER: How can you use the unexpended amounts of former years?

Mr. MILLS said the policy of the late and present Government had been never to let moneys for Indian purposes lapse. The amounts unexpended were not subjected to the law which applied to other purposes. In 1871-72, for instance, the Indian vote was overdrawn by $17,000, without any direct Act of Parliament. In 1872-73 there was an unexpended balance of $8,000. In 1873-74 there was an unexpended balance of $1,600; and in 1874-75 there was an unexpended balance of $34,000. Now there was an unexpended balance of $64,645.

Mr. TUPPER: The law of 1867 provides that unexpended balances should go back to the Treasury.

Mr. MILLS said the law was in force in Lower Canada at the time of the treaties there, and the auditor, Mr. Langton, acted on the principle that it did not apply to money appropriated for Indian purposes. That was the principle acted on by the hon. gentleman's Administration.

Mr. TUPPER: That is prima facie evidence that it must be right.

Mr. MILLS: That is prima facie evidence that the hon. gentleman has no right to complain.

Mr. TUPPER: I don't complain.

Mr. MILLS said one important reason why these balances should not lapse was, that there were many persons who should have been paid money, but who had not yet been paid. In annuities alone there remained unpaid some $36,000. Until it was accurately ascertained what was the number of Indians and the extent of the liabilities, it was absolutely necessary that there should be a considerable sum at the disposal of the Government which might be drawn upon when there was necessity.

Mr. SCHULTZ.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) asked whether any steps had been taken to prevent the importation of whiskey through Peace River Pass?

Mr. MILLS said the Dominion Government had taken no direct action. That was a matter which, no doubt, had occupied the attention of the Local Government. In fact, he had received copies of a large number of ordinances from the North-West within the last two or three days, but he had been so busy that he had not been able to see what had been the precise action of the Local Government on this subject. But, no doubt, the Government would take whatever action was necessary to enforce the policy that had prevailed, namely, to exclude intoxicating liquors from the North-West Territory.

Mr. SMITH said although an hon. member of the House had taken credit to himself for securing prohibition in the North-West, the fact was that Lieut.-Governor Archibald had a Prohibitory Law in operation two years before that hon. member was connected with the North-West Council, and then that hon. member himself was the only party who had committed any great breach of the Act.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that before this item passed, he wished to review briefly the general features of the treaties that had been made in the North-West. And in doing so, he must say that all, or nearly all of them were defective in one point, and the later treaties had especially many objections. He noticed that his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, had, in his last report, complimented the present Indian Commissioners in the North-West, and he (Mr. Schultz) supposed that this was only a graceful act of courtesy to his predecessor in office. However, his hon. friend could not but know that Treaties 5 and 6 had many objectionable features, and particularly the one last negotiated had in it conditions which he felt sure that the hon. gentleman would not allow to be repeated in the treaty to be made next summer with the Blackfeet. The fact was, that the Commissioners were too often in a hurry to complete the treaties, anxious for the eclat which they suppose belongs to the purchase of so many thousands of square miles for the smallest possible amount of money, forgetting that we have the future of the Indians to look to as well as their present wants, and getting over the troublesome question of the reservations by not fixing them at once. The making of a treaty is not a difficult matter. Generally the Commissioner has a large quantity of provisions, he has native interpreters and commands every influence which can operate to cause the Indian to part with his birthright for a mere trifle. The reserve question not being fixed, the Indian is under the impression that the country is still practically his for hunting purposes. This answers very well till the necessities of colonization force him on to the reserve which is made for him. And then will come the time when the lowness of the conditions of these treaties may bear their legitimate fruit of trouble and difficulty. He (Mr. Schultz) trusted that when the treaty was made for which they were now voting money, that these matters would receive the consideration of the Minister of the Interior, with a view to avoid the errors of the treaties already made. In the matter of the appointment of local Indian agents, he (Mr. Schultz) regretted to see that political influences had dictated many of them. It could easily be understood that in these appointments of local agents, whose duties should be, in addition to the payment of the annuities, the advising and directing of the Indians in their agricultural efforts, that a selection made from among the people of the country who understood the language and habits of the Indians would be necessarily better than any selection made from those who were strangers to the language and habits of these tribes. It has been matters connected with their reservations which have caused most of the Indian wars in the United States, from that with the Seminoles in Florida down to that with the Sioux at the present time. We have no reason to expect entire immunity from Indian difficulties in the future, and he (Mr. Schultz) very much feared that in most of the treaties which had been made were to be found the germs of possible serious difficulty with our Indians in the North-West.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said the hon. gentleman had stated that Governor Archibald said it was necessary to frame this law in order to meet the case of the Hudson's Bay Company sending such enormous quantities of intoxicating drinks into the North-west Territory. When he (Mr. Smith) had the honour of being appointed by that Company to act as their Governor in 1870, after the late lamented Governor McTavish, his first step was to have a rule passed, which was law to their people, that not a dram of intoxicating drink should go in. That was in June, 1870. From that time for two years not even a few gallons of wine or brandy were allowed to go in by the officers of the Hudson's Bay Company. So much was that the case that a small quantity of wine brought out to Moose Factory was, owing to these instructions, returned to England. In October, 1870, Mr. Archibald believed he had the right to appoint a Council for the North-West Territory to advise him there, and at that time there was an outbreak of small pox, as, unfortunately, there had been lately in the Saskatchewan, but then it had been much greater than it had been now. It was found necessary to frame some law to meet the case, and he believed it was on the 20th October, that he (Mr. Smith) had the honour of being appointed by Mr. Archibald, a Councillor of the North-West, believing he had the right to do so. Judge Johnson was another, and Mr. Bellard, a French gentleman of Montreal, was the third. His (Mr. Smith's) first act was to have this Prohibitory Law carried out. At that time a gentleman very well known, who had written with regard to that country very pleasantly, was sent on a commission to the North-West to report in regard to it, and to see the condition the country was in owing to this visitation of small-pox. He brought with him the Act now in force, with very little change indeed. That was printed and carried into the country in numbers by Major Butler and the gentleman who accompanied him—both of whom were appointed Justices of the Peace for the purpose of seeing it carried out. This was all very well. He went up into the country and a Council of Health was appointed in Manitoba at that time, and they found it necessary to send a surgeon into the country. It was left to a gentleman, now a member of this House, and another, to send what might be necessary as medicines and medical comforts into the country. That gentleman, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) at that time, without the consent or sanction of the Board of Health or of the Council of the North-West, supplied this surgeon with a very large quantity of intoxicating drinks, he believed to the extent of £120 sterling. When it came to the knowledge of the Board of Health and the Council they objected to it, but they did not care to bring it forward very prominently. The member for Provencher (Mr. Banantyne) was perfectly aware of everything that took place. Major Butler and other gentlemen found that there were large quantities of drink in the territory, and that the Indians and Half-breeds were being intoxicated by it. Major Butler found it necessary himself to destroy a large quantity of that liquor and spill it on the ground, and he said, "Here I go in with a law passed prohibiting this, and here is an officer of the Dominion immediately afterwards, who himself uses it very freely indeed, and gives it to all around him." The scenes at some of the posts were such as he (Mr. Smith) did not care to describe. These were facts as he had stated them, and could be vouched for by many gentlemen, including the hon. member for Provencher. He had shown the part he had taken in prohibition himself: that his first act on being appointed by the Hudson Bay Company as Governor, was to pass a law which was the law of the Hudson Bay Company; but there was a constituted authority—the Council appointed for the North-West, and this law, which his good friend the then Governor of Manitoba was pleased to call his (Mr. Smith's) Act, was in force there. He was aware that there was an irregularity in the appointment of that Council. That was pointed out to the right hon. member for Kingston, and he was good enough to say that all which had been done would be legalized; and he was sure he would admit that he was very much pleased at the passage of this law, and with the very good effect it had in keeping out intoxicating drinks from the North-West Territories.

Mr. SCHULTZ said his first duty was to give a distinct and unqualified denial to the assertions of his hon. friend from Selkirk in regard to liquor being sent in very large quantities in the North-West Territories by the Board of Health of Manitoba, at the instance of himself (Mr. Schultz). No one knew better, or should know better, than the hon. gentleman himself that the statement was false. The Board of Health of Manitoba had among its members the present Archbishop Taché and the present Lord Bishop of Rupert's Land, and both of these gentlemen were too anxious for the welfare of the Indians to countenance such an act as the hon. member for Selkirk declared to have been committed; and it was curious to notice that, in the journals of the proceedings of the Board of Health in question, no record was made at all bearing out the assertion of the hon. gentleman—an assertion which he must characterize as one of the most base and most unwarranted which he ever knew of being made by the hon. gentleman. He (Mr. Schultz) had no objection to this annual form of attack by his hon. friend. It seemed to be a necessity of his nature to make a wholesome relief to pent up spleen; but his hon. friend must come somewhere within the range of truth, within, at least, gunshot distance of the facts of the case. The hon. member for Selkirk had also stated that the Prohibitory Liquor Law which now exists in the North-West, had been passed first by Lieut.-Governor Archibald in 1870, two years before he (Mr. Schultz) became a member of the North-West Council. Now, the connection of a subject like this with the item in the estimates about a sum of Indian Treaties was not very apparent, but he (Mr. Schultz) was disposed to waive that fact in favour of any elderly member of the House whose infirmity of temper, weakness of recollection and garrulousness of speech should make him desirous of—not, indeed, of discussing the matter before the House—but of having a fling at an hon. gentleman opposite, and thus relieving the pent up wrath and spite of the past year. It was quite true that Lieut.-Governor Archibald, early in his Administration, did pass a temporary prohibitory measure, but it was in view of the extent of the evils which were being caused in the North-West by American whiskey and the Hudson Bay rum of the Saskatchewan Ports; and it remained for the North-West Council to frame and to put into force the law which now existed in the North-West prohibiting the importation, manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor. The hon. member for Selkirk also stated that he had, in 1870, when the Governor of the Hudson Bay Company issued an order to the different posts of the Company to cease that trade in liquor which had been carried on. Now, if by this the hon. gentleman meant to claim any credit for the action, it would be at once apparent that no credit was due, because it might be noticed that the date given by the hon. gentleman of this order of his to the Hudson Bay Posts was about the same as the date which he gave to Governor Archibald's temporary edict in regard to liquor. It was small credit to the Hudson Bay Company that they should have ceased the traffic in liquor just when the strong arm of the law, through the mandate of Governor Archibald, ordered that the trade should cease. Why, in connection with the trade in rum the Hudson Bay Company should say as little as possible, and it was in bad taste for the member for Selkirk to bring up such a matter at all. Impelled by that feeling of hostility which, Session after Session, he had displayed, he must make an attack of some kind, and if it quieted the angry feelings of his honorable friend and assuaged the smart of the castigation of the year before, he had no objection. The whole discussion was foreign to the debate, but he would call the attention of honorable members to the fact that now, as in many instances before, the attack had come from the hon. member for Selkirk and had never been commenced by himself. His hon. friend had dragged into the discussion the Hudson Bay Company, and as the Chairman had allowed great latitude in discussion and the House had good naturedly allowed it, he had a few words more to say about the influence of the Hudson Bay Company on the interests of the North-West, both in the past and present. From the very first their influence had been inimical to the interests of this country. Their charter was obtained on promises of searching for a North-West Passage which were never carried out. They opposed and ruined the flourishing furtrade of Canada, and when Canadian effort was put forth to obtain the North-West for colonization and development, they met Canada's effort to secure the country by compelling a payment of one million and a half of dollars for a country, a portion of which only they owned, and retained a twentieth part of the lands in a manner which promised to become a nuisance, and in fact had already become a nuisance in the settlement of the country. They caused to Canada an expense of three millions of dollars to put down rebellion in the country they were so well paid for; and from first to last their influence had been inimical to Canada. If the hon. gentleman was invited to discuss these matters, let him bring them up in a proper manner. Let him bring up the claim formerly preferred by the Hudson Bay Company for losses during the Red River rebellion, and then see in what manner the people of this country and the members of this House regarded their claim for compensation. He had before stated that he was quite willing to allow his hon. friend to indulge his infirmities of temper, even if he were the subject of attack; but there must be some limit to the range of discussion, some limit to the extent which an hon. gentleman could go in such gross and unwarranted attacks as had been made upon the present occasion.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. SCHULTZ.

After Recess.

Mr. TUPPER said he was sorry to see that the two great duellists had disappeared. He was rather amused to hear the two great champions of temperance disputing as to the one of the two who had done the most with regard to the introduction of a Prohibitory Liquor Law in the great territories of the North-West. He was both surprised and amused to see the hon. gentleman tear to pieces the laurels which he thought ought to encircle his own brow. He flattered himself that he was the humble instrument that had prepared and submitted to the House a Prohibitory Liquor Law of the most stringent character, applying to a very large portion of the Dominion,—he had introduced the law which rendered illegal the manufacture and sale and introduction of ruinous spirituous and fermented liquors into any parts of the North-West Territories; and he had provided for the destruction of such liquors if so introduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was under the impression that I moved the only stringent clause in that Bill.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman did not introduce the clause into the Bill, but he proposed to me a very embarrassing question, which, since he has had the honor of a seat on the Treasury Benches, he has not seen the necessity of introducing.

Vote agreed to,

166. To aid Indian schools in Ontario and Quebec, where most required..... $5,000

Mr. MASSON enquired why the words "Ontario and Quebec" were introduced into this vote.

Mr. MILLS said this appropriation had always been for these Provinces. The words mentioned were struck out last year; but the officer in preparing the Estimates had re-inserted them. He had sent for explanations. Appropriations for such schools in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were taken out of other sources.

Mr. GOUDGE said he thought this vote should be extended to the other Provinces.

Mr. MASSON asked what the other sources were.

Mr. MILLS replied that he alluded to the $9,000 previously voted for the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. MASSON said that these votes were not intended for education at all.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the total vote for Ontario and Quebec was $8,800, while $9,000 was voted for the other Provinces mentioned.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he supposed the same system was now followed in this relation as was pursued when he was at the head of the Department, when the votes mentioned were used in part to provide for schools. The vote for the Indians of Quebec was very small, and not so liberal as was the case in Ontario, and tribes settled on the Lower St. Lawrence would certainly require some help, when their hunting grounds were taken possession of by whites. He was very much pleased to see that the vote for Indian schools had been increased. This was required.

Mr. GOUDGE said that the vote for the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was very insufficient.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he would like to learn whether a list of the schools that would receive aid had been prepared.

Mr. MILLS said they had not determined on any particular schools for this purpose. The money would be distributed where most required. Many schools, especially in Quebec, were attended by Indians who were in rather indigent circumstances, and it was necessary to supply them with books. When the Estimates were prepared, he had been informed by the Deputy-Superintendent of the number of these schools which would be aided in accordance with some general principle. If he was not very much mistaken, some claim existed against the Governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with reference to these matters, and he hoped it would be disposed of shortly. It would be highly improper and unreasonable to tax the whole Dominion in order to relieve the Lower Provinces of their fair share of the burden in this regard.

Mr. VAIL said that the fund lying to the credit of the Indians of Nova Scotia had been transferred to the Dominion at the date of Confederation.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said the time had arrived when the Government should adopt a different and better policy towards the Indians of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. He had directed the attention of the First Minister to this matter in another Committee, and he had promised to refer it to the Minister of the Interior. He would state a few facts in this connection. The Miemac tribe had settled at two places in the county of Bonaventure, and there were a few scattered settlements of Indians in the county of Gaspé, besides a good many on the northern coast of New Brunswick, who were actually destitute. The majority of them had at present to be supported by their white neighbours, and the sum voted to help them was small, while but trifling aid was given to their schools. This was not adequate to their wants. The sum of $1 or $1.50 per head was allowed them for seed grain in the spring to encourage them in the pursuit of agriculture. On the other hand, however, the Department of Marine and Fisheries took away from them the right and privilege of spearing salmon, almost their only means of support. The aid granted was quite insufficient for the purpose, and, as a consequence, the Indians became degraded and debased, and this was the fault of the whites. Their spiritual advisers had become discouraged; and the Indians themselves were poverty struck and starving there. Had these poor people, however, at their backs such hordes as were in the North-West, he was sure that they would be better cared for by the House; and if hon. members were not prepared to vote a larger sum to civilize these Indians and encourage them to become industrious, they were not worthy to sit in the House. He did not know how the blankets for which provision was made in a previous item, were distributed, but he was pretty sure that none of them were sent to the Indians to whom he had referred. Proper reports in this regard could not be prepared by officials who remained in the offices of the Department, who had neither the experience nor practical knowledge necessary to enlighten a Minister of the Crown so that justice could be done on this question. He referred particularly to the Indians of the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. He would warn the hon gentleman (Mr. Mills), as no attention seemed to be paid to his statements, that he would submit to the House next Session facts that would astound him.

—Mr. MILLS said these might be the facts, but observations regarding fishery rights did not apply to his Department. Complaints had been made by Indians from the locality mentioned during the past winter, and these representations had been taken into consideration.

Mr. MASSON: But what has been done?

Mr. MILLS said the Indians had made charges against their superiors, but they had not thought proper to take action in reference to the matter.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said the trouble in that locality was owing to the taking away of their privilege of fishing. It was not fair that they should be deprived of this right, especially when the Indians abided by the laws of the country. On the one hand, there was not sufficient assistance and protection given to the Indians, and on the other, too much was taken away from them.

Mr. GILL asked whether it was the intention to extend aid to the Tête de Boule Indians at Upper St. Maurice. If he was rightly informed that tribe never received anything from the Government, and he thought some little consideration should be paid them.

Mr. MILLS said the Government had written to the Hudson Bay Company's Agent in that district, asking him to give aid to the Indians at the expense of the Department, and that aid was given.

Mr. LANGEVIN said it would be well if a small amount was put in the Supplementary Estimates to assist this tribe. He thought when the Indians were deprived of their right to fish, they should receive compensation in some shape or other. He would like to know whether any Indians had availed themselves of enfranchisement under the Act passed last year.

Mr. MILLS said the Indians had taken advantage of the Act to some extent.

Mr. GILL said the tribe of Indians in his constituency were allowed to enjoy the right of hunting and fishing, and he was not aware that the laws in regard to the preservation of game and fish had been disturbed in any way by that fact. He thought the time had come when the Government ought to cease treating the Indians of Quebec as children; they should be allowed to act as freemen, and enjoy their property as white men did. The more intelligent of the Indians desired thorough enfranchisement, and he thought a law should be enacted to give them the same rights as whitemen enjoyed in regard to property, etc.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

XXIII. CUSTOMS.

173. Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports $705,967

Mr. MASSON remarked that it looked strange to see this amount all classed together, while in other votes, all the details, however small, were given.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the suggestion was a good one, and he would endeavour to carry it out.

Vote agreed to.

XXIV. EXCISE.

174. Excise..... $241,000

Mr. TUPPER asked for an explanation of the increase, $7,600.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT stated it chiefly arose from the necessity of increased energy and activity in putting down illicit distillation, of which there was a great deal in Ontario.

Mr. TUPPER enquired whether the excise officers would carry out the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. LAFLAMME said some new officers had to be appointed to prevent illicit distillation, but the officers of the Department would carry out the provisions of the Act referred to.

Mr. TUPPER instanced the case of the different portions of distilling machinery being manufactured at different factories, and enquired whether the new law would provide for the seizure of such.

Mr. LAFLAMME replied in the affirmative.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked whether the additional preventive officers were appointed temporarily or permanently.

Mr. LAFLAMME said they were put on as necessity arose, and when their services were no longer required they were discharged without any claim on the Department. They received a percentage of the penalties which they were instrumental in getting imposed.

Mr. BOWELL asked as to what necessity existed for increasing the staff at Belleville.

Mr. LAFLAMME said there had been a disposition shown to avoid the law and an additional force was required to protect the revenue.

Mr. BOWELL said there was only one distillery at Belleville and that was not a large one. There was a brewery at Trenton, 12 miles distant, and another at Picton.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there had been a great loss to the revenue, and great frauds committed a year and a half ago.

Mr. ROCHESTER said that in 1873, seven stills, valued at $777.70, were seized by the Government officers; in 1874, 18 stills, valued at $559.60, were seized, and in 1875, ten stills, valued at $1,600. He would like to learn what percentage the officers received on seizures, for if they had besides to pay $7,600 in salaries for the seizures of material worth from $500 to $1,600, he thought it was a pretty hard case. They might almost as well abolish the system.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the stills which were seized could not be sold, save when broken up, and then as old metal, consequently they could not bring a high price. Few stills had been seized, owing to the want of a sufficient number of officers. During the past seven months, however, thirty illicit stills had been discovered and broken up, and with more active supervision better results would be secured and the revenue would be better guarded.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked why an increased number of officers was required for the Belleville district.

Mr. LAFLAMME said frauds had been detected in this district where the supervision had been insufficient. One officer was not able to attend to the duty properly, and consequently two additional officers had been appointed. There was a fourth, but he was incapacitated at present from illness. The vote for Goderich had been reduced from $5,200 to $3,250, owing to the stoppage of a large distillery there. In Guelph the vote was increased from $10,500 to $12,100, owing to the recent establishment there of a new and large distillery, requiring the appointment of two additional officers. One officer had been removed from Goderich to Guelph. In London the vote was increased $300 to provide for better supervision, as the capacity of Mr. Carling's establishment had been quadrupled, and an officer was required to superintend the production of petroleum. The vote for Prescott was increased from $4,800 to $5,300 to provide for better supervision and an additional officer.

Mr. PLATT said he knew from experience that no more than one officer was required for any brewery or distillery. One man attended to Gooderham and Worts' distillery, which used as much material as all the other distilleries in Ontario.

■ Mr. LAFLAMME said it was essential in the interests of the Department and of the revenue, that each of these establishments should be most carefully superintended, because in many instances they had found that frauds had been committed. It was not advisable to leave the superintendence as to the collection of such a large amount of revenue to one man without any supervision or check whatever. In many cases there ought to be a guarantee against fraud.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he inferred from this that it was actually necessary to appoint two officers, one to watch the other, and both to watch the brewer.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Not in every case, but in some instances.

■ Mr. ROCHESTER said these brewers must be a lawless set of people. He was afraid if this was the case, the anticipations of the Finance Minister as to increase of revenue in this respect would not be realized. It would be found that every bushel of barley used in breweries, was weighed and measured under the present regulations no less than seven times, and, under the circumstances, he could not see the necessity for appointing so many officers. During the administration of the present Deputy-head of the Department there had been a continual increase of the staff; that officer had sought in every possible way to mystify the law in this connection, that it would take a new Minister a year to understand what he had to do. He said this advisedly, as he knew that it was the case. These laws had been inoperative, and under them there was no brewery in the Dominion that was not liable to a fine; but the Deputy did not dare to attempt to enforce the law because it was inoperative. It was, however, very convenient for that official to have a great many officers about him. It was a poor state of things if the officers received the benefit of this—instead of the country. He was satisfied that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, after one or two years' experience, would make an efficient head of this Department, and he hoped he would initiate a reform in this particular.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said, after looking carefully at the items, he thought they might be reduced. He would, therefore, make this one $229,800, and the first $184,000.

Mr. BUNSTER said the farmers would suffer materially from the extra tax on malt, which would also have a depressing effect on the brewing interests. But the annoyance of an Excise officer going into their premises any time he saw fit, was almost equal to the annoyance of the tax. The gauging and weighing of malt compelled brewers to employ an extra clerk, in order to comply with the mystified law, which was changed annually, until it was impossible to understand it. He did not see why the Government should not make the law simple, as it was in the United States. In British Columbia the salaries paid to excise officers amounted to more than the duty that was collected, and he thought there was great room for reform in this respect. He thought it would be better to allow the brewers to go before a Justice of the Peace and hand in his returns and pay his dollar, instead of employing so many officers. He would recommend that, instead of imposing a tax on malt, the Government should impose it on the manufactured article.

Mr. LAFLAMME.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked how many officers were employed at Guelph.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Fourteen.

Mr. PLUMB asked how it happened that a much larger number of men were employed at Guelph than in other cities of similar population.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was regulated by the business and not the population of the towns.

Mr. SINCLAIR said the salary of the Inspector at Charlottetown was put down at $1,800, and he had good reason to believe the officer did not get more than two-thirds of this amount. He hoped that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would see that the Inspector got the amount voted by Parliament.

XXV. CULLING TIMBER.

175. Salaries, Cullers' Fees and Contingent Expenses ..... $81,000

Mr. BERTRAM said he wished to call attention to the manner in which the work was done by many of the cullers in Quebec. After the lumbermen had their timber culled, in many cases it was found the culling was of no use. If culling was to be of any use at all, it ought to stand as good in one part of the province as in another.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the arrangements in regard to culling were fixed according to the desire, and at the solicitation of the entire lumber trade. The amount for contingencies was merely for necessary expenses regulated by law.

Mr. ROCHESTER expressed the hope that before next Session a Bill would be matured which would suit every description of lumber as well as square timber. He knew of a case where a lumberman had paid the return expenses of a culler coming from Quebec to Rice Lake, to cull some timber, and paid the regular fees; but when the timber went to Quebec a survey was called for, and the lumbermen had to pay the cost of re-culling.

Mr. BERTRAM said he hoped abuses of this kind would not occur again.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) asked whether the rumour that some of the officers were to be put upon the superannuation list, was correct.

Mr. LAFLAMME agreed that there ought to be some protection against the abuse referred to, but said that the lumber should be culled from where it was shipped. It was not the intention of the Government to superannuate any person employed in the culling office.

Mr. ROCHESTER said the rule was to cull timber where it was sorted.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said a system had grown up of not culling according to the strict letter of the law, for which the cullers were not wholly responsible.

Mr. LAFLAMME stated that the Government had the matter under consideration.

XXIX. PUBLIC WORKS.

185. Salaries and contingencies of canal offices..... $35,170
186. Collection of slide and boom dues..... 20,245

Mr. WHITE (North Rentrew) called attention to the unsatisfactory manner in which this account appeared in the Public Accounts. The whole amount for collecting slide and boom dues at Ottawa and Quebec was charged against this item, whereas, two-thirds of it was returned by the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and that ought to be credited there with other items charged against that particular service which ought not to be charged against it. For instance, there was $20,000 contribution to the Chaudiere bridge, and $225 for building sidewalks on the Suspension Bridge. This item added to the amount which he contended ought properly to be credited to this account of $11,730, would increase the net revenue derived from this particular service from $30,954 to $62,909.

187. Repairs and working expenses of above..... $366,500
188. Intercolonial and other Government Railways, N.S. and N. B.; Intercolonial Railway, Quebec.....1,600,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said that in the Public Works report there were very full details of all the expenditures in this direction, so full that it would take a long time to give even a summary of what was contained there. The total number of miles now in the hands of the Government was 714, without the Windsor branch, which was worked under agreement made some years ago, and continued until it was delivered up to the Western Counties Railway Company. It was proposed to transfer that branch so soon as the Company were ready to complete their line to Digby, where they could make their connection across the Bay to Annapolis, and make their arrangements with the Annapolis Railway Company. The item was made up of several items to be found on page 91. The passenger traffic last year had amounted to $352,354 on the roads in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in Quebec $18,166. The freight business of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had amounted to $448,531, and in Quebec $7,219. Payment for carrying the mails in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had amounted to $47,976, and in Quebec to $3,831. The total revenue, therefore, including the mails, was $848,861 in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and $29,216 in Quebec. He distinguished Quebec from the other Provinces, because at that time connection was not made. The expenditure, including all the items, was $877,485 in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and $66,369 in Quebec. The total earnings in 1874-5 were $861,593, and in 1875-6 $848,861, being a decrease of about $13,000. In 1874-5 the expenditure was $850,775, and in 1875-6 $877,485. In computing the revenue he left out Quebec. For the first half of the current year the excess of expenditure over revenue was about $13,000. The total mileage was about 714 miles in use; for the first eight months of the year the mileage was 184 miles less than that. There were 338 miles in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and 83 miles in Quebec, that was 421 miles altogether. In 1875-6 there were 525 miles in operation, besides the 84 miles in Quebec; but of that 525 miles a certain portion was only eight months in operation.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that in 1874-5 the deficit in working expenses was $10,818 for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; in 1875-6 this deficit was $28,624. In the Province of Quebec, for the 83 miles in operation, this deficit for 1874-5 was $29,254, a little more than 50 per cent.; in 1875-6 this deficit was $37,153. The line in Prince Edward Island in 1874-5 was only in operation for a short time. The revenue for that year was $24,494, and the expenditure $47,671, the deficit being $23,177; in 1875-6 the revenue amounted to $118,061, and the expenditure to $214,930, the deficit being $6,869. He would here mention, in answer to a question put some evenings ago, that the Truro and Pictou Branch was opened for traffic in 1865-6, and the rails being pretty well worn out, in 1873 five miles were re-laid with steel rails; in 1874—for the financial year ending 30th June—seven miles; in 1875, ten miles; and during the last year and a half, up to the 31st of last December, 15½ miles, making in all 37½ miles which had been re-laid with steel rails, leaving 13½ miles of road with the old iron rails, but he was informed that these were in such a dilapidated condition that it was quite impossible to keep them in use. Iron rails with ordinary traffic were supposed to last for eight or ten years; but a pretty heavy coal traffic had passed over this line, and the rails had, on the whole, lasted very well.

Mr. BOWELL: Is it the intention to replace these 13½ miles with steel rails before the road is transferred?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not express any particular intention in this respect; but we must replace them, I am afraid, with something. We will maintain it as long as possible with such iron rails as we have, but whether we will do so altogether I am not able to say.

Mr. MITCHELL said representations had been made him by some of his constituents with reference to the carrying of the mails over the Intercolonial. They were taken from Halifax to Quebec, Montreal and Toronto by the first train, but to intermediate points such as Miramichi and Richibucto, by the next train. He could not see why the delivery should not be made at all these points at the same time. He was told that there was ample leisure to prepare the mails for all these places. He hoped that instructions would be given to obviate this inconvenience.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the reason why this had not been done was that the service was a new one, and the Government, very naturally desirous of having it succeed, had perhaps paid a little too much attention to through mails. They had been anxious to afford every possible chance to the road to show its competence for this work, and the result had been that during the whole of the winter the mail trains had actually averaged a little over thirty miles per hour over the line from Halifax to Rivière du Loup. They might not be able to keep up this speed next winter as the recent cold season had been very favourable; but having made immense preparations in the way of providing snow sheds and fencing, they hoped they would be able to do fair work next winter, when arrangements would be made to have way-mails made up and delivered at all principal points on the line.

Mr. MITCHELL: And in summer as well?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL said he felt bound to state, in justice to the management of the road, that this had been very successful during last winter, giving very great satisfaction to the public. He was pleased to learn from a high official that the receipts of the road during at all events nine months of the year, would certainly exceed the working expenses. This was somewhat contrary to general predictions in this relation. He was sure that it only required to have the line better understood in the country to render it even more successful. All who passed over it declared that, in solidity of construction and in appointments and administration, it was a very great success. He had been thoroughly identified with this undertaking, and had taken great pride in it. He believed that the road would be run as successfully, with the new improvements mentioned, next winter as during the late season. He had no fears whatever on this point.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) wished to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact, that passengers were frequently landed at Halifax whose destination was Richibucto, Miramichi, or some other point, but whose tickets had all been marked via Portland. He desired to learn whether it would not be advisable, in the interest of the Government, to have such information given on the other side of the water as would enable the travelling public to take advantage of this route. He was informed the other day, when the steamer arrived at Halifax, that several gentlemen, who were going to northern parts of New Brunswick, came on by rail at a very rapid rate, and other passengers would have availed themselves of the same route had their tickets not been marked for Portland.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would confirm what had just been stated. He understood that the impression on the other side of the water was that the Intercolonial was an unsafe and uncertain line; and it also seemed that the interests of the steamship lines were adverse to it. A gentleman had told him that he could not obtain any information in the old country with regard to this road; but, nevertheless he risked it. He believed that the Allan Line desired to take passengers to Portland and send them by way of the Grand Trunk. This was a matter which should occupy the attention of the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that their attention had been called to it at a very early day. Some difficulty had been experienced in inducing the Allan Line to call at Halifax, and they had been obliged to require it in accordance with the terms of the contract. The line had believed that it was prejudicial to their interests and had endeavoured to persuade the Government that no time could be gained by forwarding the mails on the Intercolonial. The result proved that the English mails, as a rule, were delivered at Montreal about the time when the steamer reached Portland, securing about 300 miles start of the latter. He thought that the line had probably no faith in the permanency of these arrangements, and, consequently, continued to sell tickets via Portland, declining to make any reduction for passage to Halifax; and, although landing at this port, required the payment of an additional $17 for fare, a number had taken this route. Of course, such an arrangement could not be allowed to continue during the coming winter. They would have to have a perfect understanding about it. Their agent at Liverpool would give the necessary information regarding the route, and they hoped to induce other lines of steamers to call at Halifax, making our railway system, when complete, a highway to all parts of the continent. When connection was made at St. John, continuous railway communication with New York would be established, and he had no reason to doubt that a very large amount of traffic, mail, freight and passenger, would then pass over these routes, both to the West and South-West. At all events, the Government were bound to do everything in their power to facilitate such a movement as far as was possible. He would now mention that the cost per train mile in 1874-75, on this line was 7957 cents; and in 1875-76, 7336 cents; while the cost per train mile on the Grand Trunk and the Great Western was, he believed, something over $1, so that the road was run more cheaply than the average lines. This was greatly due, no doubt, to its excellent construction and thorough ballasting. On the latter work, in 1875, $70,000 or $80,000 had been spent on the recommendation of the engineer, and the result had been most satisfactory. During the past year, stores had cost a good deal less than formerly. He found that the ordinary price for iron delivered on the road—he did not allude to the extravagant prices once paid to certain firms, which he did not propose to discuss—was from .0125 to six cents per pound. Last year they only paid $1.90 to $1.95 per cwt.—a little less than half what it cost in the Spring of 1874 or the Fall of 1873. They were then paying about $3.25 for coal, and they made contracts last year with the Albion Mines at $1.80, and with the Springhill Mines at $1.95.

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought the hon. the First Minister was mistaken as to the amount paid for coal in 1874; it could not have cost that much.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was possible he might be wrong, but he thought the figures he quoted were correct; he would, however, make inquiries. The coal on the Island Railway cost much more—$3 a ton. The stores in hand in 1874-5 amounted in value to $90,582, and $3,850 in Quebec. In 1874-5, 3,583 tons of steel rails were put down; in 1875-6, 2,181 tons, and 1,779 tons of iron rails. The total cost of changing the gauge was $842,764, less $79,868 received for old materials, making the net cost $735,076.

Mr. TUPPER asked if the hon. gentleman was able to state from experience up to the present, what relation the revenue on the Interoceania was likely to bear to the expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE said their expectation was that when the whole road was laid with steel rails the revenue would meet the expenditure, if they were as successful as they hitherto had been in inducing a certain class of traffic to pass over the road.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) asked if the express and Pullman car business was retained in the hands of the Government or was let out to companies. A great deal of the revenue was taken out of roads by such companies, and he hoped the Government would be able to initiate the parcel delivery system which was in vogue in England.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that matter had not escaped his attention. There was this difficulty in the way of the Government undertaking a small-parcels delivery. A large amount in value of the express companies' business was money, and he was very unwilling to run the risk those companies ran in carrying large sums of money. Then if the Government undertook to deliver ordinary small parcels and not money, they would then interfere with the express companies to such an extent that they would probably not carry on the business. Under those circumstances the Government determined to enter into a short contract with a company. Parties tendering were asked to state the percentage of their receipts they would pay to the Government, and the company offering the highest percentage received the contract. They had also considered whether it was advisable to build sleeping cars themselves. They found a great many difficulties in the way. They bought those cars in the United States at a large cost, or made some arrangement with the two great companies possessing the proprietary of those vehicles. They communicated with Wagner & Co., and with the Pullman Palace Car Co. The former made no offer, and a temporary contract for five years was entered into with the Pullman Co. This, no doubt, caused some little expense, but it was the best that could be done under the circumstances. As the time for the expiration of the contract approached, the Government would consider whether it would be well to build stock of its own, or continue the contract.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) asked if the freight cars would be built in the Government workshops or by tender by some of the Canadian companies.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government sent a circular letter to all the car factories in Canada. The lowest tender they received was from the works at Colborne at $529 per car; the next lowest was from the London works, at $530 per car. They gave the Colborne works an order for 200, and the London works for 100; and as they had a great deal of old material which could be worked in, they had determined to build the remaining 400 themselves. The two companies had delivered a considerable number of cars, which were said to be excellent stock.

Mr. TUPPER said Mr. Fisher, the late contractor for the express business of the line, had spent twenty years in building up the business, and had done excellent service in times past. Just as this gentleman was about to reap the reward of his energy and perseverance, the service was put up to competition, and another party having offered a higher percentage he lost the contract. He (Mr. Tupper) regretted exceedingly that such was the case, as he thought the Government might in this instance have exercised a wise discretion and taken into consideration Mr. Fisher's claims. He heard with great pleasure the announcement that it was expected that the revenue and expenditure would meet. A gentleman well qualified to form an opinion, Mr.

Brydges, stated in a letter to Mr. Potter, in England, that when the road was finished and opened for traffic, the loss to the country would be from $500,000 to $750,000 per annum. The Committee, he was sure, under these circumstances, would learn with great satisfaction that the experience up to the present time left them to hope that there would be, at all events, no considerable deficit in the working expenses of the road. He was quite satisfied that if the deficit of $13,000 for the six months quoted was anything like correct, that the prediction of the Premier that the working expenses would be covered, would be fully realized, since the road would every year open up new sources of revenue never thought of before. He was inclined to think the original views of the Premier, as to the route chosen by the late Government being the best that could be selected—but which views he afterwards changed—were now held by him. The result was exceedingly satisfactory, especially under such a reasonable tariff, which he had always advocated.

Mr. MACKENZIE remarked that it was necessary, in order that the road should be successful, that it should be managed by the same gentleman who had managed it during the last year.

Mr. TUPPER pointed out the injustice of steamship companies charging the same fare to Halifax as to Portland, several hundred miles farther. It was desirable for both Canada and Great Britain that merchants from Great Britain should travel to the west through Canadian territory.

Mr. MACKENZIE said of course the six months referred to were the best six months of the year. The following six months would embrace the winter months, and then the traffic would not be so great, and the expenses would be greater.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said it was a source of very general complaint that the Grand Trunk showed no disposition to forward goods by the Intercolonial. In some cases, he had been informed, they even sent them to Portland when directed to send them over the Intercolonial to Halifax; and sometimes the mails, on being transferred to the Grand Trunk from the Intercolonial, had been detained several hours.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought only one complaint of this nature had reached him. In the communications the Government had regarding it, it would appear to have been some mistake. He found Mr. Hickson exceedingly willing, and apparently anxious, to co-operate with the Intercolonial, and the relations between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government had, as a general thing, been all that could have been desired. The distance to Halifax and Portland being the same, of course it was a difficult matter to manage, there occasionally being conflicting interests.

Mr. TUPPER asked whether there was any foundation for the rumour that there was some difficulty between the Government and the Imperial authorities as to the proximity of the line to the powder magazine at Halifax.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter was not in such condition as to justify him in giving details. There had been correspondence with the Imperial authorities for the last four years on the matter. It was impossible to put the line at any other place at the time in order to reach Halifax, but it would appear as if either the magazine or the railway track would have to be removed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked whether there had been negotiations between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway with reference to the transfer of the Rivière du Loup branch.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter had been talked over, but there had been no actual negotiations.

Mr. DECOSMOS called attention to the fact that while the Government gave $5,000 a year as a subsidy to the Western Union Telegraph Company; the line between Victoria and San

Mr. MACKENZIE said if the hon. member would send him a communication setting forth the facts, the matter would be considered.

Mr. TUPPER said that under the late Administration provision was made for a steam service between Windsor and St. John, calling at important points. He observed that neither this nor last year had any provision been made for a continuance of the service.

Mr. GOUDGE said he thought that the item should be re-inserted in the Estimates for this service. He regretted to say that they were not at present able to induce any company to continue this communication. He had endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, both at St. John and Halifax, to prevail upon some one to place a steamer on the route. However, if the vote was placed in the estimates he had every reason to believe that it could be done during the present season, promoting very great intercourse between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, while a very large trade would likely result from the opening of the Springhill Coal mine. He was very glad that the hon. member for Cumberland had brought the matter to the notice of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was just one weak point in the claim; it would be subsidizing a steamer to run in competition with the railway which reached all the main points and conveyed the mails more rapidly than they could by the steamer.

Mr. GOUDGE said this did not necessarily follow.

Mr. TUPPER said the Premier was mistaken. He thought that a small subsidy would tend to develop a great deal of trade and inter-communication in that section of the country, while many would avail themselves of it who would not likely go by the Government line of railway.

AUDITING OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 118) To amend the Act 31 Vic., chap. 5, entitled An Act respecting the Auditing of the Public Accounts.

Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolutions:—

“ 1. That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting Weights and Measures, 36 Victoria, chapter 47, by repealing sections 5, 26, 27, 30, 34 and 41, and re-enacting them with certain amendments providing:—

“ 2. That the Imperial or Standard British shall always be held to be the measure agreed upon as regards sales of goods by dry measure, unless it is otherwise stipulated.

" 3. That the hundred weight shall always be understood to mean one hundred pounds, and the ton two thousand pounds, as regard sales by weight, tolls or duties, unless it is otherwise stipulated, and that public weighers shall always use the same.

" 4. That the same rule shall be observed as to contracts for the sale of grain and other articles mentioned in section 5 of the said Act, as before the 1st January, 1874, and in such contracts a bushel shall be understood to mean the weight of a bushel of the article in question as fixed in the said section, and not a bushel in measure, unless it is otherwise stipulated.

" 5. That on any verification of weights and measures under section 26, after the first, the party having them in possession shall only pay full fees in case of their being found incorrect, and that otherwise he shall only pay one-fourth of the full fees and charges.

" 6. That the parties mentioned in section 27, being manufacturers of, or wholesale dealers in weights, measures or weighing machines, shall not be liable for the penalty therein mentioned for merely offering for sale any uninspected weight, measure or weighing machine, and shall be liable to such penalty only if they sell the same without having them inspected and stamped; but that other traders using or having in possession such uninspected weights, measures or weighing machines shall be liable to the forfeiture thereof and to the penalty.

" 7. That any person, not being a manufacturer or wholesale dealer therein, who refuses to produce and permit inspection of any weights, measures or weighing machines in his possession, or, being such manufacturer or wholesale dealer, refuses to permit the inspection of such articles in his possession when required, shall incur the penalties mentioned in section 30.

" 8. That penalties and forfeitures incurred under the said Act may be recoverable before any competent tribunal, as well as in the manner provided by section 34, by suit brought by the proper officer; and that persons aggrieved by the use of false weights, measures and weighing machines may recover treble costs.

" 9. That section 41 be so amended as to allow officers under the Act to adjust weights, measures and weighing machines, on receiving compensation therefor."

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said as the committee knew by the Confederation Act the regulation of weights and measures was left entirely to the Federal Parliament. No attempt was made to regulate them until 1873 when the late Government introduced a measure for that purpose which made some very serious and important changes in the system previously in force. Prior to the passage of that Act the standard for measures of capacity was the Winchester bushel and the wine gallon, and for those the late Government substituted the Imperial measure. Besides this, several other modifications were introduced which were to take effect at a subsequent period. Up to 1873, throughout the whole of the Dominion as well as the United States, grain was generally disposed of in commercial contracts by weight, a bushel of wheat being estimated at 60 lbs. By the Act of 1873 this system was to be tolerated only until 1874. The cental system was introduced and the weights were to be divided by decimals instead of as before, and, at the same time, provision was made for the inspection of scales, a Commissioner of Weights and Measures being established to determine what scales should be used. To this Government was deputed the responsibility of putting this law into operation; but the moment that was done there arose complaints from almost every part of the country about the inconveniences and hardships caused by a change from the old system. Considering those objections the Government deemed it their duty to come to the assistance of the public generally by tolerating the old measure. The substitution of the new measure for the Winchester bushel and wine gallon interrupted our trade relations with the only portion of this continent with which we traded to any large extent. In England a large portion of the commercial community had been anxious for the establishment of an uniform system all over Europe, and about two-thirds of the European continent had adopted the French metrical system. This fact, that England was contemplating a change in her system of weights and measures, ought to have prevented the late Government from revolutionizing our system by the introduction of the Imperial standard. As the system of weights and measures was nearly allied to that of the currency, and as we had adopted the American system of currency, he did not think the late Government acted wisely in altering the standard. Nevertheless, as the measure of 1873 must have been considered as an expression of the desire of the commercial community, in carrying it into effect this Government had to do it in such a manner as to avoid trouble and confusion. It was thought advisable that a provision should be introduced into the law to allow the use of the old measures, and the amendments proposed gave authority to stamp and verify measures of this description until 1880 at least. If during the interval it was found more convenient to resort to the old measures, the country would be better prepared to do so after having made the experiment. It would perhaps have been advisable to have gone back to the old system completely, but as in Ontario the largest portion of the trading community had accepted the new system, the Government thought it proper to maintain the standard, allowing only the use of the former measures for some time to come, in order that public opinion might arrive at a surer conclusion in regard thereto at a future time. It was also thought advisable to allow the trade in grain to be conducted by weight as formerly. Then there was another important matter which it was important should be amended. From 1859 in Canada the standard had been 2,000 lbs. for a ton, but the Act of 1873 gave a new legal definition to a ton; and it was now proposed to revert to the old system. It was also proposed to amend the provisions of the Act with regard to the decimal system of weights, the amendment allowing the use of different weights than those represented actually by decimals. In the existing laws there was a provision which compelled scale makers to fraction every sub-multiple of weight, even of a pound, into decimals. This would strike everybody as rather illogical. If they took for a unit the English pound, which was sub-divided into 16 ounces, it was really absurd to fraction that into tens. The amendment would make the sub-division into ounces legal and allow the manufacturers of scales to revert to the old system. A revolution in the weights and measures up to the year 1873 was created; and, regarding these points, the strongest objections were urged. Besides, a great number of complaints had been made concerning the verification of scales, the kind of scales allowed to be used, the charges levied, subsequent verification entailing the same fees as were originally imposed on new scales, and the necessity for parties bringing scales for verification to return if the scales were not found to be correct and have them re-verified. This gave great inconvenience and trouble, and the amendments proposed were intended to remedy these complaints. The Inspector was authorized to verify weights and measures, and, as it was impossible to establish in the law what should be the exact amount of remuneration, it was thought better to leave the choice of the person who should adjust the weights or measures optional. It was stated that the remuneration should be only what would be fair value for the labour, as one scale might only require a few minutes work, and another complete modification. It was thought that this regulation, by rendering possible fair competition, would prevent individuals from being mulcted in too large amounts, and avoid the inconvenience to which parties were at present subject. Another great inconvenience of which bitter complaint was made by the public generally related to the necessity of taking weights and measures from a distance to the Inspector's office. This and many other inconveniences resulting from the first operation of the law were amended and would be amended by an Order in Council. The Government intended to analyze all the departmental regulations, and the Orders in Council which had been multiplied as objections were raised, and necessity for them became apparent, and to make as clearly and briefly as was possible, an explanation of the rules according to which tests were to be made and weights and measures were to be allowed in use. The rule would be laid down that all scales which evidently could not be used for fraudulent purposes, should be permitted to remain in use, and none others. He was omitting to mention a very essential amendment. By the present law, the necessity of having weights and measures inspected applied universally, and this had given rise to so great an inconvenience that the Government had been obliged to virtually suspend in part the execution of this regulation. For instance, the wholesale dealer was obliged to unpack large cases of weights and measures to have them stamped; and hay and platform scales could be only adjusted when set up; and the operation of the law, obliging wholesale dealers to have them all stamped and re-verified every year, was considered an injustice which could not be tolerated; consequently this evil was remedied in these resolutions. He believed that these were the principal features of the resolutions, intended to remedy the unfavourable results and inconveniences found to exist in the application of the law of 1873; and they met, as far as he could ascertain, the obligations raised by the commercial community at large. It was impossible to make the law perfect without experience as to its operation. The objection made to fees, was also met in the resolutions. The fees were to be reduced, and only to be levied to such an extent as was required to meet the expenditure requisite to carry out the law. The fee to be charged on re-verification, would be lowered to one-fourth of the original charge for adjustment, if the scale or measure was found to be correct; otherwise the full fee would be charged. This matter could be regulated by Order in Council. With these remarks, he would submit the resolutions and a Bill based upon them.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. TUPPER said that if the duty of a Government was confined to the introduction or administration of popular measures, it would be much more pleasant and easy for those who occupied seats on the Treasury Benches. There were reforms, however, which were of a very unpopular character, owing to their interference with the operations of, and inconveniencing, such large classes in the community; and when a Government were called upon to deal with such a question, they might fairly and confidently, he thought, look—as he was sure would always be the case in this Parliament—for a fair, hearty and general support from the Opposition of the day. When he felt it to be his duty to introduce this subject, for which he was prepared to take the fullest measure of responsibility, in face of the unpopularity which had attended its administration, the hon. member for Lambton, if his memory served him right, had given a very hearty and generous support to the late Government; and he felt bound to deal with that hon. gentleman, and the Administration of which the hon. gentleman was leader, in the same spirit. This measure was not introduced until the Government had satisfied themselves of its great necessity. Steps were taken to ascertain in what condition the weights and measures of the country were in the large commercial communities, and the results were so startling as to leave the Government, he might say, no choice as to whether the time had arrived, when it was incumbent on them to discharge their highest duty—to see that the great mass of the people were fairly and honestly and equitably dealt by, and they came to the conclusion that they had no option other than to introduce this measure. He was just as much satisfied then as now, that the operation and administration of the law would be attended with very great inconvenience, and involve a very considerable amount of unpopularity, and, he might add, of odium. It was not his duty to defend the Commissioner of Inland Revenue, who was well known to have had a great deal to do with the initiation, preparation and administration of the Act, but after having heard that gentleman assailed, as was the case on a former occasion, he felt bound to state frankly what he thought with regard to this matter. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) said he did not complain so much of the Act as of its administration, and that one of the great difficulties was that this gentleman was appointed by the late Government and was utterly hostile to the present Administration, doing all in his power to bring them into odium with the body of the people. Having had the honor to fill, for a short time, the position of Minister of Inland Revenue, it was his duty to say that, while Minister, he had been continually assailed by his friends and political supporters from all parts of the country, with the same charges. It was then complained that the Deputy Minister was utterly hostile to the Conservative Party, and was doing all he could to bring it into odium. It so happened that this gentleman was appointed to a high position in the Civil Service, by the Liberal Administration of 1862-3, led, he believed, by the late John Sandfield Macdonald, and it was only fair for him to say that, although he did not suppose that Mr. Brunel was entirely perfect, he believed there was no more faithful or more efficient, or more able officer in the public service to-day than was this gentleman. It had been his duty when his attention was directed to the matter, to pay strict attention to all the movements and recommendations, and to the course of this officer; and he was bound to say that, during his tenure of office, having watched him as closely as a Minister could under such circumstances, he had never been able to form the slightest opinion regarding the political predilections of this gentleman. Although a great enthusiast, and inclined, when he took up a difficult subject of this kind, to throw his whole heart and soul into it, and perhaps disposed to press it too extremely, every step taken by Mr. Brunel under the late Government was, he believed, adapted with the view of making this measure as perfect and efficient as possible. The law had been in operation for a short time, and what had been the result? The effect of it had been such that neither the Government, nor Parliament, nor anybody could suppose that the law was not required. They had only to turn their attention to the facts stated upon the 30th page of the report on Weights and Measures, brought down this Session, where it was stated that 90 per cent. of the weights and measures were rejected because they were incorrect; and perhaps in 99 cases out of a 100 this was unintentionally and ignorantly so. He was reminded of a couplet used by Lord Palmerston on a similar occasion.

“For truly the pleasure is as great
Of being cheated as to cheat.”

The fact was, it was those most incapable of protecting themselves that were most affected, and it was highly incumbent on the Government therefore, to place the law on the Statute-book, to keep it there, and to see that it was judiciously administered. He was prepared to take his full responsibility for the introduction of the Act, but he did not think it had received fair play. Competent and trustworthy officers should be charged with its administration, as there would be of necessity a popular feeling against it on the part of those who came in contact with the officers until the public were educated up to it. The severity with which the law had been operated, and its expense, were the matters complained of. Two officers had been appointed in Montreal, on the recommendation of his hon. friend from Montreal West, who were unfit for the positions.

Mr. WORKMAN: I never recommended them; I had nothing to do with it.

Mr. TUPPER: I am glad the hon. gentleman is able to relieve himself of that charge, for the men had been found to be most corrupt.

Mr. WORKMAN: They were appointed before I was elected.

Mr. TUPPER said, then it appeared he had charged the hon. gentleman wrongfully. He was sure that that hon. gentleman would not say that those two men were entitled to the confidence of the mercantile community. In some instances men 70 and 80 years of age, perfectly unable to appreciate the very first principles of the Act, were appointed. Even with the most able and trustworthy men to administer the law, it would still for some time be an unpopular one. He did not believe, however, that there had been one petition asking for the repeal of the Act. This was remarkable evidence that although there was a widespread unpopularity in connection with the measure, and dissatisfaction in connection with its administration, yet that it would not be wise to sweep it altogether from the Statute-book. The hon. Minister had spoken of the Boards of Trade. The Dominion Board was a concentration of the opinions of the various Local Boards, and that body said:

“That this Board, while approving of the objects of the Weights and Measures Act, desires to represent to the Government that the inconvenience and charges which the trade are put to in the working of the Act are excessive, and that the yearly compulsory examination, if enforced, should be at the public cost, and not made a charge on the individual trader. Further, that there be recommended to the consideration of the Government the expediency of so modifying the law that provision shall be made for stamping two and five gallon wet measures, and that the shape of such measures of capacity may be conical instead of cylindrical."

He was glad to see that a remedy was proposed as to the inconvenience and expense. There could be no objection whatever to the suggestions, as above, of the Board of Trade. The fundamental principle of the Act was actually endorsed. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue said that the law tolerated the old measures. That was provided for, however. In the introduction of this measure, he (Mr. Tupper) wanted to go a great deal further than the Bill went. The then leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Lambton, as representing a great party in Ontario, gave his hearty support to the proposed measure. The leader of the French-Canadian Opposition, now Chief Justice Dorion, urged that the Bill should go further than it originally provided, and that the cental should be introduced at once. The Government now proposed to take a retrograde step, and also an unfortunate step, in going back to the old measures. It would place them in the same position they were in before. The Commissioner in his report said:—

"It is a curious illustration of the force of habit, and of the sensitiveness of commercial men as to any change in established usages, that there should be so much difficulty in reconciling the trade to the use of the 'cental' as a unit in dealing with grain. No one, I suppose, questions the greater convenience of the 'cental,' for all grain is now bought and sold by weight; and in all places, except where a special weigh beam is provided for each description of grain, the weight is, as a rule, first determined in pounds, after which it is converted into bushel. How much easier, then, to divide by 100 than by 60, 55, 40, &c., according to the description of the grain."

The hon. gentleman's proposal was to go back to the measurement of grain instead of deciding by weight. The measure bushel had caused the greatest confusion possible. There would be much difference in the weight of the same kinds of grain. If the cental were swept away and the measure bushel were substituted, it would lead to great inconvenience and injustice to one party or the other. The hon. gentleman had referred to foreign markets. The Commissioner on this point reported:

"Then, although wheat is quoted in Chicago at so much per bushel of 60 lb., it is quoted in Liverpool at per cental, while the quotations in Mark Lane are not by weight at all, but by measure; that is, at per 'quarter,' which signifies a quantity varying in weight between 460 and 520 lb."

We had introduced a decimal currency, and it would be hard to find five men in the country who would desire to return to the old fractional currency. The same principles applied to the cental, and if it were not continued it would be a retrograde step. The report further said:—

"Indian corn is quoted in Chicago by the bushel of 56 lb.; in Liverpool by the 'quarter' of 480 lb., and in Mark Lane by the 'quarter,' which means a measure and not a weight. The same vagueness exists with reference to other grains. In short, the quotations of the prices of grain in the English markets, which appear in the commercial papers of the Dominion, give no just conception of the prices except to the initiated. It is evident, therefore, that, unless it is desired to make a secret craft of the trade, the 'cental' would be accepted by all who desire to simplify the business affected by it; and I feel confident that if Canada would stand firm in leading the way, all grain would be dealt in by the 'cental,' both in Liverpool and Chicago. I may add that, in Detroit, in the State of Michigan, as well as in several places in Canada, barley is now bought and sold by the cental."

Already they saw the effect of that measure, and there was good reason to believe that if Canada continued to maintain the policy it had adopted, England and the United States would fall into the same practice. The legislation now proposed with respect to the Winchester bushel and the wine measure was a retrograde step. He had felt the difficulty that existed, and had provided in the legislation that contracts might be made by wine measure as well as by Imperial measure. But the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue proposed to extend that provision, which was objectionable in itself. Nothing was so delusive or afforded such facility for fraud on the part of persons disposed to be fraudulent, as having different measures in use sanctioned by law, because persons dealing with ignorant people might buy by one measure and sell by another. It was true, the law provided that in order to use the old measure a special contract must be made, but that to a very great extent was illusive. The change from one measure to another was made very simple. The hon. the Minister of Interior had argued that because Canada had a small population, therefore she should adopt the wine measure, which was used by the rest of the continent. The argument would have force if the people of the Dominion purchased liquids largely from the United States. But such was not the fact, and coal oil and a small quantity of turpentine were the only liquids he could remember as being imported from the neighbouring country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the Imperial measure was only used in Great Britain.

Mr. TUPPER said that Great Britain was the principal market from which Canada obtained liquids. He called the attention of the House to the statement of the Commissioner of Weights and Measures in regard to the difficulty, danger and injustice to the masses of the people by having different measures in use. The Commissioner said:—

“Wherever the inspection has been practically in force, the advantage of establishing one standard for measures of capacity, in place of those previously legalized, has received many illustrations. The most forcible have occurred with reference to the milk trade; I say the most forcible because that is a trade which, in towns and cities, comes to every one's door. It has been ascertained that milk has been sold in the same town indifferently by the wine measure, the Winchester measure and the old ale measure, by persons who are in happy ignorance as to the comparative value of the measure used, and who, in their simplicity, had been satisfied with the measures as offered for sale by irresponsible makers.”

It had been said that all existing wine measures would be rendered useless if the Imperial gallon were made the only legal measure. There was some force in that argument, but not so much as had been urged. But, having made a step in that direction, the Government should not retrograde. He was afraid, from present appearances, that this, and other important questions, would remain to be dealt with by hon. gentlemen now forming the Opposition; and having experienced some difficulty in regard to the subject in the past, they did not wish to find, when succeeding Reform Administration, the reforms made by the so-called old Tory Party so deformed as to compel them to re-enact the legislation in order to bring the country back to the happy position in which they left it. There had been no reform within the last half dozen years, which had been of more importance than the adoption of the Wines and Measures Act; and the responsibility of dealing with the Act in such a way as not to destroy the reform intended to be accomplished, rested with the Administration, which, if true to their name, would be very careful in regard to any step which might be taken. The Commissioner in his report further said:

“It may not be out of place to refer here to the cost involved in substituting the Dominion measures for those heretofore in use. It was with reference to this that the law was made to tolerate the old measures until 1880. By that time there will be very few of the measures that were in use when the law was proclaimed fit to continue so, and it may further be stated, without fear of contradiction, that two-thirds of the old wine measures now used are unfit for use, by reason of indentations which reduce their capacity, to the injury of the purchaser of goods measured by them.”

Yet the Government proposed to change the law so that an enormous number of those measures would have to be manufactured and all the difficulty and loss again re-enacted at a future day. Everyone knew, also, that every measure that had a kink or dint in it, was to that extent a fraudulent measure, and unjust to the party that purchased the liquid measure by it. He concurred in the proposal that after the first verification, the parties should not pay the full fees, in cases where the measures were examined and found correct. He favoured the placing of the fees at the lowest possible figure, and even if it was a loss to the general exchequer of the country, Parliament would be willing to defray the sum. He also concurred in the proposition that a dealer in measures might have any number of measures, and that it was only when they were sold they were required to be tested and stamped. He objected to the proposition that the inspector should be charged with adjusting the weights and measures. While the inspector was an interested party the public would be willing to yield to his judgment, but if he were charged with the duty proposed it would be generally believed that the inspector condemned weights and measures for the purpose of adjusting them. If such a change were made in the law the Government would find that they would be compelled to withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was the practice in Ontario under the old law.

Mr. TUPPER said he had stated the objection he entertained to such a provision. He was prepared to share with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue the responsibility of carrying out the law and to aid the Government in making the Act as acceptable as possible.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the House was fully aware that he intended to introduce a Bill to repeal the Act. When the proposition to bring the Act into operation was made he took advantage of the occasion to warn the House and the Government that it was an unwise course they were pursuing with regard to it. Any one who took the responsibility of asking Parliament to go back on previous legislation, and repeal an Act which had received the formal sanction of the House should give reasons for adopting that course. The result of the working of the Act during the short time it had been in operation was a sufficient answer under that head. The public opinion of the country had expressed itself so strongly with regard to the measure as a whole, that the repeal of the Act would be in accordance with that opinion, and he would take an early opportunity at a subsequent stage to move an amendment that the Act be repealed. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had failed to show the House that there was any petition from a commercial or other body asking Parliament to pass such an Act. He was prepared to admit that on the face of it there was good reason why some supervision with regard to the correctness of weights and measures should be exercised by the authorities of the Dominion, the different Provinces or the municipal authorities, if that were practicable. But he was not prepared to admit that business men should be hampered or put to the expense and annoyance to which this Act had put them during the short time it had been in operation. The law had been fairly administered, and the officers appointed to carry it out had tried to do so with as little inconvenience to the public as was practicable; but it was found the Act itself would not work. A return had been made in regard to this measure, and he found that 134 regulations were necessary to carry it into effect. If it required 134 orders to explain it up to this time, they might fairly estimate the difficulties there must be in carrying the law out, and how little the public appreciated or desired its continuance. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had endeavoured to persuade the House that it was wise to depart from the Winchester bushel and the wine gallon, and adopt the Imperial measure, on the ground that we imported a certain quantity of liquors from England. The hon. gentleman should have known that everything in a liquid shape imported into Canada was manufactured in countries where the Imperial gauge was not in use, except a little whiskey from Great Britain.

Mr. TUPPER: Does the hon. gentleman see a strong argument in the fact that England, which imports from all other countries, finds it convenient to adopt the Imperial measure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said there would be just as much argument in that for adopting pounds, shillings and pence. In England they were hampered with old trade regulations which they would be glad to get rid of, but which prejudices and indisposition to change kept in force. Having had experience of the conveniences of the decimal system of currency, the people would never return to pounds, shillings and pence.

Mr. TUPPER asked if a cask of wine brought to Canada from London or Liverpool was not invoiced by the Imperial gallon.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Not always; he thought he was speaking correctly when he said that in the majority of cases wine was bought by the cask and hogshead.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: A cask of so many gallons.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Yes; but that was only wine purchased in England, and it was no reason why we should adopt the English method of gauging liquors. Look at the difficulties which the measure imposed upon the people and the liability of the provisions being misunderstood or used to the disadvantage of ignorant people. It proposed that the Imperial gauge should be used for a certain time—and that was one of the greatest objections he had to the measure. While it provided that liquors should be gauged by the Imperial standard, at the same time it allowed them to be sold by the old measure, and it would therefore enable traders to take advantage of people not familiar with the difference between the Imperial and wine measures, and a system would be perpetuated which would become every day more difficult to get rid of. The same argument, to a great extent, applied to the bushel, which there was no necessity for changing. We were alongside a people who after considerable experience had settled down to the old wine measure and Winchester bushel, and he thought our system of weights and measures should correspond with theirs. The hon. member for Cumberland said he had opposed the change of currency in Nova Scotia. Personally he was never opposed to that change, but their people were opposed to it. He was not opposed to it, because he believed in assimilating our trade relations with those of the continent. Why did we alter the gauge of our railways? Simply in order that we might have a continental gauge. And it was desirable that our system of weights and measures should conform to that of our neighbours with whom we traded. There was no reason for the introduction of the English system. It was inconvenient; the people were not accustomed to it, and did not desire it. At another stage he would move an amendment that the Act be repealed entirely. He was aware that was a great responsibility, but he believed if it was repealed, the Government could introduce a standard of weights and measures which was highly necessary. He had hoped to reach his Bill before this, and that the Government would have dealt with this measure in the same manner as they did with the Insolvent Act—taken the sense of the House as to the propriety of retaining it before introducing amendments. He believed the majority of the House, if they were to deal with this question as they knew the country desired, would vote for the repeal of the Act. If that were done, the Government could bring in a short measure, which could be speedily disposed of.

Mr. WORKMAN said before the introduction of the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, he agreed in a great measure with the views just expressed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), because the measure had been unpopular and was worked with the greatest possible difficulty. But he thought the amendments proposed by his hon. friend (Mr. Laflamme) would remove, in a great measure, the objectionable features of the law, and he was therefore willing to give them a fair trial. Representing a large commercial centre, where he was frequently brought in contact with the persons who were dissatisfied with the law, it was his unfortunate duty sometimes to come in contact with the inspectors at Montreal, the men whom the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had condemned in such strong language. Those men were at their posts early in the morning and late in the evening; they were attentive and anxious to meet the requirements of the public, but they were surrounded with difficulties in the carrying out of the law which it was almost impossible for them to overcome. If 304 orders were necessary to explain the act he did not think there were three hon. members who could understand it.

The hon. member for Cumberland had also said that the absence of petitions to Parliament for the amendment of the Act proved that no serious grievance existed. It should be remembered, however, that the newspapers had announced that the Government intended to make certain changes, and hence the Boards of Trade and other public bodies did not think it necessary to petition Parliament. If the commercial community had supposed no amendments were to be made, the House would have been deluged with petitions. Something had been said with regard to the measuring of liquids. In Montreal, as a rule, they were measured by the gauge rod and the callipers. There were two or three officers whose special duty it was to attend to this business, and their measurements were always relied upon and accepted by the trade. He had not heard, within the last few years, any complaints in this relation, though, previously, disputes were an every-day occurrence, giving rise to a great deal of trouble and annoyance. He thought that, if this system was carried out in other cities, less complaint would be made. He was very much pleased with the resolutions, and he believed he could say for his constituency that they were prepared to give them a fair trial, and see that they were properly carried out.

Mr. BLANCHET said he wished to correct the statement made by his hon. friend from Cumberland that no petitions had been sent to the House asking for the repeal of this law. A great many such petitions had been, in fact, sent from the Province of Quebec, and he might instance, in this regard, the counties of Bellechasse and Montmagny, as well as other counties. He was certain that, if the Minister of Inland Revenue had not advised the provisional suspension of the law, petitions on this subject would have poured into the House, because the operation of the Act had been very unpopular, giving rise to much ill feeling and discontent; and had it not been for the expectation that something in the way of amending it would be done, the excitement would have been greater. He admitted that uniformity in weights and measures was necessary, but reforms which were unpopular, as his hon. friend had remarked, must be carried out with moderation. Time alone could change the usages and habits of a people; and if an attempt was made to force changes in commercial customs, and the dealings of people with one another, a revolution might be created. The law relating to weights and measures in Great Britain was passed in 1828, and it had been since amended frequently. It was only in the course of time that the present system of Great Britain had come into universal use there. In 1852, the Canadian system of currency was altered, but, with the exception of dealings with the Government and Government accounts, which were made in decimal currency, the use of the pounds, shillings and pence method was left optional, and the consequence was that in time everybody had adopted and was satisfied with the present system of dollars and cents. He thought that the Weights and Measures' Act of 1873 was very important, but he was afraid that it was rather premature, because the Winchester bushel and wine measure were still used on the other side of the line. As his hon. friend had observed, uniformity in weights and measures was only second in importance to uniformity in currency, and it was to be hoped that the time would come when all civilized nations would adopt a uniform system of weights and measures, as nearly all of them had done in the matter of currency. This law was unpopular, not on account of its principle, but rather owing to the instructions given by the Government. It was passed in 1873, but the Order in Council putting it into force was dated Dec. 18th, 1875. Few understood the law; and, if the instructions issued were clear, they were too numerous and too extensive; and the Inspectors themselves had not known what to do. It was on the representation of merchants and the Inspectors themselves, that the Government suspended provisionally the operation of the measure. The petitioners stated that, if the law could not be repealed, and if Parliament thought that this step would be unwise, it should be amended and improved, as many inconveniences arose from its operation, which had been well exposed by his hon. friend. The Inspectors' fees were too large; and people had not known where to go to have their weights and measures adjusted, as this was forbidden to the Inspectors. The inspection also was too frequent. He did not suppose that any weight or measure could become incorrect from use in a year; and he thought that they should, perhaps, not be inspected more than once in two or three years. As was mentioned at the last meeting of the Board of Trade, the fees which were charged virtually amounted to the cost of the measures. If the Government wished to bring this law into favour with the people, they must see that it was put into operation with the least possible expense. The Minister of Inland Revenue should perhaps so regulate as to provide merely for the operation of the law. He was rather inclined to vote for the proposed motion of his hon. friend from Halifax, if made at a future stage; and, if he found that the House was favourable to the principle of having a uniform system of weights and measures, he would propose some changes in the resolutions.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked what course the Government intended to pursue with regard to persons whose weights and measures had been seized and removed. He had received complaints from quite a number of individuals, who stated that Inspectors or parties employed by them had last fall entered their shops and taken away scales and weights and measures without right or permission, and given them instructions as to where other scales and measures could be purchased.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that in a few instances these had been condemned because they were opposed to the principle of the law, and were proved by actual experiment to have been fraudulent, consequently they were seized. No officer was authorized to remove any scale or measure for any other reasons.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was prepared to establish that Inspectors, or parties in their employ, had taken away scales, weights and measures from shops without testing or attempting to test them. He hoped that the persons who had thus suffered loss would be reimbursed.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that, if the hon. gentleman showed that any irregularity or illegality had been committed by any officer, and submitted the complaint in proper form, that officer would be dismissed. Recourse could also be had by law against the official so offending.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was satisfied with the reply. He had told the aggrieved persons that there was not much law or justice about anything done by this Department. He took it that if they petitioned the Government they would be reimbursed for the loss they had sustained. He could prove that scales which weighed correctly when sent to the Inspector had never since weighed correctly. A gentleman wrote him as follows:—That their firm had suffered loss to the extent of $500 in this relation; that they had on hand twenty-seven sets of Warren's scales, which could not be marked and certified here; that they had to return them to Hamilton, the freight there and back costing $30; that the charges for certification amounted to $132.80c., not including those for Fairbanks' scales, which were adjusted and certified in Ottawa; that their customers asked not for the new but for the old measures; that the public should be indemnified for the heavy loss sustained in this regard, that they had a number of steelyards which the Inspector refused to mark and adjust, thus causing a direct and dead loss; and that, if this law continued in force, a skilled mechanic should be appointed, who would keep his office open for such purposes at certain hours. He (Mr. Rochester) thought that the people were aroused rather owing to the abuses which had been committed than to the principle on which the law was based. Some people said so, though there was a diversity of opinion on the subject. A gentleman, two years ago, bought four sets of Bell weights in London, England, costing about $40, but he was told by the Inspector that he would not be allowed to use them. He had no doubt that quite a number of petitions would now be received from persons who wished to be refunded for the expense to which they had been put by the removal of their scales, weights and measures. He heard that a great many of the latter had been sold by auctioneers on the market. The corporation of Ottawa had its own Inspector of Weights and Measures, and the weights and measures seized by the Government official, he was informed, which were all branded by the former, were not tested to see if they were right or wrong. He hoped the Government would see its way clear to reimburse parties who had sustained loss in consequence of this act of their Inspector. With respect to the remark of the hon. member for Cumberland as to the deputy head of the Department, his opinion was that he was a theorist and not a practical man. In 1873, the hon. member for Cumberland, under the advice of the deputy head, brought in two Bills, one being as to the caliper gauge, which was withdrawn in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the other providing for the gauging of all liquids. He (Mr. Rochester) pointed out that to put the gauging rod into a barrel of beer in July to measure it, as provided by the Act, would render the beer useless, on account of its being opened at that time of the year. Consequently, that Bill was withdrawn also.

Mr. LANDERKIN said he was pleased to see some amendments to the Bill as already in force; as, for instance, that amendment relative to the fees to be paid for verification after the first inspection. This was a matter respecting which the people were somewhat anxious, and he thought that the course of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was perfectly right. There were some other modifications which he thought very acceptable likewise. He had very much pleasure in supporting the amendments proposed. He was somewhat surprised at the observations in reference to the operations of the Act, and to hear the hon. member for Montreal say that it was very unpopular in that city. When the discussion on the Bill was up some time ago, he (Mr. Landerkin) had caused some enquiries to be made, in order to ascertain whether it was acceptable to the people of his Riding. He learned that it was not unpopular, but that it was regarded as one in the interests of the people. The Inspector had gone over nearly the whole of his county, and the result was generally satisfactory, although he thought there were some complaints that were well founded. In some instances the weights and measures had to be taken a great distance to be inspected, but in his county the Inspector went around and examined the grain measures, and the public were consequently well satisfied with the operations of the Act. It was absolutely necessary that scales and measures should be inspected. The old system of verification did not come up to public requirements. Under the present system weights and measures could be properly adjusted; under the old system that was impossible. He was not aware that the fees were any higher now than they were before. He believed that some of the objections to the Bill were not on the merits of the Bill itself, but partook of a political character, because the Bill was put into operation by the present Government. He knew one hon. gentleman who had opposed the Bill, but as soon as he found that it had been introduced by the hon. member for Cumberland, his objections immediately faded away, and he was convinced that the Bill was a very good measure. He (Mr. Landerkin) believed that, when it had been some time in operation, the public would be very well satisfied with it. He did not think it would be judicious to repeal the Act now. Now that it had been introduced, and a fair standard had been reached, the Act should have a fair trial. The hon. member for Carleton always got himself into a fever whenever he discussed this question, and particularly when he referred to the deputy head of the Department. He (Mr. Landerkin) had made enquiries from those who had been brought in contact with that gentleman, and they had paid a high tribute to his worth, and to the care and consideration which he brought to bear upon the subject. He did not know of any instance in his county where the people had refused to have their scales inspected. When people were unwilling to have their weights and measures inspected, he considered they had a very good reason for such unwillingness. He believed a good deal of the opposition to the Act was on account of the want of tact displayed by those engaged in the inspection. If there were good men employed, men who endeavoured to do what was right, he did not think there would be any desire to have the Act repealed. He hoped that the amendments would be carried, and that hon. gentlemen, instead of creating a prejudice against the Act, would endeavour to harmonize it to the public interest, as such an Act was absolutely required for the safety of the public.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) congratulated the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Government upon the amendments they were making to the Bill, as without them it was a very improper law. There was a great deal of force in what the hon. member for Cumberland had said. There might as well be two yard measures as two ways of computing a bushel. He would recommend strongly that the Minister of Inland Revenue should make only one measure. Were it otherwise there would be great con- feeling of the country generally, and not particular localities as Montreal fusion throughout the country. He was one of those who petitioned the Government in favour of a change in the Act. He was not prepared to support the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax. A large amount of money had been spent in connection with the Act, and it should have a fair trial. He would again express the hope that the Government would take into consideration the advisability of having only one measure. He would suggest that the yard measures on counters should also be stamped.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he agreed with the hon. member for Cumberland that the objection was not so much to the Act itself as to the administration of the Act. He could not conceive how any hon. member could advocate the repeal of the Act. Some of the amendments proposed were in the right direction, but there were others which should receive the greatest consideration. The attention of the House had already been called to the fact that the Bill tolerated two measures. He could readily understand how in some portions of the country it was desired to retain the old system of measurement with reference to grain; but in the interests of the country generally there should only be one system. As the hon. member for Bellechasse said, the provisions of the Act had been contravened, and he thought it was advisable that there should be some indulgence shown until the prejudices against the Act had died out. It was just as absurd to have two measures for grain as two for drygoods. The hon. the Finance Minister had the credit of suggesting the cental clause, and he (Mr. Gibbs) supported it, as he thought it would become general. But Liverpool was the only port of Great Britain where the cental was used. Originally it was the quarter of a gross, 500lb., eight bushels of 70lb. to the bushel, but now a quarter was eight bushels of 60lb. to the bushel. He thought that under no consideration should the Minister of Inland Revenue allow anything but the standard of weights as laid down in the 5th section. He regretted exceedingly that the cental had not come into general use in this country. In purchasing grain in this country since 1868 they had violated the law. In Detroit and in London barley was purchased by the cental, but he was afraid it would take many years before we could get that into general use in the Dominion of Canada. He differed entirely from the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) in reference to one of the provisions introduced by the Minister of Inland Revenue,—that in Section 41. He congratulated the hon. gentleman on having adopted that course. What the people could complain of in the administration of the Act in this particular was that there was no person having the authority of the Government to attend the Inspector when he was inspecting weights and pronouncing them to be incorrect. It was not so much that the charge was an enormous one, or an extravagant one, as that no one liked to be subject to a charge made by a person having no authority. All the Inspector had to do was to condemn the scale, which was then thrown back into the hands of the owner, and he had either to appoint a person to follow the Inspector or to take the scale somewhere else to get it adjusted. He would not mind if the charge were three times as much under this section. The people would more readily agree to that than to the previous provision. The people objected to paying the fees because the Inspector had not authority to adjust the scales. Hon. gentlemen had spoken of the injustice of compelling the owners of large scales to take them twenty or twenty-five miles, and he had received two letters from owners of large scales who said it was impossible to take them to the residence of the Inspector, a distance of twenty-two miles. He would suggest that, while it might be proper to bring small weights and measures to the Inspector, in the case of hay scales and scales used in mills, which were fixtures, it was almost impossible for owners to comply with the provision. He suggested that the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. OLIVER said he looked upon the proposal to go back to the wine measure, instead of continuing the Imperial measure, as one which would be very injurious to trade in the country. In every inspection district, the Inspector had partially put the Act into operation, and many others had purchased the Imperial gallon measure. This would compel those who had adopted the Imperial measure to go back to the old measure for self-preservation. They had purchased the standard measures at considerable cost, and had had them stamped and adjusted, and it would be unfair to compel those who had gone into this in good faith to go back again to the old measure. The Minister of Inland Revenue said it was unwise to adopt a revolution of this kind all at once, but the revolution had been gone into, and it had been partially adopted. In his own county about half had adopted the new measure, and it would be very unfair to them to compel them to go back to the old measures. He thought the other amendments were in the right direction. It had been stated by his hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones), that there never had been a desire for a measure of the kind.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Never.

Mr. OLIVER said it was passed by a considerable majority, not as a political measure, but in the interest of the whole country, and, if a vote was taken for the repeal of this Act, it would be found that the country still desired a measure of this kind. Where were the complaints from? It was only natural to suppose then the mercantile community, the merchants, of the country would object to a measure of this kind, and they had given as a reason for that objection that ninety per cent. of the weights and measures were not correct. It was therefore, thought they were always found in favour of the trader and not of the general community. Of the ninety per cent. which were inaccurate, a vast percentage of the weights were too light and the measures too small. The Bill was in the interest of the consuming population of the country, and he held that it was in the interest of the merchants themselves that such a measure should be on the Statute-book, because, when they were not properly authorized by it to test their weights and measures, they did not know whether they were against themselves or not. If this Act were repealed, they would have to go back to the old County Council arrangement. When the new standards were introduced, it was found, in his county, that the standards used for adjusting weights and measures were themselves incorrect. He urged, if the Minister of Inland Revenue desired to make the Bill popular, that he should continue the Imperial measure, and not have two measures in one Province.

Mr. COLBY expressed his satisfaction with the amendments which the Minister had proposed to the Act. It was a very important question for the people to determine which of these systems was the better one. His own Province had been decidedly in favour of the system suggested by his hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones), and he fully endorsed every remark he had made on that subject. The people in that section of the country in which he lived used the Winchester bushel measure and wine gallon. Their relations were so intimate with the States that it was doubtful whether it was not well to separate their system of measures from the system in vogue across the border. There was much propriety in our conforming our system of measures and making it a continental system, as in assimilating the railway gauge, and adopting a decimal currency in place of the pounds, shillings and pence used in England. While the Minister simply desired to give the country an opportunity of a year or two longer, in which to determine this question, he was doing wisely; and he thought he would be doing unwisely to enforce the Imperial measure. After a little experience before 1880 they might be able to determine finally which was the better system. He agreed that ultimately and permanently there should be but one system. It was confusing that there should be two distinct systems permanently, but he thought the people should have an opportunity of considering the matter.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said there was no doubt the working of the Act had caused widespread dissatisfaction, not so much on account of the principle as on account of the charges and vexatious annoyances parties were put to in bringing their weights and measures to the place appointed for inspection. In his own county, the deputy discharged his duties efficiently and satisfactorily, and if any fault was found it was owing to matters over which he had no control. One of his constituents had to go 50 miles to get his weights and measures adjusted, and it was really important, if the Act were to work satisfactorily, that the inspection should be so arranged that parties coming under it should not be subjected to such loss of time and expense. The provision that only one quarter fees should be paid in case the weights or measures were found correct after the first inspection was a step in the right direction; but he regretted that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had not seen his way clear to make the public Exchequer bear the charge of the inspection after the first time when they were found accurate. He did not think that dealers were inclined to defraud the public as a rule; if their weights and measures were incorrect, it was doubtless because they had not the proper means of ascertaining their correctness, and it was only proper that they should not be held for cost of inspection when everything was found correct. If that were done, it would have the tendency of making the law more popular. Again, he thought annual inspection was not required; if it were done every second or third year, it would fully meet all the necessities of the case. As to the last clause of the resolution, he feared it would not work very satisfactorily; he did not think the adjuster should receive the fees. He would suggest that the fees should be no part of the perquisites of the party performing the work. The adjuster should be a salaried officer, and the fees should go into the general revenue, and thereby relieve him from any suspicion of acting merely for the sake of fees.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said he had taken considerable interest in the progress of this Act, and he was glad to see that the same spirit of fair play which existed at the time the measure was introduced, prevailed to-day. He congratulated the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) for the fair and candid manner in which he had treated this question, and he hoped that both sides of the House would co-operate in making this Act work better in the future than it had done in the past. The changes proposed, although they might not go as far as was desired, were certainly in the right direction. The great objection was the enormous expense to the parties who had their weights and measures inspected. A half bushel measure which cost 55c. paid an inspection fee of 40c.; a peck, which cost 45c., paid 30c., and so on in proportion. In regard to this matter the Commission said:

"As to the fees charged for verification they have been adjusted with a view to making the revenue from this service cover its cost. So far this result has not been attained, but that is more due to want of energy in some quarters as to the enforcement of the law than to the insufficiency of the fees. If the provisions of the Act are enforced equally over the whole Dominion, there will be no difficulty in making large concessions in the directions indicated in the third item of objections above stated. But if, in consequence of adverse influences, some localities are allowed to escape, to a large extent, the operations of the law, any reduction made in the fees cannot fail to have the effect of throwing a portion of the cost on the general public, a result which is suggested and approved by the third objection."

This was not a valid reason why, in localities where this Act was enforced, this additional cost should be imposed on the people. The receipts and expenses in the various Provinces were for the first half of the current fiscal year:—

	Expenses.	Receipts.
Ontario.....	$16,319 41	$14,496 75
Quebec .....	10,617 63	1,965 20
New Brunswick.....	2,613 98	811 95
Nova Scotia.....	4,152 87	2,426 85
Manitoba.....	772 70	.....
	<hr/> $34,476 59	<hr/> $19,700 75

This showed that the Act had not been rigidly carried out in some of the Provinces. He understood the hon. member for Cumberland to have cast a general reflection on the Inspectors. The Inspector for the county in which he (Mr. Higinbotham) lived was an excellent officer, who attended faithfully to his duties, and if all the other appointments were as good he did not think there would be much ground for complaint. He hoped that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would see his way in the future to amend the fees, which formed one of the chief objections to the law as it now stood.

Mr. BOLDUC said there was one inconvenience which should be made to disappear. On the market at Quebec, produce was sold by French weight, while the law prescribed the Imperial measure. He thought it was certainly necessary to impose a penalty on those who did not wish to submit to the law. While this was not done, this state of affairs would not be remedied. The traders at present combined and refused to buy from the farmers unless they would sell by French weight; but the former sold by Imperial measure. He considered that this was unjust, and that it was absolutely necessary to impose a fine in the direction he had mentioned. He hoped the Minister of the Interior would take his suggestion into consideration and add the amendment he had instanced to the resolutions submitted to the House. It was also unjust to permit the use of two measures—the old and the Imperial, because this was dangerous, as traders under such circumstances were sometimes inclined to buy by the large and sell by the small measure.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that a penalty of $10 could now be imposed on those who violated this law, which only provided for the Imperial measure. No other weight was recognized by law.

Mr. BLANCHET said that his hon. friend (Mr. Laflamme) perhaps did not understand the system in vogue at Quebec. It was very true that the law only recognized the English weight, but in practice the traders combined among each other, and told the farmers that they would not buy their produce, except they sold by French weight; and this, if he sold, the farmer was consequently obliged to do, though the agreement in question was not recognized by the law; it was purely personal between two individuals. On the other hand, when the trader returned to town, after buying by French weight, 112lb. to the quintal, he sold to consumers by Imperial weight, thus making two profits—one on the sale to the consumer and the other on the difference in weight.

Mr. SCRIVER said he simply desired to say, as far as he understood the amendments proposed, that they were decidedly in the right direction. He was particularly pleased to hear the announcement from the Minister of the Interior that the Government intended to submit the instructions given from time to time to the Inspectors to a thorough and careful revision. The difficulties which had arisen throughout the country were due, he conceived, to the difficulty which Inspectors had in understanding these instructions more than to anything else. They had been, in some instances at all events, to his knowledge, beyond the comprehension of some Inspectors. He did not say that there were not others who were sufficiently intelligent to understand them; but he knew that, in many cases, Inspectors had not properly understood their instructions, and had, consequently, so administered the law as to cause injustice, difficulty and dissatisfaction. He was afraid, however, that one purpose which the Government had in view--the prolongation of the time for the use of the two kinds of measures--would result in great difficulty, not to say great injustice. He agreed with the hon. member for Stanstead in this: that, so far as their constituents were concerned, along the frontier, it would be very greatly to their own convenience to have the old measures as they were employed across the line among those with whom they mainly had transactions; but, as the change had been made, and to a great extent carried into effect, it would be better to have but one measure in use. In cases where the change had not been general, they could all easily understand that this would result in difficulty and injustice to those who had acquired new measures, on account of the difference in them. The sooner the change was made thorough and complete the better it would be. The only objection he could see in the resolutions related to the prolongation of the time, as mentioned.

Resolutions agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 119) To amend the Act respecting Weights and Measures.

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions 1 to 24, reported from Committee of Supply on February 23rd, read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 25, Precis-writer of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court, $1,850,

Mr. LANGEVIN said he wished to make a few remarks, first, personal to himself, and then as to the working of the Court.

Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that, if the remarks were such as required to be replied to, they be deferred until the hon. the Minister of Justice, who was absent through indisposition, was present.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he would do no injustice to the hon. the Minister of Justice; if he thought he would, he would defer his remarks. This was the first opportunity he had had of replying to accusations made against him in the press that he had attacked the Supreme Court in connection with the judgment that had been rendered against him in the Charlevoix election case. He might say that he had never attacked the Judges. He had never attacked their motives. He had never stated that they had wittingly committed an injustice towards him or towards anyone else. On the contrary, he had always stated that he believed they had acted conscientiously, and had done what they considered right at the time they rendered their judgment, and that the Court, as the High Court of Canada, should be respected. But he stated, as was of course his right, that he did not agree with the judgment. And he did not suppose that any hon. member placed in his position would agree with the judgment. He had given reasons why he thought the judgment was not right, but he would not now occupy the time of the House by reciting those reasons. He was not present to ask the House to sit in judgment upon the Court, but he merely wished to set himself right in this matter. He disagreed with the judgment of the Court, and that was all.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Does the hon. gentleman say he never condemned the Judges of the Supreme Court?

Mr. LANGEVIN explained that he had condemned the judgment but had not attacked the motives of the Judges.

Mr. LAFLAMME asked whether the hon. member approved of the circular issued on his behalf, which was a most violent, abusive and unjustifiable attack on the Judges.

Mr. LANGEVIN said, as the hon. gentleman knew, there was a rumour that his (Mr. Langevin's) election would again be contested, and therefore he must be excused from entering into the details, as they would be investigated if there was a trial. But he would at once say that he had not attacked the Judges, nor had he got anyone else to do so. He had never commissioned anyone to attack the Judges either verbally or otherwise.

Resolution read the second time, and agreed to.

Resolution 26 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 27, Messenger of the Supreme Court of Canada, $330,

Mr. LANGEVIN referred to the other matter, that of the working of the Supreme Court. He said he wished to call the attention of the House to the enormous expense in connection with trials before that Court. Hon. gentlemen might laugh, but it was not only a matter personal to himself but one which might affect any member of the House. The record had to be printed, and in the case of Charlevoix the volume amounted to 600 pages, at a cost of $800. Then there were other documents, which made the printing altogether $1,000, to be charged either against the member or the petitioner; in the present case against himself. This was not an isolated case; it was an ordinary case. The paper was of the best kind, and was only printed on one side, with very wide margins. The testimonies of 186 witnesses were printed, there being at the commencement of each a heading of half a page, the recital thus being repeated 186 times. He asked hon. members whether they intended, when they passed the Supreme Court Bill, that all this expense should be incurred. Only two of the Judges understood French sufficiently to appreciate the evidence of the witnesses, and therefore the whole of the evidence had to be translated—not at his expense, he was glad to say, but at the expense of the country. There was such haste to push his case through that all the Departmental translators in Ottawa were employed for the purpose. He hoped that this matter would be placed before the hon. the Minister of Justice. In the translation made, although it was done by able men, yet, because it was hurried, there were no less than one hundred blunders which changed completely the sense of the document in French. The subpoenas and headings were all translated. Not only were all the headings printed 170 or 180 times—not only were the pages printed only on one side—but, when the evidence turned the page, the few lines were charged as a whole page. They had to pay $800 for the volume, but the cost should not have exceeded from $300 to $400. He had deemed it to be his duty to call the attention of the House to that matter, and he trusted it would be brought before the notice of the Court. He had had the experience, and he wished the House to have the benefit of it through him.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would take care that the matter would be brought to the notice of the hon. the Minister of Justice. What was the case of the hon. member for Charlevoix to-day might be that of any other hon. member to-morrow. The expenses connected with cases under the English law had always been a reproach to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said these expenses amounted to a denial of justice to a poor man, for no member who was not wealthy would be able to do other than resign his seat when it came into question. The result would be that the wealthy man would have the power of worrying the poorer member out of his seat, by holding over him a threat to bring his case before the Supreme Court.

Mr. LAFLAMME thought the hon. member for Charlevoix should be pleased that he was not charged with the costs of translation. Had the case come before the Privy Council in England, the hon. member would have been put to the expense of all the costs.

Mr. CAMERON said it was reported that officers of the House had been engaged in translating this work. If this were done during office hours he would certainly protest against it, and would like to know by whom the order was given.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman was speaking a little too fast. He did not think any Minister had given any orders of that kind.

Mr. CAMERON did not suppose the officers would do it on their own responsibility.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I regret that they do very frequently.

Mr. SPEAKER said the officers of the House received their orders from him, and he had never given such orders.

Mr. LAFLAMME believed it was necessary, if they desired their Constitution well protected, that they should have the right in election cases to appeal from the local Courts and from local influences, to the only safe Court, viz., the Supreme Court.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the officers were in the habit of leaving the House at a certain hour each day, and had been in the habit of occupying themselves in keeping accounts and other pursuits during their leisure hours. The Government discountenanced that practice in the Departments two years ago, when it was the custom, and had been for many years, for a large number of young men to be employed in some of the Departments requiring extra writing. For instance, it was customary in the Finance Department to have a number of the employés from the other Departments brought in to assist. That had been put an end to, and the whole of the work was now done by ladies belonging to deceased public servants, or who had parents and others dependent upon them. Some other officers of the House were engaged—he hoped they were not now—in carrying on a regular business outside, and that was ordered to be stopped.

Mr. IRVING said some of the Judges of the Supreme Court complained of the absurd and unnecessary amount of matter printed in the book, which was far in excess of their rules, and created great expense. It was very proper that such an expense should be greatly reduced.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said he agreed with the hon. member for Kingston, that such expenses should be reduced in every way they could be without interfering with the cause of justice. It was surely not the wish of hon. members that men who happened not to have the faculty for acquiring wealth should be deterred from becoming candidates, which would be one of the effects of such a practice as had been brought before the notice of the House. Unless under very exceptional circumstances, he thought election trials could be heard before a single Judge, and even then the expenses would be sufficiently large.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue tried to make out that he (Mr. Langevin) was making remarks injurious to the Judges. Such was not his intention, nor did he say anything which would bear that construction. All he said was that this whole system, from beginning to end, was wrong. If the translation was to be made, it ought to be perfect, so that the French suitors would be on an equal footing with the others in the Court. Moreover, a law should be framed to prevent a repetition of what occurred in his own case. This was such an important matter that a short Bill ought to be introduced on the subject.

Mr. LAFLAMME said what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) complained of could be remedied by the mutual consent of the parties.

Mr. LANGEVIN said it would be much better if in such cases only the body of the evidence was ordered to be printed. That would meet the difficulty and save at least a fourth of the cost for printing, which was an important saving.

Mr. CAUCHON said they had endeavoured to save the parties from expenses in every possible way, but he did not think they had effected much. Even if this were attended to as suggested, by and by some other cause of complaint would be found. Still there would be no harm in drawing the attention of the Court to this matter, to see if anything could be done to reduce this expense. It was certainly useless to print all the evidence in many cases.

Mr. MASSON asked how the evidence was read before the Privy Council in England.

Mr. LAFLAMME said if the evidence was stated in French it was transmitted to the Privy Council in French; there was no translation. If any of the hon. Judges did not understand French, which was not very likely, one of the officers of the Court was asked to translate, but no translation was ordered.

Mr. MASSON said the present system was rather hard on French pleaders, who were entitled to plead before the Supreme Court in their own language, which the Judges of this Court should understand. An appeal to this Court entailed greater costs than an appeal to the Privy Council, which did not require the translation of French documents.

Mr. LAFLAMME said appeals from Spanish, French, and Hindoo colonies were taken before the Privy Council, but the members of this Court were not obliged to speak Hindoo and Spanish. As a rule nothing but English was spoken there, and when the members of the Court did not understand French, they had such portions as were in French translated for them.

On Resolution 31, for the salary of one Stipendiary Magistrate or County Court Judge, to provide, if necessary, for the vacancy created by the death of the late A. T. Bushby, Esq., $2,425, Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that when it was before the Committee the Minister of Justice had said he was not at all certain that this item, $2,425, to provide, if necessary, for the vacancy created by the death of the late A. T. Bushby, Stipendiary Magistrate, would be used, as an existing official might be able to fill the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the Minister of Justice had been in communication with the Local Government on the subject. The hon. member for Kingston was perhaps aware that the

Mr. CAUCHON.

Local Legislature had passed a Bill establishing County Courts in a somewhat different way than had hitherto prevailed, and required each of these Judges to be a barrister. This would necessitate the superannuation of the six gentlemen who were now acting as Judges of these Courts, none of them being a barrister. The matter he believed had not progressed any further since the Minister of Justice had made his explanation, but he would again call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, although these Judges were not all lawyers, technically speaking, yet they had had great experience, and knew the country, and the habits and wants of the people, and had practically acquired a sufficient knowledge of the law to meet the requirements of the country. He thought it would be a wilful waste of money to supersede all these gentlemen who had a right to superannuation.

On Resolution 46, grant to Parliamentary Library, including provision for law books, $10,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked whether any plan had been prepared by which the Library could be made available for a larger number of books. A library meant a room full of books, but in this instance it signified a handsome room with few books. By running up the stairway on the interior of the wall to the foot of the windows, and then having an interior circle for books, more accommodation would be provided, and there was plenty of room for it. There was a great waste of space at present in the centre of the room.

Mr. MILLS: It would then be very dark in the centre of the room.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: We want books and not ornaments.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was quite possible, of course, to provide accommodation for more books. If the gentleman would look at the initial design he would see that provision was made for a stone roof, and that the ribs which were now made of wood rested on bases of dark marble, which marble or capital surmounted pillars of the same material. All this was necessary for the artistic appearance of the structure and room. If they took up another story with books they would cover up the plinth and the columns and the capitals, and render it at once apparent that the original design and effect of the Library was utterly destroyed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would be sorry to see that, certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE said such an arrangement would effectually destroy the lighting of the room. This was a matter which had cost him a good deal of anxiety. It was originally proposed to provide stained glass windows, but he had determined to give them up. It rested, of course, with Parliament to decide what should be done, and whether they should have a very beautiful room or a mere bookseller's shop. He did think that it would be a great pity to spoil such a handsome pile of buildings. In a few years a new wing might be erected, and then the room at present occupied by the Supreme Court could be utilized for a particular class of books and perhaps for a reading-room as well, for the two Houses. An abundance of room would thus be provided. At present he strongly deprecated any cutting up of the room in such a way as to destroy the artistic affect.

Mr. MASSON said books which were required for daily reference, such as appendices or sessional papers, should be made more easy of access. At the present the library was not lit up at night, and though he had diligently sought for such books with the aid of a candle, he had given the task up in discouragement. He hoped something would be done shortly in this regard, and that a better location would be provided for books which were needed by members for daily reference.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no doubt that the lighting was a little deficient. They could not use the ordinary brackets, as these did not agree with the style of architecture, and they had had to have other brackets made for the purpose. He would see that the library by next Session was placed in the best possible order for the convenience of members.

On Resolution 52, to meet expenses in connection with the care of Archives, $3,000,

Mr. POPE (Compton) asked what action the Government intended to take in this regard.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had that day called the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the point. The matter would be taken in consideration, and it would be decided whether or not the item would be increased.

Mr. BABY said he hoped this would be done. There were two important collections, the Haldimand and Rochester, from which it was extremely desirable that copies of documents should be taken.

Mr. MASSON said, when the hon. the Minister of the Interior was preparing his report on the boundaries of Ontario, he was obliged to go to New York to inspect copies of works which should be found in our own library.

Mr. POPE (Compton) remarked that writers could be employed for a small amount of money at London, Paris and New York.

Mr. PLUMB referred to the Johnston papers, relating to the early history of the State of New York and the Province of Ontario, which should have been obtained. Every year was increasing the value of these collections, and the difficulty of securing them.

Mr. MILLS agreed that there were many manuscript collections relating to the early history of Canada which should be obtained.

On Resolution 54, Preparation of Criminal Statistics, $5,000, Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD enquired what progress had been made in this department.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the system worked tolerably well. The papers were prepared with a great deal of care, after consulting the criminal statistics of Scotland, which were generally complete, and of some other countries of Europe.

On Resolution 55, (reported from Committee of Supply, on March 16th) Immigration and Quarantine, $120,550.

Mr. BLANCHET asked the hon. the Finance Minister whether he had endeavoured to carry out the recommendations of the two physicians at the port of Quebec. When the question was asked in Committee of the Whole, an answer was promised on concurrence. The two physicians resided on the north side of the river, but the immigrants landed on the south side. Last year over 20,000 of them landed, and in one or two years there were over 50,000. The physicians not only lived on the other side of the river, but the Immigrant Hospital was two miles away on the north side. In cases of an emergency, immigrants were placed in a very unfortunate position, having to be taken across the river and carried through the narrow streets of Quebec before the hospital could be reached. There was no hospital accommodation on the south side of the river.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hospital on the north side is not an immigrant hospital.

Mr. BLANCHET said it was called the Marine and Immigrant Hospital. There was no other hospital to which immigrants could be taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is the Hospital on Grosse Isle.

Mr. BLANCHET: But they don't land there except when quarantined. His hon. friend the member for Compton, when he was in power, had provided for this necessity to a certain extent, and a medical officer was employed at the immigrants' landing place all through the summer season, and he was always on the spot in case of emergency. But when the present Government came into office this gentleman was removed, for what reason he could not conceive, except on account of economy, if not for political reasons. The two officers of the Government at Quebec had recommended that rooms and beds be provided on the south side with a full supply of drugs and surgical instruments. There were already some drugs at that place, but not sufficient. This was a matter which ought to be attended to in the interest of humanity.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had not neglected to call the attention of Department to it, but as he did not expect this item to be up he had not the required information. The matter however, could be discussed on the next item.

On Resolution 61, Salaries of Military Branch and District Staff, $28,600,

Mr. MITCHELL said he felt that in times of peace, such as we had had for several years, the exceptional state of things which existed when the time of militia service was much longer than it was to-day had been removed by the removal of the Fenian troubles, and of any fears of trouble between our parent country and the United States. The reduction was, therefore, a step in the right direction. He thought we had arrived at a period in our history when we could afford to reduce the amount still further; and, when they saw that the taxes had to be increased to maintain the ordinary service, when they looked at our friendly relations with the country on our borders, when they looked at the depressed state of trade, he believed that the expenditure of something like a million and a quarter of dollars for Militia and Police service was more than ought to be expended. He believed that the playing at soldiers for which a large amount of this money was expended did not commend itself to the masses of the people. He knew it was not of any use in a House like this, with Colonels on his right, Colonels on his left, Colonels all around him and in front of him, with about every fourth man in the House a Lieut.-Colonel, to ask for a reduction of this amount; but he desired to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that we were expending a far greater amount than the interest of the country required. He felt that, when the attention of the people was called to the subject, Parliament would be asked to reduce this vote, and he knew of nothing that would place the Ministry before the country more favourably than a reduction of this expenditure. We had expended a great amount of money very foolishly. Colonel Ross, under the Administration which preceded this one, felt it necessary, when British Columbia came into the Confederation, to travel across the continent at a very considerable expense for the purpose, as was alleged, of getting information for the Department. He had a very pleasant summer trip, and he believed was here some three or four months afterwards, when he resigned and went to Europe—left the country altogether. Now we had another gentleman in command of the Canadian troops, and he had found it necessary to travel across the country at a very considerable expense, and on the staff of those gentlemen he was told there was not a single Canadian, not one man identified with the country. These trips were mere pleasure trips and it was time they were put a stop to. If they were necessary, they should be made of advantage to the country by giving information to men identified with it, and not to men who came here, drew salaries, and left it at their own convenience. He knew that the Premier believed that the general feeling of the country was in favour of a reduction of the item to half a million dollars. He believed that the statement he had uttered would be taken up from one end of Canada to the other. Although this Parliament might not be disposed to favourably consider the matter, when a new Parliament assembled he believed his views would find an echo in the hearts of the people, and that this amount would be reduced to half a million of dollars.

Mr. VAIL said that, when the Finance Minister made his Budget speech last year, he had stated that it was the policy of the Government for the present to carry out a system of retrenchment in every Department, as far as they could do it without endangering the public service. The Estimates showed that the Government had reduced their estimates some $510,000. He must confess he had acceded to that reduction very reluctantly, because he thought it was not calculated to make the head of the Department very popular, but he thought if the pruning knife had to be introduced they could stand it in the Militia Department as well as anywhere, and so he had cheerfully acceded to the views of the Government. The amount expended by the former Government was about a million and a half dollars which this Government had reduced by more than half a million. The amount they had expended for training the Militia last year was $125,000, compared with $350,000 the year previous. That was expended in training the field artillery for twelve days and the infantry for eight days. This year they had $30,000 to provide for the training of 20,000 militia for twelve days. He agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that it would be unwise in the present state of the country to expend more than was necessary to keep up a proper force and staff, but it would be impossible to keep up the volunteer force without the proper machinery to make it of some advantage and credit to the country. The Government did not desire to expend anything beyond what was actually necessary. It was just possible that the former Government did extend it beyond what was actually necessary for some particular purpose, he would not say what, but the number was increased from 23,000 to 40,000, which was about 20,000 more than the country could afford to keep up. The number must be gradually increased to 24,000 or 25,000, which was quite as much as we could afford to keep up for militia drill.

Mr. MITCHELL: Or gradually decrease it.

Mr. VAIL said it would be unfair to do it suddenly. It could be done in such a way as to cause no disappointments to those who had made it their study, and not to impair the Militia force. It was possible that, as there were indications of war on the other side of the Atlantic, it might be desirable to make the Militia force more efficient than now.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he entirely disagreed with the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that the time had arrived when a still further reduction should be made in the Militia Estimates. He was afraid they were working in the wrong direction; that in trying to carry out the principle of economy they were really wasting all the money they gave for the Volunteer movement. He agreed with the member for Northumberland that perhaps it would be better, considering the smallness of their votes, to give them up altogether for a certain time, until the Government felt themselves in a position to return to the grant which the Minister of Militia considered was an excessive one under his predecessors. He (Mr. Wright) ventured to say that at no time in the history of Canada was it ever so efficient as under the predecessors of the present Government; and that the position which it occupied to-day was one that could not be favourably compared with the position which it occupied at that time; and, further, that if they compared the amount now asked with the efficiency of the force under a former grant, it would be found to be largely on the debit side of the account. He hoped that the very able report of the Major-General commanding the forces would be, in a large measure, carried out. He thought the time had come when the force should be reduced to such a compass as the money expended would cover, so that it might be clothed and armed very efficiently. It was a mistake to have only soldiers on paper. The drill for eight days was a mere absurdity; it was worse than useless; it was a sort of picnic party, and possibly degenerated into something worse. The men were raw recruits. It took them two or three days to get to their grounds and settle down. He thought it would be better to reduce the militia to say 20,000 men, according to the estimate of the General commanding, and that they should be in as large a measure as possible in the centres of population where they could be got together easily and readily, and that the time of drill should be extended. He hoped the suggestion that infantry and cavalry corps should be formed would be carried out. What the militia wanted was competent officers, men who understood their business, who made it their business to acquire a knowledge of their profession and could keep their companies together. A company which had a belief in the efficiency and knowledge of its officer would be almost sure to maintain its standing, but without that it would never come up to the required standard. The member for Cumberland had alluded to the different origins of the Canadian nationality. He asked last Session and the Session before that the position of Major-General should be thrown open to Canadians. He did not for one moment wish to say that a British officer should not command the force; a British officer was now in command, and discharged his duties ably and well. But he objected to any regulation whereby a Canadian could not rise to this position. He had intended to move to abrogate this resolution this Session. In looking over the report he observed there was no return with respect to the repairing of guns and material. They were generally sent to Montreal for repairs, and he was told a large amount of money was expended in this way. If the scheme suggested by the Major-General, of concentrating the force within the vicinity of towns and villages, and an adjutant or a couple of sergeants attached thereto, were adopted, a great saving would be effected. There was a great feeling of dissatisfaction all through the force, and, if the present system were continued, we would not have an efficient or willing militia. They would have a certain amount of money expended, and a number of bright and shining lights represented on the staff and in other places of emolument and profit, but we would not have the men. There was too much thrown upon the local officers at present. They were getting tired of it, and would probably throw the thing up, and it would be impossible for the Government to resuscitate the service.

Mr. AYLMER said it appeared to be the intention of the Government to reduce the force to about 20,000 men. In his report the Major General said :

"I consider it would be imprudent to make any reduction in either Cavalry, Artillery or Engineers. Upon the rural battalions and the independent companies of Infantry unaffiliated to any Battalion should fall the reduction, if such must be temporarily resorted to, though I shall regret if it becomes necessary."

He did not wish to make any invidious comparison between the city and rural battalions, but he could not but think that if any reduction was to be made it ought not to be in the latter. Anyone acquainted with the material from which soldiers were made must be aware that the men obtained from the rural districts were better recruits than those got from the cities. Besides, when disturbances like that which occurred on the Grand Trunk took place, men belonging to the rural districts would be less likely to sympathise with the rioters than men from the cities. Major Lazier, in a letter to Colonel Worsley, said :

"A strong feeling of sympathy was expressed by many of the men for the men on strike, and while some positively refused to turn out, others, I have no doubt, kept out of the way to prevent being found or called upon. Non-commissioned officers and men were under arms, the most of whom were obtained from the country."

He observed remarks to the same effect in a memorandum of Colonel Straubenzie to headquarters. If this reduction had been made, he thought he could show how it might be made without disturbing the ground work of the whole system. He perfectly agreed with the Major-General when he said he would recommend that no reduction be made in the engineers, cavalry or artillery. It was difficult to keep those branches up to a proper state of efficiency, and they ought to be allowed a full course of drill. He saw that the engineers consisted of 13 officers and 222 men; the cavalry 131 officers and 1,799 men; the artillery 255 officers and 3,420 men, or a total in the three branches of 399 officers and 5,441 men. This number should perform the full quota of drill without any reduction whatever. The city battalions consisted of 116 companies—in round numbers, as at present constituted, 6,000 officers and men. He thought it would be a pity to disturb the city battalions if it possibly could be avoided. They had arrived at a high state of efficiency, and it would not be advisable to make any permanent change in their organization. The city battalion had undoubtedly many facilities and advantages for mustering and drilling over their fellow soldiers of the rural districts; but for the reasons he had assigned, if a reduction must be made, it should not be that the rural battalions alone were to be cut down. To prevent such a calamity, which would be most unpopular throughout the country, he proposed that the following system should be applied to the rural volunteers:—As he had already shown, there were of engineers, artillery, cavalry, and in the city corps a total of about 11,840 officers and men, the whole of whom should be retained. There were in all, according to the Militia Report, 34,702 officers and men on the muster rolls of the different corps, supposed to be efficient. This would give some 22,662 officers and men as belonging to the rural districts. If 20,000 men was to be the maximum number that could be drilled annually with the funds at the disposal of the Militia Department, and the 11,840 were retained as he proposed, then only 8,160, or slightly more than one-third, of the rural force could be called out for the annual drill; but even with so small a proportion they could preserve the framework of the force without any reduction, and could, he believed, bring them into a more efficient state than they were in at present. The proportion of officers to men in the Infantry force was one to fourteen, so that they had 1,618 officers in the rural battalions, and this number of officers and 6,542 men should be taken annually for drill to make up the total of 8,160 allowed for the country force. This number, as he had explained, with the 11,840 of city and other corps, made the 20,000 or total number to be drilled. The proportion of battalion staff officers was apparently slightly more than one-third, which would give 538 officers to the staff and leave 1,080 officers as company officers, or three officers per company, the required number for 360 companies. This would give 60 battalions of six companies each. He was aware some few battalions had as many as eight or even ten companies in each; but this number made a battalion too ponderous for active work. Six companies were sufficient for active service. The 6,542 men should be called out from the different companies, which would allow of 18 men per company being annually drilled. Of this number, six should be non-commissioned officers, who would turn out annually, only twelve of the number being privates. Twelve men per company might seem to any person not understanding the subject an absurdly small number to propose to form a company with, but twelve men per company was ample to form a rope or skeleton company with which all the principles of company and battalion drill could be taught the officers and non-commissioned officers and the flank men of sections. He ventured to say more than half the drill in the British service was performed in this manner. With twelve men per company there would be four men per company to spare to form small-arm squads, and, with this system, officers and non-commissioned officers would be able to devote all their time, while at drill, to drill alone, instead of having, as at present, to devote a large share of their time, while at camp, looking after the wants and comforts of their men. The large proportion of officers to men would not be an additional expense, as it must be remembered the men not only received their pay, which was certainly small enough, but they were a charge upon the country for rations, clothes, wear and tear of arms and accoutrements and expenditure of ammunition, all of which charges being computed made the private as great a charge upon the country as the officer. Now, with a force thus organized, he contended that we could maintain the thorough efficiency of the present force upon the present money grant. They would preserve the engineers, artillery, cavalry and city corps intact, they remaining upon their present footing, the only change made being in the system of drilling and mustering the rural battalions. Before proceeding to particulars of the method of drilling this rural force, he would say that, in all our different branches of the service, stricter rules should be applied to the qualification of officers. There was no difficulty in filling up the companies with good men if they only knew their officers to be qualified to command them. All staff officers should hold 1st class certificates, and all company officers 2nd class certificates, to be renewed every five years at the brigade camps. This should be an imperative rule, and officers not qualifying should make room for men willing and able to take their places. The volunteer force could never be in a proper condition unless the officers of the force, and, to a certain extent, the non-commissioned officers were themselves thoroughly efficient. For drilling this country force of 8,160 officers, non-commissioned officers and men, he would advise that in some part of every rural district, where a battalion existed, there should be an armoury, somewhat on the same principle as were established the head-quarter armouries in the cities. The armouries could there be taken proper care of. At present, as they who had any knowledge of the way in which the arms were kept were aware, the very large majority of the places where the arms were stored were totally unfit for the purpose; and, in consequence, a great deal of damage was done to Government property. Some such proposition as was made by the hon. member for Pontiac might be adopted, and the present armoury allowance granted to the captains of rural battalions, $40, would be a sufficient salary to secure a careful, efficient man to take full charge of all the arms and accoutrements, in a building properly erected for the purpose. Besides, this would effect a large saving in the travelling expenses now incurred by staff officers, who had to visit all these out-of-the-way places, where rifles were kept, to inspect them; but, if these officers had only to visit periodically such armouries, a better inspection would be possible; the duty would be performed more quickly, and travelling expenses would be very greatly reduced. He saw that the Deputy Adjutants-General recommended the appointment of an armourer to inspect annually all the rifles of the force, and make any necessary repairs. In this there would be another advantage,—as soon as the annual drill was performed the rifles and other stores were returned into the armoury, and then the caretaker could discover whether any damage was done them, and, if so, ascertain how it occurred. If this were due to carelessness, the amount necessary to repair the damage could be taken out of the pay due for drill. The saving under a system of this kind would be the saving of the pay, clothing, and rations of something over 14,000 men annually. Then too all the companies would be filled up; under the system followed some three years ago, 54 men were in each company, and he would propose that instead of the companies in the rural battalions being reduced they should be filled up to the old number of 54 per company. Every year 1,618 officers of rural battalions would be called out to drill, and six non-commissioned officers for 360 companies—in all, 2,160, making a total of 3,778 officers and non-commissioned officers who would be called out yearly for drill. He maintained that the whole efficiency of our volunteer and militia force depended on the knowledge which the officers mentioned possessed; he thought it was of very little moment how much the men knew, as they could be very easily taught if the officers were thoroughly acquainted with their duties. He doubted very much whether any one would say to-day or or even would have said when the volunteer force was so much better than it now was, as some pretended, that the officers and non-commissioned officers of the whole force were ever properly up to their work, but the number he had mentioned called out yearly for drill, and twelve men per company would make 4,320 in all called out. He would continue this system for four years, calling out a fresh batch of men each year, with the officers and non-commissioned officers, so that at the end of that time forty-eight men from each company would have been drilled, making a total of 21,000 and upwards of officers and men drilled. He would so arrange it that one-fifth of the whole force every five years would be able to engage. Under this system, in which one-fifth of the force would be brigaded annually, the Major-General would be able to visit every camp. Now, this was not possible for want of time. Then rural battalions would not need to be reduced at all, and the whole frame-work of the present organization would be maintained, and it would be a great pity if any reduction was to be made. It was very much easier to reduce the force than it would afterwards be to re-organize and fill it up again. He considered that the present musketry practice was a simple waste of ammunition. It did not do the slightest good. In the regular service it took three or four months for a man to learn his drill, and three weeks to go through a course to enable him to use his rifle, while volunteers here had eight days to go into camp. A certain number of rounds of ammunition was served out to the men, who were marched out in front of a target at which they fired a lot of expensive ammunition without possessing the slightest knowledge of the weapon they handled. Some other system might be adopted to teach the men to shoot. Additional assistance to this end might be given to District and Battalion Rifle Associations. Much might be done in this way. He saw in the report of Lieut.-Colonel Fletcher, the Deputy Adjutant-General, that in his district there were nine rifle associations carried on in an efficient manner, and out of this district came six out of the seven competitors who went to Wimbledon. He thought this would show what might be done by teaching men to shoot under some such system. Under the present arrangements, $40,000 was annually expended for ammunition, and this might all be saved. The Major-General reported that the reserve of ammunition was particularly small; that they had only 150 rounds each for each stand of rifles in the country, and this was at least one-half too little to keep, in view of the rapidity with which breech-loading arms could be fired. Taking this into account he thought that a great saving could be effected if instructions were given that no ammunition should be used at all. It had occurred to him very often that the manufacture of ammunition could be very easily carried on in this country at Quebec or in some other parts of the Dominion. It was a very simple thing to do; and arrangements could be easily made for the manufacture of small-arm ammunition in the winter season when labour was cheap. This would furnish work to some of our own people, and ammunition could be made as good and as cheaply as that which was imported.

Mr. BROUSE said our system was not accomplishing what was desired. Men were drilled for 8, 12, or 16 days and the good effected scarcely amounted to anything. He was satisfied not one out of fifteen of those who had drilled in his town still resided in that section of the country. They had gone to the United States. Volunteers were collected, when the order came to turn out, from the floating population, and he had known men to be brought from across the line in order to swell the numbers of companies, to return when they had their pay. This was three or four years ago. He did not think that the drill would be satisfactory until it was taught in our schools as was the case in Switzerland and Germany. Youths never forgot their drill, but men who learned their drill when advanced in years, forgot it in three or four years. The youth of the country could thus be drilled without the expenditure of $700,000 or $1,500,000. Drill was capable of being taught in the Normal Schools, and it would be a great advantage if the male population learned the rudiments of drill at school.

Mr. BOWELL said he must compliment the hon. member for Richmond for his practical speech on the subject. If the recommendations made by the hon. gentleman were acted upon, he was quite satisfied that the money now squandered on the force would be spent advantageously to the country. Too much theorizing and too little practical knowledge had been shown in the treatment of this matter. He had no sympathy with the sentiments of the hon. leader of the Left Centre (Mr. Mitchell). The existence of a proper military spirit tended more than anything else to nationalize a people. If the system of late pursued were continued, little difficulty would be found in reducing the force, as it would reduce itself. This was being very rapidly done at the present moment. The greatest dissatisfaction prevailed with regard to the present system. There had been no reduction until the present year with reference to the Department at headquarters, and for the outside staff the reduction amounted to some $9,000; but it had taken a great number of years and a great many recommendations from both members of the House and Adjutants-General to arrive at this point. He thought the House was entitled to further explanations as to the causes which had led to the selection of officers retained and dismissed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Vail) had made the Major-General solely responsible for recommending the dismissal of the oldest and most valued officers on the staff in different sections of the country. While officers who were in full vigour of health and quite capable of fulfilling their duties, and who had been in the force for ten or fifteen years, serving as such ever since Brigade Majors were appointed, had been dismissed, others who had only served as such for three or four months had been retained.

He would repeat what he had said before, that if it was desired to popularize this branch of the public service a different system would have to be pursued. If the present system was continued, there could be no doubt that both officers and men would become dissatisfied, and that, as the Major-General had pointed out in his report, demoralization would ensue. There was another point on which they had no explanations. When the matter was discussed last year, it was stated that the vacancies at Kingston were not to be filled, and that it was the intention of the Government to reduce that force as rapidly as possible, in accordance with the suggestions of the Major-General. But as soon as the House prorogued these offices were filled. One Brigade Major was not then really in the force, his brigade having been disbanded, and another gentleman, a regular, although he knew nothing of the volunteer system, was put in the position of Adjutant-General, and the old officers, men who had been years in the service, were sent adrift.

Mr. VAIL said the system pursued was but a continuation of the system inaugurated eight or ten years ago.

Mr. PLUMB: That is the old story.

Mr. VAIL said the mistake eight or ten years ago was in extending the system beyond what the country could afford. 20,000 or 25,000 men would be quite sufficient. The consequence was the men were drilled a shorter time than was necessary to make them familiar with the duties of a soldier. Camp drill was a popular and instructive drill, but it was useless to attempt to give all the men the requisite 16 or 20 days' drill out of the present appropriation. The true policy would, he thought, be to reduce the force to 20,000 or 25,000 men, but to do this precipitately would be an injury to the force. Before any change was made in the system, it should be well considered. It was important that the officers should be quite competent to perform their several duties. Camp drill would instruct both officers and men, but in rural districts it would take as much to pay the officers and non-commissioned officers, in accordance with their rank, if they were all drilled, as it now took to drill the whole force. It would be advisable to generally establish schools of infantry, for the instruction of the officers; but until there was an increased amount, the present system would have to be continued. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings, he (Mr. Vail) had given full explanations before, and the appointments were made entirely in accordance with the suggestions of the Major-General.

Mr. CARON enquired whether it was intended to serve out bushies.

Mr. VAIL: No.

Mr. CARON: Do the Government intend to serve out side-arms to the bandsmen of the rifle corps, according to regulations?

Mr. VAIL: They will be served out the same as before, and as they were entitled to.

Mr. CARON: But they were never served out.

Mr. VAIL: I am not exactly in a position to answer my hon. friend, but I presume there was good reason for not serving them out. If the bandsmen are really entitled to side-arms, I see no reason why they should not be served with them.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 62 to 65 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 66, drill pay and all other incidental expenses connected with the drill and training of the Militia, $155,000,

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) expressed a hope that the Government would see fit to give the rank and file something more than fifty cents a day for service.

Mr. MASSON remarked that the Minister of Militia had stated that the expenditure of the late Government on Militia was a million and half. That large expenditure occurred in one year only, and that was the one in which Sir George Cartier replenished the stores and replaced the Militia on a first-class footing.

Mr. PLUMB said the Government was at present practising that style of economy which would no doubt result in a reactionary movement, which would, in the end, involve a very heavy expenditure.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 67, contingencies and general service not otherwise provided for, including assistance to Artillery and Rifle Associations and bands of efficient Corps, $45,000,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he hoped the grant to the Wimbledon Team would not be reduced, especially this year, when not only Australia, but the Cape of Good Hope would also be represented. A great deal of interest was taken in the country in the doings of this team.

Mr. PLUMB referred to the dilapidated condition of the barracks at Niagara, and urged that something should be done to repair them.

Mr. CASEY said he wished to endorse, very strongly, the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Frontenac, in regard to the reduction of the grant to the Dominion Rifle Association for the purpose of sending a team to England. Nothing more economical, in the true interest of the Militia service, could be conceived than this grant. Nothing tended so much to keep up the esprit de corps of the service as rifle shooting, and nothing except that was now holding it together. If any sums were to be devoted to prizes for rifle shooting, he certainly thought this grant should be retained; no prize could be offered which would so strongly stimulate the young men as the prospect of getting on the Wimbledon Team. But there was another reason why the grant should be continued. The Canadian camp at Wimbledon attracted a great deal of attention, and had created a very favourable impression regarding Canada. The vote for this purpose was a small one in comparison with the economy which might be practiced in other branches of the service. If the hon. the Minister of Militia desired to economize, he might turn his attention to the waste in the stores and clothing. It would be a great mistake for the Government to drop this grant. The step would not only be unpopular with the Volunteers, but with all who took an interest in rifle shooting and our representation abroad. If the Government had come to a decision to abolish the grant, he would urge them to reconsider it, as they would lay themselves open to the charge of having on the ground of sentiment done something unpatriotic.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no doubt that a very large portion of the Volunteers were of a different opinion to his hon. friends from West Elgin and Frontenac. A number of hon. members connected with the force had a belief that the practice of rifle shooting would be much better promoted by encouraging local associations than by giving $7,000 to $10,000 to send a team to England. He had no doubt that the grant had done us some good by exciting curiosity as to Canada but, on the other hand, a very few riflemen indeed derived any immediate benefit from it. His own impression had been that a smaller sum distributed among the battalions, or perhaps larger associations than battalions, to stimulate rifle shooting, would accomplish more good. It was the intention of the Government to reduce, if not to abolish, the vote to the volunteer team, but they would be controlled to some extent by the general views of the volunteer force, which was not so unanimous in favour of the grant as his hon. friends seemed to think. The Government would consider the matter with such additional information as they had obtained, but one thing was quite certain, that it would be a reduced grant, if any. He thought it would be quite wrong to give the same amount as in former years, and whatever amount was granted it should be devoted to the hard work of the team, and to paying the actual expenses of the men rather than to make a fine appearance.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the amount of good derived from this vote was very limited, and he thought the amount should be spent at home in encouraging the use of the rifle, rather than being devoted to paying the expenses of a certain number of gentlemen who went to England. The country was suffering from financial depression, and he thought the money could be expended in more desirable ways.

Mr. CASEY said he thought that the hon. the Premier was mistaken in supposing that the money given by the Government was used for the purpose of making displays at Wimbledon. Any entertainments that had been given were at the expense of members of the team, and the grant was simply used for legitimate expenses. With regard to future expenditure, he might state that certain reforms had been made in the Dominion Rifle Association to satisfy those members who had been clamouring for economy. He quite agreed with the opinions of the hon. the First Minister in regard to aiding local associations, but he thought the small sum required for the Wimbledon team could be spared without interfering with such aid. Moreover, there was a certain position we should take as a Colony. Other British Colonies would be sending teams, and it would not conduce to our standing abroad if, after having inaugurated the Intercolonial competition, we should not send a team because of a desire to practice economy.

Mr. BROWN said there was no doubt the Wimbledon team did a certain amount of good in interesting people in Canada, but he hoped the local associations would not be lost sight of in providing for that team.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he strongly approved of the views expressed by the hon. the Premier. The privates were the best shots, and he was quite willing that $3,000 or $4,000 should be granted if they were the men who were to be picked out for the team.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolution 68 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 69, care and maintenance of military properties transferred from the Ordnance and the Imperial Government, including rents, $10,000,

In reply to Mr. PLUMB,

Mr. VAIL said it was quite impossible to keep all the buildings so transferred in good repair, as the expense would be too great.

Mr. PLUMB said that the buildings at Niagara were an eye-sore to the place. A very small sum would put them in a proper state of repair.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he wished to call attention to the fact that 10 or 11 acres of ground at the town of Chatham belonged to the Government. A portion of it had been sold to the county, and on it had been erected a registry office. The other portion was held by the Agricultural Society, for agricultural purposes, under a nominal lease. If no money was voted for the maintenance of this property, he thought that the Government might transfer it, as had been done with a portion of the Ordnance land in Ottawa, to the municipality, to be kept in a proper state of repair. The Government would thereby incur no expense, and the locality would be benefitted. It could nevertheless, as now, be used in case of emergency.

Mr. VAIL said that, if the town desired to obtain the property and would make application for it, and if it was not necessary for military purposes, it could be sold to the town, provided fair remuneration was given.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he had no doubt that the town of Chatham would be prepared to purchase it on the same terms as those on which the Ottawa property was disposed of.

Mr. MITCHELL said land had been conveyed to the Government in the town of Newcastle, by the county, for the erection of a drill shed. This had never been done, and consequently this land should be re-conveyed to the county.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 70, Pay, Maintenance and Equipment of "A" and "B" Batteries Garrison Artillery and Schools of Gunnery, Kingston and Quebec, $115,000 (reported April 12),

Mr. MITCHELL said it appeared the other night that the fuel in this regard cost more than the food. These Batteries cost an enormous sum, and the sum should be reduced, at all events, next year. This would give great satisfaction to the country.

Mr. VAIL said the statement that the fuel cost more than the food of the men, was incorrect. The men were only supplied with rations, a pound of beef and bread; the remainder they were obliged to furnish for themselves.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the hon. member for Chateauguay had first aroused his attention to the enormous expenditures connected with the Militia. When this vote was first introduced, the hon. gentleman pronounced it a vote establishing the principle of having a standing army in this country, and, if he (Mr. Mitchell) recollected aright, divided the House on the question. The hon. gentleman had certainly made a convert of him; and, as he presumed that the hon. member's views were unchanged, he was surprised that the hon. gentleman had not raised his voice against what he had declared to be detrimental to the interests of the country, and a continual charge on the revenue.

Mr. HOLTON said he avowed that he had not changed his opinion, but his hon. friends were moving in the direction of realizing the views he had advanced.

Mr. MITCHELL: Very slowly.

Mr. HOLTON said they moved too slowly, but still they were making progress, and he hoped that the result he desired would be achieved sooner or later, and rather sooner than later.

Mr. MITCHELL: But this item is increased $5,000.

Mr. HOLTON said he alluded to the entire Department. The expenditure was diminished.

Mr. MASSON asked if the hon. gentleman thought that the creation of a Military College was a step in that direction.

Mr. HOLTON said yes. Formerly the military schools were very inefficient and very costly; and the providing of a place where a real sound military education was given to a comparative few, was a step in the right direction.

Mr. MITCHELL said the vote for militia purposes had in reality been increased by about $29,000.

Mr. BOWELL said, the vote last year was $959,151, and this year it was $988,556, the increase being $29,405.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 71, 72 and 73 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 74, Mounted Police, North-West Territories, $306,356,

Mr. MASSON asked the hon. the Premier whether he was prepared to answer the question he had asked in Committee, viz., whether he had any information or any report upon the standing and discipline of the Mounted Police. His reason for asking the question was that the only report they had was old, and there was a rumour that the discipline was deficient. The Major-General remarked that the men took it upon themselves to write to the newspapers on the matter. This did not show a desirable state of affairs. He thought the force should be put under the control of the Militia Department. He hoped the force would be provided with side-arms.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They have them.

Mr. MASSON said he was glad of this, as side-arms were absolutely necessary, as had been proved by American experience in similar operations.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said Col. McLeod, the officer in command, had been so busy on account of the movements of the Sioux Indians on the border that he had not had time to prepare a report. The cost per head of the force was $900, but the American cavalry on Indian service cost $1,760 per head.

Mr. MASSON said he did not complain of the expense.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he was afraid, if the young men that were sent out from the cities and towns of Canada to join the Mounted Police in the North-West were called upon for any serious duty, they would not be able to perform it, as they had no instruction, and many of them did not even know how to take care of their horses, rifles, and accoutrements. They should all be sent to some depôt in the North-West where they could learn their duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was afraid the hon. gentleman had libelled the force. He had no doubt they were a very superior body of men, although one or two of them might not have been very well used; but, as a body, they had fully come up to the expectations of the Government. He was quite sure all the reports indicated that, under the late commandant, there was certainly not much success in maintaining discipline, but under Col. McLeod these causes of complaint had disappeared. Major Walsh was in Ottawa some time ago, and he had questioned him very particularly on various points connected with the force, and there was no indication of the ignorance which the hon. gentleman so much deplored.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK explained that he did not refer to the force already out there; they had done good service. But he spoke of the class of men that were now being forwarded. It was very desirable that they should be sent to some place where they could be taught their drill before being drafted into active service. He had no doubt that Col. McLeod would do all in his power to make the force efficient; and he was sure that that officer would be pleased to see the suggestion carried out.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions 75, 76, 77, 80, 81, 83 and 84 (reported April 13th) read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 85, improved approach to Culbute Canal, $10,000,

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) enquired whether the Government had come to any definite conclusion respecting the bridge leading to this canal. It was absolutely necessary that either a draw or a swing bridge should be built.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have directed the bridge to be removed.

Mr. WRIGHT: Without compensation to the municipality?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; no municipality has any power to build over a river.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. MILLS moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 120) To amend the Indian Act, 1876. He said he proposed to repeal the 16th section and amend the 17th and 69th sections. The 16th section provided for the punishment of trespassers, and went on to say that the Superintendent-General might fine and imprison parties trespassing on Indian lands, but it did not state how far they should be punished, or make any provision for their arraignment before a Stipendiary Magistrate or Justice of the Peace. He, therefore, repealed the section and added the words: "persons so trespassing shall, on conviction therefor, before any Stipendiary Magistrate or Justice of the Peace," &c., indicating the manner in which they were to be tried. The 69th section provided that sales made of presents given to Indians, without the authority of the Superintendent-General, should be void. This worked very well as far as the old Provinces were concerned, but in the North-West Territories, where property such as ploughs and harrows was given to Indians—say on the Saskatchewan—these were bought from them and brought back again; to say the sale was void was practically useless, because the Indians could not regain their property, and, consequently, no effect could be given to this provision in the law. Therefore, it was provided that the Superintendent-General, or anyone acting on his behalf, might appropriate this property, which would again be taken possession of by the Government, so as to prevent frauds being committed.

QUEBEC HARBOUR ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 105.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES said he was glad to see that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had agreed to strike out the clause which gave to the Harbour Commissioners power to change at will the tariff on vessels entering the port of Quebec. The House, as in the past, would alone have the right to arrange the tariff, and he hoped that it would take advantage of it to amend the present tariff, which, he was sorry to say, was far from giving satisfaction. By virtue of the 18th clause of the law of 1873, which was still in force, small craft and barges, from 25 to 100 tons, were obliged to pay $1 each time they entered the port of Quebec, while those over 100 and up to 250 had to pay $2. This was the clause in question:—

“On schooners and barges of from 25 to 100 tons, for each time the vessel uses the harbour of Quebec, one dollar, or on each vessel for the season, five dollars. On schooners and barges from 100 to 250 tons two dollars per trip or ten dollars per annum.”

Thus the owner of a vessel of 100 tons burthen had only $1 to pay, while the proprietor of a vessel whose tonnage exceeded that number, though but by a single ton, must pay double the rate just mentioned. This he considered very unjust, and he believed that the House would share his views and recognize the fact that it was but right to establish a more equitable relation as to the dues paid on such vessels as were of about the same tonnage. He also considered that the charges exacted from the owners of small steamboats were too high, and ought to be lowered. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries would perhaps say that if his amendment were adopted it would have the effect of considerably diminishing the revenues of the Harbour Commission. He did not doubt that this was a very important point, but he also thought that before thinking of increasing these revenues there was another more important matter to be done—to render justice to whom it was due. He would have greatly desired that vessels of 50 tons and up to 100 tons should be exempt from the payment of this charge, but as he saw that this was impossible he was prepared to accept the charge of $1 made on vessels of 100 tons. When exceeding this tonnage, he believed that the most equitable and satisfactory way of arranging the tariff would be to charge one cent per ton for each ton above 100; consequently, he would propose the following amendment which he hoped would be accepted:—

“That the 8th paragraph of the 18th clause be struck out and replaced by the following:—

“On schooners and barges of from 25 to 100 tons, for each time the vessel uses the harbour of Quebec, one dollar, or on each vessel, for the season, five dollars. On schooners and barges from 100 to 250 tons, one dollar for the first 100 tons, and one cent for each ton over 100 tons, or ten dollars per annum.”

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he could not accept the amendment.

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES gave notice that he would move it on the third reading of the Bill.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

SUPPLY—PACIFIC RAILWAY.

XII. PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS—
CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

78. Pacific Railway ..... $1,524,000

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, in moving the item concerning the Pacific Railway, it is but proper that I should say a few words regarding the present position of the undertaking, the principle or scheme upon which it has been conducted up to the present time, and the course which the Government propose to take for the future. I shall not, Sir, at all events not in the initiation of the discussion, refer to any of the party political considerations which have been necessarily associated with this project; but shall simply discuss it in its business aspects, and invite the co-operation of the House in the consideration of those matters which have yet to be dealt with in connection with the carrying out of the scheme for the building of this railway. I shall only refer to the original obligation entered into, in whatever spirit or as to whatever modifications it may be looked at by different minds, as one that is obligatory upon the country to the extent of our capacity for carrying that object practically into effect. The late Administration, in entering into the agreement for bringing British Columbia into the Confederation, had an express obligation as to the building of the railway across the continent from Lake Nipissing on the east to the Pacific Ocean on the west, within a specified number of years. When the present Administration acceded to power, they felt that this, like all treaty obligations, was one which imposed upon them certain duties of administration and government which they had no right to neglect, and that they were bound to carry the scheme practically into effect to the extent that I have indicated. The whole effort of the Administration, from that day to this, has been directed to the accomplishment of this object in the way that would seem to be most practical and most available, considering the difficulties to be encountered and the cost to be incurred. The difficulties were necessarily of a two-fold kind. One of the difficulties was contemplated by the proceedings of Parliament at the Session when this obligation was assumed. That difficulty was the one of cost, it being felt that, although Parliament at that time gave its assent to the project, it ought only to give that assent in a certain modified way, and this modification was embraced not in the usual express Parliamentary manner, but rather by a resolution which indicated the prevailing opinion of the public mind and the opinion which undoubtedly prevailed in this House at that time. Of course such an extra-parliamentary utterance as this was one to which all parties—the parties immediately concerned as belonging to British Columbia and parties on this side of the Columbia boundary—attached such a meaning as might suit their own particular views to the question of the original obligation and the manner of carrying that into effect. I have always looked upon that resolution as undoubtedly qualifying the original bargain morally, although legally it would have no practical effect in setting aside an express parliamentary stipulation, engaged in and arrived at by the consent of the three branches of the Government:—"Kings, Lords and Commons"; and, while this view had necessarily to be taken by the Government of the day, we never failed to express to the Government of British Columbia and to the Government of England, when we had occasion to address it, or to the public in general in our country and elsewhere, the view that we accepted as being embodied in that resolution. It will be remembered, Sir, that, at the time this obligation was entered into, I myself took a very strong view as to the course that was to be pursued. I believed that the course then pursued by the then Administration was one which could lead to no result of a practical kind; that it must inevitably fail; and that its failure must necessarily produce some new scheme, in order to give effect to our promises and engagements with British Columbia. I believed that the project of giving this undertaking to a merely speculative financial company who had no intention of becoming contractors, bond fide, but merely to use it as a stock-jobbing operation which might result in personal profit to themselves—I believed that this was a course which was not consistent with the proper manner of letting out great contracts of this kind, even if it should not be associated, as this was, with great political considerations fraught with much of great importance to the country, either of misery or of political disintegration, or with political considerations of other than a national character—in other words, of a party character. Taking that view of it, Sir, this Administration devoted itself, in the first place, to perfecting the measures for having a complete survey made of the territory which the line had to traverse. In the Act of 1874, known as the Pacific Railway Act, provision was taken for having the contracts executed in a certain way, which will be found embodied in that enactment. It was provided, in short, that the Government should avail itself of the provisions of the previous enactment to some extent, by having the work let as fast as the country was surveyed, with certain conditions governing the sale of lands to be given in part payment of a specific sum of money per mile, which conditions would be found expressed in that Act. That Bill, I may say, passed through Parliament with unanimous consent. It was quite evident, at the time that the change of Administration took place, that it was impossible to fulfil the engagement entered into; indeed, it might be said to have been broken before that time, inasmuch as the time had elapsed within which the surveys were to be completed and the work of actual construction commenced. We felt, nevertheless, that it would have been utter folly to begin the works of construction until we had a general plan perfected of the whole country, until it was fully explored, and that route adopted by the Government which would be to the greatest possible advantage, not merely to particular parts of Canada, but to the greatest possible advantage, looking at the line as a great interprovincial and international highway from the east to the ocean on the west, and to the public at large. I need not refer to the many difficulties which were encountered in prosecuting these surveys. We have been fortunate enough, within the last few days, to be able to present to the House a complete synopsis of the engineering work, and of the engineering difficulties and engineering results in Mr. Fleming's last report. The publication of this report, therefore, would relieve me from the necessity of referring to many matters which I would be bound otherwise to refer to for the information of the Committee before asking the consent of Parliament to the appropriation that is now in the Estimates. But, at the same time, it is impossible for me to avoid discussing, to some extent, the route itself and the engineering difficulties which were encountered, as well as the reasons which led the Government, acting on the advice of the engineers, to take the steps they did towards the work of construction. I have found myself on several occasions subjected to a great deal of adverse criticism upon statements made on previous occasions like the present about certain portions of the road; and I desire to guard myself, as I have done before, against being committed to any statement regarding particular localities made at the time upon the best information available of an official character. In reference to particular localities, to particular difficulties and to particular lines, it is quite evident that a Minister who has never been over the ground, who is simply the political head of the Department, can have no possible knowledge which would justify him in expressing an individual opinion, and it is, therefore, upon the opinion of the Engineers and their reports that all my utterances are based, so far as this particular branch of business is concerned. As to political considerations, of course, the Government are wholly responsible. As to the mode of carrying on the work, we are also wholly responsible. As to the course for the future, we are wholly responsible, and I don't desire for a moment to evade any criticism or any proposed amendment which may be offered on either of these branches of the subject. Our object in the first place was, as far as it was possible to do it, to carry the Province of British Columbia with us in our mode of prosecuting the undertaking. We thought it but right to endeavour to satisfy the people of that Province and to show that we were sincerely desirous of doing all that lay in our power to implement the engagement, however improvident, to the extent that our ability financially would enable us to do so. Acting in accordance with that view, we took an early occasion, after acceding to power, to communicate officially with the Government of British Columbia. The result of that communication was ultimately a compromise, which gave us an additional amount of time and other modifications to which I need not further refer at present, and some of which, owing to the action of Parliament, we found afterwards incapable of being carried out. We have, nevertheless, lost no time in prosecuting the work as far as we have had the power to prosecute it in those parts of the country where circumstances enabled us to do so in a manner which we felt we could justify to this House. It will be quite evident that, if any value is to be attached to the lands in the great North-West, we must have a ready access to those lands, and any step taken with a view to allow the entrance of contracting companies, of the public, and of immigrants into that country in advance of letting the main contract, was a step exceedingly to be desired, especially as the introduction of a large population into the prairie country would affect not merely the construction of the railway at a very early period, but would affect beneficially the general prosperity of the country. The Dominion owns these lands, and even if the lands were owned by some of the Provinces, it would not lessen the benefit to be derived from having a large population thrown in where there is no population at present. Special efforts were therefore directed at an early day to open communication as speedily as possible between the waters of the eastern system of lakes and the western system; in other words, between Winnipeg Basin and Lake Superior. The Government decided that it would be a waste of public money at present to prosecute the construction of this railway from the western end of Lake Superior and Lake Nipissing, through a country totally uninhabited, a country, so far as we know, almost all unfit for habitation. I do not say that there may not be some tracts of land which may sustain human life in various parts of that vast rocky wilderness, but I do say that the general characteristic of the country bordering Lake Superior and advancing very nearly to the borders of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay is unfavourable. That seemed to be a portion of work which might fairly stand until the circumstances of the country or some new developments regarding that territory would make it advisable for the Dominion to prosecute the work in that particular quarter. On the other hand, it was exceedingly desirable, if we were to make as direct a line as possible at present between Lake Superior and the western country, that a line should be built upon a route which would be the best for an all-through railway, as rapidly as that could be achieved, and that in the mean time it would be desirable to have direct communication with the Eastern Provinces through the Province of Quebec, up the Ottawa Valley to Georgian Bay; so that, taking land and water together, the shortest possible line from ocean to ocean would be achieved by passing up in a direct line from the seaports on the St. Lawrence, which are connected now with seaports on the Atlantic by the Intercolonial Railway, to the nearest port of Georgian Bay, whence the water would be used all the way to Fort William. Acting upon this general scheme, which had, it will be observed, for its object and intention to utilise the lakes and rivers lying contiguous to the main line of railway, until such time as the increased financial power of the Dominion, or the increased local necessities of the districts would justify the Government in having even those barren parts traversed also by a railway system, we therefore obtained the assent of Parliament to this scheme, and we commenced surveying from the lakes—I need not say we commenced, for the surveys were commenced west of Lake Superior before we succeeded to office. At that time, it was supposed that the basin of the Nepigon River, known as Nepigon Bay, would probably be the nearest point on Lake Superior from which to start the line, with the intention in the future that, instead of passing with the main line to the north of Lake Superior, it should turn sharply to the south-west after it turned the corner of Long Lake, ascending by a long sweep to Lake Ellen, the little lake behind Nepigon Lake, and Nepigon Bay on Superior, and from that point take the shortest line available to Keewatin, or Rat Portage, as they formerly called it. The engineering difficulties, however, from the mouth of the Nepigon, and the fact, which was also ascertained, that Nepigon Bay would be late in opening in the spring, and probably earlier in closing with the ice, and also the fact that steamers from the east, traversing Lake Superior by a direct route would arrive very nearly as soon at Thunder Bay as at Nepigon Bay, and the further fact that we found a country much easier of access, and much more easily surveyed, where the work would be very light comparatively, led us to abandon the Nepigon line, and to make, at present, the start from Fort William on the Kaministiquia, which falls into Thunder Bay. I may say that we have some reason to believe that we will find a favourable line from the immediate vicinity of the south side of Dog Lake, situated from 20 to 30 miles from Fort William; as near as we can ascertain at present, it will be a comparatively easy line from that point to Nepigon, where it is thought advisable to have the continuation made eastward.

Mr. TUPPER: How far is that from Thunder Bay?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said it was between 20 and 30 miles. We are not sure of the precise distance. I may say that, between the line at present being constructed and Nepigon Bay, we have only made an exploratory survey, and that, exploratory survey has had such results as to lead us to believe that there will be no difficulty experienced in obtaining a very favourable line in that quarter. The line that was originally projected and the instrumental survey from Nepigon Bay ascending the Sturgeon River, a somewhat tortuous stream, passes through an extremely rocky country, and showed us that the country there was very difficult for railway building; on the other hand, we found that the country from Thunder Bay westward was extremely favourable. It was first surveyed by Mr. Murdock, who was sent there early in October, I think in 1873, and was continued afterwards by Mr. Hazlewood. The original location made by Mr. Murdock was set aside by the Chief Engineer afterwards, as he found that the country had not been properly examined; but Mr. Hazlewood succeeded in locating a much more favourable line, shorter in distance and very much cheaper in construction, and with easier grades. Now, Sir, acting on the principle I have indicated as governing the Government, contracts were let with the assent of this House between Thunder Bay and Selkirk on Red River, and it would be well, perhaps, to give, in a short summary way, the exact results of the contracts that were let in that quarter. It may be premised that, except at the two ends, there were no settlements anywhere; that country was a complete wilderness. Although the line traverses considerable tracts of tolerably good timber land, pine, red and white—a great deal of which has been destroyed by fire—and although there are occasionally small parcels of land, yet the country generally is of a very rough character, except close to Thunder Bay, in the valley of the Kaministiquia, where there is a considerable quantity of excellent or passable land; some of it is very good and some is of a fair character. It is estimated by various writers at from 20,000 to 30,000 acres of the best land; there is, of course, very much more than that of the same character of land in the counties of Lanark, Pontiac and Ottawa, on the river here; and land which will be available, no doubt, for settlement, to a very much greater extent than is at present supposed. The first contract that was let was to reach the neighbourhood of Lake Shebandowan.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

The Chief Engineer then expressed his belief that the best route would be found to traverse the north side of Lac des Mille Lacs. The line was afterwards turned slightly to the northward, after passing Sunshine Creek, in order to reach the north shore of the lake. The first contract was let for 45 miles, that is No. 13, and the total amount was a little over $400,000 for the 45 miles. This, however, did not embrace the track-laying, ballasting or the rails, but simply the grading and bridging and making everything ready for the track-laying. From the point at which the divergence was made to Thunder Bay, in consequence of the change to the north side of Lac des Mille Lacs, the distance was about thirty miles; so that we only took two-thirds of that contract as the distance upon which we would carry out the original plan. I estimate that the 30 miles, at two-thirds of the amount, would make altogether for contract No. 13 a sum of $270,793. Contract No. 25 overlapped this one. The contractors had to do the ballasting and track-laying upon Sec. 13, and to carry the railroad further west a distance of eighty-six miles; that is, they had eighty-six miles of complete railway to build including the track-laying and ballasting, and they had the track-laying and ballasting for the thirty miles embraced in contract No. 13. The contract was taken for the sum of $1,037,000; that, therefore, makes 116 miles of railway from Lake Superior westward, without any break, at a cost of $1,307,793.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: That is without the road-bed?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It includes track-laying and ballasting.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: But not the rails?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not the rails; I will come to that presently. Section No. 14 is the one beginning at Selkirk on the Red River and passing in as direct a line as possible towards Keewatin or Rat Portage. The distance or length, I should say, of this contract was seventy-seven miles, and that also was purely for grading and brid-ing and making the road ready for tracklaying and ballasting, the sum being $402,950. Section No. 15, which was let comparatively recently, was for the building of 35½ miles between contract No. 14 and Keewatin, thus completing the distance between Winnipeg River and Red River,

Mr. TUPPER: That is at Cross Lake?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Keewatin is at the crossing of Winnipeg River.

Mr. TUPPER: What is the other point?

Mr. MACKENZIE: From Selkirk to Red River, and Keewatin on Winnipeg River.

Mr. TUPPER: The 77 miles run eastward?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. TUPPER: What is the point?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We call it Cross Lake.

Mr. TUPPER: These 35 miles run from—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Cross Lake eastward. That completes the distance of 112½ miles between the two systems of water.

Mr. TUPPER: Across to Keewatin?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, across to Keewatin. Contract No. 15 embraces not only the construction of the 35½ miles, but also the track-laying and ballasting on the 77 miles immediately eastward of it, so that when this contract is completed the whole 112½ miles will be ready for traffic between Selkirk and Winnipeg River. The total sum embraced in these four contracts amounts to—

Mr. TUPPER: You did not give us the sum for the 35 miles.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no. I should say that the sum for Section 14 was $1,591,825. This will make the total amount of the four contracts which I have briefly described, $3,302,568. To this has to be added 228½ miles of steel rails, 90 tons to the mile, at a cost upon the ground of $1,385,775; and we take the estimated cost of engineering at $1,500 per mile on this quarter, and add therefor $342,750. I assume that the cost of rolling stock, to stock it very fairly for quite a heavy traffic, would be $2,000 per mile. This would add $457,000 to the estimate that I have made. The probable amount required for the right of way where the lands are owned, chiefly at Fort William, on Red River, we have put at $65,000, and an allowance for ordinary station buildings on that distance of road of $50,000. This would make the entire cost of 228½ miles $5,603,093, or an average cost per mile of about $24,521. The Committee will, no doubt, be anxious to know whether this is a fair estimated cost of the balance of the road yet to be built between the extreme western point of the eastern contract and the extreme eastern point of the western contract. I am not able to say that the average cost of what we have done would be sufficient for the remaining part. I think not. It is scarcely possible that it could be so, because it is more remote from supplies, more difficult of access, as a matter of course. We have reason to know that some thirty or forty miles of this distance will be of a pretty heavy character—that is, the thirty or forty miles nearest to the Winnipeg River. The total distance yet to be built is 183 miles. It may be perhaps shortened by a mile or two, but it is not likely to be lengthened in any possible way. The curvatures are not excessive anywhere, nor are the grades excessive anywhere. But I do not refer to that particularly, as the Committee will find, in the report that has been made, the extent of the high grades and the low grades and the exact curvature that is to be overcome at various points. In no place is there anything so serious in the way of curvature as there is on almost any of our railroads in the older districts of the country, nor are there any grades that so far exceed 1 in 100 or 52:80 ft. per mile. The highest grade on the Intercolonial, I think, is about 64 ft., or 12 feet to the mile more than the highest grades to be overcome in this district. The grades and curves will be found on page 80 of the report, from which it will be seen that the shortest curve we have is a radius of 1,433 feet; and, in order that a comparison may be instituted between the curves upon this line and those upon older lines, I may say that some of the curves near Halifax on the Intercolonial are on a radius of a little less than 700 feet—that being a very sharp turn indeed, and far in excess of anything we have to encounter here. But I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to refer to the page of the report for the particulars regarding the radius and ascent per mile than for me to attempt to give it in a form which would be put down rather inaccurately in any report. Those particulars will be found in extenso in the report of the Engineer, and will cover the ground more satisfactorily than I could do. After referring for a moment to the comparative cost of other lines I shall pass to another branch of the subject. It is known now that the actual cost of the Intercolonial Railway will be as nearly as may be, embracing all the rolling stock which is essential to its working, $48,000 per mile, or, as near as can be, double the cost of the 228½ miles which we have under contract. There is this, however, to be said regarding the structures on the Intercolonial. The bridges are somewhat extensive and are of the very best description. With that exception, the road built in the West as part of the Pacific Railroad will, in every respect, be equal. The steel rails are practically of the same kind, although on the average in greater length, and if anything somewhat better than the original rails obtained for the Intercolonial Railway. It was thought advisable in letting these contracts to venture upon expensive permanent works of construction, the object being in the first place to get into the country as speedily as possible, as the letting the contracts for the whole line must be determined to some extent by the facilities to be obtained in getting easy access to the prairie country, which must be the seat of a large population, and where the lands must be more or less valuable.

Mr. TUPPER: I want to know if I am accurate in understanding the hon. gentleman as saying that, with the exception of the bridges on the Intercolonial Railway being more expensive and numerous, the general character of the country is about the same, as far as regards the construction of a railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The road will be about the same.

Mr. TUPPER: That is the road-bed of the Pacific Railway will be equally as good as that on the Intercolonial?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. TUPPER: You don't refer to the character of the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; I may say there have been no very serious bridging obstacles to be overcome. There are a great many water-courses, but they are of small size, except the Red River at Selkirk, and the Winnipeg River at Keewatin. These are the only formidable bridges that are being built, and neither of them are embraced in the present contract, I may say. I was proceeding to say, with reference to the general plan, that I had formerly stated to the House, that the plan of the Government was this: To prosecute the surveys as fast as possible over the whole territory to be traversed, but not to wait until the surveys were completed everywhere before doing any work of construction anywhere. It was acting upon this view that we sought the assent of Parliament to let the four contracts I have mentioned. The survey has now been completed all the way to Bute Inlet and also to Dean Inlet. And it is proposed during the present season to complete the surveys, already partially made, from Tête Jaune Cache to the mouth of the Fraser River, at Burrard Inlet. Until that is completed, which we hope will be done in the course of the summer, it is not intended that the Government shall definitely fix upon a point where the Pacific Ocean shall be reached. I shall not deal very extensively with the difficulties encountered in reaching the Pacific Ocean on the several routes. I will merely say in brief that the northern routes seem to be the best, as hon. gentlemen will find if they look at Mr. Fleming's report, as to distance for the Asiatic trade, if that is looked on at all as an element to be considered. The route by Dean Inlet is about the same as that by Burrard Inlet in length, or fifty miles less than the route to the head of Bute Inlet, with this advantage, that you reach Dean Inlet much easier from the sea than is possible to be done by Bute Inlet. It will be observed, from the reports of the naval authorities, that they consider the only possible route to the ocean from the head of Bute Inlet will be through the Gulf of Georgia and the straits of San Juan.

Mr. DECOSMOS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know there is another way to get to the ocean, and I know that one of the authorities, but only one of those who have been invited to express an opinion, says that a passage can be found to the northward. But, assuming the bulk of the naval authorities to be correct, it will be found at Bute Inlet. From the head of Bute Inlet a vessel must sail all the way to opposite Burrard Inlet before the voyage to the open sea would be any more advanced than it would be at Burrard Inlet by the southward route. In other words, the distance is much further from Bute Inlet than from Burrard Inlet to the ocean. Besides, there are 52 miles additional of railway to build. On the other hand, it is tolerably evident that climatic difficulties will interfere with some of the northern routes. When Mr. Gamsby examined the country immediately bordering on the head of Gardner Channel, he found that the average depth of snow at that quarter was 28 feet, and he was told by some of the Hudson Bay people that this was one or two feet less than usual. There is no doubt, I think, but what Gardner Inlet would be seriously incommoded by ice during the winter, and in Dean Inlet also, during most of the season. We have no reason to believe that there is much ice to be found in the winter season in Bute Inlet, and in Burrard Inlet there is no ice at all. The only other points, southward or northward, which might be looked to ultimately as a fair terminus would be at Port Essington, or at Howe's Sound, near Burrard Inlet. Port Essington is still further north, indeed further north than any of the other points, while access can be had very readily to the open sea—and for the Asiatic trade, undoubtedly the northern routes are the most favourable as to the mere distance of mileage. But it is fair to say, in reference to these northern routes, that the distance to the Asiatic coast depends practically upon the ocean currents, which I had no means of ascertaining the strength or direction of in that particular quarter. In other words, an ocean current might make a distance to the Straits of San Juan quite as favourable as the distance would be to a northern point, although the mileage might be much longer. Upon that particular matter we have still to obtain some information which will be utilized before any further step is taken in deciding upon the point to be reached. In favour of Burrard Inlet there is this much to be said, that the works of construction could commence at Yale, the river being navigable for the whole or greater part of the season for a certain class of vessels, and a communication could therefore be had with that point without any serious difficulty. This would enable us to strike a line to that point, which saves nearly 150 miles, as compared with reaching the head of Bute Inlet.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Please explain how it is navigable the whole season.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I mean steamers could ascend the river.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Some cannot.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I understand they can all ascend. I speak as to particular localities, as I have already indicated, subject always to correction, because I depend wholly on information from others. At all events, for the greater part of the year it would be accessible on the lowest parts of the river, and the whole of the river for the remainder of the year. There is no doubt that the bulk of the population of the mainland of British Columbia is settled in the Fraser Valley, and materials could be obtained cheaper there than on the northern routes, and that construction would be, therefore, a certain percentage less on that than on the other routes. On the other hand the terminus at Burrard Inlet is very near the United States frontier, and for the distance of some 100 miles lies parallel to that frontier within a comparatively short distance. I don't look upon that myself as an insuperable objection; but, while I don't consider it an insuperable objection at all, I think it would be desirable if we could obtain a route for our principal railway as near as possible through the centre of the country. That would be productive of more local, if not more general, benefit. That, however, I merely mention in passing as to the general results of the examinations of the country during the last few years. We know we have a practicable route to Dean Inlet, and we know we have a practicable route to Bute Inlet; at both places we have difficulties to encounter such as I have indicated. The grades on both these routes, as will be found on reference to Mr. Fleming's report, will be pretty high towards the ocean, in passing through the Cascade Range—ranging from 80 feet to 110 feet per mile—while on the Fraser River route the grades will all be easy. There need be none there, I am assured, in excess of 52.80 feet per mile, one foot to the hundred. On the other hand, the works are considerably heavier on the Fraser route for some distance than on any of the other routes; and, although the distance is shorter, the cost will be somewhat greater, the excess being caused by the extra work on the canyons of the Fraser. At the same time, if a safer anchorage, a safer ocean port is reached, one open at all seasons, and if the distance is less, the saving in freight and rates of passage for all time will be very considerable; and the saving on easier grades will also be very great. That, however, we will know more about when the coming season's operations are finished. I now propose to refer to the general plan proposed to be pursued when the contracts for the eastern end were undertaken. The Railway Act of 1874 provides that 20,000 acres of land should be given absolutely as part consideration for the contract, and $10,000 per mile of actual cash—the land to be subject to certain regulations as to two-thirds of it which are provided for in the Act—and that tenderers should be invited to state the additional sum, if any, upon which a guarantee of 4 per cent. should be given by the Dominion for 25 years afterwards. It was proposed, or rather, I should say, it was intended, that the whole expenditure upon the contracts now being executed should be charged against the subsidy of $10,000 per mile to any parties who took the contract from Lake Superior to the ocean, and that the money should in this way be replaced, they retaining possession of that as part of their own contract, and paying back the Government by having this charged to their cash subsidy. I mentioned last year, in introducing this item to the Committee of Supply that we had then advertised or proposed to advertise—I forget which—in English and Canadian papers, that we hoped, about January, 1877, to be able to advertise for tenders and to supply complete profiles of the line.

Mr. TUPPER: At what time was that advertisement published?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well I am not absolutely certain, but it was very early in the summer.

Mr. TUPPER: Early in July?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think so. I think quite early in July, or earlier. I think it must have been in June. At all events, we desired to send that advertisement to the public in order that it might invite intending contractors to visit the country for themselves. I was personally satisfied that an examination of the prairie countries, if not the country east of the prairies to Lake Superior, would show to intending contractors, in the first place, that there was a large quantity of good land, and, in the second place, that the physical difficulties to be overcome were not so serious as people might reasonably anticipate to exist in the centre of the Continent. I do not think the advertisement produced very much of that particular result. Some parties, I believe, have visited the country; the agents of some English companies have visited Ottawa; some have visited the agency of the Government in London, with a view to examine the plans and profiles, and the Railway Act under which the contracts will be let; but the season was an unfavourable one in consequence of the difficulties attending railway enterprise all through the world, and can perhaps, be fairly considered as one not very fortunate for issuing or proposing the prospectus of a huge enterprise like this, in a comparatively unknown country, or, I might say, a wholly unknown country. The Government were not able, as I stated, to have the profiles all ready in January. They were, however, despatched in sections as soon as they could be completed, from the railway office to London. They have been on exhibition in the railway office here for many months, and the whole of the profile from Lake Superior to the Western Ocean is, I presume, either completed or very near it, at the present moment; that is, taking the two routes already completed through British Columbia. The Government propose, as soon as these are entirely completed, to have advertisements issued calling for offers, giving ample time, so that tenders that are received may be received shortly before the opening of Parliament at its next Session, in order that Parliament may have an opportunity of deciding upon whatever scheme may be then proposed by the Government under the offers to be received.

Mr. TUPPER: Can the hon. the Premier, in this connection, give any estimate—approximate, of course—of the cost of the remaining section from Red River westward? The profiles being ready, it would be interesting to know if an approximate estimate could be given of the cost westward through the prairie country and the Cascade Range.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman must remember that any statement made by me, as the head of the Department of Public Works, might attract undue attention, and I do not think, therefore, it would be wise or prudent for me to make any statement of that kind. I may say, however, that the branch from Winnipeg to Pembina was graded completely, except building a bridge over the Rousseau River, at a cost of something over $3,000 per mile.

Mr. TUPPER: How many miles?

Mr. MACKENZIE: About 65. The cost was not more than $3,500 a mile, and I have no doubt the balance of that branch, if we should see fit to build it, from Winnipeg to the crossing at Selkirk will be built at a little less, or no more in any case.

Mr. TUPPER: The balance will be how long?

Mr. MACKENZIE: About 22 miles, I think, from Winnipeg to the junction with the main line.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Is it the intention of the Government to call for tenders to build the line west from Selkirk, or do they propose to build it as a Dominion public work?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will call for tenders under the Act, which the hon. gentleman can examine at his leisure. I think tenders might be accepted and considered in almost any shape he might choose to put them, but we will ask for tenders under the provisions of the Act.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Ask for tenders both ways.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That might be, but that is a point we have not considered at present. Oh, yes, the hon. gentleman was asking me about the cost. I have merely to mention a well-ascertained fact with relation to that, and to say that a considerable portion of the line west of this is of a very favourable kind for the construction of a railway. There are some difficulties—as will be found by reference to the report—even in the best part of the prairie country. If hon. gentlemen will refer, for instance, to page 45, they will find that there is a very large number of what is known as coulees, or dry ravines of a very extraordinary character. Two of these call for heavy works; the Grizzly Bear Coulee, situated 668 miles west of Selkirk, has a depth of 160 feet below the ordinary prairie level, and a width of about 1,400 feet; and Buffalo Coulee, situated 690 miles west of Selkirk, is 100 feet in depth and about 1,400 feet in width. There are three others, averaging 390 feet in width and 45 feet in depth. On the other hand, it will be seen on the same page that the bridging is, on the whole, extremely favourable for such districts, there being on Red River four spans, of 400 feet each, and 42 feet in height above the water, a very easy bridge compared with those on some railways. On the South Saskatchewan there are five spans, of 200 feet each, and 90 feet above the level of the water. At Battle River there are four, of 100 feet each, and 60 feet in height; and on the North Saskatchewan there are five spans, of 200 feet each, and 110 feet in height. The other rivers to be crossed are the Pembina, the McLeod, the Athabaska, and the Assiniboine—not the Eastern Assiniboine, but the Assiniboine in the vicinity of Leather Pass and Snare River,—making altogether nine bridges, none of which can be considered very formidable.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is that near the mountains?

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is wholly in the prairie country. I allude to it to indicate that, although it is a prairie country, it is not free from certain difficulties, and that for a considerable distance east of the Rocky Mountains the country is very rough. It is woody and swampy, and somewhat rough in its profile also, especially in the neighbourhood of the Athabaska River where we have had to follow the windings of the river to skirt the edge of the mountain and get into the pass. The difficulties in which we will be there involved seem to be a little more serious than was at first supposed, although not one of them can be considered very difficult at all. We propose, therefore, as I have stated, or was proceeding to state, when the hon. gentleman behind me asked the question—as soon as the engineers report themselves in a position to give us complete information—to issue notices, which have to be carefully prepared, for tenders, and in which we propose to state explicitly what we desire. There are parties who have been entertaining peculiar views as to railway contracts who have communicated with us directly and indirectly, and who evidently desire to be allowed to send in tenders on some plan of their own.

Of course, it would not be well to discourage anything of that sort, although we will provide for nothing but what is provided for in the Act in our tenders. I thought it well, early in the summer, in order to procure for intending contractors a compendium of information, as it would be difficult for any contractors to give time to the searching up of books of travel and information of all kinds respecting the country, to publish a volume containing a summary of all the information that could be obtained. This volume has been sent to London and copies of it will be placed at the disposal of those who intend to tender for the work. It gives a description of all the Northwest country as closely as we could give it—by means of extracts from the writings of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who first, at all events—if he did not discover it—explored the Peace River section, and from the works of all other writers from that time down to the present time, private and official, embracing all the information we possess concerning the geological formation and the flora and the fauna of that country. This volume, of course, will enable parties who do not choose to visit the country to get a tolerably fair idea of what it is, and what value might fairly be attached to the land which they would become possessors of if they became contractors. With regard to the land which we own by the terms of union in British Columbia, I am afraid that no great value can be attached to the greater portion of it. It depends to some extent on the route to be taken. There is one in which, following the Fraser Valley route at the distance of perhaps half way between Tête Jaune Cache and the sea, we come across a coal bed, the only one I know of in the interior. Passing down the Fraser River from Fort George by the northern route, there is a considerable quantity of lignite, which might be made available for economic purposes, but it will never be so servicable, of course, as true coal, even if it could be used at all. Various parts are claimed to possess excellent timber for railway construction, and probably on all the routes there will be found sufficient for all, these purposes; and whatever route we take in British Columbia there will be a considerable amount of bridging and difficult work to perform. That is inseparable from the general topographical features of the country. I think it is well now to pause before making any further remarks that may be found necessary by the Committee or by any member of the Committee in the way of giving such information as I have in my possession in reply to remarks that may be made. The single object, as I stated, which the Government have in view, is to carry on as far as possible the obligations entered into, consistently with due provision for guarding the interests of the rest of the country. It will be quite apparent to any one that it is a most alarming undertaking for this country to get deeply in debt for the prosecution of this work, which for many, many years to come can yield not only no profitable results, but also must of necessity be a greater or less burden in its maintenance on the rest of the country. I do not think that the Government would be justified in proposing to Parliament any scheme which would involve an immense amount of debt, as the inevitable inheritance of the scheme. Everything, therefore, that is proposed to be done must be subject to the condition which this House attached to the vote in Supply last Session: that it shall not be considered as binding the country to increase the existing rate of taxation. I have no doubt, myself, that a very large proportion of the road can be built if any substantial value is attached to the land, and I have no doubt, myself, whatever, of the desirability of obtaining the construction of the road, and I have a firm conviction in my mind, which I have often given expression to, that it would be a most dangerous thing for this country to launch into an immense amount of debt even to secure the construction of this road. I shall not enlarge upon that point, as our views have been already sufficiently expressed; but the Government determined last Session to adhere to the expression of the views of Parliament as given in the total vote in Supply for this particular purpose. On the other hand, I think that Parliament and the Government and all parties should exert themselves as far as possible in doing everything that is reasonable and just and fair to carry out the obligations which were intended to be carried out, and if that can be done consistently, with the proviso that has been inserted in all our Acts, and which has been repeatedly reiterated in Parliament as one of the conditions to be observed, it will, of course, be a great public benefit and good, but we must always act consistently with the means which we have at our disposal, and do nothing that will prevent us maintaining the financial honour and credit of the Dominion at a future time.

Mr. MASSON: Will the hon. gentleman, before he resumes his seat, give us explanations about the most important point in question; this relates to the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway, and to the surveys which must have taken place or which probably will take place on the portion of the line to be built in the future between Fort William, passing by Nepigon and Deep River, to the terminus of the eastern end of the Pacific Railway?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have had no new surveys east of Nepigon, except an exploratory one in as direct a line as possible from the proposed crossing of Red River; 40 miles of that distance are yet to be traversed. But I may say that we have had, in the first place, a location survey—an instrumental survey—for 120 miles east of Nepigon, chiefly following the lake shore. That survey shows a somewhat difficult country, but a practicable one. From that point, leaving the lake at Pic River and taking almost a direct line to the crossing of French River, the country has been pretty well examined. There is no serious difficulty until you reach the neighbourhood of the Michipicotin River, or its affluents. It will be observed by those who know anything of the country, that the height of land is very close to Lake Superior at that point, which indicates a rapid descent of the Michipicotin and its affluents into the lake. The result is the line is very rough where the line would traverse that particular part, perhaps the most difficult part east of Lake Nepigon. From that point eastward the country is fair; and from French River westward there is no serious difficulty for the distance that has been examined. I think, from the head of the Thessalon River eastwards, some 45 miles of which we were unable to go over last year, that part is not expected to be very serious. This is, practically, all the information I can give about the district east of the Nepigon. I have stated already that, from Nepigon to the line near Dog Lake, the country is supposed to be tolerably fair. Mr. Bell walked over it, and he reports it very fair. With regard to the east of the French River, the Georgian Bay Branch, the surveys partly done by Mr. Foster, the contractor, have been completed by one of the engineers, but his report has not yet been presented. But that section has been surveyed sufficiently well to know the general character of the country, and the various gradients of the line.

Mr. TUPPER: Was there any response to the advertising for tenders?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have not asked for tenders. We have to decide upon other matters—the navigation of French River, and the exact point of the crossing; and, as the contract was annulled, we thought we would be in a better position after a complete survey. There has not been time to get exact knowledge, and I am now merely giving general results.

Mr. MASSON: For a year or two up to the present moment we have had an item of $1,000,000 in the Estimates for the Georgian Bay Branch, which is taken off this year. The hon. gentleman knows that, in certain parts of the Dominion, there is great anxiety as to the policy of the Government in regard to this branch; and I would like to know if the evidence is of such a character as to place the Government in a position to tell the House whether it will be proceeded with or not. That is the point I wish to arrive at.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have already stated what our general policy is, and that embraced the railway in the Ottawa Valley. Our policy has not at all changed.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. TUPPER: There is one point I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to now, and that is in relation to the surveys of the coming summer. The hon. gentleman told us that he proposed to continue the exploration of the Fraser, with a view to settling the question whether the line should go to Bute Inlet or some port in that neighbourhood, or to Burrard Inlet. I did not quite understand the policy of the Government in that respect, because the practicability of the line in that direction had already been definitely settled. But, although the work is known to be heavy, the survey has not proceeded to a point to enable estimates to be submitted with any accuracy. The hon. gentleman called attention to a serious difficulty which has been raised, and that is the proximity to our southern frontier; and it is, no doubt, a question of great political importance. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, in connection with some other statements which he made, he proposes to settle that question, and put the line under contract, with the assent of Parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Certainly not. I think I stated that we hoped to have the tenders submitted to Parliament next Session.

Mr. TUPPER: I do not mean to put the line under contract without submitting tenders, but to submit the subject for the approval of Parliament, or to enter into contracts without the question of the road being definitely settled by the Government. I take it that matter will remain open so that it could be fully considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That precise point the Government have not considered.

Mr. TUPPER: It is a serious one.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know it is a serious one; and it will be considered seriously. We may not ask assent to the precise location of the line. The late Administration chose to do that by Order in Council.

Mr. TUPPER: Yes; and we have been reminded of it since.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I simply pointed out the fact that it is quite possible to do that; but whether it is advisable is another matter.

Mr. TUPPER: There is one other matter to which I wish to call attention. The very greatest importance is, I think, to be attached to the necessity of securing a line through the most painful section of the country to be settled. I have been informed, and have reason to believe, that for something like 500 miles from Edmonton to Fort George along the the proposed road the country is very unfavourable for settlement. I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to that point at this moment, because, from a report made by Mr. Silliman and by the general exploratory survey of the country to the north of that, there is reason to believe that a line may be found from Edmonton, by the Pine Pass, to something like the same point, running through what is called the Ominica country. This is a remarkable country, exceedingly fertile, and one of the most magnificent grazing countries in the world, and richer, probably, in mineral resources than any other portion along the line, it containing also valuable deposits of coal and silver. I would suggest that surveys be made over this territory, as it seems to me it could be done at very little expense and with the loss of very little time.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am glad to hear these cheers about the country from the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. DeCosmos). It indicates a willingness to have another year lost in surveying another route.

Mr. TUPPER: I press this because, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, no loss of time will be thereby occasioned.

Mr. DECOSMOS: The hon. the Premier appears to be very witty at the present moment, but he was not so when I asked him for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think I always gave the hon. gentleman all the information I could. It might not be much, but I gave what I could. You will admit it takes a long time to get information about that country. With regard to the remarks about the nature of the country to be traversed, they are undoubtedly true, not exactly so from Edmonton, but from a short distance from Edmonton westward, nearly the whole way, until you get to Fort George, there is not much good land. With regard to what is known as the Peace River Pass, it is not really a pass at all. The Rocky Mountains have flattened out there. There are scarcely any hills; the highest one is 1,900 feet above the general level. The country, therefore, is quite suitable for railway construction, except that, in crossing the Smoky River and the small rivers falling into it, the prairie is hollowed out to an immense depth. The valley of the Peace River in some places is 600 or 800 feet below the ordinary level, and the smaller rivers in proportion, and they are exceedingly difficult to cross. There is no doubt, however that the Peace River country is, perhaps, the best part of the whole of the North-West. The best route to be taken there would perhaps be across the Northern Saskatchewan, about Fort La Corne, thence past Little Athabaska Lake, reaching the Pine River Pass; and then proceeding downwards, either to the north or south of Stewart Lake, and thus reaching the Ocean either by Gardner Inlet or Port Essington. At the same time it would be easy to connect Fort George with a line to Bute Inlet. I have no doubt that it traverses a larger amount of fertile land in the North West, say of the 110 degree of longitude. East of that, I dare say we have a better country upon the route on which we are engaged. But upon the West I have no doubt there is a better quality of land and more available for settlement than anywhere else. But it would be a very expensive operation to send a party out there to get such information as would really be of any value. Mr. Selwood's party, which the Government sent over in that direction two years ago, produced a great deal of very valuable information regarding the topography of the country, its products and its adaptability for railway purposes generally as well as for those of settlement; and there is no reason to doubt that a tolerably favourable route to the ocean could be had that way. But whether it is advisable at present to commence a survey which must necessarily take two years to make, and which must extend over 800 or 900 miles at the least, is somewhat a serious question. The surveys which we propose to make on the Fraser River will take five or six parties, and perhaps seven, the whole of this season, although the country is already tolerably well-known, and there exists a good route for a considerable distance, while there is a trail for getting supplies to almost the head of the North Thompson, where we begin the work to the east end of this portion. For this survey I have placed in the Estimates $100,000. And it is a serious matter whether it will be advisable to devote two more years to traversing the country to the north, although it may possess some advantages. I have no reason to believe that Pine River Pass would be much more favourable for getting through the mountains than the Yellow Head Pass. It might be slightly, but not materially. It is after we get through the Rocky Mountains that we have to get through a more difficult country, and a country which is much less favourable to settlement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD remarked that it was certainly a serious matter to make the surveys, but he thought it was a matter of great importance that this country should be surveyed, and he would urge upon the Government the expediency of having exploratory surveys of the country by the Pine River Pass. That country was the finest portion of the North-West, and rich in mineral wealth, including a mineral peculiarly grateful to Scotchmen like himself—sulphur. Even if the line were not adopted, he thought the cost of the survey would be money well spent.

Mr. MITCHELL asked if the vote would cover the cost of any rolling stock on the railway in the Thunder Bay District.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it did not; it was merely the estimated expenditure upon construction. The Government did not propose to place any portion in running order till next season.

Mr. MASSON asked if the Government had surveyed the country between Pic River and Sault St. Marie.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the only Government that had made that survey was the Administration of the right hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. MASSON said he wished to know if the survey had been made and with what result.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was made years before.

Mr. MASSON: Have you abandoned it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; I think so.

Mr. ROSCOE said he was afraid from the mode in which the surveys had been conducted that, after a survey had been made of the Fraser River route this year, should favourable accounts be received from the Smoky River country, it would be held that further surveys might be made of that route. The delay which had taken place in surveying the Fraser River route was quite unjustifiable. During three years the Government had told the House it was unnecessary to further survey the Fraser route, and that the northern route was preferable. Even the map of the railway which had been published proved that the Fraser route had been practically abandoned. There was, indeed, no excuse to be offered in behalf of the Government for having delayed to the very last the survey of that route; the route to Bute Inlet might have been surveyed three or four years ago. It now appeared that the opinion of naval and other officers was to form an important element in determining the route. The question could, however, have been asked three years ago, and it was desirable to know whether the advice of the Admiralty had led the Government to abandon a route on which hundreds of thousands of dollars had been expended. The hon. the Premier had told the House that the Canadian Pacific for many years would yield no revenue. He begged to differ with the hon. Minister on that point, especially as regarded the British Columbia portion of the road. He believed the construction of a railway through any portion of that Province would so increase the population that the increased revenue derived thereby would go far to the payment of interest on the money borrowed for the building of the railway. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had given no explanation in reference to the telegraph line in British Columbia, which was now contracted for, and no doubt the Committee desired to receive explanations. The location of the telegraph lines under certain contracts indicated that the Fraser route had been completely abandoned. He had examined the Chief Engineer's report, but had failed to find the grounds which had led to a change of opinion on the part of the Government in regard to the route of the railway. The hon. the Premier had told the House that it was an engineering question, but there was an impression abroad that it was not going to prove to be such, and that the hon. gentleman had reasons for selecting a particular route which should not exist. There was an impression held in British Columbia, and especially in his constituency, that the people on the Fraser, having shown great objection to the Carnarvon terms, should be punished by not having the railway carried to Bute Inlet. He trusted that idea was too absurd, and that, as the railway was not to be built in consideration for a handful of people in any section, but for the four millions of people in Canada, and for future generations, such considerations would not have the slightest weight. They were told that one consideration to be weighed in connection with the Fraser route was the comparatively large population there, and that the railway could be built at less cost by that route because the supplies could be had more cheaply. That was, however, a very small consideration, because if the population was larger and the country settled there would be less land available to be given to the contractors, which was an important matter. He did not wish to be understood as objecting to any particular route; he had always maintained, as representing the town of Victoria, that the selection of route did not much affect Victoria, although his constituents thought it would be an advantage to have the railway carried to Bute Inlet, an opinion which he did not share. If the railway were taken to Burrard Inlet it would be only a short distance from the American boundary line, and the Americans would probably tap the road and construct a railway to open up connection with a good port on one of the islands in Washington territory. It would be seen that any steamer or ship sailing up the De Fuca Straits would be much nearer the ocean than by running around the island and Burrard's Inlet; and it would yet be found that the actual terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be on the American Continent and not at Burrard's Inlet at all. A town of 700,000 inhabitants would yet be built on the island, while there would be but a small town at Burrard's Inlet. He would repeat what he had already stated about the Smoky River route, and he did hope that the Government would, at all events, have some surveys made this year, and not have an excuse to give for not doing so next year.

After Recess.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 62].

(Mr. Macdonald, Centre Toronto.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 62) Respecting the Northern Railway of Canada.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. OLIVER said that, when the Bill with reference to the Northern Railway was before the Committee on Railways, he had taken exception to a matter which he thought ought to be in it, and he placed the clause, which, in his opinion, should be inserted, before the Committee. The Government had stated that they would take it into consideration, and he had given notice, a few days ago, of the amendment which he proposed to move. His reason for doing so was this: When this railway was first promoted, they purchased from the Government a tract of land which extended from the western limits of the city of Toronto to Brock-street, for which they agreed to pay a certain sum of money. He was led to believe that this amount had never been paid; but the Government, in a Bill passed in 1860, reserved to itself certain powers over the track and station grounds, which powers were contained in the amendment of which he had given notice. He might state that the object which the Government had had in view was simply this: that other railways were being promoted for the purpose of connecting the west with the City of Toronto; this piece of land, as he understood, was about 110 feet in width, and from one mile to one and three-quarters of a mile in length; and it was reserved not only for the Northern Railway, but also for the use of any other railway coming to the City of Toronto from the west. It was desirable, in the interests of the City of Toronto, and certainly in the interests of the railways which were being promoted in the western section of the Province, that entrance to the city should be obtainable on this piece of land which properly belonged to the Government. It was not his intention to move his amendment now; but, when the Minister of Justice was in his place, and at the third reading of the Bill, he would move the amendment of which he had given notice. He was confident that there was a sufficient quantity of land included in the part mentioned, from the western limits of the City of Toronto to Brock street, to accommodate one or two other railways. This was a valuable strip of land, and one that belonged to the Crown, and which was never paid for by the company. If the company desired to have full control over it, as the House knew very well, they had ample means to pay for it. The Northern Railway was one of the richest railways in the country at the present time; they had lavishly expended their money, and they surely ought to pay for land which belonged to the country. Without further remarks he would state that he would move the amendment in question at the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. PLUMB moved an additional clause to give the shareholders two representatives on the Board of Directors.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said he hoped the hon. gentleman would not press the amendment. He appealed to his sense of fairness whether it would be a fair amendment. Already two directors represented the shareholders, and it would be most unfair to the bondholders to introduce two more.

Mr. PLUMB said he thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) had unintentionally misrepresented the case. The two directors referred to were elected because they happened to be members of the respective corporations of North Simcoe and the city of Toronto; and they could not be expected, from their peculiar position, to take an active part in, or supervision of, the management of the road. He thought the shareholders were entitled to the representation he sought to give them, and with this slight concession they would still be in a minority on the Board.

Mr. HOLTON said the position of the matter, as he understood it, was briefly this. There were, originally, ordinary shares in this company amounting to $400,000, one half of which was substantially held by the two municipalities of Toronto and North Simcoe, and each of those municipalities had had, from the inception of the road, a representative on the Board. The private shareholders, amounting to about £50,000 more, had no representation in their capacity as shareholders. They had a reversionary interest, and a very important interest in this company. All the bonds had been given precedence to them, and it appeared to him that this strong reversionary interest ought to have a representation, but that representation should not be excessive. If the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) claimed two directors out of the twelve, the municipal corporations having already two members, he claimed more than the House would be disposed to grant. He thought one representative for the shareholders would be fair.

Mr. PLUMB said he had no doubt the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) considered his proposition a fair one, but he could not quite agree with it. The bondholders had a very sluggish and very remote interest in the absolute management of the company, and it was asking very little to give the shareholders one-sixth of the representation on the Board.

Mr. GUTHRIE said he thought the shareholders should have a separate representation on the Board. The management by the bondholders was certainly not calculated to advance the interests of the shareholders. It was to be borne in mind, however, that four of the twelve directors had to be resident in England, and if two representatives were given to the shareholders, as proposed, these two, along with the representatives of the municipalities, would constitute half the Board. That would be altogether an undue proportion of representation for the shareholders, and he, therefore, thought the suggestion of the hon. member for Chateauguay should be adopted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed with the remarks of the hon. member for Chateauguay and those of the hon. gentleman who had just resumed his seat, and he hoped the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) would amend his motion so as to give the shareholders one director.

Mr. PLUMB said, although he did not quite fully concur in what had been said, he would amend his motion as suggested.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

CANADA TRAFFIC COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 100.]

(Mr. Workman.)

THIRD READING.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Committee of Supply resumed.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. member for Victoria had agreed to allow him an opportunity of setting himself right before the hon. the Premier on a question which he put to him before recess, and to which he received no satisfactory answer. He asked the hon. the Premier to tell the House the result of the surveys between the Pic River and Sault Ste. Marie. Instead of answering, the hon. the Premier spoke of the action of the hon. member for Kingston respecting the Sault Ste. Marie survey, and stated that the explorations were made two years ago. He got no satisfactory answer. He would read to the House from Hansard, in order to show that there was an exploration last year, and that he had a right to enquire as to the result :

“From Fort William by the Pic River (the new line) the distance is about 620 miles. Then if the line were to deflect from the Pic southward, so as to follow the general outline of Lake Superior, to reach the Sault, and there traverse the borders of Georgian Bay to Lake Nipissing, the distance from Fort William would be about 720 miles, as near as can be ascertained. A party was sent out by the Chief Engineer to examine the country between the Pic River and the Sault. That work is not yet complete, nor is it in such a state as would justify us in giving any positive opinion upon it.”

If the Government were not to pass by that place, it was useless for them to enter into the explorations. He thought he had a right to ask the result of the explorations.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The explorations between the Pic and the Sault were made, not last year, but two years ago. I told the hon. gentleman that before.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he had thought that, at this Session at least, a solution of the difficulties that had arisen between British Columbia and the Dominion Government would have been found. It appeared, however, that no solution had been found. It appeared that this Government had resisted any such thing as a solution, and by some mysterious means, he knew not what they could be, they had induced the Imperial Secretary of State to join with them. He did not know whether these means were through an agent of the Government in Great Britain or through private and confidential despatches of a certain noble person who had been sent to British Columbia. Another delay had occurred, and that delay had been taken into consideration by his constituents and the representatives of his Province, and they had agreed most generously to grant the First Minister and his colleagues another year, so as to complete the obligation they ought to have performed three years ago. The hon. the First Minister had endeavoured to persuade the House that there was no such portion of British Columbia as Vancouver Island. He made this remark because he discovered that the hon. gentleman had not even made mention of that important part of British Columbia and of the Dominion. The extraordinary blunder was made by the hon. gentleman of putting the statement in the hands of his ambassador (Mr. Edgar) that, if the people of Victoria behaved themselves, they might get the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo. It appeared they were not willing to concede to the hon. gentleman all he desired, and perhaps that was the reason the hon. gentleman had for excluding all considerations of Vancouver Island from the discussion. He would call attention to another fact: A number of questions were submitted to the officers of Her Majesty's Navy, and printed in the organ of the Government within his (Mr. DeCosmos') own constituency, which had entirely excluded any reference to the harbours of Vancouver Island. He would ask whether this was fair to the people of Vancouver Island, when questions were asked as to the harbours on the mainland. He believed it was purely a matter of design. Because the people of Vancouver would not bend “the pregnant hinges of the knee” to the hon. gentleman “that thrift might follow fawning,” he had, therefore, endeavoured to crush them. He was going to institute a survey from Tête Jaune Cache to Burrard Inlet this year at an enormous expense, and in the same breath he told the House that the whole line from the Kaministiquia to Bute Inlet had been located. He (Mr. DeCosmos) could not conceive what was meant by this. The hon. gentleman stated that the valley of the Fraser was the most populous portion of British Columbia. He (Mr. DeCosmos) only wished it was. But it so happened that it was not, and that the valley of the Fraser from Tête Jaune Cache through Yale to Burrard Inlet was more sparsely populated than any other great section of British Columbia. He would refer to the Sessional Papers of the Legislative Assembly of that Province in proof of this statement. In the whole district that would be traversed by a railway from Tête Jaune Cache viâ Kamloops to New Westminster, there would be no more than 731 votes. There was a small population in the whole Province, although it paid half as much revenue as New Brunswick, more than Prince Edward Island, and much more than Manitoba. North of the Fraser district was the Cariboo district, in which there were 601 voters, and this was not reached at all by the railway. In his own district and Vancouver Island district there were nearly 1,800 voters, and added to those of Cariboo, there were nearly 2,500 voters, and yet his hon. friend had the misfortune, he would not say the audacity, to say that the Railway viâ Kamloops to Burrard Inlet would pass through the most populous district in the Province.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman knew I referred to the mainland and not the island.

Mr. DECOSMOS said in British Columbia there was a great distinction as to the meaning of "the mainland" from the meaning attached to it in the other Provinces. In New Westminster and Yale in British Columbia, it meant the country through which the proposed line of the railway passed between Burrard Inlet and Tête Jaune Pass. But it stretched many degrees north of the point indicated by the Premier. There were 1,500 miners and sometimes 2,000 miners in the Cassiar country in 58° to 60° north latitude. The mainland would also include Omineca or West Peace River country, Cariboo, Yale and New Westminster. Having shown these errors of the First Minister, he would refer to one other thing: That, were the two lumber mills burned down to-morrow at Burrard Inlet, and not rebuilt, one half of the population in Yale and New Westminster districts would go to the American side, to Puget Sound. The First Minister had referred to the valuable land on Fraser River. As a fact, however, there were not perhaps over 400 square miles or 256,000 acres of valuable arable land along the whole river, from Yale to the mouth of the Fraser. In farms and population there they did not exceed the farming population in his own district, and were far behind that which existed in the district of his hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Bunster); but what was there from Yale to the mouth of Burrard Inlet to support a railway? There was nothing in the district to support a railway so far as at present known; and when they reached the Yale Canyon there were 60 odd miles of canyon to get through, which was nothing but a vast ditch, cut by the water coursing through for ages; there was nothing there unless mineral wealth was found in the mountains, which were walled up on each side. Next, they had to go 40 miles beyond before they found anything but some high grazing land, and away down in the bottom, along the Thompson, some patches of land that could only be cultivated by irrigation. After 40 miles more, at the end of Kamloops Lake, they found a high rolling grazing country and a few farmers. The population of that country had not increased 50 per cent. within the last ten years. When they reached Kamloops, they found a delightful point from which open lands, but narrow, stretched along the north fork of the Thompson for 20 miles beyond; it was comparatively worthless and, unless mineral wealth were found from Tête Jaune Cache to that spot, it could not be considered as sufficient to invite the Government to construct a railway in that direction. If the Government were determined to bring a railway by Tête Jaune Cache and Kamloops to Burrard Inlet, he alleged, not only from a Dominion point of view, financially speaking with respect to the cost and receipts of the railway, but in the interests of commerce, in the interests of the industry of their Province, that the line of railway could not be made a success by the best Administration of the country. The sole and whole reason was that they could not make a way traffic. It was simply following a ditch or ditches through the country, and was not calculated to make a way traffic or aid in the gaining a large share of transpacific traffic. Supposing that they started at Yale and went down the river with their railway, when they got about 40 miles above Burrard Inlet they reached the Sumass prairie, and from that about 60 miles would take them across a level tract of country to Holmes' Harbour, Washington Territory, which could be reached by the Straits of Fuca without tugs. The consequence would be that a branch line from the American side would tap our railway, and make the actual terminus in American territory. The Engineer said there would be necessary 70 miles of steam-tugging from St. Juan De Fuca to Burrard Inlet, therefore people would prefer to go by Puget Sound instead of going to Burrard Inlet. He drew the attention of hon. gentlemen to another point: That, as a matter of defence if we were to remain a Canadian people, if we were to build up a Canadian nationality on this continent, if we were to look forward to troublous times, we must regard this railway not only as an implement of traffic, but an implement of defence; and if so it should not be carried along the line of the Fraser and down to Burrard Inlet, for in case of war with the United States they could easily cross the frontier and interrupt our communications. In the report before this House they found that vessels approaching Burrard Inlet by way of St. Juan must be brought under the guns of the enemy. He asked whether a Government, to whom was committed the defence of our country, would be justified in building an expensive line of railway that in case of war with our neighbours to the south (a thing which he hoped would never occur) the terminus—the very point of all others which we ought to command—would be thus placed within the control of our enemies. He, for one, took occasion on this which he believed to be the altar of his country to denounce any such doings. And, further, he believed that the amount of money which the Government was prepared to spend this year in surveying the route from Tête Jaune Cache to Burrard Inlet, would be a waste of public money, it would be public money uselessly wasted in order to gain a year's delay, and then consult the people of the country at a general election whether they would build the railway or whether they would not. His hon. friend the First Minister had stated that he (Mr. DeCosmos) had cheered the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) when he spoke of the year's delay. He had not done so; he had cheered the hon. gentleman when he stated that there was more agricultural land and more mineral wealth contiguous to the northern than the southern route. He believed there was no earthly necessity for delay in the commencement of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway any more than there was last year or the year before, or any year since the hon. gentleman had entered the Government of the country. With respect to the Bute Inlet route, the next route north, the hon. gentleman, in referring to it, took great care, it might be by way of accident perhaps, not to mention Frederic Arm. What! did they not find in the report that it was desirable to examine Frederick Arm as a port on the main land after coming down Bute Inlet, to see if they could not have a ferry from there to Otter Cove, a distance of 15 miles? Why did not the First Minister mention that fact, and suggest the utilizing of that ferry, as ferries were utilized throughout the world. He asked the House to examine this report—this emasculated report, this report without the appendices. Because he believed that, if it were full and complete, they would find statements in the appendices, in all probability, that would give somewhat different ideas to the House and country than this defective report was calculated to give. He might refer to the visit of a noble personage to his country. He should judge, by the despatch of Lord Carnarvon, that this noble personage, among others, had been instructing His Lordship as to Bute Inlet, and unfavourably to Waddington Harbour as a harbour. The captain of the steamer

Sir James Douglas had told him (Mr. DeCosmos) that, with little trouble, he could place eighty line-of-battle ships in Waddington Harbour. He (Mr. DeCosmos) naturally inquired whether the noble lord had been to Waddington Harbour, but he was sorry to say that he did not visit it within four miles. It might be possible, with a powerful glass, to discover all the advantages of a harbour four miles off, yet it was a fact that he did not visit it, though, from his latest utterances in Victoria before his departure, he appeared to be unfavourable to it, and he supposed that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies had received some cue from that quarter, or it might be from other quarters, and so they had that harbour tabooed; and had it said that Burrard Inlet was the finest harbour in British Columbia. On page 70 of the report they read:—

“That as far as known, Burrard Inlet, an arm of the Strait of Georgia, is the best harbour and the easiest of approach from the ocean.”

Any one unacquainted with British Columbia would read that statement and form the conclusion that all the harbours of British Columbia had been passed in review before that statement was made, yet this was not the case. But, instead of this harbour being the most easily approached from the ocean, the Engineer himself told them at page 67, “That there was 70 miles of towing from Esquimalt to English Bay, Burrard Inlet,” while there was no towing at all to reach Esquimalt or to reach Uchucklesit, at the mouth of Barclay Sound. Yet here was the statement that this was the harbour most easy of approach in British Columbia, though to reach it they must pass under the guns of St. Juan, Stuart and Patos Islands, and through crooked channels, through tide rips, through strong currents, and through tides of which even the best hydrographer in Her Majesty's Navy was unable to make a tide table. In order to enter this harbour they would have to pass off Esquimalt, go through the Haro Canal, be towed for 30 or 40 miles through a number of islands, then enter the Strait of Georgia where they would have a sand bank off the mouth of the Fraser, and when they got up to English Bay they would find that no full rigged ship or schooner could go in there at certain times unless the tide and wind were favourable. The tide at the Narrows flowed in and out at the rate of six to nine knots an hour. He had been on board steamers passing in when they had careened over at an angle of 30 degrees. This was the port which hon. gentlemen proposed to make the terminus of the Pacific Railway. If they compared it with Esquimalt or with Barclay Sound, any gentleman who had no political object to serve would see that this was not the place at which to terminate a vast railway which would cost the Dominion from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000. What was the whole story about Waddington Harbour, Bute Inlet? It was only, he believed, proposed to be used as a temporary stopping place, a temporary harbour, until the Dominion Government found itself wealthy enough to construct a railway along the north side of the Inlet to Frederick Arm to reach Vancouver Island by a ferry. The route had this advantage: that, while the Burrard Inlet route had no advantage whatever but the great disadvantage of playing into the hands of Americans, the Bute Inlet route would take a central position, would strike into the central parts of Vancouver Island and would enable the Government to construct a railway 200 miles nearer to China than the southern route, and reach Quatsino at the north end of Vancouver Island, or go to Alberni Canal on the west side of the Island, and it would also enable them to extend their line to Esquimalt and would so place us outside to the westward of our American friends when competing for transpacific trade; more than that, by reaching that point, it would be easier for steamships. He observed something else in the report with which he disagreed; it was stated that the approach to Bute Inlet by the north of Vancouver Island was more hazardous and objectionable than that to Burrard Inlet via the Gulf of Georgia. But the northern approach to Bute Inlet was not as hazardous as the approach from the south to Burrard Inlet, because the channels were open and straight, and being so, were much more easily navigated than channels which were tortuous, and which contained other impediments to navigation. Besides, he remembered the fact that far more vessels engaged in the coal and lumber trade from the ports Nanaimo and Burrard Inlet had been shipwrecked than had occurred in the Straits of Fuca, or in navigating Puget Sound, shewing conclusively the danger of navigation in that quarter. The moment they reached Vancouver Island viâ Bute Inlet, they found coal and iron, and various other economic minerals; the climate there was better, he believed, than that of any other portion of the Dominion. There, forests could be turned into a marketable commodity; there were several channels for the distribution of merchandise; there was abundance of fish around the coast, and there was a great extent of land fit for cultivation and settlement; and, if the route was run by way of Bute Inlet, it would come into that portion of the Province which was most accessible for immediate settlement; and the portion that one day or other, no matter who ruled in the country, would be the ruling section of the west coast of the Dominion. Let them follow up the route—from Bute Inlet they ascended the valley of the Homathco. There might be found as good land for cultivation at some portions of the Fraser; but, so far as his information went, what did they imagine occurred last year? During the freshet, in Fraser River, along the route which it had been suggested that this railway should traverse, and on the survey of which a large amount of money was to be expended this year, the water rose 100 feet above its ordinary level. The melted snows of the mountains had gathered in the gorge of the river, and its waters so rose 100 feet. What was the case on the Homathco? He was informed by engineers and persons who had been there during the summer that the Homathco did not suffer greatly from freshets. By the Bute route a better means of escape from freshets and “wash-outs” was afforded than along the valley of the Fraser River, unless the railway route were carried up the mountain side to a very great height. After they passed through the great canyon of the Homathco, that is, through the Cascade Mountains, they reached a plateau of fine grazing land—as fine as there was in any other portion of British Columbia. Where the river of this plateau fell into the Fraser there was good cultivateable land, and to the northward wheat grew. This had been successfully tried there thirty or forty years ago by the Hudson Bay Company. They had heard the testimony of Prof. Selwyn cited, as to the excellent character of the country stretching northward from Fort George; and they knew that, in the neighbourhood of Fort James, and far north, the Hudson Bay Company had never housed their horses during the winter. Timothy, wheat, oats, etc., grew here, and the land was as good as it was in this country. There was no comparison between the northern and the southern route. The latter was a vast gorge, and, being so, he took it that their true course was to select the route best calculated to prove advantageous to the country. The First Minister had apparently taken it for granted that he was to have a year's delay, and $100,000 he (Mr. DeCosmos) presumed to spend. The hon. gentleman said they had lost no time in completing these surveys; but he believed that the Government had lost time, and, if this was not the case with regard to the prosecution of the surveys, it was certainly the case with reference to the commencement of the Pacific Railway. In 1874, the First Minister stated through his mouth-piece, Mr. Edgar, that he (Mr. Mackenzie) would commence the Pacific Railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo; the hon. gentleman told Lord Carnarvon the same thing; and also the House in the Session of 1875. If the hon. gentleman could do all this then, he could do it as well now. As far as the surveys were concerned, the hon. gentleman said that the survey of a portion of the route from Tête Jaune Cache to Burrard Inlet had been made last year, but it was a notorious fact that this line had been surveyed, he believed, in 1872. The hon. gentleman also stated that there was one advantage about the Yale route: it could be commenced at Yale and 100 miles of river navigation saved, and people could descend to New Westminster during the whole season. He had corrected the hon. gentleman at the moment, for the fact was that a section, 100 odd miles, of the Fraser, west of Yale, was often closed up by ice during one, two or three months of the year. Steamers that carried freight and passengers between Victoria and Fraser River country, had to go to Burrard Inlet in consequence of the ice; and hence it would be useless on the part of the Government to construct a line of railway there. The Premier had stated that the Yale line was rather easier of approach. It might be shorter, for aught he knew, but what were a few miles in comparison with the Bute line, which gave more commercial facilities, and opened up a better country. The hon. gentleman said that the land of British Columbia was of no great value. He would admit that a large portion of its land was not suited for agricultural purposes; but he did maintain, with Prof. Selwyn, the head of the Geological Survey, that the Province of British Columbia had more mineral wealth in it than all the other Provinces put together. It possessed more mineral wealth than all the other Provinces, and under these circumstances, he asked whether their lands were not valuable. The whole Cascade Range, from where the Fraser River broke until it reached Bute Inlet, was argentiferous. Those who had visited the Centennial might have seen bricks of silver from British Columbia, which had been taken from this section. In addition, there was not a stream in that country from the bed of which one could not get the colour of gold; and in many instances this was the case to 60° north, a distance of 600 miles. Then, again, they had the best coal in the Dominion. In the analysis of coal as shown in the report of the Geological Department, a higher percentage of carbon was given to British Columbia coal than to the coal of any other portion of the Dominion. The bituminous coal of Nova Scotia was rated one or two per cent. below it; and it was said that this land, which was rich in gold, and silver, and coal and other minerals, was worthless. The Province also possessed fine grazing land. The Premier further had mentioned the statement that they could not increase the rate of taxation in order to build this road, but the rate of taxation had been increased this year, and he took it that this was really done to fulfil the first obligation and lien on the Dominion, entered into before the hon. gentleman acceded to power. It was one of the first liens on the Treasury of the country; and it provided for the construction of the Pacific Railway. In two distinct instances, and possibly more, the tariff had been raised and the taxes increased; and yet they had been that day told that the Government did not intend to raise the rate of taxation. He would take another opportunity to draw the attention of the House to some other points in this regard; and more particularly to the transpacific and transcontinental railways.

79. Pacific Railway Survey and Engineering..... $100,000

II. CHARGES OF MANAGEMENT.

1. Charges of management... $69,100

IX. IMMIGRATION AND QUARANTINE.

56. Towards assisting immigration and immigration expenses, including estimated expense of transport of Mennonites..... $110,000

Mr. MASSON asked the reason for the decrease.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they thought this sum would be sufficient for all purposes. It was not likely there would be any large immigration to the several Provinces; there might be some to the North-West.

Mr. MASSON said he thought the same reason would apply to the preceding item.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said nearly $40,000 of the preceding item was for quarantine and expenses in regard to measures for protecting the public health.

Mr. BLANCHET: Perhaps the hon. gentleman can answer the question I put yesterday, in regard to the physicians.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. the Minister of Agriculture would take steps to remedy the evil complained of

In answer to Mr. POPE (Compton),

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Chicago and Detroit agencies would be dispensed with, but it was the intention of the Government to continue the agency at Worcester, Mass.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he did not think the expenditure for sending immigrants back to France ought to have been charged to this vote. It ought to have been charged to "unforeseen expenses."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said some small sums in other years had been charged to the immigration vote. He regretted the expenditure, as it was not in our interest that we should pay for the return of immigrants.

Mr. MITCHELL said he thought more was paid for the salaries of agents than was required. There was no reason, for instance, for an agent in Prince Edward Island, which was thoroughly settled. He would go further and suggest that the list from Quebec downwards should be gone through and reductions made.

Mr. DYMOND said he thought it would be most unwise to accept this proposition. The time of depression was only of a temporary character, and soon there would be as large an influx of immigrants as before. The cost of the agents was but trifling, and not one of them received a high salary. In fact, an addition was made to the salary of one of them because it was not considered sufficient.

Mr. MITCHELL: But they are only temporary officers.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That can hardly be said. Many of them have been in the service for 15 or 20 years. The travelling agents were in a different position.

Mr. MITCHELL said some of the officers could be dispensed with. For instance, there was no necessity for an agent at Prince Edward Island and Halifax.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac), enquired whether the appointment of the agent at London was considered a permanent one. He understood it was temporary.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: He was sent there on the resignation of Mr. Jenkins. What may be done is under the consideration of the Government.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) agreed that there was no necessity for an agent at Halifax. All that the agent did last year was to write a report of three lines. The Province had its own Emigration Agent.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) also agreed that there was no necessity for an agent at Halifax, and hoped that the item would be expunged.

Mr. POULIOT said, before the resolution was passed, he wished to make a few observations. He would, in the first place, reply to the invitation extended to him a few days previous by the hon. member for Terrebonne. To hear the hon. gentlemen opposite, one would believe that they had a specific remedy and a veritable panacea for all evils. If anything was spoken of, which they believed should or should not be done in the interest of the country, these hon. gentlemen had always a remedy to offer, and always said: "Unite with us, and give us your seats on the right of the Speaker, and all will then go well." Judging from the debates during the present Session, he had reason to believe that the hon. member for Terrebonne considered himself heir pure and simple, and not without benefice d'inventaire, of the estate of his friends who had been in power for such a length of time, when these hon. gentlemen did not act as they should have done with regard to the colonization of the country; and now these hon. gentlemen did not take up this matter to favour colonization, but rather for political purposes, and with a view to affect the approaching elections. During the few years which preceded Confederation, when he had the honour of representing the county he represented to-day, and when the friends of colonization demanded that this question should be properly treated, he solicited the opening of roads in his county, and if something in this respect was granted much more favour was shown to the neighbouring county, Kamouraska, though there was hardly any land fit for settlement. During these few years Kamouraska received for its roads only, besides considerable sums for the opening of the Taché road, $26,000, while only $15,000 was bestowed upon Temiscouata. Nevertheless, what was the result? During the same period of time, two additional parishes were formed in Kamouraska, while twelve were organized in Temiscouata. There was something in addition to be stated, showing that the hon. gentlemen opposed colonization solely for political purposes. Pressed by the true friends of colonization, who demanded that moneys so expended should be properly employed, the late Government sent one of its officials to learn what better could be done, and to inspect the Taché and other roads in the county of Kamouraska. This gentleman reported not only that there were no lands fit for settlement, but also that one of the roads, on which work was asked for, was absolutely useless; that it would have to be made over again, and that trees had again grown upon it. Despite this report, though the statement was almost incredible, $600 was at once sent from Quebec to be expended on this road. This was necessary, as it was on the eve of an election in the county, and it was well known how numerous had been the electoral contests in Kamouraska during many years back. If the hon. member for Terrebonne would give him his attention, he would make him (Mr. Masson) the same offer which he had made to the hon. gentleman who now sat in another chamber, the Hon. Mr. Archambault, when at the head of the Department of Colonization in the Province of Quebec. He would accompany the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) over the roads opened in Temiscouata and Kamouraska, and let him see for himself how the moneys voted for colonization purposes had been expended. If they once passed the parishes established on the St. Lawrence in Kamouraska, no more good land would be found except where a small parish had been begun in rear of St. Alexandre, near Temiscouata. This was what the friends of the hon. gentleman had done for colonization when in power. He was glad to be able to say that the Local Government in the Province of Quebec seemed to desire to act otherwise, since a township for repatriation purposes had already been established in the county of Temiscouata. As to the resolution before the House, he would say that the sums expended on European immigration were spent almost uselessly, producing no good effects, at all events for the Province of Quebec. Though they contributed their share under this head, they saw the immigrants pass them by and go for the most part to the United States, while others went to Ontario and the North-West Territories. These people did not remain in the Province of Quebec. He would mention a fact in this relation: Some years ago, Mr. McNeider, Seigneur of Metis in the county of Rimouski, brought out a number of Scotchmen and gave them lands and all that was necessary for their support; but what happened? Nearly all these persons, after having remained there for some years, left the country. Only a few who had married Canadian women remained; and everywhere throughout the Province this was the case. From the Eastern Townships, European immigrants went to the United States, while many who lived in the Eastern States left them to settle in the Western States. The extraordinary fertility of the lands in the North-West was loudly vaunted, and pamphlets in this regard were distributed among them; but he would say frankly—and he was not alone in this opinion—that he did not place absolute faith in these writings, for persons, whose veracity they could not doubt, did not make these flattering statements regarding that part of the country. This expenditure might be advantageous to Ontario, but this was certainly not the case with the Province of Quebec, though here were vast regions capable of receiving a considerable population. If Europeans did not wish to settle in this Province, many of their countrymen in the United States asked for assistance to return; and something should be done not only in this regard, but also to keep those in the Province who desired to leave it. There was room in the Province for over a million of additional population. The county of Temiscouata contained 1,333,000 acres. The uncultivateable land amounted to 200,000 acres, and there remained 1,133,000 acres, and allowing 18 acres for each person, this would admit of a population of 74,000. The present population was about 22,000, and, consequently, there was room for 52,000 more. The county of Rimouski contained 3,156,000 acres; uncultivateable land 400,000 acres; there remained 2,736,000 acres, capable of sustaining a population of 152,000 souls; present population 27,000; additional possible population, 125,000. The county of Bonaventure contained 2,106,000 acres; uncultivateable lands, 600,000 acres; remainder, 1,506,000 acres, which was capable of supporting 83,000 people; present population 16,000; consequently there was room for 67,000 more. The county of Chicoutimi alone could support as large a population as British Columbia—it included 15,200,000 acres; uncultivateable lands, about 11,000,000; there remained 4,200,000 acres, which could sustain a population of 233,000. The present population was about 17,000, and consequently there was room for 216,000 more in this county. The counties he had mentioned could receive a population of half a million, without considering the other parts of the Province such as St. Maurice, the Eastern Townships, &c., which could receive as many more. In view of these facts, it was evident that something should be done in this relation for the Province of Quebec. The other Provinces in turn had obtained their better terms, but they did not ask for so much—they demanded that they should at least be placed on the same footing with these Provinces. He hoped that the members from the other Provinces would not refuse to grant this request; if it were otherwise, he did not believe that any Government could long remain in power. Some one, a few years ago, had declared that the French Canadians were an inferior race. Far from admitting this to be true, he held that they were inferior in no respect to the inhabitants of the other portions of the Dominion. He hoped that the representatives and the people of Quebec would be as wise as the representatives and the people of Ontario, when Confederation, which was to benefit that Province, was proposed. They then abandoned their party strife to secure Confederation, from which Ontario so largely benefitted. It was very true that the hon. members from Quebec, amongst whom was the present hon. member for Charlevoix, favoured Confederation, but the reason why was known; they told the people that, Confederation accomplished, everybody would become rich; but the people saw in what position they were to-day placed. He hoped that the Government would do justice to the Province of Quebec. If it did not, it should be aware of the approaching elections. The members and the people of the Province should unite together and see that, in the future, a portion of the sums voted for immigration purposes was expended to secure the return of French Canadians from the United States, and to retain in the Province those who wished to leave it.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he did not think the salaries of the agents should be lessened. If there were any reductions they should be in the direction pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax. There were only two classes of immigrants encouraged to come out now, agricultural labourers and domestic servants. Of the former there seemed to be a surplus in the country already, while the supply of domestic servants was not equal to the demand. It would not be wise to reduce the appropriation, as in all probability the immigration would soon be as great as it had been before. He would enquire why there was no appropriation for an agent at Belfast.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied it came under the head of expenses for travelling agents.

Mr. TROW highly commended the speech of the hon. gentleman for Temiscouata in advocating the return of the French Canadians who were now in Massachusetts. He (Mr. Trow) thought it highly desirable that some effort should be made in this direction. Quite a little colony, some 230 or 240 went to Manitoba last year. They had sent letters to their friends stating that they were exceedingly well satisfied with the country. No doubt if inducements were offered many thousands of French Canadians would return to Quebec or Manitoba. But he must say that he did not approve of the statements made by the hon. gentleman with reference to Manitoba. The hon. gentleman's own countrymen, who had recently emigrated there, were well satisfied with their lot. The seasons in Manitoba, according to the most reliable information, were preferable even to those in the Province of Quebec. Last year they commenced sowing ten or fifteen days earlier than they did in Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: I excepted Manitoba in my references to the North-West.

Mr. TROW said nobody could speak otherwise of Manitoba. It was probably the best Province in the Dominion to which to encourage immigration. He would instance the Mennonites. The crops were a total failure during the first two years in consequence of the grasshoppers. They had only one good crop, and yet they were satisfied with the country, and were trying to induce their friends to join them. There were some 6,700, who were doing a great deal to develop the resources of Manitoba. There were upwards of fifty small villages, of the style they had in Southern Russia, each containing from sixteen to twenty houses. They did not isolate themselves, as was supposed by some, but were prepared to mix with other classes, although retaining their own ideas and customs. 50,000 Mennonites in Southern Russia were anxious to come over, their crops having been an utter failure there for two years, and they required some aid to enable them to reach Manitoba. He did not like to hear anyone discouraging immigration. In the European market, agents of the respective fields for emigrants were striving against each other, and inducements were held out on behalf of the Western States, Australia, New Zealand, Brazil, and other places. Hon. members should be careful of making unguarded statements in the House, as they were seized upon by agents of rival countries, to the disadvantage of Canada. Some years ago an hon. member stated that there was no more land in Ontario fit to be settled upon; and since that time a million and a half acres of land had been settled upon, and between 50,000 and 60,000 settlers had gone into the Free-Grant Territory; and there was room enough for ten times as many more. If the Georgian Bay road was carried on, it would be the means of colonizing millions of acres. In Manitoba and the Great Saskatchewan there were 50,000,000 acres of good arable land which was of no use now because it was not developed. For the year ending July last, New Zealand had expended $1,500,000 to encourage immigration; and during the last year over $500,000 were expended. Although we had greater resources, we only appropriated $284,000. According to the best authorities, each immigrant was worth $1,000; and, therefore, instead of decreasing the appropriation, it ought to be increased to $500,000. If proper enterprise was shown, many thousands would go from the United States to the North-West Territory. He had recently received a letter stating that from forty to fifty persons were going from Almonte to Manitoba, and many were going from the county of Oxford. The immigration of Canadians into that territory was certainly worth more than that of Europeans, as they were acquainted with the ways of the country. He was sorry to hear the Finance Minister make the remarks about Manitoba which he did the other evening, in reference to the grasshopper plague. A few years ago the Government had to assist Nova Scotia, and even Ottawa county, on account of fire destroying the crops. The Local Government gave $25,000, and the Dominion Government gave something. It was impossible to speak as to the future, but there was the best reason for saying that Manitoba would not be again annoyed with grasshoppers for a quarter of a century. In 1872, 89,186 immigrants arrived in Canada; in 1873, 99,109; in 1874, 80,022; in 1875, 44,458; and in 1876, 36,549. Of these there remained in Canada, in 1872, 36,578; in 1873, 50,050; in 1874, 39,393; in 1875, 27,382; and in 1876, 25,633. Thus, during these five years, 179,000 settled in Canada. On the calculation that they would be worth $1,000 each to the country, their total worth to the Dominion was $179,000,000. Last year $284,065 was spent in bringing out immigrants, who were worth $25,633,000 to the country.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton): How can this amount be realized?

Mr. TROW said the immigrants became producers as well as consumers. The policy of the Government should be to make innumerable homesteads, and not to centralize. There was too much centralization in large blocks of land. Even in Manitoba there was a large portion of the Province shut out from actual settlement. There were railway reserves, Half-breed reserves, Hudson Bay reserves, and school reserves, the latter, however, being proper. Non-resident settlers did not contribute much to the development of the country, they building no roads, and thus retarding settlement. He hoped that the Government would cause good reliable information to be prepared and distributed in Europe. If that was done, and the agents were instructed to spread themselves about the country parts instead of in the cities of Europe, a good class of immigrants would be introduced.

Mr. POPE (Compton) held that the money spent in encouraging immigration had not been wasted. It was estimated that the British immigrant brought, on an average, $70 a head, but, calculating that the average was only $30, it would be found that the immigrants brought into the country about three times as much money as was spent in introducing them. As an example, he might mention that in 1872 the expense was $261,953, while they brought into the country $928,000. That was a matter which he thought should be taken into consideration when the question of immigration was being discussed.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that the matter had been so thoroughly discussed in the able and exhaustive speech of the Chairman of the Immigration Committee,

(Mr. Trow) that there was really very little to be said on this subject, and having had an opportunity of speaking when this item was under consideration by the Committee before, he would take up the time of the Committee only to comment somewhat on the statements made by the hon. Minister of Finance in closing the discussion on this item, when it was before the Committee last week. If he had correctly understood the hon. gentleman on that occasion, he stated that, in view of the fact of recent grasshopper ravages in Manitoba and the uncertainty of that country being able, in consequence, to support a farming population, he could not consent to the encouraging of any large number of agricultural immigrants, at least this year. Now a statement of this kind was calculated to injure the North-West particularly, and our immigration interests generally, to a very great extent. A statement of this sort, involving a doubt of whether we had a desirable country to offer to the immigrant, coming from a Minister of the Crown from his place in Parliament, might do very great injury indeed. Pointed to by the agents of countries whose interests were competitive or hostile, it might be made to weigh much with the emigrants of Europe. To him (Mr. Schultz) it seemed a suicidal policy, and one fraught with the worst possible results to the country. While the Minister in this House who represented the Minister of Agriculture was declaring in his place his want of confidence in the region we had to offer immigrants, the agents of the Australian Colonies were using their utmost endeavours to secure additional population; our attention was called to this fact by our agent in London, who, in his report printed in that of the Minister of Agriculture for this year, said:

“The Australian Colonies continue to show great activity in the work of securing emigrants. First among them stands Queensland, which employs a number of agents and lecturers, who, when addressing audiences in the agricultural districts, constantly deprecate emigration to Canada, advocating, of course, their own colony as a farmer's paradise. South Australia has likewise been very energetic, and its agents in the south of England, Ireland, Scotland, North Germany and the Austrian Tyrol have met with fair success. Western Australia has only recently entered the field as a competitor with other colonies for its share of emigrants; its operations have hitherto been conducted on a small scale, but I am advised that a very large sum of money has recently been voted by the Parliament of that colony for this purpose."

The House had heard from the Chairman of the Immigration Committee an estimate of the value of an individual emigrant to the country, and he had shewn what it had cost Canada to secure this class. He (Mr. Schultz) believed that there was one class of emigrants which we did not want, but the scum of the cities who used to emigrate so largely seemed to have ceased, and it so happened that the immigrants whom we now could get were just those that we wanted. Mr. Klotz stated in the Minister of Agriculture's Report that the Mennonites of last year who took ship at Hamburg brought with them $175,000. These estimates, made by the Chairman of the Committee, showed that we get those immigrants, who were shown to be anything but paupers, at a cost of a very few dollars per head. It seemed to be possible to get those Mennonites but only till the year 1880, when their permission to leave Russia ceased; and this was why he felt so deeply concerned at the policy of the Government in this matter. He trusted that even now, after having heard the statements of the Chairman of the Immigration Committee, and of others who had given the subject thought and consideration, the Ministry would place an amount in the Supplementary Estimates which would make this vote, at least, as large as last year.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he had observed, during the Session, that pamphlets pointing out the advantages of immigration to Manitoba had been freely distributed. He wished to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that no such pamphlets respecting a better Province—British Columbia—had been circulated. If the Government were not in possession of the requisite facts for the preparation of such pamphlets, he would suggest that the Secretary of the Province would, no doubt, furnish all information required.

Mr. TROW said, if the hon. member for Victoria examined carefully the pamphlets to which he referred, he would find that one-fourth of their contents were taken up with British Columbia. The Committee on Immigration had recently sent a circular to prominent individuals in British Columbia so that they might send reliable information or appear before the Committee next Session. The Committee desired to give as much attention to that Province as to others.

On Resolution 82, Welland Canal,
$2,000,000, (reported April 13th),

Mr. McCALLUM said he did not wish to oppose the item, but wished to point out in what respects, as it seemed to him, an improvement could be made in the works. He was in favour of any reasonable amount of expenditure of money for the improvement of our canals, if it would have the effect of giving us the trade of the West. The people of this country could well afford to appropriate a liberal sum for this object. But the question was whether twelve feet of water on the St. Lawrence and the Welland Canals could secure this western trade. He doubted very much whether it would. But he was satisfied that fourteen feet of water would do so. If the Welland Canal were pushed forward to completion at as early a day as possible, it would be a great advantage to vessel owners, shippers and all those engaged in the carrying trade, and enrich those living in the cities, villages and towns along the route, besides being a great advantage to the country generally, as at present our vessels were shut out of the coasting trade of the United States. The more we could increase the trade from American to Canadian ports the greater benefit would it be to us, as we could employ more Canadian tonnage. We had enterprising competitors for the great trade of the West, the State of New York being the principal one. The St. Lawrence route, by the Welland Canal, was the shortest, say from Chicago and Milwaukee, which were the principal inland ports of shipment in the United States. By that route there was less canal to travel over in order to reach tide-water, by over 200 miles. But the State of New York used influences which this Government and the Canadian people would do well to take into consideration. In 1870 the State of New York lowered the rate of toll on the Erie Canal by one-half; and while business on the Welland Canal was at a standstill, so far as the Western trade was concerned, the American canals had increased in business largely, with the exception of this last year. It might be said that railways would carry the bulk of the products of the west to tide-water, but he disagreed with this—he believed that all heavy freights must be carried by water; and besides this there was a greater wear-and-tear on railways than by water routes. The Government of the State of New York had presented the West with a million of dollars a year since 1870, in the shape of tolls taken off the Erie Canal, and he was sure before they would lose that trade they would remove the tolls altogether, and the moment they did that, although we had superior advantages, the trade would all go that way, by the Erie Canal and the Hudson River. But if our canals were deepened to 14 feet of water the trade was bound to come by the Welland and St. Lawrence route, which was the natural channel. All the large lake ports, such as Chicago, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Toledo and Buffalo, had a depth of 14 feet of water, while the depth of water in the Welland Canal was at present only ten feet. The following was the amount of produce from the Western States shipped at Buffalo to tide water by the Erie Canal:—

	Barrels of Flour.	Bushels of Wheat.
1865.....	142,018	10,202,141
1866.....	52,325	7,772,217
1867.....	15,468	10,109,718
1868.....	5,774	10,369,030
1869.....	51,923	16,463,480
1870.....	76,471	16,738,613
1871.....	47,731	19,028,316
1872.....	5,172	11,601,069
1873.....	13,616	24,569,088
1874.....	49,182	21,672,048

These figures showed an increase in the number of bushels of wheat of 11,469,907, and a decrease in number of barrels of flour of 92,836. Grain was being carried by rail within the last few years, but it was carried at a loss, and that trade must soon cease. The return of the Canal Board to the Assembly of the State of New York, in 1874, showed that in 1865 there were collected on the canals of that State, on 4,729,654 tons, tolls to the amount of $3,839,955, while in 1874 there were only collected, on 5,804,588 tons, tolls to the amount of $2,637,071, being a decrease of $1,202,884. The whole cost of transportation on the State canals, for thirty-eight years, from 1837 to 1874, was $253,902,985, and the State Board, after paying for repairs and working expenses, received $73,511,078 in tolls, or say $1,934,502 per annum, to pay interest on cost, and they would still rather sacrifice this large amount of tolls than lose the trade which increased and enriched the population and brought prosperity to the cities, towns, and villages along the route. The Hon. Israel T. Hatch, formerly a member of Congress in the United States, who was admitted to be a good authority in trade and commerce, said, when addressing the Chamber of Commerce of New York:

“If the ambitious views of our people in the North-West, originating in Chicago, its commercial centre, and in New England, with Boston its commercial centre, could be realized, the signal flags of your line of splendid ships would be floating in the ports of your rivals, Montreal and Boston, for you would have to send them there to get freights. The North-West aims at direct trade with Europe, and Boston believes that if the St. Lawrence Canals can be enlarged, they can bring their largest class of propellers up the lakes now engaged in carrying trade from Chicago to Ogdensburg, and then by rail to Boston, through the St. Lawrence to Boston, and so become respectable rivals to you in the inland commerce of this country. Schemes to accomplish these objects are now pending, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe, as certainly as that the waters of the St. Lawrence will continue to flow to the ocean, that this commercial experiment will be tried to change the channels and outlets of the inland commerce of this country."

Mr. Hatch was well aware of what that trade was worth, and he said that we would be making an effort to take it away. If we were going to be successful in that, the Government must spend a large amount of money; and, while the hon. the Minister of Finance had stated the other day that he expected to get a large amount of increase from the Welland Canal (something like a quarter of a million dollars), he (Mr. McCallum) believed that if the Government would give them fourteen feet of water they might double that amount, but, if they did not, he doubted if they could get any more than they did at present, as all the large vessels would go to Buffalo, because they could go there drawing two feet more water, carrying a larger cargo, and carry at a less rate of freight, which would operate against the Welland and in favour of the Erie Canal. The people of Buffalo, who appreciated that trade, said, in 1869, through their Board of Trade:

"It would be folly to ignore the fact that a great increase has taken place in the trade of Canada with Europe in breadstuffs. The route via the St. Lawrence leads almost in a direct line from the grain-growing regions of the west to those nations of Europe whose people are, and will be, the chief consumers of grain exported from this country. By a liberal canal policy we may arrest this diversion of trade and restore the traffic of very many important articles which seek other channels through lower rates of transportation. The observer of last year's statistics has doubtless noticed that the trade of Chicago with the Dominion has largely increased, both in imports and exports. The Canadians hope to establish a large direct foreign trade by way of the St. Lawrence, to and from the west, exporting wheat by the vessels used in the trade, returning with salt, hardware, glass, crockery, carpets, drugs, dyes, etc., and the estimated value of such imports alone foot up to $40,000,000. Would not a reduction of tolls on the canal somewhat disarrange this programme?"

They had had that reduction in tolls, and it had disarranged our programme, and it had decreased the trade in the Welland Canal so far as breadstuffs were concerned; the tonnage was as large as ever, but it was all in heavy goods and not in breadstuffs. The Buffalo Board of Trade said:

"The plan proposed for receiving the trade of the great West by the Canadians is to enlarge the canals around the rapids of the St. Lawrence, and to increase the capacity of the Welland Canal to a degree whereby vessels of large tonnage can pass direct to and from the Upper Lakes."

He (Mr. McCallum) saw, on looking over the Public Works report, mention made of the moneys spent on the River Detroit in removing some rocks in that river; and, to show how well the Americans were aware that they were our competitors at Buffalo, he might mention that they had done no less than pass a vote of thanks to the hon. the Minister of Public Works for his action in the matter. He did not know whether the hon. member (Mr. Mackenzie) was aware that, when he was spending this money, it was directly against the interest of the people of this country and in favour of Buffalo; because it did not look reasonable that we should want 14 feet of water in the Detroit River to enable American vessels to load wheat at Chicago and go to Buffalo, when they could not go into the Welland Canal, drawing 10 feet of water. Further, the expenditure on the canals, especially the Welland Canal had paid, he believed, 1 $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent., and, if the Government would give them 14 feet of water and they could get the trade to go that way, he believed the Welland Canal would pay as a commercial undertaking. It was laid down in 1862 by good authority that the trade of the inland waters of North America was estimated at 50 millions of money, and that for fifteen years the trade going through the Erie Canal by Buffalo was estimated at \$350,000,000. They had the advantage of us because they could use large vessels in the carrying trade. Last year wheat was sent from Chicago to Buffalo at 2c. per bushel. So long as they had two feet of water the advantage of us on the lakes and in their harbours they would get the trade by the Erie Canal and Hudson River to New York. As to the progress of the work on the Welland Canal, he had a complaint to make against the Government.

Mr. HOLTON: Only one?

Mr. McCALLUM said he had more than one, he had several; but they were not very serious. The principal one was that the Government had not prepared the canal for 14 feet of water. He made these complaints only in a spirit of kindness. He wanted to have the matter attended to a little differently from the way in which it had been done. He believed that the Minister of Public Works had stated, in 1875, that he would have the enlargement of the Welland Canal finished this year. He (Mr. McCallum) had said, in answer to him then, that he would do well if it were finished by 1880. He thought the hon. gentleman was really then referring to that portion of the work from Port Dalhousie to Mallette's Pond. The people were looking to this because the moment the canal was enlarged it would revolutionize the whole of the carrying trade on the inland waters of the country, and so the people were looking to every word spoken by the Minister of Public Works on the subject. He thought that he should be more cautions in his statements than he was last year. So far as the work from Port Dalhousie to Mallatt's Pond, which was above Thorold, was concerned, he believed it was under contract, and he had no fault to find with that work. He believed it would be a credit to the country and to those engaged in it, but at the same time he was exceedingly sorry that the Government did not give that portion of the canal 14 feet of water at once. It could be done 30 per cent. cheaper now than it could be hereafter, and he was satisfied that we would never get the trade of the West until we had 14 feet of water. He admired the tenacity of his hon. friend the First Minister in sticking to anything he undertook, but he would really beg him to consider this matter carefully in the interests of the country. From Mallatt's Pond to Allanburg they were going to make a new cut altogether, and he thought the Government should prepare it for 14 feet because they could do it much more cheaply and easily now than afterwards. They had 14 feet at Port Dalhousie; they were preparing for it at Port Colborne; they were going to build a new aqueduct and were preparing that for 14 feet; they had very little left. He believed the new cut from Mallatt's Pond to Allanburg for 14 feet of water was to cost $850,000. So far as this rock cutting at Port Colborne was concerned, if they looked at Mr. Page's report they would see that he said in 1870 that it would take more, or as much, to remove the water from the rock as to remove the rock itself. If the Government did not do it now for 14 feet they would have to do it hereafter, as their policy evidently was, if he rightly understood his hon. friend, to make the Welland Canal 14 feet deep. He would quote from Mr. Page's report in 1872, with respect to the expenditure on the feeder. Of course it was intended, in the first place, to allow the business of the canal to go through by the feeder for one continuous year, in order to allow them to do this rock cutting in the summer. That work had been abandoned after spending something like $150,000; and the work was all completed except about six culverts to be lowered down in order to give two feet more to the feeder. He knew that some members of the House had disapproved of it; but he had never said that this was Mr. Page's fault. Mr. Page was mistaken in this respect. He did not think it was the fault of Mr. Page, but the fault of the Government, who had not sustained Mr. Page in carrying out the work. To save the paltry expense of $15,000 or $20,000, two feet of water for 21 miles of navigation was to be lost. He was aware, of course, that this could not be done next summer, but next winter, and if such was the intention he hoped that it would be done at an early day. If they were to receive $250,000 additional revenue from the canal enlargement, the sooner the work was completed the better it would be. His hon. friend the Minister of Public Works had said they might use the old aqueduct with alterations; but he trusted that the Government would do nothing of the kind, as it would be only throwing money away. This canal should be prepared for fourteen feet of water. Mr. Page said, in reference to the rock cuttings and improvements on the feeder:

"To enlarge and deepen the rock cut below Port Colborne, will take at least three winters, if confined wholly to winter work, during which time this portion of the canal must be unwatered. This would not, however, interfere with that part of the canal below the junction, as it would, as usual, receive its supply from the feeder.

"In regard to your enquiry as to whether a scheme can be suggested by which a sufficient quantity of water can be introduced into the canal to guard against a scarcity such as was experienced during the past season, I beg to submit, for the consideration of the Department, the following remarks:

"Although the Grand River has failed, in periods of great drought, to afford the full supply for all the requirements of the present canal under existing arrangements, there is, even at these times, a large area of deep water above the dam at Dunville, from which it is quite probable the necessary quantity could be drawn, if the bottom of the feeder were at such a level as would permit of this being done.

"It is therefore proposed to deepen the feeder about two feet from the junction to the Port Maitland Branch at Broad Creek; thence continuing upwards to Dunville, where the additional depth would be fully 18 inches.

"All slips or accumulations found along the lower parts of the banks to be removed—the rank growth of weeds that partially obstruct the channel to be cleared away, and generally all such work done as may be found necessary to secure as free and uniform a flow of water as possible. This, if done, would doubtless afford the means of passing an increased supply at ordinary times; whilst at low water it would admit of a greater relative surface inclination, without materially diminishing the present sectional area, which, at such times, would, of course, greatly augment the flow.

"It is therefore believed that, were this suggestion acted upon, the recurrence of such difficulties as have hitherto been experienced in very dry seasons would, to a great extent, be avoided by a simple and practical remedy, the benefits from which might be secured at a reasonable cost, and without entailing any outlay whatever for future maintenance.

"There is also another advantage that would result from the carrying out of this scheme, the importance of which can scarcely be overrated when viewed in connection with the question of canal enlargement.

"The widening and deepening of the rock cut below Port Colborne is of itself a work that, under the most favourable circumstances, cannot fail to be attended with great difficulties, and these will be very much greater if the operations are confined solely to the winter months.

"In the latter case the work would have to be unwatered in sections, and the dams constructed for that purpose in the fall must be removed in the spring; at each recommencement of the operations that part of the canal to be proceeded with would have again to be entirely emptied by pumping.

"There is no other means of obviating this than to turn the navigation through the Port Maitland route, as was done when the present works between the junction and Port Colborne were in progress. This, the deepening of the feeder would admit of being carried out, in case the Grand River would supply the necessary volume of water.

"Hitherto there has been, in ordinary wet seasons, an abundance of water for all purposes connected with the present canal, with the feeder as it now is; but were it deepened two feet throughout to Port Maitland Lock, there would be at such times not only the means of admitting the supply, but also of passing vessels of the full dimensions and draught of those in use in the existing canal.

"The arrangements necessary for this purpose under the circumstances above mentioned, it is believed, could be effected without any serious inconvenience to the trade.

"To enable the time to be fixed when the route could be temporarily changed, the height of the Grand River would require to be noted and careful observations made of rain-fall during the early part of the summer which would doubtless enable a tolerably correct opinion to be formed as to when it would be judicious to close the line leading to Port Colborne.

"If a wet season were to occur within two years after the works of enlargement were commenced, and the route could be changed in the early part of July, it might reasonably be concluded that by proper arrangements nearly one year's uninterrupted work on the improvements would be secured.

"This would enable the operations between the junction and Port Colborne to be urged forward more expeditiously, and at less cost, than if they were protracted over a series of winters.

"There is reason to believe that the difficulties which might be anticipated in navigating the comparatively narrow channel of the feeder, would, to a great extent, be obviated by the formation of additional passing places.

"It must be evident that, were this route brought into use for a time, the execution of the new works would be greatly facilitated, and in this way the pressing demands of the trade met at a much earlier period.

"The cost of deepening and cleaning out the feeder as proposed, would be about $70,000, to which should be added $20,000 for additional passing places, or in all $90,000.

"I therefore advise that the necessary authority be obtained for this expenditure, so that arrangements can be made for the commencement of the work immediately after the opening of navigation next spring.

"By adopting this course the benefits to be derived from the improvement will be realized with the least possible delay."

Of course, the work would have to be done in winter, as in summer it would interfere with navigation. He did not think that it could be done in one or two years, but it would take several years; and this would give sufficient time to prepare the balance of the canal for fourteen feet. He was not as much interested in the canal enlargement as the members for Montreal, Kingston, Toronto and Quebec, who were deeply interested in its improvement; and he called upon them—especially those who were Ministerialists—to use their influence with the Government to secure the deepening of the canal to fourteen feet; and he was perfectly certain that, unless this was done, the expectations as to revenue would not be realised. If the Government did not change their policy in this respect, they would live to see that they were wrong, and that their policy was not in the interests of the country. Besides, if the depth was now increased to fourteen feet, the labour could be done 30 per cent. cheaper than would be the case in a few years; and the extra two feet of rock cutting could be done 100 or 200 per cent. cheaper than it could be done if the rock had to be again unwatered. There was every reason that this work should be pushed forward to completion without delay.

On Resolution 146, for Indians, Quebec, $2,200,

Mr. LANGEVIN said he hoped that the Government would not forget the present unfortunate condition of the Indians in the Province of Quebec. They were badly in need of additional aid; and they had been deprived of their fishing rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that since the recent discussion on the question they had not had time to look into it.

Mr. McCALUM.

He thought, however, that it would be better in the meantime to restore to these Indians their fishing rights.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he wished to call the attention of the First Minister to the report made by the Boundary Commissioners. Major Cameron's report had never been brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this report had not been made to them but to the Imperial Government. A printed copy had, however, been sent them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Have you any objection to bring it down?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not in the least.

On Resolution 170, unforeseen expenses, $50,000,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was of importance that this vote should be applied simply to expenses which were unforeseen. For instance, the expenses of His Excellency in British Columbia had been charged to this fund. It was known that His Excellency was going to visit that Province and there ought to have been a vote to cover the expense.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he felt the general justness of the hon. gentleman's remarks. It was not definitely known that the visit referred to would be made by His Excellency, owing to circumstances which he could not state.

Mr. MILLS said he had found on inquiry that the $5,000 expended for the British Columbia Indian Commission was taken out of the Indian appropriation for that Province, and not out of the unforeseen expenses as he at first stated.

Resolutions 171 to 186, and 188 to 192 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 193, Post Office, $1,769,800,

Mr. LANGEVIN asked whether the Government intended to increase the Postal Service between the West Indies and Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman would remember that two years ago the Government invited tenders for that service, more with a view of ascertaining the practicability of establishing a steamship line—ostensibly to carry the mails. The lowest tender received was $100,000 per annum, and they felt this was an amount which the country could scarcely afford. Since then the Government had been making inquiries about the trade which might be established with the West India Islands, which was a very difficult one to estimate. Very little of our national products could be established there with advantage. The people of those islands consumed a great deal of grain and flour, which they had been able to obtain cheaper, and in one respect better, from a market much nearer to them than ours. Our flour would not keep in the West Indies; it soured in a short time, and some new process for grinding would have to be adopted before we could trade in that article with the islands. There was also another difficulty. The most lucrative trade would be with Cuba, which was in a chronic state of insurrection, and therefore difficult to have any commercial dealings with. The other islands which were best for the purposes of trade were Havanna and Jamaica. But the whole question was surrounded with a great many difficulties, and while they had not given up the idea of establishing some new trade with the West Indies, the Government did not feel justified in asking for a vote for the purpose just yet.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he had no doubt the hon. the Premier had accurately estimated some of the difficulties in opening up a trade with the islands, but the House would admit that if we were to have an increase of trade with that part of the world it could only be done by obtaining more information on the subject. It might not be amiss if, during the recess, the Government would collect information in regard to the articles which could be exported to the West Indies—the quantity consumed, etc. Last autumn he directed his attention to this subject, and he sent some 30 or 40 circulars to parties in the islands, enclosing a list of 60 or 70 articles of our production, and asking for a return as to the quantities consumed and the season at which they were required. He had received a great many replies, and he would be glad to place the information thus acquired at the disposal of the Government if at any time they thought it would be of service. Of course we could only have a successful trade if we could import in return.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government would be glad to get the information the hon. gentleman possessed, and they would endeavour to collect such other information as would perhaps justify some action next Session.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he referred especially to the postal service, which must accompany the trade. If that service was not effected our commercial relations with the islands could not very well be increased. He knew that letters took a month and a month and a half in coming from the West Indies, and he knew of a case of a gentleman in Ottawa whose correspondence from those islands had taken two months to reach him.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Oh, no.

Mr. LANGEVIN: Perhaps it was sent to England before it came here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It takes a long time to reach the West Indies, even from New York, as there is only one boat a month.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Boats are leaving every week.

Mr. LANGEVIN: With a postal service of that kind, we cannot increase our commercial relations with the West Indies. As several of the Gulf steamers have stopped running on account of the railway competition, I think one or two of them might be given a subsidy to run to the West Indies and carry the mails.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he did not undervalue the importance of rapid communication with the West Indies.

If a subsidy were granted, the steamers could only go as far as St. Thomas. There was nothing for a steamer to carry on that route excepting the mails, and therefore it could obtain nothing except the Government subsidy, which would not be sufficient. There was a monthly mail from Halifax to the Bermudas, but it was so uncertain that they preferred to send their correspondence via the United States. Steamers ran to and from between the West Indies and New York, Charleston, S.C., New Orleans, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Sometimes they could not connect with the mail steamer at St. Thomas.

Mr. FORBES cited an instance where correspondence had been detained at St. Thomas a month. If the steamer from below was late, the other steamer would not wait at St. Thomas to connect.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the whole difficulty lay in the two steamers not connecting at St. Thomas. This happened once a year, and occasionally twice a year. Unless letters were sent to consignees at Philadelphia or Baltimore, they would probably be delayed several months.

ORDNANCE AND ADMIRALTY LANDS BILL.—[BILL No. 111.]

(Mr. Mills.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. JONES.

Mr. MASSON said this Bill gave enormous powers to the Government; it, in fact, put into their hands the disposition of all the lands belonging to the Ordnance, so that they could sell them by private sale to private individuals just as they chose. It was true that the Bill provided that only No. 2 class should be sold, but there was a proviso which made it optional with the Government to take any of the lands from one class and transfer them to the other. There should be some provision to restrict the powers of the Government in that respect, as otherwise they might be subject to pressure to force the sales.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the Bill divided the land into two classes, Nos. 1 and 2. Those in the first class were retained for the country and would not be sold, but the others could be sold the same as other land. All the fortifications and strategic points the Government possessed were included in those lands, and only those not required for military purposes should be disposed of. He thought the classification should take place during recess, and that the list should be submitted to Parliament for approval before any sales were completed. A great principle was involved in this question, and if great care was not exercised a blunder might be made which would be regretted for all time to come.

Mr. BLAKE said power was vested in the Governor in Council to sell a large portion of those lands. This measure would divide them into two classes—one of which would be retained for defensive purposes and the other would be sold. He went a considerable distance with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) in this matter. There was no doubt that the various forts ought not to be disposed of without the express sanction of Parliament, nor was it to be presumed such a thing would be attempted. They had found it very difficult to make a classification, and it was not possible to prepare a schedule of the two classes which would be made to present to the House this Session; he might say, however, that this would be attended to before next Session. It might be advisable to insert a provision to the effect that any sales made during recess should not be binding until they were submitted to Parliament. That appeared to be the best plan of giving a certain measure of elasticity, at the same time reserving Parliamentary supervision over the question of policy.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he thought the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Justice was a good one.

Mr. BARTHE said there were a great many of those lands at Sorel which formed part of the county he represented. He approved of the Bill, as he thought the lands ought to be sold; but he would like to have seen a clause in the measure providing that the sale should be by public auction, except when the land was required for some public purpose, and then the Government should have a certain amount of discretion. It was in the interest of the Government and the public to prevent speculation, and selling lands publicly would prevent anything of that kind. It was also in the interest of the localities that the lands should be sold, as they would pay taxes and so help on the towns.

Mr. MILLS said there would be some difficulty in carrying out the suggestion not to make any sales until sanctioned by Parliament. He would promise to bring down a schedule next Session showing what lands were in the first class and were not to be disposed of by the Government, but to be retained for military purposes. He quite agreed with the hon. member for Sorel (Mr. Barthe) that there should be no private sale, except in a few cases. In some instances, the land was of comparatively little value, and he thought compelling the sale by public auction would not work satisfactorily in regard to such lands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought that this property, whether of small or of large value, should be sold by public sale. When this property was transferred by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the old Province of Canada, the Government of the day had always drawn a clear distinction between this property and the other public lands of the Crown. In this regard they had no discretion; the Government were appointed trustees for the sale of the land, and a positive pledge was made by the Canadian to the Imperial Government that these lands should be sold to the best advantage, and that the price obtained should be vested for the support and defence of this country. The hon. gentleman would find that a special account had always been kept of the sale of these lands which were sold on valuation and at the highest possible price. The Government thought that they had no discretion, and that they could allow of no other consideration than that of actual value to intervene. It seemed to him it would be well that the land should be sold, and the Government rendered free from all responsibility in connection with the sale. In their day, and no doubt it was the case now suggestions were made and combinations formed here and there for the purpose of purchasing particular lands.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Such as the Sarnia lands?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. gentleman could tell all about the Sarnia lands. He did think that, for the comfort of his hon. friend with respect to these lands, they had better be sold by auction. The small parcels could be advertised with the other parcels, and then they would have no trouble about it.

Mr. HOLTON said he wished to say a word as to the policy of making concessions at nominal prices to municipal bodies or the public in this relation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You cannot do that with respect to these lands at all.

Mr. HOLTON said he was entirely opposed to this policy, and for this very simple reason, they had taken over these lands from the Imperial Government in consideration of undertaking certain duties with respect to the defence of the country and the maintenance of the militia. Now the price paid for this land was paid by the whole country. The valuable portions of the lands were chiefly situated within the limits or in the neighbourhood of the principal cities, as Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, Ottawa, Hamilton, Toronto, London, &c., and if these lands, which were of very considerable value, were to be donated to these communities, the general body of the tax-payers outside of them had to pay the price, and more than their share of it, in the shape of taxation for the maintenance of the militia and the defence of the country. It might be, he thought, fairly assumed that the residents of these cities were in as good a position as the average tax-paying population of the country to meet their own burdens, embellish their own towns, and acquire land for any public purpose whatever; and the policy, therefore, of donating or conceding at mere nominal prices considerable tracts of these Ordnance lands to municipalities was, in his opinion, a vicious one, founded on an erroneous principle, and unjust to the general body of the taxpayers outside of these cities.

Mr. PLUMB said that some of these lands might have a value which was not altogether apparent, such as being desirable for sportsmen, when situated along the shores of the lakes. They, consequently, might command high prices for various reasons. There was a large reserve of some 300 or 400 acres in the town of Niagara; and it was proposed to deal with about 64 acres of it, located at the mouth of the river. It would be, he thought, entirely unadvisable, under any circumstances, even though certain lands might not be very valuable, to sell them by private contract. He hoped that the sales would be left open to public competition, preventing the suspicion that anything unfair could be done by combinations or anything of that character.

QUEBEC HARBOUR ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 105.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES moved:

“That the Bill be not read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend the same by striking out paragraph 8 of clause 18, and to insert the following instead thereof:—On schooners and barges of from 25 to 100 tons, for each time the vessel uses the Harbour of Quebec, $1, or on each vessel for the season $5; on schooners and barges from 100 to 250 tons, $1 for the first 100 tons, and one cent for each ton over 100 tons, or $10 per annum.”

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that he had communicated with the Harbour Commissioners, who were opposed to the amendment. At present, from the vessels referred to in the clause in question, a revenue of $2,200 was obtained; and the expenses of collection amounted to $725, leaving $1,475 of clear revenue. The result, if the amendment were adopted, would be to reduce the revenue by about $1,000, and as the expenses of collection would be the same, the revenue would be lowered to about $475.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not think that they should disturb the arrangements made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If a clear revenue of $475 was all that would be obtained if the amendment were adopted, he thought that, in that case, these vessels might as well be admitted free. He would oppose the amendment.

Question put and amendment negatived on a division.

PROVINCIAL GREAT SEALS

BILL.—[BILL No. 115.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not propose to go into any lengthened details regarding the Bill, as the correspondence which had been laid on the table itself gave the history of the events that had led to the present difficulty. It would suffice to say that, shortly after Confederation, suggestions or directions were made for seals for the four Provinces as well as for Canada. In the 136th Section of the British North America Act, express provision was made empowering the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario and Quebec to alter, from time to time, the Great Seals of these Provinces; but no such provision was extended to the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The matter so stood for a number of years, until the question was raised in Nova Scotia, in a case before the Courts, as to whether or not the old seal was valid. Upon this question, although the case was disposed of on other grounds, the majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court seemed to have come to the conclusion that the new seal was the proper seal. Much excitement appeared to have been aroused for a time, as, of course, if this proposition was correct, the old seal, which had been used for so many years, was not the Great Seal, and any proceedings held under it would be void. The consequences, under these circumstances, would be serious. It appeared from the papers brought down, that the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia had taken several steps with the view of adjusting the difficulty. Amongst them were two Acts on the subject. The first vested in the Lieutenant-Governor in Council the power to alter the Great Seal; and the other recognized the validity of the Acts executed under the old seal. The third action taken by the Local Legislature was the passage of an address praying the Imperial authorities for power to alter the seal and to validate the acts executed under the old seal. The papers lately laid on the table would show that it was the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown,—and his own opinion was consonant therewith—that the Local Legislature had power to pass an Act to fix and change from time to time the Great Seal of the Province. It was their opinion, however, that the Dominion Parliament had better pass an Act validating these Acts executed under the old seal, and giving the Lieut.-Governors in Council of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the same powers in this respect as had been given to the other Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. He did not introduce the Bill without considerable reluctance. He presumed that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was that the Governor-General occupied the same position to the Lieut.-Governor as Her Majesty did to the Governor-General, and that, as Her Majesty had the power to appoint the Great Seal for Canada, so His Excellency the Governor-General might delegate the power to the Lieut. Governors of the Provinces in Council to appoint the seals for the Provinces. He confessed that it was a serious question whether this Legislature had the right to interfere, and that it would require the strongest possible evidence to show that any of the rights which, unquestionably, belonged to two of the Provinces did not belong to the others. He thought that the intention of the Imperial Act upon the subject was manifestly to place all the Provinces upon the same footing. Owing to the exceptional circumstances under which the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had been created, the recognizing power had been rendered necessary before the Executive Council could be appointed. It would seem, therefore, that the power to alter the Great Seal was rather recognized than given at that time. The power was implied to exist, but the British North American Act, which united them as a part of the Dominion and then disunited them into two Provinces, clearly, in his opinion, gave the respective Lieut.-Governors in Council power to alter the seals. As the Law Officers of the Crown suggested an Act of the Dominion Parliament, validating the acts executed under the old seal, and giving the Lieut.-Governor in Council power to alter the seal, could do no harm, while it might prevent any doubt in judicial proceedings.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Minister of Justice had acted, very properly in bringing down this Bill, as the judicial consequences from any delay or doubt might be very serious. He, therefore, thought that the adoption of the suggestion of the London law office was very judicious. He quite agreed with the interpretation of the British North America Act given by the hon. the Minister of Justice. He had been always of the opinion that the power given to the Lieut.-Governors of Ontario and Quebec had also been given to the Lieut.-Governors of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. However that might be, it was quite right that this legislation should take place to prevent any mischief.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

On Resolution 48, to meet expenses in connection with the consolidation of the Laws, $8,000 (reported February 27th),

Mr. BLAKE explained that he proposed to employ for the most laborious part of the work some young practitioners as secretaries, but he had not made any definite arrangements. He had arranged, however, to secure the services of Messrs. McPherson and Langton, who had been engaged on the work of consolidation of the Laws of Ontario. There were many difficulties in the way, and he had had to postpone the work.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

SUPPLY—PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved:

“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.”

Mr. TUPPER: Mr. Speaker, in rising to make the motion of which I gave notice to the House, I may say, at the outset, that I intend, so far as possible, in the remarks I shall have to make in reference to this very important question, to endeavour to pursue the course which the hon. the First Minister marked out for himself in the observations he addressed to the House on this subject yesterday. He said he intended to deal with the subject, apart from considerations of a party or political character. Now, I am afraid it will not be in my power altogether to pursue that course; but in dealing with a question of such magnitude as the policy of the Government in regard to the great national work of the country, I will confine myself, as much as I can, to a statement of the facts in regard to the course pursued by the Government as they present themselves to my mind, and, so far as may be possible, without drawing into the consideration of the question anything calculated to turn the attention of the House aside from the real merits of the subject under discussion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

It is fortunate that, at the outset, both parties are able to agree as to one point—that is, not only to the importance, but, I may add, the necessity of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. the First Minister has himself, on more than one occasion, given to the House his own emphatic opinion that the construction of this work was a matter of the gravest public necessity. It is quite impossible for any person to look at the position that Canada occupies without arriving at that conclusion. We had obtained possession of a vast and magnificent country—the fertile prairies of the North-West—and it became at once apparent that if that boundless field for cultivation and for settlement, a country in extent and fertility not to be surpassed by any country on the face of the globe were to be utilized and made to subserve the interests of Canada as it ought to subserve them, means of rapid and easy intercommunication between the old and settled portions of Canada and that fertile section of country, the prairies of the North-West should be established as early as possible. Then, when we came to look at the position which British Columbia occupied, the necessity became still greater. The importance of adding British Columbia to the consolidated British North American Provinces comprised in the Dominion of Canada, requires no argument at my hands. It was only necessary to look at the position of British Columbia occupied, extending along a considerable portion of the Pacific coast, and lying in proximity to our neighbours to the south of the line, to see that, if we were to derive the advantages desirable, that if this country was to obtain the consolidation that was necessary, it was certainly necessary that, at as early a period as possible a line of railway should be established from one end of this country to the other, uniting and consolidating it. It was under that impression that the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway became a part of the policy of the late Government. It is quite true that measures had been suggested, and suggested by parties from that Province, which, while involving the necessity for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, deferred to a more remote period the accomplishment of the work; but when the Government came to examine and investigate the whole of that question, they came to the conclusion that the most economical mode—the mode most advantageous to the interests of British Columbia, as well as of all Canada—would be to enter upon that work, and, if possible, secure, as far as the means of the country would permit, the construction of that railway as promptly as was possible. A great deal has been said with regard to the arrangements made on that occasion. It would not have been necessary for me at this time to direct the attention of the House for a single instant to the legislation which has taken place, or to the proceedings in Parliament in reference to this question, but for a statement, which, I am sure, was inadvertently made by the hon. the First Minister on a former occasion,—that down to 1873 no scheme for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway had been propounded. The House will remember that on the 1st of April, 1871 (and I will only turn to public records in regard to these matters, if hon. gentlemen should question the statement I am making to the House), the address containing the terms of Union between British Columbia and Canada was passed in this House. Hon. members will remember that during the progress of the discussion on the question of the terms upon which British Columbia should be admitted as a part of this Dominion, great exception was taken to the undertaking, that the surveys for the railway should be immediately commenced, vigorously prosecuted and the road itself constructed within ten years. After a good deal of controversy in regard to this matter, the late lamented Sir George Cartier, who was then leading the House in the absence of the right hon. member for Kingston who was then in Washington, with a view to set at rest all doubts on that point, and to remove from the minds of every person any misapprehension or fear that the financial position of the country would be too seriously involved by undertaking to carry out so great a work, moved a resolution defining the terms and limiting distinctly the engagement we were undertaking. That resolution declared that the road should only be constructed as a private undertaking, that all the Government had to do was to provide a grant of money and of land such as the ability of the country would enable it to give, and that the construction of the work should not involve an increase in the rate of taxation. I will read the resolution to the House, in order that its terms may be distinctly understood. It is as follows:—

“That the railway referred to in the Address to Her Majesty, concerning the Union of British Columbia with Canada, adopted by this House on Saturday, the 1st of April, instant, should be constructed and worked by private enterprise and not by the Dominion Government; and that the public aid to be given to secure that undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidy in money or other aid, not unduly pressing on the industries and resources of the Dominion, as the Parliament of Canada shall hereafter determine.”

Now, although a good many points were the subjects of controversy between the two sides of the House between the late Government and hon. gentlemen who were in opposition to that Government, this question was not one of them. The policy propounded in the resolution submitted by Sir George Cartier commended itself not only to the judgment of the supporters of the Government, but to both sides of the House, without a single exception. The only objection taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to the resolution, which seemed to be sufficiently distinct in its terms, was, not any doubt as to the policy proposed, but it was held that the terms were not strong enough in declaring that the road should not be constructed by the Dominion Government; and Mr. Dorion, then a member of this House, moved in amendment to add to the motion, not to alter a word in it to change any part of its terms, the words “and not otherwise.” The object was to make it stronger. We held that the resolution which declared that the railway should not be constructed by the Dominion Government, but that it should be constructed by a private company, aided by a grant of land and money, was sufficiently strong, and rendered it impossible for any Government, without the express sanction of this House, to endeavour for a single moment to depart from these terms. The hon. the First Minister has characterized the engagement made by the Parliament of Canada, as stated by me to the House, in very strong terms. He has, as will be seen on reference to the debate in 1876, used the following language:—

“Let me say, so far as the work is concerned, that I have always been an advocate of the construction of a railway across the continent, but I have never believed that it was within our means to do it in anything like the period of time within which the hon. gentleman bound Parliament and the country.”

I am glad to be able to establish that point which will be conceded by every one, that the hon. gentleman had always been a strong advocate of the construction of this railway across the continent. So as to the main question regarding the necessity of the work, it will be found that both sides of the House agree. The hon. gentleman continued :

“I believe the bargain was an act of madness—of utter insanity, and an evidence of political incapacity that has had no parallel in this or in any other country, that I am aware of.”

The language contained in that statement is very strong, and it will become my duty in a few moments to turn the attention of the House to the position which the Government occupied on that question, which the hon. gentleman felt himself warranted in characterising as an “act of madness and utter insanity.” It will be remembered that the address passed the House on the 1st day of April, and on the 11th the resolution which I have just read was passed, preventing the Government undertaking to construct the Pacific Railway until they could obtain a private company, who, with such a grant of lands and money as the country could afford, without increasing the taxation of the people, would undertake the work.

MR. TUPPER.

That last clause might, on the surface, seem somewhat unreasonable, but I will call the attention of the House to this fact: That, during the first seven years of Confederation, as the hon. the Finance Minister was able to prove by public documents in London, we had not only carried on liberally the public service, and reduced the rate of taxation $2,000,000 per annum, but we had also contributed something like $16,000,000 to capital expenditure, including the sinking fund, causing the reduction of the public debt to that amount from the surplus revenue. If hon. gentlemen will remember that, they will see that it was quite within the power of the Government to undertake the work without increasing the rate of taxation at all. I may be asked “What reason have you to suppose that the prosperity of the country would continue?” In reply, I will ask any hon. member what he believes the result of the accomplishment of the scheme of the late Government would have been in relation to the financial condition of Canada to-day. Suppose the late Government had succeeded in doing that which they endeavoured to accomplish—floating that scheme in London for the construction of the railway upon the terms stated—I would ask any hon. gentleman what the result would have been of bringing such an enormous amount of foreign capital into the country, giving early, complete and rapid communication with the great fertile prairies of the North-West, and pouring an enormous tide of immigrants into that country to become taxpayers with ourselves, and to lighten the burdens which now rest upon our own shoulders. I think that there is not an hon. member in this House who would not be ready to believe that, had it been possible to accomplish what was proposed under this scheme, and to secure the construction of this railway on the terms stated, that the steadily rising tide of Canada’s prosperity would not have stopped, or, at all events, that we should have maintained the position which we then occupied. But I may be told that it was on the first of April that the Address was passed, and that it was not until the 11th that it was qualified by this resolution. The House must remember that we were not dealing with a foreign Power or with parties who were prepared to take any rigid or technical advantage of the Government; but we were dealing with those who were to be a portion of ourselves, who would have a common interest with ourselves in having the work prosecuted in the way most advantageous to the country, and who would be deeply interested that the financial credit of Canada should not be imperilled, or that any result should follow which would be injurious to the country to which they had irrevocably linked their own fortunes. But I have still more conclusive evidence in relation to that matter. It will be remembered that when the Address was passing the House we had then present in Ottawa some of the delegates from British Columbia, who had been authorized to represent the Province in those negotiations, and prominent among them was Mr. Trutch, the late Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia. I will trouble the House for a few moments by reading an extract from the speech he made at the banquet provided for his entertainment. He said:—

“We from British Columbia were prepared to accept the amendment of the scheme, and we accordingly proceeded to calculate the time it would probably take to build the railroad, and we agreed upon an estimated period of ten years. If it had been put at twelve or fifteen years, British Columbia would have been just as well satisfied, and if the estimated period had been reduced to eight years, she would scarcely have been better pleased. But some definite period for the completion of this work the British Columbians insisted on as a necessary safeguard to our colony in entering into the proposed union. To argue that any other interpretation will be placed upon the railway engagement by British Columbia than that which I have given to you as my construction of it, to argue that she expects it to be carried out in the exact interpretation of the words themselves, regardless of all consequences, is a fallacy which cannot bear the test of common sense.

“The case stands thus: British Columbia is about to enter into a partnership with Canada, and one of the terms of the articles of partnership is, that we are, under the partnership, to construct a railroad upon certain conditions. Is British Columbia going to hold her partner to that which will bring ruin and bankruptcy upon the firm?

Surely you would think us fools indeed, if we adopted such a course. I would protest, and the whole of British Columbia would protest, if the Government proposed to borrow $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 to construct this road; running the country into debt, and taxing the people of British Columbia as well as of the rest of the Dominion, to pay the burden of such a debt.”

I will not occupy the time of the House by reading further, but the speech is much longer, and has a great deal more in it to the same purpose. What I have read, however, contains the point of the case. Well, Sir, the Minister of Finance in introducing his Budget Speech in 1874, also alluded to this question; and as a great deal has been said by the First Minister who has used the terms “madness, insanity and utter incapacity” in connection with this act on the part of the late Government, I may, perhaps, be excused for taking up a little of the time of the House in meeting and, I think, disposing of at once and forever, I trust with all reasonable men, any charge based on such terms as those. In referring to this resolution, which qualified this engagement, the Minister of Finance said:

“So very strong was the feeling that it was afterwards determined that a certain resolution should be placed on the Journals of the House, which, indeed, was actually done, and by which it was declared that, although we had committed ourselves to this claim, it was only on condition that the road should be made in a certain fashion, and that no excessive burden should be placed on the resources of the country.”

It would be difficult, Sir, to find language more appropriately or more lucidly conveying exactly what the action of the late Government and of Parliament in this matter had been. He also says:—

“I have also been informed that the British Columbia delegates were themselves assenting parties to this resolution.”

“That, however, I do not know of my own personal knowledge. This I do know, that I myself called the attention of Sir George Cartier, the then Minister of Militia, to this extraordinary provision, asking him if he had communicated it to the Legislature of British Columbia. Some one of the delegates was then sitting near the chair of the Speaker, I am not sure which of them, but I think it was Governor Trutch.”

Sir George Cartier's reply was that :

"There was no need to do so, because the delegates were fully cognizant of the whole matter and were assenting parties thereto. And, although I do not say we can or will dissent from the consequences of our legal obligations, I do say that at any rate the people of British Columbia had very fair notice of what the intention and meaning of this House was when these obligations were undertaken."

I give this, Sir, as the testimony—I will not say of a hostile witness—but of an hon. gentleman, who was disposed himself to criticise, with a great deal of severity, the course which the late Government had pursued in entering into this engagement. Then we had recess at six o'clock, and the hon. gentleman returned at 7.30 o'clock and resumed his speech. He had investigated the matter in the meantime, and he then made some further observations which I will read to the House. He says :

"Before I proceed further, I desire to correct an error that I fell into with regard to the resolution of April, 1871, passed after the treaty with British Columbia was agreed to. I had been under the impression that that resolution declared that the Pacific Railway should be built without unduly increasing the taxation of Canada. The actual text is stronger still. Sir George Cartier moved and Mr. Tilley seconded a resolution setting forth that the railway referred to in the Act concerning the union between British Columbia with Canada, adopted on Saturday, the 1st of April, should be constructed by a company formed of private individuals, and not by the Dominion Government; that the company building it should be assisted by liberal money subsidies and liberal grants of land, provided always, that no increase of the then rate of taxation should hereafter be determined on in consequence."

The hon. gentleman, in revising his speech, has very properly put the words "no increase" in italics, it being the strongest feature of the resolution. The hon. gentleman continued :—

"That, Sir, was the resolution placed upon our Journals on the motion of Sir George E. Cartier, seconded by Mr. Tilley. It was of value for the reason I have alluded to, because it was represented to us at the time it was passed that the delegates from British Columbia were assenting parties thereto."

Mr. TUPPER.

Now, Sir, I think that I am not required to take up much more time on that feature of the subject, but I may say that following up the resolution meeting the engagement which the late Government assumed, and which Parliament assumed in relation to this matter, it became the duty of the Government to bring before the House what they considered a liberal grant of land and a sufficient aid in public money in order to accomplish this work without increasing the rate of taxation; and, Sir, we submitted to the House resolutions which will be found on the 145th page of the Journals of 1872, declaring that this House would grant $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land for that work; and we also provided, in addition to this, that the Pembina Branch should be embraced in the resolutions, and should have a subsidy of 20,000 acres of land, and that the branch connecting the line with Lake Superior should have a subsidy of 25,000 acres of land per mile. Now Sir, we may leave the Lake Superior branch out of consideration altogether, for this reason: it was then supposed that it would be absolutely necessary to go north of Lake Nipigon in order to obtain a line at all, but by subsequent surveys it has been found, and on both sides of the House it has been agreed, and both the late and present Governments were quite agreed on the question, that, as matters now stand, whenever the main line is constructed, at whatever time that may be, that a fair, passable line has been found skirting the shores of Lake Superior within some ten miles of Lake Superior, and, therefore, this disposes altogether of this question of branches, with the exception of the Pembina Branch. We therefore committed the House and country distinctly to the undertaking of providing $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land for any company found possessed of sufficient means and resources to undertake the construction of that work. The First Minister has again and again referred in very strong terms to the inadequacy of that appropriation; but, Sir, I think I may draw the attention of the House to the fact that we have better evidence than that of any opinion the First Minister is capable of giving on this question. The First Minister is a gentleman of undoubted talent and ability and of high standing in the country; and although I do not suppose that he is at all wanting in appreciation of his great powers, I am quite certain that he will not himself undertake to put his judgment, on a purely commercial question against the opinions of many other gentlemen who are to be found in the country; and when I tell him that the very ablest men—I am not speaking of gentlemen connected with the late Government or having political sympathies with it—who have shown by their successful commercial enterprises, and by their great financial ability, they had been able to acquire vast fortunes for themselves, thus giving the best evidence to the country of their ability to judge on commercial questions—were most eager to obtain acts of incorporation to enable them to undertake the construction of this work on the terms proposed, when I state that, I shall give the House better evidence than any opinion of the First Minister, that the scheme was not a bad scheme, that there was no insanity in the proceedings, and that, in fact, it was one which at that time and in the light of information then obtained in this country upon this subject, was regarded by the first commercial minds of Canada as an eminently practical scheme. When I give the names of the Hon. Mr. McMaster and the Hon. David Christie and, also the present hon. Minister of Customs, who shows himself possessed of financial ability as far as investing money and the transaction of business goes, I give hon. gentlemen the best evidence that it was not a wild visionary scheme, but that it was a practical scheme which commended itself to the judgments of those best able to form an opinion in relation to it. What were the consequences to the late Government? Was this proposition to give 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 in money regarded as utterly inadequate? No; the late Government was destroyed in a desperate struggle between the first commercial men of all parties in Canada to obtain possession of the Charter on those terms. I do not require to occupy the time longer to show that we were not open to the charge of proposing anything visionary or illusionary. It was a solid substantial project which, if carried out, would have accomplished untold benefits to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite will all admit that the greatest boon which could be conferred upon Canada would be the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway upon those terms. They were all agreed upon that. We are all agreed upon the desirability of this work, which would be of such immense advantage to Canada, being secured under the terms which Parliament was induced to grant for that purpose. The scheme was defeated. I am afraid if I were to go into that branch of the question I should be doing what I said I would not do, namely, that I would not say anything that could be understood as directed by party feeling or political sentiment, and that I would not for a single moment divert the attention of the House from the question under consideration. But I believe the time will, if it has not already come, when it will be regarded as the greatest misfortune the country ever suffered that that scheme was defeated, and that hon. gentlemen should have—I am afraid I must say in the interest of party—adopted measures to defeat it, which not only prevented its accomplishment by those who had then undertaken to deal with the work, but had thrown almost insuperable obstacles in the way of their successors or of any other Government. However, it was done, rightly or wrongly, justly or unjustly. The late Government were defeated, and hon. gentlemen opposite were charged with the important duty of governing the country, and one of the greatest and most important duties that devolved upon them was the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am bound to say that it is deeply to be lamented that party considerations ever entered into this question. It is a question so gigantic in its proportions, and of such enormous interest and importance to the country, that it demanded then, as it demands now, that party considerations should be left entirely in abeyance; and that men of all parties and of all classes should unite, and endeavour to assist, whoever may be the Government of the day, in any wise or judicious measures that are calculated to accomplish the object. I may not be able to look dispassionately upon questions in which the Government are concerned, but, as far as I am able to do so, it is my desire, as it ought to be of every hon. member of this House and every patriotic man of whatever party, to assist any Government in carrying forward any wise or judicious measures, by which a work so important may become accomplished. And now came the great test of finding out whether hon. gentlemen in power carried out the views they held when in Opposition. Hon. gentlemen were called upon to deal with this question, and I am bound to say, that they have not maintained in power the principles they professed when they sat upon the Opposition benches. I have shown that the hon. Mr. Dorion moved a resolution on the matter, and that the House was unanimous upon the question as to how the road was to be constructed. But, not satisfied with the clear, unqualified declaration that the road was not to be built by the Dominion Government, he wanted to add a "rider" to declare "and not otherwise," so as to make it impossible for the road to be built except by a private company, aided by a grant of land and money from the Government. I think the hon. member for Chateauguay seconded that resolution; but, at all events, I am able to say that the gentlemen sustaining the present First Minister voted a solid and unanimous vote with Mr. Dorion in reference to that question. This gave to the country the most unqualified and solemn pledge that public men can give to a people, that if they obtained power they would carry out the policy to which they had thus committed themselves. The hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government was called upon to form an Administration, and he had to present himself before his constituents. The late Government had, before that, appealed to the country, and their policy had been sustained. The hon. gentleman, when he went before his constituents, without any sanction from the members of the House, without Parliament having been consulted, constructed a new platform and declared his intention of building the road as a Government road. The reason he adduced was that the profits which would go to the contractors under the original scheme would go to the people. I will read the words of the hon. gentleman from the organ of the Government, and an organ which the hon. gentleman will hardly be able to repudiate, because upon the testimony of an hon. member of this House, it was an organ to which he had himself contributed a very large sum of money, in order to buy it over from an Opposition paper into an organ of the Government. I refer to the Times of this city, which reported the hon. gentleman as follows:

"It will be the duty, as I think it will be the desire of the Government, to develop any plan by which these results are to be accomplished. * * * Any profit, Sir, that would have come to the share of the company will ultimately fall, under our scheme, to the share of the country. * * * It may be necessary for us to let the work out in contracts, under our own superintendence, but, at any rate, we shall take care that our attention is given to the interests and money of the country."

True to the course the hon. gentleman stated there, he introduced a Bill providing for the construction of this work by the Government, giving the Government power to deal with the whole of this work from end to end as a Government work. The hon. gentleman says that measure passed the House unanimously. He is hardly candid, Sir, in making such a statement to this House, if he means the House and the country to believe that it met the concurrence of all the members of this House. He must remember, or, if matters of too great importance have rendered him forgetful of it, I remember that the Bill was rushed through this House at a late hour of the night, the Government refusing, when the Opposition entreated them to give them more time, to delay it and give time for further consideration. He knows that, under the Saxby gale, under the great tidal wave of political excitement which swept over the country in 1874, the Opposition were under great disadvantage; he knows that we were taunted, as, happily, we cannot be taunted now, with being a corporal's guard, and I admit that we were not strong enough to protect the interests of the country as an Opposition is bound to protect them, and as, I am happy to say, we are able to protect them in this House to-day. When the hon. gentleman says, however, it was unanimous, he makes the statement in face of the fact that I myself spoke in my place in the House—spoke much longer, no doubt, than was pleasant to the hon. gentleman and many of his supporters—against the enactment of that measure, and declared that I regarded the undertaking to build this Canadian Pacific Railway by the Government, apart from the policy previously sanctioned by Parliament and the people, as one which could not commend itself to the House, and would be fraught, I was afraid, with disastrous results to the country. There was, at all events, a very strong feeling on the part of the Opposition that the hon. gentleman was taking a step from which he was precluded by his past policy and pledged action in the House, and which, in our judgment, at all events, the public interests did not sanction. But the hon. gentleman also superadded to that the Georgian Bay branch. Let me say a single word in reference to that measure: It is known that I strenuously opposed in this House the proposal for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. Why did I oppose it? It was because I regarded the abandonment of the policy of securing at an early day the construction of a direct line of railway from Nipissing to the great prairies of the North-West, as a great misfortune for the people of this country. I regarded carrying a line of railway to a lake which would be frozen six or seven months in the year as involving a large expenditure without the country ever receiving any commensurate advantage. I did not oppose it on its own merits, but in contrast to that route for which I felt the valley of the Ottawa had been intended by nature. If anyone looks at the configuration of this conti-ment, if anyone looks at the position of this Dominion to-day, if anyone will regard the four millions of Canadians who are settled in this portion of the country, and the great fertile prairies of the North-West that would require the construction of, perhaps, a thousand miles of railway to bring us in connection with them, he must feel that we are throwing away perhaps one of the greatest possible advantages to be derived from the construction of this great national highway, if we adopt any expedient by which we should relegate to the remote future completion of a direct line of railway to the valley of the Ottawa, bringing us the products of the North-West, inhabited, as it would be at no distant date, by millions of intelligent, thrifty, industrious people. But the hon. gentleman felt, Sir, that the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch was a matter of such vital necessity that we could not afford to wait a moment, that, notwithstanding his pledges and all his declarations that parliamentary government required that every appropriation of public money should be first sanctioned by Parliament, he must take carte blanche to construct that work without the formality of submitting the contract to Parliament, and he obtained the sanction of his supporters to carry it on in that way, and a large sum of money was placed at his disposal to carry out that policy. And, Sir, his policy embraced the subsidizing of lines of railway both in Ontario and Quebec. A good deal of controversy has arisen as to what he meant by his declaration in his manifesto that he purposed to subsidize lines of railway in Ontario and Quebec to connect the Georgian Bay Branch with the system here. We all know now that the subsidy to the Canada Central is the prominent feature in connection with that policy, but I took the opportunity of asking the hon. gentleman when making his statement in 1874—he was good enough to allow me to interrupt him by asking: "Are you to subsidize one branch or two branches?" Are you to connect with the railways from Toronto as well as with the railways in this section of the country? And his answer was: "Two branches." So whatever policy he may have adopted afterwards, his policy then was to give subsidies to connect with the Toronto system, as well as with the Ottawa system of railways. I only make allusion to that in passing. But, as I have stated, the matter of the Georgian Bay Branch was considered so pressing and of such vital interest that the hon. gentleman took power to exempt the contract made in regard to it from the control of this House. The hon. gentleman has also undertaken the construction of a railway from Thunder Bay to Red River. I hold that was a contravention of the Act, and I will tell the hon. gentleman briefly why. The Act for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway provided that it should be divided into four sections. The Act read :—

“The whole line of the said railway, for the purpose of its construction, shall be divided into four parts; the first section to begin at a point near to and south of Lake Nipissing, and to extend towards the upper or western end of Lake Superior, to a point where it shall intersect the second section hereinafter mentioned.”

Now, where is that point. The hon. gentleman told us yesterday—he did not require to do so, because Mr. Fleming in his report has pointed it out, as will be seen by reference to the 55th page—that it is not the intention that the commencement of the line at Thunder Bay shall be any other than a branch. Mr. Fleming says :—

“A practical route, without excessively heavy works, is reported, establishing the fact that the trunk line from the prairie to the eastern terminus in Ontario may, in the future, be carried in a direct course, without making a detour to Thunder Bay. The line now under construction to Fort William will then constitute a short branch from the main line to the navigation of Lake Superior.”

The hon. gentlemen provided by his Act, by the construction of two branches—the Georgian Bay Branch and the Pembina Branch. That was all; the rest were to be the four sections, and in the Act it is declared that the first section shall run to the point where it intersects the second section running on to Red River. The hon. gentleman told us this would be a branch from Thunder Bay of 25 or 30 miles. Those who have looked at Mr. Fleming's map will see that if anything is to be judged from the configuration of the country from the line traced there that it would be near sixty or seventy miles, certainly much nearer fifty miles than 25 or 30 miles. I hold, therefore, that the hon. gentleman, in departing from the policy to which he was committed by his speech introducing this subject, in which he spoke of Nepigon as the particular point of intersection, has made a mistake, and that the construction of that branch is without authority, and that there is no appropriation of public money which can legally be used for that purpose. The hon. gentleman admitted himself yesterday that the bay where the trunk line would approach Lake Superior near Nepigon Bay, would be easier of access from Sault St. Marie, from the objective point, than Thunder Bay. We all know that very elaborate evidence was submitted in the report of the Chief Engineer to establish the fact that there is no point except Nepigon Bay which would have been equally beneficial to the country, and avoided altogether the construction of this branch or any detour to run in that direction. Therefore, in that respect, the hon. gentleman has acted without law, and constructed what has been done without appropriation from Parliament. But I now come to a much more important feature of the policy of the hon. gentleman than any which I have yet criticised—the terms made by the hon. gentleman with Lord Carnarvon—the solemn treaty entered into between the Government of British Columbia, and binding the Government also to the Imperial Government. I have shown that every step taken by the House up to the change of Government, was taken under the guard provided in the resolution—that the road should be constructed by a private company, aided by grants of land and money; and that all obligations we had incurred in relation to British Columbia or the Imperial Government, or anybody else, were all limited by the open and avowed policy declared by that resolution. I may say that the effect of that resolution could not be better illustrated than by the fact the hon. gentleman himself, when he found it necessary in his own defence to quote that resolution, quoted it as an unanswerable argument to British Columbia. I will now refer to a Minute of Council passed December 20th, 1875, which says:—

“It must be borne in mind that every step in the negotiations was necessarily predicated upon and subject to the conditions of the resolution of the House of Commons passed in 1871, contemporaneously with the adoption of the Terms of Union with British Columbia, subsequently enacted in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1872, and subsequently enacted, after a large addition had been made to the rate of taxation, in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874; that the public aid to be given to secure the accomplishment of this undertaking should consist of such ‘liberal grants of land, and such subsidies in money or other aid, not increasing the then rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada should thereafter determine.’”

One of the complaints made against the hon. the First Minister is that he is inclined to be an autocrat. One of the complaints is that while courting the sweet voices of the people he spoke of the necessity of a Ministry having the authority of Parliament and the sanction of the people for every important act in which they were engaged but that no sooner did he get the high position which he now fills than he seemed to throw off all Parliamentary restraint, and to regard his own ipse dixit and the opinions of the Ministry with which he is associated as the only power to be recognized, or the only one to which he required to pay any attention. The hon. gentleman made an engagement, which will only occupy a moment in reading, and which will be found extended at length at page 511, Hansard, 1875. This engagement was made in November, 1876, during the recess of Parliament, after the Session in which he obtained power to deal with the whole question as a Government work, taking it entirely out of the category of a private enterprise. But still we had, as the hon. gentleman admits, re-enacted the clause providing that the work should not be proceeded with any faster than could be done without increasing the existing rate of taxation.

I myself have a strong opinion as to the extent to which that resolution was qualified by the clause the hon. gentleman caused to be inserted in the Act of 1874, and where the terms of the resolution itself was departed from by taking power to construct the railway as a Government work which the resolution required could only be done by a private company. The hon. gentleman engaged to expend two millions per annum in British Columbia and to commence the railway the moment that the surveys were completed, and if the hon. gentleman has determined to spend another year in additional surveys, and surveys with reference to points, as far as the location of the route is concerned, which I stated yesterday, appear to me to be uncalled for—some little consolation for that state of things may, perhaps, be found in the fact that he was bound under those terms and is bound under those terms, to expend two millions per annum on the road immediately on the completion of the surveys in British Columbia, and it was just possible, in the existing state of things, that the hon. gentleman does not feel himself quite prepared to engage in the expenditure of two millions per annum in British Columbia, in the present condition of public affairs. These terms, which are of a very extraordinary character, are detailed substantially as follows:—

“Lastly, that on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the Railway shall be completed and open for traffic from the Pacific seaboard to a point at the West end of Lake Superior, at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of railway through a portion of the United States, and also with the navigation on Canadian waters.”

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, as I have stated, first took power to construct this work directly by the Government and then made a solemn binding treaty with British Columbia and the Imperial Government, that by 1890 this work should be constructed and completed from the Pacific coast to the shores of Lake Superior. What is the distance between these points? It is something like, according to the Chief Engineer's statement, 2,022 miles over which the road was to be built; and the hon. gentleman made this engagement without the slightest qualification or the slightest provision that it was not to increase the existing rate of taxation. He made a binding, solemn treaty, and the good faith of the Government of this country was pledged as far as a Minister—and a Minister has power to pledge it to a great extent—could pledge it without consultation with the House; and, without the knowledge of the House, the hon. gentleman entered into this engagement. In inviting his attention to it I would like to ask him whether the act of the late Government in engaging to subsidise with $30,000,000 of money and 50,000,000 acres of land a Company to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, was a madder scheme, a more insane scheme, or a scheme exhibiting greater incapacity than was this scheme proposed by an hon. gentleman holding the views which he did in reference to the character of that work, as stated by himself. Sir, over his own signature previous to the appeal made to the people, he published a manifesto containing the views and opinions of the Government in relation to this matter, and giving his opinion as to the cost of this work. He stated, Sir, in that manifesto, in January, 1874, his views in reference to this work at some considerable length:—

“In the meantime, with a view to obtain a speedy means of communication across the continent, and to facilitate the construction of the railway itself, it will be our policy to utilize the enormous stretches of magnificent water communication which lie between a point not far from the Rocky Mountains and Fort Garry, and between Lake Superior and French River on the Georgian Bay, thus avoiding, for the present, the construction of about 1,300 miles of railway, estimated to cost from sixty to eighty millions of dollars, and rendering the resources of the country available for the prosecution of those links.”

Now, Sir, in this statement, and I shall draw the attention of the House to it by-and-bye, the hon. gentleman estimated the saving of the 600 miles between Nipissing and Nepigon, and between Red River and the remaining 700 miles westward—because these were the water stretches and the only water stretches he covers in his manifestos—he estimated that 1,300 miles of railway, 700 miles of it through the prairie region, at from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000. That 1,300 miles of this road, and that, not the most unfavourable portion of it, more than half being prairie country, was going to cost between sixty and eighty millions of dollars; and in the face of that declaration, which I presume he would not make without having gone into some calculations with reference to it, the lowest calculation involving an enormous expenditure of money, this engagement was made by the hon. gentleman without any reserve, and without the slightest qualification as to whether the resources of the country would admit of it. Now, as we stood up to that period, we had a safety valve, and a clause exempting the country from being plunged headlong into a ruinous expenditure, but this was all swept away by the hon. gentleman who presented himself to this House with the declaration that this was a binding treaty which he had made, not only with a portion of ourselves, with our fellow citizens in British Columbia, but also with the Imperial Government, which was solemnly called on to take part in the negotiations effecting that arrangement. Now, Sir, I would draw the attention of the House for one moment to this question as one of great importance, because it has involved the most serious charge against the hon. gentleman and his Government that was ever made, or that ever could be made against any Government; it has involved the charge of bad faith. I hold, Sir, that serious as were the financial arrangements and great as were the pecuniary difficulties with which he surrounded this question, that by this arrangement, even that sank into insignificance compared with the question of having the good faith of the Government of Canada challenged, not only by the Province, and the important Province of British Columbia, a portion of ourselves, but also, Sir, broadcast throughout the world, through Great Britain and wherever the name of Canada was known. Up to that hour, Sir, no spot, no stain could rest on the reputation of the Government of Canada with relation to any engagement that it had ever made; but, I say that the charge of bad faith was brought against, and has been sustained against, the hon. gentleman, by arguments and by evidence so conclusive as to involve great trouble and great difficulty, I am afraid, on his part, in order to extricate himself from it; and as, Sir, there is no advantage to be gained in concealing from ourselves the true nature of the case, and as it is the painful duty of the surgeon, occasionally, as the first step towards the cure, to probe a wound to the very bottom, I feel myself called upon, for a few moments, to touch upon and examine that most important feature of this question. I may be told that I have had my answers, and that, too, from a very high quarter;—that His Excellency the Governor General, who has the best, and the most intimate means of judging of Ministers, has, in distinct and unqualified terms, exonerated, at all events, the Prime Minister from any charge of bad faith in relation to this matter. I cannot allow that, Sir, to prevent me dealing with the subject, but I shall touch on that point as delicately as possible, as I feel that the distinguished gentleman who rightly enjoys the confidence of the people of this country as few Governor-Generals have done before, that men of all parties, and men of all classes recognize in him a gentleman who has devoted himself, heart and soul, to the best interests of Canada; and because no person will question his entire honesty in making the statement which he did, in reference to this matter. I will not discuss the question, Sir, of its constitutionality; but I say that it is one of the most serious charges against this Government, that they should render it necessary for the representative of the Crown to come down from the exalted position he holds, and take part in the discussion of political questions that agitate the country. Now, Sir, I say that the evidences of the breach of faith that have been raised on the part of the people of British Columbia, have not, in my judgment, been raised without a good deal of foundation. It will be remembered that the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Justice, then occupied an independent position in this House, and a very independent position at that moment; put a question on the notice paper. It was a very serious question, and it appears in the Votes and Proceedings on the 4th of March, 1875:—

“Mr. BLAKE—on Monday next—Enquiry of Ministry—Whether the Government intend to propose to Parliament any measure on the subject of the readjustment of the Terms of Union with British Columbia?”

Now, Sir, it is known that the hon. gentleman had, in addition to engaging to construct this railway, the 2,000 miles of railway which the Government had power to build as a Government work, and which, by the period of 1890, he was to have completed, also engaged to add to that, outside of this work altogether, the construction of the road from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, sixty-eight miles of additional road. The Minister of Justice put this significant question on the notice paper, and what was his answer? The answer was given in the true spirit of the autocrat. The hon. gentleman said— but at that time, I suppose, he felt stronger than he did afterwards:—

“With respect to the question raised by my hon. friend from South Bruce, I may say I have nothing to ask from Parliament. We have no authority to obtain, but have merely to communicate this decision and rely upon the House supporting us in accepting the terms that have been made through the intervention, or intermediation, of Lord Carnarvon, and that support, I do not doubt, will be cheerfully accorded.”

So the hon. gentleman had made an unqualified engagement with British Columbia and with the Imperial Parliament, to spend $2,000,000 per annum in British Columbia—build 68 miles of railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, and finish the line from the Pacific to Lake Superior, 2,000 miles, by 1890. Yet his answer was that from Parliament he had nothing to ask. But he altered his mind. Some significant divisions took place in this House. The present Minister of Justice, then sitting on the Independent benches, voted against the hon. gentleman on the Bill for the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway; and on a most important question, in which the legality of the proceedings of the Government in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway was involved, the hon. gentleman put on his hat and walked out of the House, accompanied by another gentleman, whose assistance the Government felt it necessary since to obtain on the Treasury benches as Minister of the Interior. The hon. gentleman had, before the Session was far advanced, some pretty strong hints that the position he had assumed, in which he undertook to deal with the most important financial interests of this country, and involving the most onerous obligations—obligations to which anything undertaken by the late Government seemed insignificant—was such that he was not as strong in the support of the House as he had led himself to believe. What occurred? The Bill was passed by this House by a large majority. This Bill provided for building the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway in addition to the rest of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I may be told that we contemplated building a road on Vancouver Island. We did. We had fixed upon a terminus at Esquimalt, but every person knows that that did not involve the additional cost of a dollar, as far as the financial resources of the country were concerned. The stipulation required that the parties obtaining the charter of the Pacific Railway should build this road, the subsidy to be the same as far as money was concerned. But the hon. gentleman changed his base. He, who to-day had nothing to ask from Parliament, to-morrow found it convenient to introduce a Bill for the purpose of constructing the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. He passed this Bill through the House despite the opposition of the present Minister of Justice and other leading members of the Opposition. The Bill was lost, however, and significantly lost in the Upper House by the votes of two of the warmest and strongest friends the hon. gentleman had in that branch of the Legislature. I am not going to say that it was lost at the instance of the First Minister, but I may say that his colleagues in the Upper House did not exhibit great enthusiasm in trying to obtain a majority. But the

Mr. TUPPER.

Bill having passed by a considerable majority in this House, was abandoned. This was a case in which the hon. gentleman could say: "The good faith of Canada is pledged; we are bound to the British Columbian and Imperial Governments to carry this out; I ask you to re-affirm the policy." The hon. gentleman could have used those efforts of moral suasion which are always in the power of a leader of the Government. But, no! He abandoned his policy, and an extraordinary occurrence presented itself. The hon. gentleman who was most hostile to the construction of this branch was taken into the Cabinet, as the result of a bargain that this road should be sacrificed. That statement may seem a strong one, but I will sustain it by a speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Justice himself at Walkerton, in which he said that he would not enter the Cabinet until the Government had made up their minds to abandon their policy in this respect. The hon. gentleman said, as reported in the Globe:—

"He would now touch upon a question with respect to which he had not been in entire accordance with the gentleman who was conducting the affairs of the country. He referred to the settlement attempted to be made through the Earl of Carnarvon with British Columbia. He had been of opinion that that settlement was more onerous to the country than it was advantageous to agree to, and he was happy to be able to say that, previous to his accepting office, discussions had been entered upon which had resulted in an agreement upon a policy satisfactory to himself. He would not tell them that they might hope for as satisfactory a settlement of the dreadful burden imposed upon them by their predecessors as they would like, but he had every reason to hope that matters would be placed in a more satisfactory position than at one time they could expect they would be."

And what was that policy proposed by the present Minister of Justice? It was to dip their hands into the public treasury of Canada and hand $750,000 over to the people of British Columbia for local works. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that all that was necessary in case of any embarrassment that such a sum of public money should be paid as might meet the emergency. But the hon. First Minister, who had thus abandoned his policy, said to the people of British Columbia that he was defeated in the Senate, and that the Government were compelled reluctantly to abandon the construction of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway. My right hon. friend from Kingston and myself supported the Government in that proposition, and we voted for the second reading of the Bill. But when the hon. gentlemen refused to agree that the contracts should be submitted to Parliament, we voted against the third reading, and our friends in the Upper House voted entirely in harmony with us. The great substantial element of the policy of the Government, as arranged with Lord Carnarvon, regarding the construction of the Pacific Railway, was still left intact. Although the Government were not going to build the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, they were to carry out the rest of the terms as to the Pacific Railway. The terms were onerous. I am not surprised that hon. gentlemen began to be alarmed. The hon. gentleman who had said that all the resources of the British Empire could not build the Pacific Railway in ten years had agreed to build 2,022 miles, from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean, in thirteen years from this time, that is, by 1890.

Mr. CAUCHON: That is three years more.

Mr. HOLTON: The question is whether it would be easier to do the work by 1890 or 1881.

Mr. TUPPER: I say this: that the obligation on the part of Canada to give certain aid to a company which would find the capital to build the railway, and although the engagement was to finish it in ten years, yet, as has been shown by Mr. Trutch, if it could not be done in the ten years the time would have been extended, provided honest, straightforward and conscientious efforts were made to fulfil the obligation the Government incurred, that obligation was vastly superior, as none knew better than the hon. member for Chateauguay, than that the Government should proceed with the road as a Government work, taking every dollar of the money required from the public exchequer, and by a loan and debt placed on the shoulders of the people of the country build it by 1890. There is no comparison between the extent of obligation incurred in the two cases.

Mr. HOLTON: The two points are quite distinct. The relative advantage of the two modes of constructing the road, and the possibility of building the road within a given time. The latter was the point to which the hon. member was addressing himself when I ventured to throw across the floor the slight interruption. I say that, whereas, he agreed to finish the road by 1881, my hon. friend the First Minister proposed to build, not the whole but a considerable portion of the line by 1890, and the hon. member for Cumberland was denouncing him for undertaking an impossible task.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. member for Chateauguay will see this—and he will see it very readily—that the essence of the objection was, there being a time bargain in the first instance. We were told by the delegates that they would not hold us to the ten or twelve years, but that we might have whatever time would reasonably be required in the construction of the work. But the great assault made was that it was a time bargain, although it was made with a portion of ourselves. But here is a bargain to which the Imperial Government became parties, made after hon. gentlemen have had further time for consideration, made to construct that portion of the line which will involve the longest time, viz., through the Cascade range and Rocky Mountains, made without any qualification as to whether the resources of the country will permit it.

Mr. HOLTON: Were the Imperial Government parties to the original engagements? Was it not in the address which formed the basis of union?

Mr. TUPPER: The Imperial Government were parties, in so far as they were willing—for that was all they had to do—that British Columbia and Canada should unite on the terms we had mutually agreed upon. Here is a case in which the Secretary of State for the Colonies had come to accept the position of arbitrator in the carrying out the agreement made between Canada and British Columbia, to which the Imperial Government were parties.

Mr. HOLTON: Was not the ground of that interference of the Imperial Government that they were parties to the original agreement made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. TUPPER: The colony of British Columbia felt they were entitled to go to the Imperial Government to complain in regard to any violation by Canada of the terms mutually agreed upon. But to return. The main feature of the policy was still left, all except the railway on Vancouver Island. Did the Government maintain good faith as to that? The First Minister came to Parliament and proposed a vote—a moderate vote—to carry on works connected with the railway. What happened? If hon. gentlemen would turn to the Hansard for 1876, they will find the record of a very extraordinary procedure. They will find that the hon. First Minister, having become wise in his generation, found that he had committed himself to this unqualified engagement—a point not noticed by many members of the Opposition on the inception of the matter—that his solemn pledge was unrelieved by any action of the Senate, the pledge to construct the road from the shores of the Pacific to the shores of Lake Superior, over two thousand miles, by 1890. What happened when that item came up for the construction of the railway? What did the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) do? That hon. member is not a very recalcitrant supporter of the hon. the First Minister. I will not say he is not an independent member, but among the hon. gentleman's followers he has none more devoted than the hon. member for West Middlesex; there is no hon. member who will make a greater effort to act in accord with the First Minister, and, I believe, the hon. gentleman on more than one occasion showed the hon. the First Minister that he was prepared to make a sacrifice in order to meet his views. What did the hon. member for West Middlesex do? He moved a vote of want of confidence in the Government. We had been voting them the Supplies. We, like a loyal Opposition, had been endeavouring, as far as possible, to promote the interests of the country; but submitting to the fact that we were a minority, and must accept the general policy of the Government, and on many occasions vote them larger sums than we thought necessary in the interests of the country, or demanded by the necessity of the case. We recognised the obligation to assist the Government in carrying the Supply Bill. The hon. member for Middlesex, however, moved his vote of want of confidence, refusing to vote one dollar for the construction of the railway until the House had adopted the motion, which was in these terms:

"But, while granting this sum, this House desires to record its view that the arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be such as the resources of the country will permit, without increasing the existing rates of taxation."

The moment that resolution was moved the hon. the First Minister was bound to rise in his place and state that he would sacrifice his position as First Minister before he would accept it, because it involved an act of bad faith, he had made a binding obligation with the Imperial Government and British Columbia, that a certain work should be constructed in a certain time. It was impossible to proceed with the work at all if the resolution were passed. I can show the House that the Government of the day are, in the face of that resolution, violating the constitution by spending one dollar in connection with the railway. What was the state of things when the resolution was passed? It was this: three millions of additional taxes had been levied on the Canadian people, as the hon. the Minister of Justice had stated in one of his speeches; that British Columbia had nothing to complain of, for Parliament had provided three millions of additional taxes for the purpose of constructing the road. The money was all gone, and to say that under these circumstances the Government should not be permitted to spend that vote until they had accepted that resolution, was to say that they should not spend another dollar in connection with the railway. The hon. the First Minister was bound to have thrown himself on the House, not on one side but on both sides, and to have said: "The good faith not of the Government alone, but of Canada, was pledged by the head of the Government to carry out the railway, and I call on the House to vote down the motion." It is said that the resolution was drafted by a Minister and offered by a Minister to another gentleman in this House a month before, and he refused to move it, and that resolution, moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) was voted for by the Government and all their supporters; and when they did that, they placed themselves in a position from which, I believe, with all their ability and special pleading, they will find it difficult to extricate themselves when arraigned by British Columbia, or by the Colonial Minister, or any person in this country, on the serious charge of having been guilty of bad faith in relation to this matter.

After Recess.

Mr. TUPPER resumed his speech. He said: When the House rose for recess, I was dealing with the position in which the Government were placed by the resolution passed at the close of the last Session, and I had taken the ground that any expenditure made since the passage of that resolution by the Government was not only unconstitutional but illegal—that, in fact, they were bound by the resolution to stop at once any expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. The resolution which I read provided that the vote for the construction of the road should only be given to them under the obligation that no portion of it could be expended which would involve increasing the existing rate of taxation. Now, what was the position in which the hon. gentlemen found themselves placed the moment that resolution was placed upon the Journals of this House? Three millions of new additional taxation had been imposed upon the people of Canada, and, which was admitted by one of the hon. Ministers to be mainly for the purpose of constructing the railway. Parliament met, and the Government were obliged to admit, as the hon. the Minister of Finance has admitted, during the present Session, that he went to England to negotiate the late loan last autumn because it was known that a large deficit existed. Now, the Government have admitted this Session that the deficit was about $2,000,000, that the $3,000,000 of additional taxation which was imposed was all expended, and that that being done the ordinary expenditure of the country exceeded the whole revenue by $1,900,000; and, as an examination of the figures shows, the hon. the Minister of Finance considerably understated the amount of the deficit which existed. The Government have asked the House to impose $500,000 of additional taxation this year in order to meet the expenditure of the year over the amount which the $3,600,000 of previous taxes had enabled them to meet. Under these circumstances, I want to know if this resolution is not waste paper, what it means. I want to know how the Government can, without violating the principle of Parliamentary Government, expend a single dollar of public money for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad with the admission of the hon. the Finance Minister that the taxation of the country was increased, must be increased, and that additional taxes must be imposed in order to meet this expenditure—that he was unable to meet the existing cost upon the revenue without new taxation. I say they were completely prohibited and precluded from the expenditure of a single dollar without the violation of the constitution. I have another very grave charge to make against the Administration in relation to this work. Every person who has given the subject any attention knows that, regard it from what point of view you may, the moment you have declared the expediency of constructing the Pacific Railway, the moment you have gone the length that the hon. the First Minister has gone in admitting its absolute necessity, that moment you are bound to adopt every possible means in your power in order to promote the construction of that road. What means have the Government adopted? I shall show the House that from the moment they were placed in the responsible position they occupy, they had steadily, persistently, and enormously exaggerated the cost of that work. And what would be the effect of that? The effect of exaggerating the cost would be to prevent any capitalist at home or abroad from investing a dollar, and to compel the Government of the country to find all the money required to be invested in the work. And if I can show the House, as I am confident that I can, that they have steadily exaggerated and done all that they possibly could, in the high positions which they occupy, to deter any person from assisting in the construction of that work, and damaged the financial position of the country by declaring that it had assumed an obligation to construct a work enormous in its cost and unproductive in its results, I think I will show that the Government have pursued a course the most inimical to the interests of the country that can be conceived. The hon. the First Minister gave a proper answer to a question which I put across the floor of the House last night. I asked the estimated cost of the Pacific Railway, and the hon. gentleman gave us some very interesting, and, I may frankly say, some encouraging statements as to the cost of the work. In order to draw out a statement which would be still more encouraging, I asked what the estimate was. His answer was judicious and proper. It was to the effect, that in the position that he occupied, and in relation to the fact that they were about to ask for tenders at no distant day, it would perhaps be unwise for him to commit himself to a statement as to the expenditure it would involve. I regret that that wise and judicious policy was not always pursued by that hon. gentleman. I need not go back to the period of the general election, when the country was made to ring with the most exaggerated statements of the cost of this work, and the intolerable, or to use the expressive language of the hon. the Minister of Justice since he became a member of the Government, the "dreadful burden" that was upon the country. The statements to the country have been precisely of that character, and coming from persons in the position occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite, rendered it impossible to draw a dollar of money into the service of the country in connection with this work. Now the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in the most authentic manner, over his own signature, in a well and carefully considered manifesto at the general election, estimated the cost of 1,300 miles, of certainly not the most difficult portion, at from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000—no portion of this was in the Rocky Mountains of British Columbia. He stated, as I have said, that he proposed to avoid the construction of 1,300 miles of this road, some 600 miles of it from Lake Nepigon and the remaining 700 along the water stretches of the Saskatchewan, saving to the country and avoiding for the present the construction of about 1,300 miles of railway, which was estimated to cost from sixty to eighty millions of dollars. Now, Sir, if 1,300 miles of this road—and certainly not the most difficult portion of it, for we all recognized as being the great difficulty, the line permeating the Cascade range and the Rocky Mountains—would cost from sixty to eighty millions of dollars, I would ask what estimate commercial men, intelligent men and capitalists would form of the amount of money that would be required to construct this 2,000 miles from the Pacific to Lake Superior. Well, Sir, we have that followed up by the statement, quite as authentic, and on a financial question quite as weighty, published as we knew, broadcast, and sent to every part of the country, and not only here, but in Great Britain, by the Hon. Minister of Finance. Some comment I believe, Sir, has been made with reference to the expenditure involved in the publication of the Budget Speeches of the Minister of Finance; but, Sir, I do not intend to raise any question as to the propriety of a document so important as that being widely spread over the country, though I will ask for what reason should you spend a great deal of money when you have a great work like the Canadian Pacific Railway in hand,—in sending abroad and in Great Britain a statement such as that which I am now going to read on this subject from the Budget Speech in 1874, of the Minister of Finance. He said, following up the authentic statement of the First Minister:—

"In order rightly to understand the real nature and extent of the burden we would be required to take upon ourselves, it must be remembered that the lowest estimate for building this road to the Pacific is something over one hundred millions of dollars, and this too on the supposition that a very much longer time would be given for the construction."

"I entertain no doubt that if it were incumbent upon us to push the line through within the time specified (if this were possible), the expense would be enormously increased, and that a moderate estimate would reach one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty millions of dollars. Every hon. gentleman who has had experience in these matters know that the cost of construction of a work of this kind is largely enhanced if it be required to carry it to completion in a certain limited time. They well knew, too, that there is great difficulty in carrying such a work through an unprotected country, much of which, looking particularly at two sections of it, is a desert, at least for arable purposes."

"Were we to undertake such a burden as this, I would simply say that our national debt in seven years would be, relatively to our population, just one-third greater than that with which the United States emerged from their great civil war, and, if measured by the rate of interest required, it would be one-third greater than the huge national debt of England."

Now, Sir, the First Minister stated in his manifesto to the country that he hoped, in connection with this work, to be able to attract an immense amount of immigration to the country, and every person who knows anything of this question, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, knows that one of the most important features in connection with it is the opportunity its construction would present of bringing a great mass of immigrants into this country; and how admirably are these words of the Finance Minister calculated to bring people into Canada when people throughout the world are told, from so high and so authentic a source as the Minister of Finance of the Government of Canada, that the debt of this country is to become greater than that of the United States when emerging from the civil war, and one-third greater than that of England. In other words he goes on to say:—

"That if we undertake to fulfill this project according to the letter of the law, the burden we would require to ask you to lay upon yourselves for this purpose alone would be equal to a new debt of seven hundred and fifty millions sterling imposed on the people of England."

He is determined, Sir, that they shall understand the enormous taxes they will have to pay if they venture to come into Canada. He continues:—

"Having regard to population and the rates of interest we would respectively have to pay, for this is an important consideration, were it the pleasure of the House to decide that the Canadian Pacific Railway must be completed in that time, it must also be prepared to take into account the sums required to be borrowed for other public works, and to redeem certain portions of the public debt; and, at a moderate estimate, over $200,000,000 would be needed for all purposes. In other words, we would be compelled to go to the London market—for this is the only market practically open to us—as borrowers of $30,000,000 every year for seven successive years. There may be hon. gentlemen in this House who think we would be able to do this; but, if so, I envy them their faith in the future of the Dominion. Now, Sir, I say that such a project, involving such a charge is ludicrously absurd."

Then, Sir, he returned to the subject, and he said:—

"Now, Mr. Chairman, I spoke before the recess at some length upon the extraordinary deficiency arising from the working of the Intercolonial Railway and the other railroads of the Dominion, chiefly in the Maritime Provinces. The deficiencies arising from these sources are reported as likely to amount to the extraordinary sum of about a million and a quarter dollars. I desire to call the special attention of the House to one point which must be clear to every hon. gentleman. These railways ran for the most part through a country which has been settled for the last fifty or sixty years. I cannot refer, of course, to the fact that these railroads entail such an enormous expenditure, without its becoming apparent to the House, that the cost of the maintenance of a railway, nearly 3,000 miles in length, and passing through a country which is almost entirely uninhabited, must be of necessity very much greater. For a very long time, even after the actual construction of this railway, an enormous charge must be levied upon this country in order to keep it in full working order and repair, and this fact must be steadily kept sight of in considering the real character of the project."

So much, Sir, for the manner in which the Minister of Finance endorsed the statements of the First Minister; of course, they are qualified to a certain extent by his speaking of the effect of the construction of that road within a certain time, but the hon. gentleman applied no such limitation to this estimate. He says that the lowest estimate is one hundred millions and yet, Sir, strange to say, these gentlemen—I will not say with madness or with recklessness to use the strictly parliamentary expressions of the First Minister because I wish to confine myself to extremely moderate terms in characterising the acts of the hon. gentleman opposite; I will not use any of these terms, although having such an authority for them, in connection with this subject, they naturally rise to one's lips; but I do say that these statements were not, in my judgment, calculated to promote the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, either by a company or by the Government. In the first place, they would be calculated, in the mind of every commercial man and capitalist abroad, to lead to the conclusion that the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway was one of the maddest and most unquestionable measures that any Government or party ever engaged in; and in the second place, they would lead to the conclusion that the Government that were saddling a country with such a liability, and had undertaken to carry out such an obligation, would be in a position that would render their credit at no distant day, a very doubtful matter. I have given you the statement over the signature of the First Minister and his manifesto to the country; and the endorsement of that by, and the statements of, the Minister of Finance; then, Sir, we come to the introduction of the Act, and hon. gentlemen will remember—because the subject was too important rapidly to fade from recollection—that when the First Minister went, as he was bound to do, into a very exhaustive explanation of what the cost of this work would be, he drew his illustrations from a variety of sources, as to what railways cost in other places, and showed that railways running through a prairie country cost not less than $48,000 a mile. He told us what the Intercolonial was costing, and he led the House and country to believe that, in his estimate of 1,300 miles, costing from $60,000 to $80,000, he was not very far astray. He stated that the country must find all the money. That the project was so hopeless as a commercial undertaking that it was simple madness to look for any assistance from capitalists, and that the people of the country must make up their minds to bear the burden themselves, without any aid from capitalists. He favoured the House with an estimate of the working expenses. He showed that the life of an iron rail was only eight years, a steel rail however lasting some years longer. He undertook to show that when the road was in working order it was hopeless to expect anything like fair returns until millions of people were thrown into the North-West; and he estimated that there would be an annual deficit on the working expense of $6,000,000 per annum. This was the view hon. gentlemen were putting forward to the country at the very time they were taking power to construct the whole of the road as a Government road, and making a solemn engagement to construct, in 13 years from the present date, some 2,000 miles, and that embracing some of the most difficult portions of the road. I am charging the Government with doing that which, if they could be justly charged with, certainly shows an amount of incapacity in dealing with this matter which was extraordinary. I say that the Government were bound to present it in the most favourable light to the country, especially if they had the most remote idea that the time would come when they would invite capitalists to tender for its construction. Last night the hon. the First Minister gave us the information that 228 miles of the railway from Thunder Bay to English River, and from Selkirk to Keewatin, would be completed and fairly equipped with rolling stock at something like $24,500 per mile, and that 65 miles from Pembina to Fort Garry had been graded at a cost of $3,500 per mile, and that this latter amount was to be considered as something like a fair estimate of the prairie sections.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, no.

Mr. TUPPER: I suppose then that the hon. gentleman intended to confine his estimate to completing the line from Fort Garry to Selkirk?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. TUPPER: I understood the hon. gentleman to apply that estimate to the whole of the prairie section. But the country must be exceptionally favourable in that part of the route.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course it is.

Mr. TUPPER: But I am certain the House heard with pleasure the hon. gentleman state the amount of money which practical experience had shown the road could be constructed for, and I would like to ask him, in the light of the experience he has had, whether he is not prepared to revise his statement as to the "insanity" of building the road on a subsidy of $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of the finest land on which the sun shines on in any part of the world. (Hon. gentlemen: Oh! oh!) Yes, I say you can select by the Pacific Railway Act 50,000,000 acres of the finest land in the world upon which the sun shines. Nothing on the face of the civilized world exceeds it in fertility, and as a grain and grazing country; and I do not think that the hon. the First Minister will be prepared to controvert that statement. At Whitby, in the Riding of South Ontario, the hon. gentleman said we might as well offer $10 to build the road as $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. This was the language by an hon. gentleman whose every word was weighed, as he now seemed to appreciate. After spending three years in denouncing this undertaking, and exaggerating in every possible and conceivable manner the cost of this work, diminished as had been "the dreadful burden" by the interposition of the Minister of Justice, the finale was, that the hon. gentleman was, at the moment he was making the above remarks at Whitby, publishing a notice to capitalists and contractors to be prepared on the 1st January, 1877, to tender for the construction of this road. After undertaking the work as a Government work, and spending large amount of money upon it as such, in constructing some of the least productive portions of the road, after having exhausted all the power the Government possessed, in pointing out the utter impossibility of any person touching this matter, without being involved in the most utter financial ruin, he caps the climax by, adopting the policy of the late Government, publishing notices for tenders to contractors upon the basis of $10,000 and 20,000 acres of land per mile, or at the rate of $27,000,000 and 50,000,000 of acres of land, and asks the amount they will take, in addition to that, to build and own and operate the road. The hon. gentleman mentioned last night to the House; he took us into his confidence so far as to say that there had not much result obtained from that advertisement, that the capitalists of the world did not seem in a hurry to invest their money or their means in the construction of a Pacific Railway for Canada. Is it any wonder, after three years spent by this Government in exaggerating, as the hon. gentleman proved last night, in enormously exaggerating the cost that would be involved by the construction of this work; that when he comes back at last to the policy of his predecessors, the hon. the First Minister finds that what capitalists were eagerly prepared to engage in at a former period, they now shrink from touching. The statements of the hon. the Minister of Finance that this 3,000 miles of unpeopled country, that two sections of this road are two great Saharas, two great deserts from which nothing is to be hoped, could not certainly be expected to cause a great rush of capitalists to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Government stands to-day charged before the people of Canada with having failed in their duty to the people in their dealing with this question after they had voluntarily assumed this obligation. Instead of saying: "The late Government engaged to give $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land to any capitalists who were prepared to construct this road; we are prepared to do that, and to act in good faith, to go thus far but not beyond it," they maintained that it was incumbent upon them to assume that they must carry the work to completion, although they did it with public money and as a public work. I have already told the House that the Government have undertaken to do this under the Railway Act, providing that it should be constructed as under the Public Works Act. It is not to be done by Commissioners, but directly by the Minister of Public Works. I now pass from the general question of the policy of the Government in relation to this matter to the course they have pursued in carrying out that policy. Before going further, I desire to remind the House that these gentlemen were not free to deal in the autocratic matter, regardless of parliamentary control and popular opinion, that they seem to have imagined and that they certainly have practised. When they were seeking to obtain power, they gave the people of this country to understand the principles which would govern them after they attained power, and prominent among those principles was that which was stated by the Prime Minister in a speech delivered on the 5th July, 1872, in Montreal, the commercial capital of the Dominion. He said :

“The policy of the Liberal Party is to make the parliamentary government supreme, to place the Cabinet directly under the control of Parliament, to take from them all power to use any part of the people's money without a direct vote for each service. I might point out, as an instance of the course the Liberal Party will pursue, that in Ontario, when the Reform Government came into power, they repealed a portion of the Act granting aid to railways, so that all grants had to receive the sanction of the House before a farthing could be paid.”

I could multiply instances in which the hon. gentleman pledged himself to the same principle, and promised that if he was entrusted with the management of public affairs, “parliamentary government should be supreme,” and that no public money should be touched without a direct vote for the purpose. Let us see how, in carrying the law out, the hon. gentleman has succeeded. I may say, further, that, when he introduced the act giving him power to construct this road in the Department of Public Works as a government work, the hon. gentleman renewed the pledge, and told the House that, if they passed the Act—as will be seen by the report of his speech in the Toronto Globe newspaper—not a single cent of the people's money should be expended except after a direct vote for the purpose. And, Sir, the House will remember that one of the leading features of the Act was, that no work should be performed on it except under contracts, and that these contracts must be given by public tender. I now come to a very unpleasant feature in connection with the administration of this great question, and that is to the purchase of steel rails; and, I may say at once, that, consistently with what I stated when I rose to-night that I would endeavour to avoid touching any question that would, in the least degree, lead the House away from the mode in which the Government had dealt with the question, I shall, on the present occasion, carefully abstain from touching anything in reference to this matter except its purely business features, as a transaction for which the House have a right to hold the Ministry directly responsible. Now, the hon. gentleman has brought down a statement of the cost of the steel rails which were purchased without a vote of a dollar being passed by this House. It has been said elsewhere that there was a vote, that before the money was paid a vote was taken. The hon. gentleman knows it is trifling with the intelligence of the country, and I believe I am correct in saying it has never been attempted so to trifle with the intelligence of Parliament as to draw a distinction between a binding contract being made by the Government of Canada, not subject to the vote of Parliament, and the money being paid. The fact that the tenders and the contracts were laid upon the table of the House before the money was paid does not touch the question at all. Had the contracts been made subject to the approval of Parliament, there might have been a difference; but they were absolute, leaving no option to Parliament, without being charged with bad faith in not carrying out an arrangement made by the Government of Canada, and that is an alternative which I am sure the hon. gentleman would not say left it open to the House at all. The hon. gentleman, who had pledged himself that parliamentary government should be supreme; that, if we passed the Act, not a cent should be spent without a vote, startled the House and the country by the statement that he had made contracts, binding contracts on the Government, for the purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails. We have now ascertained something like the cost of the rails delivered in the country. The return shows the dates of the payments that were made and the charges that were made upon them. I have had the interest carefully calculated. I find, by the return brought down by the Government, that $2,925,896 was paid for these rails, delivered in Canada, including the cost of freight and the inspection. The interest on that sum at 5 per cent. would of course be $146,294. And the meantime at which that interest became payable—because those amounts of money were paid at different dates—but the meantime at which the whole interest became payable was the 5th November, 1875. So that from that moment we have been paying interest amounting, at 5 per cent., to $146,294 per annum. On the 5th day of May, which will be here in a very few days, we will have a year and a half's interest accumulated, $219,441. To show the price to which rails have since fallen—I may say that I was prepared to produce testimony of an authentic character on this question, and would have done so if it had been convenient to call the Committee on Public Accounts together—I speak on the authority of a gentleman well qualified to judge, who had made a purchase of steel rails of the best quality, and had them delivered at Prescott Junction during the past year, at a cost of £7 15s. sterling—that is $37.71 per ton. The freight from Montreal to Prescott I assume to be, and I am told it is within the mark, $1.71. Deduct that, and you have the cost of the best steel rails that can be made, and by parties who were ready to supply any quantity of rails upon the same terms, at about $36 per ton, laid down in Montreal. Now, the House will see that 50,000 tons of steel rails and fastenings, laid down in Montreal, cost us, according to the return laid upon the table of the House by the hon. the First Minister himself, $2,925,896, and the price at which the same description of rails were laid down at Montreal, within the last six months, was $36 per ton. The cost, therefore, of the 50,000 tons, if purchased within the past six months, instead of when they were purchased, in 1874, and paid for at a mean date of November 5, 1875, and from which date we have been paying interest on the whole sum, would have been $1,800,000, showing a dead loss on the cost of the rails, compared with what the same quality could be purchased to-day, of nearly a million dollars. Now, add to that the interest payable before they can be used, and the dead loss to the country in relation to that transaction alone, will exceed a million and a half dollars. I do not, as I said before, intend to touch any question outside the purely business nature of this transaction, because I have abundant ground for the motion I am submitting to the House without introducing any collateral issue; but I must call attention to the fact that, in relation to a part of this purchase, no tenders appear to have been asked. I notice that 5,000 tons were bought without tender, and the freight to Vancouver Island seems to have been arranged on the same private principle and not by tender. This bears on the point I am charging against the Government, that they have systematically violated the binding obligation of the law, and their own repeated pledges, that everything should be done by contract in relation to those works. The charge of $223,884 for inland transportation must be a mistake, and for this reason: We are told by the Public Accounts, we have been told by the speech of the hon. the First Minister, that it cost $15 per ton to convey the rails from Duluth to St. Boniface, near Fort Garry. The public documents on the table show that nearly 13,000 tons of rails have been deposited there, and the House will see at once that on that transaction, carrying these rails that portion of the distance by the Red River Transportation Co., must be something in the neighbourhood of $200,000. I am told that was not done by public tender and contract. Now, Sir, what was the necessity of buying these rails at all. Why should they be purchased? What did the Government want with 50,000 tons of steel rails? We have, in a public document laid on the table of the House, a statement as to the condition in which the Pacific Railway works were at that date; and what do they show? Why, Sir, they show that the contract was made for the first section, from Fort William to Sunshine Creek, a distance of 32½ miles—the line ran originally from Fort William to Shebandowan, but it was afterwards altered—on April the 3rd, 1875; nearly six months after the purchase of these 50,000 tons of steel rails was made, the first contract requiring their use was entered into; and, Sir, we are told that on the 1st of January, 1877, more than two years after this purchase was made, that 25½ miles, requiring 2,295 tons of the 50,000 are used; and therefore that is all of these 50,000 tons of steel rails purchased at a cost of nearly $3,000,000 involving an interest of over $140,000 per annum, which, at the end of this period, these hon. gentlemen with all their anxiety—and I have no doubt that they have pressed these works forward, for they had reason to press them forward as far as it was possible to do so, for the purpose of getting these rails out of sight—yet, with all their efforts, all they have been able to accomplish has been to use 2,295 tons of rails, and that, too, not on a portion of the Pacific Railway, but on a branch, unauthorized by Parliament, and built without the sanction of Parliament or the vote of Parliament. Also, on April 3rd, 1875, they made a contract, from Selkirk to Cross Lake, 77 miles; and on the 7th of June, 1876, they made a contract from Sunshine Creek to English River, 80 miles more. As to both of these contracts, the first have the same date, April 3rd, 1875, from Fort William to Sunshine Creek; and April 3rd, from Selkirk to Cross Lake, 77 miles; and, on the 7th June, 1876, with all the despatch and every effort they could make, they were enabled to put 80 miles more under contract, from Sunshine Creek to English River; and on the 9th of January, 1877, from Cross Lake to Keewatin, so that, at this moment, there are 226 miles under contract, 37 miles of which were put under contract this year, and 80 miles of it only on the 7th of June last; yet, Sir, we have the purchase made, as I say, in November 1874, of no less than three million of dollars worth of steel rails, or 50,000 tons. Now, Sir, I may be told,—but you have failed to credit us with 11,160 tons for the Intercolonial Railway—but I would like to know how they came on the Intercolonial Railway. I stand in the presence of Parliament and I am open to correction, and I ask the attention of my hon. friend from Chateaugay to the point which I am about to make, when I say that there is no graver violation of constitutional law—there is no graver violation of Parliamentary principle, than the appropriation of the public money, voted for one object, to another; I am open to the correction of the House, if I am right or wrong in that statement; and I say that the Government that would dare to take public money voted for one purpose and apply it to another a thousand miles away from the place for which it was voted, and for which Parliament gave the vote, has violated the Constitution and ignored the fundamental principles of parliamentary Government. I say that the power that Parliament has over the Government of the day, is that sound constitutional maxim which deprives the Government of the power of spending money unless they have the authority of the House for it. I say that grant the principle that you can take 11,000 tons of rails, bought for the Canadian Pacific Railway with a vote for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and take them away and put them to another purpose totally different, and I say that the Government can carry on the government of the country despite the power of Parliament, because it can use any vote for the Canadian Pacific Railway for the ordinary expenses of the country, or for the payment of their own salaries, or for anything of that kind—I am giving perhaps, an extreme illustration, but it is because I want to draw the attention of the House to the matter. It appears that the First Minister, who claimed the confidence of the people over and above all men in this country, because he was going to carry out the principle of parliamentary Government, has become totally oblivious to his duty to the House and his duty to the country in reference to the expenditure of public money. I ask the House if we have ever been asked to authorise a change of that appropriation? I ask the House if any authority was ever given by it to the Government to change a dollar of that appropriation for the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Intercolonial Railway? I am open to the correction, but I am not aware, and I do not believe, that the Government have ever considered it to be their duty to ask Parliament to grant any such authority. If it has not, then I say, Sir, that one of the gravest charges made in connection with this whole transaction, and which stands against these hon. gentlemen, is undertaking to so deal with public moneys, and appropriating public moneys for purposes for which it was never intended by Parliament and never voted. I wish also to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman purchased these rails in a falling market. He may say: "I had no knowledge of that," but he cannot say that, because I have under my hand the advice given to him by a gentleman well conversant with these questions, and a gentleman in whom that hon. gentleman has great confidence, in every possible way, of which he has given evidence to the House—I mean, Sir, the Superintendent of the Provincial Railways, Mr. Brydges—made a report to that hon. gentleman, and he used these very significant terms; and this was on the 31st day of October, 1874, at the time when this subject was under consideration. He says, in a letter addressed to Hon. A. Mackenzie, dated 31st October, 1874:—

"There is no doubt whatever, that at the close of 1873 and the beginning of 1874, the steel rail market in England was well known to be in a declining condition, and no prudent man would buy rails at that time unless he actually wanted them for immediate delivery."

Now, Sir, I do not, as I dare say the House knows, always regard that gentleman as a supreme authority. I believe this is pretty well understood; but, I do say that it is not open to the hon. gentleman who leads the House, to take that position because he has confidence in him. He has shown it in every possible way, that one man can show that he has confidence in an individual; and he knew that Mr. Brydges was conversant with this whole question, and he had under his hand that letter at the very time he was entering upon this purchase. Now, Sir, what answer does the hon. gentleman give to the House when he is charged with taking three millions of the public money without the authority of Parliament, and without one dollar of it being voted, and making a binding contract for its expenditure for 50,000 tons of steel rails, which, at the end of this long period of time, he admits himself it is impossible to apply, and he gives no prospect to the House of being able to use them for long years to come. I have shown the dates when these contracts, which are now under construction, were let, and you know the difficulty of going through a large portion of the country in question, and its remoteness from supplies; and I have shown that with all the public money the Government could spend, and all the pressure the Government could bring to bear, as the Minister of Finance says, in an open and settled country, it has taken seven long years to accomplish the construction of the Intercolonial Railway; and hon. gentlemen will see what time must elapse before it could be possible to use 50,000 tons of rails on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, Sir, the Leader of the Ministerialists, a member of the Government in the Upper Branch, says they only expect to be able to get the road through from Thunder Bay to Red River in seven or eight years; and the hon. the Finance Minister admitted last night, or, at all events, recently, that it must be at least four or five years before that portion of the road can be made. And yet these rails are lying and rusting and deteriorating in value quite as much as if they were moderately used.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. TUPPER: I may be wrong, and I am open to correction. But if it is nonsense, it is nonsense shared in by nearly all experts connected with railway matters in the world. This question of the oxidization of rails had attracted the attention of scientific men generally. It has attracted the attention of scientific men, who had devoted their whole life and great abilities to the question of railways, and there was no more interesting question than this of the oxidization of rails. Some attributed the protection from oxidation to a certain amount of electrical action caused by the passage of the cars over the rails, others held that when the rails were piled up the wet accumulated and the rust was more rapid than otherwise. But the fact remained that rails deteriorated more rapidly when piled up than when moderately used.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would the hon. gentleman name any of these experts.

Mr. TUPPER: I did not suppose that a fact so generally known would be contravened. But I will undertake to look up for the hon. gentleman a very elaborate statement on the subject, which, I trust, will satisfy him. I hear an hon. friend saying that "If the rust don't eat them up the interest will."

Mr. DYMOND: Would the hon. gentleman be able to give us his authorities before he asks us to vote for his motion.

Mr. TUPPER: I think I shall be able to convince, if not to convert, even such an incorrigible supporter of the other side as the hon. member for North York, without my being able to quote that specific authority upon that point; and will give an opportunity to the hon. gentleman to show his independent position. The hon. gentleman says Mr. Fleming advised him. I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the authority of the Chief Engineer, on a great many questions connected with such a work, as quite sufficient to absolve the Minister of Public Works, whoever he may be, from any blame whatever. If the hon. gentleman can show one single line signed by Sandford Fleming to him, stating that at a certain time the road would be in such a state of forwardness as to require a certain amount of rails, however mistaken Mr. Fleming may be, I will at once acquit the First Minister of any blame in the transaction, because he would give the House an authority which any reasonable man would be satisfied with. But I deny that Mr. Fleming is a special authority on this question. There are ten thousand men in this country just as able, and thousands of them more able, to advise the First Minister in relation to a purely commercial and business question, than Mr. Fleming, with all his engineering knowledge. If it was a question in which the hon. gentleman had required Mr. Fleming's professional knowledge, I should say his opinion was sufficient. But we have to remember that all the authority brought here from Mr. Fleming furnished was after the transaction was over. And this authority was given incidentally and verbally. This was only a paltry matter of 50,000 tons of rails, an insignificant matter of $3,000,000, and it was not considered worth a sheet of paper to make a report upon. In passing, the First Minister asked Mr. Fleming, verbally, whether it would be a good thing to secure a large quantity of steel rails.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never asked anything of the kind.

Mr. TUPPER: So much the worse. Then the hon. gentleman has no right to quote Mr. Fleming on the subject as an authority. But supposing Mr. Fleming had given him, in writing, the most elaborate report, which, however, he did not give, I question the propriety of the hon. gentleman procuring an ex parte statement for the purpose of justifying an action for which he himself was responsible. I do not presume to question the strict accuracy of every statement of Mr. Fleming, but I claim that the Government ought not to require from a subordinate officer, however high his position, a justification of acts of which they were responsible themselves alone to Parliament, unless they show that prior to the Act, they had some evidence, in writing, as to the necessity of the transaction. But who would suspect that the First Minister would have justified a transaction of this kind by quoting Mr. Fleming. I can show that he has no confidence in Mr. Fleming's judgment, even in a question where engineering entered largely into consideration. On a question on which he had devoted years of his life, and had expended enormous sums of public money, the hon. the First Minister had treated the report of Mr. Fleming as unworthy the paper on which it was written. A great deal of controversy had arisen in respect to the route of the Intercolonial Railway. Mr. Sandfield Macdonald's Government appointed Mr. Fleming to make an exhaustive survey for the purpose of locating the line of the Intercolonial Railway. That duty was vigorously discharged for years; and afterwards Mr. Fleming was called upon to give his advice. He says on page 84, in a work published by the First Minister and paid for by the country, I presume:

Mr. TUPPER.

"When Mr. Fleming entered upon the survey in 1864, his instructions on this point were very plain. He was not called upon to select what he held to be the most eligible line; indeed, as he read his instructions, he considered it to be his duty to withhold all indications of preference. His own opinions were, however, explicitly and directly expressed, when it became his duty to place them on record. In March, 1868, he was requested by the Government to report on the route he held to be the best. * * * The Chief Engineer, after examining the arguments advanced in favour of each route, placed on record his opinion that, beyond a doubt, the line by the Bay of Chaleurs was the route to be adopted."

And yet, after that declaration, made in a way to carry all the weight of authority Mr. Fleming could throw into any document, the hon. the First Minister treated it then as he treats it now, as so much waste paper, and said that the Government were throwing $8,000,000 into the sea in adopting the route that the Chief Engineer, after surveying five years, and, when called upon to express his opinion deliberately declared was infinitely the best.

Mr. MILLS: It was your colleague, Mr. Macdougall.

Mr. TUPPER: Mr. Macdougall was never my colleague. I had not that honour. If the honour of the originality of the expression is to be attributed to Mr. Macdougall he has been most servilely copied by a good many hon. gentlemen opposite, with the fact before them that Mr. Fleming had made a report in the most authoritative manner in which it could be made, in favour of that route; and this on a question on which his opinion was certainly entitled to respect. The hon. gentleman has not shown that he consulted any commercial men, though there were some of his friends engaged in the trade, whose disinterested advice, if taken, would have pointed to the fact, as I showed in the House when the transaction was first announced, that an enormous public loss was going to occur to the country in consequence of that ill-advised purchase. We have now the fact that this country is to be saddled with that enormous burden, that the legacy, the monument which the hon. the First Minister would leave behind him, when I trust, at an early day, his monument as Prime Minister will be erected, would be that transaction by which not less than $75,000 annually for ever out of the public purse was lost to the people. I ask the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond), unbelieving as he is, if that is not sufficient ground, without being able to give the authority of an expert, that rails become oxidized by lying on the ground unused, to warrant any independent member in saying that the hon. gentleman has violated the first principles of parliamentary government by expending that money without the authority of the House, and, owing to this ill-advised and unfortunate purchase, he has sunk over a million and a half of dollars of the people's money, never to be recovered, involving an annual charge of $75,000 on the public treasury. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to leave so unpleasant a subject, because I feel that I cannot deal with it, that I cannot discharge my duty to this House and the country temperately, as I am endeavouring to discharge it, without reflecting not only upon the hon. the First Minister, but upon the Parliament of Canada and the people of this country. I will exculpate the people because, until they have the opportunity of passing their own verdict upon it, we must absolve them from blame, but this Parliament stands before the world and the people of this country as prepared to sustain a Prime Minister who forgets what he owes to Parliament, to his own public declarations and to the laws on the Statute-book in this transaction, independent of the enormous amount of pecuniary loss which has been entailed. I now come to another matter in which the law has been violated in the most direct and glaring manner. I speak of the expenditure of money for the Canada Pacific Railway telegraph. The law provided that a line of electric telegraph shall be constructed in advance of the said railway and branches along the whole extent so soon as practicable after the location of the line should be determined upon. No law could be more easy of construction. It did not require an appeal to the Minister of Justice of the day, the predecessor of the present Minister (we know what his construction of the law would have been), it did not require a reference to any legal mind to say what the construction of that law was. It became my duty to bring this subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph before the House when, in 1875, the hon. the Premier again, in his truly autocratic fashion, stated to the House that he had entered into contracts to the extent of over $700,000 for the construction of that telegraph line. I directed the attention of the House to the illegality of the proceedings; I challenged the propriety of this work being so carried out, and claimed that it could not be done under the law. My action was followed up by my late lamented friend, Mr. Hillyard Cameron, the member for Cardwell, who joined in that opinion, and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) followed by moving a resolution condemning the act as illegal, which was seconded, I think, by the hon. member for Cardwell. The House will remember the short discussion which took place on that occasion, to which I intend briefly to call the attention of the hon. the First Minister. I may state that on November 10th, 1874, a contract was made with Mr. F. Barnard to construct a telegraph line from Cache Creek to Edmonton, 550 miles. That contract required the telegraph to be completed on October 2nd, 1876, and yet, on April 20th, 1877, the hon. the First Minister in his place in this House last night, admitted that he did not know within one hundred or two hundred miles of that point where the Canadian Pacific Railway would go. Yet he made a contract, knowing that he had not a particle of authority in law or a vote from Parliament, to spend one dollar on the construction of a mile of telegraph, except as the railway line may have been located; nevertheless, he made a binding contract with Mr. Barnard, to construct 550 miles of telegraph from Edmonton to Cache Creek, which, according to the hon. gentleman's statement last night, would not be within 200 miles of the point where it is most probable the railway will go.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say a word about that.

Mr. TUPPER: I am open to correction if Fort George is not between 100 and 200 miles from Cache Creek.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say that the road would go to Fort George.

Mr. TUPPER: No. But I will show the hon. gentleman and the House that he had decided that it should go to Fort George; that after the matter was discussed in the House, that after the vote was taken as to the illegality of the proceedings, the present Minister of Justice, the Minister of the Interior and Mr. Justice Moss having refused to vote with the hon. gentleman, that it was not illegal when attacked in his most vital part—those gentleman, including two of the most able legal minds in the House, refused to support him. A few days afterwards the hon. the First Minister telegraphed to Mr. Bernard to stop work, and he endeavoured to transfer the construction of the telegraph from Edmonton to Cache Creek to Fort George, showing he had then decided that was to be the railway line. The contract was not merely for the construction of a telegraph; it was for to aid the construction of a railway as well, because it was given out by the hon. gentleman in his statement in the House that he had contracted with the telegraph constructor to clear the road for 132 feet, which would be so much work done towards the construction of the road itself. Yet all this was done, when the hon. gentleman, according to his own statement last night, confessed he did not know within 200 miles where the road was to be. The hon. gentleman was very much mistaken in the statements he made to the House on that occasion. I will not say more than that, because I do not wish to be supposed to bring a charge of wilful misstatement against the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course not.

Mr. TUPPER: If I did wish to give it an unpleasant turn, I could submit a great deal of authority for the statement I will lay before the House. I do not wish, however, to be so understood. I know the hon. gentleman's mind is burdened with an enormous amount of work, and one of the reasons why he has so signally failed in administering the important department of Public Works is because the hon. gentleman is altogether over-weighted in undertaking that which no man, however great his powers can discharge, viz: to fill the position of Premier with efficiency and vigour, and at the same time discharge the laborious and almost overwhelming duties devolving upon any Minister of Public Works. I feel on this, as on other occasions, that the hon. the First Minister cannot carry in his mind all the statements necessary in order to meet charges which may be brought against his Ministry. To-day it is our duty to bring charges against hon. gentlemen opposite. To-morrow, no distant to-morrow, I believe, it will be their duty to criticise our acts, and I trust, when the time comes, that we will be judged in the same lenient and kindly spirit in which I have endeavoured to judge the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches. Well, Sir, the question arose, and it was charged that this contract was made and that the telegraph was being constructed contrary to law, without the authority of law, and in opposition to the Act, because no line had been located. On page 1013 of Hansard of 1875, I find the following :

"Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the line had been located where the contracts had been let, and he conceived the Government were acting according to law."

I have shown that this contract was let to a point that the hon. gentleman was unable to tell us whether it was on the line or within 200 miles of it; and that is six months after the time fixed for the completion of the contract.

An HON. MEMBER: There is no contract let.

Mr. TUPPER: No, not for the railway; the line is not located. The report proceeds:

"Mr. SCHULTZ said the only portion of the work that had been done was that under contract of the Pacific Railway to be useful in the construction of that work. He wished to know if the route of the railroad had been so far established as to admit of the contract of Messrs. Glass, Sifton & Co., about 23 miles, and that had not been placed where the line was completed by any means. No location had been made then, and so far as he (Mr. Schultz) could understand, no location was intended to be made where that line was put up.

"Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman's statement was incorrect.

"Mr. PLUMB said the line must be put up along the route of the location of the telegraph line, or were the contractors to locate the line for the Government.

"Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had already stated the line was to be put up where the road was to be located (these being the Engineer's instructions based upon his original suggestion) and he did not know that a single mile of telegraph line was being erected anywhere except on the line of the road.

"Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked the Premier if he could tell the House whether the line was erected from Fort Edmonton to Cedar Creek. Unless this had been done, and it was known definitely where the line of railway was to run, the contracts had been improperly given out.

"Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said these contracts were given out in accordance with the very letter of the Statute, and the House has voted money to carry them out.

On the 31st March this motion was made in the House, and this discussion took place, and there is a very significant commentary on what took place. According to this document brought down and laid upon the table of the House by the Government, the following significant message was sent to the contractor, Mr. Barnard:—

"OTTAWA, 9th April, 1875.

"Discontinue building of telegraph line, British Columbia, under contract with this Department. You will not be called upon to proceed with the work for some months. At what price would you erect telegraph, say forty-five (45) miles from Quesnel on old telegraph trail, clearing twenty (20) feet wide?"

(Signed), "F. BRAUN,
"Secretary."

So that the gentleman who had a binding contract to finish his work by October, 1876, is told to stop his work, and is coolly asked not to send in a tender in accordance with the provision of the Act that no work shall be done except by open public tender, but to put in a statement as to what he would erect 45 miles of telegraph line for. Mr. Barnard's reply is a very significant one:—

"I had completed 50 miles of the line, with the exception of erecting the poles and attaching the wire (which can be done at a small cost) receiving a certificate for $8,000, which has been paid."

So that at the time when the House was informed by the hon. gentleman that no work was being done, except where the railway had been located, $3,000 had been paid to the contractor for work done at a point which it is not known to-day whether it is within 200 miles of the line or not; and Mr.

Barnard shows that he had then involved himself in engagements in trying to fill this Government contract to the extent of $43,720. The Public Accounts show a payment to Mr. Barnard to the 31st December on this work of $18,284. Now I think that the most incredulous, the most critical gentlemen on the Government side of the House will have some difficulty in relieving himself from the responsibility of saying that a Government who would thus undertake, in violation of a Statute, to expend money contrary to, and in open defiance of the law, and to involve the country in a large amount of utterly useless expenditure in connection with this work, are not fairly chargeable with being open to public censure. Now, Sir, I have drawn attention of the House to the mode in which the Government have failed in their duty in reference to the purchase of steel rails. I have drawn the attention of the House to the mode in which they have failed in their duty in carrying out the railway in connection with the telegraph line; and I have shown that in both cases a large amount of public money has been sacrificed as well as all Parliamentary practice and principle ignored. I will now briefly turn the attention of the House to the mode in which the Government have carried on the contract for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. As I have stated before, they declared that this was a question of such vital urgency and hot haste that they must go forward, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the hon. gentlemen in opposition that no instrumental survey had been made, and that the Government had no means of informing themselves in relation to the nature of country or the character of the work. The hon. gentleman made a contract for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. That was in February, 1875, during the time that Parliament was sitting. It would have been better, under the circumstances, considering the extraordinary character of that contract, although he had obtained authority from the House, it would only have been wise to take the House into his confidence before the contract was made. That was not done; nor was the approval of Parliament asked for that contract. I myself put a motion on the paper to condemn the Georgian Bay contract, but the First Minister, by adjourning the House, prevented its being reached. I am not now going to say one word touching the desirability of the work; but one thing is obvious, Sir, that if the work was a mistake, then there is no justification for the step they have taken. If it was a matter of such vital urgency as the First Minister declared to the House, how is he going to justify himself for folding his hands at the end of a couple of years, in relation to this work, which he declared to be so vitally necessary so long ago as November, 1874, two years and a half ago? How did the hon. gentleman discharge his duty to the House and the country in relation to the contract itself. The law was plain. The law declared that he was precluded and prohibited from giving that contract to anybody unless they could satisfy him, and give conclusive evidence, that they possessed a capital of $4,000 per mile. Now, Sir, I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to this fact, that the amount I am stating is far below the sum required by law, for this reason: instead of having 85 miles, according to Mr. Foster, it is 105 miles, and, according to Mr. Fleming, it is 103½ miles; a pretty striking illustration, I think, to the House, of the mode in which the Government plunged blindly and contrary to the remonstrances given them from this side of the House, into the undertaking of this contract at all; but I say that there is a law which precludes the Minister of Public Works from letting one mile of that contract until he had satisfied himself that Mr. Foster possessed the capital of $340,000 according to his own estimate of the distance, under the Act. Now, Sir, what was Mr. Foster's position? The hon. gentleman has been asked, what evidence had you of Mr. Foster's ability to carry on this work; and he was obliged to answer—none; and this with regard to a contract, concerning which the law obliged him to have satisfactory testimony before he let it, that Mr. Foster had a capital of $340,000; and, that is only an insignificant portion of the capital which was required. The hon. gentleman did not take any means of ascertaining whether Mr. Foster was worth a single dollar; and we all now know that he was not worth a dollar; and that when the contract was let, it was a matter of notoriety, that he had involved himself by the purchase of the Canada Central Railway. He was then bound to the payment of interest which he could not begin to pay at all; and, in fact, no man in the country stood in a more embarrassed condition than Mr. A. B. Foster at the time when the contract was given him. The following telegram, from a daily paper published a few days since, says:

“The financial storm which has overtaken Hon. A. B. Foster, the railway contractor, is due to the following causes:—In 1871 he bought the rights of Mr. Bolckow in the Brockville and Ottawa and Canada Central Railways, on the understanding that he was to pay a certain sum for them in ten years, and to commence paying instalments of the purchase price at the end of five years.”

I stated it was no secret that he was struggling with difficulties with this gigantic load of debt around his neck, at the very moment when the contract was given him. It further says:

“The price was large, and in addition he bought from Mr. Bolckow a million and a quarter dollars' worth of iron rails, which he never paid for. The price of the interest in the railways and rails was over two million dollars. He has paid some small amount of interest on the railway purchases, but nothing on the rails. The railway companies have also instituted several suits against Mr. Foster in Ontario, and proceedings have been taken to foreclose on the bonds held by Mr. Bolckow. Several bills of defendant's now running have not yet been sued on. Messrs. O'Halloran, Q.C., and Edward Carter, Q.C., counsel for Mr. Foster, are contesting the writ of attachment on the ground that the affidavit is irregular and insufficient, and also upon the merits charging that the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company, plaintiffs, have no claims whatever against Mr. Foster. The contestation was presented at Sweetbary to-day.”

Now, I say, Sir, that the First Minister is called upon to justify himself to this House, and say why he let this contract in the face of the law, and contrary to law, ignoring all its provisions, and treating Parliament as if they were his creatures instead of being what Parliament always ought to be, the masters of the Government of the day. Parliament always should hold the position of requiring the Government to fulfil the law, or vacate the position that such non-fulfilment shows that they are not worthy to fill; and I say that the hon. gentleman has to justify himself to this House, under these circumstances, for making this enormous contract with Mr. Foster, and making a contract to build a line of railway which they did not know the length of within 20 miles at the time; and upon which no survey had been made, and concerning which no estimate had been prepared. The hon. gentleman violated the law if he has built this work under the Public Works' Act. What does this Act say? It declares that:

“It shall be the duty of the Chief Engineer to prepare maps, plans and estimates for all public works, which are about to be constructed or repaired by the Department.”

And yet, Sir, without a plan, without an estimate, without anything whatever, without even a recommendation from the Chief Engineer, this work is entered upon; and that without a survey, without the slightest means being taken to ascertain what ought to be done with reference to a work which was considered of such vital importance that it must be rushed through without Parliament having permission to pass on the contract at all. It was thus undertaken, and a binding contract made by the Government. Well, Sir, that law also was violated; and where are we to-day? Why, to-day we are told that $41,000 of public money have been paid. Why paid? How paid? Upon a certificate of the Chief Engineer? The hon. gentleman has never received such a certificate. The Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway never signed a certificate for a dollar of this $41,000; and, Sir, it was not only paid without such a certificate, but also without proper vouchers. Read the document brought down in relation to this matter! Let the attention of this House be drawn for a moment to the paper—the extraordinary paper laid on the table of the House in connection with this most extraordinary contract, and what will it show? Why, Sir, it will show that we have $41,000 paid on the Georgian Bay contract. It will show, Sir, that we have the contract cancelled; and, Sir, this most extraordinary document will show the mode in which the public work is carried on. I think that this document will hold a very remarkable position. On November 27th Mr. Foster says:

"We will have the profile of the Canada Central Railway in readiness to submit to the Department in the course of three or four weeks, and the remainder to French River in about two months."

On the 20th December he asks for important modifications. On December 23rd Mr. Fleming advises an extension of time for one year, and that the substitution of 26 miles of navigation would be reasonable. On the 8th of February Mr. Foster says, that his total outlay amounted to $63,000. On the 9th of February, Mr. Fleming says:

"That the proportion payable on an expenditure of $38,864 would be $9,716, less 15 per cent. to be retained under the 9th section of the contract."

One would suppose that the Government would respect a declaration of that kind from the Chief Engineer, but it appears that this was not the case. It seems that the hon. Minister of Public Works, as I stated before, delights in showing Parliament that he recognizes no authority here or anywhere else, and that anything contained in the Statute-book, or any respect for Parliament is not worth a moment's consideration. On the 28th February a Minute of Council was passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, advising that this contract be cancelled, and that the $83,000 which the law required should be deposited as a security for the fulfilment of the contract, should be returned. This deposit belonged to the people of Canada, and it ought not to have been returned, without the sanction of Parliament, to Mr. Foster. That Minute of Council said that:—

"The amount claimed by Mr. Foster to the 1st instant is $38,862.28, $20,000 of which may be safely paid."

On the 28th of April, Mr. Fleming says:

"I find by the accounts furnished by Mr. Foster, that there are only receipts for about $20,000. Accordingly, I would advise that he be called upon to furnish complete vouchers, and that the whole be placed in the Audit Department for examination."

I think that this was a very reasonable and very practical suggestion, and in this the House will quite agree with me.

Mr. TUPPER.

But instead of that being done, instead of the suggestion of the Chief Engineer being carried out—although the First Minister is so ready to fall back on that gentleman to support himself whenever he can do so—it appears it was treated with contempt, and the answer is an Order in Council dated the 6th May, recommending the payment of $36,838.15, and that the balance on the $50,996, the total sum claimed, be paid on the production of vouchers, and this was done, although Mr. Fleming had shown that only $9,716, less 15 per cent., could be paid under the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE: When did Mr. Fleming say that? Mr. Fleming said in his letter dated February 9th:

"The proportion, therefore, payable on an expenditure of $38,864.28 would be $9,716.07 less 15 per cent. to be retained under the 9th section of the contract."

The difficulty of readily finding these three statements is, that the return is put together in the most extraordinary manner: one half is backwards, and the other half, I was going to say, is upside-down. In the Order of Council, of the 28th of April, Mr. Fleming says:

"I find, of the accounts furnished by Mr. Foster, there are only receipts for about $20,000. Accordingly I would advise that he be called upon to furnish complete vouchers, and that the whole be placed in the Audit Department for examination."

On the 6th of May, a few days afterwards, without any such audit, the Minister of Public Works recommends that $36,838.15 be paid, deducting the sum of $20,000 already paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not the balance of $50,000.

Mr. TUPPER: He further recommends that he be authorized to pay the remaining accounts to an extent not exceeding in the whole the said sum of "$50,966.27, as soon as such vouchers are presented as shall be satisfactory."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman call that a balance?

Mr. TUPPER: I said the balance on $50,000—that is, the balance remaining on $50,000. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not understand the hon. gentleman. He said there was a balance of $50,000, and when I called for him to show where that balance was stated he looked for it but could not find it. Now he makes out that he did not mean that. The amount referred to is made up of the following items:—Buildings, &c., at mouth of French River, $9,494.83; survey, 31,838.15; head office expenses and fees to consulting engineer, $5,000; contingent expenses at ten per cent., $4,633; total, $50,966.27. So that instead of there being a balance of $50,000, that is the sum total of the claim of Mr. Foster, and which the Ministers recommended should be paid as soon as such vouchers were presented as were satisfactory, first as to the character and usefulness of the work at French River; and, secondly, the actual payment of the several sums for purposes defined in the Order in Council of February the 5th, 1876.

Mr. TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman understood me to say there was a balance of $50,000, after the $36,838 were paid, he misunderstood me. I meant that the value, $50,966, was the whole amount claimed by Mr. Foster. I do not want to detain the House while I read the whole amended Order in Council. I said that Mr. Fleming stated that he could only find receipts for $20,000; and that Mr. Fleming advised that Mr. Foster be called upon to furnish complete vouchers, and that the whole be placed in the Audit Department for examination; but, instead of that, as far as any evidence given to the House shows, no such audit took place. The hon. the Minister of Public Works recommended that $36,838.15 be paid, and also that the balance on $50,966.27 be paid on production of vouchers. I trust I have made myself clear to the hon. gentleman. It does not require the slightest exaggeration in order to make the case sufficiently strong, as I think I have convinced the hon. gentleman. We come now to the case of the Canada Central Railway. I have shown to the House the mode in which Mr. Foster is dealt with. That a contract is made with him without his showing that he had sufficient capital to carry it out; that he entered upon the work; and that he got a certain amount for that work.

And if the House wants to know more as to the character of that work, it can refer to Mr. Ridout, who had been appointed by the Government in charge of that work, and who, a short time before these payments were made, gave a most remarkable history of the mode in which the work was proceeded with. On the 22nd of Nov., Mr. Ridout, who had been sent to examine the work, says that Mr. Foster's engineer, Mr. Harris, was unable afford him any positive information of the result of their surveys so far as made, having only in his office a few rough pieces of profiles and maps of portions of the early surveys in a very unfinished state, no proper profiles or map having as yet been made. If the House will turn to the Journals for 1875, they will find the terms on which the Government was authorized by this House to make a contract in relation to the Canada Central. What were they?—

“That the Company shall, within one month from the ratification of this Order in Council, by the House of Commons, satisfy the Minister of Public Works that they have entered into a bona fide contract or contracts for the building of the railway, and have provided sufficient means, with the Government bonus, to secure the completion of the line on or before the 1st day of January, 1877, and also that the company shall, from the date of such contracts, make continuously such progress as will justify the hope of the completion of the line within the time mentioned.”

Now, there is the basis on which the Government alone could make a contract, and the terms upon which alone they could make any payment. In the first instance I want to know with whom they made the contract? They are obliged by law, they are compelled by the action of the House to ascertain that this Company have sufficient means with that bonus to complete the work by the 1st January, 1877, and they are only permitted by their Order in Council to make a contract with parties who proved beyond peradventure they had the means. Whom did they make it with? They made it with Mr. A. B. Foster, not content with giving the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch, in which they were required by law to have proof that he had a capital of $340,000. They gave another contract for the Canada Central to the same man without the slightest evidence that he possessed a single dollar, or had the means of doing anything whatever. It is then apparent that this contract was made in the teeth of the Order in Council with a party that the Order in Council excludes from making such contract at all, limiting, as it does, the payment to a person who had made the contract and was not making such continuous progress as would complete it within the time. Yet $68,000 of the public money of the country has been paid over to this Mr. A. B. Foster, in violation of the express terms of the act of this House, and without the evidence that he was doing anything at all except these imperfect surveys, which are treated with much contempt by the Government Engineer who was sent up to see what he was doing and on what pretext he was claiming to be paid. He was paid all the money he professed to have expended on his surveys, and that without vouchers or audit; without the authority of law, and in opposition to express terms of his contract, then he was paid $68,000 on the pretext that he had deposited a lot of iron rails somewhere. The line is not located, the surveys have not been finished according to Mr. Fleming's statement and Mr. Ridout's statement. No one knows where the line is to begin, whether twenty miles from Renfrew or not, because the estimated eighty-five miles from Burnt Lake to the Georgian Bay, turned out to be 105 miles; so that from the vicinity of Douglas to Burnt Lake it would not, probably, be 140 miles if the same in accurate estimate was made. So they do not know if these rails, what few are left of them, are now within twenty miles of where the line was to commence. These iron rails were shown to be of the most worthless character, but they were valued by Mr. Foster, during the past season, at $48 a ton and he was paid $68,000 on them at that rate. That is not the worst, it will probably turn out that these rails are owned by parties in England, but if they are of no more value than we have reason to suppose, it is of very little consequence what became of them. It is said that what were used for ballasting were worn out, they were so utterly worthless. After Mr. Foster is paid $68,000 in violation of the law, in violation of the Order in Council, which required him to be going on continuously with the work and showing that he could complete this contract, he coolly asked the loan of 100 tons of those rails; and this good-natured Government, this Government which seems to be owned by Mr. Foster, say very well, but you must deposit some security, so he deposited some South Eastern Railway bonds; and when we asked the First Minister, who had no more authority to take and lend that 100 tons of rails than to lend money out of the Treasury, after paying more than twice as much as they were worth, what security did you get?—he says South Eastern Railway bonds. We asked if he knew whether they are worth anything; No! he says he is unable to say that they can be sold at all, and I believe for the best reason, that they have, as far as I can ascertain, no marketable value. Then, Sir, when gentlemen in opposition, patient and enduring as we are, ready to pass over almost anything that is not of such a grave nature as to compel us to do our duty to the country, when we call attention to it, and it is a matter of investigation what turns out to be the fact? Why that instead of 100 tons being gone, there are 227 tons gone, and without any authority, without any security, without any pretence, without even the formality of asking for the last 127 tons. I do the Government the justice to say that I believe they were ignorant of the fact; that this property which had been paid for, that this property which belonged to the country was being used by Mr. Foster as if it was his own private property. That is the condition of things on which I think we are justified in asking the House to say it cannot agree to endorse the policy of the Government, or the mode in which the Canadian Pacific Railway has been carried out. I must say something about a most remarkable transaction, that is, a report brought down, I believe, to the Senate—at all events, it is a public document—showing what is going on at the interesting section of the country called “Thunder Bay.” I said before, that I would carefully guard myself against using a word or throwing out insinuations which might be construed into a personal assault or anything outside of the necessary criticism of this work as a public transaction.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do not spare yourself.

Mr. TUPPER: I wish I could be spared, I believe the Minister of Public Works—unlike me—is incapable of appreciating the pain it gives me to be compelled to criticise the conduct of any public man as my duty obliges me to criticise his. If he knew the pleasure it gave me to say, as I did two years ago, that I believed there was no man in this country better able to fill the office of Minister of Public Works than himself, he would appreciate the pain with which I am now forced to admit that I was no prophet, and that the administration of his department has obliged me to reconsider that compliment which I was so happy to be able to bestow, in this House, upon the hon. gentleman. But Sir, I have shown that this railway line was taken down there, and this branch commenced without the authority of Parliament. There is no law for the construction of the Thunder Bay branch. We have been told that this is an economical Government. Well, we have had a specimen of their economy in this connection. But when I tell the House that the Return brought down shows that over $51,000 have been paid for about a mile of right of way at Kaministiquia, that wild and unsettled country, they can form some conception of how the Government are expending the public money. Here is a country which has been described—and I need not describe again—by the hon. the Minister of Finance as a road running through an unpeopled desert, and which $51,000 would almost have bought the fee simple of a few years ago. No doubt the value of property has risen from the fact of the Government locating the road there, but it is an important question for discussion, why it should have gone to that point instead of to Prince Arthur's Landing, or why it should have gone to a place which lengthens the road.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It shortens the road.

Mr. TUPPER: Any person looking at the map distributed to the House, will find that the one line is curved, and the other almost direct. But I believe I am right in saying that private enterprise is building a line to Prince Arthur's Landing, and that the Government of Ontario have subsidized the line to the extent of $2,000 per mile to make this connection. I believe that returns brought down to the House proves that Mr. Ballairge has shown that there are forty-three days more of navigation to Prince Arthur's Landing than to the point where the Government are making the terminus of the line. I am now quoting from the report brought down by the Government. Mr. Ballairge is a gentleman of high attainments, a gentleman who has been long in the Public Works Department, and who was sent up specially to examine into this question, and this is his report. It may be worthy the consideration of the House or it may be not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It cannot be correct.

Mr. TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman says it is not correct he is correcting his own return submitted on the authority of his own Engineer. I do not want to detain the House, and will, therefore, pass over that without taking time to turn over authorities; but whenever the accuracy of any statement I make is challenged, I think I shall be just as likely to give as decisive testimony as I have given now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where is that report?

Mr. TUPPER: It is the report relating to the Port Francis Locks or Canal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him, because I do not think he deliberately intended to mislead the House. The date the hon. gentleman quoted has no reference to the river or Thunder Bay at all; it is the chain of lakes away in the interior, 200 miles from this.

Mr. TUPPER: I will show the House that if any person is to blame it is the one who made the report. The hon. gentleman calls Kaministiquia the present terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I assumed, as this return says: "River Kaministiquia, the present terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway," and puts the words: "opening 25th May, and closing 20th October opposite," that it applied to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The figures are not opposite.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman will see if I am inaccurate in the statement that inaccuracy has followed the extraordinary way in which this return has described the terminus. Mr. Ballairge has put down navigation as opening on the 25th May and closing on the 26th October. He may not have meant that, but it is certainly calculated to give that impression, and I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The return will not read that way at all.

Mr. TUPPER: I read it in that way, and I am glad if there is any error, that the hon. gentleman has drawn attention to it because I can assure him I am most anxious to avoid the slightest error of statement in criticizing these matters. But at all events, there is a considerable difference between the opening and closing of navigation at the two points.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. TUPPER: Why, even the hon. gentleman's own correction admits considerable difference, and when we take into consideration, Sir, the fact, we are building 400 miles of railway from Thunder Bay to the Red River, and that we are going to this enormous expenditure of public money for the construction of a road that is to be practically useless for something like at least six months in the year, it does become important, Sir, even to the extent of a few days as to the opening of navigation; but, Sir, I did not propose to discuss whether an error had been made or not in the selection of one point or the other; but I want to draw the attention of the House to this point, the amount paid for the right of way at Kaministiquia. Now, Sir, it is perfectly obvious that the location of a railway enormously increases the value of land; but I deny that speculators—and these people are declared to be speculators; it is so stated in this document which has been brought down by the Government—and persons who have gone in to purchase land on speculation at a mere nominal figure, have a right to be paid by the Government the increased value of their land owing to the location of the railway there. When the Intercolonial Railway was located, the principle observed by the Government and by the Commissioners in the payment for right of way, was the rational principle of paying the amount that the land would have been worth if the railroad had not been located there, because it is perfectly obvious that this was all the parties owning it were entitled to.

Mr. BOWELL: That is all the Act allowed.

Mr. TUPPER: Yes; that is all the Act allowed; and all it ought to allow, because it is perfectly apparent that the Government would pay, otherwise, twice the increased value of the land and that when the parties are in most instances only too glad to give the right of way. It is true that this appears on the papers to have been a town, but it was a town without any houses. I believe that after they made up their minds to sell to the Government, a rough shanty was erected on it to give it additional value, but all the streets and everything else about it existed only on paper and in the imagination of these wise and prudent speculators who managed to pocket the people's money without giving any equivalent consideration for it. Now, Sir, what do you suppose was paid by the Intercolonial Railroad Commissioners for the right of way on 500 miles, in round numbers, of the line of the Intercolonial Railway? and this was not through a wild and unsettled country like Kaministiquia, but it ran in many places through the finest, the most arable and the most valuable land to be found in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Brunswick and Quebec—only about $273,000; and, Sir, I may say that eighty miles of right of way, with station grounds, gravel pits and everything Government required in connection with the construction of the road, through Nova Scotia in the splendid counties of Cumberland and Colchester, through the town of Truro, and through the village of Amherst, including damages to buildings and for buildings, and for everything else, cost only about $3,000 more than for this mile of right of way at Kaminstiquia. What will the House say when I tell them that, according to the rate paid for the roadway at Thunder Bay, the Government have paid at the rate of nearly three millions of money more than for the whole cost of constructing the Intercolonial Railway with all the appurtenances, and with all the rolling stock, and with everything else on it; and that, in fact, these 500 miles, according to the rate paid at Thunder Bay, would have cost instead of $272,420, which was the entire cost of 500 miles through Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and Quebec, $25,709,500 for the right of way alone; such would have been the cost, had the owners of land on the Intercolonial been paid at the same rate as these speculators at Kaminstiquia, who have thus been permitted to pocket the people's money, Sir, I only need to draw the attention of the House to these figures to show that the most wasteful extravagance in the use of the public money has been exhibited by the Government in relation to that matter.

An hon. GENTLEMAN: Who got it?

Mr. TUPPER: An hon. gentleman asks me who got it; but to answer that would take me to another branch of the subject, which, as I stated at the outset, I wanted to avoid; I must, therefore, decline to say anything with reference to that enquiry. But, Sir, I now come to another matter in connection with this work, and that is—the Fort Francis Locks. I will not refer to it at length, and I will not occupy much of the time of the House with it, because it has been laid before the House previously; but I must say this, Sir, that the policy of the Government was stated in very distinct terms in 1875 by the Minister of Public Works, and it was this:—

“In addition, therefore, to the railway surveys from Lake Shebandowan to Lake Superior, a distance of 45 miles, and from Red River to Rat Portage, a distance of 114 miles, we have felt it desirable to make correct surveys, during the season, of the intervening distance. The entire distance from Red River to Lake Superior is, in round numbers, 430 miles by the Dawson route, of this we have surveyed and asked for tenders for 155 or 160 miles. This leaves a distance between the two points of 270 miles, of that distance we will be able, by constructing two cheap wooden locks at Fort Francis, to obtain from Rat Portage uninterrupted steam navigation for a distance of nearly 200 miles to Sturgeon Falls at the east end of Rainy Lake.”

He further says:

“We hope within two years, or two and a half at the outside, that we will have a railway finished at the eastern and western ends, and, with these and the locks at Fort Francis, we expect that the distance altogether may be traversed in four or five days at the outside, that now takes on the average from nine to twelve days.”

That was the policy of the Government as avowed in 1875; and I may state that the policy announced in the speech of the hon. gentlemen in submitting the Railway Act of 1874, was the immediate construction of a through line of railway from Lake Superior to Red River. In 1875, a year afterwards, that policy was abandoned, and it was proposed to substitute for it a mixed route of land and water—270 miles of navigation with a short line of railway at each end. The attention of the hon. Minister was drawn in forcible terms, from this side of the House, to the fact that as on the United States side there was a line from Duluth to Red River, it was utterly impossible to suppose that we could compete by 150 miles of Railway at the two ends of the route, and half a dozen or eight portages to cross, and 270 miles of navigation; and that all the money expended on it would be thrown away. The hon. gentleman then revised his policy and again changed it, undertaking to construct a through line of railway from Thunder Bay direct to Red River. When, Sir, that was done, it was assumed that this expenditure, which would have been thrown away in any case, and utterly useless, if a direct line of railway was made, would be abandoned, and that no further expenditure of money should take place on it. It appears, however, that, while undertaking to construct as rapidly as the location of a through line of railway would permit, a through railway, the Government have at the same time expended over $100,000 of public money, not on any portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but on these locks at Fort Francis, and in that direction. Now, Sir, I have said that this report, in reference to Mr. Foster, was a marvellous report, but it is in fact rather thrown into the shade, if anything, by the Fort Francis Locks report. What do we find? We find that, although the Public Works' Act says, that the Government must have the specifications of the engineer in all works constructed by that Department, they had no specifications, and that a Mr. Sutherland—who he is I know not—of Orillia, is called in hot haste to go and take charge of the work, and actually commence excavations without an estimate, without a plan, without engineering, or anything else. A more astounding series of statements, except for gentlemen who are conversant with these papers, which have recently been brought down, could scarcely be presented to the House, than these papers which are before us at present. Why, Sir, they show that there were no tenders. The law says that the Government must have tenders. The vote is for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Every dollar expended is expended under that Act, or under no Act at all. If they have expended it under the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, then, as my right hon. friend has stated, they are acting contrary to law, for they did it without tender; and if it was expended under the Public Works Act, then it was contrary to law, because they have no vote for it and no authority. Sir, it will be seen by the Public Works Act that, in that case, they would be violating the Act. It says:

“Nothing in this Act shall give authority to the Minister to cause expenditure not previously sanctioned by Parliament, except for such repairs and alterations as the interest of the public service shall require.”

Sir, in that case, whether it was expended under the Pacific Railway Act, or under the Public Works' Act, the Government cannot proceed without estimates, without plans, and without surveys by the

Mr. TUPPER.

Engineer; and yet you find that you have, as in the other return, to read this book backwards, and that when you have got to the end of the chapter, after the money has been spent, you get an estimate, and that after the Government has expended over $100,000, they find that it is desirable to have an estimate, and send a gentleman up there to furnish them with one. On the 11th May, 1875, Mr. Braun writes to Mr. Sutherland that:

“Pending the arrival from Ottawa of such instructions, you will proceed with the excavations first of the whole of the earth-work, and afterwards of such portions of the work as must necessarily be taken out.”

On July 24th Mr. Sutherland is informed:

“Full instructions have been sent to Mr. Hazlewood to proceed to Fort Francis and prepare a full and complete design for the whole work.”

On the 2nd August following, Mr. Hazlewood wrote to Mr. Braun:

“DEAR SIR,—Your communications, Nos. 31,203 and 31,204, with enclosures, are to hand. I shall give the canal question at Fort Francis my best attention. I have brought Mr. Mortimer down to work upon the plans, and as soon as they are ready I shall not lose a moment in forwarding them to Ottawa. In the meantime I may state that I approve of the location selected by Mr. Mortimer for the canal at Fort Francis.”

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the 11th May Mr. Braun had written to Mr. Sutherland:

“On reaching Fort Francis you will see Mr. Mortimer, resident engineer, who will be at once instructed to take soundings with a view to determine the exact points at which it would be most desirable to construct the canal locks at each, and you will then as speedily as possible ascertain the nature of the rock and the depth of various points, so that Mr. Mortimer can make a section.”

And on the 5th July—a month before the hon. gentleman said he had been instructed to go there—wrote:

“According to instructions received from Mr. Hazlewood, I have made the necessary profile, and have laid out the ground for the locks on Rainy River at this place.”

Mr. MACKENZIE: Now, does the hon. gentleman mean to mix up these dates with the view of misleading the House?

Mr. TUPPER: I will now read from the document brought down by the hon. the First Minister himself. The first thing to be noticed is the extraordinary statement that:

"In the return prepared for the House in the matter of the Fort Francis Locks, there is wanting the report of Mr. S. Hazlewood, giving an estimate of the cost of the works. The report is mislaid, but Mr. Hazlewood has been written to for a copy of it."

I believe among all the documents with reference to an important public work that perhaps is the most extraordinary statement that could be found. On May 11th, a letter was sent to Mr. Sutherland, signed by Mr. Braun, stating:

"When you reach Fort William you will see Mr. Walter Oliver, and, if he has finished the work entrusted to him, he will accompany you to assist in taking charge of the men. Mr. James Macdonald and Mr. Oliver will act as foremen under you, either in the woods or at the works, as you may deem desirable."

An HON. MEMBER: What Mr. Oliver is that?

Mr. TUPPER I don't know. This Fort Francis Lock appears to have been a happy preserve for the needy friends of the Government, who could be shipped up there out of the reach of any one. Did any one ever hear of a resident engineer being the person to prepare plans and to authorize the construction of a public work? What does the hon. First Minister take the House for? Does he not suppose that we know that a resident engineer is generally a person with—merely sufficient knowledge of engineering to enable him to carry out the instructions of his superior officers. Long months afterwards it was found that Mr. Mortimer's information was all wrong, that he had not the proper depth of the locks or anything connected with it; and that was the best evidence that Mr. Mortimer was not a competent engineer. On the 24th July, Mr. Sutherland is written to as follows:

"These instructions necessarily include the re-examination of the line recommended by yourself and Mr. Mortimer, and should Mr. Hazlewood conceive it necessary to make any change in the location, you will defer to his opinions, and carry on the work on the amended line he may trace out, should he conceive that course to be necessary."

Now, I ask, in the history of Canada, was ever a public work proceeded with in such a manner as that? I do not think there was. At all events it was done in deliberate defiance of the Public Works' Act, and without any sufficient authority. Everything like law and precedent, and everything that savours of Parliamentary Government were thrown to the wind because the hon. the First Minister decided that the work should be commenced at once. Every person knew that the engineer in charge should have control and power over the work. But Mr. Hazlewood was written to as follows:—

"As the site where Mr. Sutherland will commence his excavation has been recommended by Mr. Mortimer equally as by himself, there is fair reason to look forward to the line selected by them being approved by yourself."

I have never heard of such instructions given to an engineer. It was a direct hint to him how to make up his mind. Would it be supposed that, under such circumstances as those, the work of excavation should have been ordered by the hon. the Minister of Public Works on the 11th May? On the 18th April, 1876, nearly a year afterwards, Mr. Braun wrote to Mr. Sutherland:—

"Sir,—I am directed to forward you herewith a copy of plan of lock at Fort Francis, prepared by Mr. Page, which has been approved of by the Minister. I am to authorize you to resume work on the said lock by day labour, and to request that you will submit to the Department an estimate of the probable monthly expenditure for the next twelve months."

This letter was sent, although the work had been commenced nearly a year before under the direction of the Minister of Public Works. And yet the hon. gentleman would insinuate that I was not doing justice to these statements, because I did not read them in detail. We at last get something practical. It is the report signed by Mr. Baillairge, who had been instructed on the 30th August to proceed to Fort Francis. Mr. Baillairge said in effect that all the money had been thrown away, and that the work was practically useless unless a great deal more money was spent upon it; and showed that the work had proved an utter delusion. He said:—

"The object for which the Fort Francis Canal is being constructed cannot be obtained unless Rainy River is improved so as to ensure the requisite draft, and the ascent of vessels against the current in the rapid."

He goes on to speak of the mode of improvement, and says:—

"No definite scheme or estimate can, however, be submitted, unless the necessary levels, soundings and measurements are taken along the entire line of the proposed navigation."

It is thus shown that about a year after this work was in progress an Engineer of the Public Works Department was sent up to the locality and found the Government had not taken the first preliminary step required to be taken before the money was expended. But he gave on 1st September, 1876, a very remarkable statement. He said:

"SIR,—Having been instructed on the 3rd ult., by the Hon. the Minister of Public Works to examine the Fort Francis Canal, now under your charge, and to give such directions as I may deem advisable, I herewith enclose for your guidance a specification of the work to be done according to the revised plan with which you have lately been furnished.

"This plan was prepared from somewhat limited information, and is based on the high and low water levels originally observed by the engineer who first laid out the work; the low water levels have since been found to be fourteen inches lower at the lower end than represented on the plan. I have, therefore, appended to the specification a list of levels, showing the elevation of the main portions of the work, so as to suit the highest and lowest water levels observed up to the present time."

So we have, in regard to this work upon which the excavations were commenced on 11th May, 1875, a statement made by Mr. Baillairge on 1st Sept., 1876, that they were mistaken as to the first principles and initial steps necessary to the very inception of the work. Mr. Baillairgé continues:

"As it is important to ascertain the extent and nature of the obstructions, and the cost of removing or overcoming the same, you are hereby requested to examine the sections of the channel referred to, and such other points as may appear doubtful, during the season of lowest water, and to furnish the Department with a report thereon, together with an estimate of the probable cost of improving the channel for the required draught from Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods."

I hope I have satisfied the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and in reading the text of this remarkable document, I have given the House the best evidence that the work was undertaken without any knowledge of the subject, and after $100,000 were expended an engineer was sent to investigate and report on the work, showing, in the most conclusive manner, that the information which the hon. the Minister of Public Works was bound to have obtained before entering upon the undertaking was not fully obtained until one year and a half after the work was commenced; and, in fact, a more reckless, illegal, unjustifiable expenditure of public money had never been made by any person in this country. In the report of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, on page 26, what do we find? We find that at this place where Fort Francis Lock is being constructed with seven feet of water on the sills, for forty miles there is a depth of only four feet and a half; yet the public money is used without plans, specifications, or authority of the Chief Engineer; or without any recommendation under which one dollar could be expended, and the hon. gentleman makes an expenditure of $100,000, which unless followed up by an expenditure of half a million more, will not accomplish the object proposed. But suppose the works would be completed, what then? Does any one suppose that with a railway from Duluth to Red River, a single ton of freight would be carried by that route? As regards the transportation of rails, by this route there would be eight portages, involving sixteen times loading and unloading, putting the rails into waggons and taking them out again; and the most insane Minister of Public Works would not undertake to transport one ton of heavy freight of any description by any such line. Yet, the hon gentleman adhered to the policy he had presented before he had undertaken to construct a direct line from Thunder Bay to Red River, and went on with this expenditure. But the amount was not charged to current expenditure, as, under the late Government, all expenditures in connection with the Dawson Route were charged. I draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to the fact that, when he is comparing the expenditure of 1873-74 and subsequent years, all such expenditures under the late Government were charged to current revenue, and not chargeable to capital under this Government. All these expenditures are made in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and thus hundreds of thousands of dollars were expended without having any more connection with the railway than if it was spent in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. I am happy to say that the duty I have laid upon myself is drawing to a close. I think I have given to the House sufficient reason in relation to the policy of the Government, and the mode in which they have carried out that policy, for passing a moderate censure, the moderate censure that I propose—that this House cannot approve of the policy of the Government. We cannot approve of it, because Ministers have violated their principles and their pledges; because the men who declared to the Canadian public that the railway never would be built by any other mode than by a private company, aided by a grant of land and money, had, so soon as they obtained power, trampled the principles propounded and the pledges given to the people, under their feet, and shown that what they meant was that no other Government should, in this way, handle the public money, and be able to deal with the public requirements, but themselves. The moment they were entrusted with power, in consequence, I suppose, of their high purity and independence of character, they thought it would be safe to change the whole policy, and to take the work into their own hands, although it would involve an enormous direct expenditure by the Government. I ask the support of the House to the amendment because the Government have violated their pledges given to the people, that if power was conceded to them it would never be abused, and the great cardinal principle of their policy would be that not one dollar would be expended without a direct vote of Parliament. I have shown that millions have been expended, I may say millions wasted, without having a vote of Parliament for a single dollar. I am justified in asking the House to pass this censure upon the Government, because their proceedings have been unconstitutional and illegal, and they have violated the law under which they are constructing this work, with respect to the declaration that public tenders must be invited, and the work performed by contract. They have expended public moneys without tenders. I have shown that they have, in an unconstitutional manner, because, without any vote of Parliament, they have undertaken to pledge the good faith of Canada to the payment of millions, and by a reckless purchase have saddled the country with a dead loss of over a million and a half, involving an annual charge upon our treasury of $75,000 for ever. I have shown that, in addition to their vacillating policy,—a policy changing from hour to hour, a policy of a mixed route one day and an all-rail route the next, of carrying on the works by a private company one day and by the Government the next, and now they propose to revert to the former when they have destroyed all chance of success. I have shown that even in dealing with the small matter of the right of way in an unsettled and unpeopled district at Kaministiquia, the payment made was such that it applied to payment of the right of way for the Intercolonial, which passed in large sections through a settled country, many sections passing through most valuable lands, the amount would have been more than the whole cost of the Intercolonial by something more than three million of dollars. I have shown you that their policy was a breach of faith, because they have pledged themselves to British Columbia; they have pledged themselves to the Imperial Government, to construct a railway on Vancouver Island, and to construct a railway from the shores of the Pacific to the shores of Lake Superior by 1890, without any qualification or restriction whatever, both of which they have abandoned. I have shown you that their expenditure during the past year was in contravention of the decision of the House, as arrived at by the resolution of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), because the hon. the First Minister knows that he cannot say it is not increasing the taxation of the country. With the $3,000,000 of additional taxation, levied when they first obtained power, gone, with an admitted deficit of $2,000,000 during the past year, with the demand upon the House this Session for $500,000 more to meet the ordinary expenditure of the country, I defy the hon. gentleman to say that every dollar he expends on the Canadian Pacific Railway does not increase the existing rate of taxation. And, if it does, I say the resolution, prepared, as I believe it was, by the Government, and put into the hands of the hon. member for West Middlesex, and sustained, as it was, by them, was a complete breach of faith of the solemn, binding obligation the Government had made with British Columbia, and with the Imperial Government, that they would proceed with and construct the road within the time stated. The hon. the First Minister stated, in his manifesto to the country, in reference to the connection of immigration to this work :

“We shall endeavour to make these great works auxiliary to the promotion of immigration on an extended scale, and to the settlement and development of these rich and fertile territories on which our hopes for the future of Canada are so largely fixed.”

Is there a man in Canada who did not concur in the sentiment propounded there? Is there a man in Canada, who knows anything of the great and fertile country spoken of, who does not think that the future hopes of Canada are, to a large extent, necessarily fixed on that country? And, yet, what has been the record of the hon. gentleman? Dealing with the public money with unstinted hand—for Parliament has been ready to place anything demanded in the hon. gentleman's hands—what has been done? Instead of making his Canadian Pacific Railway policy accomplish what every person believes might be accomplished in connection with the settlement of that country—every one knows that one of the prime considerations in connection with this great work was that it would afford the means of giving valuable, remunerative employment to the immigrants brought into the country to people that magnificent territory—yet the Government have done absolutely nothing towards that end. Was there ever a Government in the position this Government was in, with this matter in their hands, with a support in Parliament such as few Governments have ever possessed, and with the opportunity of advancing the interests of the country in that way without measure and without bounds. And, yet, what is the record to-day? The record of Votes and Proceedings of yesterday shows that the number of immigrants brought to this country in 1873, when not a mile of this road was under contract, was three times as great as during the past year; that while the cost per head of bringing immigrants to the country has been enormously increased, we stand in the position, that instead of the construction of this great work bringing a tremendous immigration and advancing the interests of Canada in the way the hon. the First Minister held out to the country when he made this address to the people, those expectations have utterly failed; and that notwithstanding all this expenditure in connection with the work, it has not been attended by increased influx of immigrants, but, on the contrary, a large and rapid decline has taken place. I have referred already to the violation of law, the utter disregard of Parliamentary authority, and the enormous payments of money connected with the Georgian Bay Branch and the Canada Central Railroad, in violation of the one and contempt of the other. The whole policy of the Government, as propounded by the hon. gentleman, has been utterly delusive, and to-day we find ourselves without any advance, without anything accomplished, but minus a large sum of money which has been paid to parties, who, contrary to the law, were entrusted to carry out contracts. I am sorry that I have been obliged to trespass on the indulgence of the House so long, but I think I have adduced sufficient to support the motion which I now have the honour to move. I have endeavoured, and I think the hon. the First Minister will agree with me in the statement, to avoid every question that could raise an unpleasant topic of discussion between the occupants of the Treasury Benches and ourselves. Notwithstanding the great temptation that was presented as I proceeded in this discussion, I have carefully endeavoured to give a simple statement of facts presented by the Government themselves, as brought down in public documents; and if I have not established successfully that the Government have failed in their duty to the country, and that the course they have pursued on this great question has been detrimental to the interests of the country, then I have no grounds on which to ask for the support of this House. But I feel that the case that has been presented is one which entitles me confidently to ask your support, and if I do not obtain it from this House there is an equally independent tribunal in this country to which I can confidently look for the affirmation of this motion which I have now the honour to offer. Thanking the House for their indulgence at this late period of the Session which they have kindly given on the ground of the vast importance of the subject, and deeply regretting my own physical inability, under the circumstances in which I was compelled to address the House, to deal with the question as vigorously as the interests of the country demand, I beg leave to offer the following resolution:—

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That this House cannot approve of the course pursued by this Government with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway.”

Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the debate be adjourned, the hour being eleven o'clock, and that it be the first Order of the Day for Monday.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Ten minutes after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 23rd April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE SEAT FOR ST. JOHN.

MOTION TO REFER.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that before the Orders of the Day were called he desired to read a statement as follows:—

“That it appears from the accounts laid before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts of this House in the Session of 1875, that the firm of I. & F. Burpee, of St. John, New Brunswick, at divers times between the 20th November, 1873, and the 24th September, 1874, agreed to supply, and did supply for the Government of Canada, divers goods and merchandize to be used for the purposes of the Intercolonial Railway and the Government Railways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, amounting in all to a large sum of money; that such supplies consist of railroad spikes, cut spikes, refined iron, telegraph wire, boiled oil, Colza oil, English iron, ingot copper, cast steel, cut nails, white lead, blasting powder, and other wares,—and that he is credibly informed, and believes he can establish that the moneys paid to the said firm of I. & F. Burpee were so paid under contract and agreement made between the said firm and the officers of the Government charged with the construction and maintenance of the said railway, and that the Hon. Isaac Burpee, a member of this House, was, at the time when the said contract and agreement was entered into and the said payment made, a member of this House for the Electoral District of the city and county of St. John, in the Province of New Brunswick.”

He therefore moved :

“That it appears from the accounts laid before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts of this House in the Session of 1875, that the firm of I. & F. Burpee, of St. John, New Brunswick, merchants, at divers times between the 20th of November, 1873, and the 24th of September, 1874, agreed to supply, and did supply for the Government of Canada, divers goods and merchandize, to be used for the purposes of the Intercolonial Railway and the Government Railways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, amounting in all to a large sum of money; that such supplies consisted of railroad spikes, cut spikes, refined iron, telegraph wire, boiled oil, Colza oil, English iron, ingot copper, cut nails, white lead, blasting powder, and other wares, and that Mr. Domville, a member of this House, has stated that he is credibly informed, and believes that he can establish that the moneys paid to the said firm of I. & F. Burpee, for such supplies, were so paid under contracts and agreements between the said firm and the officers of the Government charged with the construction and maintenance of the said railways, and that the Hon. Isaac Burpee, a member of this House, was, at the time when the said contracts and agreements were entered into and said payment made, a member of the said firm and also a member of this House for the Electoral District of the city and county of St. John, in the Province of New Brunswick; it be Ordered, That the matter herein stated be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they be required to inquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and to report the result of their enquiries, and whether the said Hon. Isaac Burpee has vacated his seat.”

Mr. BURPEE: Before the motion passes, I may say I have no objection to going before the Committee on Privileges and Elections; I have no desire to sit here one moment in my place in this House if anything has been done amiss or wrong by me. I am willing to abide by the decision of the Committee. I am willing to vacate my seat at any moment, and I assure the member for Kingston that this would be no great sacrifice to me at any time. I was very largely interested in this firm at St. John, but I retired from it and left them my means and name, and instructions to settle up my affairs. I have no interest in any profits that may have arisen from the business with the Government or otherwise from the 1st of January, 1874, until now. I have received nothing; nor did I know of any contract at any time entered into by them with the Government. If any were entered into by any members of the firm it was quite unknown to me. I have never seen the accounts referred to. I have no knowledge of them whatever. I have no more to say, I think, on the matter. When I heard the hon. member for King's give notice that he was going to move against me I sent to my brother at St. John for all the information he could give me about it, as I do not know the particulars of the charges made. The information I have not yet got, but I expect it in a day or two. I do not think it worth while to say anything more on the matter now, but I will leave it to the Committee. I only wish to add that, so far as any transactions with the firm and the Government from the 1st January, 1874, are concerned, until now, I have had no interest in them whatever.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

"That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom it has been referred to enquire into and report upon the allegations of Mr. Domville, a Member of this House, in his place this day made, that Isaac Burpee, a Member of this House for the Electoral District of the City and County of Saint John, was a member of the firm of I. and F. Burpee, who entered into contracts or agreements for supplying certain materials for the Intercolonial Railway, and that public monies were paid to the said firm for such materials supplied, that he, the said Isaac Burpee, at the time of the making of the said contracts or agreements and the said payment, was a Member of the said firm and of this House; and to report whether the said Isaac Burpee had vacated his seat, should be examined on oath."

Motion agreed to.

THE SEAT FOR RESTIGOUCHE.

MOTION TO REFER.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) read the following statement :—

"That he was credibly informed and verily believes, that George Moffat, while a Member of this House for the Electoral District of the County of Restigouche, in the Province of New Brunswick, received on the 15th September, 1873, for services rendered in connection with the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, the sum of $454.37; that on the 11th December, 1873,—the said George Moffat did also receive for the transportation of Rails and other services, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway the sum of $637.15; that on the same day—namely the 11th December, 1873, the said George Moffat did also receive, for the transportation of Rails and other services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, the further sum of $314.25; that on the 17th December, 1874, the said George Moffat did also receive, for the transportation of Rails and other services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, the sum of $3,567.50; that the said George Moffat did also receive on the 25th March, 1876, for the transportation of Rails and other services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, the sum of $708; that he was credibly informed and believes he can establish, that the monies paid to the said George Moffat were so paid under contracts or agreements between him and certain officers connected with the Intercolonial Railway Branch of the Department of Public Works; and that the said George Moffat did not ignorantly or unwittingly enter into such contracts or agreements with the Public Works Department, as is shown by the following telegram, signed by Robert Moffat, through whom most of the said contracts were made and receipts for the payments in connection therewith given, viz :—

“ ‘DALHOUSIE, June 2nd, 1875.

“ ‘To Peter Grant, Civil Engineer :—

“ ‘Mr. Moffat wants to know what he has done wrong in connection with taking iron to Campbelltown last year, that contract for doing so should be let to another. This (year?) he made no preparation for doing so, but can. At same time wants to be aware of his fault before doing so.

“ (Signed) ‘ROBERT MOFFAT.’ ”

He therefore moved :

“ That Mr. George William Ross, a member of this House, having stated in his place that he has been credibly informed and verily believes that, in the last half of the year 1873, the sum of $1,405.77 was paid by the Intercolonial Railway Branch of the Public Works Department to George Moffat, who was at that time a member of this House for the Electoral District of the county of Restigouche, in the Province of New Brunswick, for the transport of rails and other services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway ; that he believes and can prove that the said George Moffat was also paid by the hands of William H. Stephenson, from the Department of Public Works, on the 17th December, 1874, the sum of $3,567.50, for the transportation of rails and other services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway ; that he believes and can prove that the said George Moffat, on the 17th December, 1874, was paid by the Intercolonial Railway Branch of the Department of Public Works, for the transportation of rails and other services in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, the sum of $708 ; that it would appear from a telegram, sent as follows :—

“ ‘DALHOUSIE, 2nd June, 1875.

“ ‘To Peter Grant, Civil Engineer :

“ ‘Mr. Moffat wants to know what he has done wrong in connection with taking iron to Campbelltown last year, that contract for doing so should be let to another. This (year?) he made no preparation for doing so, but can. At same time wants to be aware of his fault before doing so.

“ (Signed), ‘ROBERT MOFFAT.’ ”

“ That the said George Moffat deliberately and knowingly entered into a contract or agreement with the officers of the Department of Public Works, under which agreement the before-mentioned sums were paid ; be it therefore Ordered, That the matter be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the said Committee be directed to enquire into the facts, search for precedents, and report the result of their enquiry to the House, and whether the said George Moffat has vacated his seat.”

Mr. MOFFAT : Mr. Speaker, I never had a contract for the Intercolonial Railway in my life, to the best of my knowledge and belief. I know nothing about this, and I deny the whole of it. I have never obtained a cent of money from that railway, either for contracts or anything else. I have never sought a contract and never got one.

Motion agreed to.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. TUPPER : Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a statement previous to the hon. the First Minister making any reply to the statement I made to the House on Saturday night. I am told that, in relation to the permanent cost to the country of the loss which, I maintained, was caused by the purchase of steel rails, I stated the permanent loss per annum at $175,000. The House will at once see that I have stated the amount of loss, as at present estimated, at $1,500,000, or thereabouts ; and at 5 per cent., I assumed the permanent charge resulting therefrom would be $75,000. I wish, therefore, to correct that statement by saying that the amount which I claimed to be the permanent loss was $75,000, not $175,000.

Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply,—and the motion of Mr. Tupper in amendment thereto, and which motion was, “ that Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that this House cannot approve of the course pursued by this Government, with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway,” read.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Usually, Mr. Speaker, a motion of want of confidence is a somewhat solemn or grave matter to be discussed in the House of Commons ; but such motions have become so common of late during this Session that it scarcely causes a ripple of surprise when such a motion is made. We have had them for breakfast, dinner and supper lately. It is scarcely possible for the Government to make a motion of any kind without some one of the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side responding with a motion of want of confidence. Well, we are getting used to them at all events, and, if hon. gentlemen opposite are gratified by the progress that they have made, I am sure we have no reason to complain. This motion is one which I might perhaps fairly complain of, because it embraces several questions upon which votes of want of confidence have already been proposed; and now there is a general aggregation of all the particular charges, just in the same way that boarding-house people, who, having used the joint of meat warm, serve it up as cold hash next day. The speech that the hon. gentleman delivered, the statements which he recapitulated, repeated, and reiterated were a fair representation of what is understood by that well-known dish. Before proceeding, Sir, to notice some of the particulars which the hon. gentleman ventured to condescend upon, let me deal for a few moments with the general subject. Three years and a half ago, it would have been a matter of surprise to almost any person in Canada if the hon. gentleman or any of his colleagues would have uttered the words Canadian Pacific Railway, unless they were forced to it in a Court of Justice. Three years ago when Parliament met, and when it became necessary for the Government to adopt a policy and introduce a Bill, the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition ventured upon no remark; the hon. gentleman who moves this resolution now, ventured upon no attack. There was no doubt a mild criticism; but there was no attempt to divide the House; there was no attempt to establish any particular claim on behalf of their own discarded, broken-up plan; nor was there any attempt to say that the scheme which we proposed for the approval of Parliament was one which was open to any serious objection. It is true, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has since avowed some hostility to that. It is true that he has criticised adversely, during the last Session and this, some parts of that policy resulting from the original great blunder in 1871. I have to ask the attention of the House for a moment to the position which this Administration found itself in, when it assumed office in 1873. It will be remembered that I opposed, in common with those who formed the Opposition in 1871, the plan which the Government then existing proposed for the admission of British Columbia. We pointed out that the terms which they proposed to make were so extravagant that it was quite hopeless to expect that Canada would be able to fulfil that engagement. We pointed out, day after day, with the greatest earnestness, that the difficulties which we were voluntarily incurring, the obligations we were about entering into were such as must of necessity either be broken or bring financial distress, if not ruin upon the country. We found that the Government of the day had a comparatively small majority it is true, but still a majority, with which to carry their measure through, and it was carried through. No one could comprehend at that time why that Administration chose to force through Parliament a measure so disastrous, even in its conception, and far more so in its inevitable consequences. It was very clear that it was not necessary to secure Confederation with British Columbia. It was quite clear to them then, as it is to everyone now, that the undertaking must be one of enormous cost. The people of British Columbia did not ask the terms that were forced upon them. They simply made a very modest demand that certain conditions should be observed as to making a road, as to proceeding with the surveys for the railway, and that, when those surveys were completed, a certain amount ($1,000,000) should be spent each year upon the construction of the road. This was all that they ventured to ask of the Dominion of Canada. And no doubt, as this was the maximum of their demands or expectations, a very considerable modification of these terms might fairly be expected, as it was quite evident that they were as anxious as we were that the whole of the Canadas should be united under the Dominion flag. But, notwithstanding this was pressed upon the Administration of the time, they resisted every attempt on the part of the Opposition to modify the conditions they were thus forcing upon the country; and so, Sir, the Bill passed, and Canada became bound by this obligation to construct a railroad from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean within ten years from that date. So that, in July, 1881, if the road were not constructed over that vast distance of 2,700 miles, the terms of union would be broken. So secure was the Administration in its faith in its own scheme that it also bargained that the surveys should be completed within two years. Am I wrong?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has unwittingly made that statement several times. If he looks at the Treaty he will find the work of construction should be commenced within two years, and that the Government should secure the completion of it in ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then, Sir, I am quite right, after all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then, Sir, if I am not right, the hon. gentleman means to say that the road should be built before it could be surveyed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think so.

Mr. MASSON: You are doing that at the present moment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, before the surveys are finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We know that the Province of British Columbia, shortly before the hon. gentleman left office, was obliged to protest against the conduct of the Government in not having these works of surveys completed and the work of construction actually commenced. However, it matters not as to the statement. There is no doubt the Government were bound to commence the construction within two years, but it was not commenced four months after that, when the hon. gentleman and his Government went out of office. Nay, more, at the time the hon. gentleman went out of office their scheme had entirely failed. They resisted all attempts made on the part of the Opposition in the then House to have the contracts let in the regular manner. We insisted that the country should be surveyed before the contracts were let, and that the contracts should be let by open competition, and that no members of Parliament should be members of any companies entering into that competition. All these demands were resisted, to use the language of the hon. gentleman in another speech, "systematically and continuously." It was determined beforehand, it seems, that this work should be given to a mere speculative financial company, composed of Sir Hugh Allan and his associates, while an hon. Senator was kept dangling at the end of a rope, hoping that he might obtain the coveted prize, and have some hand in the carrying out of the agreement in regard to the building of the road. But the latter arrangement fell through, for reasons which we came to know in 1872, because the hon. Senator was not able to offer the same inducements that hon. gentlemen opposite were able to obtain from another person, Sir Hugh Allan. And after the engagement was entered into, in 1872, with Sir Hugh Allan and his company, that gentleman, with some of his associates, went to England. During the Session of 1873, in the early part of 1873, we were assured that these gentlemen were succeeding in England. I recollect very well asking the hon. member for Cumberland across the floor of the House if he could tell us what success was attending the efforts of the delegation, and he was proud to assure myself and the House that they were meeting with most gratifying success. I congratulated the hon. gentleman upon this fact, as I had not anticipated success. But it turned out that the hon. gentleman's statement was not borne out by the facts and the results, for the delegation utterly failed in obtaining any offer whatever to build the road upon the terms proposed. These terms are known to every one, and I will not therefore refer to them. But the hon. member for Cumberland, in his speech of Saturday, seemed to think it a great achievement to have a bargain made to build the road for $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land; and he maintained that this was not only a bargain, but that there was a possibility and a probability of carrying out that bargain. Then, Sir, why was it not done? How was it that these gentlemen came back here and were obliged to report that they were utterly unable to carry out the arrangement, and to report that they found no financial party in England who was willing to enter into any arrangement or find the means. They came back here, and they at once asked to be relieved of the bargain. They were so relieved of the bargain, and the million dollars which had been deposited as security for the fulfilment of the bargain was restored to each of them without any recognition of the intention to do so by Parliament or any sanction from Parliament. Now, Sir, it may be said, as it was said the other night by the hon. gentleman, that this scheme of theirs was defeated on account of some opposition or other given to it by parties in this country. I recollect, on a former occasion, that the hon. gentleman declared it was the opposition of the Grand Trunk and the then Parliamentary Opposition in this country—that it was through their efforts that the scheme had broken down; and the hon. gentleman said that we were responsible for all the consequences that would result from the scheme breaking down. It was also said that the scheme broke down because of the expenses connected with the heavy advances of money made by Sir Hugh Allan to hon gentlemen opposite to carry on the election of 1872. But it had completely broken down before that, and any one who will consult the dates and the statements made by that delegation, will find that they were utterly unable to obtain any offer whatever in England upon which to base any commencement of the work which they had taken in hand. Nay, Sir, during the whole Session of 1872, at the very moment when hon. gentlemen opposite were assuring us of the success of their friend, Sir Hugh Allan, in London, they were asking for heavy appropriations for the purpose of conducting the survey; and I myself pointed out upon the last item asking for that service that, if the country was successful in launching the scheme, the Government had no grounds whatever for proposing a vote of money for carrying on the surveys for a year afterwards. But the vote was taken, nevertheless. And it was well that it should be taken, if the surveys were to be prosecuted, for it turned out afterwards that they had no reason for the assurance they gave to the House that Sir Hugh Allan was meeting with great success in London. Under these circumstances, the present Administration came into power. We were met at the very outset by a complaint from British Columbia that the terms were already broken. We knew, Sir, well, as well as we did before, if not a little better, that it was already hopeless to expect to be able to carry out the engagement the Government had entered into; and one of the first matters which engaged the serious attention of the Administration was the consideration of the course that should be adopted with regard to British Columbia and the building of the road. After various deliberations we decided to open a communication with the British Columbia Government, with a view to obtaining a relaxation of the terms. We all felt that, this solemn engagement having been entered into by the Government of Canada, it should not be lightly broken by a succeeding Administration, and we endeavoured in that spirit to approach the Government of British Columbia. Though we met with very little success at first, we afterwards did enter into an agreement with them for a certain set of modified conditions. I need not refer to these now, because they are sufficiently well known to the House. They are known in British Columbia as the Carnarvon terms, and are generally discussed under that name. Whether those terms were wise or unwise, whether they were extravagant or moderate, is not a question that I would discuss at the present moment. But I take this ground, that, situated as we were, we were obliged to do not what we would have done if we had had to originate the scheme. We had not the option of choosing for ourselves what course we should take. If the whole scheme had been thrown overboard, British Columbia released from any obligation under the terms of Union, and her autonomy re-established as it was before the terms were proposed in 1871, then the Administration would have been at liberty to consider what method, if any, should be adopted in order to secure a re-admission of British Columbia, or a continuance in the Union of British Columbia, had she chosen to remain without going out. There could be no question of this, that, if any arrangement could not be made, British Columbia would be entitled to leave the Union, and to a restitution of the position she had previously occupied. Now, Sir, I confess to having a good deal of anxiety for many years to have the Confederate system of Government established all over British North America. I confess I have repeatedly sacrificed some of my own individual views, and I have on occasions failed to act with some of my most cherished political associates, for the purpose of giving effect to that desire, and I would have viewed, as I view now, with a great deal of regret, any step which should be taken for the division or excision from the Confederation of any single Province that now composes the Confederacy. And, while I have this desire, perhaps stronger than many other public men, to avoid what we would consider, to a greater or less extent, not a disastrous result, perhaps, but a result to be regretted, the Government acted upon that desire, for they all felt it would be exceedingly desirable to avoid such a conclusion as would necessarily lead to one of the Provinces leaving the Confederacy. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tupper) has taunted me with having acted on the occasion inconsistently with previous discussions. He has declared that the ground I took when in Opposition in 1871 was not the ground I took as an Administrator in 1874-75-76. Why, I admit that. If I had taken the ground I did in 1871, it would simply have resulted in disaster all around, because a certain step had been taken which was irrevocable, and we were obliged, as an Administration, to consider, not what would be consistent on our part to-day, but what would be the best policy to adopt. A disastrous policy having come practically into operation, we were bound as statesmen to consider not our own individual crotchets or opinions which we fought for years before under different circumstances, but what was essentially necessary under new circumstances altogether in order to meet a great political and national emergency. Why, my opinion was that, though it was desirable to have a railroad across the continent, while I looked upon it as a political necessity at some time or other, I never believed and I never said we were in a condition in 1871 even to commence that undertaking, and if I had followed out my conviction of 1871, I would have used the power which the people of Canada had given me and my associates in order to stamp the whole thing with our disapproval, and wait till more propitious times and a more serious emergency should necessitate our undertaking a large expenditure for such a vastly tremendous undertaking. Those were the views I held. Those are the views I am bound to say that are held by nine-tenths of this House at the present moment. Those are the views which I know are entertained by the country, and those views are views which have to bear some practical fruit in our legislation and through the intervention of the Administration of the day. Why, Sir, were we to refuse to carry out the terms after this legislation had been made, after the solemn treaty had been entered into by gentlemen opposite?—a treaty I stamp now, as I have always stamped it, as one of the most insane acts of legislative madness ever known, and I say that the men who perpetrated it deserve, I might say, the everlasting political execration of the country, because they introduced an element of confusion. They knew they were deliberately undertaking a project which could not be carried into effect. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tupper) now deliberately washes his hands of the whole thing. He said that, while it is true we passed the Bill of 1871, the resolutions of union, we afterwards passed a resolution declaring that the works should only be done if we could do it without increasing taxation. Will he show me a paragraph, a sentence, a word from the people of British Columbia to say that they so understood the resolution? And why, then, was not the resolution embodied in the Minutes of Council? If it was intended that this resolution should have the effect that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) now contends for, why was it not adopted as part of the Act at the time? The resolution which the hon. gentleman took through the House, upon which the Order in Council by Her Majesty is based, is a complete governmental and legislative Act. It has no reference to any resolution. There is not a word that refers to anything as a justifying clause, and the hon. gentleman acts a disingenuous part in professing what he never did pretend before. The hon. gentleman never did take that ground until two years after his expulsion from office, and he only took that ground when he found that it would be possible to make some capital against the Administration of the day. He thought that the time had sufficiently passed away to cause the people to forget, to a greater or less extent, the transactions in which he and his associates had been engaged. He thought that now was the time to commence a new line, and to take new ground—ground which had never been taken before. Now, Sir, when the Carnarvon terms were first proposed, and were being discussed in this House, what did the hon. gentleman say in his place in the House then? He says now that they were not bound by the terms of union at all, unless they could have been consistent with that resolution. He says that we are bound by our Carnarvon terms, and that this resolution has no effect as applied to us, although he knows that we embodied that resolution in our Act of 1874; although he knows that by our Minute in Council of the 20th September, 1874, we deliberately expressed the opinion, in assenting to those terms, that it was because we believed that the concessions suggested might be made without involving a violation of the spirit of any parliamentary resolution or the letter of any enactment. Sir, if we had believed that these terms could not be carried out without a violation of that resolution, we would not have agreed to them. The hon. gentleman in discussing this question spoke as follows:—

Mr. MACKENZIE

“But, Sir, the fact of the engagements which the First Minister has just stated were entered into with British Columbia during the past season, set at rest and for ever any question as to whether we are in a position that would allow us to doubt and hesitate a single instant what course to pursue. I am not going to call in question the propriety of this engagement for a moment. I feel that the Ministry of the day are entitled to the support of this House and especially of the gentlemen who sit on the Opposition Benches in any measure which is required to carry out the pledge—perhaps a somewhat imprudent pledge—that was given by their predecessors in relation to this great work; and I feel that they may look with confidence to this side of the House for the most energetic support of the measures they have taken—I believe wisely taken—for the redemption of that pledge.”

Now, Sir, here, in this paragraph, he alludes to the engagements they had made as imprudent engagements, and declares that it was the duty of himself and his colleagues in Opposition, to give to the Ministry of the day their hearty support in carrying out the Carnarvon terms which, on Saturday night, he denounced as extravagant and absurd. I need hardly, Sir, have referred to this in order to show the difference of the ground which the hon. gentleman takes now and that which he took on a former occasion, but I made this quotation to show, in his own language and in his own express terms, that he considered the pledge they had given—it is a very moderate term to be sure—an imprudent pledge; and that while discussing these matters he never referred to the resolution as governing the action of the Administration in this matter, and as governing the obligations entered into by this country. Sir, I think that this resolution had some effect; I think that it indicated the opinion of this House, and I think that the delegates from British Columbia must have attached more or less importance to it.

Mr. DECOSMOS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An hon. gentleman behind me says they attached no importance to it. I know that they always said so; but, Sir, there is no doubt of this—that the resolution, while having no legal effect, must have had some moral influence and effect upon those with whom we came to discuss this question afterwards. I am bound to say that I never found the slightest inclination on the part of any British Columbian to recognize the force of that resolution, and my hon. friend behind me, the hon. member for Victoria, expresses that very strongly, but the hon. gentleman at the same time has never, as I have heard of, expressed a single word adverse to the hon. member for Cumberland, although he knew that he (Mr. Tupper) took this ground a year ago. It would be very bad ground for us to take, but it is all right for the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Would the Premier allow me to make a brief remark. I will state this: that during last Session I called the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland to his statement, that the resolution respecting taxation in connection with the Pacific Railway was not part of the terms; and I also referred to the Minister of Justice as having cleared that up most satisfactorily the same evening; so the First Minister, I take it, is a little astray.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps I am mistaken, Sir, but I have no recollection of hearing the hon. gentleman say so. I think that, if he did, it must have been in an exceedingly mild way. I do not think that my hon. friend spoke with his usual energy on that occasion.

Mr. DECOSMOS: I can assure the hon. gentleman that I am not accustomed to speak in any other than a mild way, though with some hon. gentlemen this is not a common custom.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was proceeding to show the ground that was occupied now by the hon. gentleman opposite, and, I presume, by his associates, though it is difficult to know how the hon. member for Kingston could sympathize with that. He could not possibly have believed that the terms of union were not binding as to the ten years, because the hon. gentleman, in a speech he made at Kingston, when he merely suspected us of trying to get a relaxation of the terms that he had made, openly advised the British Columbians to secede.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says "No." It is true that he hid it, as he does many things, in a very clever way. It is true that he did not say: "I advise you, gentlemen, to leave the Union at once;" but he did say, and he gave the weight of his great authority in this country to the opinion—that they were entitled to secede, because we sought to obtain a relaxation of the terms; and now, Sir, the position of the hon. gentleman is simply this. Why, Sir, they would engage to build a railroad to-morrow to British Columbia, or anywhere else on this continent, if they could only get into office by making the declaration. And it is one of the noticeable features, I have observed, that there has not been a single speech made by either of the political twins opposite, during this Session, which has not either begun or ended with the expression of a desire and hope that they would soon be over here. It is the beginning and end of their day thoughts and of their night dreams, and they have got so possessed with the idea that it is impossible for them to discuss the simplest business matter in this House without expressing their anxious desire to be back to these clover-fields on this side. I am afraid, Sir, that the hon. gentleman and his associates will have to wander for a long time to come in the bare shades of Opposition, and will have to get what pickings they can.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am afraid that the hon. member will not leave us much clover if he goes on in the way he has done.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can only extend to them my sympathy in their bereavement, and express the hope at the same time that their parliamentary leaders may take a more manly and straightforward course in discussions in this House than to be constantly showing that they have nothing to think of, nothing in their minds, nothing in their purposes, and nothing in their language but an eager scramble to get into office by any means. My hon. friend the member for South Wentworth declared last year that, judging from his long parliamentary and political knowledge and experience of public men in this country, he thought there was nothing he knew of in nature that showed such innate ferocity as a Tory excluded from office. He declared, Sir, that the feelings and actions of a she-bear robbed of her whelps were nothing to their feelings. Who does not remember, Sir, the long and desperate struggle that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition had with Sir Francis Hincks and Robert Baldwin, and their associates? Who does not, amongst old Canadian politicians, remember the extravagance of their denunciation, and the wildness and excitability which characterised all their then political speeches? We have had a reproduction, Sir, of the same spirit and the same speeches, only with a change of scene and some change in the subject; but the men are the same; and the true, genuine nature bursts out, brimming all over. I was amused the other night—and I will digress for a moment to pay the hon. gentleman a little attention—I was amused the other night when the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), standing up and assuming the gravest attitude, denounced me because I had, upon the technicality which he was urging, spent money without the express authority of Statute. I was astonished at the hon. gentleman, as I remember what his practice was. To be sure, Sir, I would not be justified in following his example, and I can only say, may all that is good forbid me from doing so. The hon. gentleman has long led the Conservative party in the country, and it is but right, on an occasion like the present, that I should refer to incidents in his career. Why, Sir, in the first days of his official position, what took place? I remember very well that, when the Hincks Government went out in June, 1854, the hon. gentleman and his associates came into office. Parliament was dissolved. The new Parliament, I think, met some time late in September, and Parliament was asked to vote money they had expended on the Lower St. Lawrence, on those piers—a sum of $350,000 when Parliament had never voted one cent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You are mistaken; altogether mistaken.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not mistaken; I am pretty correct in my facts, as the hon. gentleman will find out. But I merely mention that as an incident, just in passing. Well, Sir, having referred to these matters, as I have done, I shall proceed with the other part of the remarks I intend to make. I was pointing out, when I made this digression, what the duty of the Government was under certain circumstances. Our duty was clear, to make the best of the circumstances in which we found ourselves—to adopt that course which we believed would be most productive of peace and harmony with British Columbia, and at the same time to save the people of this country from an intolerable burden which the country would never be able to bear. The hon. gentleman referred at considerable length on Saturday night to a disagreement between my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and myself, as to the Nanaimo Railway Bill. I will only refer to that to say that the ministerial explanations that were given at the time are quite sufficient to meet all the remarks the hon. gentleman made in that direction. The hon. gentleman, Sir, said in quoting an article from some newspaper, the Ottawa Times, that I could not shake off the responsibility for that paper. I shake off all the responsibility for any paper in Canada. No paper has ever been authorized to express my views on any subject whatever. The mere fact that I support Liberal newspapers requiring my support with some of my own money is no reason why I should be responsible for any of their opinions, except in so far as my own opinions are fairly reflected by articles in such papers. The Government having determined to seek a modification of the terms, and having assented to the terms ultimately proposed by Lord Carnarvon, with the saving exception that I have mentioned, that it could be done consistently with the resolution passed in Parliament, to which reference has been made, the next step was our seeking authority of a legislative kind for the construction of the railway. The hon. gentleman opposite pointed out, on Saturday, that I said in the House, in reply to my hon. friend the then member for Bruce (Mr.

Blake) and now the hon. the Minister of Justice, that the Government had no necessity for asking authority in these concessions, neither did we force the road or expect any vote in Parliament. But, with regard to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railroad, that was a different matter altogether. We had never recognized that as a part of the Pacific Railway, and we were bound, therefore, having entered into the engagement with British Columbia to build that 65 or 70 miles of railway, to seek parliamentary authority for it. That parliamentary authority was granted in this House. The two hon. gentlemen opposite voted for one reading of the Bill, and voted against the next on the pretext that they were not willing to allow the contract to be submitted for parliamentary ratification. But let me point out why they were not willing. We simply desired to proceed with that work as rapidly as possible, as we engaged with British Columbia it should be done, and if we had to wait another year for parliamentary authority it would be a year beyond the time. That was our reason; not because we were unwilling to submit any contract to Parliament, because in one case in which we were not obliged to do it we submitted a contract for the approval of Parliament—that was relating to the Georgian Bay Branch. The action of the Senate, Sir, destroyed that part of the arrangement, and the hon. gentleman says that, because the Senate by a majority of two threw out the Bill, I was bound to adopt the same course that I said he was bound to adopt with regard to the National Policy. If I had lost my Bill in this House, I would have been bound to adopt that course; but I lost the Bill in a House which is not responsible to the people, over which the people and myself have no kind of control. It was lost as many Governmental measures may be lost, and, when such measures are lost in a House somewhat different to it in England, the House of Peers, no Ministry thinks it necessary to resign on that account. I think we would have been subject to the gravest political censure from our political friends, and from all constitutional thinkers, if we should have adopted that course on that occasion. It would be practically saying to the whole public: "We know we have your confidence; we have the confidence of the popular branch of the Legislation; we have the confidence of the people; but we will allow governmental action to be governed solely by the other branch of the Legislature, which has no popular element in its constitution, and which existed, without any change worth noticing, as it was when we assumed office." Now, Sir, one of the principles upon which we acted from the first, even when we were in Opposition in 1871, was this: that, until the country had been thoroughly surveyed, thoroughly explored and the route determined, it would not be advisable to enter into any contract, or to invite tenders for the construction of the road. That purpose we have adhered to from first to last. We pushed on the surveys as rapidly as possible, and, as I explained on a former occasion, the contracts that were made on the eastern end of the line were let, simply because the surveys were there completed, and because it was desirable to get into the prairie country at as early a day as possible, as entrance into the prairie country of a large population is almost an essential element to be considered in the project for the construction of a road across the continent. Now, Sir, I propose to deal for a few moments with the assertions of the hon. gentleman as to the course, because that involves the consideration of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Branch, and it involves the discussion of the terminus at Esquimalt as fixed upon by the hon. gentleman's Order in Council. The hon. gentleman said that they proposed, by their scheme, to give simply $30,000,000 of money and 50,000,000 acres of land. Now, Sir, if I take the hon. gentleman's own calculation as to the cost, he will not blame me, I presume. He found fault with me for saying that the omission of 1,300 miles from immediate construction would save the country $60,000,000 or $70,000,000, and he hoped I was now prepared to modify that statement, with my experience; but I am not prepared to modify that statement. The hon. member for Vancouver said the road would cost $100,000,000 instead of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, as I had allowed in the above calculation.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps for convenience sake I had better deal first with the hon. member for Victoria. When the project was under discussion in British Columbia, the hon. member for Victoria calculated the cost at $150,000,000, and then he proceeded to calculate what the amount of interest on that amount would be. But the hon. member for Cumberland declared that it would cost $280,000,000 to build the road. Does he deny that?

Mr. TUPPER: I would like to see the authority for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that is a most reasonable request. I may say in the first place that he made two estimates. In speaking on 1st March, 1875, on Mr. Foster's contract, he declared that the land was well worth $2 per acre. $2 per acre upon 50,000,000 acres is $100,000,000; and $30,000,000 of cash given, makes $130,000,000, according to his own calculation. But my hon. friend the member for Chateauguay said: "Why not make it $5 an acre?" And the hon. member for Cumberland replied:

"I could safely make it $5 an acre, provided I have the selecting of the land. The whole character of the land from the eastern limits of Manitoba to Fort Pelly is worth $5 an acre as well as $1, and will fetch that sum."

Now, Sir, $5 an acre for 50,000,000 acres is $250,000,000, and the $30,000,000 in addition is $280,000,000. I know I shall hear more samples of the hon. gentleman's figures. He is an eminent authority on calculating figures. He disposes of millions with the greatest possible facility. But here is his own calculation applied to his own purpose. I have shown him that, by his own scheme, he was intending to immerse this country in a loss of some $200,000,000 over and above the $30,000,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You are going to give the 50,000,000 acres of land away.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; only I don't place their worth at $5 per acre. I wish I could say they were worth $1 an acre. The hon. gentleman, in speaking of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill the other night, said that we assumed the task of completing this road upon the island, and that we were not called upon to do it. When he had to account for the fact that they themselves had fixed the terminus there, he said they required the contractors to do that without any extra cost. We know from Mr. Marcus Smith's calculation that it will take $27,500,000 to build the road from the head of Bute Inlet to Esquimalt. But he said the contractors were to do this without charging the country a dollar. What magnanimous, rich and generous fellows these contractors are. But where are the contractors? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows he failed to find a contractor that would touch it, even without knowing that the contractors would be obliged to build the Esquimalt Branch for nothing. It was not known at the time that they were going to Esquimalt. That Order in Council was never made known to Parliament until 1873; that is my recollection of it. And these people went home to England on the understanding that they were simply to reach the Pacific Ocean; but here the hon. gentleman says that they were to build 260 miles of railway after reaching the Pacific Ocean, and that they were to do this for nothing. It is the sheerest trifling with the public mind, it is the sheerest trifling with this House to say that any company would undertake to build what the Government chose to put in for $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. The whole thing was a huge farce. The whole scheme was undertaken quite evidently to serve a temporary political purpose; and they resolved that they would first secure that political purpose, and that then something or other would happen which would enable them to gain something in the scramble. They were utterly unworthy of the position they held, when they entered into an agreement which they knew they could not carry out, and which the hon. gentleman now tells us they never intended to carry out. And I appeal to the House and the country against that kind of political morality, which will sanction a treaty being entered into, and three years afterwards it being declared that they never meant to carry it out. Sir, I am astonished that any public man would give utterance to such a sentiment as the hon. gentleman has admitted to be the sentiment which animated him at the time; and which governs his actions now, and that he has no other object in view but to endeavour to reach the position he is constantly telling us he is to reach very soon. Now, Sir, I shall say nothing about the sop to Cerberus or who represents Cerberus in the matter. The hon. gentleman says the money given to the island was a sop thrown to Cerberus. My hon. friend from Vancouver can deal with that, as he knows what is meant by it.

Mr. DECOSMOS: There was British Columbia and Imperial interests also.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A word as to British interests. The hon. gentleman said the Carnarvon terms, as they were known, were not only an engagement with British Columbia but with the Imperial Government. The very basis of the negotiation with British Columbia was that the Order in Council of 1871 was also Imperial in its character. The hon. gentleman knew that it was impossible to carry this out without the Imperial sanction. He knows that Columbia appealed to Her Majesty, and that Her Majesty's Government, as the guardian of those interests which were committed to them by both parties, when both parties sought Her Majesty's assent to these resolutions, were placed in this position as much as we were placed in it, by our action of being subject to the same extent to Imperial opinion, if not to Imperial control. There is nothing in the arrangement made by this Administration, through Lord Carnarvon, but what has not been accepted by British Columbia, in consequence of the failure of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill, that differs in character from that which was adopted by the hon. gentleman in 1871—not the slightest—so that, if the resolution as to taxation applied to govern their action of 1871, the same resolution applies to govern the plan as adopted by the present Administration, and we have always held to whatever moral extent it might be supposed fairly to have effect. Sir, we stated, in the first place, in 1874, in accepting these terms, that we did it because we conceived they could be carried out without violating that Parliamentary resolution. We stated in a subsequent Minute that these conditions arranged with Columbia through Lord Carnarvon were necessarily predicated upon, and subject to, this Parliamentary resolution of a certain date. That will be found in our despatch, and in the Act of 1874 we embodied that resolution. In the vote of Supply last Session, when the amendment was moved by my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), almost the entire House gave its assent to that doctrine; showing that, while we admit that it had no legal effect with British Columbia, and could not and should not be dealt with as a legal rider to the Terms of Union, there was a moral effect to be attached to it, which must govern the action of this country. And I have stated over and over again, in asking for the votes to carry on this work, the purpose and intention of the Government to remain within this resolution. The hon. gentleman says we have already increased taxation. To be sure we have, because we found it necessary, apart from the Columbia expenditure altogether, in 1874 to obtain an increase of revenue. It was not on account of that, but other expenditures had increased to a great extent and there had been a great falling off in the revenue from other sources. But the mere fact that we increased taxation does not bind us to increase it any more. We are not to say that, because we have an engagement with a party and we shall not increase taxation to pay him, we shall not increase it for any purpose. Therefore we consider that our faith was thoroughly kept with British Columbia; that, in fact, we have shown an anxiety to preserve the good faith of the country to the utmost possible extent; and no taunts of the hon. gentlemen opposite, no accusations will, in the slightest degree, affect our purpose in that regard, or our policy, which is to carry out in good faith these engagements, so far as the financial condition of the country will permit us to do so.

I might, Sir, without being subject to any accusation of neglect of the hon. gentleman's speech, pass over some of the items on which he expanded very largely, because, as I have said, votes of want of confidence have previously been discussed touching upon these questions. He has embraced everything in his motion. It is a sweeping motion of want of confidence in the whole Pacific Railway policy of the Government, although we obtained the hon. gentleman's hearty assent to that policy on a former occasion, although he said that every member of the Opposition, and the whole country, were bound to give the Government support in that matter. He says now that the Government is entitled to censure, because they have done what he previously said they ought to do. But, though I might pass over these statements of the hon. gentleman, I will touch on some of them. First, as to the much-harped-on steel rails. On a former occasion, the hon. gentleman made some insinuations; and, at this time, he said there was a strong temptation to say more than he felt inclined to say in this matter. Well, Sir, I do not ask the hon. gentleman's forbearance. I invite him to formulate any charge he may have to make. I have asked him and his friends to do so several times; and I now give him and the House notice that, as they have failed to make good their statements in pie-nic speeches, it will be one of the first things with me to do next Session, to move for a Committee to enquire into these matters alone. The hon. gentleman, in order to effect a purpose, misstated the cost of these steel rails. He gravely gave the cost as $59.09 per ton, if the report in the Citizen is correct. Is that correct?

Mr. MASSON: At Fort William.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, adding freight through the country. That is one way to swell the thing. The actual cost of these rails delivered at Montreal was $54.60 a ton, and at Columbia $64.03. The total amount was $2,777,734.97. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that we bought these rails when they were not required. Well, I admit that we are subject to any fair accusation for want of foresight, or any political blunder. The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to criticize it, and I have no fault to find with any fair criticism on that point. All I have to say about that is what I said on a former occasion, that the subject was first mooted to us by the Chief Engineer, who strongly advised that, the price of steel rails being so low at the time, it would be advisable to have a large quantity secured. We coincided in that opinion, and entered into engagements at the time by open contract. The hon. gentleman, now, Sir, says that we have lost a great deal of money, and he takes the entire quantity of these 50,000 tons of steel rails and bases his calculations upon that, although he knows well that about 11,000 tons of these rails have been delivered for use on the Intercolonial Railway, where they must have been brought in any case, if they were not given from this source. It is quite true, Sir, that the hon. gentleman said we have no right to divert these rails from the purposes for which they were originally bought. I think we had, as long as they were charged in a proper quarter. They were not charged to the Pacific Railway survey or expenditure, but to the Intercolonial; but, Sir, if this is true with regard to the rails that we asked tenders for and contracted for in the winter of 1874-5, what is the position of the hon. gentleman and his Government, who purchased immediately before that 6,000 tons without any tenders at all being asked; and while ours cost $54.60, delivered in Montreal, their 6,000 tons cost, delivered on the Intercolonial, $85.53 per ton; and they were bought without any tenders at all.

Mr. TUPPER: You asked me a question as to whether my statement was that the rails cost $59 per ton delivered in Montreal, but I had not my figures in my hands. They were, in fact, in the hands of the reporter, but that is my statement; and I will tell the hon. gentleman how I make it up. I take the return brought down by the hon. gentleman as to the cost of the 50,000 tons of steel rails landed in this country, and without the $48,000 on the freight of the portion sent to Van-cover, the amount is $2,946,000, and, I think, some odd dollars—I am speaking from memory, and if you divide that sum by 50,000 you will find that they cost $59.08 per ton delivered in Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The figures are not correct.

Mr. TUPPER: The figures are according to those brought down by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think not.

Mr. TUPPER: I know that the expenditure was over $2,900,000, and the hon. gentleman will find that the rails cost, delivered at Montreal, without the $48,000 of freight on those sent to Vancouver, $59.08 per ton.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They cost nothing of the kind.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): Well, then, the returns are not correct.

Mr. TUPPER: That is according to the hon. gentleman's own return.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was proceeding to show that immediately before we came into office this transaction took place on the Intercolonial Railway; and, if we adopt the same mode of calculation the hon. gentleman went on, and calculate what the price of steel rails is at the present time, what will be the result? He based his calculation upon the price at the present time, and he makes up the difference of a certain amount of money upon which he calculates the interest as the annual loss. Now, Sir, suppose I was to adopt the same plan with many things. The hon. gentlemen opposite purchased iron for the Miramichi Bridge—and they did not take the lowest tender either, but one $22,000 above the lowest tender—and they had that iron bridge lying for three years before they could use it; and am I to charge interest on that for all time, and thus get the cost of their blunders? They had 12,000 tons of steel rails delivered for eighteen months on the Intercolonial before they used a rail of them, and am I to charge interest on that for all time? and so, Sir, with many other transactions all through their career, am I to charge interest upon all that? Well, Sir, take this particular transaction. I apply precisely the same reasoning as the hon. gentleman did; and, instead of buying these 6,000 tons at $85.53, he says that they could be bought at $35, so that they paid $210,000, by his mode of calculation, more for these steel rails than ought to have been paid.

An HON. MEMBER: What nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I admit that the reasoning is absurd, but I am presenting a reductio ad absurdum of the hon. gentleman's statement. He also went into another set of figures. He took $50,000 paid for 100 acres at Kaministiquia River—I shall deal with this presently in another way; I merely mention the figures now—and he stated that if the land was paid for all over the Intercolonial Road at that rate, the right of way would have cost something more than the road. Suppose we apply this reasoning another way. Suppose we take, for instance, a specimen of the lands purchased on the Intercolonial. Sir, there were two acres purchased from one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues for $16,000, which have never been used to this day. Now, Sir, if we apply this price per acre to the acreage on the Intercolonial Railway, we will find that the right of way on the Intercolonial would cost $5,968,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does the Premier refer to myself as one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I refer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL: I say that the statement of the hon. gentleman is untrue. The land is used at this day, and the property was worth the money paid for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can only say that it is not used.

Mr. MITCHELL: I assert that it is used. You know nothing about it if you say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Whether used or not, it never was used except for landing rails to build the road with. It is absolutely unnecessary; it is absolutely useless. In the little village of Newcastle (N.B.) to pay $8,000 an acre for land, will appear something a great deal worse, I should say, than buying 100 acres at $490 an acre at Fort William.

Mr. MITCHELL: You want to make misrepresentations. What I wish to state is that $8,000 an acre was not paid for the land alone, but in addition to the land there was a water frontage, the most valuable in the place, and wharves 300 feet long, with 20 feet of water at the end, and with facilities for landing rails from ships drawing from 17 to 20 feet of water. This could not be got in the place except there. Five ships came in at a time, and they were liable to demurrage at the rate of £15 to £20 sterling a day. They took my property away. They took it in spite of me.

Mr. MACKENZIE: To proceed with the illustration the hon. gentleman gave us on Saturday: there was paid for the terminus at Halifax $192,000, or $26,870 per acre; and, if we apply this sum along the Intercolonial Railway, we shall find that the right of way would have cost $19,940,000. I know that these are very ridiculous things, but I am mentioning this to show the preposterous character.

Mr. MITCHELL: Some of the statements are very false.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not attacking my hon. friend at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why did you bring my name in?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not mention the hon. gentleman's name until he got up and asked me.

Mr. MITCHELL: You referred to me, and that is the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But the hon. gentleman must be responsible for administrative acts, and am I to suffer an argument of that sort to be used?

Mr. MITCHELL: But don't misrepresent.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, Sir, I might take another instance. There is another hon. gentleman sitting farther back, who got $2,000 for moving a house that was valued by the valuers of land at $1,200. If we apply that calculation to the average for either of the routes, we will see what the result would be.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Name.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Moffat). Now, Sir, if we apply the same calculation to the Pacific Railway, we will see how absurd such figures are. I have now to say a little about the road on Lake Superior. The hon. gentleman insinuated that some serious blame was attached to me because of the selection of the Fort William terminus. I may say that the Engineer states that there are two miles of water frontage, the best water frontage on all Lake Superior, and that the terminus was agreed upon there by common consent of every person engaged in it; that I knew nothing about who owned the land, or anything in connection with it; and that when we agreed to take the land the map was sent, in the winter of 1874-5, to the proper office, as a deposit under the Act. I may say that, when we came to take possession of the lands, we applied to the Commissioner of Crown Lands in Ontario to get the name of a surveyor who was acquainted with that part of the country, who would be a suitable person to do what surveying was required. The Commissioner named Mr. Hugh Wilson, a well-known surveyor, a gentleman who had surveyed many townships in that part. With him we associated Mr. Robt. Reid, of London, whom everyone who knows him will admit to be one of the most thorough business men in Ontario. These two men valued those lands, whether high or low I am not competent to give an opinion; but the hon. member for Cumberland, with that recklessness of assertion of which he is capable, stated that there was not a shanty on those lands until it was heard that the Government had bought them, and that then someone put up the shanties. Why, Sir, I saw houses there myself 13 years ago. The township was laid out 12 years ago, and a great portion was under cultivation. The Hudson Bay Company had a farm up the river; the Roman Catholic Church had a mission on the bank opposite, which has been there for over half a century; and yet the hon. gentleman would belittle the place, its importance, and its value. The land may be valued too high; I know nothing about it. The same course was taken there as in any other place. Valuators were appointed—men of standing and capacity, and with them was left the adjustment of the price. But, in order to show the House the unfairness which is exhibited towards the Government and particularly towards myself, let me recall an instance. In 1874-75 we all expected that the terminus would most likely be at Nepigon Bay on Lake Superior. Subsequently explorations showed that it was not so suitable as Thunder Bay in any respect, and that it would be much better to go there. Well, at that time, the newspaper owned by the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had the following article:—

“The Kaministiquia River, or Thunder Bay, is navigable for lake vessels nearly fourteen miles up, and has high banks, offering unusual facilities for the building of docks; while the Nepigon River has marshy banks, on which docks could be built only at great expense. With such a concurrence of testimony in favour of Thunder Bay as the terminus, how comes it to pass that it is deemed necessary to petition Parliament, and to make the most pressing representations to the Government, in order to prevent the unsuitable terminus of Nepigon Bay being selected? In the absence of reasonable explanations, it need not be surprising that people should say that Mr. Mackenzie and a number of political friends have strong personal interests to serve in the Nepigon country, and that such private interests are likely to override all considerations of public benefit.”

At this very time it was about decided that we should not go to Nepigon. We went, therefore, to Thunder Bay, and we were immediately told by the same newspaper and the same parties: “Mr. Mackenzie has interests at Thunder Bay, and, therefore, Nepigon is not selected.” Such is the stream of calumny and abuse which is poured out unceasingly, alike from Conservatives and Conservative newspapers, that it is impossible for any man in this country to conduct public affairs without being subjected to the grossest possible abuse. Let a political friend get a contract, and it is stated at once it is because he is a political friend. Let a political opponent get a contract, and we are charged at once with trying to buy him over to the Government. Such is the outrageous manner in which public men are treated in this country by hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs. I know this was the custom in former years. They expect to weary out every public man; they expect to torture his life out with insinuations which they dare not mention here. There is an hon. gentleman opposite who even was gentleman enough to mention my wife's name in a speech last season. Not content with opposing me, they must carry the warfare into my family. There is no fairness in the parliamentary motions of hon. gentlemen opposite; there is no fairness in their speeches. They seem to be actuated by a determination at all hazards to mislead and to misstate even matters which could as well be stated fairly as not. How is it, Sir, that in this country it seems impossible to conduct parliamentary debates or parliamentary business as they do in England? How is it that it is impossible for any public action to be done here without subjecting the Minister of the day, or his associates, whoever they are, to this stream of obloquy and abuse. I need not say that I appeal to the House to put down this, and to testify by their votes on these occasions that they appreciate fully the evils of the course which has been adopted and carried into practice by hon. gentlemen opposite in their newspapers. Now, Sir, I mean to say very little in relation to two or three matters referred to by the hon. gentleman. I am not touching the St. Frances Lock matter because we have discussed that within the last few days. I have merely to say I am perfectly satisfied that we not only acted within the law, as I said then, but that we acted also in the best interests of the country. What motive have I to serve—what purpose has the Government to accomplish, but the general welfare of the country? It may be that we are mistaken in our policy, and I don't object to a fair discussion of our policy. It may be that it was unwise to proceed from Thunder Bay instead of Nepigon

Bay. But, while I am prepared to discuss that, and to listen to all the arguments pro and con., I am not prepared to be misrepresented, and have it thrown up as an insinuation that I went there to benefit some particular friend. I do not know that the sale of land benefitted a single relative I have, good, bad or indifferent, and no person ever solicited me to make that the terminus for the purpose of securing a benefit to himself. And the hon. gentleman should remember that the Government of which he was a member sent the first party to Thunder Bay—it was not I. I found a party of engineers examining the country. I have this much to say, that in the ground selected by Mr. Fleming as a terminus we have two miles of the best water frontage, where no storm can touch a vessel, and where there is the best possible accommodation for wharfage; and it is the only place upon that river where we can get the accommodation. Some hon. gentleman said there was good wharfage ten miles up, but the banks of the river did not suit the grade. There is a certain grade, and we touched the river at the earliest possible point consistent with that grade. If the wharves had to be built at Prince Arthur's Landing they would cost ten times the amount that they cost where they are, and we would have had to purchase the right of way for several miles through and in the midst of a flourishing village. I am informed that Mr. Aikins in the Upper House stated that the Government owned enough land at Prince Arthur's Landing to build a terminus on; but it is not so—although we may own enough land there to build a station. We have not land enough at Halifax for the terminus of the Intercolonial, although we thought we had, and the Chief Engineer had profited by that experience. The selection and the amount paid for the site are not mine. The selection was made indifferently to the interests of particular parties, but was made in the interest of the country by the officers who were in charge of that matter. I forgot, in noticing my hon. friend's figures, to notice one remarkable figure of his last year. He told us, in spite of the information I had given him then and have also given him this Session, that the Pembina Branch would cost \$40,000 a mile, and he based all his calculations upon that, as he based his calculations also upon the preposterous figures as to the Georgian Bay Branch. With all these matters I do not propose to deal. I don't think it worth my while. Any statement or assertion, or argument which has anything on its face and which requires attention, I am willing to consider; but I think it would be a sheer waste of the time of the House, and of my own, to do anything more. With regard to the question which I touched upon a little while ago, of the Government having lost a great deal of money in consequence of buying rails—as is asserted, but which I don't admit—we cannot expect any more than any merchant, as to the raising and lowering of prices. We cannot at all times buy at the best possible opportunity, and have nothing on our hands which could not at a particular time be bought at a cheaper rate. When I came into office, I found a contract with the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville)—who is not in his place—for delivering spikes at \$94 a ton. Now, Sir, we have delivered them recently for \$54 a ton. Are we to get the benefit for this difference? Are we to be praised for having saved \$40 a ton on spikes, or are we to be only censured when the price goes the other way. I find that the then Government were paying the same gentleman \$6.50 a keg for nails, while we afterwards only paid \$3.10. I find that they were paying on an average from 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. to 6c. per pound for iron, while we are now having it delivered at \$1.98 per 100 pounds. Are we to get credit for this, or are we not? Are we to be subject to censure because at a certain time we may have lost in our purchasing, but to get no credit when we gain? In the public works let last year, I do not hesitate to say that we let them 25 per cent. cheaper than they had been let in 1873 by hon. gentlemen opposite. I claim no credit for that, because wages and prices have fallen. That is the sole reason of the reduction. I do not pretend to claim credit for any of these things. But I ask that hon. gentlemen should not blame me when I don't blame them. Every Minister will do the best he can for the country, if he is an honest and capable man. The hon. gentleman was pleased to say I had made a lamentable failure as a Minister of Public Works. Well, I shall leave that to the judgment of the House and the country. I don't say whether I have or have not. I shall say one thing, however—that the first year that I controlled the management of the Intercolonial Railway the expenditure was reduced by \$100,000. I shall say, also, that we have done twice the business in my Department since I have been there than was done in the same number of years previously, and we did it, Sir, at less cost. I was accused the other night in the matter of the Goderich contract of having given out a contract to a person who tendered higher than another had, and gentlemen in the Opposition voted that it was improper to have done so, and they voted to censure me for it. I have a small list which shows that in general contracts hon. gentlemen opposite, in cases where no reason was assigned, except that the contracts were too low or for other sufficient reasons to the the Government or their officers, had lost \$621,994 during the last three years they were in office, by not giving the contracts to the lowest tenderers; and on the Intercolonial Railway, applying the same principle, of \$1,411,567. I do not say they were wrong in passing over them, as there is no reason assigned. However, I proved to the House the other night that, in the matter of contracts, we succeeded, at all events, in establishing a better system. We succeeded in receiving tenders and give them to a larger number than ever before of those who tendered lowest for public works, and I may be presumed, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) says I have made a lamentable failure in the position I have occupied in the Government, to invite the attention, at all events, of my own supporters to these statements, in rebuttal of the charges the hon. gentleman has made, and I have no doubt but that I shall receive the approval and support of those gentlemen in the course I have endeavoured to pursue. I believe at this moment the contract system is on a sounder basis than ever it was before in this country, and, in saying this, I am not imputing blame to the hon. gentleman opposite who preceded me. I do not say he did not do the best he could, but I have this satisfaction, that I succeeded in doing a little better. I don't speak as to motives. I say simply as to results, for I can quite comprehend, as I do comprehend, the difficulties which the hon. gentleman must have had, or any other hon. gentleman who occupies the position in dealing with some parties who tender, and I say adverse criticisms should not be too readily indulged in with reference to such a matter. I can appeal to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) if I did, when sitting on the Opposition side of the House, indulge in that kind of criticism that was launched at me a few evenings ago—if he can mention any instance when I was open to such an accusation. I might have gone that length and asked hon. gentlemen opposite to look a few miles further, and have shown, as I can show, a case of a thoroughly good man whose tender was \$13,000 or \$15,000 lower than that which was accepted. Yet the Minister may have had sufficient reason for not accepting it. I don't judge him, but I simply ask that I may be judged by the same standard, and the Government judged by the same standard those hon. gentlemen have had applied to them by myself. I have little more to say. In conducting their general policy, the Government have had to encounter great difficulties. They have had to call on their supporters to make some sacrifices in relation to the voting of public money. They have to call on their supporters to support them still in carrying to a successful conclusion such negotiations as may yet become necessary with the Province of British Columbia. I have pointed out, with regard to those obligations which were not of our creating, that we succeeded at least in modifying them, and that we have endeavoured, to the best of our power, knowledge and ability, to serve the public, both in the old Province of Canada and the Province of British Columbia; and, if we have not been so successful as we would desire, if the circumstances of the country have been such as to require us to move with caution and discretion, I am quite sure that, in that matter, every single member who has supported myself and the Government that I lead, from the first, will be prepared to make due and proper allowance. It is our interest to make this a cheap country to live in; it is our interest also to open up the vast prairies of the west, as soon as it can be done, and to do everything that our means and circumstances will permit to keep faith with our cousins across the Rocky Mountains, with those who are associated with us for good or for ill, and we hope for all time to come. In the meantime we are bound, while dealing with these matters, in consequence of the obligation imposed upon us, not to lose sight of other portions of the country which contribute the money which has to be expended in that quarter, and the great tax-paying population of this country is the population which will have to decide the manner in which this has to be done for the future; and no pressure from any quarter, however influential, must be suffered to interfere with the great interests of the country which you, Mr. Speaker, and I have alike sworn in common to protect.

Mr. MASSON said the House, in listening to the speech of the hon. the First Minister, would not realize the fact that it was made in reply to the most moderate, most temperate, most statesmanlike speech of the hon. member for Cumberland the other evening. There was not in the hon. gentleman's speech a single word which would justify the hon. the Premier in using the expressions he had to-night. Instead of being a moderate defence of his own Government, the hon. gentleman had made a violent attack upon his adversaries in the face of the fact that the hon. member for Cumberland had distinctly stated that he would not use a single word which could be considered as a personal attack. The hon. the Premier opened his observations with a gratuitous attack upon the right hon. member for Kingston and the members of the late Government, by stating that a few years ago they dared not have mentioned the Pacific

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Railway except compelled to do so in a Court of justice. Was there anything which the hon. member for Cumberland had said that would justify the hon. gentleman in using such language. It was well known that the members of the late Government would compare favourably with hon. gentlemen at present occupying the Treasury benches, and, if mistakes were committed by the late Administration, there was nothing in their conduct which warranted such expressions as had been used by the hon. the First Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman understood my remark to apply to any individual, I exceedingly regret it should be so; I certainly had no intention of anything of the kind.

Mr. MASSON said he accepted the hon. gentleman's explanation. The hon. the Premier had held up the action of the late Government to the execration of the people, but he had forgotten that the project put forward by the right hon. member for Kingston and the late lamented Sir George Cartier was only the result of the policy which had been submitted to the country and adopted by Parliament, with the concurrence and approval of the hon. gentleman at present leading the Government. He (Mr. Masson) was one of those who, with the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), believed at that time that the annexation of the territories of the North-West might have been premature on the ground that the country was not yet sufficiently strong to annex such a vast territory with the serious obligation connected with it. The hon. the Premier, however, side by side with the right hon. member for Kingston, stated to the House that that was a suitable time to annex the North-West—he almost forced some of his followers to adopt that view—and that it was now or never that the territory should come into the possession of Canada. They had said that the American nation with the shrewdness which distinguished them saw that the time was come for them if they wanted to stop the prosperity of Canada, to encircle it as they tried to do and partly did by annexing to their own territory and purchasing the vast territory of Alaska. The intention of the Government, and their friends was to take a step in advance of the American nation and become possessed of the North-West Territories. He might have been mistaken, and the hon. member for Chateauguay, who was his leader on this question, might have been mistaken; but, nevertheless, the acquisition of these territories took place and was approved of by the hon. gentleman himself. What were the consequences of that acquisition? They were stated boldly in the House, by every Ministerialist at the time, by the friends of the hon. gentleman, and in the Press. It was held that this must be followed by the commencement of the Pacific Railway, which was to stretch from ocean to ocean. The friends of the hon. gentleman declared that this country would be a useless acquisition if a railway was not constructed to pour a numerous population into that country. The hon. gentleman said that neither he (Mr. Mackenzie) nor any of his friends favoured this project, but he could again recite the rehash—the hon. gentleman had used this word—of the opinions of the Globe, and the newspapers which he had in his possession, which stated at the time not only that the Pacific Railway should be built, but also that we would be traitors to ourselves if we did not build it. It must be pushed forward at any expense. This was in 1869. No restrictive clause as to whether the finances of the country would allow of it was then mentioned. The Liberal Party of Ontario, led by the Hon. George Brown and the present Premier, were the first to say that this railway should be built whatever it might cost the country. Mr. Speaker, as well as himself, knew that these vast territories would be useless, and more than useless—a burden—if they did not build this railway for the purposes mentioned. These statements, it was true, did not at the time find an echo with the Liberals of the Province of Quebec. In this, at least, he admired the conduct of the hon. gentleman who at that time never depreciated that country but pronounced it the most glorious in the world. He held in his hands proof that not only had he been right two or three years ago, but also the hon. gentleman when he said that the vast fertile belt in the North-West was the proper abode for a numerous, thrifty population similar to ours. He held that in his hands, to which he called the attention of the Ministerialist members from the Province of Quebec, who depreciated that country on every hustings in Lower Canada; he had proof that 1,000 miles north of the latitude of Ottawa, there was a country where the finest wheat would grow. He had received that morning from a friend a grain of wheat which had come from the north-eastern extremity of the great territory of the Peace River, in the region of Athabaska Lake and Chipewyan Fort, founded nearly 100 years ago by an industrious and able North-wester. He would read what accompanied the grain of wheat:

“Wheat from the Peace Region; north-eastern and western part of it; that is to say, Lat. 58° 42’; it was sown on the 8th May, 1875, and was reaped before the 26th August, 1875.”

He would pass this to the Minister of Finance, who a few weeks since had most imprudently depreciated that country, which was, he hoped, at no distant day to become the abode of a large population. Wheat grew at the point named, weighing 68 pounds to the imperial bushel, he believed, and barley weighing 58 pounds to the bushel. The late Government had, indeed, acquired a glorious country, and the Pacific Railway scheme was not a blunder. It would have been a serious blunder and fault—as the Globe said—if the men at the head of our public affairs had not considered it their duty to build it, he would not say with the Globe “at any cost,” but at any reasonable cost. The hon. gentleman now said it was an insane project, and the greatest objection made to it was that no company could be found to build it. It happened, however, that so many companies wished to do so that the Government almost fell in consequence. There was a company from Ontario, a company from Quebec, and a company formed of English capitalists, men holding high positions, who were ready to accept the terms proposed by his right hon. friend from Kingston. It had been stated all over the country, and in the Province of Quebec, that the building of the Pacific Railway would ruin this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite had indulged in the most extravagant calculations. Some said it would cost at least $200,000,000; others $250,000,000; and the present Minister of the Interior had declared he believed that it would cost $300,000,000. This was not surprising. Hon. gentlemen opposite had said the same thing about the Intercolonial Railway, forgetting, at the same time, that it was to be to the future advantage of Quebec. Even the hon. member for Chateauguay, who was distinguished for his prudence, had said that it would cost not $20,000,000, nor 30 nor 40, but 50 millions. The press from Quebec said that this railway would ruin the country. He held in his hand an extract from the National, a leading Ministerialist journal, which was a true eteignoir, extinguisher, and he did not believe a Liberal paper in Ontario would write after such a fashion. It ran as follows:—

“The fallen Minister asked for an impossibility. In Europe, men would think twice before constructing a line 800 leagues in length; but our great men here have gravely decided that such a railway in a desert was advantageous for a poor country. The whole scheme was a wager against common sense, and those who dreamt this insane project”—a repetition he was sorry to say of the hon. gentleman’s expression—“can only be ranked among imbeciles. * * * What will we send to British Columbia? Goods which they can purchase at half the price from Oregon. And what quantity will we send to your 12,000 Columbians? Ten cargoes would provide for their wants for one year, I leave you one-half for your road—five loads a year. It is for this result that you wish to spend 250 millions of dollars! Admit that you are imbeciles.”

This was the character of the cry raised in that Province against the Pacific. But they had to-day a glorious vindication of the action taken by his right hon. friend and the late regretted Sir George E. Cartier—a vindication of their project and statement that $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land would build this railway. This vindication was to be found in the admission made by the Premier a few nights ago, when he spoke of the proposed location of the railway—he (Mr. Masson) wished to draw particular attention to this point—from Thunder Bay or Kaministiquia River to Fort Garry, which comprised one of the most difficult parts, and the Cross-Lake section, No. 15, 45 miles east of it—in fact, so difficult that the Government had had to alter their contracts. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman had given the most favourable and delightful statement that that road, when completed, would only cost $24,000 a mile.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend will remember that I stated the parts under contract would cost that.

Mr. MASSON: But I asked the hon. gentleman if the rest would cost about the same, and he replied there would be no material difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What I said was that the other portion was in the middle and most difficult part of the country, and that it must necessarily cost a good deal more—how much I could not say. At least, that is what I intended to say.

Mr. MASSON: Well, it might cost $25,000 to $26,000 per mile. If the calculations of the hon. the Premier were correct, the Pacific Railway would be built for less than $100,000,000. The hon. gentleman saw the difficulty he was in by the questions the Opposition put to him; and he tried to qualify the statement by saying that the road on the North Shore of Lake Superior would cost some $50,000 per mile. On what authority did the hon. gentleman say that? He (Mr. Masson) had asked the hon. gentleman if he was going to present a report of the explorations going on there, and the hon. gentleman could not answer. But he (Mr. Masson) had in his possession a report of Mr. Fleming, which proved clearly that the construction of that branch would not reach more than the average cost of construction on the whole line. Mr. Fleming said:

“That it is now established beyond doubt that a favourable and comparatively easy route, considering the line as a whole, has been found from Ottawa to the northerly side of Lake Superior. This result is the most more satisfactory, as unfavourable impressions have been created regarding this portion of the country, many having considered it even impracticable for railway construction."

He (Mr. Masson) admitted that those parts of the line to be built in British Columbia would be extraordinarily heavy, but he still thought his calculation borne out by the Chief Engineer's report was correct. The 630 miles of line from Lake Nipissing to Fort William would cost, according to all reasonable calculation, $35,000 per mile; the 410 miles from Fort William to Selkirk would cost about $26,000; the $40, that part of the railway which ran from Fort Selkirk to Edmonton, which was a prairie country, would cost about $22,000 per mile; and the 750 miles in British Columbia would cost some $45,000 to $50,000 per mile. Adding all this together it did not exceed $90,000,000 for the construction of the whole railway, and would not reach 100 millions, even granting the extravagant estimate of $50,000 a mile for the eastern section.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MASSON resumed. He said it was evident by the above calculations, given to them by the Premier himself, that the arrangement made with Sir Hugh Allan for building the road with $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land, was sufficient. The hon. the Premier had laid great stress upon the fact that Sir Hugh Allan failed to find the money in England. That hon. gentleman should have been the last to have reproached the late Administration on that score, as it was greatly due to the acts of himself and his followers throughout the whole Dominion, who said that the railway could not be built for anything approaching that sum of money. Sir Hugh Allan, who should have been supported by the public men of this country, was discouraged in a disgraceful manner. He would instance the banquet tendered Sir Hugh Allan before he left for England to raise the necessary funds. The Liberals of Quebec would not join in the banquet when asked to do so. They said they wished to keep their hands out of the whole affair, so as to preserve liberty of action. They wanted to have the means of finding fault and of fighting against the company in future. And they succeeded. They were against the Pacific Railway—they could not show this better than by their action in that circumstance. The baneful influence of the Liberal leaders of Quebec was not shown in this matter only. The same men and some of their followers were opposed to the great undertaking for the construction of a railway on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. They tried to depreciate the line, and said its building would ruin the Province and that it would not be able to pay the debt incurred thereon. He was very pleased to say that the leader of the Dominion Government, however, and the leading organ of the Upper Canada Liberal party, the Toronto Globe, supported the scheme, and they defeated the object of the Lower Canadian Liberals. As illustrating the contradistinction between the two branches of the party he would read two extracts, one from the Franco-Canadien and the other from the Toronto Globe. The former paper said:

"Blind to the uttermost, and with flagrant want of foresight, the railway policy inaugurated by the DeBoucherville Cabinet, during last Session, already presents unfavourable points, foreseen and announced by the Opposition at the time the scheme was discussed. This purposeless policy, impeded from the date of its presentation by inevitable difficulties as to execution, will become more and more precarious as it is developed, and it will result in new checks being given to the enterprise at the price of disastrous financial embarrassment for the Province."

The Globe, on the other hand, said:

"Nothing is more common, but nothing is more absurd, than the habit of gauging the state of affairs in Canada, or some other new country, by a European standard. Up to the date of the recent application for a railway loan, Quebec actually did not owe a dollar above her actually available assets, her surplus and funds held by the Dominion more than covering the loan raised last year. So that for the new loan the whole resources of the Province stand as a free and absolutely unencumbered security. As to imposing on the people a disastrous burden, as the Times puts it, the idea is a ridiculous one. Whether as a commercial venture the North Shore Railways will or will not pay for some time to come is not the first consideration, for one thing is certain, and it is this, which has so strongly impressed the people of Quebec in their favour—they cannot fail under any circumstance to add largely to the general measure of prosperity.”

The speech made just now by the hon. the Premier was not with his usual force, which showed that he felt that he was wrong to some extent. The question of the time limit as to building the road should have been exploded by this time. The hon. gentleman had contended that the road could not be commenced until the surveys were completed. In saying this, he pronounced his own condemnation, for the surveys were not yet completed, and would not be for some time, and yet the construction of the road was being proceeded with. The hon. gentleman had said himself that he would not go on with the building of the road north of Lake Superior for several years to come; he had, nevertheless, entered into an agreement with British Columbia to spend $2,000,000 a year on surveys and building in that Province, in order to push the work as fast as possible, thereby admitting that the work of construction could proceed before all the surveys were completed. He (Mr. Masson) had always contended that the time limit of ten years, granted to British Columbia by Canada, was only a condition to show the earnestness of the Government in pushing on the work. The hon. gentleman had admitted that Mr. Trutch had said that, whether the road was finished in 10, 18, or 20 years, it was nothing to the people of British Columbia. All they wished at the time was to establish that we were in earnest in pushing on the work which we had undertaken. The Government had no right to accuse their predecessors of disingenuousness in this matter; but the Opposition could, with propriety, accuse the Government of being entirely disingenuous on this subject. On this question—the ten years limit—they were playing two games. In British Columbia they claimed that the ten years limit was not binding on the people of Canada, that it was directory and not mandatory, and they made use of that to prove to the people of British Columbia that they could not insist on the immediate building of the road. Here was what was contained in the Order in Council of the 8th July, 1874. After reciting the expression of opinion of Mr. Trutch, the delegate of British Columbia, establishing that his Province would not demand the pound of flesh, the Order in Council read as follows:

“These expressions show very clearly that the terms agreed were directory, rather than mandatory, and were to be interpreted by circumstances, the essence of the engagement being such diligence as was consistent with moderate expenditure, and no increase of the then rate of taxation.”

Well, at the very moment when, in order to obtain delay and better terms from the people of British Columbia, they contended that the ten years limit was directory and not mandatory, that it did not bind the Dominion of Canada, but was only an indication of the time when it was probable the road would be built, they turned round on his right hon. friend, the member for Kingston, (Sir John A. Macdonald) and spread broadcast through the country that the former Government had made an insane agreement which was legally binding upon the Government, and that the Government were bound to finish the road in ten years, or to commit a breach of faith with British Columbia if they did not. By that course they had two benefits: they tried to calm down the people of British Columbia on the one hand and on the other hand they had a fling against his right hon. friend. It was a most disingenuous mode of proceeding. The late Government had fixed a limit of ten years, but they did not mean that the road must and should be built in ten years, but that, by doing what prudence might indicate, the railroad could be built in that time. If the British Columbians really wanted a railway, what would they have said if Canadians had stated that we would build it when we chose or when we could? The late Government said they could build it in ten years, and they based their opinion on what was done in the United States, where they had undertaken a railway, shorter, it was true, but far more difficult of construction than ours. They began it in 1863 or 1864, and finished it in 1869. It was said in the Committee, by an Engineer of the Government, that the Pacific Railway in the United States had been mooted for twenty-five years before. It might possibly have been dreamt of for twenty-five years before; but he alleged that the real initiation of it dated from 1863 or 1864, and five or six years afterwards the engines—one from the East and one from the West—met in the middle of the prairies and the road was complete. The late Government, feeling that the Dominion of Canada, backed by the power and guarantee of England, could accomplish in ten years what the Americans did in five years, said they would do it. The hon. gentleman found fault with the previous Government for having fixed the limit of time, but what did this Government do? In the famous terms that were proposed by the Minister of Public Works himself—as they had heard since, it was his pet measure—he proposed to build the Pacific Railway, irrespectively of whether we would be obliged to increase our taxes or not, from the Pacific Ocean to Lake Superior in five years more than the late Government by its resolution, had undertaken to build the Railway in.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Five years?

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman would see by the correspondence that Mr. Walkem and the late Government had agreed to an extension of time for four or five years. They were quite willing to do it, and that brought the completion of the road to 1885. The hon. gentleman bound himself and this country without any restriction to build the road in five years more—that would be in 1890—from the coast of the Pacific to Lake Superior. He (Mr. Masson) contended that this ten years' limit had been made a useless bugbear in this country, that the people of British Columbia never required it, and that they did not care for it at the moment.

Mr. DECOSMOS: They did.

Mr. MASSON: They did not then, because Mr. Trutch, the delegate of the Government of British Columbia, said that whether it were ten or eighteen years, all he wished was to know that we were in earnest in the matter. He (Mr. Masson) could prove by the report of Mr. Edgar himself that the people of British Columbia did not at the moment care about the ten years limit, and never did.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am glad to hear it.

Mr. MASSON said he had paid the compliment to the hon. gentleman that he knew everything about his Department, and especially about the Pacific Railway, but must withdraw the compliment as he ignored this. In the Minutes of Council of the 23rd of July, 1874, we read as follows:—

“It should be mentioned that, before the late Government left office, it had been distinctly understood, as one of the results of the visit to England by the Directors of the Allan Line, that an extension of time of at least four years would be absolutely necessary. Mr. Walkem, of British Columbia, quite understood this, and there is every reason to believe that it would have been assented to by all parties.”

Mr. Edgar, in his report of June, 1874, moreover stated as follows:—

“While prepared to admit that the Province would be most reasonable, and would not be disposed to insist at all upon the original time limit for completion, yet members of the Administration, looking at it from their own point of view, very naturally urged that this was a peculiarly unfortunate time to seek any alteration.”

And further on:—

“In discussing the question of the time for the completion of the railway, I elicited a very general expression of opinion that there was no great importance attached to any particular period for completion, but that serious disappointment had been felt at the failure to commence the work of actual construction by July of last year.”

This explained clearly that in 1874, when the hon. gentleman held the reins of power, the people of British Columbia did not care about the ten years limit, but that all they cared for was the assurance that the Government of the day was in earnest, as the Government of his right hon. friend the member for Kingston had been. He (Mr. Masson) could readily understand that they must have been very partial with respect to the time when the railway should be begun. They were very anxious and they manifested it, and his right hon. friend from Kingston said that the prosecution of the surveys was, in his opinion, the beginning of the work. All they cared was that the work should be begun at the time allotted. As to the completion, they were reasonable men, and willing to wait till the circumstances of the country allowed us to finish. The whole difficulty with British Columbia was that they had no confidence in the good will—he would not say the good faith, because he would not be as severe as the Minister of Public Works had been in his speech—but in the good will of the Government of the day. They knew that, from the very inception of this work, the Liberal Party had reviled that country; that, from the moment of the connection of that territory to Canada, the Minister of Public Works himself described that country as a forbidding country, as a country not fit for settlement; and as he (Mr. Masson) said last year, the hon. gentleman had made use of the opinion of Sir Alex. Mackenzie, who had not seen the interior of the country, who went up the Peace River through the Rocky Mountains, through West Road River and to Dean Inlet, and, finding that the country he passed through was rather rough and forbidding, had stated immediately that that part of the country was not available for settlement. He (Mr. Mackenzie) at once decried the country, and would not refer to those industrious miners who had been in the country, and whose statements he (Mr. Masson) had read, saying it was a glorious country which had a great future before it. What did his hon. friend the Minister of Justice do? Why, when he went to the Province of Ontario making his famous speech against all the smaller Provinces, raising the most extraordinary sectional cry ever heard; when he held up the old Government as giving a sop to this and that Province—$150,000 to New Brunswick for her export duties, and the better terms that had been given to Nova Scotia—he went so far as to say that this western country was an inhospitable country; how could they expect that country to believe that there was in the Liberal Party any intention of building the Pacific Railway? The Liberal press and Liberal leaders of the Province of Quebec, from the beginning to the end, had been decrying the Province of British Columbia, and how could they expect that these gentlemen, coming from a small Province—and small Provinces were always more susceptible than large ones—would believe that there was any serious idea in this Government of building this railway? If they had real faith and confidence that this Government wished to build the Pacific Railway, that it was not wasting its time in useless explorations, they would immediately come to the leader of the Government and tell him: "We will give you whatever time you want to build the Pacific Railway." He thought the hon. leader of the Government, when he examined quietly his everchanging opinions relating to the Pacific Railway, would feel that he should have been more liberal, more moderate, and more charitable in the expression of his opinion as to the conduct of the old Government. If there was any gentleman in the House who had ever shown an indecision, a want of knowledge with regard to the course which it was proper for this country to follow relating to the Pacific Railway, it was the hon. the Minister of Public Works himself. Take him from the very initiation of this measure, take him from 1869—he (Mr. Masson) remembered at the time when he was quite a young member of this House hearing the hon. gentleman and his friends speak in glowing terms of that great North-West territory which we were going to acquire, and he had read the utterances of the hon. gentleman's leader in the Globe newspaper, speak of the advantages of a railway through that country. He remembered hearing the Premier himself telling them that he believed that a railway through British territory on this continent would be the cheapest, the best and the easiest of construction that could be made. At that time he was heart and soul for the Pacific Railway, and considered, in unison with the great part of the Liberal party from Ontario, that we must have a Pacific Railway within our border; and, further, he was in favour of having it built on the north shore of Lake Superior. What occurred in 1872? Then the Government of the right hon. the member for Kingston brought in a measure to carry out the views of the Liberal party of Ontario, to annex British Columbia and build the Pacific Railway. Then all the fine ideas of the Minister of Public Works vanished; he then perceived that the northern part of Lake Superior was no good; that there were enormous forbidding mountains over which we could not cross; he, who had contended that the railway through British territory was the best and easiest, turned round and said that that very road was almost impracticable. At that time he made a clear sweep round and pretended that he did not want the Pacific Railway at all for the present—we should have a waggon road through the continent. In 1872, on the 7th May, when the Government had decided to build the Pacific Railway, this was his policy; and, on hearing it, the House could judge whether that hon. gentleman had a right to throw a taunt across the floor of this House, about the late Government having entered into some insane project:—

“With regard to the whole question as to the construction of this road, his views had always been that the use of the existing lines of water communication in the summer and of the American lines in winter to Fort Garry, and then—he submitted this to the judgment of the House—the construction of a good waggon road west to the Pacific would suffice for our present wants.”

He (Mr. Masson) was a good Conservative, but he was not such a retrogressionist as that; this was too conservative even for him, and might have done in the olden times of coaches and pewter jugs in England, but it would not do on this continent. They could imagine British Columbians jogging along in carts for 2,000 miles across the continent to reach Canada, consuming two months at the rate of forty or fifty miles a day on the trip; but would they submit to this long? He would submit to any hon. gentleman whether he who proposed, from a Canadian point of view, to build a waggon road across the continent, could properly throw the taunt of “incapacity” and “insanity” across the floor of the House. And when was this proposal made? At the very time when the Northern Pacific Railway Company was looking with anxiety to see whether or no the Canadian Pacific Railway would be built; then Washington was looking to Canada—no Canada to Washington. They saw that, if this was built, the Northern Pacific line was for ever ruined; and then the Minister of Public Works advised the construction of this waggon road, giving thereby a helping hand to the Northern Pacific. All knew that a short line of about 150 miles in length, could have been built from a point of the bay south of British Columbia, Olympia, to tap the great American railway. This was just what the American company wished. Then the hon. gentleman practically advised them to force the British Columbians to use the American line. If this policy had prevailed, the Confederation would have been destroyed. From the moment that the British Columbians found that their interests were bound up with the Americans, they would have demanded annexation, because, whenever a people felt that their commercial and pecuniary interests were allied to a certain people, their political feelings would soon and unavoidably turn in that direction also. In 1874, however, on his accession to power, the hon. gentleman, feeling the importance of framing a policy, paused for a moment, considered the whole question, and what did he do? This famous waggon route was cast to the winds. It had become ridiculous; and the hon. gentleman proposed a scheme which he would not call ridiculous, but inexplicable. He proposed to utilize the water stretches, not only between Fort William and Fort Garry, but also on the Saskatchewan, in order to secure communication with the West. They could imagine British Columbians starting in flat boats or in steamboats for this country, and passing along the windings of the Great Saskatchewan. Had the hon. gentleman, like himself, visited the North-West, he would have seen how preposterous this scheme was. Between Moorehead and Red River the distance was only 200 miles by land; it was 600 miles by water, on account of the interminable windings of those rivers. This proposition was most preposterous. Nevertheless, it was made; and the hon. gentleman had to carry the elections, especially in the Province of Quebec, with it. He was now touching on rather delicate ground. He knew how important it was for public men in this country to examine public questions on broad grounds and broad principles. He quite understood that they should not be sectional. Hon. members would, nevertheless, admit with him, that peace and tranquility could only exist in this country while the different Provinces felt that they had an equal share of the benefits flowing from the policy of the Government. Otherwise, it would be sheer hypocrisy to say that a Province could be systematically set aside in such relation, and, nevertheless, be systematically satisfied. The hon. gentleman, in 1874, was obliged to force the country to swallow a difficult pill, that of abandoning the great policy introduced by his right hon. friend and the late Sir George Cartier—a noble policy, just to all, which had for its purpose the sending into the old Provinces the advantages accruing from the expenditure of large sums of money in the North-West Territory. The hon. gentleman had to justify to the country the abandonment of the line north of Lake Superior; which, if to any, was advantageous to the old Provinces, that were furnishing the money to build this great railway. Why were they endeavouring to create a great nation in, and spending money in sending immigrants into, the North-West? It was in order that the wealth and prosperity that this population would accumulate and produce would conduce to the prosperity and wealth of the older Provinces; and how could this be done unless the traffic from that country passed in a direct line to Ontario and Quebec? What did the hon. gentleman then do? He made his famous Lambton speech, propounding his new policy. The hon. gentleman told the people of the Province of Quebec they would lose, it was true, the great advantages secured for them by Sir George Cartier, but they would obtain a compensation. The terminus, placed as a compromise where the late Government had fixed it, would not be changed, but, as a road was not to be built north of Lake Superior to pour the wealth of the North-West into the old Provinces, and Quebec particularly, railways and water communication would be provided between Fort William and Fort Garry, and the Georgian Bay Branch to the mouth of French River would be constructed to the terminus fixed by the former Government, from which point two lines would be subsidized, one running through Ontario and the other through Quebec. When the hon. gentleman desired to secure the votes of the electors, and especially those of the Province of Quebec, he said:

“This will involve the construction of a short line of railway from the mouth of French River to the southeast shore of Lake Nipissing, and a grant to aid in the extension to that point of existing and projected lines in Quebec and Ontario.”

This policy was never accepted in Quebec, but they had submitted to it. They desired to have the policy of the late Government followed, but they expected that eventually a line would be built north of Lake Superior, as at first agreed to. What was the result? The Government carried the elections all over the country, and particularly in Quebec. He had, and still believed that the policy then propounded should have been binding on the Government; and for this he had no less an authority than the Minister of Justice, who held to that opinion, two years ago; and who, moreover, declared that the part of the policy which related to the Georgian Bay Branch should have been maintained. The elections were carried, and there was great triumph among the Liberals. The Liberal press of Quebec said that of the Conservatives of Quebec a small band of sixteen incapables only remained; but the policy of the Government had been such that, since the beginning of this Session, they had never been able to secure a majority among the members of Quebec, for this small band had so grown that they had obtained majorities of four and five and eleven on votes taken during the Session. In 1875, after the elections, the hon. gentleman broke his pledge; and the interests of Quebec were sacrificed. They, who promised that the terminus should remain at the south-east corner of Lake Nipissing, by a stroke of the pen determined that it should be changed and placed forty miles to the southwards. They, who carried the elections by declaring that two roads would be subsidized, resolved that only one should be subsidized, and that it should not run through the Province of Quebec. The people of Quebec protested, and he was a member of a deputation that interviewed the Premier on the subject. They told the hon. gentleman that Quebec had acquired rights, and that if only one line was to be subsidized it should run through Lower Canada. They had not acted in a selfish or sectional manner. They informed the hon. gentleman that the route by the Matawan was the best, and they supported this statement with the evidence of an Engineer of great capacity. They proved that the grades on the Ontario line were far greater than on the Quebec route, and reminded him that eminent engineers and others had been near the sources of the Madawaska and Bonnechere Rivers, and had found their level 700 feet higher than the Matawan. The Engineer further established that the Quebec line could be built for $30,000 per mile, while the other would cost some $40,000; but the hon. gentleman said that the Engineer did not know what he was talking about. They then brought the Premier before a map of the country and asked him whether, in the face of the fact that no explorations or instrumental surveys had been made, it was not according to common sense and what people knew of the country, to admit that the sources of rivers sprang from high rather than low land. They asked whether it was not madness to adopt the line before instrumental surveys had shown whether or not the construction of the line was possible? The Premier simply turned his back upon them, and told them that they did not know what they were talking about. They were obliged to submit; but, nevertheless, they asked a very reasonable thing. It was this: "Sir, you know nothing about that country; you admit it; you have no surveys, no explorations of it. Will you grant one favour—that, before deciding against us, and declaring that we shall lose the line, you will have a survey made of the line you propose compared with ours." The Premier replied that he did not wish to have any surveys, and that he knew all about the matter. This was not all. The Legislature of Quebec, in which Liberals and Conservatives acted in accord, the leader of the Opposition uniting with the Premier on this subject, petitioned the Government, asking that the question should not be decided before surveys were secured, and that the terminus should not be changed. What occurred? A month after this petition had been forwarded he (Mr. Masson) spoke about it in the House, and discovered that ever since it had been lying in one of the departmental pigeon-holes, unnoticed. And in the meantime the voice of the whole Province of Quebec was demanding justice, and was not listened to. But there was quite a change of opinion among the Government in 1876, when the hon. the Premier came down and told the House that they had made a great mistake, that there were difficulties in the way, and that the line could not be made to the mouth of the French River, and that, consequently, they would have to bring it 26 miles up the river. But that was not all. In 1877 what did the Government do? From 1874 up to the present an item of $1,000,000 for the Georgian Bay Branch appeared in the Estimates; but this year, the omniscient Government that knew everything, and did not want advice, declared that they did not want any money at all for this Branch, and implied that it was through a mistake that they obtained money for it in the first place. The hon. gentleman said he would not follow the hon. member for Cumberland in his arguments that he used in criticising the general policy of the Government; that the House had voted upon some of the matters referred to; that the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Mackenzie) had been whitewashed by a majority of the House, and did not wish to go again into those questions. He could tell the hon. gentleman that he might have been whitewashed in regard to the Fort Frances Locks, but before many months had passed the hon. gentleman himself would admit that he had made a great blunder in reference to that work, and his followers who supported the position taken by the hon. member for Wentworth would exert such a pressure upon him that he would be glad to abandon the work. This work was quite sensible and comprehensive in 1874 when the hon. gentleman said he wanted the benefit of the water-stretches between Thunder Bay and Fort Garry, but from the very moment the hon. gentleman abandoned the idea of using those water-stretches he should have stopped the construction of the Fort Frances Locks and Canal. The hon. gentleman should have come down to the House and stated there had been a certain amount of expenditure on that work, but he would throw himself on the judgment of the House and support of his friends, who had also altered their minds on the subject. If the hon. gentleman had adopted that course, he might have thrown himself on the good will of his followers, and have been excused. But although the hon. gentleman had altered his policy, he, nevertheless, continued this expensive work, which could only be useful in connection with the abandoned scheme of utilizing the water-stretches. The hon. gentleman could not fall back upon his friends and say he had been absolved, as even his friends knew he was wrong, but acted upon the advice of the hon. member for Wentworth, and said they would stand by him. In defending his policy, the hon. gentleman said the Fort Frances Locks were required for the purpose of transporting supplies. That was the most extraordinary policy that he had ever heard; it was not a reason but a pretence for continuing the work. No man would believe that a work which cost three-fourths of a million, and could not be used for two years yet, was necessary to take supplies for a railway which would be completed in four or five years. At the present moment there were more rails out there than were required to build the whole railway from Fort William to the English river. That branch was only 116 miles long; but there were, at Thunder Bay, sufficient rails to build 155 miles; and at St. Boniface, the other end of the line, a sufficient quantity for 130 miles more. The hon. gentleman had said a few words about the Kaministiquia lands. It was pretended that Mr. Fleming recommended that transaction; and he (Mr. Masson) would like to know if the Engineer-in-Chief was continuously to be made the scapegoat for the faults of the Government. It was determined in 1874 that Kaministiquia should be the terminus of the road, and it was the duty of the Government then to acquire the necessary lands; but, if hon. gentlemen would consult the return which had been laid on the table, they would find that the deeds of sale only passed in August, 1876, that was to say, ample time had been given to speculators to buy the land, at cheap rates and to sell them to the Government at a large advance. Land which could have been purchased for $2,000 or $3,000 in 1874, was sold to the Government in 1876 for $50,000. The hon. gentleman might say what he chose, but he could not relieve himself from this grave responsibility, this serious dereliction of duty. The complaint had been made in bitter tones by the hon. gentleman that the business of the Opposition and of the Conservative press had been to malign and destroy his reputation. It should be remembered, however, that, during this Session, the most bitter and cruel accusations had been made by the leaders of the Government against the hon. member for Kingston—a man who stood second to none in this country, a man whom many hon. gentlemen opposite declared to be a noble-minded, noble-hearted man. That hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had been hunted down, pursued and maligned not by the followers of the hon. the leader of the Government, but by the men who sat beside him on the Treasury benches. And those were the gentlemen who reproached the Opposition for maligning them. He could tell the hon. gentlemen he would never be found uttering a word against the personal honour of any hon. member. The reputation of our public men was the inheritance we should wish to transmit intact to our children, no matter to what party they belonged; and he would be proud to see the hon. gentleman, when he left office, take a high position in the country in the same manner that he was proud to see the hon. member for Kingston, notwithstanding the maligning of hon. gentlemen opposite, stand high, not only in the estimation of his friends, but in the estimation of gentlemen opposed to him politically. Now, with regard to the steel rail question, he did not believe the hon. gentleman was personally dishonest; but the hon. gentleman had no right to shield himself behind the personal opinion that people entertained on his account. He did not impugn the hon. gentleman's personal motives, but he would say, and he knew it was the opinion of a great many of the hon. gentleman's friends, that this was an unfortunate transaction. The Government were the agents of the people. If an agent made a good bargain, he had the right to enjoy the credit for it; but, if he made a bad bargain, he must submit to the reproaches which his imprudence would bring upon him. The hon. gentleman was bound to submit cheerfully to criticism. If the Government had made a good bargain, the hon. gentleman would have been the first to come to the House and tell his followers not only to support, but to glorify him on that account; therefore, he should not complain when, having made a bad bargain, they told him he had made a mistake.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He has not made a mistake.

Mr. MASSON: The hon. gentleman injures his own cause in saying that, because he knows that even his own friends think he has made a mistake. If the hon. gentleman frankly admitted that he had made a mistake he would be in a better position with his friends and the country than he is at the present moment. The hon. gentleman says he has made no mistake.

Mr. DOMVILLE: No; he has made a good thing.

Mr. MASSON: My hon. friend says he has made a good thing. Fourteen thousand tons of those rails are now rusting at Fort William. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that they are required at present?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MASSON: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say they were required last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MASSON: I suppose they were required to make an experiment to see whether they would rust more in piles than singly. The rails at Fort William were sufficient to build 155 miles of railway. The hon. gentleman had given out only 116 miles of railway in the present contracts, and that distance would only be finished in one or two, and perhaps three years from the present time. Then, what was to be done with the 3,500 tons of rails remaining at Fort William, after those two years? At $64 a ton—for they cost that delivered at Fort William—they cost the country $224,000. The hon. the First Minister, not knowing what to do with his 50,000 tons of steel rails, had sent 5,000 tons to Vancouver Island uselessly, as had turned out, over 12,000 tons to St. Boniface and 14,000 tons to Thunder Bay, and the balance he had sent to the Lower Provinces. When the hon. member for Cumberland stated that the oxidization of rails occurred much quicker when they were piled up than when they were being moderately used, the hon. the First Minister, with his usual dogmatic tone and usual infallibility, laughed at the hon. gentleman and said the statement was "nonsense." He (Mr. Masson) would give the hon. gentleman an authority on that point, and an authority which he would not dispute. He referred to the Scientific American. That paper on December 5th, 1874, said:

"At the recent session of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Professor Haldemand read a paper on this subject, showing that railway rails when in use oxidized but very little, but when not in use were subject to rapid oxidization. In fact, disuse for one day, for example, Sunday, resulted in a visible increase of rust of the track rails. This, in the opinion of the author, would indicate that, in chemical combination, vibrations may interfere with the molecular arrangement of the elements. In the discussion which followed, Professor Van der Weyde took the same view, and thought that molecular relations tended to prevent rust. But other speakers combatted this view, and it was suggested that possibly the oil employed upon the locomotives might be more or less spread in a thin film over the rails in use, and thus prevent their oxidation.

"Professor Robert Mallet, of London, had his attention called to this discussion, and in a recent note to the Engineer states that some thirty years ago he was requested to examine and report upon the same matter on behalf of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, a grant of money being allowed for that purpose. He made a variety of experiments and examinations, all of which were duly reported. He found, in brief, that one of the reasons why rails when used corrode less than the same rails when not used, is because the vibration of the used rails tends to shake off the rust formed, so as to prevent its prolonged contact with the metallic iron from accelerating the corrosion of the latter."

When the hon. member for Cumberland made this statement, the hon. the First Minister should have made himself familiar with the subject before he stigmatized the statement as "nonsense." The hon. gentleman said that rails for the Intercolonial cost $85 a ton. The question was not whether the late Government gave more or less for their rails than the present Government—this had nothing to do with the matter under discussion. The price of rails was regulated by the price of iron. When iron was four cents a pound, it stood to reason rails could not be purchased as cheaply as they could now, when iron was only two cents a pound. The hon. gentleman himself, a short time ago had made use of this argument to support his own case, and he should not use two bushels to measure with. The question for consideration in relation to the purchase of rails for the Intercolonial Railway, was whether the old Government bought the rails at the ordinary rate then. The hon. gentleman had purchased the rails that were sent to Fort William, on the suggestion of the Engineer-in-chief. But this, being a mere commercial transaction, was not within the domain of an Engineer. As to the Nepigon and Thunder Bay location, he (Mr. Masson) contended that the proper place to put the terminus was at Nepigon. The opening of navigation was about the same time. It was not controlled by the breaking up of the ice at either place, but by the opening of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. If the terminus had been placed at Nepigon, the

Mr. MASSON.

First Minister would not have placed himself in the position, as he had done, of building an unauthorized branch of the railway, a branch of from thirty to thirty-five miles, at a cost of $1,000,000, which was unnecessary. The hon. gentleman, to put himself in accord with the Statute, would be obliged to build a road about 70 miles long from the south part of Dog Lake to Nepigon Bay. This road would in the future be the main road, while the road from south of Dog Lake to Thunder Bay would only be a branch road. He would ask what right had the hon. gentleman to construct this branch of the road, to bring it to Thunder Bay, if he had no intention of making the terminus there. He (Mr. Masson) would now refer to the Georgian Bay Branch. No hon. member would contend that this road was not undertaken rashly, and carried out, so far as it was, with much incapacity. There was no instrumental survey of the railroad made. A simple glance upon the map would have shown that that route should not have been adopted. The hon. the First Minister said that the difficulties as to building the Georgian Bay Branch were entirely fallacious, and that there were, in fact, no difficulties in the way. If such were the case the hon. gentleman should see in what an awkward position he had placed himself with regard to the Hon. Mr. Foster. But he (Mr. Masson) would take his part and show him there were difficulties in the way, and that the hon. gentleman had an imperfect memory. Mr. Walter Shanly, the Engineer of Mr. Foster, reported as follows:—

"With respect to the former, the levels already run, extending from the mouth of the river to the 'Nipissing Road,' a distance of about sixty miles, show, beyond all question, that the maximum gradients and curvature limited by the contract, namely, 26 feet per mile ascending east and 52 feet on the westwardly ascent, are not obtainable on or near the line laid down on the contract map.

"The easterly survey presents a fair profile for some 50 miles from Douglas westward, the required grades and curves being obtainable; but about the 52nd mile a narrow gorge or canyon of the Bonnechere River affords the only practicable line for a distance of about four miles, the country on either side being high and mountainous. Some seven or eight miles further on, near the point designated on the map as the 'Village,' a somewhat similar gorge is met with, and is again the only feasible pass.

through which the line, as laid down on the map, can be carried.

"In both these gorges, the work to be done to obtain grades of from 70 to 80 feet in the mile, even in curves of six degrees, would be heavy.

"In view of the above facts, and facts they undoubtedly are, it seems absolutely necessary to ascertain immediately one of two things. Will the Government entertain the idea of modifying the contract in respect of gradients or alignment, or will such latitude in surveys be permitted as will allow of the best obtainable section, or profile, being sought for, however far it may lie to the north of the line laid down in the contract map.

"Judging from the ascertained elevation of the interior waters on the still unsurveyed portions of the line, and from the contour and watersheds of the country generally, I am very strongly of opinion that it will prove impracticable to obtain any line whatsoever from any point on the Bonnechere to any point on the French River that will admit of such a low maximum of gradient as, on the eastern ascent, is stipulated for, by the contractor."

The hon. gentleman might put his opinion against that of Mr. Shanly, who was second to none in his profession, and who had reported that it was impossible to find a proper route within the contract; but he (Mr. Masson) would ask him whether he did not in reality abandon the Georgian Bay Branch on account of difficulties unprovided for and unforeseen. The hon. gentleman, in order to clear himself, should admit that he had made a grave mistake, and that he was bound in honour to relieve the Hon. Mr. Foster of his contract and to indemnify him for the same. But the hon. gentleman, on the contrary, said all the accusations brought forward and statements made by Mr. Shanly and others, are false, and the route was a very easy one. If that was so, why did the Government abandon the route by the contract. The hon. the Premier knew that the character of his former relations with Mr. Foster were such as to make it his bounden duty to be more strict with him than with any other contractor. The hon. gentleman knew very well that public opinion had its eyes upon him, and the statement was made broad-cast that Mr. Foster obtained the railway contract on account of action taken by him before the fall of the late Government. Whether that report was true or false—and he was ready to believe it was false until it was proved to be true—what was the duty of the Government? Surely it was to be more strict with Mr. Foster than with any contractor.

On the contrary, the hon. the First Minister was more improvident with Mr. Foster than with the Georgian Bay Branch Railway. He made a great blunder with regard to the railway, but in dealing with Mr. Foster he made a greater mistake still; he made such a grievous mistake as would compel the hon. gentleman to show that the accusation brought against himself and his party was entirely unfounded. When the hon. the Premier gave the contract to Mr. Foster, with whom he was on such intimate terms, did he take the precaution of enquiring whether Mr. Foster was able to carry it out? Did he remember that in the authority given by Parliament to make the contract it was provided that the Government should not award the contract to any person unless he was in a position to spend $4,000 per mile, and there was a condition in regard to the Georgian Bay Branch that the contractor was obliged to show that he was worth $340,000. The hon. the Minister of Public Works did not take those precautions, as had been candidly admitted before the Committee on Public Accounts. When asked as to whether he knew Mr. Foster would be able to carry out the work, the hon. the Premier said he believed so; he thought he would. When asked as to whether he obtained any information on the point, he replied that he had not obtained any particular information. The hon. gentleman was asked as to how he arrived at that conclusion; to which he replied, from Mr. Foster's general reputation, that he was a great railway man, interested in many lines, and that he was a strong and able man. The hon. the First Minister, by some other person, was asked to this effect: "Did you not gather the information as to Mr. Foster's ability a little from himself?" to which the answer, he thought, was that he did so. The Georgian Bay Branch contract was the most amusing affair which had yet been before Parliament. Mr. Foster had a right to a certain percentage on rails delivered on the line of road. Hon. members did not yet know by any statement which had been made before them where those rails were delivered. The authority of the Government stated that the rails were to be delivered on the railway to be built, that was the subsidized portion of the Canada Central Railway. The Chief Engineer knew nothing about the point. It appeared, however, that they had been delivered in the neighbourhood of Renfrew; but there was no evidence to show that Renfrew was a portion of the subsidized line of the Canada Central. The first duty of the Government should have been to ascertain the location of the subsidized line. But they took no such action. The proof that Renfrew was not on that section of the line was that Mr. Foster asked that that branch of railway should be extended to Renfrew instead of Douglas. The rails might, in fact, be fifteen miles away from the subsidized portion of the line where they were to be delivered. Those rails were, moreover, received by the Government without knowing anything as to their value.

Mr. DYMOND rose to a point of order. The evidence of the Public Accounts Committee, to which reference was being made, had not been reported to the House.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman must feel very guilty if he would stop his argument at that point.

Mr. DYMOND said he would not object if all other hon. members were allowed the same privilege.

Mr. MASSON said it had been ascertained that those rails, the quality of which it was the duty of the Government to have known, had turned out to be worthless. Mr. Ridout, an Engineer, had stated that he had never seen worse rails used. But he (Mr. Masson) did not so much complain of the quality of the rails as of the circumstance that the Government had purchased nearly 2,000 tons of rails, knowing nothing as to their quality; and the evidence showed that when one of those rails dropped from the hand, it broke. Mr. Foster, who was still a very powerful supporter of the Government, obtained a loan of those very rails he was partly paid for, and it was stated by the Deputy Minister of the Department before the Public Accounts Committee that it was a very unusual act to loan anything belonging to the Department; nevertheless, Mr. Foster could obtain a loan of rails. They were lent to Mr. Foster, a particular friend of the Government, but it was impossible to find out by whom they were loaned or delivered. Nor could the quantity so loaned be ascertained. At first the quantity was 100 tons, but the evidence had disclosed the fact that the quantity missing was 227 tons; they had not been loaned, they had been taken—made use of by Mr. Foster. Those rails were of the value of $10,000. He would not say that anything was wrong on the part of Mr. Foster, but the transaction showed gross negligence and supineness on the part of the Public Works Department. He would submit the case to any hon. gentleman opposite, who was sure to vote against the motion, and especially to the hon. member for South Wentworth.

Mr. RYMAL asked the hon. member for Terrebonne what he understood him (Mr. Rymal) to have said the other night.

Mr. MASSON said he understood the hon. member to have said that a friend in need is a friend indeed.

Mr. RYMAL said that in his remarks the other evening he was referring to the doctrine taught by the right hon. member for Kingston, which was that he wanted his friends to sustain him when he was wrong, because the Opposition would keep him in power when he was right. He (Mr. Rymal) said his friends might take a leaf out of the book of the hon. gentleman, and go so far as to pardon a small offence; but he went on to say that if they could show him a corrupt bargain performed by members of the Government he would desert them at once.

Mr. MASSON said he would leave the interpretation to be placed upon the hon. gentleman's words to the House. A few days ago he had a somewhat disagreeable conversation with the hon. the Premier in regard to the exploration of the country between Pic River and Sault Ste. Marie. He had put those questions to the hon. Minister advisedly. He had observed the course of the hon. gentleman and his determination to carry into execution those views and principles which he advocated when in Opposition. It was only for the Opposition and some of the members of the Cabinet to try and counteract the action of the hon. gentleman. When in Opposition, the hon. the Premier held views which were opposite to those of many of his friends who came from the Province of Quebec. To-day the hon. gentleman was determined to have his view predominate, whether it pleased his Lower Canadian supporters or not, and it was that the railway should pass west and south of Lake Nipissing. He had foreseen this since last year, when he read the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman while he was unavoidably absent from the House. He was then convinced that the cause of the Province of which he was one of the representatives had not only been sacrificed as to the Georgian Bay Branch, but also as to the location of the Pacific Railway itself; and that the grand policy propounded by the right hon. member for Kingston and the late regretted Sir George Cartier was to be cast to the winds, and the interests of Quebec set aside. He would read extracts from the hon. gentleman's speeches, establishing the position he took. It would be remembered that the great question of past years was whether this railway would pass by Sault Ste. Marie. Sir Hugh Allan and Sir George Cartier disagreed on this point, because Sir George Cartier thought that Sir Hugh Allan was playing into the hands of the Americans; and hon. gentlemen opposite were acting to-day, he was afraid, as Sir Hugh Allan in vain desired the late Government to act. The hon. the Premier said last year:

"Taking Fort William as the objective point, from there by the old line via Long Lake to the Eastern terminus, the distance is 660 miles. From Fort William by the Pic River (the new line) the distance is about 620 miles. Then, if the line were to deflect from the Pic southward so as to follow the general outline of Lake Superior and reach the Sault, and there traverse the borders of Georgian Bay to Lake Nipissing, the distance from Fort William would be about 720 miles, as near as can be ascertained. A party was sent out by the Chief Engineer to examine the country between the Pic River and the Sault. That work is not yet complete, nor is it in such a state as would justify us in giving any positive opinion upon it. I have no doubt, however, that it is practicable; but the other route I have indicated is one there is no doubt about. I believe that it is quite as easy as the former one while it is shorter.

"Hon. Mr. TUPPER: Where are these 720 miles route?"

"Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE: From Fort William round by the Sault Ste. Marie to Nipissing; but by leaving Lake Superior at Pic River we can reach Lake Nipissing in 620 miles. The old line north of Long Lake was 660 miles."

Why did the hon. gentleman have this survey made when he knew that the House had decided that the main line of the railway should not pass there, but north and east of Lake Nipissing, and that the terminus should be south-east of this Lake? When the hon. gentleman told the people of Lower Canada and Parliament that the terminus should be located forty miles below, he never spoke about the main line running west and south of Lake Nipissing. His hon. friend from Charlevoix brought this question up last year and read an extract from the Globe which proved clearly that it was the intention of a certain party in Ontario to have the line pass below the point at which it had been fixed by Parliament. He would read what passed on that occasion:

"Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he knew a newspaper, the Toronto Globe, which was under the influence of a gentleman who had always been considered a great authority, and a power behind the Throne. That newspaper, in February, said:

"The railway to French River is a part, and a material part, of the old scheme. It is one link in the chain; another will take us to the Sault Ste. Marie neighbourhood, and so on to the head of Lake Superior."

He thought that showed he was not far wrong. In his speech on the subject in March last, the hon. the Premier said:

"We therefore fixed upon that part as the terminus for two or three reasons—for the reason just assigned in the first place; and in the second place, for the reason that, if the road should be continued westward, those 85 miles that would be built by the Government as a Government work, will be generally speaking in the line to be followed; and which may be carried out whether we pass slightly north-east of Sault Ste. Marie ultimately, or diverge northerly by the route to Long Lake, and passing from the south of Long Lake to Pic River, or by the north of the lake where the surveys of last season terminated.

The Premier on the 5th April stated to the House:

"A good deal had been said about this being a link. By stretching a cord on the map from Montreal to Thunder Bay or Ne-pigon, it would be seen that this line lay directly in the route of the Pacific Railway. The Canada Central formed the straightest possible way from Portage du Fort, and the Georgian Bay Branch formed a continuation of that line in nearly the same direction."

He would ask hon. gentlemen to take a map and see whether this was the case. The statement was most incorrect. A straight line drawn from Lake Nipigon to the first seaboard of this country passed north of Lake Nipissing. The hon. gentleman continued:

"He did not know the country between that point and the French River and the Pic, but was familiar with the country from there to Michipicotin. He had always expressed his anxiety that the line should go on the south side of Nipissing. It was unquestionably the shortest route and traversed the best country. Whether it passed immediately south of the lake or at some distance from it was a matter of no concern, because it would be an exact link in the line."

He had no fault to find with the hon. gentleman, for this was the policy the hon. gentleman had advocated in Opposition, contrary to the views of the members from Quebec. Nevertheless, in this as in many other things, the hon. gentleman's opinions prevailed over those of the leaders of the Quebec Liberals, to the great disgust of the majority of these Liberals, as they would see before long. He protested, in the name of the Province of Quebec, against this policy. This might appear a bold assertion, but he knew he had the unanimous support of the population of Lower Canada on this subject, in opposition to the policy of the Government, as proved by the vote of 1872. If British Columbia was today a part of the Dominion, this was due to the votes of the solid phalanx which supported Sir George Cartier; and they had voted for the railway to bring wealth and prosperity to the Province of Quebec. He would speak fairly and frankly to the representatives of the Province of Ontario on this matter. They believed that Quebec would obtain its share of the accruing advantages, otherwise they would not have consented to the Bill. This was the reason why the representatives of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces advocated the scheme. He was, for his part, pleased to see the position occupied by Ontario, which would share largely in these advantages.

Mr. MASSON.

They expected, in exchange, that, as Providence had placed Quebec in the most direct line for the trade of the West, they should obtain their share of it. He would submit to the representatives of Ontario whether it was right, admitting that Montreal and Quebec were placed in a straight line with the head of Lake Superior, to take away from the Province of Quebec the advantages bestowed upon it by nature. Was it not sectionalism on the part of Ontario to divert this great national route to itself, when it should be established so as to secure the prosperity of the whole Dominion and bring the trade of the North-West to their first seaboard, Montreal? Quebec, however unwilling, cheerfully submitted to the change. They understood that Ontario required more than their share; but Sir George Cartier joined hands with the hon. member for Kingston, and consented that the line should deflect towards Ontario instead of passing in a straight line from the north of Lake Superior to the first sea-board, to some 50 miles north of the River Matawan and the Upper Branch of the Ottawa River. The Liberal Party of Ontario, nevertheless, demanded greater concessions, and asked that the line should pass southwest of Nipissing. Sir George Cartier and the hon. member for Kingston then determined on a compromise, and agreed that the terminus should be fixed at the south-east end of Nipissing, where a point would be of easy access to the railways from Ontario and Quebec. This was devised to secure peace and quietness in Ontario, and they were ready still to abide by the compromise. Sir George Cartier was now missed from the Treasury benches, and Quebec had reason to mourn his loss; Sir George said it was true they were giving 40 or 50 miles to Ontario, to which that Province was not entitled in strict justice, but nevertheless it would be done, and a road should be constructed on the north shore of the Ottawa River as far as the topography of the country would permit, striking the Pacific Railway at the junction north of Lake Nipissing, thus enabling the wealth of the North-West to be poured into the Province of Quebec. This was denied; but, as a part of a scheme had been arranged between Sir George Cartier and himself, he (Mr. Masson) was in a position to assert the facts himself. Sir George asked him and Mr. Currier and Mr. Alonzo Wright to form a company to build this line by the north shore, and they mooted the organization of an independent railway by the north shore for this purpose. The Liberal press of Quebec had declared that Sir George Cartier had never conceived such a plan; they could not understand that this great man should form such a scheme. He would take the opportunity of reading once more the correspondence and telegrams which passed between himself and another party on the subject. He at once wrote to a gentleman who was second to none in his patriotic endeavours in advocacy of railway enterprise, although a clergyman—Father Labelle, who was distinguished for that spirit of enterprise and energy for which the Anglo-Saxon race was celebrated and which they would appreciate. He sent to Father Labelle a telegram which he previously showed to Sir George Cartier, who approved of it. It was as follows:

“Received letter; Sir George just declared in House, that terminus of Pacific Railway will be so placed that easy access to it can be had from Ontario by their future roads, and from Quebec by a road running on north shore of Ottawa.”

Sir George Cartier having seen that Sir Hugh Allan might not coincide with his views in this regard, sought the formation of a new company, as he had stated. He (Mr. Masson) was offered a directorship, and Father Labelle, who had just arrived in Ottawa, immediately telegraphed to Sir Hugh Allan on the 16th May, 1872, as follows:—

“Charter asked for railway from Ottawa to junction with Pacific Railway by North Shore of Ottawa; if it meets your approval would you join?”

Mr. Labelle received this answer:—

“I am in favour of the shortest line from Ottawa to the east terminus of Pacific Railroad; if it goes north of Ottawa I would favour such line, but my opinion is that it should cross at Portage du Fort.”

To this Mr. Labelle replied:

“Received telegram. Cartier would seem to favour a line wholly by North Shore of Ottawa to junction with Pacific Railway; would you like one or two of our friends being on the Board of Directors of new Company.”

There was a meeting of the parties interested in the Northern Colonization Company, and they consented to taking up the scheme. He (Mr. Masson) could show by public documents that the plan propounded by Sir George Cartier was a bona fide one, and that he was strong enough to impose his opinions upon Sir Hugh Allan, who readily engaged to build the railway. He submitted the following letter for the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite from Quebec. It was the official letter from Sir Hugh Allan to the Secretary of State, dated 9th July, 1872, and read as follows:—

“Sir,—With reference to the last communication addressed to you by the Secretary of this Company, advising that the Company was now prepared to accept of the contract for building the Pacific Railroad on the terms and conditions authorized in the Act of Parliament, I have now the honour to state that if the building of the Pacific Railway is given to this Company, it will agree, with such assistance as may be obtained from the Governments of Ottawa and Quebec, or such other assistance as may be given, to build a branch railroad from some point on the main line of the Pacific Railroad, near and north of Lake Nipissing, to Hull, opposite Ottawa, there to connect with the Northern Colonization Railroad. This route will cross the Ottawa at Deep River, or some other point as far up on the north shore of the Ottawa, in the Province of Quebec, as the nature of the country will admit.”

That was the policy of Sir George Cartier; whether it was feasible or not was not the question now. That was the policy of the hon. member for Kingston, and that was the policy which the present Government abandoned with the help of the Liberals of Quebec. It might be said that he had been sectional. Who ever suggested that Mr. Howe was sectional when he asked for and insisted upon justice for his Province until he got it? Who ever said the people of New Brunswick were sectional when they asked that $150,000 should be granted them for abandoning the export duties on timber. Canadians were all one, but we had the common frailties of human nature, and were naturally disposed to favour our own Provinces. When they saw men whose duty it was to maintain their rights forgetting them, the Opposition were obliged to take this ground. It was no new cause he was pleading.

He had advocated it three times in this House, and he knew that two-thirds of the Liberal Party of Quebec approved of it, but party spirit was so strong that they would vote down that which they supported in the lobbies and was supported by the country. There was, however, a sad exhibition of sectionalism in the House when Sir George Cartier and the hon. member for Kingston propounded that noble, just and statesmanlike policy. There were men who, to embarrass the Government and for party purposes, advocated that the line should be more in favour of Ontario, and vice versa. The hon. the Minister of Justice moved a resolution to the effect that the railway should "extend from some point on or near Lake Nipissing, passing, if practicable, south and west of said lake." That was the extreme view of those who favoured a section of Ontario, against which every member from Lower Canada voted without exception. But what did the Liberals of Quebec do, not from any patriotic feeling as was well proved to-day, but from the simple desire of embarrassing the Government? The Liberals of Quebec advocated the location of the line more in favour of that Province; and Mr. Dorion moved an amendment to provide that the eastern terminus should be at some point west of the Ottawa river as shall be found to afford the shortest practicable route from the Pacific Ocean to such eastern terminus. Here were the two extreme views. For this extreme motion all who voted were French Liberals. Mr. Smith (Westmoreland) was the only hon. member who did not belong to the Province of Quebec who voted for the motion. What was the position of those hon. gentlemen to-day? They had now no opinion of their own. They supported the one-man Government. The hon. the Minister of Finance, the hon. the Minister of Justice, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, the President of the Council had all taken their brains and put them into the hard Scotch head of the hon. the First Minister, who thought and acted for them all. The French Liberals had repudiated every question which they supported before the change of Government. All those questions on which the Conservatives and Liberals of Quebec were agreed had been repudiated; and there was not a member of the Cabinet who represented the principles, the ideas—call them the prejudices if they pleased—of the Province. They were going to repudiate the Georgian Bay Branch, and to-day those hon. members he was afraid would support the hon. the Minister of Public Works in abandoning the scheme to make Montreal the eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway, and the Province of Quebec the channel for the great trade of the North-West. He spoke advisedly when he said that the Province of Quebec now stood in an inferior position. He was present at a meeting in Lachine when the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was seeking re-election, and at that meeting, in the presence of the hon. member for Chateauguay and himself, that hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme) said: "I promise, if I am elected, that if in three months I have not obtained justice for Lower Canada I will resign my seat."

Mr. LAFLAMME: The hon. gentleman has either taken wrong notes or he has a bad memory.

Mr. MASSON: Not at all. The hon. gentleman also said in answer to certain reproaches: "I have not spoken in the House; my business was to listen, and not to speak. But I have only been two years in Parliament, and have already given places of emolument to twenty of you; what will it be when I am a Minister of the Crown?" This was a great slur upon the hon. gentleman's predecessors and colleagues in the Cabinet, but was not the only thing the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had repudiated. In this connection he would read the following from L'Evenement:—

"It is now too late to enquire whether Messrs. Dorion, Fournier and Ross would have acted better in refusing the offers that were made to them and remaining faithful to politics. It is an accomplished fact, it would be useless to discuss it; we must accept it and see the most we can make of it for the Liberal cause and the country.

"The withdrawal of the two most important men of the Liberal party, of the two men who have for twenty years personified the popular cause in the two great districts of the Province, must naturally mark a new era in our politics. It is evident that the withdrawal of MM. Dorion and Fournier only preceded for a short time the withdrawal of others, and that for the disappeared leaders we must substitute others. Who shall be those leaders, who will know how to conciliate in a just measure the best traditions of Liberalism with the exigency of a new state of things?"

Who were the men that had taken the places of those cast away? Look at the front benches. The President of the Council and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier were the men who were to bring forward the best interests of the Liberal Party in Quebec, and the hon. member for Shefford was to represent the English element. These were the leaders who had taken the place of Sir George Cartier; these were the men who had taken Mr. Dorion's place; these were the men who had submitted to the withdrawal, one after another, of all those questions upon which Conservatives and Liberals were united, and the former, unfortunately, found, as they would in the present circumstances, that they were to be left alone to fight the battle of the Province. Although it was not the duty of the Opposition to point out the policy that should be followed, yet he could not help referring to it and reiterating what he had said on the subject last year. The Government had the power in their hands; they had the majority, and they should not in his opinion repudiate the grand policy inaugurated by the right hon. member for Kingston. The important link that was to connect Quebec and Ontario directly with the West had, however, been abandoned. For years to come the traffic that would have been created thereby would be diverted to the United States. They in Lower Canada had been forced to submit to it. The Government afterwards said they would adopt the Georgian Bay Branch policy. He was willing to submit to that policy, although if the railway had been passing to the north, the Georgian Bay Branch would not have been required, because Quebec and Ontario would have been on equal terms, and each could have had, by adopting the necessary means, its share of the traffic of the North-West. But, now that Quebec must reach the waters of Lake Superior, he did not ask that the Georgian Bay Branch should be built, but he did ask that the Government should take some action to secure the desired object on the promised terms. Let the Government adopt that part of the scheme of the old Government which met with the approbation of both Ontario and Quebec, that policy which provided for the eastern terminus being at the east end of Lake Nipissing and thus placing Ontario and Quebec on equal terms. Then it would be the duty of Ontario and Quebec to see how they could reach that point. Then it would be the time for statesmen to consider what was best in the interest of the Dominion and their respective Provinces. Then would be the time for the Government to repair the injury done to Quebec, and carry out the promises they had made before the elections. The duty of the Government was to support their policy of 1874 in this respect. Let them subsidize a line in the Province of Quebec as they promised to do. He knew that the sentiments of the majority of the Liberal Party in Lower Canada were in accord with his on this point. Let them subsidize a line so that the Pacific Railway, passing by the north of Nipissing, could be tapped and a connection with the emporium of commerce, Montreal, secured; then the members from Lower Canada would be willing to support the Government in voting away a reasonable amount of money to bring a line from the eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway to any point in Ontario, in the direction of Toronto if desired. The members from Lower Canada supported that policy when they came to this Parliament, when the hon. the Minister of Public Works declared that he would subsidize roads in the Province of Quebec, and would, he believed, do so still. But the Province of Quebec would never consent to the present policy. It would never consent to be deprived of its rights. It asked no favours; it only asked for the acknowledgment of acquired rights—those granted to it by Act of Parliament. The Province of Quebec stood by the announcement of the hon. the Premier, unfavourable as it was compared with former plans, and was determined to maintain it as best it could.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that it appeared that the leader of the Conservative Party in Quebec was determined to outshine the leader of the Party in the Maritime Provinces. After the able speech of the hon. member for Cumberland, which lasted five hours, the hon. member for Terrebonne had afflicted them with a speech of almost the same length. It was amusing to hear the hon. gentlemen complain of the tone on the part of hon. members on the Government side in the debate. Certainly, if there was any offence it had not come from that side of the House. And, besides, the hon. gentlemen well knew, and the country well knew, that the hon. gentlemen opposite resorted to all the violence and abuse possible against their opponents. The hon. gentleman had thought fit to go back to past years and attack the Liberal Party in the Province of Quebec, for having assailed almost every measure of public importance. The hon. gentleman had accused them of having opposed the establishment of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. This he (Mr. Laflamme) positively denied. There was opposition as to the Intercolonial, but not as to the Grand Trunk, on the part of the Liberal Party of Quebec. It was contended that at that time, when money was so much required, the amount appropriated could have been put to better use than in building the Intercolonial Railway. But the opposition to the Intercolonial Railway was before Confederation. The hon. member said that the Quebec Liberal Party had called the project of building the Pacific Railway an insane project. The whole intelligence of the Dominion had attacked that plan, as the Prime Minister had shown. The hon. gentleman himself had admitted that the bare construction would cost $100,000,000. He had accused him of having stated at a public meeting that the road would cost something like $300,000,000. He did not state any such thing. What he did say was that, as the American Pacific Railway, with a much more favourable route, had cost $215,000,000, it was nonsense to pretend that the Canadian Pacific could be built for less; and he also stated that the cost of the road would be an addition to the public debt. The original plan was an absurdity: it was a fraud. The hon. member had pretended that the failure of Sir Hugh Allan to raise money in England was owing to the opposition of the Liberal Party, and yet he said the Globe and the hon. the Minister of Public Works had supported the scheme.

Mr. WRIGHT: No; he did not say that.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he so understood the hon. member. At all events, the Liberal Party could not have had the alleged influence against Sir Hugh Allan. The surveys were to have been completed in two years, but they were not completed yet, although all the energy possible had been thrown in them. They had been carried out in the most economical, and at the same time, in the most efficient manner. The hon. member pretended that there was no real intention to carry out the work within ten years. If there were no real intention, why was it so expressed? On the one hand, the British Columbians themselves did not expect to have it done within ten years, and, on the other hand, notwithstanding that, they had seen, ever since the new Administration came into office, that the British Columbians had insisted and almost, at the instigation or suggestion of the hon. gentlemen opposite, threatened the Government with secession for not carrying out the contract formerly made; that was, to construct the road within ten years as laid down in Bill.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Not so.

Mr. LAFLAMME said there had, at all events, been some persistence on the part of the British Columbians to obtain this work within a specified time. He should not fall on the hon. member in regard to what he called the hesitation or indecision of the hon. the Premier in relation to the Pacific Railway. The facts were there, and they were the best answers to his insinuations. There certainly was no indication that he intended to come back to a system of a waggon road, as the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had stated. The Pacific

Mr. MASSON.

Railway was in a fair way of construction in all the most essential parts, and was being carried on, on the system which had obtained for the American Railway the greatest success, that was, to progress with the railway in such a way that the population should follow its construction.

Mr. MASSON asked if the hon. gentleman would have the kindness to repeat what he (Mr. Masson) had said as to Mr. Mackenzie's action with regard to Sir Hugh Allan in England.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he understood the hon. gentleman to say that the enemies of the Local Government in Quebec, and the enemies of the Conservatives in Quebec, had used their best endeavours in order to prevent Sir Hugh Allan from carrying his scheme in England; that the same system had been followed by the Liberal Party in Quebec with respect to the loans made by the Local Government for the North Shore Railway; and the hon. gentleman compared the Globe, of Toronto, and even the Liberal Party of the Province of Ontario with the Liberals of Lower Canada, saying that the former favoured or came to the assistance of the Province of Quebec in order to establish or maintain the credit of the Province of Quebec in England, and elsewhere.

Mr. MASSON said he had stated that the action of the Liberals of the Province of Quebec in England was such as to lower or discredit the credit of the Province of Quebec in England, and that they had succeeded in getting their loan, firstly, by the credit of the Province; secondly, by the energies of the Ministers; and, thirdly, by the influence of those Ministers and of the Globe, and not by means of the Liberal Party who pretended that it was running the country.

Mr. LAFLAMME: By what medium could they communicate their influence there?

Mr. MASSON: They have no influence there more than they have in Canada.

Mr. LAFLAMME said they had enough influence to keep the hon. gentleman out of power, and if he were left to his own individual influence in the Province of Quebec he would not, perhaps, be sitting in the front benches in this House, because he (Mr. Laflamme) had not forgotten that the hon. gentleman had thought the Liberal element of Quebec was worthy of cultivating, and they had some influence in sending the hon. gentleman to this House.

Mr. MASSON: And I have always been particular in following their instructions.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he knew the Liberals of the county of Terrebonne, who, he had no hesitation in saying, when called upon to follow their principles, would be found as true as the Liberals had been found in any other part of Quebec.

Mr. MASSON: 600 majority for Mr. Chapleau.

Mr. LAFLAMME asked, if the railway were taken away from the county, where would be the 600 majority? He would just answer some of the principal questions which the hon. gentleman thought fit to bring forward in his attempt to answer the arguments of the hon. the Premier. He had regretted that the petition of Legislature, asking that the old terminus should not be discarded, had not been considered and accepted by the Government. Now, that was evidently stated without regard to the fact. The hon. gentleman knew, and the whole Province of Quebec could not ignore the fact, that the whole which the late Sir George Cartier attempted to obtain for the Province of Quebec was to locate the terminus of the Pacific Railway at a point south of Lake Nipissing. This was the only point which had been settled and determined upon after long contention. What had the hon. member for Terrebonne done since? The hon. gentleman had alluded to the vote of the 30th May, 1872, when 51 members voted for the motion of Mr. Blake, while in the nays was the name of the hon. member for Terrebonne. The hon. gentleman also voted against Mr. Dorion's motion on the same day, though that proposition was in the interest of the Province of Quebec. Would the hon. member for Terrebonne pretend to say that the Province of Quebec was interested in having the terminus of the Pacific Railway established south or north of Lake Nipissing ?

Mr. MASSON : North.

Mr. LAFLAMME contended that the Province of Quebec had no interest in having the road pass either north or south, but it was interested in having connection from the terminus which would bring that terminus and a point in the Province of Quebec within a shorter distance of Lake Nipissing than any point in the Province of Ontario, and if the hon. gentleman would look at the map he would find that the proposed scheme of the Government for the Georgian Bay Branch originated entirely with this Government. The defunct Government never thought of that scheme. The hon. member for Terrebonne, while he was supporting the late Government and advising them, when he had so much influence, and pretended to represent so faithfully the interests of the Province of Quebec, never thought of, or asked, or pretended to obtain this advantage of having a branch road from the terminus of the Pacific Railway, were it west, east, north or south of Lake Nipissing, to put the entire West of this continent within a shorter distance from Montreal than by any other route which could be submitted. The Province of Ontario had no interest in the Georgian Bay Branch; it could not be for their interest. Coming down to Ottawa or within the vicinity of Ottawa, by the Canada Central, that road would bring the whole business of the West into direct communication with the section of railway which was in course of construction, the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway. The greatest part of the eloquence of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had been expended this evening on the impossibility of obtaining or securing this Georgian Bay Branch, or bringing the terminus of the Pacific Railway in contact with the railway system of the Province of Quebec. This had been already asserted and approved by the act of the Government. The hon. the Premier had declared on an interpellation made by the hon. member for Terrebonne that the Government had not changed its determination with respect to the establishment of a branch railway connecting with the Georgian Bay, or in that direction, and it was evident to every man who looked at the position of the branch established on the line traced out by the Government, that whether the line passed south or north of Lake Nipissing from Thunder Bay, it would put Montreal within a comparatively small distance further from Thunder Bay than Toronto itself. Consequently, it secured for the Province of Quebec all the advantage of communication with the Western Territories, and it also secured the settlement of the entire part of the country. The hon. member had thought proper to criticise the valuation of the lands for the purpose of establishing a dépôt at Kaminstiquia. He pretended that $50,000 was paid in the most extravagant manner for land which could have been purchased at a much lower rate. The answer was that this valuation was made, not by the Government, but by a competent party, and that the valuers had been sworn. This property was divided into town lots, and constituted almost a little town, and this determined them to fix this price. Consequently, the Government could not be accused of having disposed unjustly of its money in favour of any party. It was really something calculated to call forth the sympathies of all the members of the House, to hear the hon. gentleman complain of abuse having been heaped on his hon. friends. He had carefully followed the debates and the discussions throughout the whole of the Province of Quebec, and he had never heard Liberal speakers use personalities with regard to their political opponents. Political facts had alone been discussed, such as the Pacific Railway scandal, which related to a public act. He challenged the hon. member to point out an instance where personalities had been made use of; but he regretted the same thing could not be said of Conservatives. He did not believe that the hon. member for Terrebonne would descend to the use of abusive language, but the hon. gentleman's disposition was naturally so warm and impetuous that he was sure the hon. gentleman would regret the fact of any one exhibiting equal violence with himself in debate, if a witness of it. The tone of the hon. gentleman could be justly complained of. He admitted, what the hon. gentleman contended for, that the character of our public men should be held sacred, and defended and upheld; but this did not preclude criticism of their public acts. Discussion should not touch on the private character of individuals; but be confined absolutely to their political acts and deeds. The hon. member had criticised the construction of twenty-five miles of roadway to reach water communication, but he could not see how this was detrimental to the interests of the Province of Quebec, as this, in fact, enabled the trade of the West to be placed in direct communication with the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman pretended that the Georgian Bay Branch Railway contract had been given to Mr. Foster as a recompense for political services; but this contract had been awarded after tenders had been asked for, and after the scheme had been submitted to the House, without censure having even been called for in this regard. The hon. gentleman said they should have ascertained whether Mr. Foster was in a position to fulfil the terms of the contract; but the contractor was at the time in perfectly good circumstances, and no one doubted this, his means being unquestionable. Mr. Foster carried on large undertakings, and consequently ought to and must have been supposed capable of bringing this affair to a successful conclusion; and it was only after a survey was made and it was found that the road was not practicable, that the Government gave up the project.

Mr. LAFLAMME.

Mr. DESJARDINS: Then the contract was given before a survey was made.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that there had been a sort of general survey made. The whole Province of Quebec seemed to be interested in this railway at the time. There appeared to be no difference of opinion on the point. The Province of Quebec was anxious to see this road built, as it was in the interests of the Province to secure it. Its construction was insisted upon in this relation. It was designed in favour of the Province mentioned, and it could not have been otherwise. He would not refer to the 227 tons of rails loaned or advanced by the Government. The hon. gentleman said he knew neither the quantity or quality of the rails; and he (Mr. Masson) did not accuse the Government of bad faith, merely asserting that some negligence had occurred; and if this was the case, it was the fault of the engineers, who might have neglected their duty and instructions. No doubt these rails would be forthcoming; they would be found; security had been given for their restoration; and, if more had been taken away than was authorized, the Government was entitled to take possession of them wherever found.

Mr. DESJARDINS: Who will pay for returning them?

Mr. LAFLAMME: He who took them.

Mr. DESJARDINS: Suppose he has no money?

Mr. LAFLAMME said the hon. gentleman was fond of recalling Sir George Cartier to memory, for whom he had the greatest respect. The hon. gentleman constantly spoke of the energy shown by Sir George Cartier, and of the advantages he had secured for Quebec, as in strong contrast to what was done in these days; but the hon. member should recollect that the terminus of the Pacific Railway had been virtually brought down to the valley of the Ottawa by the Georgian Bay Branch, and by the carrying out of the system of railways and the policy of the Government, which declared that there should be a branch built from Lake Nipissing through to Ottawa. Assuredly, this was an advantage which had been secured for Quebec since the accession of the present Government. There had been no change in the policy of the Government, and no abandonment of the original idea with regard to the Georgian Bay Railway. A line selected had merely been set aside momentarily. The hon. gentleman had said that he had stated during his late election that if he did not obtain justice for Lower Canada he would resign. This was incorrect, as could easily be established by numerous witnesses. He had said that if he found that the interests of Lower Canada were not fairly considered, or that if injustice was done to the Province, he for one would not remain in the Administration. This was what he had stated, and indeed he could not have said anything else, in view of his position, having accepted office. The hon. gentleman pretended that he (Mr. Masson) represented the large majority of the electors of Quebec, but, while the hon. gentleman might represent the Conservative Party in the Province, he did not represent a member of the Liberal Party in it. The hon. gentleman declared that the Liberals should unite with the Conservatives in the defence of the interests of Quebec, and he would like to see a corresponding sentiment displayed by the Conservatives when they saw the interests of the Province at stake. The Conservatives ought to sink their party feelings and join as one man in the defence of these interests. This the hon. gentleman had preached, but had never practised. The whole theme of the hon. gentleman had been that these interests had been sacrificed in the abandonment of the Georgian Bay Branch. This was the only accusation preferred by the hon. gentleman for a space of three or four years. The hon. gentleman had said that since the hon. Mr. Dorion was in power there had been no one to defend these interests in the Cabinet.

Mr. MASSON: I did not say so.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the hon. gentleman had always denounced and abused the Hon. Mr. Dorion, rendering his political life almost insupportable, and representing to be everything that was anti-national and anti-religious. But the hon. gentleman was shown and exposed as a traitor to his nationality and an apostate to his religion. It was the system which the Conservative Party of Lower Canada had always followed and were ready to follow again. He understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Liberals could not carry any constituency in Lower Canada. The result of late elections showed the contrary. He thought he had proved that the hon. gentleman was wrong in stating that the Liberals of Quebec had been derelict in their duty in the House. The only real question which the hon. gentleman brought forward was that concerning the Georgian Bay Branch, and there could be no question that instead of a retrograde movement there had been an advance in the right direction, which would secure more substantial advantages to the Province of Quebec than were likely to be secured previous to the advent of the present Administration.

Mr. LAFLAMME.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he would take the responsibility upon himself individually of stating that the scheme of the late Administration in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway failed in a large measure owing to the action of the Liberal Party of the Province of Quebec. It was not to be expected that we would be able to carry out this great national scheme independent of outside aid; and, as it was one of the conditions of the Confederation of the Provinces that there should be this road across the country, it was the duty of every Canadian to assist the great scheme of the late Government for building this road. He would venture to say—and this matter could be discussed at the next general election—that that project was the best possible one under the circumstances. The day when the supporters of the present Administration could hurl the Pacific scandal at the heads of the Opposition had long gone by. Whatever might be the merits or demerits of that scheme, certainly the plan of the Government was no improvement on it. As to the alleged insanity of the terms with British Columbia, he had sufficient confidence in the people of that Province to believe that had the railroad been put under construction there would not have been the same discontent as existed now, even if it had not been completed within the ten years. When the late Government went out of office, and the hon. the First Minister undertook to manage the Governmental duties of this country, in an address to the electors of Lambton he promised, among other things, that the great water-stretches of the country should be utilized, and first and foremost in his proposition was the construction of a line of railway connecting the waters of the Ottawa River with those of the Georgian Bay. The people of Quebec believed that the hon. gentleman actually intended to carry out this project, and they invested largely of their means in the construction of a railway to connect the tide-water with the probable eastern terminus of this route. Although he did not agree with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) in his opposition to the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, yet he agreed with that hon. gentleman that there was no necessity for the construction of that branch at all, and that the original scheme of making the eastern terminus at the mouth of Mattawan River should have been carried out. In the scheme of the late Government there was no favouritism intended or proposed with respect to the location of the eastern terminus. The Provinces of Ontario and Quebec had equal facilities for going to that point; and it was on the motion of the hon. the Minister of Justice, then the member for Bruce, that it was decided to go to the south-eastern shore of Lake Nipissing instead of the north shore. The party of which he was a member were then obliged to take the next best thing which offered, and they accepted the declaration of the hon. the First Minister in regard to the water-stretches as a bonâ fide statement. But they found that the eastern terminus was an indefinite point—fluctuating between Renfrew and Pembroke. The people of Quebec had invested their money to build a road to connect with the Georgian Bay Branch, but they now found that that branch was a myth from its conception and was a demonstrated myth to-day. The Liberals of Lower Canada were now supporting a Government which promised that this line should be built, and so induced the people of Quebec to invest their money in the enterprise referred to, but which had broken faith in this respect. They had a right to go to the members from the Province of Quebec, whether Liberal or Conservative, and ask them to support a national enterprise. But what were the leaders of the Liberal Party of Quebec doing to-day? They saw the hon. the Postmaster-General go into the county of Argenteuil and endeavour to incite a religious war. But there were other instances of the same kind. The hon. the Minister of Justice in a speech at Aurora endeavoured to excite discord between the Provinces. Because the Province of British Columbia was a small one in its representation, and did not have a sufficient number of votes to make itself felt, this should be no reason why the moral obligations incurred with respect to it should not be carried out. If British Columbia was a disaffected Province, the Government was responsible. Instead of trying to cement the union, the hon. the Minister of Justice taunted British Columbia with being nothing but a sea of mountains. Last Session, the First Minister was appealed to as to the location of the eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway, but he would not, or could not, inform the House where it was to be. There had been a bogus survey, and a contract had been let for the terminus at Kam-inistiquia; but all the time before that had been wasted. He, and some hon. gentlemen from the same locality, supported the Government in its Georgian Bay project to a fair and independent extent, they believing that it was to the general interest of the country, but more particularly to the interest of their locality and the Ottawa Valley. He supported the project itself, but he did complain of the manner in which it had been managed and the money had been expended.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he fancied it would require stronger arguments and more cogent reasons than had been given by the hon. member for Terrebonne, to convince the large majority in the House that the Government were altogether wrong, and the Opposition altogether right, in this matter. A great deal of stress had been laid upon the fact that the project of the late Government had fallen through, owing, it was alleged, to the representations of the then Opposition. He was sure the right hon. member for

Kingston and the hon. member for Cumberland did not entertain that view. It was really impossible that gentlemen belonging to the Opposition could have this influence. He himself had never had any confidence in the project. Before Sir Hugh Allan went to England, commissioners had been in London, and had ascertained that it was impossible for the scheme to succeed, as far as raising the money to build the road was concerned, if the company was to be a private company, unless a guarantee was given by the Government. He did not know that Sir Hugh Allan was the most fitting person to undertake such a mission. This would be generally admitted by all who knew that gentleman. But, apart from that, it was impossible to make the scheme a success. English capitalists had already spent a large amount of money in Canadian enterprises without any returns, as, for instance, on the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways, and they naturally fought shy of the Pacific Railway unless it was made a Government measure, which it was not, but was only supported by the Government to a limited extent. A great deal had been said respecting the Fort Frances Locks, and much blame was thrown upon the Government for undertaking that enterprise. At the time the work was undertaken, the intention was that the railway should touch at Sturgeon's Falls, and this would give an uninterrupted stretch of 178 miles or upwards to the next point on the railway, at Rat Portage. There was a very considerable portion of that extended country fit for cultivation, and it abounded in timber, which was much required in Manitoba. He thought, however, that the road should be farther north, but it would be unwise to throw away what had been done without utilizing it for the benefit of the country. The hon. member for Terrebonne had strongly and earnestly spoken of the treatment meted out to the right hon. member for Kingston. He appeared to have forgotten that the provocation had been first given on the side of the Opposition. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had on a previous evening spoken of the connection of the hon. member for Selkirk with the Red River Transportation Company which had received a contract from the Government. It was, however, said that the hon. member for Cumberland was connected with certain works at Spring Hill and elsewhere. If that hon. member had spoken to him personally on the subject, he would have learned that he (Mr. Smith) never possessed a share in that Transportation Company; that he had never received from the Government a single sixpence from the time he entered Parliament, except what he received in common with all hon. members as an indemnity from the country, and which, as he had stated on a former occasion, he was quite as willing to forego as the hon. member for Cumberland. He therefore gave the assertion the most unqualified contradiction, and declared that he had no interest whatever in that company and had never received any money or benefit from it. Perhaps the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) might say that if he did not individually he might have done so as connected with the Hudson Bay Company. That statement would not be correct. He had not received any benefit from the Hudson Bay Company, and had had no share or interest in that company directly since 1870. His emoluments from the company were purely such as any hon. member or Minister might receive. When he went into the Far West to serve the interests of the country, although certain expenses were incurred, he wished to be so free and independent of the Government, and of any party, that he declined to receive anything whatever from the Government for any services he might have rendered. The Government had subsequently acknowledged that what he had done had been in every respect satisfactory. He would not have made those explanations had not the point been raised, but he desired the House to know that he had never received one sixpence from any member of the Government for any services whatever.

NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL.

(Mr. Macdonald, Toronto.)

THIRD READING.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said that, with the assent of the House, he would move the consideration of the amendments made in Committee to the Northern Railway Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this Bill would have been passed some time ago had not the Government refused the assent of the Crown until certain pecuniary arrangements were ascertained and agreed upon. Very large interests devolved upon the passage of the Bill this Session, and there was no time to lose.

Mr. BOWELL asked if he was to understand that the resolution placed on the Votes and Proceedings by the Finance Minister was the result of negotiations made with the company.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that this was not precisely the case. The position of affairs was this: The Government had two claims on the company for £100,000 sterling, and interest; and they proposed to insert in the Act a clause which would declare that nothing in the Act should affect the right or priority of the Government claims, except so far as the terms and conditions that might be prescribed by the Act passed during this Session were concerned. This proposition would be similar to one that had been introduced with regard to the Government lien. The resolution on which the Bill would be based would be introduced tomorrow.

Mr. LITTLE said he had a right to, and would, object to the present consideration of the Bill. It affected his constituency, and he wished to consider it more minutely.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it had been agreed that the Bill should be taken up to-day, the want of confidence motion having taken up Monday, the private members' day.

Mr. TUPPER said they were all anxious to bring the Session to a close as soon as possible; and he hoped the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Little) would withdraw his objection, under the circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was under the impression that, when the Orders of the Day were moved, this being a Government day, it would be open to the Government to permit this Bill to be taken up.

Mr. HOLTON said he thought that the hon. member for Simcoe was, perhaps, right in his point of order. When the Government Orders were exhausted, however, they could pass on to Private Bills or anything else on the Orders. It would be manifestly more convenient to deal with it then, than late at night, after the debate on the motion of want of confidence was disposed of.

Mr. BLANCHET said he thought that to take this course would establish a dangerous precedent, as, unexpectedly, Bills might be taken up in the absence of members interested in them.

Mr. SPEAKER: In May it is laid down that, when the Orders of the Day are reached, it is open to the House to take any Order in precedence of all other Orders.

Mr. BLANCHET: Except Private Bills.

Mr. LITTLE withdrew his objection. Amendments read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) moved that the Bill be read the third time.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be recommitted, with instructions to the Committee that they have power to insert the following clause:—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall in any wise affect the rank or priority of any claims now held by the Government of Canada against the said Northern Railway Company of Canada, except in so far and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by any Act passed during this Session, which shall also declare the sum to be paid by the Company in satisfaction of certain sums due to the Government of Canada prior to the issue of the bonds mentioned in Section 1 and 5 of this Act."

Motion in amendment agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Bill amended according to instructions, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, and amendment read the first and second times and agreed to.

Question put on the third reading.

Mr. OLIVER moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to the Committee that they have power of adding thereto the following:—

"Notwithstanding anything in this Act, or in The Northern Railway Company Act of 1875, contained the paragraph of the Order in Council, made on the 12th day of May, 1859, recited and confirmed by the Act of the Legislature of the late Province of Canada, passed in the 23rd year of Her Majesty's Reign, and chaptered 105, which paragraph provides as follows:—

"The Governor and Council reserve the complete control and direction of the station and other ground in the City of Toronto occupied by the said Company, as well as of the alignment and disposition of the track of the said Railway leading into and within the said City, with a view of completing such arrangements as may be deemed expedient by the Government for affecting proper connections with the other Provincial Railways in the said City."

He said there was a scheme in the west to have a complete railway communication in connection with the North Shore Railway, from the city of Quebec to the Western States, and in view of that scheme the Credit Valley Railway was being promoted. As far as he could learn from letters and telegrams received from Toronto, it was impossible for that railway to get into the city without a part of this property occupied by the Northern Railway. This land was reserved in 1860 for the purpose of promoting other railways coming into the city, but, by some ingenious Act passed in 1875, in place of reserving that power to the Governor in Council, it was re-vested in the Company. It was of vital importance, not only to their section of the country, but to the whole section from this city to Toronto, that as cheap an entrance to the city should be had for those railways as possible, and, in order to promote that end, he moved the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) called attention to this matter some time ago, and technically the hon. gentleman was right as to the question of occupying the lands in question. These lands were a part of the Ordnance Reserve which was assigned to the Railway Company, which, in other words, was permitted to occupy the water front of the reserve; and this water front they had utilised by filling it up and making their yard upon the main ground of the lake shore. At the time they were permitted to do this, there was a reserve made between the main ground and the high bank for the passage of other railways into the city. That passage he had examined since the question was discussed by the hon. member in the Railway Committee, and he found that there was a space left for four tracks going into the city. One was occupied by the Great Western and the other by the Grand Trunk. The Credit Valley Co. had, therefore, with the permission of the Dominion Government, which permission could be given in the usual way, a right to the occupancy of this track into the city. He did not think it would be reasonable to expect that the company should be allowed to pass through the yard of the Northern Railway Company, which was made at their own expense. Even if they were permitted to pass through, the privilege would be of little use to them, because they would not have space to turn into the wood; but by keeping on the track which had been reserved for other railways, they would have an entrance in a better position every way for the traffic of the road. He would, therefore, ask his hon. friend either to let his motion be lost on a division, if he desired it to go on the Journals, or else to withdraw it if he was satisfied with the explanation made. It was important they should not encumber the Bill of the Company with anything that might appear in England to be an encumbrance. The company had to raise money under the Act, to comply with the demands the House made two years ago, and for other purposes, and everything of this kind added to the Bill would have a tendency to confuse those who might look at it for the purpose of making investments.

Mr. YOUNG said this was a matter of great importance, not only to the city of Toronto but to other parts of Ontario. His first impression was that it was absolutely necessary for the promotion of the Credit Valley Company that this clause should be restored to the Bill; but the statement of the hon. the First Minister seemed to take away the difficulty. He would like to know how far, under the law as it existed, the company would be able to penetrate into the city.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he forgot the precise point, but it would be just as far as the reserve went, which, he thought, was to Brock-street. They could not, of course, go on the Esplanade, which was owned by private parties. There was power under the General Railway Act for the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to make the arrangements that were necessary for a new railway crossing the companies' tracks. Therefore, there could be no possible difficulty, as far as the reserve was concerned, and beyond that they had no jurisdiction.

Mr. OLIVER asked if the Credit Railway Company would be dealt with in regard to the right of way on the same condition as other railways were dealt with.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, of course; he did not know what the conditions were in the other cases, as he had not looked at them; but it would be apparent to every one that public policy required that all railways should be dealt with on common grounds when they occupied precisely the same position.

Mr. COOK said it was unfortunate that something could not be done to make the railways terminate at one station, as great inconvenience was caused to travellers by the stations being apart. He would suggest that if anything could be done to promote the Credit Railway Company in this respect it should be attended to.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they could not suggest a terminus for any company; that was purely a private matter.

Mr. ROBINSON said he thought the hon. member for North Oxford was mistaken in thinking that the Act of 1875, passed in the interest of the Northern Railway Company, precluded the Credit Valley Company, or any other company, from any privilege that they might have had previous to the passage of that Act. All such rights were reserved by the 4th clause of that Act. In fact the Credit Valley Company, under the law as it stood, could not be precluded from having that which the hon. member's amendment would give it.

Mr. OLIVER said with the promise just made by the hon. the First Minister, he had no hesitation in asking leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Bill read the third time and passed.

THE CAMPBELL DIVORCE BILL.

MOTION TO PLACE ON THE ORDERS.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) moved that the Bill from the Senate, entitled an Act for the Relief of Robert Campbell, be placed on the Orders of the Day for the second reading.

Mr. YOUNG said this was rather an extraordinary motion to make. He was not sufficiently well acquainted with the facts to say positively, but he had seen it stated that this matter was up before one of the Standing Committees of this House, a Committee presided over by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) who gave a great deal of attention to matters before that Committee. Unless a very strong case could be made out, the House was bound to support the decision of the Committee.

Mr. GIBBS said he had only to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great injustice had been done in the premises, to secure a favourable consideration at the hands of the House. During the Session of 1876 three petitions were presented, one to each branch of the Legislature, under the title quoted in his motion. The Committee upon Standing Orders in 1876 reported upon the sufficiency of that petition, and the Bill was introduced into the Senate during that Session. Some progress was made, and it was agreed that it should be taken up during the following Session at the precise point which the Bill had reached. The notice was deemed sufficient by the Senate to proceed with the Bill. It did not require that another petition should be presented this Session. The Bill passed through its three several readings and was sent down to this House on the evening of Friday last, when he moved that it should have its first reading. It was referred to the Committee on Standing Orders. That Committee held that there had not been sufficient notice. He thought there had been, and that under the circumstances the matter should be placed on the Order paper, and then the constitutional question might come up for discussion.

Mr. CAUCHON said, if the rules were to be violated, it was better to have no rules at all. The petition last year was from Robert Campbell for a divorce from his wife, but the present Bill was one for alimony against the husband. They were two separate matters, and both demanded notice.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said such an important matter should not be dealt with hastily. Looking at the Bill cursorily, he did not think the House had jurisdiction to deal with it. It was purely one of civil rights.

Mr. FORBES pointed out that the Bill under discussion was entirely of a different character from that for which notice had been given. The law was that notice should be given in the Gazette, and two local papers for at least six months before the meeting of Parliament. No such notice had been given, for the Bill must be regarded as totally distinct from that regarding the divorce.

Mr. RYMAL said he had the misfortune to be the Chairman of the

Mr. GIBBS.

Standing Orders Committee. Last year Robert Campbell petitioned for a divorce from his wife on the ground of adultery. By some mysterious means the counsel for Mrs. Campbell had secured the passage through the Senate of a Bill for alimony in favour of the wife and child. In order that the House might understand the proceedings in the Senate he would read a protest signed by nineteen hon. members of that body, setting forth the manner in which the Bill had been brought before them, and giving their opinion of the way in which it was managed. The protest was as follows:—

“First—Because the Bill was not presented by notice and petition, as required by the rules of the House, from Eliza Maria Campbell, in whose behalf the Bill was ultimately passed.

“Second—Because the Bill, as passed, reverses every provision in the original Bill and grants a separation from bed and board at the instance of the wife; whereas that Bill sought for a divorce a vinculo, at the instance of the husband.

“Third—Because the provision of the British North America Act conferring upon Parliament the power to deal with questions of marriage and divorce does not include the power to deal with questions of simple separation from bed and board.

“Fourth—Because questions of alimony and questions regarding the custody of children dealt with in this Bill in this instance can be heard and disposed of in each of the Provinces of the Dominion, by the ordinary tribunals of the country.

“Fifth—Because the question of alimony in this case has already been decided by a Court of competent jurisdiction in the Province where the parties reside, and that such a decision should not be overruled by an Act of Parliament.

“Sixth—Because the said Bill deals with matters which, under the British North America Act, 1867, come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures.

“Seventh—Because, even admitting the competency of this Parliament to deal with the matters affected by this Bill, the proceedings have been unusual and contrary to rules and precedent in their character, in this that no Bill was referred to Committee of the Whole, but simply the report of a Select Committee of last Session, which did not even recommend the Bill now passed to the House, but simply appended to their report the suggestion of counsel of certain proposed clauses; and in this, that the Bill passed was never submitted for a first or second reading, and, in fact, has had no such readings, and, therefore, was not in a position to be read a third time.

There never was any petition presented by Mrs. Campbell for a Bill granting alimony at the hands of her husband, and she could not avail herself of the petition of her husband for this purpose. Mr. Todd, the best authority in Canada, took this view. He had no desire to do an injustice to any party, but he had endeavoured to sustain the rules and orders of the House, and, if the House should see fit to ignore the rules and precedents which should guide it, let it not be said that the Standing Orders Committee had failed to do their duty, let it not be said by hon. gentlemen opposite that, in doing their duty, they had endeavoured to do a gross injustice to a suffering woman. The law was open to her; let her apply to the Courts if she had been wronged, and, if she obtained no relief, let her present a petition and bring a Bill before the House in a proper and regular manner.

Mr. SPEAKER said the motion was virtually a motion to override the decision of the Standing Orders Committee, and also to suspend the operation of the order under which they professed to have acted. Of course, if the resolution were adopted, it would set aside the report of the Standing Orders Committee and, impliedly, the Orders of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE asked if such a proceeding would be in order without notice, for it would require the suspension of the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER said it would be setting the rules at naught rather than suspending them.

Mr. BLAIN said there was no intention on the part of hon. members to criticize too strongly the action of the Committee, which was not the point before the House. The question was whether the House should consider the motion submitted by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs). Now, he (Mr. Blain) contended that, when hon. members examined the reasons why the House had Standing Orders and adopted rules, they would find that they did not apply to the present case. The object for which it was provided that notices should be published was that parties who might be interested in opposing proposed legislation might have the opportunity of appearing before the House, in order to protect their rights. In this case, that reason for the rule did not apply. The gentleman specially interested in opposing the Bill had been before the Senate during the whole time the proceedings had been going on, and, both last Session and this Session, he had been supporting his own case, and opposing the case now presented by the wife. When both the parties interested in the legislation proposed had been before Parliament, it would be a waste of time and money to compel the wife to give notice. Under those circumstances, the House might fairly have followed the course it pursued the other day, when the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) was permitted to introduce a Bill, though every rule of the House had to be violated. He was not speaking of the merits of the case, but, as there was no reason why the Standing Orders should be strictly adhered to in the present case, he thought the House should adopt the motion of the hon. member for South Ontario, and consider the case on its merits.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said the only question that could be brought before the House without notice was a question of privilege; but such was not the present proceeding.

Mr. SPEAKER said the rule did not apply to Bills after they had been introduced.

Mr. CAMERON said he had seconded the motion because, after considering the matter, he had come to the conclusion that it was right it should be passed. The House should not dispose of it on a technicality, and the reasons given by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) were sufficient to show that it would be so disposed of if the Bill were thrown out. The whole reason for the rule regarding notice was that the parties concerned should be made aware of the legislation proposed. There were only two parties interested in the present legislation—Mr. and Mrs. Campbell. Mr. Campbell himself gave notice of a particular Bill, and the Bill remained the same Bill, though its contents had been altered.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. CAMERON said the Bill remained the same Bill, as the title remained, and the proceedings were, in fact, continued. Surely, when both the parties were before the House, when they had both been before the other House, where the matter was fully discussed, and when the Bill came down from the other branch of the Legislature, it should not be rejected on a technicality. He pronounced no opinion on the principle involved in the proceeding, which was one of great importance and should be discussed. The Bill was the same as that for which notice had been given last Session. The Senate had altered its terms, but it was not for the House at that preliminary stage to consider whether the alterations made by the Senate were proper or improper. The proceedings had been kept alive, and the Bill which was introduced last Session was now sent down to the House by the Upper Chamber, and as both parties were at hand, they should be heard upon it. The question had been fought out with great bitterness in the other House, and, as so much money had been expended, the House should dispose of it on its merits, and, when the Bill came before them, the question could be discussed as to whether Parliament possessed the power the Bill sought to confer on it, and whether it could exercise that power.

Mr. SPEAKER,

Mr. SPEAKER asked that the question should be allowed to remain over until to-morrow, in order that he might have a fuller opportunity to consult Parliamentary law on the points raised.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario), consented.

Motion postponed.

THE SEAT FOR RESTIGOUCHE.

MOTION TO TAKE EVIDENCE ON OATH.

Mr. IRVING moved:

“That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom it has been referred to enquire into, and report upon the allegations of Mr. George William Ross, a Member of this House, made in his place, on the 23rd instant, that George Moffat, a Member of this House for the Electoral District of the County of Restigouche, had entered into a certain contract or contracts, or agreement or agreements with the Department of Public Works, and for the service thereunder, public moneys of Canada were paid to him, and to report whether the said George Moffat has vacated his seat, should be examined on oath.”

ORDNANCE AND ADMIRALTY LANDS BILL.—[BILL No. 111.]

(Mr. Mills.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 111) Respecting Ordnance and Admiralty Lands in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

(In the Committee.)

In reply to Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,

Mr. MILLS said he had no objection to insert a provision in the Bill providing that lands should be sold by auction. There were, however, cases in which such mode of sale could not be adopted. For example, an island in Shelburne Harbour, an acre in extent, was leased to a shipbuilder for thirty shillings per annum. He had established extensive shipbuilding works there, worth from $8,000 to $10,000. In such a case, he did not perceive how they could sell the property by auction when the improvements were worth ten times the value of the land. The proper course to adopt under such circumstances was to appoint competent persons to ascertain the actual value of the property, and deal with them in the same way as settlers and squatters on public lands were dealt with. In fact, it was decided that they should deal with these persons as settlers or squatters on public lands. The Chief Clerk of the Ordnance Department had assured him—he had not had time to look into the matter—that they were under obligations to the Imperial Government to respect these parties' rights, and give them the opportunity of becoming first purchasers. Under these circumstances, he could not well see how they could insert a clause in the Bill applying universally the principle of sale by auction. He thought that this rule should be generally adopted, but, in consequence of the obligations incidentally connected with the possession of the property, he did not think that it could be universally followed. There must be exceptions. He believed that it would be more convenient and better not to undertake to make any such provision, save as to reporting each year the amount realized on the value of such property and the amount realized on the sales by public action. The public interests would thus be protected. If any amendment could be suggested preventing the difficulties he had mentioned, he would have no objection to it, but he thought that the Bill, as it stood, would be more convenient and more easy to administer while it would be quite as safe as the other plan proposed.

Mr. MITCHELL said he could not perceive any practical difficulty in the objections of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills). As to the island valued at from $300 to $600, and on which improvements had been made, the rights of the occupant would be protected under the proposition of the right hon. member from Kingston. A valuation of the improvements could be made, and the property could be sold by public auction, subject to the improvements and the valuation. The object of sale by public auction was, he took it, to prevent corruption or the suspicion of it. This had been the policy of the late and present Administration; and should be adopted in all these transactions, to prevent disputes in Parliament, and before Committees, embarrassing public men and individual members of Cabinets, laying them open to charges of all kinds, which in the majority of cases would have no foundation whatever. Room should not be left in this relation for suspicion of partiality or favouritism.

Mr. MILLS: I will put a case to the hon. gentleman. He knows that there are hundreds of tenants in this city on Ordnance property. Would he say that these tenants should be required to compete by public auction with others for the continued possession of such property?

Mr. MITCHELL said he was not prepared to say it would not be right, under such circumstances, to act so, the previous valuation of improvements being added to the cost of the land. If a party made improvements on public property, either under a lease or squatter's right, and the Government desired to sell it, let them value the improvements and sell the property subject to such improvements; and, if the party in question was not the purchaser, let him be paid for the value of these improvements. There was no difficulty in thus settling the question. It was not desirable that opportunity should be afforded for bringing charges of favouritism or partiality.

Mr. MILLS said there were instances of leases being given for an indefinite period of time, to continue until the Imperial Government wished to resume possession for actual military occupation. The holders of these leases would be perfectly willing to buy at a valuation, but they were not willing to abandon leases and have simply a chance of bidding against others. In one case they received thirty shillings a year rental, and the property was worth, he dared say, $600. Selling by auction was the easiest way and the least responsible for Ministers; but he did not think that it would be the fairest way in some instances. He did not desire to sell otherwise than by auction, save in the two cases mentioned: when property was not of sufficient value to render it worth while to advertise, and where certain rights arose from occupation and the making of extensive improvements which might be of very great value to occupants, though of much less value to any other persons. They ought to keep faith with the Imperial Government as to the terms on which possession was taken of this property; but they ought not to do injustice to parties who had been possessed of properties for forty or fifty years, compelling them to pay something more than the actual value for property which rightfully belonged to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. gentleman agreed with the general principle that such property should be sold by auction. This was advisable on every ground. In the first place, because it relieved the Government from all responsibility; and, in the next place, because it relieved the Colonial Government from any responsibility with regard to the Imperial Government. The Colonial Government was under a distinct pledge to the Imperial Government to sell Ordnance lands at the highest price; and whether the property brought at auction £5 or £500, this was an answer both to Parliament here and to the Imperial Government, reasonable notice having been given of such intention.

Mr. MILLS: You did not do so with regard to the land in the City of Ottawa.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said sometimes they had sold by auction and sometimes they had not done so; but the principle on which they were governed in putting Ordnance property on the market was to sell it at the highest price. Then they had the public domain of the old Province of Canada on their hands as well as the Ordnance property, and, with respect to the former, the Government had had considerable latitude under which parties might be favoured under particular circumstances as a matter of general policy. It would be infinitely better on every account that for the future these lands should be offered to public competition by auction; and if this was the general principle, he did not see how one or two isolated cases should interfere at all with the general policy. As to the island, the answer was—do not sell it at all. And, if a person held a long lease, there was no necessity for selling the property at all. The Government might be supposed to be perpetually in existence. The British Government now held leases running from the time of Henry the Eighth and Queen Elizabeth. The nation was going to last for ever, and the property was always increasing in value. The hon. gentleman wished to sell a property on which $1 was paid a year for the sake of obtaining $600, and for such a purpose he would interfere with the general principle which the hon. gentleman himself admitted was correct, but there was no need to sell these properties.

Mr. MILLS: I only gave that as an illustration. I do not know how many such cases exist, but I know that there are a great many of them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think that there were a great many such cases. He did not think that the hon. gentleman was so well informed as himself on this point. He did not believe that many long-term leases existed, but, if this was the case, they should be allowed to lapse. They should deprive no man of his rights, and commit no breach of faith with the Imperial Government. Properties of small value could be advertised together at a slight expense. There was no necessity for getting rid of these properties. The Ordnance Department was not pressed by creditors and compelled to sell these properties at a sacrifice. He hoped that the hon. gentleman would insert in the Bill a clause stating that these properties should be offered at public auction, and they might depend upon it that the hon. gentleman would find it to his comfort and satisfaction, and that of the Government of the country, to do so.

Mr. MILLS said he had no objection to the insertion of such a clause so long as it did not interfere with any of their obligations.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there were cases in which the Provincial Government desired to obtain possession of public lands for public purposes. The Government of Quebec, for instance, wished to secure certain lands, and this was not only of importance to that Government, but it actually also added a great deal to the value of their own property across the Seigniory Road. It was only right to sell in such cases at a valuation. Other land had been sold at Kingston for the purposes of a Normal School, and it would be very hard if these lands could not be sold to the Provincial Governments at a reasonable valuation, especially as these Governments often transferred lands required by this Government at no cost whatever. If anything was added, they should make that exception also.

Mr. BLANCHET said he did not suppose that, in the case of a municipal corporation requiring land for public purposes, they would be subject to public competition.

Mr. MACKENZIE said municipal corporations would stand in the same position as individuals.

Mr. BLANCHET: How did the corporation of the City of Quebec obtain their land?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think we agreed to lease certain portions to the corporation of Quebec.

Mr. BLANCHET: I presume the same thing could be done in the case of other corporations.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Logan Farm was leased to the city of Montreal for a term of years with certain provisions, and St. Helen's Island, which they did not intend to sell, was leased at pleasure to the corporation for park purposes.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he called attention the other day to the necessity of introducing an amendment to the Bill, to the effect that Parliamentary sanction should be obtained before the lands were disposed. This was important, in view of the fact that the lands were not classified, and he understood the hon. the Minister of Justice was favourable to the insertion of such a clause. Did the hon. the Minister of the Interior intend to submit such an amendment?

Mr. MILLS said he did not think it advisable to propose an amendment of that kind. There were certain properties which it would be highly improper for the Government to dispose of; but it was equally obvious that there were many other lands, which were transferred by this Bill from the Minister of War to the Crown, that they should have the power to sell at the most favourable opportunity, which might occur before Parliament met again. At this moment there were no means of classifying the lands, but the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) knew right well on what principle they would be classified. Any lands necessary for military purposes would be retained, and the hon. gentleman should trust to the common sense and good faith of the Government in reference to this matter, for they would not sell any property that might be necessary for the defence of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Defence Commission and, subsequently, in 1865, Col. Jarvis made confidential reports to the Government in regard to the lands necessary for fortification; and the hon. gentlemen (Mr. Mills) might obtain information to assist him in the classification from those reports.

Mr. MACKENZIE said Col. Jarvis's last report pointed out property required for defensive purposes which did not belong to the Government.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 120.]

(Mr. Mills.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. MILLS said he proposed to substitute a new clause for the 16th clause of the Indian Act of 1876. That clause provided for the punishment of trespassers on Indian lands, but it did not provide for the way in which it was to be done—it did not authorize the taking of the offender before any competent authority. He purposed to repeal this section and to substitute one in its place, the same as the other, except that it provided for the offender to be taken before a Stipendiary Magistrate, a Police Magistrate, or a Justice for his trial. He proposed to amend the 17th section by extending several provisions. He also purposed to amend the 69th section, relating to the purchase of Government presents from Indians. It was found that agricultural implements, waggons, horses, &c., given to Indians, were sold, and, as the persons buying often went some distance away, the Indians could not reclaim the property. The amended section, therefore, would provide that the Superintendent-General or his deputies would have power to take possession of the property so illegally bought from the Indians, and to hold it as Government property. He had also added several suggestions of the agent in British Columbia, which would render less expensive some of the arrangements of the Department.

Mr. HOLTON said he regretted very much that his hon. friend had not found it convenient to introduce the Bill at an earlier stage of the Session. He did not know that he would oppose the Bill, but there had not been time to examine into it, although it might have a very important bearing upon counties adjacent to Indian Reserves, such as his own county.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD enquired why the Bill had not been introduced before.

Mr. MILLS said he could not do so. There was nothing new in the Bill, except in the way he had indicated.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. HOLTON suggested that the hon. member for Charlevoix, who was familiar with Indian affairs, should express his opinion.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he must say that he had had very little time to look over the Bill. He had, however, read it over twice. His experience of the Indian Department was that a great deal of forbearance was required, both on the part of the officers and of private individuals. If the law was made very strict, it would cause bitterness. There was much difficulty in deciding who actually were Indians, as the races were getting mixed. He thought too much power was given to the deputies of the Superintendent-General.

Mr. MILLS: That power is in the present Bill. I have not increased that.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he had objected to some of the clauses of the Bill before. The present amendments were intended to make its provisions more stringent. On the other hand, he admitted, with the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), that it was very late in the season to amend that law. Last Session they had understood that it was so amended, and that two or three years would elapse before they would have to amend it again. These were very important amendments, and they did not affect only the Indians, but the white men.

Mr. HOLTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that anyone might violate this law by going on land without knowing that it was Indian land. He did not think the Bill should pass in its present form, and he suggested that it would be better to allow it to stand over until next Session.

Mr. MILLS said the only change made was that the Government took the means of enforcing the law. Every word and syllable of the provisions to which the hon. gentleman had taken exception was in the Bill last year, and in the Acts of former years, the Acts from which the Act of last Session was consolidated; and the provisions of this Act with regard to penalties for trespass were not different, were not more severe, were not indeed so severe, as the original penalties for trespass, which might be enforced by one white man against another. It, therefore, seemed to him very extraordinary that the hon. gentleman should have attacked the Bill. It proposed merely to provide machinery for enforcing the law. The appointment of a person to see the law enforced was no novel provision. If they were to enfranchise the Indians it would be a different matter, but the law assumed the Indian population to be incompetent to deal with their property, and, if the Government acted as guardians or trustees for them, it would be inconsistent to say that no person should be appointed to see that this law should be enforced.

Mr. PATERSON said he did not see any objection to this section. The penalties were all in the Act as it was at present, and the provision was only to enforce it.

Bill read the second time.

AUDITING PUBLIC ACCOUNTS BILL.—[BILL No. 118.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that during the present Session the House would remember that the hon. member for Cumberland had directed attention, on two or three occasions, to two things:—First, the difficulty of getting an idea of the state of public business from the public returns; and, second, by the Act passed last Session authorizing the Government practically to extend the term for the use of appropriations by Orders in Council, for three months, sanctioning by law what was done formerly by virtue of Orders in Council; and he was not prepared to deny that there was much force in the hon. gentleman's observations respecting the desirability of an amendment of this law. There was another matter of very considerable importance to which attention had been strongly called during the last two or three years. Very great inconvenience had been experienced as matters now stood, owing to the circumstance that the financial year terminated in the centre of two working seasons. It was a matter of very considerable difficulty at a distance of eighteen months to produce accurate Estimates, particularly for such Departments as those of Public Works, Marine and Fisheries and the Interior; and these difficulties had been very seriously aggravated by the great increase in their territory which had taken place during the last three or four years. Moreover, since the practice of their meeting very early in the year, in February, and perhaps earlier occasionally, had sprung up, considerable difficulties had arisen in the proper preparation of the Public Accounts; despite all the zeal and diligence the officers of the Department could use, they found it barely possible to get the accounts in readiness to lay on the table when the House met; and it was scarcely possible, with all their diligence, for Ministers to have a sufficient length of time to become acquainted with them. Some confusion had occasionally arisen in consequence, and he was afraid that this confusion would tend to increase in the future. In former years, this was by no manner of means the case, because, as the House was aware, the average time for the meeting of Parliament was usually in March or April. With a view to remedying these defects he proposed to change the financial year so as to assimilate the period for the closing of their accounts with the period at which the accounts in Great Britain were closed, and this was about the 31st of March.

Mr. HOLTON: It is the 5th of April, their quarter day.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he knew it was somewhere in that neighbourhood. He also found that the American authorities, in some of their reports, earnestly recommended Congress, for precisely the same reasons he had mentioned, to change the financial year.

The only serious objection he could see to it was that it would, no doubt, deprive the House of a certain class of information for the period of some three months; but, on the other hand, he thought that the House would gain, on the average, five or six weeks in the average period at which it was possible for them to be summoned together, with due regard to the advancement of the public business. He further proposed to introduce in the Bill a provision for a statement to be submitted to Parliament, showing the receipts and expenditure under the several heads of revenue and service, to the last day inclusive of the month of December, March, June or September, as the case might be, immediately preceding each Session. This statement would show the several appropriations for each service, the expenditure and the balance available. The hon. member for Cumberland had called his attention to the fact, and the hon. gentleman was quite correct, that, were this Act passed, it would no longer be necessary to preserve on the Statute-book the Act passed last Session empowering the Government to extend for three months the time at which appropriations closed; and he proposed to repeal this Act if the Bill he was about to introduce was passed. The hon. gentleman had also spoken of another amendment to keep up the accounts, for the purpose of comparison, to the 1st day of July in each year. This was an amendment in which he would cheerfully concur; and, if the hon. gentleman had not prepared it, he would like to add a few words in the form of a sub-section to the third clause, by which this object would be obtained. The delay in introducing the Bill had been occasioned by certain difficulties in detail arising in his own Department, and these required to be surmounted before he could come down with any such proposition. Any inconvenience that would arise would fall necessarily on his own Department and his principal officers, who, after discussing the matter, had cheerfully acquiesced in the desirability of undertaking the trouble which this alteration would give them, as it would relieve them from certain work at the expiration of the present financial year. He begged, with these remarks, to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. HOLTON said he was not prepared to state that the change proposed might not be useful or not called for by the changed circumstances of the country, especially in consideration of the great territorial extension that had taken place during the last few years. He had been himself mainly instrumental in bringing about the change in the termination of the fiscal year from December 31st to the 30th of June, which was not done without very grave consideration. It was then felt that the governing circumstance in the Estimates for this country was the harvest. The 30th of June was the period of the realization of one harvest, and in advance of the reaping of the ensuing one. The returns, therefore, were made up to the time when the product of one harvest was completely exhausted, and when the Estimates for the future year were necessarily based upon the results of the preceding harvest. They found that, when the Public Accounts were made up to the 31st of December before Parliament met—and this was not usually in March or April under the old system, but towards the end of February or early in March—it was impossible to get them ready in time to lay before Parliament and assist in its deliberations during the Session. It was thought that by going back to the 30th June there would be no difficulty in having the Public Accounts and departmental reports ready to be laid before Parliament when it assembled. He believed that they had succeeded in this; but they had, on the other hand, strongly felt the inconvenience of voting the appropriations so far ahead as was done under the present system. One result of the change proposed was to cause the Estimates to be voted still further ahead. Then if they met in February or March, they would vote the Estimates, not for the immediately ensuing financial year, but for the year following.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No.

MR. HOLTON: Oh, yes; necessarily so. Just as they were now voting the Estimates for the financial year 1877-8, so, in the month of March, if the change was in operation, they would vote the Estimates so much further ahead.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No.

Mr. HOLTON: Undoubtedly, it would be so.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Not at all. I do not at all intend that; but that in every case the House will vote the Estimates to March in the succeeding year, instead of July of the succeeding year, as is now in case.

Mr. HOLTON asked how was this to be brought about. The Estimates would terminate on the 31st of March, and they must vote a year ahead or spend money without the sanction of Parliament. In the United States, it must be remembered, Congress did not rise until August—not in April—and they had ample time there to consider the Public Accounts and Estimates and everything connected therewith for the current year. He did not object to the change. It might be useful. There were important considerations in favour of it. He was simply pointing out the inconveniences which he thought might flow from it; and these were sufficiently grave possibly to cause them to pause in the adoption of this proposed plan. He desired to point out another result which would inevitably flow from the change, and it was that which occurred in consequence of the change made in the old system in 1864. This rendered it next to impossible for two or three years to get fairly into the new groove and make any comparison between the revenue without a degree of labour for which few had sufficient leisure, or any accurate comparison between the expenditure and revenue for the year in question, and the preceding year or two. It would introduce a great deal of confusion of that kind, but he did not say that this was any reason why the change should not be made. This would be an incidental inconvenience. He thought it very much to be regretted that this Bill which, although short, was really very important, had not been introduced at an earlier period, in order that they might duly consider the somewhat important consequences which its adoption would create.

Mr. TUPPER said that, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) was right as to what the effect of the Bill would be, it would become a very serious matter for the Minister of Finance to consider whether he should proceed with the measure or not. The Minister of Finance had kindly communicated to him his reasons for introducing the Bill, and he had frankly stated that he approved of them to a large extent. He felt that they would involve the necessity of an earlier meeting of Parliament, which, instead of being an objection, he would consider a great advantage. He was satisfied that every hon. member would be glad to exchange the present fortnight for the fortnight which preceded the opening of the present Session. The natural time for the meeting of Parliament he was sure would be found to be as early in January as business arrangements would admit of. If the hon. member for Chateauguay was right in assuming that, instead of being able to make their calculations more final as to the end of the current year, under the change proposed—and the Minister of Finance evidently aimed at this—they would have to calculate for a still farther year ahead, in order to have the means of meeting the exigencies of the country without spending money without the authority of Parliament, he was quite sure that the Minister of Finance would feel that he could not proceed with this Bill. It was not desirable to enable the Governor in Council to carry over lapsed balances, as it prevented the House having that stringent supervision over the appropriations that was intended. This year he supposed that something like half a million had thus been placed at the disposal of the Government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) said that he was willing to repeal the Act touching lapsed balances and provide a clause for the preparation of a comparative statement at the end of the fiscal year, and, if this was done, and if the hon. gentleman found that he could effect the object he intended, he (Mr. Tupper) did not think there would be any objection to the change proposed. The hon. member for Chateauguay had called attention to the very natural and substantial reasons which had led Parliament to alter the old system, causing the fiscal year to terminate when the people had realized the result of one harvest, and before another came in. He did not himself see the great force of this objection, and he would tell the hon. gentleman why. They had all the means of knowing what the last harvest was, and what the effect upon the revenue would be.

Mr. HOLTON said that point resolved itself into the other.

Mr. TUPPER said he quite agreed with that. He thought the Bill, however, failed to accomplish the object of the Government, and therefore would have to be abandoned. He would say a single word as to the returns in the Gazette. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright), at page 690 of Hansard, 1876, said that this was a subject of careful consideration, and on that occasion he gave the strongest possible assurance to the House that the mistakes would be remedied, and care taken that they should not occur in the future. From what had fallen from the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) it was evident the hon. the Minister of Finance would have to give careful consideration to the point, for unless he met that objection the objects sought by the measure could not be attained. The comparative estimate was of the utmost value. It had a party as well as a political value, and that very fact made it of value to the country, because it led to a careful comparison year by year of the expenditure of the Government. It was not only of value in arriving at certain conclusions, but it had a salutary effect on anything like undue expenditure. He did not see any difficulty in the way of making that comparative statement. It would occasion some labour, but with some additional labour it would be possible to prepare a statement to show the expenditures of different years.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he fully appreciated the remarks made by the hon. members for Chateauguay and Cumberland (Messrs. Holton and Tupper). With respect to what the former had said, he would state, as indeed he had intimated to the House, that one of the principal objects they had in view was to enable Parliament to meet earlier in the year. That was a point to which the House would attach great importance, and which he thought commended itself to the good judgment of all. He took especial care to consult the principal officers of his Department on the identical point raised by the hon. member for Chateauguay, and they were of opinion that there would be no necessity whatever to provide Estimates for more than one year. As far as he could judge of that matter, which was somewhat a matter of detail, he thought the officials were in the right in this. He thought they could do so. Of course he quite agreed that, if it were necessary, if, instead of reducing the Estimates they were extended over 24 months, the main object he had in view, which was to diminish the inaccuracies which existed at present, and would continue to exist, and which he always felt as rather a reflection on our business system, would be accomplished. He entirely agreed with what had fallen from both hon. gentlemen as to the importance of preserving those comparative statements, and he proposed to submit an amendment which he thought would cover all that was desired, and provide for the continuance of the comparative statements for at least the next three years.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had listened attentively to the arguments which had been advanced in relation to the measure, and he could see no reason whatever for the change. He did not see why the hon. the Finance Minister should desire to disarrange and disorganize the existing system of the Public Accounts. If the desire was for Parliament to meet a few weeks earlier in the year, he thought that could be accomplished without such a violent change in our system of public accounts. As no satisfactory reason had been given for the Bill, he would oppose it. The comparative statements, for which he saw no provision, were of the utmost importance to the House and to the country.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CARTWRIGHT submitted a new subsection providing for a comparative statement.

Mr. MITCHELL said, as this met one of his main objections to the measure, he would withdraw his objection to the Bill, but he still saw no good reason for its introduction.

INSPECTION OF GAS AND GAS METERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 92.]

(Mr Laflamme.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. LAFLAMME said since the introduction of this Bill a great many recommendations had been made by almost all the parties concerned in the manufacture of gas, which required some consideration. They all urged strong reasons for not enforcing the propositions of the Bill, and, after reflection, he had come to the conclusion that it would be advisable to take more time to consider the objections made, and he would, therefore, move that the order be discharged.

Mr. TUPPER said he was exceedingly glad that the Minister of Inland Revenue had decided to withdraw the Bill. In the re-preparation, it would be necessary to consider whether it would not be advisable to make a very considerable reduction in the charges for inspection, which would come very hard upon small companies. The provision as to the abstraction of sulphur from the gas, also, would require some amendment, as the process was enormously costly. Indeed, he knew of only one place where this was done, at London, although the presence of sulphur in gas was very injurious.

Mr. MITCHELL congratulated the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue upon deferring to public opinion in withdrawing the Bill.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Mr. Tupper in amendment, read.

Mr. DYMOND said, at the adjournment of the debate last evening, an hon. member had suggested that the remaining speeches delivered during the present debate should be vigorous but brief. He could not engage that his speech would be vigorous, but he would guarantee that it would not be so long as at least two of the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, and he would endeavour to avoid, to a considerable extent, the diffusiveness and discursiveness by which both those deliverances were characterized. It was a misfortune that the House should be discussing this great measure of public policy in the last moments of the Session. It was also, he ventured to think, a misfortune that they should be discussing it on a resolution which was in the nature of a vote of want of confidence in the Government of the day, because on such an occasion it was impossible to exclude party asperities, and reference to many collateral issues which perhaps diverted attention from the subject to which their attention ought to be most particularly directed. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) opened his speech by complaining of the tone in which the two leaders of the Opposition had been assailed by the hon. leader of the Government. The hon. member made a passing reference to certain historical incidents which must have been painful to all who were implicated in them. They certainly were painful to those who were engaged in tracking out the offence; and they ought to be hardly less painful to the offenders. The hon. member might really have left the task of making that protest to the right hon. gentleman who led the Opposition, and who, in his speeches last year, not only defended, but to a certain extent exulted over, that melancholy affair. He might have left it to the hon. member for Cumberland, who pronounced a sort of unctious benediction whenever he alluded to the subject, and declared that whatever was done was done "with patriotic motives," or he might have left it to the hon. member for Charlevoix, who, when he looked back to his recent election experience and forward to the general election which could not be very far off, must certainly feel a deep tinge of melancholy when he recollected that there was no public contractor from whom he could receive $32,600.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Big Push.

Mr. DYMOND said hon. members called "Big Push;"—there was never a smaller "Big Push" than the "Big Push" that was in their minds. Hon. members should understand that this was a subject which should be discussed with a little seriousness. The speech of the hon. member for Cumberland was one to which his friends, and especially the hon. member for Terbonne, alluded with a great deal of praise. That, no doubt, was occasioned by the fact that it did compare very favourably with many of the hon. gentleman's utterances. It was not so violent as some of them. His statements were not so exaggerated, and he was more careful in many respects to keep to literal facts. He was good enough again and again to assert that all he was saying was spoken with the most benevolent intentions, and that assurance must be regarded as expressing his own sincere conviction that, in his four and a half or five hours' speech, he was really desirous of doing some good to hon. members on the Ministerial benches. But, unfortunately, one was bound to admit that his efforts were marred by the fact that, even in that much commended speech, he fell into some of his old habits. He was good enough to say that he would ask the hon. member for North York whether, even in his opinion, a statement he made was not sufficient ground for the censure which he desired to pass upon the Government of the day. If, in a Court of criminal justice, an item of evidence, however small, was admitted by the Judge which he ought to reject, the consequences might be the quashing of the verdict. There was an old Latin adage too, which meant that, when one incorrect statement was made, it vitiated the whole story. Now one statement made by the member for Cumberland referred to the steel rails transaction. The hon. member for Cumberland stated that the First Minister, in that transaction, lost to this country $175,000 per annum. It was known, however, from the admission honourably and frankly made by the hon. gentleman the following day, that he was only out in his reckoning $100,000, representing a capital sum of $2,000,000. Suppose the House had taken a vote on the first evening of the debate, and they had voted with the hon. member in consequence of that statement, what a predicament they would be in with their constituents the following day. Another statement made by the hon. gentleman was that there was 43 days' difference between the seasons at Prince Arthur's Landing and the new terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the neighbourhood of Thunder Bay. It turned out that these forty-three days related not to a place only four or five miles distant from Prince Arthur's Landing, but to a district 200 miles away. Then the hon. gentleman seizing hold of a paper before him declared that in 1873 the immigration to Canada was 310,000 souls. That wonderful discovery was arrived at by merely adding a cipher, but it might have had the most serious consequences, as he had already pointed out. Then the hon. member declared that no engineer had been employed at the inception of the undertaking known as the Fort Frances Locks, and he spoke rather disparagingly of Mr. Hugh Sutherland, the Superintendent. He (Mr. Dymond) happened to know Mr. Sutherland, and he would take this opportunity of saying that he was one of the most faithful and intelligent public servants in the Dominion; and the hon. gentleman could not do better, if he wanted to make himself acquainted with the public works of the North-West, than place himself under Mr. Sutherland as a pupil for one or two hours. It turned out, however, from the papers which the hon. gentleman held in his hand, that there actually was a resident engineer there as well as Mr. Sutherland. The hon. gentleman next took up the question of the iron rails formerly belonging to Mr. Foster, and he quoted the evidence of one Mr. Musson, as also had the hon. member for Terrebonne. He (Mr. Dymond) would like to give the House the benefit of this evidence which was to imperil the existence of the Government. Mr. Musson was examined by the hon. member for Frontenac, who would admit himself, if he were in his place, that Mr. Musson was one of the most troublesome witnesses he had ever come across. His evidence was as follows:—

By Mr. Kirpatrick:—

“Do you know anything of the value of rails—the market price of rails about that time, or any time; do you keep posted as to the value?—I just have a general knowledge of it.

“Do you know what was the value of rails about September, 1875?—I should say they were worth between thirty and thirty-five dollars per ton in Montreal; that is a matter of recollection and opinion.

By Hon. Mr. Mackenzie:—

“On what do you form that opinion?—I don't recollect.

“Is it your recollection of some sales?—I knew of one sale.

“Who to?—It was to a road; I don't remember the road; I was told of the sale.

“Who told you of the sale?—I don't know who it was.

“You don't remember who it was made the sale?—No.

“You don't remember who it was bought the rails?—I was told that it was a road down in Lower Canada.

“You don't know who the buyer or the seller was?—No.

“Do you know anything at all yourself about the value of rails?—Simply from hearing quotations.

“Where did you see them?—In the papers from time to time.

“Did you see that quotation in the papers—thirty to thirty-five dollars?—I don't remember.

“Do you believe you did see it in the papers?—I remember that was about the price of iron at that time.

“The fact is you knew nothing about it?—I knew about it at the time, but I do not consider the opinion worth anything; it is simply recollection.”

Then the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) broke in and asked some questions on a subject with which he was exceedingly familiar. He wanted to test the knowledge of the witnesses as to the quality of the rails:—

By Mr. Domville:—

“When you broke those rails, what did you see inside; were they crystals—large crystals or small crystals, or small fibre, or what?—What I think is they were not good iron, whether it was in the rolling or quality I cannot say.

“You have seen a piece of pig iron broken? Yes.

“You know how it looks when it is broken?—Yes.

“Did the rail look anything like that?—I should say it did.

“Would it be a greyish colour?—It is rather hard for me to recollect what the break looked like.”

Then came Mr. Mackenzie again:—

By Hon. Mr. Mackenzie:—

“I suppose you have no technical knowledge of the manufacture?—No; no practical knowledge.

“That is not what I mean; have you any knowledge of the foundry business?—No.”

So the man who was called to tell the Committee what was the value of iron rails at a particular time could not say more than that he had heard the price; he could not remember when the transaction had taken place; he could not tell where; and, when asked to show that he had taken some trouble to examine the fractures in the rails in order that he might form an opinion as to the character of the material of which they were composed, he was just as ignorant as about the price of them. That was the sort of evidence on which the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) wished to turn out the Government of the Dominion, and place himself and his friends on the Treasury benches. He now came to the last statement—or rather misstatement—of the hon. member for Cumberland, which he would notice. He was sure the hon. gentleman would take the earliest opportunity to make the amende to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith). The hon. member for Cumberland had charged that

hon. gentleman with being a member of the firm of Kittson & Co., who had received $200,000 for carrying steel rails and other material for the Government.

Mr. TUPPER said he desired to ask the permission of the House to make a statement in respect to the subject referred to by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond). He would take that opportunity to state that the hon. member misrepresented him when he said that he (Mr. Tupper) asserted that such was the case with respect to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith). He (Mr. Tupper) made no such assertion. In the course of his remarks on the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he stated to the House that there was a rumour that the hon. member for Selkirk was a partner, and a large partner, in the transportation company that had been employed for the purpose of transporting nearly 13,000 tons of rails from Duluth to Winnipeg; and he stated, further, that, if that rumour was well founded, that the hon. member for Selkirk, a member of this House, was a member of that firm, and it had received that large contract amounting to something above $200,000 without tender, he thought the circumstances demanded the attention of the House. The hon. member for Selkirk would do him the credit to say that he indulged in no insinuation which the hon. member had not an opportunity of frankly dealing with. The House had heard the statement made last night by the hon. member that there was no foundation whatever for the statement he had made and the rumour to which he had alluded. He was prepared to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman in the most unqualified manner; he was quite sure the hon. member would not have stated to the House, as he had done, that he was not interested to the extent of a single dollar in the company if such was not literally and actually the fact, and the hon. gentleman was deeply indebted to him (Mr. Tupper) for having given him an opportunity to make that statement. His (Mr. Tupper's) statement was made on the authority of an hon. member who came from the same district as the hon. member for Selkirk—he referred to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz). He would show the hon. member for Selkirk, who had said he might have referred to him personally, that no personal or private communication would have accomplished the hon. gentleman's object. He accepted the hon. member's statement; but he was bound to give him the grounds on which he (Mr. Tupper) made that statement. He had stated he had the authority of a member of this House for the statement, and, moreover, he believed there was not an hon. member on that side of the House who did not believe the statement to have been precisely as he had stated it; but he held in his hand a speech made by the Hon. Robert Read, a member of the Senate, on 21st April, and hon. members would see it was necessary in the interest of this House and of the hon. member for Selkirk himself that he should have given that hon. member the opportunity which he had given him, not by an insinuation, but by a frank, manly statement, to deal with the rumour which prevailed to his disparagement, and which, he was glad to say, proved to be thoroughly unfounded. He supposed he was doing the Government the greatest possible service he could render them, as well as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith), when he stated the rumour circulated, and believed and gave the hon. gentleman the opportunity, by a frank open statement, to entirely relieve himself from any responsibility in relation to that matter. He did not think the hon. member did him equal justice when, in making his explanation, he referred in vague, indefinite, intangible terms to rumours, not in the manner he had done, but in a way that no hon. member could deal with them; and he took that opportunity of saying to that hon. member or any other hon. member that, whenever they heard a rumour to his (Mr. Tupper's) discredit, which they thought had any foundation, he trusted they would afford him the same opportunity of meeting it in a straightforward manner as he had given to the hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. DYMOND said that, while the hon. member for Cumberland now said he made the statement as a rumour only, it was worth while to notice that the following interpretation of his remarks appeared in the Toronto Mail, a paper in which he was not likely to be incorrectly reported. The Mail said:

"The member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) is in a most unpleasant corner, as he holds a third interest in a transportation company that received $200,000 from the Government."

The hon. member had said referring to the arrangement for forwarding the rails:

"He (Dr. Tupper) was told that that was not done by tender or contract, and he was told that one member of the Red River Transportation Company sits in the House, and was one of the principal supporters of the Administration."

The hon. member for Cumberland then went on to endorse the falsehoods which had been communicated to him, in the following manner:—

"He referred to the member from Selkirk (Hon. D. Smith) who had one-third or a half interest in that Company. If it was true that $200,000 had been given to a company in which that hon. gentleman was a proprietor, without tender, it was a question that struck not only at the foundation of the Act, but assumed a complexion of the most unpleasant and disagreeable character."

He gave the hon. member for Cumberland the benefit of any explanation he might offer to the House and the country in regard to the statement he had made upon the authority of the hon. member for Lisgar. But his statement was sent all through the country in twenty-four hours. Mr. Spurgeon once said that "a lie would travel round the world while truth was putting on its boots;" and the consequence of that incorrect little rumour, as it appeared to the mind of the hon. member for Cumberland, in his late speech, was that the hon. member for Selkirk was branded everywhere as a corrupt man, who had violated the independence of Parliament, and pocketed $50,000 or $60,000 of the public money. He thought that after these illustrations, while giving all the credit he deserved to the hon. member for Cumberland for the moderation of his speech compared with previous deliverances, it must be admitted there was a great deal of the unregenerate nature still left in him. In regard to the speech of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), in which he had attempted to justify the original compact made with Sir Hugh Allan and his associates for the construction of the Pacific Railway, it had been very well remarked that the failure of that enterprise was the best proof of its hollowness and un wisdom. But he ventured to say that from first to last there was no action on the part of the Government in connection with that company, or on the part of Sir Hugh Allan, that was likely to give confidence to European capitalists. Their association was not a public company, in the ordinary acceptation of the term. The persons who, by an arrangement with certain banks, had joined together to make a nominal deposit, with an understanding that it would never be called for, were simply a committee of Government nominees who had, with the exception of one or two of the number, no stake whatever in the undertaking. With respect to Sir Hugh Allan, the truth had better, once for all, be spoken. Probably no more unfortunate selection could have been made of a gentleman to send to London to raise a large sum of money from the capitalists of that city. The name of Sir Hugh Allan was not a savoury name there, long before the Pacific Railway Company was formed. He paused for a moment to refer to the allusion made, he thought, by the hon. member for Cumberland to the two original companies, formed for the purpose of building that work. The name of the Hon. William McMaster had been mentioned as that of a gentleman whose position showed that these companies were composed of men who thought highly of the undertaking. He (Mr. Dymond) had the authority of the hon. Senator to state that he only allowed his name to be used for the purpose of getting the company organized, that he gave it to be understood from the first that he would take no risk and no responsibility in the matter; and that, so soon as the company was organized, he withdrew altogether from the undertaking. But there was another reason why that undertaking could not be regarded, at this time of day, as one, the failure of which was at all peculiarly remarkable. It had been presumed that Sir Hugh Allan was at the head of a magnificent scheme to construct a railroad from the south shore of Lake Nipissing to Thunder Bay, and thence across the North-West Territory to British Columbia. He ventured to say that Sir Hugh Allan never contemplated building one mile of road between Lake Nipissing and Thunder Bay. Sir Hugh made no secret from the very first of his disapproval of that part of the undertaking, and he exercised no reticence whatever with respect to his views on that subject. He was content to construct a railway from Lake Superior to the North-West, but he was not content to build six hundred miles of railway from Lake Nipissing to Thunder Bay. On 21st December, 1872—the charter was granted on 13th January, 1873—Sir Hugh Allan visited Peterborough in connection with many of the railway schemes he was at that time promoting. He (Mr. Dymond) had been unable to put his hand on the speech of Sir Hugh Allan on that occasion, but he found something which was even better—the interpretation of that speech, evidently given authoritatively, by the Editor of the Montreal Gazette, who, from his language, it was clear, was in communication with Sir Hugh Allan, and desired to correct any misapprehension which had occurred in consequence of Sir Hugh Allan having been misrepresented.

The Gazette said :

“It may be well, however, to state distinctly the views expressed by Sir Hugh Allan in relation to the railway interests of the country.”

The writer then referred to several schemes projected for the purpose, as he expressed it, “to tap the trade of the Pacific.” He then went on to say : “The particular lines to which Sir Hugh Allan referred were the Pacific Railway and the extension of the Canada Central.” He had previously explained that the object of the Canada Central was “to continue that railway to a point at or near Sault Ste. Marie.” Further on, he said :

“The Canada Central, having already had power to go as far as Pembroke, and being, in fact, in a fair way to construct its line to that point, asked for authority to go to Sault St. Marie. Should it do so, and cross by a bridge at that point, it would connect with the Northern Pacific Railway, running south of Lake Superior, and would furnish for the Northern Pacific the shortest and most direct line to ocean navigation.”

Then the editor of the Gazette went on to remark :

“The line from Duluth to Pembina approaches completion. The short distance between Pembina and Fort Garry will, therefore, undoubtedly furnish the first railway inlet to the Province of Manitoba and our own North-Western territories. It is understood that the Northern Pacific Railway Company is disposed to aid in the construction of a railway south of Lake Superior towards Sault St. Marie; and the branch to be built between Pembroke and that point in Canadian territory is so comparatively short that no one can doubt the propriety of its immediate construction having reference to the direct railway communication with Winnipeg.”

So this gentleman, who was supposed to be enthusiastic for the construction of a through route from Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, was actually at the time interested in a rival undertaking which, to use his own words, “would bring over it the whole trade of the West and the North-West.” There was another proof of the insincerity of the scheme of the hon. gentlemen opposite which was touched upon by the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government in the course of his remarks. Considerable discussion had taken place in the course of this debate as to the possible route of the Pacific Railway; and they had the authority of Mr. Sandford Fleming, in the report just issued, for the statement that the cost of the railway from Yellow Head Pass to Burrard Inlet would be $30,000,000, and that the cost to Waddington Harbour, by one route, would be $38,000,000, and by another route, $33,000,000. It was not to be supposed that the line could have been constructed for less than the estimate made by Mr. Fleming, as the result of all the experience he had since acquired: and this would have absorbed every dollar of the money subsidy proposed to be granted with the Pacific Railway charter; and yet they were to believe that, without any regard whatever on his part to the question of the terminus, Sir Hugh Allan, six months after, having obtained the charter would have allowed the Government to fix the terminus at a point 260 miles from Waddington Harbour at an additional cost of $27,500,000. Mr. Fleming gave the following description of a part of that route, after describing the fifty miles traversed from Waddington Harbour to Seymour Narrows :—

“For a distance of fifty miles from Waddington Harbour, the only course for the line is to follow the base of the high rocky mountains which extend along Bute Inlet. On this section a great number of tunnels varying from 100 to 3,000 feet in length through bluff rocky points would be indispensable, and the work generally, even with unusually sharp curvature, would be very heavy.”

Mr. Fleming then described the mode by which the Narrows were to be crossed. He said :

“Careful examination has established the fact that, to reach Vancouver Island from the mainland, the following clear span bridges would be required :

	Feet.
At Arran Rapids, a clear span of....	1,100
At Cardero Channel (first opening) a clear span of.....	1,360
At Cardero Channel (second opening) a clear span of.....	1,140
At Cardero Channel (third opening) a clear span of.....	640
At Middle Channel, a clear span of..	1,100
At Seymour Narrows (first opening) a clear span of.....	1,200
At Seymour Narrows (second opening) a clear span of.....	1,350

“The length of the section across the group of islands known as Valdes Islands, lying between the mainland and Vancouver Island, is about 30 miles. The channels to be bridged are of great depth, with the tide flowing from four to nine knots an hour. In crossing the islands, heavy rock excavation and probably a few short tunnels would be required. Taking everything into consideration, the work of construction on these eighty miles lying between Waddington Harbour and Vancouver Island, would be of a most formidable character.”

This work, and the further line of 180 miles to Esquimalt, was to be imposed on a company of shrewd business men, as they were called. The man at the head of the company was in certain respects as good a business man as was to be found in the Dominion ; but would any one for a moment dream, even in connection with the simplest work of construction, in the course of his own private business, of allowing any such intolerable species of bargain to be saddled upon him ? This was, therefore, he thought, plain and clear proof that the whole arrangement as to Sir Hugh Allan was little better than a fraud ; and that Sir Hugh Allan had no intention whatever of ever carrying out that work in the terms of the charter granted him. They had another illustration of the folly and recklessness of the hon. gentlemen opposite. During the period between 1873 and now, a very large sum of money had been spent on surveys, under the superintendence of a gentleman who was probably second, in point of character and ability, to no engineer on this continent ; and they had not yet arrived at a conclusion as to the precise location of the road in British Columbia. What a spectacle they had witnessed the other day. Two hon. gentlemen opposite had entreated the Premier to pause, even if necessary, for two years longer, before settling on the line of route in order that they might ascertain whether any other new, more northerly and more favourable route through the Peace River district could be obtained. The hon. member from Terrebonne had mourned over the loss of immigration that had occurred in consequence of defeat of the former scheme, but it would be in the recollection of the hon. member for Terrebonne that certain terms were agreed upon with that company by the Government with regard to the price at which land was to be sold ; and this price was $2.50 per acre. He believed it was perfectly well understood that the only mode of settling up a country rapidly and effectually was by adopting the system of free grant settlements. The hon. gentlemen opposite had, however, no intention of doing anything of that kind. When that portion of the Pacific Railway resolutions was before the House, the present Premier had proposed an amendment to secure more liberal terms. When the hon. gentlemen opposite talked of fifty millions of acres appropriated by the Company and fifty millions more reserved by the Government, and of there being any considerable quantity of land left for settlement in the North-West, he (Mr. Dymond) fancied that they were running beyond any reliable information possessed as to the cultivateable land in that region. But the right hon. member for Kingston then repudiated the idea of people being induced to settle in that country on liberal terms; and the hon. gentleman's speech was thus reported in the Montreal Gazette :—

“The country would be open to settlement and the surplus population of England, Ireland or Germany, might flock there and enjoy all the advantages, at the cost of the people of the other Provinces. Why should these people be given farms improved, with a railway running before their doors, for nothing: advantages which had never been enjoyed by the people of the other Provinces, when there was plenty of other land in the country which they could take outside the twenty miles on either side of the line.”

So it was really to be an offence on the part of people from England, Ireland or Germany to settle exactly where they were most wanted along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If he wanted proof that the hon. gentleman's theory or proposition at the time was absurd and inimical to the interests of the country, he would find it in the fact that the hon. gentleman gave, at all events, a silent assent to the Bill of 1874, in which the precaution was taken which the hon. gentleman had affected to despise. He had said, at the commencement of his remarks, it was much to be regretted that a great question of this kind should be discussed under such circumstances, and if any proof of this were wanted, it was to be found in the tone of sectionalism which had pervaded the address of the hon. member for Terrebonne. Instead of hearing anything like a statesmanlike discussion of the measure, and the most important policy that could engage the attention of this or any other country, they had been favoured with a discourse from the hon. member for Terrebonne, three-quarters of which would only suit one of the little stump election meetings, with which they were very familiar, when they had to face their constituencies in the rural districts. The object of the hon. gentleman's speech seemed to be to corner some unfortunate French Canadian Liberal, or some French Canadian Liberal newspaper, and not to discuss how they could build up a great nation, and enable this country to carry out the gigantic work before them. The hon. gentleman also spoke of Sir George Cartier, and deservedly, in terms of high admiration; but what was the treatment that Sir George Cartier had received in connection with Sir Hugh Allan's railway operations? If there ever was a specimen of cold-blooded and deliberate cruelty, it was to be found in the conduct displayed by Sir Hugh Allan in the intrigues revealed by his correspondence with G. W. McMullen; and yet the hon. member for Terrebonne was a humble follower of the right hon. gentleman who gave Sir Hugh Allan the charter, after the proof of that cold-blooded cruelty had been placed before him. The hon. gentleman was exceedingly anxious that the Georgian Bay Branch should be built, and had paid a warm tribute to the liberal spirit in which the members of the Reform Party and of the Government from Ontario had acted towards Quebec enterprises. He could assure the hon. gentleman that, as far as the material development of the country was concerned, there was no disposition on the part of anyone in Ontario to allow a sectional spirit to intrude for one moment; and, if the hon. gentleman could show the Government that any change in their plans with regard to the Georgian Bay scheme would render it more favourable to Quebec, not a man in Ontario would be found to utter a protest against it. The Georgian Bay Branch, so far as Ontario was concerned, was little more than a colonization road, though to Quebec it was undoubtedly valuable in another sense, as it offered a direct through route to the upper lakes, and from thence to the Pacific. The Government of Ontario a year ago had passed a Bill guaranteeing, or proposing to give, a subsidy of $8,000 per mile to any company connecting the present railway system of Western Ontario with that railway. He ventured to deny the statement that the Government of the Dominion had any intention of abandoning the Georgian Bay scheme. They all knew that the present moment was eminently unfavourable for railway enterprises, and news had arrived that day from Europe which further tended to embarrass those who had great financial operations in hand. What effect this might have on the fortunes of this country or the calculations of the Finance Minister he could not tell; but he was sure that the Government had not the slightest intention of abandoning the Georgian Bay scheme. Nay, though not in their secrets, he ventured to say more—that, if there was anything connected with this scheme which could render it more satisfactory to the people of Quebec, he could assure the hon. member for Terrebonne and others from that Province that it would receive at the hands of the Government the most favourable consideration. The hon. gentleman's leader, however, wanted them to postpone the location of the Pacific Railway for two years more.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: How does the hon. gentleman make that out?

Mr. DYMOND: The hon. gentleman suggested that the final location of the road should not take place until the Peace River district had been explored.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I made no such suggestion.

Mr. DYMOND said the hon. gentleman had stated that the survey might take one year or two years, and the hon. gentleman was exceedingly anxious that the advantages of that line should not be lost to the country in consequence of the Peace River section not having been carefully and effectually explored.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I made no such suggestion.

Mr. DYMOND said everybody on that side of the House so understood the hon. gentleman. Of course, if the hon. gentleman denied it, they would suppose that he did not wish this line to go through the Peace River country and Pine Pass, but desired it should traverse the comparatively inhospitable region lying between Fort Edmonton and Fort George. Perhaps, however, it was the hon. member for Cumberland who had made the statement he had mentioned. He would refer for a moment to the water stretches about which so much had been said. All that he (Mr. Dymond) understood with regard to the use of those water-stretches was this: that, pending the completion of a through route from the south shore of Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, such water stretches as existed should be utilized. They had been assured by the hon. the Premier in his speech delivered a year ago that there was no intention whatever on his part to deviate to any important extent, perhaps not a mile, in order to meet and utilize those water-stretches. But, as it happened, that, from the south shore of Lake Huron nearly to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, there was a series of those inland waters, it would be something like a madness equal to the original Pacific scheme if the hon. gentleman did not utilize them. With regard to the question of the Pacific Railway policy generally, it presented an aspect at the present time to which for a moment or two he would allude. There could be no doubt that, under the influence of commercial depression, and in the face of the delays that had occurred from the original inception of the scheme up to the present time, in consequence of the more extended knowledge of the difficulties that work presented, there had grown up a prejudice against it which might to a certain extent assume the form of public opinion in opposition to that enterprise. He believed that nothing could be more fatal to the interests of this country than for one moment to put any check upon the undertaking to build the railway. Surround it with what precautions they pleased, be as prudent as they would, it was a matter of absolute necessity that such a work should be ultimately constructed. Whether they looked at it as a great national enterprise, as one that might stimulate the ambition of the people; whether they looked at it as a great factor in their material progress, or as an obligation depending on the faith of treaties to be carried out; whether they regarded it under any one of those aspects, they were all equally potential in his mind in urging them to carry the work forward. And he believed that they would carry out this policy most wisely and effectively if they looked at the Pacific Railway, to a large extent, as an instrument not so much in providing a through route as a great means of colonization. Although it was possible that shorter routes might be obtained by traversing desolate portions of the country; although it was possible they might hasten the completion of the enterprise by adopting a certain location, yet the great object they should have in view, from the moment they left the north shore of Lake Nipissing until they finally touched the waters of the Pacific Ocean, should be to develop and settle the country through which the road passed. But, although that might be the object, and although he believed that would be the object of those who were, at the present time, charged with carrying out this work, it was worth while to bear in mind what really the construction of the Pacific Railway meant. Many years would pass over before the road would be completed. British Columbia might seem a burden to them during that period, but, although what he said might grate harshly on the ears of some of his most respected political friends, he believed that this country had no conception of what value that Province would ultimately be to the Dominion. He believed that, in Vancouver Island alone, there was a mine of wealth of which those who first promoted the union had no idea whatever. They had there in juxtaposition the three greatest ingredients of national wealth. They had coal of the best class, no less than 100,000 tons of which were exported to San Francisco last year. They had also iron of fine quality, and the limestone necessary for its manufacture. They had, in the exhaustless fisheries in the seas which surrounded the island, the cheapest food that could possibly be given to man, and they had a territory, if not in our own soil, immediately contiguous, within American jurisdiction, capable of raising all the vegetable necessaries of life on the cheapest possible scale. These were ingredients of a great national industry. Besides they should remember that Vancouver Island was within 4,000 miles of Japan, with a population of 33,000,000, and at a not much greater distance from China, with a population of 425,000,000. They had, then, for prospective customers, the population of two countries which were just about beginning to witness the dawn of a new-world civilization; customers who would be supplied from our Pacific sea board as easily as from any other part of the world—far more easily than from England, far more easily than from any European country. He was quite aware that Canada must for a considerable time be content to bear a heavy burden in order to accomplish this great work; but, whether they looked at it as a matter of interest, whether they looked at it as a matter of national good faith, that work would have to be accomplished. If they turned, for example, to the parent country, they would find that the main source of the power and credit of Great Britain consisted in the dependence that had always been placed upon her plighted word; and we could not in Canada to-day, in our relations with British Columbia, any more than in our relations with any foreign power, dare for one moment to utter the shameful word “repudiation.” He believed that many years would pass over before they should witness the result of their efforts in this direction. Mr. Speaker and himself, and many more who heard him might have passed away before the consummation of the work, but on the wisdom with which they dealt with this great question that day, the patriotism they exhibited in view of the obligations it imposed upon them, depended to a very large extent the future welfare and prosperity of the Dominion.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said it would be remembered that one very prominent feature of this great land and water scheme of the hon. the First Minister, when he announced it to the people in 1874, was the opening up of communication between the existing system of railways in Ontario and Quebec and the waters of Lake Huron at the mouth of the French River. In the Session of 1874, following this manifesto, the Pacific Railway Act was passed, under which the hon. gentleman took power to construct the

Mr. Dymond.

Georgian Bay Branch without submitting the contracts to Parliament. Following the power which was granted the hon. gentleman by that Act, a cursory examination of what was considered to be the shortest line of communication between the existing system of railways in Ontario and Quebec and the mouth of the French River, was made in the summer of 1874. The Engineer who made the examination did it under adverse circumstances; he (Mr. White) was informed that the country was so enveloped in smoke that the Engineer was unable to traverse a considerable portion of the route he was sent to examine, and that in one instance he examined a very considerable portion of the territory from the top of a hill which he climbed for the purpose. The contract for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch was given to the Hon. Mr. Foster. That contract provided in the most stringent manner for the completion of this work. Severe penalties were entailed upon the contractor if he failed to complete the work by the time specified, which was January 1st, 1877. Everything showed that the Government considered that line a very important feature of the Pacific Railway scheme; but, when the hon. gentleman came down to Parliament last Session, he was obliged to inform the House that the contract had been cancelled; he, however, declared that, as soon as the terminus on French River was decided upon, the work would be put under contract again. A year had passed since that statement was made, and on Friday the hon. gentleman made a very lucid statement with reference to the Pacific Railway policy, but he failed to mention anything in connection with this branch which he deemed so important in 1874. It was only after he had been pressed by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) that the hon. gentleman stated that the Government had not altered their policy in relation to this line. But while that declaration was made, not a single dollar was asked for the prosecution of the work, which was rather remarkable in view of the fact that $1,000,000 had been appropriated in previous years for the construction of this branch. Notwithstanding the statement by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) it seemed to him the evidence was strong that the Government did not intend to proceed with this particular work. The hon. gentleman had not stated whether the line originally laid out to be followed by the contractor had been found impracticable or not. If he (Mr. White) were inclined to be sectional, he might suggest that a line might be found in a more northerly direction, starting from Pembroke, following in the vicinity of the Ottawa and up the Mattawa River to the point which he assumed to be the objective point. If he were correctly informed, the distance of the line from Renfrew to Canter's Bay was about 217 miles, while the distance from Pembroke was 183 miles. But he did not suggest that the hon. gentleman should adopt the northern line unless he found it to possess greater advantages than the line already laid out. He had stated last Session that he was not disposed to view the construction of this work from a local or sectional standpoint, and, if the hon. gentleman honestly intended to carry out the scheme of opening up communication between the railways of Ontario and Quebec and the waters of Lake Huron, whether he adopted the Bonnechère or the northern route, he would gladly give his humble support to the carrying out of that scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In nothing else?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said he did know what the hon. gentleman meant by that. The hon. gentleman, he dared say, looked upon any humble assistance he might be able to render him with a great deal of contempt; but he could only repeat that he would support either of the schemes if the hon. gentleman intended to carry them out. But it seemed to him quite evident, from the course pursued, that the Government did not intend to carry on this work. He could come to no other conclusion than that the scheme had been abandoned. With reference to the payments made to Mr. Foster, for surveys upon the Georgian Bay Branch, he could not see how the Government could avoid making them, for the contract stated that the cost of surveys was to be a part of the subsidy granted to that gentleman. But he did think that the money paid for the rails was paid without the authority of Parliament. The Order in Council, which the hon. the Minister of Public Works gave as his authority, stated that the rails should be delivered along the line between the village of Douglas and a certain point in the vicinity of Lake Nipissing, which was fixed as the terminus of the Georgian Bay Branch. But instead of that they were delivered at Renfrew, ten miles away from the commencement of the road.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he was surprised to hear the hon. the First Minister speak of the speech of the hon. member for Terrebonne as a long speech, and one which was not required in this discussion. He was not so much surprised to hear the hon. member for North York say that, because that hon. member was in the habit of despising everything but what came from himself. The hon. member for Terrebonne certainly made a speech which was a credit to himself and to the Opposition side of the House. The hon. the Minister of Public Works and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had complained of the tone and violence of the discussion. The hon. the Minister of Public Works said: "No public man can conduct public affairs in this country without being subject to personal abuse of the most outrageous kind. Why should we not follow the parliamentary custom in England?" He (Mr. Langevin) had no fault to find with that desire—every member of the House would join in it. But the hon. member for North York had followed a very different course. That hon. gentleman, without any cause whatever, had thought proper to repeat a slander that had already been repudiated by himself (Mr. Langevin); he had made a defence which the press and the country thought was sufficient, and was the only one he could make under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman had no right to bring this matter up in this discussion again, and he would not drag him into it. It would be very easy for him to answer the hon. gentleman in the same way, and to make allusions to matters that would not be very pleasant to the hon. member for North York, and to speak of parties that came to this country and were most happy to find refuge here. But it was not his habit to attack hon. members personally, although the hon. gentleman had thought proper to attack him personally, which he had no right to do. He (Mr. Langevin) had not spoken on the subject. There was no reason whatever for the attack; and, therefore, it was a mere act of malice on the part of the hon. member to make the attack. Having said so much, he would pass to another matter. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had denied the statement of the hon. member for Terrebonne that the Liberals of Quebec had opposed all the great schemes that would make the future greatness of this country. That statement was perfectly correct. The Liberal Party of Lower Canada had opposed the Grand Trunk, the scheme which had made Ontario and Quebec what they were; the Victoria Bridge, one of the wonders of the world; the Confederation, which had made us one united people, enjoying all the benefits of the constitutional monarchical system of England alongside the great Republic of the United States; and the Intercolonial Railway, which was another bond of union between the Maritime Provinces and the Western Provinces. It was the same now. The Liberal Party of Quebec opposed the Pacific Railway. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had referred to it as the most insane scheme which ever engaged the attention of any Legislature. He (Mr. Langevin) hoped that hon. gentleman would live long enough to see that he was a bad prophet. That was a work which would be one of the glories of Canada. It would make this country one of the greatest countries in the world, and bring hither the trade of Asia and Europe, and make us one people from one ocean to another. The acquisition of the North-West was a pet question with hon. gentlemen opposite, especially with those from Ontario, previous to Confederation. The Province of Quebec was found not to be very warm on that question. The reason was, it was thought that the acquisition would only increase the troubles already existing between Upper and Lower Canada. But, when the scheme of Confederation was placed before the people of Quebec, and they saw it was not desired to acquire the North-West merely for the benefit of Upper Canada but of the general country, the objection ceased. Then they said that was the time to ask for the annexation of that country, because it would not be a danger for the future of their own Province or of this country; but, on the contrary, it would make this country a great country; it would give us the country we wanted from one ocean to another. That territory had become our territory; it had been acquired, and now the question which arose was what would be done with that country? Having acquired it, were they to leave it there; were they not to build a railway? They required a railway to unite it with the old Provinces of the Dominion, because they must have a means of going from one ocean to the other. He was glad to hear the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) express himself on that question as he did, because on that he was perfectly right. That country, and the country west of it, he meant British Columbia, were great countries; they were full of wealth, and they would be great sources of wealth to the Dominion. He need not go into the details of the resources of British Columbia, the hon. member for North York had indicated some of them. They were great and real. He for one had had an opportunity of seeing with his own eyes what that Province was, and he stated that it would be one of the most beautiful Provinces of this Dominion. There might be, as an hon. member, whom he regretted not to see in his place on account of sickness had said, "a sea of mountains" in that country. But that hon. gentleman would change his views, ideas, and convictions were he to go there and see that country for himself. He would find that it was a country worth annexing, that it was full of resources, and only required a railway which would bring it population and wealth, and the money that we would expend there would go back to the coffers of the Dominion tenfold. The North-West was near to us. He knew the resources of that country, and he was glad to hear his hon. friend the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) mention yesterday the fact that wheat was grown a thousand miles north of Ottawa. The hon. gentleman had shown them a sample of that wheat which had been sent to him, he believed, by Mr. Malcolm McLeod, of Aylmer, who had written about that country. The hon. the First Minister had said that it was obligatory upon this country to build the railway; he (Mr. Langevin) had been glad to hear him say so. It was true it was an obligation, and if they had not contracted that obligation with British Columbia they would have had to build the railway nevertheless. The member for North York seemed to indicate the same conviction in his mind. He (Mr. Langevin) had been sorry to hear the First Minister speak of a waste of money as to the railway from Lake Superior to Lake Nipissing. He had said that that country had no settlement, but let them take the whole line of the railway from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific ocean, and see how much of the whole country was settled. There were very few settlements, but, nevertheless, who spoke of that? The Premier did not say how long it would be before this portion of the road from Lake Superior to Lake Nipissing would be built; but evidently, according to the hon. gentleman, they could not see the date when it would be built. That portion of the line was a portion that ought to be built as much as any other portion of the Pacific Railway. It was the connecting link between the Pacific Railway and the lines of railway through Ontario and Quebec. They must have a line of that kind in order to have the benefit of the Pacific Railway. The hon. the First Minister said: "We build the railway from Fort William to British Columbia, and that is sufficient." That, however, was only a railway from the head of Lake Superior to British Columbia, and did not connect with the railways of the old Provinces of Canada. The portion of the line east of Fort William was a necessity. Of course the First Minister had a majority of this House behind him, and perhaps he could do with that link as he pleased, but the time would come, perhaps, when the public opinion of this country would be felt and made known, when that portion of the railway would have to be built. He (Mr. Langevin) had no doubt that the railway would be built, as well as the remainder of the Pacific Railway line, and then only would Lower Canada be satisfied that justice had been done to it. They were now contributing a large share to the building of the railway, and they did not grumble or complain, but they said: "Give us also the benefit of that railway; why should we be deprived of it?" The first section of that line, by the Pacific Railway Act, was from Lake Nipissing to the junction with the line which went from Lake Superior towards Winnipeg. The branch from Fort William to the point where the railway would connect with the first section from Lake Nipissing would be probably fifty or sixty miles in length. That was not contemplated by the Railway Act of 1874, by which the first section was from Lake Nipissing to Lake Superior to connect with the line towards Winnipeg. In that Act only two branches were mentioned, and this branch, from Lake Superior to the junction of the Nipissing line, was not mentioned. He need not repeat what had already been said in the House in reference to the scheme of the Government to use the water stretches until a through line by rail was obtained. He, for one, did not agree with that policy. We should have a road built from one end to the other in conjunction with the railways in Ontario and Quebec. We should have a through route by rail, not one partly rail and partly water. They knew that the portion by water could be used only, he supposed, for five or six months during the year at the utmost, and what would be the result? The road would be used during that time, but in the winter the railway would be inactive, there would be no traffic upon it, and how could they expect a large revenue from a railway in that position? It was the same thing when they came to Lake Superior. What benefit would be derived from a railway which would come to the end of Lake Superior in the winter months? He would not discuss that policy at any length as it had been discussed by others before him, but he would speak now of the two roads which had been mentioned by the First Minister as being the lines between which the Government would have to decide the route of the Pacific Railway through British Columbia. The first route was by the valley of the Fraser River, and the other by Bute Inlet. Of course he (Mr. Langevin) might have his predilection in favour of one route over the other, but he did not intend to show that predilection, but merely to show the advantages and disadvantages of both lines. By the Fraser route the hon. the First Minister said they might bring a railway down to Yale, and then Yale would be accessible by water all the year round. That was a statement which he had no doubt the First Minister had good grounds for making; but he could assure him that, were he to go to British Columbia, he would find that the Pacific Railway could not end at Yale, but must go down to Burrard Inlet, because he would see if he were there in the winter months that Yale could not be reached by that means.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he did not make this statement as a reproach to the First Minister. It was quite natural that he might make a mistake of this kind about localities which he had been unable to visit, but those who had visited British Columbia, or had come from that Province, would all tell him the same as he (Mr. Langevin) had, and he was sure his hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) would support him in that.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the other objection to that route was that the line went too near the American frontier. Of course it was said that there was no danger of a war with the United States, and that that should not be a question. Well, there might be no difficulty now, we might be at peace for sixty or a hundred years; but, when a work of this magnitude was being built, when they were to expend large sums of money, they should put the railway at the proper place, they should adopt the proper line, they should look to the future and say: "Is that the line the railway should follow were we an independent power, were we in difficulty with the United States?" because, of course, though one smiled when we spoke of war between Canada and the United States, it must not be forgotten that Canada in a hundred years' time would not be the Canada of to-day, that instead of four millions, as we had to-day, we would have a hundred millions or more in a hundred years, and would be a great country, a great power on this continent. We should therefore locate our line where that great empire of the North would require to have its railway built. Another reason against that line was that with a short road, a short branch, the Americans on the other side of the line could tap our Pacific Railway, and we would put the terminus within their territory, and build up a great city there at our expense. We would have built a railway and spent millions upon it, and finally the great terminus of the road would be on American territory.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that was a great objection. There was another reason also. When they went down to Burrard Inlet, there they required, according to the report which had been placed in their hands lately, in order to bring ships to Burrard Inlet, a towage of 70 miles, and when they went into the interior of Burrard Inlet, of nearly 90 miles; at all events it was a long distance, and that was another objection. Further on their way they would have to pass under the guns of the Island of San Juan.

Mr. DECOSMOS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN said it was a very unhappy day when we lost San Juan; but, of course, the matter had been left to an arbitrator, and he had decided against us. He had no doubt he decided according to his conscience, but it was a very sorry day for Canada. It was true that going by the Fraser River they would pass through a settled portion of the country. On the main line they would go through a territory where, according to the First Minister's statement, the grade would not exceed 52 feet in a mile, and they would obtain perhaps a shorter route than the Bute Inlet route and, consequently, it might cost less than the latter. These were the objections to and disadvantages of that route. Coming to the Bute Inlet route, there they had a more direct route. They might have heavy work, and they had the crossing of the Straits to go to the Island of Vancouver, and they had a railway to build from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, but was it worth still having a difficulty yet existing with British Columbia about that railway, when they did not hesitate a minute in building a branch of fifty or sixty miles from Lake Superior to the junction of the Lake Nipissing Railway?

Mr. DECOSMOS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN said if they had spent the money to build that railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt it would have avoided all the difficulty and all the heart-burnings which had been created. He was sure that if hon. gentlemen could visit British Columbia and see both lines they could find advantage in both; but they could not help seeing that if the Fraser route would cost less, if it would be less in length, if the grades would not exceed fifty-two feet in the mile, on the other hand, the Bute Inlet route would be further from the frontier, and would have as its terminus either the harbour of Esquimalt or the great harbour of Hartley Sound, in which case they would not require to pass under the guns of the Americans, and they would have access to the ports all the year round. He believed that Burrard Inlet was also open throughout the year. From this Inlet they could cross in a ferry to Nanaimo, and go by the Nanaimo Road either to Esquimalt or Hartley Sound. At the latter place there would be a very short line indeed, and, therefore, in both cases, whether they selected the Fraser River or Bute Inlet route, they could reach the harbour of Esquimalt or the harbour of Hartley Sound, and have the harbour open during the whole year, where protection could be afforded by the British fleet in the event of a war. Besides, the railway would be far enough off from the Americans at Bute Inlet to be protected. The contrary was, perhaps, the strongest reason urged against the Fraser route, but it might not be an insuperable difficulty. He had done his best to be as impartial as possible between the two lines. The First Minister had alluded to the passage of the Bill relating to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway through the House, and its defeat by a majority of two in the Senate. They knew of whom this majority was formed, being composed of friends of the hon. gentleman, who had just been appointed to seats in the other Chamber. Nevertheless, these hon. gentlemen had acted independently and very properly, because the Senate was established for the purpose of controlling too hasty legislation. The hon. gentleman said he would have been censured had he resigned on that occasion, but he (Mr. Langevin) did not think that a member of the Opposition had ever stated that the hon. gentleman should then have resigned. If, however, that measure was such as should have received the sanction of the House, why had not the hon. gentleman re-introduced it the following Session? Nothing had happened in the interval to cause the hon. gentleman to believe that the Bill was an improper one; and during that period the hon. gentleman had appointed other Senators. What reason did the hon. gentleman have for having three years previously, before a vote had been given in the Senate during the present Administration, asked the Imperial Government to empower him to appoint six additional Senators—not in accordance with, but in violation of, the Constitution, which only provided for such nominations in cases of extreme emergency, when the Senate had repeatedly refused to allow public measures to pass? There was no necessity for the step proposed by the hon. gentleman. The Railway Act of 1874 required that contracts should be given out after tenders were asked for, and after lines were surveyed; but the hon. gentleman had awarded the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch before the line had been located and surveyed. Nevertheless, the Government, for some reason or other, were in great haste to award the contract, and they called for tenders. What was the result? An American firm obtained the contract, but the Americans very soon disappeared, and they found that the Hon. A. B. Foster was the contractor. Very little work was done before Mr. Foster abandoned the undertaking, and finally the Government had given him full value for all he had done, paying him in cash \$100,000. The contractor was to have received so much money and so much land per mile; and, though this was the case, and though Mr. Foster had not fulfilled his engagements, that amount was paid in hard cash. In what position was this line to-day? The First Minister had not placed a dollar in the Estimates for this road, though last year about a million of money had been voted for this purpose. He supposed that the First Minister would yet tell them that it would be a waste of money to build this road. Nevertheless, the line from Fort William westward and another portion was under contract. What had Quebec done to be refused justice by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Ministry, during their first year of office, had controlled a majority of votes from that Province; and was it because this majority, during the present Session, had abandoned the Government, that an injustice was committed towards Quebec? Not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite would say that the votes in the Estimates were just towards that Province, and he was glad they were silent on the subject, because it showed that they felt that the Government was acting unjustly in this relation. The hon. member for North York had spoken of sectionalism. This was the term used when the representatives of the Province of Quebec alluded to such matters, but it was not sectionalism when such remarks referred to Ontario. The representatives of Quebec were to keep their mouths closed and not say "boo," though treated with the greatest injustice by the Government. He was not disposed to submit in silence to this treatment. At all events, he was bound as a member of the House and the representative of a constituency to raise his voice in protest against it. They had done nothing to merit this treatment, or the deprivation of their just rights. But, when the term of this Parliament expired, the electors of the Province would speak and let the Government know how they appreciated the course pursued towards them. The majority of the representatives opposed to the Government would then be largely increased. Under the Pacific Railway Act, tenders should have been asked for the construction of the Fort Frances Locks, but this had not been done. The work had been carried forward by day's labour. The reason for acting so was said to be owing to the distance of this region from the settlements, preventing the letting of it out by contract; but the portion of the Pacific Railway north of the canal had been let out by contract, and there was no reason why this could not have been done in the other case. The Superintendent was instructed to be guided by the wages paid to labourers and mechanics on the Pacific Railway to the east and west of this point, and if this could be done by the Superintendent, it could surely have also been done by a contractor. Then the Railway Act would have been observed instead of having been violated. Besides, this work was not required, and the money spent on it was wasted. There were seven feet of water on the sills, while above or below it, the water was only  $4\frac{1}{2}$  feet deep, or less. Half a million would have to be spent to secure the same depth of water all through; and when would this be done? This work was being built, according to the hon. gentleman opposite, only for the purposes of the railway, and it was not required. The Railway Act contained a special clause relating to the telegraph line, as follows:—

“A line of electric telegraph shall be constructed in advance of the said railway and branches, along their whole extent respectively, as soon as practicable after the location of the line shall have been determined upon.”

Consequently it was not to be built for the purposes of an ordinary line, but along the line of the Pacific Railway; but the hon. gentleman opposite had not located one foot of the road when they gave out the contract for the construction of this line; 100 or 200 miles from the route might be followed by the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman had discovered his error last year, and had stopped the work. The contractor, who was a worthy man, had been put to great expense, and no doubt would have a large claim against the Government. This contract had also been awarded in violation of the terms of an Act of Parliament, and it was not authorized by the House. The fourth reckless expenditure of the Government was in connection with the purchase of steel rails. He would not enter into the details of this transaction. The Government knew when the rails were purchased that they would not be required for three years, indeed only 2,295 tons had been used up to the 1st January, 1877. About 10,000 or 11,000 had been used on the Intercolonial, which was in direct violation of the Act of Parliament. The hon. gentleman said the Chief Engineer recommended the purchase. Mr. Fleming could give proper advice on engineering matters, but this was a matter on which any good business man could decide, and there was no reason why the Chief Engineer should be made the scapegoat for the mistake of the Government. The Government were responsible for the transaction, and the country would hold them responsible for it. When pressed about expending money without the authority of Parliament, the hon. the Minister of Public Works said the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) expended $350,000 on the Lower St. Lawrence wharves without parliamentary sanction. That was a mistake. That expenditure took place one or two years previous to the accession of the hon. member for Kingston to office. It was in September, 1854, when that hon. gentleman entered the Government, and the Minister who had expended the money, the Hon. Mr. Shepherd, went out in the following January. The hon. member for Kingston was only two or three months in the Government before Hon. Mr. Shepherd went out, and it was under the administration of the latter that the money was spent. He could not agree with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue that Quebec was being looked after in regard to the Pacific Railway; every fair-thinking man in the Province must see that it was being neglected by the Government. The Administration had not dealt with this work according to the spirit or letter of the law, and hence the great dissatisfaction in regard to their course. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) declared that the late Government did not accept the lowest tender in giving out a contract for harbour improvements somewhere west of Goderich. If that were so they had good cause for it. The man's securities probably were not good, or the Government were dissatisfied with his ability; but, at any rate, an Order in Council would be passed in accordance with the law, before this step was taken. Although he could not remember the circumstances, the hon. gentleman would have the papers in his office and he could easily ascertain the facts. He thanked the House for the attention they had given him, and would simply say that he would support the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. HAGGART said, before he answered any of the remarks of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond), he might state that he was in no way connected with the Pacific Scandal; that he received no money to assist him in any election; that to his knowledge no money had ever been spent to influence the electors whom he represented; and, therefore, the tu quoque argument would not apply to him. If the report of the Immigration Committee was correct, if the evidence given by gentlemen to that Committee was borne out by the facts, there were 300,000 square miles of good arable land in the North-West, or in the neighborhood of 245,000,000 acres, which would give a farm of 250 acres to 1,000,000 farmers, and maintain a population of 40,000,000. If, independent of Manitoba, we had such a reserve as that, he maintained that the Government were wanting in energy and enterprise in not pushing the railroad into that section. This was of double importance in view of the fact that to the south of this land there was a country rapidly increasing in population, and it might shortly become difficult for us to hold any of that territory if steps were not taken to colonize it. What had the Government done towards building the road. They had let contracts for the portion from somewhere in the neighborhood of Fort Garry or Selkirk to a place called Keewatin, and from Thunder Bay in the direction of Keewatin. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, when asked if it was the intention to let the contracts this year for the intervening portions, said he was not prepared to do so. The probabilities were, as remarked by one of the members of the Government in the Senate, and by hon. members of this House, that there would be no railway communication to that country for the next seven years. That was not fulfilling the hopes and wishes of the country. The people were willing to embark in the enterprise, and would take all the risk on their own shoulders, and the Government which would accomplish this work most rapidly would have the confidence of a great portion of the people of the country. To his astonishment, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in his speech on this subject, made no reference to the charge he (Mr. Haggart) made a short time ago—that there had been improper contracts and transactions in regard to constructing the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway and Canada Central connection. No answer was made to the charge preferred by the hon. member for Cumberland in regard to the extravagant price paid for the carriage of rails from Duluth to Fort Garry; but the hon. gentleman interlarded his remarks by referring to the interest the hon. member for Selkirk had in this transaction. That was a portion of the charge which was denied. If the hon. gentleman had considered a little he would not have thought that any British subject would have a direct interest in boats sailing in American waters. If his information was correct there was no difficulty in the way of making a contract with the railway running from Duluth to Moorhead for the transportation of these rails at $5 a ton; and for carrying them from Moorhead to Red River, $2 to $3 per ton would be a fair charge. But $15 per ton had been paid for the transportation of the rails, which was about double what ought to have been. In comparing the dates of the opening and closing of navigation at the proposed terminus on the Kaministiquia, the hon. member for Cumberland was quite right in reading the report as he did; it could not be read in any other way. There was a debate on the subject in the Senate a few days ago, and the report was read in exactly the same way. With regard to the claims of Prince Arthur's Landing, he would read the following portion of the petition of Peter Nicholson and 100 other residents in that section:—

“It is an undisputed fact that the Kaministiquia River is closed by ice several weeks earlier than the Bay, the average time of the river freezing up being the first week in November; this is a disqualification affecting the river for being made the final terminus of the railway on Lake Superior, the importance of which cannot be over-estimated, as the fall of the year is the period during which the heaviest shipments are made; therefore, if the railway terminate at Fort William, all late freight would have to go by Duluth, thus losing a large amount of money to Canada, besides building up American lines in opposition to ours; in the same way shippers in the West would ship via Duluth, rather than risk having their freight left over for an entire season at Fort William.”

He had also a letter from Captain Dick, who had been a shipowner and sailor in that district, and who was quite competent to speak on the subject, and would be heard with respect, in which he said:

“Another point to be considered is the earlier freezing of the river; the first frost closes it. I have seen people skating on it in the end of October, and in the bay there is never a particle of ice to be seen, outside the bar, before December is well advanced, and rarely enough to impede vessels before the end of that month. Six weeks longer of navigation may prove to be a matter of infinite importance to the North-West, when agricultural produce comes to be carried.”

If the information he had was correct, the finest bay on Lake Superior was that on which Prince Arthur's Landing was situated. It was strange that the terminus of our Pacific Railway was not there situated, instead of five miles up that creek, the Kaministiquia, which never could be made available unless by a large expenditure for dredging, and even then the narrowness of the stream precluded its being used by vessels to the extent expected from the great traffic of the North-West. The price paid for the land at this place for railway purposes was most extraordinary. It was a price which the Premier could not at all justify. The Act declared how these lands were to be valued, and it would be found at the registry office that lots for which the Government paid from $250 to $300, on the average, were purchased a few years ago at $4. But he now came to the matter upon which he desired particularly to dwell. A short time ago, when moving for papers, he had made a statement in reference to the contract with the Hon. A. B. Foster and the Canada Central and Georgian Bay Railway. He would, in the first place, deal with the Georgian Bay contract. He took exception to the manner in which that contract was granted. It was true Parliament gave the power to the Minister of Public Works to award the contract. But the Government took powers which had never been taken in any other case. It was one of the stipulations that contracts let should be submitted to Parliament. The contracts were laid upon the table of the House for one month, but it was impossible to get a debate upon the matter. The peculiar part of the arrangement was this: That no person who was a contractor, or who proposed to be a contractor, could know when the Government intended to take the line off his hands. This road, particularly during the winter months, must be running at a dead loss to the contractor, unless the contractor had confidential relations with the Government, so as to know when they would pay the full cost of the road and ten per cent. of the amount expended. It was useless to tender, consequently no well-known names in connection with railway building tendered for the construction of this line. There were three tenderers. It was first given to a man named Musson and afterwards to the Hon. A. B. Foster. But that gentleman did not complete the line, giving as a reason that a practicable route could not be found. He believed, however, that a favourable route had since been found from Cantin's Bay to a place called Burnt Lake, situated within the four townships mentioned by the hon. the First Minister as the terminus of the road. Some hon. members seemed to think that the road would touch Pembroke. But if it were built in that direction it would never reach Pembroke. The road from Pembroke was impracticable, as the line was now located, and the connection would be by Ottawa and Renfrew. The contract with the Hon. A. B. Foster was cancelled. He was to have deposited a certain amount of money for the security of the fulfilment of the contract. He was also to show that he was possessed of a capital equal to $4,000 per mile of the road to be constructed, and to deposit one quarter in cash. But there was no evidence that he had shown to the Government that he had any capital at all. The amount of cash security, $85,000, was deposited in the Ontario Bank. There was an order made that he was to have his amount returned, and also the amount which he had expended upon the road as far as it could be shown that it would be useful in the building of the Georgian Bay Branch. He (Mr. Haggart) was now coming to the extraordinary payments made to the Hon. A. B. Foster. The account which he presented for payment on the 1st February, was in the neighbourhood of $38,000, beside office expenses, the fee of the consulting engineer and ten per cent. for contingencies, which three last items were disallowed and struck off by the hon. the Premier. The amount he actually received, however, was $41,000. It might be interesting to notice some of the items. One of them was $9,000 for building a wharf and store house at the mouth of the French River. The mechanics' and labourers' account was in the neighbourhood of $4,800, of which a mechanical engineer received $2,500 for superintending, being at the rate of $250 per month. The whole account was the most extraordinary ever presented to any Committee. Mr. Foster could not furnish vouchers enough for even the amount he received from the Government. They had really paid him $1,500 more than was shown by the vouchers he presented. But the most extraordinary portion of this transaction was the following:—The Government issued a Minute in Council or memorandum, whereby they agreed to give so much per mile to a connecting road with this branch. This was given to the Canada Central Railway Company, which, in its turn, was to enter into a contract with a capable person. This they did through their President, Mr. Redhead, with the Hon. A. B. Foster. He (Mr. Haggart) mentioned this to show that the Government in no manner of way was connected with the Hon. A. B. Foster. The contract was with the Canada Central Railway Company. When the Public Accounts came down there was an item of $109,000 paid to the Hon. A. B. Foster for rails at Renfrew for the Georgian Bay Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Renfrew being a distance of 132 miles from such Branch. The House was afterwards told that a mistake was made; that it was a payment on behalf of the Canada Central Railway. He (Mr. Haggart) knew there was no such quantity of rails there. He knew there were no rails delivered along that line of the route as contemplated by the contract. He asked the hon. the Premier across the floor of the House whether he did not know that there was not a ton of rails delivered over the line, that there was not a rail within sixteen miles by waggon route of where the subsidized line of the Canada Central commenced. The hon. the Premier said he did not wish to be insulted by the hon. member for Lanark, and that he had paid this amount on the certificate of an Engineer. He (Mr. Haggart) would say there was no such certificate. The certificate of Sandford Fleming for the payment of these rails was to the effect that the Hon. A. B. Foster had delivered a certain quantity of rails at Renfrew, and Foster said they were for the Canada Central Railway. There was no enquiry as to the quality of the rails. The enormous price of $48 a ton was paid, and they were of the same kind as in his bankruptcy case Mr. Foster was contending were worthless. They were not one size of rails even. One kind was set down for 60lb. to the yard and another kind 56lb. to the yard. By information he received these alleged 56 lb. were only 54 lb. to the yard. The Hon. A. B. Foster was paid on that transaction $68,000. He (Mr. Haggart) believed that there was a decision in the Courts that, where advances were made by the Minister of Public Works on supplies for the purpose of carrying on a contract, unless the property was on land belonging to the Government, or in some way transferred to them, they ranked the same as any other creditor. This was on property belonging to the Canada Central Railway, twelve miles away from the commencement of this road. The Government had no control over the property any more than any of the creditors of the Hon. A. B. Foster, the Canada Central, which had the contract with the Government, not appearing in the transaction. But it seemed Mr. Foster was in a hurry for the money, and he got it. Another peculiarity about the matter was this: An enquiry was instituted by the Department into the alleged difference between the rails at Renfrew and those paid for. It then appeared that the Hon. A. B. Foster, for the purpose of finishing the road to Pembroke, had borrowed 100 tons of these rails. When the Deputy Minister of Public Works asked for security for these rails, Mr. Foster gave South-Eastern Railway bonds, although the Deputy Minister did not know their value, which were now known to be worthless. The Deputy Minister admitted that this was the first transaction of the kind the Department had ever entered into. But Mr. Foster not only took 100 tons of these rails on a nominal security, but he took 127 tons more without the knowledge of the Department. Even if the Government had any claims on the rails, and they had been delivered on the subsidized portion of the Canada Central Railway Company, they had no right to pay the Hon. A. B. Foster. Their contract was not with him but with the Canada Central Railway Company. This accounted for the strange entry in the Public Accounts. It might be presumed that before payment could be made the account had to pass the Audit Department. When an account on behalf of the Hon. A. B. Foster came for rails to the amount of $68,000, the Auditor-General could not pass it as a payment to the Canada Central Railway Company; and it could pass through the Audit Department in no other manner than as a payment for the Georgian Bay Branch. It was a most extraordinary circumstance. He could not see how the Auditor-General, who was so very careful in other matters, could ever allow such a thing to be done, for it was the payment of a sum of money to the hon. A. B. Foster to which that gentleman had no claim whatever. He (Mr. Haggart) wished to draw particular attention to the case of the Hon. A. B. Foster. He was one of the parties connected with the celebrated "Pacific Railway Ring." He was the gentleman who furnished the noted letter at the time of the McMullen developments a few years ago. He was a strong supporter of the right hon. member for Kingston. If there was anything wrong in the whole transaction he was as much to blame as any of the others. His reason for turning round and supporting the present Government then could not have been because he was shocked at the developments which took place at that time. Shortly afterwards the Hon. A. B. Foster proposed the hon. the Postmaster-General for election, although, up to that time they had been political opponents. It was a notorious fact that the information used to turn out the late Government was furnished by the Hon. A. B. Foster, and everybody in the country expected that the hon. gentleman would receive his reward for the same. And he did. The manner in which the contracts for the Georgian Bay Branch and the Canada Central Railway were let showed it. No man not in the confidence of the Government so as to know when the Government would take the work off his hands could make a satisfactory contract; and it was here that Mr. Foster had the advantage. These extraordinary transactions in reference to the Canada Central Railway and the Georgian Bay Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway could be accounted for in no other manner than that the Hon. A. B. Foster was entitled to considerations which no other contractor could have, and he got these considerations, too. It might be supposed that, at some future time, the connection with the Canada Central Railway would be made. The hon. the Premier had denied that Douglas was the commencement of the road. In his evidence before the Committee, that hon. gentleman wanted to make the point that the 120 miles might overlap the village of Douglas, and come over to the town of Renfrew. In his speech, when asked where the commencement of the road would be, he replied that it would be in the vicinity of Douglas, or on a line between Douglas and Pembroke. That point would be still further from Renfrew than Douglas was itself. But the measurement made by the Hon. A. B. Foster showed that this distance from Renfrew to the Georgian Bay Branch was 132 miles. The contract with the Hon. A. B. Foster was for 120 miles. The commencement of the subsidized portion of the Canada Central Railway was, therefore, two miles westward of Douglas. The whole 1,900 tons of rails would only lay seven miles of the subsidized portion of the Canada Central Railway Company along with the portion from Renfrew to Douglas, which was twelve miles. The Government ought not to have paid one cent on these rails. The whole transaction was most disgraceful. He had taken particular pains to enquire into it on account of the insulting statement of the hon. the Premier to him. He had a perfect right to ask the question which he had. He asked it in a civil manner and was entitled to a civil answer. The hon. the Premier had tried to bluff him, but he had not succeeded. These payments ought only to have been made on the certificate of the Engineer appointed by the Government. Mr. Sandford Fleming, the Engineer, stated in his evidence before the Public Accounts Committee that he made out no such certificate. The hon. the Premier had stated that he would ask for Committees next Session to enquire into what he called the "slanders" circulated at pic-nics by the Opposition. Had there been a graver charge against the Premier than this? Let him appoint a Committee to enquire into it. He (Mr. Haggart) hoped to see the time when there would be a Government in power who would answer the wishes of the people, and would proceed in a proper manner with the construction of that great work which they desired so much to see accomplished.

Mr. DEWDNEY said that, when the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) submitted his motion to the House, he was under the impression that the debate would be confined to the British Columbia view of the case; as, however, that hon. member had opened up the whole question of the Canadian Pacific Railway policy, he would take that opportunity of offering a few remarks, and stating the position he proposed to take with regard to it. As a British Columbian, knowing his country thoroughly, probably as well as any man in it, knowing the difficulties that had to be contended with, both on account of the engineering problems to be solved and the unreasonableness of a portion of their population, he had always taken a fair and moderate view of the situation in British Columbia, not only when the late Government was in power, at a time when they were attacked for not commencing construction on the 20th July, 1873, but since the present Administration acceded to office. If the question were confined to British Columbia alone, he would probably be found voting with the Government. He did that last year when the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) brought forward the resolution which was justly characterized by the right hon. member for Kingston as a purely selfish motion; but, if on this occasion he (Mr. Dewdney) voted against the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland, he thought he would be laying himself open to the same accusation that was made against the hon. member for Victoria last year, viz., that of selfishness; for, however satisfactory the position of affairs in British Columbia might be to him personally or to the district he had the honour to represent, in view of the course adopted by the Government, he would not be doing his duty as a Canadian if he voted against the motion. It was very true that on more than one occasion the hon. the Premier had given his opinion very decidedly as to his wish to see the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed. And, although that hon. gentleman had on several occasions spoken of it as an enormous undertaking, and also estimated the cost at a very high figure, he still believed he was in earnest when he stated that it was a necessity and must be constructed. But what was the course followed by the hon. gentlemen who sat behind the Premier? Whenever a point was made adverse to the road, whenever an enormous estimate was put upon the cost of construction, it was cheered, and those significant cheers and cries of "hear, hear" so frequently occurred from hon. gentlemen behind the hon. Premier as to lead to the belief that, whatever sincerity there might be in the expressions of the leader of the Government with regard to that undertaking, there was very little among the large majority of his supporters. He (Mr. Dewdney) had listened very attentively to every word uttered by the hon. member for Cumberland, and had also listened to the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, and he must say he had failed to see that the Government had answered the accusations made by the hon. member for Cumberland. He had never wished or intended that it should be supposed that he held any ideas implying dishonesty in the actions of the Government; whatever mistakes they had committed he had always considered as mistakes of judgment, and thought of them as nothing else. But they were responsible for those mistakes of judgment, and if they were continued it would be very long before they saw a sod turned in British Columbia. The hon. member for Cumberland had referred to the estimates made of the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway by hon. gentlemen opposite. Last year when addressing the House, he (Mr. Dewdney) also gave his ideas of what he thought the Railway would cost. He was glad to observe that the estimate of the hon. Premier for the railroad through the section of country between Lake Superior and Red River was very nearly the same as he (Mr. Dewdney) laid before the House at that time. In an article published in the Globe on August 31st last year, he found an estimate in which the whole length of the road from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean was divided into sections, very similar to those adopted by himself, and the whole cost was placed at three millions less than he estimated it last year. His estimate was $54,000,000, while that gave by the Globe was $50,900,000. He mentioned the circumstance to show that the Globe must have received that information from the Government—for no one else possessed it—and, further, to show that beyond a doubt the road could be built from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean for from $50,000,000 to $54,000,000. He would now ask the attention of the House for a few moments while he referred to the question of the route in British Columbia. It would be within the recollection of hon. members that on several occasions he had discussed the subject. His action in that direction had been characterized very unfairly by hon. members from his own Province, and not only by them, but, when last spring he wrote a letter to the hon. the Premier setting forth the advantages of the Fraser River route, he was characterized in the newspapers as being sectional. In that letter he stated as follows:—

"In my endeavours to bring to your notice the claims of the Burrard Inlet and Fraser routes, I would disclaim any intention of arguing that the line should be made to run through such portion of the country as is already settled, because of such settlement. I hold that the interest of the Dominion as a whole should be looked to in a matter of this kind, and that it would not be at all fair for a small population such as ours to attempt to dictate a route to a people who must for all time to come bear the consequence of any mistake that may be made in selecting a line."

Those were sentiments he had always advocated when he brought the question before the House, and, if anything further was required to vindicate himself before Parliament, he asked hon. members to refer to the report of Mr. Sandford Fleming submitted during the last few days. It was not worth while to read several pages, but he would read one or two extracts to show that the Chief Engineer to-day took a similar view to what he (Mr. Dewdney) did in his letter to the hon. the Premier last spring. Mr. Fleming said:

"The cost, however, of one line is of little use in making a comparison of routes; but as estimates, even if only rough approximations, if the other lines are demanded it becomes expedient to adopt some method by which the information may be obtained."

He had always contended that the Fraser River route should be surveyed before estimates could be made. Mr. Fleming further said:

"The only way in which estimates can be formed of the other lines is by a study of the profiles and the other data of the surveys; by comparing the various portions of each line, the one with the other, and with a common standard; and by applying the rule of proportion to sections which correspond in general character, but are different in length.

"Some difficulty has been experienced in making this comparison, owing to many important documents and memoranda connected with the survey having been destroyed by the fire of 1874, when the offices of the survey were burnt. It has not been possible to replace many of the plans and papers which were lost; consequently the precise information then recorded, which has not since been reproduced, is not now available. Every care has, however, been taken with the data at command to arrive at as accurate results as possible.

"A comparison of the estimates which have been formed shows that Route No. 2, from Yellow Head Pass to Burrard Inlet may, with a judiciously selected location, be established and completed for about $2,000,000 more than Route No. 6, terminating at Waddington Harbour. No. 2 has a much greater length of very heavy works, but the extreme length from Yellow Head to the tide water is some fifty-three miles shorter, and thus the common mileage charges, embracing permanent way, rolling stock, and various other services, form a reduction in the cost of the line to Burrard Inlet."

Mr. Fleming went on to say:

"The characteristics of a railway have much to do with its capacity for business, and the cost of maintaining and operating it. The route which will, in the highest degree, admit of low gradients, easy alignment, and permanently firm road bed, at the least annual outlay, is the one most capable of transporting cheaply. In this respect, there can scarcely be a doubt as to Route No. 2, terminating at Burrard Inlet, being the best."

That was the route he (Mr. Dewdney) had urged for adoption. Those were some of the recommendations made in Mr. Fleming's report, and they were quite sufficient to vindicate the position he (Mr. Dewdney) had taken in years gone by. But certain misstatements had been made with respect to that route to which he wished to refer. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) the other evening had endeavoured to show that the population on Bute Inlet route, which that hon. member had been advocating, was larger than the population of the Fraser River route, and, in order to prove his assertion, he read from the Voters' List in British Columbia. But, whether there were only two or three thousand people on the Fraser route, he (Mr. Dewdney) could tell the House that from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Bute Inlet, outside of the Hudson Bay Company's posts, there was not a white man living within from fifty to one hundred miles of the proposed line. He held in his hand the land returns of British Columbia showing the number of entries made under the Land Act, and found that, even including Vancouver Island and the whole of the Bute Inlet route, the number of records made was, in 1875, 89, while on the Fraser River route the number was 551, out of which there were in the New Westminster and Yale districts through which the Fraser route ran, 479. In 1876 there were in Vancouver Island 42, on the mainland, 378, of which 312 were in the district of Yale and New Westminster. Thus, he had shown that, so far as land was concerned, the facts were against the contention of the hon. member for Victoria, and the records showed that immigrants went in the direction of New Westminster rather than along the route advocated by that hon. member. He (Mr. Dewdney) stated the other day that he had statistics to show that a line through British Columbia by the Fraser River route would be able to contribute something in the shape of local traffic. He did not know whether hon. members were acquainted with Columbia River; if not, he would tell them that a large quantity of grain was transported down that river and shipped to foreign markets every year.

From Portland to Astoria, wheat was transported a distance of 404 miles, partly by water and partly by rail, and was handled eight times, for $6 per ton. From Okanagon to Burrard Inlet it was 358 miles, and the present rate of freight was $51 per ton. With a railway through the canyons of the Fraser, they could carry wheat from Okanagon to Burrard Inlet for $6 per ton; and in the Okanagon and Kamloops country they could raise for exportation, after supplying their home demand, some 50,000 tons. Every one must know that the southern portion of British Columbia was the only section where large grain crops could be grown, and it only required an opening to the seaboard not only to raise sufficient grain for their own consumption, but also to transport to foreign markets. He was now speaking of the country to the east side of the Cascade Mountains, a large extent of country on the Lower Fraser not being taken into consideration. When the hon. the Premier spoke of commencing work at Yale he gave it as his opinion that it would be advantageous to do so on account of having the river navigation for a hundred miles; but he made a mistake when he said the river was open all the year round. It was generally closed during two or three months; though sometimes it was open all the year to steamships. An advantage he (Mr. Dewdney) saw in commencing the construction of the railway from Yale was that as soon as the road pierced the Cascade Mountains the wheat growing country to which he had referred would be opened up, from whence grain could be exported not only to foreign markets, but supplies could be furnished for the road during construction from Yale to Burrard Inlet. The question had been raised, and he had heard it before, in regard to the Fraser River line running close to the American frontier. He had always considered that would be an advantage rather than otherwise. He had always contended that easy communication with the system of railways in Oregon and Washington Territory would be an advantage. With reference to the commercial aspect of the case, the hon. member for Charlevoix had said there would be many miles of towing at Burrard Inlet. He (Mr. Dewdney) contended that when sailing vessels entered the Strait of Fuca they should always be taken in tow, and whether they were towed 70, 50 or 60 miles made very little difference. The eastern trade would all be done by large sized vessels. If they were to have a railway at all, they must have one that would compete with other roads. There was a chance of the Northern Pacific Railway being built, and there were other American lines, and this road must be placed in a favourable position to compete with them. It would be much better to locate the line where it would command some business than where it would secure no business at all; and, if the terminus was fixed at Waddington Harbour, it would get none. If, on the other hand, the Northern Pacific Railway was not built, this route would obtain all the business of Washington Territory and Oregon—a very great advantage. He knew something about the more northerly, the Port Essington route. Seven or eight years ago, he had been engaged by the Local Government to make explorations about the mouth of the Skeena River and the Peace River country. He knew this section thoroughly. He did not object to the explorations proposed by the Premier in this quarter, and he was quite sure that a great deal of valuable information would be obtained, and the Government would find, he believed, that, next to the southern portion of the Province, it was the best part of British Columbia. There were very large tracts of magnificent land in this section, capable of sustaining a very numerous population. But as to its being suitable for the Pacific Railway, he thought that the Premier would discover that it was not as favourable for this purpose as the hon. gentleman might now expect; and that it would be impossible to leave the Skeena River at a less distance than 130 or 140 miles from its mouth to strike into the lake country of which the hon. gentleman had spoken. If this was the case—and he was confident of it—the line if built in this quarter must be some 75 or 100 miles longer than if located to Burrard Inlet. He thought that, when the contract for the telegraph line was awarded, from Cache Creek to Edmonton, this was the proper route. It was a great pity that the contractor had not been allowed to proceed with it. He believed that, at the time this contract was let, the Government favoured the Fraser River route. The Premier knew that the telegraph line must be connected with the present system of telegraph lines in British Columbia. The distance from Edmonton to Bute Inlet was 833 miles, and an additional distance of 75 miles would be required to connect with the present line, making a total of 908 miles, while the distance from Edmonton to Burrard Inlet was 744 miles, and 200 miles of the telegraph line had already been built by the Western Union Telegraph Company, leaving only 544 miles on the Fraser River route to be constructed, as against 908 miles by the other route. This he considered a very strong argument in favour of the construction of this line to where they all believed the terminus of the railway would ultimately be located. Last year, he had stated that, if he found that the Government were prepared so to continue their Pacific Railway policy as to satisfy British Columbia, he would give them his support in the House and in the Province on that question. He was sincere when he made this promise on the 5th of April, last year; but, two days subsequently, during his absence, the hon. member for West Middlesex moved a resolution which he considered to be very unfair, unnecessary and calculated to arouse feelings of animosity in the breasts of all British Columbians. The hon. member for Cumberland had referred to this resolution as having been written by a Minister and passed to the hon. member for Middlesex. He found that, at the time, neither the right hon. member for Kingston nor the hon. member for Cumberland were in the House; it was near the close of the Session when the House was disorganized, and the motion took the members by surprise. He doubted very much whether, if these hon. gentlemen had been present, this motion would have been submitted. He concluded by stating that he should support the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. PLUMB said, when the present Government took office, the question as to the construction of the Pacific Railway was the most important matter before them. They had chosen to adopt a policy entirely different from that adopted in this relation by their predecessors; and now, after three years had elapsed, Parliament was called upon to review this policy. This great project was one which the Parliament and the people of Canada had ratified and adopted, and they would never be satisfied until it was carried out to completion. A large expenditure of money had been made on surveys; and at the present time about 240 miles were under contract. The line between Fort William and Red River had been located far north of the original location; and between the eastern and western terminus was supplemented with water-stretches, which would be closed up in winter. One of the great objects for which the road was projected in the first instance was to people the extensive and fertile lands in the North-West. Hon. gentlemen opposite had opposed the construction of the road in every possible manner; and had exaggerated the engineering and financial difficulties in the way. The resolution proposed by the hon. member for Cumberland was one which might very properly be submitted to the favourable consideration of the House. During the past three years, the whole course of the Government in this regard had been one of hesitation and vacillation, their policy had been half-hearted, and bore evidence that they were not inclined to fulfil the great trust placed in their hands, by building this road. Many of the arguments used against this scheme had been brought forward against the Intercolonial Railway, which, notwithstanding the great depression in commerce, and the fact that this was one of the most unfavourable seasons for railways that had been known for twenty or thirty years, had shown that it would not be the great burden on the country that had been predicted. The loss in working it the last six months had been but thirteen thousand dollars and he believed that, if properly managed, having no rivals, the Intercolonial Railway would not only pay expenses and for repairs, but also yield a revenue besides. Hon. gentlemen opposite had thrown every obstacle in the way of the building of the Pacific Railway, and the expenditure that would entail had been enormously exaggerated. The North-West Territories could not be settled until this line was constructed. They had been told by the Premier that it was originally projected to serve a temporary political purpose, and that there was no good faith in regard to it on that side of the House. They were also told that it would be impossible to build the road with any resources Canada could command, and the speeches of the hon. the Finance Minister tended to depress and understate the resources of the country and to create a distrust of any plan which might be necessary for the construction of this great work. They had an admission from the hon. the First Minister that the line from Fort William to Red River might be a mistake with respect to utilizing the water route, and also in regard to one prominent act with reference to this road—the large purchase of steel rails. He supposed the hon. gentleman claimed that the latter was a commercial transaction, and that he purchased the rails according to the best of his judgment. But his side of the House urged that when the rails were bought there was no prospect of their being required for a long time to come. It was stated that the Chief Engineer recommended the purchase. The Chief Engineer was but an instrument in the hands of the Government; he knew nothing as to the speed with which the construction of the line was to be prosecuted, and was, therefore, not in a position to judge as to the advisability or inadvisability of the purchase. They claimed that the rails were purchased in a falling market, and, moreover, that the Government was not a speculator, and had no right to say "We will buy this or that because it is at a low price." If that principle were carried into other Departments, it would result in a worse state of things than was indicated by the purchase of steel rails. This whole matter was a speculation, and he for one protested against the Government managing the affairs of the country in this way. The Government claimed credit for letting certain contracts on favourable terms. Now there was little ground for such a claim, as the low price for which the work was taken was the inevitable result of the depression of trade and manufactures, and the consequent cheapness of material and labour. But there was another question involved in the purchase of the rails which had not been dealt with. It was found from a return made to the House that 11,000 tons had been laid upon the Intercolonial without the authority of Parliament. For himself, he did not think the rails could be legally used for that purpose. The purchase was made on account of the Pacific Railway, and to apply them to any other use was a violation of a principle which both sides of the House should be anxious to preserve; and that fact was sufficient in itself to justify hon. members in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland. The question of the Georgian Bay Branch had been so ably treated by the hon. member for Lanark that he would not press it further. But there was another subject, which was intimately connected with the best interests of the country, and that was the pushing forward of the railway as an immigration agent. It was the most important and would prove the most effectual means of settling our western lands. The fact that we had far northward and westward of Manitoba a country of the greatest farming value, capable of producing the finer cereals, ought to be an incentive for proceeding rapidly with the railway; and, if this Government were apathetic in this matter, which affected the interests of the whole Dominion, the people would probably find a Government which would build the railway and so open up this valuable country. The construction of a line from Lake Manitoba westwards towards Edmonton was a comparatively easy task, and it would be most valuable as a means of settling the country. In his Budget speech the hon. the Minister of Finance made some very discouraging remarks on the immigration question. The hon. gentleman said it was not desirable that immigrants should be brought into Canada for the North-West, as the grasshoppers might ravage their crops year after year and make it necessary to apply the public money to the relief of the settlers. Now he thought there was little reason for those remarks of the hon. gentleman. If that section could be colonized by the building of the Pacific Railway, and that alone would colonize it, there need be no fear of the people requiring Government aid, as suggested by the hon. the Finance Minister. If it were understood that the Government would undertake the construction of this road with earnestness and singleness of purpose, it would do a great deal towards stimulating and encouraging the people, who were now so depressed by the financial cloud which hung over Canada, and, indeed, the whole world. But every pretext was made for delay; every excuse for delaying the construction of this great work was eagerly seized upon by the Government; and to-night, one of the most remarkable excuses given for the procrastinating policy of the Administration was the war which had broken out in Europe. When they heard the hon. member for North York give that as an excuse, there was a laugh on that side of the House; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dymond) should not infer from that that they under-estimated the vast consequences of the war. No hon. member would undervalue a matter fraught with the gravest consequences to Europe; but the statement that a war declared to-day had delayed the construction of the railway was so ludicrous that hon. members could not help smiling. It was the duty of every hon. gentleman who recognised the importance of this great work to support the resolution of the hon. member for Cumberland. The speech of the hon. the First Minister was no reply to the masterly argument with which the hon. member for Cumberland introduced his motion. To the manly, statesmanlike and comprehensive speech of the hon. member for Cumberland, the hon. the Premier should have made a better response than the one he had made. The speech in reply did not in any way meet the salient points brought forward by the hon. member for Cumberland. There were no arguments in the reply; it was merely a feeble attempt at sarcasm and a repetition of the old jokes, which always brought down the applause of the faithful followers of the hon. the First Minister. He (Mr. Plumb) had yet to learn that any hon. gentleman had done anything towards removing the charges of delay, mismanagement and incompetency which had been brought forward against the Government. It was deeply to be regretted that the discussion should have taken place so late in the Session, and that the hon. the Minister of Public Works doubtless, through the great pressure of work which he had to labour under, had not been able to bring down to the House a statement of the plan of the Government as to the survey and construction of the Pacific Railway with as much particularity and comprehensiveness and geographical knowledge of the country as was required. The Government had shown great reluctance in approaching the subject. The House had waited week after week for a statement as to the condition of the work and the intentions of the Government. And now the policy had been brought down, what was it? It was the most meagre bill of fare that could be placed before the House. It had disappointed even the hon. the First Minister's friends. On former occasions that hon. gentleman constituted himself a whole corps of engineers. He had a mastery of the whole details. Then he had no hesitation in regard to gradients, curves, lines, &c., and he had led the House to expect that he would continue in possession of such full and accurate information. But the information now given to the House by the hon. gentleman was meagre and vague. Canada was bound by all sacred obligations to carry out this work. It was admitted by all sides that Canada was bound to do this. It had its political, financial and physical difficulties, and it needed the united efforts of men of all parties to carry the project through to a successful issue. But there could not be this union of sentiment unless they were all clearly and distinctly and fully taken into the confidence of the gentlemen having the work in charge. The House was groping in the dark. Unless there was a very different policy pursued, the people of Canada would become restive under the delay. One of the most important items was the construction of the line of telegraph, in anticipation of the location of the line of the road. He undertook to say that it was impossible to fix the line of telegraph, for a distance of 1,100 or 1,200 miles, which would cover the ground to be occupied by the line of railway. It was impossible to lay the telegraph until the final location was made, for the least deviation—and it was very natural to suppose that there would be many deviations from the line ultimately to be followed—would render all the work in that respect wasted. Such had been the arguments of the hon. member for Cumberland that no fair-minded man who had listened to the debate, and who was not bound to be one of the “mechanical majority”—to use the happy phrase quoted by that hon. member on another occasion—could refuse to vote for the amendment, which he sincerely trusted would be carried.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that he did not propose at this late hour to occupy much of the time of the House in discussing the present motion, but he felt that he would not be doing his duty to the Province, a portion of which it was his honour to represent, if he did not give some consideration to the railway policy of the Government as affecting Manitoba, and the policy of the Government generally towards that Province. He would frankly state, at the outset, that he had always felt that the small representation which Manitoba enjoyed in Parliament, together with the fact of any new and struggling community needing all the assistance that could legitimately be given by the Government, would render it extremely desirable not only that its representatives should offer no factious opposition, but that the Government of the day should have a fair and liberal support, where that support could be given without prejudicing the interests of the Province. Believing this to be the true policy to be pursued by Manitoba members, it would be found that since the present Government came into office many more votes had been given by him with than against the Government, and that, when the votes had been adverse, it was because he (Mr. Schultz) could not, in the interests of his Province, endorse the action of the Government. The Pacific Railway, at least that portion of it between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains, was of vital importance to the people of the North-West, and the portion between Fort William and the Red River was particularly so to the people of Manitoba. From the very first he had denounced the water-stretch scheme as propounded by the Premier, and he regretted to see that, notwithstanding the clear manner in which its utter futility was shown, the Premier still looked upon it as an important factor in the great question of railway communication with Lake Superior. In all human probability, next year would see a surplus of grain in the Province, and, with their own road uncompleted to Fort William, they must ship, if they shipped at all, through the United States. To do this the people of Manitoba were at the mercy of the river and railway monopolies, which barred the possibility of cheap transportation to the head of Lake Superior. As regarded the prospect of their own railway they were told that the line from Red River to Rat Portage and that from Fort William to Lac des Mille Lacs were under contract, and might be finished in two or three years; and that the intervening distance would be united by the navigable waters of the region till the connecting railway link could be completed. If two or three years were required for the completion of these ends, why wait till then to commence the connecting link? Why not consider the evidence that was accumulating on every side as to the utter impossibility of shipping grain over a route that would need eight transshipments? Why not spend the money which was now being thrown away on the St. Frances Canal on some portion of this connecting line? And why not place under contract at once that work which the Government admitted it must, sooner or later, build. Again, they had the Pembina branch graded two years ago, its rails, carried at an enormous expense from Duluth, left to rust on the banks, while the grading itself was being washed away. The Government, by a proper policy in regard to this line, might have relieved the situation much, and made people more content to wait for the slow progress of the Lake Superior and Red River line. It would be remembered that all the representatives from Manitoba, both in the Commons and Senate, waited on the Premier to ask him to lay the rails on the Pembina branch, and thus save them from the river monopoly, which was draining Manitoba of its money by their high rates of freight, and increasing, consequently, the cost of all imported goods to their people. It would have been thought that the request was reasonable, but it had not been granted, and the condition remained the same. As regarded the railway west of the Red River, it seemed that many years must elapse before that was even commenced, and when it was taken into consideration that its importance as a colonization road could not be overestimated, it would be readily seen how great a disappointment this announcement would cause. Here, again, they found the baneful effect of an affected consideration of the water stretches, and though it had repeatedly been urged that, not only was the Saskatchewan River not navigable for a considerable portion of the summer, but that, emptying three hundred miles north of Winnipeg, it was out of the way of the use of immigrants who wished to settle in the North-West. In matters of general policy, Manitoba had many real grounds of complaint, and, although it had often been brought up against her that enormous sums had been charged to her in the Public Accounts, yet it had invariably been found that the charges were for purposes other than that which related specially to the Province, and were chargeable to the North-West, and to other headings of expenditure. On the other hand the revenue from the Province had been increasing at a ratio much greater than that from any other Province, and while this would continue to increase it would be found that, since the public buildings had been built, their expenditure would decrease almost to a minimum which would cover their subsidy and the usual and proper charges of management. From returns brought down this Session it was shown that they contributed to the general account—

Mr. SCHULTZ.

	Customs.	Excise.	P. Office.
In 1874....	$66,464	$4,246	$ 733
" 1875....	171,493	7,971	3,612
" 1876....	253,351	19,716	7,897

Showing that last year, from Customs, Excise, Post Office, the sale of Bill Stamps, fines and forfeitures, Manitoba had contributed to the General Revenue no less than $281,846.20, and this did not include the sum from the sale of lands. This enormous increase simply showed the progress of the country; it was a country where a fostering care would produce good results, and he (Mr. Schultz) regretted that this had not always been the case. At this moment, there existed a very great grievance in the Province. As soon as the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway west of the Red River had been determined upon, twenty miles of land on each side were withdrawn from sale or settlement. Time passed, and no farther work was done by the Government on the line. If work had been proceeded with, the people would have been satisfied; but, in the Province of Manitoba, and particularly in the county of Lisgar, this reservation had produced the worst of consequences. It had crowded in the new settlements which had been formed east and west of the Red River, outside of the Half-breed reserves, and now threatened to strangle these in their infancy. This grievance was so great that he (Mr. Schultz) had urged it on the Government for two Sessions in succession before this, and last year he had attained his object when the Government introduced a Bill to allow of homestead settlement on certain conditions on this reserve. This Bill, having passed to its final stage, was suddenly withdrawn, and all his efforts had been powerless to induce the Government to reintroduce it. In the meantime, many persons, believing in the good faith of the Government as evinced by their admitting the principle by introducing the Bill, had gone and settled upon these lands, and he believed that they had the right to hold them, and trusted that no attempt would ever be made by the Government to dispossess a single individual of his right. In the matter of these reserves generally there had been the most vexatious and causeless delays. The scrip to Half-breed heads of families should have been issued three years ago, and, had it been, the recipients might have placed it on lands near them, which would have been of some use to them, but on which it was now impossible to place them in consequence of this Railway Reserve. Again, there had been the equally causeless and vexatious delay in the issue to the minors of land to be allotted to them. Had this been done three years ago, those of them old enough might have now had cultivated farms, or had they sold the land it would have afforded an opportunity for others to do the same thing. This delay has been a serious matter both for the natives of the country and the newcomers, and equally prejudicial to both. In fact in Manitoba everything seemed to have been delayed, the adjustment of the hay question, the tardy issue of patents, the settlement of disputed claims, and in proportion, as these had been and were delayed, so much was the country thrown back in its advancement. On matters of general policy, there was not so much to complain, although it was an undoubted fact that the fiscal policy of this year was very prejudicial to their interests, and he had hoped that, when a change was announced to be necessary in the tariff, the increase of duty had not been so arranged that agricultural products from the United States had been made to bear a portion of the burden instead of a direct tax being laid upon tea, which pressed upon every one without promoting or protecting any home industry. In Manitoba it was found that, not only did the Minnesota farmers send in immense herds of cattle and large quantities of flour, but butter, eggs, chickens and a host of minor articles which would in consequence of our low tariff, continue to come, to the detriment of our own farmers, who were able to produce all that Manitoba wanted of these articles, and who found that they were shut off from the United States market by their heavy import duty. In the speech of the hon. member for Cumberlandland was to be found the statement that ten thousand tons of steel rails were carried by the Kittson line from Duluth to Red River at an enormous cost and without the usual formula of tenders being asked; the consequence being, that the line in question pocketed over two hundred thousand dollars of the money of this country. The hon. member also stated that he had learned that the member for Selkirk owned one-half or one-third of the stock of this company and drew general inferences which seemed to have induced the member for Selkirk to deny that he had any connection with the line in question whatever. Now, an enquiry in the facts of the case was worth a few minutes' attention, and, fortunately, the return to an address of the House of Commons, dated 2nd March, 1876, threw what little light there was to be had on this matter. On page 58, of this return, would be found the following letters:—

“OFFICE OF THE RED RIVER
“TRANSPORTATION COMPANY,
“NO. 92, THIRD STREET,
“ST. PAUL, MINN., 21st April, 1875.

“SIR,—In accordance with your wish expressed to our Mr. Hill during his recent visit to Ottawa, I now desire to put in writing the offer made by him to transport railway iron, chairs and spikes from Duluth to a point in Manitoba.

“With reference to the improvements of the rapids mentioned in my offer, I beg leave to state that from the information I have received I am of opinion that it could be made at a very small cost to the Government.

“Very respectfully,
“Your obedient servant,

“OFFICE OF THE RED RIVER
“TRANSPORTATION COMPANY,
“NO. 92, THIRD STREET,
“ST. PAUL, MINN., 21st April, 1875.

“SIR,—I hereby offer to transport railroad iron, chairs, fish-bars, spikes and other material for track, from Duluth, Minnesota, to Winnipeg, Manitoba, or any point on the Red River between Pembina and Winnipeg, at rate of $15.00 U. S. currency per ton of 2,000 lbs; and I further offer that in case the channel of the Red River at the rapids at St. Andrews, between Winnipeg and the Stone Fort, is improved so as to make a channel of sixty feet in width, free from rocks and boulders, so as to enable boats and barges to pass with ordinary safety, to make the same rate, namely:—$15.00 per ton from Duluth to the point of crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway, north of said Stone Fort, or in case the said rapids are not improved, I will allow the barges loaded with such material to be run down to said crossing, provided that the Canadian Government will receipt for the material, at Winnipeg, and will assume all risk of danger of navigation arising from said rapids on down trip to both boat and cargo.

"The above rate to hold good and be in force during the season of navigation on the Red River, as long as there is two feet of water on the rapids and shoals in said river.

"This offer includes all labour in handling above material from the dock at Duluth, to the bank of the river at point of delivery.

"Very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

(Signed,) "N. W. KITTSOON,
"General Manager.

"To the Hon. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, "Minister of Public Works,
"Ottawa.

"[Note]—Write and say Mr. Hill's offer covered all wharfage or other charges at Duluth, and ask that this be also put in writing. A. M."

Nowhere in the return was there found to be any mention of tenders having been asked for, or information sought for as regarded the cheapest mode of shipment, nor did there appear the report of any engineer declaring these rails to be necessary at Red River, and so a very short time afterwards they found the bargain concluded for the transport of five thousand tons on the following terms:—

"OTTAWA, 22nd May, 1875.

"Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 21st ulto., and 8th inst., on behalf of the Red River Transportation Company, offering to transport rails and accessories from Duluth, Minnesota, to a point in Manitoba, on the conditions hereinafter mentioned, I beg to inform you that the Honorable Minister of Public Works accepts of said offer, viz:—

"To transport railroad iron, chairs, fish-bars spikes and other material for track, from Duluth, Minn., to Winnipeg, Manitoba, or any point on Red River between Pembina and Winnipeg, at rate of ($15.00) fifteen dollars, U. S. currency, per ton of two thousand pounds, and in case the channel of the Red River at the Rapids at St Andrews, between Winnipeg and the Stone Fort, is improved so as to make a channel of sixty feet in width free from rocks and boulders, so as to enable boats and barges to pass with ordinary safety, to make the same rate, namely, fifteen dollars per ton from Duluth to the point of crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway, north of said Stone Fort, or in case the said rapids are not improved, to allow the barges loaded with such railway material to be run down to said crossing, provided that the Canadian Government will receipt for the material at Winnipeg and will assume all risk of damages of navigation arising from said rapids on down trip to both boat and cargo.

"The above rate to hold good and be in force during the season of navigation on the Red River, as long as there is two feet of water on the rapids and shoals in said river.

"This offer to include all labour in handling above material from the dock at Duluth to the bank of the river at point of delivery, also, all wharfage or other charges at Duluth, but not charges which might arise in the United States Customs Department.

"The transportation of these rails, about five thousand tons, to take place within one month from their arrival at Duluth.

"The point of delivery of these rails, &c., to be indicated by the Government.

"I have, &c.,

"N. W. KITTSOON, Esq.,
"General Manager,
"Red River Transportation Co.,
"St. Paul, Minnesota, U. S."

Now it would be noticed that the agreement at this exorbitant rate only covered five thousand tons, and yet they found, from a return to an address of the Senate dated 15th February, 1877, that there was delivered at St. Boniface 12,008 tons, and at Selkirk 918 tons, at a cost to the Government, according to the contract quoted, of nearly two hundred thousand dollars, and this rendered easy the explanation of why the Kittson line could divide eighty per cent. on its stock among its shareholders. But how came about this enormous waste of the public money? How was it that, when an opposition steamboat line was known to be in operation on the Red River, tenders were not asked for?—and why was it that the enormous price only originally promised for 5,000 tons, should have been extended to 12,926 tons? The hon. member for Selkirk said he had nothing to do with the Kittson line; but certain it was that rumour gave him the credit of owning indirectly a large quantity of its stock. Certain it was that Mr. Kittson merged the agency of the Hudson Bay Company into the management of the Kittson line, which was commenced mainly with the boats of the Hudson Bay Company. Of course, it was not at all likely that the name of the hon. member for Selkirk appeared in the stock books of the Kittson Company, for that would vitiate the right of the company receiving bonded goods; yet there were other ways of holding stock than the open one of having names in full in the stock books of the company. If no one deeply interested in the success of this line vouched for Mr. J. J. Hill, who so deftly manipulated the contract, how was it that the Premier chose to jump at the offer of a stray American, who came along with his offer to carry rails at twice the price the transportation was worth, and at least one-third more than it would have cost the Government had tenders been asked for from the rival line on the Red River, and others? He regretted that he could not support the Government on their railway policy, and he saw little hope of their plan succeeding in making the western portion of the road the great means of colonization, which it was capable of, and felt deeply grieved when, in the cross fire with the member for Cumberland about the value of the lands which the Government had to offer to aid in building the Pacific Railway, the Premier should have felt called upon to sneer at the value set upon them by that gentleman, and to express a doubt of their being worth to contractors one dollar an acre, which taken in connection with the statement of the Minister of Finance, that we did not want immigrants, because there was a doubt of the country being able to support them, was not calculated to rejoice the hearts of those who, like himself, believed that we had in the North-West the richest agricultural country in the world, and the source of any future greatness which our country might attain. He (Mr. Schultz) would say now that he firmly believed that the hon. member for Selkirk was just what the hon. member for Cumberland had stated—a participator in the profits of that line.

Mr. SPEAKER called the hon. gentleman to order, and said that the hon. member for Selkirk had positively denied that he was a shareholder in the company referred to and that he participated in the profits; and no hon. gentleman, therefore, should undertake to say otherwise, unless he was prepared to make a formal charge.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he had no wish to dispute the statement of his hon.

friend from Selkirk (Mr. Smith). He was aware that the statement of hon. gentlemen in this House must be received as the truth, no matter what other hon. members might believe; but, as his hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had derived that information from him, he (Mr. Schultz) must state why he arrived at that belief. He based it mainly on public documents and especially on the letters he had read. He believed Mr. Hill had a very strong backing in his dealings with the Government, and, as Mr. Speaker had stopped him, he would not, of course, say where that backing was.

Mr. DYMOND: Does that prove the partnership between the hon. member for Selkirk and the firm of Kittson?

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk): Might I ask if the hon. gentleman would be permitted to give any authority for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think I am called upon to state that I never did have a conversation of any kind whatever with Mr. Smith regarding this matter.

Mr. SCHULTZ: Then I would be glad if the Premier, as he is in a mood of explanation, would explain how he gave the contract to Mr. J. J. Hill without asking for tenders on a matter which would be likely to cost so much—comparatively unknown as Mr. J. J. Hill was?

Mr. MACKENZIE said they received two tenders. One was for $13.50 in gold, but they declined to pay the charges at Duluth and other places. The other was for $15 in American currency, the tenderers taking all the charges and transhipments until they reached the points of destination near Winnipeg. These were the two tenders, and the Government chose the lowest. He was not aware whether he saw Mr. Hill himself or not. His impression was that it was his deputy. He had no doubt it was the latter who made the arrangement.

Mr. SCHULTZ said the explanation did not refer to his question at all. It did not state that tenders were solicited. In the same return from which he had quoted there was a tender for $13.50, from some parties in Hamilton, who had no means of transportation unless they built boats on the Red River. But had his hon. friend taken the slightest precaution, he would have found that a rival line to this Kittson Company, with two magnificent boats and barges, were in existence in open and avowed hostility to the firm which got the contract, and he could not conceive why tenders were not asked for from them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Were there any tenders?

Mr. SCHULTZ said he had never seen any asked for in the public prints, and he believed there were none. He contended that there was no excuse for the action of his hon. friend the Premier, particularly in increasing the amount of rails contracted to be carried. He considered it was the duty of everyone to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. YOUNG said hon. gentlemen opposite certainly manifested courage in moving the vote of want of confidence now in the Speaker's hands. If there was one question more than another which those gentlemen ought to be ashamed to bring before this House, it was the question of the Pacific Railway, for there was no question in which had been more clearly exhibited, not only the extravagance, but the corruption and wild recklessness of their schemes to keep themselves in power. He, for one, had always been favourable to the construction of the Pacific Railway. He had felt that, if these different Provinces were to be united together under one Government, it was absolutely necessary that railway communication between the most distant Provinces should be supplied. But he had always considered the scheme of the late Government one of the maddest projects ever propounded by a Government to an intelligent assembly. There was only one rational way to account for the extraordinary bargain with British Columbia, and what this was he had pointed out when the question was brought before Parliament in 1871. Subsequent events had shown that he was correct, and that hon. gentlemen opposite had deliberately undertaken to degrade this great public work—the greatest public undertaking ever commenced on this continent—into a mere engine to effect political purposes; and their whole scheme, from beginning to end, was framed with a view to surround themselves with a gigantic ring of railway and political speculators, in order to keep themselves in office. A leading member of the late Government had stated, when the Intercolonial Railway was proposed, that the hon. member for Kingston must have lost his usual astuteness, if, with the expenditure of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 on that line, he did not hold office for ten years, and with the expenditure of three times that amount on the Pacific Railway, the late Government majority naturally concluded that they would be able to retain office for the remainder of their natural lives. He approved of the present Government's Pacific Railway policy, in undertaking to build the line only as fast as the resources of the country admitted. One section of it, however, might, with great propriety, be carried forward—the portion between Lake Superior and Manitoba. Considerable progress had already been made in the construction of this section, the whole distance, with the exception of 182 miles, being under contract. He believed he spoke the sentiments of the majority of the commercial people of the country when he said that the best interests of the Dominion would be promoted by building this section with all convenient speed. It was all important to pour immigration into the magnificent territories of the North-West, and, to attain this desirable end, the country would support the Government in completing an all rail route from the head of Lake Superior to Winnipeg at the earliest possible moment. He was of opinion that the Georgian Bay Branch was conceived in the interests of the Dominion, and that it was wise policy to construct a straight line from the Canada Central to the mouth of French River, leaving it the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec to connect their railway system with the Pacific Line in the neighbourhood of Burnt Lake. The hon. member for South Lanark had endeavoured to torture certain facts relating to the Georgian Bay Branch, so as to tell against the Government; but these circumstances, when properly explained, would not bear the construction put on them by the hon. gentleman. It was a common thing, when contractors failed to carry forward public works with sufficient speed, to cancel the contracts. They knew that the late Government had quashed the contract granted to Sir Hugh Allan and Co., and also returned the $1,000,000 put up as security.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): And you found fault with them.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. gentleman is debarred from attacking the Government on this ground when the late Government pursued a similar policy, and to a larger extent.

Mr. GIBBS: And now it justifies you.

Mr. YOUNG: All I have to say is that I do not think fault ought properly to have been found with the late Government for the return of the million so put up by Sir Hugh Allan's Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Did you not find fault with it, though?

Mr. YOUNG: I am not aware that I did. There were much more important and darker features in the transaction to find fault with.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings): But Sir Hugh Allan did not get $109,000.

Mr. YOUNG maintained that the Government had pursued a reasonable policy. They took the course usually followed by Governments under similar circumstances, and blame could not be properly attached to them on that account. The hon. member for South Lanark had asserted that the amounts paid to the contractor (Mr. Foster) had been handed over without certificates from the Chief Engineer as to the value the country received from the work done. This was an entire misrepresentation of the facts. Mr. Fleming had affirmed before the Public Accounts Committee that he (Mr. Fleming) believed the country had obtained value for the work done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was no certificate, though.

Mr. HAGGART: What I said was that Mr. Sandford Fleming, in his evidence before the Public Accounts Committee, stated that he had given no certificate as to the $41,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He said nothing of the kind.

Mr. YOUNG said the hon. gentleman had distinctly stated in his first remarks that these payments had been made without any certificates. If hon. gentlemen would turn to page 3 of the official return brought down, they would find the first certificate given by Mr. Fleming for the payment of $23,346 on iron rails, and on page 8, the certificate for the payment of $45,289, these two sums making the $68,000 paid for iron rails—not at $48 per ton, as the hon. gentleman had alleged, but at only 75 per cent. of this price, as the certificates proved. Regarding the payments for surveys Mr. Fleming stated that good value had been obtained. The Engineer's letter ran as follows:—

“CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY, “OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER-IN-CHIEF,
“OTTAWA, 28th April, 1876.

“With respect to that part of the Order in Council of March 8th, touching the value of the works of exploration, survey, and construction performed by the Hon. A. B. Foster, I have made every enquiry into the subject, and I feel assured that in the event of the Georgian Bay Branch being proceeded with, the expenditure incurred will generally be available in the prosecution of the work.”

Mr. Fleming had advised the Minister of Public Works in every step taken with regard to this matter, and it was on the Chief Engineer's recommendation the payments had been made. Mr. Foster had not been paid one cent save on duly certified vouchers, showing that the money was actually expended in the service of the country. They had also the further statement made by Mr. Fleming that, after adding on the amount since paid to complete the surveys, those of the Georgian Bay Branch had been performed as cheaply, if not cheaper, than on any other portions of the Pacific Railway.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Allow me to read from the evidence of Mr. Fleming:

"Q. You say you have not seen the vouchers for the payment of $41,000?—A. I have not seen them except on the outside.

"Q. Are you aware that an Order in Council requires payments on the certificate of the engineers, and do you hold yourself responsible for the payment of the $41,000 dollars?—A. I have not certified at all for the payment of the $410,00.

"Q. You have not seen the vouchers and you have not certified the payments?"

Mr. MACKENZIE: That refers to two distinct things. Here is a letter stating that the amounts to be paid on these surveys would be for value received; but the vouchers therefor were presented to the Accountant in his Department. The Accountant distinctly testified before the Committee that there were vouchers in his possession for every farthing of the outlay, excepting some $1,200 or $1,300. The hon. gentleman misrepresents the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I read the evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman only read part of it. He read what suited him and kept back the rest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will not allow you to state that. You say what is not—it would not be parliamentary to say what it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can refer to many parts of the hon. gentleman's parliamentary career which are very much worse than what he intended to say.

Mr. YOUNG said he was present when both Mr. Fleming and the Accountant were examined. The latter affirmed that he had vouchers for everything except a trifling sum, and this he expected to get shortly. Mr. Fleming could not certify as to the accounts, because they did not properly come before the Chief Engineer; but the Accountant, the proper officer to audit them, testified that he examined them minutely and found them correct. The hon. member for South Lanark had said that not a single rail had been laid down on the Canada Central Extension, and yet the Government had paid Mr. Foster for rails said to be delivered. If the hon. gentleman was present before the Committee when

Mr. Fleming made his statement, he could not acquit him (Mr. Haggart) of disingenuousness in making this assertion. Mr. Fleming had said that the terminus was to be between Renfrew and Douglas, and that, when it was uncertain which of these two routes the terminus would be nearest, the proper place to lay down the rails was Renfrew, where railway carriage terminated. He alleged, further, that the usual course in delivering rails was to take them to the nearest point by water or rail, and that, if the rails had been taken to Douglas, it was possible they might have had to be conveyed a further distance back again than if left at Renfrew. This statement had not been contradicted. It was well known the Minister of Public Works had had nothing whatever to do with fixing the price of the rails. Mr. Fleming, who was entirely responsible for them, had given to the Committee the data on which he had determined the price paid as being fair and just. There was no evidence to prove that the rails were bad. One witness had merely stated that a few of them were worn out, having been used in ballasting. The only argument of the hon. member for South Lanark in this regard was that Mr. Foster, in the course of a law suit, had pleaded that the rails were not good; but this was evidence of a very indefinite character; no proof had been adduced before the Public Accounts Committee to show that they were not a fair sample of iron rails. Very great stress had been laid by the hon. gentleman on the fact that Mr. Foster had asked for the loan of 100 tons of rails; but in this there was nothing extraordinary. The people of Pembroke were anxious to secure the opening of the Canada Central to their town; and it was very natural, when much delay was likely to arise for want of a few rails to complete the last mile or two, that the loan of one hundred tons should be requested. Neither did he see anything very wonderful in the fact that Mr. Foster, finding this quantity insufficient for the purpose, had taken 117 tons more to finish the work. This circumstance was afterwards communicated to the Department, and an officer had been sent to come and take charge of the rails; but, before any whatever were taken, £5,000 worth of bonds of the South Eastern Railway were deposited with the Government, which bonds, it was reasonable to suppose, would be sufficient security for the return of the rails. The hon. member for South Lanark went on to say that Mr. Foster seemed to have been favoured, because he had given the Government information which led to the exposures connected with the Pacific scandal. He was not aware that this was the case; but, if Mr. Foster had given such information, was it not possible that this was the very reason why he was hounded down by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The general feeling in the country would be that, if Mr. Foster had been the means of exposing the transactions with Sir Hugh Allan, he had done a real service to the people of Canada.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario): And he was well paid for it.

Mr. YOUNG said that, if such information had not been obtained, and if the railway scheme of the late Government had been carried out as proposed, the prosperity of the Dominion might have been ruined. The policy in regard to the Pacific Railway at present being pursued was far superior to that of the late Government, and without entering at length into the subject, he would briefly draw a few points of contrast between them. Hon. gentlemen opposite solemnly undertook to complete the 2,700 miles of railway in ten years, and he did not hesitate to say, on his responsibility as a representative of the people, that if such an attempt had been earnestly made it would have been fraught with disaster and ruin to the interests of this country; the policy of the present Government, on the other hand, was simply to carry on the railway and build it as the finances of the country would permit. The late Government undertook to construct 260 miles additional railway, from Bute Inlet to Esquimalt, the estimated cost of which, by Mr. Marcus Smith, including the bridging at Seymour Narrows, was $27,500,000; the present Government had abandoned that portion of the scheme, and at one stroke saved that large amount of money to the country. Another contrast between the two schemes would not be unnoticed by the people of Canada. The road was to be begun at both ends, and completed from ocean to ocean simultaneously—than which nothing more reckless could be conceived; the present Government had adopted the wise course of constructing the line in parts, and proceeding first with those sections which would tend to settle and develop the North-west Territories. The late Government took away from Parliament and assumed themselves the power to select the route, name the Pacific Railway Company, and give them any charter they pleased—and their trafficking with Sir Hugh Allan proved why they did so. Under the present policy the route had to be submitted to Parliament, and the work had to be let by tenders asked for publicly, and the sanction of Parliament had to be obtained for every contract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: How about the St. Frances Locks?

Mr. YOUNG: That was one of those works which it was almost impossible to contract for, and it was being done by day's labour. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) spent $1,000,000 himself on day's labour for that line.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not against the Act of Parliament.

Mr. YOUNG said the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch was submitted to Parliament, which was also asked to sanction the letting of the contracts for the road from Fort William westwards—the portion from the Kaministiquia River to Lake Shebandowan—and from Rat Portage to the Red River country, and the House would also be asked to sanction any contracts made in the future. Looking at it from every point of view, the policy of the present Government on the Pacific Railway must commend itself to the wisdom and good sense of the people of this country. By the overthrow of the late Government and the termination of their absurd and ruinous bargain with British Columbia, Canada was rescued from one of the greatest dangers that ever threatened it; and he felt assured that the policy of constructing the railway in parts, and only as the finances of the country would warrant, was one which commended itself to the people, and would do much to ensure a continuance of that confidence which the present Government had so largely enjoyed during the past four years.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he thought that the clear and enlightened views expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) must have convinced the House that the policy of the Government had not been satisfactory, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Young) had lauded them for the able and intelligent manner in which they were prosecuting this great work. That hon. gentleman had tried to throw every obliquy he could upon the scheme of the late Government; but he believed that, at the next general election, the people would show by their votes that they had the utmost confidence in the ability of the members of the late Administration to complete the Pacific Railway. After waiting anxiously for weeks and weeks, they were favoured, at the close of the Session, with the announcement of the hon. the Premier's policy for this year; and they found that the course laid down for the coming season was only a repetition of the indefinite delay which had characterised this Government in regard to this undertaking. Last year the hon. gentleman said the work would be ready for contract by this time; but now he came forward and made the same statement. He told them again that he hoped to be in a position to complete the surveys this year; and Lord Carnarvon, in his despatch, entreated the people of British Columbia to wait another year, so that the Government might be in a position to determine the route. Patience might be a virtue, but the people of British Columbia had borne the taunts and contumely cast upon them for years long enough. It was time something more tangible than surveys should be shown. Why could not the Government of this country take an example from the United States. That country built a line from Omaha to Sacramento, a distance of 1,800 miles, through as wild a country as the Canadian Pacific Railway would pass through. That road was built by private companies, in the same manner as the late Government proposed to build our railway. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue stated that the Union Pacific cost $215,000,000. He would like to know where the hon. gentleman got that information, because he believed he (Mr. Laflamme) was the only man outside the ring that constructed the road who knew what it cost. But that road, as far as expenditure was concerned, was no guide for us, as it was placed in the hands of a ring, and the contracts were let at enormous prices to the directors themselves. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government did not seem to appreciate the results which would follow the construction of the Pacific Railway. If it were earnestly proceeded with it would prove a source of wealth to the country, inasmuch as it would cause a speedy influx of immigrants to the fertile prairies of the west. Although he agreed in some respects with the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Dewdney), yet he rather favoured the northern route, if it were practicable to carry it out. According to the estimate of Mr. Fleming, the Bute Inlet route would cost $2,000,000 less than the Burrard Inlet route. It was true that compensating advantages were supposed to exist in favour of the latter, but, for himself, he thought the Bute Inlet route would be found the more preferable of the two. He could not believe that the Ministry were as sincere as the Premier would lead them to believe; at least he believed that a large portion of the followers of the Government did not ever expect and did not wish that the road would ever be built. The Pacific Railroad would not be for the benefit of British Columbia alone, but of the whole Dominion. He trusted that the gentlemen would have sufficient foresight to spare no effort to carry on this great national work, which was essentially necessary for binding the country together, building up a mighty empire, and making Canada a rival of the United States. But, as long as the road was only built in little pieces, and water-stretches were depended on, and rails were piled up for years, no good would be done. Taking all the circumstances into account, he considered it his duty to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. BANNATYNE said that, at this late hour, he trusted the hon. members of this House would excuse him for making a few remarks regarding this Pacific Railway. He was pleased to see the great interest taken by all members in this House to have that iron link fairly commenced which would bind all the Provinces of this Dominion, as they should be, in one great nation. He had much pleasure in hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland and others, who said that the great North-West was to be the garden of this country and one of the finest wheat-growing countries in the world, with a soil and climate as good as any. Now that they had an immigration pouring into that country from all parts of the globe, they trusted that road would be pushed forward as rapidly as could be done and he must say that, from what the hon. Premier had said, he believed he intended doing so; and he trusted that he would reconsider the report of the Chief Engineer and have that road go by the south of Lake Manitoba instead of by the Narrows. Although a great national highway, in Manitoba they believed it to be the shortest, with 60 per cent. better land and easier of construction. They sincerely trusted and begged that the Minister of Public Works would have a survey made of this southern route this summer. He felt justified in saying that every man in Manitoba to-day was anxious for it, and, if they were determined not to do so, he might say that he had had a petition sent to him for His Excellency the Governor-General, praying for a grant of land for the Western Railway Company who were willing to build that road by the south of Lake Manitoba. Regarding the Fort Frances Locks, he did not object to the work so long as it did not delay the great Pacific Railway, and he believed it an earnest of the anxiety of the Government to do all they could to open up that country. They had a fine section of farming and timber country there. He was sorry to hear the remarks made by the member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) respecting a gentleman who was not a member of this House, and had no means of answering him as he would do were he here. That gentleman was Mr. J. J. Hill, of St. Paul, Minnesota, a member of the Kittson Transportation Company. Mr. Hill was a gentleman and one who knew the hon. member for Lisgar very well. He had known both Mr. Kittson and Mr. Hill for many years, and these gentlemen were doing far more to-day to assist the Dominion Government to improve and colonize that great North-West than the hon. member for Lisgar. Only the other day this Mr. Hill, a Canadian born and brought up, now in the United States, like many others of his countrymen, was doing all he could to assist us to build up that great North-West, and the Kittson Line was the only company which could receive contracts for bringing in those famous steel rails. There was no other line of boats, and certainly they could not do so by flat boats—the only other means they had. And, when the merchants of that country did try to get up a line of boats to oppose these parties, he believed the hon. member for Lisgar was not there. The member for Lisgar asked if he (Mr. Bannatyne) was a member of that Transportation Company. That was his affair. He did say that the hon. member for Selkirk was not a partner of that company. He believed the hon. member for Cumberland was perfectly satisfied that such was the case after hearing the remarks made by Mr. Smith. He sincerely trusted the Government of the day would push forward the Pacific Railway with all haste, and they would find the money would be well invested, and he believed the Government of the day would do all they could.

Mr. DECOSMOS said his constituents did not approve of the policy of the Government with respect to the Pacific Railway, and he should, therefore, feel bound as representing their views, to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland. However, before the House went into concurrence upon the item, he should take an opportunity of expressing his views more fully.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MANITOBA JUNCTION RAILWAY BILL.—[BILL No. 117.]

(Mr. Thompson, Haldimand.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. HOLTON moved that the order of reference of the Manitoba Junction Railway Bill to the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines be discharged, and the fees thereon be refunded.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand) moved for leave to withdraw said Bill.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 122) Respecting the Act further securing the Independence of Parliament.

THE SEAT FOR MONTREAL WEST.

MOTION TO REFER.

Mr. MOUSSEAU made the following statement :—

"That it appears from the Public Accounts laid before this House in this Session of 1877, that some time in the year 1876 the sum of $272.21 was paid to the firm of Frothingham & Workman out of the public monies, for hardware supplied for repairs, furniture, etc., to the Penitentiaries of the Dominion. That it also appears, and that he is credibly informed and believes that he can establish, that divers sums of money were also paid during the same year, and during the ensuing nine months expiring on the 1st day of April, instant, out of public monies, to the said firm of Frothingham & Workman, for hardware and other goods supplied to the Department of Public Works for repairs and other works made and to be made on the following Canals, Lachine, Carillon and Grenville, Beauharnois, Chambly, Ste. Anne's Locks, and St. Ours Locks. And that he is credibly informed and believes he can establish that the monies so paid to the said firm of Frothingham & Workman were so paid under contracts and agreements between the said firm and public officers representing the Board of Directors of Penitentiaries and the Department of Public Works, and that Thomas Workman, Esq., a Member of this House, was, at the time when the said contracts and agreements were entered into, and the said payments made, a member of the said firm, and also a Member of this House for the Electoral District of Montreal West."

He moved :

"That, whereas it appears from the Public Accounts laid before this House in this Session of 1877, that some time in the year of 1876, the sum of $272.21 was paid to the firm of Frothingham & Workman, out of the public monies, for hardware supplied for repairs, furniture, etc., to the Penitentiaries of the Dominion ;

"That, whereas it also appears, and that Mr. Mousseau, a Member of this House, has stated in his place in the House that he is credibly informed, and believes, that he can establish that divers sums of money were also paid during the same year, and during the ensuing nine months expiring on the 1st day of April, instant, out of public monies, to the said firm of Frothingham & Workman, for hardware and other goods supplied to the Department of Public Works for repairs and other works made on the following Canals, Lachine, Carillon and Grenville, Beauharnois, Chambly, Ste. Anne's Locks and St. Ours Locks ;

"And, whereas the said Mr. Mousseau, a Member of this House, has also stated in his place in the House that he is informed, and believes he can also establish, that the monies so paid to the said firm of Frothingham & Workman were so paid under contracts and agreements between the said firm and public officers representing the Board of Directors of Penitentiaries and the Department of Public Works, and that Thomas Workman, Esq., a Member of this House, was at the time when the said contracts and agreements were entered into, and the said payments made, a Member of the said firm, and also a Member of this House for the Electoral District of Montreal West ; be it therefore "Ordered, that the matter therein stated be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that they be directed to enquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and to report the result of their enquiries, and whether the said Thomas Workman has vacated his seat."

Mr. WORKMAN : Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I beg to say a word or two in explanation. In reference to this transaction, Sir, I have merely to say that I have no personal knowledge of it whatever. The amount the hon. gentleman mentions probably has been paid to my firm. I never saw the party who made the purchase ; I never spoke to him. I never saw the goods laid out, as we call it. I never saw the invoice until this morning. I would not know the gentleman who purchased the goods if I saw him ; and therefore, I am quite willing to submit the whole of this matter to a Committee of this House. If I have unintentionally erred, of course I must submit to the consequences, but I have had no personal knowledge of those facts. If this system is to be carried on, the only plan for hon. members to adopt hereafter is to place a detective or policeman at the doors of their offices and warehouses to prevent people going in to buy goods. They would be safe under that provision, and that provision only.

Motion agreed to.

THE SEAT FOR HOCHELAGA.

MOTION TO REFER.

Mr. CASEY made the following statement:—

“That he is credibly informed, and believes he can establish, that in the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, the newspaper Le Nouveau Monde, published at Montreal, was paid divers sums out of the public monies for advertising, printing and stationery, printed and done by the said paper for public offices, to wit:—the Department of Militia, the Post Office, the Inspectors of Penitentiaries, and the Public Works, per agreement, and under contract with the officers of the said Departments, and that at all the times above mentioned Alphonse Desjardins, Esq., a Member of this House for the Electoral District of Hochelaga, was the sole editor of the said newspaper, and published the same for his sole benefit and advantage, and that the said Alphonse Desjardins was then and is now a Member of this House for the Electoral District of Hochelaga.”

He moved:

“That, whereas it appears in the years 1874, 1875 and 1876, the newspaper Le Nouveau Monde, published at Montreal, was paid divers sums out of the public monies for advertising, printing and stationery, printed and done by the said paper for public offices, to wit:—The Department of Militia, the Post Office, the Inspectors of Penitentiaries, and the Public Works, per agreement and under contract with the officers of the said Departments, and that at all the times above mentioned, Alphonse Desjardins, Esq., a Member of this House for the Electoral District of Hochelaga, was the sole editor of the said newspaper, and published the same for his sole benefit and advantage, and that he said Alphonse Desjardins, was then, and is now, a Member of this House for the Electoral District of Hochelaga; be it therefore

“Ordered, that the matter herein stated be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that they be directed to enquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and to report the result of their enquiries, and whether the said Alphonse Desjardins has vacated his seat.”

Mr. DESJARDINS: I have no reason to thank the hon. member for Elgin for the courtesy he has shown in my regard in this instance. I have not had the advantage, like others, of receiving notice that he was going to move against me. I think that the courtesy extended to others under the circumstances ought to have been exhibited towards myself. No notice was given me of the intention of the hon. member to make this childish accusation against me to-day. The only answer I have to give is this: In the first place I am not the proprietor of the Nouveau Monde; I am only a shareholder in the company that owns it, and my experience has been something like that of others regarding political papers. I have expended money on it, but I failed to receive any. I am ready to abide by the decision of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

GOVERNMENT NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved that tomorrow the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the sum of £50,000 stg., second preference bonds now held by the Government of Canada, part of a certain sum of £283,000 stg., of second preference bonds issued by the Northern Railway Company of Canada, shall hold equal rank and priority with other bonds of the same character in any re-arrangement that may be authorized by an Act passed during this Session; and, further, that the sum of £50,000 stg., part of a certain sum of £100,000 stg., of third preference bonds issued by the said Company, and now held by the Government of Canada, together with the interest thereon, be extinguished on the following conditions:—

“1st. That the said Company shall, within one year from the first day of May, 1877, pay to the Government the sum of £45,000 stg. in cash, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

“2nd. That the said Company shall, within the same period, pay the Government of Canada the sum of twenty-seven thousand four hundred and fifty-eight dollars and eighty-seven cents, in satisfaction of the sums improperly applied by the Company out of the monies payable to the Government of Canada, and also assign the mortgage now held by the said Company on the Couchiching Hotel for monies advanced thereon.”

He said that at present the Government held two distinct sums of £50,000 each, in claims against the Northern Railway Company; one consisting of Second Preference Bonds, and the other, of Third Preference Bonds. They proposed, regarding the former, which were part of a sum total of $283,000, of Second Preference Bonds, to accept the same terms as the majority of the holders of the bonds were willing to accept, that was to say : to allow themselves to rank after the issue of the bonds, the House had lately authorized, on the conditions specified. As to the second £50,000 of Third Preference Bonds, with interest thereon, they proposed to accept £45,000, sterling, payable within one year, and drawing interest at the rate of five per cent., from the 1st of May next, in satisfaction of their claim. The position of the Third Preference Bonds was this : no interest had been paid on these £50,000 by the Company, and a sum of about £17,000 sterling was due thereon. It was not at all easy to form an exact estimate of their value. The Second Preference Bonds were selling in London during the past year, at a rate varying from 88 to 90, or thereabouts, in the open market. The rate that would be paid under this proposition would be in the neighbourhood of some 70c. on the dollar, and he thought that this was as near the value of the Third Preference Bonds as possible, and considerably more, he had every reason to believe, than they could be sold for in the open market. Under the terms of the Act, if the company did not choose to accept this proposition—providing it were passed—the rank and priority of the Government bonds would remain undisturbed. Certain other claims, detailed in the report of Committee submitted to the House, made in all about $27,000, and they deemed it right that the company should refund this to the Government, that amount having been paid out of monies which ought to have been used in liquidating the interest due the Government. These sums would be found detailed in the first eleven sections of the report. About $13,500 had been paid on account of the steamer Chicora ; this might be said to have been advanced for the legitimate purposes of the company, and therefore he had not thought it proper to make any claim for it.

Mr. CAMERON said he would like to ask the Minister of Finance if the sum of $27,000 included the $2,000 reported as paid to Mr. Moberley.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT : Yes.

Mr. CAMERON : Will the hon. gentleman state the principle on which this is considered an improper payment, if there is any principle about it ?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT : I accepted the report of the Committee regarding it. This was, I think, not entitled to be charged to legitimate working expenses.

Mr. CAMERON said that surely a bonus paid to an officer of the road could be rightly charged as a legitimate expense. The practice was common among public companies and private individuals. The Government also gave gratuities to persons when retiring from service after having served the country for many years. This was an every day occurrence. He was entirely at a loss to conceive how the Committee could come to any such conclusion. He was equally at a loss to discover the principle on which the company was ordered to refund the $27,000. The company, according to the Committee's report, had misappropriated $27,000, and the Government told them that because they were unfortunate enough to lose this, they must pay it over again ; because, if any one, the company had been defrauded of this money.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT : No. The Government was defrauded.

Mr. CAMERON said that, if this money had not been so expended, it would not have been paid to the Government, but to the reduction of the floating debt, which at present, he believed, exceeded $200,000. To his own knowledge, during the last six or seven years, the company had owed one gentleman who had supplied them with iron four or five times, $27,000 continually. How this sum could have been paid the Government passed his comprehension. After an investigation of weeks and months, the result related to this paltry $27,000 as having been misappropriated during a period of nineteen years, extending from 1858 to 1877, when the company's receipts had exceeded $11,000,000, the company having carried on a very large business. He could only say it was an instance of a mountain having laboured and brought forth a mouse. The investigation might have served political ends, but it had been of no benefit to the country. It had led to a waste of time and money. It was as if the Government said to the company: "You want some legislation in order to get your share capital on a proper basis, and we will make you pay blackmail to that extent to let the Bill through." The investigation had been proceeding here for weeks past; fifteen or twenty tons of books belonging to the company had been brought down, and the time of the House and of members had been continually occupied with it. Not only so, but the Government were willing apparently to go into the business of hotel keeping, because a mortgage on a hotel property belonging to the company was asked for. He knew that the Minister of Public Works was a very efficient public servant, who could carry through almost anything he undertook; but he would apply to this case the old Yankee saying: "You may be a mighty smart man, but you cannot run a hotel." He doubted that the hon. gentleman was so very able as to be capable of running the Couchiching Hotel. The whole result had been to make a farce of the proceedings, and the report of the Committee was very unjust and partizan. If certain transactions were reported, why were not others? While they were reporting lawyers' fees, why did they not state that Mr. Biggar received $15,000 of the company's money, and the preposterous sum of $2,500 for carrying one little Bill through Parliament? Why did they not report that the firm of Morrison, Wells and Gordon had received $10,000, which was equally out of all proportion for the services rendered? The explanation as to why these facts were not mentioned in the report lay, no doubt, in the fact that Mr. Biggar and the active member of the firm of Morrison, Wells & Gordon were friends of the hon. members opposite. The $1,000 paid to Mr. Gordon Brown, Mr. Cumberland admitted, was given with the view of greasing the wheels of the Globe newspaper. But not one word was said about that. It was beneath the dignity of this House to take a mortgage upon the Couchiching Hotel property on account of the alleged defalcations of $27,000. He did not think such action would raise Canada in the eyes of the stockholders in England.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said for a considerable number of years the company had paid the interest on the three preferential bonds with the exception of the interest on these bonds belonging to the Government.

Mr. TUPPER: What is the amount of interest each year?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: £3,000, making about £17,000 in all. Had not that been the case there might be some force in what the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had stated. There had been large amounts misappropriated which otherwise might have gone to the payment of the Government interest. The company itself did not dispute that these moneys were improperly applied.

Mr. ARCHIBALD said, without entering fully into the merits of the report, there were one or two points raised by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) which deserved some attention. It should be remembered that the enquiry had been extended to the point ultimately fixed upon by the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston. He could not see that the report was unjust. It was carefully drawn so that it should not contain one single word which was not fully, and sometimes more than fully, borne out by the evidence. He challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to say that one single particular in the report varied from the facts as brought out in evidence. The $2,000 paid to Mr. Moberley was held to be improperly paid on the same ground as the other payments. It appeared not to have been anything new for some of the officers of the company to overdraw their salaries. When the new elevators were constructed, Mr. Moberley received in addition to his salary large commissions, and yet over-drew his account by $2,000, which was balanced by making the sum appear as a bonus. It was complained that the charges against Messrs. Morrison, Wells and Gordon had not been enquired into. They were enquired into by the Royal Commission, which reported that a certain sum was paid for certain services, and pretty well paid too he thought. But the Committee had other matters to consider which fully occupied the whole of their time. The enlargement of the enquiry rendered it necessary that they should not undertake more than they could get through and thus defeat a report being made, but should endeavour to ascertain the facts of each case which they took up. It was also complained that the $1,000 paid to Mr. Gordon Brown was not included in the report. It was not his (Mr. Archibald's) fault. He consulted a gentleman belonging to the Opposition who was a member of the Committee, who candidly admitted that there was nothing in it.

Mr. BOWELL: Who was that?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Mr. McCarthy. The report omitted to state that Mr. Bernard had been paid the money received by him, but mention was made of the transaction because it was held to be an improper act.

Mr. BOWELL said he neither complained of the remarks made by the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Archibald), nor was he prepared to say that the facts as stated in the report were not borne out by the evidence taken before the Committee; but the manner in which the report was drafted and presented to the House left an impression upon the minds of those who read it, without having read the evidence before, that it was neither fair nor equitable. He complained not so much as to what the report contained as to what was left out, which, if inserted, would, to a great extent, explain conclusions and deductions which must be drawn by anyone not familiar with the facts. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Archibald) had stated that the reason the Committee did not examine into the matters connected with payments to Messrs. Morrison, Wells & Gordon, was because they had not time. He (Mr. Bowell) concurred with him in that respect. But the hon. gentlemen also gave, as an additional reason, the fact that they had been dealt with fully by the Royal Commission.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I did not say that. I said we had not time, and remarked that the Royal Commission had examined into the matters.

Mr. BOWELL: An equally searching investigation was made into the accounts of the late President, Mr. Beverley Robinson; and yet all the facts and figures connected with the amount he drew were embodied in the report, while not a single reference was made to the transaction of Morrison, Wells & Gordon. He objected, not so much that the figures were placed in the report, but that the explanations which were given by Mr. Cumberland and Mr. Robinson as to drawing these amounts were not also embodied in the report. The report left the impression that Mr. Robinson overdrawn his account, and that the amount so overdrawn should have been appropriated for the purpose of reducing the amount due to the Government. The explanation of Mr. Robinson, whether right or wrong, was that he had expended more in the service of the company than he was given credit for, and that he was entitled to and demanded a larger salary than had been paid to him; and he produced a letter from Mr. Cumberland which must leave the impression upon the mind of anyone that read it that this claim was proper and legitimate. Mr. Cumberland, moreover, stated that he intended, as soon as an opportunity presented itself, to recommend the payment of this money to Mr. Robinson, in consideration of the services rendered as the Superintendent and servant of the company. That was also stated in the report of the Royal Commission laid before the House. So that the Committee had not only constituted themselves a Committee of enquiry to examine into the mal-appropriation of money of the Company, but also judge, jury and hangman. They had arrogated to themselves the right to say whether a dispute that still existed between the President of that company and the company itself should be decided in a particular way, a question which could only be legitimately and properly decided by a Court of Law. He had no doubt that, if Mr. Robinson and Mr. Cumberland were to give the same evidence before a judge and jury, the award of that sum of money would be made to Mr. Robinson. Several other amounts which had been spent had been omitted in the report. It was rather significant that not one member of the political party of gentlemen opposite was mentioned in the report, except to justify the expenditure of money. Mr. Chisholm received $1,000 for the purpose of promoting certain bonus by-laws, and Mr. Robinson received a certain sum for the same purpose; yet the former was not mentioned in the report. The $1,000 given to Mr. Gordon Brown for the patent nut-lock was evidently placed in the same category by Mr. Cumberland as the $1,000 subscribed in Mail stock. He was bound to say, however, that the purchasing of the nut-lock had no influence upon the Globe. Mr. Patteson of the Mail had sworn that he was never asked to write an article in favour of the Northern Railway, and that no control over the columns of the paper had been sought by Mr. Cumberland. He had expected that the Chairman of the Committee would have moved the adoption of the report at an earlier day, when he (Mr. Bowell) would have been prepared to state his objections more fully. The objections he entertained to the reductions drawn in the report he had stated in the Committee, and, being the only dissentient in the Committee, he had his reasons entered on the minutes. His reasons were these: While there was a floating debt which was sworn to in evidence of from £20,000 to £50,000 during the whole of the time in question, which had been incurred for the rolling stock and various purposes, if any portion of the current expenditure could be included in that floating debt, that money was equally applicable to the payment of those expenses as to payment of the Government debt. According to his reading of the law, it would be applicable first to the payment of the floating debt. Mr. Cumberland had stated very frankly that they had paid interest to the bondholders in the old country for the purpose of maintaining their credit in the English market. It was open to fair and legitimate criticism whether that proceeding was right or wrong, but he contended that the liability of the company with regard to its floating debt was the first amount which should have been paid. He did not understand the principle on which the mortgage for the Couchiching Hotel had been taken. It appeared to have been the best managed speculation for stockholders of any enterprise connected with the line. The managers appeared to have obtained from the coffers of the Northern Extensions Railway Company the sum of $30,000 or $40,000, which did not appear to have been accounted for, and they also obtained a large amount from the Northern Railway Company, believing that the establishment of what would prove to be a summer resort or watering place would compensate the road for money invested in it. He would not be prepared to say that that was not a perfectly legitimate expenditure. Any one who had seen the use to which railways put their money in order to create traffic over their roads would consider that this might be legitimately and properly expended. But, on taking over the Northern Extensions Railway, they were to pay over a certain sum of money and receive all the property belonging to the road. They did take over the Couchiching Hotel property, on which they held a mortgage, but they took no step to prevent the stockholders, whose principal mouth-piece was Mr. J. D. Edgar, when this property was burnt down, from getting the insurance money into their coffers. On the contrary, they permitted the misappropriation of that money, and allowed the directors to put it into their own pockets instead of paying with it their debts. It was true, they paid a certain proportion of the amount for which they were personally liable; but there was from $15,000 to $19,000 remaining, which they divided among themselves, and allowed their debt to the Northern Railway to continue. Reference was made in the report to two drafts of $500 each, drawn by Sir John A. Macdonald, which were charged to parliamentary expenses. No explanation was given of that amount, and a misapprehension would be left in the minds of any person who read the report. It had been, however, denied that Sir John A. Macdonald knew, when he drew the money, that it came from the Northern Railway Company. He had stated distinctly and positively in evidence that he had not such knowledge; but that, on the contrary, he thought the contribution was made by Mr. Cumberland himself. As to that money, said to have been misappropriated, which went to Sir John A. Macdonald's testimonial fund, it had been explained that Sir John A. Macdonald knew nothing whatever of the subscription coming out of the funds of the company; but it might have been said that he had no knowledge that a subscription of that kind was made at all by those parties, for such view was confirmed by the evidence of the Hon. Mr. Macpherson. The complaint he (Mr. Bowell) had to make was that no explanation was given with respect to the first paragraph of the report. It was precisely the same with respect to the clause in the report which treated of two amounts having been paid to the Mail newspaper. With regard to this subscription for Mail stock made by Mr. Morrison, Mr. Barlow Cumberland suggested the mode in which they should be entered. It had been contended that it was done with the consent, knowledge and approbation of the conductor of that newspaper, but Mr. Patteson had sworn positively and distinctly that he knew nothing of the transaction, that he would never have permitted it, that it was an improper transaction, suggested by Mr. B. Cumberland himself and carried out by the book-keeper and collector, of which he did not approve. The same objection applied to the paragraph of the report, with respect to the subscription given to Mr. J. C. Campbell of Toronto, for, on reading the report, any one would come to the conclusion that Mr. Campbell knew, or had reason to believe, that the money was appropriated out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company. Mr. Campbell had sworn distinctly that he had no knowledge of its having been so paid. On the contrary, he thought that it was a private subscription on the part of Mr. Cumberland. Mr. Cumberland, however, stated that, if those persons who drew on him thought that the money was all coming out of his own funds, they must have considered him a much richer man than he was. That, no doubt, might have been the case. Whether that was the case or not, there was no doubt a most wasteful expenditure in many respects, which was not embodied in the report, or the amount would have been swollen to an enormous extent. Those were the reasons why he objected to the wording of the report,—not so much to what it contained as to what was omitted. With regard to Mr. Moberley, he appeared to have free entry to the coffers of the company. He, as the engineer, had received large commissions while employed superintending the erection of elevators, for which he was liberally paid; and Mr. Cumberland stated that the $2,000 mentioned, was given to him for a bonus in consideration of services as a faithful servant of the company. He quite agreed with the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) that that was not an item which could be called misappropriation or a malappropriation of the company, for they knew that, in ordinary business affairs, efficient employés of long service often received bonuses on retiring. It was well known that both the present and the late Government had carried out that principle in dealing with many faithful officers; and, therefore, in entering the $2,000 as a misappropriation of money, the Committee did not do justice to the company and its management.

Mr. LITTLE said that any measure affecting the interests of the Northern Railway met with considerable attention from his constituents, for his county was a large stockholder in the Northern Railway. At the time when the Government first instituted an investigation into the financial affairs of the line, it was viewed as a political movement, and he had not changed his opinion—but he did not see what political capital was made out of it. He could not agree with the report of the Special Committee, for it had glossed over the sums paid to certain parties, and made special reference to payments to others of a certain political bias. There was no reference disparagingly to Mr. Edgar, who it appeared received a very large sum for parliamentary and other services. The Committee must know what those services were, but the report never mentioned them; and there was no reference at all to the money paid to Mr. Gordon Brown for ostensibly a patent nut worker, which was afterwards found to be next to worthless. He (Mr. Little) was not there to speak, and he did not speak, to defend Mr. Cumberland in paying these sums mentioned. In his opinion these sums were not judiciously paid; but he (Mr. Little) was not a railroad man, and it must be remembered that Mr. Cumberland stated that as managing director of the road, he had paid these sums in the interest of the line. At the time when he first entered Parliament, the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railroads were largely represented in this House; the Hudson Bay Company and others afterwards and since; and, if any assistance was required for the Northern Railway, and it was, and was now still required, it was right that the line in question should have an influence as much as others. He did not think Mr. Cumberland was altogether right in paying these sums, but his constituents recognized Mr. Cumberland as a very successful railroad manager, perhaps the best in the Dominion. Mr. Cumberland had been manager for over twenty years. There had been no crash-ups or breakdowns like other lines. When he first had charge the road was in a shocking condition, no rolling stock to speak of, and the wages of the working hands months upon months in arrears. All this was now changed; the line could compete favourably with any other; but his county still required more. The line was isolated; it was the broad gauge, whilst the Grand Trunk, Great Western and others were the narrow gauge. His people could not ship a bushel of grain either to the east or west without breaking bulk.

MR. LITTLE.

But to change the gauge of the Northern a large sum was required, and the Government, instead of helping his county, were demanding better terms from the Northern Company, and consequently from the people who were large stockholders. To him it seemed that the Government could not fairly do so in the face of the agreement entered into in 1875, and since ratified by the Government last year in accepting the sum from the Northern Railway Company, as agreed upon. He looked upon the action of the Government as too tardy. Why did not the political spy who was in the service of the company give his information before. He supposed that this party also was looking for better terms from the Railroad Board, and, being refused, made terms with the Government. It was unfair for the Government now to exact further money; if it was exacted, it should, if possible, be paid by the bondholders, and not by the stockholders, for the stockholders had no voice, and were not consulted in the disposal of these sums. It was unfair for the Government, who should look to the interests of the people, to put the brakes on and demand further sums from the company, which, after all, would injure the interests of the line, and consequently the people who made use of it, and required assistance to have the gauge changed.

Mr. GUTHRIE said he did not wish to go at length into this discussion, which would be more appropriate when the report came to be considered; but he would call attention to one or two things which had fallen from the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell). That hon. gentleman sought to create the impression that the report was unfair in what it left out—that certain facts had been suppressed. He was prepared to challenge the hon. gentleman, when the evidence came down, to point out a single instance in which anything had been suppressed that ought fairly to have been placed in the report. He was prepared to say that not one important fact in explanation of any of those improper payments had been omitted by the Committee without just reason.

Mr. BOWELL: I accept that challenge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: One of the matters to which the hon. gentleman referred was in reference to Mr. Robinson's salary. That salary was paid in regular monthly instalments, and had been changed to various amounts. The Committee felt that, Mr. Robinson holding office at a fixed salary, they could not, as sensible business men, allow any claim that his services were worth more than that salary. The salary due to him was properly credited to him, and they could not justify the over-drawing of his account. With regard to the fact that the report said nothing about Mr. Gordon Brown, the hon. member for North Hastings never suggested that that was a proper subject for mention in the report. Any one who read the evidence must come to the conclusion that there was no impropriety on the part of Mr. Brown in relation to that transaction. The distinction between the case of the Mail and that was obvious. Taking stock in the Mail was an illegal transaction; the purchase of a patent nutlock for the use of the railway, which was recommended by the Engineer, and which, if it had answered the expectations, would have been worth the money, was a legitimate transaction. With regard to the Chisholm matter, there was no evidence whatever before the Committee that the money had been applied to an improper or illegal purpose. It was admitted that this system of obtaining bonuses was an expensive matter, but Mr. Chisholm was exactly in the same position as the other gentlemen who received money for similar purposes. It was unfair for the hon. gentleman to come down to the House, when he had said nothing about the matter in Committee, to say other hon. members had acted unfairly. They were charged that, in two or three instances, the report did not say that misappropriations had taken place without the knowledge of the gentleman concerned. There was nothing in the report which claimed that Sir John A. Macdonald or Mr. Campbell knew that the money came out of the company's funds. It was true that those gentlemen said they had no knowledge, but the circumstances pointed the other way. Mr. Cumberland stated that his private subscriptions were of a smaller character, and that no one could regard those subscriptions as anything but railway subscriptions. Furthermore, he understood Mr. Cumberland to adhere to his impression, notwithstanding Mr. Campbell's denial that he did not know the money had come out of the railway funds. The Committee had stated the undeniable facts which had been proved, and had not referred to the controverted facts. There was no reason to believe that Mr. Patteson of the Mail had personal knowledge of the transaction with that newspaper. The financial clerk of the Mail made out the accounts and collected the money. When the evidence was examined, it would be found that the charges of the hon. member for North Hastings were utterly groundless.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not propose to go elaborately into the character of the report, as he must confess that it did not fairly realize his expectations. Hon. members on the other side of the House had challenged the Opposition to formulate their charges, but when they did so those hon. gentlemen seemed rather to complain about the course they adopted; but, if there was any person who was under the impression that it was the duty of the Opposition to formulate charges in this House, this report would be a sufficient answer to him. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Archibald) said it must not be forgotten that the resolution was extended in its character by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald). It should also be remembered that, when the House was called upon to deal with the resolution, hon. gentlemen opposite exercised the power which they possessed by packing the Committee with six of the strongest partisans to be found on that side of the House; and he quite admitted that, in defence of their privileges, the Opposition selected partisans to serve on the Committee. He wanted to draw attention to the tribunal to which they must submit in formulating charges in this House, and the power of that majority of two to one had been exercised in a way he was not required to advert to after the statements of the hon. members for North Hastings and Victoria. Those hon. gentlemen had shown the character of the report, and had given to the House and the country a thorough exemplification of what might be expected from charges formulated in this House in reference to any question. He agreed with the hon. member for Victoria that the Government, in going outside of the report altogether, and in bringing this question before the House, had adopted a course unworthy of them. It was the duty of the Government, in bringing business before Parliament, to accomplish the object in view without the introduction of any irrelevant matter that could possibly be avoided. The hon. gentleman asked them to pass a resolution which he thought was not true in point of fact. It asserted that this $27,000, which was declared to have been improperly expended, was a debt to the Government. He denied that this was the case. The Government were asking the House to accept a composition with the company, and yet demanded the payment of the $27,000 in full. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had shown that, during the period in question, the company were indebted to other parties in connection with the expenditure for the necessary operations of the road. The hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to introduce this matter, and this action was unworthy of the hon. gentleman, actually asked them to accept a resolution which, he contended, was, in part, not true in fact. The hon. gentleman admitted that the Government was not in a position to exact full payment on their loans; and if this was the case, all this $27,000 was not payable to the Government, but only the same moiety demanded in the other case. The hon. gentleman had been induced, for party purposes, to state a thing which was a total fallacy. The hon. gentleman said that about £17,000 as interest was due on the £50,000 Third Preference Bonds, making in all £67,000, and the very extraordinary—he would not say, absurd—proposition was made to accept for this, £45,000 plus the $27,458.57. This was ludicrous when examined. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) seemed to think it was a great hardship for the company to be called upon to pay this $27,000; but he did not agree with this view. The House was asked to delude itself into the impression that this $27,000 was being paid back, when £45,000 was to be accepted for £67,000. He wished to call attention to a very extraordinary thing which had occurred in connection with the Committee of investigation. The Commission had the services of one of the ablest accountants in the public service placed at their disposal. The accountant discharged his duty, and informed the Committee that he had made a report. The whole essence of the Governmental investigation was contained in this report, and yet the power of the Government or the Committee had been used to prevent this report from being submitted. It was suppressed from the Committee and Parliament. This was a startling fact connected with the mode in which the Committee had discharged the duties entrusted to them. The Minister of Finance had not shown his usual sagacity in dealing with this question, but had framed the resolutions in order to serve small party purposes, and to put the resolutions on the Journals in their present form.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member for Cumberland had made out a very strong case for the exaction of more stringent terms respecting the bonds. In Committee it would be for the House to consider whether more stringent terms should not be made. If the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) were of the same opinion in Committee, he was quite sure that a large number of the members were disposed to exact the letter of the bond. This $27,000 which had been improperly expended undoubtedly belonged to the Government after the payment of prior claims. It ranked before the Government lien. There was a great deal to be said in favour of the view that too liberal a settlement was proposed. It had been the lot of the company to be represented in the House, and it had been the hard lot of the company to be represented in the House by wise friends, among the wisest of whom he would place the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), who exceeded, perhaps, in wisdom the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) and even the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member for Chateauguay was rather illogical. How could the statements of his complaining that the terms were too liberal, and of his being a representative of the company be reconciled? He had never had any connection, direct or indirect, in the most remote character, with the company. He had not complained of the terms offered to the company. He had assumed that the Government had investigated the matter, and decided upon proper terms, but he had said that if the Government declared that a certain amount was sufficient compensation, they should not delude themselves into taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, and supposing that they were thus obtaining money which would not otherwise have been secured.

Mr. BERTRAM said it was somewhat unfortunate that the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) did not agree with the report submitted by the Committee. The hon. gentleman had not said that the report was not borne out by the evidence, but that in his estimation it was unfair. If the hon. member held these views, he should have offered an amendment in Committee, and placed them on record. If the minutes of the Committee were examined, it would be found, he believed, that only in one instance, or at most in two instances, had the hon. gentleman offered an amendment to the report; and this he considered a sufficient answer to any charge the hon. gentleman might make as to the unfairness of the finding. He was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Cumberland charge the House with appointing nine of the strongest partizans in the House on the Committee. In a matter of this kind, he thought that the hon. member should speak for himself alone; whether hon. members were strong political partizans or otherwise had nothing whatever to do with the question. If there was anything wrong in the report, it would be quite proper to take exception to it, but it was not right to charge any hon. gentleman who performed a duty placed on his shoulders by the House with partizanship in the matter. He did not think that the hon. member for Hastings would say that he was in any instance prevented from making any enquiries he thought proper to make in the Committee.

Mr. BOWELL: That report excepted.

Mr. BERTRAM said he intended to allude further on to this matter. The hon. member for Cumberland had said, that the part of the resolutions relating to the $27,458.87 was not true in fact. The same subject had been touched upon by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), but he considered that this hon. gentleman had rather hazy ideas as to that of which a floating debt consisted. No man or company could possibly do business without having a floating debt of some kind, and the Northern Railway Company must have a floating debt. In 1868, this debt was paid off by money borrowed, and the company again started in that year with a clean sheet. It was in evidence that, after that time and up to the time of amalgamation, most of the floating debt then existing had been incurred by advances made to the Northern Extensions Railway Company. From 1863-4 to 1874-5, no less a sum than £200,000 or £300,000 sterling had been thus paid out of the profits of the company over and above the working expenses, for rolling stock and new works; and it was in evidence that it was with the tacit consent of the late Government that this money was used for that purpose. In the Act of 1860, and the Act of 1868, it was set forth that the first charge on the road was the working expenses, and the next the payment of interest on the First Preference Bonds; the next in order being the Second Preference Bonds. In 1868, £150,000 sterling were put before the Government lien, and the Railway Company expended some £30,000 or £40,000 sterling on new works. Interest was payable on the 3rd A and 3rd B Bonds, and after them on the Government lien, and during this time the Company expended between £200,000 and £300,000 sterling out of their revenue for purposes of the kind mentioned. It was manifest that, if the Government had demanded it, a part of this money should have been paid them instead of being expended for new works and rolling stock, &c. No one seemed to say that this $27,000 had not been improperly expended, and if it had not been so paid out it could have been paid either on the Government lien or on the 3 B Bonds. It was an extraordinary thing that interest on these bonds had never been paid, because—as the manager stated—it had never been demanded by the Government. The company had money to use for all the purposes mentioned, but not one dollar had been paid to the Government, simply because they had not asked for it. When it was taken into consideration that such large amounts had been paid for other purposes than those mentioned in the Act, they must be held liable in this regard. If any facts had been suppressed by the company, then it was certainly equitable that the company should be still so held liable. The Government had not been informed of this improper expenditure, and they, therefore, held that these sums were properly applicable to the payment of the Government lien. With reference to the remark of the hon. member for Cumberland that the Committee did not use the report made by the gentleman who accompanied the Commission, the facts were these: He did not have the books of the company to examine, but only based his report on the statements of officers of the company. He admitted also that he was not a railway man, but merely an accountant. The memorandum or report he prepared was not in evidence as part of the Royal Commission. The Committee thought they had much better take the books of the company than this gentleman's report as evidence.

Mr. COOK said he agreed with the observation of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Little) that this case had a political application. But the hon. gentleman forgot that the motion for the Committee originated with the Opposition side of the House.

Mr. BERTRAM.

The hon. gentleman must know the way in which the road had been managed for political objects for a number of years. In 1874 he (Mr. Cook) made a motion for the investigation of the affairs of this railway, something similar to that made a short time ago. He was satisfied from what others had told him that a great many misappropriations had taken place. He then asked the hon. the Premier to allow an investigation into the books of the company before any legislation was had as to the reduction of the Government lien upon the road; but, as he was not able to make any specific charge, the Premier said he did not think the Government were justified in taking the matter into their hands without some tangible evidence, and the motion was withdrawn accordingly. In 1875 a Bill was introduced to reduce the Government lien. He heartily supported the Bill, because the road was in a crippled condition, and the Bill would much enhance the value of the road to that part of the country through which it passed, and especially through the constituency he himself represented. He noticed with a great deal of amusement the way in which the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) referred to the money given by the company towards the testimonial to the right hon. member for Kingston. That gentleman stated that this was not the money of the Government, but of the company. He (Mr. Cook) had an extract he would read from a Conservative paper published in Toronto, the Telegram, published by Mr. Robertson, the gentleman who was so brutally knocked down by the member for West Toronto, one of the gentleman party, on the streets of that city. The Telegram said:

“Every dollar taken from the funds of the Northern Railway was a dollar taken from the public funds, the company being at that time a debtor to the Government to the amount of several hundred thousand pounds. It follows, therefore, that when Mr. Beverley Robinson was paying his election expenses out of the moneys belonging to the Northern Railway, and was spending the funds of the road in excess of his salary—when Mr. Angus Morrison was subscribing for stock in a political journal, and throwing money about, lobbying for a railway corporation, instead of protecting the interests of the people—and when Sir John Macdonald was levying on the company for the election of poor young men who were running for Parliament under his protection (Sir Francis Hincks being one of them), he and they were despoiling the people of Canada of money which should have gone into the public treasury."

Mr. BOWELL: Do you call that a Conservative paper?

Mr. COOK said that such was the gentleman who had accused him (Mr. Cook) of having fraudulently obtained his election; that was the gentleman who, with his virtuous and innocent smile, which he always wore when he meant mischief, had been putting his hands deep up to his elbows in the coffers of the Northern Railroad. Who would have thought that the hon. gentleman would have done this when he had stood up in this House and presented a petition against his (Mr. Cook's) return in 1872? Who would have thought that Sir Francis Hincks, who had also accused him of corruption, would have been the recipient of $1,000 from the Northern Railway to promote his own election in the county of Renfrew? But such was nevertheless the fact. If he (Mr. Cook) did expend money at elections it was merely to fight the enemy with their own weapons, and to meet on an equality those who had their election expenses paid by the Pacific Railway ring and the Secret Service money. He was prepared to prove by a Committee of the House, if it was granted, that larger sums of money had been expended by his opponents in his constituency than by himself and his friends; and when he did spend money he took it from his own pocket and not from the public Treasury, which had been swindled by the Northern Railway Company for years. He had taken some notice of the manner in which the investigation had been conducted. The honorable member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), who was attorney for the county of Simcoe, and whose duty it was to extract as much information as possible from the witnesses, seemed to try to keep back evidence which might be damaging to the party of which he was a member, although of benefit to the county of Simcoe. He (Mr. Cook) had had some experience of the way the Northern Railway was used as a political engine in favour of the late Government. He had had the company's navvies for the construction of the Extension follow him about the constituency with the view of breaking up his meetings, and he believed they were instigated by the leaders of the road. A gentleman of undoubted reputation and truthfulness, for many years holding a high position in the Northern Railway Company, stated in a letter written to him: "Reformers on the Northern Railway were almost persecuted at election times." The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had characterized the act of the Government, in securing a portion of the illegal expenditure of the Northern Railway Company, in the resolutions now before the House, by making them refund $27,000 and securing a mortgage on the Couchiching Hotel property, now held by the company, in terms of disrespect, and wished to know if the Government intended to keep a hotel. He would advise the hon. the Premier to engage the services of the hon. member to manage the hotel, as he had for a number of years been practising at the Bar. When the Bill for the relief of the Northern Railway was introduced in this House, it contained a clause to cancel the county of Simcoe stock. He succeeded in Committee in having that objectionable clause expunged, thereby preserving intact the rights of the county; a part of which he had the honour of representing in Parliament. He took special credit for this to himself, and he thought it would be appreciated in the proper quarter, and at the proper time, as no doubt this stock would soon become valuable from the course of events in connection with that road. He would probably take another opportunity of referring at greater length to the political character of the Northern Railroad.

Mr. McCALLUM said, on a former occasion, he had opposed the passage of the Northern Railway Bill. At that time a report was made by the Treasurer of Ontario, Mr. Crooks, who showed that the company was able to pay its indebtedness to the Government, and yet have enough money to keep the road in working order. His (Mr. McCallum's) opinion was that the political character of the company would change with the change of parties, and his expectation was realized. In looking at the names of those who obtained money from the company, he observed the name of the gentleman who was sent as a Commissioner to British Columbia, who was a great favourite with the Government. That gentleman received more than all the others put together; but his name was not mentioned in the Committee's report. Even the Royal Commissioners in their report went so far as to say that the gentleman in question did not receive any money for payment of election expenses. He had, however, been useful, and might prove useful again to the Government, and it was therefore advisable that he should be whitewashed by the Commission or the Committee. The Commissioners in their report said :

"In consequence of rumours that other parties had received sums of money for improper purposes out of the funds of the Northern Railway Company, and that Mr. J. D. Edgar had been the recipient of some for his election expenses, it was considered proper to have Messrs. Cumberland and Edgar examined in relation thereto; and this having been done, we find that there is no ground for such rumour; but that whatever moneys Mr. Edgar received from the Northern Railway Company were so received in his professional capacity, for legal and parliamentary services rendered the company in 1874-75, when he had no seat in Parliament, and that the remuneration for his services had the sanction of the Board of Directors for the time being."

In regard to the charges made against the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson) in connection with having taken money from the company, he found the following, the evidence of Col. Cumberland—and he (Mr. McCallum) was not present in the House to defend that hon. member who would be able to defend himself:—

"Q.—But you were not paying Mr. Robinson the same as Mr. Justice Morrison?

"A.—No, but it was my intention that he should be paid the same as his predecessor.

"Q.—And on account of that intention you paid him these amounts?

"A.—I won't say that it was an absolute intention; but I saw and recognized his claim, and when the time arrived when I could exercise my influence, I would see that he was paid.

"Q.—And therefore you gave him these notes from time to time?

Mr. McCallum.

"A.—Yes, that was the reason."

He believed when Mr. Robinson took that money he thought he had a right to it; that he was as much entitled to it as was his predecessor. He did not think Mr. Robinson was any more guilty than many other public men. The Government were much to blame in connection with the matter, for they voted down a motion submitted by him (Mr. McCallum) on the general subject. In regard to the political aspect of the question, he would state that, when a new Government came into power, the Northern Railway changed its politics, because Mr. Morrison had given evidence that he was removed from the Board on account of his politics, and that a gentleman was placed there who was in political sympathy with the Government. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Cook) appeared to have a great grievance because $2,500 was subscribed by the Northern Railway Company to the testimonial to Sir John A. Macdonald, because of the Northern Railway Company's influence in his county, and because $1,000 had been subscribed by the company towards Sir Francis Hincks' election fund; and, at the same time, the hon. member for South Simcoe had loudly boasted that he had never spent money in such a direction. But the House knew that that hon. gentleman had spent money in such objects, that he made a "big push" and "came down handsomely" to the tune of $30,000 for election purposes.

AUDITING OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 118.]

(Mr. Cartwright).

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had offered some objections to this Bill in Committee, but he had withdrawn his opposition in deference to the explanations which the hon. the Minister of Finance had made. He would say, however, that he saw no good reason for the change proposed.

Mr. HOLTON said he had very considerable doubts as to the expediency of the proposed change. He took it for granted that his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) was satisfied that he could get the supplies needed in time under this Bill. One great advantage resulting from this measure, however, would be the repeal of a Bill which he never regarded favourably, and that was the Act authorizing the over-lapping of appropriations. He apprehended that some inconvenience and confusion would result during the transition from the present system to that proposed.

Mr. MASSON said in this, as in many other things, he would follow the lead of his hon. friend for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton). He thought some inconveniences would result from the new system. If the fiscal year ended 31st March, Parliament might sit beyond that time, and the Government would have to bring in Estimates in advance or pay money that was not provided for. Sometimes a weaker Government might be in power, and great embarrassments would be caused them.

Mr. YOUNG said Parliament, in a matter of this kind, must defer very much to the opinion of the Minister of Finance, who had the practical management of the Finance Department, and who, from his experience, must know the proper period at which it was advisable the year should end. He must say, however, that he did not look upon the change with great favour. If the hon. the Finance Minister had not absolutely made up his mind that this measure was necessary in the interest of the public, and he could see his way to defer the final passage of the measure until next Session, he believed that many hon. members would be glad to have that time to consider whether they would like the Bill to become law or not. One great objection to the measure was, that it would put the Public Accounts still further back, and the attention of Parliament would be directed to accounts in regard to which all interest had ceased.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was considerable force in what the hon. member for Chateauguay and other hon. gentlemen had urged. He had consulted officers of his Department as to the practical working of this change, and believed that it would work satisfactorily. One result would be the earlier meeting of Parliament, which he believed would meet the wishes of many hon. gentlemen. With regard to the objections of his hon. friend for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), he might state that much fuller information was provided for by the Bill than had ever been laid before Parliament before. One of his chief reasons for proposing the measure was to get rid of the inaccuracies in the Public Accounts, which he thought it would tend to diminish. He would carefully note the remarks that had been made, and would feel doubly bound to take all possible precautions, so that none of the evils apprehended might occur.

Mr. LANGEVIN said, if Parliament met earlier, it would not be before the 15th or 20th of January, and he was afraid that the Session would frequently extend beyond the 1st April. The result would be that the hon. the Finance Minister would be pressing the House to pass the supplies, and the system might lead to difficulties. He thought Parliament should have the Supply Bill in hand as long as it sat, and he did not think it advisable to make this change in view of the inconveniences which might result therefrom.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the House would have from 75 to 80 days in which to transact the public business, but he did not think any serious objection would be raised if such an emergency as the hon gentleman suggested should occur.

Mr. TUPPER said certainly a great many hon. gentlemen sitting on that side of the House were determined to avoid anything approaching to a factious opposition to the Government of the day. They were prepared, perhaps, to accept without very close criticism many measures presented to the House. He had the day previous at once said that, if the objection taken by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) was not distinctly met by the Minister of Finance, he would regard it as fatal to the Bill. He confessed that, having since turned it over in his mind, the more he examined it the greater did the difficulty seem. If, as the Minister of Finance had frankly admitted, the effect of the Bill would be to oblige them actually to provide Estimates for another year ahead, then its object would be entirely defeated and matters had better remain in their present position. He would even now suggest to the Minister of Finance whether under the circumstances it was not advisable to allow things to remain as they were at present until next Session.

Mr. HOLTON: There would then be this very great advantage—that it could be carefully considered before the Public Accounts Committee. It is a non-party matter.

Mr. TUPPER said he was sure he spoke for almost every gentleman on that side of the House in saying that there was no disposition to deal with the Bill save with the view of promoting the public service. This question could be more closely investigated in the Public Accounts Committee than in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he thought there would be no difficulty as to provision being made in the Estimates for another year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought that there was a great deal in the suggestion of the hon. member for Chateauguay. The matter could be fully considered before the Committee on Public Accounts next year, and it could very properly be left over until next Session.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that they would have a great deal to do next year, which would require a good deal of attention. He thought it desirable that the Bill should be passed and sent up to the Senate.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.
[BILL No. 120.]

(Mr. Mills.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 120) To amend the Indian Act of 1876.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LANGEVIN objected to the execution of the law in the form of distraint for a fine, or imprisonment in lieu thereof, being left in the hands of the Superintendent-General, or any person appointed by him. The Superintendent was not a judicial officer, but was the complainant, and he should not have the power of issuing a warrant for the collection of a fine imposed upon trespassers by a Magistrate or Justice of the Peace. The law as it stood contained a similar provision, but that was no reason for increasing the powers of the Superintendent or his subordinates. The warrant should be issued by the judicial officer, as in other cases.

Mr. MILLS said it would have been more satisfactory if the hon. gentleman had looked at the general provisions in the Indian Act before taking the exceptions. Those portions of the Bill to which objection had been made were all in the existing law. The observations of the hon. gentleman might have some force, but in order to meet the suggestions it would be necessary to re-cast the whole Bill. As Indians were unable to take any steps for their own protection, it was necessary that large powers should be given to the Superintendent and his officers. At the same time, it was right to see that these powers were not abused.

Mr. PATERSON said no doubt the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had much force, and the power referred to was too arbitrary; but, as it existed in the present law, it would not be practicable at this stage of the Session to re-cast the Bill.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he could not see what objection there was to the adoption of his suggestion.

Mr. MILLS said if he intended to recast the whole Bill he would be prepared to consider the objection; there would be no propriety in altering this power as to one section and not in the others. It was very extraordinary that the hon. gentleman had not discovered these serious defects in the Bill while the late Administration were in office.

Bill ordered to be reported.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACTS
AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 119.]
(Mr. Laflamme.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 119) To amend the Acts respecting Weights and Measures.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) asked if the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had considered the suggestions made in regard to the proposal of the Bill to permit the use of two sets of weights and measures.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he did not propose to make any alteration or amendment in that respect.

Mr. FLESHER said it would be a serious objection to the measure if the inspector did not go round to the places where scales were.

Mr. LAFLAMME said it was the duty of the inspector to go where the scales were fixed. Parties who had portable scales would not be obliged to travel more than five miles to have them inspected.

Mr. BLANCHET asked what reduction in the fees would be made.

Mr. LAFLAMME: About 30 per cent.

Bill ordered to be reported.
House resumed.
Bill reported.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved:

"That the Bill be now read the third time."

Mr. JONES (Halifax) moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction to the Committee that they have the power to amend the same, by providing that the wine gallon of 351 cubic inches, and the Winchester bushel of 2150  $\frac{3}{4}$  cubic inches, shall be the only standards of weights and measures, with respect to those articles to which they apply."

He said it was manifestly more convenient for us to have the same standards as the people alongside of us. He thought it unwise to have two standards in existence at the same time, and that return to the Winchester bushel and wine gallon would be in the interests of the country. He hoped the amendment would receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said the Imperial measure might be a great inconvenience in Nova Scotia, but in British Columbia they had used nothing but that standard, and the change would be a great inconvenience to the people of that Province. He thought the Imperial measure should be adopted throughout the whole of the British domains, with the alternative of allowing the wine measure to be used by special agreement between the parties.

Mr. WOOD said, a change having been made to the Imperial measure, which to some extent had been made in Ontario, it would be unfair to put parties to the expense of purchasing new measures. He agreed with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in allowing both measures to be used.

Mr. YOUNG said one of the difficulties in the way of adopting this amendment was that the Imperial gallon had gone extensively into use in a large portion of the Dominion. The provision allowing either that standard or the old one to be used until 1881 would prevent any injurious consequences where the people preferred the Winchester bushel and the wine gallon. One reason urged for a return to the old system was that we dealt extensively with the United States, and it was therefore necessary to have similar measures to those in use in that country. Now he believed that, in regard to the class of articles in which the wine gallon was used, our transactions with Great Britain were greater than with the United States. Looking at the whole of the circumstances, he thought that the amendment should not receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he supposed that provision would be made for this office in the new building.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had not as yet distributed the Departments in the new building, though the precise distribution would be determined upon very shortly. It was likely that the Post Office Department would be moved into it, a large number of clerks being here employed, and spacious rooms being required for their accommodation, in order that they might be more easily supervised. The hon. gentleman would remember that, in the original buildings, most of the rooms were too small, and only two or three, or at most four or five, clerks could be placed in a room. The rooms were made pretty large in the new block, so that the entire Department could be confined to a single large room. The archives of the Public Works Department would be placed up stairs in the second flat. A large room on the lower flat would be occupied by the Post Office Department. Considerable changes had been made in the Patent Office, which had been fitted up with a number of cases, bought for the Exhibition at Philadelphia, and it was tolerably convenient, even in its present situation, though it might be more so in the upper storey and attics in the new blocks. These rooms were quite as good as any in the second storey of the old block.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said he had visited the Patent Office during the present Session, and had found the ventilation extremely bad. He had also understood from an official that this was continually the case. It would be only right, he thought, to make an improvement in this respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would call the attention of Dr. Taché to the complaint at an early day.

207. Expenses in connection with Exhibition at Sydney, N. S. W ..... $25,000

Mr. TUPPER said he hoped that a statement would be made regarding this expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that two vessels had been chartered to convey goods at a certain rate of freight, £2 per ton he believed, to New South Wales. He was under the impression that the expenditure before these vessels left amounted to $3,000 or $10,000. They had further to fit up a building at the Exhibition and pay the expenses of the Commissioner, besides furnishing such assistance as might be required. It was somewhat difficult to make an exact estimate in this regard, but they did not expect it to reach $20,000. Nevertheless, they asked for $25,000 to be perfectly sure of a sufficiency. A general desire had been shown when the Australian Commissioners had visited Canada in favour of this country being represented at this Exhibition, in order to find whether Canadian could compete with American manufacturers in that particular market. It was tolerably evident that the manufacture of a great many articles of competition could be carried on with advantage in this country. At all events, it was considered from an intercolonial point of view worth while to spend a small amount in cultivating amicable relations between the great Southern Colonies and ourselves. This feeling was so apparent that the Government had ventured to make this appropriation in anticipation that Parliament would sanction the course they had taken by voting this sum of money. A considerable portion of the amount appropriated for the Philadelphia Exhibition was unexpended. He was not quite certain of the precise amount because various claims for damages of one kind or another had been brought before the Commissioners from time to time, and they were not all yet adjusted. By the last statement it was expected that $15,000 or $20,000 of the vote would be unused, so that the combined vote for the Philadelphia Exhibition and the Sydney Exhibition would not be much more than the anticipated cost of the former exhibition.

Mr. BABY enquired whether it was the intention of the Government to ask a vote for the Paris Exhibition.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it was. The Government had not had time to mature a plan. They had been notified some few weeks ago as to taking part in the Paris Exhibition, and they had decided that they would do so. The particular mode of doing so, and the style of goods to be sent had not yet been decided upon. They proposed to ask a vote of $30,000, believing that that would be a sufficient sum to meet all expenses until Parliament met again.

Mr. TUPPER: What is the total amount expended for the Philadelphia Exhibition, so far as ascertained?

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was about $80,000. The Canadian exhibition at the last Paris Exhibition cost somewhere about $50,000, but he thought a much better exhibition could be made for a less sum this time. The Government proposed to have some models of the principal hydraulic works sent to Paris, as it was found that we compared very favourably with the best French designs. It was also proposed to furnish the French Public Works Department with designs and plans of our principal public works, reciprocating a like courtesy paid Canada by the French Government. They would first be placed in the Canadian department at the Exhibition, and when the Exhibition closed they would be left with the French Government.

	To pay for four 7-pounder guns, carbines and ammunition, and for the transport thereof.....	6,250
		$33,750

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said this vote was rendered necessary chiefly by the concentration of the Mounted Police at one or two places close to the border, for reasons that were well known to the House, instead of being scattered in five or six places over a considerable area of the country as before. The Department advised him some time ago that this would involve considerable additional expense. Large numbers of the men had to be marched 600 or 700 miles, and stores had to be bought in place of those that could not be transported. As the American Government had taken possession of all the boats on that part of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers for military purposes, the cost of transportation had been considerably increased. A large expense had also been incurred in sending some of the force with the Lieut.-Governor to make treaties with the Indians.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the expense of the force was very large, and enquired the number of the force.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there were 320 men.

Mr. LANGEVIN expressed the hope that next year the officer in command would make a full report both as to the current year and that which had passed.

Mr. MITCHELL said we were playing soldiers. He did not see any necessity for this expensive force in the North-West, as there was nothing to fear from Fenian invasions or Indian troubles.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Mounted Police were the sole representatives of law and order in that great territory. They were not playing soldiers. It should be remembered that, a short time ago, one of the finest American regiments had been totally destroyed, not more than a couple of hundred miles from our frontier, by Indians. A considerable number of those Indians had since crossed our lines, but had as yet behaved themselves peaceably. It was, however, necessary to be on the look-out.

Mr. MITCHELL said that was no argument in favour of the maintenance of an expensive force. The Indians were hostile to the American Government on account of broken faith, but they were at peace with the British Government.

Mr. BROUSE said a large number of the Sioux Indians had, in moving before the American troops, penetrated into the domain of Her Majesty and we had to send troops out to Fort Walsh, in the Cypress Mountains, to see that order was maintained. There could be no better appropriation than in securing law and order in that section of the country. The force had driven away a large number of Americans who were engaged in our territory in selling intoxicating liquors to the Indians. This result, if nothing else had been done, warranted the expenditure. He could not see how anybody could object to the item.

Mr. MITCHELL said he agreed that it was desirable to maintain friendly relations with a warlike tribe like the Sioux. The history of the North-West for the last half century showed that friendly relations had been maintained with the Indians, both by Her Majesty's Government, through the Hudson Bay Company, and the Canadian Government. The amount now appropriated for the Mounted Police Force was far in excess of the requirements, but it was not necessary to expend $340,000 in order to drive some American marauders and whiskey dealers out of the country. Canada was now maintaining a military force beyond its resources.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that while he was prepared to admit that the Mounted Police Force had very efficiently discharged their duty, yet he held the opinion that it could be done for less money than was expended, and by a reduced force. The cost of maintenance should not reach $1,000 per man.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that, if the people of Canada chose to take upon themselves the work of maintaining law and order over a territory 1,000 miles long by 300 or 400 wide, it would undoubtedly prove an expensive business. That was a matter, however, to be considered before we put an end to the rule of the Hudson Bay Company, and before we became ourselves the guardians of the Territory of the North-West. No comparison could be taken between the state of affairs now, when certain portions were settled, when railroad surveys required to be made through it, when the Government had attempted to extinguish the Indian title, and the state of things which prevailed during the Hudson Bay Company's administration. Americans of doubtful character frequently came over and endeavoured to take up Indian lands, and it was necessary to keep both the whites and Indians in check. Moreover, the Half-breeds of Manitoba were pushing more and more into Indian territory, and it was necessary to have a force in the country to keep the peace. The expense of providing rations for the Mounted Police Force was very large.

209. Intercolonial Railway, completion..... $200,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said that some other sums were required in connection with the railway. It was proposed to take $370,000 for the purpose of purchasing 700 cars, with which the railway would be able to do additional business, and be able to dispense with the use of the Grand Trunk cars. There was an expense of $8,000 for removing the clay near the crossing of the river; increased siding accommodation, $50,000; snow shedding $100,000; extra ballasting to make up the banks, which had settled during the winter, $45,000, &c. Those varied items consumed all the appropriation of $500,000 voted last year, and they were obliged to ask this additional amount in order to secure the completion of the line.

Mr. MITCHELL said there had been many complaints, and particularly from the constituency represented by Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of work had been given out without asking for tenders. He would like to know what system the Government had followed in this regard. He had just received, from gentlemen owning a grist and saw mill in his own constituency, a short distance from Newcastle, a complaint that a great portion of the stream which drove their mill had been appropriated by the Intercolonial Railway. This was a fair case for compensation, and he would ask the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the matter.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the road had also encroached on the shipyard of a man named McPherson at Halifax, and had destroyed the value of his property for the purposes for which it had been used. This was a case that should be looked into.

Mr. MACKENZIE said Mr. Schreiber's instructions were to let everything that could be let by contract. A great many complaints had come to the Department about this matter; some were not well founded, and in others there was more or less reason for complaint, but very little compared to the character of the complaint. Of course, in such a remote quarter, it was impossible to have personal supervision over the work; but he had full confidence in Mr. Schreiber's ability and integrity, and he believed that, wherever it could be, the rule was carried out. With regard to the shipyard at Halifax, he might explain that Mr. McPherson owned a piece of land bordering on the bay, and the railway passed on one side of it. As much land as was required for the railway was bought, but Mr. McPherson complained that he was subject to danger from fire, owing to the proximity of the road to his shipyard. It was a very peculiar case, and the Department had it under consideration. With regard to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), he heard it for the first time to-night, and would look into the circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER said some remarks had been made in regard to the constituency which he represented, and he would briefly explain how matters stood, as far as he knew of them. There had been several complaints about work not being let by tender, and he had reported the facts to the hon. the Minister of Public Works. On some occasions, where it was said there were invitations for tenders, he found that hand-bills had been distributed, advertising that the work was to be let. He had communicated with Mr. Brydges, who, on one occasion, showed him tenders—as his constituents thought that the work was unfairly disposed of—and that the person who obtained it had sent in the lowest tender. It had been alleged all over the country that a great deal of the work was not let by tender, and, perhaps, a number were too unimportant to render this necessary. Structures, such as station-houses, were built, as far as he could learn, without tender; but he did not pretend to say that the country had, in consequence, suffered loss. The general feeling was that the work should be left open to competition in all cases. The circumstances had been such as to create the suspicion that undue favouritism had been shown, and he had taken good care to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to all these complaints, and long and full correspondence had passed on the whole subject—so much so that the Government must have considered him an unpleasant supporter, if he might use the term. He had felt it to be his duty to present the case as strongly as possible to the Minister of Public Works and the Superintendent of the Railway.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was aware of the steps taken by Mr. Speaker in this regard. The construction of snowsheds involved the expenditure of thousands and thousands of dollars; and the system pursued had been a crying scandal throughout the country. Opportunity for public competition should be given in this regard.

Mr. SPEAKER said Mr. Brydges had shown him a very large number of tenders received for some of the snowsheds, and how the contracts were awarded. For all he knew, this was also the case in other instances.

Mr. MITCHELL: Were the hon. gentleman's constituents satisfied?

Mr. SPEAKER: No, they were not.

Mr. MITCHELL said public competition should be invited, and no room should be left for favouritism. It was not sufficient to ask for three or four or half a dozen tenders.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was quite sure that the work had generally been done very cheaply. He had examined into the complaints, and he found that Messrs. Brydges and Schreiber had done the work faithfully. In some instances, tenders which were too high had been received, and Mr. Mann had done the work cheaper than the price named in the lowest tender. Such transactions had taken place. He did not think that the public had suffered any loss. At the same time, there could be no doubt of the soundness of the general principle that wherever it was possible these works should be let by tender; such were the general instructions sent down. Mr. Schreiber would be able to give particular explanations on particular points.

Mr. PLUMB said that the time had come when this road should be put on a commercial basis. It was no longer a tentative experiment. He wished to know whether the amount put down for old material, $79,688.67, included $44,500 odd, value of old rails on hand; and, as $200,000 was to be voted in these Estimates, chargeable to capital, whether these sums were to be added to it as part of the expenditure for the current year on capital account; also, whether any part of this $200,000 was to pay for the steel rails, purchased for the Pacific Railway, and laid on this road. He was glad to see that it was necessary to add to the number of engines and cars employed on the line, the business of which was, so far, very satisfactory, despite the great depression in trade. The capital account should now be closed, if possible, in order that they might understand exactly where they were in the future. Large sums had been lost in the United States owing to the false system according to which the accounts were kept regarding railway traffic and expenditure. Working expenses and repairs of a temporary nature had been charged to capital account, and no one consequently knew what the actual value of the properties were. In New Jersey recently with respect to a railway that had paid a dividend of from 10 to 15 per cent., it was found that from 10 to 12 millions had been charged to capital account. The debt of the railway had consequently been increasing constantly, and, owing to the corrupt management revealed, the stock, which had sold at 120 or 150, fell to 8 or 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this expenditure was wholly made on capital account. The renewals on the road were paid out of its revenue and charged to income. Where roads were once completed, it was assumed that the capital account was closed. A portion of the cost attending change of gauge had been charged to income, and a portion to capital. The relaying of the steel rails was charged to income, and taken out of the annual vote. Last year the vote for railways was $1,600,000; and what were usually termed working expenses were somewhere under $900,000, no portion of which was charged to capital account. The old rails sold were treated as so much cash received on the ordinary yearly expenses of the road.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the old rails were credited as cash, but no cash was shown to be received; at least, this was his interpretation of the accounts. He had complained again and again of the management of this line; and, if they knew what was going on in this regard, he thought that many hon. members, perhaps on both sides of the House, would not be sure of sitting in the House next year. Seats were already challenged—they might be declared vacant—and their present occupants might not return. He had complained year after year that the reports brought down regarding the Intercolonial Railway were vague, meagre and unsatisfactory. They could not tell what was going on; and the people were entitled to this information. Large sums were voted, and the manner in which they were expended was not disclosed. No person should be allowed to give out contracts whenever he pleased, and control the expenditure of large sums. This bestowed patronage which might be allotted as such a person saw fit. They could not get at the facts and details under the present system; all the items should be furnished the House. He knew of old material which had been sold and delivered on the Friday previous to the Monday on which the tenders sent in for them were opened. This was not a right state of things. They required honest and reliable men to run railways. It was improper for any person in the employ of the Government to make blind bargains regarding the purchase of material, as was at present the case. He had seen old and rusty iron bolts placed in new cars on the Intercolonial Railway. He asserted this to be a fact. He thought, before any such sum of money as that proposed was voted away, the hon. the Premier should give some assurance that the Intercolonial Railway would be better managed in the future than in the past. He maintained that, as the House was voting an amount for the completion of the railroad, it was strictly in order that all the expenditure should come up for discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman must confine himself to the item under discussion. Merely because the hon. gentleman held a seat in Parliament, he ought not to take advantage of it to asperse people's characters in the way he had done. There was a Company called the Cold Brook Rolling Mill Company which had made sales to the Government of $113,788.22, and the railway had purchased to the amount of $42,256. When he (Mr. Mackenzie) came into office, he found the hon. gentleman himself a contractor with the Government.

Mr. DOMVILLE: You never did.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, it was the firm of James Domville & Company.

Mr. DOMVILLE: You never did.

Mr. MACKENZIE: For nails and spikes. I mention this to show that, if any person has the right to complain, it is not the hon. gentleman. I maintain that the Intercolonial Road has been well and economically managed. The best proof is that the Government are paying about one-third the price for iron that was paid by the late

Mr. DOMVILLE.

Government to the hon. gentleman himself; less than half the price for rails; and exactly one-third for springs. Every department is managed with the utmost possible economy. I examined all the tenders myself.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he did not asperse anybody's character. As regarded the alleged contract, he most distinctly denied that the firm of James Domville had any contract, and the hon. the Premier knew this. He knew he was stating what was incorrect. In regard to the spikes, whoever the firm were that supplied them, they were supplied at $90 a ton, while English firms had tendered at $135 and $140 a ton. It was unfair to say that rails then ought to be as cheap as now, when iron was now so very cheap. As to the completion of the Intercolonial, he hoped that the hon. the Premier would see that there were no unfair rates over different portions of the line. The Lower Provinces were not satisfied with the line. Discriminations in favour of friends of the Government had been made, which was not right. He believed there was a good deal of extravagance, and the hon. the Premier should give a guarantee that the money now being voted would be spent judiciously. It was possible that a large portion of the appropriation would go towards putting up residences. If so, he was entirely opposed to it.

Mr. LANGEVIN asked for explanations in regard to the freight cars.

Mr. MACKENZIE stated that 200 freight cars, costing $529 each, were being made at Cobourg, and 100, costing $530 each, at London. The rest would be made at the Government works.

Mr. DOMVILLE: Platform or box cars?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Box cars.

Mr. DOMVILLE: Are they delivered on the Government road?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he thought the price was rather high.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they would be delivered at Rivière du Loup or Moncton.

213. Lachine Canal ..... $250,000
214. Welland Canal ..... 200,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said the additional amount required for canals was due, as he had already explained, to the fact that the work was proceeded with more rapidly than was originally expected.

Vote agreed to.

215. Culbute Canal..... $25,000

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he hoped a portion of the vote would be devoted to constructing a drawbridge from Calumet Island to the mainland. A bridge was built at that point in 1867, at a cost of $1,500, a large portion of which sum was paid by the Quebec Government. The island had a population of from 700 to 800, and, as the parish church was on the island, inhabitants of two or three surrounding municipalities were prevented from attending Divine service. He believed the Dominion Government had no right to remove the bridge as they had done, the plea for which was that it crossed a navigable stream, but it was the Dominion Government that had made it navigable.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not the duty of the Dominion Government to bridge the Ottawa; that was a local work. If the bridge had been built over a navigable stream without the authority of the Dominion Government having first been obtained, the municipal or other authorities who had constructed it must take the consequences. He would then see what claims, if any, they had upon the Dominion. His impression was that there was no claim.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he would like to know the object of this vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is for balance of contracts.

Mr. CAMPBELL said this work was one of the most corrupt jobs ever entered into in this Dominion; the Pacific Scandal and steel rail transaction dwindled into insignificance in comparison with it. The trouble about such matters was that two-thirds of the House were pledged to back up the hon. the Premier, without reservation. There was an hon. gentleman on the other side who promised him, if he could make out a case against the Ministry in regard to this matter, he would withdraw his support from them. He (Mr. Campbell) would endeavour to do so, and he hoped the hon. gentleman would keep his pledge. The contract for this work was given to Mr. Wm. Ross, who was at the time a member of the House. There were so many strange features about the whole arrangement that he was constrained to ask whether it was simply for political purposes, or whether a combination like the Tammany Ring had been formed. He would be able to show the House that money had been paid for work which was never done. He looked at it in this light: that the Government were in office merely to carry out the wishes of Parliament and not to set Parliament at defiance, acting tyrannically. He protested against such conduct, and he wished these papers to be printed. If the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in February, was true, why did the hon. gentleman ask for more money for this work? The sum of $50,000 had been spent, and $1,600 was demanded. In March, 1875, it was stated that the contract would be finished in the following August. He had applied for the papers within the last two months, and he had not obtained the information he required. He desired to have the items, for certainly this $84,000 had not been paid in a lump sum. He had asked for the certificates of the Engineer, advising the payments, but none had been submitted; and he believed that none existed. Though $84,000 had been expended, the contract was not half finished. The pier was to have been 700 feet in length, with a depth of 15 feet at low water, but only 565 feet had been built, and only 12 feet of water had been provided. Two years' extra salary, $1,900 had been paid Mr. McLeod, and extras, besides the contract price, had been advanced to the contractor. It was well known that it was easier to build two feet of a wharf near shore than one foot in deep water, and that a foot dredged in a depth of fifteen feet of water would cost more than the dredging of one foot near the surface of the water. The Engineer did not certify the payments, but the reverse. There was nothing to show that over sixty feet had been dredged. The engineer was very cautious, and had sent in this communication since this subject was broached in the House. The engineer could not so stultify himself as to certify to the payments. This contract had not been finished in two years, as had been agreed upon, but it had consumed four years. If it was not completed by the 31st December, 1874, any extra cost for superintendence was to have been paid by the contractor; but this had not been done, and $1,900 or $2,000 had been paid the Inspector during the last two years. The contractor had not paid a penny of this sum. The interest besides on the money expended was to be considered. They had proof positive that this Mr. Ross had been opposed to the Government in 1874, in the correspondence which had taken place with the Minister of Militia, and political reasons must have induced the Premier to trifle away the people's money in this manner, for he did not believe that this was due to incompetency on the part of the First Minister. He was personally interested in every dollar voted, as he paid his share of it; and his constituents occupied a like position. The engineer merely stated that only 60 feet in place of 200 feet had been dredged; and the work had not been taken out of the hands of the contractor. Extras to the amount of $50,000 had been charged, and of this $3,700 had been already paid. The Government should explain why they had treated Mr. Ross differently since he wrote to the Government. Why had sums of money been handed over to this contractor? It was evident that Mr. Ross had come up in the nick of time to look after the matter, and tell the Government that, if they were not prepared to he carry out their bargain with him, held the whip-hand of them and would expose them, as he (Mr. Campbell) had been looking into the question, and then was the time to secure as much as was possible. Mr. Ross had the Government on the hip. In March last the contract was not half finished, and two-thirds of the wood work had not been done. He denied that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had a right to pay out large sums of money without the consent of Parliament. If he could do so, there was no use in having Parliament; and the hon. the Premier would become a dictator if he followed out that policy. He (Mr. Campbell) did not know of the circumstances of the case until his attention was directed to them on the occasion of the visit of the hon. the Minister of Militia during the election. He was grieved that such a putrid transaction should take place.

MR. TUPPER said it could hardly be expected that the House could pass this item, after the statement made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr.

Campbell), unless the hon. the Premier gave some explanation. That hon. gentleman seemed disposed to treat the matter as one of amusement, but he (Mr. Tupper) did not so regard it. He wanted to know what this vote was for.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have already stated.

Mr. TUPPER said a contract was made with one or two parties by the Government to build a breakwater at South Ingonish, Cape Breton. The work was to be 700 feet long and 15 feet deep. That work had been reduced to 565 feet long and 15 feet deep since the contract was made. The original contract price of the work was $78,428.60. To this $3,643 had been added, and now it was proposed to increase it by $1,600. Although the work had been greatly decreased, the cost had been largely increased.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was not this Government which gave out the contract.

Mr. TUPPER: I know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was given out in May, 1873, and the contract was signed July 23rd, 1873. The contract was given to W. F. Mackenzie for $78,428, although Thomas Evans tendered at $74,110. In other words, the contract was given to a party who tendered to the amount of $4,117 above the last tenderer. The contract was afterwards assigned by Mackenzie to John Ross, and the work was carried on under the superintendence of the Chief Engineer of the Department for the Lower Provinces. The foundation of the pier, to the full length, was laid, but it appeared that it was destroyed to a considerable extent by a storm. The evidence of the Engineer went to show that it was destroyed because it had a square end. The engineer recommended that the pier for the last 150 feet should present an acute angle. This was partially done, when the work was destroyed by a second storm. These were accidents beyond, he presumed, the control of human power. He had not the details of the Engineer with him, and he spoke entirely from memory, not expecting this item would be discussed to-night. However, the calculations of the Engineer were based upon what he conceived to be the proper interpretation of the contract and of the work performed. The contractors, as could be seen by papers laid before the House, had presented claims amounting to $13,000. He had no means of knowing what the Engineer would report, as that gentleman had taken the papers in the case with him, but he would report as soon as possible. As to the dredging, his (Mr. Mackenzie's) opinion was that the contractors had no claim upon the Government. In the meantime, the Engineer had sent the Government his certificate for the amount now asked for, and there could be no doubt but they would have to pay it, unless they resisted the claim without any evidence from their own officials on the subject to warrant them in so doing.

Mr. TUPPER said he understood that the work had been completed for some time. The contract placed all hazards, such as storms, upon the contractor. It was a peculiar fact that, while the amount of work was largely decreased, the cost had increased at an inverse ratio. There was another point. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell) had referred to the harbour breakwater being carried away and obstructing navigation, and therefore destroying the very object for which it had been erected.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was utterly impossible for the Government to do anything more than issue general directions to the Engineer, which had been done. He had every confidence in the Engineer, who was an able and upright man.

Mr. TUPPER: Yes, very.

BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF ROBERT CAMPBELL.

MOTION.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he desired to bring up the motion of which he had given notice two days previous. It was as follows:—

"That the Standing Orders of this House so far as they affect a Bill brought down from the the Senate intituled An Act for the relief of Robert Campbell be suspended, and that the said Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for a second reading."

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought the motion could not be made until they reached it on the notice paper. If it had any priority over the Orders of the Day, then this would equally apply to any other notice. It was extremely irregular, and wholly out of order in his opinion to make the motion then, as there was nothing in it which entitled it to any precedence.

Mr. TUPPER said the motion had been placed on the notice paper on the suggestion of the Chair, so that if the decision on the point at first raised was unfavourable, the hon. member from South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) might not be precluded from moving it in the ordinary way.

Mr. SPEAKER said that the question raised the other day was as to the necessity of giving notice of motion for the suspension of Standing Orders. He had since satisfied himself that this was actually necessary. It had been given, and the question now was whether it should be treated as a notice regarding a Bill, or as an ordinary notice of motion. It was requisite as a preliminary to the introduction of a Bill that notice of such intention should be given; but it was not necessary to wait until they reached the notice in the ordinary notices of motion before it could be moved. The only question was: did a motion concerning a Bill already before the House, placed on the Orders of the Day, hold a position analagous to a motion for the introduction of a Bill of which an hon. member had given notice? Of course, there was another element in this case with reference to the suspension of Standing Orders, but his own impression was that the motion should now be allowed to be made, as being equivalent to a motion for the introduction of a Bill. Rule No. 69 ordinarily governed the action of the House respecting the suspension of Standing Orders, but this motion, he took it, was of sufficient scope to suspend the operation of that rule also. It was an extraordinary motion, and should so be dealt with by the House.

Mr. ROBITAILLE said he wished to know whether the Government would allow an opportunity for moving the notices of motion placed on the notice paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the motion now moved by the hon. member from South Ontario was an entirely different motion from the one introduced the other day.

Mr. GIBBS said that both motions were substantially the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that in the other motion the hon. member had drawn his pen through the part relating to formal suspension of the Standing Orders or Rules, and now this formed a substantive part of the motion. The other was a motion for proceeding with a Bill, in short, but the rules declared that such a motion as this should only be granted in a specific way. It was the most sweeping resolution ever submitted to the House; nothing was allowed to stand in its way. As to the point raised by the hon.

member for Bonaventure, he would say that the Government had not the slightest objection to let the notices of motion pass in conformity with the usual practice. They might be reached that evening.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said, lest he should move for the suspension of the wrong rule, he had determined to cover the whole of them in his motion. His impression was that the Committee on Standing Orders had done a grave injustice to certain parties who had come before the House for relief, and, lest there might be any obstacle of the kind at which the Premier had hinted, he had made his motion in its present shape. He believed that the Standing Orders Committee came to an improper conclusion, and that the proceedings of the Senate ought to have been taken notice of by the Committee. He was prepared to show that the step he now proposed should be taken was in accordance with the practice in the old Parliament not more than ten or twelve years ago.

Mr. HOLTON said, if the course proposed to be taken by the hon. gentleman was adopted, it would give rise to a very important constitutional question, and it might be clearly doubted whether at this stage of the Session such a discussion should be had. Nothing, therefore, in point of fact, would be gained by overriding the ordinary practice of Parliament. The hon. gentleman proposed a suspension of the Rules in a way that was contrary to the rule and practice of Parliament. The rule was that no suspension should be granted in respect to Private Bills without the concurrent report of the two Standing Committees on such Bills. They had no such report, and indeed, one of those Committees had reported adversely to the Bill on the ground of insufficient notice. His own conviction was that, without the unanimous consent of the House, this measure should not be proceeded with.

Mr. SPEAKER said a question of considerable importance was involved in this motion. If by accident the order for the second reading of the Bill or proceeding with any other stage should disappear from the Order paper, it being still before the House, it was manifest that this would be the proper time for a motion to replace it on the Order paper.

Mr. HOLTON said a motion to restore a Bill to the Order paper was a kind of notice and should, like any other notice, be dealt with when it was reached on the notice paper.

Mr. BLAIN said if he understood the position assumed by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) it was this: Assuming that by some mistake the Bill had gone to the Standing Orders Committee, and they had ruled upon it by mistake, the Bill was sent there to decide a point which ought not to be determined because the rules ought not to apply in a case of this kind. He thought this was a case in which the Standing Orders should be suspended and the Bill put on the paper.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he contended that, the Senate last year having made certain progress on this Bill, and having given notice that at this Session they would take it up in the position in which it was left, was a notice to all the world, and the Committee on Standing Orders ought to have accepted it as sufficient notice.

Mr. SPEAKER said he was inclined to think that this was a motion analogous to one relating to the introduction of a Bill.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said the question had been asked if anything had occurred in the Parliament of Old Canada which would bear on this point. In the Session of 1865, held in the city of Quebec, he found that certain Bills passed during the winter Session were taken up at the fall Session and dealt with without the notice which the Standing Orders Committee seemed to think necessary in this case. When the House met in August, 1865, the motion was made "that the resolutions of last Session relative to Bills then before the House be now read," which was done. It was then resolved that any further proceedings upon every Bill which had been presented during that Session should be suspended on the day Parliament prorogued, in order that the promoters might proceed with them at the following Session. Accordingly a Bill was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Simpson entitled "Sylvester's Relief Bill," which was read a second time on the 8th day of March, 1865, and was referred to the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills. The House met again in August and dealt with and passed that Bill, taking it up at the point at which it was left when the previous Session closed. In some cases, the House asked that the petitions on which the Bills were founded should be read in the popular branch, which was done, and they proceeded to legislate upon them. The proceedings could be found in the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the old Province of Canada. He found that the Clerk of the Legislative Council brought down to the House of Assembly, after the Bill had passed the Upper House, a Bill intituled "An Act for the relief of Robert Sylvester." The Bill then went through the various stages in the lower branch and became law. In some cases, the Bills were proceeded with without a petition being received at all. The fact that the Legislative Council adjourned the case from one Session to another and took on at the precise point where it was left off, was considered as sufficient notice. He could cite a number of cases all in the same direction. Twenty or thirty different acts were laid over from March, 1865, until the next Session in August or September, and were dealt with in precisely the same way as the one above quoted; just as if notice had been given in the papers.

Mr. HOLTON asked for a statement of what was done on that occasion.

Mr. GIBBS said the proceedings were analogous to those which took place in the Senate upon this very Bill.

Mr. HOLTON: But in 1865 this House, or the House corresponding to this House, resolved that business should be taken up at a certain stage. The hon. gentleman now asks that the legislation of the Senate in respect to this Bill shall bind this House, which never came to any such resolution.

Mr. GIBBS: The popular branch, as far as I know, never came to any such resolution in the first Session of 1865.

Mr. HOLTON: Oh, yes. I am quite sure the House could never have proceeded otherwise. The spring Session of 1865 came to a sudden close. Business was unfinished, and it was determined, either by Statute or resolution of both Houses, that it should be taken up in the ensuing Session at the point it had reached the previous Session. We have done nothing analogous to that in respect to this Bill or any other Bill. It comes before us as an entirely new Bill, to be introduced according to our Standing Orders.

Mr. GIBBS said that the Senate, by resolution last year, had determined that the Bill should be taken up at the precise point it had reached then. This House should recognize the act of the Senate in determining that due notice had been given.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he regretted that the hon. the Minister of Justice was still too ill to attend in his place. The objection which he (Mr. Mackenzie) entertained was the fact that the Bill was intended now to deal with a matter which could be dealt with by the Courts. He had no objection to affording relief to Mrs. Campbell if the proper forms were observed—nothing would give him greater pleasure.

Mr. TUPPER rose to a point of order. He did not think the merits of the case should now be discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is quite competent for me to speak as to the merits of the case.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think so.

Mr. GIBBS, referring to the proceedings of the Senate, said it would have been much better had the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders allowed the petitioner on behalf of Mrs. Campbell to read these proceedings, instead of himself (Mr. Rymal) reading the minority report.

Mr. RYMAL said the Hon. Mr. Macdougall had every opportunity of reading the proceedings. In fact, it was that gentleman's reference to them which led him (Mr. Rymal) to read the minority report.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the usual rule of notice should only be suspended in urgent cases, under which head he did not think the pre-ent case came. He would accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Cumberland, and not speak on the merits of the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON said it was within the powers of the House to suspend the Standing Orders. The question was, whether this was a fit case in which this should be done. The other night, very late, the Rules were suspended in order to rush a Railway Bill through for the accommodation of a gentleman, and he certainly thought the House should do the same for the accommodation of a lady. He held that sufficient notice had been given last Session. The fact that Mr. Campbell recognized the notice, in appearing before the Senate this Session as well as last Session, left him no right to claim insufficiency of notice. The case was still in Court, and, as Mr. Campbell had acquiesced in the jurisdiction of the Senate, it was not open to him to object to the jurisdiction of this House.

NORTHERN RAILWAY ARRANGEMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following Resolution:—

“1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the sum of £50,000 stg., Second Preference Bonds now held by the Government of Canada, part of a certain sum of £233,000 stg., of Second Preference Bonds issued by the Northern Railway Company of Canada, shall hold equal rank and priority with other bonds of the same character in any re-arrangement that may be authorized by an Act passed during this Session; and, further, that the sum of £50,000 stg., part of a certain sum of £100,000 stg., of Third Preference Bonds issued by the said Company, and now held by the Government of Canada, together with the interest thereon, be extinguished on the following conditions:—

“1st. That the said Company shall, within one year from the First day of May, 1877, pay to the Government the sum of £45,000 sterling in cash, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

“2nd. That the said Company shall, within the same period, pay the Government of Canada the sum of Twenty-Seven Thousand Four Hundred and Fifty-Eight dollars and Eighty-Seven cents, in satisfaction of the sums improperly applied by the Company out of the moneys payable to the Government of Canada, and also assign the mortgage now held by the said company on the Couchiching Hotel for moneys advanced thereon.”

(In the Committee.)

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT introduced a Bill (No. 123) To provide for the arrangement of certain claims of the Government of Canada upon the Northern Railway Company.

Bill read the first, second and third times and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 120.]

(Mr. Mills.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for the third reading, read.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had examined the Bill, and found that it was quite consistent with the provisions of the Act. While he admitted there was a good deal of force in the objections taken to the Bill by hon. gentlemen opposite and the hon. member for Chateauguay, it was quite impossible to make the changes suggested without reconsidering the whole Bill and reconstructing many of its sections. No evil had arisen from the operation of the Act, so he hoped the House would allow the Bill to pass in its present form, and he gave the promise that the Government would reconsider the respective clauses during the recess with a view to amending them in the direction indicated. If hon. members would not agree to that proposition, the Bill would have to be withdrawn; it would not be possible to amend the Act in the manner suggested at the present late period of the Session.

Mr. HOLTON said the hon. the First Minister had himself suggested the best reason for not proceeding with the Bill, viz., that the House was unable at that stage of the Session to reconsider the Act which was passed only a year ago, and which it was proposed to amend in a sense which might operate very injuriously and vexatiously to the people living in counties adjacent to Indian Reserves in the old settlements of the country. That was the point he (Mr. Holton) took. The county he represented was contiguous to an Indian reserve, and was in intimate relations with it, and the people had to pass through the Indian reserve on their way to the market of Montreal. The Bill was introduced at so late a stage of the Session that no opportunity was afforded to communicate with parties who would be affected by it. The legislation of last Session on the subject was considered, if not final, as likely at all events to stand for some little time. No intimation was given of any purpose to change the law during this Session. On Friday last the Bill was introduced, and he had not had, therefore, an opportunity to communicate with those who knew more about the operation of the measure than he could pretend to know. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had made out a case—which he was not prepared to dispute—for legislation in regard to the wild tribes of the great North-West, and in the largely waste country of British Columbia; but, in dealing, as it was, perhaps, necessary to deal, with the Indians, subject to those conditions, the hon. Minister proposed to deal in the same manner with Indians residing in the centre of settlements in the old Provinces of the Dominion. All things being considered, the present Bill might fairly lie over until next Session. It should be remembered that the Bill was an amendment of the measure, dealing with the whole subject of Indian affairs, introduced by the Government itself last Session, and hon. members had been afforded no opportunity of seeing its working, and no possibility of comparing the proposed amendment with the general law, and no interests would be injuriously affected by the Bill being allowed to lie over until the hon. the Minister of Interior, who was bringing his abilities and great industry to bear on the duties of his Department, had the opportunity to consider the whole subject of the Act of last Session. The practice of officers of Department urging their views on their political chiefs and having them carried into effect by legislation was one which should not be carried too far. Great questions of polity rose with respect to the treatment of Indians and their relations with the whites in the surrounding country, and, at the closing of a most laborious Session, it was asking rather too much to invite the House to consider the Indian Act, which was adopted with so much deliberation one year ago, with a view to remove some possible defects.

Mr. MITCHELL said he concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) that there was a mischievous tendency to force on Ministers the views of officers of the Department, and much firmness was required to resist the attempts made to change legislation in accordance with the opinion of such officers. It was too late in the Session to deal with the Indian question, and, instead of having patch-work legislation, it should be dealt with at a subsequent period in a comprehensive manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, as it was evident there would be a long discussion on the Bill, and as the hon. the Minister of Interior was unable at that period of the Session to make a general amendment in accordance with the views urged by hon. members, for two reasons: First, because of the late period of the Session, and, second, because the hon. gentleman had not had time to consider the wisdom of some of those suggestions, he would move that the order be discharged.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 109.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MASSON said he desired to direct the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to an irregularity which had occurred in regard to the introduction of the Bill. It was well known in England as well as in this country that any irregularity in dealing with resolutions affecting the imposition of taxes or Bills relating to the tariff was jealously watched by the people. They had been deprived of one of the important stages in the discussion of the measure by the omission of the second reading of the resolutions, at which stage hon. members had a right to discuss the whole question on its merits and not on the details of the measure. The Journals of the House for 1868-69 and 1874 showed that the resolutions were submitted from the Committee of Ways and Means, they were read a second time and afterwards concurred in. When a similar irregularity had occurred in England, the proceedings had been quashed, and a like course should be adopted in the present case, and the proceedings should be recommenced. If the Journals remained as they were to-day, this would evidently be invoked in the future as a precedent.

Mr. SPEAKER said that his recollection of the matter was very distinct, as he had given a great deal of attention to it. The apparent irregularity arose entirely from the fact that, departing from the old mode of proceeding, an endeavour was made to adopt the more correct English mode. The custom followed in the House ever since he had been a member of it had been that when the resolutions came up the question was put on each resolution, and not on the resolutions as a whole, as was the proper English practice. On this particular occasion he had followed the old rule, and he had asked the House whether they wished that the first resolution should be read a second time and concurred in. The right hon. member for Kingston objected to this mode of proceeding, and read a passage from May bearing on the subject. He felt satisfied that the hon. member had made himself familiar with the rule—of course he was quite aware of the English practice—and he at once assented to the objection as being a good one, and he was much pleased to find that it was proposed to take what he believed to be the more correct mode of proceeding. May laid down very clearly what was the proper course to follow; in the first place, the question was on the first reading, as a matter of course, and, on the second reading being proposed, it was open to any member to propose an amendment of a general character; but when that motion was once disposed of, hon. members were confined on the several resolutions to the motions affecting the questions immediately under consideration. Under their old practice they had arrived at nearly the same results by a different process. On the question for the first resolution to be read a second time and concurred in, it was open to hon. members to propose any general amendment and discuss it as they pleased, but this amendment once disposed of, hon. members were held to the particular amendment and particular resolution subsequently moved. On the occasion in question, he remembered, very distinctly, putting the question thus—and it turned out to be the correct English form:—"Is it the pleasure of the House that the resolutions be read the second time." The right hon. member for Kingston objected, and stated that the question was on the first resolution. The right hon. member had a book in his hand, having just consulted an authority; and he had said: "Very well." The matter stood in that position. He had really put the question on the general reading of the resolutions, and objection being taken to this, he presumed that the right hon. member had made himself familiar with the subject, and he remarked: "Very well;" and let the matter remain so. He supposed that it was so recorded by the clerk. This was the exact position in which the matter stood. He felt, on further consideration of the whole question, that no practical injustice had been done. General discussion was not admissible afterwards, both according to the English practice and their own old practice. The general discussion was confined to the first resolution. He had looked into the English practice very carefully. If there was any error in the proceedings on the former occasion, it could, certainly, not be taken as a precedent, when all the other rulings, and the practice on all subsequent reports, were in correct form.

Mr. HOLTON said the Speaker had placed the matter very plainly before the House. They were at a period of transition from the old and former practice to a better practice. Perhaps some little irregularity, or what seemed to be so, had arisen; but Mr. Speaker might instruct the Clerk, or the Clerk taking note of the discussion might see that the Journals were prepared according to the English practice in this respect, which they had better follow. It was wise to do so. Great care was taken in the mother country in this regard, as this related to dealings with the pecuniary interests of the people. He remembered an occasion when that distinguished Parliamentarian, Robert Baldwin, who had had a good deal to do with giving tone to our earlier proceedings under the constitutional regime, had a Supply Bill thrown out because of some irregularities, the exact nature of which he had forgotten, and proceedings were taken de novo. He thought that the hon. member for Terrebonne was quite right in calling the attention of the House to this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be a very hard precedent indeed if any one was permitted to alter or tamper with the Journals, whether for good or for ill, after the entries were made. It would be dangerous to give such a power to any person. As a matter of fact, not one of the resolutions, except the first, had been read the second time.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The Journals state that they were read the second time and concurred in on a division.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the resolutions were reported from the Committee, and the Minister of Finance had moved that they be read the second time. He objected, stating that the first resolution should be read the second time, and this was done.

Mr. SPEAKER said that if, when he put the question, the right hon. member for Kingston had not interjected his objection, and if he had not then said—"very well," there would be no room for doubt whatever. He had, in the first place, put the question on the second reading correctly.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT called attention to page 246 of the Votes and Proceedings.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that in such matters no irregularity at all should be allowed to exist. He would suggest that the matter be settled between his hon. friend and the Minister of Finance. It could be declared on the Journals of the House that this should not be a precedent, and this would settle the whole difficulty. It was agreed that the following entry should be made in the Journals:—

Mr. MASSON, having drawn the attention of Mr. Speaker to an irregularity in the proceedings upon the concurrence by the House in the Resolutions reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, viz.:—that the question for the second reading of the said Resolutions does not appear to have been put to the House, but only the second reading of the first Resolution,—it was Resolved, "That the said informality shall not in future be quoted as a precedent."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT then moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. DESJARDINS said that before the Bill was read the second time he wished to make a few remarks on a subject to which he had drawn the attention of the House at the opening of the Session, when he had asked for a return regarding the importation of different grades of sugar. He had called the attention of the Minister of Finance to the importance, from a commercial point of view, for Canada, of securing direct communication with the Antilles. It was impossible to obtain this trade and the benefits accruing from it, if they did not keep in operation the sugar refineries which had already been established in this country. The financial policy of the Government was not known at the time, and the Minister of Finance stated then that it was not proper at that stage of the Session to raise that discussion. The hon. gentleman had not afforded him subsequently an opportunity to return to the subject, but he considered that the moment the House was called upon to vote on the Bill, by which the tariff was changed and new taxes of a temporary character were imposed to meet the needs of the country, he should be allowed to observe to the Minister of Finance that it was natural, perhaps, for them to hope and ask that, when obliged to alter the tariff, this should be done in such fashion as to benefit the industrial interests of the country. The expect-tation that this would have been done by the Government was so much the more natural, owing to anterior declarations made by members of the Cabinet. He would, in particular, quote a statement made by the First Minister in the course of a speech which the hon. gentleman had delivered in the city of Hamilton on the 22nd January, 1874, when he said :

“The parties have adopted the principles which I maintain ; to wit, that our revenue should be obtained by means of duties levied on our importations, and that the distribution of these duties ought to be always made in such a manner as to confer the greatest possible advantage on our population. Sir Francis Hincks has said that he was in favour of incidental protection. I have made the same declaration, and that simply signifies that, as long as it will be necessary to levy duties on importations, those duties ought to be levied on articles identical with those which our people can produce. I will add a word on this subject, and that is to say that, even if it were possible, which I do not believe, to reduce the duties on imported goods, this would not be just with regard to the manufactures which have been established, counting upon the permanence of the present system.”

The occasion seemed to him to be favourable for the carrying out of the policy indicated by the Premier, and, when they were obliged to impose duties to meet temporary necessities, he believed that the Government should consider favourably the sugar refining interests of the country. One of the great hindrances and obstacles which prevented the establishment of sugar refineries in Canada arose from the fact that the duty levied on refined sugar imported into this country was less than that which was imposed on the inferior grades, and, as the levy of new imposts was in question, it seemed to him that the Government should have, instead of increasing duties on tea or malt, so re-adjusted the tariff regarding these qualities of sugar and the refined sugars imported from the United States and elsewhere as to favour and contribute to the success of Canadian refineries. This question—as indeed he had remarked on a previous occasion—ought not to be considered as one which concerned private interests. It related, in point of fact, to a most important commercial question. One of the greatest problems which they had at present to solve was to find markets for the products of this country ; and everybody would admit the correctness of the statement made by hon. members who had made of this subject a special study,—that the only means by which we could open foreign markets to our products was to establish direct communication with the West Indies and other meridional countries. The great obstacle—as the First Minister, and he believed, also the hon. member for Waterloo had observed—to the establishment of this direct communication was that, when we exported our products to these markets, it was difficult to procure return cargoes, and, in consequence, the products exported had to bear all the weight of the charges made for transport. It had been objected by the hon. the Prime Minister that they had to contend with the competition of the United States, the ports of which were in greater proximity than those of Canada to the countries in question ; and that the principal product that we could procure in the West Indies, and these meridional countries, in exchange for what we sent them, was sugar, which was brought into the United States at an expense reduced to the lowest possible limit. He believed that, taking into consideration the cost of breaking bulk, repacking and transhipment, the exchange of cargoes would compensate for any increased expenditure attending the transportation of the percentage of the useless matters contained in the inferior qualities of sugar, which was in the raw state when imported. It was known that the proportion of waste attending the process of refining was scarcely more than four per cent.; and, if this percentage was considered in connection with the advantages connected with this importation, he believed that the objection made in this relation could not be considered to have any great force. It had been suggested to the Government that they should grant a subsidy to a line of steamers to ply between Halifax and the West Indies, but no matter what aid was given, this would still remain insufficient to guarantee the success of such a line, if, prior to its establishment, they did not decide upon the conditions of trade necessary to render an exchange of products between these two countries successful. It was stated that, under present circumstances, it was impossible to compete in this regard with the United States, owing to the amount of the drawbacks and bounty granted by the American Government on sugar exported from that country. On the other hand, the Committee appointed last year to consider this question had denied in their report the existence of such a bounty, but placing in comparison the percentage admitted by the Committee and that recognized by all who had looked into the question, outside of interested parties, it would be seen that such was the case. Taking the point that the United States Government was awarding drawbacks 60 or 70 per cent. of refined sugar, as the only quantity capable of being made out of 100 per cent. of the raw material—and this figure the American experts and the Committee of the House had accepted as being the proportion adopted by the United States as the amount upon which they based the amount of the drawback on exports in favour of their refiners—they would find that there really existed a bounty, and that this bounty was quite considerable. He saw it stated in a speech delivered by Mr. Leatham in the House of Commons, in 1864, that in England, after experiments had been made with nineteen varieties of sugar, the percentage of crystallizable saccharine matter obtainable was found to be from 85 to 90 per cent.; and at Cologne, in experiments which had been made, relative to arrangements to be made between England, Holland, Germany and France, a percentage of 83 to 85 had been obtained. There was no reason to believe that the American refiner was inferior in any way to the refiner of any of the European countries. The American Government, therefore, in granting a drawback on the percentage of 70, not only gave a drawback equal to the duties paid at the port of entry, but a considerable bonus besides. There were few persons who now dared affirm, that the American refiner, was not in receipt of a real bounty; and this was admitted by the best informed amongst the commercial journals of the United States. It was also recognized in all the reports made on the subject by those who had investigated into the matter, as well as by many others. In the course of an interview with many senators and members of the Assemblée Nationale, M. Tesserence de Bort, Minister of Agriculture, in reply to statements made in the interest of the French refiners, admitted that the United States must be ranked amongst the countries which granted bounties in favour of sugar refiners. A doubt had been sought to be raised as to the interest we could have in maintaining our sugar refineries; but, he believed that, if such a theory was adopted, it might equally be held that we had no interest in maintaining any of our manufactures. We would be running counter to the policy which prevailed in the most important and prosperous countries of Europe and America. It had been established that about 100,000,000lb. of sugar were consumed in this country, and to refine this quantity it would require not less than ten of such establishments as the one existing at Montreal, giving permanent employment to at least 6,000 people; and the consequent consumption of coal from our own mines would be at least 50,000 tons a year. It seemed to him that, under these circumstances, the Government had no right to despise, or set aside as unworthy of consideration, any proposal of a nature to encourage the establishment and progress of such industries, in order to aid in the maintenance, and to supply work to a considerable number of individuals. They ought to consider that the benefits flowing from such a policy were not confined to the refiners and the men whom they employed, but they extended in a very great degree to the rest of our population. The importance of this question was such that in England very serious complaints were made on the part of the English refiners, owing to the competition from countries like France, Germany, and even Russia, with which they had to contend.

Mr. CAUCHON: They give more aid to this industry, I suppose?

Mr. DESJARDINS said this was due to the protection extended by the Governments of these countries to this important interest. He would ask permission to refer to a speech delivered on this subject by Mr. Ritchie in the Imperial Parliament, for he found that, despite the superiority of England with reference to capital and wealth compared with Canada, they seemed to suffer in a corresponding proportion from the competition the English refiners had to contend against from France, where this industry was encouraged by means of drawbacks and bounties, so that the position of these two countries was pretty much the same as the position occupied by the refiners of Canada and the United States on this question. Mr. Ritchie, in the course of a debate, said :

“The question was one of great commercial importance to this country as the House would see when he stated that the quantity of sugar refined annually amounted to 650,000 tons, and was of the value of from £15,000,000 to £20,000,000 sterling. Until within a few years past the English refining sugar trade had been growing and prosperous, but it had now fallen into decline. That decline was not owing to any want of skill or of enterprise on the part of the refiners, but to the unfair competition which France was enabled to carry on by the system of bounties.”

This opinion was admitted to be correct by those who replied to Mr. Ritchie on the part of the Government. They agreed that it was impossible for the English refiners to compete with the French refiners, if France did not change her tariff, and so readjust it as to place these refiners on the same footing. The objection raised here was also made on this occasion to the claims of the English refiners, and it was this: that the consumers benefited from this system, and that they ought not to complain if drawbacks were given by the French Government on sugar exported by the refiners, as it affected the price of this article in favour of the pecuniary interests of consumers. To this Mr. Ritchie made a reply, which in his opinion was equally applicable to the same objection that was raised in this relation in this country.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he did not think they could enter into the discussion which his hon. friend had raised, as to the expediency of giving in one shape or another a bounty to sugar refiners. He would waive the merits of the case, as it was not possible to consider it at this period of the Session, for the simple reason that whichever way such a thing was done, it would involve of necessity either the loss of a very large amount of money in the revenue, or place on the people a very considerable burden in the shape of a large increase in the price of an article which, though not a necessary of life, was still so universally consumed that such a step would impose a heavy tax on the people. The question had been at various times pretty extensively discussed, and he would remind his hon. friend, that, as it at present existed, their policy, as modified, had been undoubtedly changed in the interests of the sugar refiners. It was a very large and difficult question which he did not then propose to discuss.

Mr. TUPPER said that the question so fully and ably brought up by the hon. member for Hochelaga was one of great magnitude. He attached very great importance to it, but he would then merely reply to a statement made by the Minister of Finance, who seemed to think that this was a question which he was precluded from entertaining at all.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: At this time.

Mr. TUPPER: At this time. The hon. gentleman took it as his premises that the establishment of sugar refineries in Canada could only be attained by a large increase of taxation. He (Mr. Tupper) was disposed to question the soundness of the hon. gentleman's view in this respect. He believed it could be done by lowering the tariff on raw sugars, which would not necessarily decrease the revenue. When Sir Robert Peel, in England, reduced the duty on sugar £10 a ton, it was followed by an increased revenue from sugar, as the consumption of that article was enormously increased. Sugar, while a necessary of life, was indulged in according to the means of the people. By a large reduction of the duty on the raw material, refineries could be established, and then the people would use more sugar as it would be cheaper than it was now. It was not simply a question of the amount of labour employed in sugar refining, but the enormous trade with the West Indies, as we had large quantities of those articles suitable for exportation to the West India Islands. The misfortune now was that ports in the United States did almost all the trade of Canada with the West Indies. He also joined issue with the hon. gentleman in the statement that the change made was in favour of the industry in this country. The change was not sufficient to meet the change in the United States. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had laboured to show that there was no bounty upon sugar, but the evidence which had come before the House on that subject must convince all that there was a large bounty. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States had made a careful investigation and reported to his Government that the drawback was largely in excess of what it ought to be, and the Government ordered it to be reduced. The refiners, however, got a commission appointed, which examined nobody but experts in the refining business, and even their evidence went to show that on a drawback of $3.60 per hundred, there was 60c. more than it ought to be, or this amount of bounty, and some witnesses showed that it was from 60c. to 75c. per hundred pounds. He believed the United States would be glad to see a countervailing duty here which would meet the enormous bounty which sugar refiners there got. He read several extracts from a letter from a planter in Jamaica, Mr. Solomon, written to Mr. George Gordon Dunstan, which he thought contained the argument in a nut shell :

"It must be explained that the chief export from this island is Muscovado sugar. We have not the skilled labour or the capital to refine it, and it is, therefore, shipped in the raw state to the United States and to Europe, where it undergoes the necessary manipulation to manufacture it into what is termed refined or loaf sugar.

"Upon examination of your customs' tariff, it is observable that your duty upon the raw article of sugar is far beyond what it should be as compared with your duty upon the refined article, and until there be a more appreciable difference either by the duty on the refined being increased, or the duty on the raw being decreased, it would prevent the exportation of the raw article to your country, as the only form practicable under the circumstances would be to send it to you in a refined state, and, as before brought to your attention, the difficulties in our way cannot be surmounted.

"The sugar duties are now abolished in Great Britain, but while they were exacted there, there was a low scale for the low quality of muscovado; there was a higher scale for the grocery description, and still higher scale for the refined article, and such a system was considered fair and just, not at all encroaching upon free trade principles, for it was allowed that there is foreign matter in muscovado sugar, and there is also a large percentage of molasses, and when it is manufactured into refined sugar there is a large percentage deficient in sugar, and it was deemed unfair to charge as high a rate of duty upon impure sugar as upon the pure article.

"You might as well charge as high a duty upon a weak spirit as upon a strong spirit that will admit of adulteration, but in this respect there is a fair allowance, and the same principle should be adopted in regard to the weaker sugars.

"If the scale of duties were grounded upon the basis of the Dutch Standard above and below, with a fair additional duty upon the refined, I am firmly convinced the revenue derivable from your sugar duties would increase year after year by the large increase of consumption from ordinary causes, as well as extraordinary causes, in the preservation of an abundant fruit crop and divers other accessories which can scarcely be enumerated.

"Trusting that this subject will have careful attention of your Government, and hoping to hear from you soon, that the great impediment to a large commercial intercourse between this Island and the Dominion has been removed."

He trusted that the hon. the Finance Minister would give a careful consideration to this subject during recess, and see whether some means could not be devised, consistent with the interests of the country, which would bring back and increase tenfold the large business we had with the West Indies, a trade which no member could appreciate who had not given attention to it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT remarked that, when the reduction on sugar was made by Sir Robert Peel, the duty was 6c. per pound.

Mr. TUPPER said he knew this. He only meant to point out the principle.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On the 5th Section, as to tubing,

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had made the announcement when the subject was under discussion that tubing, when used in a particular way, was subject to a drawback. It was then suggested by the right hon. member for Kingston that it should be expressly so stated in the Bill. He (Mr. Cartwright) had taken the matter into consideration, and had adopted the suggestion by providing in this section that all tubing used for boilers should have a drawback on the duty paid for admission into Canada.

Mr. DOMVILLE enquired whether the law would cover the case of brass and copper tubing on locomotives, which, however, were not for boilers.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said all tubing which properly belonged to boilers would be subject to the drawback. No doubt his hon. friend referred to ships built in Canada and going to an American port, having the full duty charged on the various materials entering into their construction, whereas vessels built in the United States came here free of duty.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had this injustice in his mind when he asked the question.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the attention of the Government had been directed to this matter, and when such a case occurred it would be dealt with.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he was satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. TUPPER said the change was an improvement. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) had questioned the accuracy of some statements he made on this subject, his authority being Mr. J. H. Killey, of the Mona Iron Works, Hamilton. He had received a letter from that gentleman, from which he would quote :

"The duty on pipes or tubes is a great mistake. There are none made in Canada, nor likely to be, as the plant is very costly. The whole consumption in Canada of iron pipes, if turned into one factory, would not pay for working it, so that duty is and will be a direct tax against the manufacturer using pipe, which means all the manufacturing operations of this country, because it enters into everything in which steam, water or gas is used. Now it would appear, say in steam boilers, that one half the cost of a tubular or ordinary steam boiler, as used in the factories of this country, is on the tubing alone, so that steam boilers imported at 17½ per cent. duty would be practically reduced to half that sum, as against a Canadian manufacturer paying duty on the tubes. Now another article, steam or water heaters, radiators, or articles made entirely out of tubes, four-fifths of the cost is the material, the labour required to put them together being smaller in proportion than boilers, but still employing a large number of men in all the large cities. Now on those articles the duty will be practically repealed, and the Americans placed on a better footing than Canadians, their facilities for the manufacture being greater in proportion to the greater field of operations. * * * I may add that the least cost of plant to make iron tubes would be from $150,000 to $200,000, a sum which no capitalist or capitalists would invest under the regime of the present Government."

Mr. YOUNG said he would prefer to see the matter remain as it was than to see the proposed addition to the Bill, expressly declaring that the tubing must be for boilers to make it subject to the drawback. Tubing entered into the manufacture of a large number of machines, and should in that respect be regarded as a raw material. He thought, however, that tubing used for handsome residences, &c., should be taxed. A discrimination should be made, and all tubing for machinery ought to have the drawback allowed. As it was proposed, the Custom House officer was circumscribed, while, before, he could judge of each case as it came up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, while he agreed with his hon. friend that the duty on tubing should be taken off altogether, yet, as the hon. the Finance Minister did not see proper to do this, he thought it better that, where a drawback was allowed, it should be expressly stated in the Bill rather than left to the discretion of the Government.

Mr. WOOD said, in explanation of his remarks to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) on a former occasion, that he had heard Mr. Killey complain of the enormous expense attendant upon the manufacture of boiler pipes, and not as to gas and water pipes.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Committee resumed.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. YOUNG said, since the rising of the House, he had consulted with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), and found that the understanding was that the concession made by the hon. the Minister of Finance only referred to tubing used in boilers. In view of that concession, he felt he would not be justified, at this late period of the Session, in introducing a motion which might give rise to considerable discussion.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendments read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved, in amendment:

“That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to the Committee that they have power to amend the first section of the said Bill, by striking out after the words ‘on every pound of malt,’ the words ‘two cents,’ and substituting therefor the words ‘one cent.’”

He said the news that the hon. the Finance Minister had imposed an additional duty on malt was heralded from one end of the Dominion to the other, and a large deputation of persons interested in the trade waited upon the hon. gentleman to protest against the act of gross injustice he was committing upon their interests. The hon. the Finance Minister, however, was impregnable, and subsequently a petition of the manufacturers was presented to the House, praying that the duty on malt should not be increased. That petition deserved the respect of the House, as the gentlemen engaged in this trade would compare favourably in point of respectability with any other portion of the manufacturing community of the country. There were some hon. members who thought the brewing trade should be put down. Now, the Government had a perfect right to suppress it if they chose; but, while the business was legalized, and the Government derived a large amount of revenue from it, those engaged in it were entitled to the same amount of protection as was enjoyed by persons engaged in other pursuits. He quite agreed with the views enunciated by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) in regard to prohibition; he was prepared at any moment to vote for a prohibitory law as soon as the people were educated up to it, and as soon as the Government could find ways and means to supply the $6,000,000 revenue derived from the liquor traffic. In making this motion he was not advocating the interests of the drunkards. He held that, in taking the course he was pursuing, he was advocating the cause of temperance, rather than of intemperance. A few figures that he would quote would bear out this statement. Last year the increase in the consumption of ardent spirits amounted to $122,671.96, while there was a decrease in the consumption of malt liquor of $15,788.28. This showed conclusively that the course pursued by the Government was contrary to the policy of other countries in this regard, which always fostered the beer producing interest as compared with the manufacture of ardent spirits. Our manufacturers paid 100 per cent. more duty than those engaged in the same business in the United States did; they paid 30 per cent. more duty than was imposed in England, and 40 per cent. more than those in Scotland and Ireland. But the agriculturists of this country were directly interested in this question. If times were good in the United States, our farmers could find a market for their products by paying a duty of 15c. a bushel. That duty, however, prohibited our farmers from taking their products to the United States, while the farmers of that country had no duty to pay in importing to Canada, and could, therefore, flood our markets with their products. We imported 4,000,000 bushels of corn from the United States, from which all ardent spirits were made. A few years ago our distilleries were supplied by our own farmers, but that was all changed now owing to the negligence of the Government in not affording our agriculturists the protection they needed so much. This 4,000,000 bushels of corn represented somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3,000,000, and no one could claim that if this amount was distributed among the agriculturists it would not be a benefit to them. The additional duty proposed was not only an injury to the brewers, but it affected the agriculturists of Canada. He had no hesitation in saying that this additional duty on malt would increase the consumption of ardent spirits, and would in no wise tend to the elevation of public morals as far as temperance was concerned. If our farmers were not afforded the protection that they needed, they would leave this country for the United States and help to swamp the Canadian markets. He did not expect this amendment would be carried, but he thought a certain amount of respect was due to that respectable class of gentlemen who had petitioned this House. He did not believe the Finance Minister would be in any better financial position if the amount expected to be derived from that source should be obtained. The hon. gentleman would then fail to realize the sum required, because, as they had heard from the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, the staff would have to be increased about two-fold. In four years the expenses of that Department had increased by the nice little sum of $50,000. It was imagined by some hon. gentlemen that he had some peculiar animosity to that Department, but such was not the case. It was evident, from the remarks of hon. members, that the deputy heads of the Departments had too much to say in the management. It could not, of course, be expected that every Minister could be fully posted in regard to the affairs of his Department, and he had, accordingly, to depend to a certain extent upon his deputy, the result of which practice was that the deputy was virtually head of the Department, and this was the reason why there were so many abuses in connection therewith. He wished that the Government could see their way clear to reduce the duty on malt, and allow the trade to have the benefit of it for a few years, and so benefit the agriculturists throughout the country. The course which was being pursued by the Government was one which could not fail to militate sorely against the agricultural community.

Mr. PLATT said he desired to hear the reasons which led the hon. the

Mr. ROCHESTER.

Finance Minister to increase the duty on malt. He had not heard any reasons given by the Government for the action taken. He was an old distiller and brewer and he thought he knew something about the trade. When in the distilling business twenty-five years ago, they used barley, rye and oats and did not import corn from the United States. This tax was an indirect tax on barley, and would tend to drive the people from the country.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he was afraid if it were necessary to give satisfactory reasons to the parties taxed for the taxes which the Government found it necessary to impose, it would be extremely difficult to satisfy them. He could only hope they would succeed in recouping themselves sufficiently from the parties to whom they sold the articles. In response to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester), he desired to say that he and other hon. gentleman who had spoken on the subject had very much exaggerated the difference between the duty in Canada and in England. In England until very lately the duty was 65c. or 66c. per bushel, whereas the duty in this country was computed at 62c. per bushel—that was the bushel of barley, or its equivalent in malt. When the English Chancellor of the Exchequer found it necessary to raise additional revenue he did not hesitate to increase the duty from 2s. 8½d. to 4s., which was done in 1852, and on other occasions. That was equivalent to about 100c. per bushel, which was considerably higher than the duty he (Mr. Cartwright) proposed to levy. It must be remembered that this duty only inflicted an additional 2½c. per gallon, as far as he could reconcile the somewhat varying statements of gentlemen in the trade and officers of the Department, the latter being based on actual experiments. He did not think a tax of 2½c. or 3c. per gallon would seriously affect the brewing community.

Mr. PLATT: It has done so already.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there were few articles which were retailed at a larger advance on the cost of manufacture than beer and whiskey. He had already stated reasons why he thought it impossible safely to augment the tax on whiskey, and he might remind hon. members that when he first had to levy taxes he levied them on whiskey instead of on beer or malt; but having, on grounds of public policy, a strong aversion to disturbing the existing Customs tariff, he was necessarily confined to a large degree to articles and taxes which approached to direct taxation. Malt was one and tea was another of such articles. His best attention, during the recess, would be given to working out those taxes, and, if he should find, on examination and careful investigation of the subject, that the evils spoken of by hon. gentlemen did really exist or were likely to accrue, then, no doubt, it would be his duty to consider the matter very carefully and to call the attention of the Government to any error into which they might have fallen. But he must state that this duty was not imposed without very careful consideration, and it was not a heavier duty than had been very frequently imposed in England, where beer was an article of vastly more general consumption, approaching more to the rank of a necessity than it could be said to be here.

Mr. ROCHESTER: As to Germany.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I do not dispute the accuracy of your statement as to Germany.

Bill read the third time and passed on a division.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 122.]

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this Bill required very little explanation. The Government had adopted almost the exact wording of the English Act, which had the same object in view. They had followed literally that Act in its general provisions. It would be observed that they did not pretend to do anything except to indemnify those members who had sat in the House under a bonâ fide belief that they were qualified to sit. The Bill did not affect the Statute at all, and he hoped it would meet with the general assent of the House.

Mr. BOWELL: How about those who have no bonâ fide belief?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he regretted that he could not make up his mind to vote for the Bill. He could quite understand that there might be occasions when a Bill of Indemnity might pass when some one had unwittingly committed a breach of the law, in regard to which they had two or three precedents in England. But this Bill set aside the law of the land, and provided that a person who sat in this House wrongfully, if he had a bonâ fide belief that he had a right to sit there, should still retain his seat. The country would say there was no use in Parliament passing laws to preserve the independence or purity of Parliament, or to protect the people against having improper representatives in the House, persons who had forfeited their seats, if this Bill were to pass. It would be said "What is the use of passing laws of this kind, if the moment persons are found to have violated the laws they are repealed?" He thought it would greatly weaken the confidence of the country in this House. There was also an objection to passing a general whitewashing Bill, as compared with one for the relief of a person who was proved to have unwittingly broke the law and suffered hardship therefrom. Cases brought before the House, in which the seat of a member was attacked, were referred to a Special Committee or to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and, after the Committee had taken evidence and reported that, in any particular case or in any given number of cases, there was a hardship inflicted, then, and not before, could this House interfere. By the first clause of the Bill, if a person was sued for the penalties under the Independence of Parliament Act, and it was proved that he had made himself liable to all the penalties, the then defence would be that he had acted under a bonâ fide belief that he continued to be qualified. How was that to be proved? It could only be proved by the person charged going into the witness-box and swearing that he so believed.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The second clause provides for that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the second clause provided that he should be a witness. Then, it amounted to a man going and swearing himself clear. Such a measure would weaken the moral sense of the people of the country. It appeared to him that the Bill had not been prepared with any degree of consideration. Under the present law, any person who chose could bring an action, and actions had been brought; and, indeed, a gentleman had called him out of the House to-day and handed him a writ in the name of a gentleman whom he had never heard of before. That gentleman had a vested right in him (Sir John A. Macdonald); he had told in him; the law had told that gentleman that, if he chose to sue him (Sir John A. Macdonald), and prove the case, he had a right to get a judgment. That gentleman trusted in the law. But here was a Bill of Indemnity, by which not only would men be deprived of the right acquired under the law, but, if it passed, no one need trouble himself about penalties hereafter, for no gentleman would be patriotic enough to bring actions against corrupt Members of Parliament at his own expense. If a case was enquired into, and it was shown before a Committee of the House that a party had unwittingly broken the law, there might be reason for passing a Bill of Indemnity; but to pass a whitewashing Bill of that kind would be to make Parliament the laughing stock of the whole country.

Mr. CAMERON said the question of vested rights involved a serious principle: either those who had brought the suits had a right to the money or they had not. If the present Act was to be enforced, they had their rights; and if previous legislation was bad in giving rights to certain individuals, they were now asked to take away those rights without compensation or consideration. The House should not pass the Bill as it now stood. The costs at present were not very serious, unless a man went into the matter wholesale, as he believed some persons had done, for he had seen some two or three dozen suits entered by one man. He had previously seen legislation enacted which took away vested rights, but there was always a provision at least to prevent any person being out of pocket. In this Bill, however, there was no provision even for the class of unfortunate men who were relying on the validity of an Act of Parliament. He granted that a penalty of $2,000 a day for every day a member might sit or vote in the House was preposterous, but it was the law under which they had lived for many years. And the law must have been that a member of this House was liable to the penalty if he did so even innocently or only if he did so knowingly. He confessed there was very great doubt as to what the proper interpretation of the present law was in that respect. But there must be a right and a wrong interpretation of the law, and it seemed to him that this law would have been much more consistent with the true principle upon which legislation should proceed if it had defined what the law was, and if there were doubts removed them, and then provided that only in cases where the law was wilfully violated should it apply. This Bill seemed to assume that the opposite interpretation was correct. It had been very ably argued, he thought, in the other branch of the Legislature, that a man was only to be held liable when he erred knowingly and wilfully.

Mr. MILLS: The case is different.

Mr. CAMERON said he was speaking of no particular case, but only of the general principle of the law. As a lawyer, he must say that he had very great doubts whether under the existing law any knowledge of the act or of the consequences was necessary to make the person so acting subject to the penalty; and he could not say his doubts had been quite removed by what had been said on the present occasion. There was a clear distinction between civil and criminal proceedings. Where a man was subject to be criminally convicted, the law implied that a knowledge of the act was necessary to be proved—he did not mean a knowledge of the law, but of all the facts. But, in a civil case, the law imputed knowledge. The present class of cases, however, came between the two. In another place, all those cases in which it had been held that knowledge was essential to constitute the elements of the offence, were cases in which a penalty was imposed, the alternative being imprisonment; they consequently, being quasi criminal cases. But, under the Independence of Parliament Act, there was no imprisonment. If there were no goods or chattels on which to collect the penalty, there was an end of the matter. He failed to see, therefore, that knowledge was an essential element to make the violators of the Act subject to the penalty. The Bill also proceeded upon the presumption that knowledge was necessary to entitle the party informing to recover. The other alternative was that, because a man was ignorant of any law which he violated, therefore he was to be relieved of the penalty imposed. That surely was not a principle of law which the House would sanction. The law presumed that every man knew the law, and this should be pre-eminently the case with members of Parliament, who were law-makers. He thought the Bill was far too broad in its terms, and involved a principle of a very grave character. It also interfered with the vested rights, because recognized rights, of a certain class of persons who might choose to put the law into operation, but rights which he was bound to say could not meet with the sympathy and encouragement of hon. members. Nevertheless, they had these rights, and the House should be careful to see how it was proposed to take them away. Hon. members who voted for the Bill stood in the position of being liable to be taunted with having white-washed their political friends.

Mr. IRVING said the principal objection of the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Victoria was that the measure emanated from the Government. The alleged infractions of the law were a surprise to the House and to the country, and, instead of making fish of some and flesh of others, it would be better to treat all alike, where there was no knowledge of the Independence of Parliament Act having been broken. The Bill would receive the approbation of the country. If the two hon. members referred to could not make up their minds as to the risks, how was it to be expected that commercial men could do so. Hon. members seemed to forget that the right hon. member for Kingston, amongst others, had an Act of Indemnity passed with reference to his holding an official position while a member of Parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said he had no difficulty in making up his mind on the Bill, no matter from whom it emanated. Hon. members came to the House at a very inconvenient time to attend to the business of the country, and also at much personal sacrifice; and while he was absent from his business house it was likely one of his clerks or agents might make a sale to the Government which would not only vitiate his seat, but also subject him to a very heavy fine. He thought the Government would have been culpable had they neglected to bring in this Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL said his name had been personally associated with acts which had led to the introduction of the Bill. It was said that he himself was subject to the operation of the Independence of Parliament Act. He believed he had done nothing which placed him in that position. Therefore he could challenge any attacks which might be made upon him, and he did it with a thorough feeling that he was perfectly safe. The steps taken against Mr. Speaker had been followed by a close scrutiny not only of the Act but of the Public Accounts. The position taken was a strained position. Most of the members were the leading commercial and professional men in their several districts. The hon. member for Restigouche had facilities for carrying out public contracts, but he would not enter into any, but gave the use of his lighters and tug boats to persons who did, and did not receive a dollar benefit himself. He (Mr. Mitchell) was charged with having leased a building to the Government.

of Canada. He did it; he acknowledged it. If that would unseat him he was willing to go back to his constituents, and own that nine years ago he leased a building to the Government of Canada for offices for the Intercolonial Railway staff, at Newcastle, one of the head depots for the construction of the work. For two months the staff used the Court House. Then they were given notice to quit; and, not being able to get any building in town, application was made to him to rent them one of his houses. He did it, and signed an agreement for three years. The building was occupied until the present Government came into office, and then, without any notice, he was informed that the lease had expired. Although great damage was done to the premises, he was only allowed $200 for damages and lack of notice, the rent being paid up to the date to which the house was occupied. He was presumably liable to a penalty of $2,000 a day, and two actions had been brought against him, one for $500,000 and the other for $300,000, under the Independence of Parliament Act. He defied those who were bringing the suits. He had not violated the Act, and he was not afraid to go back to his constituents. He had a right to his seat in Parliament and to give free expression to his opinions. He had made that statement because misstatements had been circulated throughout the country in the Press in reference to his position. It had been said that he had solicited gentlemen on the Ministerial benches not to press the claims against him. He stood ready to resist any attack which might be made upon him. He was afraid of no one, and was ready to meet any charge. In justice, however, to gentlemen on the Government side of the House, he would say this: that from the time of the first attack being made on the seats of hon. members, before he knew his own seat was attacked, he expressed the opinion that it was an unjust thing to attack the seats of hon. members who, from circumstances beyond their control, might have their seats impugned because they had sold a claw-hammer or a jackknife to a Department of the Government. He disapproved of the proceedings that had been taken, not because his own seat had been impugned, but because he did not believe hon. members should be placed at the mercy of every scoundrel in Lower Town to have writs issued against them, as had been done. He approved of the policy, from whichever side of the House it came, of taking measures whereby hon. members would be relieved of responsibility for acts done unintentionally and in ignorance of the construction placed on the Independence of Parliament Act. He was ready to go before a Court of Law, and he defied any one to obtain a conviction against him for a violation of that Act. He was, therefore, perfectly free to express an independent opinion, and that independent opinion was that a measure should be passed to relieve hon. members who had, through inadvertence or ignorance, violated the Act, from charges brought against them by social pirates who instituted the prosecutions in order to make money. A dozen members of the House had been served with writs for from one-half to one million dollars, and it was not right that they should be made subject to annoyance, trouble and expense, and even danger, during nine or twelve months, in consequence of a certain construction having been placed on the Independence of Parliament Act. The feeling of justice entertained by Parliament and the country would sanction and ratify the proposed measure. He cared not for party, but he wished for justice to be done.

Mr. ORTON said that, notwithstanding the statements which had been made by political friends as well as political foes, he thought the Bill, if passed, would establish a precedent which would be fraught with danger to the country. They were familiar with the great evils which had arisen in the United States from the laxity there of a just regard to the people's rights. If that Bill were passed, the only protection the public possessed against a corrupt Government using their partizan majority to override any Act of Parliament would be removed. He thought the Government might have found other means for relieving those hon. members who had unintentionally offended against the Independence of Parliament Act. If there was one thing Canadians were proud of more than another it was the purity of their legislative bodies; but, when the people found that in the principal legislative body of the country there were hon. members who were every day infringing one of the most important safeguards, the example thus established would be followed by other legislative bodies, down to municipal councils. When ignorance of the law was pleaded in this House, he was led to think there were very few hon. members who were not aware of the law that no employé of a municipal council could hold a seat in that council. But, if it were established that a member of the House of Commons could not only sit and vote in violation of the law, but that, when, in the interest of the public, attention was directed to the fact, the Government could bring down a white-washing bill, the precedent would be a dangerous one for the country. He hoped the Bill would not be allowed to pass. While entertaining a feeling of regret for hon. members who had been placed in an unfortunate position, and one in which they had no intention to place themselves, he thought they should suffer, rather than such a principle should be established. He desired also to call attention to the laxity displayed by the Government in the management of the Public Works. If instructions had been given to officials that it was contrary to the Act to make contracts with, or obtain supplies from any firm, any member of which was a member of the House, many of those cases would have been avoided.

Mr. BOWELL said that before the question was put to the House he desired to offer a few remarks, he being one of those who occupied the enviable or unenviable position of having had a writ served upon him, whether by a whiskey informer, a social pirate, as these informers had been termed by the hon. member for Hamilton, or some one else he knew not. But holding the opinion that he occupied a position somewhat, though not altogether, similar in regard to his seat to that of some other hon. members who had been served with writs, he was not afraid to go into Court and contest the question with the so-called "whiskey informer" or "social pirate." If the truth were known, those "whiskey informers" or "social pirates" were not so much to blame as gentlemen who held high positions in the Government of this country, who threatened members on this side of the House with what they would or would not do if they dared to act in the manner which they thought was in the interests of the country in exposing the hypocrisy of the promises of the Government as exhibited during the past three or four years. The House would be surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving). That hon. gentleman was not satisfied with giving his opinion in reference to the reasons which actuated the Opposition in the course they proposed to take on this question, but stated it was quite sufficient for the Opposition to know that the Government proposed a measure to vote against it. Perhaps it would have been much more true if the hon. gentleman had said it was sufficient reason for him to vote for any measure, no matter what its character, that it was proposed by the Government. The hon. member for Hamilton went further, and said it was well such an Act should be passed in order to prevent the case being sent to the Committee of Privileges and Elections which might make fish of one and flesh of another. That imputation on the Committee certainly should not come from its chairman. He (Mr. Bowell) could not conceive it possible that hon. members composing that Committee were not prepared, on all occasions, to decide every question coming before them on its merits and the law which governed the case. But the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) perhaps knew better the course the majority of the Committee intended to pursue than other hon. members. This action, according to his own statement, depended largely upon the political complexion of the gentlemen brought before the Committee and what the causes to be adjudicated upon were. That hon. member, in answer to a remark made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had said "he blushed for his profession." An interesting subject for exhibition at the next Paris Exhibition would be a photograph of the hon. gentleman, who was a lawyer, blushing when speaking of the costs imposed upon a client. The hon. member for Victoria suggested that the hon. member for Hamilton blushed because the amount of fees was so small; probably that was the case, as it would be more in accord with his feelings. He (Mr. Bowell) was not a little amused at the hon. member's remarks in extenuation when the hon. the Premier sent over to him the Act passed in 1868. Every hon. gentleman who had read the law must know that the two cases were not at all analagous. When a new Government under Confederation had to be formed, there was no provision in the then Independence of Parliament Act, which afterwards exempted certain executive officers, created on the formation of the new Government, from the penalties of the law. It was true the Attorney-General for Upper Canada and the Attorney-General for Lower Canada were exempt from those penalties, but there was no exemption of the hon. the Minister of Justice, who occupied the same position as an Attorney-General for the whole Dominion. The hon. member for Hamilton, when he made that illustration, must have known that he was deceiving hon. members who did not know the facts. The hon. member for Centre Toronto should be commiserated with under the circumstances. That hon. gentleman had shown himself to be a martyr in leaving his business and coming to the capital to legislate for the country at great inconvenience to himself and at the risk of his health. It was true, though strange, that scarcely would the dissolution of Parliament have taken place before hon. gentlemen who had been sacrificing themselves and injuring their health in the country's service, would be occupying their whole time in endeavouring to secure again their return to Parliament, to sacrifice themselves again. Because, forsooth, hon. gentlemen did that, they must be released from the operation of the law, which provided certain penalties in case they violated it, was an argument the force of which he was not prepared to admit.

Mr. BOWELL.

He believed none of the "social pirates" would have endeavoured to prey upon the members of the House by serving writs, had they not been instigated to go to certain lawyers, to sue out writs with which to frighten hon. members on the Opposition benches, from doing what they believed was their duty. In his own case he had the honour of being served with a writ, endorsed with the name of the attorney, lawyer or agent of the hon. the Minister of Justice. Whether it was the action of the Government he neither knew nor cared. He knew it was intimated to him by an hon. Minister that he (Mr. Bowell) would have an opportunity of defending his right to sit in the House. The hon. gentleman must have known when he gave that intimation and made the threat, that he was either instituting it or was acting on behalf of those who were instituting it. He believed the same hon. gentleman had told the leader of the Opposition that, if certain steps were taken against certain hon. members, his seat would be attacked. If the hon. member would visit the Library, and read a little more of the parliamentary history of, and parliamentary practice in, England, he would find it was considered, a very serious breach of the privileges of the House to attempt to threaten any member for either doing an act or leaving undone that which he conceived it his duty to do. In these days, however, Ministers of the Crown occupying high social and executive positions, thought that, because they were supported by a large majority, they could use any amount of threats they pleased with impunity, and perhaps they could do so as far as their own action was concerned. His (Mr. Bowell's) own conviction was that the issue of writs against members of the Opposition, against whom there was no real cause of action, was instigated by Ministers themselves for the purpose of endeavouring to frighten those served with them into voting for the present Bill to whitewash some of their own friends. He was not prepared to record his vote in favour of the measure. If the hon. member who had the papers in his desk desired to test his (Mr. Bowell's) right to sit in the House and thought proper to formulate the charges, he would be quite prepared to meet him, and those who had instigated him, and he was also quite prepared, though it might be at some inconvenience, to test the rights of Levi Cane, the complainant in his case, to collect the penalty, and he challenged the Minister of the Interior and those who were acting for him to proceed as soon as they pleased, and test the question and he would meet them.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton): A hurricane.

Mr. BOWELL said that what was done did not create a hurricane on the Opposition benches; but the hon. gentleman from the sea-board knew pretty well what this Bill meant, and its objects, as the hon. gentleman might also have an opportunity yet of testing his right to sit in the House. He would vote without the slightest hesitation against this whitewashing Bill. The fact of his having been served with a writ was not going to prevent him—nor any threats that the Minister of the Interior or any one else in the future might think proper to hurl at him, would prevent him from doing what he believed to be correct and proper.

Mr. BLAIN said he thought it would be a very great pity if the hon. member for North Hastings was not taken at his word, and excepted from the operation of the Bill, for otherwise an injustice would be done to the hon. gentleman, who it was quite clear had buckled on his armour for the fight. He hoped that some hon. gentleman would move an amendment in this sense. The hon. gentleman felt certain that the Bill would be carried, shielding himself, and this accounted for the position the hon. gentleman had taken. He was exceedingly amazed—if it were possible to be amazed, after having had a seat in the House for six years—in observing the course taken by the right hon. the member for Kingston who knew that, over and over again, Legislatures had to resort to Bills of this character. The fact of it being agreed that the law was in a state of uncertainty—and who would deny it—was one of the strongest reasons in favour of the Bill.

When hon. gentlemen who held prominent positions at the Bar of this country told them that even now they were not prepared to say what the law was, and when a Committee of the House had sat from day to day considering the subject, and yet the members of it were not prepared to state what construction should be put on the Statute, he thought it the most natural thing in the world, that they should come to the rescue of these men, who, under no circumstances, could have known that they were sitting in the House contrary to the terms of the Act. Members instead of being censured should rather be praised for their generosity in being willing to take the responsibility of voting for this Bill, which violated no principle of legislation. Resort was had to such measures over and over again. Bills of indemnity were numbered by the score; and if ever a fair case for indemnity was presented this was one, since it was stated that between thirty and forty members had inadvertently violated the letter of the law. Were they, under these circumstances, to allow these writs to go on, and permit men who had served the country to be prosecuted under the provisions of the Independence of Parliament Act? The cases referred to as far as he could remember and, recognized as standing cases for fifteen years back, were, in his opinion, sufficiently strong to exonerate every member of the House. So far as he had been able to ascertain the facts alleged, if they did not pass some such Bill, the law would be brought into contempt. It was their duty to place rational laws on the Statute-book; and, if this law was correctly construed by many of the first legal minds in this country, they should not only pass this Bill but go beyond it, and pass a Bill interpreting the meaning of the law, which was now misunderstood by nearly everybody. The proposition before the House was a fair one. If the law were carried out to the letter, a member durst not take a $5.00 bill out of his pocket lest he might find it to be a contract on the part of the Government to pay him gold for it. Constructions so perfectly absurd should never be put on the Act; this Bill was merely intended to relieve those who had innocently violated the law, and it was the duty of every member to vote for it. He, for one, would do so with pleasure.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said he was one whose name had been bruited through the country as having infringed upon the Independence of Parliament Act. This statement had appeared in the Globe, and in a newspaper published in South Leeds, which announced that there would likely be a new election in the constituency. It was not a very pleasant matter to have writs served for large sums upon one, and to have them hanging over one's head for a whole lifetime. The Independence of Parliament Act was a most extraordinary Act. He was very much surprised that, when it was introduced by Robert Baldwin in 1843, it was not made to correspond exactly with the English Act, for the words "knowingly and wilfully," which appeared in the English Act, were omitted. The law was very stringent as it stood, and particularly so for a new country like this. The words he had mentioned should certainly be inserted. He did not acknowledge in any way that he had contravened the Independence of Parliament Act, and he did not intend, by any vote he would give that night, to acknowledge that he had done so in any way or shape; therefore he would vote against the Bill.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said that, although this subject, properly speaking, should be considered from a legal point of view, yet, as a business man, he wished to state his views on the subject. He was a little surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Wellington who should not forget that in 1875 he occupied just about the same position that certain other hon. members now occupied; and, if it had been necessary at that time to introduce a Bill to have allowed the hon. gentleman to retain his seat, no objection would have been taken to it from that side of the House. He thought his hon. friend should have exercised a little more charity in this regard. On March 8th, 1875, the Committee on Privileges and Elections had presented a report in which it was stated:

"The Committee instructed by the House to consider and report on the proper course to be pursued as to the case of Mr. Orton, member elect for the Electoral District of Centre Wellington, having sat and voted in your Honourable House during the present session without having qualified himself to sit and vote by taking and subscribing the oath prescribed in the 128th Section of the British North America Act, 1867, report as follows:—

"The 128th Section of the British America Act of 1867, enacts that any member of the House of Commons of Canada, shall, before taking his seat therein, take and subscribe the Oath of Allegiance contained in 5th Schedule to that Act, but no direct forfeiture or penalty is provided by this Act for the omission; and

"The Act for the independence of members of Parliament, 31st Victoria, chapter 25, while it makes provisions for disqualifications, forfeiture of seats and payment of penalties by members in certain cases, makes no provision for such a case as this;

"Your Committee are, therefore, of opinion that the seat of Mr. Orton, the member for Centre Wellington, is not affected by his having sat and voted in your Honourable House before he took the oath provided as aforesaid;

"Your Committee is further of opinion that the votes of Mr. Orton before he took the prescribed oath, should be struck out of the Division List and Journals of your Honourable House, as he had no right to sit and vote until he had taken that oath."

It was well understood at the time that, if it had been necessary to pass an Act to relieve the hon. gentleman from the penalty of $2,000 a day, no objection would have been taken to it from that side of the House. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had had a fling at the Government benches, and had stated what he (Mr. Higinbotham) would be very sorry to believe to be true: that the informers in these cases were not so much to blame as those who sat on the Ministerial benches, having been urged to issue the writs by the hon. gentlemen who occupied the Treasury benches. He did not believe that this was true.

Mr. BOWELL: I do—and that is the difference between us.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said he would ask the hon. gentleman who issued the writ against Capt. Norris. They knew that this came from a high source in Toronto. Several writs had been issued—he would not say by whom—but they had not come from that side of the House at any rate. He believed that a writ had been issued against the Minister of Customs, and he would like to know who issued it. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had shown himself particularly brave, but he did not believe that there was the slightest necessity for exhibition. No attempt had been made to show—or if it had, it had been unsuccessful—that any member against whom such a charge had been made had known that he was really doing wrong in occupying a seat in the House. He knew that the Bill would commend itself to the general public and business men outside of the legal fraternity, and no vote of his on record he would regard with more confidence or be better prepared to explain to his constituents than the one he intended in the performance of his duty to cast in favour of the Bill.

Mr. ORTON said that he had not implied that he was opposed to relieving those gentlemen who were unwittingly involved in this matter; but he believed that the Government should relieve them without taking away the privileges of the public, by making the penalty merely nominal.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said it seemed to him that they were placed in a very peculiar position. When laws were broken, all hon. members expected that the violators of the law would be brought to justice. They were bound by the law, and such was the position in which they found themselves. Law-makers should not be law-breakers. He who had entered into these contracts and performed this work was not one whit more responsible than the Government which was a party to the transaction; both were involved in it. It was the duty of the Government to have considered what they were about before they had given out these contracts, or involved those in them who knew nothing about the transactions. They knew how necessary it was to purge Parliament of any influence brought to bear by the Government on any member of the House. The Government had the patronage of the House and country to distribute, and they knew how dangerous it was to leave that patronage in the hands of the Government, who might, by means of it, influence members to act in a manner not, perhaps, in accordance with the feelings of their constituents. This was the fundamental principle on which the Independence of Parliament Act was based. They should be aware how they made precedents which would last till the end of time. Hon. members ought to be clear and free from any entanglement with influences which the Government might bring to bear upon them. A great principle was at stake. They should not forget the duty which they owed to the people of this country. While it might be felt that the action of the law was harsh, and while they might wish to relieve the hon. gentlemen in question—and no one could desire to do so more than himself—yet he would not like to infringe upon a great principle. They were asked to say:

"1. Any person who has, at any time since the passing of the said Act, been elected a member of the House of Commons, and who, acting under the bonâ fide belief that he was or continued to be qualified and capable of sitting or voting as a member thereof, has sat or voted therein, shall be and is hereby indemnified, exonerated, freed and discharged from all pecuniary penalties or forfeitures whatsoever (if any) which may have been incurred by him by reason of having so sat or voted at any time up to the end of the present Session of Parliament."

Who was to say whether an hon. member acted with bona fides, except that hon. member? Ever since he could remember, he had heard that no member of Parliament should have transactions with the Government to the extent of a single dollar. He did not believe there was a single man ignorant of those principles, and that being the case, while he regretted that any hon. member was placed in that position, he felt justified in voting against the Bill. If they allowed the independence of Parliament to be infringed, and if they took the ground that members of this House, who ought to know what the law was, were to be excused, the result would be disastrous, and there was no knowing where the thing would end. He did not believe that the common sense of the country looked in that direction, and, although he regretted that those cases had occurred, and he would do everything he could to relieve the hon. members concerned, yet he must support any measure which was calculated to conserve the independence of Parliament.

Mr. McDUGALL (Renfrew) said, if the hon. member had learned when he was a boy that no member of Parliament should receive any Government patronage, he would never forget it. But that hon. gentleman was a member of a Government which occasionally gave emoluments to certain members of Parliament; the hon. gentleman was an ardent supporter of the Administration which employed Col. Gray. On an occasion of this kind both sides should have some degree of sympathy for persons who unwittingly subjected themselves to the penalties of the law in this regard; but he thought that the men concerned had nothing to complain of. If the House allowed those men to gain money in this way it would be putting a premium on a practice which ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) said he was one who had been served with a writ, but he thought that none of the hon. members who had offended in this particular intended to violate either the spirit or the letter of the law. The money penalty, he thought, was altogether too great. He would vote for this Bill, but he considered the serving of a writ on himself an absurdity; and he regretted to be in the position in which it might be said that he was voting to relieve himself from any responsibility. Still, in his opinion, hon. members had unwittingly contravened the law, and he felt he would be doing an injustice to them if he did not support this measure.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had declared that this measure was an unprecedented one—that no such legislation had ever before been attempted in Canada. He thought the hon. gentleman was mistaken in that particular, for he himself introduced a Bill to exempt Sir George Cartier for having accepted a certain position; and the hon. gentleman adopted similar measures to exempt other members of this House who were receiving money from the Government for various services. A few years ago, an hon. member, still in the House, subjected himself to the penalties of the law by holding a seat in the local Parliament of Prince Edward Island while he was a member of this House, and a Bill was introduced to exempt that hon. member. It was evident from those instances that the principle was not a new one. This Bill was to exempt hon. gentlemen from penalties to which they were subjected under the law. If the parties were not subject to the provisions of the law, there would be no necessity for the measure. When the writ was served on Mr. Norris, late member for Lincoln, the Mail had an article in which it was claimed that it was a just and legal proceeding; but, when hon. members on that side of the House moved against members of the Opposition, the tune was changed; when the other ox was gored, it was an entirely different thing. The Speaker was attacked when he had not an opportunity to say a word in defence; and he (Mr. Mills) told the hon. member for Kingston then that he must expect his own side to be attacked. Then he informed the hon. gentleman that it was his intention to move against him. The motion was not immediately made, and the right hon. gentlemen complained that he did not receive notice. The hon. member referred to said he would not move against the right hon. member for Kingston if no motions were made against the Government side of the House. It was not a fact that members to the right of the Speaker took the initiative in this matter. If hon. members on his side of the House saw their friends attacked and did not attack hon. gentlemen opposite on the same grounds, they would be unworthy of sitting there. They represented a party that, at all events, was not wanting in courage, and they would not see their friends attacked unfairly and improperly without attacking in return. He gave the right hon. gentleman the notice not by way of a threat—for he would not presume to threaten him—but he merely informed the right hon. gentleman that he would be proceeded against in this respect. He hoped hon. gentlemen were satisfied with the explanations he had given.

Mr. BOWELL: Speak the truth.

Mr. MILLS said he never prevaricated there or elsewhere. He could appeal to those who had associated with him, whether his friends or political opponents, whether he did not speak the truth always, and he did in this case.

Mr. BOWELL: No, you don't.

Mr. MILLS said he thought the measure a proper one under the circumstances. The seats of hon. gentlemen were attacked for acts that had been notoriously permitted to pass with impunity ever since Confederation, and, if a new rule and a new principle was to be laid down, at all events one that had not hitherto been supposed to be binding upon members, it was only fair to the House that, for this Session at all events, there should be a relief from the penalties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he considered the communication of the hon. the Minister of the Interior as decided a threat as ever was offered him, and as a breach of the privileges of this House. He so felt the insult offered him that he at first thought of bringing the matter up before the House, but, after consultation with some of his friends, he determined not to do so. The hon. Minister met him in one of the halls outside, and said: "I understand some of your friends are going to move against some gentlemen on our side." He (Sir John A. Macdonald) said: "It may be so." "Well, then," said the hon. gentleman, "I give you notice that, unless your friends stop their motions against our side, we will attack your seat." That was a distinct threat.

Mr. DYMOND said, in justice to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, he felt it his duty to state, in the first place, that he had facts placed before him which he intended to formulate and bring before the House, constituting a charge of a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act against the right hon. member for Kingston. He communicated the fact to the hon. the Minister of the Interior that morning. He told him at the same time, just as the hon. Minister had stated, that he did not feel at all disposed to give any encouragement to assaults of this kind, but that he believed he had evidence of a most flagrant breach of the law on the part of the right hon. gentleman, and that he was not going to allow him to escape if gentlemen on the Government side of the House were attacked. He was not, nor had he ever been, on such terms with the right hon. gentleman as would justify his approaching him personally on the subject. He had never spoken to the right hon. gentleman except across the floor of the House. He was, perhaps, the only member of the House who had not been introduced to the right hon. gentleman, and he did not think, under those circumstances, that it would be becoming on his part to approach him with a communication of this kind verbally. At the same time, until he was assured that these hostilities were to continue, he did not think it proper or wise to address the right hon. gentleman in writing, and thus give him formal notice. He did not know exactly what passed between the right hon. gentleman and the hon. the Minister of the Interior, but he was sure no intention existed on the part of the latter nor of himself that anything should be said in the nature of threat. They regarded the right hon. gentleman as the leader of a party, and one who no doubt had great influence among his friends as to the course they generally pursued, and they desired to let him know that he, with others, would be placed on the list of accused persons, in order that he might take the whole situation into account, and pursue such a course as in his judgment seemed best. Knowing that the Minister of the Interior was on speaking terms with the right hon. gentleman, he asked him to be the means of communication.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: And as to Mr. Rochester, as well, I suppose?

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was sorry to see party feeling carried to such an extent this Session that everybody must be ashamed of it. Although irregularities had been committed on both sides, the present feeling was greatly owing to the action taken by the Conservative Party—those who professed to be Conservative, not only of the rights and privileges of the members of the House, but of the people at large. And yet this Conservative Party desired that Mr. Speaker should be punished without his being heard in his own defence.

Mr. BOWELL: No such thing.

Mr. SMITH: It was known before hand that that case was to be brought up, and no doubt a feeling of great bitterness was engendered accordingly. People of not very much character were issuing writs to the modest sum of $500,000 and costs, as in his own case. It had come to his knowledge, and he believed it was pretty generally known in the House, that a member of the House had been directly instrumental in serving a writ upon him. That was the only case of the kind.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Name.

Mr. SMITH: It was hardly worth while naming him. He believed it would be acknowledged on both sides of the House, and he trusted it was the case, that of 206 members of this House, only one member was found capable of doing so, although it could not possibly affect himself.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he wished to make a personal statement, having had a writ served upon him for a large amount. If any inducement were necessary to make him vote for the Bill, it would not be his own case. It was stated in the St. John Telegraph that the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) intended to proceed against him and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper.) He begged now to say before the House and country that he knew no such charge which could be made against him (Mr. Domville). He disclaimed having had any contract with this Government. He had, however, a contract in his own name with the late Government, in 1872, before he entered Parliament, and before he anticipated coming into Parliament. If he had in any way placed his seat in jeopardy, he distinctly wished to state, as it was, perhaps, his last opportunity, that he hoped the hon. member who was proceeding against him would bring the case on without delay, and he pledged himself that, if any charge could be brought against him, in which his legal adviser, or his friends in whom he placed confidence, considered he had committed a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, he would vacate his seat, and do it at once. He did not hide himself behind the plea that he did not know the law. He was fully aware what the law was. He had known it for some years, and he knew it to-day; and, if he had violated that law, intentionally or unintentionally, he would go back to his constituents.

Mr. BERTHAM said he fully expected that the Bill would pass the House unanimously. He did not think it could be considered a party measure, but he would suggest, now, that, as the Bill had created so much opposition, the Government should withdraw it.

Mr. RYAN said the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) had said what was almost equivalent to the statement that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz), who was not now in his place, had served a writ upon the hon. member in his own name. As he (Mr. Ryan) knew something of the circumstances connected with the case, he thought it was only right and due to his hon. friend from Lisgar, in his absence, that he should make them known. He had the honour of being on very good personal terms with his hon. friend from Lisgar, although they happened to hold different political opinions, and he thought it was only right that he should do the justice to that hon. gentleman which he believed he would do to him. A couple of days before the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Bannatyne) was served with a writ, the hon. member for Lisgar came to him in the smoking room and told him he had information that the hon. members for Provencher and Selkirk had instigated the issue of a writ against him (Mr. Schultz). He (Mr. Ryan) expressed his surprise and regret, as he did not believe that any member from Manitoba would be guilty of such intolerable meanness. He asked him if the information was correct, and the hon. member said he believed it was, and that the writ would be served upon him the following day. And he was served with a writ the following day. The hon. member, at the same time, said, if he found that the information given him was correct, he would retaliate, and would issue writs against the hon. members for Selkirk and Provencher in his own name. He (Mr. Ryan) knew nothing about the facts of the case, and hoped that the hon. members for Selkirk and Provencher had not caused the issue of the writ. He merely, in the absence of his friend, gave this explanation of his conduct, and, if it was true that the hon. members for Selkirk and Provencher had instigated the issue of the writ, he thought the hon. member for Lisgar was perfectly justified in causing the issue of the writs against them; and he thought it was much more manly to do so in his own name than in the name of a third party.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) disclaimed all participation in the issue of a writ against the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) although he had heard it mentioned that the hon. member was to be served with a writ.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said that those hon. members who had been charged with violation of the law, but had protested their innocence, could have their sincerity tested by availing themselves of the second section of the Act, which was as follows:

"This Act may be pleaded as a bar and discharge to any action, suit or proceeding pending or which may be brought against any such person, for any such pecuniary penalty or forfeiture as aforesaid."

When this House met at its next Session, they would be able to see whether those hon. gentlemen had availed themselves of the provision of the measure which they now declared they were about to vote against.

Mr. FLESHER said he fully recognised the responsibility which rested upon the Government to meet a difficulty of the kind which had occurred. But it seemed to him that the Bill was predicated on an error and was vicious in principle. It assumed that every one who had transgressed had done so unknowingly. He could readily understand that some principle should be applied to future Sessions, unless the measure was made to apply only to the past, as it was, according to the third section. Supposing the Government denied they were culpable in the eyes of the law of giving contracts, though they were in the eyes of the community—and that was a vicious principle, and the chief element and source of the wrong—and if it was possible that the Government might influence individuals by giving them contracts, and if the principle was once established that the Government could introduce and carry a Bill to whitewash their fellow-sinners, then the law for the Independence of Parliament would be completely violated. He was certain the Bill would not meet the approval of the people at large. He regretted that a measure had not been introduced to amend the law, which was wrong in its details and utterly disproportionate in its provisions, as a man who received $5 might be punished to the same extent as one who received $50,000. This Bill, however, proposed to relieve an offender on the ground of ignorance, and, in addition, it almost furnished a temptation to commit perjury. He could not vote for the Bill in its present shape.

Mr. RYMAL said that, when he heard that such a Bill as that under discussion was about to be introduced, he understood that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House had concurred in the opinion that it was a very proper thing to do; he had, indeed, heard that hon. gentlemen opposite had said they would support a measure of that kind. He believed he was justified in thinking they did so. But now, when the object was about to be accomplished, for the purpose of making a little political capital, they became very pure, and attacked the Government and its friends for resorting to the whitewashing process. As far as he was aware, gentlemen on both sides of the House were charged with whitewashing their friends. Let them take a couple of them. The first, he believed, was Captain Norris. Did any hon. member believe that that gentleman had entered into a contract with the Government by which he thought he was vacating his seat? He did not believe any hon. member thought so. What followed? The whiskey informer, the social pirate endeavoured to collect the penalties mentioned in the Act from Captain Norris. Then there was another case—that of his hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Currier), who let the Government have some lumber at a time when, as he understood it, some of the bulkheads about the slides at Ottawa were likely to be carried away by the freshets. He presumed that gentleman had done a favour to the Government and a public service in letting them have the lumber. Was there any corrupt act in that? He understood, however, that Mr. Currier had been sued for the penalties. Now, was it reasonable, was it common sense, fair play or justice, that those men should be made the victims of whiskey informers or social pirates? He believed that Parliament should be just as pure as possible, but he did not believe that men who, unwittingly or without any corrupt intent, had entered into contracts or performed work for the Government, should be liable to be prosecuted for such vast sums. He presumed he was one of the few against whom a charge would not lie of having been implicated in any contract with the Government. He might have been implicated, however. A gentleman was sent into his neighbourhood to purchase horses for the Mounted Police Force. He opened an office in the city of Hamilton. Fortunately, or unfortunately, for him (Mr. Rymal), he had no horses to sell, but he presumed that, if that gentleman had bought one from him for $80 or $100, for which he would have given value, he would have been in a nice mess. Let them exercise a little common sense, let them do to others as they would like others to do unto them, and let them not for a little cheap political capital keep a couple of their colleagues, who were, he believed, as innocent as a child unborn, on the rack, liable to be followed by whiskey informers and social pirates. He admired the manner in which one hon. gentleman had defied his foe, but he fancied that, when the time came, that hon. member would screen himself behind the enactment he so much objected to now. He would make a suggestion, which would, perhaps, meet the case. Could there not be a rider appended to the motion, to this effect:—"Provided, nevertheless, that we, the undermentioned members of the House, are, at our own request, exempted from the operation of this Bill." He fancied that, if such an opportunity were given, there would be a rush of members to affix their signatures. His imagination pictured the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) running up to the paper saying: "I write a pretty fair hand, and I will put my name to that." He appealed to the House to act as sensible and fair men in dealing with the subject.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On Section 1,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said this clause was highly objectionable. It did not say that an innocent man, but one who believed, not that he was innocent, but that he had managed the matter so that he had not broken the Independence of Parliament Act, was to be released from his difficulty. Though he was a contractor under the influence of the Government, though he had knowingly made the arrangement with the Government, yet, if he believed that under the operation of the Statute he was clear, he was to be clear. The Bill provided that, if by some construction of the Statute an hon. member believed he had not broken the law, no matter how flagitious his conduct had been, he was to be exonerated. Other hon. gentlemen could not claim to be indemnified, because, in order to claim that, they must admit they had broken the law and were disqualified. They must have vacated their seats before they could claim the indemnification; they must confess their guilt before they could get the discharge. So that men who honestly believed they had not broken the law would not benefit by the Bill. Others might say: "It is true I entered into contracts with the Government, but this acquits me. On my honour, while knowing I was making a contract with the Government from which I was to derive large profits, yet I thought I would manage to keep my seat."

Mr. MACKENZIE said the clause was similar to the one in the English Act of Indemnity.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said in that case a hardship had been made out.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was a very remarkable circumstance in connection with the Bill that four members, two of whom asked him to introduce the Bill and two volunteered their assistance, happened to be absent from the House to-night. Another member who, he had reason to believe, held the same opinion, had taken an active part in opposing the Bill. It was quite evident that a large number of hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to be quite satisfied that the Bill would pass, and they, therefore, thought it would be an easy matter to speak and vote against it. That was the whole root and branch of the opposition to the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL said that he did not interpret the first clause in the same manner as the right hon. member for Kingston. He was satisfied that his own case did not come within the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the Bill was only intended for those whose cases came within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. MITCHELL said the clause read as follows:—

"Any person who has, at any time since the passing of the said Act, been elected a member of the House of Commons, and who, acting under the bona fide belief that he was or continued to be qualified and capable of sitting or voting as a member thereof, has sat or voted therein, shall be and is hereby indemnified, exonerated, freed, and discharged from all pecuniary penalties or forfeitures whatsoever (if any) which may have been incurred by him by reason of having so sat or voted at any time up to the end of the present Session of Parliament."

Nothing in the Act implied that a man must himself be satisfied that his case came within the meaning of the Independence of Parliament Act. He could not see the force of the objection taken by the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the relief was intended for those who had, innocently and unwittingly, violated the law. It could be pleaded, in the first place, that a member had not violated the law; and, in the second place, that, if he had violated the law, he had done so unintentionally. Then the provision would inure to his benefit.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said it was competent, in such cases, to raise the question as to whether or no a member had acted in bona fides, when this would become a question of fact. The wrong or offence was only created by Act of Parliament. The pleas must necessarily involved a question both of law and fact.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that a member, under such circumstances, must prove his bona fides, which could be done by no one save himself. The defendant must also, in the plea, admit the transaction and that he was a contractor.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said that, as in civil cases, regarding the Statute of Limitation, for instance, witnesses could be called to show bona fides or otherwise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said no one could prove what a man believed except the man himself.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said that the question of intention arose and was proved in commercial cases. This would be determined by the Judge or jury from the facts and circumstances of the case.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that surely the question as to the bona fides of a transaction was one capable of proof.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not the bona fides of the transaction, but the bona fides of the belief of a man that is to be established.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said malice was proved in cases of malicious prosecution. The intent became evident from the facts and circumstances surrounding a case.

Mr. CAMERON asked whether the Bill applied to the case of a man who deliberately signed a contract with the Government, but who at the time did not know that it forfeited his seat.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that this law was intended to cover every case of unwitting violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. He presumed that no hon. member would wish to see any hon. gentleman condemned under such circumstances to pay $2,000 a day for the period in question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked what was the use of an Independence of Parliament Act if a law was to be passed rubbing it out? He was glad to hear the Minister of Justice say that he would introduce a Bill next Session to amend the Independence of Parliament Act, doing away with the excessive nature of the penalties and removing some of the anomalies connected with it. A general election would follow, and then there would be a crop of such cases, and another whitewashing. The same argument applied now would apply to such other cases, if a new Bill were introduced. If this argument was carried out, they had better wipe out the Independence of Parliament Act altogether.

Mr. FLESHER asked how would the law apply to a member who might be invited to enter into a contract with the Government and who would deny that the provisions of the enactment applied to his case, and swear to it.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): That is a question of fact.

Mr. FLESHER: Such a member would rest on his own interpretation of the Statute. He would whitewash himself by his own act.

Mr. BLAIN said the logic of the hon. member for Kingston was very singular. The leader of the Government had referred to a case which met the approbation of the hon. gentlemen—in which a man had acted deliberately and with his eyes open in such relation—and yet the hon. gentleman held that persons who knew nothing whatever of these matters must be held responsible for them. This was absurd.

Section agreed to.

On the Preamble,

Mr. PLUMB asked why was not the law made general in its character and its effect continued.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): Hon. members now have knowledge of the Act.

Mr. PLUMB said that hon. members were not better acquainted with the law now than previously. Hon. gentlemen had been sitting in Committee for twelve or fourteen days, and yet were unable to decide what constituted a contract. The difficulty lay in the disproportionate penalty attached to the infringement of the Act.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the expenses had been cut down as low as possible. Under the heading "Extraordinary Expenditures" was included the use of the Government steamer on the proposed visit of His Excellency the Governor-General to Manitoba.

Mr. MITCHELL said he objected to His Excellency's trips costing the country so much. He also thought the expenditure as to the "Northern Light" might be decreased. He desired to know the probable cost of the actual repairs.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the Government had just received a telegram stating that the cost would be $6,000. The Government was under an obligation to keep up steam communication with Prince Edward Island. He considered the enterprise had been very successful, and the people of Prince Edward Island were very much satisfied with it, although he admitted the expense was rather heavy.

Mr. SINCLAIR said he thought the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had done his duty very creditably. It was desirable that the vessel should be repaired for service next winter. Communication was not kept up as much as was desired, but still what was done was very much appreciated. He believed that a considerable part of the expense in carrying the mails was on account of ice-boats which were absolutely necessary during a certain portion of the year.

CIVIL SERVICE.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. CASEY presented the report of the Select Committee appointed to enquire into the present condition of the Civil Service, and the method of nominating and examining candidates for appointments, with a view of ascertaining the general efficiency of the service.

COAL TRADE.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) presented the report of the Select Committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Mitchell and others, with instructions to enquire into the allegations as to the state of the coal trade contained in the said petition, and into the best means of promoting Inter-Provincial trade.

CIVIL SERVICE.

MOTION TO PRINT REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. CASEY moved that the report of the Civil Service Committee and the evidence taken before it be printed, and that the rule enquiring reference to the Printing Committee be suspended. He considered that the report and the evidence was of considerable importance to the House and the public. When he moved for the Committee he felt that the result of the investigation would justify the labour taken and the expense incurred, and he was sure that hon. members would agree with him when they perused the report and the evidence. The return to an address that he had the honour of moving for did not contain as full information as he desired, and the inference was that something was lacking in the Departments which had not responded, as nearly all the information he asked ought to have been on the books of the Departments. Owing to this, the Committee had to depend almost entirely on the oral evidence of gentlemen of high standing in the service, all of whom gave evidence with great clearness, frankness and courtesy. The general result of the evidence he might state to be this. The Committee found that political influence had been, and was, to a considerable extent, at work in all Departments of the service, and that that interference had almost invariably been injurious to the service and led to violations of the law regulating it. The actual state of the service he could not say had been found good; but, on the other hand, it was not found scandalous. In some instances the heads of Departments stated that their men were as good as could be wished; but in one instance it was testified that the employes were not of as high quality as were to be found in banks. He thought when the House saw the report they would agree with him that the labour and expense of the Committee had not been spent in vain.

Mr. MACKAY.

They had been unable to go into the points brought out in the evidence at any great length in the report, and he thought the ipsisima verba of some of the witnesses would carry great weight.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the printing of the evidence would be valuable to hon. members. He would like to ask the hon. chairman of the Committee whether the report dealt with the service as a whole.

Mr. CASEY : Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD : Does it deal with the mode of selecting the higher officers.

Mr. CASEY : It does not deal with that question. The report dealt with the method of selecting men for appointments, the modes of making appointments, the question of promotion and the discipline in the Departments. The Committee did not deal with the question of the appointments of higher officials, because that was considered a matter which, under all circumstances, should be left to the responsibility of the Government of the day. The report recommended a double process of selection for employes—a means of selecting men to be taken on trial, and a further trial by probation before the appointment was confirmed. The selection of men on trial was recommended to be made as in England, that was to say, there should be first a qualifying examination to test the ordinary education and intelligence of men applying for appointments; and, secondly, competition between those who showed themselves to be qualified for the privilege of being taken on trial. Those who succeeded in competition were to be appointed conditionally to places in the Departments; but they were to have no claim to permanent employment until they had earned a favourable report from their immediate superiors before the close of a certain term—one year, or two years, or whatever it might be. Subsequent proceedings regarding promotion should take place on the primâ facie ground of seniority. When a vacancy occurred, the senior qualified officer should be promoted unless a junior was especially recommended to the post by those under whom he worked from year to year. This provision was intended to remedy existing evils. The practice of compelling a man to stay for a certain number of years in a certain grade, before he was promoted, they considered injudicious. It appeared that this took away any stimulus to be afforded by the hope of promotion; it kept employes for a very long time at mechanical work, sometimes thus unfitting them for higher duties, and too long on lower salaries, which affected their self-respect, their character and the support of their families. The Committee thought that these employes should be promoted when their turn came, although they might not have served a specified term, provided such persons were reported efficient by their superior officers. Regarding discipline, they made no distinct recommendation, but they called attention to the system in vogue in the Province of Victoria, Australia, where the official head of the Department was allowed to inflict a limited fine as a penalty on subordinates, in addition to suspending them, and this was sometimes found to be of very good effect. The only points they distinctly recommended related to the selection of men for trial in the service by some other means than political favouritism; and the adoption of qualifying and competitive examinations. Their strongest recommendation concerned probationary appointments, which, if strictly carried out, would remedy a great many of the evils which now existed. This alone would work a great reform as to the class of men admitted into the service, without any change being made in the manner of making the first appointments. They strongly insisted on promotion according to some fixed rule, and not favouritism. This should take place primâ facie by seniority, and should extend both to the inside and outside service. They found that at present promotion hardly existed in the outside service in the Department of the Minister of Customs—though it prevailed to some extent in the Inland Revenue Department—where vacancies as to the higher places were generally given to outsiders. They hoped to avoid this by making promotions general in both services.

There were many other minor points in which he could not go unless he read the whole of the report.

Mr. TUPPER said he regretted that the report had been presented at so late a period in the Session. Hon. gentlemen would, however, have opportunity and leisure to examine it during recess, and consequently they would be better able to take the question up next Session than they were now. He was inclined to think that the Committee had substantially come to the conclusion which was long since arrived at, and the recommendations of the Committee rather pointed to the rigorous enforcement of the law and practice which had been adopted by Parliament with regard to this service, than to the introduction of any new system. There was no novelty in the probationary system, as it had already been authorized by Parliament. The practice was, that every person who entered the service was obliged to do so as a probationary clerk, at $300 a year; and he so remained for one year before he obtained an additional $100, and before he was appointed by Order in Council a member of the service at all. Clerks were obliged to shew themselves worthy of their positions before they could be appointed. This system might, to a certain extent, have fallen into desuetude, but it nevertheless existed. The hon. gentleman had himself admitted that the Government must have the power to go outside of the service, in certain cases, to secure qualified officials. He was afraid that there was too much necessity for the action recommended with regard to the present Government, because he believed it would be found that very little regard had been paid, during the last two or three years at all events, to the rules relating to these appointments. He had endeavoured to conform to them when head of two or three Departments, and he thought that the hon. gentleman would search in vain for any violation of the law in this respect. He regarded the decision at which the hon. gentleman had arrived with reference to the system of promotion as the very foundation of an efficient Civil Service, which could not be made so while capable and experienced officials were neglected and outsiders appointed over their heads. He did not think that the late Government had always observed the rule regarding promotions as closely perhaps as they ought to have done, but he believed that they had observed it much more closely than their successors.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the report be referred to the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament, with a view to its being printed, with the evidence accompanying the said Report.

Mr. CASEY said that the presentation of the report had been delayed because they desired to make it as full as possible. They had found that the law to which the hon member for Cumberland had referred had not been carried out. This was the testimony at least of members of the Civil Service. Men had been nominally appointed on probation, but they had never been dropped when found to be inefficient. They had obtained no testimony to the effect that the rules relating to promotion had been more closely observed by the late than by the present Government. Mr. Fleming had stated that he had felt the grave evils of political nominations in his Department; and that this had been the case in connection with the construction of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. ROCHESTER rose to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER said that, as objection had been taken by the First Minister to the proposed resolution, it must, in its present shape, be dropped, while the suggestion of the Premier was not a debateable resolution. It was simply a mode of referring the matter to the Printing Committee.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.—[BILL No. 74.]

(Mr. Mills.)

SENATE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Mr. MILLS moved that the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill relating to the North-West Territories be read the first time. One of them, he stated, provided for the publication of the proceedings of the North-West Council in English and French, and for the use of both languages in the Courts. They had thought that this was a matter which had better be left to the Council in question. He regretted that the amendment had been made, but it would be impossible to get the measure through at this late period in the Session, unless the amendments were accepted. The action taken by the Senate would add very considerably to the expense. Almost every one in that part of the country spoke Cree, though some spoke, in addition, English or French, and, if the proceedings were to be published in the most prevalent language, Cree should be chosen for the purpose.

Amendments read the first and second times and concurred in.

THE ALBERT RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

MOTION TO CONSIDER.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

“That the Order of the House, referring the amendment made by the Senate to the Bill (No. 48) Respecting the Albert Railway Company, to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, be discharged, and that the said amendment be considered this day.”

He said he was informed that the Committee would not meet again, and, as prorogation was near at hand, some action must be taken in the matter.

Mr. KERR said that he felt it would not be right to let the motion pass without considering whether it had not better lie over. He was a member of the Committee, and he knew that there was a diversity of opinion as to the expediency of granting the legislation asked for.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he considered that the Bill as it stood was very objectionable, and it was quite important to Albert County in two or three aspects. The Bill, as a whole, was a local Bill. The only provision sought by the Bill at first was to allow the issue of debentures at 8 per cent. instead of 6 per cent. There were other provisions which had been sought for, however. One objection to the Bill as it now stood was that it did not give sufficient guarantee to parties having claims against the company as to land damages. Another ground on which he objected to the Bill was that it allowed the company to issue promissory notes. So guarded were the Local Legislature as to this power, that they altered a former Act so as to reduce the issue of bonds from $700,000 to $600,000. But the present Bill gave the company power to issue promissory notes as well as debentures at 8 per cent.

Mr. DOMVILLE: No.

Mr. BURPEE: And of course this added to the liability of the company. He was informed that the company had no paid-up capital at all. Under these circumstances the promissory notes issued under this Bill would be very deceptive, and liable to lead to serious difficulties. Another reason why he objected to the Bill was that it was not put on the Order paper, but passed through the House without proper notice being given. From all these considerations he must protest against the passage of the Bill.

Mr. HOLTON said he moved the reference of this Bill to the Railway Committee because he knew that it had engaged the serious attention of gentlemen from New Brunswick, although of course he had no local knowledge of the objections. It was considered at two or three sittings and subsequently amended in the appropriate Committee of the Senate in the interest of the parties concerned in the Bill. These amendments, so made, were overruled by the Senate. The Bill came back to the House amended. Of the precise purport of the amendments he was not in a position to judge, and he was desirous that the Bill should be considered anew; he, therefore, moved its reference to the Railway Committee. The quorum of that Committee was very large, and no doubt there was a difficulty in getting a quorum together. He thought the motion just made with reference to the Bill was perfectly in order. It was for the House to pass not only upon the merits of the amendment, but upon the merits of the Bill itself. His suggestion was that, as the time of the House was so short, it should be put upon the Order paper to be discussed in the evening during the hours for Private Bills.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD approved of the suggestion.

Motion agreed to.

COAL INTERESTS.

MOTION AS TO PRINTING REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) moved that the report of, and the evidence given before, the Select Committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Mitchell and others, relative to the coal interest, be referred to the Joint Committee on Printing.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House resumed the further consideration of Resolution 124, completion and construction of Lighthouses and Fog-alarms, as reported from the Committee of Supply.

Mr. TUPPER said he wished to avail himself of that opportunity to direct the attention of the House to the mode in which the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had failed in the discharge of his duties. The House would remember that, at an early period of the Session, when he (Mr. Tupper) made a few remarks in connection with that Department, he was met by a very prompt and authoritative denial on the part of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with regard to the question raised, and a challenge to bring forward, at any time, proof that the hon. gentleman had failed in the discharge of his duties. He now undertook to produce, from public documents brought down to the House by the hon. Minister, evidence of the most gross neglect of public duty that any hon. gentleman administering a public Department could be charged with. Parliament had voted money for the purpose of establishing a fog-whistle at a very important point, viz., Cape D'Or, having come to the conclusion that such protection to shipping was necessary. The point in question was much exposed to fog during a considerable portion of the year, and, as much shipping passed off the point, the fog-whistle was extremely necessary. When Parliament provided money to maintain a fog-whistle at a certain point, and the Department afterwards failed to keep it in operation, the expenditure became a snare and a delusion. He would show the House that the most gross neglect had taken place with respect to keeping the fog-whistle in operation, for the correspondence submitted showed that, at one time, there was no water and at another time no coal. He had no hesitation in saying that, if a valuable vessel was wrecked under such circumstances, a petition of right would compel the Government to pay the amount of loss; and, if lives were sacrificed, they would have to suffer an extreme penalty on account of their neglect. If, from accident, a fog-alarm became useless, then due notice should be given; but, as he would show by quotations from the returns, no precaution was adopted by the Department, and during several months the Department was aware of the condition of affairs at that point, but took no action. It appeared that, on the 16th August, 1875, the person in charge of the fog-whistle at Cape D'Or wrote to the agent of the Department in Halifax, Mr. H. M. Johnson, in the following terms:—

"I am clear out of water and had to stop yesterday at 10.30 a.m., in thick fog, after running fifty-two and a half hours, and we have nothing else but thick fog this month. I have been running 171 hours this month already, and if it had not been for the rain we had last week I should have had to stop before. The fog cleared about three hours after stopping, and the weather looks a little clearer now, and the wind to the eastward."

The next paper of the series was a letter from Mr. Johnson, agent at Hali fax, to the Engineer, dated 12th October, 1875, in which he stated:—

"As it is just possible some change may be made in the location of the fog whistle, no steps will be taken at present to have another tank made, but meanwhile, you will make every possible exertion to secure and keep on hand a sufficient supply of water."

The Department had been informed that there was no water at the point, and that the only means of obtaining a supply was by constructing an additional tank at a cost of less than $1,000. After an investigation was made he was told on the 12th October, 1875, that it was possible some change might be made in the location of a fog alarm, and, therefore, the Department was not prepared to construct the tank required. The next document was dated 18th October. It was a letter from Mr. Short, the Engineer, concerning an advertisement which appeared in the St. John newspaper, and which was a complaint from private individuals with regard to the fog alarm not being in operation. Mr. Short wrote:

"I have tried every possible means in my power to keep her going. Myself and my assistant have bucketed rain that fell from the dwelling; but without rain I can get no water, for there are no springs here, and I have to depend solely upon rain. If there was another tank built, as you mentioned in your last note, I could catch sufficient water to last the whole season, for there was more water run waste last season than would fill four or five tanks like the one that I have; and I sent you due notice when I had to stop: but I have been blowing all along since I have got water, and I have plenty of it now."

On the 31st May, 1876, the Engineer wrote:

"I had to stop on the 9th of this month on account of a rivet blowing out of the boiler while the whistle was going, and I had to screw a bolt and put in, and it was thick fog at the time, and I hear there were vessels in the bay at the time; but I soon got her running again. I would thank you to send me some coal as I am getting short."

On the 19th June, 1876, he again wrote:—

"I have been obliged to stop blowing the whistle, in consequence of my supply of both coal and wood being entirely exhausted. I stopped blowing on Sunday morning at seven o'clock. It was then very foggy, and it is now clear."

The Engineer at that time called the attention of the Department to the difficult position in which he was placed on account of the want of fuel. On the 14th July, 1876, having had no fuel since the 19th June, he wrote, stating that Captain Smith had arrived with a supply. On the 26th July, 1876, there was a letter from the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department at Halifax, to the Department at Ottawa, which ran as follows :—

“The water supply at the station is very uncertain. There are no streams or springs, and it can only be obtained in the spring of the year from the melting snow running down the cleft, and from what can be secured from the roof of the whistle house. The tank can be filled in the spring but cannot be replenished after that, except from the rain supply. I would strongly recommend the building of another tank alongside the first one, by which means a constant and sufficient supply of water can be maintained. When I was at the station there was only enough for about 100 hours sounding, and had the whistle been in operation during the foggy weather at the end of June and the first part of July, when the fuel was out, the water supply would have been exhausted before this date.”

In the Department, with respect to the administration of which the hon. Minister had challenged him to point out any want of diligence, it appeared by the reports of the officers, that the only reason why there was not enough water on the 26th July was because they had to stop the fog whistle during the most dangerous period of the year for want of fuel. It would be difficult to imagine a case of more culpable negligence in any Department. The reply sent by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the agent of the Department at Halifax was as follows :—

“Your report received in this matter. I am glad charges against the Engineer are unfounded. I don't feel inclined to authorize expenditure this season for the tank you recommend. What will be the probable cost?”

The hon. Minister on the 5th August, 1876,—one year after the engineer had been asking for water—obtained an estimate which placed the cost of building the improvements at $992, which was afterwards reduced to $815. On the 8th of August, Mr. Johnston wrote to Mr. Short:

“I am in receipt of your letter of 1st inst., inclosing estimates and offers for building tank, coal-shed and wood-house at Cape D'Or. I sent these papers to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he instructs me that these improvements will have to stand until next year, as there is no appropriation to meet expenditure.”

On 24th August Mr. Johnston wrote to the Minister:

“I have the honour to forward copy of letter from the engineer at Cape D'Or, stating that the supply of water there was exhausted. I did not advertise this whistle as stopped because, between the date and receipt of the letter, we had had very heavy rain, which will, I trust, both clear the fog and give us a supply of water.”

The Department had certainly shown unlimited faith in Providence. On the 19th August, Mr. Short wrote to the agent at Halifax, to the effect that the water had given out, and that the whistle was silent. Now, if any ships had gone ashore, under the circumstances every fair and just-minded man would consider the Government responsible for any loss of life and property that might occur. On the 19th December, 1876, Mr. W. M. Smith, the Inspector, wrote to the Department, stating that he proposed building an addition to the reservoir, so as to insure a supply of water, and they had a memorandum by Mr. Joseph Tomlinson to the effect that this would involve an expenditure of $700. Without taking up any more time of the House, he submitted that, if there was any question which demanded careful consideration, it was the one to which he had referred.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he did not think it was right that, at this late moment, without giving him notice, his hon. friend should make such a violent attack. He thought the conduct of the hon. gentleman on this occasion was unworthy of him. If any hon. member examined the papers he would find they did not reflect on either himself or his Department. It was impossible to manage 400 lighthouses and 30 or 40 fog-whistles without occasionally some mistake happening; but he did not think that there was sufficient ground in this instance for the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) to make a personal attack. He did not object to any fair criticism of his Department, but the hon. gentleman rather overstepped the mark in this particular. Any one who read the papers would find evidence to exculpate both himself and the Department. The appropriation for this fog-whistle was made during the incumbency of his predecessor, and it was finished in the autumn of 1875. It was thought by the inspector at the time there would be an insufficient supply of water. Provision was made for the construction of a light on the Isle of Hope, and the agent advised the Department that it would be desirable and expedient that the fog-whistle should be transferred there, but it was decided that it should not be removed. In the month of August, last year, his attention was drawn to the fact that there was a deficiency of water; but he concluded, as there was no appropriation, that it would be better, before doing any work, to wait until Parliament met and voted a sum for the purpose. He did not think that he had been fairly treated in this matter. He would read the following letter:—

“HALIFAX, 9th May, 1876.

“Your note of 5th inst. offering to supply Cape D’Or Fog-alarm with 100 tons of coal during the month of June, was submitted to the Minister to-day, and he directs me to say that the Department will give you the sum of two hundred dollars ($200) for landing 100 tons of Spring Hill coal at the Whistle-house, Cape D’Or, during the month of June next, or earlier if you desire. The coal will be provided at the wharf, Dorchester. Please inform me if you accept this offer, as otherwise we will probably send the coal by our own vessel.”

“I am, &c.,

“H. W. JOHNSTON,

“WILLIAM SMITH,

“Master Schooner Ada,

“Advocate Harbour.”

This was the contract, and the coal was to be delivered at the wharf at Dorchester. The coal was to be furnished in the month of June, or earlier if the captain chose. The captain, on the 13th of May, 1876, wrote the following letter:—

“CAPE D’OR, May 13th, 1876.

“DEAR SIR,—I received your letter to-day, and contents duly noted. I think your offer is too low, but I will take two hundred and fifty dollars ($250), as that is as low as I could do it for; and if you choose to send me the order for the coal, I will accept it with pleasure, and be very much obliged to you.

“It is very bad freight to deliver and very expensive.

“It is of no use of our saying any more about the place, as it is well known to you all. When you get this, if you send the order, please send it at once, as I want the best of weather to land the coal.

“I remain, etc.,

“CAPT. WILLIAM SMITH,

“Schr. Ada.

“To H. W. JOHNSTON, Esq.”

Mr. SMITH.

Then followed this memorandum by himself (Mr. Smith, Westmoreland):

“Perhaps this offer had better be accepted. See that it is clear that coal is to be landed at whistle.”

Then Mr. Johnston wrote the following letter:—

“HALIFAX, 20th May, 1876.

“SIR,—Your offer to land one hundred tons of coals at the Whistle-house, Cape D’Or, for the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, is accepted, and the work can be done at once. The coal is Spring Hill, and I suppose you can best take it from Dorchester.

“Let me know when you will be ready to load and I will send an order for its delivery to you.

“It must be clearly understood that the coal is to be landed at the Whistle-house.

“Yours, etc.,

“H. M. JOHNSTON.

“Capt. WILLIAM SMITH,

“Schr. Ada,

“Cape D’Or.”

This closed the correspondence. It was supposed that the coal would be delivered on the 20th of May, but unfortunately this was not done. He thought that the attack made on him by the hon. member for Cumberland was ungentlemanly and not warranted by the facts. In the matter of the fog-alarm, he was not to blame. He did not object at any time to fair criticism from friend or foe, but he did object to the unfair manner in which he had been attacked in this regard.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 78, Pacific Railway, $1,524,000,

Mr. TUPPER said he wished to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a point regarding which he thought the hon. gentleman had misapprehended the views expressed by his right hon. friend and himself. It related to the exploratory survey of Pine Pass, and the country about Peace River. As this season was to be consumed in the further examination of the Fraser River District, with a view to ascertain whether the line could be taken down the Burrard Inlet, no time should be lost in making the explanations to which he alluded. The Assistant Chief Engineer was a man of great ability, and he could be simply directed to go with a smaller staff, and see whether, without materially lengthening the line, the road could be carried from Edmonton to Fort George, through a valuable and productive country, instead of through a section which, as he believed, they were all agreed was unfortunately very unproductive. The expenditure this exploration would occasion would be comparatively small.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had quite understood the point when made. He had, however, been misunderstood. They had now, they might say, a complete line from Lake Superior to the Pacific Coast by Dean Inlet and Bute Inlet; and, therefore, they would be in a position when the profiles were finished—which would be very soon—to ask for offers based on the Act of 1874. If the surveys of the season proved that the Burrard Inlet route was the best, a supplementary tender could be only received in this regard. If they laid on their oars altogether during the whole of the summer, and surveyed a complete route for two-thirds of the distance from Lake Superior, some 1,100 miles, they could not possibly be ready for tenders for a year and a half to come. Their intention was that, as soon as the profiles were finished, they would take the necessary steps to bring the matter before the public.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the work to which his hon. friend from Cumberland had alluded could be done during this summer.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, if Mr. Fleming's report of 1874 and appendices were examined, it would be found that they had got a pretty good exploratory survey from Fort George on the Saskatchewan, to the neighbourhood of Smoky River, where it joined the Peace River, and from that point to Pine River Pass, though this was no pass at all, but a flat portion of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: So much the better.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they knew this section of the country tolerably well. No doubt there was a fair route here for a railway, but they had to contend continually with the impatience engendered in British Columbia by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. He was afraid that if they undertook to make an instrumental survey—which they would have to do, if anything was done—they could not possibly ask for tenders for two years to come.

Resolution read the second time, and agreed to.

On Resolution 56, towards assisting immigration and immigration expenses, including estimated expenses of transport of Mennonites, $110,000,

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that an item concerning public health appeared in the Estimates improperly. It was placed there in 1873, and it had remained there ever since. This had then been done because balances were due under the old state of things; but this Parliament had nothing whatever to do with the public health. This was a matter entirely beyond their jurisdiction.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he was not prepared to express an opinion on the constitutional question; but he thought there was fair ground to assume that they might fairly be held responsible for taking measures with regard to the public health in the North-West Territories. One reason for the retention of the item was that they dreaded the breaking out of epidemics, such as smallpox in that region. This had, unfortunately, been the case during the past few months, and they had been absolutely obliged to use a certain portion of this vote to check the spread of smallpox among the settlers and the Indians. The ravages of the epidemic among the latter had been terribly destructive.

Mr. MACKENZIE said another case had occurred in British Columbia, where they had been obliged to expend $4,000, Judge Gray and another gentleman having held that the epidemic had broken out owing to negligence on the part of Dominion officials. The Local Government had tried to make them pay $12,000 or $14,000, but the arbitrators reduced the amount to $4,000.

Mr. TUPPER said he rarely differed from his hon. friend, the member for Compton, but he felt that the view taken by the Minister of Finance was correct. It might be quite true that the question might be raised as to how far the matter came under the surveillance of the Dominion Parliament. But there was no doubt that they had to do with quarantine. It would be monstrous to suppose that 1,000 immigrants could come into this country bringing contagious diseases with them, as immigrants coming into the port of Halifax had introduced cholera, which caused the death of 300 persons. He would suggest that the Government take it into consideration whether it would not be advisable to see that all immigrants were vaccinated.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT expressed his obligation for this suggestion, although it might not be practicable to carry it out. He would, however, communicate it to the head of the Department.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he was of opinion that this question should be under the power of the Local Government.

Resolution read the second time, and agreed to.

On Resolution 208, Supplementary Estimates for North-West Mounted Police, $33,750,

Mr. MITCHELL asked whether the amount could not be reduced 50 per cent. by next Session.

Mr. MACKENZIE said a reduction to as great an extent as possible had been made, although he hoped that further reductions could be made in a short time. It should be remembered that it was absolutely necessary to give a feeling of order and security before immigrants could be invited into the North-West.

Mr. TUPPER said he was glad that attention would be given to this matter, and he hoped that the expense for forage would be decreased by the force growing oats, potatoes, &c., themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this had been attempted for two years, but the experiment failed, owing to the incursions of grasshoppers. However, it was thought that the North-West would not be again afflicted with this scourge for a good many years to come.

Mr. TUPPER enquired why this force had been transferred to the Department of the Secretary of State, and not placed under the Militia Department.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it had been removed from the Department of Justice because of the large amount of work there. He did not think it was advisable to place it under the Department of Militia as it was a civil force, and the rules applicable to the Militia would not apply to it. The Department of the Secretary of State transacted much business with the North-West, and having less pressure than the other Departments as to the amount of work, it could control the force with advantage and convenience.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 235, Dominion steamers, $31,000,

Mr. TUPPER asked the attention of the Government to the importance of exhausting every means in their power of discovering the best point of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland in winter. The efforts of the Northern Light during the past winter had only been partially successful. He was informed that during the whole winter there had been clear passage, free from ice, between the Island and Oak Island, at the mouth of Wallace Harbour. He hoped that would be investigated and the Northern Light put on that route next winter. The Ports of Pugwash and Wallace presented the best point of communication with Prince Edward Island as a short line of railway would bring either of those ports to the Intercolonial about mid-way between Halifax and St. John, forming the shortest connection with the Island both in winter and summer.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ALBERT RAILWAY COMPANY
BILL.

(Mr. Domville.)

SENATE AMENDMENT POSTPONED.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

"That the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill No. 48, to grant additional powers to the Albert Railway Company, be now taken into consideration and concurred in."

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said there were some grave considerations why the amendments should not be concurred in. Their adoption would place certain persons in the county of Albert in a very awkward position. The Bill also enabled the company, which had not one dollar of stock paid up, to issue an unlimited amount of promissory notes which would add to the liabilities of the corporation, while the Local Government had limited the borrowing powers to $600,000. He moved :

"That the consideration of the amendments to the Bill be postponed till this day three months."

Mr. TUPPER said he thought the House would hardly be disposed to concur in the amendment just moved. The Bill had been carefully considered by the Railway Committee, and the Minister of Marine, a representative of the adjacent county, took great interest in its promotion ; and that Committee reported it to the House with such amendments as they thought necessary. The Bill passed through its different stages, and was sent to the Senate. It was open, of course, now, to consider the amendments made by the Senate, but he thought their criticisms should be limited to those amendments, which diminished instead of increased the powers granted by the Bill. The Senate had merely added the words "or others." He hoped the House would feel that the general merits of the Bill ought not now to be taken up.

Mr. HOLTON said that the question before the House was, of course, that of the Senate amendments. This Bill had, however, been brought in at the early part of the Session in a form in which the Railway Committee absolutely refused to consider it. It was taken up again and to a considerable extent remodelled so that it was hardly in any sense the Bill which was first introduced. He understood the Bill was objectionable on its merits. Gentlemen from New Brunswick assured him that it was a vicious Bill, ab initio. He did not know anything about the company or about the country which it was proposed the railway should traverse ; but when gentlemen from the neighbourhood, in whom he had confidence, gave him such an assurance, he had no option but to act upon it.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the best legal advice had been obtained as to the absolute necessity of the proposed legislation. The hon. the Minister of Marine had been firmly of the opinion that the Bill was a good one ; it had been delayed on account of some technicality, and New Brunswick members, through the hon. member for Albert, had agreed to the new Bill which that hon. gentleman had informed him had his hearty approval. Only three or four members were opposed to it, among whom were the hon. members for Kent and Sunbury.

Mr. CAMERON said he was astonished at the argument of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) who said that, because certain members of the House had represented to him privately that the Bill was vicious in principle, he had such confidence in their private representations that he was prepared to oppose it. The House, however, had already affirmed the Bill and passed it. The Senate had added words which did not alter the principle in any way, and yet, on concurrence in those amendments, it was proposed to defeat the whole Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL said the House would be stultifying itself if it refused to pass the Bill.

Mr. McLEOD said his object in seconding the motion of the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) was this : that there were few members from New Brunswick in this House who regarded this Bill in any light but as pernicious in its effect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD rose to a point of order. The debate must be confined to the amendments from the Upper House and the consideration of the motion to postpone the consideration of the amendments for three months. There could be no discussion on any portion of the Bill, because it had been assented to by both Houses. To consider the Bill de novo was contrary to common sense and principles of justice, and being contrary to both was contrary to the law of the land. The authorities laid down the principle that whenever either House had passed on a matter they could not go back on their tracks.

Mr. SPEAKER sustained the point of order.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) moved in amendment to the amendment:

"That all after the word 'that' in the amendment be struck out and the following words substituted 'the amendment to the Albert Railway Bill be not agreed to.'"

Question put on the amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not see how the House could agree to this amendment. This House passed a Bill and the Senate chose to amend it; and they had now voted that they would not disagree with the amendment.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said that the Bill passed through the House without being put on the Order paper at all. If this had not been the case, it would have been amended.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was a libel and a slander on Mr. Speaker and the officers of the House to say that any such irregular proceeding was allowed.

Mr. HOLTON said his hon. friend from Sunbury merely meant that the Bill was considered on the same day on which it was reported, not having been previously placed on the printed Orders; therefore the hon. gentleman did not blame Mr. Speaker.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, if the hon. gentleman's remarks did not convey a censure, they were intended to justify the hon. gentleman's motive in making such a motion. His hon. friend (Mr. Gibbs) had moved that the House should disagree with the amendment made in the Upper House, and an enormous majority of the members had voted the motion down, and had declared that they agreed with the amendment; and, after doing so, a motion was made to consider the amendment three months hence. This was really a most absurd position, and it only showed what spirit induced hon. gentlemen to so act, and to what lengths the spirit of patriotism—

Mr. MITCHELL: Say spirit of party.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that both terms ought to mean the same thing. The hon. member for Northumberland called it spirit of party. This was a short word, and it sounded very much like the other ; but the action of the majority showed how a spirit of patriotism actually induced the House to stultify itself by voting down the motion.

Mr. HOLTON : My right hon. friend ought not to charge the House with stultifying itself in any act the House may take. This is out of order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, if the House had not stultified itself, it had passed a resolution which stultified itself. This was quite in order.

Mr. HOLTON : No proceeding of the House must thus be characterized.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would take back what he had stated ; and would discuss the matter in the freer atmosphere outside of the House. In this instance, they had the House passing a Bill unanimously, and, when the other House ventured to amend it, and they were asked to disagree with the amendment, a majority of the House had declared that the amendment was quite right, and that they would not disagree with it ; and, after doing so, a motion was made to consider the Bill this day three months. To what extent and to what length would not the spirit of party carry men.

Mr. TUPPER said he wished to make a few remarks with relation to the very extraordinary position in which the question before the House then stood. The case had been stated strongly by his right hon. friend, but not strongly enough. It was not the case of an ordinary Bill introduced by an hon. member, and which, without undergoing careful consideration in the place on which the House relied for the treatment of such questions, had come before the House for consideration ; but a case in which strong exception had been taken to the Bill by leading members of the Railway Committee, to whom it had been sent. The hon. member for Sunbury had just told the House that he brought before the Railway Committee the strong objection he had to the measure receiving its approval. The Minister of Justice also took exception to the Bill, and it was very well known that the hon. gentleman

(Mr. Blake) and one of his colleagues on the Treasury benches differed very strongly in opinion upon this measure.

Mr. HOLTON : Will my hon. friend permit me ? My right hon. friend from Kingston called an hon. member to order for discussing the Bill.

Mr. TUPPER said he was not going to discuss the Bill, but the conduct of the hon. gentlemen who had dealt with it. He did not wonder at his hon. friend trying to prevent his taking this line of argument by raising a point of order ; but before he sat down he would place that hon. gentleman in a very equivocal position before the House with relation to this Bill. The Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Chateauguay, and other hon. gentlemen had taken exception to the mode in which the Bill was presented, and they had undertaken to remodel it. The Committee did so ; and, after the most careful and exhaustive examination, they made—notwithstanding the objections of the hon. member for Sunbury—such changes and alterations in it that he believed that he was correct in saying that it passed the Committee without dissent. At all events, the Bill was so changed as to induce the hon. member for Chateauguay—as the hon. gentleman had just stated—to move that the Bill should at once receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. HOLTON : All the Bills.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not care how many there were of them. The hon. member stood before the House as the father of this identical Bill. It was then, in fact, a new Bill, prepared by the Committee to meet every objection after every objection had been taken to it ; and the hon. member for Chateauguay, than whom no member of the House gave more careful consideration—this he was bound to say in compliment and in just compliment to the hon. gentleman—to measures before Committees, or discharged his duties on leading Committees of the House with greater fidelity, insisted that no measure should pass the Railway Committee or any of the most important Standing Committees until it was made to square with the public interests ; and the hon. gentleman, having accomplished, in Committee, all that was necessary to obtain its entire support to and approval of this Bill, presented himself before the House as the father of the Bill, and asked the House to accept it, he and other members of the Committee having bestowed upon it the most careful and exhaustive consideration. He felt, when the hon. member for Northumberland had ventured to insinuate that night the motives which actuated hon. gentlemen in placing themselves in the extraordinary position—he would not say of stultifying the House, because that was unparliamentary—but of unanimously passing a Bill and sending it to the Senate, and then, by their vote, declaring that the amendment of the Senate should not be agreed to, for the purpose of preventing the Bill becoming law at all, that—and he believed he would be sustained in the assertion by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House—in the history of legislation, they would search in vain to find a parallel to a proceeding such as this.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is disgraceful.

Mr. TUPPER said he would say nothing like disgraceful. He did not want to use strong terms. The Act itself spoke in terms so loud to the country, as to the action of the House in regard to this Bill, as to admit of his dealing with it in a very subdued manner indeed. When the hon. member for Northumberland had ventured to insinuate that the motives behind this extraordinary change of position and right-about face—the fact of gentlemen being prepared to vote down that night what, after careful and deliberate consideration, the Railway Committee had accepted as a wise and judicious law—he was called to order, and justly so, because it was not parliamentary to impute such motives; but, while they were bound to consider that the action of hon. gentlemen in the House had not been influenced by improper motives, and while they were prevented from impugning motives to any hon. member, it would be impossible, outside of the House, to prevent the conviction being widespread throughout the country as to the cause of the defeat of the measure of his hon. friend from King's; this was the policy adopted in the House; to what would it bring the Legislature? He could tell hon. gentlemen opposite that, if those who sat on the Opposition benches had treated them as they were now treating these hon. gentlemen in relation to their legislation, Parliament could not have risen for another month. Had not the Opposition assisted these hon. gentlemen in passing over, as rapidly as possible, the most grave and important questions, and aided them in bringing the business of the House to a conclusion, it would have been impossible for them to prorogue the House for another month. If the principles of disintegration had gone on, and if the difficulties that could have been raised legitimately and constitutionally had been pressed, hon. gentlemen opposite would have found themselves in another month in an attitude still worse than that in which they were that night. Never was there an Opposition less deserving of such treatment as his hon. friend had received, and he would tell hon. gentlemen opposite that this treatment was accepted by him, as it would be by every member of the Opposition, as treatment not extended to an individual but to the whole Opposition as an Opposition. He said that the course taken and the example set was a baneful example, dragging down into the lowest mire of partyism all questions of public import which had a right to be considered on their merits alone and aside from all party considerations; and this was an example which, if it was followed, was going to be attended with the most baneful results in the House; and no persons in the House were going to feel these baneful results more than the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, who had lent themselves, he would say, unworthily to crush a measure in which his hon. friend was interested, simply because it was a measure in which this hon. gentleman did take an interest.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he wished to make an explanation to the House to put himself right in this matter. When he found that there was opposition to the Bill, he had gone to the various New Brunswick members, and to the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) and asked the reasons for this. With his usual diffidence, the hon. gentleman did not give him an answer, but, being pressed on the point, told him that he would give his answer that or the next day. The hon. gentleman afterwards communicated his objections, and he had the Bill drawn to meet these objections. Nevertheless, now, at the eleventh hour, the hon. gentleman stated he had objections to the Bill. He could prove, by the hon. member for Albert, that the hon. member for Sunbury had stated that he would agree to the Bill. He was called away on private business, and when he returned he found that it was altered in the Senate. He complained that the hon. member for Sunbury had committed a breach of faith; and, had the hon. member with candour and honesty of purpose told him that there was anything more to which he objected, he would have been the last man to bring anything before the House to which objection was taken. The Bill was drawn a third time and agreed to by the hon. member, and he contended that the hon. member had committed a grave breach of faith.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House resumed the consideration of the remaining Resolutions, as reported from the Committee of Supply.

On Resolution 239, to provide for the salary of an Inspector of Indian Agencies, &c., with the rank of Chief Clerk of the second grade, $1,800,

Mr. MILLS said it had been found necessary, in consequence of alleged irregularities, to appoint an Inspector to examine the books of the different agencies throughout the country. The officer would, he believed, save the amount of his salary ten-fold.

Mr. LANGEVIN pointed out that there was no provision for travelling expenses, for, of course, the Inspector could not stop in one place all the time.

Mr. MILLS said the travelling expenses would be taken out of the $1,000 for contingencies. Charges had been made against Agents, but he would not like to make any statement to the House until he had had them verified, and this examination could best be made by a special officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Department had got on for a long time without such an officer, and, in view of the present commercial depression, it was advisable to do without these additional officers. If the present audit system was not correct, another system, that of inspection, should be introduced. It was impossible for one officer to travel all over this vast country and inspect the different Indian agencies.

Mr. MILLS said he had asked this appointment on the recommendation of men familiar with the subject. Inspection was certainly needed, and his proposal would provide that inspection.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that, under the old Government, when any charge was made against an agent, an officer of the Government was sent up to examine into it. He did not think the appointment necessary.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he agreed with this to a certain extent, but the rule could not very well apply to the distant North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the appointment seemed only to be for the benefit of some political friend, and he would take the sense of the House upon it.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 242, expenses of Committees, extra Sessional clerks, &c., House of Commons, $4,500,

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. ROBITAILLE asked, as to the mode of distributing reports, which he observed were being packed up and dispatched in large numbers, while some members could not obtain copies.

Mr. BOWELL said he had seen bushels being packed.

Mr. PLUMB said the reports appeared to consist of large pamphlets published by Mr. Spence and Mr. Trow.

Mr. FARROW said the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow) deserved great credit for the way in which he had acted on the Immigration Committee. It was the unanimous wish of the Immigration Committee that those pamphlets should be printed.

Mr. BOWELL said hon. gentlemen seemed to have lost sight of the question. What he wanted to know was why some hon. members could get bushels of those pamphlets and others did not know where to get them.

Mr. MILLS said the pamphlets could be got at the Immigration Office.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 214, to provide for expenditure likely to be incurred in connection with the Exhibition to be held at Paris, $25,000,

In reply to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had not yet matured their plans in regard to the manner in which the exhibition of Canadian goods at the Paris Exposition should be conducted. It was the intention of the Government to make it as creditable as possible.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 245, Prince Edward Island Railway, including stores, $42,000,

Mr. MACKENZIE said the amount was altogether for stores. They required to keep a quantity of coal, iron, wheels, &c., on hand.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he thought this should not be charged to capital.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was necessary, in the case of new railways, to have a certain amount of stores on hand. He thought the amount was properly charged.

Mr. TUPPER said he was satisfied that these stores should not be charged to Capital, but to Revenue Account, as the road had been in operation for more than a year.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Everything that is actually used goes to revenue; and, if, at the end of the year, this asset is diminished by $15,000 or $20,000, it will be charged against revenue.

Mr. TUPPER said he could quite understand the desire of hon. gentlemen to reduce the enormous deficit on this railway, which had been stated by the Minister of Public Works at about $96,000.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: It is $100,000 a year.

Mr. TUPPER said that, under these circumstances, the deficit would really be $150,000 instead of $100,000 a year.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he entirely agreed with the hon. member for Cumberland. Stores should not be bought until required, instead of being placed in large quantities at various stations and store-houses. He knew of a large quantity of articles having been purchased for the Intercolonial which had been sold for old iron, though never used.

Mr. MACKENZIE: When were they bought?

Mr. DOMVILLE said he did not know when they were bought, but he knew when they were sold.

Mr. SINCLAIR said he was very glad to hear the explanation of the Premier regarding the vote. The road was about 200 miles long, and a large amount of stores was required. A station was greatly needed at Breadalbane, and he was glad to hear that one was to be built there at a cost of $2,000. It was much needed.

Mr. TUPPER said it would be found on page 42 of the Minister of Public Works' Report, that $36,594.38 had been paid for general stores for this railway. This, then, was not opening this account, but it was to supply the annual demand.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they did not expect to expend $240,000 a year on this railway, for if they did, the deficit would be $140,000. They only anticipated an expenditure of $200,000 a year. The officer charged with this account had considered that this vote should be charged to Capital Account, and, therefore, it had been so entered. He would, however, look into the point that had been raised, and revise the matter.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 246, Pacific Railway survey, $130,000,

Mr. MACKENZIE said that an item of $100,000 under this head had been placed in the regular Estimates; but Mr. Fleming, who had been absent at the time, had pointed out on his return that the vote was quite insufficient for the work of the year. Mr. Fleming reported that $180,000 would be required for the Fraser Valley survey, and $5,000 with relation to superintendence of telegraphic construction from Edmonton to Tête Jaune Cache and the revision of the location near the Saskatchewan. The sum of $30,000 was also required for the revision of the location between Keewatin and English River. This had been instrumentally surveyed, but it was thought that the distance might be shortened by a slight deviation from the ascertained line. Some 40 or 50 miles from Pic towards French River, on a line which had been nearly explored, remained to be surveyed, and in this regard $15,000 was required; a direct line was to be laid out to the point where the road would ultimately cross French River. The sum of $230,000 in all was needed, and $100,000 had already been voted.

Mr. PLUMB: How far north of the Sault does the line from Pic to French River run?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would judge, in looking at the map roughly, that the distance was probably 70 or 80 miles.

Mr. PLUMB: I suppose that a preliminary line is being run.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Purely so. The original line reached pretty far north—to Troublesome Lake. One line ran north of Nepigon Lake and a second to the southern corner of this lake, instead of the north corner. If the road can be run in a direct line from Lake Nipissing to Pic it will be very much shorter than the other line proposed. A great deal of the country is favourable, but the Engineer is not able to pronounce at present very positively upon its capabilities for the support of a line, and the obtaining of an easy gradient. This cannot be done until a preliminary exploration is at least completed.

Mr. PLUMB: Is the line, as it crosses the Pic River, very far from the lake?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the line, he believed, ran quite close to the mouth of this river, which there would be no difficulty in crossing. The banks were low and sandy, but the river was not quite approachable for heavy vessels.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On 247, Pacific Railway construction, Pembina Branch Extension, $60,000,

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be remembered that the Pembina Branch, which was to join the main line, was graded to a point opposite Winnipeg; a distance of 22 miles to the main line was still to be graded, and Mr. Fleming said this could be done for about $60,000. The Engineer strongly recommended that it should be done this summer, chiefly with a view to the easy transportation of rails. Immediately below Winnipeg the water was too shallow, except for a week or two in the spring, for loaded vessels to descend it with cargoes. The recommendation in question was made particularly because the line passed through the only gravel bed obtainable in that quarter. Mr. Fleming estimated that it would cost about half this sum to have the rails taken down otherwise to Selkirk. The Government had not actually adopted the suggestion, but they, nevertheless, placed the sum in the Estimates to be used in case they did so, and Mr. Whiting, who was the contractor for and interested in No. 15, was the contractor for the Pembina Branch, and the Engineer reported that this person was willing to continue the contract at the same rates which had been paid for work performed between Winnipeg and Pembina; and these were very low, twenty-two cents a yard. Mr. Fleming was of opinion that the contract should be continued, but nothing was settled in this regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. TUPPER enquired what prospect there was for a connection from Moorehead to the border of the Province at Pembina.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had obtained several reports on the subject. He had endeavoured in various ways to stimulate the building of the road by showing that the Government were in earnest about it. There were now only 13 miles to grade and 63 miles to cover with rails.

Mr. TUPPER: There would be very little for the road to do unless this connection was made?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Very little.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 248, St. Lawrence Canals and Rapids, $20,000,

Mr. JONES (Leeds) asked permission to refer to the vote for the Grenville Canal, $30,000, passed the other night. The hon. member for Cardwell asked why so small a sum was placed in the Estimates, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works said it was for the reason that the canal could not be used because of the non-completion of the Carillon Locks. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had, he thought, been misled on the subject. The locks at the lower end of the Grenville Canal were of the old size and had never been put under contract, and nothing had been done towards the deepening. Therefore, if the hon. Minister of Public Works waited for the completion of the Carillon locks, it would be years before the canal could be used all the way through. Nothing also had been done with respect to St. Anne's Locks, towards Montreal, except that the channel below had been deepened, but the channel above was still in the same state as the Carillon Locks. The fault was not with the contractors, and he felt assured that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had been misled. He felt a little delicacy in speaking about the matter, as his brother was a contractor. He would hand the hon. gentleman plans and specifications which would show him that, in damming the river four or five times, a larger amount of timber had to be used than was credited by the Department.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 250, Public Buildings, $4,000,

Mr. FLEMING said, in the absence of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) he would remind the hon. Minister of Public Works that he had promised to consider the advisability of building a post office at Brantford.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government did not consider it an absolute necessity to take a vote for that place this year, but there would be, most likely, a vote taken next year.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 251 and 252, Harbours and Breakwaters, $6,000,

Mr. LANGEVIN expressed regret that the Government had not thought proper to comply with the opinion given in the House that something should be done for the Province of Quebec in this respect. He must say that the Province of Quebec was nearly forgotten.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the remarks of the hon. gentleman were sectional. Although there might not be much given to the Province of Quebec this year, sometimes it might receive five times the amount given to other Provinces. Since Confederation, Quebec had received $13,895,492; Ontario, $14,379,299; New Brunswick, $16,398,207; Nova Scotia, $9,544,239. For public buildings there was expended in Ontario, exclusive of Parliamentary Buildings, $883,000; in Quebec, $1,162,243; in New Brunswick, $354,328; in Nova Scotia, $144,749. They found in other services similar anomalies. They could not possibly expect, however, that in any Province there would be every year an equal distribution of the public money, because the expenditure was in accordance with the necessities which arose. The hon. gentleman would find, if he examined the votes for harbours and piers, that for Ontario there was voted this year $28,500, and for Quebec $22,000, which did not embrace nearly $20,000 expended on Rimouski Pier, which was charged to the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway. To the Province of New Brunswick $97,000 was voted, but $80,000 was really for work undertaken for the benefit of commerce in the harbour of St. John. The sum of $31,500 was voted to Nova Scotia, which, undoubtedly, required more than any other Province in the Dominion, in consequence of the extent of its sea coast. His hon. friend, however, would find that no neglect whatever had been shown to his Province, and he did not like to hear a leading member of the House speak as if there was a refusal to do justice to any Province.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he did not complain of the amounts voted to the other Provinces, but he affirmed that the Province of Quebec, though its members had made its wants known to the House, could not obtain justice. The hon. gentleman had quoted the vote for harbours and piers in the different Provinces. Last year the vote stood as follows:—Ontario, $62,200; New Brunswick, $86,000; Nova Scotia, $36,500; Prince Edward Island, $24,750; Quebec, $5,000. The representatives from Quebec had repeatedly asked for improvements. A vote had been asked for improvements at the entrance to Chicoutimi harbour, but there was nothing for it in the Estimates; nevertheless, it was important that something should be done. There were reports made in regard to the Lower St. Lawrence, but no sums were placed in the Estimates for works there. Why was the Province of Quebec placed in that position? He did not suppose it was purposely done, but still the Province was neglected. Its coast line was as long as that of any other Province, a large portion of it being on the Atlantic. He insisted on this point, because he was satisfied that, after the attention of the hon. the Premier had been called to it, he would be prepared to take the claims of the Province into consideration next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he hoped he would always take into consideration the public interests, whether they were connected with his own or any other Province. He claimed that the Government had carried out that policy, and that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had no ground at present for complaint. He remembered the time when over half a million had been spent on piers in the Lower St. Lawrence and nothing in Ontario; and when an equal amount was spent on slides and booms in Quebec and nothing in the other Province. No person had complained of that expenditure.

Mr. LANGEVIN: The elections were carried against us on that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Let us see what we spent.

Mr. TUPPER: I do not think we can balance the accounts of all the Provinces to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had not raised the question; that was done by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), who had endeavoured to make political capital out of it. He could not, however, pass by the subject altogether without assuring the House that no injustice had been done to the Province of Quebec. With regard to what the hon. gentleman called the harbour of Chicoutimi, it was at the upper end of a large, deep river. It was not a harbour, but a mere landing, and there was a great difference between a landing place in a river, and a similar place for shipping in a harbour. He did not think it was the duty of the Government to build wharves at that point. He protested against the allegation that the Province of Quebec had been neglected. The Government would fulfil its duty without regard to any local or sectional consideration whatever.

Mr. LANGEVIN.

Mr. MITCHELL said he objected to the hon. the Premier referring to matters which took place fifteen or twenty years before Confederation, when the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec were flying at each other's throats. The county which he represented had not had justice.

Mr. TUPPER: We are not coming down to counties.

Mr. MITCHELL: I represent a county which has not had justice done to it.

Mr. TUPPER: I can compare favourably with you in that respect.

Mr. MITCHELL said then the hon. member for Cumberland had not done his duty. He entered his protest against such a large expenditure being made on the harbour of St. John, when he was informed that nothing was to be done this year at Miramichi. He contended that a breakwater should be built at Point Escuminac, which was one of the most exposed points on the shores of New Brunswick. He had asked that a small sum be put in the Estimates for erecting a breakwater at that point.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 261, to provide for the expenditure likely to be incurred in connection with the proposed visit of His Excellency the Governor General to Manitoba, $8,000.00,

Mr. MITCHELL said this was an item new in its character, and, as its adoption would establish a bad precedent, the House should give it some little attention. Too much money was spent in paying expenses connected with the Government; the highest and the lowest official seemed to have his travelling expenses paid by the country. He thought this would be an improper appropriation of public money; it was highly improper to vote sums of money for the pleasure trips of His Excellency.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said this item was put in at the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite, who objected to such expenses being charged to "unforeseen expenses." He thought the hon. gentleman underrated considerably the real practical value that had been derived to Canada at large from His Excellency's visit to various portions of the country under his care and charge. Wherever His Excellency went, he did full justice to the resources of the Provinces, and his words had great weight in England and elsewhere, and were largely commented upon by the British press. But, while this was important as an immigration agency, there was another consideration. The distant Provinces were apt to think they were overlooked by gentlemen here, and he thought a good feeling was engendered in the minds of the inhabitants of those Provinces by the personal visit of such a person as His Excellency. He thought money appropriated in this manner would, even in a mere pecuniary sense, bring considerable advantage to the country at large.

Mr. MITCHELL: What did the trip to British Columbia cost?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I think the total expenditure will be within $20,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: I simply protest against the principle of such a grant.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 262, to meet expenses of Halifax Commission, $30,000,

Mr. TUPPER asked for an explanation as to the object of this vote.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was for the purpose of meeting the expenditures incurred by Sir Alexander Galt and the various persons they would have to employ to prepare the case which was to be submitted to the Commission. The fees of the legal gentleman and the sums which would have to be paid with regard to the witnesses they would have to produce would amount to a considerable sum. In any case, the expenditure must necessarily be rather considerable; and, if they succeeded in recovering even a moiety of the amount which the hon. member for Northumberland held these fisheries to be worth to the country, this would be a very small percentage on the sum total.

Mr. TUPPER said he regretted this last remark, as was an intimation of a divergence of sentiment between the gentlemen who occupied the Treasury benches and their predecessors such as was not calculated to promote the objects of the Commission. It was an unfortunate remark. Aside from this, he did not understand why they were called upon to pay anything. This Joint High Commission which sat at Washington was an Imperial Commission. It was very true that the Government of England had very properly given to the Government of Canada an opportunity of having representation on the Commission. They deferred to the wishes of the Government of Canada. He took it for granted that Sir Alexander Galt was not going there as an officer of the Government of Canada, but that he was appointed by the Imperial Government as a sequence to their former action, and a means of carrying out the objects of the Joint High Commission. He held that the expenses of the sequence should be dealt with in precisely the same way by the Imperial Government as was done in connection with the expenses of the Joint High Commission at Washington, by the Imperial Government, which was bound to protect Canadian interests, and provide the means of defraying the expenditure in connection with this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, if the hon. gentleman would turn to page 183 of the Public Accounts, he would find an item of $11,307 which was paid in consequence of an arrangement made by the late Administration in this relation.

Mr. TUPPER: At Washington?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. TUPPER: That may be an incidental expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was not incidental. It was by virtue of an exact agreement; one-half was to be paid by each Government.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not recollect such an arrangement having been made. It was spent, he presumed, to secure desirable preliminary information.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this occurred in the fall of 1873 and in the winter of 1874. It related to Mr. Rothery's expenses; not to those of the Joint High Commission.

Mr. MITCHELL: Have we paid those expenses?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL said that not one dollar of this sum should ever have been paid. He now learnt of it for the first time; a more useless expenditure had never been made. He could not understand why it was necessary to employ four legal gentlemen in preparing this case for the Commission, as the consequent expenses would be very great. He believed that the Bill which would have to be paid would be such as would not only astonish the British, but also the American Government. The Minister of Finance had chosen to refer in a jocular way to the amount he had had the honour to claim that these fisheries were worth to Canada. He made it on statistics and facts furnished by officers of the Department, and he did not believe that the value was at all exaggerated. He also believed that this valuation had been confirmed by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He did not object to the rate asked, but he did not think that they should be extravagant. He knew that officers in the Department possessed more information and talent, serviceable in this regard, than any outside talent in the whole of Canada. One or two solicitors were sufficient. He recollected, however, that fault had been found with him for paying some $400 to the Hon. Wm. McDougall for gathering information in the archives of London. He had been attacked for this by the hon. member for North York, who was backed up by the gentlemen on the Treasury benches, because that sum had been appropriated in advance; and yet he found in the Public Accounts that sums had already been paid in this relation for preliminary meetings.

Mr. TUPPER said he was open to correction, but he was satisfied that the hon. gentleman was mistaken in the statement that had been made.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. Rothery had come to Canada during the crisis in which the late Government fell; he had not visited Washington at all; and he (Mr. Tupper) believed it would be found that not one dollar of the expenditure mentioned had been incurred by the late Administration.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The arrangement on which he was paid was made by your Government.

Mr. TUPPER said he would be satisfied of this when the hon. gentleman gave evidence of it. He knew of no such arrangement. He spoke, however, from memory on the point. As far as the Joint High Commission proper was concerned, the expenditure was borne by the Imperial Government; and the expenditure attending this sequence should also be so borne. This, however, would not preclude them from spending money in getting up the case, in order to present it as strongly as possible. The amount in question was insignificant compared with the results aimed at. He wished, while upon this subject, to draw attention to an important error into which the First Minister had fallen with relation to the Washington Treaty. The hon. gentleman had declared, in the most emphatic terms, in the House, that the Washington Treaty surrendered the canals of Canada irretrievably, and placed their control entirely beyond our jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken. The hon. gentleman had stated:

"We find ourselves, in consequence of that Treaty of Washington, placed in an invidious position in regard to several matters. There is a direct advantage given to the United States in regard to the canal navigation that no legislative and no administrative action of ours can ever possibly overcome. When the hon. gentleman came back from Washington, he boasted that he had obtained the free navigation of the Yukon, the Stikien and the Porcupine, and for this he gave away the free navigation of the magnificent St. Lawrence; he being actually in a state of supreme ignorance of the fact that we had the navigation of those rivers before then, by a Treaty with Russia in 1825, and in a more complete way too. We had the navigation of the northern rivers of this continent, not only for commercial purposes, but for every other purpose; and yet the hon. gentleman gave away the free navigation of the St. Lawrence to obtain navigation of these rivers for commercial purposes, and the immediate result is already a quarrel between the two countries as to whether or not a prisoner can be conveyed down the Stikkeen River. We are bound by one of the clauses of that treaty to give the United States the free use of all the canals of the Dominion, and they are bound only to use their influence with the individual States to secure for us the navigation of the canals of the States contiguous to us, traversing the boundaries of the two countries. So they placed us actually in a position of inferiority in this respect from which no negotiation can possibly deliver us; and the successors of the hon. gentleman's Government have been obliged to take a stand upon other grounds in vindication of the rights of this country to certain privileges in connection with the navigation of these waters."

The hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken with regard to the common use or free navigation of the St. Lawrence. So long ago as 1826, a most elaborate discussion of the subject took place, and the Imperial Government then offered it to the United States as a concession; but the offer was refused, the United States demanding it as a right, and stating that, unless they so obtained it, they would not accept it at all. And this was the reason and the only reason why the free navigation of the St. Lawrence was not parted with so long ago as 1826. Whether the Treaty with Russia gave us these rivers or not, on the face of this Treaty appeared the fact that the United States abandoned the position they maintained in 1826, and accepted it as a concession from the Government of Great Britain. Every person understood that the common use or right of navigating the magnificent St. Lawrence was a mere phrase without any meaning in it whatever, as the navigation of the St. Lawrence did not amount to anything apart from the navigation of the canals. He would read a clause in the Treaty to show the hon. gentleman that, by an Order in Council to-morrow, notwithstanding the Treaty, he could close every canal in Canada against United States bottoms whilst leaving them open for the free use of Canadian subjects; therefore the hon. gentleman was under a complete misapprehension when he supposed that legislative and administrative action regarding these canals had been taken out of the hands of the Government by this Treaty. The 27th Article of the Treaty was as follows:—

"The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats' Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States; and, further, engages to urge upon the State Governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by, or contiguous to, the boundary-line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States."

Then this was further provided:

"The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying granted in favour of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty under this article, in case the Dominion of Canada should, at any time, deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII."

So, in the first place, all that the Imperial Government bound itself to do was to use its influence with the Government of Canada to obtain the use of these canals for the people of the United States, in precisely the same manner as the American Government bound itself to use its influence with the States' Governments, in order to secure to the people of Canada the use of State Canals; and the proviso followed that, if certain concessions with reference to the carrying trade were withdrawn, other concessions made by the United States could be suspended. It was, therefore, evident that the hon. gentleman might, to-morrow, by a stroke of his pen in an Order in Council, close our canals against the people of the United States. This was an important point, and, deprived of the right of dealing with the speech of the hon. gentleman on the occasion, in consequence of the ruling of Mr. Speaker, he now desired to correct the grave and serious error into which the hon. gentleman had fallen, because it led the Canadian people to suppose that we had deprived ourselves of the lever which, at any time, we might use if we desired it, for the purpose of obtaining better trade relations with the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had not fallen into error, but had stated what was exactly, technically and literally correct, and he now reiterated it. The article stated :

“The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other Canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and, further, engages to urge upon the State Governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State Canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the Possessions of the High Contracting Parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.”

There was a distinction at once. If the canals on the Upper Ottawa could be reached by American vessels, they could be used, while the United States only promised to use their influence with the several States to allow us to use the canals contiguous to the boundary or waters traversed by the boundary.

Mr. TUPPER: None of them have been conceded. All that has been done is that the Government of England has agreed to use her influence with us.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said that.

Mr. TUPPER: You said we were placed beyond any administrative or legislative action on our part.

Mr. MACKENZIE said his point was, while certain canals only were to be conceded to us by the United States, we were to concede to the United States the whole of our canals under the same condition. He and the present Government had taken the ground that the canals connecting the Hudson River with the lakes ought properly to come under these terms. They had some difficulty in getting the right conceded, and, when it was, it was so hampered with conditions as to make the use of the canal of very little good. By the 30th Section of the Treaty, if Canada refused the Americans the use of our canals, they could refuse us the right of transportation over their territory. The hon. gentleman had not shown that he was wrong about the rivers. Our right to navigate the Stikcoen and the Yukon Rivers was not so great under the Washington Treaty as it was under the Treaty with Russia, the conditions of which had not been altered by the purchase of Alaska by the United States.

Mr. TUPPER held that he had shown that under this treaty Canada had the same right to close its canals against the Americans whenever it considered it desirable to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have something to say.

Mr. HOLTON rose to a point of order. The discussion should be confined to the item upon which concurrence was asked.

Mr. SPEAKER took the same view.

Mr. MITCHELL said England had never protected our rights, and therefore the Treaty with Russia was of no practical use.

Mr. HOLTON again rose to a question of order.

Mr. MITCHELL objected to the Canadian Government paying for Mr. Rothery's mission as well as half the expenses of the Commission.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the payment was made on the basis of an arrangement made with the Imperial Government before the present Government here came into office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think not.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had no recollection of such an arrangement.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolutions referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions agreed to as follows :

1. Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1877, the sum of $1,625,395.99 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

2. Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1878, the sum of $16,286,576.52 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and agreed to.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT then introduced a Bill (No. 124) For granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service, for the financial years ending, respectively, the 30th June, 1877, and 30th June, 1878, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service.

Bill read the first, second and third times and passed.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

EXPLANATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Minister of the Interior had called his attention to a report of his remarks in the Mail on the Independence of Parliament Act. He was reported in that paper to have said :

"The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) came up to him and said : 'I understand that some of your friends intend to move against members on this side, and I give you notice that you and Mr. Rochester will be sued.'"

That was inaccurate. The remark was "I give you notice that Mr. Rochester will be moved against." There was no threat at all. It was simply a notification that, if proceedings were taken on that side of the House against hon. members on the other, hon. members on that side would be moved against.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD AND CROWN SUITS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the following notice of motion by the member for North York had been on the paper for some days :—

"That an Order of the House do issue for a statement of the suits and legal matters in which the legal firm of the Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, M. P., or any partner of his said firm was instructed by his Department to act on behalf of the Crown, during the tenure of his office as Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, with the dates of such instructions and of the last action in each case."

He would ask the hon. gentleman to move it, as he would like to obtain the statement for his own information. He also desired to secure the dates.

Mr. DYMOND said he had been anxious to make the motion. He now moved it without remark.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would like the hon. gentleman to include in the motion, the dates of the commencement and end of the proceedings.

Motion, as amended, agreed to as follows :—

"That an Order of the House do issue for a statement of the suits and legal matters in which the legal firm of the Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, M. P., or any partner of his said firm was instructed by his Department to act on behalf of the Crown, during his tenure of office as Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, with the dates of such instructions and of the last action in each case; with statements of the dates of the beginning and conclusion of such suits and legal matters."

House adjourned at

Fifty minutes past

One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, 28th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at five minutes before Three o'clock.

THE WASHINGTON TREATY AND FISHERIES COMMISSION.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he wished to call attention to a conversation which had taken place the night previous in the House, when he had stated—and his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was of the same impression—that an arrangement was made by the late Administration to pay one-half of the salary of a special agent in connection with the Fisheries Commission, and of the expense with reference to the Halifax Commission. He was not authorized to lay those papers on the table, but he might say that the proposition was made on June 16th, 1873, in a despatch, to pay £1,000 in addition to the usual travelling expenses to this agent. One-half of the expense was to be borne by the Colonies and one-half by the Imperial Treasury. The Colonies were to bear the expense relating to the preparation of the case, and the Imperial Government the expense connected with the memorandum of England, while the Colonies were to share the expense of the proceedings at Halifax. A telegram of a subsequent date from Sir John A. Macdonald stated that the propositions were accepted, and, on the 8th July, 1873, a formal Order in Council was passed sanctioning the arrangement; and, under that arrangement, the amount mentioned in the Public Accounts in this regard was paid. He brought down this statement, in compliance with the request of hon. gentlemen opposite, and in order to put themselves right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the circumstances connected with this expenditure had, the previous evening, utterly escaped his memory, as he had mentioned at the time. He was quite satisfied with the statement of his hon. friend. He further desired, on behalf of an absent member—the hon. member for King's, to make a personal statement. His hon. friend was charged, in the Montreal Witness, with having made certain charges against the seat of his hon. friend the Minister of Customs, and with holding them over the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Burpee's) head for the purpose of making him uncomfortable during recess. He desired, on behalf of the hon. member for King's, to say—and his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would verify the statement—that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville), at the personal request of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, had postponed the motion with reference to which he had given the Minister of Marine and Fisheries notice; and the hon. gentleman did this with the distinct understanding that opportunity would be given him to bring the case before the Committee. The hon. gentleman assented to this, and the witnesses were at once summoned, and they would have been here that night had it not been ascertained that day that the Committee would not sit to try the case. He considered it due to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) to make this statement.

Mr. MITCHELL said that, when, on the previous evening, he had stated that he had no recollection of the arrangement made touching the Fisheries Commission, he had stated what at the time, and now, he believed to be true. He had never been aware of such an arrangement; and this was due to the fact that the arrangement proceeded from the Department of Justice. His hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) had assumed the responsibility, and it was done in his absence. He did not think that he had ever before up to this day seen the Order in Council; but the way in which the question had been dealt with would explain how, in a matter of fact so important in its character with relation to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, he should have been so ignorant. He rarely forgot a matter of fact though he might forget conversations.

GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH.

QUESTION.

Mr. TASCHEREAU said, before the Session closed, he would like to ask the hon. the Premier a question touching the interests of the Province of Quebec, on account of the disquieting effect which had been produced in that Province, owing to the rumours that were prevalent that the Government intended to abandon the extension of the Ottawa Valley Railway, which would connect the Quebec railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway system. This work had long been expected by Quebec, and in this expectation the Province had contracted heavy obligations; and he wanted to know if the Government still intended to subsidize the Canada Central and build the Georgian Bay Branch.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With reference to the question put by the hon. member for Montmagny, I have merely to say that I stated in the House, in reply to the hon. the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), that the policy of the Government with relation to building the railway up the Ottawa Valley was in no way changed, and that we considered that the subsidizing of the Canada Central or some other road running in the same direction was essential to the scheme. The misfortunes attending the contractor who had the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch, and the subsequent examination of the country with a view to making better arrangements, if we could, have occupied the time, so that we have not been able to present to Parliament at this Session the details as to the manner in which the connection should be made, but the scheme or plan originally proposed is still the scheme of the Government. I stated on a former occasion that the Government would be prepared to recommend to Parliament the importance of affording a junction at Portage du Fort wherever it is proposed for the Quebec system to cross the river. It is needless to say that many representations have been made about the superior capabilities of the Pembroke route and the Pembroke Railway constructed from that town. The Government are bound to consider what advantages that may have, and, while they were very anxious to consider this subject, they have not at present been able to make such progress which would justify the Government in bringing down any further proposition to Parliament at this Session, but they hope to be in a position to do so next Session. I cannot say anything more definitely to the hon. gentleman, but I believed what I said on a former occasion to the hon. member for Terrebonne would be quite satisfactory. The statement I now make is, perhaps, a little more full and explicit than the former one.

MARITIME CONTRACTS ACT.

QUESTION.

Mr. KILLAM said he would like to enquire of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if the Government had any definite information with regard to the Bill before the Imperial Parliament last Session, which was, he believed, being also considered during the present Session, relating to Insurance and entitled Maritime Contracts Act. He understood that it was the intention of the Imperial Parliament to make this Bill applicable to the whole of Her Majesty's Dominions. The Bill, as it appeared before the Imperial Parliament last year was radically bad in principle. But he did not object to it so much on this ground as on the principle that the Imperial Parliament had no right to interfere with private contracts in this country. The Bill was much more objectionable than the one introduced in this House last Session. Englishmen could legislate for themselves in any way they chose, but it was entirely too much to expect the people of Canada to accept legislation from the English Parliament in those matters which were under control of our own Parliament. He hoped representations would be made by the Government to the Imperial authorities to the effect that this Bill, supposed to be in the interest of Englishmen, would not be applied to Canada.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the Government had made a remonstrance in the sense indicated by the hon. gentleman. The Bill was now pending before the Imperial Parliament, and the Government had sent a despatch protesting against any interference with the rights of Canada in this respect.

THE SEAT FOR GLOUCESTER.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. IRVING presented the first and second reports of the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Sergeant-at-Arms announced that a Messenger from His Excellency was in attendance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is too bad. I object to the door being opened until the report is read. It is very important, and it should be read.

Mr. SPEAKER: The door must be opened. Admit the Messenger.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Privilege, privilege.

A Message from His Excellency the Governor General, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

The Titles to the following Bills were then read:—

An Act for the relief of Mary Jane Bates.

An Act for the relief of Walter Scott.

An Act for the relief of Martha Jemima Hawkshaw Holliwell.

To these Bills, the Clerk of the Senate, by His Excellency's command, did thereupon say:

"His Excellency the Governor General doth reserve these Bills for the significations of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon."

The Speaker of the House of Commons then said:

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:—

"The Commons of Canada have voted the supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the Public Service."

"In the name of the Commons I present to Your Excellency a Bill intituled an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1877, and the 30th June, 1878, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service, of which I humbly request your Excellency's assent."

To this Bill the Royal Assent was signified in the following words:—

"In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill."

His Excellency the Governor-General was then pleased to address the two Houses in the following Speech:—

"Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"In relieving you from further attendance in Parliament, I beg to convey to you my thanks for the diligence with which you have applied yourselves to the performance of your duties.

"Among the numerous measures you have passed are several of considerable public importance.

"The improved provision for the incorporation of Joint Stock Companies will, I trust, tend to the establishment of such companies under the operation of sound general rules, rather than by special and exceptional legislation.

"The law as to Insurance Companies will add to the existing securities of Canadian insurers.

"The alteration of the duties on petroleum will confer a great boon to the masses of the population.

"The vast shipping interests of our great inland seas will be benefitted by the extension to the trade on those waters of rights and remedies, the utility of which has been recognized by long experience.

“The law providing for the extradition of fugitive criminals will enable Canada to discharge efficiently her part of the engagements of the Empire in this important particular.

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

“In Her Majesty’s name, I thank you for the Supplies you have so cheerfully voted. I will take care that they are expended with due regard to economy.

“Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

“The Commissioners named under the Treaty of Washington having been at length appointed, the Commission will shortly be organized at Halifax. I have taken steps to ensure a full and fair presentation of the case of Canada. I trust the negotiations may realize all our expectations.

“I have now only to give expression to my earnest hope that on your return to your several homes you may meet with evidences of growing prosperity, and that, before you are again called upon to meet together in your representative capacity, the passing cloud on our Trade and Commerce will have disappeared.”

The Parliament of the Dominion of Canada was then prorogued to Thursday, 7th June, next.
