He might increase the number of such quotations in order that, if hon. gentlemen opposite voted against the motions before the House, which so vitally concerned the interests of this Dominion, the people of this country might see how they were betrayed by these men, who had, in truth, run and carried elections under false pretences in the years 1872 and 1874. This had become a historical fact. This was what had been declared by the Bien Public, the organ of the Parti-National before its disappearance from public view:

"The resolutions adopted at a large meeting of manufacturers that has taken place lately in Toronto ask for the tariff to be raised to twenty per cent. on all goods manufactured in England and Ireland that can be manufactured in Canada, and that on all articles coming from the United States and other countries Canada should impose equal duties to those imposed on Canadian products going into the United States and other foreign countries. We accept these resolutions and do not hesitate to say that that should be the programme of every Government having at heart the prosperity of the country. It is this that everybody requires, except certain political men who sacrificed practice to theory. The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie has happily said the tariff should be modified in the Canadian interest, and we are sure he will keep his word."

If these hon. gentlemen, therefore, voted against the motion before the House, they did not have at heart the interests of the people. The motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington was calculated to obtain reciprocity as one of its results, and it was well known how great an advantage the Reciprocity Treaty which was abrogated in 1865 had been to this country; and, if we could not secure a proper degree of protection, this motion was intended to open the way to the negotiation of a new Reciprocity Treaty. He was convinced that there was an intimate union and attachment between the Liberals and the Nationalists of the Province of Quebec. In a famous speech delivered by the Postmaster-General in 1869, under the auspices of an Agricultural Society, the hon. gentleman had developed his programme for the future, and the hon. gentleman, speaking of our relations with the United States and other matters, then said:

"The great commercial want of this country is a market for the surplus products of our industry. It was the theory of Confederation to supply this want, by opening up to us the markets of the sister Provinces. I am afraid the results thus far have not greatly increased our scanty manufactures. Our natural market is the American; and we do and shall suffer till we gain access to it; nor would a mere temporary treaty, subject to the caprices of politicians and entangled with the embarrassments of British diplomacy afford a full remedy. Manufactures and commerce prosper under permanent as well as liberal arrangements, and it is in vain that you treat them with generosity to-day if there is apprehension that you may cramp them to-morrow. We require markets, but to confer their full benefits they must be permanent, so that capital may acquire confidence and seek permanent investments here. Without this state of things our trade must be limited and manufactures remain exotics among us; and, the exodus of our population remaining about equal to its increase, the progress of promise is not cheering. We ought to be manufacturers for this continent with our cheap labour, cheap living and wonderful natural facilities. We cannot compete against the distance, the skill, the capital and teeming labour of the old world, and there remains for us the comparative petty business of supplying our own sparse population in unhealthy competition with the great manufacturing industries of England and America; and it often happens in times of depression, when our struggling manufacturers most need encouragement and support, that we make a sacrifice market for those great countries to the ruin of our home trade."

He believed he had shown that it was possible for hon. gentlemen opposite to vote for the motion of his hon. friend from Centre Wellington. Frequently in the press, upon the hustings, and even in the enceinte of Parliament, hon. gentleman opposite had deplored the existing state of things, and particularly the emigration of French Canadians to the United States, which has continued for many years. And they had always held that, in order to bring these people back to their own country, manufactures should be established and encouraged; and that this was the only means of doing so, and of rendering the country prosperous. These hon. gentlemen, therefore, should not forget their past professions of faith, and should vote for the motions before the House. This was precisely the time when protection should be adopted; a crisis existed in the United States, and many of their countrymen who had emigrated to its manufacturing towns, were now in misery. They desired to return, and we had need of both population and manufacturers. And, in order to provide for our imperious necessities, a greater degree of protection and encouragement should be accorded to our suffering industries; and, above all, an effort should be made to produce what was consumed in the country, to the greatest extent that this was possible. We should import as little as possible, and only, in this way, by the proper development of our great national resources, could we meet and satisfy the difficulties and exigencies of the present unfortunate situation of the country.

Mr. LAURIER said he would not attempt to follow the hon. gentleman through the whole range of his argument. Were it necessary, he could cap the quotations cited by superior and counter quotations. Every one must admit that the policy of the Administration was at once comprehensive, definite and clearly mapped out. The First Minister had declared over and over again that, though he was in principle a Free-trader, the theory of free-trade could not be adopted in this country in its entirety; and that we could not collect a revenue except by means of Customs duties. The exigencies of the tariff had already increased duties to 17½ per cent., and this was as much protection as was necessary for the manufacturer, and as much as the country could bear. What was the policy of the Opposition as revealed in the motions of the hon. members for Centre Wellington and Kingston? The least that could be said in this relation was that it was loose, vague and very faintly delineated. The right hon. member for Kingston said that the tariff should be remodelled so as to foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the country. No one would say that these words did not sound well. But the country required something more. It required to know whether the means whereby this great result would be achieved were natural or magical. The right hon. member could not expect any member to pledge himself against the policy of the Government unless it was known what the policy to replace it was to be. Of course the result of the resolutions was a foregone conclusion—they would be rejected by a large majority. But, if the result was at all doubtful, or the balance of parties was not as it was, there would only be a more forcible reason that the country should know at once the extent to which the Opposition committed themselves. But the resolution, and the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, had no principle. The resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston contained only one assertion, viz.: "That the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burthen of taxation on the people, without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries." He (Mr. Laurier) took that assertion to be a fallacy and an error. There was no increase of taxation. The tariff was adjusted, but the taxation was not increased. There was an increase in some respects, but a decrease in other respects, and the tariff was not onerous upon the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not forget that some of the changes arose out of their own action. They should not forget that last year one of their own members showed there was a grievance as to the existing tariff on petroleum, that the interest was over-protected. It was in consequence of the representations of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) that the Government removed the duty on petroleum.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER said hon. members might say "Hear, hear," but this fact was to the credit of the Government, for it showed that they were ready to remedy a wrong whenever it was pointed out to them. But he was not at all surprised that hon. gentlemen regretted that justice had been done in the matter; gentlemen opposite always regretted something, no matter what was done or what was not done. Three years ago they regretted that the tariff was increased from 15 per cent. to 17½ per cent., although this gave some protection to our industries. Last year, every one expected that the tariff would be increased; but it was not, and the Opposition were loud in their regrets. He believed that, if the tariff had been increased, as was anticipated, the Opposition would have been equally loud in their regrets. And now, when the tariff was partly increased and partly decreased, the Opposition were, as ever, loud in their expression of regret. The chief cause of their grief was the fact that they had to remain in the Opposition seats. He was quite sure that, if they were on the other side of the House, every thing, even though the same as now, would be the best in the world. The resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston, in toto, was loose and vague, and was prepared with a view to the possibilities of future contingencies—that was his candid belief. A policy of protection had never occurred to the right hon. gentleman during his long tenure of office. The present Government would not last forever. Like everything human, it would become a thing of the past; and, therefore, the right hon. member had so framed his resolution that his party would not be embarrassed when it came into power. The resolution would catch the wind, no matter from which point of the compass it came. It would not be difficult for the right hon. gentleman and his party to drive a coach and six through their resolution, and let the country have, on its basis, either free trade, protection, incidental protection or a revenue policy. The country had a right to demand more than this. It had a right to demand that the gentlemen opposite should state something definite as to the policy they would adopt when they came into office. He was justified in saying so, not merely on his own opinion, but on the opinion of a gentleman who was connected with the party of the hon. gentleman opposite, a gentleman whom they always justly held in high estimation. He referred to Mr. Thomas White, of the Montreal Gazette. At the meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade, which took place in 1874, a resolution was moved by Mr. Jas. McPherson (St. Johns, Q.), as follows:

"That a duty of 15 per cent. is fair and reasonable, and no disturbance of the tariff is at present desirable; but should a revision of the present tariff take place, it is resolved that the interests of our farmers be thoroughly looked after."

Mr. White then said:

"I rise to a point of order: Motions should be definite in their character. I submit this one is very indefinite. No one will deny that the interests of the farmer should be looked after. But the motion should be made in such a way that we would understand what the mover meant by looking after."

The President of the Board of Trade, who was a Protectionist, said :—

" I must say I am pleased that Mr. White has raised the question of order, because the motion is too indefinite. It is necessary that, in passing resolutions, we should know what is meant by them."

He would not go the length of saying that the ruling of the President of the Board of Trade ought to be the ruling of Mr. Speaker in the present matter; but he would say that the Opposition ought to give a more exact definition of their policy. Perhaps the resolution was so worded to produce the result attributed by Talleyrand, when he said to his pupils: "Young men, remember that language has been given to men to conceal their thoughts." The Opposition said they were not going to announce their policy; that they could constitutionally refuse to do so. But this was not the language which the great Liberal-Conservative Party should use. The Liberal Party never shrank from declaring its policy, denouncing abuses and suggesting remedies; and it not only suggested but forced remedies down the throat of the Government which then existed. But, perhaps, it was not fair to expect gentlemen opposite to give the House their policy. He thought they had a very great reason why they should not. And the reason was that they had nothing definite; they had no policy. They had a high-sounding name, which they called the "National Policy." If the motion were to carry, and the Government were defeated, and the Opposition formed a new Administration, the very moment they attempted to carry out their National Policy, there would be a confusion worse than that at the Tower of Babel. Each interest would speak a different language which would not be understood by the other. Even now they did not agree. They had the name of a National Policy, but not the substance. The resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston proposed protection for three interests—the manufacturing, agricultural and mining. The resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) threw overboard the agricultural and mining interests, and only advocated protection to manufactures. But, the moment the amendment to his own motion was made, the right hon. member for Kingston accepted the modification of his policy. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) then threw overboard the manufacturing and mining interests, and moved in favour of agriculture alone, and this was at once accepted by the Opposition. He believed that, were a resolution presented in favour of mining alone, it would be supported by the gentlemen opposite. The National Policy had not yet been hatched, and, if it had any basis at all, it was that the bread of the people should be taxed, and this was the remedy proposed for the evils of the present Government by the great Conservative Party, which professed to be the friend of the people. He could not speak for any Province but his own, but in Quebec the National Policy was held to be a mockery and a farce; it was an inhuman policy, in that it would make fuel and food dearer. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) said his own immediate countrymen were willing to tax themselves, and this, unfortunately, was true. As to the charge of inconsistency against the Liberal Party of Quebec in this matter, Mr. Papineau was a Protectionist not so much from reasons of political economy as from political reasons. Our country was then struggling to obtain political liberty and responsible government, and the French Liberal Party proposed that we should close ourselves within our own limits and buy nothing from England. But now we were given most ample justice and the most complete liberty, and the result was that, in all this vast Empire over which the sun never set, there were no people more attached to British institutions than French Canadians. He held, however, that there were some industries which could not be established without the aid of legislative action. He said this openly and in the face of his own political friends. Then it might be asked why he favoured the policy of the present Government? His answer was that it was because there was no necessity for more protection than we had. The party opposite did not so much want increased protection as to arouse the prejudices of the masses against the Government. It must not be forgotten that the tariff was adequate. We had a temporary deficit, it was true, but that would be met by increased economy. If the gentlemen opposite were in earnest they would point out the industries which wanted protection, but instead of that they did nothing but generalize. When they spoke of protection they had nothing unless they had everything absolutely definite. Free-trade was a principle, but protection was not a principle. When they asserted the doctrine of free-trade they were at once understood. They laid down the principle that all the relations of trade must be regulated by the same conditions. But protection could not be treated as a principle, as it did not carry with it any definite idea. It simply affirmed that certain branches of industry ought to be put beyond the ordinary rules of trade, and that the enhanced price of the article would be more than compensated by the addition to the labour of the country. He called upon the gentlemen opposite to show that 17½ per cent. was not sufficient protection. The country was extremely prosperous under the régime of the gentlemen opposite, but this fact was against the argument they now used, for the tariff then was lower than at present. But that was not all. His hon. friends from Terrebonne and Bagot, in fact all who had addressed the House on the Opposition side, had insisted upon a retaliatory policy. They declared they wanted reciprocal trade with the United States, but, if they could not obtain it, they wanted reciprocity of tariffs, whereby the duties imposed on American goods would be as high as those levied on Canadian goods entering the United States. If any measure could be calculated to do injury to this country that would be the very measure. Excess in anything was a bad thing, and protection was not an exception to the rule. Excessive protection to an industry would prove the ruin of that industry. He would quote the words of the hon. member for Stanstead, a Protectionist, who, in referring to the petroleum trade, showed the results of excessive protection. They had it from hon. gentlemen opposite that undue protection would destroy the petroleum trade, and, further, that a duty which was estimated by the hon. member for Stanstead at 25 per cent. had completely destroyed the trade, which had been controlled by an organized "Ring." What was the remedy proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite? The Americans had to pay a duty on our refined petroleum of 40c. per gallon; the Canadian duty was 15c.; did hon. members opposite propose to retaliate? Did they propose that the Canadian duty should be increased from 15c. to 40c.? Instead of that, they proposed that the 15c. duty should be reduced by one half. That was how hon. gentlemen opposite practised retaliation. While they declared that the Government should adopt a retaliatory policy, yet in practice instead of asking that the tariff on petroleum should be increased to that of the United States, they asked that it should be decreased. If the protective duty of 25 per cent. on petroleum had destroyed that industry, what would be the effect of imposing a tariff on trade of 40, 50 or 100 per cent.? The effect would be that our industries would be completely annihilated. He could not understand the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite when they believed the country would not see through such pleas. He supposed these hon. gentlemen would some day return to power, and how would they affirm the policy of retaliation? He asked them to point out how they would retaliate; would they retaliate on everything, petroleum included; would they exclude that article? It was quite evident that the retaliatory policy was simply a cry, something to suit their purpose for the time, but when they come back to power it would never be heard of again. That retaliatory policy reminded him of the old temple of Janus, the doors of which were open during war but closed as soon as war was over. If hon. gentlemen opposite came back to office, the doors of the retaliatory policy would be closed, never to open more. The theory of retaliation, called a political policy, was a theory of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) as he gave it the other day in his speech.

Mr. MASSON said it was not his policy, he gave it as the policy of Sir Alexander Galt.

Mr. LAURIER said the hon. member had, perhaps, quoted it as the policy of Sir Alexander Galt. When a man threw himself into the absurd there was no limit for it; because, at the same time, his hon. friend advocated that the Government of the day should not only protect the labour of the country, but should also give labour to the labouring class. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had enunciated, what was characterized afterwards by the hon. the Minister of the Interior as communism, a doctrine, which was not a new doctrine, but was found in the work of Louis Blanc. Such was contained in his work, published in 1848, called "The Rights of Labour." Englishmen were accustomed to say that if they scratched a Russian they were sure to find a Tartar, and if they scratched a Quebec Conservative they would find a Radical of the French school. Extremes always met. The hon. member for Bagot had used language which, for subversive doctrine, was quite equal to that used by the hon. member for Terrebonne. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had attacked the Bench of his country and had spoken of it in derisive and calumnious terms, and had applied to the Bench a term not found in the French language but invented by the French press of Lower Canada and applied to the judges. Any man who did not respect the Bench of his country, and who attacked it in such language, could not be proud of such institutions and would never deserve the name of patriot. The hon. member for Bagot had also charged the Government with fattening themselves and their friends on the substance of the people. They had heard such language used in Lower Canada for the last three years, but they never expected that such language would find its way into the House of Commons. He would not do the same injustice to the Conservatives as they, the Liberals, had to suffer every day. He would not say they were Communists, but Conservatives of Quebec would stop short of nothing to obtain position. They would tax the people's bread, they would attack the Bench, and the ferocity of a she-bear deprived of her cubs was nothing compared with that of the Tory party when deprived of the spoils of office.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the amusing speech of the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) had no doubt placed the House in good humour to hear a few remarks justifying his vote the other night, as the hon. the Minister of Justice said, for economy. He wondered what the country would come to if it were deprived of the services of the hon. the Minister of Justice. As a humble merchant, who had endeavoured not only to benefit himself, but at the same time to advance the interests of the country, who had endeavoured to fructify the public works and to aid every enterprise that would advance the welfare of the Dominion, he had listened attentively to the defence of the Government policy, which was to do nothing. When the people, from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, read the daily press, they found nothing to encourage their drooping spirits, nothing to lead them to hope for better times. Did the leaders of the Government and the occupants of the Treasury benches consider they had no greater responsibility in administering public affairs than to create extra clerkships, to build canals, which could not be used to-day and never would be used, to import 50,000 tons of steel rails to lie rusting five years before they were wanted, and which probably would never be wanted? Did they call that a policy? Was that the object for which the Ministers were returned to Parliament, and paid $7,000 or $8,000 a year? The people were like the members of a family; they expected the head of the family to do something for them. If the Government were not able to give the people a word of consolation, they might at least have said: "My children, we can do nothing for you, but God bless you." While reviewing the state of trade, in his Budget Speech of 1876, the Finance Minister said:

"During the last few years, a very considerable number of persons had engaged in manufacturing enterprises for whom there was really no room; as was well said on a recent occasion, many of them possessed neither the brains nor the money to bring those enterprises to successful issue."

Surely it was bad enough for the hon. the Finance Minister to declare the people did not possess the necessary means, without stating that they had not the brains. Did not such remarks show the people they were reviled? They were twitted in these hard times—when every man was putting forth his energies to endeavour to be respectable, and meet his obligations as they became due, and to keep the country together—with the charge that they had not only no means, but no brains. Such was the consolation they received from the Government. The day might come when a Finance Minister with brains might come up from the people. Gentlemen opposite called themselves Liberal Reformers. In what were they Reformers? Were they not elected by the suffrages of the people, and yet they turned around and told those people who sent them to Parliament that they had no brains. But they did not make such statements on nomination day. Not satisfied with running down the manufacturing interests, the hon. the Finance Minister said:

"Everyone who knows much about the mode of carrying on banking is aware that banks, when they have accumulated large sums of money, are very apt to discount largely to men of straw."

The hon. gentleman talked about men of straw and insinuated that such was the character of men who were largely dealing with and trusted by the banks, and conducting the business of the country. This was an unjustifiable sneer. It was true that there were not many men of great wealth in Canada—practically none; but the business community as a class were honestly endeavouring to build up the industries of the country for those who might come after us, and did not deserve to be stigmatized as men of straw. If some of them failed, or even if the country lost the assistance of the hon. the Premier, the St. Lawrence would not cease to flow or the sun to shine. Why were the stocks of banks and joint stock companies depressed and falling daily, every holder running to his neighbour asking what he thought of the situation and should he sell? The position of affairs, which amounted almost to a panic, was due to a want of confidence, not because bank stocks were not really worth as much to-day as they were last week. Stocks which were at 120 or 140 some time ago were, with few exceptions, selling below that figure to-day. It was want of confidence which produced the panic, and what was more likely to cause it than the language of the hon. the Minister of Finance, who threw distrust upon our institutions, who, in his Budget Speech, insinuated that our traders were unworthy of credit. That speech would travel far and near, and lead the people in England and elsewhere to be careful how they extended their credit to a nation which was represented to be in such a precarious state by such authority. The Finance Minister further said:

"You may trust the instincts of the people to acquire wealth, but the difficulty is to distribute it. We have seen enough in past times of the mischief which can be done by large corporations, or rather, by wealthy, unscrupulous men."

The hon. gentleman with one breath objected to men making colossal fortunes, and at the same time he talked about the banks dealing with men of straw. Which were preferable—the men of straw or those of colossal fortunes? If traders, manufacturers and others became rich, would it not place them in a position to help to open up more industries and increase the development of the country. Was there anything in the position thus taken by the hon. gentleman to encourage the people? The hon. gentleman declared that the formation of rings was a natural consequence of a high tariff, which was not proposed or advocated on the Opposition side of the House. The debates were filled with charges of impurity. The hon. the Minister of Finance said a man who made money would become dishonest, and yet, almost in the same breath, he declared that the men who did not make money were dishonest. Even if a man were a great statesman, according to the hon. gentleman, he must of necessity become corrupt and dishonest. When the next election took place—when they were called to meet their constituents—there would be no subterfuge. Every man would have to point to the Hansard and stand by his individual conduct. For himself he would tell the people that he voted for this and similar resolutions, because the policy of the Government, which was not one which was calculated to benefit the country, was condemned by these resolutions. When the members of the present Administration were seeking office they proclaimed themselves Reformers. But had they fulfilled their promises? Had the expenses of the Government been cut down? No; on the contrary, they had been increased. The Baie Verte Canal, which was solemnly promised, had not been built. This work was alluded to at the opening Session of this Parliament in the Speech from the Throne, with a great flourish of trumpets, but year after year passed by and not only no effort was made to proceed with this desirable improvement, but it had been abandoned. He held that a promise should be kept inviolate, but here was a Government, composed of men who were supposed to be Reformers, which openly broke its word, even in this particular. The people of the Maritime Provinces, however, would no longer be satisfied with bare promises. They would inquire what the Government had done and intended to do for them. Some time ago it was stated that the people of the Lower Provinces could not trade profitably on account of the smuggling of American goods into the country. The New Brunswick Board of Trade memorialized the hon. the Minister of Customs as follows:—

“The Hon. Isaac Burpee, Minister of Customs:—

“The memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of St. John respectfully sheweth that on the borders of New Brunswick, from Calais to the Upper St John, large quantities of oil, cottons, woollens, and other American manufactures, teas and a variety of other articles are brought in systematically by traders or runners from the United States, acting in co-operation with persons on this side the frontier and delivered to them in their places of business free of duty.

“That all along the coast of the Bay of Fundy and its tributaries a large quantity of goods are landed from the United States, carried in the vessels running to and from Boston and other adjacent American ports and paying no duties.

“That not only is the revenue very much defrauded, but the mercantile community are great sufferers thereby, and the evil has grown to such large dimensions that it seems to call for the most stringent measures on the part of the Government.

“Your memorialists would suggest among other remedies that might be assured to abate this evil that seizing officers be changed from one port to another every one or two years, and that active officers be appointed to travel through these districts as often as may be necessary, and endeavour to bring to punishment all engaged in a trade defrauding the revenue and evading the laws.

“And that instructions may be sent to all collectors of customs in the outports to use greater care in examining entries and promptness in collecting duties, and to report each case of fraud coming to their notice also.

“That appraisers from the large centres, well acquainted with their duties, be ordered to all the outports, to give such instructions to local officers as will ensure the thorough examination of all invoices and of all goods entered at these ports.

“St. John, N. B., December 15, 1876.”

The hon. the Minister of Customs replied to this communication as follows:—

“From the positive manner in which your communication deals with the matter, we presume you have evidence and cases in point that you can give us, whereby we may be enabled to take such steps towards a definite investigation as will lead to the immediate prosecution of those parties whom you know are systematically engaged in delivering and receiving such merchandize without paying duty. We will be glad if you will give us a list of the cases, the merchandize so delivered and received, and the names of the parties engaged therein. In every case that has been brought under the attention of the Government, the parties have been dealt with as the law directs, and no effort has been spared to put a stop to such illicit trade when it has been found out.

“Your suggestions as a remedy for the evil have been carefully noted.

“The department, some time since, put in operation measures for the further protection of the revenue, and did, from time to time, extend their efforts as opportunity offers and the circumstances of cases will admit.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“your obedient servant,

“ISAAC BURPEE.”

They were coolly told to make out a case and then the Government would attend to it. That was not what the people expected. The Government should be able to grapple boldly with such matters, instead of requiring those who complained to take the initiatory steps as suggested. It would seem that the hon. the Minister of Customs lost sight of the interests of the people in thinking of his own, or in consulting his own ease and convenience. One hon. gentleman stated that he believed in making hay when the sun shone. But the sun had not shone for the people since the so-called Reform Government came into power. In his Budget Speech the hon. the Finance Minister had to announce a deficit of $1,900,000. In this regard he might point to the loss on the steel rail purchase, to the wasted expenditure on the St. Frances Canal, Mr. Edgar's expenses to British Columbia, and other matters, which, if added together, would make up this deficit. If the Government had adopted a judicious course this deficit might have been avoided. As he stated last year, he did not charge the hon. the First Minister with having acted corruptly in the steel rail matter—he was unwilling to believe the statement of partizan papers that the rails had been imported through a firm in which his brother was then a partner. He did the hon. gentleman the justice to say that he had simply made a bad bargain without the previous sanction of Parliament. The result was a deplorable one, entailing a loss far above a million of dollars. Rails were scattered in various sections of the country, and nothing but disaster had arisen from this large expenditure of money. Responsible firms to-day were offering to supply best Bessemer steel rails for £6 10s. to £7 per ton, and guarantee them, which was a reduction at the rate of nearly £4 sterling on the price paid for this unfortunate purchase; and some steel rails had been sold as low as £5 5s. of first quality. The Government, not content with the purchase just referred to, has also taken from the contractor on the Georgian Bay Branch, at excessive prices, iron rails which were of various patterns and of short lengths; in fact, "job lots," as they were called, and the bargain was therefore doubly unsatisfactory. Why was this purchase made? What had the Government done with all these rails? Had they built substantial railroads? Had they built that line to the far West which was to be a boon to future generations as well as of great advantage to the present? From all that we could learn, nothing was being done towards the actual construction of the Pacific Railway proper; the location of the line, after enormous expenditure for surveys, was still undetermined, and the choice of the terminus on the Pacific Coast would seem to be delayed and held up, either as a bribe or a menace, to the various interests of the Province which will be directly affected thereby. From Lake Superior westward to Winnipeg, there seemed to have been the same want of decision and hesitation in the policy of locating the line, and, while out of the 50,000 tons of rails purchased in 1874, but 2,200 tons, representing about 25 miles of road, had been laid in that district, a vast outlay had been made in the attempt to secure the navigation of the "magnificent water-stretches" which could not be completed for several years, and which the construction of the railway would render utterly useless, if it should not previously be found utterly impracticable. The hon. the Minister of Finance told the House that, when he went to London, he found a great deal of difficulty in placing the loan of November, 1876. No doubt any one not conversant with financial operations would find a great deal of difficulty. In 1874, the Finance Minister went to London for the first time to borrow money. He pointed out that the resources of Canada were unbounded and that its credit was good. But the money-lenders and bankers of London asked why then he had spoken so gloomily about the finances of Canada in his Budget speeches, and he found that those speeches had had a depressing effect upon his negotiation. The Finance Minister had to deal with a syndicate composed of leading men in the city, such as Glyn, Baring, and others, and all his financial arrangements had been affected by his gloomy predictions in our House of Commons. Thus it turned out that for the loan of 1876 the money was got at 91 nominally, but in reality it only netted 89½. If the loan had not been placed in the market en bloc, if people had been asked to subscribe to it generally, it would doubtless have brought a much better price, although the Finance Minister said it would be doubtful whether as much could be obtained by that method as the price obtained by him. The Finance Minister asserted in the Budget speech that the 30-year loan of 1874 was more valuable than the 30-year loan of 1876 because it would mature two and a half years sooner. This he (Mr. Domville) thought, was a fallacy. Investors in London wanted to get bonds which ran for a long time, if they had confidence in the security, only wanting regular payment of the interest. The London genuine investors had more money than they knew what to do with. Failing to get a large interest for a small period, they would take a smaller interest for a long period. They wished to get immediate employment for the money, and in the end the transaction was a paying one. In fact, they took loans up as an investment, and not as a speculation. The hon. the Finance Minister said there was so much difficulty in placing the debentures, that one large firm took $1,000,000, or so, to themselves. In other words, the Finance Minister said he was not able to place the loan except through the agency of the gentlemen in the city who were really dealers in securities. In point of fact, the bonds were never legitimately sold or placed on the market. In 1876, when the Finance Minister went to make another loan, he had his last loan staring him in the face, and the firms he had dealt with before, told him that, if he placed the new loan on the market independently of their aid, it would depreciate the market price of all the four per cent. bonds. He had to raise the money, and he was therefore in the hands of the banking firms. The money which was to be received for the loan of 1876, the Finance Minister said, was deposited with these gentlemen at four per cent. interest for six months, and perhaps longer. The money they were to pay him for the bonds they placed in their books to the credit of Canada, at four per cent. interest, with six, eight and nine months to pay. It was evident that the parties taking these bonds would not have borrowed the money unless they could have employed it profitably. There was every reason to believe that large amounts of it were re-lent to people in Canada at enormous rates of interest. The loan, in fact, was opened upon the following terms, as per prospectus:—

“ COPY of Prospectus, extracted from the Times, London, England.

“ Dominion of Canada loan for £2,500,000 four per cent. sterling bonds or inscriptions. Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co., and Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., the Financial Agents in England of the Dominion of Canada, are authorized by the Minister of Finance of Canada to receive applications for a loan of £2,500,000 sterling bonds or inscriptions, bearing interest from the 1st November, 1876, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly on 1st May and 1st November of each year, at the offices of the said Financial Agents in London.

“ This loan is issued under the authority of an Act of Parliament of the Dominion of Canada (39 Vic., chap. 1, sec. 4) passed during the last Session. The object of the loan is partly to provide for the payment of debt maturing or redeemable in the course of next year, and partly for expenditure on Public Works.

“ The principal of the loan now offered is to be repaid in London in 30 years. A cumulative Sinking Fund of not less than  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum will be employed in the purchase of the bonds or stock of the Loan, at or below par; the Government reserving the right to invest the Sinking Fund in other securities, if the price of the Loan should be above par.

5	per cent.	on application.
15	“	on allotment.
20	“	on 31st January, 1877.
20	“	on 27th March, 1877.
20	“	on 25th May, 1877, deducting the half-year's coupons due 1st May, 1877, less Income Tax.
11	“	on 25th July, 1877.

Those who took the loan therefore were not obliged to pay for it in cash, but in instalments, without interest, running over a period of nearly nine months, meanwhile receiving the accruing interest on the bonds at the rate of four per cent. per annum as clear gain. The Finance Minister permitted the subscribers to the loan, who chose to do so, to pay the instalments in advance, less interest at the rate of three per cent., and left the money on deposit in London at four per cent.

interest. The subscribers for these bonds, owing to the glut of the money market in London, could easily borrow upon them at one per cent. or one and a half per cent. per annum, and thus they could make a double profit. The loan was in fact sold for  $89\frac{3}{8}$ , while the quotations for the four per cents. of 1874 were  $94\frac{1}{8}$ , and while peculiar advantages were enjoyed by the subscribers for it in the way of rebate of interest, and an unprecedentedly cheap money market. The Finance Minister however asserted that the quotations for the loan of 1874 could not be stated as a price for the new loan, which was for a large amount, while the price was fixed for the stock of 1874 upon small or retail sales; "and that it was a well known fact in London, and he would imagine ought to be equally well known in Canada, that there are many stocks which a peremptory order to buy or sell even the small amount of £50,000 or £100,000 sterling would have sent the price up or down from one to two per cent. as the case may be." And this was his reason for not submitting the loan to public competition and for putting it into the hands of a syndicate; and he said also:

"As an appropriate illustration of the correctness of this view, I may state that one of the most important Australian colonies had occasion some time ago to negotiate a loan of £1,500,000. That loan was offered to the market by tender, with a sealed minimum. The tenders at or above the minimum only amounted to some £300,000. The minimum was then disclosed and tenders again invited, but only another £300,000 or £400,000 could be obtained. After many efforts to float it, the loan was finally withdrawn and the balance was taken up by the Australian banks, or private arrangements best known to themselves. I need not say that our case was directly opposite to this."

This might be an appropriate illustration of transactions of previous years, but we had a more appropriate illustrations of the correctness of an opposite view in the following extract taken from the London Colonies, a well known newspaper, dated February 17th, 1877:—

"The tenders for the South Australian Government four per cent. loan for £500,000 sterling were opened at the National Bank of Australia, London, on the 13th instant. There were 209 tenders amounting to £2,967,300 at prices ranging from  $96\frac{1}{8}$  10s. to £100. The average price for the £500,000 allotted is  $97\frac{1}{8}$  10s. to £100. Tenders at  $97\frac{1}{8}$  9s. and above, amounting to £483,500, are allotted in full, while those at  $97\frac{1}{8}$  8s. 6d. will receive about 53 per cent. of the amount applied for."

The point illustrated, therefore, was this. When this loan was asked for there were tenders for nearly six times the amount, so that instead of being sold at 91, as our loan was, with the deductions and allowances that he had stated, these bonds were placed openly in the market and there were tenders to six times the amount, the minimum tender being at  $96\frac{1}{8}$  10s. per £100. The Australian debentures of a similar kind were quoted in the open market at  $97\frac{1}{8}$  for a single debenture, while the whole new loan was awarded at  $97\frac{1}{8}$  and over; thus showing the fallacy of the Finance Minister's argument that the retail price of bonds could not be obtained for those offered at "wholesale" as he termed it, and the deduction ought to be drawn that the Finance Minister had improperly placed our loan. Instead of being thrown open to public competition our loan was given at a fixed price, practically below 90. The Finance Minister said it was with great difficulty that he could sell the large amount we asked for in London, that market not being prepared for it. He had given us quotations of loans of foreign States of various characters. Among them even Chilian bonds in order to justify his position. The fact remained incontrovertible that, while our 4 per cents. of 1874 were selling at  $94\frac{1}{8}$  at retail the Finance Minister sold those of 1876 at less than 90 by wholesale, and while the Australian 4 per cents. were selling at  $97\frac{1}{8}$  at retail the 4 per cent loan of that country was placed by open competition at  $97\frac{1}{8}$  at wholesale and was now selling at retail at  $98\frac{1}{8}$  to  $98\frac{3}{8}$  and over. Free trade was, no doubt, very desirable in theory, "but commerce, to be really free, must be free in all its branches. That enactment is but a deliberate injustice which sets only one class of producers free, and holds back the rest by a system of restrictions. If the English farmer be made to stand on a commercial equality with the Pole and the Russian he ought to be compensated by free access to all the products of the known world; whatever he can gain by free trade is the return made to him for his otherwise reduced profits." It would be a glorious country if they could get along without the Government, without the Custom-house officers, without the tax-collectors, the doctor, or the lawyer, and if each one could deal with his neighbour without the intervention of the middleman. He would not join with any hon. member in this House in putting \$2 or \$3 a ton on coal, whether he supported the right hon. member for Kingston or the hon. member for Lambton. He did not believe such a duty would be for the benefit either of the country or the coal interest. But, if a moderate duty would be of benefit to the country by allowing the people of the Upper Provinces to send their cereals down to the Lower Provinces he might vote for that which would be an encouragement to inter-provincial trade, and an interchange of products was what built up a people. If they had to go to Glasgow for their ships or to California for their flour, the country would come to nothing. If they followed out the Free-trader's theory, they would not produce anything, because other places could perhaps produce to more advantage—though he denied that they could get better ships built in Glasgow than in Canada. They were to sit down and do nothing but watch their neighbours, and say: "Better times will come; we are Free-traders; we do not believe in protecting anything; it will all come right." It would all come right with a vengeance, as in the year in which people left New Brunswick for the United States because they found the mines and manufactures and industries of that country built up and flourishing because they had been protected, because there were 40 millions of people to interchange trade with one another; and they had not to look outside for very much because they always had a home market. A man in Massachusetts made the article of bobbins, for example, and could sell it to some one in another State because there was no barrier to keep it out. But the Lower Provinces had a barrier to keep them out. They could not send to the United States or to Canada. They had no medium of trade, no freighters, no means of sending their goods out cheap because there was a want of intercourse between the various Provinces of the Dominion. Free trade might be a very good theory, but they wanted something more practical; they wanted a bread and butter policy. A "fly on the wheel" was not motive power enough for them. They could not drive a steam-engine by it. Was it not a crying shame that coal should exist in the Province of Nova Scotia, with iron, limestone and fire-clay in close proximity, and yet that they should have to import their iron from abroad, besides clay and everything else. He had a few statistics on paper. At the end of the fiscal year 1875, the imports exceeded the exports by \$45,000,000. Allowing something for new shipping, they might assume the balance to be \$35,000,000 of excess of imports. Free trade could not be a very great boon when under its working they had to import so much more than they sent away, and he thought it was the duty of the Government to advocate a policy that would build up our Canadian mills and manufactories, and give us a larger population, that would keep our young men in Canada and enhance the value of our farms by giving a larger population to consume the products of the farm, and larger local markets. Let them induce capitalists to invest in Canada by a reasonable policy of protection—not a Chinese wall. We had the natural facilities, and it was only reasonable that we should use them in making some portion of what Canada now imported. Why should we have a large balance against us every year when a proper policy would prevent it? England sought free trade because she monopolized the markets of the world, and her capacity was beyond her requirements. Now, the case was changed, and we saw one of her leading steel makers opening a manufacture in the United States in order to benefit by its protection. France, whose policy was one of extreme protection, recuperated rapidly after the late disastrous war. Could she have done so under a free-trade system? In 1875, Canada imported ten millions of dollars worth of cotton manufactures; what a population it would have required to produce this large amount, and what a vast amount of farm produce the operators and their families would have consumed in our own country. There was another difficulty in regard to our finances and our position. It was in the Budget statement, showing an alarming falling off in trade and increase in expenditure. He did not see how any one could go to England to borrow money with that Budget staring him in the face. The speech of the Finance Minister, emanating from such an important personage, permeated the country, and did an incalculable amount of harm. In 1875, the people of the Dominion imported 189,945 tons of iron, while the coal and the iron were here on the spot, but they could not get it mined because they had no market. The Americans smuggled across the border, and the Canadians could not compete, because the United States had been passing through years of disaster. The merchants could not pay their indebtedness at home, and so they did not care, provided they could realize on their stock. If only this \$10,300,000 worth of iron had been made in the country, it would have meant \$1,000,000 worth of labour and 150,000 tons of coal, and to have placed the iron in position, and to produce hollow-ware and machinery, &c., they would have doubled or trebled the quantity of coal produced; then Nova Scotia would not have been asking for protection, because she would have had a home market for her coal. He thought it was a fallacy, talking about sending coal to Manitoba or very far west, they might as well talk about sending it to British Columbia. They wanted to consume it as best they could; could they send it to Canada? No. What were they to do with it? Burn it. What for? To make iron. The duty should be placed on iron instead of coal, so that the labour and capital would be used to make the iron and mine the coal, and so that the people in Upper Canada and elsewhere could send their flour and other produce in exchange. That was trade. They would have steamers and sailing ships built to carry on the trade. Then the product of coal and iron would go to other countries, perchance to the West Indies and South America. There was \$60,000,000 worth of goods exported from the United States to South America and the West Indies yearly. Why did they not go from us, or a part of them? It was not by subsidizing a steamer that they would open up that trade; it must be done by merchants who understood what was best for their interests, who were the pioneers of trade, and who, knowing what was best for them, could obtain the desired end. How did the Americans work up this West India trade? They started originally the trade from New Haven with a vessel of two or three hundred tons burthen, they picked up lard, flour, rocking chairs, fish, horses, hay, &c., in fact an assorted cargo of Yankee notions, so they loaded their vessel and ran down to the tropics and sold their goods. Then they loaded with molasses, sugar, and rum, because the ship had to come back. If, by any chance, she lost nine or ten thousand dollars in her outward cargo, coming home she made fifteen thousand dollars, or a profit of five or six thousand dollars. Instead of confining their business to one island, they went to a number of others, Jamaica, Santa Cruz and so on, and added more vessels to their fleet until there was no one that could compete against them, and thus became rich and held the trade to-day. It was not by sending an emissary that this could be accomplished. He remembered when the Canadian Government sent Commissioners in 1866 to the West Indies, they offered many inducements, but the merchants said: "We are willing to trade with you if you can compete." Thus they brought in the free-trade doctrine of buying from the cheapest place. Hon. gentlemen said that protection had killed the ship-building industries in the United States, but it was the war, not protection. All they had to do was to use such materials as the country afforded them, and let the Government allow a drawback for that portion of the ship for which they were indebted to their neighbours. It came back to the question of a policy which would enable them to trade with their neighbours. A few points as to the West India trade. He wanted to show how the want of a fostering care from the State might divert the channels of trade and injure the mercantile community. In 1875, the imports of sugars into Canada were over 54,400 tons, in round numbers; whilst in 1876 they amounted to 50,700. Of that entered for consumption in 1875, about 22,200 tons came from Great Britain, 19,400 tons from the West Indies, and 13,000 tons from the United States. In 1876, it was quite reversed, inasmuch as 23,800 tons came from Great Britain, 19,300 tons from the United States, and 7,600 tons from the West Indies. Thus the West India direct trade fell off by some 14,600 tons, and Great Britain sent us 10,800 tons more, and the trade from the United States remained about stationary. In other words, the trade was diverted from the West Indies to Great Britain. Scotch sugar was made in Liverpool and Scotland, and contained 50, 60 and 65 per cent. of saccharine matter. It was a very pretty sugar to look at. The West India sugar was nearly doubly as sweet, but vessels which went to the West Indies from St. John, New Brunswick, with fish or lumber, had nothing to bring back, because we had no market for the sugars made there. They might continue their voyage to Boston or Baltimore with a load of sweets for the fineries, and then return in ballast to the Lower Provinces for another outward cargo to the West Indies. He proposed now to show that it was the mode in which the duty was levied which had caused the diversion of our sugar trade from the West Indies to Scotland and England. The ad valorem duty acted thus: If he wished to order a cargo of sugar at Porto Rico, he would have to pay duty on a value at port of shipment of 5¼c. to 5½c. per pound, viz., 1c. per pound, and 25 per cent. ad valorem; then he had to pay for the export duty, the labour, the cartage, the cooperage, and every possible expense that could be placed on the invoice, except the commission. That might amount to a duty of 2¼c. to 2½c. a pound, whilst the importer from the United States would only perhaps have to pay duty on a valuation of 5c. to 5¼c., in consequence of having purchased his supply in a market where values were depreciated from internal or other causes. Thus it became so uncertain what the direct importer would have to compete with in regard to duties to be paid that he avoided the direct West Indies, which had so often placed him at a disadvantage with his neighbours. The result was that people would not import direct; they got their sugar from the United States or Great Britain, in consequence of the ad valorem duty. This discouraged the great direct import trade. As an illustration of the sugar duties, the following figures drawn from the past year's business clearly demonstrated how unfairly the ad valorem duty bore on the West India trade:—

Moreover, the present system discouraged direct trade with the West Indies. If the Government placed a duty on the lower grades of sugar, and placed white at a higher rate of duty, there would be some chance for this interest to revive. The tariff might be so arranged that the ordinary grades would pay sufficient duty to meet the demands of the revenue. But it would also have the effect of bringing the sugar straight to this country, instead of its going first to the United States or Great Britain to be refined. There was also another point. A great leakage occurred in the cargo during the voyage from the West Indies—from five to eight per cent., according to the place at which it was shipped. The duty had to be paid not only on the sugar itself but on that leakage, which was scarcely a fair arrangement. The hon. member for Brant referred in his speech the other night to the duty put on pig iron by the Government. But what was found on the schedule? When the hon. the Minister of Finance proposed to free shipping materials, anchors were left out, but pig iron was put in their place. He came now to the question whether the proposed tariff would produce any more than, or as much revenue as, the present. He believed that it would produce less revenue. One effect would be that cigars would not be so largely made in Canada, because the tariff acted against the manufacturer. He believed that, when the Government met the House again, the deficit would be greater than the past year. The importations were nothing like what they used to be. Our steamers were returning only half loaded, and there was no prospect of early improvement. It was claimed that the farmers would suffer under a protective tariff. Now, if there was a re-adjustment of the tariff, if all branches of industry were enabled to produce and sell to the people that which they required the farmers must be benefitted to a certain extent. Although they might be taxed a little more, yet they would be enabled to take that which the manufacturers produced in exchange for what they grew, and the whole country would be benefitted. At present the whole Dominion was paralysed. Every one was at his wits' end, and there was no hope of improvement. Not one word of encouragement had dropped from the Government. They might go to their constituents and declare that the occupants of the Treasury benches were the right men to guide the destinies of the nation. But what would the people of his Province say? The first question would be, "What about the Intercolonial Railway?" Talk about economy and retrenchment. All along the line there was evidence of the reverse of those principles. They found here and there one station-master and two others to teach him his duty. There was an immense expenditure all round; fine houses had been put up and the locomotives were running into each other and smashing up. He would like to be able to return to his constituents and state that the policy of the Government was a wise one, but he could not do it. Their policy was directly opposed to the interests of the country. Reference had been made by an hon. member to the testimony taken before the Fraser, Reynolds & Co. Committee two years ago. He felt bound to say that the action of the majority of that Committee reflected no credit upon themselves; it spoke for itself. Fair play as English speaking people would seem to dictate that we should do as we would be done by. For any wrong committed, the guilty parties should have been made to suffer the due penalty, but it was not right to endeavour, as the majority of the Committee had done, to make the case worse than it really was. He thought the House would say that in his remarks he had made no implication and cast no slurs on hon. members. If he had desired to adopt such a course he had affidavits in his pocket which he might have read in reply to the hon. member who had charged the Opposition with every kind of rascality and villany possible. It was not right that because they were in the minority that such reckless imputations as had formed the staple of many speeches of hon. members on the Government benches should be made. He hoped that hon. members would refrain in future from using such harsh terms, which only created bad feelings on both sides of the House, and led to scenes of confusion and disorder that should be deprecated and avoided. In view of all the points of the case, he should feel constrained to cast his vote on the amendment under discussion with the Opposition.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said he regretted to see so much of the time of this House taken up with sugar discussions; it was making a shop of Parliament; and, if absolute free trade and direct taxation existed, we would hear no more of such subjects here. He objected to the mercantile system as too cramped for the development of the productive interests of the country. The mercantile system was vicious, it made credit the rule and cash the exception; and should be overcome by a Dominion currency and direct taxation. The last loan made by the Finance Minister in England was made on scientific and proper principles, and was a successful loan; but, if we had an expansive national system of currency, emanating from the Government in this country, we should not need to borrow money at all abroad. In some respects the two parties in this House were much alike in their manner of dealing with the business of the country. However, he belonged to the Ministerial side, and was going to continue loyal to the Reform Party as the best. The great prairie basin of the North-West would be the centre of power and population. If Vancouver Island was made a free port, if the Government constructed the railway over the mountains at a cost of thirty-five millions, then our Pacific city would have a very large population within ten or twenty years, for, the Rocky Mountain section constructed from the prairies to the Pacific, private enterprise would soon cover the prairies from Manitoba to the foot of the mountains with several lines of railway, on the basis of land grants, without calling upon the Government for any money, and in twenty years there would be five millions of a population on those magnificent prairies. Canada, to hold her position alongside of the United States, must out-Herod Herod in activity, in progress and liberality, and boldness in legislation. He (Mr. Thomson) did not think the speeches of members ever reached the public through the press, the reporting was too limited. He thought the Ministers were too exclusive with their supporters, which took away that interest in Parliament which, otherwise, private members would enjoy. As to protection, as advocated by the Opposition, he considered it already as discounted by the people and dead; he, therefore, intended to continue his support to the Government and to free trade.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said, as hon. members generally had taken part in the discussion, he thought he might be excused for expressing his opinion. The impression seemed to be—at least, it was outside the House—that they were discussing a question with respect to the relative merits of free trade and protection. Now, he had come to the conclusion that it was hardly such. As he understood the position taken by the hon. the Minister of Finance, we were, for a time, and for a time only, in temporary difficulties, and to over-tide and pass over that and to increase our revenue the hon. the Minister proposed the temporary remedy of levying increased duties upon the articles which had been mentioned in his Budget speech. The Opposition said this could be done much better in a different manner. The Opposition did not particularize. It was the function of the hon. the Finance Minister, when he proposed to arrange the tariff, to give all the details as to how he proposed to raise the additional funds. The Opposition had nothing to do beyond laying down general principles, and they had done that. We were in a state of commercial depression; not only every industry, but every man felt it more or less. The Government said they were not able by legislation in any way to alleviate it. The Opposition on their side, without going into matters of detail, thought that it was possible to so rearrange and re-adjust the tariff as would both meet the requirements of revenue and at the same time tend to alleviate in some degree the general depression. The Opposition had not the information that would enable them to re-adjust the tariff, nor could they come down with the items or details of a fiscal policy; but they affirmed certain principles which he hoped they would go to the country upon; and, if they changed sides and occupied the Treasury benches, he believed they would carry out the principles which they had advocated while in Opposition, whether condemned for doing so or not. It had been stated that this policy was not agreed to in the Province of Quebec, but his belief was that the assumption was incorrect. He had no hesitation in saying that the Province of Quebec was in favour of the policy of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, and not of the policy of the Government of the day. Coming to the Ottawa district and lumbering community, although he was not actually connected or interested in the trade itself, he thought he should say a few words with respect to the peculiarities of that particular business. The proposition which he ventured to submit to the House and the country, although it might not prove that protection would be a good thing for that particular interest of the Dominion, would show what protection had done with respect to the United States. No one would dispute that our neighbours across the lines understood their business, and that during the last ten or fifteen years, in face of a great war and difficulties that would tend to destroy a nation, the United States had become prosperous, and the indications were that within ten or twenty years no nation of the civilized world had so far proceeded in the march of general prosperity. That had been accomplished under a system of protection. He asked free-trade advocates opposite if they could show a historical instance of a people, who formed themselves into a nation and became commercially prosperous, commencing on free-trade principles. He appealed to the collective wisdom of the country whether the four millions of people in Canada—and he was proud of being a Canadian, and thought everything that was possible to be done by man could be done by Canadians—with all their mental and physical superiority could commence where all the nations of the world had left off.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland): Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT said that was an utter impossibility. The immediate vicinity of the city of Ottawa was one of the centres of the lumber trade, including both square and sawn lumber, in which a large capital was invested. The manufacturers paid $2 per thousand feet upon short lumber entering the United States. The result of that imposition was that four of our largest establishments—Messrs. Ritson, J. R. Cook, Eddy and McLaren—had transferred their business from Ottawa to Whitehall and Burlington, taking the Canadian timber to those points and there manufacturing it. Following the general principle of the United States, they manufactured the lumber and paid a duty of $2 per thousand feet, and then they were entitled to a drawback of $2 per thousand feet on sending our lumber back to Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was the champion exponent of free-trade doctrines, was engaged in the lumber trade on the shores of Lake Erie; he was, however, not a manufacturer, but an exporter of the raw material to American manufacturers on the other side of the Lakes, and therefore he, of course, wanted to run off as much of our raw material as possible. Some time ago there was a duty imposed by Canada of $2 on each log exported. The hon. member for North Norfolk being a somewhat influential supporter of, at that time, an unreasonably strong Government, coolly proposed, in order to float his oak logs and staves from Norfolk to the other side of the river, to remove the duty and thus punish Canadian manufacturers. The consequence of the adoption of such a proposal would have been that, instead of the logs being sawn at Ottawa, the logs would have been taken to the United States and there manufactured. The matter was, however, compromised. That hon. member afterwards became a Free-trader, because he wanted to bring American lumber to Quebec to compete with that manufactured in Canada. The Dominion was only in its infancy in regard to manufactures. If by adopting the free-trade policy of the Government we would only encourage not exotics, but such articles as could be legitimately produced by the country, was there any article which was native to the soil or in which we had a better chance of competing with the world more than in manufactured lumber? There was no article which could be manufactured in Canada better than lumber, yet the manufacture was in the infancy. We did not manufacture lumber, though everything made of wood should be manufactured in the Ottawa Valley, and the people should not only obtain the value of the raw material, but also the profits from its manufacture. He believed the present policy of the Government was entirely erroneous. The hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) had taken exception to the action of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) with regard to the reduction of the duty on petroleum. They of the Opposition declared that, while they were Protectionists they did not require over-protection. That was a great mistake, and the Government was false to its political principles when they allowed what was not protection or free trade but simply a monopoly.

striking of the Committee after the first reading for the present, and a special rule might be made at the commencement of the next Session.

Mr. HOLTON said that it was disclosed in the previous discussion that a motion had to be made to bring the Bill reported back to the Orders. He thought it would be more convenient to follow the ordinary practice in regard to Private Bills.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought it would be well to make a special rule, as suggested by the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. PALMER said he was in favour of adhering to the regular practice. It was the ordinary rule that the principle of a Bill was affirmed upon the second reading.

Mr. HOLTON said Private Bills were not affirmed until they came back from Committee.

Mr. PALMER said, if that was the case, it made little difference whether the Bills went after the first or second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER said, according to May, the second reading affirmed the principle conditionally.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it would be inconvenient to adopt a different practice every day. It was decided on Monday that the reference should be after the first reading, and it would be better to adhere to that practice now.

Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) could not get his Bill back on the Orders without giving two days' notice, which might take three weeks to reach. So convinced was he as to the correctness of the procedure he had recommended, that he would be much inclined to insist on that notice being given, in order to bring the Bill back on the Orders.

Mr. CAMERON said this was purely a question of practice, which ought to be settled uniformly. He would move that the Bill be read the second time on Monday.

Motion agreed to on the same division.

Mr. CAMERON moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought the understanding was that the House should adhere to the rule relating to Private Bills, and that the reference should be after the second reading.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his opinion was that the wish of the House was that such Bills should be referred after the first reading.

Mr. HOLTON said the matter was up for discussion the other day. It was found that the practice of referring after the first reading arose when the rules required the reference of all Private Bills after the first reading. He thought those Bills were especially of the nature of Private Bills and ought to follow the ordinary course.

Mr. BLAKE said the impression of the House seemed to be, that the House should not depart from the customary practice. His own opinion was that Divorce Bills were of an exceptional nature, and ought to be referred to Select Committees. It might be as well to continue the

NARROWS.

EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he rose to a question of privilege. He had had occasion to complain of an injustice done to one of his constituents by the Government, who had removed him from the office of postmaster for political reasons. He had reason to believe that this gentleman had told him the truth, as he was a very respectable person; but, to his own great surprise, up jumped the Postmaster-General and stated that no such man had ever been in office under the Government. Mr. Speaker then requested him to withdraw his motion, and he had been laughed at by the House. He had been non plussed, but he did not imagine for a moment that a man holding such a high position as the Postmaster-General would come before the House and before the country and make such a bold statement unless supported therein by the facts. After submitting to this painful operation, he had gone to the Post Office Department, and he had not been there five minutes when he discovered, to his surprise, that such an officer had been appointed, and that such a post-office was in existence. He obtained the papers and waited for some time in the expectation that the Postmaster-General would not think it beneath his dignity to make the amende honorable, and say he had been mistaken, relieving himself of the responsibility and odium which had been thrown upon him. In the papers he found a petition from the inhabitants of the south side of Little Narrows, asking for the establishment of a way officer among them, and recommending this very postmaster for the appointment. There was also a letter from a then member of the Government, Hon. Wm. Ross, which he would read. It was as follows:—

“OTTAWA, 20th April, 1874.

“DEAR SIR,—I enclose petition for Way Office, South Side, Little Crossing, Victoria county—Malcolm Matheson to be Way Office Keeper. This office was promised by me, and I hope will be granted; line is already established, and postman passes tri-weekly on the road where office is required.

“Yours truly,

“The Honourable

“MEMORANDUM.—Some time ago I recommended Malcolm Matheson to be Way-office keeper, South Side, Little Narrows, Victoria, Cape Breton, and afterwards desired it to be laid over for further information. Since then I am satisfied that the office is wanted, and that therefore I would recommend the appointment to be made, to be called Matheson's Way Office, if none other by that name.

(Signed) “W. Ross.”

There was also a letter from Mr. Woodgate, Post Office Inspector at Halifax, dated in July, as follows:—

“HALIFAX, 27th July, 1874.

“SIR,—I beg to enclose a communication from the Hon. W. Ross, Minister of Militia, asking that the Way Office at South Side, Little Narrows, established at Malcolm Matheson's under your authority, No. 725, of the 25th of April last, may be transferred to John Matheson, the appointment of the former person having been made by mistake. I have informed Mr. Ross that the matter would be submitted to your decision.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“Your obedient servant,

(Signed) “A. WOODGATE.

“The Postmaster-General,
“Ottawa.”

On this letter was entered the following memorandum:—

(“No. 670.)

“Instruct Inspector to place this Way Office in charge of John Matheson, and explain to Mr. Malcolm Matheson that his name was inserted in the appointment by mistake, and that the P. M. G. hopes that the error has not caused him inconvenience.

“31st July.”

Another letter had been written by Mr. Ross, when down to buy cattle and find out who had voted for and against him. He was informed that a neighbour had told Mr. Ross that this man, Malcolm Matheson, had voted against him. Thereupon, Mr. Ross wrote the following letter:—

“NORTH SYDNEY, July 17, 1874.

“A. Woodgate, Esq.

“DEAR SIR,—Some mistake was made by me in appointing Malcolm Matheson, way-office keeper, Little Narrows. I thought that there was two places to be provided for, but now I find that John Matheson and Malcolm are for the same place. Please have Malcolm's appointment cancelled, and John Matheson's confirmed. Telegraph Elmsley not to make any mails up for Malcolm Matheson. When I go to Ottawa, I will then see what will be done to abolish Malcolm's appointment; unless you can at once deal with the case there. I heard at Baddeck that there was to be some new arrangement between there and New Campbellton, giving them two mails each week direct. I heard nothing of this, or any change up to the time of my leaving. If any changes are in process, please inform me what they are; but, in the meantime, confirm John Matheson's appointment.

"Yours truly,

(Signed) "W. Ross."

Mr. MACKENZIE said he rose to a question of order. It was utterly impossible to consider this a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman was taking up the whole time of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had presumed that the hon. gentleman wished to make a brief personal explanation. This was not, however, a question of privilege.

Mr. BOWELL said that the hon. gentleman had accomplished the object he had in view. The hon. gentleman had moved for papers which the Postmaster-General said were not in existence.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: No, no.

Mr. BOWELL said he begged hon. gentlemen's pardon. The hon. gentleman had gone to the Department and obtained the papers, which he had read to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has not correctly stated the case. The Postmaster-General did not say that there was no correspondence.

Mr. BOWELL said he had not said so; but the hon. gentleman stated he had asked for papers which the Postmaster-General had said were not in existence.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he had stated that the Postmaster-General said that there were no such papers.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he dared say the pleasure of proving that the Postmaster-General had risen in his place deliberately and stated a falsehood was delightful to hon. gentlemen opposite. He had informed the hon. gentlemen in the most courteous terms, that there was no such postmaster; and he had politely asked the hon. gentleman to come to his office next day in order that the hon. gentleman's misapprehension might be removed. The hon. gentleman came to the Department and got his information, and he had brought down the necessary papers. The hon. gentleman now charged him with falsehood, but he would inform the House that, when the hon. gentleman brought the matter fairly before the House, he was prepared to vindicate the case on its merits. He had told the hon. gentleman the exact truth, and he had treated the hon. gentleman as he was bound to treat every member of Parliament—courteously; but he was not bound to continue that treatment to the hon. gentleman, whether he knew how to reciprocate it or not.

Mr. MITCHELL said he only wanted to say one word on the subject.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman was out of order. It was never permitted to other hon. gentlemen to interpose on such a subject.

Mr. MITCHELL said that perhaps the Speaker was a little out of order himself in prejudging what he was about to utter. He had only wished to say that his old friend from Victoria, an honest and independent representative, as everybody knew, was difficult of hearing, and that the hon. gentleman often misunderstood what was stated in the House. The hon. gentleman consequently could not place himself as clearly before the House as his real talent and ability, under other circumstances, would permit. He would tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they woke up the wrong passenger when they attempted to compel him to refrain from speaking.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. member from Northumberland was entirely mistaken. It was highly improper for that hon. gentleman to interpose under such circumstances. As to the hon. gentleman from Victoria, he had extended to him (Mr. Campbell) the utmost possible latitude in consequence of the hon. gentleman's infirmity.

THE DUTY ON MALT.

QUESTION.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked when instructions had been issued from the Inland Revenue Department, placing the additional duty on malt. He had put this question a week or two ago.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the duty went into effect the very day when the resolutions were proposed to the House.

Mr. ROCHESTER said the reason he had enquired was that he knew instructions were sent from the Department dating the duty back to the 15th of February, instead of the 20th.

Mr. LAFLAMME said a letter had been received from the hon. gentleman with respect to some matter of this description.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had written no such letter to the Department.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that the hon. gentleman's name was attached to such a letter received by the Department.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cartwright for the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Orton in amendment to the said proposed amendment, read.

Mr. BROUSE said the county he represented being deeply interested in this question, he felt it his duty to make a few remarks. When the question of protection was before the House last Session he felt it his duty to vote for the motion of the hon. member for West Montreal, where he declared it to be the duty of the Government to support the manufacturing interests of the country. During the present debate, he had listened very attentively to see if he could ascertain any reason for supporting the motion now made. When the substantive motion of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), was brought before the House, he felt it his duty to record his vote in favour of the principle of protection to our infant manufactures, under the circumstances in which they were placed. He would here premise by saying that in the abstract he favoured the principle of free trade. He desired to see commercial relations carried on between Canada and the United States properly and equally, but he was unprepared to say that he was a Free-trader when the American Government were not willing to extend like fair play to us. Therefore, he was strongly of the impression that the Government should so readjust the tariff as that the industries of this country should be protected. He might be asked to name the articles on which he would give increased duties. The two articles he would name especially would be those manufactured from iron and wood. It would be readily admitted that, if this country was to rise to its just position, it would have to be unwilling to bow down to its neighbours on every occasion. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had said that, admitting that protection would bring a large new population into this country, say 150,000, yet that would be counterbalanced by the cost of protection to Canada amounting to $19,000,000. But the hon. gentleman did not follow out his argument to its legitimate conclusion, for, if, according to the estimate generally laid down, each immigrant was worth on the average $1,000 to the country, then the 150,000 would be worth, on the whole, $150,000,000. A strong argument was made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) when he said that four or five lumber dealers in this city sent their lumber to the United States to have it dressed. Now, if a sufficient duty was placed on dressed lumber coming from the United States, the money spent on the dressing would be spent in this country. He was prepared to support any Government—he did not care what Government it was—which would, under existing circumstances, foster and nourish the manufactures of the country. But he was not prepared to go as far as the motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), in that it must be attached to the question proposed by the hon.

member for Hamilton. In his opinion the two questions were different, and while he was prepared to support protection to manufactures, he did not think the question of protection to farmers should be brought forward in the House. Were it not for the motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington and the subsequent remarks, he would have remained silent in the debate. He represented a county which was manufacturing to a certain extent, and which was largely interested in agriculture. The county was peculiarly situated along the St. Lawrence, and was much interested in the question of tariff between Canada and the United States. He had ascertained certain facts in order to see if farmers required protection. It had been particularly represented that a duty should be placed on American corn. From a synopsis of returns on the subject, which he had prepared, it appeared that in 1875 we imported 12,203,447 bushels of grain, and exported 22,218,916 bushels; there being an excess of exportation over importation of 10,000,000 bushels. In 1876 we imported 12,837,648 bushels, and exported 29,006,361, leaving over 16,168,717 bushels of excess of exportation over importation. Much had been said about the advisability of placing a duty on wheat. He could not understand how wheat imported could affect the market in this country, since, practically, the Canadian market for wheat was in England, the same as was the United States market. We exported, last year, 3,000,234 bushels of wheat more than we consumed, and all the surplus went to England; and thus, any wheat brought into the country did not compete with the local market. The hon. member for Centre Wellington alluded principally to coarse grain. In 1875 we imported into Canada 294,623 bushels of coarse grain, other than of wheat or corn. We exported that same year, 11,386,747 bushels. In 1876 we imported 714,938 bushels of coarse grain, and we exported 15,287,000 bushels. The small amount of coarse grain was, probably, sent into the smaller Provinces, such as British Columbia; and he could easily understand how British Columbia would ask for protection to their farmers. But he felt sure the Ontario and Quebec markets in coarse grain were not affected by importations from the United States. Stress had also been laid upon the necessity of imposing a duty on corn, and thus, by forcing distillers to use Canadian barley, to create a market for it. In 1875 we imported 3,679,746 bushels of corn, and we exported 2,080,090 bushels; and in 1876 we imported 3,635,528 bushels, and exported 2,047,040 bushels. Thus it would be seen that corn was the only grain of which there was an excess of importation over exportation. The argument was that if a duty of 10c., 15c., or 20c. a bushel was placed upon corn, Canadian distillers would use Canadian barley. He made bold to say that whiskey could not be made out of barley, but it could be made out of malt. He had letters from different distillers saying that the duty already on corn was extravagant, for on every bushel of corn used the distiller had to pay a total tax of $2.70. He had addressed a letter to Messrs. Gooderham and Worts, in which he asked: "If 10c., 15c. or 20c. is placed upon corn, would you or could you use barley?" and the reply was: "It cannot be done." He also had a letter from Mr. Weiser, a large distiller, who paid between $2,000 and $3,000 a day for duty, and he was of the same opinion as Gooderham and Worts. If that argument was correct, and if hon. gentlemen could show him that distillers such as Gooderham and Worts and Mr. Weiser were satisfied that that could be done, he would vote for the amendment. But it could not be done, and it was useless for hon. members to attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the farmers by striving to show them that they would benefit in that regard. As to the statement of the hon. member for Carleton, who had declared that whiskey could be made from barley, he was satisfied that such could not be done beyond a limited extent. No doubt, with his teetotal views, that hon. gentleman would think it was a good way to get rid of the consumption of whiskey in the country. He agreed with the hon. member, and would go as far as he would in that direction, but, when men were licensed to manufacture a certain article, Parliament should not turn round and tell them that they should not use a certain article in their trade when they would be crippled by the restriction. That would be a singular way to protect and foster the manufacturing interests of the country. The manufacture of starch was one of the interests in the county he represented, where there was the largest establishment of that class in the Dominion. He had been asked to support the motion submitted by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) and to declare that it was the duty of the Government to support the industries of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite would move a resolution which would support starch manufacturers in this country, but they would afterwards submit a motion setting forth that a heavy duty must be placed on an article which entered into the manufacture of that starch. They would say that a specific duty of two cents should be placed on the corn which came in free from the United States, and they would afterwards turn round and say that a duty of 10c., 15c. or 20c. must be levied on every bushel of corn which entered into the manufacture of starch. The manufactory at South Grenville would not exist one week if the proposed resolution were put in force. It was important that they should consider the agricultural products of Canada and the market for them especially in view of the statement as to the large amount of products imported from the United States. During 1876 there were imported 1,225 horses, of which British Columbia took 728 and Manitoba 110, leaving 387 for other Provinces — the large Province of Ontario receiving only 174 — while we exported 4,100. Of horned cattle, there were imported 4,580, British Columbia taking 1,187, Manitoba 3,025, leaving 368 for all the other Provinces, while we exported 39,000. Of sheep, there were imported 8,690, British Columbia taking 8,409, and Manitoba 268, leaving all the other Provinces 13 — of which Ontario received three animals, of the value of $7 — while we exported 242,438. Of eggs we imported 8,456 dozen, while the four villages along the St. Lawrence exported in 1874, 1,130,000 dozen, and the whole country last year exported 3,521,000 dozen. Those were important facts. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they referred to the products brought into the country, refrained from stating the exports. The Provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba no doubt imported largely of American produce, but the surplus products of the older Provinces found an outside market, for they produced far more than they consumed. In order to understand fully how far the question might affect the country they must consider individual cases. On a previous occasion, he had laid before the House the productions of the towns along the river St. Lawrence, from Brockville down to the Province line, a distance of 100 miles. He had obtained from the Hon. Clifford Stanley Sims, American Consul for the district of Prescott, a statement of the exports from that district during the years 1875 and 1876, the district comprising Prescott, Brockville, Cornwall and Morrisburgh. The statement was as follows :

He asked the Consul what quantity of those products returned to this country, to which he replied nothing that he knew of. It was true that Canada paid a large amount into the treasury of the United States for placing those goods in the American market; but there was no other market open to us, and the great question with the farmers at present was how they could open the American market for the produce of our soil? That brought him to notice the question asked as to how we lost the free market of the United States that we once possessed, and whether hon. gentlemen opposite, or this Government, were responsible for it. He charged the Tory Party as being directly responsible for the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States, under which our products freely entered that country. When the United States was struggling for existence during the civil war, there was not a Tory in Canada who did not sympathize largely with the people of the South, and hoped that the Union would be broken up.

Mr. BOWELL: The member for Montreal West was a member of the party then.

Mr. BROUSE said a writer in the New York Herald said:

"It is unnecessary to revert to the acts of the Canadian Government, which made the Reciprocity Treaty unpopular with the people of the United States, and induced its abrogation."

This was the best authority he could submit to the House, and it stated a fact, he did not care who endeavoured to refute it. The country had suffered largely because of the action of the Tory Party and their sympathy with the Southern rebellion. The writer in the New York Herald further said:

"It is sufficient that, on this side of the line, we are willing to extend the hand of brotherhood to our neighbours for all commercial purposes, and to give to the industries of both countries all the advantages which we believe Free Trade would insure."

There was a large body of people in the United States who were anxious to give Canada reciprocity and to engage in commercial relations with her, and it was the duty of the Dominion Government to make every exertion to open the markets of the United States to our farmers. We should not, snail-like, shut ourselves into our shell, thinking we could live there without the surrounding people. We raised a large surplus of the products of the soil, and naturally looked to the other side of the line for a market. He was glad to say that a market for some of our produce, especially for beef, was being opened up in the mother country, and he believed Proscott was the first to send a consignment. A dealer there exported 500 head of cattle, distilled, and made from $10,000 to $12,000 profit by the transaction. The same gentleman was now negotiating for the purchase of 1,000 head, and he hoped he would be as successful as he was the previous year. He had given one reason why we were compelled to pay so large an amount into the Treasury of the United States in the shape of export duties on our products entering that country, which reason would be sufficient to satisfy the majority of the people in this country; but there was still another reason. We possessed a key that would have unlocked the market of the United States—a lever that would have opened the door to our farming products—but he regretted to say that the right hon. member for Kingston, who went to Washington, gave away that power. He trusted that a better feeling might prevail between the two countries, and it was for that very reason that he favoured protection for our manufactures, especially on goods brought here which we ourselves could manufacture. But we could not produce the corn, and we must have it, and it would therefore be useless to injure ourselves by placing a large duty on it in order to injure our neighbours. He was willing to force the Americans, as far as was in our power, by placing a heavy duty upon their products imported here and protect our manufactures, for he believed we could not obtain free trade between the two countries if we became supine and allowed the Americans to bring manufactures into this country, while our people did not meet them on the same terms. He was, therefore, prepared to take that position in regard to manufactures, and, on the other hand, he was prepared to assist in every possible way to open the markets of the United States to our agricultural products. Thus, he would vote against the Government on the first question, and with them on the next. He was surprised last night to hear the reason given for his vote by the hon. member for King's, namely, that he would vote for protection because he had no confidence in the Government. When an hon. member of the Opposition rose in his place and gave that as his reasons for voting against the Government, he was not prepared to adopt it; and, while he would oppose the Government on the question of protection to manufactures, he did not consider that the two questions, manufacturing and agricultural interests, went side by side.

Mr. McCALLUM said he understood from the hon. member for South Grenville that he was in favour of protection to manufactures and not to agricultural interests, but Canadian farmers would not sanction such a policy. The hon. member had declared that we must not impose a duty on imported corn, that it was required for the manufacture of whiskey. If the hon. gentleman were an agriculturist, he would have known there were thousands of acres of land suitable for the growth of rye from which whiskey could be produced. Moreover, rye, owing to corn coming in free of duty, had never realized its proper value. The hon. member for South Grenville had stated that the right hon. member for Kingston was the cause of Canada losing reciprocity with the United States, and also that it was due to the sympathy of a portion of the people with the South during the American civil war. The large majority of the people of the Dominion sympathised with the Northern States at the beginning of the war; but, when they insulted the British flag, and took Messrs. Mason and Slidell from the Trent, there was a change in the feeling of this country, and it was somewhat strange that the hon. member for South Grenville was so cold as not to have changed his feelings. We found the Northern States more than sympathy, viz: the bone and muscle of our young men to fight their wars. As the representative of an agricultural constituency, and as an agriculturist, he (Mr. McCallum) affirmed that the interests of this country in regard to agricultural products had been injured by the existing arrangement between the two countries. Besides, it was offering a premium to our farmers to leave Canada and settle in the United States. Everyone would concur in the desire expressed by the hon. member for South Grenville that the population of the country should be increased. As the result of the existing arrangement, he, as the representative of a county close to the frontier, was able to state that if a farmer left the Dominion and went to the United States he had access to two markets for the productions of his labour—the American and the Canadian markets. What the Canadian farmers complained of was that, in the case of a short crop in the United States and a large one in the Dominion, when we sent our products over the line a duty of 20c. or 25c. on the dollar was imposed on them. The House would agree with him—at any rate the agricultural members would—that if the farmer had a short crop he wanted a fair price to enable him to pay his hired help, his municipal taxation, his shoemaker, blacksmith, tailor, etc. But what was the fact? The very moment there was a large crop in the United States, the Americans swamped the Canadian markets with their grain. Men were leaving Canada for the United States in order that they might avail themselves of two markets. Under the present tariff we were losing a large number of farmers, and also young men who went across the border to engage in the various industries of that country. He thought he was speaking the sentiments of the agricultural population when he said they were in favour of more protection to the manufacturing and mining interests, and at the same time desired protection themselves against the unfair competition of our neighbours. The hon. the Minister of the Interior said in his recent speech:

“The Finance Minister set down the doctrine that the more we imported the better we were off. That might be true if what we imported were paid for.”

The pith of the hon. gentleman's argument was all in the “if.” There was an old saying that “if ‘ifs’ and ‘ands’ were pots and pans, what would tinkers do?” He had taken the trouble of collecting statistics which, in his opinion, would show that the excess of imports over exports were not paid for; and that the trade of this country was not in an encouraging condition, and had not been for some time. In 1851 the balance of trade against us was $7,470,070; in 1852 it was $5,979,856. He was speaking now of the two Provinces of Canada, and not of the Lower Provinces. In 1853 the balance against us was $9,180,136; 1854, $17,510,135; 1855, $7,897,708; 1856, $11,537,370; 1857, $12,423,974; 1858, $5,605,918; 1859, $8,788,180.

Mr. BROUSE.

The only year in which he found there was not a large balance against us, was in 1860, when there was $190,271 in our favour. But he would go a little further. In 1861 the balance against us was $6,435,638; in 1862 it was $15,004,508; 1863, $4,132,970; 1864, and part of 1865, $15,685,954; 1866, $3,520,028; 1867, $13,974,763; 1868, $15,951,756; 1869, $9,940,484; 1870, $1,230,839; 1871, $21,929,343; 1872, $28,791,619; 1873, $47,221,360; 1874, $39,861,654; 1875, $41,728,681; 1876, $13,806,783. How were we paying those balances? The hon. the Minister of the Interior said they were made up by some kind of speculation; that what we exported came back to us in increased profits. This balance, he admitted, might be reduced by whatever profits our vessels made over and above their expenses, and that was all we had to pay the balance with; and he would venture to say that even the Minister of Interior would acknowledge that it was nothing like sufficient to pay this enormous balance against us, which, he considered, the country was mortgaged for. Was it not, therefore, the duty of the Government to foster and encourage the manufacturing, agricultural and mining interests in order that we might endeavour to keep our expenditure within the income, and keep our money in the country, instead of draining the gold of our country to pay these balances against us? Hon. members had tried to make out that protection had been injurious to the United States. He had taken some little pains to ascertain what were the real facts, and he had arrived at the conclusion that that country was not in the bad condition some hon. gentlemen supposed. The total balance of trade against Ontario and Quebec was $365,635,477. For 17 years previous to Confederation there was a balance against Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of $72,158,812, which made a total balance against the Dominion during the 25 years of $427,794,269. The population of the United States was 40,000,000, while Canada could only lay claim to 4,000,000. The balance against that country during the same period was $299,033,250, an average of $11,961,430 per annum; while the average balance against the Dominion with only four millions of people was $16,711,770. Yet, in spite of those figures, we were told that Canada would be injured if she copied the United States. If the balance of trade against that country had been the same in proportion to population as it was against us, it would have been ten times as great annually, viz, $167,117,700, or, in the 25 years, a total of $4,277,942,690. But during the last few years the balance had been steadily in favour of the United States. For the last ten years there had been an actual balance in their favour of $129,000,000, one effect of which had been to raise their currency almost to par. Moreover, the exports of the United States had increased from $136,941,912 in 1850 to $643,094,788 in 1875. Not only had the Americans prospered under a protective tariff, but they had been enabled in the face of a 17½ per cent. tariff to slaughter goods in our markets. Besides that, this extraordinary and energetic people could send their goods 3,000 miles across the ocean and compete successfully with the English in their own markets. Reference had been made to the Reciprocity Treaty. He thought that while that treaty was in existence the Americans had the better of us. From 1854 to 1863 the balance of trade in their favour was $39,847,199. But reciprocity was undoubtedly favourable to this country, as we sent more free goods into the United States than were sent into Canada. In 1876 he found that the balance against this country, and in favour of the United States, was $19,976,716. He asked the hon. member for Grenville a question in relation to this, but had received no reply. The hon. gentleman evaded the question, and it was to be inferred that he could not answer in such a way as to throw discredit on the protective system. About $24,730,371 from the United States came free into Canada, and into direct competition with the Canadian industries in our own markets; and the tariff which allowed such a state of things could, he was sure, not be called a beneficial one. The people were suffering now on this account, and some remedy ought to be speedily adopted. It was desirable that our population should increase—that we should bring immigrants to help to develop the resources of the country. He regretted that our population did not increase in the ratio which he should like to see. He did not wish to say anything disparaging to the hon. member for South Perth. The hon. gentleman should bring his influence—which was not small—to bear upon the Government to induce them to adopt a policy which would give employment to the immigrants the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to bring into the country. He was satisfied that, under the present circumstances, our immigration system only served as a feeder to increase the population of the United States to our own injury. He had statistics regarding the increase of the American population as far back as 1790, but he would only use them for the period between 1860 and 1870, when that country had gone through a great and disastrous war, which had cost 850,000 men their lives, 350,000 for the South, and 500,000 for the North. Despite this fact, between 1860 and 1870 the population of the United States had been increased 7,526,298, or twenty-four per cent., under the protective system. He wished to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this circumstance. The hon. gentleman should feel proud to copy the example of such a people. He had similar statistics with reference to Great Britain dating as far back as 1811, but he would confine himself in this particular to the period between 1861 and 1871. In the former year the population of Great Britain was 29,296,946, and in 1871 31,628,338, the increase having amounted to 2,358,391, about eight per cent. He knew it would be said this was no argument, as emigrants had left Great Britain and gone to all parts of the world, and, further, that this country had so received an influx of population. This was the case, but he was sorry to say that we had been unable to keep these immigrants in the country. We, on the other hand, had in 1861 a population of 3,250,000, and in 1871, a population of 3,845,929, the increase being 595,929, or eighteen per cent. The number of immigrants from the United Kingdom and other countries which had come to the Dominion during this period was 190,411. Subtracting this from the increase mentioned 405,518 were left, showing an increase during ten years of less than 12½ per cent., or less than 1¼ per cent a year. But anybody must know that our natural increase was much greater than that, only they left our country and went to the United States. These facts startled him. What was the cause of it? It was because we had no employment to offer to our own people, and artisans and others were obliged to seek for it in the United States. It was desirable to secure immigrants, but it was also desirable to furnish them with employment and keep them. These were some of the questions which should engage the attention of the Government; they should attempt to reduce the balance of trade existing against us, and to diminish the public expenditure. If any one, whether a farmer or engaged in any other occupation, lived beyond his income, the result was bankruptcy. And so it was with this country. We were rapidly, he was sorry to say, getting deeper into the state of bankruptcy. The Minister of the Interior had stated the other night that only three sheep were imported into Canada in 1876, but this was incorrect. The figures for importations in the returns were—for cattle during 1876, 6,367 in number and $164,491 in value; for sheep, 11,856 in number and $23,240 in value, and for swine, 10,419 in number and $152,497 in value. We had also imported green fruits to the value of $376,464. He was aware that duties of 10 per cent. were paid on these articles, but the United States charged us 20 per cent. for the same. The Minister of Finance appeared to have taken some trouble to fulfil the prophecy he (Mr. Cartwright) made in 1874. He thought he could tell the hon. gentleman how he could secure sufficient revenue without oppressing the people with taxation while he assisted our industries. We imported free goods to the value of $32,269,761; goods paying five per cent. duty to the value of over $4,133,000; and of goods paying 10 per cent to the value of $2,191,762. Now, if the free list were charged 10 per cent., the five per cent. duties were advanced to ten per cent. and the ten per cent. to fifteen per cent., the change would afford a revenue of $3,542,647. He was aware of the fact that advance in duties checked importations, but, if they were reduced one half, the country would still materially benefit from the change, while our interests would at the same time be protected.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): The free goods in question are used by the manufacturers.

Mr. McCALLUM replied that 24 million of the free goods came into direct competition with our own industries as they were produced in this country, and chiefly products of the soil. In 1874, the Minister of Finance had predicted a deficit, and the hon. gentleman had then set to work to bring it about. They had now got it, and of course the world knew that the hon. gentleman was a prophet. If he could only see the means by which this result was reached, he could prove to the people of this country that the hon. gentleman had been ably assisted in his undertaking. Departmental expenditure had been largely increased since the advent of these hon. gentlemen to power; a large sum of money had been lost on the steel rail transaction, the interest on which was charged to revenue; a very considerable sum had been wasted in connection with the Georgian Bay Branch Railway contract; and over $100,000 had been wasted with relation to the magnificent water stretches so often mentioned. The country would see that the Government had materially aided the hon. gentleman in making his prophecy of 1874 an accomplished fact.

Mr. SMITH (Peel) said the question before the House more especially related to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Centre Wellington in favour of protection for farmers. There were few hon. members who did not take a deep interest in this class of the community, and to them the farmers of Canada, and of Ontario particularly, owed a lasting debt of gratitude. It would, however, be noticed that only two or three members who were agriculturists had taken part in this discussion. He was prepared to grant that there was some reason for what had been said on this subject. The farmers of Canada were certainly placed at a disadvantage. When they took grain to market, the merchant fixed the price; if animals, the purchasers generally set the price; and if the article was farm produce, the buyer usually did the same thing. Again, if they employed the lawyer or the doctor, they too followed the almost universal example in this particular. The farmers were placed at a decided disadvantage, and perhaps it was not to be wondered at that some gentlemen took such a deep interest in those who did not take an interest in themselves. As other hon. members had spoken with reference to their particular Province, he would speak as to Ontario. From that Province there were fifty-nine members who supported the Administration, and would always vote against a motion of want of confidence. He found that about thirty members of the House were following agricultural pursuits as a profession. Of these, a little over a half were from the Province of Ontario, of whom from 13 to 15 supported the Administration. It was extraordinary, therefore, under the circumstances, that hon. gentlemen opposite pressed their motion. Farmers did not understand how it could benefit them to have everything taxed. On account of the duty on petroleum the price had gone up from 20c. a gallon to 25c., 30c., 35c. and 50c. a gallon. Farmers understood too well that no tax which could be levied upon grain would put one cent into their pockets. The farmers might not interfere much in the business of the country, but they understood their own business too well to sanction such a proposal. He desired to call attention to the question of retaliation. If the Americans had built a Chinese wall against us they had also done it against every other country. In 1860, before they had entered into perhaps the greatest civil war which had ever occurred, they only had the paltry debt, for them, of $6,000,000, but in four years it rose to $2,600,000,000, which they determined to liquidate. The first step was to impose a heavy inland revenue tax, and, of course, as they taxed their own productions they had also to tax those productions which were imported, otherwise their markets would be glutted with foreign manufactures. Canada was treated by the United States the same as any other country, but if we applied a special tariff to the United States that country would have the same right to apply a special tariff to us. If we made a general increase in the tariff, then we would have to increase the duty on articles coming from Great Britain, and that in spite of the fact that we exported our surplus to British ports. The farmers of Ontario neither wanted protection on one article or another, although, if it were necessary, in order to carry on the business of the country, to impose an increase of 20 or 25 per cent., they were willing to pay it; but they were not willing to pay it in order to benefit a few men who had made princely fortunes as manufacturers. The question of the canals came into the consideration of this subject. As was well known, our system of canals was the great highway from the West to the Atlantic. It was about 350 miles from Port Colborne to Montreal, in which distance there were 72 miles of canals, with 54 locks. But in order to reach New York from the West, there were 70 locks, in a distance of 350 miles, requiring about two weeks to traverse; while it only took three days to pass through the Canadian canals. The Government did not seem inclined to resign in accordance with the request of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), and he did not think there was any chance of their being voted out of office.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. CARON said the discussion upon the important subject before the House had extended over such a period of time, and the great principles which now divided the political parties of the country had been so ably discussed by leading men of both sides that he did not think it would be proper for him to speak at great length. Indeed, he should have hesitated in addressing the House at all had it not been for certain statements which fell from the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabasca (Mr. Laurier), which he could not consent to see go unchallenged and uncontradicted to the country. His hon. friend had intermixed his speech with anecdotes and sayings from great men, which greatly added to its attractiveness. He told of Talleyrand telling a young man that words were given to man for the purpose of disguising thoughts. He had no doubt that these famous sayings of the distinguished Frenchman must have flashed through the mind of the his hon. friend when he stood on the floor of this House to deliver his speech in opposition to protection. He must have remembered the eloquent speeches which he made on so many occasions before the people, on the hustings and when he sat in the Local House, in favour of that measure which he was now opposing, and well might he have feared that this celebrated saying might be interpreted as applying to himself. When the hon gentleman was in the Local House, he became the eloquent champion of protection. He followed the programme laid down by the National Party, to which the hon. member at that time belonged, and the last plank in whose platform, one to which they adhered long after the others were given up, was protection to native industries. That was well known in the Province of Quebec; it was well known at the public meetings which the hon. gentlemen addressed: it was well known that one of the great accusations members of that party levelled at the Government of the day was that they did not favour protection. But that party had to give up their protection plank just before it was swallowed up by the stronger, more energetic, more determined and experienced party, the Rouge party of Quebec, which, for a time, had made use of the National Party for the purpose, no doubt, of getting rid of their compromising antecedents and to place before the people, at the election of 1872, what they supposed to be the banner of the new party. If it became necessary to establish beyond a doubt what the party was with whom the hon. member for Arthabaska formerly acted, he would quote a few extracts from Le Bien Public, which was founded and supported by the Liberals of Quebec. On the 10th May, 1874, the prospectus of that paper was published, and he would take the liberty of reading the following portion of it.

This was from the prospectus of the newspaper which was going to unite the parties of Quebec, and whose teachings the hon. member for Arthabaska was one of the first to adopt. On the 23rd April, the editor or proprietor of Le Bien Public, writing from Ottawa under the title of editorial correspondence, said:

Mr. CARON.

“ Nous sommes dans la semaine des manufacturiers, ils arrivent de partout pour plaider la cause de la protection, avec des projets et des résolutions préparés avec soin. Ils sont décidés à frapper un grand coup car il se sentent supportés par l'opinion publique.

On the 25th April, he wrote:

“ Comité industriel.—L'enquête qui se poursuit en ce moment annonce une idée générale et complète de nos manufacturiers, des causes qui arrêtent leur développement et des remèdes qu'il s'agirait d'apporter à la situation. La plainte universelle provient de deux choses différentes: La différence énorme qui existe entre le tarif américain et celui du Canada, qui nous exclut pratiquement des Etats-Unis, tandis qu'il invite la concurrence américaine au milieu de nous. Ainsi la plupart des produits manufacturés sont frappés d'un droit de 35 par cent, à leur entrée aux Etats-Unis, tandis que ce droit n'est que de 15 par cent à leur entrée en Canada. En outre, pour maintenir les prix chez eux, les Américains nous envoient et vendent à sacrifice le surplus de leur production, ce qui fait à nos industriels une position de dépendance intolérable. 2o. Les manufacturiers anglais, ayant la main d'œuvre à plus bas prix et un marché plus étendu et produisant d'un autre côté un article inférieur sous bien des rapports, peuvent faire à notre industrie une concurrence sérieuse. Une taxe un peu plus élevée donnerait aux Canadiens le contrôle de leur marché, leur permettrait de fabriquer sur une plus grande échelle et de fournir l'article à plus bas prix que maintenant. Il y a bien quelques autres obstacles soumis, ceux-ci sont les principaux et ils pourront être guéris de la même manière en portant à 20 et 25 le droit de douane prélevé sur les marchandises à leur entrée dans le pays.”

Now when it came to the question of what amount of duty it was necessary to impose, he would, perhaps, not be ready to go as far as this paper, which was the exponent of the political views of the hon. member for Arthabaska. It seemed beyond a doubt that the great Free-traders of Quebec, who now sat upon the right of the Speaker, at the time when they found the existing newspapers were not adequate to the promulgation of their doctrines, or to elucidate their views, and determined to establish Le Bien Public, were all agreed that protection was for the best interests of the Dominion. At that time, as indeed he was to-day, the hon. member for Arthabaska was one of the promising members of his party, and occupied a seat in the Local House. It was then that he became the eloquent champion of protection, and not only accused the right hon. member for Kingston of being to blame for not raising the tariff, but, no doubt blinded by his zeal, he went so far as to blame the Local Government for not affording the local industries protection. The hon. gentleman must have been very zealous when his present leader, the hon. the President of the Council, stated in the Journal de Quebec that he ought not to be so violent.

“ M. Laurier, a cru devoir déclarée à deux ou trois reprises que les hommes de son origine étaient commercialement et industriellement inférieurs aux autres races. S'il a raison, ce n'est pas en le disant qu'il améliorera leur sort, mais en leur donnant l'exemple par des œuvres.”

The President of the Council or some one acting under the hon. gentleman's authority had written as above stated in the Journal de Quebec with regard to the position taken by the hon. member for Arthabaska on that occasion. This was in answer to the eloquent address of his hon. friend on the floor of the Local House demanding protection. The President of the Council told the hon. gentleman that, whether he was right or wrong, a mere statement of the case would not do, but the hon. gentleman should give an example, put his shoulder to the wheel, and tell them what he proposed as a protective policy. When his hon. friend from Arthabaska, the previous evening, had accused the Opposition with having no policy in this regard, he could not help calling to mind the forcible lesson given him on that occasion by the hon. the President of the Council, his present leader, who told his hon. friend that he had no policy, and that he should define what protection he proposed. His hon. friend, however, then occupied a proper position. It was not the duty of an Opposition to do the work of the Government and form their policy; but if the Government felt that they were unable to meet the exigencies of the situation, the Opposition would willingly cross the floor of the House and undertake the responsibility of framing a policy. The hon. member at the period referred to was not alone. Very many eminent members of the party to which the hon. gentleman belonged also advocated protection. And his hon. friend who had recently become Minister of Agriculture had at that time at a public meeting held in Quebec spoken in favour of protection. This meeting took place on the 28th of March, 1872, and the hon. gentleman then declared :

“ Our manufactures, our different industries, which could so easily be developed, did not meet with sufficient protection. Perhaps, in answer to this, may it be said, there is among the people a certain impulse towards progress, a growing spirit of enterprise is to be found among us. Yes, gentlemen, hunger and misery often will goad men to superhuman efforts.”

At that time it was not a question of protection alone, but to what extent this policy ought to be carried to establish on a permanent and firm basis our growing industries, to increase the spirit of enterprise which was being exhibited; and the hon. gentleman was dissatisfied with the Government of the day, as shown by these extracts from his speeches. These hon. gentlemen were also at the time assisted by their present leader, the President of the Council, who was a member of the Protectionist school. With regard to the meeting of the National Board of Trade at St. Louis, when the establishment of a Zollverein between Canada and the United States was discussed, the President of the Council declared, in an article in the Journal de Quebec dated 18th January, 1872, that such a system—which would provide for uniform laws with reference to Customs duties—would be most disastrous for this country; that it would be equivalent to annexation; that it would strike a fatal blow to our growing industries; and that it would place us in such a position that it would be impossible to compete with the Americans. If, with equal duties with the United States, which had grown powerful and rich from year to year under the protective system, this would be the case, how could we compete with this powerful, rich and prosperous nation when our tariff was lower than theirs, preventing us from entering into their market and making of our own, for them, a slaughter market? This was impossible. He had shown, he believed, that these hon. gentlemen who seemed to be so indignant to-day at any proposition for protection, were, when in Opposition, strong advocates of such a policy. He had been greatly astonished to hear the hon. member for Arthabaska express himself in such severe and bitter terms against the Province of Quebec, he one of her most gifted sons. This was not the first occasion on which the hon. gentleman had adopted such a course. The hon. gentleman had said that the credit of the Province was rotten, and that, owing to the building of the railways, which were indispensable to the requirements of the Province, it was bordering almost on bankruptcy. The hon. gentleman also paid the French Canadians the distinguished compliment of being inferior to other races, as far as commerce and manufactures were concerned.

Mr. LAURIER: That is not the case.

Mr. CARON said he was perfectly open to conviction. But, if his hon. friend had not said so, he should have contradicted the statement long ago. This language had not caused the hon. gentleman to be favourably considered in many parts of the Province.

Mr. LAURIER said that, in the speech in question, he had attacked the educational system of the Province of Quebec; and if he was still a member of the Local House he would do the same thing again.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER: Yes; I would.

Mr. CARON said he accepted the explanation of his hon. friend. He had obtained his information on the subject from one of the articles of the President of the Council, who published in his paper so slanderous a statement against the hon. gentleman. French Canadians, according to the hon. member for Arthabaska, might, perhaps, not be as eminent as many hon. gentlemen who sat on his side of the House; but, nevertheless, their representatives occupied a position which entitled them to respect, they being in possession of the confidence of the people who sent them to the House. His hon. friend, last Session, had declared that the Local Legislature of their native Province was degraded and tarnished. He was grieved to hear this expression. He was certain, at all events, that the hon. gentleman had not been treated by the Province in such a way as to warrant him in using such language. His hon. friend had expressed himself astonished at a phrase used by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), and he accused him of wanting in respect towards the Bench. The expression of his hon. friend from Bagot (jugerie) the night before might not have been classical, but his hon. friend had not been lacking in respect towards the Bench. More respect had never been shown by any party towards the Bench and those in authority than had been exhibited by the Conservative party. The hon. gentlemen opposite since they reached the Treasury Benches had become very particular in this regard, but he remembered a memorable occasion in the summer of 1873, when such respect had not been shown towards one much deserving of it. His hon. friend had stated that the Opposition desired to secure reciprocal duties without reciprocity; how was it possible for us to obtain reciprocity from the Americans, when the present tariff was so favourable to their interests, opening our markets to them without getting from them the benefit of reciprocity for our goods; his hon. friend said that the difference existing between our various interests would prevent the making, by the Opposition, of a satisfactory tariff; but in 1858, the Conservative party had adopted what was known as the protective tariff of Sir Alexander Galt. The Conservative party had then showed their readiness to deal with this question in a proper manner. Of course, he might not occupy a position similar to that of his hon. friend from Arthabaska, whose seat was gradually approaching the Treasury benches. He might not be able to speak as his hon. friend had assumed to do on behalf of the Province of Quebec; the distance which separated them might be great, but he was astounded to hear his hon. friend declare that the principles he (Mr. Laurier) advocated were those of the Province of Quebec. He would like to know whether the hon. gentleman had been absent from the Province of Quebec for a long time? One would fancy that he had not taken the trouble to ascertain the feeling of the people. When he said that that feeling was opposed to protection, was it in the commercial cities, in the Boards of Trades, in meetings where people were called upon to select members to this or the Local House? It could not be, for in every case where the people of the Province of Quebec had expressed any opinion on the matter, it was universally in favour of protection. It would be impossible to suppose it otherwise, when the manufactories and sugar refineries had been closed, and hundreds, nay thousands of skilled artisans had been forced to leave the country, as also many business men. The hon. member had said that protection would increase the price of bread. On the contrary, it would not do so comparatively, but would give the people more money to buy bread with. How was it possible for the men, who had been thrown out of employment by the closing of factories and refineries under the present system, to buy bread for their families? It was also said that the Conservatives, when they were in power, had not attempted to increase the tariff beyond 15 per cent. But every business man knew that 15 per cent. in those days was a far better protection than 17½ per cent. now. Not only so, but with this ample protection the late Government reduced the burden of taxation by $1,000,000 per annum, while now we had a deficit. He did not pretend that 17½ per cent. was not sufficient protection for many articles, but he did contend that the Government should have the pluck to take the matter into their own hands and frame a tariff so that industries could be fostered and protected thereby. He could not help alluding to a remark of the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier), who insinuated that his hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) was like a fat woman, while he himself, thin and delicate, was modestly compared to the first Napoleon. That comparison should be carried a little further, and the fat, healthy, jovial woman, whom his hon. friend from Bagot represented, could be likened to a healthy policy of protection, while the delicate and thin and sickly-looking young man compared to Napoleon personified the starving policy of free-trade.

Mr. CARON.

Mr. CAUCHON said it was somewhat strange that they should again have to fight the battle of free trade and protection when the question had long been settled by the political economists of the two greatest nations in Europe—England and France. Free trade, no more than protection, would save the country from its own follies in over-buying or over-producing, but free trade was the best position for a country to be in when there was a commercial calamity, as the people were allowed to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest market. The great financiers were for the most part Free-traders, although they agreed to the imposition of duties for revenue purposes. The occasion was a very favourable one for the Opposition to advocate protection, which they had never advocated before. It was a good policy on their part, as all industries were affected by the universal depression, and they could thereby arouse the prejudices of the masses in their favour. Free trade was a settled principle. It was the true foundation of the relations between nation and nation, its effect being to equalize somewhat the necessities of life by placing it within the power of a country to sell in the dearest and buy in the cheapest market.

Some HON. MEMBERS: What is protection?

Mr. CAUCHON said protection was no principle at all but a contrivance by which the few were made rich at the expense of the many. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had said that was no party but a national policy.

Mr. MASSON: I did not say that.

Mr. CAUCHON said the House knew that the Oppositionists were not Protectionists before. It had been said that he (Mr. Cauchon) was a Protectionist. He would challenge any hon.

member to point to anything that he had said or written—and he had written volumes for the press—during 36 years of public life, which showed that he favoured protection. The two or three lines which had been referred to were written by somebody else. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had told the House that it was necessary to protect the articles that we could produce. What were those articles? If there was sufficient protection we could produce all possible articles. But with what success for the consumers, the masses—that was the question. The question was limited to the articles we could produce at a cheaper rate than our neighbours, and in that case what was protection, if not the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many? Deficits which had a temporary cause demanded temporary remedies. To employ other means would be to go beyond the end required. Those temporary measures meant the construction more slowly of public works for which there was no immediate necessity, and to exercise all possible economy in the administration of public affairs. The House had heard a great deal about incidental protection. But that protection was not a principle; it was simply a consequence which resulted incidentally from the increase of the tariff levied by the necessities of the public service. A tariff was not made to create incidental protection; it was made to obtain a revenue, and, if the tariff had for its effect the incidental protection of certain industries, it was so much the better for the manufactures. The consumers submitted to that state of things, not because they wished to increase the profits of manufacturers, but because they knew that the State had need of a revenue, and that the consumers were bound to contribute according to their means. If the country really wished protection it was a different matter. Then, a tariff would be raised, not to obtain a revenue—that would be imperilled—but to encourage manufacturers. He had said that it would place the revenue in peril; he meant that such a protective tariff would wipe out the revenue derived from articles imported, the object being to supply those articles by others made by Canadian manufacturers. The same hon. member had reproached the hon. the Premier for having supported Mr. Workman against Mr. Thomas White in the Montreal election. If the hon. member had accused the hon. the First Minister with having spoken in favour of protection in Montreal and free trade elsewhere, he could understand the point, but he had not adopted that course, in order not to expose himself to the danger of infringing on the truth. The complaint was that the hon. the Premier had sustained a friend against a political adversary. Both candidates were in favour of protection, but the one supported the general policy of the Government, while the other denounced it with extreme violence. What should the hon. the First Minister have done? Surely supported his political friend. If the logic of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) was worth anything, it would lead him to reject from the ranks of his party the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Pope), who was elected as a Free-trader, and who should vote against the proposition of his leader. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) said also that the Opposition were anxious to increase the productive power of the people. Was it not rather the consuming power that they should wish to see increased? What advantage would be gained by increasing the power of production, if consumers were wanting? The power of production would never be wanting while the consumption required the products. It was necessary, then, in the first place to increase the consumption. It was not by increasing, by means of additional duties, the price of products, that the people would be enabled to increase the consumption. Let the consumers buy in the cheapest market and they would increase the consumption. If, on the contrary, they increased the load of duties, they stimulated production, it was true, but they increased the quantity of goods thrown on the market and the equilibrium was disturbed. In such a state of things bankruptcies arose, the markets were overcrowded, and strikes occurred. That was the commercial history of such times in all countries. Undoubtedly the man who earned more could pay more. But that was not the question. It was necessary at first to know whether the workingman with increased wages could buy more of the necessaries of life than if his wages were less and those articles cheaper. It was said that after the American war a gentleman could make the trip to Europe, buy his clothes and have money to spare on the amount which would have been expended on similar clothes purchased in the United States. That anecdote described very well the state of commerce as affected by the two principles. He read in the Nouveau Monde a correspondence which occurred in 1871, between Mr. Stuart Mill and a distinguished American, on the occasion of a discussion which took place between the former and Mr. Horace Greely. Mr. Mill had written to the Liberal Club of New York, that, if the wages were higher in the United States than in England, the cause of it was due to the fact that the American Republic possessed more lands to be disposed of, which were fertile and adapted to colonization, than Great Britain had, and therefore offered greater advantages to immigrants. Mr. Horace Greely, in discussing this letter of Mr. Mill, remarked that Canada possessed more extensive tracts of land adapted to colonization than was found in the United States, and that, notwithstanding, the wages in Canada were lower than in the States. Mr. Henry D. Lloyd, secretary of the league of New York Free-traders wrote then to Mr. John Stiles, distinguished, it appeared, as a Political Economist, and as being also familiar with Canadian affairs, in order to obtain his opinion on the subject of controversy. How did Mr. Stiles reply, who evidently was a zealous partizan of protection? That the facts are in favour of Mr. Greely. That the United States cannot pretend to a national superiority over the British Colonies on this continent; that the Province of Quebec, it is true, has long and cold winters, but yet not more so than some of the States of the Union; that in that Province the farming products are always abundant and certain; the water power most abundant and the mines very valuable; that the Province of Ontario has a shorter winter, a milder climate, a fertile soil which yields wheat equal in quality to the best wheat of the Genesee Valley, etc.; that as an agricultural country the Province of Ontario is superior to all the New England States, and is not probably inferior to any part of the continent of America; that the Maritime Provinces are more endowed by nature than are the States of New England; that on extending his examination to the North West Country, he found that the Red River and the Saskatchewan districts would form four or five larger States, possessing superior prairie lands, excellent coal and gold mines, and agricultural advantages equal to those of the North Michigan, Illinois, and Minnesota States; that beyond the Rocky Mountains there was British Columbia abounding in gold mines, and also containing the best and most extensive coal mines which they had discovered as yet in the declivity of the Pacific; that British Columbia possessed a superior soil, a splendid climate and an abundance of fish; that in every respect this colony could contrast with California, Oregon, and the territory of Washington; that nature had done as much for the Canadian colonies as she had for the United States. Mr. Stiles referred to free trade as affecting this country, and he said that it was a question very attractive in theory but not adapted either to the present generation nor to the succeeding one, and that emigration from the colonies had been caused either by certain political causes or by want of sufficient protection. Unfortunately for the partizans of protection, these foregoing facts which were set forth in order to sustain Mr. Greely were, for the most part, without foundation, and he (Mr. Cauchon) asserted, without fear of contradiction, that it was not true that the agricultural products were always abundant and sure in the Province of Quebec. The soil and the climate of Ontario are very favourable to agriculture, but compared with the vast prairies of the West—whither the largest portion of emigration was directed—it was a mere garden. Those States where the climate is cold were not the most prosperous of the Union; and wages were not there the highest, and emigration to the West was greater from those States than from Lower Canada. Again, it was not true that we had more land fit for colonising than they had in the United States. We did not possess the twentieth or even the fortieth part of what they possessed. The United States had every variety of climate, all kinds of natural products in abundance, and open ports all the year round; and thus, with those resources, that country necessarily attracted to it the mass of emigrants. We had, it was true, Manitoba and our North-West Territories, but they were only just beginning to be opened for colonization, and, most unfortunately, the grasshoppers had been making terrible ravages in the country. Although we trusted that this plague was only temporary, yet the distance of that district from the settled portions of the Dominion rendered it unfavourable. We had, indeed, fertile territories, but they were not continuous, according to the account of them, as he (Mr. Cauchon) understood, from the pamphlet on the subject by the Archbishop of Manitoba, and were situated far to the north of the fertile prairies of the United States. Again, the comparison of British Columbia with California—the finest and most fertile of all known countries—contained statements most exaggerated and without proof. British Columbia hardly possessed any good land for agriculture; it was very mountainous, while the miners had not discovered enough gold to induce them to remain there. Mr. Stiles told us that our inferiority was the result of the protection which existed in the United States and of the want of protection in Canada. If this were so, how had it happened, that our fellow-countrymen emigrated to the United States at the time when the American tariffs were low and returned, as many as could, at the time when the prohibitory tariff was being enforced? Hence they must conclude that the principle of protection was not the cause of the difference to which Mr. Stiles referred, and he had not done justice to Mr. Mill, who only sought the truth.

MR. CAUCHON.

The United States had every variety of climate, all kinds of produce, an uninterrupted navigation, and, besides, a protective tariff, and yet they were experiencing at this moment a most formidable commercial crisis, due principally to excessive speculation and production, stimulated beyond all calculation by the prohibitory tariff of which he was about to speak. The factories had been closed and workmen had been cast out by hundreds of thousands upon the streets in New York and other cities. The United States became rich inspite of themselves; the resources of the country were so great that it was impossible almost to escape prosperity. He would quote some extracts from a book written by Prof. Leoni Levi, to show what the effect of protection was on the manufactures of England before free trade was adopted. That gentleman said :

“The beau ideal of the Government at that time seems to have been to exercise a certain paternal superintendence over the transactions of society, to endeavour to repair by artificial means the shortcomings of private industry, and even to hamper or interfere, if need be, with the management of business, with a view to the advancement of certain interests which were deemed deserving of public support. Fortunately, the advocates of such measures did not always succeed. For a considerable time a tax was levied on all stuff made of cotton or of cotton and linen mixed; but complaints were made against such a tax. The Manchester manufacturers and Glasgow operative weavers strongly urged the repeal of all duties on manufactures, and called upon Parliament, as Heaven's Trustees for the nation, not to strangle an infant industry. The petition was successful, and the duties were repealed. Would that the woollen manufacture had been left as free from legislative interference as the cotton has been. The cotton manufacture was not born under an atmosphere of protection, was never the petted child of the Government or Parliament, and yet grew and prospered most vigorously. The woollen, the object of so much care, was for years weak and slow in its progress. Nothing could have been more suicidal than the action of the woollen manufacturers. They were not content to shut out all woollen goods from the English market; they went much farther. The long-stapled or English combing wool being superior for some manufacturing purposes to that of any other country, the most severe laws were passed, prohibiting the exportation of English wool. Nay, more. An Act was passed in 1788, prohibiting the exportation of live sheep; imposing all kinds of restriction on the carriage of wool from one part of the country to another, and even prohibiting sheep-shearing within five miles of the sea. This was, indeed, carrying the protection policy to its legitimate results; but what were the consequences? Trade and industry were hampered and misdirected; the interests of the consumer were disregarded, in the vain hope of favouring the producer; and even the processes of agriculture were unduly interfered with, so that blunder was heaped upon blunder, producing in the end nothing but disappointment and loss. To some extent the policy of obtaining, free of duty, the raw materials of industry was acknowledged and acted upon. Indigo, cochineal and logwood necessary for dyers were allowed to come in free, and the duties on oak and bark were lowered. But the prohibition of foreign goods was very general, and bounties were freely given to encourage the exportation of British manufactures. These were the times when apprenticeship was everywhere prescribed, when workmen were kept by force in the country, and when the combination laws were in full operation."

Mr. PLUMB: How long ago was that?

Mr. CAUCHON said he was reading to prove that, if the principle, was bad when carried to extremes, it must be always bad. The only difference was that carrying it to extremes made it a little worse.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is always bad to shave your head in order to cut your hair.

Mr. CAUCHON said that remark was very witty, but it was not well understood. Mr. Levi proceeded to say:

"The London merchants started from the first cardinal principles of trade that foreign commerce is eminently conducive to the wealth and prosperity of the country, by enabling it to import the commodities for the production of which the soil, climate, capital and industry of other countries are best calculated; and to export, in payment, those articles for which its own situation is better adapted; that freedom from restraint is calculated to give the utmost extension to foreign trade, and the best direction to the capital and industry of the country; that the maxim of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest, which regulates every merchant in his individual dealings, is strictly applicable as the best rule to the trade of the whole nation; and that a policy, founded on these principles, would render the commerce of the world an interchange of mutual advantage, and diffuse increased wealth and enjoyments among the inhabitants of each state."

That was the true principle. If we could produce cheap, we should do so; but if, by producing dear, the people were taxed and forced to pay one dollar for what could be got now for fifty cents, he did not think the industries of the country would be at all benefitted. Such a system would only create wealth for some few individuals, at the expense of the masses. It was argued that it was perfectly right for large countries like England and France to adopt free-trade policies, but that it would never do for a poor country like Canada. He did not place much faith in such an argument. If the principle was good in itself it must always be applicable, or vice versa. To sell dear and buy cheap was the best method of trading, and such a system would soon make a poor country rich. The same arguments used here to-day were brought to bear against free trade in France and England. It was always stated that ruin would follow any departure from Protectionist principles—that the country would be inundated with the products of other nations. In a measure, that was the fact; but, while the country overflowed with foreign products, native industries were flourishing, and the people were generally prosperous. Sir Robert Peel, referring to England's free-trade policy, made the following remarks:—

"I have no guarantee to give you that other countries will immediately follow our example. I give you that advantage in the argument. Wearing with our long and unavailing efforts to enter into satisfactory commercial treaties with the other nations, we have resolved at length to consult our own interests, and not to punish other countries for the wrong they do us, in continuing their high duties upon the importation of our products and manufactures, by continuing high duties ourselves, encouraging unlawful trade. We have had no communication with any foreign Government upon the subject of these reductions. We cannot promise that France will immediately make a corresponding reduction in her tariff. I cannot promise that Russia will prove her gratitude to us for our reduction of duty on her tallow by any diminution of her duties. You may, therefore, say in opposition to the present plan, 'What is this superfluous liberality, that you are going to do away with all these duties and yet you expect nothing in return?' I may, perhaps, be told that many foreign countries, since the former relaxation of duties on our part,—and that would be perfectly consistent with the fact—foreign countries which have benefitted by our relaxations, have not followed our example, but have actually applied, to the importation of British goods, higher rates of duties than formerly. I quite admit it. I give you all the benefit of that argument. I rely upon that fact as exclusive proof of the policy of the course we are pursuing. But what has been the result upon the amount of your exports? You have defied the regulations of these countries. Your export trade is greatly increased. Now, why is that so? Partly because of your acting without your wishing to avail yourselves of their assistance, partly because of the smuggler not being engaged by you in so many continental countries whom the strict regulations and the triple duties which are to prevent the ingress of foreign goods have raised up, and partly, perhaps, because these very precautions against the ingress of your commodities are a burden, and the taxation increasing the cost of production, disqualify the foreigner from competing with you. But your exports, whatever be the tariff of other countries, or however apparent the ingratitude with which they have treated you, your export trade has been constantly increasing. By the remission of your duties upon the raw material, by inciting your skill and industry by competition with foreign goods, you have defied your competitors in foreign markets, and you have been enabled to exclude them. Notwithstanding their hostile tariffs, the declared value of British exports has increased above 10,000,000 pounds during the period which has elapsed since the relaxation of duties on your part. I say, therefore, to you that these hostile tariffs, so far from being an objection to continuing your policy, are an argument in its favour.

Sir Robert Peel had been a Protectionist himself, but by long reasoning, by the operations of a mighty rival, he arrived at the conclusion that free trade was the true policy. He would now give some figures to show the result of such a policy in England and France. The latter country was not so advantageously situated as England, but that she had prospered would be shown by the following figures: In 1860 the imports were £47,740,000 and the exports £79,920,000, but under the free trade system the imports increased to £89,000,000 and the exports to £91,000,000. The following statement would show the yearly differences:

but, if this were true, England at the present moment would be utterly ruined, while the fact was, that her wealth was increasing at the rate of at least £100,000,000 sterling per annum. The history of the United States proved the advantages of free-trade. In spite of its immense resources, its trade had scarcely increased since a protective policy was adopted. The following figures showed how the trade of the United States with foreign countries stood between 1855 and 1876:—

The trade of the United States remained almost stationary under the protective system. The population of England was 31,857,338; her imports amounted to £373,939,000 sterling and her exports to £223,465,000 sterling. The population of France was 36,120,000 and in 1875 her imports amounted to £146,891,000 and her exports to £160,886,000. In 1875 the population of the United States was estimated at 41,675,000, and her total trade then amounted to £216,000,000, against over £600,000,000 sterling on the part of England. The American people were very energetic and enterprising, but under free trade, France had made greater advances than they had. The United States could not enter into serious competition with England, and the general result was strongly in favor of free trade, which was the only system we ought to adopt if we wanted to become a prosperous nation. This question was settled long ago; a revenue tariff was all very well for every one knew that they must make sacrifices in order to meet the public expenditure, but a real protective tariff would not be borne by the people. The hon. member for Bagot had said that the people of Quebec were not afraid of taxation. This might be true with regard to railways which benefitted the country, but they would never tolerate a tariff drawn so as to enrich merely a few men in the business centres. The Government was accused of living at the expense of the people, but one thing was certain, that, if they changed places with the hon. gentlemen opposite, the position of things in this regard would not be changed. Those hon. gentlemen did not care for the money of the people. The present difficulty was only temporary, and it was only necessary to bridge it over. The truth was that our market had been over-stocked with our own productions, and to this the existing trouble was due. To every branch of industry this remark applied. In the United States, under the protective system, a similar state of things existed, and, having over-stocked their own market, they made of Canada a slaughter market. If the United States wished to prosper, they would find that they must return to their old policy.

The hon. member for Bagot appeared to think that, if the balance of trade continued against a country for a long time, it was ruinous to its interests;

Mr. BLANCHET asked whether the House was to understand that the hon. gentleman had stated that there was free trade in France.

Mr. CAUCHON said they had comparative free trade in France. It was like England, and in England, there was not quite free trade. Both countries had a tariff for revenue purposes. There was a free-trade treaty, however, between England and France. Coincident with the disappearance of the prohibitory tariff was the great increase in business.

Mr. BLANCHET said there was not free trade in France. In that country they had protection to an industry in which the hon. gentleman himself had an interest, namely, ship-building. By the papers just brought down to the House, it appeared that the French Government refused to take off the duty of 40 fr. per ton upon vessels constructed in Canada, as they wanted their own shipping interest protected.

Mr. CAUCHON.

Mr. CAUCHON said the difficulty was when England obtained the treaty with France it had neglected to include the colonies, and France did not care to extend it to Canada now as we had placed heavy duties on their wines, &c.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he would reiterate what he had before stated, that our tariff ought to be framed with a view to incidental protection. The farming, as well as the other interests, was entitled to protection. Canada was adjacent to a country where every industry was protected by a duty or received an encouragement to export in the shape of a bounty. He would approve of free trade if it were adopted on both sides. But free trade did not consist in there being duties on one side of the line while there were none on the other. A vast extent of our country was suitable for the growth of coarse grain, which we grew in some instances better than wheat. But Indian corn was an article which was not raised to any extent in Canada, although it was in the United States. Corn was imported into Canada for the purpose of making whiskey. If the Government had put on a duty of ten cents a bushel on corn they would have raised a little more than the amount of taxes that the Finance Minister had chosen to put upon the coarse grains. It had been said that whiskey was not made out of Indian corn. It was a fact, however, that very good whiskey could be made from corn, and when American corn was brought into Canada it displaced so much Canadian coarse grains. A few years ago, rye was the principal grain used by distillers for the manufacture of whiskey. With reference to the brewing business, he would take the opportunity of saying that he had no interest in the trade, and had not had for nine years; therefore he spoke only from a desire to see the general good prevail. Men would take stimulants, and, as beer was much less injurious than whiskey, a wise Government would encourage the manufacture of the former rather than of the latter. But the two cents a pound placed on malt would prove most disastrous to the brewers. He had received the following letters from gentlemen in Toronto on the subject:—

"TORONTO, Ont., 20th March, 1877.

"JOHN ROCHESTER, ESQ., M. P.

DEAR SIR:—I am sorry to inform you that I am going to shut down the last day of the present month. I find it hard to get in enough cash to pay the duty, and an increase in the price of ale is out of the question. Whiskey is king and beer is unquestionably on the decline, and will continue to diminish so long as the present foolish and unwise legislation is persevered in. Surely corn can stand the tax much better than any article that should be fostered in the country, and is in all civilized countries in the world. I think the Government will yet rue the day, and that before long, for the course they have pursued in the matter. I hear that other brewers here are completely disheartened and intend shutting down at once.

Yours truly, etc.,

"E. O'KEEFE."

TORONTO, Ont., 21st March, 1877.

"J. ROCHESTER, ESQ., Ottawa."

DEAR SIR:—Is there no prospect of the tax upon malt being removed? We have been brewing now for about three weeks under the additional burdens, and we are quite satisfied it is useless to go on any longer. We have decided upon stopping next Friday. We had plans, specifications, and everything prepared for the erection of a lager beer brewery, upon which we propose to expend $15,000, believing that it would be the policy of the Government to encourage the manufacture and use of light beverages, but finding their policy so directly opposed to what we had just reason to believe would be, in the best interests of the country, we can only see one course left, that is to stop all expenditures at once, stop the business and leave the country, the government of which seems so blind to its own interests and the interests of its people.

"Yours truly, etc.,

"COSGRAVE & CO."

Both Mr. Cosgrave, of Toronto, and Mr. O'Keefe were strong supporters of the present Administration. He had received other letters from some of the largest concerns in Montreal, within the last day or two, stating that they had advertised their property for sale. The increase of 1c. a pound might seem a little to some gentlemen, but, when they found it meant 72c. a bushel, or 100 per cent. over what it had been, and what any other country levied, they would see its importance. They all believed the United States was taxed as heavily as any country in the world since her internal war, but, while they put a dollar a barrel duty on beer, ours now amounted to about two dollars. This was another deadly blow at the farmers, because a number of these breweries would have to shut down. If they could not get up the price of ale, which he did not think they could, then the Government, by this unwise policy, would succeed in making honest men dishonest, in making brewers use an article in beer which ought not to be used. This was a very serious thing, for, if the Minister of Inland Revenue had forty Brunels under him and forty others under them, the brewers could make beer, and defy them to detect anything deleterious in it. He knew enough about the business to know that. But he believed the brewers of Canada had never done it. It had, however, been done in other countries, because other ingredients could be got cheaper than malt and hops. At the rate which had been paid for malt in this country, however, there was no ingredient that he knew of which it would pay to substitute; but, when the price was increased 100 per cent., it was a different thing altogether. A finer or a more honest and straightforward class than the brewers of Canada they could not find. But now, after having expended their lives and the little they had got together in building up good establishments where they might manufacture their ale, these were to be thrown upon their hands, and they were to be debarred from carrying on their business. The Government had no compunction about granting a license, and then passing a prohibitory law and saying they should not brew. He was not there as the representative of the brewers, but as any other hon. member, elected not only to look after the interest of his constituents, or to legislate for the county of Carleton alone, but for the Dominion of Canada. He hoped that, even yet, the Government would see their way clear to make some change in this matter. He suggested that they should put a duty on corn, which, he thought, would raise the revenue by $50,000 more than they expected to derive by this additional tax on malt. It was often asked what they proposed to put a duty on. He was in favour of doing just as they did in the United States. It had been asserted that we imported nothing from the United States in the way of cattle, sheep and horses. He thought that was a mistake. He found that in 1876, 6,397 horned cattle were brought into the Dominion, at a cost of about $164,000; 1,571 horses, at a cost of about $75,000; and 11,856 sheep, at a cost of about $23,000. In 1875, 125,000 swine were imported, at a cost of $350,000. Did it seem right that silks, velvets, jewellery, pianos, and such aristocratic articles should pay 17½ per cent., while the poor man's sugar was taxed 45 per cent., his molasses, 25 per cent.; his oil, 25 per cent.; his tobacco, over 100 per cent.; his butter, 4c. per lb.; his cheese, 3c. per lb.; and so on. Upon what principle was our tariff got up? Was it that the poor and middle classes who consumed quantities of sugar, &c., should pay what ought to be paid by ladies and gentlemen who wore silks, velvets, fine cloth and jewellery, and played on pianos? Was it that the poor man's molasses should pay three-fourths as much per cent. ad valorem as the rich man's sparkling wines? He thought the Finance Minister might take a hint in the way of protecting our farmers, and he thought he could raise the revenue without doing injustice to any one party in the community. An anonymous communication had appeared in one of the city papers, telling the Ottawa members that, if they voted protection, woe betide them. He had stated the other day that he thought the writer was an American. He signed himself "Ottawa Valley." He tried to show that protection would be an injury to the farmer and the lumberman. The author of that communication belonged to a lumber firm in this city, and did not want protection. He was connected with a saw-mill and a flour mill in this city, and that establishment imported a large amount of Indian corn from the United States, costing them a little less than 1c. a pound, while they sold it for more than 1½c. a pound, making a profit of from 65 to 70 per cent. This was the disinterested gentleman who wrote over the signature of "Ottawa Valley." He did not go so far as to say that the Government ought to take the duty off pork, but he hinted very strongly at it. He (Mr. Rochester) consumed a good deal of this article during the year but he thought the duty was light enough, and that in fact the protection was hardly sufficient to allow our farmers to compete with the United States in the raising of pork. Our farmers could raise pork, but it was impossible for them to do it as cheaply as it was done in the United States. In regard to manufactures, we had a nation of forty millions of people along our border, and their manufactures, which were many years senior to ours, had succeeded. It was true that they had been put to their wits' end, but necessity was the mother of invention, and hence the prosperity of the United States. Besides, the Americans were sending their goods to England and competing with English manufacturers on their own ground. The London Lumber Trade Journal contained an article recently which stated that English manufacturers were talking seriously of protection. If that was the case, was it any wonder that the manufacturers of a young country like this should ask for protection against the United States. The Americans were a very ingenious people. By their practice of making tools for every description of work they undertook, they were able to manufacture at 50 per cent. less cost than people who did not pay so much attention to the preliminaries. This fact, in a great measure, explained why they could export their goods into Canada and undersell, despite a 17½ per cent. tariff. Yet hon. gentlemen agreed that we wanted no protection. He had never heard such an insane argument. With regard to the lumber interests, he contended that we laboured under serious disadvantages as compared with the United States. The Americans had the benefit of our rivers and canals for floating their lumber, but they imposed a duty of $2 gold on the products of our forests. It had been charged that the hon. member for Kingston was to blame for this state of affairs—that we would have been in a different position had the Washington Treaty never been consummated. The hon. member for Kingston, however, had pointed out that there were complications between the United States and Great Britain, and that it was necessary that both sides should make concessions, as Canada had been protected by the mother country, and the hon. gentleman was perfectly right in attaching his signature to that treaty. But the trouble was that the convention had not been carried out by our neighbours. By it the Federal Government of the United States had to urge upon the State Governments the necessity of granting to Canadian bottoms the right to pass through American waters. This privilege had never been allowed, and it was thought that the State Governments were to blame. But it appeared that the Federal Government had the regulation of this matter, and they had prohibited all foreign vessels from passing through the First Collectorial District of New York. In support of this position he cited a letter from Mr. B. H. Bristow (Hansard, 187*c*, page 391). In this connection he would also read the following letter which contained information of interest on this point:—

To the Editor of THE CITIZEN :

“SIR,—On my return home, after an absence of a few days, I notice in Mr. Mackenzie's reply to Dr. Tupper's speech on the Budget, that he taunts the late Administration for the manner in which they bartered away our canals to the Americans; and I would like to call the attention of Mr. Mackenzie, as well as every member of Parliament, to a few facts.

“The Washington Treaty provides that we give the Americans the use of our St. Lawrence and other canals, and in return for this, the United States Government agree to use their influence with the State Governments, to grant Canadians the similar use of their canals. Now, Mr. Editor, the State Governments say they have no laws to prevent our going through their canals, provided we comply with their rules and regulations, and to substantiate this, they allowed a number of Canadian vessels to pass through the Whitehall Canal in the spring of 1875. But the owners of these barges were informed by the Collector of Customs of the District of Champlain, that through instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, they are forbidden to continue such trade, as the revenue laws of the United States would not permit it, for, he further stated, a foreign vessel could not carry foreign goods or merchandise from one district into another. To explain this, I would state that each State is divided into collecting districts; for instance, the district of Champlain extends from Rouse's Point to a point midway on the Whitehall Canal, at which point another district commences; and a vessel having to enter at the first port of entry must enter in the district of Champlain, and, according to the above interpretation of the revenue laws, cannot go out of that district with her cargo. Now, Mr. Editor, I would ask you what this has to do with the Washington Treaty? The United States Government is not debarred from carrying out their part in the Treaty by the State laws. Even this can be got over by paying the duties at Rouse's Point—as I am under the impression that their Act reads that foreign vessels cannot carry foreign goods from one district into another—for we will readily see that the moment the duties are paid that they become American goods. But Mr. Editor, this is not the only objection they make. They say that there is nothing said in the Treaty about the Hudson River, and consequently they cannot give that up to us; that they are willing that we should go to Troy or Albany, but no farther. Of course, this means that we are debarred from our lumber trade with New York city, and that we cannot get to their coal regions, which effectually debars us from the trade altogether. Now, this is the standpoint on which I consider our Government ought to take them on, for I would like to have any one show me where Sir John, or any of our representatives, ever mentioned the Richelieu or Ottawa Rivers in the Treaty; and if the Americans can get out of their part of the bargain on this ground, why cannot we do the same? Now, Mr. Editor, I for one do not wish to drive the Americans from our waters, but I do think they ought to give us what they get, when we consider that not more than five years ago there were between 2,000 and 3,000 canal men employed in this trade, with at least 350 barges and forty or fifty steamers, while last season, all told, forty barges, four steamers and about 150 men did all the work, and were only employed half the time at that. I am quite well aware that our worthy Minister of Customs, as well as his efficient Deputy, are thoroughly conversant with this subject, and can properly lay it before Parliament, should the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie so desire it, and in fact Mr. Burpee went so far into the matter last summer as to draft a motion in Council to the effect that, unless the Americans gave us what they asked that we would not allow them to come past the foot of Chambly Canal, that is, that they would not be allowed to enter the Richelieu River on the same grounds that we could not enter the Hudson. And, Mr. Editor, I have it from the best authority that Mr. Mackenzie objected to this on the ground that the Richelieu River is a canal, it having been dredged. Consequently, we have no rivers in Canada of any importance, all the principal ones being canals. You will hear from me again on the subject of registration.

Those facts were worthy of the most serious consideration. We could send our lumber to Albany in Canadian bottoms, but then were obliged to transfer the lumber to American vessels to be sent down the Hudson to New York. The Government ought to try to remedy this state of things. It was not enough for hon. gentlemen opposite to allude to the Washington Treaty in reply to such remonstrances. He believed that the country was fully satisfied with this treaty; but it had not been carried into effect. If it was in force, Canada would have nothing to complain of.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this matter was not pertinent to the discussion. If the hon. gentleman would only set a day for a debate upon the Washington Treaty, he would be gratified. Meanwhile he could only state that the Government had done everything in their power to carry the provisions of this treaty into effect.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was very glad to hear it, and he was certain that this news would be gratifying to the House and the country. He hoped that the Government would push their negotiations to a conclusion. It was not agreeable to be told, as had been the case with himself a short time ago by Americans, that they had always the best of the bargain relative to treaties they had made with England. The speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on this subject had surprised him. He was astonished to learn from the hon. gentleman that our industrial productions during the past year nearly by a million exceeded in value those of 1875. The Journal of Commerce in this relation said:

“The debate on Sir John A. Macdonald’s amendment to the resolutions of the Government embodying their fiscal policy has brought forward several gentlemen who have not hitherto taken a prominent part in the discussions in the House. Mr. Dalton McCarthy, the new member for Cardwell, and Mr. Charlton, member for North Norfolk, spoke on opposite sides, and, if we may judge by the array of figures quoted by both gentlemen, they have made considerable preparation. On subjects such as that under consideration, figures are indispensably necessary, but great care must be taken to subject them to the closest scrutiny, as they are often misleading, and not unfrequently used to establish the foregone conclusions of the speaker. Mr. Charlton, who is a strong Free-trader, asks the question: ‘Had we anything to complain of at the present as to the state and development of our manufactures? In 1875 the exportation of domestic manufactures was $2,293,000, and in 1876 it had increased to $3,164,000: surely an increase of 38 per cent. in one year was a satisfactory exhibit for any industry to make, and he ventured to say that in no other country, whether Free-trade or Protectionist, could be shown a better exhibit.’ Now we are ready to admit that the figures cited by Mr. Charlton are correct, and that the deduction from those figures appears to be plausible and calculated to support that gentleman’s free-trade argument; but we must, at the same time, deny that they convey an accurate description of the real facts. It was, no doubt, convenient to compare the year 1876 with 1875, a year of greatly reduced exports, instead of with 1873; but Mr. Charlton, when he undertook to deal with the exports of manufactures, in order to establish their development, ought to have gone a little more into detail, and to have shown in what branches of our infant manufactures there was such great prosperity. Not having been satisfied with the general statement of Mr. Charlton, we have endeavoured to ascertain for ourselves what particular trades are in such a flourishing condition as that which he has indicated. The export of extract of hemlock bark was $230,229 in 1875, and $373,258 in 1876. In 1873 it was only $106,000. Now it is at least open to grave doubt whether the increased export of this article is advantageous to our interests. A few years ago there were urgent representations to the Government to endeavor to restrain its exportation by a prohibitory duty. It may well be doubted whether this increase of about $150,000 is a subject for congratulation. Then there is an increase in the export of iron and hardware of nearly $100,000. In the years previous to 1876 no distinction is made between ‘pig and scrap iron,’ and ‘iron and hardware,’ so that no fair comparison can be made, but of the $292,211 exported in 1876, no less than $196,928 was ‘pig and scrap;’ and we must own that we should have thought it a much greater subject of congratulation to the House and the country if Mr. Charlton had been able to shew that our pig and scrap iron had been used at home in our domestic manufactures. Wood manufactures are better classified in 1876 than in former years, and we are, therefore, unable to institute a comparison on any article but that which is probably the most important, viz: ‘sugar boxes.’ In wood goods generally there is no material difference between 1875 and 1876, but in both years there is a lamentable falling off from 1872 and 1873. Advertising, however, to Mr. Charlton’s years, sugar boxes were $288,630 in 1875, and $205,168 in 1876. In 1873 they were $712,101. It will be borne in mind that Mr. Charlton’s aggregate increase of exports was $871,340. We have accounted for $244,060 under the heads of hemlock bark and iron. The great item of increase is in leather and its manufactures. These were $1,105,981 in 1876 and $527,348 in 1875, or an increase of $578,633. In this article there has been a great improvement in the classification, as until 1876 it was all classed as 'leather.' Of the large quantity exported in 1876 no less than $956,379 was 'sole and upper leather,' and, we confess, as in the case of pig and scrap iron, we doubt whether the country is to be congratulated on sending off the raw material of a very important manufacture. The total amount of boots and shoes exported in 1876 was $83,279, but we have no means of instituting a comparison between the exports of this article in 1876 and those of former years. There was also an increase in grindstones in 1876 over 1875 to the extent of $23,196, that utensil being an entirely new article of export, not having been noted at all until 1875, when it was $2,559. We now come to 'sewing machines'—the value of which in 1875 was $254,510, and in 1876, $305,749, an increase of $51,239. As a slight drawback to this increase we may notice that the average values in 1875 were about $2 each machine higher than in 1876, while in 1873 both the number and average value was considerably higher than in 1876. We have more than accounted already for the aggregate increase of exports in 1876 over 1875. We cannot undertake to go through the whole list, but in some items there was a falling off, as in books, which were $45,634 in 1875 and $20,579 in 1876; gypsum or plaster, $49,809 in 1875 and $32,063 in 1876. On the other hand, woollens were $17,954 in 1875 and $45,249 in 1876. It must, however, be noted that in 1873 the export of gypsum was $121,220 and of woollens, $52,780. We shall not weary our readers with any more details, but we trust that we have established our point, which was that, by wholly omitting details, Mr. Charlton gave a completely false coloring to his picture of 'the state and development of our manufactures,' and that the result is anything but 'a satisfactory exhibit.'"

The exportation of extract of hemlock bark, as business men knew, was extremely detrimental to the country. To obtain these exports a very large number of valuable hemlock trees had to be felled for the purpose, and thousands of acres of ground were denuded of these trees, to the number of two or three millions a year. The Journal of Commerce went on to say:

"On another point Mr. Charlton made some remarks which would have been appropriate had they not been tinged with party spirit. The acquisition of British Columbia and of the North-West Territory has been a heavy strain upon the resources of the Dominion—that all must admit. It may be that the acquisition was premature, but there can be no doubt whatever that the political party in Ontario, with which Mr. Charlton is identified, was specially responsible for the early acquisition of the present Province of Manitoba and of the North-West. There was a serious division of opinion among the small population of the territory on the subject—the minority, composed chiefly of new immigrants, being favourable to the union with Canada, while the majority, consisting of the native population, giving a decided preference to the old Hudson Bay Company's régime. All the negotiations were conducted in concert with the Imperial Government, and with their entire concurrence, and the Canadian Government had no reason whatever to apprehend the serious outbreak which afterwards occurred. Nothing is easier than to find fault, and Mr. Charlton, who complains bitterly enough of fault-finding with the present Government, is but too ready to imitate the example of those whom he condemns. On the whole, the Manitoba difficulties were dealt with most prudently and successfully, and with no considerable expenditure of money. The North-West having been acquired, the consolidation of the Dominion by the incorporation of British Columbia became almost a necessity. Had it not taken place the annexation to the United States of the territory west of the Rocky Mountains could hardly have been averted. We have no doubt that Mr. Charlton would have solved the difficulty by leaving British Columbia to its fate, but the statesmen of his party have not ventured to take that line. Their complaint has ever been that the Canadian Government did not accept the terms proposed by British Columbia, viz: the immediate construction of a stage road, and the expenditure of not less than a million per annum on a railroad. Had such a proposition been entertained by Canada, there can be little doubt but that it would have been assailed with not less vigour than was the scheme that was actually adopted. While we see much to object to in Mr. Charlton's speech, the notice we have taken of it is proof that we consider it deserving of public attention."

Mr. SPEAKER said it was laid down in May that extracts from newspapers or other documents relating to the debates in the House could not be read by hon. members.

Mr. ROCHESTER said that in this respect he had only followed the example of many other hon. members, and particularly the President of the Council.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was clearly out of order.

Mr. ROCHESTER said the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) had stated that the poor people of Montreal were suffering fearfully, and buying coal by the pound and wood by the stick. What was the reason of that? Was it not because the manufactories were closed and business was at a standstill?

Mr. LITTLE said that no apology was necessary from him in addressing the House, as he represented one of the wealthiest and most populous agricultural constituencies in the Dominion. Many hon. members on the Ministerial benches had said that protection was not needed by the farmers; indeed the hon. the Premier himself said that the farmers could take care of themselves. It had also been said that the American produce coming into Canada did not materially affect our market. He thought otherwise, and believed that protection was required by the Canadian farmers just as it was by the farmers of the United States. Whatever difference of opinion there might be as to protection and free-trade, there existed no difference as to the desirability of having reciprocity, though the roaring speech of the Minister of Justice at Aurora implied that some Canadians were averse to it. However, now those who were foolish then had become wise, for all the country was in favour of reciprocity—but the Government could never secure it by its present policy. If, however, we had protection even to a limited extent, we should be much more likely to secure better terms with the United States. If protection was good for the American farmers and manufacturers, it was good also for us. But the Government was careless, and was playing into the hands of the American people. The hon. the Minister of the Interior remarked that the agricultural products imported into Canada from the United States did not tend to injure the Canadian farmer. On looking at the returns lately brought down to the House, he found that last year there were imported into Canada from the United States,—1,895 horses, value $92,770; 5,864 horned cattle, value $162,446; 30,195 swine, value $364,600; 11,344 sheep, value $22,358; all these were imported at only 10 per cent. duty. There was also of flour to the value of $1,897,146, and meal to the value of $493,988 imported free; whilst our Canadian live stock had to pay a duty of 20 per cent., our wheat 20c. per bushel, and our flour 20 per cent. for admission into the American markets. Was it not a fact that Canada had enough and to spare both of stock and flour? Why, Canada exported no less than 229,922 of live-stock valued at $1,826,172, with produce such as wool, hides, butter, cheese, &c., to the value of $12,700,500; and agricultural products, grain, &c., to the value of $17,258,358; thus the farmers had great cause to complain of the high duty Canadians had to pay in the United States, and the low duty the Americans had to pay here. Not only did the farmers object to the policy of free-trade, but they also objected to the extravagance of the various Departments. Did they not all know that, regarding the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails would never have been made, if the firm of Fairman, Cooper & Co., with his brother as a partner, had never existed? The idea of purchasing rails before a mile of the railway was located was absurd, and the country lost a million dollars by it. Then, again, giving a contract for the Georgian Bay Branch Railway survey and construction to Mr. Foster, allowing that person to withdraw from the contract, and absolutely paying him some $100,000 for committing a breach of the bargain—paying him for a survey at the rate of $500 per mile—was a waste of money. Besides, it was folly to construct the transit line before the main railway was located, for where could we tell at what place the connection would be made. He would also remark upon the carelessness of the hon. the Postmaster-General, who, in that regard, was unlike his predecessors in office. For instance, a few weeks ago, he made an enquiry if that Department was going to adopt some plan whereby registered letters could not so easily be tampered with, and if recompense could not be allowed to parties who thus suffered loss. The hon. the Minister answered in a very curt way that one letter was under his consideration and nothing could be done as to recompense. The fact was that 54 registered letters had been abstracted last year, five of which were in his (Mr.

Mr. ROCHESTER.

Little's) own county, at a loss of from $3 to $15 each. He held, that since the Government constituted themselves the mail carriers of the Dominion, and asked an appropriation of $1,769,800 for this year's service, they should be held accountable for any loss that was sustained, else what was the use of registration? He thought the Government was prone to blunder. But the hon. the Finance Minister was looked upon by his party as possessing the ability of a Galt and the genius of Sir Francis Hincks. The hon. the Minister of Finance was fond of borrowing, but never was a loan effected on worse terms. The people blushed at the thought of how low the credit of Canada had fallen in the London market, when the hon. the Finance Minister sold our bonds last year at about 90c. on the dollar, and lost £50,000 sterling in borrowing £2,500,000. Why the county treasurer of Simcoe never did any thing so bad as that; the county debentures never were sold at less than 98c. on the dollar. The hon. the Finance Minister had better step out and let a county treasurer step in and regulate the Department. Then, there was the hon. the Minister of Immigration, who spent last year in his Department more than $286,000, and only about 25,000 emigrants came out, of whom upwards of 6,000 returned to Europe, most of them to the British Isles, disgusted with the country because they could find no work, our mills and manufactories being idle. And, to cap the climax of folly, absolutely the Government sent 234 emigrants back to France at a cost of $5,000. He (Mr. Little) held that it was the duty of the Government in inducing emigrants to come here to find them work instead of throwing them on the municipalities for relief. The times were undoubtedly bad; but the Government should rise to the occasion and adopt better measures for the country's welfare, and endeavour to lessen the distress. That could not be done by a rest-and-be-thankful policy. With regard to the manufacturing interests, he held that there was a very close affinity between the manufacturing and agricultural interests. If one prospered the other was not far behind. Every farmer was better off having carding, flour, saw and shingle mills in his locality, but such must be in running order, in full blast, to be of service. Well, nearly all these were shut down, and the Americans flooded our markets with products, taking away our people's gold that should remain in the country. He did not believe the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, that the more we imported the richer we should be, even if we did not export so much. That was another instance of that hon. Minister's fallacies. He could not help contrasting the present position of the country with that when the right hon. member for Kingston was at the head of affairs. Then there was a good time for the town and country, for the farmer, manufacturer, mechanic and the labourer. Let them look at the picture now; hear the cries of thousands for work; view the tramps begging from door to door; find out the amount of taxes that were paid by municipalities for the support of the poor, and then let them consider whether there was not reason to believe that this at all events was partly owing to the present Government. He hoped, however, that a good time was coming. The people were tired of waiting, and would soon release the country from its bad position. They required protection at the hands of the Government of the day, and asked Heaven to protect them against the Government which was plunging the country into ruin.

Mr. BORRON said the issue really before the House was not between free-trade and protection, but between protection as it was at present and protection as the hon. gentlemen opposite wished it to be. The Government had expressed no intention of taking away from any industry that amount of protection already received under the tariff. The amendments moved by the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) plainly meant an increase of the tariff, or in other words, an increase of what they were pleased to call "protection." He was aware that some hon. gentlemen might deny this and assert that "re-adjustment of the tariff" or "an arrangement of the tariff of Customs duties" did not necessarily imply an increase. He knew that these phrases were ambiguous and might be perverted so as to mean anything or nothing. Fortunately, however, where words failed to bind, actions might be appealed to. In voting as they did for the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) the Opposition committed themselves to the view for which he (Mr. Borron) contended. That amendment was couched in these words:—

"That inasmuch as it has been deemed necessary to raise an additional revenue, it is the opinion of this House that the interests of the country would be better served by imposing additional duties upon such goods and wares as may be produced in Canada; thereby affording increased protection while securing the additional revenue required."

The Opposition voted for that amendment almost to a man, and no further proof was needed that the phrases "readjustment of the tariff" and "to arrange the Customs tariff," in the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Centre Wellington respectively, really and truly meant an increase of the tariff; the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) had said, that "Government was a system of protection," that it was the duty of every Government "to protect the weak against the strong, the right against the wrong." He entirely agreed with that hon. gentleman. He (Mr. Borron) held that, whatever other functions or duties a Government might be justified in assuming, the first, the most sacred and important duty was, the maintenance of the just and equal rights and liberties of the people. That was his firm belief, and it was in the light of that great fundamental principle that he proposed to treat the question now before the House. Taxation could hardly be a blessing under any circumstances, although hon. gentlemen opposite would have the country believe that they could so adjust or readjust it as to benefit every one. It was, at best, in his opinion, the lesser of two evils. There were two systems or modes of taxation, called direct and indirect. The direct mode of taxation was adopted in our corporations and municipalities, and was well enough understood by the people generally. It was, in his opinion, the most just, if not the only just system of taxation. It was urged, however, by opponents that it was or would be impracticable to levy and collect the Dominion taxes in that way; even that it would be impossible. It was asserted that the people, and the working classes especially, were not provident enough to set aside out of their weekly or monthly wages, the sums required to satisfy the demands of the tax gatherer when he called. If this were so, the fault, if any, was in the people and not in the system. The other mode of taxation, the indirect, was the system under which the revenue was obtained when levied on the commodities produced abroad. The tax was paid by the merchant who imported or brought them into the country. It was regulated according to a list or tariff approved by Parliament, and the duties imposed were called Custom duties. On most manufactured goods or articles, the present duty, as hon. members knew, was  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., or, in other words,  $17\frac{1}{2}c.$  on the dollar. When levied on the commodities produced in the country itself, such as spirits, beer or tobacco, the duty was called an Excise duty and was paid, in the first place, by the distiller, brewer or tobacco manufacturers to the Government. Both those taxes, however, were ultimately paid by the consumer. So long as the article taxed was grown or produced abroad, and either was not—or could not be—produced in the country itself, such as tea for example, the duty could be fairly collected, and all went into the Treasury. As regarded those articles, like spirits or beer, which, when imported from abroad, paid Customs duties, and when manufactured at home, as they could be, paid a corresponding Excise duty, was there any material loss, unless from smuggling, sustained by the revenue? But it was a very different thing when commodities manufactured abroad were called upon to pay Custom duties when brought into the country, and the same things were permitted to be manufactured in the country itself without paying any corresponding Excise duty whatever. The whole bearing of that important part of the subject could not be made plain to those classes in the country not actually engaged in commerce, unless illustrated by some familiar example. He would take hats, for instance, and suppose that a Montreal merchant imported a lot from England which cost him, landed at Montreal, \$1 each. He would be obliged to pay to the Collector of Customs there  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Customs duties on the value, or  $17\frac{1}{2}$ c. on the dollar, and as each hat cost a dollar, it would bring the duty to just  $17\frac{1}{2}$ c. bringing the cost of each hat up to \$1.17 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Suppose he sold them to a country store at a profit of 10 per cent., or 10c. on the dollar, the price paid by the country storekeeper would in that case be \$1.28 for each hat. Then suppose that the country storekeeper added 20 per cent., the price would come \$1.55, at which price the hats were finally sold to the farmers, fishermen or miners, who wore them and were called the consumers, for, if they lived long enough, it was to be hoped they would wear the hats out and in due time want others. Now the consumer, it would be observed, paid the first cost of the hat, the tax or duty, the profit of the importer or wholesale merchant and also the profit of the country storekeeper; all these items being included in the \$1.55 that he was finally charged. He would now further suppose that the number of hats required for the whole Dominion was one million annually, and, as there was as yet no hat manufactory in this country, that the whole had to be imported from England. The revenue from one million of hats imported would be \$175,000. Suppose now, that some enterprising individual who understood the business and knew that hats could be made in Canada at the cost or rate of one dollar each, established a hat manufactory. He accordingly set to work and made, say 100,000 hats the first year, on which he cleared \$17,500 profit. The importation from England would fall from one million hats to 900,000, and the revenue from \$175,000 to \$157,500 next year. Our enterprising manufacturer would perhaps take in a partner or two, and increase the number of hats to 200,000, the profit on which at  $17\frac{1}{2}$ c. each would be \$35,000. The quantity of hats imported would fall to 800,000, the Customs duties on which would amount to \$140,000. In the meantime there was no reduction whatever in the price paid by the consumer—he was paying the tax or duty all the time—but, instead of going into the public Treasury as it should do, it was going into the pocket of the manufacturer. Thus the manufacturers went on from year to year increasing in numbers and extending their business until the account stood thus:—Hats imported from England, none; revenue therefrom, nothing; hats manufactured in Canada, one million; manufacturers' profit, \$175,000; price of hats to the consumer, still \$1.55 each. This example would serve to illustrate and show three things; first, the principle of indirect taxation, "incidental protection" so called; second, the operation by which certain hat manufacturers (infant manufactures) had been benefitted and fostered and enabled to realize a splendid income; lastly, it lay bare the process of "incidental spoliation" by which the Treasury had been robbed of \$175,000 annually, and for which the people at large had been taxed without receiving any corresponding benefit or advantage whatever. He (Mr. Borron) contended that what was true of one million of hats, was equally true of \$70,000,000 worth of goods and articles produced annually in the mills and factories of Canada at the present time. It had been shewn in the case of the hats that, so long as the manufacturer did not glut the market, the price of the hats was just as much as if they had been brought from England and paid  $17\frac{1}{2}$ c. on the dollar Customs duties. So in like manner was the price of this \$70,000,000 worth of manufactured articles increased by  $17\frac{1}{2}$ c. on the dollar to the Canadian purchaser or consumer, that was, to the farmer, lumberman, fisherman, miner, shipbuilder and others, numbering nine-tenths at least of the whole people who thus paid a tribute of \$10,000,000 annually to support, and in some instances doubtless to enrich, those so-called infant industries, to foster and "protect," which was the declared object of the leaders and framers of the “Great National Policy.” With respect to the woollen manufactures, he observed from the Census Returns for 1871 that the sum paid in yearly wages was \$917,827, that the value of the raw material was \$3,217,068, and value of the articles produced, \$5,507,549; that the loss to the revenue on this commodity alone amounted at 15 per cent. to \$826,132, or, as nearly as possible, nine-tenths of the whole yearly wages were incidentally paid by the people of Canada. It was really just the same as if a bonus or bounty of \$826,132 was paid continually out of the people’s money to those manufacturers. From the Census Returns relating to cotton factories it appeared that the yearly wages amounted to \$129,400, that the raw material cost \$462,000, that the value of the articles produced was \$781,800, showing a loss to the revenue of \$127,270 yearly, or again nearly nine-tenths of the whole amount paid for labour. That was one of those manufactures that was generally believed to be suffering most severely, but that belief was not borne out by the facts. On referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns it would be found that the quantity of raw cotton imported in 1871 was 2,246,005lb., valued at \$340,901, whereas in 1876 it was 5,527,428lb. valued at \$660,983, clearly proving that the production of these cotton factories had actually doubled itself in five years. This he would say was a symptom indicative of decided prosperity and not distress. He could not help feeling some surprise and indignation in view of the facts stated that manufacturers should come to Parliament demanding that additional duties should be imposed upon such goods and wares as they might produce, thereby affording them increased protection. It was charitable to suppose that they were blinded by self-interest; that, while keenly alive to the advantage of any increase of the tariff to themselves, they failed to perceive the grievous wrong they were inflicting on the people. It was so one hundred years ago, according to Adam Smith, and it seemed as if it was so now. That manufacturers were still keenly alive to their own interests was proved by the way in which they had treated the application of the distressed coal miners of Nova Scotia, asking that a moderate duty might be imposed on coal. These poor miners had as good a claim to protection as any manufacturer in Canada, yet how were they treated by those men who had been preying on the miners and other consumers for years? Why, they were told that the manufacturers might be disposed to agree to a duty of 50c. a ton upon soft coal as a part of a “protection” policy, under which the duty on manufactured goods should be increased from 17½ to 20 per cent. As the quantity of coal imported from the United States was 625,203 tons, the sacrifice those gentlemen proposed submitting to, in aid of their suffering fellow countrymen, and to prove their consistency as “good Protectionists,” would be \$312,601, as against which they modestly asked an increase of 2½ per cent. duty on manufactured goods, equivalent, on the goods manufactured in Canada, to a tax on the miners and other consumers of, probably, from one to two millions of dollars. That was, they were willing to pay \$312,600 with one hand if they could get back from one and a half to two millions with the other. Surely godliness was profitable unto all things, but especially to the manufacturers. He would now briefly examine the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, in the light of the conclusions he had arrived at. But he would say, in the first place, that the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) was mistaken in ascribing any merit to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) as having brought about the reduction in the duty on coal oil. As far as he remembered, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) was the first to call attention to the hardship and injustice of the then existing high duty on petroleum, and it was generally believed and expected that there would be a reduction before the hon. member for Stanstead brought forward his motion last year. Indeed he considered that the hon. member for Stanstead had not acted with consistency in reference to that matter, for, first of all, he had voted for the hon. member for Kingston's motion, in favour of protection ; and, after being defeated on that question, he picked out the one article in the tariff that was most obnoxious to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and proposed to reduce the protection on that article. He contended, therefore, that any credit that was due was due to the Government and its supporters, and not to the hon. member for Stanstead or the Opposition. The amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston called upon the house to express its regret "that the financial policy, submitted by the Government, increases the burthen of taxation on the people, without any compensating advantages to Canadian industries." Now, in reference to this part of the amendment, he would observe that, in imposing a tax upon tea and upon malt, the Government had not done so without a compensating advantage ; whereas the hon. member for Kingston would confine the advantage to one particular class, namely, the manufacturers. The Government having, imposed a tax which would fall on the people, very properly considered it their duty to accompany it by a compensating advantage which would benefit the whole people. That it had done by largely reducing the duty on petroleum, the effect of which had been greatly to reduce the price of coal oil to the people. The rich might light up their mansions with gas or with wax tapers, but petroleum or coal oil was the light of the people at large ; and the reduction in the price of that now almost indispensable article would be a boon to all, but more especially the working classes. The right hon. member for Kingston had further called on the House to express the opinion that there should be "such a re-adjustment of the tariff as will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion." He (Mr. Borron) had already endeavoured to show that re-adjustment of the tariff with the view to benefitting and fostering manufacturing industries although called "protection" was really legalized spoliation, and class legislation in its most specious form. That the right hon. member for Kingston might enrich one class of industry at the expense of the people generally, on the plan of robbing Peter to pay Paul, he fully admitted. He could as soon believe, however, that the right hon. leader of the Opposition had discovered the philosopher's stone and could convert at will all the base metals into gold, as he could believe in his ability to benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing industries of the Dominion by any re-adjustment or increase of the tariff. He had been connected with or engaged in mining pursuits for twenty years, during the greater portion of which period the right hon. member for Kingston had been in power, and he was not aware that during all that period anything had been done to protect or aid the miner. He would not trespass longer on the patience of the House at that late hour, but would vote against every resolution or amendment which had for its aim and object the increase of what hon. gentlemen opposite were pleased to call "Protection."

Mr. MONTEITH said 2,500,000 of the population of Canada were engaged in agricultural pursuits. He had been connected with farmers for forty years, and he thought he might presume to know something of their wants ; and his opinion was that their great want was protection. They wanted the Canadian markets for Canadians. Our neighbours across the border, while ready to take advantage of the facilities we afforded them for trading, yet refused to admit our farmers to their markets on an equal footing. In consequence of this patent inequality between the farmers of the two countries, large numbers of our agricultural population were leaving Canada to take farms in the United States in order that they might have the advantage of two markets. When the Americans could bring their goods here in the face of a 17½ per cent. tariff, and undersell our manufactures, it was nothing but right that the Government should so remodel the tariff as to give an efficient protection to native industries. The duty on those articles produced in Canada which suffered from the unfair competition should be raised. The salt interest was one that particularly required protection. It gave employment to a large number of people, and it was not right that we should allow it to suffer when it might be made prosperous by a little protection. The farmers were undoubtedly favourable to the policy enunciated by the hon. member for Kingston. Last year a Committee was granted to inquire into the cause of the depression in the agricultural interest. Circulars were sent to leading farmers in all parts of the Dominion and a great deal of valuable information was obtained in response thereto. Another Committee was appointed at the same time to investigate the general depression of trade. As an illustration of how the present Government treated the farmers, he might state that the evidence taken before the Depression Committee, which was very voluminous, was printed in book form and was widely circulated; but the evidence taken by the Agricultural Committee was only partly printed and was not nearly so widely published. He received one copy of the latter, while he had about a dozen of the more bulky pamphlet of the former. He did not think the Government were doing their duty towards the farming population, who were seven-eighths of the community and the mainstay of the country. At a meeting of the South Huron Agricultural Society, held recently, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

“That the Directors of the South Huron Agricultural Society see with much regret, that the American Government still continues to place restrictions, in the shape of high Customs duties, on all Canadian farm produce entering the United States, and we humbly submit that the policy of our Government, which admits American agricultural produce into Canada on more favourable terms than we are permitted to enter their markets, is unjust to the agricultural interests of this Dominion; while, as farmers we are willing to pay, and do pay, at least our full share of the burdens of the country, encourage manufacturers, and, when necessary, fight the battles of the country, we think it only simple justice that we should have the benefit of our own markets.”

He did not think he was mistaken in declaring that that resolution expressed the sentiments of the bulk of the agriculturists of Canada. If they did not receive protection from the present Government, he thought the time was coming when better men would control the affairs of the nation, and who would see that the interests of the farmers were not overlooked in their fiscal policy.

Mr. PLATT said he could not agree with the policy of the Government. The imposition of a higher duty on malt was not required by the exigencies of the revenue, nor was such a duty likely to have the beneficial results which some parties seemed to think. It was a step directly opposed to the temperance cause, as an increase in the price of beer meant an increase in the consumption of whiskey, which was admittedly more hurtful in its effects than beer. It was useless to assert that the price would not be advanced in consequence of this move of the Government. The cost of manufacture would be increased, and there must be an effect on the consumer, either in the way of a higher price or a poorer article for the present price.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said that, at this late hour, it was not his intention to occupy much of the time of the House. This important question had been fully and ably discussed on both sides, and he had no doubt every hon. member had his mind made up as to how he would vote. He, however, must say that he was what was termed a Free-trader, as he believed were most people in the Maritime Provinces. He thought that 17½ per cent., with the cost of importation, amounting to 5 per cent. more, was sufficient protection for Canadian manufactures. A revenue must be raised, and if, under a protective policy, the duty on many articles was to be reduced to favour the manufacturer, the amount of such reduction would have to be made up on other articles, these additional duties would have to be paid by the general consumer, the agriculturists and others receiving no compensation in return, whilst the manufacturers would be placed in a position to form rings or monopolies, and demand much more for their goods than the same description would cost if imported under a fair revenue tariff from England or the United States. They had a striking example of the effect of protection in the late coal oil combination of Ontario. The Province of Prince Edward Island, from its isolated position and small population, could not possibly become a manufacturing place to any extent,—shut out as it was nearly half the year from all parts of the world. The people there had to depend upon their rich lands and valuable fisheries. The mackerel fishery was the most valuable and many of the people engaged in it. The United States offered the only market for those fish, and there they were admitted duty free under the Washington Treaty. The fishermen, or many of them got their supplies from the traders, who as a rule, had all their business relations with the United States, whence they imported what they required to carry on their business, and in return they forwarded their fish for sale. The same applied to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—the coal region perhaps excepted—and any legislation that would disarrange this business would do a serious injury. While he was prepared to vote against all amendments and resolutions which favoured protection, he felt equally bound to vote against the increase of duties proposed by the Government as bearing particularly hard upon the working and poor man, more particularly at a time of great depression, such as now existed, when he felt that the Government should do all in its power to relieve the labouring classes, instead of putting increased burdens upon them. He had always thought that it required a great deal of financial skill and ability to undertake the responsible task of Finance Minister, but, when he heard the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, he changed his mind. What did it amount to? Why, he told the House in the first place that there was a deficit of nearly two millions during the past year, that the expenditure would not be so large this year, and that if an increase in the tariff amounting to $500,000 or $700,000 were made, it would be sufficient for all purposes; and to raise that amount he proposed to double the tax upon malt and to add two cents per pound on tea, when the poor man already found it hard to get even the necessaries of life. He believed that any common-place school boy could have arranged the tariff in a much more intelligent and reasonable way to raise the required amount. Although the general taxation in other places was much higher than here, in no country in the world was there such an extravagant duty upon malt as that now proposed. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) read a letter from some friend of his, which, as he stated, he felt sure would convince every hon. member of this House of the justness of this tax; and, as he (Mr. Pope) did not think it possible that any two minds could conceive the grand idea of this particular tax, at the same time, he must give the hon. member's correspondent the credit of originating it, and of influencing the Finance Minister—who this correspondent was, the House had not been told. Further than that, he once was connected with a brewery—the chances were that he was driven out from some establishment, and, by way of injuring his former employer, suggested this tax, and succeeded—backed by the strong influence of the hon. member for Hamilton—in dictating the policy of the Government. The average cost of barley was about 70c. per bushel, and the tax amounted to 72c. a bushel. The result of the tax would be that it would affect the price of barley to the farmer. It would drive many of the brewers to make an inferior class of ale, would increase the price so as to drive the labouring classes, who were the principal consumers of beer, to drink more of deleterious whiskey. He would much rather support the Finance Minister in doing away with the liquor traffic altogether. As regarded the tea question, it was well known that the more wealthy class took coffee for breakfast, dined late, and, perhaps, took another cup of coffee; whereas the labouring and middle classes had tea three times a day; consequently, the greater portion of the increased tax would fall upon those least able to bear it. If a larger revenue were wanted, why not put the additional duty on brandy, spirits of all kinds, high-priced wines, broad-cloths, silks, satins, velvets, ribbons, feathers, etc., so that it would be paid by those who could best afford to pay it. So far as his Province was concerned, they wanted reciprocity with the United States; and if a hostile tariff, discriminating duties, or a general readjustment, would attain that object, he would willingly go for any or all of them, believing that the interests of the Province and of the Dominion would be best served by so doing; but, at present, he must say he saw no reasonable prospect of obtaining reciprocity.

Mr. GAUDET said, despite the long discussion which had taken place on this important question of protection or free-trade, he could not allow this occasion to pass without making a few observations on the points at issue. He was far from pretending that he could add anything new of any great value to what had been said; but a protective tariff would be favourably regarded in the Province of Quebec, and this project had been advocated warmly for several years by the Liberals. But how could this be accomplished, since to-day they did not bring pressure to bear upon the Government with the view of securing protection? He was glad to see that protection was demanded for the agricultural interests and farmers, a class to which he had always been proud to belong. He asked permission to thank the hon. the mover of this amendment, in the name of the county he had the honour to represent, for his good intentions with regard to the interests of farmers. It would be wrong to refuse this protection to agriculturists as well as to any other class that requested it. Misery was extending its effects everywhere, in the cities as well as in the country; and he declared, without hesitation, that the Government did not pursue a proper policy in refraining from doing more on public works than was being done—in order to afford employment to those who had nothing to do, and who were now bewailing their unhappy fate. It was during such years of misery as this that the works which were considered necessary in the interests of the country should be pressed forward with vigour. Independently of the services which would thus be rendered to the suffering classes of the community, the Government would reap a great advantage from such a course owing to the reduction of wages. He knew he would be told that the finances were not in a sufficiently prosperous condition to permit them to do more, and that the deficit of the present year, amounting to some two millions, had been due to a certain extent to the prodigality shown in previous years; but he thought that the people throughout the Dominion would look with a favourable eye upon a loan being effected for a certain sum, in order to construct indispensable public works, which would have as its result the relief of misery. Had not the Government on their accession to office hastened to levy three millions of additional taxes in order to create new offices with high salaries attached for their friends. He thought he was in a position to say in the name of the farmers of the Province of Quebec: "If you do not wish to do anything to aid us in sustaining the sufferers from this state of things, at least do not refuse to give us proper protection, which will enable us to furnish work to those who have it not, and who are crying of hunger." He would go farther and say that, during the past several years, the Government had expended large sums to bring out immigrants who had not given full and entire satisfaction. They had thus augmented considerably the number of the country's poor, which they left to-day in charge of the residents of the country. As a Government, their share of aid only consisted in taking care of those who occupied the prisons and penitentiaries; the rest was left to the charge of the people. In terminating his remarks, he was not prepared to say that he would vote for an increase of duties upon articles which we could not produce in sufficient quantity for consumption, nor was he more willing than the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska to tax the bread of the poor. It seemed to him that the agricultural interests could be protected without going so far as this. The hon. member, while refusing all protection, said he did not wish to tax the bread of the poor man, but the hon. gentleman appeared eager to bring about such a state of things as would prevent the poor having any bread to eat. He did not hesitate to say that it was better for a poor man to pay twenty cents for his loaf of bread when in employment, than to pay only fifteen cents when he had nothing to do. It appeared to him that one need not be extremely intelligent to understand this matter. The hon. gentleman was one of those who had advocated protection during several years past as a means of rendering the Dominion prosperous; and, nevertheless, to-day the hon. gentleman pronounced against it. The hon. member for Bagot, in his able speech on this subject, seemed to wish to hasten the entry of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska into the Ministry. His hon. friend must permit him to differ with him in opinion. He thought that, in the interests of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska, it would be much better if the hon. gentleman would take a few years more in order to mature his ideas on the question of protection. Before entering into a Ministry, the hon. gentleman should know what views he should entertain with regard to this important matter. As a means of protection, they should diminish the Excise duty on Canadian tobacco, or increase the duties on foreign tobaccos, in order to encourage the production of this article, which was raised in this country with great success. Further, was it just that the Canadian farmer should pay to the American Government 20 per cent. for the privilege of selling his stock and produce in the United States, whilst the American farmer coming into our markets had only to pay a duty of 10 per cent? There was, besides, a good way of protecting the agricultural interests, which would be to pass a measure to prevent the exportation of manure from our cities to the United States, as was mentioned to be the case by the hon. member for Chambly before the Special Committee appointed last year in the agricultural interests. This exportation was injurious. Having made few observations, he would state that he would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Centre Wellington, and for any other amendment having for its object the procuring of a reasonable degree of protection.

Resolution 1 read the second time and agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped the Government would not force the other resolutions through, as it was nearly three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought the resolutions might be allowed to pass, as the subject had been fully discussed. If desired, amendments could be offered at another stage. While, however, he desired to go on with the resolutions, he did not wish to do anything like forcing them. But he really did not think it was reasonable to ask that there should be more lengthy debating.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman takes the responsibility of bringing on another debate, he himself will be to blame.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will endeavour in every possible way to prevent that.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes before
Three o'clock.

PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. DEWDNEY asked whether it was the intention of the Government to locate the whole line from Burrard Inlet to Tête Jaune Cache before selecting the route through British Columbia, for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not able to answer that question at the present time.

PURCHASE OF OLD RAILS FROM THE INTERCOLONIAL.

MOTION.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked for the names of those parties who purchased old rails or other old materials from the Intercolonial, and who were owing for the same on the 30th June, 1876; also value, quantity and description.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think this is not a fair question to put. It is quite impossible to answer such a question. The proper mode to obtain this information is to place a notice on the notice paper and move for a return. I could not answer a question of that kind.

WINDSOR BRANCH RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

Mr. GOUDGE asked whether, in the matter of the transference about to be made of the Windsor Branch Government Railway to the Western Counties Railway of Nova Scotia, it was provided that the tariff of rates for both passengers and freight upon this branch should not exceed those charged for like goods and distances upon the Intercolonial Railway; also whether the privileges of ships and shippers doing business at the railway wharf should be as heretofore.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will see from the Statutes of 1876 that there is no such reservation made by the Act or by Orders in Council transferring this branch to the Western Counties' Railway. The tariffs of rates for passengers and freight are, of course, subject to the approval of the Government when these are submitted. The privileges of ships and shippers are similar privileges—whatever they were—which were enjoyed under the Nova Scotia Statutes, at Richmond Station. My hon. friend will find that the Act of 1874 continues whatever privileges existed to the company after this transference.

Mr. GOUDGE said the railway wharf he referred to was the railway wharf at Windsor.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that there is nothing about the railway wharf at Windsor in the Statute or the Orders in Council.

L'ANSE ST. JEAN LIGHTHOUSE.

QUESTION.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to build a lighthouse at L'Anse St. Jean, on the River Saguenay, in order to guide vessels entering L'Anse St. Jean.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): It is not the intention of the Government to build a lighthouse there at the present time.

FISHING REGULATIONS IN CHICOUTIMI, SAGUENAY, AND CHARLEVOIX.

QUESTION.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to repeal the regulations which prohibited, within the counties of Chicoutimi, Saguenay and Charlevoix, fishing in the lakes before the first of February.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): It is the intention of the Government to communicate a regulation requiring a close season there. They hope to be able to allow people to fish in December, and also in January.

NAVIGATION ON THE NORTH SHORE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

QUESTION.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to build new lighthouses on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, between the Seven Islands, as far as the Straits of Belleisle, with the view of rendering navigation safer.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland); I may say to my hon. friend that we have no intention of doing so at present.

L'ANSE ST. JEAN WHARF.

QUESTION.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to put in the Supplementary Estimates a sum of $1,000, for the construction of a wharf at L'Anse St. Jean, on the River Saguenay.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The estimates will be down in a few days and my hon. friend can then observe whether there is any such item in them or not. We have not considered that particular point up to the present time.

THE WASHINGTON TREATY AND BRITISH COLUMBIA.

QUESTION.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked if any negotiations had been opened with the United States since the last Session of Parliament with the object of extending the 21st Article of the Treaty of Washington of 1871 to British Columbia; if not, was it the intention of the Government to urge Her Majesty's Imperial Government to do so?

Mr. BLAKE: No such negotiations have been opened and, in the present state of the arrangements, consequent upon the Treaty of Washington it is not thought convenient at this time to consider whether such negotiations should be opened.

THE LATE NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

Mr. DYMOND asked whether any communication had been received by the Government from any member of the late Northern Railway Commission, or from the counsel representing the Crown before that Commission, with reference to the non-examination of the Hon. John Beverley Robinson, M.P.; and if so, what was the nature of such communication.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Chairman of the late Committee writes the following letter to the Secretary of State:

"TORONTO,

"26 Wellington-st.,

"Saturday, March 17th, 1877.

"Hon. R. W. SCOTT, Q.C.,

"Secretary of State, Ottawa,

"DEAR SIR,—Seeing from the proceedings in Parliament that Mr. Robinson has complained that he was afforded no chance of giving any explanation as to the charges of having had his election expenses paid by the Northern Railway Company, and of having overdrawn his account, I deem it my duty to state that Mr. Robinson was afforded every opportunity, but that he never presented himself for examination (as Messrs. Edgar and Lockhart Gordon did), although the Attorney-General gave his partner, Mr. McWilliams, to understand more than once that every facility for explanation would be afforded him. I enclose herein the original subpoena with the memorandum of the clerk who tried to serve him, to show that he was much in our thoughts; and I will further state that I told Mr. McWilliams (who attended as counsel on behalf of the city of Toronto, at every meeting) at the very outset that the Commissioners were prepared to examine any party who wished to be examined or had any explanation to make, regardless of politics or any other circumstance, it having been most unfairly insinuated that the Commissioners would make distinctions in favour of supporters of the Government.

"I am, yours, &c.,

"LARRATT W. SMITH,

"Ex-chairman N.R. Commission."

I will also read the following letter from the senior counsel:—

"TORONTO,

"21st March, 1877.

"Hon. R. W. SCOTT,

"Secretary of State,

"Ottawa.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I understand that Mr. Robinson is supposed to have had no opportunity of giving evidence before the Northern Railway Commission in regard to those statements made by Mr. Cumberland which affected Mr. Robinson. Having been senior counsel for your Government in the matter of the Commission, I think it my duty to say that the supposition is a mistake. It was intended to examine Mr. Robinson as a witness, and a subpoena was issued to procure his attendance. Mr. Robinson was not examined because, subsequently to the facts having been obtained from Mr. Cumberland's evidence, it was intimated, on behalf of Mr. Robinson, that the statements made by Mr. Cumberland were correct, and that he (Mr. Robinson) did not wish to be examined. Mr. J. H. Cameron was counsel for the company in the proceedings under the Commission, and in the discussions which took place on one or more of the applications for delay, which he made, he had mentioned Mr. Robinson's absence from the city, but after Mr. Robinson's return, Mr. Cameron, at one of the meetings of the Commission, stated to me in answer to an inquiry on my part, that he had communicated with Mr. Robinson, and learned from him that Mr. Cumberland had related the facts correctly, and that he (Mr. Robinson) had nothing to add. To avoid any possible misunderstanding, however, I spoke to Mr. McWilliams, also on the same point, at a subsequent meeting, and he also stated that Mr. Robinson did not desire to be examined. I thought that, under these circumstances, there was no necessity for asking the Commissioners to compel his attendance. Mr. McWilliams is Mr. Robinson's law partner, and attended professionally on behalf of the firm, at the various meetings of the Commissioners, Messrs. Robinson and McWilliams, being solicitors for the Toronto Corporation, who hold stock in the Company, claiming on that ground the right to be present."

Mr. BLAKE.

There is the following endorsement on the copy of the subpoena which was issued:—

"Attended at Mr. Robinson's house to serve him on the 23rd October, 1876, when I was informed that he was not in; I attended at his office in the City Hall again on the 24th October, 1876; not in.

(Signed) "C. W. THOMPSON,

"17th March, 1877."

Mr. BOWELL: Who signed the last letter?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The letter is signed—"Oliver Mowat."

THE LONDON EMIGRATION AGENCY.

QUESTION.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) asked whether Mr. Dore had been permanently appointed Emigration Agent in London, or whether the appointment was provisional or temporary, and whether any commission or letter of appointment had been issued or directed to him as Emigration Agent, or whether any other person in England or elsewhere had been promised the appointment of Emigration Agent at London, or of Agent-General there.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said Mr. Dore was only acting temporarily as Agent. No appointment had been made there as yet.

THE GREAT SEAL OF NOVA SCOTIA.

QUESTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked whether the Government was aware that the Courts of Nova Scotia had decided that the late Great Seal which had been in use since December, 1865, was illegal, and if so, whether the Government contemplated dealing, or whether they had any power to deal, with this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have merely to say that we have no official knowledge of that matter, nor any knowledge of any kind about it. I may add that no communication has been addressed to the Government on the subject.

THE FISHERY COMMISSION.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said his hon friend the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), asked the other day if the Fishery Commission, provided for under the Washington Treaty, had been appointed. The Government were not in a position to make any announcement at that time; but he could now state that Sir Alex. T. Galt had been appointed to represent Canada and that the Commission was now complete. The other Commissioners were the Hon. E. H. Kellogg for the United States, and Mr. Delforse, Belgian Minister at Washington.

PIERS AT BAIE ST. PAUL, MALBAIE, AND EBOULEMENTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. CIMON moved for a statement showing the quantity, quality and dimensions of timber supplied by Mr. Adolphe Gagnon for each of the piers at Baie St. Paul, Malbaie and Ebolements, in the county of Charlevoix, and also the price per foot paid for such timber during the fiscal year 1875-76.

Motion agreed to.

ORDNANCE PROPERTY AT QUEBEC.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. CARON moved for a statement showing:

1st. The instructions given and to whom given for the division of the Ordnance property at Quebec, known as the Cove Field;

2nd. The cost of dividing, also for advertising, and of selling the same;

3rd. The names of the parties receiving such sums of money, the amount received by each of them, and the reason of such appointment;

4th. The amount of such sale, the names of the purchasers, the amount paid by each on each lot, and the balance remaining unpaid.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would suggest that the words "and the reason of such appointment," be struck out. He must decline giving the reasons for the appointment of an officer.

Mr. CARON said there could not be much to conceal.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not know that there was anything to conceal, but he objected to the principle of giving such reasons.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LACHINE CANAL STAFF.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. CARON moved for a statement showing:

1st. The names and salaries or wages of each officer composing the Government staff of the Lachine Canal, for each of the years 1875-76 and 1876-77;

2nd. The amount of contingencies in connection with said staff for each of these year;

3rd. The dates of appointment of each such officer.

Motion agreed to.

THE DISMISSAL OF WILLIAM COLWELL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for all correspondence, telegrams, and orders in connection with the dismissal of William Colwell, Locker in the Custom House Department, St. John, New Brunswick; also, all papers, telegrams, and correspondence, in connection with the investigation carried on by Inspector Cudlip, together with his report thereon, date of dismissal, copy of medical report as to his health after examination; a statement of all other official appointments which were offered him, copy of letter addressed by Commissioner Johnson, at Ottawa, to the Department of the Minister of Justice recommending him for an appointment; together with a statement of the fund from which the sum of one hundred dollars was paid him; of the grounds for such payment and the account to which such payment was charged in the Public Accounts. He said, if there were any merits in this case, the motion ought, properly speaking, to have been made by some hon. member representing the city or county of St. John. The only reason why he took it up was because he had been requested to do so, and that he felt it only right that every New Brunswicker should receive that justice which was due to him. Mr. Colwell was suspended on the 10th July, 1875, by the Collector for depositing the keys of the warehouse with a person not connected with the Department, and for "being guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer of the Crown." It might hardly be well to place before the House the papers which had been placed in his (Mr. Domville's) hands, as very serious charges were preferred therein against gentlemen in authority, and they censured a Minister of the Crown. He thought they were proper for the consideration of a Committee, which, although it was late in the Session, he hoped might investigate the matter. Mr. Colwell's explanation was to the effect that on the day on which his offence was committed he was suddenly taken sick and had to go home. He left the keys with the person in charge of the warehouse, expecting a locker to arrive shortly afterwards and take them to the Custom House. Through some mischance or other, the locker did not put in an appearance, and hence the keys were taken by a private person. He (Mr. Domville) thought some allowance ought to be made when an officer was sick. After having been treated in this way, however, on the 29th October Mr. Colwell received a letter from Mr. Johnson, Deputy Minister of Customs, intimating that the hon. the Minister of Justice would get him employment in the North-West. Mr. Colwell came to Ottawa and received $100, and was told that he would get employment if he went out to Manitoba. After thinking the matter over, he came to the conclusion that it would be unwise to go to that Province without having employment beforehand, and he informed the hon. the Minister of Justice of his decision. Mr. Colwell then claimed that he was locked up in a room until he should return the $100, but, although he (Mr. Domville) could not vouch for this extraordinary proceeding, yet he had the satisfaction of knowing that the money was not returned. It appeared very strange that a person who had been dismissed the service as an unfit person in July should, in October, be offered employment and receive a donation of $100. Mr. Colwell was advised to go home, and an investigation was had into the causes of his dismissal. No evidence of material consequence was given against him. One or two men swore that he was a little addicted to liquor; others, who had known him for ten years, declared they had never known him to be the worse for liquor. Mr. Colwell was anxious that the matter should be thoroughly investigated, and that the administration of the office in St. John should also be inquired into. He claimed that all sorts of improper things were done there. He (Mr. Domville) held in his hands the order of the Collector to exchange teas, and Mr. Colwell stated that one man was allowed to go to the warehouse and get his teas as he pleased, and that, when he remonstrated and refused to cover up things, this charge of drunkenness was preferred against him.

He found that there was really no substantial charge against the man. Before he asked for a Committee to investigate the matter, he must see the papers.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said there was no objection, of course, to the papers in connection with the transaction coming down to the House; and they would be brought down as soon as possible. Without entering into the particulars of the case, he would say that, soon after Mr. Colwell was suspended, the Inspector was instructed to examine his case, which he did, and reported adversely to him. Mr. Colwell subsequently came to Ottawa, as he said, to refute the charges made against him, and he was told that if he could establish his innocence he would be reinstated or given another situation. A very full investigation was again held in St. John by Inspector Cudlip, and the report, which was very voluminous, would show that the Government had acted as it was bound to do. He did not wish to make the matter worse than it was, but he must say that it was the most exceptional case of the kind he had met with. He was sure his hon. friend, when he saw the papers, would agree that the conduct of Mr. Colwell was such as could not be overlooked. He (Mr. Burpee) held in his hand a communication from Mr. Johnson, denying that he had officially recommended Mr. Colwell to a situation in the Department of Justice, or any other Department. And, further, there was no payment of $100 made to him on account of any public fund, nor was there any such payment charged in the Public Accounts.

Mr. PALMER said he had never heard of the case until it was brought up in the House, and he had nothing whatever to do with it. Of course, Mr. Colwell had a right to select his own representative in Parliament, and no doubt his hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville), with his great pertinacity, would attend to the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs to the statement of Mr. Colwell that he got a letter from Mr. Johnson to the Department of Justice, recommending him to a position in Manitoba; and to the fact that Mr. Johnson only denied making an official recommendation. If Mr. Colwell was dismissed for dereliction of duty in St. John and soon afterwards got a recommendation for a position in Manitoba, there must be something wrong.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he knew of no official recommendation.

Mr. BLAKE said he had an indistinct recollection of an application being made in Ottawa by somebody from New Brunswick for an appointment in the North-West, but his terms were such as could not be agreed to by the Department. His recollection was that the conversation was with some person other than Mr. Colwell. He certainly never offered to give the appointment to Mr. Colwell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that the hon. the Minister of Justice should make an investigation for anything bearing on the matter.

Motion agreed to.

THE ALASKA BOUNDARY LINE.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ROSCOE moved for copies of all letters from Government officials in British Columbia to the Government in respect to the escape of the prisoner Martin on alleged United States territory; also of a demand made upon Mr. Buck to pay duties to the United States Custom House Officer. He said two Sessions ago, when he moved for returns as to the boundary line between British Columbia and Alaska, he made the prediction that, if the question was not soon settled, there would probably arise a difficulty between the British Columbia and United States Governments; and his prediction had been verified. During last summer two difficulties had arisen, both of which showed the importance of this question. A Canadian officer was coming down the Stikeen, near the boundary line, with two prisoners, who managed to escape, assaulting the constable first, however. One was recaptured and taken back and punished for the assault and the attempted escape. The other could not be touched, on the ground, as was alleged; that he made his escape on

United States territory, that was to say, north of the boundary line, the 49th parallel. That boundary line was settled by treaty between Russia and Great Britain in 1825, and was confirmed in 1825 by the Treaty of Washington. The boundary line at that point was held to be a range of mountains extending by the coast, but as there was another range of mountains fifteen miles away from the coast, it was extremely desirable that there should be no dispute as to which range of mountains was meant. Where Martin escaped was beyond the range. The United States officials absolutely refused to entertain the notion of giving him up, they holding that he had escaped while in United States territory, and, therefore, beyond British jurisdiction. The other case related to a Custom-house on the river, placed there during some gold mining operations. The Collector from Victoria was sent up to fix upon some spot. He went beyond the range of mountains and established a Customs station, leaving an officer there. That was in 1874. In 1875, this officer, on the part of Canada, and Major Berry and General Howard, commander of the Alaska forces, on the part of the United States, fixed upon a particular spot, about two-and-a-half miles above the range of mountains. It was agreed that this point should be considered as the boundary line, until the question was definitely settled; and here the Canadian Customs officer fixed his tent. For two years he lived on that spot. Last Session, he (Mr. Roscoe) brought the matter before the House as to building a suitable residence for the officer, the Collector at Victoria having strongly recommended that this should be done, especially as it would only cost $500. As he (Mr. Roscoe) understood it, the proposal was agreed to; but, as yet, nothing had been done, and last summer the officer was ordered to go higher up the river. At the interview referred to, when the temporary agreement as to the boundary line was made, there was present Mr. Buck, who heard what was said and understood what was agreed upon. So last summer he built a store within the British line, costing $4,000, for the purpose of trading with the Indians. But no sooner had the Canadian Custom-house officer removed from the spot than the United States authorities said if Mr. Buck did not withdraw, all his stock would be seized if he did not pay United States Customs duties. The value of his stock was about $3,000. He (Mr. Roscoe) wanted to know what action the Government proposed to take in the matter. He understood there were letters on the subject by the Circuit Judge and by the Collector at Victoria, which were considered important.

Mr. ROSCOE.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman would find, when the papers were brought down, that the Government had given the matter their earnest attention. But the correspondence was in such a condition that it was not in the public interest that even the small portion asked for should be brought down; and, upon the whole, it was perhaps better that no statement should be made, except that the Government had been diligent in asserting what they believed to be the rights of Canada, that nothing had been conceded which could be fairly maintained, and that efforts had been directed to obtaining a settled boundary line; and, pending that, the maintenance of the existing state of things; and, failing that again, the Government had directed an officer of their own to make such a general examination as would verify them in the position which they thought they had a right to take. Two questions were involved: One was the boundary line, and the other was the navigation of the Stikeen, and there were many important points connected with the latter. It was very difficult to determine whether the point where Martin escaped was above or below the boundary line, and any information on this point would be welcome to the Government, as would also any information of a definite character regarding the location of the Custom-house referred to. The Government had not supposed that any agreement had been arrived at. He asked his hon. friend to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUNSTER said that when the Custom-house office at Stikeen River moved back, the American officers took advantage of that circumstance to advance what they claimed to be the boundary line.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

SUPPLIES FOR THE MOUNTED POLICE.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for returns showing by whom the pork stuffs supplied to the Mounted Police Force in the North-West Territory and Manitoba were furnished; the quantity and description of such stuffs supplied; the prices asked as well as the prices paid therefor; the point from where they were shipped and the cost of conveyance per 100 lb. to the point of their final destination; also, all correspondence shewing whether such stuffs were called for and supplied by tender publicly advertised; together with copies of any notices for tenders, as well as all tenders received since the establishing and locating of said Mounted Police Force in the North-West Territory and Manitoba. He said he submitted the motion in the interests of the country. It was the policy of the late Government that all contracts should be given out by tender, and when supplies were required the tenders should be advertised for. In this case, he was given to understand large sums of money had been expended without tenders being invited. The Public Accounts showed that large amounts were annually expended on the Mounted Police Force in the North-West. They found that while the expenditure for the volunteers in Ontario and the other Provinces was constantly diminishing, the expenditure on the North-West Police was regularly increasing. While he had no objection to the maintenance of the Mounted Police, he held that the Government should carry out the policy advocated by their party when in Opposition. Those hon. gentlemen were violating their pledges in every shape and form, and in the present case he was led to believe that a prominent supporter of the Government had secured a contract without tenders having been invited. Mr. Miller obtained his contract because he was a Government favourite and a warm supporter, and that at prices beyond those paid in the West. The western portion of Ontario was the pork-producing portion of Canada, and the people could not understand how a gentleman not directly in the trade, and not living in the district where pork was produced, could have obtained the contract.

Mr. BLAKE: Where does he live?

Mr. STEPHENSON said the gentleman lived in Ingersoll. The people living in the pork-packing section of the country had been unjustly treated, in that advertisements calling for tenders had not been published and tenders invited. If such was true, the public should know the reason why it occurred; if it was not true the facts should be made known to the people. The transaction was a violation of the principles promulgated by those hon. members when in Opposition, and if they had violated those principles in that respect, as in many others, the country should know the facts, so that the people when called on to vote could vote intelligently and give reasons for their votes.

Mr. BLAKE said he had received from the Secretary of State, who had charge of the Mounted Police, the following information:—

“The first detachment of police (about 150) was sent to Manitoba upon very short notice, in September, 1873, and during the winter of 1873-74 was supplied from the Hudson Bay Company's stores, I believe at rates similar to those charged the militia. When the force was recruited to its full extent for the journey to the Rocky Mountains (May, 1874), an agent was sent to Chicago and St. Paul to purchase such articles of provisions as it was considered could be purchased in the States at cheaper rates than in Canada; the bacon required was obtained at St. Paul, Minnesota, at 12½c. per pound, American currency. 25 bbls. of pork were also purchased there at $19.50 per barrel, American currency. The pork (bacon) required for the force on its return from the expedition in 1874, was obtained in Winnipeg, Manitoba,—tenders were called for by public advertisement. On the 16th April, 1875, Mr. Nixon was instructed to communicate with the Commissioners and purchase, amongst other things, sufficient bacon for two divisions (100 men) for six months. He had represented that he could purchase them cheaper than at a later day. The bacon for 1876-77 was included with other articles for which tenders were called, but, owing to complaints as to the quality of the pork purchased in Manitoba, a supply was obtained in Ontario—Ingersoll; with the addition of freight charges to Manitoba, this bacon cost about two cents per pound more than the tenders for supply at Winnipeg. Small quantities have at various times been purchased from storekeepers in Manitoba, but the above mentioned include all large quantities. The bacon required for the force in the southern parts of the Territories has been supplied by Baker & Co., of Fort Benton, Montana, either under contract, or at prices certified by the Assistant Commissioner of the force. It will require some little time to obtain a statement of all the prices and quantities."

Mr. SCHULTZ said, that in the matter of the supplies to the Mounted Police, under the most favourable circumstances, there must be very great expense, owing to the remoteness of the posts where a portion of that force was stationed, while he was glad that the motion of his hon. friend from Kent allowed him an opportunity of speaking generally on the subject of the contracts for these supplies. In the absence of the Minister in charge of the Department, he would only allude generally to the enormous sums which the supplies for a portion of this force cost. In the Public Accounts for last year, it was shown that one firm, J. G. Baker & Co., had received from the public purse $127,668.92, for various purposes connected with the North-West Mounted Police; and among the items which made up this enormous sum, there was $30,438.29 for provisions, $31,428.25 for forage, $707 for horse-shoes, and $1,342.32 for medicines and medical comforts. Now the accounts did not, of course, show to what particular posts these supplies were furnished, nor was there any way of ascertaining, definitely, the number of men for whom these supplies were provided. However, as the establishment of Messrs. J. G. Baker & Co. was in the Bow River country, and as the force maintained last year at or near Fort McLeod seemed to have been about 120 men, it would appear that, if these supplies were for them, they had entailed a cost of about $250 per man for provisions.

Mr. BLAKE said that the supplies were for the southern district, about two-thirds of the whole force. -

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that he had no means of knowing this, and that it would, of course, alter the per capita estimate; but, even if there were the number stated by the hon. the Minister, the cost would still be very great. For provisions, they would still have a cost of $150 per man; for forage, supposing the number of horses to be equal or somewhat in excess of the number of men, they would have $140 per horse. In the matter of these supplies generally, it was to be regretted that tenders were not, in every case, asked for. J. G. Baker & Co. might be a very respectable firm. He had no reason to doubt that fact; and it might be also, notwithstanding the enormous cost of that which they furnished, that the Government might have done the best that could have been done under the circumstances; yet the principle was a false one. Tenders should be asked for the furnishing of the supplies for the Mounted Police, not only in Montana, the nearest place they were attainable at, but Manitoba should be given a chance to compete, and also the principal cities of the Dominion; and, in this way, Canadian products might, possibly, be used, and some of our own people have a chance of participating in the supply of that for which the Government seemed to have paid J. G. Baker & Co. the enormous sum of $127,668.92.

Mr. BLAKE said the House would remember that he was obliged to state last Session that the vote for the North-West Mounted Police for the previous financial year had been very much under-estimated, and a large portion of the vote which he asked for was taken in point of fact for arrears. His hon. friend from Lisgar, if he investigated the subject, would find that the amounts covered more than one year, and therefore his calculation as to the per capita cost was incorrect. The cost of supplies in that distant region was very great, and the cost of forage was enormous. There was great difficulty in obtaining supplies and the water communication had to be largely used in transportation. The season was very short, and it would be necessary to make a special contract in advance in order that the period of high water might be made available for the transport of these supplies. He quite agreed with the general principle that proposals for tenders should be as widely spread as possible, but his hon. friend from Lisgar would find that, in order to supply this force at that distant point, it would be found extremely difficult to ask persons from remote parts to tender when they were not aware of what the means of communication were, or by what mode supplies should be sent. Under such circumstances the figures would be either extravagant, or they would be founded on guess work at the present time, and for some time to come. He hoped that the expenses for forage, either this or next year, would be very considerably reduced by the establishment of some settlers, at any rate in the vicinity of the post, who would grow supplies of that description. These might be sold at enormously remunerative rates if raised on the spot, and at the same time the price would be much cheaper than if purchased in a remote part of the country.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said his hon. friend had very properly made this motion. He had no doubt that the Minister of Justice was doing the best he could in the public interests in securing these supplies; but he (Mr. Blake) could not be surprised if the House and country were not exactly satisfied with the very large expenditure which had taken place in connection with this force. Whether a right or wrong course had been pursued, the country would have been better satisfied if all parties in it had had a chance to compete for the furnishing of these supplies. He, moreover, took exception to what the Minister of Justice had stated. He knew that the firm of Baker and Co. were very respectable and wealthy, but this firm did not produce these supplies. They had to buy them, and other respectable firms lived in their city as well as a long way from that section of the country. It would have been much better if the hon. gentlemen opposite had acted up to the doctrine they had always laid down. These hon. gentlemen had insisted upon the late Administration tendering for such things on all occasions, and they (the Opposition) felt that this matter was not in the position it should occupy.

Mr. BLAKE said he ordered the supplies to be tendered for, but, on the statement of the Assistant Commissioner, who went down there to look after it, and in consideration of the time and circumstances besides, he had taken the responsibility of acting as he did. The Assistant Commissioner had informed him that a loss instead of a gain would be sustained if tenders were called for.

Mr. POPE said he understood this. His hon. friend no doubt thought he had acted in the best interests of the country.

Mr. BLAKE: And I know it now.

Mr. POPE said the best proof of this would have been to have asked for tenders. Even the Assistant Commissioner might be mistaken, although he had great confidence in that gentleman's judgment. It would have been much the safer course to have advertised for tenders. This was always the proper way to act under such circumstances. This was one of the reasons why they felt that there should be an investigation. Great care should be taken even by the Minister of Justice to refrain from putting himself in a false position. This service had cost a very large sum, and more per head, as the Minister of Finance had told them, than the soldiers of the United States.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I said the very reverse.

Mr. POPE: I understood my hon. friend to say so.

Mr. BLAKE: He said that this mounted force cost about the same as the American foot soldiers.

Mr. POPE: My hon. friend will admit that they cost about $1,000 per man.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I remember the conversation alluded to. My statement was that the cost was rather less than more than the cost of the United States soldiers. I was referring to them generally and not to the cavalry force. As a matter of fact, deducting the arrearages paid, the cost does not quite amount to $1,000.

Mr. POPE said the cost was very large at any rate. He found one item in one corner of the Estimates and another in another corner relating to this force, and he felt that this was done with something like a purpose. The Government evidently did not like to show the House in one lump sum the great cost of the force. His hon. friend had done well in moving for the papers.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said no doubt there had been a feeling of disappointment among the people of Manitoba, owing to the fact that they had not had an opportunity for tendering for these supplies. However, they were not aware of the circumstances explained by the Minister of Justice. He believed they were satisfied with the general system of getting supplies by asking for tenders throughout the country. This was perfectly fair. He did not doubt that the Government would give them an opportunity of tendering in the future for these supplies, as this was expected; and, if they could get equally good terms as could be got elsewhere, they would have the contract.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he would like to add that these supplies were not all obtained in this country. He believed that they should be obtained among our own people. He did not think that this money should be sent into a foreign country. He was surprised that so flimsy an excuse should have been offered for the violation of an established principle, which was a correct one. When the papers came down they would be able to place the matter before the country in a proper light.

REPAIRS TO BREAKWATERS ON THE SOUTH SHORE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

MOTION FOR INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. ROY moved for copies of all the instructions given to Mr. Kingsford, of the Department of Public Works, and of all reports and correspondence in relation to repairs and other work done on the Breakwaters at L'Islet, Rivière Ouëlle, Rivière du Loup and Rimouski, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, Province of Quebec; also a statement showing the amounts expended for such work or repairs on each of the said Breakwaters.

LOSS OF A MAIL BAG.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) moved for copies of all correspondence between the Postmaster-General and the Post Office Inspector at Halifax and other Post Office officials, with reference to the loss of a mail-bag between Truro and Halifax, on or about the 14th December last, and which contained two or more registered letters containing sums of money, with all correspondence with reference to the loss of said money. He said the mail that was sent from Truro on the 14th December, according to all accounts, never reached the office in Halifax. It contained several registered letters, amounting to some $114. If he was correctly informed, the Post Office officials at Halifax never reported the lost bag until one of the parties who had mailed a money letter enquired what had become of it, and then it was discovered that the mail had been lost. He was aware that the Government were not liable for the loss of money in the mail, but Post Office officials were liable to the Government, and such investigation should be held in this matter as would bring the fault home to the guilty party. Even if the money was not stolen in Halifax, the Postmaster was guilty of gross carelessness in not reporting the loss.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was no objection to the papers being brought down. The facts were as the hon. gentleman had stated, but there was a dispute as to where the bag was lost, whether the blame attached to the conductor who carried the mail or the baggage-master who received it. The hon. member seemed to censure the Postmaster at Halifax, but the information the Government had received from the Inspector was to the effect that one of the clerks at Halifax had neglected to report the circumstance. The Postmaster never had his attention called to the matter until one of the parties who had mailed a money letter made enquiries concerning it. The facts, however, could be more completely discussed when the papers came down. He need only now assure the House that every possible means were being taken to ferret out the circumstances under which the bag was lost.

COTEAU AND PROVINCE LINE RAILWAY AND BRIDGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. CURRIER moved the first reading of the Bill (No. 98) (from the Senate) To amend the Coteau and Province Line Railway and Bridge Act.

DEPARTMENTAL PRINTING.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for the amount in detail of departmental printing of each Department respectively, the names of the persons or parties who made such printing, with the names of the parties who have such printing not yet finished, with the conditions entered into, and the amount in value of the work yet to be done. He said that a great amount of printing was being done for the Department of Agriculture. Hon. members had been kept busy sending pamphlets to their constituents in regard to the North-West Territories. While this expenditure might be of great service, there ought to be some limit or check on departmental printing. He had no objection to the Government giving certain patronage to newspapers, providing they were not owned by members of Parliament. That was perhaps the only way in a new country, where the newspapers had many difficulties to contend with and met with little encouragement, in which the press could be in a manner sustained. But, as he said before, there ought to be some limit, and the accounts and expenditures should be under parliamentary supervision.

Motion agreed to.

THE POSTMASTER OF MONTMAGNY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for copies of a certain report made against the Postmaster at Montmagny, Jean Stanislas Vallée, Esquire, in connection with a pretended enquiry held by Achille Talbot, Esquire, Deputy Inspector of Post Offices for the district of Quebec, and of all papers, documents and correspondence thereunto relating. He said, although Montmagny was not in his county, he had the consent of the hon. member for that constituency to ask for this report. Mr. Vallée had been postmaster for 25 years, and, until now, had given every satisfaction to the public. A zealous friend of the Government, however, had tried to annoy him by having this enquiry instituted. The motion was made for the purpose of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the hon. gentleman might have changed the terms of his motion and not have insinuated that it was a "pretended" enquiry. The hon. gentleman was in error also in supposing that the enquiry was conducted by Mr. Talbot; it was conducted by Mr. Shepherd during the present month. The evidence had just been received; it was very voluminous and he had not yet had time to look at it. He would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the motion until the Department had time to consider the report.

Mr. BABY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLAKE: No, no.

Mr. MASSON: If the motion is moved again it will never be reached.

Mr. BLAKE said it was unprecedented, when papers had just reached the Department which it might be improper to bring down, to move the adjournment of the debate in order that the time might arrive at which the papers could be brought down. The motion was premature. The papers had not been considered and the inquiry was therefore still pending. The proper time for asking for the report was when Government action had been taken upon it.

Mr. BLANCHET said when the time for resuming the debate arrived it would be very easy for the hon. the Postmaster-General to state the reason, if there was any, why the demand could not be complied with. The matter could be allowed to drop then. He asked his hon. friend (Mr. Huntington) to allow the motion to pass.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the hon. member's action was rather in the nature of taking the thing out of his hands. Let the hon. gentleman give him a fair opportunity to consider the papers, and, if they were not considered correctly, he might then move a vote of want of confidence in his administration. He was sure the hon. gentleman would see the propriety of withdrawing the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he presumed there would be no objection to bringing down the papers as soon as they were looked at.

Mr. BLAKE: Not if they are proper to be brought down.

Mr. BABY said he had no intention of moving a vote of want of confidence in his hon. friend's administration. He asked leave to withdraw his motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRESERVATION OF THE BUFFALO.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved for copies of all communications from the first Council of the North-West Territory in regard to the preservation of the buffalo; all communications on the same subject from Indian Commissioners or other Dominion Government officials, and all Orders in Council or Acts passed by the present Government of the North-West Territories having this object in view. He said that he had brought up the subject of the preservation of the buffalo last year, and on that occasion had explained that, from various causes, the destruction of the buffalo had been very great indeed, and was becoming greater as the circle wherein they were to be found was being gradually narrowed. About ten years ago he had seen buffalo east of the Red River, and now they were only to be found by going several hundred miles to the west of that stream. Crowded westward by the settlement of the country, and the hunting parties from the Red River settlement, they were now attacked on the north by the hunters from the new settlements on the Saskatchewan, while from the south the hunters of the Missouri made their onslaught. Added to these sources of diminution was the number killed by the Cree and Blackfoot Indians who inhabited the buffalo country proper; and the wolves, together with the loss caused by drowning, made up the quota, which was estimated by the Rev. Father Lacombe, a perfectly reliable authority, to be a destruction of about eighty thousand in winter and eighty thousand in summer, making a total of 160,000 killed yearly. Unfortunately, too, it was the female buffalo which was selected, if possible, her evenly distributed protection from the cold making the best robe, and her flesh being the best for pemmican and dry meat purposes, and hence it was that late travellers reported meeting droves of buffalo in which the proportion of cows was only about one sixth. Now, while it was a fact that the very existence of the plain tribes of Indians depended upon this valuable animal, it was obviously desirable that they should be prevented as long as possible. The same authority (Father Lacombe) whom he (Mr. Schultz) had already quoted, estimated that, at the present rate of destruction, in eight years the buffalo would be extinct, and was of the opinion that, were a law enforced which would prevent the killing of these animals from 1st November to 1st May, and calves at all seasons, in five years the increase would be such that the restriction might be removed. Several years ago, in speaking of the condition of the Indians of the North-West, he (Mr. Schultz) had pointed out the results likely to be occasioned by the entire destruction of the buffalo. The animal was invaluable to the Indian, because its flesh was his food, the hide his house and clothing, while the sale of its robe furnished him with all that he needed of European manufacture. Without this source of supply the Indian would become a pauper and, by an easy transition, a marauder. To avert these results it was obvious that the buffalo must be protected, at least, till a time arrived when the Indians who now inhabited these hunting grounds could be weaned from the chase and taught to depend wholly or in part upon agriculture. From one of the Government sources of information he was glad to see their attention directed towards this matter, and hon. gentlemen would find in page 34 of the Minister of the Interior's report the following statement of Mr. Dickieson:—

“The subject which at present takes precedence of all others in connection with the Indian question in the North-West Territories is the preservation of the buffalo. The rapid decrease in the numbers of the buffalo has become a matter of alarm to the Indians, who see that, unless steps are speedily taken to arrest it, their future condition will be one of extreme hardship. That the buffalo are decreasing in number in a rapidly increasing ratio is a fact admitted on all sides. A few years ago they were found in plenty over all the country extending from points eastward of Fort Ellice to the Rocky Mountains, and from the north branch of the Saskatchewan to the United States boundary line. Hemmed in by the American hunters, the Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegans and kindred tribes of Indians on the south and west, and by the half-breeds, Salteaux and Crees on the north and east, the area over which they then roamed has been gradually encroached upon, and their numbers reduced. This summer they have come further east than they have for many years, and were found within a few miles of the Touchwood Hills Post, while south of the Qu'Appelle they were reported to have been seen not far from the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba. But, while they were thus plentiful in the south and east section of the country I have above referred to, there were few or none to be found in the west and north, and the Blackfeet and other tribes in these quarters were said to be starving, and following the buffalo eastward. I am aware that this question has already received some consideration on the part of the Government, and that representations have been made by parties better informed than I claim to be, as to the necessity of some action in regard to it. For this reason I will not enter into the matter as fully as I would otherwise have done.

“While at the Qu'Appelle Lakes, the Cree Chiefs, accompanied by their principal headmen, waited upon me, and represented that they were becoming alarmed on account of their means of subsistence failing; and begged me to report what they said to the Government, and to convey their request that something should be done to prevent the entire extermination of the buffalo. To show the importance they attach to this question, I may remark that each chief and his headman separately made the same request. In all my previous intercourse with the Indians I have never seen this course adopted. In discussing other matters, a spokesman is generally chosen who speaks for all, the others merely signifying their assent; but in this case it was evident they considered something more was necessary, and adopted this method to impress the gravity of their position upon me. In my opinion the buffalo must be protected, or in a few years, not more than ten at the furthest, the whole number of Indians in the North-West, who now rely upon these animals for subsistence, will require to be fed and maintained principally at the expense of the Dominion Government. I can see no other alternative, as it is an impossibility to teach them in a short time to forsake their present mode of life and adopt that of civilized men. The subject is one which demands and should receive the early consideration of the Government, for the peace and consequent prosperity of the North-West Territories depend in a great measure upon it. Should the buffalo become exterminated, it is not to be expected that the starving Indians will refrain from helping themselves to the supplies to be found in the stores of the Hudson's Bay Company and other traders; compelled by hunger, outrages might be committed by them which would result in an Indian war. These are the views of everyone who is well informed regarding the state of the country, and, while I admit that the Indians at present are peaceable, well disposed and have every confidence in the Government, I think there can be no doubt that they are correct.”

It would be seen from this statement that Mr. Dickieson corroborated his (Mr. Schultz's) own assertion on several occasions that the Indians themselves fully appreciated the danger to themselves, and would willingly submit to a protective measure, such as suggested by Father Lacombe. When the matter was brought up in the House last Session, the Premier stated that the Government had the matter under consideration, but as yet they had heard of nothing being done. A new Government had been established in the North-West, and machinery for the enforcement of any preventive measure had been in existence for some time, and he (Mr. Schultz) could not but believe that some one was to blame for the neglect of this important matter. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were being spent for the maintenance of a Government and Police Force in the North-West. The treaties made were not likely to be satisfactory to the Indians when the settlement of the country pressed upon them, and it was clearly the duty of the Government, who were by law constituted the guardians of this little understood and often traduced race, to see that, while by the stipulations of their treaties they were allowed to hunt over the lands which, often with many misgivings and under the pressure of necessity, they had sold, this game, the best gift, in their opinion, that the Great Spirit had given, should be preserved to them and for their use against the present wholesale destruction and inevitable extermination.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was happy to be able to concur entirely with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz). It was very necessary that some steps should be taken to prevent the entire destruction of the buffalo in the North-West. This was a matter in which there might be reciprocity with the United States. We should give them the same measure which they gave us. They did not permit any except American citizens to go to their territories and trade and hunt, and even their own citizens were forced to get licenses. The slaughter and disappearance of the buffalo was owing in a large measure to the inducements held out to American traders. A large number of the robes went to the other side, and, while the Canadian trader lost profit so far as this was concerned, the buffalo were also rapidly decreasing, or, rather, gradually but surely being killed out. He hoped that the Government would be able to devise some means to exclude to some extent the ingress of American traders, and also, as far as possible, to give protection to the buffalo.

Mr. RYAN said he was happy that one subject had been found upon which all the members from Manitoba could agree, this being the first upon which they could agree during the two or three Sessions in which he had been in the House. He thought there was no reason for difference of opinion on this subject. Every hon. gentleman who had given the matter any consideration must be convinced that there was very strong necessity for the protection of the buffalo. Hitherto our relations with the Indian tribes had been very satisfactory; but he thought that, in a year or two, or four or five years at the furthest, we would be called upon to enter into a new phase of the Indian question, and one which would require the exercise of the greatest vigilance and care, if we were to preserve the same satisfactory relations with the Indians. Hitherto the Indian tribes in the North-West had been almost entirely self-supporting. The small grant made to them by this Government, although, perhaps, sufficiently onerous to this Dominion, was only a trifle in aid of the Indians. As his hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) had pointed out, these Indians subsisted almost entirely upon the buffalo. Its robes furnished them, directly or indirectly, with clothing, and its flesh with meat. They subsisted upon buffalo month after month, and year after year, and followed it around on the vast plains. What rendered the question all the more important was the fact, that buffalo was almost the only game that could subsist upon the plains; and, when the buffalo disappeared—as it almost inevitably would in a few years unless the hands of the Government were raised to stay its slaughter—then all the Indians would be thrown upon the Government. It was, therefore, of the greatest importance that some steps should be taken to preserve the buffalo. He thought they would all agree upon this point. But perhaps they would not all be of the same opinion as to how far it was possible to protect the buffalo. There was a difference of opinion as to how far it was necessary to go in order to make that protection effective. He had conversed with several gentlemen who were au fait in regard to the matter, and it was their opinion, and also the opinion of one of the authorities quoted by the hon. member for Lisgar, Father Lacombe, a few years ago, that protection to the buffalo, in order to be effective, would have to extend to an almost total prohibition of the killing of the buffalo for five years. This would entail the support of the Indians upon the Government. If the finances of this Dominion were able to bear the strain, he would be very happy to see the Government do so; but he was afraid we were not able to go so far. If we did not, but only took a single step in the path of protection, it would be necessary to go as far at least as to prohibit the trade in buffalo robes and pemmican. In addition to this, it would be necessary to induce the buffalo Indians to devote some portion of their time to agricultural pursuits. But he doubted whether we were in a position to go even as far as that. Supposing the trade in the buffalo robes were prohibited, the consequence would be that the large market at present available in the North-West for the consumption of the excessive supplies of Manitoba would be taken away. For several years, Manitoba must look to the west for a market. Last year, the first for three years, there was a slight surplus, and he had no doubt that next year there would be a large surplus. If the buffalo trade in the west were stopped, Manitoba would be deprived of the largest market for her breadstuffs. He thought, before the Government took a step in this direction, it would be necessary for them to carefully consider the matter. It seemed to him until the Pacific Railway was built between Thunder Bay and Red River it would be impossible for them to go even that far, and at the same time no protection would be effective which did not, for a number of years, prohibit the enormous slaughter of buffalo now going on.

Mr. MILLS said this subject had received the serious consideration of the Government. So far as he had been able to look into the matter, he was of the opinion that it had better be left to be dealt with by the Government of the North-West rather than by Parliament here. From the information in the possession of the Government, there could be no doubt that the buffalo were rapidly diminishing, and this diminution had sensibly increased since American traders had come across. Ever since the settlement of Manitoba, also, the buffalo had retreated farther and farther to the west. The Half-breeds, in their pursuits, had invaded the country of the Blackfeet and Blood Indians, and much complaint had arisen thereupon. The Government had some information which they could supply, such as a report by the North-West Council and a communication from one or two missionaries. He saw one of the missionaries a short time ago, and obtained from him all the information possible. He had come to the conclusion that it would be a very formidable undertaking. The missionary he spoke of said it would be necessary to induce the Indians to obey the law, as at present they had not sufficient respect for each other to observe any regulation. The result was that those who would be disposed to refrain from destroying the buffalo were prevented from acting upon such a principle by the fact that others would not act in the same way. His informant's opinion further was that it would be necessary to get the Indians to abandon the plains and live along the borders of some of the lakes for a period of four or five years. They could subsist by fishing and agriculture during that time, although the Government would also be obliged to contribute very considerably to their support. The Local Government of the North-West could probably devise a cheaper and better plan than this Parliament, it being on the spot and more familiar with the matter.

Mr. PLUMB said he did not think the matter ought to be left with the Local Government. It was a matter of great consequence that the buffalo should be protected as it was the only means of subsistence for the Indians. The difficulty was one which should be met at the outset.

Mr. MILLS remarked that the difficulty was with the Half-breeds more than with the Indians.

Mr. DAVIES said the buffalo, like the deep sea fish, ought to be protected.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) enquired whether the Government intended to do anything to prevent American hunters and traders coming here, when Canadian hunters and traders were not allowed to go into American territory.

Mr. MILLS said the Government were not in a position to express any opinion on the subject, although the fact, as stated, was known.

Mr. TROW said it would be quite out of place to prohibit the legitimate slaughter of buffalo, because there were thousands dependent upon the buffalo for their sustenance. It was the wanton cruelty that he complained of. There were a great number of Half-breeds in Manitoba who hunted buffalo merely for the sake of their tongues, and left their carcasses upon the prairies to go to waste. Buffalo were very prolific, and, if a law were passed to protect them for a few years, he had no doubt that they would soon increase. Although he frequently saw the bones of the buffalo bleaching in the sun in Manitoba, not a live buffalo could be seen until four or five hundred miles west was reached. The buffalo must be protected, or else it would soon become extinct.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he had not distinctly heard the remarks of his hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Smith), but, from what he could gather, he complained of Americans being allowed to come on our side of the line to kill the buffalo. It had not possibly occurred to that hon. gentleman that there was another matter in connection with the trade of the North-West which needed attention, and that was that, while the Americans were allowed to come into our Indian country and trade with the utmost liberty, yet on their side of the line it was said that no one could trade with the Indians without a license from the Government, and these licenses were granted only to citizens of the United States. If this was the case, then we should have reciprocity in this matter. The robe trade of the North-West was very valuable, and, unfortunately for the interests of the trade of the Dominion, was almost entirely in the hands of Americans, their easier means of access giving them advantages which they had utilized with great profit to themselves. Now, he (Mr. Schultz) believed that, if it were true that none but United States citizens could get a license to trade on the American side of the line in the Indian country, then a system of licensing traders on our side should be adopted, and only British subjects be allowed to procure such licenses. This would keep the trade among our own people, and Canada would enjoy the advantage of that large trade which properly belonged to her, and which now went to the United States. In regard to the remarks of his hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Ryan), he feared that the hon. gentleman had not understood the suggestion of the Rev. Father Lacombe as it was understood by himself and by the hon. the Minister of the Interior. Father Lacombe suggested that no buffalo should be killed from 1st November to 1st May in each year, and no calf at any time—this restriction to continue for five years. But the full grown animal might be killed all the summer, hence the fear of his hon. friend that the Government would have to support the Indians during the five years of enforcement of a preservation law would be without foundation. The statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior on the same point, he must criticize somewhat. The hon. the Minister seemed to fear that, if a protective Statute were enacted, great expense would be caused to the Government in supplying the Indians with the means of subsistence during the interval between 1st November and 1st May, when they were not allowed to kill the buffalo. Now he (Mr. Schultz) believed that no such great expense would be caused. Much of the food in the shape of dried meat and pemmican used by the Indians in the winter was made by them in the summer months, and, if it was once understood that no buffalo were to be killed during the winter months, the Indians would lay in an extra supply of the dried meat and the expenditure by the Government of a few thousand dollars for twine for nets would be all the aid the Indians would require. On the score of expense he must take issue on other grounds as well with the Minister of the Interior. Every hon.

gentleman who had spoken seemed impressed with the belief that we were likely to have difficulty with the Indians if the buffalo supply should be speedily cut off. Now the history of Indian difficulties in the United States taught us that, under any circumstances, it was far cheaper to feed the Indians than to fight them. A distinguished United States military officer once said that it would be far cheaper to feed a tribe of Indians at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York than to have war with them. With them it had come to be understood that nothing was so enormously expensive in proportion to the results obtained, nothing was more unsatisfactory, and nothing could possibly more injure the interests of settlement and immigration than conflicts of this kind. So that, even if the Indian Department had to largely assist the Indians during the five years' enforcement of this law, it would be far cheaper than the expense which would be caused if the surmises of the results that would follow the speedy extinction of the buffalo were correct. The hon. the Minister had stated that he thought the present Council of the North-West were now engaged in a consideration of this matter. He (Mr. Schultz) feared that for any practical good for this year any enactment now would be "shutting the stable door after the horse had been stolen." Any measure, according to Father Lacombe, must take effect in November and continue till the first of May. Now, the Governor of the North-West had received his appointment early last fall. That gentleman, while a member of the House of Commons, had heard the matter discussed last year, and heard the Premier admit its importance, and state that the matter of protection to the buffalo was under consideration. It was, therefore, no new matter to the Governor, and one of the first acts of the Governor of the North-West Territories should have been to take active steps in this matter. Had that been done, the destruction of this winter might have been averted. He (Mr. Schultz) had every confidence in the good intentions of his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, but, as the Government of the North-West was an appointed one, and not responsible in any way to the people of that region, it would be necessary for the Government here, as they were responsible for the actions of the North-West Government, to see that important measures like the one under consideration received prompt attention.

Mr. MILLS said that the hon. gentleman had misapprehended what he had stated. He had not said that it was necessary to prevent the Indians from destroying the buffalo for several years in succession, but for the period of each year extending from November to May. This was the statement made to him by Father Lacombe. He believed that the hon. gentleman was himself a member of the North-West Council, and had had power to deal with this question, but he was not aware that anything had been done.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that the hon. Minister had evidently not lately read the correspondence of the late North-West Council, for if he had he would find among the papers which he hoped to have brought down by this motion that the old North-West Council had brought up the matter in the strongest form possible, and urged the necessity for a protective law of this kind.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he quite agreed with his hon. friend that it might be possible to pass an enactment, prohibiting the killing of the buffalo during a certain portion of the year. He was sorry to hear his hon. friend suggest or hint at the possibility of war in the North-West. He thought this very remote. Under ordinary good government there was no necessity for legislation with such a project in view. The Americans, of course, had many such wars, but the action of the Canadian Government towards the Indians had been very different to that of the United States under similar circumstances.

ONTARIO BANK GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BOWELL moved for copies of all the correspondence between the President and Cashier of the Bank of Ontario and the hon. the Finance Minister, or the Finance Department, respecting the Government Deposits in the Ontario Bank since 1st November, 1873, to the present time. He said it would be in the recollection of the House, and also of the country, that, during the elections of 1874, most extraordinary steps were taken to secure the election of the friends of the Government in the section of the country in which the head-quarters of the Bank of Ontario was situated. At that time, the President of the bank so far forget himself as to write a circular to his customers, which, certainly, from its tone and tenor, must have led them to the conclusion that, by voting for the then Ministerial candidate, they would receive greater favours than they could otherwise possibly obtain if the Government of the day was not sustained. Among other paragraphs in that famous circular, which was issued by the Hon. John Simpson, President of the bank, he found one couched in the following language:

“If they (the Government) were sustained our Bank and other Ontario banks, and through them the country, will have the use of the Government surplus till required.”

Of course they understood why “other Ontario banks” were included in this paragraph. This was done to lead the country generally to believe that not only what Mr. Simpson designed as “our Bank” would receive large deposits, but also that other Ontario banks would obtain similar favours at the hands of the Finance Minister, and that owing to this circumstance they would be enabled to make larger discounts, and give their customers better terms than they possibly could do if they did not receive these deposits from the Government. The instructions sent to the customers of the bank were not confined exclusively to the President, for he found the Manager of the same bank writing to their customers in the following strain:—

“We (the Bank) are largely interested in the success of the present Government, as its continuance in power will add largely to the success and prosperity of the Bank. Our President (the Honorable John Simpson) is calling upon all our friends to give us a hand for Mr. Cameron, and we would esteem it a great favour if you could give us a helping hand along with many other friends.”

Mr. BOWELL.

These letters having been made public, the President of the bank found it necessary to explain the position he had taken in connection with these deposits; and, if hon. members would turn to the files of the Toronto papers or of the Globe of the 7th of September 1874, they would find a letter written by the Hon. John Simpson, dated the 4th of that month, which contained this remarkable paragraph:—

“I admit that I did write to the present Finance Minister complaining bitterly of the manner in which the Government surplus had been deposited by the late Government, greatly to the prejudice of Ontario for many years, and I did ask him to do the right thing.”

Subsequent events, he thought, proved that the Finance Minister, so far as the Ontario Bank and its customers were concerned, did do the right thing. He found, in addition to the figures he had laid before the House at the last Session of Parliament, that for the last ten months this Bank had received deposits to the following amounts:—For the month ending May, 1876, $383,855.95 without interest, and the interest account nil; end of June, $395,522.66; July 31st, $223,596.74; August 31st, $248,181.25; September 30th, $330,971.60; October 31st, $208,708.38, and November 30th, $233,641.11. During these months there were no Government deposits drawing interest. On December 31st, he found that the Government non-interest bearing account was $209,506.58, while $26,814.91 was deposited to interest account. In January of this year (1877) the non-interest account was $255,953.37; while the interest-bearing account had been reduced to $16,232.75. This small balance could, however, no longer be permitted to continue, for they found that the interest account was withdrawn altogether, leaving, in February, $265,183.28 to the credit of the Government in the non-bearing interest account; making the average for these ten months, $275,342.08. From these figures it was evident that this bank had had “the right thing” done by it so far as this account was concerned. On looking at the returns published in the Official Gazette they would find that the Ontario Bank had a subscribed and paid-up capital of only $3,000,000 while all the other eight banks in Ontario had a subscribed and paid-up capital of $13,074,600; and yet this favoured bank which demanded that "the right thing" should be done by it in consideration of its support during the election before referred to, had, during the month of February last, no less than $130,562.69 more than all the other eight Ontario banks together, of Government deposits. In other words, this bank had $265,183.29 Government deposits on three millions of capital while the other eight banks, representing a capital of $13,074,600 had but fifty per cent., or one-half as much. He thought the country would come to the same conclusion that he had upon that question—that the Ontario Bank had received an ample reward for what it did on that memorable occasion. This arrangement might possibly have been the cause of the hon. the Finance Minister's mission to South Ontario at that time, but he thought the country would come to the conclusion that this understanding with the Ontario Bank had much more influence with those connected with it, and, through them, with its customers, than all the other eloquence which the hon. gentleman ever uttered. There could be no question that this bank, holding larger deposits by 50 per cent. over and above the others, could extend to its customers greater accommodation, and divide larger dividends among the stockholders, than any other bank possibly could do that had to depend upon its own resources. With a knowledge of these facts, it would be for the country to follow the example set by South and North Ontario at the next election. In order to have a full and complete history of this whole transaction—a system of bribery, he did not hesitate to say, which it would be difficult to exceed—it was necessary that this correspondence should be brought down. The facts were before them that the hon. Senator, the President of the bank, did make a "big push" for Government deposits, and it was equally true that the hon. the Finance Minister "came down handsomely" with the deposits, and the result was the Government succeeded in carrying the constituencies.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said, as regarded any letters that the President of the Bank of Ontario might have addressed to his cashiers or directors, he need hardly say that he accepted no responsibility whatever. He was not aware until long afterwards that he had sent such letters, and he would undertake to say that it was with no consent or concurrence of his that they were addressed. As to the question whether the bank received an undue amount of favour from this Government or not, he said that it had nothing of the kind. The deposits the bank had were not one whit more than the proper necessities of the case required. It had become necessary to spend very large sums of money in distant parts of the North-West, and the bank had established branches at Prince Arthur's Landing and the Province of Manitoba. The Government transacted business to the amount of three or four millions a year in that section, and it became necessary that the bank should have considerable reservations. He could not see that reservations to the extent of $200,000 or $300,000, scarcely a month's expenditure, were one whit more than what, as a matter of prudence and business arrangement, he would have considered necessary in transacting personal business. As to the question of deposits in individual banks, he had before explained the reasons which rendered it utterly impossible to consider their capital in making Government deposits. Everyone knew that for a long time it was a source of complaint against the late Government—in which, however, he did not join—that they held large reservations in the Bank of Montreal. A glance at the deposits under the late Administration would show that they were in the habit, for which he did not blame them, of depositing large sums in the banks about Montreal. On the 15th October, 1873, the Union Bank of Lower Canada held $283,123 bearing no interest; the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, $548,947, bearing no interest; the Merchants' Bank, $201,912, bearing no interest, and so on to a great many more. The Ontario Bank was the Government's agent at Prince Arthur's Landing and in the Province of Manitoba, and it was undoubtedly necessary to keep on deposit a considerable amount of money. He had always objected to asking for interest on money in constant fluctuation which might be taken out at any moment, because, if interest was demanded, the banks would in turn seek to invest the money permanently, and considerable injury to the customers would result. For three or four years the expenditures of the Government had been on an unusually large scale,—sometimes $3,000,000, or $4,000,000, sometimes $8,000,000 and in one or two cases $11,000,000 or $12,000,000. Under those circumstances, the Government had felt it their duty to keep a large sum of money available for use, especially under our fiscal policy, which exposed us to very considerable sudden demands. The main point in this particular case was that, while carrying on those great expenditures in distant parts, with which communication at many times was difficult, and where it would be a matter of considerable expense and inconvenience for the Government to hold large sums, they considered it perfectly legitimate and proper to hold a sum adequate to the demands in this bank. He would not object to bringing down any correspondence with himself or the Finance Department. He would only say that, although he presumed, as the hon. gentleman had quoted, that Mr. Simpson did write a letter to him complaining bitterly of the injustice done to the Ontario banks, he had no particular recollection of it. He would cause search to be made for it. If it was sent, he was quite sure it must have been a private and confidential one, and, therefore, one which he could not fairly be asked to bring down. If, however, it was found, he would either bring it down or such extracts from it as affected this particular matter.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he quite agreed with the hon. the Minister of Finance that it was necessary to keep a certain amount on deposit in the Ontario Bank to do the business of the Government at Prince Arthur's Landing and Manitoba. But he desired to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that long before the Ontario Bank established agents at those points it had double, treble and nearly quadruple the amount on deposit that it now had for conducting the business of the Government. He considered this was as corrupt a bargain as possibly could be made between the Government and those with whom it had been consummated. He was rather glad to hear the hon. gentleman disclaim it as far as he was concerned. There was a letter in the hon. gentleman's possession which the public ought to see. To convince the hon. gentleman he would read a further extract from the Globe of September 7th, in which Mr. Simpson used this language:—

“My letter was read in Toronto in the presence of the Hon. Mr. Gibbs, and if he or any of his friends desire more light on the subject I will ask the Finance Minister for permission to publish this letter.”

The country had had a good deal of light on this subject since then. That letter was read in his hearing, as well as in the presence of several of the directors of the bank; and he should like very much (if he was at liberty to do so) to give the hon. gentlemen the opinion which was expressed in reference thereto by at least one gentleman of high position who was present. That letter could not, in any sense, be considered a private and confidential one any longer. Mr. Simpson said he was willing it should be published, and he hoped the hon. the Finance Minister would produce it. During the contest in 1874, when the Premier and Finance Minister, in addition to the other influences brought against him, were pitted against him in his riding, this particular letter was read by a gentleman who had previously supported him, but who had been influenced by what he expected to receive from the bank in exchange for supporting the Government, for the sole purpose of influencing the electors and the public generally with the belief that a large amount of money would be placed in the bank, and that, therefore, its customers would receive a far larger amount of accommodation than they had been in the habit of receiving previously. At that time the bank had no intention whatever of establishing those agencies in the North-West. It was only after they became a large debtor to the Government that they thought of this arrangement for disbursing the funds of the bank in the North-West, and obtaining a considerable amount of circulation there, and thus paying off gradually their indebtedness to the Government. From the returns in the Official Gazette, it appeared that in January, 1875, the bank had at interest $440,861, and $331,645.28 without interest; that it had in the month of February a similar amount, and that it was somewhat diminished in the month of March. It would, therefore, seem that it was not in consequence of the bank having agencies in the North-West and doing the business of the Government at those points, that those deposits were made, but in accordance with the agreement between the President and the Government. What was the President's own statement? It was reported that he had promised the Government six constituencies and he had been able to give them five. During the three years that had elapsed since this corrupt arrangement was entered into, three of those constituencies had been gained by the Opposition, and, if the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Ross) had seen his way to accepting that position which was recently mentioned in connection with his name, they would have regained that seat also, and been in the same position as they were prior to 1876. A good deal of the correspondence moved for had seen the public eye, and he hoped that the balance in possession of the Government would be brought down. He had suppressed correspondence in regard to this matter, because he felt that the parties would have been violating the confidence reposed in them. He regretted now having given them that advice, as it would have given a great deal more light as to what took place in those constituencies. The hon. gentleman might deny that any corrupt arrangement had been made, but the fact was patent that an enormous sum of money was deposited in the bank which there was no need for. In the letter referred to, the President seemed to be pleading for other banks besides his own, but the plural was simply used as a cover for the arrangement he sought to make. He hoped that the country would have an opportunity of seeing this correspondence so that the origin of the arrangement between the Ontario Bank and the Government might be better understood.

Mr. ROSS (East Durham) said the statement of the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) was false.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. member had no right to use such language.

Mr. ROSS said he had heard the hon. member for South Ontario make the statement before. He told that hon. gentleman that the Ontario Bank never gave a cent to any election in his county, nor any one connected with it.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he had never asserted that the bank had done so.

Mr. ROSS said the Ontario Bank had nothing to do with his election.

Mr. GIBBS said he had never declared it had. His statement was that the President of the Ontario Bank was reported to have said that he had promised the Government six constituencies, and had carried five of them. If the hon. member had accepted the Postmastership of Port Hope, making East Durham vacant, the Opposition would have carried the county.

Mr. ROSS said he had heard before the statement made by the hon. member for South Ontario, that the Ontario Bank had to do with his (Mr. Ross's) election. The agent of that Bank was always opposed to him; he belonged to the other side of politics and so could not have helped him (Mr. Ross) in the election. If all the other statements of the hon. member for South Ontario were as true as that one, there was very little truth in them.

Mr. McQUADE said he had good reason to believe that Mr. Simpson's son and a man by the name of O'Leary had spent money freely during his election, as Mr. O'Leary shook a handful of bills at him. He took him (Mr. McQuade) to be a man of straw, but found out his mistake.

Mr. BOWELL said that, when Mr. Simpson sent his agent to Prince Arthur's Landing, the business was being done by the then Royal Canadian, now the Consolidated Bank. It was strong evidence that there was a corrupt bargain made between the Government, or some one on their behalf, and the Ontario Bank. If it were not so, why should the Ontario Bank agent here be sent to supersede and take the place of the Royal Canadian Bank agency there doing business, and compel it to withdraw from that section of the country. The best evidence the House and the country possessed that there had been favours extended to the Ontario Bank was contained in the figures submitted to the House, and contained in Hansard of last year. They showed that the bank which had neither a larger capital nor better position than other banks, had more than two-thirds of the whole Government deposits from the time the engagement was made up to the present time; that in order to drive out another bank agency from the Thunder Bay district, Mr. Simpson established an agency there, received Government deposits, and, consequently, distributed Government favours. The Bank of Commerce, with a capital of $6,000,000, had comparatively no Government deposits. Why did the Ontario Bank receive such a large share of Government favours if it was not in consideration of services rendered through an engagement made, which should not have been, with any banking institution by any Government in any country? It was true the return showed that the Merchants' Bank and other banks held large deposits without paying interest from the Government prior to the present Administration taking office; but there was no evidence to show there had been a corrupt bargain between the late Government and those banks which received deposits, that they should render services to the Government in a political capacity. When that was proved there would be an analogy between the deposits received by banks from the late Administration and those received by the Ontario Bank from the present Government, but not till then was any analogy.

Mr. BLAKE: Who was president of the Merchants Bank?

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BOWELL said he also could tell the hon. the Minister of Justice the name of the gentleman who was president of the old Commercial Bank, but the hon. the Finance Minister could tell the hon. gentleman more about it than he (Mr. Bowell) could tell. The hon. the Minister of Finance took good care not to lose much by the bank when it did fail. He thought the hon. gentleman was quite right in that.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Explain. The hon. member insinuates what he dare not say.

Mr. BOWELL said it was generally reported the hon. gentleman did not lose much. If he would say that he did lose much he (Mr. Bowell) would withdraw the statement. The report published in the newspapers was that the hon. gentleman, knowing the position of the bank, was sensible enough not to retain or hold much stock in it. The hon. gentleman knew exactly what he meant by the reference he made. The hon. gentleman was not so ignorant as not to know what was the general opinion of the people. That might all be incorrect, and he (Mr. Bowell) would admit that such was the case if the hon. gentleman could explain the matter. But that subject had nothing to do with the question under discussion. What he had endeavoured to show on a previous occasion and what he had succeeded in showing on the present occasion, more especially with the assistance of the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), was that the transactions with the Ontario Bank, arising from election contests, were such as he, and every hon. member and every man in the country, trusted would never occur again.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that with regard to the assertion that the Government had made a corrupt bargain with the Ontario Bank or any other bank, he deliberately stated from his place that it was an unmitigated falsehood. His connection with the Commercial Bank would bear comparison with that of any other director in the bank, and, when the shareholders did not dare at three meetings at which he presided to raise a similar question against him, or to offer the smallest insinuation, it was somewhat impertinent for any hon. member at this time, nine years afterwards, to utter what no shareholder had dared to utter then. As to the main question, he would repeat that the Government were perfectly justified in exercising their discretion in placing considerable sums of money in Ontario banks, not in the Ontario Bank, but in Ontario banks. It was a matter of notoriety that before the present Government came into office, as the public returns showed, nothing whatever was deposited with the large Ontario banks. It was natural, right and proper that they should, to a considerable extent, reverse that position. As to the Bank of Commerce, he might say that, shortly after the present Government acceded to power, it held very large deposits. It might have held larger deposits and a much longer time, but for the fact that it had no demand for them, and refused them again and again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Minister of Finance had declared the statement that the Government made a corrupt bargain with the Ontario Bank to be an unmitigated falsehood. The Government did not, therefore, make any corrupt bargain, because the hon. gentleman said so, and the House was bound to believe it; but whether the country would believe it or not was quite a different matter. While the House would agree with the hon. gentleman, the country could not overlook the fact that the circumstances were suspicious. In the first place, it was thought important to defeat the hon. gentleman who sat for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs). Mr. Simpson was not only an influential, but he was a prominent, politician. His support, and, still more, the support of his bank, was deemed important. He wrote a letter stating that it would be a happy golden day for all the banks—"our bank and the other banks,"—if this change of Government were brought about and "we are to make our fortunes out of it." That was what "our bank"—our bank first—and then the others were going to make out of it. Then, after that the cashier wrote a letter stating that, it was understood to be in the interest of "our bank" that all parties should vote against Gibbs, and for Cameron. He did not say "the Ontario banks," but he said: "It is for the interest of our bank, and we expect you all to vote, and do the right thing for Cameron as against Gibbs." There was no doubt that about this time there was a letter written by Mr. Simpson to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright), and he must have got that letter in December, 1873. The hon. gentleman knew what Mr. Simpson wanted. Mr. Simpson was very proud of the letter as a composition, and had shown it to his friends. He had not seen it, but he had heard a great many people say they had seen it, and that it was a most curious specimen of putting a pistol to the head of the Government declaring: "No cure, no pay; if you want us to support you, you must support our Bank." Mr. Simpson was electioneering in the county at that time, and the Manager was writing letters to the customers directing them to vote for the right man, and the Minister of Finance himself went to South Ontario on the very same business. He must have seen Mr. Simpson. He was one of the canvassers, and it was only natural that he should see him. Thus, on the one side, there was the bank declaring that it was in its interest that the election should be won, and, on the other, there was the Finance Minister entreating the people to vote in the direction Mr. Simpson had indicated, so that the Finance Minister was working in the same interest as Simpson and his cashier. It was said there was no such arrangement, but he could only say, what every man of common sense would say, that the circumstances would bear no such construction. He was satisfied that had the election been protested it would undoubtedly have been set aside for undue and corrupt influence exercised on behalf of the Government. It might have been unfortunate that all those coincidences should have occurred. It might be that every member of the Government was quite free from the charge, but the circumstances were so suspicious, and the evidence was sufficient to satisfy any jury that the election was carried by corrupt and undue influence on the part of Mr. Simpson, the Ontario Bank, and the Government.

Mr. BLAKE said he believed there was a meeting held after the election, to discuss the propriety of entering a protest, and the present representative thought it better not to protest the election. It was to be regretted that the hon. gentleman did not retain the right hon. gentleman for Kingston in the case. It was material to understand two points, of which hon. gentlemen opposite did not take any account. First, that the directors of the Ontario Bank were not all of one line of politics, there being directors as well as shareholders belonging to both political parties. Second, that the President of the bank had been for twenty-five years a member of the Liberal Party, and a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen who came into power in 1873. There was no question, therefore, of purchasing his support, for that was impossible, and no inducement or corrupt bargain, as was charged against the Government, was necessary to ensure his support. The hon. gentleman said it must have been a corrupt bargain because the Ontario Bank, with some other Ontario banks, had received some deposits. Without imputing any corrupt or improper motives to hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with their deposit, and for the condition in which the deposits were to be found, without asking for explanations, he would remind them that they had $600,000 with interest, and $400,000 without interest, in the City and District Savings Bank of Montreal, and nearly half a million in the Merchants' Bank. The present Government were but carrying out the view of the Liberal Government of Ontario. When he succeeded to office, he found the whole deposits in the hands of the Bank of Montreal. At the earliest convenient moment this was changed, and a million and a half of dollars were taken from the Bank of Montreal and deposited in some of the stronger Ontario banks. It was held that, as the Province of Ontario paid a very large portion of the revenue, its banks should also have charge of a large portion of the Government funds. Not, however, that they hinted or suggested corrupt motives on the part of the late Government in placing the deposits where they were, although he thought it was rather extraordinary that the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), should not have understood that it was a very suspicious thing that as Mr. John Simpson was the President of the Ontario Bank, Sir Hugh Allan was, in 1873, President of the Merchants' Bank which then received large deposits at the hands of the Government.

Mr. PALMER said, if he understood the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite, it was, that, because Mr. Simpson was already a member of the Liberal party, therefore he did not require to be purchased. But that was not the point. It was rather that the Government placed means in his hands to corrupt the electors. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not use the same argument respecting the Pacific Railway as they did now. The argument was not that Sir Hugh Allan did not belong to the party then; but it was that influence was brought to bear upon Sir Hugh Allan in order that he might go a great length himself, and that a great many other people might be corrupted.

Mr. BLAKE: It was not put that way.

Mr. PALMER said the hon. the Minister of Finance distinctly denied that there was any bargain. If this were so, the circular of Mr. Simpson contained a falsehood. One or the other was not telling the truth. Whether he had allowed his zeal to prompt him to tell what was true or not, it was very curious that what he said was a promise was fulfilled. Mr. Simpson might have told a falsehood, but he was a true prophet. As the question was now before the Courts, he (Mr. Palmer) would not make any extended remarks upon the matter.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said, with reference to the election in South Ontario, the hon. member for Kingston had advised him to protest it, but he had declined, thinking the electors, on sober second thought, would reverse their judgment. As to the $1,000,000 deposited by the late Government in the City and District Savings Bank of Montreal, that bank was then acting as the agent of the Government in the city of Montreal.

FISHING RIGHTS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PALMER moved for returns of all leases of the right to fish in the non-tidal waters of New Brunswick, showing which of them, if any, wholly, and which of them partially cover beds of rivers granted to private persons. He said this was a subject of very great importance. He was informed and believed that fishing leases for terms of years had been granted under the Act of 1868, on the non-tidal rivers of New Brunswick. He did not know whether this was done by the late or by the present Government; but he conceived that the practice was illegal. If his contention was right, it would involve considerable claims being made on the Government of Canada. Leases had been granted to other persons who were not grantees of the beds of the rivers, and thereby the right of fishing over the land of other persons was bestowed. According to his view, not only by the terms of the Act passed there, but by the British North America Act, there was no such right vested in the Parliament of the Dominion as the right of granting such leases. Wherever the bed of a non-tidal river was granted to any person, the right of fishing went with it. He directed the attention of the Minister of Justice to this matter. The principle at issue was affirmed distinctly in an Irish case, Murphy v. Ryan, reported in the 2nd volume of Common Law Irish Reports. This case was decided in the Common Pleas Court of Ireland. It was here stated:

"The public cannot acquire by immemorial usage any right of fishing in a river in which, though it be navigable, the tide does not ebb and flow. The word 'navigable' used in a legal sense, as applied to a river in which the soil, primâ facie, belongs to the Crown and the fishing to the public, imports that the river is one in which the tide ebbs and flows."

Again, on page 152:

"Upon a full consideration of all the cases, it will, I think, appear that no river has been ever held navigable so as to vest in the Crown its bed and soil, and in the public the right of fishing, merely because it has been used as a general highway for the purpose of navigation; and that, beyond the point to which the sea ebbs and flows, even in a river so used for public purposes, the soil is primâ facie in the riparian owners, and the right of fishing private."

Further:

"According to the well established principles of the Common Law, the proprietors on either side of a river are presumed to be possessed of the bed and soil of it, moietywise, to a supposed line in the middle, constituting therein legal boundary; and being so possessed, have an exhaustive right to the fishing in the water which flows above their respective territories, though the law secures to the community the right of navigation upon the surface of that water as a public highway, which individuals are forbidden to obstruct, and precludes the riparian proprietors from preventing the progress of the fish through the river, or dealing with the water to the injury of their neighbours. But no usage can establish the right to take a profit in another's soil which might involve the destruction of his property, and such profit would be the taking of fish. The precise point is decided both as to the general law and to the particular case of profit by fishing in Bland v. Lipscombe (1); and the principle of that case in affirmation of the ancient doctrine is sustained by the judgments in Lloyd v. Jones (2); Race v. Wood (3); Hudson v. MacRae (4), and other recent discussions. That principle is beyond controversy, and therefore the usage relied on in this defence cannot sustain the claim of the right in the public to fish in a river, the soil of which is not publici juris, but private property."

If this was common law, it resulted that, wherever a private person had the grant of the soil in the bed of non-tidal rivers, this was his property, and he had the sole right of fishing over his own land; and any one intruding on this property for the purpose of fishing was guilty of trespass at common law. This was a most important point. Sec. 109 of the British North America Act vested the whole of the land in each Province in that Province, as its right, and the Province had consequently the right of making what profit it could out of grants for fishing purposes. How was it possible then to take away such a right without compensating the Province concerned therefor. The right of fishing, he held, was part of the public domain of the Provinces. This was a matter of very considerable consequence in New Brunswick. The Fisheries Act 31 Vic., cap. 60, sec. 2 declared:

"The Minister of Marine and Fisheries may, where the exclusive right of fishing does not already exist by law, issue or authorize to be issued, fishing leases and licenses for fisheries and fishing wheresoever situated or carried on; but leases or licenses for any term exceeding nine years shall be issued only under authority of an Order of the Governor in Council."

He contended that whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have the right to grant the exclusive right of fishing would depend on whether that right already existed. The 13th section of this Act stated:

"Whosoever fishes for, takes, catches or kills fish in any water, or along any beach, or within any fishery limits described in any lease or license, or places, uses, draws or sets therein any fishing gear or apparatus, except by permission of the occupant under such lease or license for the time being, or disturbs or injures any fishery, shall incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars with costs, or imprisonment not exceeding two months," &c.

He held that the giving of the right to fish was vested in the Province, and the right of fishing was one of the civil rights; and, of course, this Legislature ought not to interfere with it. Under the 94th section, it was prescribed that the powers of this Parliament should be confined to legislation on the subject of the sea-coast and inland fisheries. Supposing this could be made to apply to fishing in non-tidal rivers, it never could enable the Government to give away what they did not own; but he held it was extremely doubtful whether this did not apply to fishing in the sea, and the public distinguished from the private right of fishing. The gentlemen who had the leases, he would explain, had in no way prevented the public from fishing in these parts of the rivers, and most of them, he believed, wished to preserve the fish. He only brought the matter up in order that a question of very great importance might be settled.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said this was a very important matter as a question of law, and it was desirable that the point should be decided. It appertained however to the Local Government and Legislature, and he understood that the New Brunswick House of Assembly had passed some resolution bearing on the subject. He had no objection to submit such papers as were in his Department, but of course it was not possible for him to furnish all the information requested. He would, however, bring down information as to whether the leases granted covered land belonging to the Crown. He could give the leases and their boundaries, and it would then be open to the hon. member to apply to the Local Government and learn what he desired.

Mr. MITCHELL said this question was one of the very greatest importance with relation to the peace, prosperity, trade, and commerce of the fishing sections of the Dominion. He thought it very desirable that it should be settled by some decisive authority as a great deal of difference of opinion existed in his county with reference to it. The Government might feel it to be their duty to obtain a proper decision regarding it. He hoped, at all events, that something would be done in this relation. They should know where the rights of the Dominion and Local Governments respectively commenced and terminated, and where the riparian rights—if they existed—began and closed. These points would have to be settled sooner or latter.

Mr. SMITH asked that the motion be amended to apply simply to the information which he was able to supply.

Mr. PALMER assented, and said he was greatly obliged to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the answer which had been given. If the matter was so fixed that a legal decision was necessary, of course this was not the place to obtain it. He supposed, however, that before going into a contest of this kind the matter would have been referred to the hon. the Minister of Justice, and he thought the House should have that hon. gentleman's opinion on that point.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he hoped that before long this question would be decided.

PARRY SOUND HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

Mr. COCKBURN moved for Engineer's Report of the Survey of Parry Sound Harbour made by Mr. Michaud, C.E., and others in 1876. He said it was supposed that by a small expenditure of money a more direct channel, to be called the South Channel, could be made, which would be nearer to the south-eastern part of the Georgian Bay where the railroad would be situated. The engineers were sent out by the Department of Public Works to make a survey, but as they returned too late for their observations to be embodied in this year's report, he had availed himself of this method of learning the result of their examination.

SECTION FIFTEEN OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BOWELL moved for all papers connected with the awarding of section fifteen of the Canada Pacific Railway, including copies of advertisements for tenders, all tenders sent in, with the names of the parties tendering, the names of all sureties offered, and the amount of such tenders; a statement of all sums of money deposited at the time of tendering, or subsequently, as security in part or in whole for the performance of said contract, and whether such sums or any portion of them have been returned, and to whom; all telegrams and correspondence with parties tendering, or with any other parties in relation to the tenders or to the contractors, all protests filed by parties tendering, or by any other parties in respect of such contracts, all reports to Council by the Minister of Public Works, and Minutes of Council referring to the said tenders and contracts; also copies of contracts for such section number fifteen of the Canada Pacific Railway, and of any order of the Department of Public Works or Minutes of Council altering the terms of the said contracts, or extending the time for the completion of the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no objection to the motion. On seeing the motion on the paper, he gave directions to have the papers prepared, and he expected he would be able to bring them down in a few days. There had been a great deal of misrepresentation in the newspapers concerning this contract, and it was desirable that the papers should be laid before the House.

In reply to Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was nothing new in regard to section fourteen, except an allegation that the time for the completion of the contract had been extended. The contractors had been stopped a whole season owing to the operations of the Engineers of the Department, and, that being the case, it could not be expected that the Government could force the completion within the time specified. There had, however, been no regular extension.

Motion agreed to.

KILLING OF CATTLE ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for all correspondence between Mr. James Niven, of Newcastle, Miramichi, N.B., and the officers of the Intercolonial Railway and the Government, in reference to the killing by one of the trains of said road, on the 23rd of February last, of five head of cattle of the said James Niven; also a statement of the officers of the road as to the distance to the place of accident from the Miramichi Station from which the said train started; whether the same is or is not a straight line; where the driver of the train first saw the cattle on said track. He said Mr. Brydges had taken the ground that the fault of this accident lay in Mr. Niven himself in leaving the gate leading on to the track open. That might or might not be, but the particular allegation by Mr. Niven was, even if that were true, that the driver saw his cattle at a distance of half to three-fourths of a mile from the place where they were killed. The train was just starting from the station, and the driver, after whistling, put on full speed. The object of the motion was to see where the blame really rested, and whether there was no means of getting compensation or punishing the driver in some way.

TARIFF OF CHARGES ON THE GRAND TRUNK AND INTER-COLONIAL RAILWAYS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. POULIOT moved for:

1. Copies of the arrangements made by the Government, or by the General Manager of the Intercolonial Railway, with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, respecting the tariff of charges for the conveyance of passengers and freight over the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railways;

2. A statement of the rates which should have been and ought still to be charged for passengers and for freight by the Grand Trunk Railway from its various stations to Rivière du Loup, and vice versa, per passenger, per car, and per the hundred pounds of the different classes of merchandise;

3. A statement of the rates charged by the Intercolonial Railway, for passengers and freight over the Intercolonial Railway from Rivière du Loup to its various stations, and vice versa, per passenger, per car, and per the hundred pounds of the different classes of merchandise.

He said the object of this motion, in the first place, was to learn what were the prices which, by the arrangement requested, should be charged by the Grand Trunk Railway Company for passengers and freight, from any station on the Grand Trunk to its terminus at Rivière du Loup; and, in the next place, how much the Government should receive according to the scale of charges for passengers and freight from Rivière du Loup to the various stations on the Intercolonial Railway; for, from what had taken place and would appear, not only had the Government charged nothing in many cases, but also they had been obliged to pay a part of the charges made on freight passing over the Grand Trunk, because, as would be perceived, the charge for freight on the latter line merely from one of its stations to Rivière du Loup, was often higher than when, having reached Rivière du Loup, it had passed some distance over the Intercolonial. Facts which he would mention would better enable the House to understand. During last summer, the charge for freight from Quebec to Ste. Flaire, on the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial was generally 12½c. per 100lb.; during winter it was 15c. while the Grand Trunk charged 18c. per 100lb. from Quebec to Rivière du Loup. Merchants of Toronto had sent out circulars, one of which he then held in his hand, offering to sell flour at the same price, delivered at any station in the county he had the honour to represent; that was to say, as far as thirty-six miles beyond Rivière du Loup upon the Intercolonial;—the charge for freight being the same, $50 per car, including the transfer at Rivière du Loup, while the Grand Trunk alone charged $50 per car from Toronto to Rivière du Loup. So much for freight. With reference to fares for passengers, he would state that, when he left home to come to Ottawa, he enquired at the Grand Trunk Station at Rivière du Loup for a ticket to take him direct to this city, and he was told there were no such tickets. He was, consequently, obliged to buy one taking him only from that place to Montreal. On entering the cars, he took a seat beside the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Mr. Costigan), with whom he entered into conversation. A few moments afterwards the conductor demanded their tickets. He showed his ticket, and the hon. member for Victoria did likewise; and great was his surprise when he perceived that the hon. member's ticket was of another kind, being a return ticket. He asked the hon. gentleman where he got it, and the answer was that he had just bought it at the Rivière du Loup Station, where he (Mr. Pouliot) had been told that no such tickets were sold. The hon. gentleman further added that circulars had been distributed, informing them that they could procure return tickets either at Rivière du Loup or at Portland. These were abuses from which they suffered. He hoped that the papers for which he asked, when brought down, would make these evils known, and that the Government would endeavour to remedy this state of things. It was known that the Grand Trunk Railway Company seriously complained that this road did not pay expenses; and recently, at a meeting of shareholders in England, the advisability of ceasing to run the portion between Rivière du Loup and Richmond during several months of the year, was even broached. On the other hand, the present Manager stated that the company would do everything possible to encourage local traffic. An effort was made to show that, if this part of the road did not pay, this was due to the small amount of traffic obtainable in this district; but this was not the case, for, if the company had not done more, it and its vicious administration were to blame for this state of things. Again, how could Messrs. Abbott & Freer, who had inaugurated this part of the road between Quebec and Rivière du Loup, even when it was not completed, have made something in this relation with which to pay themselves; and the traffic since then had greatly increased, in such fashion that the Company would certainly have done more if its affairs were otherwise administered. Now, however, an offer to encourage local traffic was made, though the past policy of the road had been of such a nature as to have the effect of stopping it. He would again cite a few facts in support of this assertion. Below Quebec, there were some very extensive lumbering establishments—amongst others those of Messrs. Methot at Cap St. Ignace, and King, at River Ouelle—which forwarded their lumber by car from their mills to Lévis. The charge for this transportation was at the outset reasonable, being, he believed, from $7 to $9 per car. During the first year he was charged only $9 per car; during the second year, $14, and, during the third year, $23. The same course had been taken with Messrs. Methot and King, and what were the consequences? Mr. Methot stopped sending his lumber by car, and shipped by water to England. Messrs. King did the same thing at River Ouelle, and these gentlemen still pursued this policy. As far as he himself was concerned, he sold his mills and stopped his undertakings. This motion would also have the effect of informing them what was the price of freight on the Intercolonial, and of showing them, he hoped, that the rates were not higher for the Province of Quebec than they were for the other Provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was willing to furnish all the information possible; but he would be unable to obtain a statement of the rates which should have been and ought still to be charged for passengers and freight from various stations. He would procure from the company a tariff of rates, and call the attention of the company to the complaints made.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said the Grand Trunk preferred sending all freight to St. John over their own line, by way of Portland. In view of the advantages which the company had received from Canada, he hoped preference would be given to the through line by the Intercolonial.

Mr. OLIVER said he had, on two or three occasions, brought the subject before the House and endeavoured to have some of the evils redressed. From careful calculation he found that the people of his county paid from $50,000 to $75,000 more for freight on a certain quality of goods than it would cost to lay the same down in Toronto, where there were two competing lines. At the present time passengers from London could obtain a return ticket to Toronto for $3, while the people of Oxford, which was thirty miles nearer Toronto than London, were charged $4.50. The tariff of rates on railways was under the control of the Government, and, from the many complaints made, some action should have been taken to remedy the grievance. He heard that from the freight charge from London to Detroit was 13c. per 100lb., while from St. Mary's it was 27c. From Oxford the rate to Detroit was 19c. per 100lb., while from Paris it was 16c. The result of those unequal rates had been that the people of Oxford had had to tax themselves to aid the construction of a railway from the lake shore in and to bring the Grand Trunk, Canada Southern and Great Western into competition, which cost Oxford $70,000. The people had given large sums of money towards railway construction in this country. The Grand Trunk had received, including interest, thirty millions, and, in the compromise effected between the Great Western and the Government, the public Treasury lost one million and a quarter. If the people, by their taxes, contributed to the construction of railroads, the Government, which had certain control over the railways, should see to it that equal justice was done to all parts of the community. In view of the extent of the Canadian railway system, there should be a Government Department which should take the railroads under its charge. In England there was a Railway Commission, and any grievance felt by the people was submitted to it and remedied. He hoped the Government would take the subject into consideration, and endeavour to adopt some means by which the people of different sections would be placed on the same footing with respect to the carriage of passengers and freight.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) said that in the Lower Provinces higher rates were sometimes charged for short distances than for long journeys, and undue advantages given to Halifax and St. John.

Mr. MITCHELL said the fishermen of New Brunswick got greater facilities for the transport of their fish by the southern route to Boston than by the Intercolonial Railway. The reason was that the Intercolonial would not take less than a car-load except at very high rates. The Intercolonial last summer did not take more than a third of the trade, and it would never get it unless it consented to take the fish in small lots, as it offered, as fresh fish would not keep.

Mr. DAVIES said he could quite understand that the rates to Halifax,

Mr. OLIVER.

St. John and some other points were low because the railways had to compete with the steamships. In carrying flour to the Maritime Provinces the route on the Intercolonial had to be placed at the same figure as that charged by the steamboat companies in order to get the trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it had been stated that the Grand Trunk Railway was now disposed to send a great deal of its freight by way of Portland to the Eastern States. But the memorandum was to the effect that some must be sent to Portland and some to Rivière du Loup, and there was no particular temptation to send freight one way more than another. The company did not own the steamers, but they were run in connection with the road.

Mr. MITCHELL: The company receive a percentage.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the House must remember that the Intercolonial Railway was a commercial affair, and it would have to be managed on commercial principles. It would be impossible to avoid charges which might appear eminently unjust, because it would be impossible to carry pro rata. To show the difficulty there was, he would mention that during last season flour was actually carried from Chicago to Boston at less than it could be carried from Toronto to Quebec. But the Government could not avoid that.

Mr. JONES said he was alluding to manufactured goods and not flour.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the same rule applied to all kinds of freight. The fact remained that the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial had to compete with other lines through New England, and that competition was becoming daily more keen, and it was getting more impossible for the Government to avoid the anomalies pointed out. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) it must be remembered that there was competition between London and Toronto, while there was not competition at Woodstock, and therefore at the latter place the ordinary rates were changed. The Government had no power over that whatever. Companies could go below their schedules if they pleased. Railway companies were interested in making as much money as possible, and at a competing point they would naturally have a lower rate than where there was no competition. In New York a certain rate was charged per mile by law, no matter what the distance, but it had not been thought advisable to adopt such a law in Canada. In Minnesota and some other Western States, where the Granger movement obtained complete supremacy as to voting power, they had compelled railroad corporations to carry both freight and passengers at certain rates. The result was that, within a year, a large number of these companies were compelled to suspend many of their trains, cancel some, and several of the roads were obliged to stop running altogether. Very few railroads had paid any dividends in this country. They had operated with great success so far as developing the country was concerned, and they had benefitted the pioneers by giving an equalization of prices all over the country. Farmers had derived more benefit from railroads than any other portion of the community, and, though there might be a little neglect on the part of the companies and complaint on the part of the people sometimes, yet he contended that the country had benefitted immensely by the vast outlay of English capital. The Government had endeavoured to make passenger and freight rates on the Intercolonial fair and just, as far as possible, and they were now lower for any distance than on any line on the continent.

Mr. MITCHELL: What about fresh fish?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman must remember that to send fish to New York or Boston the Intercolonial and Grand Trunk would have to connect with other corporations, whose assent to any arrangements would have to be obtained. He had already called the attention of the Railroad Superintendent to this particular point, and it was hoped that arrangements would be made during the coming season which would enable the object which the hon. gentleman had in view to be carried out.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock.

BILLS FROM THE SENATE.

The following Bills from the Senate were severally read the first time:

Bill (No. 99) To amend the Act respecting the Canadian Engine and Machine Company.—(Mr. Workman.)

Bill (No. 100) To incorporate the Canadian Traffic Company.—(Mr. Workman.)

GODERICH HARBOUR RETURN.

REMARKS.

Mr. FARROW called the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the fact that papers he had asked for, in relation to Goderich Harbour, had not been brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had been informed by the Secretary of the Department that there were no such papers to bring down.

Mr. FARROW said the papers he asked for were a telegram and a letter, which he would vouch were sent to the hon. the Premier from Guelph. In fact he held the original telegram in his hand. It ran as follows:—

“GUELPH, January 7th, 1877.

“To HON. ALEX. MACKENZIE, “Minister of Public Works,
“Ottawa.

“I understand that John S. Tolton of Walkerton has tendered for the Goderich Harbour Works. Mr. Tolton is a thorough practical, honest and reliable man; financially able and accustomed to the construction of public works. The securities named are reliable, sound men.

(Signed) “D. STIRTON.”

A letter, mailed the same day, followed this telegram. He would vouch for the correctness of these facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE said those papers were not in the Department, and, if the hon. gentleman had the original telegram, that accounted for the absence of one.

Mr. FARROW: I should have said copy.

BREACHES OF CONTRACTS BILL.

[BILL No. 66.]

(Mr. Blake.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 66) to repeal certain laws making breaches of contracts of civil service criminal, and to provide for the punishment of certain breaches of contract.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said it would be remembered that, on the debate on the second reading of the Bill, exception was taken to the first clause, on the ground that it might interfere with certain local laws. His hon. friend from Renfrew suggested that it was important that the law should not be altered in Ontario, as no provision had been made by the Local Legislature on the subject. In order to meet the objection raised, he proposed to strike out sections two and three of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada from the clause as it stood, and to alter the provision as to the repeal contained in the clause as it stood by making it provide that it should stand repealed from and after the 1st May, 1878. That would give an opportunity to the Legislatures of Ontario, Quebec, and Prince Edward Island to make whatever local laws they pleased to provide for the repression of those breaches of contracts now punished as crimes in these Provinces. He also proposed to insert a sub-section providing for the immediate repeal of the sections of the local law which had been repealed by the Legislature of Quebec, the result of which would be that they would stand forthwith repealed as far as this Parliament had power to deal with them, and would be totally off the Statute-book.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said, unless there was some guarantee that the provisions of the law which at present existed would be continued in some way, very serious losses would be incurred by a particular class of employés. In the lumber regions, the Provinces were divided by almost an imaginary line, and in many cases labourers employed in one Province might step over into the other and thereby escape punishment from a breach of contract. Some provision ought to be made to give the magistrates of the Provinces concurrent jurisdiction in order that this class of offenders might be punished.

Mr. WOOD asked if the hon. the Minister of Justice had received a communication from his colleague (Mr. Irving) in reference to this Bill. He understood that that hon. gentleman, who had gone to Toronto for a few days, was to try and arrange the postponement of the matter until his return.

Mr. BLAKE said he regretted to say that at no time had there been any understanding with the hon. member for Hamilton and himself in regard to this measure. He had received the communication referred to, asking that action might be deferred on the Bill for a week or ten days, but he could not delay the Bill so long. The amendments which the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) proposed to move, he observed, were to come up on the report of the Committee.

Mr. PALMER said he thought this Bill would interfere with the laws relating to masters and apprentices in New Brunswick, and it was a grave question whether Parliament could legislate in that direction. He contended that, while the Criminal Law of Canada was entirely within the province of this Parliament, yet it had no power to do away with the punishments which the Local Legislature had established. The 15th and the 27th sub-sections of the 91st section of the British North America Act seemed to him clear on this point. He was entirely in accord with the hon. the Minister of Justice in regard to the general features of the Bill. Its object, he understood, was to prevent those combinations of workmen which sometimes had disastrous consequences. While he was quite willing that every man in the country should have the best right to labour and enter into contracts, yet he denied the right of workmen to co-operate and combine, and he could quite understand why such an act should be made a crime.

Mr. FARROW.

He would like the hon. the Minister of Justice to give his opinion on the point he had raised.

Mr. MITCHELL asked the Minister of Justice whether this Bill, in its present shape, would in any way interfere with engagements between masters and seamen? If it did, it would very seriously affect the control of masters over seamen.

Mr. BLAKE said an express clause in the Bill provided that nothing in the Act should subject any person to any other or greater punishment than he was subject to by law now, for any offence mentioned in the Act, provided always that he should not be punished more than once for the same offence. There was no intention to affect the existing relations between masters and seamen; but, if it was found that the Bill did effect these relations, a clause could be easily introduced preventing any such application.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was glad to hear this. Certain parties interested in shipping had called his attention to this matter, and he had consequently requested information on the subject.

Mr. BLAKE said, with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John, that the Bill did not purport to interfere with questions relating to apprentices. No doubt there was a very great distinction between the relations of masters and apprentices, and masters and ordinary servants or employes. In times past, breach of contract of service was declared to be a crime, and it was punishable as a crime, and it was only two or three years ago that the last vestige of that law was swept from the English Statute-book. The true principle was then adopted that contracts of hired service were the same as other contracts, unless some special circumstances in the breach of them involved consequences which could fairly be called criminal. The clause he now proposed to the Committee repealed only so much of the sections of the old Acts of the Provincial Legislatures as declared that breaches of contract of service were crimes to be so punished. It was true that this involved the proposition that they were not criminal, but properly civil matters; and, being so, that they came within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. It was competent for these Legislatures to punish breaches of civil contracts, though not as crimes. He had before him local laws providing for two years' imprisonment for breaches of a civil law. If any Local Legislature proposed, at this time, to pass a law providing for breaches of contract of service, without peculiar circumstances connected with them, being punished by imprisonment, it had the power to do so. This Bill did not, as it could not profess to, affect any right possessed by Local Legislatures, or any Act of such Legislatures.

Mr. PALMER: It repeals them.

Mr. BLAKE: No. It only repealed so much of the Acts of the old Provincial Legislatures before Confederation, as dealt with the Criminal Law, which law belonged to this Parliament. These were not repealable by the Local Legislatures. This was the principle of the Bill. If any Court should hold that any section proposed to be repealed did not deal with any matter as a crime, then that section was not repealed. With reference to the local point, considerable divergence of opinion existed among the Local Legislatures; while the Legislature of Quebec had provided for the repeal of two of these clauses, the Government of Ontario had declined to interfere with this law on the ground that it was not within their competence. The policy of the Government was to remove the stigma of crime from breaches of contract of service, which were not attended with peculiar circumstances.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked whether the Minister of Justice would object to confining the clause to the following words:—"Making the violation of any provisions of any of the said sections a crime?"

Mr. BLAKE said he was quite willing. It was but right to state to his hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. White), that the difficulty the hon. gentleman alluded to was not one which, in the opinion of the Government, ought to alter that portion of their policy which was involved in the proposition that ordinary breaches of contract were crimes. The circumstance that there was the Ottawa River between two Provinces could not alter the character of the acts done there. Any inconvenience which might result from this fact was not to be remedied by attributing a criminal character to acts done there, which could not be so treated if committed in the interior of the country. The hon. gentleman's remarks more appropriately belonged to subsequent clauses, and when they came to them the hon. gentleman might, if he pleased, ask the House to extend its provisions to the acts which had been mentioned. The geography of the country could not alter the character of an offence.

Mr. BROOKS said that on the former reading of the Bill he had referred to what had appeared to be a conflict with the laws of the Province of Quebec; and he deemed it but right then to say that the amendment suggested by the Minister of Justice would meet the requirements of the Province of Quebec. Sections 2 and 3 had been repealed by the Local Legislature of Quebec, and Sections 5 and 7 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada were only to be repealed in 1878. He, consequently, apprehended that the Local Legislature of Quebec would be obliged to enact a new law on this subject and make the present law perfect.

Mr. BABY said he would entirely concur with the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Brooks) if the Minister of Justice would grant a sufficient delay.

Mr. BLAKE: Delay is granted until 1st May, 1878.

Mr. BABY: Then there is no difficulty on that point.

Section 1, as amended, agreed to.

On Section 2,

Mr. BLAKE said he had made a slight verbal alteration in this clause. It read: "Whosoever wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service or otherwise, and whosoever being under contract of service or otherwise." His hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay) had suggested that the use of the words "service or otherwise" might create some confusion, the object being simply to show that it was not confined to contracts of service or all contracts of the character referred to. He proposed to make it read, instead of "whosoever,"—"any person who wilfully and maliciously breaks any contract made by him, knowing, or having reasonable cause to believe," etc. He would say to his hon. friend from Renfrew that the first sub-section of this second section, being that which applied to contracts not made with gas, or water, or railway companies, was the one which might cause, under certain circumstances, breaches of contract, whether of service or otherwise, involving special consequences, to be treated as crimes. The language used in the description of the character of these contracts was identical in words, he believed, and certainly in substance, with that used in the English Acts. One was the Employers' and Workmen's Act, and the other was in reference to the law of conspiracy and to the law for the protection of life and property. If the hon. gentleman would refer to those Acts he would find a good deal which was in the present Act. As he had explained with reference to another clause, there was a great convenience in using the same phraseology where it was suitable to our circumstances, for we then could obtain the benefit of the construction of the English Courts upon these words, as well as the construction of our own Courts of Justice, and so a degree of certainty as to the precise operation of the law could be more speedily and surely obtained. He saw no reason, however, why the principle of the English law should not be extended, as he had proposed in the Bill, and in England the House of Commons was pretty evenly divided on the point. One of the cases put as a reason for making a breach of a certain kind of contract criminal was this: At a particular stage in the manufacture of iron, when several furnaces were in full blast, if workmen left them even for an hour, it would probably be necessary to blow out the furnaces, pull them down, and then reconstruct them. A case of that description occurred, in which the two hour's absence of three men caused a loss to the employer of

Mr. BLAKE.

£2,000 sterling. The men knew the result that would follow, and chose the critical time and went away. And so in England, and he thought the same view would be held here, such an Act was considered to partake of a character outside of the ordinary breaches of contract, and ought to be stigmatised as a crime. The case put by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) of a gang of men driving lumber down a small stream, with only a short time available, and with a knowledge of what their act would cause, namely, serious destruction of property, and who suddenly left their work—such a case, he thought, would come under the provisions of the clause. He would, however, without very strong and cogent reasons, be averse to make any substantial variations in the clause, for the reason he had assigned.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) suggested that the words "or entail serious loss or damage" be added to the clause as to breaches of services.

Mr. BLAKE said that would be making breaches of contract criminal acts. There was hardly a breach of contract that did not cause more or less damage.

Mr. PALMER said he concurred entirely with the view of the Minister of Justice. He could see no difference morally, and there ought to be no difference in law, between the man who wantonly destroyed property and the man who maliciously left his duty, with a full knowledge of the consequence, and thereby entailed an equal destruction as in the former case. Of course he agreed that it was better to follow the terms of the English Act.

Mr. ROCHESTER instanced the cases of serious injury being caused to machinery by a bolt being thrown in wantonly.

Mr. BLAKE: That is punished already by the law.

Mr. ROCHESTER: Or any man who puts grit or sand into the journal.

Mr. BLAKE: It is the same thing.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he would suppose the case of a farmer having a gang of men to work for him for the year. They would have very little to do in the winter, but in the month of June, just when their labour would be worth more than during all the rest of the year, they left him, and thereby caused the farmer much loss. The farmer would have no means of redress, for the men had nothing to collect from. But, if the farmer dismissed them in the winter, they could sue him for damages. Notwithstanding the great damage to the farmer, the hon. the Minister of Justice said no crime was committed.

Mr. BLAKE: It is not a crime because the man was a poor man any more than if he was a rich man.

Mr. POPE said, if the master could not pay them, he would be imprisoned.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Mr. POPE: I say it is a bad law that won't work both ways.

Mr. BLAKE said he quite agreed that it was a bad law which exempted a rich man, but said to the poor man: "It is a crime and you shall go to jail." But, if the Local Legislatures thought that the security of property and civil rights required that, in particular cases, they should repeal the punishment of imprisonment for breaches of a civil law, this House could not prevent them, nor did they want to prevent them. But it was an added injury to say that the breach of a civil contract, such as instanced, was a crime. What the House was dealing with was that with which it could alone deal, namely, the question of the Criminal Law. It was behind the spirit of the age to say that those persons were guilty of a crime, because they were not able to pay damages.

Mr. POPE said he must not have a false construction placed upon his words. It was not the inability to pay damages which constituted the crime, but the abandonment of the work. It would be an unfortunate day when an employer would not have the means of indemnifying himself for any loss he might sustain owing to his servant breaking his contract. Unless there was some assurance that the master could hold his employé, it would be to his disadvantage, for he would not be engaged to carry him over the winter months if the employer knew that he could not force him to work out his engagement, and that when he most needed him he would leave.

Mr. BLAKE said he was sure his hon. friend would not wish to place any of his employés in gaol for leaving his service. But possibly he wanted to hold the rod over them.

Mr. POPE: Yes.

Mr. BLAKE said that when a workman broke his engagement in England he was liable to be tried before a justice, and if he signified his willingness to go back he was released; but if he did not offer to go back he could be ordered to do so, and unless he obeyed the orders of the Court he could be tried for contempt. The workman could give his own security for the performance of the contract.

Mr. MASSON: So it is with us.

Mr. BLAKE said he was speaking of the law in England, not in Lower Canada. If then he did not go to work he was liable to be imprisoned for breaking the order of the Court. But it was not held to be a crime, and the man was placed in the civil side of the gaol.

Mr. POPE: What is the difference?

Mr. BLAKE: It is as if you or I made a promissory note or bond and did not pay it—it is not a crime.

Mr. MASSON: The result—the punishment, is the same. In one case you give a man two months' imprisonment, and say he is not a criminal; and in another you give him two months and say he is a criminal. Where is the difference?

Mr. BLAKE said he was not called upon to determine what would be the policy of the Local Legislatures in framing the laws which they had the power to enact. He had merely pointed out that it was competent for a Local Legislature to make a certain act a crime after this House had removed it from the category of crimes under the Dominion law. It was not for this House to discuss whether a Local Legislature would make simple breaches of personal contracts a crime or not.

Mr. MASSON: The hon. Minister pretends that the power belongs to the

Mr. POPE.

Local Legislatures, and yet, in his speech, he wishes to compromise the House into saying that it is not in their power to legislate upon it.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Mr. MASSON: If you have no right to legislate, you have no right to express an opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said surely the Minister of Public Works would not controvert that statement. In the preamble a position was taken which was against the whole of the legislation of Lower Canada. Certain acts were not to be considered as crimes, but yet were to be considered sufficient to warrant some punishment. He would like to know what was the intention in bringing in this Bill. The second and third sections of the Consolidated Acts of Canada were to be amended, but how was it that the Act of 1870 of the Province of Quebec, which was a repetition of those sections, was not to be amended? The hon. the Minister of Justice wanted to have his idea dominate here. He said that the punishment of a certain act was behind the age, and yet he said he would express no opinion upon the right of a Local Legislature to pass a law relative to the same. He (Mr. Masson) objected to the whole principle. This was the reason why he had voted against the Bill before. It was not because he sympathised with the strikers upon the Grand Trunk Railway, as was stated in some of the papers; that statement was a slander. What he thought was, that the hon. the Minister of Justice determined, by a side way, to make the House declare that the law of the Province of Quebec and other Provinces, making a breach of contract a crime, should not exist. While the hon. gentleman knew that they could not change the law in this House, he wanted to compromise it. He (Mr. Masson) objected to the whole proposition, and hoped the Bill would be amended.

Mr. BLAIN said the sooner the House got out of the idea that it could make good servants by making people criminals, the sooner they would be able to reach proper legislation. The proper way was to give servants some motive for doing their duty. He wanted to call particular attention to the fact that the Bill, by the second section, was retrospective in its action. He held that the law should apply to no contract which was now in existence unless the man was aware that he was under a criminal law. On that account he hoped it would be amended by inserting the following words: "Any person who wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, made and entered into after the passing of this Act, knowingly," &c, should be liable to the provisions of the Act. The Bill as drawn applied to every single contract now in existence. He was aware that it was contended that servants now were liable to be prosecuted criminally for violation of contract, but every one knew that the law was not rigidly enforced, and that it was practically a dead letter in that respect. There had been but few prosecutions, and for the very best of reasons, that people could not make good servants by making them criminals. He would move the addition, after "contract and service," of the following words:—"made and entered into after the passing of this Act." If such an alteration were made in the Bill a difficulty would be obviated, because when parties entered into contracts hereafter they would understand that in those particular cases where they had the control of property and responsibility, where damage might accrue to property or life be in danger, they made themselves subject to the terms of the Criminal Law. The amendment was, he thought, exceedingly reasonable, and hon. members would agree with him that they should not bring a class under the scope and operation of the criminal law who did not properly come within it.

Mr. BLAKE said the amendment was open to two objections. One had been pointed out by the hon. member, and another was that the Bill proposed to repeal existing punishments. Those persons who had broken contracts during the recent strike were amenable to the Masters and Servants Act all through the Province of Ontario, although the special consequences which made their acts criminal under this Bill had not arisen from the breach of contract. It was proposed to change the punishment from a general one of imprisonment for thirty days and make it special for three months in cases of wilful violation of contract having certain results. If it were a crime that men should break contracts, having those particular results, it should be a crime with regard to the present as well as the future.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the measure had given rise to a very interesting discussion on the line between civil and criminal breaches of contract. He was inclined to agree with the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) that it was of little consequence now-a-days whether a breach of contract was made a misdemeanor and placed on the criminal side, or made punishable as a civil offence. Still, however, there was a sentiment in the matter which the hon. the Minister of Justice had acted rightly in dealing with, and in making the measure similar to the English Act in that respect. His objection to the whole clause was that, although it made a breach of contract a civil offence, yet it inflicted a heavier punishment than the Masters and Servants Acts, under which it was an offence against the Criminal Law. He had no objection to the punishment, if he thought it would really meet the end in view—the prevention of strikes, for which purpose the hon. the Minister of Justice had introduced the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said no doubt the measure would irritate the working men, locomotive engineers especially, and would create dissatisfaction among the working classes, who would not be satisfied by the offence being called a breach of the civil law instead of a crime. When a strike or combination was arranged among 500 or 600 men, the threat of sending them to jail for three months or fining them $100 would not prevent the strike taking place. The country could not imprison a whole army of men. Accordingly, a few men would be selected for punishment, who would be considered martyrs, and they would gladly go to prison when they knew their families would be taken care of at the expense of the union. The Bill was, therefore, utterly defective for the purpose of preventing strikes, while, at the same time, it would irritate the men. He thought the hon. the Minister of Justice had received a communication from the Grand Trunk Railway Company stating that the Bill would be inoperative, and would not cure the evil complained of. He understood the Grand Trunk authorities had stated that the measure would be worse than useless in the direction of preventing strikes. As a general law, without reference to that particular evil which had arisen, there were strong reasons why the Bill should be adopted. But it would irritate the men on the one hand, and, on the other, not satisfy the railway company, which desired to have the means of preventing strikes, as well as of subsequently punishing those strikers.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was sorry to differ from the right hon. member for Kingston on this question. The Bill should go further than was proposed. If it was necessary to prevent strikes on railways, it was equally necessary to prevent them in manufactories. It sometimes happened that, in a factory where 200 or 300 men were employed, 20 or 30 men undertook to organize a strike, and, owing to this "ring" or combination, work was entirely stopped to the great injury of the manufacturer. He could speak from experience on the question, because he had experienced such an occurrence, and it was a very serious matter to have rowdies enter an establishment, take possession and set the owner at defiance. It was not so serious a matter in cities and towns, but in country localities, where there were no police to restore order, it was a difficult position in which to be placed. He hoped the $100 fine would be abolished and the punishment would be by imprisonment without a fine. He held that men who entered an establishment and refused to allow other men to work should be sent to the Penitentiary for one, two, or three years. Combinations of working men frequently possessed large funds and would easily pay a $100 fine, but, if a workman was sent to the Penitentiary for twelve months, he would not be likely to strike again. If men did not wish to work for the wages paid, they should leave and go somewhere else.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) did not understand the bearing of the Bill. Last year, there was a Bill before the House, which passed without division, providing for such cases as those he had referred to. The present Bill did not deal with a strike per se, or the consequences of a strike, or any improper conduct connected with a strike, only with a breach of contract. He would not enter into a lengthy discussion of the general policy which ought to be adopted with regard to the question of strikes. He might say shortly that he dissented from many of the opinions of the hon. member for Carleton, if they were applied simply to the proposition that men were not to be permitted to operate together to better their condition, if they did so without violence either to their employers or fellow-labourers. If Parliament deprived them of that right, they refused them a weapon in the contest between labour and capital. The Bill of last year was more liberal than the English law and was tolerably well level with the spirit of the age on the question. The right hon. member for Kingston had somewhat misapprehended the object of the Bill when he stated that it was intended to prevent strikes. It was not directed to that object, but to breaches of contract. Almost all the contracts of operatives to-day were what might be called minute contracts, and were so made in order that men without breaking their contracts might be free to leave their employment when they thought that, either alone or in combination, their condition would be improved by leaving. The Bill, of course, did not seek to impose penalties on any operative leaving his work or employment at the termination of his engagement. If an engineer made a trip contract and left at the end of his trip without notice he could not be touched by the law; but if he left at the middle of the trip, knowing what the results might be, then he would come within it. In regard to the remark of the right hon. member for Kingston with respect to communications from railway companies, he might state that he had received one communication from a gentleman who thought the measure ineffective as dealing with the whole question. But the Bill did not propose to deal with the whole question. It dealt with only one phase of it, and that on general principles. It did not deal with strikes, and still less did it attempt to deal with what followed after strikes, with acts of violence, intimidation and lawlessness which were said to have taken place subsequently. If law was wanted for those acts, hon. members must not search that Bill for it. He was glad that the right hon. member for Kingston had said that the Bill was not unreasonable on general principles. He was gratified in being able to state that having a communication, written and verbal, with both parties to the controversy, having collected the opinions of both parties, he had no reason to believe that the treatment of breaches of contracts as proposed in the Bill would be received by working men with irritation. On the contrary, he had every reason to believe that no such breaches of contract would have taken place had the Grand Trunk men been aware that the Masters and Servants Act applied to the case. He had been informed by men authorised to speak that no such violation of contract would again take place, and that any steps taken by the men would be within the law. He had received communications from the great body of operatives who were considerably interested in any measure which affected a branch of the working classes, and their opinion was, subject to certain considerations of detail to which he had given his best attention and which did not affect the principle of the Bill, that the measure was based on just and equitable principles. It was true that there was a natural sensitiveness on the part of the men to anything which looked like class legislation. It was true they desired their power—it was one power, simply that of combination—should not be infringed upon unduly by either criminal or civil legislation; but it was not true that they were disposed to ask from Parliament exemption from even the criminal consequences of breaches of contract involving such results as those particular breaches of contract made criminal under the Bill. He had, therefore, to say to the right hon. member for Kingston, that if he had been convinced by communications from either party that the Bill would be inoperative in regard to breaches of contract, and that it would produce irritation on the one hand, and no benefit on the other, he would have frankly stated the fact to the House, and asked either to withdraw or modify it. But his information was entirely in the other direction. He did not believe the measure would be able to prevent such results as happened the other day, but he hoped the result would be mitigated, that the contracts made between the railway companies and engineers would be observed, and that, whenever the men felt it their duty to resort to the extreme step of leaving the service of the company, it would not be in breach of their contracts, but in pursuance of their legitimate rights.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said there ought to be no two ways of punishing the same offence. Under the proposed law a man might be imprisoned or fined.

Mr. BLAKE said the whole Criminal Law provided for the punishment of minor offences by fine or imprisonment.

Mr. WALLACE said because a thing was, it did not follow that it was right. A rich rowdy might commit a crime and escape with a fine, but a poor man committing the same crime would be sent to jail.

Mr. BLAKE said his hon. friend should remember that crime might have various degrees of criminality. There was nothing exceptional about this provision, which was the ordinary one by which a magistrate could for minor offences inflict fine or imprisonment.

Mr. BLAIN moved an amendment limiting the operation of the Act to contracts made after its passage.

Mr. TUPPER said he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the rather unusual way in which the hon. the Minister of Justice replied to his remarks on the second reading of the Bill the other night. He thought the Committee would agree with him that the terms in which the hon. gentleman rebuked him for venturing to express the opinion that the legislation contained in the Post Office Act covered the ground of the clause under consideration, were scarcely called for. He admitted that he was guilty of the great crime and misdemeanour of questioning the infallibility of the hon. gentleman in reference to a question of law. The hon. gentleman found it convenient to ignore the fact that a legal gentleman on this side of the House, who ordinarily supported the Government, also questioned the wisdom of the measure. Supposing he had entertained a doubt as to the possibility of the hon. the Minister of Justice being for once inaccurate, he was not without some grounds for doing so. He quite admitted the hon. gentleman's great standing as a lawyer, but he could not forget that on many occasions as important as this, when the hon. gentleman had taken equally strong grounds, the highest authorities in the country had found his law was all wrong. But the hon. gentleman had been compelled to-day, in view of the argument of the hon. member for St. John, to "back down" and amend the Bill. Under such circumstances, he did not think it became the hon. gentleman to treat his humble suggestions in the way that he did. He still contended that the clause of the Post Office Act of 1867 which was re-enacted in 1875, with the support and assistance of the hon. gentleman, gave the Government the very powers which were embodied in the clause before the House. He had taken the opinion of a number of legal gentlemen, not second in standing to the hon. the Minister of Justice himself, on this subject; and he was assured that his construction was strictly correct and accurate, and, indeed, the only construction that could be put upon it. He wanted the hon. gentleman to tell the House, if his (Mr. Blake's) construction was right, whether he discharged his duty to the public in leaving the Government of the country, as he did leave it under the Act of 1875, according to his construction, without any means of preventing wilful obstructions of Her Maesty's mails over the great arteries of mail communication in this country. It was not right, when an hon. gentleman expressed an opinion on a subject under discussion, that he should be treated as the hon. gentleman treated him, and he trusted that he would adopt a different tone in future.

Mr. BLAKE said it was true that he spoke in reply at the close of the debate on the second reading of the Bill, and that in doing so he felt it necessary to answer some arguments of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). He told the hon. gentleman that he deferred to his high legal acumen, but that he (Mr. Blake) laboured under a different opinion as to the effect of the Post Office Act. So convinced was he that that opinion was correct that he had already placed on the paper a notice for leave to amend the Post Office Act in that particular. This was the sum and substance of his offence. It was this sin of which he had been guilty towards the hon. gentleman and this House, for, if it was a sin against him in his parliamentary capacity, it was also a sin against the whole House. He never professed infallibility. The hon. gentleman said he had proved to be wrong several times. It was true, that there had been occasions on which his opinions and those of the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) who sat beside the hon. member for Cumberland, had not been acquiesced in on the other side of the water. He confessed to having thought that he was right in the views that he took on these occasions, and he presumed that the hon. member for Kingston thought that he also was right sometimes. He was prepared to sustain his opinions as far as he could by fair argument and reason, and not to ask the House to accept them on his ipse dixit. He gave to the House his views and the arguments upon which he founded his conclusions, and asked that they might be fairly considered. With reference to this particular clause of the Post Office Act, he did not give the details on the motion for the second reading of the Bill; but he proposed to amend that law, and he presumed the Bill for that purpose would be introduced and read the first time, and probably distributed to-morrow. He maintained that it was clear the construction of the clause referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland was not applicable to railways. Its language referred to the "obstruction of the passage or progress of any mail, or any vehicle carrying any mail across or along any public highway." That clearly meant along the canals, rivers, or public highways. It did not necessarily refer to railways, and, upon reflection, he had thought that the original framer of the Act, and the subsequent revisor, had omitted railways in this connection for some reason. There were a series of most stringent enactments in reference to those who obstructed railway engines or trains, not confined to mail trains, but trains carrying passengers. Some of those were to be found in the Grand Trunk Act, and a great many more in the Criminal Law, as consolidated in 1869. His idea as to the reason of the omission of such provisions from the Post Office Act was that it was thought by the framers of the law that the subject of obstructions of railway cars or locomotives was sufficiently ample without introducing another law upon the subject. But this was purely conjecture. The hon. member for Kingston might probably be better able to tell the hon. member for Cumberland how it was that in 1867 this law was so shamefully defective as, according to his construction of it, the hon. gentleman said it was. But, however that might be, that construction had not hitherto been adopted, but the discussion as to the precise meaning of the law and its effects would come up more conveniently under the measure which he proposed to bring up.

Mr. PALMER said he was rather surprised at the construction which the Minister of Justice placed on this section. If the hon. gentleman said this Act gave no power to punish persons for obstructing the mail on a railway, he did not agree with the hon. gentleman. The contrary was unquestionably the case. To obstruct or wilfully delay the passage of any mail was one thing, and—"or of any vessel or carriage, or animal, employed in conveying the mail" was another thing.

Mr. BLAKE: But there are the words "passage or progress."

Mr. PALMER said this phrase applied to the carriage and not to the mail. It applied to any carriage or vessel or horse or animal employed in conveying any mail on any public highway, river or water communication. It was clear to him that if the mail was obstructed under the Act a crime was committed irrespective of a highway or any other place. The Statute surely made a distinction between the mail and the carriage or animal conveying it. The application of the Act depended entirely on the construction of language.

Mr. Blain's amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

On Section 3,

Mr. BLAKE said that in this clause municipal or other corporations and railway companies were put in the same position, with reference to wilful and malicious breaking of contracts in which those with whom they made contracts were placed under the second clause. Of course no imprisonment was ordered in default of payment of fine, as a company could not be imprisoned. Although he conceived that the interests of corporations were plainly in the other direction, yet still this did not affect the abstract justice of the proposition. It should not be said that they dealt in one way with the rich and powerful while they dealt in another way with those who were not so strong and influential.

Mr. DESJARDINS enquired whether the officials of companies could not be rendered responsible in this relation.

Mr. BLAKE said it would not do at all to make officers, who acted under the orders of their companies, criminally liable for the companies' acts. This would be an extremely serious step.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 83.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 83) To amend the Acts relating to the Inspection of Steamboats.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

QUEBEC HARBOUR AND PILOT- AGE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

RESOLUTION AGREED TO.

Resolution reported from Committee of the Whole, on the 20th instant, declaring it expedient to amend the Acts for the improvement and management of the Harbour of Quebec, read the first time.

Mr. MITCHELL said he hoped the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would see that the moneys levied under this resolution were really expended for the legitimate objects for which the tax was created—the improvement of the harbour of Quebec for the benefit of the shipping and trade of that port.

Resolution read the second time, and agreed to.

TRURO AND PICTOU BRANCH RAILWAY TRANSFER BILL.

[BILL No. 82.]

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill regarding which he had expressed his opinions pretty freely on a former occasion. He would now give notice to his hon. friends opposite that, when the Bill came up for the third reading, he would move a rider conveying his ideas on the question of issue, though he might not be able to prevent the country being deprived of its property. This was a railway which must be useful in connection with the Intercolonial Railroad. It was a line over which we must take a great portion of the coal we used. He hoped that, at all events, the right would be reserved by the Government of running cars over it free, in order to bring coal from the great coal depôts of Pictou and New Glasgow. If this was not done, they would have to pay very sweetly to the persons who got it, for the use of it to transport coal from the great mines of Pictou and New Glasgow to and over the Intercolonial line. The practical result of the transference was that it placed them at the mercy of two great corporations. The policy pursued by the Government in this relation was most suicidal, ill-judged and unwise in view of the interests of the Dominion at large. Did he not see that it was useless, he would ask for the consideration of a rider to secure the control of the road to the Government of the country, and the right to carry coal required for the Intercolonial Railway over it free.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported.

Mr. TUPPER enquired whether the Government would have power to regulate the road under the General Railway Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no doubt about it.

Mr. TUPPER: I suppose there is no arrangement by which the road could be resumed on certain conditions?

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be very difficult to arrange this. There was much trouble in making a contract. The company already complained that it had too many burdens. The Government of Nova Scotia had purchased more land than it turned out they required for railway purposes in the immediate vicinity of Pictou and New Glasgow. A considerable portion of these lands were still available for sale. The company expected that they would derive all the advantage that could be derived from the possession of these lands, but the Government did not intend that they should have any more land than was required for the working of the road.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired whether the Government would have power to run a Government or any other train on certain terms.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied in the affirmative.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

BOUNDARIES OF MANITOBA BILL.—[BILL No. 87.]

(Mr. Mills.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendments read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOMS ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.—[BILL No. 19.]

(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) pointed out the amendments proposed to be made by the Bill.

On Section 10,

Mr. COLBY said it would cause a considerable amount of inconvenience to persons living 15 or 20 miles from the frontier. Its effect would be to compel them to go to the office whenever they wanted to export anything.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said this was the old clause.

Mr. COLBY said, if that was so, the law had never been enforced. If the hon. the Minister of Customs would give a pledge that the law should not be enforced any more rigidly in the future than it had been in the past, he would have no objection to the section passing.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he had never heard any complaint as to the operation of the law. The party was simply required to make a report at the Custom-house.

Mr. SCRIVER said the entry provided for in the section was of the utmost value, as without it no reliable statistics could be obtained. The rule had never been literally enforced. It would be a hardship if parties had to take their goods to a port of entry, but all that was demanded was that they should make a report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the section might be all right for statistical purposes. The clause, however, was imperative, and it might be well to consider an amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had made a note of the objections and before the third reading was reached the Government would consider whether the section could not be changed so as to provide for the difficulty.

Section agreed to.

On Sub-section 4,

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said a great deal of fraud was committed on the revenue by conductors, baggage-men, and brakemen on railroads. While the smallest package of the passengers was examined, the boxes and appliances of those persons were allowed to go unsearched. There ought to be some amendment of the law to prevent the smuggling which was carried on by those railway officials.

Mr. BURPEE said the hon. gentleman was undoubtedly correct in the view he took on this subject. The next two sub-sections, however, provided everything that possibly could be done by law to prohibit this method of smuggling.

Sub-section agreed to.

On Section 11, Sub-section 6,

Mr. COLBY said the sub-section seemed to apply to every railway train. Conductors were frequently changed on through passenger trains, and, as expressmen alone were familiar with what goods were on board in their cars, it appeared advisable that the duty of reporting goods to the Customs authorities should not devolve on such conductors.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the conductor was supposed to have real charge of the train, and was the proper officer to know what was on board of it. Sub-sec. 5 of sec. 10 applied to the duties of expressmen under similar circumstances. Trains carried manifests, and, if conductors were changed half a dozen times, the manifest remained.

Mr. TUPPER said he would like to ask the Minister of Customs whether he had conferred with any railway manager or any person who was familiar with the conducting of trains with relation to this clause.

Mr. BURPEE said this provision was carried out at the present time as far as it was possible; no penalty was, however, attached to the making of an incorrect return.

Mr. TUPPER: Is the return made by conductors?

Mr. BURPEE: It is.

Mr. MITCHELL said, as it was proposed to place this arrangement in legal shape, this fact made an important difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that they proposed after the word "train" in the 8th line to insert the words "other than express goods."

Mr. COLBY said it was absolutely impossible for the conductor to make such a statement of his own knowledge. A train passing from, say Boston to Montreal would have a great many conductors, and all that one conductor could do would be to pass the manifest to the other conductor. Neither did he (Mr. Colby) think it right that a consignee's goods should be confiscated through the carelessness of a conductor. He thought that the sub-section should be struck out.

Mr. BURPEE.

Mr. BURPEE said the manifests of the trains were made up where they started from, and all one conductor had to do was to pass the manifests on to the other conductor. The position of a conductor was much like that of a captain of a vessel. There was provision made to prevent hardship.

Mr. COLBY said he did not think the same rule as applied to captains of vessels would apply to conductors of trains. The captain had plenty of time to arrange matters, and went the whole voyage; but the train was rapid in its transit, and there were many changes of conductors. If the conductor failed to do his duty the owner of the goods should not be made to suffer.

Mr. WOOD: Supposing there was an understanding between the conductor and other parties to secure the smuggling of the goods, would it not be right to confiscate them?

Mr. COLBY: Decidedly so.

Mr. WOOD: Then you have the right to presume fraud.

Mr. COLBY: The presumption should be reversed, and it should be made to appear that there was fraud.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said a conductor had just about as much as he could do without attempting to be responsible for manifests handed to him, and which he would have to deliver to the next conductor. Still, conductors should be punished if caught conniving at fraud.

Mr. COLBY further suggested that the agent of the road at the frontier should take charge of the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD pointed out that some arrangement ought to be made as to express conductors.

Mr. BURPEE said he would note the various suggestions.

Sub-section agreed to.

On Section 14,

Mr. MITCHELL objected to importers being compelled to land their goods within three days when they had been brought by sea or from any place out of Canada. There were many instances where an importer would find it too expensive to land his goods at a particular place as he sometimes could not find a profitable market there.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was out of the question for the Government to keep its officers waiting more than three days to see that there had been no smuggling. The words "land the same" were absolutely necessary.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that it would be very inconvenient when a shipper, after the vessel had arrived in port, desired to send his cargo to some other place.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no practical difficulty.

Mr. MITCHELL said there should be a clause, making the landing discretionary with the Custom House officer, for, as it was now, the Government tacitly admitted and winked at an evasion of the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE said an entry was only made of the goods proposed to be landed; the balance could be taken to any other port within the Dominion without a new manifest being made out.

Mr. WORKMAN approved of this clause of the Bill, and believed that it was desirable to shorten the time as much as possible. At present vessels arriving at Montreal with general cargoes were often delayed six or seven days.

Mr. MITCHELL asked that in certain cases where perhaps two or three days were spent in seeking a market, a discretionary power should be given to the Collector of Customs in regard to compelling the vessel to be unladen at that port. He also objected to another section of the clause providing that goods unladen should be at the risk of the owner or consignee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD did not think the Customs had anything to do with the matter. They were not to say who were responsible, and he consequently thought this provision should be struck out.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) stated that in large towns goods were often landed on the wharf, and laid there over night, or perhaps for two or three nights. The object of the clause was to relieve the Custom House authorities of any risk. He would consider the objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE stated that the clause was added at the instance of the chief officials. There had been some vexatious suits, which he had no doubt led the officers to make this recommendation. They could pass the clause at present, and they would consult with the officials and give the reasons at a subsequent stage.

Section agreed to.

On Sub-section 4,

Mr. BURPEE explained that a similar system was adopted in England as that proposed, under which goods, on which duties were not paid within one month, were to be sold at public auction, and the amount devoted to payment of duties.

Mr. DOMVILLE said a shorter time was required in England, as warehousing room was very valuable. There was no such hurry here.

Mr. WORKMAN said he thought that one month was too short. Three months ought to be allowed before the goods were sold.

Mr. BURPEE said no inconvenience had been experienced under the operation of the provision. It only applied to those parties who did not attend to the entries.

Mr. MITCHELL said it would be an improvement, if, instead of the words "shall be destroyed," in the 14th line, "may be destroyed," were substituted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the proposed amendment appeared to be an improvement, and it would be considered.

Sub-section agreed to.

On Section 17,

Mr. MITCHELL said the non-correspondence of the entry might be owing to a mistake.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said, provision was made in section 124 to cover such cases.

Mr. TUPPER said he understood that in some ports of entry the expenses of cartage from the warehouse to the Custom-house and back again were charged to the Department, while in other ports those expenses were borne by the owners of the goods. He would like to know the reason for this distinction.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the information his hon. friend had received was, in a great measure, incorrect. He did not know of any port where the cartage was paid from the warehouse. In all the large ports cartage was paid to the warehouse.

Mr. TUPPER asked if that practice was uniform.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he thought it was. He would, however, make inquiries and inform his hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

On Section 20,

Mr. MITCHELL said the object of the Government should be, instead of retaining all the nuisances of the old Act, to eliminate sections like these.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the reason for this section was to enable goods to be entered at Digby.

Section agreed to.

On Section 29,

Mr. MITCHELL said he wished to protest against the system of appraising. He had had some experience in this respect on behalf of another party. The Customs officer valued the goods far beyond their real value, and the party was fined, double duty being imposed. He appealed, and appraisers were appointed. The party in question did not have a fair opportunity of stating his case, and the valuation was confirmed. In a similar case, three weeks ago, the Government, however, decided that the goods had had been over valued. The Collector, under the present system, was one of the appraisers, and could select the two others. A board of appeal should be appointed. He felt that this was a serious grievance.

Mr. BURPEE said he could see the difficulty, and he was quite prepared to hear complaints. Valuations might occasionally be unjust, but he could not perceive any different way of treating these cases, unless qualified appraisers were placed at all the ports. He would, however, consider the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would never have appealed had he known how the system worked, but he would have gone direct to the Government; rather than so appeal a very important matter, he would throw the money in question into the sea.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said that the authority asked for should be granted.

Section agreed to.

On Section 31,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would like to have the opinion of commercial men such as the hon. members for Centre Toronto and Hamilton, on the point whether the market value of goods was the cash value or not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said it seemed to him that the clause was fairly drawn; there would always be differences in market values as some bought cheaper than others. The clause worked very well and he did not wish to suggest any change.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said the value on which duties were collected should be the actual cash value. Some years ago a discount of five per cent. was allowed on cash purchases, but now duty was paid on the actual amount of the invoice, whether the goods were bought for cash or otherwise.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said the entry was made on the credit value; and, when goods were sold for cash only, an addition of two per cent. was made to the entry.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the intention of the law was as stated by the hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto. The credit value of the goods was the one intended to be acted upon.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the system must be uniform. By far the largest portion of the goods imported were bought on credit, and they must either take the ordinary credit or cash rate. If the cash rate was taken, a less amount would be collected.

Mr. PLUMB said the intention was to prevent this country being turned into a slaughter market.

Mr. BURPEE said that the appraiser had of course discretionary power with regard to the valuing of goods. No discount was allowed unless the article was sold only for cash.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that the worst credit was the standard on which the man, whose credit was better, paid duties.

Mr. WOOD: The man whose credit is the worst pays the highest prices.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he wished to put on record his protest against the power being granted to the Collector of Customs, or the Governor in Council, or other person, to discriminate between two invoices or lines of goods.

Mr. WOOD said that the best merchant of the best standing could not obtain over two and a half or three per cent. discount in England, when a discount of five per cent. was allowed on cash invoices in this country; the result was that many persons pretended to buy for cash and obtained the reduction. This system was consequently abolished.

Section agreed to.

On Section 32,

Mr. DOMVILLE said too wide a scope was given to the Minister of Customs under this section, in determining the standards of sugars. He (Mr. Domville) thought all sugar should be placed on the Dutch standards, which were the acknowledged standards throughout the world. He knew that under this clause any amount of irregularities were opened up. He had been informed that sugars had been entered at different grades at two different ports. There might be no practical difficulty while the present Minister of Customs was in office, but it might happen that a gentleman might assume the position who was totally unacquainted with business, and who would not be able to make a standard, and he might be led astray by other people. He hoped this section would not pass until it had been given ample consideration.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he had had it under consideration for many months. The Dutch standard was the standard in use throughout the Dominion. Every effort had been made to secure a uniform standard. He could, if desired, furnish two or three reports by an officer of the Government, who had visited all the ports where sugars were imported, with the view of securing uniformity.

Mr. DOMVILLE found fault with the decision of the appraiser being final and conclusive.

Section agreed to.

On Section 33,

Mr. DAVIES enquired whether the commission of agents was included in the term "free on board"?

Mr. BURPEE: It is not, but it includes all other charges.

Mr. DOMVILLE pointed out that, in consequence of packages not being charged the same duty, simply through different rules of trade, certain places of trade, say islands in the West Indies, were unjustly discriminated against.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said this question had never been brought under his notice before. He would give it careful consideration.

THE FRENCH INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1878.

QUESTION.

Mr. DELORME asked whether the Government had decided about placing a certain amount of money in the Estimates, so that Canada might be represented at the International Exhibition to be held in France in 1878.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have several plans in connection with this subject under consideration, but at present I am unable to answer the question.

WHARF AT STE. ANNE DU SAGUENAY.

QUESTION.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to construct a wharf at Ste. Anne du Saguenay, on the River Saguenay.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not.

DISMISSAL OF A POSTMASTER.

QUESTION.

Mr. ORTON asked what were the causes which led to the dismissal of Mr. Wm. Cornock from the postmastership of Erin, in the County of Wellington.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: This postmaster, having been reported inefficient by the Inspector, was called upon to resign. He refused to do so, and this was the reason which led to his dismissal.

DAM, LOCK, AND SLIDE AT CARILLON.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for a return of all correspondence between Government and the contractor for the construction of the dam, lock, and slide on the Ottawa River, at Carillon. Also for the original estimates for the said work and the correspondence between the Engineer and the contractors. He said the contract had been given out some time ago—in 1873, he believed—for this work, which included a dam across the river and a slide to carry timber over the two locks. He understood that the time for the fulfilment of the contract expired last September, and also that very little of the work, comparatively speaking, had as yet been completed. This was a great annoyance to the trade, as it impeded navigation between Ottawa and Montreal, this being the worst place on this route when the water was low. The trade were anxious to know what was the reason for the delay. He supposed that, according to the Government Engineer's estimates, sufficient time had been originally allowed for the completion of the work. It was reported that nothing like the amount of work which should have been done by this date had been finished. He wished to get information from the Minister of Public Works respecting the state of the work and the time when it would probably be completed.

Mr. CHRISTIE said he was aware that dissatisfaction existed concerning the backwardness of the contract. At the same time, it must be remembered that the contractors had encountered very great and unexpected difficulties. It was anticipated that the work could be carried on during winter, but experience had shown that this was impracticable. Work could only be prosecuted during low water, and for only about six weeks in the summer. Last season, not less than five hundred men had been employed on it. Besides, a good deal of extra labour had to be performed in preparing the foundations. All these circumstances caused delay. It was very desirable that the work should be pushed forward as rapidly as possible, but, as far as he knew, the contractors had really done all they possibly could do under the circumstances.

Mr. CURRIER said that, in the Ottawa District, people were very anxious to see this work completed. It had been under contract for three or four years. He was not aware what the difficulties that had been encountered were, but certainly the work had not progressed as rapidly as they had been led to expect would be the case. Owing to the shortness of the season available to carry on operations, a larger force of men should be employed. The completion of the work was a matter of great importance to the lumber trade, and he hoped that some means would be taken to expedite it as much as possible. He was not disposed to complain of the manner in which the contractors had acted, unless they knew that there was no reason for the delay which had taken place.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said it was reported in the Ottawa District that the contractors had more work to perform than they originally had reason to believe would have to be done. It was stated that the Government engineers had made an estimate which indicated that much less timber and other material would have to be used, and much less work to be performed. It was stated that the contractors, in order to find a solid basis of rock, had to remove a large amount of gravel, stones and other matter. If this was the case, it should be known to relieve the contractors from the charge of unreasonable delay. It was also advisable to know in what state the work was now, and what the prospects of its completion were. The want of this improvement prevented complete communication by water between Ottawa and Montreal, and, therefore, they were anxious to see it pushed forward as rapidly as possible.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he thought more definite information should be asked. He understood that the bottom of the river shown upon the original plan was represented as being composed of level and solid rock; and the contractors complained that they were obliged to put timber in crevices in the rock and in many instances to take out boulders and sand to enable them to go to solid rock; and this had to be done during a limited period—six or ten weeks in the year. The water was not sufficiently low until late in August to enable the contractors to put down timbers in the bottom of the river, where the dam was located; and he understood that the formation of frazil prevented the laying of foundations during winter. The contractors also complained of frequent changes having been made in the plans furnished them. The work was to have been completed in September, 1875; and it was said that the plan of the slide which was to be placed in this dam was not furnished the contractors until the month of October or November, 1876. It was extremely desirable that the contract should be pushed forward as speedily as possible. There was a general impression abroad among manufacturers of timber that the work projected in connection with the slide was not suitable for the intended purpose. He understood that there was to be no floor in the dam, and it seemed to him that the Minister of Public Works should take this important matter under consideration. He thought that some change in the plan for the slide ought to be made. He would be gratified if the motion was so amended as to include the original plan upon which the contract was based, with the original and also the progress estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government must decline under any circumstances to give the Engineer's estimates concerning any works, but they had no objection to give the original amount of the contract, which had been already before the House. The Engineer's estimate was a confidential document intended for the guidance of the Department. It was a very delicate matter to speak in Parliament of the relations of contractors with the Government, especially when the time for the completion of the contract had long passed. The statement made that frequent changes had been made in the plans was inaccurate, and the bottom of the river had not been inaccurately described. It was well known what sort of a foundation the river had, and also that timber had to be put in in order to obtain a level surface. The work was, no doubt, very difficult. The contractors had claimed that one description of crib-work which was done was not provided for in the schedule of prices, and the contract was wholly one of schedule prices and not based on plans for a lump sum, and this claim had been ultimately allowed. Certain prices were allowed for certain articles as timber, planking, iron, stone-work, masonry and earth-work, and all these prices amounted to the gross sum of the contract. No other difference of opinion with the contractors had occurred, to his recollection, except with reference to some unimportant matters. The contractors had, no doubt, encountered considerable difficulties, and, besides, wages and prices were different at the time the contract was undertaken from what they were afterwards. He was anxious to have the work completed as soon as possible, and every possible facility in this relation had been and would be given the contractors by the Government. He had heard no particular complaint about the plan for the slide, but he would make enquiry about it. If any improvement could be made in this respect he presumed that it was still not too late to do so. He would bring down such papers as were necessary to give information on the subject, but he would not communicate any documents of a confidential character. As to including in the motion the plans, he thought that this had better be left out; if there was time, such sketches as would suffice to convey the meaning of the specifications would be submitted. He was afraid that they could not wait for complete plans of all the works embraced in the contract to be prepared.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had asked for what he thought could be properly communicated to the House. He wished the public at large to know exactly in what position the work was. He was afraid that it would not be completed for a very long time. He understood that the original plans represented the bottom of the river at this point as composed of flat rock, but, nevertheless, holes varying from two to eight feet in size had been found in it, with gravel, sand and boulders. Diving bells had also to be employed, he believed, to commence the crib work. An engineer of good standing had told him that, if the dam had been located 500 feet higher up, a flat rock would have been found, and perhaps it was advisable yet to make the change. He was told with relation to two dams previously built there by the Government—one 500 feet long, and the other 3,300 feet—that the latter took in the channel of the river for the running of square timber during low water, and that this dam was partially removed in the prosecution of the work in question. If this was the case, he would suggest to the Minister of Public Works that this matter ought to be looked into, for, unless it was remedied, he did not know how timber was to be passed down during low water next summer. At no time during the last twenty, twenty-five or thirty years, owing to the unusual lowness of the water, had there been a better opportunity to build a dam across the river, than during the last season. If the plans and circumstances under which the work was commenced were changed, it might be necessary to make further arrangements with contractors, in the public interest, in order that this work might be completed within a reasonable time.

Mr. CURRIER said he had hoped that the Minister of Public Works would have been able to state when he expected the work to be completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

He had supposed that those interested in the lumber trade had made representations to the Government with a view to some change. As far as common opinion went, he did know what change could be made. Putting a bottom in the slides would not be an improvement, as the rush of water through the channel would be so heavy that it would be likely to break up rafts passing through. No one, however, could tell exactly what the result would be until the work was completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE said nothing would afford him greater pleasure than to give more definite information on the subject if he were able to do so. There was no doubt that the work could be done, and it could not be taken from the contractors and re-let. He wished to give the contractors every possible chance to complete the work; but, unless reasonable progress was made, new arrangements must necessarily be entered into.

THE RISE OF WATERS ON THE OTTAWA.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

Mr. HAGAR moved for copies of all reports of engineers or correspondence respecting the existence and cause of the greater rise in the waters of the sixty-mile level of the river Ottawa between the Chaudiere Falls and the Long Sault Rapids, than the levels below and above those points, as set forth in the petitions to this House, of certain inhabitants of the counties of Ottawa, Prescott and Russell. He said it was well known to those who had travelled on the Ottawa that the overflow of water at this point was something extraordinary. The land flooded by the freshets in the spring was equal to a strip of land thirty miles in length by one mile in width, which, under ordinary circumstances, would yield abundant crops, and, being near to Montreal and Ottawa, would be very profitable. This disproportion in the rise of the water had been gradually increasing during the last four or five years, so much so that the proprietors and occupants of the lands in the neighbourhood found it impossible to utilize them. In fact, the banks were destroyed, houses and fences swept away, and wharves destroyed, and the public generally suffered from the freshets. One owner of wharves had told him that, if the present state of things continued, it would be impossible to keep wharves along the river. This flooding did not always exist, as some years ago the settlers were able to raise abundant crops. This region was formerly covered with a dense growth of timber, but the water had destroyed it, and the lands were becoming worthless. He understood that the Government had sent some person to investigate this matter, and he hoped that when the papers were brought down it would be found that the Government had some plan whereby the evil could be remedied.

Mr. CURRIER said what the hon. gentleman had stated in regard to the rise of waters was perfectly true. While it rose no more than six feet to eight feet within the Chaudiere and below Long Sault Rapids, between those points it rose on an average twenty-two feet. Last year it was much higher than before, reaching 26 feet to 27 feet, and a great amount of damage was done. The old settlers along the river stated that the rise was increasing year after year, and the people were anxious that the Government should ascertain the cause and provide some remedy. It was thought by some that the enlargement of the canal had increased the difficulty, and it was suggested that the widening of the channel would make an improvement. Perhaps the hon. the leader of the Government would explain what had been done, without going to the trouble of bringing down the papers.

Mr. McNAB said the question was one deserving the serious attention of the Government. Unless some remedy could be applied, a large number of the inhabitants would have to abandon their homes. However, he would not pretend to say what was the cause, or whether it could be removed.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this point was practically a large basin of the Ottawa River, which had been filled up by deposits of saw-dust and the ordinary refuse of mills and manufactories along the banks. This was the case to such an extent that the current had been turned eastward and had been rendered to some extent useless. On the other hand, it was tolerably evident that the Dominion Government could not hold themselves responsible for the overflowing of a provincial river, whether from natural or artificial causes, as would be the case if the Government had erected public works which would have a tendency to block the current and cause a backwater, and thereby flood the lands. While he repudiated any responsibility on the part of the Government, they had felt so much sympathy with those who suffered from the periodical overflowing of the river, that they felt bound to make some enquiry into what was supposed to be the cause. Last autumn an engineer was sent to make some examination of the river, particularly at the point indicated by the hon. the mover, at the head of the Grenville Canal. It would be remembered that a large sand-bank had collected a little off the head of the Grenville Canal, and immediately off the rapids caused by the descent of the river at that point. He would also point out that the Hawkesbury Mills, the Hon. Mr. Hamilton's, had utilized the smaller streams for the purpose of obtaining water power, and the dams had seriously obstructed the flow of the water to the east, and particularly so between Grenville and Ottawa. At the same time the engineer had not proved that the water had risen higher than it had for the last thirty or forty years. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier), said the water had risen twenty-seven feet. If this were so the information of the Government must have been incorrect, as they were informed that it had only risen 25 feet. Many years ago the river had been as high as that, although it was higher than usual. The obstruction at the head of the Grenville Canal was a sort of breakwater which prevented the water from finding an easy access to that point. He would bring down the report of the engineer and would continue the observations during the present season, with an anxious desire to obtain such information as would lead the Government to take prompt steps in the direction indicated, if it was found that they had a right to meddle in the matter. At the same time it must be understood that the Government could not be public prosecutors for private owners of lands. If any person felt that his lands were overflowed through the draining of the river by rubbish thrown from mills, he had a legal remedy.

Mr. ROCHESTER said the increase in the rise was not remarkable, from the fact that the more the land was cleared the greater would be the spring freshets, in consequence of the snow having a better chance to melt and the water run down. That had been so on the Rideau River, and would be the same on the Ottawa. He presumed the Ottawa had been dammed to a certain extent by rubbish from mills being thrown into it, but at the same time he was satisfied that saw dust had not blocked up the stream.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where does it all go to?

Mr. ROCHESTER said the saw-dust went to the sea; and he might ask in return where the saw-dust thrown into the Hudson went to?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I don't know, but I know there is a great deal of saw-dust at the bottom of the Ottawa.

Mr. ROCHESTER said this was owing largely to the formation of sand banks. Even when the saw-dust sank to the bottom it generated a gas, which exploded and scattered the saw-dust again. The partner of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier) had informed him that such an explosion had once removed a boom, and he himself had seen an explosion throw the water up three or four feet. In his (Mr. Rochester's) own mill he burnt his saw-dust, but he knew it was very difficult for mill-owners to get rid of their saw-dust except by throwing it in the river. He thought the Government might well spend a few thousand dollars at the Grenville rapids, as it would bring great relief to the farmers in rescuing land which was now annually covered with water. With regard to the dams of the Hon. Mr. Hamilton, they had been there for forty years, and if they had any effect upon the current, it would have been shown eight or ten years ago.

Mr. HAGAR said he thought comparison between the Rideau and the Ottawa was hardly fair. He understood that the water had risen twenty-seven feet at the point named, or twenty-five feet as the hon. the First Minister had stated, while at Aylmer it had only risen nine and a half feet.

Mr. ROCHESTER: That was two feet four inches higher than before.

Mr. HAGAR said he would not pretend to say what the causes were, whether they were natural or artificial, or whether the Government was implicated; but he was pleased to see that the hon. the Premier had expressed his determination to investigate the matter. He thought the expenditure of a few thousand dollars would provide a remedy.

Mr. CURRIER explained that he did not mean that sawdust was the cause of the obstruction, but that he had merely stated that this was alleged by the petitioners. There must be some other reason than that of the spring freshets, the rise of water being greater below the Chaudière than above. He was glad the Government were interesting themselves in the matter.

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa) said the question was one of importance to the county which he represented. For many years a large portion of the County of Ottawa, lying along the line of the river, had been completely flooded, and thousands of acres had been rendered valueless. He thought that the construction of some of the Government works had increased instead of diminishing the evil. A deputation composed of many leading citizens had waited upon him and other hon. members, and requested them to press the matter as strongly as possible on the Government, and he trusted the investigation promised would be of a most thorough and searching character, and would commence at an early day. The hon. the Premier had made a mistake in declaring that the Ottawa River partook more of a Provincial than of a Dominion character. If he examined the British North America Act, he would find the great arterial rivers and water stretches were under the management of the Dominion. Although he (Mr. Wright) was deeply interested in everything that pertained to the welfare of the lumber trade, he thought the time had arrived when the question of throwing slabs and sawdust into the rivers should receive its solution, for such a practice must necessarily injure the navigable streams. He understood the Government were taking steps to prevent the continuance of the practice, and he hoped that it would result in an entire change in the system.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he used the term Provincial in comparing the Ottawa River with such a river as the Saskatchewan, which ran wholly through the Dominion territory and not through a Province.

Mr. MITCHELL said he agreed with the distinction drawn by the hon. the Premier between Dominion and Provincial, but, by an Order in Council, rivers which formed the division line between Provinces were regarded as Dominion and not Provincial rivers. In a certain sense all rivers were under the control of the Dominion as regarded their fisheries and their navigation. It was a serious matter that an important river like the Ottawa, which formed an outlet for the exports of lumber, which was one of the staple products of the country and which contributed a large revenue to the Government, should be gradually filling up. It was time the question was solved and the difficulties which had for years been troubling the people obviated, and it was a matter for satisfaction that the hon. the Premier had promised to give special attention to the subject. When he (Mr. Mitchell) was in a measure responsible for the evil, he found himself unable to do much towards remedying the grievance.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. POPE (Queen's) moved for a Return shewing amounts for printing for all services done in Prince Edward Island, during the years 1874, 1875 and 1876 respectively, the nature of the work done, and the names of the persons who performed such work.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. HECTOR L. LANGEVIN, Member for the Electoral District of Charlevoix, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved :

"That, in admitting the Hon. Hector L. Langevin, C.B., elected to represent the Electoral District of Charlevoix, to take his seat on the production of the Duplicate Indenture only, and without the Return of the Indenture of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the Certificate of the latter Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the practice of requiring the production of the usual Certificate."

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN CAMP- BELLTON AND PASPEBIAC.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ROBITAILLE moved for copies of all correspondence, reports, papers and records, respecting the renewal of the contract for the transportation of the mail between Campbellton and Paspebiac, nearly six months before the expiration of the said contract, and without tenders being called for ; and also for copies of the contract. He said the mail between Campbellton and Paspebiac was carried under a contract of four years' duration. As stated in the Report of the Postmaster-General, the distance was 88 miles and the price $4,200 a year. The mode of making a contract for this, as well as other mails, had been to advertise for tenders and invite competition. This contract would have expired at the end of June next. It appeared that, on the 11th of January last, nearly six months before the expiration of the contract, the Postmaster-General ordered the contract to be renewed with the present contractor without any public notice, indeed without any notice of any kind having been given ; and, moreover, without having before him a report of his officers on the subject. He did not intend to attack the mail contractor for that section, but there was a time when that public servant professed political opinions which, it would be supposed, would have led him to act differently to what he did during the last local election. He could not understand how, after so many years' profession of political purity by the hon. the Postmaster-General and his party, and after condemning for so many years, before the House and the country, the giving of any contract by the Crown without first calling for tenders, the hon. the Postmaster-General should have renewed this contract in the manner he did. Surely it was not the absence of blank forms, the printing of which for his Department alone cost the country over $55,000 for the last two years, that prevented his issuing a few of them with a view to obtain the benefit of competition from persons who might have been disposed to carry the mails as well as, and perhaps at a cheaper rate than, the present contractor. On reflection, however, he remembered that, on the 19th December last, the election for the Local Legislature for the county of Bonaventure was annulled and the writs for a new election issued on the 21st of the same month. On 27th December, the Assistant Inspector of Post Offices left Quebec for Bonaventure, where he had interviews with persons carrying the mail ; and the result was that the contractor, who had always been a Conservative and supported Conservative candidates, whether French or English, Catholic or Protestant, took in hand, at the last election for the Local Legislature, a gentleman representing advanced Liberal views, and supported him night and day. That election took place in January, after the visit of the Inspector. The Assistant Inspector arrived at Campbellton on the evening of the 27th of December. The mail courier was ready to leave at 10 p.m. for Paspebiac, but was ordered by the Assistant Inspector to remain over all night; thus the mail left only at nine o'clock on the 28th. The down mail was, therefore, detained eleven hours, and the consequence was, the detention of the next day's mail from Paspebiac to Campbellton and Quebec, including all mails from Gaspé to Quebec—a loss of a day. The mail by the courier was ready to leave Paspebiac for Campbellton on the evening of the 4th of January. The Assistant Inspector ordered the courier to wait until the morning of the 5th, making thirteen hours' delay. The mail arrived on the same day at Maria at 3:30 p.m., and there the Assistant Inspector ordered the courier to remain over until the next morning, nearly sixteen hours. This arrangement enabled the officer to travel by day, to save the expense of a carter, and to make arrangements for the election. Thus two down and two up mails were detained without any reason except that of the Assistant Inspector's own convenience, and to enable him to canvass in the local election.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he could not be expected to reply to the accusation, made by the hon. member for Bonaventure, from the fact that they were not suggested by the motion. If at some previous time the Post Office Inspector had detained the mail courier unnecessarily, there was no impropriety connected with the renewal of the contract. The hon. member had himself said that the courier had done good service for a long time and renewals of contracts of four years had generally been made before.

Mr. ROBITAILLE: Never.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that was the information he had received. He had learnt for the first time that the contractor whose conduct was impugned in the first instance was a politician. The contract for the mail service involved a good deal of plant, and the contractor had been a mail contractor all his life, and the contract was renewed with him as was frequently done by the Departments when the price was not raised. He took departmental advice on the subject, and had received a petition numerously signed, recommending the renewal of the contract on the same terms as previously, and this was the first occasion on which the contractor had changed his politics. He did not take such matters into consideration in dealing with contracts.

Motion agreed to.

POLITICAL CUSTOM HOUSE OFFICERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Customs and any Custom House Officer respecting any application for permission to be a candidate for any corporate office between the dates following, that is to say, 1st July, 1875, and 1st January, 1877. He said he would direct the attention of the House to Rule 10 of the Customs Department, which set forth that no officer of Customs was allowed to hold any corporate office, or to interfere in political questions, either local or general. That rule was a very proper extension of the Act of Parliament which provided that those officers should not vote at elections, and should not be candidates for parliamentary honors. The reason for that was obvious. Officers of Customs were necessarily brought in contact with all classes of the community, with men of all political opinions, and it was therefore proper they should not be mixed up with political questions, and should not interfere in political contests. The rule went so far as to say that officers of that class were not allowed to hold corporate offices, which he (Mr. McCarthy) understood to mean offices under any municipal body. He desired to know why that rule was not carried out impartially; why some officers of the Customs were allowed to hold municipal offices, while other officers were not accorded that privilege. He spoke more particularly with respect to the Collector of Customs at Collingwood, who was at present mayor of the town, and who for four or five years had either been mayor or a candidate for the office. That gentleman was not only an officer of the municipal corporation, but he was understood to be a very warm supporter of the Ad ministration, and one who took a very active part in political affairs generally. This, of course, might not be known to the officers of the Department, but he thought it must be known in the Department whether this officer had applied for leave to hold the office of mayor, and, if so, whether such permission had been granted. He did not wish to mention names, but he would state that two gentlemen, officers of the Department, who had applied respectively for liberty to run for the offices of reeve of a township and alderman of Toronto, had been refused it, and the rule in question should be enforced impartially and strictly, without reference to supposed politics.

Mr. COOK said he was glad to see the hon. member bring the matter before the House. He fancied his hon. friend forgot that a reeve of one of the municipalities of the county of Simcoe was also warden of the county, and this gentleman happened to be a Conservative. He was satisfied that the assertion of his hon. friend with reference to the Collector at Collingwood being a political partizan was unfounded in fact. This gentleman had been most circumspect with regard to politics since he had become Collector of Customs. From 1867 to 1871, Mr. Watson had been Mayor of Collingwood as well as Collector of Customs, and no fault had been found in this relation. There was no emolument connected with the mayoralty, and in 1871 no less a sum than $8,461, very little less than last year, was collected. The duties of Collector did not clash with those of Mayor. Mr. Moberly, who had been Mayor of Collingwood for four years previous to Mr. Watson's re-election, had plunged the town into such financial difficulties that the people, irrespective of politics, asked Mr. Watson whether he would accept office if elected. Mr. Watson did not receive $1,000 a year as Collector, and was consequently not precluded under sec. 3, of chap. 5, of 31st Vic. from holding such a position as mayor.

That clause was as follows:—

“The salary or pay allowed to any such officer or person as aforesaid shall be in lieu of all fees, allowances or emoluments of any kind whatsoever, except actual and authorized disbursements, shares of seizures, forfeitures and penalties, and no such officer or person receiving a salary at or exceeding the value of one thousand dollars per annum shall exercise any other calling, profession, trade or employment whatsoever, with a view to derive profit therefrom, directly or indirectly, or shall hold any other office of profit whatsoever, except in either case with the express permission of the Governor-General in Council.”

Therefore, the salary of the Collector at Collingwood being less than $1,000 per annum, he was precluded from the meaning of this Act. He (Mr. Cook) could not but think that the member from Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) has been ill-advised by his friends at Collingwood in this matter. Mr. Rutledge, a Government official, being Collector at Penetanguishene since 1872, when he (Mr. Cook) entered the House, had been reeve of one of the municipalities of his constituency, but he (Mr. Cook) had thought it beneath his notice to mention so small a matter. In 1872 he had been supported by three Reeves and deputy-Reeves, and although his hon. friend had been looking after these matters in accordance with the advice of the hon. member for Kingston, the number of Reform Reeves had been increased from three to thirteen at the present time. In 1872, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) had been nominated as a candidate to oppose him (Mr. Cook) at that general election by the Reeves and deputy-Reeves in council assembled. No doubt, he looked upon this as a great auxiliary in promoting his election, and was chagrined to see that class of his supporters slipping from his grasp which would tell against him at the next election, if he again contested the constituency. He begged to move in amendment that the words “from the 1st July, 1875” be struck out and the words “from 1st June, 1873” be inserted instead thereof.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said he had no objection, of course, to bring down any papers referring to this matter. He had not heard of this case until three or four weeks ago, at the outside. He did not approve of a Customs officer having any connection with municipal affairs, and especially with such an important position as a mayorship. He was quite sure that he had never given any officer of the Department leave to run for municipal honours.

Mr. McCARTHY said he was very glad to hear that the Minister of Customs had not given this gentleman permission to violate the rules of the Department. He had been requested by residents of Collingwood to bring the matter to the notice of the Minister of Customs and of the House. A gentleman residing near Collingwood had applied for leave to be a candidate for the office of reeve, but had been refused, and very properly too, he thought, under the circumstances. He was glad to see that his hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Cook) had found the use of his tongue since his (Mr. McCarthy's) entrance into the House.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McCARTHY said the tongue was sometimes a useful and sometimes a dangerous member. If he was out of order, he would withdraw the expression. His hon. friend had once said that he (Mr. McCarthy) was one of his constituents, but he did not propose to allow a duel to go on between his hon. friend and himself. Though defeated by his hon. friend on two or three occasions—the House and the country knew by what means—he would oppose his hon. friend at the next election and stake his political future on the result. If Mr. Rutledge, though only a landing-waiter, had not obtained the leave of the Department to run for office, he ought not to be permitted to hold his municipal position. Mr. Moberly had not plunged Collingwood in debt as far as his knowledge went, and he did not believe that this town was more in debt than its residents approved of. Besides, the contest had not been solely between Messrs. Moberly and Watson, for a third candidate was in the field. Public officers, who were deprived of the franchise, owing to the positions they held, and who were servants not merely of one political party but of all the people in the country, should not be permitted to hold municipal offices.

Mr. BLAKE: He is not deprived of the franchise.

Mr. McCARTHY: I think so; a Collector of Customs cannot vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By what law?

Mr. McCARTHY: By the Election Law of Ontario. And I understand that the franchise in connection with this House is the same as it is in Ontario.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In some Provinces they can vote and in some they cannot. They may not be entitled to vote in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY said he was speaking of Ontario, and a Collector of Customs was not qualified to vote under the Statute law in that Province. He had no desire to press the motion if his hon. friend from North Simcoe was of the same opinion. There was nothing to bring down. He had attained his object.

Mr. COOK said that Mr. Rutledge was a Collector of Customs.

Mr. McCARTHY: What is his salary?

Mr. COOK: His salary is not large; but that is not the question.

Mr. McCARTHY: What is it?

Mr. COOK: It is $400.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE LACHINE CANAL ENLARGEMENT.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BABY, in the absence of Mr. MOUSSEAU, moved for copies of all correspondence, letters and telegrams, between the Government and the proprietors of the lands in the neighbourhood of the proposed enlargement of the Lachine Canal, from the first of March, 1875, up to the 10th March, 1877; also copies of all the orders given to the Engineers to furnish information to such proprietors, and of all applications of said proprietors for information made either to the Government, to the Engineers, or to the Department of Public Works, as to the quantity of land required for such enlargement between the said dates 1st March, 1875, and 10th March, 1877; also copies of all orders, proposals and arrangements submitted by the said proprietors to the Government, to the Engineers or to the Department of Public Works, and of all offers, proposals and arrangements submitted by the Government, the Engineers or the Department of Public Works, to the said proprietors, between the said dates of the 1st March, 1875, and 10th March, 1877; also copies of all reports made by arbitrators or valuers on the value of the lands of such riparian proprietors on the said canal, within the said period, from 1st March, 1875, to 10th March, 1877; also of all reports made by the Engineers to the Government, or to the Department of Public Works, on the value of the said lands, and on the offers, proposals or arrangements made or proposed by such proprietors to the Government, or by the Government to such proprietors, within the said period, from the 1st March, 1875, to 10th March, 1877; also copies of all contracts entered into between the said proprietors and the Government, or the Department of Public Works, in relation to the lands required for the enlargement of the Lachine Canal, between the 1st March, 1875, and the 10th March, 1877.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the motion embraced many things that could not exist. No offers had been made by the Government to any proprietors, and no offers had been received from proprietors, except through the ordinary current of communication. He presumed a summary was all that was required by the hon. gentleman; if the entire correspondence with the valuers was wanted, it would take a much longer time to bring down.

Mr. BABY said, in the absence of the mover, he could not say exactly what was required. He presumed that what the hon. the Premier had suggested would meet the case.

LIGHT DUES ON CANADIAN SHIPPING.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. GOUDGE moved for copies of any correspondence that may have passed, during the past three years, between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of this Dominion, relative to the abolition of light duties on Canadian shipping. He said his object in moving for the correspondence was to draw the attention of the Government to a matter of considerable importance to Canadian shipping. In Canadian and United States waters no light dues were imposed, but in the mother country a very onerous charge had always been made in this respect, not only upon foreign but upon English vessels. Two or three years ago, the Dominion Board of Trade memorialized the English Government on the subject, and the memorial was referred to the Board of Trade; but he regretted to say that the reply was to the effect that the prayer of the petition could not be granted. But, while the mother country had refused to abolish the light dues, considerable reduction had been made; but he felt that, in view of the fact that the principle maritime nations did not impose such dues, the attention of the Imperial Government should be again called to the advisability of abolishing them entirely. He proposed shortly to ask the approval of the House by a vote to the movement to abolish the light dues.

APPOINTMENT OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES FOR NEW WESTMINSTER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM moved for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Government of British Columbia, concerning the appointment of a County Court Judge for the District of New Westminister in place of Arthur T. Bushby deceased. He said his object in bringing this motion before the House was to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the unfortunate position in which the county of New Westminister had been placed since the decease of Mr. Bushby, their County Court Judge in May, 1875. He (Mr. Cunningham) had repeatedly written to the hon. the Minister showing him how they were situated, and had also had several personal interviews with him on the same subject, and yet no Judge had been appointed for this important county although the matter had been under consideration for two years. He desired now to remind the hon. the Minister that the county was one of the most important in the Province, containing as it did, vast resources, and population was coming in rapidly. It seemed unreasonable that such an important place should be left without at least one legal man. The Judges of the higher Court, three in number, resided at Victoria on the Island, and he thought that one of these gentlemen should reside somewhere on the mainland. He observed that the sum of $15,000 was placed in the Estimates for the travelling expenses of the Courts, and he thought this sum might be very much reduced, if some of these men lived on the mainland. He could not see any reason why Victoria should be the home of justice for the entire Province. During the past two years the County Court at New Westminster had been supplied by any person whom the Government might think fit to send. Sometimes the Judge of Yale held Court, again the Judge of Lilloett, in fact almost any of these Judges. The Court days had been uncertain, and often postponed, to the great inconvenience of parties having cases before the Court. It had been stated that the delay rested with the Local Government who had not acted in the matter. If this were so then he would beg the hon. the Minister to again remind them of the case. He wished the House to understand that he did not advocate the appointment of a new Judge at an expense to the country. They had three now on the mainland for the work of four counties, and he was sure those gentlemen could do the whole work without any inconvenience to themselves whatever. What was wanted was a redistribution of the counties. Caradoc and Lilloett counties might be united; so might Yale and New Westminster—the Judge residing at the last named place. This was what he advocated; this was what his constituents wished. They were becoming very impatient, and they had a right to be so.

Mr. BLAKE said the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman had alluded had received the earnest attention of the Government. The expenses connected with the administration of justice in British Columbia were extremely large, and the judicial staff, circumstanced as that Province was, was very great. It was originally arranged at the time of Union that the existing functionaries called County Court Judges should, during their lives, or good behaviour, be continued in office at certain fixed salaries, but no provision was made by Parliament for the continuance of the staff of those Judges. It was, therefore, not in the power of the Government upon the demise of the late Judge Bushby, on its own motion, to make an appointment for the vacancy. It was one of the defects, he might say blemishes, of our Constitution that the judicial power was divided between the Local and Central Parliament. The Local Legislatures enacted the laws providing for the organisation of Courts and the number of Judges; and this Parliament enacted the law providing for the appointment of those Judges, and the power of appointment was vested in the executive authority of the Dominion. Efforts had been made from time to time in British Columbia to improve the system, but the laws enacted had been found not unexceptionable, and no law addressed to the real interests of the case had become practically operative. The Dominion Government, so far as it was proper to do, had suggested to the local authorities the propriety, in remodelling the system, of considering such economy as was compatible with the efficient Administration of Justice. All the Supreme Court Judges were located on the Island of Vancouver, and also two of the County Court Judges, one of whom held sittings in Victoria and the other in the town of Nanaimo. On the mainland, as his hon. friend had pointed out, there were now three Judges. It appeared to him that a staff of three Supreme Court Judges and six County Court Judges was very large for the judicial service of the country, and that it might be possible to make arrangements for lessening it. A learned Judge, who resided in Victoria and not in his own judicial district, now discharged the duties formerly performed by Mr. Justice Bushby on his way to his own district. He would not enter into the details of the various plans which had occurred to him for providing some degree of economy, not losing sight of efficiency, in the administration of justice in the Province. He admitted that the Local Government was infinitely more competent than they to devise some such plan. He understood that a Bill was now pending in the Local Legislature for the purpose of effecting a reorganization of the system. He was sorry to learn, however, that one of the provisions required the appointment of barristers as County Court Judges, which would require them at once to superannuate the existing Judges. He believed that would be an unfortunate step for the Local Government to take. Although the present Judges were not men of legal training, they were men of ability and accustomed to deal with local matters. They were thought fit for the position when appointed, and he did not think it right that they should be superannuated at the expense of the country in order that barristers might take their places. He hoped the hon. members representing British Columbia would not suppose that, either individually or on behalf of the Government, he expressed or implied the slightest reluctance to propose any sum necessary in order that justice might be efficiently administered in the Province. Owing to the large area and sparse population, a larger sum of money proportionally was required for this purpose than in other communities. He would ask the co-operation of those hon. gentlemen, however, in aiding to reduce the expenses as much as possible, and to impress upon the Local Legislature the advisability of making such arrangements for the reorganization of the districts, location of the Judges and discharge of the duties, so that the existing staff might be utilised and the Government not be called upon to nominate additional judicial officers.

Mr. BUNSTER said he could quite understand the anxiety of his hon. friend, in asking to get a County Court Judge appointed for the District of New Westminster, for the very good reason that he was a merchant and probably wanted to sue a good many persons for bills; but he (Mr. Bunster) would be sorry to see the hon. member accommodated in that matter. He begged to differ from him in the statement that New Westminster was the most important place in the Province of British Columbia. The Judges were compelled to live in Victoria, where they could send their children to school and have advantages of the best educational talent in the Province. He did not think the hon. the Minister of Justice would feel the propriety of appointing a County Court Judge for Westminster at present. He would admit that the importance of the place demanded that there should be a permanent Judge there, but the gentleman who now occupied that position was quite able to perform the duties required of him. Although he had not a legal training, he had been acting as Judge for about 21 years, and had given universal satisfaction to the citizens of British Columbia. That he had only made one or two mistakes during his judicial career was greatly to his credit. He believed the Government had far better reserve all their resources for the construction of the Pacific Railway than use it in appointing new Judges and superannuating old ones.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he fully concurred in the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Justice as to utilizing the services of the present County Court Judges, as such a course would be most convenient for the country. He also fully agreed in what had been said as to the ability of the gentleman who now held the office of County Court Judge. Although he had not been brought up to the legal profession, he had uniformly shown himself able to perform the duties devolving upon him. He trusted that the Local Legislature would make such arrangements as would be consonant with the views of the hon. the Minister of Justice; and he did not think the people of British Columbia wished to see the present Judges superannuated.

Motion agreed to.

UNPREPAID LETTERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CARON moved for copies of correspondence between the council of the Quebec Board of Trade and the Dominion Government, relating to the rule in existence in regard to unprepaid letters. He said it was hardly necessary that he should take up the time of the House in pointing out the manifest inconvenience of the rule now followed. All non-prepaid letters, under the present system, were forwarded to the Department at Ottawa. This affected in a most disastrous manner the great shipping interests of Canadian ports. Every business man knew that these letters might sometimes be of very great importance, and, when they were sent to the Dead Letter Office, they deprived those to whom they were directed of the information contained in them. Not only might important matters of business be involved, but also those affecting even life. When the papers came down it would be seen that the council of the Quebec Board of Trade had submitted their views to the Government. He hoped that this important subject would receive the earnest and the earliest attention of the Government. He would defer any further remarks which he might consider it his duty to make until the papers were brought down.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was no objection to the papers being brought down. But he would call attention to the fact that the system which was now condemned had only just come into operation, and had not yet received a fair trial. It would be for the hon. gentleman and others who wished to do away with the present system to suggest some remedy for the evils of the optional system. He was aware that the Quebec Board of Trade had made representations to the Government on the subject, and they would receive the greatest possible consideration; but it was very difficult to change the system so suddenly. Of course there must be inconvenience when persons negligently failed to prepay the postage, but there was not much on the part of business men, and the delays at the head office were trifling.

Mr. CARON said he thought the difficulty might be obviated by making the rule that a person having an insufficient or non-stamped letter addressed to him must pay the proper postage before he could receive it. He knew the system was a new one, and that it was only upon its trial, but it had been tried long enough to have found to be a very inconvenient one.

Mr. HUNTINGTON remarked that this would be imposing a fine on a person who was not responsible for the negligence.

Mr. TUPPER instanced the following as a case of hardship: A letter was addressed to himself, say in Ottawa, by a person in the city, requiring only one cent. But before he received the letter he left the city, and the letter was sent after him. He could not, however, get the letter without paying a fine as well as the additional postage. This was a matter of some importance to business men, and he suggested that the Government should propose a remedy.

(Mr. Jetté.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 44) To amend the Act to incorporate the Bridge Company of Rivière du Loup, in the County of Maskinongé.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said this Bill appeared to affect an Act of the Legislature of Canada and to release the company from the obligation to keep a draw-bridge in future.

Mr. JETTE said he understood there was no opposition to the Bill. The North Shore Railway Company had built a bridge six arpents from the company's bridge, and the former bridge would not be opened; so that navigation was entirely impossible in that part of the river. Consequently, the proprietors asked to be allowed the same privilege.

Mr. BLAKE: Was the North Shore Railway Company authorized by this Parliament to build a permanent bridge?

Mr. JETTE: It appears the river is not navigable at that part.

Mr. BLAKE said if the river was not navigable, this Parliament had nothing to do with it. If, however, it would be navigable but for the artificial obstruction below, it would be necessary to see if that was a legal obstruction placed in the navigation of the river, or, if not a legal obstruction, whether, notwithstanding that the river might be technically navigable, there was really so little navigation upon it that the company might be allowed to create a fixed bridge.

Mr. JETTE said the river was not navigable during the greater part of the year. It was only navigable during the spring when the water was very high. It was accordingly felt that there was no necessity for the existence of the drawbridge.

Mr. MITCHELL said the question raised by the Minister of Justice raised this other query—what was a navigable river? It was held by the highest legal authority in England that a navigable river was only one which had a tidal flow. It would be very inconsistent to apply such a rule to rivers on this continent, and indeed this was not the case. He thought, however, that they should have the opinion of the highest legal functionary in the House on the subject.

Mr. DYMOND said the facts laid before the Committee on Public Bills, with respect to this Bill, were that the river was navigable only to and under this bridge at certain seasons of the year, and that, when so, only such small vessels could pass up it as could go under the bridge if there was no draw—so that the abolition of the latter would not impede its navigation.

Mr. BABY said he was glad to see that the hon. member from North York had, within a couple of years, changed his opinions on this point. He approved of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE said the preamble of the Bill, under the circumstances, should have been more explicit. He was not aware that anything in the original Act required the drawbridge to be of a certain height above the water.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That Section, No. 24, is repealed in this Bill.

Mr. BLAKE said there would seem to be no objection to the Bill if it was so worded that the navigation of the river could not be interfered with. The stipulation concerning a draw in the previous Act acknowledged interference with navigation; and, if Section 24 required the bridge to be of a certain height, and if this was repealed, this would remove the guarantee that the navigability of the river should be preserved.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he agreed that the preamble should more fully justify the amendment proposed. He thought that, if the clause which declared that the arch should be of a particular height were repealed, the power of bridging over the portion which would have been occupied by the draw would not be possessed.

Mr. BLAKE said it would still be allowable, he apprehended, to make of it a fixed bridge.

Mr. MASSON said he was informed that the river was navigable for two or three miles above this bridge. He held in his hand a copy of the Journal des Trois Rivières, which stated that this river was navigable for two leagues above the bridge; that their means of communication were not so numerous as to justify the destruction of the finest river they had, and that the passage of this Bill would be detrimental to the public interests. This was a very serious question.

Mr. DYMOND said the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Cuthbert) and the hon. gentleman who promoted the Bill had given the Committee the most positive assurance to the effect he had already stated.

Mr. MASSON said it was clear the river was navigable once, or the draw-bridge clause would not have been enacted.

Mr. BOYER said he personally knew that the river was only navigable for a very short distance above the bridge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: How far?

Mr. BOYER said he supposed for five or six miles. He was willing to sanction an amendment to the effect that the arch should remain above the highest water mark. The North Shore Railway was building a bridge without a draw just above it.

Mr. LAJOIE said he believed that there was no solid objection to the passing of the Bill in its present state.

Mr. MASSON said he thought the hon. member would see the advisability, under the circumstances placed before the House, of delaying the passage of the Bill at this time.

ELECTORS OF STOUFFVILLE REPRESENTATION BILL.

[Bill No. 70].

(Mr. Metcalfe).

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. METCALFE moved:

“That the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 70) To preserve to the electors of the village of Stouffville the continuation of their representation in Parliament.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said no explanation had been made of this Bill, and it was desirable the House should know its object before going into Committee.

Mr. METCALFE said the village of Stouffville was situated partly in the North and partly in the East Riding of York, and there was some doubt as to the right of the electors to vote in either riding. The object of the Bill was to decide this point.

Mr. BLAKE said the Bill had better be allowed to go through Committee. The only question in his mind was whether the Bill was necessary. If legislation was required, however, there was no doubt that this Bill would answer the purpose, as it kept the representation precisely as it was. It left to the electors the right to vote as before. He would ask his hon. friend, before the third reading, to look at the Representation Act, which, he thought, provided for the case sufficiently, and obviated the necessity for any legislation at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think the Bill was called for at all. If there was any doubt about the rights of the electors, it was a question whether this Bill would be of any service.

Mr. DYMOND said this case was somewhat analogous to that of Richmond Hill, which was incorporated a short time since, out of the East and West Ridings of York. The only difference was, that Richmond Hill was assigned to West York, whereas in this instance the electors were left in the same position as before incorporation.

Mr. MITCHELL said all measures affecting the representation of the country in Parliament ought to come through the Government. The system of individual members introducing measures of this kind was entirely wrong, and was likely to lead to a great deal of confusion. The Bill ought not to be allowed to go on unless it had the entire approval of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. the Minister of Justice had hardly discharged his duty to the House in allowing the Bill to be read the second time. If this Bill were allowed to become law, it would be an admission on the part of the House that constituencies might be affected by outside legislation.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS LOANS ACT REPEAL BILL.

[BILL No. 4.]

(Mr. Blain.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAIN said this Bill involved an important principle, and it might be desirable that he should make a few remarks in regard to it. The Act which he sought to repeal was Chap. 49 of the Statutes of 1874, and the powers he complained of were contained in the first section, which authorized companies incorporated under any Act of Parliament in Great Britain and Ireland to come into Canada, merely upon the receipt of a certificate to the Finance Minister, to invest money. At first sight, the Bill might seem to be rather innocent in its terms, but, when they came to look into the matter, it would be found that it placed our companies at a very decided disadvantage. The law in reference to the subject was very confused. He understood the hon. the Finance Minister intended to introduce a Bill to harmonise the various powers possessed by those companies organized in this country, but it would not deal with those companies that came under chapter 49 of the Statutes of 1874. He desired, while asking the House to agree with him in removing that Act from the Statute-book, to point out the difference that would exist between a company organized under the English Joint Stock Companies Act and one organized in this country. Parliament had settled the principle that a company which was empowered to take deposits could only borrow to the extent of its paid-up capital. If a company borrowed on deposits and issued debentures, then it could borrow only to the extent of the paid-up capital and one-third in excess; and, if a company borrow without taking deposits, it could borrow to the extent of the nominal capital. A company organized in England under the Joint Stock Companies Act was not thus limited and restricted. Canadian companies were placed by legislation at such a disadvantage compared with companies organized in England that they were unable to withstand the competition, and some companies established under the English Joint Stock Act had come over and purchased the entire assets of some Canadian companies. The Toronto Building Society, with funds under its control to the amount of $100,000, had sold out its entire affairs to a British company; and he believed negotiations were in progress by British companies to purchase some other Canadian companies. While our own companies were borrowing money in England at five per cent. on debentures, the Canadian people were paying to holders of stock in the joint stock companies of Great Britain dividends at the rate of 10 per cent. The present law discriminated against Canadian companies. So far as related to English companies at present doing business here, there was a provision in the Bill that they should not be disturbed; but probably, when the Bill was sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, it might be desirable to insert a clause to enable those companies now doing business, and which came within the Bill, to continue in existence under some other arrangement which would give the people of this country control over them and not leave them entirely in the hands of foreign shareholders. Another objection to those British companies carrying on business here was their unlimited powers to receive deposits, and, moreover, they paid no taxes.

Mr. PLUMB said he was much surprised to hear the arguments addressed to the House by the hon. member who had introduced his extraordinary Bill. He had recited how several large companies in England and elsewhere were doing business here and lending money in a manner to compete with Canadian money, lending companies. He (Mr. Plumb) had supposed that certainly free trade in money was a principle upon which all hon. members could agree, and that it was not necessary to introduce the principle of protection in that direction. The hon. member had pointed out that the English companies which he proposed to legislate against, and drive out of the country if possible, possessed facilities for borrowing money superior to the facilities enjoyed by the Canadian companies, which were limited to a certain ratio on which to issue debentures on their capital, while the English companies had power to issue larger sums. As they were not borrowing money in the Dominion, we had nothing to do with that. The power of Great Britain with respect to those companies was a matter they did not question, as the companies did not come to Canada to borrow money, when the rate of bank interest in England at some periods was only 1 to 2 per cent. The House should not be called upon to adopt any measures adverse to foreign companies who brought capital to the Dominion and commenced to do business in a legitimate way. Those foreign companies could not be taken under control or taxed in this country, and, indeed, every possible facility should be afforded them.

Mr. YOUNG said the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) had given great consideration to questions of that nature; at the same time, his Bill was of a very doubtful character. He did not see any reason why, if foreign monetary companies saw fit to come here and lend their money, we should have any particular objection to their doing so. It appeared, on the contrary, that we should afford them every facility, and he would like to see their number very largely increased, and an increased amount of money brought into the country for investment. The more money that was invested in the Dominion, the better was it for the people at large. The arguments advanced in support of the Bill were not sufficient to warrant its adoption by the House. In regard to the facilities possessed by British companies for borrowing money, if companies chartered in England borrowed money in Canada, the objection might apply, but as they borrowed money in the mother country, it would be a matter for the British people to look after, not the people of Canada. With regard to the advantage alleged to be possessed by British companies with respect to their not being limited as to the rate of interest, the best way with respect to that was not to fix the rate of interest, but to allow the rate to be determined by the law of supply and demand. He should regret if any difficulty were thrown in the way of any foreign corporation coming here to invest money, for, if more capital were brought into the country, the rate of interest would be reduced and the interests of the country promoted.

Mr. BLAIN said he must express surprise at the views expressed by hon. gentlemen who had addressed the House, and he thought, if a little more attention had been devoted to the subject, they would have presented the question in a different aspect. Foreign companies had really no existence in this country. A corporation was a mere creature of law, and, when a corporation was incorporated abroad, it had no existence whatever in this country, under our laws. Those companies were incorporated under an Imperial Act, and they came to this country; we knew nothing about their constitution, even about the Charters under which they carried on business. Those companies borrowed money in England at 5 per cent., or even less, and brought it to Canada and invested it at 10 per cent. These companies were coming into this country; already three were here with seven millions invested, and more were making application. He contended that every company that did business in this country should be, to some extent, under the Canadian laws. The Act limited the investment companies to those that had been incorporated under the laws of the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland. If the principle were a sound principle, they should allow foreign corporations to come in and invest money here. Why should they not allow French and American companies to do so? The Act was indefensible as it stood. Foreign companies, no matter where incorporated, should be allowed to invest money in this country. He contended that we had companies which were capable of doing our business, which should not be left in the hands of foreign companies. If foreign companies got into trouble, the whole odium was thrown on the Canadian people, who, it would be said, had got the money and would not pay interest for it; and yet they had no control over these companies at all. The present principle was entirely wrong. Under all the circumstances there could be no serious objection to the Bill, and, as they proposed to modify its terms in Committee, he asked the House to consent to the second reading.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD agreed with his hon. friend that, if the Bill wished to repeal a principle, the same principle should be extended to all foreign countries including France and the United States. The hon. gentleman who drew the Bill should introduce another extending such liberty to all the world. He thought such a Bill would be more acceptable to the House than this one. The matter should receive consideration.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he understood that it was informally agreed a fortnight ago that his hon. friend would be allowed to take the Bill before the Committee on Banking and Commerce. One point, however, deserved consideration. Chap. 49 of 37 Vic., if he rightly understood it, permitted in practice any agents of Canadian companies or shareholders to incorporate themselves in Great Britain and utterly disregard the law they had just been passing. The Committee on Banking and Commerce had first passed an Act to regulate the incorporation of Canadian companies intended to go into the business of making loans and borrowing money. He was rather inclined to think it quite possible for parties here to be incorporated in England under the English law, which was very wide and easy, and in that way the action of our own people would be completely defeated. The right to interfere with companies who had come into the country under the existing law would hardly be granted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was exceedingly delighted to find that, although the hon. member for Kingston had gone back on the true principles of commercial legislation, still he was really willing that there should be free-trade in money in this country. The hon. gentleman did not even wait to consider whether this should be reciprocal or not.

Mr. BLAIN said the motion was made in the absence of the leader of the Government, and consequently the debate had been adjourned. He thought the enforcement of the rule, under the circumstances, was extremely inconvenient ; if that course had not been taken, the motion would have remained on the notice paper instead of appearing under the heading of Public Bills and Orders. He had taken very considerable interest in these canals. He looked upon their improvement as being the chief means of enabling this country to settle the North-West. In 1870, the late Government appointed a Commission to enquire into the whole subject. It reported in February, 1871, and recommended the deepening of the canals to 12 feet. Instructions were then given to the Chief Engineer to prepare a report on that basis, and this was done in 1875. In 1875, he drew the attention of the House to the subject. According to the report, it seemed impossible for them, with any sort of moderate expenditure, to deepen the canals beyond 12 feet. After having perused this report carefully, he had come to the conclusion that, in not more than three or four places on the entire St. Lawrence, would they require to deepen to 14 feet, canals which were to be deepened to 12 feet. He addressed the House on the subject, and, as it involved the expenditure of money, he drew up a requisition to the Government, signed by 147 members, requesting the surveys to be continued, and the estimates given of the probable expenditure deepening to 14 feet would require. In 1876, he again drew attention to the matter, and the Minister of Public Works stated that, under the circumstances, he had adopted the principle of 14 feet. The Engineer reported this year, giving the probable estimates as follows:—Cost of deepening the Welland Canal to 12 feet, $9,240,000, and increase for the other two feet, $3,000,000; cost of deepening the St. Lawrence canals to twelve feet, $12,460,000, and increase for the other two feet, $5,500,000, making in all $30,200,000. The items $5,500,000, and $3,000,000 seemed to be so large that he had moved on this occasion for the quantities and prices on which the estimates had been based. If he found, on examination, that the increase amounted to so large a sum he would be somewhat surprised. The first report they had received in this relation warranted him in criticising it very closely, and he would be somewhat mistaken if he did not find, on a careful examination of the estimates, that the figures $5,500,000 and $3,000,000 could be made something less.

Mr. BROUSE said the navigation of the Galop Rapids, some seven miles from Prescott, was probably more important than that of any other point on the River St. Lawrence; and here there was an obstruction. Vessels passing down at low water were unable to cross the bars, which were seven feet under water; and it was impossible for vessels fully laden, even in the spring and especially in the fall, to descend the river, drawing more than seven or eight feet of water. They frequently struck even at that draft. He found no amount in the Estimates for the removal of this obstruction, although the Chief Engineer stated in his return that it could be removed. The Galop Rapids were the sill of the River St. Lawrence. It was certainly necessary to remove this obstruction for the encouragement of commerce, and to enable vessels to go as cheaply as possible to tidal water. There was another obstruction in this part of the St. Lawrence with regard to the canals. The water at present in the canal was so low that the machinery run by it was not able to be worked. He trusted that the Government would put in the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient sum to ensure the removal of this obstacle. There were many reasons why this should be done during the present year. The Chief Engineer stated that it would take a long time to remove these three different bars, which were smooth, and which extended across the river from north to south. One was some 200 feet in width, and the water ran at the rate of about eleven miles an hour at this point. Several years would be required to secure their removal. The Government had, last year, built a vessel for this purpose, costing about $60,000, and it was certainly extraordinary that this vessel should be allowed to remain idle, moored at Prescott. He really trusted that the Board of Works would see that the request of the Chief Engineer would be carried out, and the work pushed forward to completion. Moreover, owing to the swiftness of the water, no vessel could enter the mouth of the canal at this point, to descend it. On a future occasion it would be also necessary to enlarge the canal; but the first real object to be attained was the removal of the obstacle he had mentioned. This work bore a national character.

Mr. NORRIS said there was considerable uneasiness on the part of those engaged in the trade at the position in which the Welland Canal works were. He did not himself find fault with the delay, because he believed it was necessary, in order to procure the best route and to make the necessary changes. It was better that a longer time should be taken if, thereby, a more advantageous route could be secured. He believed the work was being pushed forward with all possible speed. He desired to impress upon the Government the necessity of increasing the depth to 14 feet, if it was possible, as he believed a good deal of the work had been performed with this view. It was well known to the Government, and it appeared by report of the Chief Engineer that it was necessary, that vessels should be of the largest capacity possible to compete in the carrying trade. If the canal was only made at a depth of 12 feet at first, vessels would be constructed to suit it, and then they would not suit when it was made 14 feet deep. It was to get the great trade of the west, and he presumed that was what we aimed at, we would have to carry at a cheaper rate to Montreal than was being done through New York or anywhere else.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK called attention to the petitions which had been presented from people in Ontario, urging that the portions of the Welland Canal which had not been placed under contract should be commenced at once. The country would not find any benefit from the money expended until those portions, in which were the most serious difficulties of the whole route, were finished. Already, he had seen it stated that one firm, which had a number of large vessels in view of the early completion of the canal, had failed in consequence of the delay. It was desirable, in the interest of ship-owners and the country generally, that the work should be completed at the earliest possible moment. He would remark that the Government's own friends in the immediate neighbourhood of the canal had called attention to the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE: To what fact?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: To the fact that several sections in the most difficult part of the construction had not been touched, and the contracts for which had not been let, and that while certain delays might have been unavoidable, there were others which were contrary to the popular expectation, and that a little restlessness under the circumstances was inexcusable. He would ask the hon. the Premier to give his serious attention to placing the remaining works under contract at once. Some portions could remain until a more favourable period for their completion. But there was one part, the Galop Rapids, which would not require a large expenditure in order to enable the chain tug to be used.

Mr. PLUMB said his constituents were much interested in the work, and they much desired that the canal works should be constructed as quickly as possible, and with locks sufficient to carry vessels of fourteen feet. It would be undesirable to hurry the opening if longer time was required to make it to this depth. The competition on the Welland Canal would be very severe, and the profits on the carrying trade much less than in former years. Commercial men had therefore to use close application and economy, and, unless the depth of water in the canal was made fourteen feet, they would be placed at a serious disadvantage, as vessels of an enormous draft were being used, these not requiring more running expenses to manage than smaller vessels. It was to be regretted that some of the most important parts of the canal were not under contract, as he observed by the report. He must admit that certain sections had been pushed forward rapidly, but they would be of no use unless those referred to were also finished. He trusted the Government would see, from the complaints and remonstrances from quarters where they generally did not get unfriendly criticisms, the necessity of pushing forward the work as rapidly as possible, and bring into effect the great system of canals which would enable us to secure the trade from the West, through the St. Lawrence down to the seaboard.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK.

Mr. SCHULTZ said the remarks of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) had shown that he devoted considerable attention to the subject of the exportation of grain from the North-West, and he had done wisely in bringing forward the subject. There were two facts in connection with the grain trade of the North-West, which had an important bearing upon the question of the deepening or otherwise of this canal system. In the first place, it had been demonstrated, he thought, to a certainty, that we had in the North-West the best wheat-growing country on the continent. It had been shown that the yield of the cereals was greater in the Province of Manitoba, and presumably so in most of the North-West Territory—that was, of course, in the Winnipeg basin, to the west,—than in the best of the prairie States. And, in connection with this fact, when it was taken into consideration that this large wheat-growing area did not lie farther from the waters of Lake Superior than the wheat-lands of Iowa, Minnesota, Michigan and Illinois from the head of Lake Michigan, it would be seen that the interests of the North-West and the construction of the canal were intimately related to each other. He did not see why we should go to this enormous expense merely for the purpose of facilitating the exportation of grain from the Western States, and certainly we should not make a special effort with this view in the present depressed times. But we should construct the canals with the object of benefitting our own territories. He strongly approved of the Welland Canal being made 14 feet deep.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this was not a matter of friendly or unfriendly criticism, so far as political supporters were concerned; it was a matter of stern business. He was quite surprised to hear any complaint made as to progress of works on the Welland Canal. He did not think in any other country in the world so much work had been done in such a short time as had been done there. Combined with the Lachine Canal, all of which was under contract, the officers of the Department had been pushed to the utmost extent in attending to canal work. It was not true that the most important portions of the Welland Canal were still to be tendered for. There were a few small sections, but nothing serious to be put under contract, and they would be let in a few weeks, as soon as Mr. Page could overtake the work connected with them. As was intimated in the Speech from the Throne, it was an important matter of consideration how far certain of the other works should be prosecuted with the same hurry, as he might almost say, as had been shown in connection with the Welland and Lachine Canals. Indeed the Lachine Canal was hurried in consequence of the desire to have the works proceeded with while so many men were idle, a year and a half ago. The Welland Canal when finished would be a complete work, of a depth of 12 feet of water, with the necessary works for making it 14 feet when necessary without disturbing navigation. The question was whether it was desirable at the present to spend $3,000,000 more for the purpose of obtaining two additional feet, and this should not be seriously entered into merely for the purpose of gratifying the desire, a very laudable one, of a considerable number of people having an interest in seeing the work carried out. The work had already been enormously expensive, and had added considerably to our National Debt within the last few years. The Government could not put the whole money into these works now. It would not be considered necessary to do so for many years, at least to Kingston, because large vessels going to the Upper Lakes would undoubtedly unload at Kingston without seriously increasing the cost of transport to tidal waters. At all events, the increase in cost would be trivial compared with the enormous advantage to the country in the increase of works necessary to carry vessels 260 feet long down to Montreal. While there was no more zealous or anxious advocate for a complete system of navigation for vessels of that class to the ocean than himself, still ordinary prudence required them to consider how far the prosecution of the scheme might lead to serious difficulties in the meantime, and not to push too fast works which possibly could be done without for a time by certain improvements in the navigation which might obviate the construction of locks and canals at certain points on the river. Some hon. gentlemen had referred to the "easy task" of bringing down estimates. The hon. member for West York was mistaken if he thought it was a mere matter of putting down so many figures for the Engineer to estimate the cost of excavating under water from a little below Prescott to Montreal. It would be observed from returns of the Engineer that it would cost $1,500,000 to obtain a depth of 12 feet apart from the locks altogether; but in order to obtain 14 feet the cost would be increased to $5,000,000. The reason for this was tolerably obvious. If the profile of the bottom of the lakes—St. Louis, for instance—was consulted, it would be observed that the land under the water was a series of waves and the excavating would be simply cutting through a series of ridges. If, however, they cut down to 14 feet, a large proportion of the lake had to be excavated, making in fact a canal within the lake. Besides they did not exactly know at what particular point the lock would be constructed. In some parts, the soil to be excavated was extremely hard, and in other places rock appeared; and immediately above the Galop Rapids there was a serious ridge of rock. They had procured a chain-tug here, not merely for the purpose of taking out shale and removing boulders and other impediments, but also as an experiment to ascertain what would be the cost and what would be expedient. If large vessels could be towed up past the serious part of the rapids, it would enable them perhaps to obviate the making of the canal altogether. The works on the Welland Canal would be prosecuted to obtain a depth of 12 feet with all the expedition they could use. As he stated a moment ago, the new aqueduct was the most serious part of the works yet to be commenced. It was possible to get a vessel over the Welland Canal by the old aqueduct, but the area was too limited to take a very large vessel over without serious inconvenience, because a vessel filling the entire area of the aqueduct would operate as a dam. Although they would be able to get the depth by cutting down the crown of the arches, and probably would have to do that, it became evident last autumn that the most expeditious method to secure navigation across the Welland was to build a new aqueduct. The proposal of the Engineer was, in the first place to make a water way which, by taking a circle round the old aqueduct, would convey the water past from the lake level to the east side, and thus keep up the supply while the vessel was operating as a dam. It had been determined however, to build a new aqueduct with a depth of fourteen feet and a larger sectional area, so that when the work was completed it would be able for all time to come to take the largest vessels navigating the lakes. They would be obliged to excavate to a depth of sixteen feet at Port Colborne and Galop in order to secure navigation for vessels of fourteen feet draught, as allowance had to be made for low water and the operation of high winds blowing in a contrary direction to the canal, which would sometimes reduce the height of water two feet. It was necessary that the approaches should be made deeper. The entrance of the lock at Port Colborne, where the bottom was composed of hard rock, would be dangerous were this not done, as it would be almost fatal for a vessel attempting to pass through in low water. The works were of so vast a character that those who had not visited them could scarcely comprehend the magnitude of the difficulties to be surmounted, and he was surprised that anyone should imagine that the engineering department had not prosecuted them with as much speed as was practical or possible. It would have been possible probably to have done a little more, but certainly not in a profitable manner. The contractors had barely time to carry out their contracts, and, although many of them had been tolerably successful in adhering to the time, it was scarcely possible for most of them to finish the works in the time originally set by the Government. Everything possible was being done toward the construction of the Lachine and the Welland Canals, although there was no particular hurry for the latter. The works on it were placed under contract rather in a hurry with a view to utilising the cheap labour to be obtained at the time and to afford employment to a large number of labourers in a time of depression. He hoped that hon. members would take a reasonable view of these matters. While they did not object to, but rather invited a free expression of opinion on the subject, he thought the course of the Government in regard to those works would be ultimately approved by the community generally.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the hon. the First Minister had misunderstood him if he thought he desired to view this matter in any other but a business light. He merely desired to call the attention of the House to the fact that petitions had been presented to the effect that the works were not progressing as fast as was to be wished; and, in order to show that that opinion was not confined to the political opponents of the hon. gentleman, he quoted from the St. Catharines News, a paper which warmly supported the Government. He did not complain of the works under contract, but what he desired to explain to the House was that it had been said, and he believed the hon. the First Minister admitted it, that some of the most important works in connection with the whole system of canal improvement had not been put under contract. He was glad one announcement had been made, that the remaining works were soon to be put under contract.

Mr. BLAIN said, in justification of the position the hon. the Premier had taken in reference to this matter, he might state that when the deputation waited upon that hon. gentleman it was distinctly understood that if the depth was increased to 14 feet the canals could not be completed as early as if 12 feet was adhered to. He believed that it would be much more in the interests of the country to wait for 14 feet than to get the 12 feet now. His object in moving for the return was in order to check the report and not with a view of finding fault.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was utterly impossible for a return to be made to enable anyone to check the Engineer's estimate. This was an approximate estimate; they could not get the quantities without minute instrumental surveys and borings in all those places. They had always found Mr. Page's estimates exceedingly accurate and close, as a rule. There was no question about the estimate for the Welland Canal, as that was almost exact.

Mr. BLAIN said, if the Government had not the data on which to make the returns, he did not desire to put the country to additional expense. If the hon. gentleman wished, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the motion. They might be able to bring down some interesting statements; at any rate, he would do the best he could.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was always objectionable for a Government to promise a return which it could not make. Although there might be an understanding that certain information could not be furnished, yet that was forgotten afterwards, and the Government was held responsible for what they did bring down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had always endeavoured studiously to avoid publishing engineer's estimates, as they were confidential documents. Although, in this instance, they might be reasonably accurate, as far as the surveys enabled them to ascertain, yet they were still approximate, and not for the guidance of any contractor tendering for the work.

TRURO AND PICTOU BRANCH RAILWAY TRANSFER BILL.—[BILL No. 82.]

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

THIRD READING.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL said that, when this Bill was in Committee, he stated the objections he had to its passage as it now stood. If he thought he could attain any success he would have moved to throw the measure out, but, as he felt the Government had resolved to carry the Bill, he would not take up the time of the House by a motion of that character. He did not propose that this property should pass out of our hands with the knowledge that ere long we would have to pay a large sum of money annually for its use. He moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to add to Clause 1, the following proviso:—

"Provided always that there is hereby reserved to the Government of Canada, free of cost, the absolute right and free use of the said railway for the purpose of transporting coal or other supplies and materials, required for the maintenance and working of the Intercolonial and other Government Railways."

The reasons which influenced him to bring this before the House were as follows:—This branch was one of the most important feeders of the Intercolonial Railway that we had. There was no line of railway in the Dominion, outside of the Grand Trunk, which would give so much traffic or profit to the Intercolonial as the Truro and Pictou Branch. It connected the town of Truro with the Intercolonial, and there were immense coal fields in the neighbourhood through which it passed. From this coal field, the Intercolonial Railway obtained cheap supplies of fuel. They all knew that the great lines of railway, east of Kingston at all events, and even he might say east and west of Toronto, were gradually departing from the consumption of wood, as not only more expensive but also far more dangerous and troublesome, owing to the sparks it gave off, than coal, which was moreover cheaper. And one would naturally suppose that the Government would desire to keep under its control the means of supplying that without which a railway could scarcely be run. In the eastern part of the Dominion there were but three great coal deposits; in the county of Cumberland, through which the Intercolonial passed; in the county of Pictou, with which the railway in question connected the Intercolonial; and in the Island of Cape Breton, which would be impossible now to utilize for the use of Government railroads. The first-named was of comparatively limited extent, at all events as far as yet developed, compared with the Pictou field. One would have imagined that the Government would have been naturally inclined to reserve within its own control the power of holding this line of railway, and to avoid a monopoly falling into the hands of the Springhill Mining Company, or other such companies in that district. The effect of the transfer would, practically, be to place the Government at the mercy of the road. He might be told that the Government reserved running powers over the line, but he did not think that the section in question was as comprehensive as it ought to be. The necessary power might be possessed under the General Railway Act, but, whether this was the case or not, he contended that, as the country must depend on the Pictou region for supplies of fuel for the Government railways, it was not desirable that the only railway of 60 odd miles in length, which connected the Intercolonial Railway with this coal field, should pass out of its hands. It should be retained for the benefit of the greater line, connecting the Atlantic sea-board with the interior. Even assuming that the Government possessed the powers necessary to run cars over the road, he held, in the second place, that it was unwise for them to place themselves in the position of having to pay any company for the use of a road which they gave away. He looked upon it as a suicidal policy on the part of the Government to give up a line which had cost the country one or two million dollars, as an additional compensation to Nova Scotia, without any consideration whatever. What would be the next step? Doubtless his hon. friend from Westmoreland would ask that the line from Fredericton to Grand Lac should be subsidized by the grant of the road from Shediac to St. John, or the hon. member from Queen's, N.B., might make a similar proposal, and why should not the one be done as well as the other? He would not be at all surprised to find his hon. friends from Queen's, Sunbury or Kent asking that the road from Shediac to St. John be given to aid in building the several lines projected for their own counties, and was the House prepared to extend the same liberality in their regard? With what kind of justice could the House or Government refuse such a request? He thought that such a course would encounter serious objection on the part of the people of New Brunswick. True it was that the management of the Intercolonial Railway was satisfactory. The large majority believed that the line was administered with very great cost and not in the interests of the country; but, bad as was this state of things, he considered that it was preferable to seeing the road pass into the hands of a private company, and the whole business of the chief commercial centre controlled by private persons, who were not amenable to public opinion and not controlled by Parliament. When he saw how the large majority of members sustained the Administration, he had very little hope of his resolution being carried, no matter how much justice and sound reason it comprised, or how much the interests of the country might be affected by its defeat. If he stood alone, however, he was bound to divide the House on the question. The company, moreover, could scarcely object to the propriety of the rider he proposed. It might be very convenient for Sir Hugh Allan, who controlled one whole coal mine and part of another, and for other capitalists interested in coal mines, to get hold of the best railway property which the country possessed. No other road in the future, if in the present, would give so good a return for the outlay; and yet it was to be given away without adequate consideration, and a large sum would have to be paid annually to convey coal over this line for the Intercolonial Railway. He considered it his duty to present his views to the House, and to leave the responsibility of sanctioning the transfer to the Chamber. If his motion were carried, it would not defeat the object in view, and there would be no breach of faith, as the bargain made was subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. MACDONNELL said the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) had the other evening attacked the whole Bill, but, having been informed by one of the members of the late Government that he had been a party to a similar resolution, he (Mr. Mitchell) shifted his ground and attacked the resolution in flank. The amendment proposed had, however, only one purpose, and this was the defeat of the Bill. He would refer to one or two points to shew how contumacious and groundless were the arguments of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member said that this line was a feeder to the Intercolonial Railway, but was not the hon. gentleman aware that the extension of the road eight miles farther would tap the Island of Cape Breton, which had nearly one-third of the population of Nova Scotia, and also the Strait of Canso with its great shipping and trade. This would tend to add to, rather than diminish, the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway. The distance from the mines to Truro was about forty, not sixty miles; and the line would only be used on very rare occasions to carry coal from Pictou to the Intercolonial, owing to the existence of coal at Springhill. But, if it were otherwise, would this be a sufficient argument to justify the House in rejecting the Bill, and preventing the Government from adopting a measure which had for its object the fostering of the prosperity of the whole Province of Nova Scotia, and particularly of the great portion of it lying east of this road. It would, besides, cost the Government but a very small sum indeed to convey coal over this road for the Intercolonial. The hon. gentleman said that the people of New Brunswick would oppose any similar transfer, but they were in this respect very different from the people of Nova Scotia, who were a unit in favor of this transfer. He believed every member from Nova Scotia also favoured it, and consequently the hon. gentleman's argument in this respect did not hold good. He hoped that the House would oppose and reject the amendment.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he was astonished at the moderation of the amendment. The question was one of very great importance to this Dominion. In every Province, he thought, it had been decided that provincial railways should be built by the Provinces themselves. If the road was of the importance stated, the Province would build it. If the provincial bonus of $8,000 a mile, besides a large land grant, was not sufficient, it ought not to be built. But now it was proposed to give the Truro and Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway as a Dominion subsidy, in addition. The Province of Quebec had to build its own railways, and he saw no reason why the Province of Nova Scotia should receive the equivalent of millions to help it to build a road. He was quite aware that there was not a Province in the Dominion which was so favoured as the Province of Nova Scotia. He had to confess that the matter looked very curious, and there must be a large influence brought to bear against the Government to induce them to depart from their policy. He protested against the action of the Government. He would vote for the amendment, though he did not think it strong enough.

[BILL No. 66.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) moved in amendment:

“That the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House to amend by striking out of the first section the following:—All those parts of sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 of the Act of 1875, Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, entitled an Act respecting the Masters and Servants Act.”

He said he would not add to his former remarks, except to say that the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice, that this clause should not take effect until 1st May, 1878, with the view of giving an opportunity to the Local Legislature of the Province of Ontario to pass such an Act as might meet the objections which he had to the clause—that this amendment did not give a sufficient guarantee for what he wanted. He, therefore, placed his protest on record.

Question put, and amendment (Mr. White, North Renfrew), negatived, on a Division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

ONTARIO MARITIME COURT BILL.—[BILL No. 41].

(Mr. Blake.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 41) To establish a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in the Province of Ontario, read.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he did not intend to oppose the Bill, as was understood by many hon.

members. It had been his duty in former Sessions to introduce, for the consideration of the House, a resolution declaring it to be advisable and expedient to extend to the inland waters of Canada a more speedy remedy for the collection of certain claims against vessels. He also founded upon that resolution, after it had been carried, a measure which he had introduced for several Sessions in succession, but which had always met the determined opposition of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), who, by putting forward various rules of the House, had always succeeded in killing it off. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) must congratulate the hon. the Minister of Justice upon bringing down the measure, which he believed would be received with much satisfaction by a large number of people in Ontario, and for which they would give the Government due credit. There could be no question that in a Province like Ontario, where so many commercial men owned vessels, and where so many people were employed in navigating inland waters, great interest was felt in the subject. The step which had been taken, although an unusual one in some respects, that of establishing a new Court, and of introducing a new set of laws, would be found beneficial. The law which it was proposed to introduce, while new on this side of the line, was not new on the south side of the waters which passed through Ontario. There the astuteness of the American people had led them many years ago to introduce, above tide water, the very provision which the Government of this country, at this late hour, had seen fit to introduce. While there might be some question as to the kind of Bill which should be introduced, he thought upon the whole the Minister had adopted a wise course in introducing a Bill which with one sweep would establish in Ontario the maritime laws as they existed upon the seas, instead of introducing different Bills, as was the case in some of the American States, to meet different cases. It was better that the old established laws should be put in force, as advantage could then be taken of the decisions given. Although the processes of this Court might not be used as processes of other Courts were, yet it would be of great advantage, because there was a remedy to put them in force, and because people, whose rights would be affected, knew that they could invoke the protection of the law. This fact being known would bring about in many cases, a settlement of the claims out of court. Every person acquainted with the towns upon the lake shore, knew that there were a great many instances, especially during the last few years, of seamen, after trading all the summer on vessels, being informed at the end of the season that the owners were bankrupt and that the vessels were mortgaged; and the seamen in consequence could not get a dollar in return for their summer's labour. In other cases wealthy men chartered vessels to persons or firms of no means whatever, to whom it was useless for the mariners to look for their wages. Another class of cases was where men supplied the vessels with necessaries, particularly wood and coal, and had no remedy in the collection of the debt. The Bill also applied to ship-carpenters and steamfitters making repairs, working on vessels that were mortgaged. The Bill in a great many cases would give the remedy sought for; and the knowledge that that remedy existed would often prevent a Court process being sought for, and would bring about a settlement of the claims. But there were claims for necessaries which would not come under the Bill. He thought it would be desirable to give a lien for these necessaries supplied to vessels, whether the owners of the vessels were resident in the Province or not, and the same remark would apply to building, repairing and equipping. But, by this Bill, as now introduced, these two classes of claims would not constitute liens upon the vessel. There would be a lien for wages, for towage, for salvage and for pilotage, but none in the case of necessaries supplied, or in the case of building, equipping or repairing, where the owners or part owners were resident in the Province. He would be glad if the hon. the Minister of Justice could allow an amendment in this respect. The other point to which he would call attention and which he had reason to hope would be acceded to, was, that of limiting the time when those claims should be put in force. Ship-owners took a deep interest in the Bill, and many were afraid that the process of the Court would be abused, or at least would be abused so as to injure their property and depreciate it to some extent. He did not think their fears were well-founded, but, in order to prevent any possibility of that coming true, he suggested that a clause should be inserted in the Bill limiting the time for the enforcement of the lien to a period of 90 days—that if the claim were not prosecuted, or some steps taken to enforce it within 90 days, it should have no force under this law. This would enable owners to know within a reasonable time, what claims there were on which it was intended to take liens. Another matter to which he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice was in regard to disputes between owners of vessels regarding ownership, employment or earnings of vessels. Cases might arise in which it might be necessary to adjudicate upon those cases. At present, there was no Court in Ontario fully competent to consider that question. The number of vessels was daily increasing and their division into shares, and it became difficult for the ordinary Courts of Ontario to deal with disputes between owners as to the appointment of masters and similar points. He had known cases in which one of the owners had taken forcible possession of the vessel, causing a breach of the peace to be imminent. In the case of vessels registered in the Province of Quebec—and many of the vessels trading on the lakes were registered at Montreal—the Bill would not apply; and he, therefore, suggested that this subject should receive the consideration of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. PALMER said that, as the question of the Dominion Parliament dealing with Canadian shipping, instead of the Imperial Parliament, was the most important subject he brought before the House last Session, he felt called upon to make some observations. He was glad to observe that the legislation had assumed its present form, because he held that if this Parliament had the power to pass this Bill, his former contention with respect to the power of the Canadian Parliament over shipping must also be conceded. If the Act went into force it would have this effect, that any vessel in any tidal waters in any part of the world, having been in collision with and caused damage to any other vessel, the moment it came within the jurisdiction of this Court, it could be seized and the claim for damages could be enforced here. That jurisdiction, which it was proposed in the Bill to give to Ontario, was exercised by the Vice-Admiralty Courts in the Eastern Provinces, those courts enforcing the Imperial laws relating to ships in those Provinces. Unless the Imperial authorities would concede to Canada the right to legislate equally broadly in Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, he could not understand by what principle it could be conceded in the case of Ontario. He agreed that it would be a great anomaly that where a vessel on the great lakes came into collision with another vessel on the south side of the lake, and a maritime lien was created, it could be enforced in the United States, but, if the collision occurred on this side, it could not be enforced. It made no difference where the act was committed or the debt created, whether in the waters of Nova Scotia, Alaska, or the waters of Europe, the moment the vessels got within the jurisdiction of the Court, proceedings could be instituted if the Bill should have the force of law, as it should have. He regretted he had not had time to peruse the correspondence between the Dominion and Imperial Governments; but he wished the hon. the Minister of Justice to consider how it was possible to ask the Imperial Government to give to the Dominion Parliament the power to legislate in the manner proposed with respect to Ontario, and thereby allow the Canadian Parliament to legislate with respect to ships that happened to come within the jurisdiction of Ontario, the Imperial Parliament legislating with respect to all other ships in the Dominion. It was an anomaly that could never be submitted to by this country. The result of such a position of affairs must be to carry out the principle that Canadian ships and ships of all nations within Canada must be governed by the Dominion Parliament. It was a question of the greatest importance to this country, in working out the great future which he was satisfied there was before it. When the shipping of Canada was placed in its proper position in regard to shipping laws the Dominion would become one of the greatest maritime powers of the world. He looked forward to that day. Whatever industry might flourish, there could not be a shadow of doubt that, with proper legislation, the shipping would become one of the largest and most important interests, not only in the Dominion but in the world.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he noticed that the Bill did not apply to any portion of the waters of Lower Canada.

Mr. BLAKE said there was power to exercise jurisdiction, but on account of inconvenience it was not exercised.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the commission of the Vice-Admiralty Judge was and was meant to extend only to such portions of the Province of Quebec to which the Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction would apply, as was the case in England. The Court of Vice-Admiralty had exclusive jurisdiction within those limits to which the jurisdiction extended. The difficulty he saw in regard to Ontario was that before the present measure very many of the subjects of controversy were within the jurisdiction of the local Courts. This measure did not oust the Courts of Ontario from their present jurisdiction. They would have all the rights they now possessed, and a conflict of jurisdiction might arise. Actions might be brought in both Courts. The Legislature of Ontario had the power to deal with very many of the subjects which this Court would have jurisdiction over. Then, if any rights were created by the Ontario Legislature, this Court must try those cases. This Court was framed under the British North America Act which provided that, notwithstanding the power given to the different Provinces with regard to criminal jurisdiction, the general Parliament could establish a Court of Error and Appeal and additional Courts to administer the laws of the Dominion but not to administer the laws of any of the Provinces. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice in the preparation of the Bill had fully weighed how and to what extent the Bill would interfere with the jurisdiction of the Courts in Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE said he was not the first person to consider that difficult subject. The hon. the Minister of Justice in 1869, who occupied his position and was also Premier of the Government, brought down a Bill to establish a Supreme and Exchequer Court, in which was the following clause as No. 58:—

“The said Supreme Court shall also have and possess exclusive jurisdiction in Admiralty in cases of contract and tort, and in proceedings in rem, and in personam, arising on or in respect of the navigation of, and commerce upon the inland navigable waters of the Dominion, above tide water, and beyond the jurisdiction of any now existing Court of Vice-Admiralty.”

There could be no doubt it was his (Mr. Blake's) duty to consider the difficulties to which the right hon. member for Kingston had referred, as the right hon. gentleman had discharged that duty himself when he prepared and submitted to Parliament the clause which he had read. The right hon. gentleman could have arrived at that conclusion only on the one principle, that the legislative power of Canada to deal with the subject of shipping, navigation, trade, and commerce, entitled it to pass laws which practically involved all the subject matters contained in that clause. The right hon. gentleman, moreover, proposed to oust the Courts of Ontario from exercising jurisdiction in all classes of cases covered by the Bill. He agreed with the right hon. gentleman that the Dominion Parliament could oust those Courts from their local jurisdiction. But knowing there was a large and useful, though imperfect, jurisdiction exercised as to many of those subjects which would come under the Vice-Admiralty Court, and as respecting some of those subjects the common law jurisdiction exercised by the ordinary Courts was found more convenient, he thought it was the better and more prudent course not to attempt to oust the Courts in Ontario from exercising jurisdiction. He did not think there would be any conflict of jurisdiction, but there would be concurrent jurisdiction. In Queen's Bench, Chancery and Common Law there was concurrent jurisdiction and no conflict was found to arise, and if after a time it was thought desirable to make that jurisdiction exclusive which was now concurrent, it could be done. The right to petition in rem, the new principle which was being introduced, was a class of cases over which the local Courts would have no jurisdiction, and in which there could be no conflict of jurisdiction. With regard to the observations of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer), he might say that he largely shared the views of the hon. member with respect to the jurisdiction of Parliament. If he did not, he (Mr. Blake) would not propose the present Bill, which, he hoped, would do something to carry out the views they shared in common.

Mr. PALMER said that there could be no conflict of jurisdiction between the Courts, for there was concurrent jurisdiction in New Brunswick, and such difficulty did not arise. If the principle were once conceded that we had a right to deal with collisions on the high seas, then, surely, the Canadian Parliament could deal with collisions in its own waters, and give jurisdiction to a Court over such cases. If the Dominion Parliament could legislate on the subject at all, there could be no limit placed to its legislative powers. He thought it was impossible for the Dominion to create a Court that could administer the laws of any particular Province. Under the British North America Act they could not create any Court of original jurisdiction except to execute the laws of Parliament.

Mr. HOLTON said it would be very great presumption on his part, of which presumption he would not be guilty, to speak on the purely technical points raised, but there were some points to which, as a practical man, he might address himself very briefly. He was struck very much by the argument of his hon. friend for St. John (Mr. Palmer) when he first addressed the House in respect to the anomalous position in which the Bill would place us. They ought, he thought, to deal with this whole subject—on the coast, up the Gulf of St. Lawrence and all through the Dominion, but, while there might be obstacles in the way of obtaining that jurisdiction, he failed to see what valid reasons there could be for not including the piece of land from Cote des Lacs to Montreal within the scope of the Bill. Montreal was, in fact, the port of the Province of Ontario; it was the destination in fact of all vessels likely to come within the jurisdiction of this Vice-Admiralty Court. This was a great anomaly which perhaps this Bill was the first step towards redressing. The Bill failed to cover the ground which ought to be covered; except as a first step we would probably be better without it than with it.

Mr. MITCHELL said he might add a few words endorsing the remarks of the hon. members for St. John (Mr. Palmer) and Chateaugay (Mr. Holton.) Between the Province line and tidal waters in or about the vicinity of Three Rivers collisions were numerous. The greater portion of the commerce of the St. Lawrence passed between Montreal and Three Rivers, and he thought the Bill ought to extend to the Province of Quebec the same facilities which he proposed to give to Ontario. He saw no reason why they should not pass a law for the inland waters, or why a portion of those inland waters should be exempt from the operation of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE said he would explain that in Committee.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he would call the attention of the hon. member for Chateaugay to the fact that the jurisdiction would be exercised, no matter where a case arose.

Mr. HOLTON: Having no Court of our own, that makes no difference.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: The jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec, according to the decisions, extends beyond the tidal water.

Mr. HOLTON: But if they do not exercise it?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Then the business must all come to Ontario.

Mr. CARON: I have no doubt but that the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court extends to the whole Province of Lower Canada.

Mr. BLAKE: It did not formerly, but recent law has extended the jurisdiction.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the first clause of the Act. He thought the Legislature of this country could not pass a law to be administered by the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec.

Mr. BLAKE: I suppose not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec is governed by the same laws as in England.

Mr. BLAKE: It has statutory jurisdiction as well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said if it was the case that the Court could not administer any laws passed by this Parliament, his hon. friend would then see that in this clause the rights arising out of cases of contract or tort, the remedies would be only the same as would be exercised in any existing Vice-Admiralty Court.

Mr. BLAKE said his purpose was to put all persons who had vessels on the inland waters in precisely the same position as if there were a Vice-Admiralty Court extending to those waters. If they could introduce new maritime rights and remedies by Act of Parliament, they could of course provide for their administration by this Court. The powers to be conferred would be simply supplementary.

Section 1 agreed to.

On Section 2,

Mr. BLAKE said he proposed to make some amendments. After the word "shall," he proposed to insert the words, "be a Court of record," which was simply to make it expressly a Court of record. He then proposed to add two sub-sections intended to meet such points raised by his hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) as he was able to yield at this time. The Court under the first and second sections, as they stood, would not be able to deal with the cases touching the ownership, profession, employment, or earnings of ships, registered out of Ontario. The second sub-section he intended to insert, would make the law apply to ships registered in Quebec engaged in navigating the inland waters. This did not, however, extend the jurisdiction to vessels not engaged in navigating these waters. He had adopted the third sub-section with some degree of hesitation. It had reference to the period at which the lien should cease. As hon. members knew, under the Maritime Law, there was no specific period at which the lien should cease. It was within the discretion of the Judge to say whether due diligence had been used. This sub-section provided that no right or remedy in rem given by this Act should be enforced against any purchaser or mortgagee of a ship, unless such enforcement was made within 30 days of the time when such rights accrued, but this did not exclude the right of the Court to determine whether due diligence had been used or not.

Mr. WOOD said a very important item had been left out of the Bill. A number of people who furnished supplies to vessels had no remedies against the vessel, but had to sue the owners in Civil Courts. He thought that those parties ought to have the same right of lien upon a vessel as a carpenter had upon a house.

Mr. BLAKE said the law was proposed to be made just the same with reference to the extent of maritime liens as it was all the world over. He thought the Committee would agree with him that, in introducing a law providing for new and hitherto unknown liens, they ought not to provide a more stringent law than that which was the commercial law of the world on the subject. If, afterwards, it was found to be advisable in the interests of ship-owners and suppliers to establish a lien as suggested it would be easy to do so. He would not like now to propose an additional lien which might fetter the transactions of ship-owners very much, and which would not be sanctioned by any maritime law in the world and certainly not by that of England.

Mr. PALMER said he quite agreed with the principle of the amendment suggested by his hon. friend from Frontenac and introduced by the Minister of Justice. One consideration, however, had not been noticed with regard to liens. If a lien existed and the vessel was found within the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Courts of the Lower Provinces, it would be enforced, but not in this Court.

Mr. BLAKE said practically Ontario vessels were not touched by the Vice-Admiralty Courts below.

Mr. PALMER: Still a class of vessels could not be reached.

Mr. BLAKE: Of course it is possible.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he was obliged to the Minister of Justice for adopting his amendment. He thought ninety days was the best period for the duration of a lien. He did not anticipate any trouble with relation to the objection made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer). Ontario vessels did not trade or come under the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Province of Quebec. With vessels making long sea voyages, it was perhaps impossible to fix any period, but with vessels on inland lakes the circumstances were different, the time taken on their trips being brief.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL objected to the system of appointing assessors as cumbersome and disadvantageous. He thought it would conduce much more to the efficiency and simplification of the business of these Courts, if the method of calling experts, as adopted in the ordinary Courts of law, was followed.

Mr. BLAKE said the system of employing assessors was advantageous. The Judge could summon them when he deemed it necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL said the system of assessors did not work well, in his experience of the working of Admirality Courts. Assessors did not bear much responsibility; they sat with the Judge; and they could not be examined and cross-examined as were experts in the Civil Courts. He had had to pay dearly for his experience, and he thought that the system should be abandoned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, as he understood it, the Judge was not bound by the report of the assessor, which was simply submitted for his guidance. The present system of assessors was infinitely better than that of calling in casual experts. They knew what this meant. Engineers, architects, etc., were summoned on each side, and they swore against each other, while assessors were officers of the Court, selected at the discretion of the Judge, who had no interest in the cases tried before him.

Mr. CARON said that, as one practicing before the Admiralty Court, he would be very sorry to see the system of assessors abolished. They were of great service, and he had never heard any commercial men make any objection to them.

Mr. MITCHELL said, if his hon. friend from Kingston considered assessors so valuable, why did he not use his influence to have them employed instead of experts in other Courts? The system of using experts worked very well, and gave satisfaction. He had had a great deal of experience in these matters, and he held that experts should be employed in order that they might be examined under oath.

Mr. PALMER said he concurred, to a considerable extent, with the hon. member for Northumberland. Assessors were not employed in his Province at all. Assessors, in some respects, fulfilled the functions of jurors in Common Law Courts. He submitted to the Minister of Justice whether the system ought not to be changed. Assessors had particular views as to what ought to have been done, and, as counsel did not know what they were, they could not meet them with evidence. These gentlemen hardly ever gave reasons for their opinions, and the Judges of the Privy Council, on appeal being taken, constantly said: "We do not know exactly how it was, but the assessors were skilled men, and they may have seen something which we do not understand," and the appeal was unsuccessful. This was the English of it. It was better to have everything done openly and above board. He confessed he was very much impressed with the practical ideas of the hon. member for Northumberland. If the entire responsibility were thrown upon the Judge, it would certainly be more satisfactory on the whole.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

PAYMENT OF ACTIVE MILITIA BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to make provision for the payment of the cost of transport of the Active Militia when called out in aid of the civil power, and also to provide that the reasonable cost of calling out the Active Militia in certain cases in aid of the civil power may be in whole or part reimbursed out of moneys to be provided by Parliament."

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said the proposition was two-fold. Under the existing law, which provided that the militia might be called out by a local authority in case of a riot or disturbance of the peace beyond its power to suppress, the municipality was liable to pay the militia. A municipality might collect a certain rate prescribed by the Statute; it was also liable to pay the officers a reasonable price for their lodging, if lodging was not provided. But no provision was made for the payment of transport, although the law authorised the municipality to call the militia out anywhere. While it was essential that a wider power should exist as to calling out the militia to a certain point, it was very unreasonable that there should be no provision for the payment of transport. Rapidity of motion was most essential, and, if the militia was called out, as on a recent occasion, from Toronto to Belleville, and brought down by train, it was obvious that the municipality which called them out ought to be liable to pay for the transport. The second proposition was that it was convenient in certain circumstances for the transportation to be paid for by Canada. This was expressly intended to meet such a case as recently occurred, where a railway carrying mails passed through a municipality, and a riot or disturbance took place which obstructed the passage of the mails, and which was beyond the power of the municipality itself to quell, and the object of the riot was not merely local. He did not wish by this proposition to break into the principle of a municipality paying for the militia which it called out. When the papers were brought down with reference to the Grand Trunk strike it would be found that there were two cases in which municipalities asked the company, in reply to applications for the calling out of the militia, whether they would pay for them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD enquired whether the Bill would deal with the case of Provincial Governments calling out the militia.

Mr. BLAKE replied in the negative, and said the whole subject was one eminently worthy of consideration, when the Bill which he would introduce on the subject was before the House for the second reading.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill (No. 102) To make further provision for the payment of the Active Militia when called out in certain cases in aid of the civil power.

EMPLOYMENT OF PRISONERS OUTSIDE OF JAILS BILL.—

[BILL No. 94.]

*(Mr. Blake.)SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said for some time representations had been made in various quarters as to the expediency of permitting, under certain circumstances, the employment of prisoners without the walls of jails, and the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson) had introduced a measure for the purpose last Session. He (Mr. Blake) had felt great hesitation then, and up to a late period, in making any provision for that, but the difficulties were so great that he thought some effort ought to be made to meet them. In the Province of Ontario, at all events, the sentence of hard labour was, as a rule, a farce. There was hardly any provision for hard labour in the ordinary jails. The prisoners were kept in idleness, and there was no means of enforcing the sentences. His difficulty was that the jails were generally situated in, and sometimes in the heart of, the towns. The labour upon which the prisoners were sometimes proposed to be employed was labour on the streets or in public in that way, and, except for comparatively hardened criminals, there was something calculated to degrade any prisoner so employed in the presence of the free people of the country. He did not think labour of that kind was as likely to be productive of improving results to the prisoner as that kind of labour which he should be glad to encourage as far as possible, labour on a farm or something of that kind more in the country. Still the representations made by several county councils had been very strong, and, though he believed this measure would have a comparatively slight effect, not at all commensurate with what was expected, he had thought it right to introduce it. A large portion of the persons it was desired to employ without the walls were confined for breach of provincial laws and for first offences. This Bill did not, of course, propose to authorize the employment of persons outside the jail unless they were sentenced for a breach of the Criminal Law of Canada, and it proposed to confine the permission to a person sentenced to a second term of imprisonment after previous conviction for breach of Canadian or Provincial law. The spirit of this proposal had already been adopted by Parliament. Some years ago, after the establishment of the Central Prison, and in confirmation of an Act of the Local Legislature of Ontario, an Act was passed by this Parliament authorising the employment of prisoners there without the walls. A good deal of the present Bill was borrowed from the measure of the hon. member for Kingston on that subject.

*Bill read the second time.BETTING AND POOL-SELLING REPRESSION BILL.

[BILL No. 95.]

*(Mr. Blake.)SECOND READING.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he thought some parts of this Bill were very hard, and would prove practically inoperative. If a man made a bet and recorded it in his betting-book, he would be liable to imprisonment for a year, and a penalty of $1,000. The Minister of Justice might not be a betting man, and he (Mr. Thompson) did not profess to be one, but anyone must know that, at any horse race, foot race, or boat race, bets were always made to a certain extent, but, if they were only for a dollar or 25c., this Act would inflict a penalty of $1,000. This was going backwards—going back to the Blue Laws of Connecticut, when persons were fined for violating the moral law. If the Minister of Justice did not move amendments in Committee, he (Mr. Thompson) would move the six months' hoist.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman has not yet convinced me. I am open to conviction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: A good many persons will be open to conviction under this Bill.

Mr. BLAKE stated that the Act did not apply to persons who had paid the money to the winner of the race, or owner of the horse. He had so much respect for the sport of horse racing as not to propose the extreme law passed in the Legislature of one of the principal States, which would appear to prevent a wager being paid to the successful person or owner of the horse; but the English Law contained a proviso similar to that in this Bill. The object was to prevent the recording and registering of betting upon races by persons who were not the owners of the horses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said they had passed a law yesterday, making a person who obstructed a railway train liable to three months' imprisonment, or a $100 fine, while a person who made a bet was to be imprisoned for a year or fined $1,000.

Mr. BLAKE said the Bill was directed chiefly against pool-selling. A person informed him the other day that, on the results of one local election, $30,000 passed through the hands of one pool-seller. If so profitable a business could be affected, it could only be by a very heavy fine. A law recently passed in the States made the penalty two years or $1,000. He had thought it better to leave the discretion in the hands of the Judge.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he thought the provisions of the Bill unreasonable, and that his hon. friend (Mr. Blake), if he lived ten years longer, would find that the people would laugh at this sort of thing.

Bill read the second time.

POST-OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 96.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said to a certain extent this Bill had been discussed in advance, and he did not think he need trouble the House with any further explanation. The Act was amended to meet such cases of obstruction as had recently occurred.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on the said Bill.

(In the Committee).

On Section 1,

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. the Minister of Justice had interpreted the Act as not applying to railways. If, in conveying mails in the rural districts, the highways were blocked and the fields had to be used, would the Act cover an obstruction in that case.

Mr. BLAKE: The obstruction in that case would be caused by the act of God in making the snowstorm.

Mr. BOWELL: But I am talking about the obstruction of the mail.

Mr. BLAKE: Who would obstruct the mail?

Mr. BOWELL: Who obstructs it here?

Mr. BLAKE: That case is not provided for.

Mr. BOWELL; Neither was the railway in the Act. Either from your stupidity or mine I cannot make myself understood. You have introduced this Bill to provide for the word "railroad" not being in the Act, and I have pointed out a case in which obstructions might arise in the fields.

Mr. BLAKE: That case is not provided for; and I disagree with the hon. gentleman's view that it ought to be provided for. At any rate I do not intend to ask that it should be provided for.

Mr. BOWELL: The propriety or impropriety is a matter for the hon. the Minister of Justice to consider, but the case I have suggested is not an improbable one. Perhaps a future Minister of Justice may deem it proper to make such a provision.

On Section 4,

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he thought notice should be given in this relation in the local papers as well as in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said similar publication had to be made in the Ontario Gazette to the best of his recollection.

Mr. JONES said he believed very few persons saw the Canada Gazette. It would be well to give one month's notice in one of the local papers.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not see any necessity for it.

Section agreed to.

On Section 94,

Mr. YOUNG asked the hon. the Minister of Finance if he had come to any decision in regard to the clauses which were struck out of the Private Bill in Committee, relating to the amalgamation of companies. He understood the hon. gentleman was to consider whether those clauses should be put in the general Act. The general sentiment of the Committee was favourable to the insertion of the clauses; but it was felt that if they could not be admitted into the general Act they could not be allowed in a Private Bill. He could see no objection to them on public grounds. The clauses had been very carefully drawn.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) asked why they were not brought before the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG said they were introduced in a Private Bill. He thought there could be no objection on public grounds to the amalgamation of these companies under proper restrictions.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the clauses came up after this Bill passed through the Committee. They provided for precautions being taken similar to those which related to the amalgamation of two banks. Special meetings had to be held, notice was to be given, and the shareholders of the respective corporations must agree to the arrangement. Other precautions were also mentioned. He was not disposed to object to them on general principles. Probably there existed more of these companies than were necessary to carry on the business of the country in this respect. It might be advantageous to give these powers. One of two things should be done: they either should be inserted provisionally in the Bill, to be more fully considered on the third reading, or they should be put on the notice paper as amendments to be proposed at the third reading.

Mr. BLAKE said the clauses should be so framed as to chime in with the provisions relating to all the other revolutionary subjects proposed. If his hon. friend would put a notice on the paper in this connection, probably there would be no difficulty in disposing of them at the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. YOUNG said he would take this course. The Chairman of the Committee seemed to think that they fitted in with the general character of the Bill, and he was inclined to the same opinion.

QUEBEC SCHOOL OF NAVIGATION.

QUESTION.

Mr. BLANCHET, in the absence of Mr. ROY, asked whether it was the intention of the Government to provide, in whole or in part, for the maintenance of the School of Navigation which had recently been established at the port of Quebec by the Local Government of the Province of Quebec, for the theoretical education of young sailors.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) replied that such was not the intention of the Government.

ST. PLACIDE VILLAGE WHARF, OTTAWA RIVER.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. DAOUST moved for copies of correspondence had in 1875, between the Government and Mr. B. J. Bertrand and other persons of the parish of St. Placide, in the county of Two Mountains, and of all documents sent to the Department of Public Works, during that year, in relation to certain works to be done on the Ottawa River, near the wharf built opposite the said village of St. Placide. He said that a petition with regard to this work had been sent to the Government in 1875, signed by a large number of persons. He desired to call the attention of the Government to the matter, for he thought it highly desirable that the prayer of the petitioners should be acceded to. The request was also supported by Captain Shepherd, who was well known on the Ottawa River. If the work would be expensive, he would have been the last man to urge that it should be undertaken, but, far from this being the case, it would not cost over a few hundred dollars at the outside. The removal of two or three feet at the point in question from the bottom of the river would suffice for the needs of navigation. A great deal of grain and other freight from several parishes in the neighbourhood—St. Placide, St. Scholastique, St. Augustin, &c., were placed on the boats calling at this wharf, and it was desirable that the improvement asked for, in the interests of navigation, should be acceded. He saw, in a letter dated the 21st August, 1875, written in reply to the request made to learn whether the petition presented by Captain Shepherd had been taken into consideration, the Government stated that the work was not as yet ordered to be done. But it was not declared that it was the intention of the Government to do so. In another letter, dated 7th September, 1875, in reply to a communication asking for the use of a dredge, the Government stated that at the time they could not accede to the request as they had no such vessel at their disposition. He hoped that the Government during the approaching season would secure dredges, and have this work executed, as it could be done very easily and at slight cost. He also trusted that provision would be made for the purpose in the Supplementary Estimates, and further that the Government would learn from Captain Shepherd and others whether it was desirable. He wished to know if it was possible to find out whether the prayer of the petitioners would be granted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no objection to the motion. He could not at the moment say anything about it, or give the reasons for or against dredging the particular part of the Ottawa River to which the hon. gentleman referred. He could only say that he would look at the Engineer's reports and papers, and ascertain whether it was one of the works for which the Government would be justified in asking for an appropriation.

Mr. DAOUST said that, under the circumstances, he would withdraw his motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

St. AUGUSTIN PARISH POST OFFICE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DAOUST moved for copies of all documents and correspondence in relation to the appointment of a new Postmaster for the parish of St. Augustin.

tin, county of Two Mountains, and to the change in the location of the post-office of the said parish, during the year 1875. He said he was sorry to be obliged to reproach the Government for their action in this respect. A notary, Mr. Paquette, had for some years acted as postmaster in this parish, and was succeeded by a merchant, who acted as deputy-postmaster, and who lived in the house Mr. Paquette occupied. Later, Mr. Paquette sold his property, and Mr. Ouellette, who was the purchaser, became deputy-postmaster. This gentleman so acted during six or seven years, giving unqualified satisfaction to the public and to Mr. King, the Post Office Inspector. In 1875, Mr. Paquette's health became very bad, and he desired to resign his position, and recommended one of his political friends for appointment as postmaster. Thereupon, the residents of the parish, to the number of 120 or 130 at least, signed a petition, urging that Mr. Ouellette should be named postmaster, and this was sent to the Department of the Postmaster-General. It was also desired that the post-office should remain in its old position, which was very central, and where it had been for thirty years. In December, 1875, the residents, however, perceived that a grocer who had lately arrived in the place was preparing to act as postmaster. To the petition sent, no answer was received, but, on the 31st March, Mr. Paquette wrote to Mr. Ouellette informing him that Mr. Desjardins had been appointed postmaster. There could be no other reason for this step than a desire to give an appointment to a political friend, and at the same time to take away a position from a political opponent. He wished to learn what influence had been brought to bear upon the Government to induce them to take this step. The petition in question had been signed by the adherents of both political parties and by persons of various nationalities. He could not understand why the Government had not granted a petition which was so just in its nature.

Mr. MILLS said there was no objection to the passage of the motion. It seemed that the late postmaster of this parish had resigned in January, 1876, and Mr. Desjardins was appointed his successor on the 4th February, 1876. A petition in favour of the appointment of Mr. Ouellette was sent to the Department, but Mr. Desjardins had been recommended to the Postmaster-General, and was considered the more suitable person. He understood that the place where this post-office was situated was not very populous, and that its present was not over one hundred yards from its previous position. The hon. gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the Government was bound to appoint any one to whom a postmaster had sold out his business, or who had been named to act as deputy. The appointment and the consequent responsibility rested with the Government.

Mr. DAoust said the distance of the present location of the post-office from that it formerly occupied might be only a few hundred yards. This, however, was not the question. The present site, moreover, was not so central as the late one. He desired to know why a petition signed by some two hundred people had been disregarded. If Mr. Globensky, the late member, had recommended the recent appointment he would have said nothing about the matter. Mere justice had been demanded. Mr. Ouellette had acted as the deputy for many years, and occupied the only place fit for a post-office in the village; consequently, he wished to learn the cause of the Government's action in this regard.

MALT TAKEN OUT OF BOND.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved for a monthly return of the malt taken out of bond each month from 1st July, 1876, to 28th February, 1877. He said certain reports were going round to the effect that everything had not been done on the square in regard to the increase of duty on malt, and his object in moving for the return was to learn what quantity of malt had been taken out of bond monthly during the year. It was stated that hints had been given to particular friends that it was well not to have too much malt in bond, and that in consequence more malt had been taken out of bond last month than during the previous ten or eleven months of the year. Maltsters generally had a bonded ware room, a privilege given by the Government, but there were a number who did not keep a ware room, but paid for the malt as they took it off the pile. The resolution increasing the duty was passed on the morning of the 20th, but the duty was collected from the 15th. He knew that the excuse would be made that the first half of the month was payable on the 15th, but he did not think the Government were justified in imposing the duty from the 15th when the law did not go into force until the 20th. He was not prepared to say that the rumour he referred to was correct, but the statement he moved for would show the quantities of malt taken out of bond during each month of the year.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had stated that he was not prepared to say whether the rumour was correct, but he had no business to mention such a rumour unless he was prepared to prove it. If the hon. gentleman or any one acting for him undertook to endorse such a statement, they would soon find themselves where he (Mr. Mackenzie) was putting other parties for circulating rumours in that connection. It was a scandalous offence for any man to give circulation to such rumours, and it was quite wrong for any one to assume they were correct, and to speak in the manner in which the hon. member had done.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was careful, in mentioning the rumour, to state that he did not endorse it. He simply gave it as a rumour.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

Mr. PERRY moved for the Report on improvement of Cascumpec Harbour, Prince Edward Island, made by H. F. Perley, Esq., C.E., in 1874. He said the importance of this harbour to the western end of the Province was so great that at the time of Confederation it was brought prominently before the Department of Public Works, and in 1874 an Engineer was sent down to report on the possibility of improving it. About 40 years ago there were 18 feet of water in the harbour, but the new gap had the effect of reducing the depth to 10 feet. The people had been made to believe, and had good reason to expect and hope, that the Department would have taken this matter under consideration this Session, but he found that no provision was made in the Estimates for the improvement. Last Session, he was informed, when he called attention to this question, that the Government were not then in a position to commence new works. He understood, however, that it was likely to be taken up this year, and he trusted the hon. the Minister of Public Works would see his way clear to putting a sum in the Supplementary Estimates sufficient to carry out this improvement as suggested by Mr. Perley.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the papers asked for would be brought down, but they would be found simply to convey a general idea of the nature of this harbour, the great importance of which he admitted. It would, however, be observed, when the report came down, that, without dredging the outer as well as the inner harbour, and probably filling up one of the gaps made by the sea, very little could be accomplished. The Engineer estimated that it would require $50,000 for those preliminary works in order to produce good results. This was one of those pieces of engineering which the Government engineers found it difficult to grapple with. The Government had placed $10,000 in the Estimates to improve the harbour of Malpec which was situated further east, and, when the contemplated improvements were made on St. Peter's Bay, which was still further east, the north shore would be furnished with fair harbour accommodation, and vessels drawing from 10 to 14 feet would obtain access to the Cascumpec. He hoped that in some future year they would be able to make some provision to render this harbour more accessible and valuable. He was afraid that the prospect for doing anything this year was not very good, as any small sum would be thrown away; and the amount required was so large that he could scarcely venture to ask the House to vote it at present.

COURT HOUSE AND GAOL FOR KAMOURASKA.

MOTION FOR STATEMENTS.

Mr. POULIOT moved for—

1st. A statement of debentures issued by the Government of Canada for the purchase of a building for the court-house and gaol of the district of Kamouraska, and for the rebuilding thereof after the fire;

2nd. A statement of the cost of the said building, of the rebuilding thereof, and of the maintenance thereof since;

3rd. A statement of the amounts levied by taxes imposed on said district for the building and prison fund, up to the 30th June last;

4th. A statement of the amounts paid on the said debentures and interest, shewing the amount, if any, remaining due on the said debentures, and, if there be nothing, then how much has been collected over and above the amount of the said debentures and interest.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was sorry the Finance Minister was not present. He had observed the motion, and all he could say was that the Government had none of the papers with respect to the gaol or court-house of Kamouraska or any other Lower Canada gaols. But he had no doubt that means could be found to obtain a good deal, if not all, of the information asked for, and the Government would endeavour to bring it to the notice of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT said he was satisfied with the statement made.

Motion agreed to.

BREAKWATER AT POINT ESCUMINAC.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. PALMER, in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, moved for a return of all petitions, papers, and correspondence had with the Government or any of the Departments, by or from the inhabitants of the county of Northumberland, in the Province of New Brunswick, in relation to the necessity of a breakwater for the protection of fishermen at the easterly side of Point Escuminac. He said he believed the hon. member for Northumberland was induced to make the motion by reason of the dangers to which the fishermen on the east coast of New Brunswick and the Gulf of St. Lawrence were subjected. Around Point Escuminac there was a great deal of fishing by small vessels, and, owing to the violent and oft-recurring storms, many lives were annually lost. It was important, therefore, that the Government should build a breakwater for the protection of the fishermen.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved:

“That it is desirable to establish life-saving stations on the west coast of Vancouver Island, on Queen Charlotte’s Islands, and on the mainland of British Columbia, north of Fort Rupert, to succour shipwrecked mariners and to protect their lives against the murderous attacks of savage tribes of Indians.”

He said he rose for the object of calling the attention of the Government to a matter that was of material importance, not merely to our own people, but to the people of the United States, whose ships traversed the North Pacific. Along the whole west coast of Vancouver Island, there was but one trading station, and but one missionary, a Catholic priest. Small vessels occasionally went up the coast to trade. All along the coast were large numbers of savage Indians, who, following out their barbarous instincts, murdered the crews of ships that had been wrecked. The latest act of cruelty was the murdering of a missionary. Much the same state of things existed on the Charlotte Islands, the Indians there, with the exception of a few who had been brought under the influence of civilization, being as savage as any on the north-west coast. As an illustration of this matter he would read from the Victoria Colonist, of a year or so past, a report of what had happened to an American steamer, which ran from Portland, Oregon, to Alaska, carrying the United States mails:

“The steamship ‘George S. Wright’ while crossing Queen Charlotte Sound encountered a most terrific gale, with the sea running mountains high. The vessel endeavoured to keep her course, but a huge wave broke over her, putting out the fires. Immediately afterwards the boiler exploded and in a short time the steamer sank. In the meantime the boats were lowered, but, with one exception, the boats were instantly swamped. The fortunate, or rather unfortunate, boat contained fifteen white persons and the Wakana Indian, and reached one of the two small round islands in Queen Charlotte Sound in safety. At night those saved lit a fire and went to sleep. The fire attracted a party of Wakana Indians who, in conjunction with their tillikum who had been saved cut the throats of the white men while they were asleep, mutilating their bodies in a frightful manner, and afterwards threw their bodies into the water. The disaster occurred close to where portions of the wreck were washed ashore..

He thought the Government ought to do something in the shape of appointing agents among the Indians around that coast, who would prevent the Indians from indulging in such conduct, and who would make it their business to do all in their power to save the lives of mariners who might be cast upon the shore. It might be said that the Provincial Government should make it their duty to attend to this; but it could be hardly expected that the Provincial Government, with its limited revenue, could afford to appoint magistrates and agents and pay them sufficient salary to induce them to live among the Indians. This was a duty which devolved upon the Department of the Interior. Although British Columbia had been six years in the Confederacy, there had been only two Indian agents appointed by the Dominion Government, one in Victoria and one in New Westminster. Considerable money might have been spent among the Indians of British Columbia, and spent he believed judiciously; but, as the Indians were treated as wards of the Government, a great deal of good could be done by appointing agents among the tribes on the coast. The United States Government had it under consideration to appoint agents along their coast from San Francisco, a distance of 750 miles. He took it that there ought to be reciprocity in this matter, and that, as they afforded protection to our commerce, we ought to do something to protect theirs.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he presumed all that the hon. gentleman desired was to call the attention of the Government to the subject. While he admitted that the subject was an exceedingly important one, he did not think the House ought to be asked to pass such a resolution in advance of the information which the Government would have to obtain before they could develop any particular policy. He had observed the report which the hon. gentleman had quoted from the Victoria paper, and other matters of the same kind also had from time to time come under the notice of the Government, one case in particular, where one of Her Majesty's vessels was despatched along the coast in consequence of a crew being ill-treated. The Government would, of course, consider any representations which the hon. gentleman or anybody else might make with reference to the desirability of making further provision for the protection of life and property in that part of the country. He could only say that the Government would consider what had better be done, but they were not prepared to say anything definite regarding the matter.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked leave to withdraw the resolution, in the hope that the Government would give the question consideration.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

DUNDAS POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BAIN moved for a return of the papers and correspondence respecting the loss sustained by depositors in the Savings Branch of the Dundas Post Office through the absconding and default of the late Postmaster, Mr. Thornton, in April last. He said the gentleman in question, in the latter part of April last, suddenly left Dundas. One of the depositors in the Savings Bank branch of the post-office had experienced some difficulty in obtaining payment on a deposit, and she wrote to the Government, drawing attention to the matter. The Department sent the Inspector to ascertain where the difficulty existed. He did not wish to attach any blame to the Inspector for not at once arresting Mr. Thornton, for the reason that there appeared to be only one small item wrong, which the postmaster asserted was susceptible of satisfactory explanation if he were able to go to the office, the postmaster being at that time at home unwell. When the Inspector had taken his word of honour in that respect, and had left for a short time, the postmaster found it convenient to depart from the vicinity at once, and it was presumed that he crossed the boundary into the United States. An investigation of his affairs showed that, while he had carefully administered the ordinary post-office business, yet, when the books of depositors in the Savings Bank were examined and compared with the official records, it was found that considerable discrepancies existed; he had apparently carefully gone over the depositors and selected that class for his victims who had little or no business capacity. Quite a number of them, to his knowledge, were unable to either read or write, and knew nothing of the necessity of complying with the regulations imposed by the Post Office Department for the security of depositors. He secured himself in this manner. On receiving deposits from those whom he defrauded, he entered the true amounts in the deposit books of the parties, attaching the post-office stamp and date as required by law, but failed to make a correct return to the Department of the amount so deposited with him, he selecting the deposits made by uneducated persons who fully trusted him, on the ground of his having been postmaster for many years, and formerly local manager of the Ontario Bank. The postmaster was, moreover, a man who was well known and respected in the locality, and a pleasant and agreeable person in his manner. It was provided in the Post Office Regulations that, if depositors fail to receive, within ten days, an acknowledgment from the Post Office Department at Ottawa for the amount of their deposit, then they should apply to the Postmaster-General to ascertain the cause of the delay. This case was, he believed, the first of its kind which had occurred in connection with the Post Office Savings Bank, and it showed that the very regulation adopted as a protection to depositors, was, by a clever and unscrupulous man, turned in such a way as to enable him to carry out a process of plundering, which, he had reason to believe, had continued during several years. He personally knew that some of the parties who had had deposits in the post-office during two or three years, handed their deposit-books to the postmaster as required once a year to have the interest computed; after the lapse of two or three weeks he returned them to the depositors, assuring them the books had been at Ottawa, that he had received the interest for them, which he handed over, and that the matter was quite correct. The postmaster then returned the books to the parties, frequently, in their presence, putting them in envelopes and sealing them up, telling them that the matter was all right until that time next year, and the people went unsuspectingly on their way. There was one case of peculiar hardship. A person residing in his immediate vicinity had a brother sick in California who desired to return to Canada for the benefit of his health. This person, who could not read nor write, went to the postmaster and gave him $100, which he agreed to forward to his brother, charging him, in addition, the cost of the money-order; but Mr. Thornton quietly put the money in his pocket and never sent it. He wondered why he did not hear from his brother, but continued expecting his return. The consequence was that nearly a year elapsed before he became aware of the facts of the case; and, when he was able to raise another sum of money to send to his brother, the sick man was unable to come home, and found a grave by the way. On examining the list of depositors who were defrauded, he found that the total amount misappropriated reached between $7,000 and $8,000, and that out of fifty-eight depositors no less than thirty-two were females, of whom a large number were widows, who naturally placed great trust in an official having a good reputation and occupying a Government position. He felt, notwithstanding the fact that those depositors had failed to comply with the particular regulations which were unquestionably established for their protection, that if ever there was a case in which individuals had a strong claim on the lenient consideration of the Government, it was the case of these depositors. The money appropriated comprised literally the hard earnings and savings of those who were not in a position to defend themselves; if they had been business men he would have had no sympathy for them. But they had no knowledge of business requirements, and he felt the Government might justly, therefore, step aside from the absolute routine of business, and meet the fair and strong claims which those female depositors had on them. Under these circumstances, he brought the matter under the notice of the House, not for the purpose of casting imputations on the Government, for he had been courteously treated by the Postmaster-General in representing their claims for his consideration, but because it was only just to himself and those parties who were interested that a statement of the hardship involved should be made, and to show that the regulations provided for the purpose of making depositors absolutely safe could be made effective in depriving that unfortunate class of depositors—the uneducated—of the very protection for which that particular branch of the Post Office system was established. He felt, in connection with the subject, that, if the parties had gone to the savings branch of an ordinary banking institution, and taken the action they did with Mr. Thornton, viz., deposited the money and received the ordinary receipt, the stockholders would, in case of any default of an officer, have been held responsible for the payment of those claims, not only to the amount of their stock, but for an equal additional amount. Under the exceptional circumstances the depositors, whose case he had submitted to the House, had a very strong claim on the Government for a favourable consideration of their case, and he hoped they would yet receive it at their hands.

Mr. MILLS said the Government could not allow the matter to pass. The matter was still under the consideration of the hon. the Postmaster-General, and it was impossible to bring down the papers. There was no objection to giving the hon. member a statement of the losses, if he agreed to it.

Mr. BAIN said he had no desire to place the Government in an awkward position. Through the courtesy of the hon. the Postmaster-General, he had been furnished with a statement of the names of the individuals and the amount of their losses. Under the circumstances, he would ask leave of the House to withdraw the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF ERIN VILLAGE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. ORTON moved for copies of all correspondence and papers in reference to the dismissal of Mr. Wm. Cornock, from the Postmastership of Erin Village, in the county of Wellington. He said it would appear that Mr. Cornock, who was instrumental in establishing the post-office at Erin Village 35 years ago, had occupied the position of postmaster since that time. It was reported in the neighbourhood that the reason why Mr. Cornock had been dismissed was because he was a Conservative and an opponent of the hon. member for South Wellington, and that the dismissal had been recommended by that hon. member. It was important that the people of that locality should know whether there were just grounds for such conclusion. It appeared that Mr. Cornock in the year 1856 took into his employ Mr. Carberry, who so remained until 1871, when he entered into business for himself and continued to act as deputy-postmaster. He would read to the House a statement of facts as presented:

“ Mr. W. McDowell, barrister, having gone to the Centennial Exhibition, left Mr. James McArthur in charge of his law office. McArthur called at the post office regularly for McDowell's letters and obtained them, until a registered one came. Carberry thought he would not be justified in giving this up without an order from McDowell and therefore refused to do so. McArthur persisted in his demand, but as Carberry still refused, he left the office, returning the following morning and repeating his demand. Carberry stuck to his decision and as McArthur kept on bothering him, Carberry ordered him out of the store. It is understood that McArthur at once set to work to procure his revenge, the result being that shortly afterwards, Mr. Stevenson, from the Post Office Inspector's Office, Toronto, went to Erin to investigate the matter. While there he saw Cornock, Carberry and McArthur, and also Charles Ferguson, who was in the post office when Carberry ordered McArthur out. Nothing more was heard about it by either Carberry or Cornock until the latter received the following letter:—

“ TORONTO, 30th Nov., 1876.

“ DEAR SIR,—In consequence of your inability to give your personal attention to the duties of Postmaster at Erin, the Postmaster General deems it advisable to call upon you to resign the Office, and I am instructed to intimate his desire to you. You will therefore address to the Postmaster General a letter of resignation of your office as Postmaster at Erin, and please forward it under cover to me.

“ Yours truly,

“ M. SWEETMAN,

“ Wm. CORNOCK, Esq., P. M., Erin.”

“ It will be noticed that nothing whatever was said in this letter about any charges of mismanagement, the only excuse being non-personal attendance. Mr. Cornock felt he was not being fairly treated and addressed the following letter to the Postmaster-General:—

“ ERIN, Dec. 5th, 1876.

“ DEAR SIR,—Your communication of the 30th November, requesting me to resign my position as Postmaster of Erin was duly received, and after giving it due consideration, I beg to decline doing so, for the following reasons:—1st. I have held the office for over thirty-five years, and was the first to have an office established here, and I don't think during that time there has been any defalcation in the office. As for my not attending to it personally, I think there are plenty of instances of the same all over the country. For instance, the Guelph office was conducted by a deputy for years, the Postmaster himself not living in the town. The person who discharges the duties of this office has done so for the last fourteen years, and, I believe, has given general satisfaction. I might say that if there is anything wrong in the way the office is conducted please let me know and I will endeavour to have it remedied but, as I said before, under the circumstances I must decline tendering my resignation.

“ Your obedient servant,

“ W. CORNOCK,

“ P. M. Erin.

“ THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,

“ Ottawa.”

“ Mr. Sweetnam again wrote Mr. Cornock as under:—

“ TORONTO, 6th Dec., 1876.

“(Private.)

“ DEAR SIR,—On the 30th ult., I wrote you asking that you would address a letter of resignation of the Postmastership at Erin to the Postmaster General, and forward it under care to me, and in which I pointed out the reasons which would seem, in the estimation of the Postmaster General, to render this course advisable. Please let me hear from you in the matter without further delay.

“ Your obedient servant,

“ M. SWEETNAM,

“ P. O. Inspector.

It thus appeared that the only reason given for the dismissal of Mr. Cornock was the fact that he had not been able personally to perform the duties of postmaster at Erin Village. But it was well known to hon. members that there were many similar cases. It might be said that it would be well for the public service that the postmasters themselves should perform the duties, but such did not seem to be the policy adopted.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the case was one in which the Post Office Department was bound to exercise supervision. From the report of the Inspector, who was well acquainted with post-office affairs, it was evident that the assistant postmaster should be got rid of. Mr. Cornock was asked to resign, and, as he would not do so, he was, of course, displaced. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) appeared to think there was some difficulty in the case with respect to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Rymal), but he (Mr. Huntington) could assure the hon. gentleman that the matter was purely departmental; and no other interest except the public good was taken into account in the course pursued.

Mr. ORTON said it seemed that the only sin committed by the deputy-postmaster was the fact of his not giving up a registered letter.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had told the hon. gentleman, as he would learn when the papers came down, that he (Mr. Orton) was entirely mistaken. The deputy-postmaster was unfit for the place, and the postmaster being sick, had endeavoured to force on the Department a distasteful man.

TRANSPORT OF RAILS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. PALMER, in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, moved for all letters, telegrams, accounts and other papers which have passed between Robert Moffat, of Dalhousie, N.B., and the Government of the Dominion, or any of its members or officers, in respect to the transport of cargoes of rails and other railway materials from the vessels Colonist Bessie Parker and Stabstadt, which vessels arrived at the Port of Dalhousie in the summer of 1875; also communications with the masters of said vessels in reference to said materials, and more especially the communications between Mr. Peter Grant, district engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, and the said Robert Moffat; also copies of the charter parties under which said vessels carried said cargoes; also copies of all contracts and agreements for the transport and delivery of the cargoes of the said vessels from the port of delivery at Dalhousie to Camp belltown. He said that he was sorry that he was not more familiar with the circumstances of the case. He understood, however, that the vessels named were chartered on behalf of the Government to bring rails out to this country; that the place of delivery, according to the terms of the charter, was situated a considerable distance from where the rails were required; that they had to be landed at the place they were at or carried to the point where they were required, and that the Engineer or some persons connected with the matter, got Mr. Moffat to convey these materials and rails in scows, as otherwise the vessels would have been under demurrage to the Government and would have to pay a considerable sum. As he understood it, this was done under the impression that the Government would pay the bill; but, nevertheless, these claims had not been met. It was represented to him that the claim was of the clearest nature, in equity at all events, although perhaps a contract had not been formally entered into to secure delivery in the manner in which it was done. Unquestionably Mr. Moffat had done the service in question; and, if he did, he expended money for the benefit of the Government; and if so, he (Mr. Palmer) hoped that the Government would remunerate him (Mr. Moffat).

Motion agreed to.

THE RICHELIEU RIVER FISHERIES.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BENOIT moved for copies of all papers relating to the abolition of the fisheries in the rapids of the Richelieu, in front of the village of the Canton of Chambly; of the report of the fishery overseer and of all correspondence of the Government with the proprietors of the said fisheries, and with any other person in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

LAKES HURON AND SUPERIOR INDIAN ANNUITIES.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BORRON moved for all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion or any Department thereof and the Government of Ontario, in reference to the claim of the Indians on the north shores of Lakes Huron and Superior to the arrears of annuity under the "Robinson" Treaties.

Mr. MILLS said he must inform his hon. friend that this correspondence was not complete, nor in a condition to be brought down, as the hon. gentleman was undoubtedly aware the calculation of annuities was a very intricate and difficult matter. It would require very considerable care and attention to arrive at a proper result. It was utterly impossible for the matter to be taken up during the midst of the Session, and he thought he would have to tell his hon. friend that he would be unable to bring down these papers during the present Session.

INDIAN LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for any correspondence between the Local and Dominion Governments during 1876, with reference to the adjustment of Indian Lands in British Columbia.

ONTARIO PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—(BILL No. 21.)

(Mr. Hall.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. BLAKE said he had only one suggestion to make with reference to this Bill. His hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) had a Bill from the Senate on the Order Paper for the second reading, and it was intended to amend the Act to make further provision for the management of Permanent Building Societies in Ontario. He thought it would conduce to the convenience of building societies and of the public generally if all the legislation made during the same Session, at any rate with reference to permanent building societies, were embodied in one Bill.

Mr. HALL said he had no objection to such a course being taken.

Mr. BLAIN said he understood the Government intended to deal with the question. If this was the case, perhaps it would be as well to consider in Committee the Government Bill, and embody the whole legislation in one measure.

PACIFIC RAILWAY SURVEY EMPLOYÉS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Cook, for an Order of House for papers, &c., in connection with the engagement of employés for the Pacific Railway Survey, read.

Mr. COOK said, when he made this motion, the hon. the leader of the Government was, unfortunately, not in his place, and he had the debate adjourned because in speaking to it he would be obliged to use language which would show a conflict between the constituencies of Collingwood and Sarnia, and he did not wish to make an attack on the hon. the Premier in his absence. The question alluded to in the motion was one of considerable importance to himself and a part of the constituency which he had the honour to represent. Some years ago a line of steamers ran from Collingwood to the northern ports of Lake Superior and Lake Huron. At that time this was considered a very necessary line for the transportation of immigrants and for the shipment of supplies to the parties living on the north shore of Lake Huron and that vicinity. This line was composed of the Messrs. Beatty, who now owned the Sarnia line, and some other gentlemen who were now interested in the boats plying between Collingwood and Lake Superior. In 1871, Messrs. Beatty had a difference with the other parties, and they withdrew from the company and established the line now running from Sarnia, which was well fitted up, and was no doubt as capable for the requirements of the trade as the Collingwood line. They were men of great energy and perseverance, and had taken away a large portion of the trade of the Collingwood line. In every election contest in which he had the honour to participate, his political opponents insinuated that the hon. the Premier had used his influence to draw the trade away from Collingwood. As a representative of that place, and at the same time as a supporter of the Government, he had reason to believe that the accusation was entirely unfounded, and attributed the Sarnia trade to the personal efforts and energy of Messrs. Beatty. In 1874, however, when he had occasion to contest his constituency again, the charge was made that parties hiring men for the Pacific Railway survey, instead of embarking them by the Collingwood line, took them by the Sarnia line. It should be remembered that the persons engaged in hiring those men, some of them, at all events, were interested politically in that constituency. A great outcry was made that everything was being done to the injury of Collingwood and the benefit of Sarnia, and while he was anxious to contradict the charge, he had nothing on which to base his denial. The impression that something was wrong in this respect was so engrafted upon the minds of a large number of electors that, in 1874, he, as a supporter of the Administration, was defeated by a considerable majority. The charge, however, was not believed by the great mass of the people of Collingwood; and, as far as he was concerned, he had not the slightest idea that the hon. the Premier would stoop to anything so far beneath him. Even a large number of Conservatives in that section did not believe the charge, but were of the opinion that it originated with some designing individuals who was always on the alert, and particularly at election times, to raise cries of this character. He wished to have the hon. the First Minister state that such a discrimination against Collingwood was not contemplated by him, and that the Department had nothing to do with the matter, unless by the action of some subordinates who had no jurisdiction whatever in the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not aware of any one in his Department giving such order, and he certainly knew nothing at all about the business of either of the lines of steamships to which the hon. member had referred, further than that the one made its headquarters at Sarnia and the other at Collingwood. He recollected very well, on the representations of the hon. gentleman who had just spoken, telling the Deputy Minister of Immigration that he ought to see that both lines obtained as near as might be one-half each of the Manitoba immigrants who had been sent for the Government; and he believed that the Mennonites went in alternate squads or divisions to Collingwood and Sarnia. Indeed, if he were rightly informed, the Collingwood line obtained a very much larger share of the Government business than the Sarnia line—he thought in the proportion of 9 to 13—during the term of the present Administration. He could not conceive how any one could have made a charge of the character referred to by the hon. gentleman. In 1874, the Government thought it was much better to pay the engineers going to the North-West here, giving them the amount of their travelling expenses, and they were, therefore, at liberty to go by Collingwood or Sarnia just as they pleased. He trusted that the trade of the great North-West would be sufficient to maintain not only one line from Collingwood and another from Sarnia, but several lines from these and other parts of Western Ontario; and that there would be no jealousy between the different lines. The Government were bound to see that they or any of their officials did not use any influence in favour of one line or the other. He knew nothing of the proprietors of either line, further than that it was said the Sarnia line belonged to Messrs. Beatty, and the other to certain gentlemen in Toronto, most of whom, he believed, were political friends of his.

Motion agreed to.

MEANS OF ESCAPE FROM DROWNING BILL.—[BILL No. 62.]

(Mr. Cook.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. COOK, in moving the second reading of the Bill to authorize municipalities to pass by-laws to provide means of escape for persons falling into the water in the vicinity of wharves and docks, said, if the House allowed the second reading, he intended to move for a Select Committee to consider the Bill.

Mr. PALMER said this Bill was a kind of successor to the Bill his hon. friend (Mr. Cook) brought forward every year. He believed the object was to force the owners of wharves to keep life-buoys in certain harbours. He thought the principle of the Bill had been explained to the House, and he saw no reason why this Parliament should be asked to grant powers to municipalities, which, it was perfectly clear, could be granted by Local Legislatures. He did not think the time of the House should be taken up with such a Bill.

Mr. BLAKE said, while the Bill, in its present shape, could not be entertained, there could be no doubt that this Parliament had jurisdiction over public harbours. Whether arrangements could be made that would meet the cases of all harbours and docks was one which should receive the careful consideration of the House before they could consent to the Bill. His hon. friend's proposition was to let down ladders along the wharves to the water, but whether this was a fitting plan under all circumstances he could not say, and it was questionable whether municipal corporations had such powers as would enable them to carry out this Act. While he did not desire to be understood as assenting to the proposition contained in the Bill, he thought it was fairly a matter which might go before a Select Committee. It was desirable that something should be done, but care should be taken that the remedy was not greater than the evil. No doubt there were many cases of loss of life annually, and the benefit of some remedy would be by no means insignificant. He hoped his hon. friend (Mr. Palmer) would not object to the second reading of the Bill, it being understood that the House was not, as a matter of consequence, committed to the Bill, but that it would be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. PLUMB said the Bill, as it stood, was a very extraordinary one. He thought the objects sought by the provisions of the fifth section as to municipalities might be reached with much less machinery. While the provisions might be applicable to the Province of Ontario, they might not be applicable to the other Provinces. Then, the mode by which it was proposed to prevent the loss of life might do for some places and not for others, as, for instance, where there was a swift current. It seemed to him that the various conditions attached should be left to the exigencies of the different municipalities. A Bill of this kind should be placed under the charge of the Government, and the Minister of Justice should see that it came within the limits of the Statutes. He did not see, however, that there could be any objection to the Bill going before a Select Committee, although he doubted whether any general Bill could be framed which would meet the object sought. The hon. gentleman who introduced it must have strong reasons, or he would not so frequently have pressed the matter before the attention of the House, but it was due to the House that some explanations should be given.

Mr. BUNSTER said, as representing one of the largest and best harbours on the British coast, he deemed it his duty to enquire what kind of buoys were proposed to be erected.

Mr. DECOSMOS pointed out that on the Pacific coast there were animals in the water which destroyed wooden piles in a very short time, and no doubt they would destroy the ladders also.

Mr. COOK said he understood that the House was already familiar with the explanations as to the Bill. In fact, the Bill itself would explain its object. He might say that he would be as much affected by the Bill as any other hon. gentleman in the House, as he owned a great many wharves. It would entail much expense to place ladders down to the water, but still he thought it should be done. The Select Committee would, no doubt, deal with the matter so as to make it as convenient as possible for parties owning docks. There was not a year in which some valuable lives were not lost in different parts of Canada by drowning. He could refer to several in the city of Toronto, where there were wharves the whole length of the city, and the water was five or six feet lower than the edge of the wharves. Not long since, a Mail reporter was drowned along the edge of the water. He had letters in his desk from several parties who were conversant with the matter, expressing the hope that the Government would take some action.

Bill read the second time, and referred.

PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 101.]

(Mr. Wood.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. WOOD said, at the request of several members, he would ask that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. HOLTON said his impression was that the effect of this Bill would be to change very materially the Bill passed two or three years ago in reference to Permanent Building Societies.

Mr. WOOD: Not very materially.

Mr. HOLTON said the proposed Bill would increase the borrowing powers, and he thought it would be in contravention of the Government Bill which had passed its second reading, and which was referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, then brought back to Committee of the Whole, and now stood for its third reading. Of course, it was for the Government to decide whether they would allow the passage of a Bill which distinctly contravened the principle affirmed in their own Bill.

Mr. WOOD said the Bill asked for scarcely anything more as to the borrowing powers of building societies than they formerly held. They had now authority to borrow one-third more than their paid-up capital. It was not defined, however, whether this was to be on bonds or their own deposits. This Bill asked for double the powers, but confined it to one-half upon bonds and one-half upon deposits, and would actually give greater security than did the Bill of 1874. The Bill would not be out of conformity with the Government Bill, and surely the House could have no objection to its going to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Of course, if the Bill was not in conformity with the Government Bill, it could be submitted to the House.

Mr. PALMER said he did not think the question of enlarging the borrowing powers of building societies should be left to any Committee to settle. He was opposed to any legislation in the direction of increasing this power, in view of what was occurring every day as to people losing the money which they had invested. Unless the Government were prepared to affirm the principle that such societies ought to have increased borrowing powers, he did not think the Bill ought to pass.

Mr. BLAKE: It is not a question of principle. They already have borrowing powers and the question is should those powers be increased.

Mr. PALMER said he held that it was a matter of principle, and not one of mere detail to be settled by a Select Committee.

Mr. PLUMB said he supposed it was understood that the societies were in the nature of savings banks, and recent legislation had certainly not been in the direction of increasing their borrowing powers. He thought that any such step should be very closely watched and scrutinized. A very large concession had been made them, when they were allowed to borrow one-third more than their capital. Originally it was not intended that they should become borrowing societies.

Order postponed.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

CUSTOMS ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.—[BILL No. 19.]

(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole further to consider Bill (No. 19) To amend and consolidate as amended the Acts respecting the Customs.

(In the Committee.)

On Section 58,

Mr. COLBY said he doubted the advantage of re-enacting this clause with regard to beef cattle. The exportation of beef cattle to foreign markets was becoming very important in Canada, and we had certain natural advantages for that exportation. In some places we now had large establishments for packing and curing beef. One in his county had lately been aided by municipal bonuses in order to secure that market to the country. It was questionable, however, whether, if the importation of cattle in bond from Chicago was permitted, the farmers would derive the advantages from these establishments which they had expected. The farmers of Ontario were going into cattle-raising as a speciality to supply the European market, and it was well for the Committee to consider whether we should not be injuriously affected by permitting cattle to come in as they had hitherto.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they were not considering a Customs tariff, but simply arrangements for the slaughtering of cattle in bond, which would find its way to the English market anyway. If we refused to allow it to be slaughtered, it would go through the United States to England, and this was simply securing to us a certain portion of the trade which we would not otherwise have. The larger our carrying trade, the larger would be the amount of business done by our railways and vessels.

Mr. COLBY said he had not overlooked that, but, if foreign cattle was brought into competition with the beef of the localities, it had a tendency to depress the local markets. If these packing establishments could buy their meat cheaper in Chicago than in Canada, they would do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was utterly unable to see how slaughtering cattle in bond and exporting it in bond could affect manufacturers in Canada. If the hon. gentleman carried out his views, he would prevent our carrying anything which did not originate in Canada.

Mr. SCRIVER said he was acquainted with the establishment referred to by his hon. friend (Mr. Colby), and knew that they had been compelled to import cattle from Chicago, being unable to obtain all the cattle they wanted in the vicinity.

Mr. COLBY said that was a mistake.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the regulations were very strict, and every pound of cattle which came into the country and was not exported paid the duty. One of the first applications for permission to import cattle in bond was from the firm referred to, in order to keep their factory going. This clause had been in the Act for a number of years and he should be sorry to see it struck out.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said he thought he understood the point raised by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). The only thing that occurred to his mind was whether the export of beef from Canada would be affected by this practice. He understood that the Americans now wanted to ship cheese of inferior quality to Montreal in bond, to be sent to England as Canadian cheese, affecting the character of this article. He could see no possible objection to having cattle come from the United States and then slaughtered in this country for such a purpose.

He only wished that the Government, in their wisdom, would put a duty on wheat and flour entering this country, and allow them to be manufactured, like beef, in bond. He thought that such a course would meet a strong demand which was now made in this relation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But that question does not come up in this Bill.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said that the same views which were held with regard to beef applied equally cogently to the questions of wheat and flour.

Mr. COLBY said he did not care to press the point further. He had felt it his duty to bring it up for this reason: In the instance to which he had referred, municipalities and inhabitants had contributed largely to the building up of the enterprise under the pledge that it should be a local market for the sale of those animals and for the local advantage. When the shipment of cattle from Chicago under this bonded system—a system unknown to their people until then—occurred, it created a very general and very intense dissatisfaction. It seemed to be a breach of faith, and a very great hardship that they should contribute not by way of taking stock, but of giving bonuses to build up an establishment to benefit themselves locally, and then lose the entire advantage in case beef could be bought cheaper in Chicago, and brought there, than it could be obtained in that neighbourhood. He declared, as a matter of fact, that in this instance it depressed the local market very considerably, and every shipment of Chicago cattle brought in there would have such a tendency.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The meat is not sold in the local market but in England.

Mr. COLBY: No; but it fills the place.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It cannot fill the place, for it does not stop there.

Mr. COLBY said it affected the local market. He was surprised that the Minister of Public Works could not perceive it. The market in that locality consumed fifty head of cattle daily, and it was an important market for the farmers living in the neighbourhood. When the shipment to which the Minister of Customs referred took place, it created very intense and general dissatisfaction in two or three important counties in that section of the country, and a repetition and continuation of it would continue to cause such dissatisfaction and disappointment. He lived nearer to that locality than some hon. gentlemen who had spoken on the subject, and he knew it was untrue that these localities could not have supplied this market. The purchase of Chicago beef had been an unfortunate thing for the company; the whole shipment became tainted and worthless, and had to be thrown away to the discredit and damage of the company. He hoped that the venture would not be tried again, and he regretted to know that, under the law, such a thing could be done.

Mr. PALMER said he considered it unfortunate that so important a principle should be discussed under the then circumstances. If his hon. friend from Stanstead wanted this or any other alteration made, he had better bring the matter before the House. He held it should be a very grave case to justify them in interfering with the carrying trade of the country. He apprehended that this was a matter of great importance to the Dominion. The Minister of Public Works appeared to think that because this beef was sold in a foreign market, therefore we might not have a local market for it. He could quite understand that what his hon. friend from Stanstead stated was true; that, although the meat was sold in a foreign market, Canada was the best route to Europe, and, as a consequence, western beef could not be sold in Europe unless it was brought through high latitudes; and it could not come into competition with Canadian beef, unless it was first brought into Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Three times the amount of beef goes from the United States, perhaps, than from Canadian ports to Europe.

Mr. PALMER: But it cannot go with the same facility and convenience from them as it can from Canadian ports.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do you want to drive this trade away from us?

Mr. PALMER said this was by no means his desire. This was a very important matter. In his opinion, a very strong case would have to be made out to justify them in interfering with the carrying trade of the country. Americans and every one else ought to be allowed the greatest possible facilities to convey produce through this country to the European market.

Section agreed to.

On Section 81,

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said it enacted that all spirits brought into Canada in casks or packages of less size than one hundred gallons should be forfeited. They, however, knew perfectly well that spirits and wines were brought into Canada in octaves, quarter-casks and puncheons of sixty gallons, for instance. He could not see the object of the clause.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said that the reason why the size of the package was limited was to prevent the packages being put up and smuggled into the country in vessels or otherwise. He did not know, however, what this regulation had done to prevent smuggling.

Mr. GOUDGE said the hon. member for South Leeds would perceive that the regulation applied to very small vessels—one decked vessels. It was a very useful precaution.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds): In other than decked vessels, the clause says.

Mr. GOUDGE: Large vessels may bring small packages, but small vessels cannot bring packages containing less than one hundred gallons.

Section agreed to.

On Section 142,

Mr. PLUMB asked whether this Bill repealed all Customs Acts on the Statute-book.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John): It repeals all the Customs Acts, but does not affect the Tariff Act.

CULLING OF TIMBER BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend the Act 38 Victoria, Chapter 34, respecting the culling and measuring of timber, by repealing the twelfth section thereof, and by authorizing the Governor in Council to fix the number of Cullers to be employed in each Department of the Supervisor's office, the number in the Square Timber Department not to exceed eighteen; and to grant annuities not exceeding $200 per annum to Cullers employed on 1st May, 1876, and no longer required, or incapacitated by age or infirmity, such annuities to be paid out of any surplus of the Cullers' office, and also to regulate the charges for services in the Cullers' office, as to give average earnings of seven hundred dollars yearly to each Culler employed.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME stated that there were thirty-six cullers, eighteen of whom were to be dismissed or superannuated, from old age or infirmity. Those who were dismissed would have $200 superannuation a year maximum, proportionate to their capacity. There had been a conference between those representing the cullers and others representing the lumber trade, and the basis of the resolution was agreed upon. The resolution simply applied to the culling of square timber.

Mr. BLANCHET said he considered $200 too small as a maximum.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the intention was that the superannuation was to fall entirely as a tax upon the lumber trade, and it was agreed that $200 should be the maximum. If the surplus was not sufficient, the fees would be increased, and if more than sufficient they would be decreased.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he thought the maximum should be increased to $300.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the agreement was a compromise between the cullers and the trade, who desired more efficient inspection of lumber, and at less expense.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was understood when nine or ten cullers had left the roll a superannuation of $200 should be paid. As the average of wages earned now was only about $450, he thought $200 as superannuation was very good.

Mr. CURRIER said he thought that $200 was quite sufficient, since for the last five years the maximum wages earned had certainly not been more than $300. Some of them, of course, would not be entitled to $200. If there was a compromise, as stated by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, the compromise was all on one side. The lumbermen gained very little by it. Still, upon the whole, the expenses of culling would be reduced. What the lumbermen wanted was an open list of cullers, and that would have saved the superannuation of any of them, for then lumbermen could pick out what men they liked. It was admitted that eighteen cullers was more than the number required to measure the lumber in Quebec. He had intended to submit an amendment, but he would not do so now.

Mr. CAUCHON said he presumed his hon. friend would like to abolish the whole institution. But his confrères in trade did not agree with him on that point.

Mr. CURRIER said there was not a single lumberman who dissented from the open list system.

Mr. CAUCHON said the great majority favoured the rotation system.

Mr. CURRIER affirmed that he was supported by resolutions passed at a meeting of lumbermen in Quebec. All the lumbermen agreed, with the exception of one, he thought, that the open list system was the best.

Mr. CAUCHON: You are mistaken.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue deserved to be congratulated upon so early dealing with the subject. If the cullers were to be reduced, it was manifestly just that the wages of those remaining should be increased in proportion to their increase of work. He thought $200 was a fair superannuation. If there were eighteen cullers, he did not think it would be necessary to have an open list.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was disappointed in seeing that the resolution did not refer to cullers of deals. He had hoped that such a measure would have been prepared, which would not only be satisfactory to the square timber men, or to those engaged in the deal trade, but that the waste in sawn lumber would also be included. They had a Cullers' Bill in the State of New York, and there was a necessity for such a Bill here as well. Shipments made to the United States were corrected by the cullers there, and Canadians had to accept their corrections; while, if the lumber could be culled here, figures could be sworn to and they would be able to collect.

Mr. COOK denied that there was any Cullers' Law in New York State.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked who took charge of shipments when they arrived in New York if it was not the Government cullers.

Mr. COOK said that the commission merchants did this work. He favoured reducing the number of cullers, and considered that $800 a year was not too much.

Mr. BLANCHET said that the assistance which the cullers found it necessary to engage had the effect of reducing their salaries. He would favour a still larger reduction in the number of cullers in order to give sufficient remuneration.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he would be very sorry to reduce the fair earnings of the cullers, but, looking at the quantity of timber arriving at Quebec for the last four years, they were not employed for more than 30 days. There was nothing to prevent the cullers from pursuing other employment, and he believed that such was frequently the case. He considered the average amount placed in the resolution quite sufficient to remunerate the cullers. As regarded sawn lumber, he believed the same difficulty would arise if the lumber were culled here, as the Americans would not accept our specifications.

Mr. CURRIER said the average earning of a culler was, formerly, from $450 to $470, which included about thirty days' work. The number would be reduced one half—eighteen—under the Bill, and their average earnings increased to $700, which would be placing the cullers in a better position. He did not complain of the reduction made in the number of cullers, but, if the open list system were adopted, it would do away with the possibility of Government having to superannuate any of those men. As to the culling of deals, when the question was discussed in Quebec last fall, the manufacturers objected to any change being made in the law. About Quebec, every manufacturer employed a man of his own to cull deals. Under the circumstances, he did not find fault with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue for not having dealt with the culling of deals question.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 103) To amend the Act respecting the culling of timber.

Bill read the first time.

MISSION OF NEWFOUNDLAND FISH AND FISH-OIL BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council, on being satisfied that the standards of inspection of fish and fish-oil in Newfoundland are equal in quality, grade for grade, to those of Canada, may, by proclamation, so declare, and that while such proclamation is in force, fish and fish-oil inspected in Newfoundland, and being the produce of the fisheries thereof, may be admitted to the markets of Canada, and otherwise dealt with as if inspected in Canada.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said the resolution was submitted in order to facilitate the fish trade between Newfoundland and Canada. There had been a regular system of fish inspection in Newfoundland which entirely corresponded with that adopted in the Dominion, and, at the present time, after the fish had been inspected in Newfoundland, it was subjected to a second inspection when it arrived in the Province of Quebec or any other part of Canada. The resolution had for its object to authorize the Governor in Council, when satisfied that the mode of inspection corresponded entirely with the requirements of the Canadian law, to decide that fish having been so inspected in Newfoundland, should be accepted as if inspected in the Dominion.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Mr. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 104) To provide for the admission of fish and fish-oil into Canada, inspected in Newfoundland.

QUEBEC HARBOUR AND PILOTAGE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 105) to further amend the Acts providing for the management and improvement of the harbour at Quebec, and of the Pilotage Act of 1873.

Bill read the first time.

INSURANCE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 36.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 36) To amend and consolidate the several Acts respecting Insurance.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL asked if the Bill had been reprinted as amended. He believed it would be but fair to have it reprinted for the benefit of those who were not on the Committee, and who consequently had no knowledge of the amendments—and they were important, in his opinion—which had been introduced.

Mr. HOLTON said that the changes were of some importance, undoubtedly, but they were not voluminous. An alteration had been made, for instance, in the repealing clause. Some doubt had been expressed as to its having the effect, as originally stated, of extinguishing the old mutual companies, and it was so amended as to make that point perfectly clear. He did not think that, if hon. gentlemen would look at the draft of the Bill, they would desire it to be reprinted, in view of the few changes made.

On Section 11,

Mr. BLAIN said he was afraid that it was not correctly drawn, as to the process being served upon any of the agencies of companies in the different Provinces. Parties, for instance, having a process to serve, and residing in British Columbia, should not be compelled to go to the city of Montreal to serve it. He understood that the clause was to be so altered as to name one place at least in each Province where process might be served.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said this point was raised in the Committee, but the decision of the Committee was adverse to it.

Mr. BLAIN said this was not the case.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I remember the discussion, but I was not aware of that decision.

Mr. BLAKE: The clause had better pass, and the amendment can be inserted on the third reading.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: We will receive the suggestion; at all events we can consider it on the third reading.

Section agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG said, before the Committee rose, he would say he regarded the Bill as a very valuable one indeed, but it appeared to him that, as it was at present before the Committee, there was one very serious defect in it, viz., that reserves to be put up by foreign companies were not to be for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone. As they were well aware, this question was discussed before the Banking and Commerce Committee very considerably. He only rose to say that, when the report was to be received, he would test the feeling of the House with regard to that point, as he thought it would be inadvisable to raise the question at the present time in such a very thin House. When the report was to be received, he proposed to move an amendment of the same character as he moved before the Committee, viz.: That the reserves to be held by foreign companies in Canada should in all cases be for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone. The principle of the Bill was that full reserves should be put up by all foreign companies doing business in Canada hereafter, but in the case of stock companies the reserves would be for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders only, an exception being made in the case of mutual companies. His humble opinion was that it was very important to make the change that he had indicated, knowing, as they did, the great number of failures of such companies which had lately taken place in the United States; and he thought that the reserves of mutual companies, as well as of stock companies, should be for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone.

Bill ordered to be reported.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 60.]

(Mr. Blake.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 60) to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875, and the Act in amendment thereof.

(In the Committee.)

On Section 5,

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said it seemed to him that the proposition to alter the time of publication of the first meeting of creditors from three weeks to ten days was a move in the wrong direction. As much publicity as possible, not interfering with the interests of creditors, should be given. The clause with reference to the time of advertising had better remain as it was.

Mr. BLAKE said this was a mere consequential amendment; the whole object in view was to accomplish what those who were most versed in these matters considered an important thing—the shortening to the greatest possible reasonable extent of the period between the issue of the writ of attachment and the making of the assignment and the first meeting of the creditors. To do this the period of advertisement must be shortened to some extent. He had originally adopted the hon. gentleman's view, and it was not until the suggestions of persons versed in the matter showed him that it would be impracticable that he altered the clause in this manner.

Section agreed to.

On Section 11,

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he had opposed the passage of an Insolvency Law since 1864. He now found, however, that it was of no use to do so, the last vote having shown a larger majority in its favour than was the case during former years, and he consequently was now ready to support the Bill, and make it as acceptable as possible to the people. He was glad to hear the Minister of Justice invite amendments from both sides of the House. He proposed that inspectors should be appointed: one for Ontario, in which last year there were 873 failures; one for the Province of Quebec, in which 600 failures took place last year, and one for the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, in which last year's failures amounted to 251 in number, making in all 1,724. For last year in Ontario the amount of liabilities was $9,488,052; in the Province of Quebec they were $13,678,616; and in the other Provinces mentioned $2,351,302, making, in all, $25,577,991, a very large amount. He thought it would be but right under the circumstances to have inspectors appointed to look after these interests. During the last four years the amount of liabilities concerned in the failures that had taken place was $74,502,000, an immense sum; and, in 1873, though there were only 994 failures, the liabilities amounted to $12,324,000. The salaries he proposed for the inspectors were $3,000 for those of Ontario and Quebec, and $2,000 for the inspector in the Maritime Provinces, making, in all, $8,000, amounting to about one-half of three-eighths of a cent per cent. on the total liabilities. He thought that this would bring about a great gain, to the extent of five or seven and a half per cent. on the proceeds of estates. He had spoken to a great many members on both sides of the House on the subject, and he had found them at all events favourably disposed towards his proposition. He recommended that inspectors should, in any case, be tried for one year. If the salaries he proposed were considered too high by the Minister of Justice, or by the Government, he would suggest that they be paid $2,500 in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and $1,375 for the other Provinces, about one-quarter of a cent per cent. on the total liabilities of last year. Each insolvent's liabilities in the Dominion last year averaged $14,800, and in the United States $21,000. In 1876, in the United States, there were 9,920 failures, liabilities $191,000,000; and in 1875 7,740 failures—liabilities, $201,000,000. He found that the dividends paid in the Dominion last year on insolvent estates amounted to 22½ c. on the dollar; and also that the insolvents' assets averaged from 60 to 75 per cent.; and he would like to find out what had become of the difference between the 22½ c. and 60c. He, for his part, considered that a very large amount in this relation was squandered between the assignees and the lawyers; and he proposed the appointment of inspectors, whose duty it would be to look after assignees and also after the lawyers. With regard to the proposition to require the payment of fifty cents on the dollar, he remembered that, two years ago, the Minister of the Interior proposed that each insolvent should be compelled to pay ten cents on the dollar.

Mr. BLAKE said his hon. friend had better defer his remarks on this point until they came to Sec. 15, to which they applied.

Mr. ROSS said he assented.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he entirely approved of Sec. 11. It was not in accordance with the principles of justice that a partner of an assignee should be allowed to practise before such an assignee when acting in a quasi-judicial position. The inspectors of an estate had employed a partner of an assignee to present claims before that assignee, and he desired the clause to be so worded that inspectors could not employ partners of an assignee for such a purpose.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said that the inspectors for whom provision was made in the Bill were useless. He contended that the appointment of inspectors as he had suggested would be a great benefit to all interested in the insolvent estate—to the creditors, the insolvent, and the public at large.

Mr. WOOD said that the appointment of Government inspectors had been fully discussed by merchants, by lawyers, and by members of the Committee; and the conclusion at which they had arrived was that such a system would merely furnish sinecures for persons whom the Government would have to appoint. Creditors at present obtained little enough out of these estates, and, if the burden of appointing inspectors or accountants was further laid on them, it would reduce the dividends still more, and take so much more money out of their pockets. If the inspectors did their duty according to the terms of the Bill, the system would work very well. The law as proposed should have a couple of years, fair trial before any new weight was laid on creditors in the shape of a proposition to find employment for some drone or other.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he did not agree with the statement that the appointment of such inspectors would be any additional charge on bankrupt estates. Under the present law, power was given to appoint inspectors and this necessarily entailed a charge on such estates. He did not know but that the suggestion of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Ross) was worthy of consideration. Still, he did not suppose that it could be taken up during the present Session. In the meantime, the Government would have an opportunity of ascertaining the views on this point of those who had had charge of estates during the last two or three years. He supposed that so far from such appointments entailing any additional charge on estates, the result would rather be the very reverse.

Mr. YOUNG said he wished to ask the Minister of Justice whether, under this clause, an inspector would be prevented from engaging his own partners to act as counsel in winding up the affairs of an estate. He was aware of such a case having occurred; the inspector, having been a gentleman of the long robe, had employed, he believed, his own firm, and out of $10,000, $2,500 were consumed in legal expenses.

Mr. BLAKE said he proposed to make a slight alteration in the 12th clause to cover the suggestions made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) and the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young), The suggestion of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Ross) had been communicated to him previously, and he had had some discussion with the hon. gentleman and other members on the point. At first sight, it appeared to possess considerable merit, and there could be no doubt whatever that a failure to use the powers with which creditors were entrusted and a degree of slackness in the administration of estates existed, and this was very much to be deplored. The difficulty which beset him in this relation was one which, he fancied, had also beset his predecessor, who had, at one time, put on the table of the House a resolution drawn in that direction, but who had not prosecuted it further. He greatly apprehended that, so long as creditors—who had the fullest powers of determining who should be their assignee or agent, and who had the fullest power of regulating and controlling and punishing and admonishing and exposing the assignee or agent if appointed, and of displacing him if found untrustworthy, and who had the fullest power of appointing one or more of these inspectors to watch over the assignee or agent, and of remunerating them as they pleased, or not at all if they so pleased—found it impossible to manage their own affairs through themselves or the person placed in charge, this state of things would not be improved by the appointment of these Government inspectors—one for Ontario, one for Quebec, and one for the Maritime Provinces—to look over the accounts and attend to the administration of estates scattered over the wide range of those Provinces, and paid by salary or by fees. He would express no decided opinion on the matter, but the conclusion he was at present disposed to draw was this: That the inspection of these persons would, necessarily, be of a cursory or perfunctory character in the bulk of cases, and that the sense of responsibility which weighed on the assignee, and which ought to weigh on the inspectors, would be removed, or, to a large extent, be diminished by the fact of a Government official being appointed, whose duty it would be to inspect the accounts, while there would be no actual efficient inspection substituted for it. This was his difficulty. He would take the liberty of repeating to the Committee what he had more than once stated with reference to the Insolvency Acts: while they could not expect any such law to work satisfactorily, it could be expected that no Act would work tolerably so long as the creditors, the persons most interested in these estates, did not take an interest in them after the insolvencies had occurred; and, if they did not think it worth while to look after the portion of their business which had gone into insolvency as they did after the portion which had not gone into insolvency, they might depend upon it that no other result would occur. He considered that the remedy for this state of things lay in the appointment of one or more inspectors, at moderate remuneration, to look after the interests of creditors. He believed that a merchant who was appointed an inspector, who happened to be a creditor and engaged in other business, might, not unnaturally, feel that he was asked to bear a loss greater than the other creditors. If a moderate remuneration were paid to inspectors, and creditors made them understand that they were expected to discharge their duties faithfully, he believed the duty would be better performed, in each individual case, by merchants interested than by official inspection. If we could not get a merchant interested in the estate to serve efficiently, we condemned by that very proposition the idea that we could secure efficient inspection in the manner suggested.

Mr. BARTHE said that the officers who were named by the Government ought to be paid by the Government. As assignees were appointed by the Government, the proposition to have inspectors appointed by the Government had a raison d'être. It appeared logical. An assignee named for a district became an officer of the court; he was under the direct control of the Government, which could displace him if he did not do his duty. While in principle opposed to the Insolvency Law, which, in his opinion, sanctioned an immoral principle, in relieving a man from the payment of a legitimate debt, still, as it existed, he was disposed to make it as useful as possible in conformity with the views of the majority. He did not see any remedy but this: The appointment of assignees by the Government in each district, and the appointment by the Government of inspectors in each Province to watch over them. A striking fact resulting from the discussion of the law was this: Those who had taken part in it had agreed that it was defective and vicious, and that it gave rise to an immense quantity of abuses. The Government had obtained a majority against the proposition he had made for the abolition of the law, simply on account of the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice to remedy the evil, and to make the measure acceptable to the people. He had examined these amendments with great care, and certainly some of them were useful; but, even when they were adopted, he did not see that the result would be more satisfactory to the public. For example, the proposition to compel the payment of fifty per cent. had been discussed in the House and elsewhere; and he was convinced, from the experience he had had of the working of the law, that, in practice, this amendment would be far from giving satisfaction, even to the creditors, for, in the majority of cases, the bankrupt would not be able to pay fifty cents on the dollar and costs; and what would be done under these circumstances? The bankrupt would secrete money in a fraudulent manner, at the expense of his creditors, and continue in business in the name of a brother, his wife, a brother-in-law, or of some other person. A large estate might pay fifty cents and costs, as the fees of the assignees would be less considerably, comparatively speaking, in these instances; but, in the generality of cases, he was convinced that the provision in the law obliging the insolvent to pay fifty cents on the dollar and costs before he could get his discharge, would open a new door to fraud, and would be a new cause of ruin. He understood that the Minister of Justice was to take into consideration, during recess, the suggestions made in this regard last year; and he was certain that, while these might not be unacceptable with regard to the appointment of assignees, they would make the law so impracticable and unpopular as to enforce its repeal. He would not then, however, enter into the merits of the discussion, apropos of this law, but he considered it to be his duty to move the following amendment:—"And be it enacted that this Act shall remain in force until the end of the next Session of Parliament, but not longer." He hoped that, before the termination of the next Session, the Government and the majority of the members would come to the conclusion that a law which had caused so much ruin and demoralization in the country should be swept from the Statute-book, never again to be enacted.

Mr. DAVIES said he did not concur with the hon. member for Prince Edward that the appointment of Government inspectors would be an improvement in the Bill. The appointment of inspectors by the creditors was the best system. A Bankruptcy Law had only existed in Prince Edward Island, he might state, during the last few years. Previously, unfortunate debtors had to go to prison, or leave the limits of the town; and, when a Bankruptcy Act came into force, the other extreme was gone to, and the result was that for eight or ten years creditors received nothing. This was generally termed "Going through the mill." He remembered very well the first case of any magnitude which came up under the present law; the legal gentlemen engaged had not studied the Act, but they thought they would carry the alleged unfortunate debtor through. But, when they looked into the law, they found that this could not be done. The case related to an assignment of goods in transit and of goods in a warehouse. The result was that the creditors agreed to accept the Government allowance of 33½ per cent. It was generally believed that a good deal more could have been secured, but the parties concerned thought that, if the estate was put into insolvency, a great deal of money would be consumed in the payment of expenses. In small communities, there was undoubtedly a great deal of influence brought to bear in such cases, and perhaps the large creditors were disposed to be lenient to the person supposed to be an unfortunate debtor, and in that way the man got through. Under the present Bill the creditors had everything in their own hands. They appointed an inspector, who went through the accounts and reported to the creditors, and upon that report the latter acted. He did not think the appointment of official inspectors would be any improvement on the present system. In his Province, the Act had worked satisfactorily. If creditors had not obtained as much as they ought to, it was their own fault. Going into insolvency had unfortunately become too much of a business. People who found themselves in small difficulties, from which they might clear themselves by a little effort, found it easier to compound with their creditors. Merchants, however, should exercise a little more care when there was an Insolvency Act in operation, and not give credit in doubtful cases. By that means, a great deal of the evil complained of would be avoided.

Mr. POULIOT said the greatest number of merchants did not suffer on account of failures; those who paid the bills were certainly the consumers. The wholesale merchants made up for their losses by charging greater prices; for instance, instead of making ten, they would realize fifteen per cent. profit on their sales. He approved of the suggestions made by the Minister of Justice. If adopted, they would tend to protect society. An inspector would be named, and would be paid for his services; and it would be his duty to look after the estate. At present, inspectors were not obliged to perform these duties.

Mr. MITCHELL said it was well known that he was one of those who held that the Insolvency Law had done its work. Insolvencies were daily occurring, and they had swollen to such an enormous extent, that one could not help coming to the conclusion that there was something wrong with relation to the insolvencies occurring in this country. He thought that the Act should be repealed. Additional changes had been made in the law yearly, during the last seven years, and he thought that it had been yearly made worse. When he looked at the Bill before the House, and saw the tinkering attempted in the existing measure, he believed that it was rendering confusion more confounded. What was going to be the effect of the Bill? He would take the liberty of discussing a clause which they had not yet reached—with relation to the percentage which had to be paid before an insolvent could get his discharge.

Mr. BLAKE rose to a point of order. He thought it quite clear that each clause should be discussed as it came up in succession.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would not persist in speaking on the point in question.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said the Minister of Justice had practically admitted in his argument that paid inspectors would be an improvement on the measure as it stood.

Section agreed to.

On Section 12,

Mr. BLAKE proposed, in order to meet the views of the hon. members for Frontenac and Waterloo, to insert after the word "inspector," in the third line, "nor shall any inspector employ any person being his partner or being the partner of any assignee."

Mr. KILLAM said he did not think the duties of inspectors were sufficiently clearly defined in the law of 1875. The clause relating to these officers simply stated that inspectors should superintend the winding-up of the affairs of the estate. The assignee was required to deposit money in the bank, and only to withdraw it on a cheque signed by himself and one of the inspectors, who, however, were not required to look after the deposits. He knew of very serious cases which had occurred, in which, for default of security, creditors had suffered largely. He thought the clause should be so worded as to make it the duty of inspectors to see money deposited when, or within a very short time after, they were received. They should also inspect the dividend sheets, and see that dividends should be declared, and pay more attention to the affairs of estates generally than they had been in the habit of doing. Of course, inspectors could be sued for negligence in these cases, but he thought that very gross negligence would have to be proved to recover damages.

Mr. FRASER said that the duties connected with the management of an estate were very various, and he was afraid that, if specific rules were laid down, it would rather make matters worse. He thought that no inspector did his duty unless he supervised the proceedings of the assignee, and, from time to time at comparatively brief intervals, looked over the accounts and saw how things were going on, and verified the balances laying in the bank. A code of rules would be very difficult of application.

Mr. KILLAM said he thought that if diligence was imposed on inspectors this would have some beneficial effect.

Mr. BLAKE said he would look into the matter before the Bill reached its last stage. They should remember that, if too many duties were imposed, persons might refuse to accept the position of inspector.

Mr. MITCHELL said the Minister of Justice had stated that it was a duty which the creditors owed to themselves and the public to attend to their interests and look after these estates, and that, if they did not do it, an inspector appointed by the Government could scarcely be expected to undertake that supervision which those directly interested in the estate ought to see was undertaken and preferred. He recently conversed with gentlemen in Montreal who, to their deep regret, were largely concerned in insolvent estates. They were two of the largest importers in Montreal, and, believing it was their duty in the interests of the other creditors and the public to make an example of a fraudulent debtor, they had spent one month out of three in Court looking after the matter. He asked them if they would pursue the same course in relation to other claims, and the leading one replied: "I will never follow another case in Court; the trouble and labour is such that we had better lose our debts." He did not think the amendments would improve the law, which he thought had had no good results. The proposed alterations were simply tinkering with the law

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said he thought it was forgotten that the parties appointed as inspectors generally had an interest in the estate, which was the best guarantee that they would endeavour to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. He admitted that there was great force in the remarks of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) and that such a case as was referred to might have occurred. As a means of preventing the recurrence of such cases, he would suggest that the hon. the Minister of Justice should introduce a clause to the effect that every assignee should be compelled when he had a fund of five cents in his hands to declare a dividend. Such a clause would prevent assignees having any large amount in their control at one time.

Section agreed to.

On Section 14,

Mr. COLBY said it was proposed to strike out the clause in the old Act which conferred discretionary powers on the Judge, and substitute one which made it peremptory, except with the limitations in the subsections, for a debtor to pay fifty cents on the dollar before he could get his discharge. It was a matter of great importance, and one deserving the serious consideration of the House, whether this change was a desirable one at this time and in the present condition of the country. His own conviction was that it was not, and that it would be fraught with very great danger, and that its consequences might be very serious upon the struggling merchants. Under the system of voluntary assignments, where a man could throw himself into insolvency, it was right and logical to exact that his estate should pay a reasonable percentage in order to entitle him to a discharge; but under the Act of 1875 the debtor had no right at all in the matter. His estate was taken possession of and wound up by the creditors. It was a monstrous hardship, and was an illogical and unfair proposition, to say that an estate must, under such circumstances, pay a given percentage—much less to pay an unreasonable percentage such as the amendment proposed to fix. An hon. member had informed the House that the average dividends of insolvent estates was only 22½ per cent. Were we then to have a law whose practical working would not permit a man to obtain his discharge? He had before him a statement prepared by a gentleman well known to this House, and one whose name, if mentioned, would be received with the highest respect, bearing on what a country estate would pay. He assumed an estate of $12,000—one half in merchants' stock and the other in book accounts—and showed that when it came to be wound up, under the most favourable circumstances, the stocks would hardly bring 62½ per cent., which would be $3,750, and that it would be a favourable sale if the book accounts brought 50 per cent., which would be $3,000. There would always, this gentleman pointed out, be privileged claims, and costs of which a moderate estimate would be $1,000, which would leave a total of $5,700 at the disposal of the creditors, and, therefore, according to the proposed law, would not entitle the debtor to his discharge. But this estimate of what the estate would realise was very liberal. It would be more reasonable, more in accordance with actual results, to estimate the goods sold en bloc at about 40c. on the dollar, and if the book accounts were sold for 33c. it would not be a bad sale. This would make the estate pay about 30 per cent. He ventured the assertion that insolvent estates would not, and in these times could not be expected to pay the high average of fifty cents to the dollar. As he said the other day, an estate composed of broken stocks of goods, book accounts, lands and mortgages in lands, which might be appraised at 150c. on the dollar of the liabilities would, if sold, not realize fifty cents on the dollar. He did not want the solvent merchant, he did not want the men who, if left to themselves, might extricate themselves from their difficulties, he did not want these men to be brought under the operation of this law, and to be ground down and stripped of their property, and then not get their discharge under circumstances of this kind. Did the House understand the ordeal which a merchant had to pass before he could get his discharge under the operation of the law as it now stood? He would look at the clauses of the present Act in reference to this. By the 25th clause, the insolvent, in the first instance, was subjected to a most rigorous examination with regard to his affairs, and by a subsequent clause his wife and others who would be most conversant with his affairs might also be subjected to a most rigorous examination. Then it must be shown that there had been no collusion and no fraud; there must be no suspicion of fraud, or any evil practice. It must also be shown that there were proper book accounts kept: otherwise he could not get his discharge. Clause 57 provided that before a debtor could get his discharge the evidence must show that he had not been guilty of misconduct; that in the management of his business he had not been extravagant; that he had not been reckless in endorsing or being surety; that he had not incurred debts with no reasonable prospect of paying them; and that he had not been negligent in keeping his accounts. If he had failed in any of these particulars, his discharge might be suspended under the operation of the present law. He (Mr. Colby) submitted that the existing Act was sufficiently rigorous for these hard times. The other day, one of the strong arguments used by the hon. member who resisted the appeal of the Insolvent Act—and it was an argument which went a long way—was that the repeal of the Act would not suit the peculiar conditions of these hard times, that it was unwise to repeal the Act at this time, and that it would throw the country into great difficulties. If this was a forcible argument against the repeal of the Act, it was equally forcible against the modifications proposed by the Minister of Justice. If the experiment was to be tried of not giving a debtor his discharge unless he could pay fifty cents to the dollar, some more advantageous period should be chosen, and not the present time, when honest merchants were struggling under such great difficulties to keep their heads above water. He knew that the hon. the Minister of Justice in the 3rd subsection proposed a new feature. The Minister of Justice said that the debtor might rid himself of all these difficulties if, when he became insolvent, when he knew that he was insolvent, he notified his creditors to that effect, and his creditors did not choose to throw him into insolvency. The hon. the Minister of Justice was in favour of voluntary assignments. He knew and acknowledged that the House and the country were opposed to that system, and he was now ingeniously endeavouring to obtain his object by a side wind. He (Mr. Colby) would not go the length of saying that, in no circumstances, or in no condition of the country, would a provision of that kind work well; but it would be very unwise to make it operative without at least a year's notice in these depressed times, when, as an hon. member had lately said, the wholesale merchant was carrying the retail dealer. It would be very hard, under such circumstances, to compel a man to come out with a disclosure of his affairs in order to throw himself into bankruptcy. He did not believe that the provision would have the practical effect which the Minister of Justice seemed to think it would have. He did not believe that men who had a pride in their reputation, who had a desire not to go into bankruptcy, but who desired to keep an honoured name in mercantile circles, would avail themselves of this provision, and would be willing, for the sake of the little immunity they would get, to throw themselves hopelessly into bankruptcy. These would be the last men to avail themselves of this provision, at all events until they were so far gone that their estates could not realize fifty cents on the dollar. He knew of an estate which had been unsettled for twelve months, although it was in the hands of an assignee and judiciously inspected, and aided by the best efforts of the insolvent. It had been estimated at 90c., but, notwithstanding the combined efforts of all, it was doubtful if it could realize 25c. on the dollar. The estates of many country merchants consisted in part of real estate and mortgages upon real estate, which would not bring nearly their value, and the same was the case as to their stocks, which were usually sold en bloc. He did not think it wise to take away the discretion of the Judge in granting a discharge. He hoped the Minister of Justice would see that the present was a very unfortunate time to introduce experiments.

Mr. MACMILLAN said he coincided with the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). When the Insolvent Bill was first introduced, it was for the purpose of relieving the debtor, but the present Bill seemed to be for the purpose of placing the debtor completely in the hands of the creditor. The section providing that no debtor could get his discharge unless he could pay fifty cents on the dollar was an exceedingly hard one. It was sufficiently difficult now for a debtor to obtain his discharge without making it more stringent. The hon. the Minister of Justice and the Government were quite willing that Judges should try criminal cases, and yet they did not seem to have sufficient confidence in them to give them the power of saying whether, upon the evidence before them, an insolvent should be discharged or not.

Mr. PATERSON said he would desire, in any remarks he might make, to give all weight and importance to the arguments which had been so ably set forth by his hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby). But all questions, and eminently this question, had two sides. He could not agree with nor could he take the line of argument adopted by his hon. friend from Stanstead. There might be difficulties in the matter; he did not pretend to say there were not. He would not pretend to say that it was within the power of the Minister of Justice, or of the united Ministry, to compile an Act that would be perfect. But what it was necessary to consider was whether there were any evils under the present Act, to determine exactly what they were, and then they should ascertain whether the amendments proposed were calculated to remedy the evils or not. There were evils which existed under the present Insolvent Act. But he alleged that one of the evils was not the debtor being oppressed by the creditors. He challenged the House to produce a single case in which the debtor had suffered any hardship from the creditors under this law. The evil under the present law was that it operated to such an extent in this direction that the country had had to deplore a lowering of the commercial tone and commercial morality of this country. It had been lowered by the fact that, under the law, as it at present existed, men had been enabled to relieve themselves from the just payment of their debts: men who stood high and honourable at one time, and whose names had been held in high esteem, had been carried away by the general movement and had drifted into the current, and their good name and morality had gone. It was therefore for the House to consider whether the proposed amendments would correct this evil. When the present law was introduced, he recollected that the Minister of Justice, who did not then occupy his present high position, took exception to a man being compelled to pay a certain amount when voluntary assignments were being done away with. That hon. gentleman did not think it right that the debtor who was not at liberty to go into insolvency himself, should be liable to be put into insolvency at any time his creditors saw fit, and that it was harsh to refuse him his discharge when he was prepared to show that it was not possible for him to pay what was required of him. He (Mr. Paterson) differed somewhat from his hon. friend at that time. He desired that the amount to ensure discharge should be 50c. instead of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ c. He desired it then, as he desired it now, in the interest of the commercial morality of the country. He believed this was the only effectual remedy for the evils which now existed. There should be a strong incentive for merchants to act honestly, and a debtor should be compelled to strain his energies to pay his creditors. But there was nothing of the kind now to enable him to secure his discharge from the Judge, who lived in his neighbourhood and was generally disposed to look upon him leniently, although perhaps it was pretty well known that the debtor had not paid all that he might have paid. Under the proposed amendments the man who owed the money would himself be an interested party in seeing that all was done which possibly could be done. He trusted that the House would support the clause as to the 50c. That brought him to consider the objections which had been urged against the clause. The strong objection which had been urged—and it was pressed very strongly and ably by the hon. member for Stanstead, who always placed his arguments strongly before the House—was that it would necessarily be unjust to the debtor, from the fact that, in a period of depression, such as the present, stocks brought under the hammer would be sacrificed at such a price as would make it impossible for a man, honest and almost solvent—the hon. member for Stanstead thought a solvent debtor might be placed in the position—to pay 50c. on the dollar. He was not disposed to go with the hon. member so far as to say that a trader perfectly solvent would, under the Act, be unable to pay 50c. He was not disposed to take the view, even in such depressed times as the present, that the stock would be sacrificed so as not to realize the amount. He could scarcely believe such would be the case, because the amendment proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice made provision that the debtor would not be placed at a disadvantage from his estate having been mismanaged by the assignee, or fraud committed, and be prevented from receiving his discharge. Therefore, the only circumstance that would operate against the debtor was that the stock was such that it would not realize 50c. on the dollar. He granted that there was some force in the arguments which had been presented by hon. members in favour of that view. But he desired to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the tendency on the part of creditors was not only not to oppress the debtors, but to deal most leniently with them, and no danger need be apprehended to the honest debtor if he could not pay the 50c. on the dollar, for, if he had an honest desire to pay the full amount, he would go to his creditors and tell them frankly that he was unable, under present circumstances, to carry on his business successfully; that he desired to pay them all he could, but that the estate, if forced into the market, would not raise a sufficient amount.

Mr. COLBY said any such arrangement would be owing to the generosity of the creditors, not to the law.

Mr. PATERSON said the House should consider what would be the action of the creditors in such an event. There would be no disposition on the part of creditors to have revenge on an honest debtor. There would be no motive for revenge by punishing him by preventing him obtaining his discharge, and the creditors would allow the debtor to wind up his own affairs. The evil result existing under the present law was that the debtors defrauded the creditors and tended to lower the standard of commercial morality. It must also be remembered that it was a man's bounden duty to pay, not 50c. but 100c. on the dollar. Any law, therefore, which said that a man might obtain release from his debts on payment of 50c. on the dollar was conferring a benefit. While a debtor might go through insolvency or make a compromise with his creditors for 50c. on the dollar and be legally absolved from his liabilities, still, under the higher law, the moral law, he should pay every dollar of his debts. Every hon. member who looked at the question from his standpoint would believe that the most effective remedy which had been proposed for the end which existed under the present Insolvency Law, was to be found in that clause which had been introduced by the hon. the Minister of Justice, which, while it would tend to secure to creditors their just dues, a consummation devoutly to be wished, would also tend to improve the commercial morality of the country, which had been somewhat impaired under the operation of the law in its present form, and again elevate it to that standard which every lover of his country desired to be maintained.

Mr. JETTÉ said he believed the legislation of Parliament should be suited to the wants of the country. The other day the House voted to retain the Insolvent Law, and that was done, he believed, for the reason which was given by almost every hon. member, that the circumstances of the country would not allow of its repeal at the present time. If the House accepted Clauses 14 and 15 proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice, they virtually repealed the Insolvent Law to the extent of 50c. on the dollar. No doubt the circumstances of the country required some aid to be given to the debtor. He believed we had not yet seen the worst of the depression. If that were so, and it had been established by the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Ross) that the rate of dividends paid by insolvent estates during the past twelve years had not exceeded 12½c. on the dollar, this was not a proper time to compel insolvents to pay 50c. on the dollar.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said the adoption of the 15th section would practically do away with one of the objects for which an Insolvent Act was provided, viz: that when an honest trader became insolvent and handed his estate conscientiously over to his creditors he should obtain his discharge and be able to commence business again. He concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) that an estate required to be worth $1.50 on the dollar, in order to pay a dividend of 50c. Hon. gentlemen would learn, if they consulted sheriffs, that in forced sales it was almost impossible to obtain any offer whatever. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Peterson) had declared that the present law did not operate injuriously to the debtor, but that its operation had been adverse to the interests of the creditor. His (Mr. White's) experience had been, that, where the law had operated injuriously to creditors, it was their fault in not being sufficiently attentive in winding up the estate. According to the argument of the hon. member for South Brant, there should be no Insolvent Law. He was not prepared to maintain that there should be no Insolvent Law, and he opposed the 15th clause because it would practically withdraw from insolvents the benefit of the law. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would expunge the clause or substitute 25c. for 50c. on the dollar.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said the 15th clause was the best clause in the Bill. There was one point, however, on which all hon. members would agree, viz., that there were too many men in trade. No hon. gentleman, moreover, would deny that a large number of the failures which occurred were the result of extravagance. Did they want to get extravagant dealers back to demoralize the trade? Insolvencies were also due to incompetency on the part of the dealer. Did hon. gentlemen want to bring incompetent men and demoralize trade? It would not be denied that a large number of insolvencies were the result of fraud. Did hon. gentlemen want to bring back into trade fraudulent men to demoralize business? No man crossed the border line between honesty and dishonesty without thought, it was the result of planning and chicanery, and was done just in proportion as opportunities were afforded. He held that the very facility which men had had to obtain their discharge under the present law had led many men to become insolvent who would not have dreamed of doing so under different circumstances; the very ease with which the discharge was obtained enabled them to re-enter business, demoralize the trade of the country, and prevent the honest trader, who intended to pay one hundred cents on the dollar, from being able to carry on his legitimate and honest designs. He held that any man who conducted his business properly need not fail; that any man who examined into his affairs, and took stock every six months, need not get so far behind in his financial affairs as to compel him to make an assignment and call his creditors together; and, just so soon as the country got rid of incompetent and fraudulent traders, would the honest man be enabled successfully to carry on his business. In regard to the contention of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), that an insolvent estate required to be worth $1.50 in the dollar in order to pay a dividend of 50c. on the dollar, he (Mr. Macdonald) could not imagine a trader in such a position going into insolvency, and surrendering the estate to his creditors. The hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Ross) had endeavoured to show that the average dividend paid by insolvent estates had been 22½c. on the dollar. But did that hon. member claim that the law should be so framed as to meet the case of those traders who only paid 12½c. on the dollar, and who became so accustomed to the thing that they did it every twelve months. A dividend of 33½c. had been tried, and had resulted in demoralization. Much had been said about the discretion placed in the hands of the Judges. He did not wish to impugn their judgments, but they could not have been the best that could have been rendered. An hon. member had proposed that the law should remain in existence for only twelve months, and then be repealed; but he advocated that course without knowing what the effects of the new law would be, and whether it would prove, as he (Mr. Macdonald) claimed it would, the greatest safeguard the commercial community had ever possessed. A case had been supposed, in which a trader bought a hardware stock and did not sell one dollar's worth during twelve months and then, from a shrinkage of values, was unable to pay 50c. on the dollar. If such a case did occur, the sooner the trader was out of business the better. Some hon. gentlemen had spoken as though the importer desired the failure of merchants. But the importer could not realize his profits until he sold his goods. The proposed 50c. clause would be of immense benefit to the trading community, and he was satisfied it would meet with the general approval of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member for Stanstead had so well expressed his views on this measure that there was no necessity for him to speak at great length. It would be supposed, from the argument of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, that the Insolvent Law was simply for the protection of the creditor. That might have been the result of the Bill, but it was certainly not its object, which was to afford on the one hand reasonable protection to the creditor and on the other enable the debtor who had pursued an honest, straightforward course to get his discharge. They did not legislate for the rich merchants and importers, but for all classes. What had been the tendency of the Insolvent Law? Had it been to give more relief, latitude, or licence to the debtor, or more power and influence to the creditor? He held that the latter was the case, and that the Act prevented a man exercising his energy and application to work out the means of paying his debts. The law was not in the interest of public morality either, as had been suggested, because it kept thousands of men in bondage if their estates did not realize a certain percentage. The hon. member for Prince Edward had shown that the average paid by insolvent estates was only 22½ per cent., and what show of reason and fair play was given the unfortunate classes of the community by raising the required percentage in a time of great depression like this to 50 per cent. The thing was an outrage—it was barbarous. For his part, he would favour the abolition of the percentage altogether. What were the Judges for? We selected the best men we could find for such positions, and we should not take from them the discretionary power of determining whether or not a debtor should have his discharge. There were hundreds of men to-day, as high-minded and honourable as the hon. member for Centre Toronto, who were in difficulties and against whom the law would operate harshly. A hurricane, a storm at sea, or a fire might destroy the business prospects of many men, and it would be manifestly unjust if they were to be kept from regaining their positions through an arbitrary law of this character. He was surprised that the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald), who had introduced a system of prayer into this House, should be so wanting in Christian spirit as to support a law which was to benefit the creditor at the expense of the poor unfortunate debtor. If he (Mr. Mitchell) had his way he would sweep the law out of existence altogether. It had performed its mission; it had effected the purpose for which it was originally enacted; and, although it had been extended term after term, the number of bankruptcies which daily occurred clearly pointed out that this was no time for the enactment of more stringent measures. He thought the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Barthe) was worthy of the support of the House, and that it would be wisdom to reject the Bill of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said if 33½ per cent. had proved disastrous it was easy to understand that 50 per cent. would be worse. Three or four years ago the hon. the Minister of Justice insisted on 10c. on the dollar; two years ago he increased it to 33c., and now he proposed to increase it still further to 50c. At this rate, in the course of a year or so, the hon. gentleman would undoubtedly make it $1. He (Mr. Ross) thought the creditors were better judges than the hon. the Minister of Justice of what a debtor ought to pay, and he did not think any amendment of the law in this particular was called for now. Speaking of the Insolvency Law a writer in the Journal of Commerce said:

“Thus there should be an Insolvent Act, framed both for the quick and just division of his estate, and the discharge of the insolvent from all his liabilities on giving up his whole effects to his creditors. The debtor's discharge should never be refused him when such is the case; but the burden of proof of that should be thrown on the insolvent. If he can prove that he has given up all, he is entitled to his discharge and to be freed from all liability, so as to leave him a free man to devote his talents and his labour again to the maintenance of himself and family, for so he can best serve the state or country of which he forms a part. Law has no right to dictate on this point that an insolvent shall pay 10c., 25c., 33c., 50c. or 75c. on the dollar in order to obtain his discharge. There are certain classes of goods which may be worth at cost, $10,000, but which, if forced suddenly on the market in a small community, might not realize $1,000, while certain classes of staple commodities will realize within 25 per cent. of cost at almost any time or in almost any community however small. Law cannot and ought not to go into details on a point like this. It can only deal with broad principles. Every man must judge for himself in details, and take the consequences of his folly or wisdom.”

He put great faith in that article, and he hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would drop that clause. He knew an estate worth $7,300 with debts amounting to $6,500, which only paid a dividend of $375. The expenses of winding up another estate which was worth $4,200, amounted to $4,750. It was high time that official inspectors were appointed.

Mr. PALMER said that, when the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) acknowledged that the result of the Act had been to demoralize the country, the House must come naturally to the conclusion that the country would be very much better without it. The hon. the Minister of Justice had certainly desired to bring forward an Act that would stop the commercial demoralization of the country, and in that respect he ought to be assisted. He (Mr. Palmer) had come to the conclusion that something was being attempted which was impossible to be done, but yet he was not going to say that he would vote against the Bill, and he did not think he would. If his hon. friend desired to try the Act for another year he was disposed to grant him the experiment, although he was entirely of the opinion that it would fail. It would involve legislation of a larger description than was proposed. At present, under Section 64, if he remembered rightly, in a year from the time he first went into bankruptcy, the debtor was at liberty to apply to the Judge for his discharge. But how would it be possible for him to do so if it was necessary for him to pay 50c. on the dollar? His property would be taken away from him, and even the year's earnings would not be his own. He could not acquire any property, and he could be kept in insolvency for an indefinite period until it was discovered that he could pay 50c. on the dollar. There should be some provision for determining the time when the estate should be wound up. A man in business was subject to all sorts of misfortunes. He might sell goods to a man who might become insolvent, or he might be subject to shipwreck or fire, and yet he would be deprived of the ability to carry on business at all. He sympathized with the object of the Minister of Justice, although he did not think he would be successful. The Bill, as it existed, was generally used by dishonest men. The House had imposed a duty upon the Minister of Justice which it was impossible for him to carry out in consonance with the principles of justice. Therefore, he (Mr. Palmer) would prefer to see the Act entirely wiped off the Statute-book.

Mr. FARROW said he rose in the interest of the retail merchant. He thought, if the clause referred to was passed, it would be a great detriment to the retail men. He could easily perceive how the wholesale men viewed the matter. They would be perfectly satisfied if they could furnish goods to retail merchants on credit for five years, and then be sure of 50c. on the dollar, as had been before stated by an hon. member, and he was pretty well convinced that this was true. If the wholesale men could only get this clause passed, they would be jubilant. The Minister of Justice ought to see, from what had been said, that the part referred to ought not to become law. The argument and the figures presented by the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Ross) showed conclusively that, under the existing machinery, it was nearly impossible for an insolvent to pay 50c. on the dollar, and that the great majority of those who had assigned had paid much less than 50c. The consequence of the clause would be that many men doing business here now would remove to the United States, it being impossible for them to continue in business in Canada, and this at a time, too, when large amounts of money were being spent to bring people into the country. He could instance two houses in Toronto who had recently assigned, and had paid only 31c. and 40c. on the dollar; but these men, under the proposed amendment, would be branded as dishonest. The hon. the Minister of Justice would, if the clause were adopted, earn a new laurel, and the clause would be known as the "cruel" clause.

Mr. McCARTHY pointed out that the repeal of the 58th clause left the whole estate under the control and management of the creditors, and with this he agreed so far. But, when it was seen that the debtors, however honest they might be, could not obtain the assent of their creditors to their discharge under a certain composition, the matter became a rather important one.

His hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) had said that no man, unless he was incompetent or dishonest, failed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) explained that he had said that a large number of failures arose from incompetency, extravagance and fraud; but he had not said that there were no failures from any other cause.

Mr. McCARTHY said this did not alter what he was going to say, and he accepted the hon. gentleman's amendment. It was admitted, then, that in certain cases a man might fail from other causes than fraud, extravagance, or incompetency; and many also who could not pay 50c. He would suggest whether it would not be wise to throw the burden of proof upon the insolvent, and then make it obligatory upon the Judge to grant the discharge. The fault of the present law was not so much in the law itself, as in the fact that creditors had not paid that attention to it which they should have done. He thought if the 33½c. clause was left in, and the Bill was amended so that no Judge could grant a discharge unless it was shown that none of the exceptions had been violated by the debtor, and that when it was so shown it should be obligatory upon the Judge to grant the discharge, it would meet the difficulty.

Mr. BLAKE: Is not that re-enacting the 58th clause.

Mr. McCARTHY said he thought the amendment he proposed was different to that clause.

Mr. PATERSON remarked, in reference to what had been said by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) that one of the crying evils under the present Bill was that solvent merchants had to compete with the goods of those who had been able to assign at 33½c. on the dollar, and he asserted that no class complained so much about the laxity of the law as retail traders.

Section agreed to.

On Section 17,

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said, after thinking carefully over the matter he had remained of the same opinions as previously. He ventured to say that the standard of commercial morality would be more lowered during the next year than ever before, for a number of men now in trade, who believed themselves solvent and worth 150c. on the dollar, would soon see that, unless they went into bankruptcy, it would be impossible for them to get their discharge. He thought it had been clearly shown that it was impossible for a debtor to realize what was required by this Bill. Even where assessments had been made at 60c., or 75c., not more than 33½c. had really been realized. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would see that it was advisable not to force this Bill.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he felt it to be his duty to oppose the 15th clause, and, if an amendment was moved in the right direction, when the Bill came up for concurrence, he would support it. He did not doubt that the Minister of Justice was actuated in this relation by the best intentions, but he thought that bankrupt estates could be safely left in the hands of creditors for management throughout. Parties might be overtaken, as it were in a moment, by disaster, and, in consequence, under the provisions of the Bill, they might be unable to obtain their discharge. He considered that cases of this kind should be taken into consideration, as the causes of ruin were beyond the debtor's control. He would oppose the clause, and he trusted that the Minister of Justice would see his way clear to its amendment in such a manner as to meet the views which he thought were generally entertained by the House.

Mr. BOWELL said he had not heard anything in that debate, or during the previous discussion which took place on the introduction of the Bill, nor had he perceived anything in the arguments advanced by the Minister of Justice that indicated that he (Mr. Blake) had changed his mind on this question since 1875, when the hon. gentleman had expressed his views on the subject. On that occasion, when the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) spoke in the same strain as he had done that evening, the hon. gentleman, who was not then Minister of Justice, spoke equally strongly with the hon. member for Stanstead, and wound up his remarks by saying that a limitation of this kind—33c. on the dollar—was in opposition to the principle of the Insolvency Law. He saw the hon. gentleman shaking his head, and he would refresh his memory by referring to Hansard. The hon. gentleman was represented to have said :

“He believed that if power were given to a debtor to go into insolvency voluntarily, it would be proper to impose, as a condition of discharge, that the dividend to be realized from the estate should not be less than a certain amount; but to tell the insolvent that he could not be allowed to go into insolvency of his own accord, that the time for him to do so must be fixed by the creditors, and that in case of them forcing him into insolvency, it the estate could not bring thirty-three cents on the dollar, he should not have his discharge, was too hard; and besides it was inconsistent with the principles of the Bill.”

Mr. BLAKE: Of the Bill?

Mr. BOWELL: Certainly. He did not find anything in this Bill changing that principle, further than one of the provisions in the proposed amendment, that the debtor must give notice that he was able to pay fifty cents on the dollar, and that, if he were not put into insolvency within a month, he was not obliged to pay fifty cents on the dollar. There was nothing in the law to compel the creditor to put the debtor into insolvency, nor did it follow that a debtor would be enabled to inform his creditors that he could pay fifty cents on the dollar. A man might take stock, and this, with his book debts, might show him to be solvent to all intents and purposes, and yet when he came to collect his debts he might find that his accounts were scarcely worth a third or a quarter of their face. The result would be that, if he failed to give notice within one month under this clause, such a debtor would be unable to obtain his discharge, and then circumstances might arise which would prevent him from giving one month's notice—the fact of the failure of those whom he had assisted, or whose notes he had endorsed, or the failure of the wholesale merchant who supplied him with goods, and who might also bring him down to bankruptcy. They knew that such things occurred almost every day. He could not but take exception to the sweeping arguments—if they could be so termed—or the denunciations rather of the hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto, when speaking of debtors. If the arguments of the hon. gentlemen from Centre Toronto and South Brant meant anything, they were the strongest possible arguments which could be advanced in favour of the complete repeal of the law, and, if the hon. gentlemen had taken this ground, it did seem to him that they would have been more consistent. The hon. gentleman said there were too many in the trade, and he quite agreed with him on that point; and further, to prevent those who had been, unfortunately, fraudulent—as the hon. gentleman termed them—or incompetent, from again commencing business, they should be hindered from obtaining their discharge. It seemed to him that the wholesale merchants should have begun at the root of the evil, for they could, to a very great extent, prevent these fraudulent transactions. Into every small village, town and city in the Dominion, these merchants sent forth their runners; and, having over-imported themselves, in order to get rid of their stock, they actually forced their goods on the retail dealer, who, in turn, forced them on his customers. When the retailers attempted to collect their accounts, they found that they were unable to do so; and the result was bankruptcy. Anyone who had given the slightest attention to this question, must have come to the conclusion that bankruptcies had almost quadrupled since the time when the system of sending out runners, or drummers, or bummers into every section of the country was adopted by the wholesale trade. In almost every little village they established a man, having a small capital of his own, and gave him the requisite, and even more than the necessary, credit to carry on business; and this was not all; a second and a third man came along, and if they had a few hundred dollars the wholesale merchant would give him goods to three or four times that amount, and send them into the same locality to compete with the solvent trader. The result was bankruptcy in nine cases out of ten. The wholesale merchant should keep his drummers at home, and let the man who desired to purchase goods, and who had some capital, come to him and establish a fair and equitable credit. Two or three persons should not be established in the same business in the same locality where there was scarcely business enough for one. Such a case occurred a few days ago; a man began business with some $9,000 or $10,000, and this continued for some eighteen months, when the creditors came to the shop and found only $3,000 or $4,000 left. The balance had disappeared. The man told them: "When I commenced business, I had a fair prospect not only of succeeding, but of paying every dollar I owed; but I was scarcely in business a month before you established two other shops in this locality, and the result has been that none of us have been able to do any business." Bankruptcy followed; and this would continue under such circumstances to the end of time. If wholesale merchants desired to prevent the recurrence of these things, they must begin at the bottom and refuse to give such a degree of credit. If this system were continued, they would never obtain, by Act of Parliament, 50c. on the dollar from their debtors. On the same arbitrary principle, 60c. or 75c. might be stipulated for; if the House went to the length of the hon. member for South Brant, debtors might be compelled to pay 100c. on the dollar. If this could be accomplished, it would undoubtedly benefit the whole trade, but he was convinced that the attempt would fail. If, to the proviso that a dividend might have been obtained if it had not been for negligence or fraud on the part of assignees or inspectors, were added "and the expense in winding up the estate," it would undoubtedly have the same effect as if the clause were altogether eliminated. The example given by the hon. member for Prince Edward was sufficient to show that, where an estate was actually worth from 80c. to 100c. on the dollar, when it passed through the hands of the assignees and lawyers, if 30c. or 40c. were obtained, this was all that could be expected.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said the amendment was proposed to apply to the 65th section of the Act of 1875. When this law was passed, he was one of those who opposed the introduction into it of the 65th clause, as he then believed that it would not accomplish the object in view. The hon. member for North Hastings said that the Minister of Justice opposed the 33 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. clause. He thought this was probably the case, and therefore the then and now positions of the hon. gentleman were not consistent, the one with the other.

Mr. BOWELL: I did not say so.

Mr. MACDOUGALL said the two cases were not parallel. The 33c. clause, as it existed now, was applicable to all cases of discharge, where the consent to the discharge was obtained from the creditors, and it was likewise applicable to cases of confirmation of discharge, and to other cases, where no other discharge had been obtained in the regular way. This amendment was proposed to be added to the 65th section, which provided for the cases where the application for discharge was made where there was no consent to the discharge being obtained, and where no confirmation of the discharge was to be secured; and not to these cases. It had been stated that the wholesale merchants forced their goods on the retail dealers throughout the country; but he did not think it could be fairly stated that these merchants had dealt hardly with their customers; on the contrary, they had shown great leniency in this respect. There was nothing to prevent assent to discharge being obtained or a composition of discharge, and, if this was the case, there was nothing in this section to prevent a discharge being confirmed. Sub-section three of this amendment was in part equivalent to a voluntary assignment. It was proposed that, when an insolvent found himself in such a position, he should honestly inform his creditors about his condition; he need not wait, as now, until they saw fit to put him into insolvency; and this provision was equivalent to a voluntary assignment. He was not favourable to a limitation of the description proposed, or one of any kind, for he thought that the provisions of the Statute were now sufficient to enable creditors to look after their own interests properly. He was willing, however, to defer to the wish of the majority on this point. Nevertheless, he did not apprehend that any very beneficial effect would result from the adoption of the amendment. He did not understand that the fifty cents included costs, but, probably, it was only proper that it should do so. It would make those engaged in trade see that their affairs were properly conducted, examine their books and take stock at such intervals as to be able to know at any time how their affairs stood; and, when they found their affairs in such a condition as required it, they could give this notice, and would be very likely able to arrange such a compromise with their creditors as would be beneficial to the creditors, not hurtful to themselves, and at the same time not necessitate their going into insolvency. He would have been pleased to have seen the minimum dividend untouched, and still better pleased to see no limitation of the kind; but it seemed to him the evil effect of the 33 per cent. clause was to a considerable extent obviated by the 3rd subsection.

Mr. HOLTON said, two years ago, when the Act of which this was an amendment was before the House, he had the good fortune to agree with his hon. friend the Minister of Justice in opposing the 33 per cent. limitation. He did not blame the hon. gentleman for the position he had now taken, because in matters of this kind they had to be governed by expediency and not by abstract principle, and he had no doubt that the raising of the limitation to 50 per cent. was in accordance with the representations of the mercantile community. But he (Mr Holton) wished to say that he adhered to the opinion he formed two years ago. He had thought somewhat on the subject, and watched the workings of the present law, and he was persuaded in his own mind that the arguments upon which he and his hon. friend agreed in opposing this limitation were valid, and had been sustained, rather than weakened, by the experience of the last two years. What he feared in the practical operation of the clause proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice was that a great many men who were struggling with a certain probability of success to meet their liabilities, would be hastened into insolvency, and give up the contest. They knew very well that an estate under the management of a prudent man, who hoped and strove to meet his liabilities, might turn out to be worth 100c. on the dollar, which, if forced into insolvency, would hardly produce 50c.; and he feared the immediate result of the amendment would be a rush into bankruptcy of men struggling against adverse circumstances during this period of depression, and that great evil would result to the mercantile community. Such, at all events, was his view of the case, and, while adhering to the opinion which he entertained, and which, so far as he had an opportunity of observing, had been fortified by the experience of the last two years, if, on the report of the Committee, or at a subsequent stage, a motion could be made similar to the one made two years ago, to strike out this limitation clause altogether, he should certainly feel constrained to vote for it.

Section agreed to.

On Section 22,

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said it was proposed to reduce the time for which labourers or operators employed by an insolvent could rank as privileged creditors. Many classes of labourers, those engaged in the lumber trade, for instance, were engaged for periods varying from six to twelve months, and, beyond some small advances, did not receive any payment for the time. It would be a great injury to those parties to reduce the period.

Mr. GUTHRIE said in many instances clerks of insolvents could be utilized by the assignees, at a great saving to the estates, and he suggested the insertion of a clause to give some discretion to those officials in this regard.

Mr. BLAKE said there was great force in the suggestion, and he would consider it.

Section agreed to.

On Section 23,

Mr. BARTHE said he thought the majority in number should be struck out, leaving only the majority in value. Besides, who, if not the estate, was to pay the costs? The Bill was not clear on that point.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not propose to alter what had always been, in all the Acts since 1864, the general principle of governing the meetings—the joint majority in number and value. If, however, the law was to be modified, the modification which his hon. friend suggested would be the proper one. Cases had occurred where rival assignees, fighting for the control of the estate, one representing the majority in number and the other in value, had run up expenses against an estate of $2,000 or $3,000; but it would not be a less misfortune to the estate if the worst of those parties had been appointed assignee. If the mass of creditors understood that such a question must be decided by the Judge, and that the parties bringing the litigation must bear the costs, two good results must follow: First, that the mass of the creditors in number and value would seek more earnestly than they now did for an agreement; and, secondly, that when a controversy did take place it would not proceed quite so keenly or expensively when the parties knew the money had to come out of their own pockets, instead of out of the unfortunate estate.

Mr. MITCHELL said there was another evil which arose out of the law. Like the wreckers on the Cornish coast, who decoyed ships in distress on shore in order that they might pillage them, there was a certain class of men who, when they saw houses in difficulty, aggravated in every way the difficulty and precipitated the stoppage of the firms by purchasing debts and forcing them into insolvency.

Mr. BARTHE said the difficulty he had suggested might not only happen in the choice of an assignee, but in the settlement of the whole estate.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE.

On Section 30,

Mr. GOUDGE said Section 83 of the present Act was inoperative, as regarded the Province of Nova Scotia. It had been decided by the Judges that it was not the issuing but the recording of a judgment that gave it effect. He proposed to add the following proviso:—

“ Provided always that in such of the Provinces when by the laws thereof judgment of Courts of Record may be recorded against lands, such judgments so recorded shall not be considered as a lien on the said lands, if recorded within thirty days before a Writ of Attachment has been issued or an Assignment has been made.”

Mr. BLAKE said he was afraid he was unable to adopt his hon. friend's proposal. He would be glad, however, if he would place it as a notice of motion, so that the House might have an opportunity of considering it. When he himself had attempted to introduce a similar proposition, he had to withdraw it, on account of the alleged invasion of the civil law of Quebec.

Mr. BABY said he did not know that the proposed amendment, just introduced, did infringe upon the law of the Province of Quebec, and he saw no difficulty in the way of its being adopted.

Mr. GOUDGE said he had consulted the Quebec members on the subject, and they had suggested this amendment as a solution of the difficulty. The law, as it stood, was really a fruitful source of insolvencies.

Mr. PALMER said he agreed with the amendment proposed. Until he looked into the law, he had supposed that the provision existed, but he supposed it had been overlooked.

Section agreed to.

On Section 35,

Mr. PALMER said he thought this section ought to be extended, as its provisions were not large enough for the purposes intended, and he thought it might be amended so as to make it more effectual. There were cases in which the Judge would necessarily make an order for the payment of money other than the costs, but there was no means of enforcing this order. Section 125 authorized imprisonment, but a man might be imprisoned and yet no money could be obtained from him. He would suggest an amendment that, in all cases where costs or other sums of money were ordered by the Court or adjudged to be paid, the same proceedings, as near as might be, should be taken for the collection of such sums of money and costs as if the order were payable under such judgment.

Mr. BLAKE accepted the amendment.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendments read the first time.

Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of the amendments.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) moved in amendment:

"That the said amendments be not now read the second time, but that the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to strike out the 15th section of the Bill."

Mr. YOUNG said, when the Bill was brought before the House two or three years ago, his impression was that it was not desirable to fix too high a limit on which the discharge could be obtained. But he was of the opinion that considerable evils had manifested themselves in the working of the Act, and there was a very strong feeling that discharges could be far too easily obtained, and that there should be some further restriction. He would be disposed to leave the limit at 33½c. if there could be sufficient safeguards under this rule, but he was satisfied that these could not be obtained, and, therefore, he was in favour of 50c. in the dollar being imposed. He thought an altogether exaggerated view had been taken of the restricted character of this clause. It was known that under the present system nearly all the persons who had assigned had had their discharge agreed to by the creditors, and there would be the same effect if the proposed clause were adopted. It would be found that, where a man had managed his affairs in anything like a proper manner, there would be no difficulty in his obtaining his discharge. But it placed in the hands of the creditors the power, in cases of individuals seeking and insisting on their discharges, against whom objection was entertained on the ground that they had not managed their business properly, to withhold their discharge until they had paid fifty cents on the dollar. Many of the arguments which had been adduced against the clause were very much beside the mark. Many hon. members who were opposed to any Insolvent Law objected to the provision for fifty cents, preferring that the amount should remain at 33½c. That was a very inconsistent position; they wished to obtain the whole loaf, but, when they could not obtain it, they insisted on having one-third instead of one-half. Again, they had the argument adduced by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), who had submitted imaginary cases of great hardships, where individuals who had been perfectly honest had been unable to pay fifty cents on the dollar. Other hon. members had referred to persons losing heavily by fire and dealings with commission houses, and had pointed out that owing to misfortunes the traders might have been unable to pay the amount stated in the Bill. He wished any hon. member to specify a single case of persons suffering losses of that character who had been refused a discharge by their creditors. He did not think a single instance could be adduced; it was an imaginary danger that was not likely to occur; in fact, the evil lay entirely in the opposite direction; discharges had been obtained by debtors much too easily instead of creditors being too strict. He could not concur in the argument brought forward by the hon. member for South Ontario, to the effect that a trader who was able to pay \$1.50 on the dollar would go into insolvency lest he might be unable at a later period to pay a sufficient dividend to obtain his discharge. That danger also was a purely imaginary one. One of the evils which had grown up under the law was that traders did not make assignments sufficiently early, but continued in business until almost the whole estate had been consumed. Besides, it was not an agreeable matter to enter into insolvency. He believed the clause proposed would have a tendency to compel traders to make assignments as soon as they were unable to pay 100c. on the dollar, and in that respect it would act to the advancement of the public interest. He was of opinion that certain evils had arisen under the operation of the Insolvent Act, that the tendency of late had been to grant insolvents their discharges much too easily, that a very strong feeling prevailed throughout the country in favour of some check being placed on the present easy manner in which traders were whitewashed and relieved of their liabilities; and, believing the proposal of the hon. the Minister of Justice was brought forward with the object of preventing that, he would give it his support on the present occasion. If it had been possible to introduce other checks, he would have preferred that the dividends should have remained at 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ , but that seemed impossible and therefore he supported the present proposal as one which would tend to the public good. At all events, they should give it a trial. Every hon. member acquainted with the business of the country would admit that very considerable evils had been developed under the working of the Insolvent Law during the past two or three years, and the action of the Government was worthy of the support of the members of the House.

Mr. WORKMAN said he hoped the section would be retained in the Bill, because he knew the sentiments of a large portion of the commercial community of Lower Canada, and especially of the large cities, to be decidedly in favour of the proposal. Not that they wished to impose upon the honest debtor restrictions which would be injurious to him, but it was their desire that the honest creditor also should be treated with justice and have an opportunity to obtain fair play and honest dealing under the Act which he had not received heretofore. Much had been said about the poor, honest and unfortunate debtor, but not a word about the poor creditor. The creditors were the persons, however, who severely suffered; indeed, who were victimized. Where one honest debtor was refused his discharge, one thousand honest creditors were cheated out of money by dishonest debtors. Such had been his experience, and while he had attended many meetings of creditors he had never yet found a case—though he had probably had as much experience as any hon. member—when an honest debtor made a straightforward statement of his affairs when he was not treated with the greatest consideration and his discharge granted, even though he did not pay five cents on the dollar. He had also seen dishonest debtors who had concealed large portions of their assets and defrauded their creditors, who could not be reached under the Act, or justice obtained. There was a spirit abroad in this country which operated as it were dishonestly, and it was tingeing the whole commercial character of the people and would, if it continued, ruin it. A stringent clause of the nature of that under discussion was, therefore, absolutely necessary, not for the purpose of punishing the honest debtor, but for the purpose of enabling the creditors to obtain all the assets possible out of the debtor's estate. The clause did not stop the creditors from granting a discharge; it merely prevented the Judge granting a discharge to an insolvent debtor who had not paid as much dividend as his assets would warrant, and in 99 cases out of 100 the creditors would grant the discharge if the debtors were entitled to it. He hoped, therefore, that the good sense of the House would retain the clause in the Bill, because, as the law had worked for the past two years, it had almost demoralized the commercial community of this country. If they could not obtain some stringent clause of the nature of that proposed, they had better sweep the Act from the Statute-book.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; the House had better sweep it off.

Mr. WORKMAN said he wanted to give a fair opportunity to work the Insolvent Act under the amendments proposed, because they were very important and to the point, and they would be a great improvement on the law as it heretofore existed. He would, therefore, vote to retain the clause in the Bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL said the Insolvent Law was originally intended for the benefit of the poor but honest debtor. As it stood to-day, and under the present Bill, it was intended for the benefit of the creditor. The new machinery created under the Insolvent Law enabled the creditors to institute summary proceedings to seize the property of a debtor, and, while informing him that they had stopped his business and speculations, to tell him he must pay a certain amount of dividend. The original intention was to grant a discharge to any business man who had embarked in business and, through misfortune, had become insolvent. That was done on the principle of public policy. The country had an interest in the industry and work of its people, and it would be a great misfortune if men of ability and experience should be dependent upon the creditors for remaining in business. The law, therefore, was intended to remove such persons from that position. It required that the honesty of the debtor should be proved before the Court. The hon. member for Centre Toronto had spoken about inability, extravagance and fraud on the part of insolvent traders. The question of fraud, however, did not arise, because they supposed that a Judge, whenever fraud was proved, would refuse to grant the bankrupt his discharge. In regard to incompetency they could not blame every trader for not being endowed with the commercial common sense, ability and ingenuity of the hon. member for Centre Toronto. If there were not incompetent men, that hon. member would not be so competent. One was dependent on the other; therefore, competency and incompetency were correlative terms. The present Bill had two objects. Its first and principal object was the relief of the honest and unfortunate debtor, which was the basis on which all Insolvent Laws in England or this country were based. The other object was that, while endeavouring to relieve the debtor, it, at the same time, placed a new power in the hands of the creditors for their protection. The creditors obtained a power which they did not possess under any other law to seize the property of a debtor without taking the preliminary steps which a creditor, without the Insolvent Act, would have to adopt if he entered a Court of Law, viz: to give the debtor the opportunity of defending himself, to establish the claim without a doubt, to obtain the judgment of the Court, and execution by the aid of the sheriff. Instead of compelling the usual proceedings to be taken, the Act gave the creditors the power to at once seize upon the property of the debtor, though he might be engaged in a speculation which might prove a fortune. The proposed clause gave an extraordinary and almost dangerous power to creditors. Yet, the House was told that, while this power was conceded to creditors, the debtors should receive no benefit. There were many men engaged largely in business to-day who, if forced into bankruptcy would not be able to pay more than 25c. on the dollar. He knew of estates of persons who had been engaged largely in business which could not be realized by the administrator, and where the goods had been compelled to be taken from Cape Breton to Halifax and sacrificed for a small sum. If a trader, who possessed great ability and business tact, went into insolvency, his estate would prove as unsaleable as that of an estate sold by the Court of Probate. The present Bill was unfair and one-sided and was framed entirely in the interests of the creditors. He would be prepared to see the Bill thrown out rather than it should be emasculated by the 50c. clause being inserted.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he wished to place himself right before the House. He had stated that he would support the hon. Minister of Justice in regard to the 50c. clause, and he thought by doing so it would be the means of throwing out the Bill altogether. If the Bill were enforced next year that clause would be killed. When laws were passed by Parliament, they should be carried out. The Insolvent Law under which every insolvent had to pay 33 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. on the dollar had been in force two years, and yet it appeared from the returns that the average dividends amounted to only 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. and they had therefore not been carried out. He thought the Bill submitted by the hon. the Minister of Justice should be withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was afraid that the proposition of the hon.

the Minister of Justice would bear severely upon the charitable institutions of the country. He had attended some meetings organized for charitable purposes and had seen gentlemen come forward and hand over subscriptions of \$100 to \$200, \$500 or \$1,000, and felt quite ashamed on handing over his five or ten dollars. He not unfrequently found after a few months or a year that those large subscriptions had been paid by those gentlemen out of the pockets of their creditors, and he was very much afraid that in many instances at the moment of paying them they were very well aware that their creditors would have to meet the obligations. It was certainly not asking too much from the House that the amount of dividend should be placed at 50c. instead of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ c. There was no doubt that a man having honest intents would always be leniently dealt with, but the honest creditor ought to be as much protected as the honest debtor. The clause did not bear unnecessarily severely upon the debtor. He would support the clause submitted by the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said the amendment required that a debtor should pay a certain amount of dividend in order to obtain his discharge. While he thought the amount should not be placed so high as 50c., he was not disposed to say there should be no limitation. He therefore moved in amendment to the said proposed amendment:

"That all the words after the word 'the' in the last line of the said amendment where it occurs the first time, be struck out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—14th and 15th Sections of the Bill."

Mr. TUPPER said he regretted he was not present when the Bill was submitted to the House for the second reading, but he wished to take the present opportunity to refer to two or three matters connected with the Bill. He would address himself first to the clause under the consideration of the House. He thought they had some right to complain that the hon. the Minister of Justice in proposing so substantial and important a change in the Bill should not have adduced some reasons for the amendments he proposed, and offered some explanations to the House of the remarkable changes that had taken place in his own views. There was perhaps no measure ever submitted to Parliament that had obtained inside of the House and outside of it, from the great commercial bodies and leading business men of the country, the same amount of attention and consideration as the present Bill. It was well known that for several years it was a matter of keen controversy and discussion in the House as to whether the country should have an Insolvent Law or not. The late Government, by the assistance of some members of the Opposition were able to retain the law on the Statute-book, pledging themselves to the House that they would endeavour to improve the measure so as to make it as acceptable to the country as possible. With that object in view, they addressed themselves to the Boards of Trade and the commercial men in the country and invited their co-operation and assistance, and, as was well known, no subject ever before Parliament had received more patient, more careful and more exhaustive consideration from that great commercial organization, the Dominion Board of Trade, than had this very question. More than that, they appointed gentlemen to act as a committee to assist the Government and the Committee of the House, after a most patient and laborious investigation, to mature the measure and present it to the House in as complete a form as possible. He gave the present Government great credit for the importance they had attached to this question and for the care they had taken in submitting the measure to the House in as perfect a shape as was possible. He was not surprised that this was the case, since the hon. member for Prince Edward told them that the number of insolvencies during the past year exceeded seventeen hundred, and that the amount of indebtedness exceeded twenty-five millions of dollars, and also that the amount of indebtedness and the number of insolvencies had about doubled since 1873. The House would understand, under these circumstances, that it would be difficulty to approach a question of greater moment or importance than the present one. Hon. gentlemen opposite would probably recollect that, on the occasion when the Bill was presented to the House, he steadily supported, from the beginning to the end, the Government; and he believed that, in many instances, he voted against the great bulk of the party with which he ordinarily co-operated in that House. He gave the Government a most earnest and hearty support on the grounds he had already mentioned; and he did think that, although the Minister of Justice was not, he believed, responsible for the passage of that measure—not being at the time on the Treasury Benches—the hon. gentleman, when asking the House to go back on that legislation, and make a most important and fundamental change in it, was bound, in justice to his own friends and supporters in the House, who assisted the Administration, whether on one side of the House or the other, to put that law on the Statute-book, to give them some reason for the fundamental and important change proposed. There was another reason why it was doubly incumbent on the Minister of Justice to make these explanations. The hon. gentleman had to justify himself. He had supported the First Minister and the late Minister of Justice in carrying that measure through the House, against the opposition of the hon. member himself, with relation to this very clause. The hon. gentleman then supported a motion made by his hon. friend from Stanstead, who had avowed his hostility to the Insolvency Law altogether. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) had voted against the Government on this very clause—not because he wanted to raise the 33c. to 50c., but because he desired to reduce it from 33c. to 10c. Under these circumstances, the House deserved an explanation why the hon. gentleman proposed to invade the principles of the law, which was not settled without a good deal of discussion and in opposition to which the Minister of Justice had formerly arrayed himself. The hon. gentleman's views seemed to have undergone a complete change since he had opposed the 33c. clause because it was too oppressive to the debtor. What had made the hon. gentleman less the friend of the great mass of people whose interests were to be brought under consideration with relation to this measure? What had transferred the affections and confidence and support of the hon. gentleman to a most important class of the community, but to a class which, at the same time, was wealthy enough and powerful enough to protect their own interests against the persons who would be affected by the Bill? The hon. gentleman had objected to the 33c. clause because, he said, it, with the other provisions of the Bill, were not satisfactory, and that, when they did not give to the debtor the opportunity of going into insolvency, the House ought to be very careful how they imposed a barrier against the discharge of the honest debtor. He (Mr. Tupper) sustained the Government at the time, because he felt the 33c. clause did not impose an insuperable barrier against the honest debtor getting his discharge. If he was not able to follow the Minister of Justice in the great and oppressive charge at present proposed, with relation to the great mass of people of whom, as the hon. member for Prince Edward had stated, nearly two thousand had been compelled in the unfortunate condition of the country to go into insolvency last year, it was because of its oppressive nature. Was this the time, when the number of insolvencies had doubled within three years, and the amount of indebtedness of insolvents had increased from a little over $12,000,000 to $25,000,000, to introduce more stringent and more oppressive legislation? The hon. member for Chateauguay had covered the whole ground when he stated that the effect of the measure would be to drive people into insolvency, who would not otherwise be obliged to go into it at all. The terror this clause would inspire would have such an effect, and, instead of making efforts, which in the great majority of cases would be successful, to extricate themselves from the difficulties in which the unfortunate condition of the country had involved them, they would, under the influences of this amended Bill as now proposed, sink down hopelessly and helplessly, and go to swell the great mass of insolvencies, which was now, in his opinion, sufficiently large. He thought that, in the absence of any indication on the part of the commercial men of this country, or commercial bodies, or any parties entitled to claim and command their respect in this relation, the First Minister ought to remember the support and assistance he had received from both sides of the House, and ought not to allow the Bill to be unnecessarily changed and altered without any show or reason, or any ground being given to the House why so great an alteration should be made in it as was proposed. He also wished to call the attention of the First Minister to a statement he (Mr. Mackenzie) had made with regard to the Insolvency Law at the time when he had had the pleasure of meeting that hon. gentleman before the electors of South Ontario at Whitby. The hon. gentleman then said, in reply to his own statement that the Government had grasped all the patronage comprised in the appointment of official assignees: "The next charge was that we monopolized a great deal of this patronage by our legislation, and that, by enacting a new Insolvency Law, which placed in our hands the appointment of official assignees we took the patronage into our own hands. We did so, and that with the consent of Dr. Tupper and of every member of the House. There was all but a universal feeling that the Government were the best persons to appoint official assignees which were previously elected by Boards of Trade." He would now turn to the discussion, and he would invite the First Minister's attention to the fact that the late Minister of Justice, in introducing this Bill to the House, proved conclusively that there was not a general feeling in favour, as far as the Committee were concerned, of having the Government appoint official assignees. He desired to draw the attention of the First Minister to the fact that in his judgment the Government had scarcely kept faith with the declaration which they made to the House when the House gave them power to appoint official assignees. He would quote from Hansard:—"Hon. Mr. Fournier moved the House into a Committee to consider the Insolvency

Bill. He said the Select Committee, to which the Bill was referred, had held numerous sittings and had devoted much attention to it. With respect to the appointment of official assignees, the intention of the Government in taking to itself the power to appoint those officers was, as far as might be in the public interest, to appoint to these offices sheriffs, who, he believed, would be acceptable as such officials." He would like to ask the First Minister if the pledge, not implied but expressed here, had been kept. Had good faith been kept with the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, in the appointment of sheriffs as official assignees? He thought it must be admitted that this had not been done. The late Minister of Justice also said: "When the Bill was in Committee, hon. members had stated that, if it was the intention of the Government to appoint sheriffs, their principal objection to the Government having this power would be removed." So, it appeared, there was not a general desire that the Government should appoint the official assignees, but there was a general desire that, if they took these appointments into their own hand, they should confine them to sheriffs. He found that, so far from every member of the House having concurred in it, the hon. member for St. John had opposed it most strenuously, and made a motion in opposition to it; and Mr. Jones (Leeds) said: "If the Government insisted on pressing this clause, of course it would be carried. He moved, in amendment, that the 27th clause should be struck out, and that the sheriff be official assignee within his county or district." This amendment was lost on a division. Mr. Palmer said: "He did not agree with the hon. member for Shefford, but held that these appointments were of considerable importance. He believed Boards of Trade were more likely to make good selections than the Government, because it was likely the fruits of bad management would come out of their own pockets. Many of the members of the Boards of Trade in such instances being interested as creditors, it was of vast importance that a person interested in the particular district in which insolvency occurred should be appointed, and none were better fitted to make such appointments than Boards of Trade. He, therefore, moved in amendment to the 27th clause—"that the person shall be appointed in every county or district, in which the Court is held, by the Board of Trade in such county and district or the nearest to such county or district, who shall reside in such county or district to act as assignee for such county or district." This amendment was lost on a division and the clause passed. He invited the attention of the Premier to these facts, not because he made the statement in question with a view to mislead, but to show the hon. gentleman that he was not accurate in making that statement. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would feel it was due to the House, when he asked the supporters of the Government to make this important and oppressive change in the law, to give some reason why the change was demanded, and to state what necessity existed for it; and to explain what he thought the House was entitled to know—what circumstances had led to such a total and complete revolution in the sentiments which the hon. gentleman held and advocated and voted for when this Bill was formerly under the consideration of the House.

Mr. BLAKE said he perfectly agreed that it was the duty of the Minister who was charged with the introduction of this measure to give to the House the reasons why it was proposed; and also that the House should not be asked to adopt a measure without reasons and explanations being given for it. On the 26th of February, anterior even to the introduction of the measure, and during the discussion of the motion for the second reading of a Bill proposed by the hon. member for Richelieu, and in conformity with the pledge he had heretofore given to the House, he gave his reasons in the fullest manner in this relation. He had before that stated, with reference to a suggestion that the debate should be adjourned, that it was probably the intention of the Government to submit a substantial amendment besides some minor amendments; and that it was his desire that the House should be in possession of that substantial amendment before disposing of the Bill of the hon. member for Richelieu. The hon. member for Kingston then acceded to the reasonableness of that view. In the course of the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Barthe), the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) called his attention to the fact, and asked him to make that announcement. As soon afterwards as possible, he rose, and, at some length, expressed his views. He had then prepared the amendment, which now stood as the 15th clause in the Bill, not merely in substance, but also in form. He stated it fully, read it to the House, and gave his reasons, which occurred to him then as well as now, in support of it. He had no right to expect that the hon. member for Cumberland would have at the time listened to his remarks or remember his words, but if the hon. member would refer to pages 291, 292, 293 and 294 of the Official Report, he would find a tolerably full statement of his reasons for introducing this very clause, and the clause itself, with its three conditions, stated verbatim. He also pointed out on that occasion what his views had been with reference to the Act of 1875; that he formerly entertained the opinion that it was inconsistent with the principle of the law which allowed no opportunity to debtor to go into insolvency to insist upon a certain minimum being paid by the estate as a condition of discharge; and that he still retained the views which the hon. member for Chateauguay had stated, with tolerable accuracy, with regard to what occurred in that debate, with the slight exception that, instead of the hon. member dividing with him, he (Mr. Holton) divided against him.

Mr. HOLTON: No, no.

Mr. BLAKE: Yes. The division list was there and the hon. member would find his name among the majority. The hon. member's views nevertheless concurred with his own no doubt as stated in the debate. He still felt that difficulty. He had pointed out they were proposing to the House to violate a principle which the House had very decisively affirmed on that occasion: there should not be a voluntary assignment, he conceived, and an alternative had been devised to get rid of that injustice to the debtor, which had induced him to oppose in the former law a provision for a compulsory minimum. That provision was the 3rd subsection which gave to the debtor the opportunity he always had, of exemption from this compulsory minimum. It seemed to him perfectly logical and consistent. His difficulty was that enforcing a minimum under all circumstances did not allow the debtor to go into insolvency. He did not propose that, but that it should be enforced under the circumstances stated in the 15th clause. Among the exceptions to the enforcement of the minimum was the case in which the creditors, being made aware of the fact that the debtor was unable to pay 20s. to the pound, should be able to put him in liquidation. The bare statement of that proposition was quite sufficient to enable him to escape from the charge of inconsistency preferred against him by the hon. members for Chateauguay and Cumberland. He found a sort of coalition on this occasion between those in the House opposed to any Insolvent Law and those who thought there ought to be one of a more liberal character. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and others declared that the Insolvent Law should be swept away, and that there should be no provision either for the speedy realization of the estates of embarrassed debtors in favour of creditors, or for the discharge under any circumstances of any debtors unless they paid 20s. in the pound. The argument of this class of persons, although he believed it did not countervail, was still worthy of attention. They claimed that the law was unnecessary because an honest debtor always got his discharge. That was the theory on which a certain and not unimportant body in this House acted with reference to this matter. The 15th clause, he might state, in answer to those hon. gentlemen, did not apply in any case in which a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors consented either to a discharge or a deed of composition; and he appealed to those hon. members to say whether they could fairly object to the clause when they knew that it was operative only when the whole body refused to grant the discharge—when the debtor could not get a majority in number and three-fourths in value to agree to his discharge. The class of cases to which they referred would never occur. But, if it were not so, then an Insolvent Law was wanted, because the honest debtor did not get his discharge which they said he ought to get. His own view was that the honest debtor would not always get his discharge if left to the mercy of his creditors. He believed creditors would occasionally be found—harsh, greedy creditors—who would rightly or wrongly think they had been injured, and that by holding out they would get better terms, who would defeat the unanimous discharge by all the creditors, and therefore defeat any composition, arrangement, or settlement of the estate, which depended upon the general principle, for which all creditors contended, viz., that no one should have an advantage over another. He also thought that there was this measure of truth in the statement of the hon. gentleman who did not believe in the necessity of an Insolvent Law as far as debtors were concerned—that the bulk of creditors dealing with an honest debtor were inclined to, and did as a matter of fact, grant the discharge upon any reasonable terms independent of a dividend, considering only whether the man had been honest in the management of his estate and giving up what remained. If this clause became law he believed that would happen, which had hitherto happened, that the cases in which a debtor could not get the consent of the required number and value of creditors would be very few, and would be confined to those cases in which there was either proved or such well-grounded suspicion of fraud and dishonesty as would induce the creditors to refuse the discharge. What was the working of the present law? It was this: that, owing to the mode in which the 33c. clause had been carried out, owing to its having practically become nugatory, creditors almost invariably consented, and in the few cases in which they refused the Judge acted upon principles of very great lenity to the debtor, and used his discretionary power in his favour. It would, therefore, appear that the clause which the hon. member for North Renfrew wanted to retain on the Statute-book was a nugatory clause. Two years' experience had shown that the average dividend did not come up to 33 per cent., and yet they did not hear of a case in which a discharge had been refused. It was said by another party of men, who were favourable to an Insolvent Law, that the discharge ought to be of the most liberal character. They were told by them that the law was for the benefit of the poor debtor, and that it was being perverted into a law for the rich creditor. The law was neither for the poor debtor nor the rich creditor. It was a law founded, however defectively it might work, upon a general principle of justice, which was invariably recognized, that it was expedient, and in commercial countries almost necessary, that there should be a speedy means of obtaining, by the mass of the creditors, of the property of the debtor unable to pay 20s. to the pound, and of its realization and distribution, pro rata, among those creditors. That was the object of an Insolvent Law in the first instance, and, following upon that, that it was not the right of the poor debtor but in the interest of the public that he should not—after the property had been taken from him, after it had been distributed, after his affairs had been examined, and after it had been found he had not been guilty of any fraud or misconduct—that he should not, as a rule, in the bulk of cases, be left stripped of his property, without the opportunity or means of earning a livelihood in the country to which he belonged, or starting afresh. It was not to his mind the right of the poor debtor at all, it was the public interest which induced the discharge of the debtor. But those men who were unable to pay 20s. in the pound, whose whole estate was necessary to the satisfaction of their debts, had no right to complain if such restrictions should be put upon their discharge as the public good should be found to require. In regard to those who favoured an Insolvent Law, but who said that the debtor ought to be liberally treated, he appealed first of all to the operation of the law, and asked whether discharges had not been granted altogether too freely. He asked whether the difficulty was not with reference to the extravagantly dishonest and imprudent debtor, who contracted debts long after he ought to have ceased, and the debtor who laboured under a well-founded suspicion that he had not acted rightly, and not with the honest one; and yet there was not one out of five hundred but obtained his discharge. The country at large was dismayed, not because, when a man was unable to pay 20s. in the pound, his assets were taken and divided among his creditors, and, being honest, he got his discharge, but because there was a suspicion, having too much foundation, that the debtors were, in many cases, not honest, and, notwithstanding that, it was impossible to prevent discharges. What was proposed? They did not propose to deal with the case of the honest debtor practically, but with that small residuum of cases in which the creditors, by a majority in number and value, declined to grant the discharge—that small residuum of cases which came before the Judge. By giving the Judge power to deal with that small residuum, and grant the discharge under certain conditions, they might practically exclude all going into the class of cases which had been commented upon. Hon. gentlemen had referred to the unfairness which would be done if the 50 per cent. minimum were enacted in cases where property had been suddenly destroyed by storm or fire. Did those gentlemen who contended that the honest debtor should be dealt with liberally—he would not say liberally, but with common fairness—say that those extreme and exceptional cases of calamity, in which it was clear as the noonday that it was the case of an honest debtor who, by some unforeseen misfortune, not by negligence or imprudence, but by unavoidable misfortune, had been crippled in his business, would be harshly dealt with? The argument was preposterous. That was the very class of cases, of all cases which could be pointed out, in which this House, considering the interests of the debtor, could depend upon the ordinary motives of humanity; and yet it was set up as a bugbear to frighten persons in regard to this clause. In its practical operation the clause would never apply to that class. But, because of that phantom condition, it was proposed to take away what seemed to be a salutary provision to restrain the too frequent discharge in certain cases. With reference to the dividend, whether it was 30, 50, or 60 per cent., the circumstances of the country might to some extent be taken into consideration; but he did not think that those hon. gentlemen, who were peculiarly fond of referring to the "brutal and atrocious" principle, which principle prevailed in England for the discharge of debtors, had been successful in their line of argument. In England at present the Judge could not grant the discharge unless there was a dividend of 50 per cent. or a resolution of the majority of the creditors to the effect that the deficiency had been occasioned by circumstances over which the debtor had no control. He did not propose to ask the creditors to say any such thing, or to express any opinion whether the debtor was responsible or not. If they said by a majority in number and value the debtor should have his discharge, this clause did not apply, and the Judge proceeded without reference to it. It was only if the creditors said "No," and the case came up without any consent on their part that the Judge was called upon to deal with it. When he had pointed out that only a small number of cases were affected by this section at all, he had taken away from the objections the plausibility which made it appear that there might be hardships. He had left only the case in which there might be some grounds for supposing in the minds of the creditors that there was dishonesty, and in which the Judge found that a dividend of not less than 50c. ought to be paid. If hon. gentlemen had said that they thought this too much, that the limit ought to be 40c., he could have understood the argument, although he must confess that some of the reasoning he had heard that day with reference to the condition of assets had quite astonished him. It was actually said that a man might be solvent, and yet, when his solvency was put to the only test that could be made, namely, the realization, only 30c. or 40c. on the dollar were realized. He could understand a man who called himself solvent, and brought forward his accounts, and his odds and ends of stock, which he ought to know would be depreciated every year he kept them; who said that he had $6,000 of book debts and $6,000 of stock, and who said he was worth $12,000, taking all at par, while at the same time he owed $12,000; but such a man ought not to be in business. He ought to know that his books would be getting worse and worse every month, and that his stock would not be worth what it was when he purchased it. Such a man who said he had 100c. on the dollar did so against the experience of every storekeeper in the country, and it was absurd to say that such a man was solvent to all intents and purposes. It was said that this clause would have the effect of hurrying people into insolvency, but the rate of dividend, 22½c. on the dollar, which was paid on the whole insolvencies of the year, was sufficient answer to this. It was possible, under the circumstances he had just instanced, that a debtor might shift himself out of a difficulty with one set on to another set of creditors, but his position would only be getting worse. He did not think merchants would be found going into insolvency simply because of this clause. But he hoped, and believed, that its effect would be that it would make some reckless men who now went into insolvency for the purpose of evading the just claims of their creditors, use all their energies and make them cautious in business, so that their creditors might at least have something proportionate to what was due.

Mr. HOLTON said he did not rise for the purpose of protracting the debate, but simply to correct the inaccuracies which the hon. the Minister of Justice had inadvertently fallen into, in respect to a few observations which he (Mr. Holton) had the honour of presenting to the Committee a short time ago. That hon. gentleman said he reproached him with inconsistency in proposing now a limitation, whereas a few years ago he opposed any such limitation, and that he agreed with him (Mr. Blake) then, but disagreed with him now. He did not reproach the hon. gentleman with inconsistency. He was careful to say that no doubt he had had representations made to him to change his opinion, and that it was not a question of principle, but one of expediency. He himself did not share the change of opinion which the hon. gentleman had undergone, and he was bound to say that the eloquent, able and argumentative speech to which the House had just listened, had failed to convince him that the position which he had occupied two years ago and which he now occupied was unsound. He had retained his opinion, but the hon. the Minister of Justice had changed his, for sufficient reasons, no doubt. If that hon. gentleman was satisfied that the change in the law proposed was a judicious one, he would then be liable to reproach, if, out of regard to personal consistency, he refused to advance the change. The hon. gentleman had said that, although he agreed with him in the debate when the Bill was before the House two years ago, he had voted against him when the division came. Here was a manifest error, as the hon. gentleman would see if he would refer to the Journals of 25th March, 1875, which he held in his hand. It was there stated :

"Mr. Colby moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Devlin: That all the words after 'now' to the end of the question, be left out, and the words 'recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of leaving out the fifty-eighth clause, which makes it a condition that if the dividend is less than 33 per cent. discharge may be refused', inserted instead thereof."

The question being put upon the amendment, the House divided, and it passed in the negative. There was no record of the votes, the Government being in a small majority, however. The hon. gentleman and he voted together. But it was subsequently that

"Mr. Colby moved, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Devlin: That all the words after 'now' to the end of the question be left out, and the words 'recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend the fifty-eighth section by striking out 33 cents and inserting 10 cents in place thereof, inserted instead thereof."

It was for this motion that the hon. the Minister of Justice voted, while he himself voted against it. That latter motion affirmed a limitation; a limitation which he at the time thought absurd. But he had previously voted with the hon. gentleman against any limitation whatever. Having merely risen to correct these inaccuracies, he would make no further observations.

Mr. COLBY said it would appear that the hon. the Minister of Justice believed that the happiest condition a man or community could be in was that of insolvency. He had given as many facilities for taking this step, both to the debtor and creditor, as possible. The hon. gentleman favoured voluntary assignments, but he knew the House was opposed to him. Nevertheless, he tried to attain his object indirectly. The result of the Bill would be that timid men, who otherwise would endeavour to get through their difficulties, might go into insolvency as the only chance of getting their discharge. But the Bill would do no good to that determined set of men, who would not yield to difficulties until they were compelled. The hon. the Minister of Justice could not deny the position which he had so often taken: that it was absurd to compel a man to pay any particular sum before he could get his discharge when his property and everything belonging to him had been taken from him without his consent. The subsection objected to would be wholly inoperative except to drive timid men into insolvency; and it would have a tendency to aggravate the difficulties of this distressed period.

Question put on the main motion.

Mr. BARTHE moved in amendment:

“That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, in order that a clause may be added, declaring that this Bill, and the Acts thereby amended, shall remain in force until the end of the next Session of Parliament. and no longer.”

Mr. BLAKE said he thought there was one practical objection to this motion. Of course it was in the power of Parliament during the whole of next Session to repeal the measure at any time. If they were to put upon the Statute-book to-day a provision of this description, the probable result would be that these “timid debtors,” of whom they had heard so much awhile ago as being about to be driven into insolvency, would be driven in large numbers by the apprehension that the Act would terminate at the end of next Session. He did not see that any good would result from this provision, while the evil would.

Mr. BARTHE said, when he proposed the Bill for the repeal of the Act, many hon. members voted against it, because, they said, the remedy was too violent and would be worse than the present evil, so he thought, by giving a year's fair trial, this amendment would meet their objections. A remarkable feature of the discussion when the repeal was proposed was that all the hon. members admitted that the law worked badly, but still, under present circumstances, they hesitated to vote for its repeal in consequence of the depression of business.

Mr. PALMER said if this amendment passed it would require the action of Parliament to further continue the law, and he thought after the expiration of the year there would not be much danger of that, but, if nothing were done this Session, the matter would have to be brought up again next year, and the country would have no opportunity of knowing whether it would be continued or not. If the working of the law should be beneficial, it would be open to Parliament to continue it.

EMPLOYMENT OF PRISONERS OUTSIDE JAILS BILL.

[BILL No. 94.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

A DEFECTIVE RETURN.

REMARKS.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he rose to call the attention of the House to a matter of some importance to himself and his section of the country, and he thought, also, to the House and to the country generally. On the 21st February last, an Order of the House was issued for returns in detail of all expenses incurred and moneys expended in the payment of engineers, surveyors and others, for services rendered, as well as for horse-hire, etc., in connection with the surveys of the North

Mr. PALMER.

Branch of the River Sydenham from Forks at Wallaceburgh to the Village of Wilkesport, in the year 1876. The returns were subsequently brought down. He looked over them and found them complete. He returned them to the Clerk, who sent them to the office of Routine and Records, from whence they were sent to the Printing Committee. He procured a copy of the return, and found it incomplete. He went then to the office of Routine and Records, and he found that the most material portion of the return had been abstracted by some party, he could not say by whom. He was informed that this had been the case with another return. He trusted that the Government would see that the portion of the return which had been removed was supplied.

Mr. SPEAKER said the charge seemed to be laid against the officers of his Department rather than anyone else. He regretted that the hon. gentleman had not chosen to speak first to him on the subject. As the matter stood, of course an enquiry would be made, and he hoped he would be successful in finding out what had become of the portion of the papers in question.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he made no charge against any officers of the Department, but certainly some one interested in the return had instigated the abstraction of the material portion of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not conceive who could be interested in this return, which was one of the simplest things imaginable. The hon. gentleman could get a copy of it any day he chose to apply to the Department for it.

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman did not confine his remarks to officers of the House, or of Mr. Speaker's Department. The hon. gentleman stated distinctly that the return was passed from the Clerk of the House to the Printing Committee, and from the Printing Committee to the Office of Routine and Records, so that the loss could have taken place when the return was out of the hands of the officers of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter clearly lay between either the Printing Committee or Mr. Speaker, or Mr. Speaker's officers. If the hon. gentleman knew of any parties who had had any connection with it, let him name them.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he hoped that the hon. gentleman did not mean to imply that any member of the Printing Committee had had anything to do with the abstraction; when the return was in possession of the Committee, it was perfectly safe. Though the hon. member was a member of that Committee, he had not been present when the return was under consideration. They had recommended that it be not printed, and this was the last he ever saw or heard of it.

Mr. STEPHENSON said it was impossible for him to be present at the time of the next meeting of the Printing Committee, as he was a member of another Committee, at which he was then obliged to be present. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) might plead innocent or guilty; he made no charge against the hon. member; yet he stated distinctly and emphatically that the papers had been abstracted by some one.

CUSTOMS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 19.]

(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

THIRD READING.

Order for consideration of amendments made in Committee of the Whole, read.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the only amendment of any consequence was the 10th Section. The hon. member for Kingston had taken exception to it as it stood, and it was now divided into two parts. It was provided that imports must be entered where there was a lawful office of Customs established, but exports might be taken out of the country without going to the very spot where there was a Custom House, provided the entry was made within twenty-four hours. He was not aware of other changes of any consequence.

Amendments read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes before
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 4th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

Mr. McCALLUM asked whether the accountant who assisted at the investigation by the Royal Commissioners into the affairs of the Northern Railway Company of Canada made a report; if so, why said report was not sent down with the other papers relating to said Company, and whether said report would now be submitted to the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An officer was detailed to assist the Commissioners in the way of looking at accounts, but that was simply for the Commissioner's private information. No report was expected from that gentleman, and no report was intended to be presented from him to the Department.

RAILWAY FROM QUEBEC TO LAKE ST. JOHN.

QUESTION.

Mr. CIMON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to accede to the petition of His Grace the Archbishop of Quebec, the Hon. I. Thibaudeau, and Messrs. J. B. Renaud, A. P. Caron, E. Cimon and others, citizens of Quebec, addressed to the hon. the Prime Minister, and praying for assistance from the Government for the building of a railway from Quebec to Lake St. John.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have already stated, two or three weeks ago, that the Government do not intend to put any sum in the Estimates for this purpose.

CANADA CENTRAL EXTENSION.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) moved for a copy of all Orders in Council relating to the Canada Central Extension, and the contract for building that portion of railway.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSFER OF PORTAGE ISLAND.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for all papers and correspondence between the Dominion Government, or Department of Marine and Fisheries, and the British Government or the British Admiralty, or any of its officers, or any party acting for either of the above named authorities, in relation to the transfer of Portage Island, in the Bay of Miramichi, from the jurisdiction of the British Admiralty to the Dominion Government; also, all reports to Council from the Department of Marine and Fisheries in relation to this subject, and Orders of Council thereon. He said he wished for this information in order to explain to a large portion of his constituents the position of the title of this island. It was an island occupying a prominent position in the entrance of the Miramichi Harbour, and around it were several fisheries which gave a good deal of employment to a large number of men. The position of the island prior to the resignation of the late Government was something like this: It was formerly held by the Province of New Brunswick, but was reserved as an Admiralty property as a possible point which might be found necessary for the defence of the country at some future time. The tactics of the present day, however, had made the island so manifestly useless that the Admiralty office frequently expressed a desire to be rid of it, and it was also thought desirable, felt desirable, that the title should be transferred either to the Provincial or the Dominion Government. While he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he opened up correspondence with the British authorities in regard to the transfer, and some months before he left office the matter was put into the hands of the Minister of Justice for New Brunswick, who was instructed to prepare the necessary papers for the transfer. He did not know definitely what had been done from that time to this, and, as the people of his county felt a deep interest in the question, he was anxious to be placed in a position to explain to them the present position of affairs in relation to this question.

Motion agreed to.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) moved for Reports of Engineers and all other correspondence and information in possession of the Government, not yet communicated to the House, having reference to any actual surveys or proposed survey in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Red River westward, south of Lake Manitoba. He said the course that the railway would take was a matter of deep interest to the people of Manitoba. The object of the motion was to find out whether any instrumental survey had been made on the south side of Lake Manitoba so that some idea might be gathered of the advantages to be gained by adopting that route. The country in that neighborhood was of the best description for farming purposes, and there was quite a number of settlements by English and United States immigrants. He would be glad to know what means had been taken to ascertain the facilities which would be offered for railway communication on the south side of Lake Manitoba.

Mr. RYAN said the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) had chosen a very appropriate time to introduce his motion. So far as related to that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railroad between Rat Portage and Selkirk, discussion was useless. Between those two points the line had not only been located, but also put under contract and even partially constructed. Whether or not the best possible location had been made, they could only now recognize the location as a fixed fact. West of Selkirk, however, the case was different. Although the line had been located all the way to the Rocky Mountains, yet no portion of it west of Selkirk had been put under contract, nor had any of it been constructed; so that, if, upon a full consideration of the subject, it was deemed advisable, in the interests of the Dominion, to vary from the line as at present located, they were still in a position to do so. There were several weighty reasons why they should re-consider the location of that portion of the line between Selkirk on the east and the elbow of the North Saskatchewan on the west. One reason was that, since the very full discussion which had taken place in the House upon the subject in the Session of 1875, a very great change had taken place in the minds of leading public men and in public opinion—a change wholly unfavourable to the line as located by the Government. Another reason was that the Manitoba Western Railway Company, having obtained a charter from the Local Legislature, proposed to build a line of railway south of Lake Manitoba, and had applied to the Dominion Government to assist them by a grant of land. In order to know what answer the Government should, in the public interest, make to this application it was necessary to settle the line of the Canadian Pacific between the points indicated. During the discussion of 1875, he had endeavored to treat the question as a national one; but he had failed to convey that impression to the House, since several hon. gentlemen, not at all disposed to be harsh critics, had represented him as speaking from a provincial standpoint. He wished still to view the question in a national light. Although that portion of the line west of the Red River, as at present located, would be of very little, if any, benefit to his constituents, they were prepared, if, upon a full consideration of the question in all its different phases, the present location proved the best calculated to promote the interests of the Dominion, to see the provincial desire waived, and the provincial good made subservient to the national welfare, because the Canadian Pacific Railroad was, beyond doubt, a national and not a provincial road. While he freely admitted so much, on the other hand he contended that the interests of the Province in the matter should not be sacrificed. From Selkirk to the elbow of the North Saskatchewan there appeared to him to be only three practicable routes. The first was the northern or proposed Government route, which, running north-west from Selkirk, left nearly the whole of the Province to the south-west, and crossed Lake Manitoba at the Narrows. This route passed by the north flank of the Riding Mountains and through Fort Pelly. Of the three routes, this was the least beneficial to the Province. The second or middle route would run west from Selkirk, south of Lake Manitoba, and, having reached the south-west extremity of that lake, would turn somewhat abruptly towards the north, and rejoin the Government line near the north-east flank of the Riding Mountains. The third or southern route would, like the middle one, pass south of Lake Manitoba, but, instead of turning abruptly towards the north would keep on towards the west, and, passing by the south of the Riding Mountains, would rejoin the Government line near the elbow of the North Saskatchewan River. During the debate of 1875, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in justifying the selection of the northern route, claimed, 1st, that it was by about thirty miles the shortest possible route; 2nd, that it traversed a better wooded country than any other route; and 3rd, that it would cost very much less to construct than any other route. If these propositions were true, there was an end of the matter, there was no room for discussion, and, however much they might regret it in Manitoba, the northern route would have to be adopted. But he (Mr. Ryan) did not believe these propositions to be true, as to the comparative lengths of the different routes. While he was willing to admit that the northern route was considerably shorter than the middle, he denied that it was shorter than the southern. Of course, he was not an engineer, and was not prepared to give correct statistical information; he could only venture an opinion on the point, an opinion formed from conversations with engineers who had been over the country, and were well qualified to give information. And, indeed, since no actual survey of the southern line had ever been made, it was evident that the Government engineers were in no better position to express an opinion than other engineers, who, like themselves, had walked over the country. Among others, he would mention

Mr. Jarvis, an engineer of acknowledged ability, who had been at one time in the employment of the Government, who gave it as his opinion, after having passed over the southern route, and examined the Government maps, that there would be very little, if any, difference in the comparative lengths of the northern and southern routes. The second proposition, that there was more wood upon the northern than the southern route, was, perhaps, true. But it was beyond doubt that, if there was less wood upon the southern route, it was better located, and more available for railroad purposes. He had recently called the attention of the House to the fact that fifty thousand ties were being now actually got out for the Canadian Pacific Road, not upon the northern line, where it was claimed there was so much wood, but to the south-west of Lake Manitoba, upon the southern route, where wood was alleged to be scarce. There could be no dispute upon the point, if the road was being constructed west of the Red River at once, whether the northern or the southern route were adopted, the ties would come down the Assiniboine River to the Red River, and down the Red River to Selkirk, where they would be taken as required; and these ties would be cut, not upon the northern, but upon, or in the neighbourhood of, the Riding Mountains, on the southern route. As to the third proposition, that the northern route would be the least expensive to construct, he could only state that it was the opinion of Mr. Jarvis and others well qualified to venture an opinion that the expense of construction on the southern would not probably exceed that on the northern route; that, the lines being about equal in length, the heavy expenses which would have to be incurred in bridging the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, and passing through the vast extent of muskeg on the northern route, would equal, or nearly equal, the expenditure necessary upon the southern route at the crossings of the Assiniboine and other streams. Whilst the comparative length and cost of the northern and southern routes were probably not far from equal, the southern had several advantages. It traversed a much better country. The land south of Lake Manitoba was the very garden of the whole North-West, whilst it could not be disputed that very much of the land on the northern route was of inferior quality, and would not probably ever be well settled. That portion between the Narrows of Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipeg was almost entirely one vast muskeg. Whatever difference of climate existed was in favour of the southern route. The northern route was absolutely without settlers, and portions of it would probably always remain unsettled, while the southern route was comparatively well settled, and would, in a couple of years, and even at present, afford a fair local traffic. No one would deny that, if the advantages of the two routes were at all nearly equal, the southern route ought, in justice to the Province of Manitoba, to be adopted. What he thought advisable, and would under the circumstances venture to propose, was that the Government should have an instrumental survey of the southern route made. If, upon such a survey being made, it was found that the advantage much preponderated in favour of the northern route, all things being duly considered, it would have, of course, to be adopted. But, whenever the Government came to the conclusion that the northern route should be adopted, whether with or without a survey of the southern route, it at once became their duty to assist the Manitoba Western with a land grant. As had been frequently asserted in the House, the public lands of a country were the proper sources whence assistance should come to build such roads as were necessary to open up the country. In other Provinces these lands were held by the Local Governments; but the Dominion Government held the public lands in Manitoba and the North-West, and to them, as custodians of these lands, an application had properly been made by the Manitoba Western Railway Company for a land grant to assist the construction of a road to open up all the country south of Lake Manitoba. He hoped the Government would give the application their favourable consideration.

Mr. RYAN.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that very little remained to be said on the subject. He thought that the House would see from the unanimity of feeling expressed by the gentlemen who had preceded him, that there was not much difference of opinion in Manitoba, at least in regard to the route which the Canadian Pacific Railway should take in its passage through the Province of Manitoba. Of course, he felt with his hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Ryan) all the weight of the arguments on the Government side, and admitted, with this hon. gentleman, that, if the assumptions of the Government with regard to the distance and feasibility and character of the country were correct, then the line in the interest of the Dominion, no matter how much the interests of Manitoba were concerned in it, ought to remain as it was; and he also agreed with the hon. gentleman in his opinion that the conclusions at which the Government had arrived had been framed from the reports made at the time when the country was very much less understood than it was at present, and perhaps without having at their command that amount of data this important matter rendered necessary for a proper determination. In the early settlement of the western portion of Manitoba, it was understood by everyone that the Canadian Pacific Railway in its passage through the Province was to pass through the City of Winnipeg, or near that point and south of Lake Manitoba. This was generally understood, and it was laid down on the maps published by one of the Departments—that of Agriculture, he thought—and these were accessible to anyone. Every immigrant that went there, and a great deal of the settlement to the North-West, was determined by the fact which was generally believed, and which was stated in this way to be the case on these maps to which he had referred. In justice to those people who acted on the assumption that the railroad was to pass in this direction, and in justice to the people of the city of Winnipeg, who had large interests, and who had helped to build up a city in the wilderness, and who had made a place which people from all parts of the Dominion might point to with pride and with pleasure as one instance of Canadian enterprise and push, it was due that if further investigation into this matter, and if a trial line to the westward, as his hon. friend from Marquette hinted at and if the reports of any sort, of which his hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Smith) spoke, would assist the Government in determining to change the route, that this step should be taken, which would go far towards satisfying the people in the western portion of Manitoba, who did feel seriously aggrieved at the change of route, which had made the line of the railway pass sixty or seventy miles to the north of them, instead of through the portion which was at first considered to be the most fertile portion of the Province. When the delegation, to which both his hon. friends had referred, was down in Ottawa two years ago, and had an interview with the Premier, the members of it represented the facts very much the same as they had been represented in the House that day by his two hon. friends, and the answer of the Government to the delegation had been what seemed to be, he would admit, quite fair. The Premier said to these gentlemen: "Is it fair for you to expect that, for all future time, to accommodate these interests of which you are the representative, the Government shall cause every passenger, and every pound of freight to traverse a thirty miles longer distance than would otherwise be necessary, simply to accommodate the interests of Winnipeg and the interests of the western portion of the Province?" He would admit at once that this was an answer which could not be refuted; but he had reason to believe, with his hon. friend from Marquette, that since that time information had become general, and it might have reached the Department itself, on which, if they could not change the line to the east, they might at least determine the course of the railroad to the west of Red River. In that way they would, partially at least, satisfy those persons to whom he had alluded. It seemed to him that the Government should take into consideration, before finally deciding upon the route to the west, the propositions which had been made, and which were proposed to be made by the city of Winnipeg. It was a fact, but he did not know whether it had come under the official notice of the Government or not, that a recent meeting had been held in the city of Winnipeg, at which there were represented not only the largest portion of the mercantile class of the place, but also its official dignitaries and the members of the Local Government, who were unanimous in the expression of the opinion that it would be advisable, if such a course would decide the action of the Government, to pay largely towards any extra cost that might be imposed, touching the works under construction, in order to enable the change of route they so much desired to be made. He hoped that, before any contract was given for the west and any further steps were taken in that direction, either on the telegraph or railway line, other surveys would be made in the country to the south of Lake Manitoba to see whether any engineering difficulty existed, and whether the difficulty as to the thirty extra miles could be overcome. If they stretched the objective points from Rat Portage to Edmonton, and an objective point to the west nearer than Edmonton, by running south of the Riding Mountains, as his hon. friend from Marquette asserted, he believed there would be not only not a difference of thirty miles in the lengthening of the route, but also not even a distance of thirty yards. He hoped that the matter would receive the favourable consideration of the Government.

Mr. RYAN said he desired to make one other remark: If the Government road were built across the Narrows, he had forgotten to say that a drawbridge would be necessary at the Narrows, as there would no doubt be considerable navigation between these lakes in the future. The cost of the undertaking would be materially increased by the necessity of building a drawbridge at that point.

Mr. MASSON said he hoped that the Prime Minister would make some explanations in this connection, and see whether the statement made to the House agreed with the report of the Engineers. This was a question of vast importance. It concerned the location of the road from Selkirk westward, and it would be run, according to the information he had gathered, in about a straight line to Battleford. He had seen persons who were thoroughly acquainted with this country, and who were well known to the House and the country; and they invariably told him that, if the Government persisted in the resolution they seemed to have adopted in locating the road at the Narrows of the Lake, and to the north of Fort Pelly, as he believed was the case, this would be one of the greatest mistakes they could possibly commit. It would be admitted that no people knew a country better than those who lived in it; and, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) would only consult the residents of that country, he would find that the existing trade going westward invariably passed—if he was not misinformed touching the matter—to the south of Lake Manitoba; and the few trails which ran to the northwards invariably stopped at the point where the hon. gentleman wanted to locate the line of the railway. Though it might here be easy of construction, the country being flat and low as he believed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) stated last year, it was in fact nothing else than a swamp and marsh. He had been informed by gentlemen who were never mistaken regarding the capabilities of the country, that this portion was almost entirely useless for agricultural pursuits; and he supposed that the Government would not wish to abandon the most valuable part of the Province of Manitoba and of the North-West Territories, and place the road in a portion of the country where it could be of little use. The persons from whom he had his information were well acquainted with the country and their views agreed entirely with the statements of the hon. member for Marquette. They declared that the portion below Lake Manitoba and the westward was really the garden of the North-West Territories; that, if it was desired to build a road which would entice immigrants to that country, it must be run through the finest part of the country and the localities best fitted for cultivation and development; and that, where the line was placed, no immigrants could go unless they laboured under great difficulties. He hoped the Premier would tell them that he would reconsider the question, in view of the circumstances placed before the House. He trusted that an instrumental survey would be made to the south of the point in question to ascertain whether the whole population of that country were mistaken in their views. People had asked him: "Can you believe that a country through which a North-West cart passes"—and in these carts there was not a nail or a piece of iron—"for miles and miles is not fit for the construction of a railway?" The reports of all the Engineers in the world could not alter this great fact: a North-West cart, rude as it was, could travel all through the part of the country south of Lake Manitoba, and for almost any distance to the north-west, through vast and rich prairie lands, without meeting a single impediment in the way. He was told that one could start from Fort Garry, or from some distance to the west of it, and plough for sixty miles, without encountering an obstacle, through good and valuable lands. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) knew that the land of the North-West was not all of the same quality. He was informed that the territory a little to the north of and near Lake Dauphin was not as good as the rest; and persons said that, all around Manitoba, and to the north-westward of it, for some two hundred miles, were situated the richest lands of the North-West, the section near and around Peace River excepted. He hoped that the Prime Minister would not renew the awkward results which had followed the policy pursued with relation to the Canada Central Railway and the Georgian Bay Branch. He trusted that this line would not be undertaken before an instrumental survey was made, in order to avoid useless expenditure, and to locate the railway where it would be most useful for colonization purposes. He hoped that the hon. gentleman would reflect on the matter, and tell them not that he would change his mind, but that he would take means to ascertain whether he was not mistaken in the premises.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) spoke as if it was merely a matter of his changing his mind or of fixing his mind on some particular reply or some particular plan, and as if it was an arbitrary resolution of his own or of the Government which determined the particular route this railway might take. From the very first, both with regard to the extension of the Canada Central Railway, or the Georgian Bay Branch, and to every part of this line, the Government had not in any case interfered with the opinions at which the engineers had arrived after having made a careful examination of the country. In one particular, the Government might be called upon to express an opinion without any special reference to the opinions of the engineers; and this was where two or three routes were considered equally favourable as to distance, ease of construction and place of termination. It would then undoubtedly be a matter of policy with the Government to consider the local advantages which might be in question and the local considerations that ought to be always present with the Administration in such a case. With reference to the line west of Lake Superior, all the way to Tête Jaune Cache, the one plan which the Government had in view, and the only plan that was ever considered, was simply how to connect these objective points by the shortest line with the cheapest mode of construction, and the route which would ultimately be the best adapted for the settlement of the country. On these principles the engineers went to work and made their examinations. Advantages were, no doubt, to be gained by running the road from Rat Portage in a more southerly route, and reaching Red River, twenty miles further up the river, near or at the city of Winnipeg. Then this route passed through a comparatively settled portion of the country, some of it at all events: and it would also pass through the centre of population. Apart from the engineering difficulties which presented themselves, and to which he would refer presently, there were other disadvantages. One of these disadvantages was that the route would pass through a place where the price of land was very high. The Government found themselves, even at Thunder Bay—a place which was still more recently settled,—obliged to pay for every inch of land for two miles along the river bank, at a cost in the neighbourhood of $50,000. On the line they had adopted in Manitoba and the North-West country, very little of the land was in the hands of private parties, and they took an early opportunity, as soon as the line was sketched and planned, to prevent the sale of any land which might be made available into the hands of speculators, for the purpose of extracting money from the Government at a future period. The line, therefore, where it was located, suited that peculiar consideration. It passed almost entirely, he might say entirely, except a very small portion of land immediately bearing on one side of the Red River, through their own lands, and so far as he was able to say—and he might say that he had read everything that had been published, he believed, concerning that country—it passed in the direction where the greatest amount of fertile lands were liable to be found. He was quite aware that, from the Red River, and from a considerable distance east of the Red River, passing the city of Winnipeg, and, on its south end, Lake Manitoba, and some distance west of that, the line would transverse very excellent fertile land. He did not think with the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) that for a distance of 200 miles west of that line the land was good. Taking the direction indicated by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan), that was, from the south shore of Lake Manitoba to the bend of the Saskatchewan, that would pass through a very considerable tract of land that was barren, and so also would be the portion immediately east of the South Branch of the Saskatchewan River.

Mr. MASSON: I could not have explained myself well. I did not say that for 200 miles west the land was good, but I said the fertile part of that country extends for about 200 miles from the boundary line running north and south.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, concerning this particular part of the work, the last examinations which had been made established, in the first place, that, to carry the line from the Red River by the south of the Riding Mountains, would involve much heavy work in crossing the deep and wide Assiniboine River and its tributaries; and, secondly, that by making a divergence up the valley, this heavy work could be avoided, but that the latter course would necessitate a considerable detour from the direct line. Accordingly, further examinations were made. Mr. Fleming's last report, which was not yet published, gave a brief sketch of the country through which the line had been run. Now, it was a serious matter, when hon. gentlemen from Manitoba asked that another survey should be made from Red River all the way to the south bend of the Saskatchewan. The surveys upon the Pacific Railroad thus far had exceeded considerably the cost of $1,500 per mile. It was quite true that this part would not cost anything like that amount, but it was certain that the expenditure of $70,000 or $80,000 would be required to do what was now asked for; and it was equally certain that it would require the greater portion of two years, if not the whole of two years. It could not be finished in one year, and the whole work would be put back at least for a year before they would be able to reach the point now reached in the location of the line, in preparing profiles, and taking all the necessary steps to invite parties to tender for the entire work, on the basis of the Act of 1874. The Government could have no possible objection to any examination which was likely to result in benefit to the road and to the locality, and he might say that he could adopt the idea that, if the locality could be benefitted without seriously interfering with the general results to be achieved, as to length and cost, it would be the duty of the Government to meet the suggestion. He could only say, with regard to that portion of the line, that, while the Government were prepared to listen to all that might be said, they had also felt bound to obtain information from every quarter. It was at first represented to the Government that a very large proportion of the territory to be traversed, or about to be traversed, was either barren or incapable of cultivation. One gentleman told him that he believed that, if a 10ft. pole were left in the ground, with a sharp point, it would sink 10ft. or 12ft. down of its own weight. He (Mr. Mackenzie) questioned Mr. McLeod, one of the engineers who went over the ground and spent many months there, and he informed him that there was no point that he knew of where any such soil could be found, and he told him what Mr. Fleming now reported,—that there were places where there was a little wet soil on the surface, of a mossy or peaty material from 2ft. to 2½ ft., or possibly 3ft. deep in some places; but that everywhere this was capable of drainage, and the profile, as he had already said, was exceedingly favourable. It was not quite correct to assume that there was no expenditure upon this part of the line. Throughout the whole length of this line a width of 132ft. had been cleared of timber, and the telegraph poles had been erected. It was true that the line was not in the hands of the contractors, but a great deal of the work which had been done for the telegraph would be work ultimately for the road itself. Whatever works had been done by the telegraph contractors would not require to be done by the railway contractors. The instruction was that the telegraph line was to be in the exact line to be traversed by the railway. He would of course give every consideration to the statements that hon. gentlemen had made, but he would also say that no change could, in any case, be made in the status quo during the coming season, as no contracts could be submitted to Parliament until the next Session; and, if circumstances or events should so develop themselves as to produce a new state of things, or information should reach the Government which would in any way materially change the position which had been assumed to exist at present in this quarter, no step would of course be taken until Parliament was advised of it, either by asking for money for a survey in another direction, or by embracing more modifications in any tender that might be asked for or received when Parliament next met. He could not at present say there was any likelihood of any such information reaching the Government, as he presumed the engineers employed by the Government had made an exhaustive examination of the whole country. They had, from lake to sea, traversed and surveyed, to a greater or less extent, some 30,000 or 40,000 miles of this enormous territory, in order to reach the point that had now been reached in the survey and location of the line. Whatever hon. gentlemen might feel, think or desire, the Government felt that it was a very serious matter to interfere with the conclusions arrived at by eminent engineers, whose sole instructions were—and he had no doubt those instructions had been carried out—to consider what was best for the interests of the whole country. and, at the same time, to give such consideration to local circumstances as could justly be invoked without destroying the general character of the work.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was very much pleased that the motion had been made, as it had given an opportunity for the discussion which had taken place, by means of which much valuable information had been given with regard to that portion of the country. He could appreciate the importance of the consideration of expense, referred to by the First Minister, in taking the southern instead of the northern route. But he was certain that the people of Manitoba, finding it to their great advantage to have the railway pass through their country, would gladly have given the land required for the railway. Of course he did not speak with authority, but he felt assured that he but spoke the feelings of the people of Manitoba. He was also glad that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had given the assurance that, should information reach the Government that it would be advisable to place the line southward, they would consider whether the present arrangement should not be broken. That portions of the country, after going some 140 miles beyond the Winnipeg, were of a very light character was well known, but, excepting that, he believed the country was very good. He had been over the whole of it himself, and could speak from personal observation. He was also pleased to hear the hon. the Minister of Public Works say that where the interest of Manitoba could be considered it would be, when it was not opposed to the general interest of the Dominion.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not rise for the purpose of continuing the discussion, as he intended, at an early day, to take an opportunity to invite the attention of the House to the whole question of the policy of the Government in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway; and he was anxious to avoid covering any portion of the same ground now. But he wished to ask the First Minister when he would lay before the House the report from which he had been kind enough to read to the House. Parliament had voted enormous sums of money for the survey of the Canadian Pacific Railway; millions had been expended on the work, and yet they had been left Session after Session without any detailed statement of what had been done with the money, what had been accomplished, or the amount of information that had been obtained. He presumed that the document which the hon. the Minister held in his hand was a portion of the Progress Report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it appeared to be in type. He would like to ask whether that document was to be submitted in the closing days of the Session, or whether Parliament was now to have the advantage of the information that, at such immense cost to the country, had been obtained, and which he was sure every hon. member must feel he ought to have, in order to deal with a question of such magnitude in the manner it deserved.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, when Mr. Fleming returned from England, he requested him to proceed immediately with the report, and he had been engaged upon it, he might almost say, night and day. The work was only partially completed and was partly in type. The completion of the report had been much delayed through the absence of Mr. Fleming at the Courts at Quebec and Halifax in the cases of petitions of right in connection with the Intercolonial Railway contracts. It was intended to print the narrative and important parts before the rest, and he hoped it would be before the House in a few days in as succinct form as possible.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved:

“That, in the opinion of this House, a Prohibitory Liquor Law is the only effectual remedy for the evil of intemperance, and that it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure at the earliest moment practicable.”

He said he would have preferred this motion being made by some one in the House more identified with the temperance movement than himself, and it was in the hope that such would be the case that he had delayed the present motion until this advanced period in the Session. It, however, he thought, made little matter who brought up this great question which, this Session or at some future Session, must be settled by the General Council of the nation. While it was true that he (Mr. Schultz) did not belong to any temperance organization, yet he would always remember with pleasure that the North-West Council, of which he had the honour of being a member, had passed, early in its existence, the first Prohibitory Law in Canada, and the result had been that in over one-half of the Dominion the manufacture and sale of liquor had been prohibited, and with effects so good that he would like to see the experiment tried in the other half. Of course, he had not heard the discussions of the past six Sessions without being aware of the difficulties in the way, and yet he had never been able to sympathize with any of the many means which had been taken to prevent a direct expression of opinion by the House on this important matter; and, while at this moment, many held action in the matter to be premature on account of the fact that the question of jurisdiction was at this moment before the Supreme Court, and that a decision would not be given till next summer, yet he (Mr. Schultz) could see no impropriety in taking the sense of the House on the subject now. If the Supreme Court decided that the Dominion Legislature had no power to pass a Prohibitory Law, then the matter dropped for want of jurisdiction; while, if that Court decided otherwise, then the Government were fortified with an expression of the opinion of the House in this motion, and their course was clear to mature a measure for introduction at the coming Session. What the result of the vote would be, if it could be fairly brought to a vote, he (Mr. Schultz) thought there could be no doubt. Nearly all the principal public men of the country had expressed themselves in its favour at various times, and enquiry into the subject showed that twenty-three years ago—in 1854—a Prohibitory Bill passed its second reading, and was only defeated finally by one vote. Since that time, the agitation had continued, but had never culminated within his own memory. It had seemed several times on the point of being disposed of, but some unhappy twist, some ingenious device tided over the difficulty till they had reached the present stage. In 1873, the Ontario Legislature and sixty-eight municipalities petitioned these Houses for the passage of a Prohibitory Law. These petitions, with 384 petitions, containing the names of nearly 40,000 persons, were referred to a Committee, who reported as follows:—

“The Select Committee to whom was referred the petitions presented to the Senate, praying for the enactment of a law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the Dominion, have the honour to submit the following as their Report:—

“The number of petitions referred to your Committee to this date is 447, of which one is from the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario; 68 are from municipal councils, three from church courts, and 375 from an aggregate of 36,224 individuals; 25,945 of whom are of the Province of Ontario, and 10,279 of the Province of Quebec.

“The individual petitioners are men of all ranks and classes of society, of all professions and trades, and of all shades of religious and political opinion, and many of them occupy high positions in churches and municipalities, in the medical and legal professions—and in the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures: constituting in the aggregate such a large and influential representation of the intelligence and public sentiment of the country as to entitle their testimony and their prayer to the fullest and most favourable consideration of the Senate—while the fact of so many municipal councils and the House of Assembly of Ontario joining in the same prayer clearly indicates the deepfelt and urgent need of the legislation petitioned for.

“Your Committee do not regard the absence of petitions from the other Provinces as evidencing any lack of sympathy with—much less any opposition to—the petitions from Ontario and Quebec; they know from unofficial but thoroughly reliable resources that a Prohibitory Law is desired by large numbers in those Provinces, who will doubtless send in their petitions at the next Session of Parliament.

“The united unvarying testimony of all the petitioners is, that the vice of intemperance is spreading—mainly in consequence of the facilities afforded for the sale of intoxicating liquors. That the traffic in these liquors is the prolific cause of three-fourths of the crime and pauperism in the country. That so long as the traffic is licensed and protected by law, the evils resulting from intemperance cannot be repressed—all the various attempts by stringent License Laws having signally failed—and they therefore pray for absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages.

“Their testimony is fully sustained by the evidence already collected, and presented to the House of Commons now in Session, by a Committee of that Honourable House in their second report, where they state that they find four-fifths of the crime in Ontario, and the same proportion of commitments to gaol in Ontario and Quebec, are directly or indirectly traceable to the traffic in and use of these liquors.

“Your Committee are fully convinced that the traffic in intoxicating liquors, in addition to the evils already mentioned, is detrimental to all the true interests of the Dominion, mercilessly slaying every year hundreds of her most promising citizens; plunging thousands into misery and want; converting her intelligent and industrious sons, who should be her glory and her strength, into feeble inebriates, her burden and her shame; wasting millions of her wealth in the consumption of an article whose use not only imparts no strength, but induces disease and insanity, suicide and murder, thus diverting into a hurtful channel the capital that should be employed in developing her resources, establishing her manufactures, and expanding her commerce; in short, it is a cancer in the body politic, which, if not speedily eradicated, will mar the bright prospects and blight the patriotic hope of this noble Dominion.

“Your Committee are not unmindful of the serious apparent diminution of revenue which would temporarily result from the suppression of the manufacture and sale of these destructive liquors; that it would be much less in reality than appearance is perfectly clear, for a very large amount of the expenditure for criminal jurisdiction, and maintenance of gaols, penitentiaries, and asylums, would be saved immediately, and should be deducted from the apparent loss; but even were it otherwise, your Committee would regard it as directly contrary to the spirit and fundamental principles of our truly British code of laws to allow any consideration of loss of revenue to hinder the removal of this great national evil, or to accept any amount of revenue as an equivalent for legalizing a traffic so pernicious in its effects upon the community. They are, moreover, firmly of opinion that, instead of impoverishing the revenue, the effect of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, faithfully enforced, would be largely and permanently to increase it, saving the fifty millions of dollars now expended annually in the Dominion for these liquors; and converting that immense sum, now lost, into a capital yielding large returns from its being employed in trade and manufactures.

"Your Committee regard it as the first and highest duty of Parliament to legislate for the peace, happiness, and material prosperity of the people, and consequently for the removal and prevention of evils such as are proved to be now injuring and threatening the country through the common use of intoxicating liquors; and concurring in the opinion of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, as expressed in their petition, 'that a Prohibitory Liquor Law, such as prayed for by the petitioners, would be most beneficial in its results' to the Dominion, would respectfully recommend that the prayer of the petitioners be favourably entertained; and inasmuch as at this late period of the Session it would be impracticable to carry through a well considered, comprehensive Prohibitory Law, that the Senate, at the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, do appoint, with the concurrent action of the House of Commons, a joint Committee of both Houses upon the subject, to consider what steps should then be recommended to Parliament in connection therewith.

In accordance with the recommendation of this Committee, in the following year (1874) the Select Committee of the Senate presented the following report:—

"The Select Committee, to whom were referred the several petitions presented to the Senate, praying for the enactment of a law to prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the Dominion, beg leave to submit the following as their Report thereon:—

"The petitions which have been referred to your Committee number 993, and have attached to them 349,294 signatures, being ten times the number of those of last year; 147 of the petitions are from municipal councils, and nine from other representative bodies, each acting for a considerable number of persons; it is, therefore, obvious that the aggregate number of signatures mentioned would have to be largely increased, probably to 500,000, in order to convey an approximate idea of the vast number of individuals who plead for a prohibitory liquor law. Among these representative petitions, there is one from the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick, signed by thirty-three members, and one from the General Assembly of the Canada Presbyterian Church, which claims a constituency of 226,000 church members; and it must not be forgotten that the Legislative Assembly of Ontario joined last year in the prayer of these petitions.

"That the desire for legislative prohibition is not of a merely local or even Provincial character, is shown by the petitions coming from all the Provinces of the Dominion.

"There are from:—

"Ontario, 633 petitions, with 302,090 signatures;

"Quebec, 103 petitions, with 140,038 signatures;

"New Brunswick, 92 petitions, with 16,335 signatures;

"Nova Scotia, 119 petitions, with 13,622 signatures;

"Prince Edward Island, 43 petitions, with 3,174 signatures;

"British Columbia, 2 (municipal) petitions, with 34 signatures;

"Manitoba, 1 (Presbyterian Church) petition, with 1 signature.

"Your Committee regard the vast and annually increasing number of petitioners, and their unanimity in the statements and prayer of their several petitions, as indicating the immense and pressing importance of the subject to which they call the attention of the Senate, and the profound and wide-spread feeling of the need of such legislation as shall at once check, and eventually extirpate from our land, the vice of intemperance, which has so long been, and still is, a prolific source of crime and misery, disease and death, and a blight upon the fair prospects of our young Dominion.

"The whole of the petitioners join in asserting that the vice of intemperance is fearfully prevalent and increasing, and that it results mainly from the facilities afforded by law to the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Your Committee have no means of testing the accuracy of the statement, but their own personal observations, and the facts brought to view in the official returns of Customs and Excise, showing the enormous quantity consumed in the Dominion, lead them to place full reliance on the assertion.

"These returns show that, for the year ending 30th June, 1873, the quantity of intoxicating liquors imported into Canada, and entered for home consumption, was 2,910,304 gallons, valued at $2,075,089; and the quantity manufactured in addition thereto, after deducting exports, was 16,308,625 gallons, valued at $9,785,154; they also show that 121,762,347 lb. of valuable grain, principally Indian corn, wheat, barley and rye, were used in their manufacture; these quantities and values are in excess of those of the preceding year.

"The petitioners further assert that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is shown, by the most careful inquiries, to be the cause of, probably, not less than three-fourths of the pauperism, immorality and crime found in this country. The evidence gathered by the Committee of the House of Commons, and reported last year, is strongly corroborative of this assertion; but your Committee are of opinion that more full and extended official information on this very important branch of the subject, than can possibly be procured by Parliamentary Committees during the time the Houses are in Session, should be obtained by the Government and laid before Parliament.

"A third assertion is made by the petitioners, viz: that the history of legislation upon the liquor traffic shows conclusively that the evils resulting from intemperance cannot be suppressed so long as the traffic is licensed and protected by law; this statement is proved by reference to the Statutes, both Imperial and Provincial, and the unquestionable increase of intemperance while license laws have been in force; these laws have, indeed, signally failed in their professed object of so curtailing and regulating the traffic as to repress that vice.

"The petitioners, with one accord, pray for a law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, evidently believing that such entire prohibition, and nothing short of it, will prove effective in removing or in materially lessening the evils of which they complain; they do not assign their reasons for this belief, but they are, doubtless, based upon the failure of the licensing system, and in the experience of other countries where prohibitory laws have been enacted, as shown by the testimony to the beneficial effects which have resulted from such legislation, which was obtained and appended to their report last year by the Committee of the House of Commons.

"As it has already been officially announced in Parliament that the prayer of these petitions cannot be granted at this present Session, your Committee refrain from submitting any opinion, or recommendation as to immediate legislative action; but they consider that the time has arrived when the earnest attention of the Government and of the Legislature should be given to this important subject, with the view of discovering and applying the best remedy for the gigantic evil that affects so seriously the peace and prosperity of the Dominion.

"Your Committee, therefore, recommend that steps shall be taken without delay to ascertain how far the attempts to remove the evils of intemperance, by legislative prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors in other countries or states, have resulted either in success or failure, in order that Parliament, at its next Session, may be in possession of all the information necessary for its guidance in determining whether the legislation prayed for should be granted or withheld; and as this cannot, at this Session, be done by your Committee, they recommend that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, respectfully requesting him to lay before Parliament, at its next Session, such information as His Excellency may be able to obtain thereon.

"All which is respectfully submitted.

The recommendation of this report resulted in the appointment of a Commission who presented their report in 1875, and since that time parliamentary action had ceased in reference to this question. It would be noticed that both reports were quite decided in their recommendation to the Government of action in the matter, and the report of the Commission was, he believed, for it was not at hand, equally favourable. To him (Mr. Schultz) this seemed conclusive. If more evidence were wanted of the effect on national life, we had that of Chief Justice Coleridge, who attributed "all the crimes of violence in England to the use of intoxicating drinks, and affirmed that if indulgence in them could be prevented, nine-tenths of the jails would be closed for want of inmates." And we had the corroborative testimony in nearly as strong words of our own Chief Justice Harrison, in his able address on the opening of the Court a week or two ago in this city. If the matter was one of revenue, let it be frankly and fairly stated; if one of jurisdiction, he (Mr. Schultz) had already explained his views; and if one of expediency, he trusted every hon. gentleman would remember the records of crime and suffering and misery which our Blue-books contained, the pitiful tale told by the innumerable petitions of past years, and, divesting himself of every consideration of local influences, resolve, on this question of such vital importance to so many of his weaker fellow-creatures, to look only to that which was right.

Mr. FARROW said, as seconder of the motion, he desired to say a few words on the subject before the House. The hon. member for Lisgar, who had introduced the motion, the other day had requested him not to let the matter drop, but in the hon. member's absence to move the motion for him. When the day came he thought the best thing to do would be to ask the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), the champion of the temperance cause, to second the motion. He asked the hon. member for West Middlesex to do so, and he replied "No." He then asked the hon. member if he would move the motion and he (Mr. Farrow) would second it. The answer of the hon. member was again "No." He asked the hon. member for an explanation of his course, whereupon he said he did not think it would be in the interests of temperance at the present juncture. He was surprised at the remark of the hon. member. That hon. gentleman, for a number of years past, had been going up and down in the country lecturing and speaking to the people on the temperance question, appealing to their good sense, to their morality and sympathy, and presenting evidence that both their bodies and souls were going down to destruction; but all the appeals had died away, and, notwithstanding the misery, the deaths and the destruction, the hon. member for West Middlesex was willing to let the subject drop, not caring that bodies were going down to untimely graves and souls to destruction. He (Mr. Farrow) thought no time should be lost, and therefore believed that, under the circumstances, the hon. member for West Middlesex would have been only too glad to have either moved or seconded the motion of which notice had been given by the hon. member for Lisgar. However, the hon. member thought differently, and would not do it. The country would now see how much the hon. member was in earnest; how his present course differed from his past course. The House could remember what the hon. member's action had been during the past eighteen months or two years. They knew that he worked earnestly for the cause in Parliament, and he (Mr. Farrow) had always given the hon. member for West Middlesex credit for being sincere. The great obstacle in the way at the present time was that action on the question did not suit the Government. He (Mr. Farrow) did not understand why it should not suit the Government. The present Government in 1873 professed before the House that they had the subject at heart, and they declared to the people that they would settle it. Looking back at the history of the question, he found that, in 1873, when the late Government was in power, many petitions were presented to Parliament. The late Government treated those petitions with respect and appointed a Select Committee to which they were referred. Moreover, when the report of the Committee was presented, it was printed and thousands of copies circulated throughout the country. The Government had appropriated $500 for the purpose of having liquors tested, and those efforts were appreciated by the temperance people. In 1873 the Government resigned. He believed, if the Government had continued in power up to this time, the country would have seen a different state of affairs. He appealed to the House and country whether the position would have been worse. On the resignation of the late Administration, the hon. the present Premier formed his Government. The hon. the First Minister would remember having been in Toronto in November, 1873, when a temperance convention was being held in Shaftesbury Hall. The chief speakers on that occasion were Messrs. Warring Kennedy and Knowlton, both Reformers and friends of the hon. the Premier. They wanted to indoctrinate the members of the convention with the idea that the hon. the Premier was all in love with temperance. Mr. Knowlton had a night conference with the hon. the Premier on the question. About eight o'clock in the evening, Mr. Knowlton returned to Shaftesbury Hall from the Queen's Hotel after his conference with the hon. gentleman. Mr. Knowlton said: "I have a very important communication to make to this Grand Lodge. I have just come from the Queen's Hotel where I have had an interview with the Premier, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, and he assures me that he is strong for prohibition, and if we will only back him up with plenty of petitions he will do his utmost to have enacted as speedily as possible a Prohibitory Liquor Law. He also assures me he is a strong temperance man, a Good Templar, and were it not for pressing engagements elsewhere he (the Premier) would have been with us tonight." He thought if the English language meant anything this meant something. But let them look a little further. What was the advice used throughout the country? He asked this question in all earnestness. The Globe said that the Reformers were the men of prohibition, and that if those men were elected the darling object of the temperance advocates would be accomplished. The Canada Casket, published at Napanee, said the same thing; and the papers were sent not only to subscribers but non-subscribers. The people gave the hon. the Premier credit for his principles; they believed that he was sincere. The hon. gentleman might be sincere, but it was his bounden duty to show his sincerity. The hon. gentleman had had from 1873 to 1877, and had done nothing—no, he had done a little. It was not much, to be sure, but the hon. gentleman should be given credit for what he had done. In 1874, Commissioners were appointed and sent to Maine to ascertain how the law worked there. The hon. the Premier and the hon. member for Middlesex knew very well how that law worked, and there was no occasion for them to expend $2,000 in the shape of a Commission. But a few dollars were nothing to time; give them plenty of time and they would squander another $2,000. The Commission made a good report, but it contained just such information as could be obtained from several books in the Library. However, this showed the Government were sincere so far. Petitions came pouring in after the appearance of the report, and it was evident that something must be done. They were not prepared to meet the question, but the hon. member for North York solved the difficulty—that hon. gentleman cut the Gordian knot. At his suggestion a grand national temperance convention was held at Montreal; all the notables were there, along with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) and the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier). They held high jubilee. They had good times. Many of them had their expenses paid as delegates from temperance societies. They wanted to show themselves in earnest, and tried to get a good Conservative (Mr. Tilley) in the chair; but failing, they got another man, an earnest worker, to preside. But everything that was to be done was planned by the hon. members for North York and West Middlesex; they managed the affair to suit themselves.

Mr. DYMOND: Allow me to say that I was not present at that convention.

Mr. FARROW said he was given to understand the hon. gentleman was present.

Mr. DYMOND: I am sorry that I was not able to be there.

Mr. FARROW said at all events the hon. members for West Middlesex and Arthabaska were present. When the point came up about the plébiscite, they made every objection to it, stating that it was wrong and unconstitutional: but he (Mr. Farrow) thought it would be the best thing that could happen to Canada, if the people were allowed to express their opinion by vote on this subject. But another strange thing happened at that meeting. The hon. member for West Middlesex advised that no more petitions ought to be sent to Parliament. He (Mr. Farrow) was sorry that this advice had been taken, for otherwise there would have been 100,000 petitions this Session, and they must have done some good. This was the way in which these hon. gentlemen had treated this subject. The late Hon. Malcolm Cameron said, at a temperance meeting at Ottawa, that if the Government wanted to pass a Prohibitory Liquor Law they would soon find a way to do it. That was certainly true. The Government had shown a strange apathy all along in regard to this question; and this Session their conduct was still more strange. They had placed an additional duty on malt, which was a direct thrust against the temperance cause. If the Government did not want to pass a Prohibitory Liquor Law, they might at any rate let the people have the cheapest and least hurtful drink. They claimed that whiskey would not bear any duty, but that spirit did not pay as much duty as it did in the United States and England. Besides, a great deal of brandy was manufactured in Canada, which might easily bear some duty. What did the drinking usages of the country cost the country every year? It cost the United States $650,000,000 per annum for drink, and, allowing the same proportion to Canada according to population, we had the enormous figures of $65,000,000, and when the cost of dealing out and waste was taken into consideration, the total cost would be $130,000,000 per year. It seemed to be nothing to the Government that this large amount was wasted yearly on account of the liquor traffic, to say nothing of the untimely deaths and sufferings which were caused by intoxicating drink. If it cost the United States $650,000,000 on account of the drinking traffic, Maine's share ought to be about $21,000,000; but as a matter of fact it was not the tenth of that. It was evident that the Maine Law worked as well as any other law, for through its operation the State saved $18,000,000 per annum. Owing to this saving, when the panic came in 1873, the people of that State were unaffected by it. If the report of the Commission was good, it ought to have been acted upon. The Government probably thought nothing of squandering $2,000, but that sum helped to make up the deficit of $1,900,000. He was not under obligations to any temperance society, but he was quite willing to vote for a Prohibitory Law and leave the rest to the country. He thought hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side ought to explain why they had not acted up to their professions in this regard, and to state what their present intentions were.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) in his preparatory remarks seemed, to a certain extent, to feel the peculiarity of his position, and expressed the regret that his resolution was not in the hands of some gentleman more intimately connected with the temperance cause. Whether the hon. gentleman felt in his own mind an apparent incongruity in the position he held among temperance men, and in the new rôle which he had assumed, he (Mr. Ross) was unable to say.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he would like to correct the hon. gentleman. This was no new rôle, as he occupied precisely the same position as he assumed two years ago in relation to this matter.

Mr. ROSS said, that being the case, he would strike out the word "new." He could not say that he at all regretted the position the hon. gentleman had taken. He (Mr. Ross) was so warm an advocate of the temperance cause that he was quite willing to see, even under peculiar, unfavourable circumstances, any hon. member advocate it, and he hailed as valuable and, he trusted, earnest and devoted acquisitions to the temperance ranks, the two hon. gentlemen who had just addressed the House. The hon. member for North Huron seemed to be animated with a particular desire to make it appear that the hon. the Premier and himself (Mr. Ross) appeared to great disadvantage before the House and the country as the advocates of temperance. The hon. member launched out with a great charge against him that he had at first done a great deal as an advocate of temperance, and was now doing very little. His hon. friend, he was afraid, misapprehended very much the position he occupied. He could only tell the hon. member that, so long as he secured the appreciation and support of the temperance organizations throughout the Dominion, and so long as he was sustained by his own constituents, and felt justified in his own consciousness of right, he cared not for any charges hurled against him by hon. gentlemen, who, he trusted, were at this moment not bringing the temperance question before the House, not to secure its advancement, but with some sinister purpose.

Mr. SCHULTZ: I desire to ask my hon. friend whether he makes this as a statement or as an insinuation.

Mr. ROSS: My hon. friend may take it just to mean what it means—either as a statement or as an insinuation.

Mr. SCHULTZ: It seems to me that —

Mr. ROSS: I am sorry that my hon. friend quarrels with me, because we are both rowing in the same boat.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER said he did not understand the hon. gentleman to charge the hon. member for Lisgar with acting for sinister purposes. It would be much better, however, if such words were not used.

Mr. ROSS said his expression was that he hoped that the hon. gentlemen were not actuated by any sinister motive. He would be very sorry to charge the hon. member for Lisgar or any other hon. member with acting with sinister motives. He wished to briefly review the position he occupied in reference to the temperance movement. In 1873, he served on a Committee, of which Mr. Bodwell, member for South Oxford, was chairman, which brought in a report sustaining the idea of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. He held then that in endeavouring to bring about such a great change it would be wise for the temperance men to move cautiously and perhaps to hasten slowly. The House was well aware that temperance sentiments did not predominate in the Dominion and statistics in possession of the House showed that the consumption of intoxicating liquors was on the increase. With a knowledge of those facts, much as they were to be regretted, he held that, to bring about such a radical change as a Prohibitory Liquor Law, temperance men, if they wished to act wisely, should act slowly, surely, and discreetly. He had also before his mind the history of the temperance movement in New Brunswick. It would be remembered that that movement was so strong a few years ago that a Prohibitory Liquor Law was passed by a respectable majority, but, when the people were appealed to in the Province, they rejected the law at the polls. With a view to prepare the country and the people of Canada for a thorough appreciation of the true position of affairs, the Committee on which he had the honour to serve, and the Sub-Committee of which he was chairman, issued circulars throughout the whole length and breadth of the Dominion. Their desire was to collect information in order that the electors of the Dominion might understand what was the nature and character of the liquor traffic with which they were disposed to deal. That report was circulated, and, as his hon. friend from North Huron (Mr. Farrow) had said, several thousand copies of it were printed. These were circulated extensively throughout the country, and he ventured to say that his humble efforts—if he might show so much egotism—in connection with the preparation of that report, on which he had bestowed a great deal of care, had had something to do with the revival of the temperance agitation during the last four or five years. At the next Session a similar Committee was appointed, and, Mr. Bodwell having retired from the House, he had the honour of acting as chairman. He saw before him hon. gentleman who had also served faithfully on the Committee, which also prepared a report, submitting it to the House on the 9th May, and recommending, as far as was possible to do so, that it would be expedient to take such steps as would put the House in possession of full and reliable information regarding the operation and result of such laws in those States of the American Union, whether they were new or had been in force, with a view to show what would be the practical working and effect of such laws in Canada. They recommended the appointment of a Commission for the purpose, and this was done. It was not wholly composed of temperance men, but of a temperance man on the one hand and on the other of a man who, in his own written statement, in his (Mr. Ross) possession, stated he was neither in favour of total abstinence nor of prohibition. This Commission visited the United States, and the evidence, contained in the report which was laid before the House, was so conclusive and so satisfactory to his mind that he was prepared to ask the House to express an opinion with reference to the principle of prohibition. He did not feel then, or now, he regretted to say, that they could at this very moment sustain a Prohibitory Liquor Law in the Dominion; and he felt it would be of vast importance to the temperance men of Canada, if they could have an expression of opinion from the House of Commons—the High Court of Parliament—on the subject. His esteemed friend, Hon. Mr. Vidal, had carried a resolution through the Senate by a large majority affirming that prohibition was the most effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance; and he was very anxious that this House should also express an opinion on the matter. He accordingly moved the following resolution:—

“That, having regard to the beneficial effect arising from prohibitory liquor laws in those States of the American Union where the same are fully carried out, this House is of opinion that the most effectual remedy for the ends of intemperance would be to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors.”

This resolution was submitted in the Committee of the Whole, and it was sustained by seventy-two votes on the one side and nine on the other. He was pleased with the result, for he was anxious that the advocates of temperance all over the Dominion should be able to say, when they addressed the people, that the House of Commons, the High Court of Parliament, had declared that prohibition was the most effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance. He could assure the House that the effect of the passage of this resolution had been of very valuable assistance indeed to temperance advocates throughout the Dominion.

Mr. BOWELL: Was that resolution ever adopted by the House?

Mr. ROSS: No; it was adopted by the Committee of the House.

Mr. BOWELL: Why?

Mr. Ross.

Mr. ROSS: The Session was closing.

Mr. BOWELL: Tell the House the rest of it.

Mr. ROSS said the next step was to attempt to gather the friends of temperance from all parts of the Dominion, to ascertain what was the best course to be taken. He invited those who acted with him in this respect in the House to meet together with him in the Tower Room, and after consultation—members of both sides of politics were present—it was decided to call a convention, to meet in the city of Montreal. A Committee was appointed for that purpose, and on this Committee he found his hon. friends from North Huron and Lisgar. He had the approval of these two hon. gentlemen in calling the convention, and they were appointed by the caucus then held to assist in preparing the business of the convention. He regretted the absence of these hon. gentlemen from the convention, which was very largely attended, 260 delegates being present: 148 from Ontario; 90 from Quebec; 12 from Nova Scotia; 9 from New Brunswick, and 1 from Prince Edward Island. All the Provinces were represented, with the exception of Manitoba and British Columbia. It was said in the House that he had handled this convention. The greatest compliment that could be paid him—only two or three members of Parliament who acted with him being present at the convention, of whom his hon. friend from East Elgin was one—would be to say he had handled 260 delegates sent by the temperance men of the Dominion, so as to serve some peculiar purpose of his own. The convention continued in session for three days. His hon. friend from North Huron said they had abandoned the principle of a plebiscite at it. He found that one of the resolutions then adopted affirmed—“In order that a Prohibitory Liquor Law, when passed, may have the sympathy and support so indispensably necessary to its success, it is the opinion of this convention that the Dominion Parliament should be urged to frame such a law, subject to ratification by the public vote.” The question of prohibition was of such a peculiar nature that to make of it a party question for either political party, would, in their opinion, be to sacrifice it. They found that it was so sacrificed elsewhere. Those conversant with the history of prohibition in the States of Massachusetts, New Jersey and New York, knew very well that the moment it was made a party issue, the question was at that moment ruined; and so felt many Conservatives and Reformers who were strong advocates of prohibition. They were not anxious to place men in the position of being obliged to sacrifice their political principles, in order to vote for a Prohibitory Liquor Law. They rather took the ground that they would utilize the temperance sentiment of the country irrespective of politics, and so combine it as to bring their united influence to bear on this question. If they had made a mistake they did so with the best possible design. This resolution was submitted to the convention and carried without one dissenting voice. The policy which the convention endorsed was not a policy of prohibition, as a plank in any peculiar temperance party, but a prohibitory policy subject to the ratification of the popular vote. What was the next step? No sooner had the convention dissolved than a fresh difficulty arose. In the Province of New Brunswick a case came before the Supreme Court in which it was decided that the Dominion Parliament had absolute jurisdiction over the liquor traffic. In Nova Scotia a case also appeared before the Supreme Court in which it was decided that the Local Legislatures had such absolute jurisdiction as far as the retail sale of intoxicating liquors was concerned; and one of the Judges of the Province of Ontario had rendered a similar decision. It was further alleged by legal gentlemen in the House and in the country, and by the Local and Dominion Legislatures, and particularly by those who belonged to this House, that this Parliament could not deal with the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors. The Attorney-General of Ontario on the other hand said he could not deal with it; and they felt that this point must be settled before they could advance safely. He consequently last year proposed a resolution to the House with the view of seeing whether the Government had any information in their possession bearing on this question. He asked for all the correspondence between the Government and Lieutenant-Governors of the different Provinces regarding the relative jurisdiction of the Dominion and Provincial Parliaments over the manufacturer and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. FARROW: On what date did you ask for that information?

Mr. ROSS: On April 10th.

Mr. FARROW: That was a day or two before Parliament closed.

Mr. ROSS said he did not know that this made any difference. Unfortunately he was not in the House during the whole of last Session, as hon. gentlemen knew. The motion was put on the paper two or three days, he believed, before it was reached. The mode of allowing motions to stand that prevailed last Session was the cause of its not being reached until the date he had mentioned. One of the objects he had in view in moving his motion was to ascertain whether they could not use the power conferred upon them by the 52nd Section of the Supreme Court Act to get directly an opinion from the Supreme Court as to whether the Dominion Parliament or the Local Legislatures had jurisdiction in the matter. In reply to his remarks the Minister of Justice said:

“The Supreme Court was an Appellate Court formed for the purpose of determining the correctness or inaccuracy of the decisions of the various Provincial tribunals and that class of cases which might be brought before these tribunals for adjudication and which might afterwards come before it in the proper and normal discharge of its functions as a Court of Justice. It was obvious that it would be a serious matter in the performance of these duties for it to give a preliminary opinion under this exceptional power without all the advantages and without those aids arriving at a correct conclusion to be found in the presentation of a case—narrowed, if you will, but also made more clearly by the ordinary forms in which cases were presented to the Courts both as to issue and as to argument.”

From these remarks, it became quite clear to him that to make a direct appeal to the Government with their request that the matter should be referred directly to the Supreme Court was utterly useless. They also hoped that a case then before the Supreme Court—Queen v. Taylor—would have settled the question; but it appeared that this case was dismissed on a technicality. This brought them down to the present stage of the temperance movement, and that was this: the temperance men of the Dominion were anxious for legislation, but they were unable to see where they were to go and get it. The Judges of the Province of Nova Scotia had said that the Dominion Legislature could not legislate in this matter, and that the Provincial Parliament could alone so legislate, and Chief Justice Ritchie had said that the Provincial Parliament could not, and the Dominion Parliament alone could, so legislate. In order to satisfy himself that no unreasonable delay would occur, by not putting any resolution on the paper this Session, he placed himself in communication with Attorney-General Mowat, who had charge of a case on behalf of the Government of the Province of Ontario, which he expected was to be referred to the Supreme Court, and which, he thought, would involve the principle of jurisdiction. In this correspondence, he ascertained that it was their intention in the case which had been appealed recently from the Court of Error and Appeal, to open up the whole question of the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature, and thus learn whether the Dominion Parliament or the Local Legislatures had control over the prohibition of the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. This being the case at the beginning of this Session, he decided not to make any move in the matter. When he arrived in Ottawa, it was his intention, were it not for the information he had received after his arrival from the Hon. Mr. Vidal and others, to attempt to pass a Bill applying the principle of the Dunkin Act and a Permissive Bill to the Dominion of Canada, including vote by ballot, one day's polling, &c. He had had the idea, and he had it still, that if they were to fight it out as the Americans did, on that line, and ask the people themselves whether they wanted prohibition or not, it would be best for the temperance movement in the end and for all parties concerned, inasmuch as the question of jurisdiction was unsettled, and as he knew he would be told by the Minister of Justice that a case before the Supreme Court would very likely settle it, and inasmuch as he was aware that without this he would be asked to withdraw any Bill of that kind, that he should now make no move in the matter. He felt it was not required in the interests of the temperance cause to do so; and, also, that, while the temperance men throughout the Dominion were working, they could afford to wait a little for legislation. Looking to his own Province, he found that there was scarcely a county in the Province of Ontario that was not discussing at this moment the Dunkin Act, a local prohibitory law. In the Province, of Quebec, he found the same influences at work; and even from Manitoba, petitions had come down, asking for a Permissive Act to be applied to it. Everywhere, temperance organizations were at their work. It was not by legislation that the temperance cause was going to be benefited. This was not going to be done by mere parliamentary enactments. If the temperance men were ever going to get prohibition by legislation, they must work more outside than inside of Parliament. All they could do there was to secure, by statutory enactment the pinning down on the Statute-book, of every inch of ground they won outside; and if they attempted inside those walls to forestall public opinion, and go in advance of it, they would find very distinct intimation hereafter that their efforts were unnecessary, not required, and not demanded. What he asked of his hon. friend opposite, who had charge of this motion, was to consider whether, inasmuch as they could not tell whether or not they had jurisdiction over the liquor traffic, and inasmuch as they knew for a fact that a question before the Supreme Court would decide whether or not they had it, and inasmuch as they must know before the next Session of the Dominion Parliament whether they had control over the liquor traffic or not, it would not be unwise, in the interests of the temperance cause and prohibition itself, to press the question on the present occasion. Every temperance man with whom he had come in contact on the Council of the Dominion Alliance, which met in this city a few weeks ago, and the temperance press from all parts of the Dominion which he saw, agreed with him that, in the unsettled state of the question at the present moment, it would be unwise and injudicious to press for legislation. They should wait until they saw what power they had in the matter, and for this reason he objected to his hon. friend's motion; in the first place, because the House had already affirmed what his hon. friend's motion affirmed. This House had on a previous occasion declared that a Prohibitory Liquor Law was the best remedy for the evils of intemperance, and this resolution was recorded on the Journals of the House. In the second place, he objected to it because the second clause of the resolution was entirely unnecessary, because it accomplished nothing. If passed, the Government could do nothing until they had the decision of the Supreme Court. No Government could take any action in the matter at present. In view of all these circumstances, he was not prepared to support the resolution of his hon. friend from Lisgar, but he was prepared to offer an amendment to it. He would take upon himself personally the entire responsibility of standing by the ground he had taken as a temperance man—that they must work their way inch by inch—cautiously, firmly, steadily and honestly, and that any amount of “resolves” in the House of Commons placed on the paper would not aid the temperance cause as much as honest and steady work outside the walls of Parliament, and a consistent reputation on the part of those who were the advocates of the temperance cause.

He moved in amendment :

“That all the words after ‘that’ in the original motion be expunged, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—Whereas grave doubts exist, whether, under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, this House has the power to deal with the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and whereas the Court of Error and Appeal in the Province of Ontario has referred a case to the Supreme Court, whereby the relative jurisdiction of the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures over the liquor traffic will be argued; be it therefore resolved, That this House, while not receding from any previous declaration on the importance of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, deems it inexpedient, under these circumstances, at present, to express any opinion regarding the action to be taken by the Government in dealing with this question.”

Mr. DYMOND said, if any one had entertained a suspicion as to the promptings of the hon. member for Lisgar, his fears would have been justified by the speech of the hon. gentleman who seconded the motion. If any body, to use a very common expression, had “let the cat out of the bag,” it was the hon. gentleman who figured as seconder. That hon. gentleman was a party to the consultation or conference which took place in that House, when it was decided, on the suggestion he believed first thrown out by himself (Mr. Dymond), but for which others equally took the responsibility, to hold a convention in Montreal. If that hon. gentleman were on that occasion acting in good faith, and were earnest in the prohibition cause, he would not have made the speech which he had just delivered.

Mr. SCHULTZ : To whom does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Mr. DYMOND said he referred to the hon. seconder of the motion; but he might perhaps say a little about the mover, although he was not so sure that the peculiar relations of that hon. gentleman himself to the great cause of prohibition or its converse were not sufficiently transparent to require no observation from him. The object of the convention at Montreal was simply that they might collect from the friends of prohibition—not merely from temperance men, but from all parties who had the cause of temperance legislation at heart—the opinion held as to the practicability of taking parliamentary action. The object, so far as he understood it, was to take the movement out of the position of a purely temperance sentiment, and deal with it as a great practical issue to be presented in due time to the country. And nothing that was done on that occasion, and nothing that had been done by his hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) since, had been at all at variance with the objects of that convention. Indeed, he might venture to say that, without any assistance from the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) led or sustained by the gigantic efforts in the cause by the hon. member for Lisgar, in Manitoba and elsewhere, there was no cause that was making so much progress in the country at the present moment as the cause of the legislative suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. If any one were behind-hand in that effort, it had not been the politicians. He believed that the House of Commons had been prepared to go just as far as sensible men outside its walls desired it should go. He had the pleasure only a short time ago of presiding at a large demonstration in East York, in the village of Markham, and there a lady, whose name has become a household word with this question, Mrs. Youmans, of Picton, told the people that the matter rested in their hands; that Parliament had, in the Dunkin Act, provided means whereby they might express their own will with regard to the liquor traffic, and that it was not for one moment to be expected Parliament would initiate fresh legislation until the people themselves had exhausted all the powers which Parliament had already placed in their hands. That advice was being acted upon, and the Dunkin Act agitation was assuming large proportions in all parts of Ontario and Quebec. In the county with which he (Mr. Dymond) was politically connected, the Dunkin Act had been carried by 45<sup>9</sup> majority. A great deal had been said by the hon. member for North Huron with regard to the private views or opinions of the hon. gentleman who led the Government. He (Mr. Dymond) took the opportunity a year ago of being present with the deputation who waited on that hon. gentleman. Every member of that delegation, with the exception of Mr. Malcolm Cameron, left the room with the conviction freely expressed that the Premier had said all that could be expected of him, and that he was just as earnest as any one of his visitors in his desire to see a Prohibitory Law take effect when the public opinion of this country could justify it. It happened, as they were retiring, that a conversation between the Premier and Mr. Cameron took place, and that gentleman, misunderstanding something that the Premier had said, which he would have understood had he had a little patience, rushed out, and in the course of a few hours made the speech which had been alluded to, and from which some doubt upon the sincerity of the Premier seemed to be cast. This was the simple history of an occurrence of which much had been said by the Conservative press.

STOUFFVILLE ELECTORS' REPRESENTATION BILL.

[BILL No. 70.]

(Mr. Metcalfe.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he was obliged to the promoter of the Bill for having brought this matter to the attention of Parliament, because it was necessary that some legislation should be enacted as, otherwise, there would be some danger of a portion of some constituencies being entirely disfranchised. Local Legislatures could not help this matter, for, as he understood the law, they had no right to interfere with the territorial boundaries of constituencies represented in this House.

Mr. BLAKE said it was the fact that in such cases there was no adequate provision for the returning officer obtaining the proper voters' lists and adjusting such difficulties; some law ought to be enacted to meet the case. They ought not to be dependent upon the accident of a Local Legislature making special provision as in this case. He would be very glad to receive privately from his hon. friend the other instances to which he referred, and to consider them, with others, before the next Session, so that such alterations as were necessary in the Election Law might be made before the next election. The hon. gentleman would best consider the convenience of the House if he allowed the order to be discharged.

Mr. METCALFE moved that the order be discharged.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON RAILWAYS BILL.—[BILL No. 89.]

(Mr. Trow.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. TROW said that for the last twenty years he had travelled extensively on railways both in the United States and Canada, and, whatever hon. gentlemen or the Government might think of this Bill, he was perfectly satisfied that some restrictions ought to be placed on the companies and better provision made for the protection of life and property. This country had paid very largely for the construction of railways and it behooved this Parliament to protect the travelling community to the best of their ability. In this Bill he had not overlooked the interests of the railway; they would receive what was right, but it was provided that they should take no undue advantage of the public. He had received a number of letters, one from a Canadian railway manager, approving of the principle of the Bill. If the Bill went before Committee, he would feel inclined to add even a few more clauses for the better protection of the travelling community which, since drafting the Bill, he had become convinced were necessary. The law required that returns of accidents should be made semi-annually, but he found that no return had been made since 1871. From the newspapers, however, he gathered that passengers not having tickets had been put off trains and lost their lives through walking on the tracks. It was necessary that some restriction should be imposed in that respect. The first clause provided that, whenever a passenger purchased a ticket, he should receive value for his money, even to the extent of returning to his starting point by another train if sickness or any other cause prevented him from completing his contemplated journey. It was also provided that no passenger should be required to produce his ticket or pay his fare if the company failed to find him a seat. This was a very necessary reform, and one which could be easily carried out, if the railroad companies would show a little consideration for their passengers. It was not right that anyone should pay unless he received the accommodation for which he paid. He had seen ladies and infirm persons standing in crowded cars, when by putting on an extra car for the first few miles from the station the train started from, everyone could have been seated comfortably. There was another hardship which pressed upon the travelling community. Passengers not getting tickets before entering the cars were charged extra. At some stations the ticket-agent did not arrive until a few minutes before the train started, and there was a general rush for tickets; and it was almost impossible for everyone to pay their fare before starting, as desired. Besides, at some stations there were a gang of thieves, who were always on the alert to see where people, in a hurry, placed their purses; and the result of this regulation of the railway companies was that many persons were robbed. He also provided that anyone not getting a seat in one car should have the privilege of going into any other attached to the engine.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No matter whom it belongs to?

Mr. TROW said he had seen one person occupying a car in the Lower Provinces, and he did not think it was right that females and infirm persons should stand and one man have a whole car to himself. He was aware that the companies might assert that they required some safeguard to make the conductors honest, and that there was no other way of affecting this than having the fares prepaid at the stations. He had a better idea than this of the human family. He believed that conductors would be honest if sufficiently remunerated for their services. As a rule they were honest, and, if properly treated, they would no doubt make proper and honest returns. One particular clause he considered essential; this was that no conductor or railway official should put a passenger off, unless at a station. The wording of the present Act in this respect was indefinite. It stated that any passenger refusing to pay his fare, should be put off the car with his baggage at any usual stopping place or near any dwelling-house. It would do no injury to the companies to put them off at a station or at some place of safety at all events. This would be much better than to eject them at some isolated point on the road; under such circumstances, persons at times had no opportunity of leaving the track and the result was that many valuable lives were lost. He thought that the wording of the Bill was so plain that it recommended itself to the members of the House. Some restrictions on present usages were highly essential and necessary. He proposed the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BROUSE said it was the duty of the House to carefully legislate for the comfort and protection of the people, and at the same time to see that no legislation calculated to injure our railway system took place. He could not agree that, if all the clauses of the Bill were passed, the general public would be advantaged. For instance, the first clause stated that tickets should be good for the trip mentioned at any future time. They knew that railways in summer, when competing with navigation lines, were obliged to carry passengers at lower rates than during winter, and if this clause became law, tickets could be purchased in summer and used in winter. During summer the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway issued second class tickets between Ottawa and Montreal for $2, while their price in winter was $4; consequently if this clause was passed, persons desirous of sending four or five hundred men to the shanties, could buy their tickets in the summer at the reduced rate, defrauding the company of $2 on each ticket. If passengers were allowed to remain over at stations, the effect would be that parties would traffic in railway tickets. They knew that, on competing lines, rates were very much lower for long than for short distances; and under this system, persons would buy tickets for long distances, travel a short distance on them, and then sell them, to the great injury of railways. If the clause requiring companies to find seats for passengers were adopted, no railway would know what accommodation to provide for each day, and this it would be impossible to ascertain. This regulation would consequently cripple roads and destroy the good effect of our general railway system. Another point was that an individual could take his seat in any car. They were aware, however, that railways had no control over the seating accommodation on Pullman cars, and hence this regulation would do an injury to the companies. Again, there were directors, and paymasters' cars, practically private offices, and it would not do to authorise people to take seats in them. Many points in the Bill should be carefully considered. He really trusted that his hon. friend would not force the Bill on the House in its present condition, and he hoped that in Committee, due protection would be given to the railway companies as well as to individuals.

Mr. OLIVER said he thought the mover of the Bill deserved the thanks of the House and the country for preparing it and bringing it before the House. It ought to be passed, in the interests of the travelling community. His hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Brouse) took exception to the first clause, providing that a ticket should be good for the trip for which it was sold. If he was not very much mistaken, in the State of New York a decision had been given to this effect. If this was law and justice in New York, why should it not be so here? If the price of a ticket from Toronto to Montreal was reduced from $12 to $8, in consequence of steamboat competition, this price became the regular fare for the time being; and, this being the case, those who bought tickets for $8 did not ride at reduced rates. He could not see why a railway should not allow a passenger, under circumstances which could not be avoided, to get out of a train at one station, and take passage again on another train, on the same ticket. When people paid for anything at all, they expected to get that for which they paid. It was not at all to be supposed that the travelling community would, for the mere pleasure of the thing, get off one train and get on other trains, under such circumstances, after intervals of an hour or two, or of a day or two. He thought it was but an act of justice for railway companies to find seats for those to whom they sold tickets. If they were not prepared of their own accord to do so, they should be compelled by law to do so. People did not buy tickets for the privilege of standing in cars. The mover of the Bill had referred to advantages which railway companies enjoyed in this country as well as in other countries, and, under these circumstances, the people certainly ought to expect a fair share of justice from them. Another important clause provided that passengers who, unfortunately, had no money with which to pay for tickets, ought to be put off at convenient points in place of being ejected at points where there was no shelter. Common humanity ought to compel railway companies to take proper care of the travelling community, even if unfortunate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Common honesty ought to keep such persons off the cars.

Mr. OLIVER said that some people, under certain circumstances, had to take advantage of trains, who were not able to pay for the accommodation they received. Such people ought not to be thrown off the cars as was at present the case. A young man from his own town had, within the last twelve months, happened to enter the wrong train on the Grand Trunk, north of London, for which he had no ticket, and being thrown off had his leg broken by a freight train which was following, and the leg had to be amputated a short time afterwards. He thought that at all events the travelling community ought to be dealt leniently with. He would only take one exception to the Bill, and this had reference to the payment for tickets on the train itself. He had some doubts as to the wisdom of compelling companies to take the same amount for tickets on trains as at the regular offices. He hoped that the Bill would be allowed to pass the second reading, and to be referred to the Committee on Railways, where it would be dealt with fairly, as was usual in such cases.

Mr. POWER said he thought that the Bill in its present state would be more injurious than beneficial to the travelling public. If, for instance, there were thirty or forty more passengers applying for tickets than was customary, the result would be that seats would either have to be provided, or the overplus could not enter the cars, for the companies would not allow any to enter whom they could not seat. He thought, however, that these companies should be obliged to open their offices for the sale of tickets at least half an hour before trains started, preventing the rush for tickets and the confusion that was now prevalent under such circumstances. It was a common thing for travellers to secure cars for themselves or for families, and it would not be just to allow, say second class passengers, to force their way into such cars. Several of the clauses of the Bill would not have a beneficial effect, and before it should be permitted to become law they should be struck out.

Mr. BOWELL said any one looking over the Bill must have come to the conclusion that, if it was not framed in the interest of spongers, who desired free rides, and of dishonest conductors, certainly if it ever became law it would have that effect. It provided among other things, that if a man without money jumped on a train a railway company would be compelled to convey him to the next station, and this ruse could be repeated until such a person arrived at his destination. It would be preferable to make it compulsory on these companies to carry people to their destinations, and, if they had no money, they could sue them for their fares. This would make business for the lawyers, and it would matter very little whether the company was defeated on the execution or not. However, it did seem that a proposition of this kind was not only absurd but monstrous. The hon. gentleman said he had provided for special or irregular trains. Let him instance a case: There were five or seven regular trains between Toronto and Hamilton each day. During the Provincial fair, there were a number of special or extra trains. Under this Bill there would be no protection to those who desired to go to the fair. The extra trains would be, of course, crowded to excess, and it would be impossible for the railway company to procure carriages enough to meet this particular case. All the trains, both regular and irregular, would be crowded; yet it was only upon the irregular trains that the company were allowed to do as they pleased. There were three trains between Hamilton and Toronto which did not stop at every station, but went through in about an hour and ten minutes; and, on every one of them, any person who desired to be dishonest enough could steal a free ride each way. The second clause provided for making the ticket good for the full journey. There was some force in that provision. And yet there were cases in which that might be abused. He had been informed and he believed it was true that sometimes a person who had purchased a through return ticket from Toronto to Montreal would, when he had arrived at one or two stations this side of Montreal, step out and buy another ticket for the rest of the journey, which he would hand to the conductor when he collected the tickets. On returning he would buy a ticket the same way, a station or two this side of Toronto, and thus he could retain possession of his return ticket for future use. Of course that was a fraud, and it was punishable but still there was great difficulty in ascertaining the fact whether he had travelled over the road or not. The clause also which provided for the purchasing of tickets seemed to be very objectionable. He was of the opinion that no clause could be framed which would be so much in the interest of dishonest conductors as that. There were many other objections to the Bill, which he was sure would have to be met before the Railway Committee. If it was understood that the Bill should go before that Committee, he would have no objection to its being read the second time. As the Bill stood, no practical man, acquainted with the running of trains, would consent to its being placed on the Statute-book. He could not understand why every passenger train was required to stop three minutes at every station. The stoppages were already long enough, and, unless there was business enough to make it pay, trains should not be made to stop three minutes at every station. While it might be necessary to place some restrictions upon the conduct of railway owners in the protection of passengers and railway employes, he could conceive it possible that any country would adopt a Bill of this character.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no doubt this Bill had been prepared by his hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) with the greatest desire to accommodate the travelling public. But, on the other hand, the Government had a duty to perform towards railway companies, especially as they happened to be large railway owners themselves. Many of the clauses contained provisions which would be intolerable if carried into practice. For instance, a company had to pay a certain rate for each passenger in the Pullman cars; and yet, according to this Bill, persons might make the pretence that there were no seats in the other part of the train, might force themselves into the Pullman cars, and compel the company to pay for their riding there.

Mr. TROW said he only intended that persons should be able to go into the same grade of cars. He wished the Bill altered so as to be consonant with this.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It would not do, as provided in the 7th clause, to insist that all passenger trains should have platforms connecting each two carriages.

Mr. TROW said he intended that that clause should be omitted entirely.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the 9th clause provided for taking possession of all railroads, whether the Government had them under their jurisdiction or not. The Government could only deal with those roads that were under its jurisdiction. That matter was provided for fully in the General Railway Act. There were several provisions which, he was really afraid, would be disastrous to a company. It was tolerably clear that anyone could travel from Montreal to Chicago free, if he had plenty of time, by not taking a ticket, and by getting on again after being put off at each station, "if his hide held out," according to the old saying. The provision as to buying the tickets before entering the car had been made to prevent fraud on the part of conductors, who, however honest they might be as a class, had men amongst them who took advantage of people buying tickets on the trains to defraud their employers; and, therefore, it was only right that passengers should be discouraged, by having to pay a small additional price, from purchasing on the trains. The Great Western Railway had attempted to force all passengers to purchase their tickets before entering the trains, but it had failed on account of the open character of the stations which was so general throughout the country. The only protection companies had was in imposing a small additional price for tickets bought on the trains. He would not object to the Bill going before the Railway Committee, but he would warn his hon. friend that he must submit to a great many changes in it before he could get it through that Committee.

Mr. PLUMB said he was very much pleased at the position taken by the First Minister with regard to this Bill. It seemed to him that the time of this House should not be taken up with the consideration of such Bills. He could scarcely see why it should go before the Railway Committee. No doubt it was out of kindness to the hon. mover that the First Minister had assented to that course. He (Mr. Plumb) would like to know of a single clause which warranted its being recommended to the serious consideration of the Railway Committee. There was not a clause in it which had been framed by any one conversant with the necessities of railway companies. The first clause provided that railway companies should not be permitted to limit the use of their tickets to any particular time. But it was necessary that they should be allowed to do so, as otherwise, in case of an increase in the price of tickets, speculators could buy a number of tickets and sell them at a profit to themselves. He had known this to be often done. There were many other clauses that were objectionable, and, under all the circumstances, he thought the Bill should not be permitted to have its second reading.

Bill read the second time and referred.

ONTARIO PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 101.]

(Mr. Wood.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading, read.

Mr. McCARTHY said he had not heard the explanations that had been given by the hon. member for Hamilton, but, without pretending to object to this particular measure, he must confess that he had a very great objection to the way in which these building societies were managed throughout the Province of Ontario; and he thought, before any extension of power was given to them, it should be seen that the power they already possessed was not abused, as he believed it was to a very great extent. This Bill proposed to give building societies power to borrow more money than they were entitled to do under the present law. They sent out notices and circulars stating that they would lend money at 5 or 6 per cent., yet it was found, when a case came up for settlement, that from 15 to 20 per cent. was paid. He was informed, and he believed that his information was correct, that there were arrangements made with insurance companies to compel parties to insure in a particular company, and that they got a commission on the amount of each premium. The profits were so large that the salaries of the managers of some of these societies were larger than the salary of the Premier of Canada. He had had some little experience with these companies professionally, and he might mention some facts which came under his own knowledge. A farmer borrowed $1,000, and at the end of two or three years had paid between $400 and $500. At the end of that time he failed to pay anything, and he had to give a renewal mortgage, as it was called. In five or six years this unfortunate man had to pay twice the amount of the original debt, without being credited with what he had paid in the interim. They lent a man $1,000 and capitalized it with the interest for a period of say ten years, so that he appeared to borrow $2,000, and then, if he fell into arrears, he had to pay a fine of 12 or 12½ per cent. on the arrearages.

Mr. WOOD: What company does that?

Mr. McCARTHY said he would not name the company, but might say that it was not that with which the hon. gentleman was connected, but was one in Toronto. If the hon. gentleman wished for more information, he would give it to him privately. But it was the general practice to do this. He submitted that, if this was a sample of the mode in which these building societies carried on their business, the House ought to be very chary of granting them new power. If no action in the matter was taken this Session, he intended to move for a Committee next Session to enquire into the affairs of building societies.

Mr. OLIVER said, while the hon. member for Cardwell was moving for this Committee, he might extend his investigations to the banks as well as to building societies. There were two classes of building societies, one class were allowed to take deposits when they had a paid-up capital of $40,000 to an equal amount, while the other class were only allowed to borrow to the extent of one and one-third more than the paid-up capital. The Bill proposed simply to deal with that class which had a capital of $200,000; but, if one class was allowed to go into the English market, borrow money and afterwards lend it in Canada, the other class of societies should have the same privilege for the society with a small capital might be as safe as one with a large capital.

INCORPORATION OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

[BILL No. 67.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

THIRD READING.

Order for the third reading read.

Mr. WORKMAN moved :

“That the Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same, by inserting the following Sections, after Clause 94 :—

“It shall be lawful for the company to unite, amalgamate and consolidate its stock, property, business and franchises with those of any other company or society incorporated or chartered to transact a like business and any other business in connection with such business, or any building, savings or loan company or society heretofore or hereafter incorporated or chartered, or to purchase and acquire the assets of any such company or society, and to enter into all contracts and agreements therewith necessary to such union, amalgamation, consolidation, purchase, or acquisition.

“The directors of the company, and of any other such company or society, may enter into a joint agreement under the corporate seals of each of the said corporations for the union, amalgamation or consolidation of the said corporations, or for the purchase and acquisition by the company of the assets of any other such company or society, prescribing the terms and conditions thereof, the mode of carrying the same into effect, the name of the new corporation, the number of the directors and other officers thereof, and who shall be the first directors and officers thereof, the manner of converting the capital stock of each of the said corporations into that of the new corporation, with such other details as they shall deem necessary to perfect such new organization, and the union, amalgamation and consolidation of the said corporations and the after management and working thereof, or the terms and mode of payment for the assets of any other such company or society purchased or acquired by the company.

“Such agreement shall be submitted to the shareholders of each of the said corporations at a meeting thereof to be held separately for the purpose of taking the same into consideration. Notice of the time and place of such meetings, and the objects thereof, shall be given by written or printed notices addressed to each shareholder of the said corporations respectively, at his last known post office address or place of residence, and also by a general notice to be published in a newspaper published at the chief place of business of such corporations, once a week, for six successive weeks. At such meetings of shareholders such agreement shall be considered, and a vote by ballot taken for the adoption or rejection of the same, each share entitling the holder thereof to one vote, and the said ballots being cast in person or by proxy; and if two-thirds of the votes of all the shareholders of such corporations shall be for the adoption of such agreement, then that fact shall be certified upon the said agreement by the Secretary of each of such corporations under the corporate seals thereof; and if the said agreement shall be so adopted at the respective meetings of the shareholders of each of the said corporations, the agreement so adopted and the said certificates thereon shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State of the Dominion of Canada, and the said agreement shall from thence be taken and deemed to be the agreement and act of union, amalgamation and consolidation of the said corporations, or the agreement and deed of purchase and acquisition by the Company of the assets of such company so selling, as the case may be, and a copy of such agreement so filed, and of the certificates thereon properly certified, shall be evidence of the existence of such new corporation.

“Provided nevertheless—that due proof of the foregoing facts shall be laid before the Governor in Council, and, it deemed expedient by the Governor in Council, letters patent shall be issued and notice thereof duly published by the Secretary of State in the Canada Gazette, after which the new corporation may transact business.

“Upon the making and perfecting of the said agreement and act of consolidation, as provided in the next preceding section, the several societies, parties thereto, shall be deemed and taken to be consolidated, and to form one corporation by the name in the said agreement, provided with a common seal, and shall possess all the rights, privileges, and franchises of each of such corporations.

“Upon the consummation of such act of consolidation as aforesaid, all and singular the business property, real, personal and mixed, and all rights and incidents appurtenant thereto, all stock, mortgages or other securities, subscriptions and other debts due on whatever account, and other things in action belonging to such corporations or either of them, shall be taken or deemed to be transferred to and vested in such new corporation without further act or deed; provided, however, that all rights of creditors and liens upon the property of either of such corporations shall be unimpaired by such consolidation, and all debts, liabilities, and duties of either of the said corporations shall thenceforth attach to the new corporation, and be enforced against it to the same extent as if the said debts, liabilities and duties had been incurred or been contracted by it; and provided also that no action or proceeding, legal or equitable, by or against the said corporations so consolidated, or either of them, shall abate or be affected by such consolidation, but for all the purposes of such action or proceeding such corporation may be deemed still to exist; or the new corporation may be substituted in such action or proceeding in the place thereof."

Mr. HOLTON explained that these clauses had been struck out of a private Bill, not because they were objectionable, but because there was no provision of that kind in the general Bill. The clauses merely provided for amalgamation.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government were prepared to accept the clauses.

Amendment agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Bill amended in accordance with instruction.

House resumed.

Amendments reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Question put on the third reading of the Bill, as amended.

Mr. JETTÉ moved that the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend it, by inserting, after section 42, the following section:—

"(a.) Whenever the interest in any share or shares of the capital stock of the company shall be transmitted, by the death of any shareholder or otherwise, or whenever the ownership of or legal right of possession in any such share or shares shall change by any lawful means, other than by transfer, according to the provisions of this Act, and the directors of the company shall entertain reasonable doubts as to the legality of any claim to and upon such share or shares of stock, then, and in such case, it shall be lawful for the company to make and file, in one of the Superior Courts of Law and Equity in the Province in which the head office of the company is situated, a declaration or petition, in writing, addressed to the Justices of the Court, setting forth the facts and the number of shares previously belonging to the party in whose name such shares stand in the books of the company, and praying for an order or judgment adjudicating and awarding the said shares to the party or parties legally entitled to the same, and by which order or judgment the company shall be guided and held fully harmless and indemnified and released from all and every other claim for the said share, or arising therefrom: Provided always, that notice of such petition shall be given to the party claiming such share or shares, or to the attorney of such party duly authorized for the purpose, who shall, upon the filing of such petition, establish his right to the several shares referred to in such petition; and the delays to plead and all other proceedings in such cases shall be the same as those observed in analogous cases before the Superior Courts: Provided also, that the costs and expenses of procuring such order and adjudication shall be paid by the party or parties to whom the said shares shall be declared lawfully to belong, and such shares shall not be transferred until such costs and expenses be paid, saving the recourse of such party against any party contesting his right."

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. CARON moved: "That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to insert therein the following amendments:—

"That in the statement of liabilities and assets which the Insolvent is required, under the seventeenth section of the Act hereinbefore cited, to furnish to the Assignee, the Insolvent shall discriminate between his liabilities to traders and non-traders. At any time after the making of the assignment, or the issue of the writ of attachment and previous to the first meeting of the creditors, any creditor who is a non-trader may notify the Assignee in writing that such is the case, and that he proposes to avail himself of the provisions of this Act; and no non-trader who shall have so notified the Assignee shall be bound to accept the composition, or sign the discharge of the Insolvent, but the claim of such non-trader shall, nevertheless, be ranked by the Assignee upon the dividend sheet for a dividend or dividends in like manner as the claims of other creditors; and the receipt signed by the non-trader for such dividend shall be a receipt pro tanto in respect of such claim as aforesaid.

"That a non-trader, that is to say:—Any farmer, grazier, common labourer, workman for hire, or other person, who cannot be declared an Insolvent under the Act herein above cited, who has availed himself of the provisions of this Act, may attend at meetings of the creditors of the Insolvent and may vote thereat in the same manner as other creditors, except that such non-trader shall not vote upon any question touching the acceptance of any offer of composition, or the discharge of the Insolvent; and in calculating the number of creditors and the amount of the claims against the Insolvent, upon which the acceptance of a deed of composition and discharge, or the consent to the discharge of the Insolvent is based, non-traders who have availed themselves of the provisions of this Act, and the amount of their claims shall not be computed; and no deed of composition and discharge, nor any discharge from the Court or Judge shall in any way impair the right of a non-trader who has availed himself of the provisions of this Act, to recover from the Insolvent any balance that may remain unpaid upon the claim of such non-trader, but the said balance may be recovered in like manner as if no proceedings in Insolvency had been entered into, notwithstanding the acceptance by the non-trader of any dividend from the Assignee as herein before provided; Provided always that no non-trader shall avail himself of the provisions of this and the preceding clause, in the case of an Insolvent whom such non-trader has required or forced to go into Insolvency."

He said last Session he had the honor of moving an amendment to the Insolvent Act, which contained exactly what was contained in the amendment he now proposed. He would not have again troubled the House in this respect, did he not consider that the Act, as it now stood, was an injustice to the non-traders. It was stated that the law was intended to be a relief to one class. But he could not see why this relief should not be extended to the class of non-traders. If a non-trader were overtaken by misfortune, he ought to have the same opportunities for relief as a trader. He saw no reason why this clause should be excluded from the Insolvent Law. From the beginning, he had been opposed to such a law, but if it were to remain on the Statute-book, it ought to apply equally to traders and non-traders.

Mr. BLAKE said he would imitate the admirable brevity of the hon. gentleman, because the House had discussed this subject on several occasions, and it was useless to re-discuss it. The hon. gentleman had laid down three propositions in his remarks. First that the benefit of the law should be extended to non-traders; second, that it should not be for the relief of one class; and, third, that he was opposed altogether to the principle of the law. The hon. gentleman must know that non-traders did not want the law extended to them. He acknowledged that this class did not want this alleged benefit, but he proposed that they should not be subject to accept the position that a trader's creditors obliged him to accept. There was only one principle upon which a discharge was justified: that it was not the interest of the state that a man whose property had been taken away, who fulfilled the general conditions under which a discharge was granted, should not be freed from his liabilities and enabled to start afresh. The proposition of his hon. friend would be entirely subversive of the very basis on which the discharge was founded, and, if admitted, would make the whole law inefficacious.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was surprised at the line of argument taken by the hon. the Minister of Justice, who said in effect that the object of the law was to give a man complete and final discharge.

Mr. BLAKE said that what he wished to convey was that one of the elements of the law was that the debtor should have his discharge.

Mr. MITCHELL said that was substantially what he said. The hon. the Minister of Justice had forced upon the country a law which exempted a large class from its operation. The position of the hon. gentleman was illogical and inconsistent. They did not want any hair-splitting on a subject of this character; no class should be debarred from the benefits of a law of this kind. When he thought of the effects of the Bill, it roused a feeling of indignation within him against the men who introduced it, and who perpetuated it in the country. The result of the law was shown by the statistics presented by the hon. member for Prince Edward proving that the average payments under it only amounted to 22 per cent. of the liabilities. The Minister of Justice wished to oblige such debtors to pay fifty cents on the dollars, and how were they to get their discharge under the circumstances. The law was an outrage on the common sense of the community. He hoped that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec would show whether or not these hon. gentlemen would prevent the farmers, who formed so large a class of the community, from getting the benefit of the Act, or, at least, protection from its tyrannical operation.

Mr. TROW said that, in looking over the Insolvent Acts of 1869 and 1875, and the amended Bill under discussion, he saw no provision made for the discharge or the personal reports of the assignee. Probably the Minister of Justice would give him some explanation on this point. Another provision he considered essential would be to the effect that when real estate was offered for sale by auction the assignee should have the privilege of selling it at private sale in the interest of the estate.

Mr. BLAKE: On the third reading I will inform my hon. friend. These points are not germane to the amendment.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said his hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Caron) deserved credit for the position he had taken. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that about 75 per cent. of the whole population of the country were farmers, who could not take advantage of this law. (Great numbers of this class became security for merchants and others, and hence were often dragged into difficulty. The Government, nevertheless, took no steps to protect them, and they were obliged to pay every dollar of their debts. He had never believed that it would be well for farmers to be able to take advantage of the Bankruptcy Act, but, then, they ought not be compelled to accept less than the full payment from the merchant of every farthing due by the merchant or insolvent to such farmer, although the merchant might not pay more than five cents to other traders who came under the Insolvency Act, and could take advantage of the Act. The farmers should have fair play; they asked for nothing more and they would be content with nothing else. If this 75 per cent. of our population were in presence of the Minister of Justice, to one man they would endorse this statement.

Mr. BLAKE: I represent 40,000 of them.

Mr. POPE said the hon. gentleman misrepresented 40,000 of them. The farmers only desired fair play and justice.

Mr. BABY said he had always opposed the Insolvent Act. It was based on class legislation. Between traders no difficulty was experienced in this relation. The wholesale merchant obtained all he could from the insolvent dealer, and consoled himself with the reflection that he would yet make up his loss out of his profits, by selling goods at such and such a price, and by charging interest on notes, etc. The same state of things, however, did not apply to the non-trader; generally speaking in rural constituencies, farmers looked up to the trader as an honest man. The latter bought grain, &c., from the farmers, and, if he failed, often occasioned them serious loss, though such losses might not be so considered by the wholesale merchant. Farmers, moreover, had generally no voice in the meeting of creditors and their interests were usually overlooked. He was desirous of seeing this condition of affairs done away with, and he would, consequently, vote for the amendment.

Mr. LAURIER said it was touching to see the interest showed by the hon. gentlemen opposite in the interest of the country, though, when they were in power, the Insolvency Acts of 1864 and 1865 had been passed. He was surprised to hear gentlemen occupying the positions of the hon. members for Quebec and Joliette express the sentiments to which they had given utterance. He had very recently heard the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Baby) speak in high terms of the civil code of Lower Canada; and the hon. gentleman knew very well that the principle of the French law in insolvency matters applied to all creditors indiscriminately, whether they were traders or not. The hon. gentleman said the Act was immoral; but he was sure that his hon. friend was at variance with himself in this relation. In the French law, and he believed in the laws of every civilized nation, there were prescriptions. In the English law he thought they were known as the Statute of Limitations, and this was then certainly more immoral than an Insolvency Act. But it was better that such provisions should exist, else greater prejudices would occur. He could not conceive, for the very reason which had been given by the Minister of Justice, that an Insolvency Law should not apply to all classes of creditors without distinction.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the Insolvent Act of 1864 applied to farmers and other persons.

Mr. LAURIER said that this law in Ontario applied to all persons indiscriminately. However, in Quebec, traders only had been able to take advantage of it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said that not one per cent. of the farmers were ruined by endorsing notes.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said that when the Bill included non-traders, he had moved in amendment that the clause relating to this class be struck out, and hon. gentlemen opposite had accepted it. Since then, he had conversed with a great many farmers on the subject, and they thought that it was an insult to them to be included in the Act. He did not believe that the majority of farmers desired to take advantage of it.

Mr. CIMON said he admitted there was something special in the law in Quebec with relation to this subject; but it did not follow, however, that it worked to the detriment of other classes of society. One creditor under the French law could not act to the detriment of the other creditors in an estate. He did not agree with the view that the law relating to prescription was more immoral than the Insolvency Law. The hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier) reproached hon. members on his side of the House with an interest in the affairs of farmers and labourers; but this was certainly no ground for censure. Their constituents would not be of the same opinion as had been expressed by the hon. member for Arthabaska. A trader in his county had purchased supplies from the farmers, and even borrowed money from them; he also owed wages to labourers; under these circumstances he got into difficulties, and the merchants of Quebec, whom he owed, made an arrangement according to which the insolvent secured his discharge, while the unfortunate farmers and labourers lost all that was due them. A bankruptcy law should be extended to all classes or else it should not exist at all. It should not provide for a privileged class--all classes should, with respect to the payment of their debts, be placed on the same footing. He would vote for the amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY pointed out that there were some kinds of debts for which a man could not get his discharge under the present law. He therefore thought the amendment merely extended a principle that had existed for a number of years, and this view of the matter would meet the objections of the hon. the Minister of Justice. Farmers, most likely, did not wish to come within the provisions of the Insolvent Law, but, if they could not get any of its advantages, he did not see why they should be compelled to accept a settlement under it.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he had great doubt whether it was in the interests of the country that a Bankrupt Law should be upon the Statute-book as a permanent law. He had come to the House prepared to vote for its repeal, but, from the arguments that had been presented, he was content that it should remain another season. However, as a farmer, he was not willing that farmers should be amongst those who were exempted from the operations of the Act; he did not think it a compliment that they should be so placed. He would vote against the amendment, and, unless he changed his mind, he would support the repeal of the Act.

Bill read the third time.

Mr. BLAKE moved that the Bill do now pass.

Mr. GOUDGE moved in amendment:

“ That the said Bill do not now pass, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding the following proviso:—

“ Provided always that in such of the Provinces when by the laws thereof judgment of Courts of Record may be recorded against the lands, such judgments so recorded shall not be considered a lien on the said lands if recorded within thirty days before a writ of attachment has issued or an assignment has been made.”

Mr. BLAKE said he had considered a good deal what his hon. friend proposed, and he was not of opinion that it was the most satisfactory way of dealing with the subject to which he had referred. He was obliged to move another amendment, viz.: That the following be added to Section 133 as Sub-section 2:—

“ In any Province in which the record of registration against lands of a judgment creates a lien or charge against lands, any such record or registration effected against the lands of a debtor within thirty days next before a demand for an assignment or for the issue of a writ of attachment, whenever such demand shall have been followed by an assignment or by the issue of a writ of attachment, shall be null and void.”

Mr. GOUDGE said he would withdraw his amendment. The only reason he put it was that he feared the Bill would be allowed to pass without any such provision. In the Province of Nova Scotia it had been decided by the Courts that, when a judgment had been recorded or registered, it was a lien on real estate and the creditors were debarred from any benefit from the lands in consequence of the recording of the judgment. The law as it now stood in Nova Scotia was a source of much injury to parties interested, and he was glad that the Minister of Justice had taken the matter in hand.

Mr. McISAAC said the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hants sought only a part of what was entirely provided by the very section he proposed to amend, and the amendment of the Minister of Justice, as a substitute therefor, was not materially different. The member for Hants stated that the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia had decided that a recorded judgment attached land and became preferential, but he probably forgot that the decision he meant had been given under the Insolvent Law of 1869, not that of 1875. The late Judge McCully, he believed it was, decided that a recorded judgment secured to the claimant its full amount, preferentially, out of the real estate of an insolvent, notwithstanding an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The Judge maintained that, under the Act of 1869, a judgment duly registered created the same lien or privilege that a mortgage or hypothec did. Under that Act, like the Act of 1875, the recording of a judgment, even the placing of an execution thereof in the hands of a sheriff, did not affect the personal property of the insolvent so as to prevent its vesting in the assignee, unless in the case of actual sale, and the payment of the money realized to the party entitled. By the Act of 1875, so far as a registered judgment was concerned, the real and personal estate of an insolvent were put on a perfect equality, and the very clause the hon. member wished to amend was the one effecting the equality. It distinctly said that no lien or privilege upon either the personal or real estate of the insolvent should be created for the amount of any judgment debt, unless before assignment the money levied under an execution was actually paid over to the plaintiff. In that view, which he believed to be correct, the proposed amendments were entirely unnecessary.

Mr. GOUDGE said that, while a judgment might have been rendered under the Act of 1869, a judgment had also been rendered since 1875, which had been accepted as law in the Province of Nova Scotia, and it was a fact that all real estates against which judgments had been obtained were abandoned by the creditors, if the judgments had been recorded but a single day before the assignment had been made. In consultation with business men, not only of Windsor, but of Halifax, he had found that the opinions were general that the present law was a great hardship as it referred to Nova Scotia. There it was not the execution of a judgment which gave it validity, but its mere recording. He believed that, since the passing of the Act of 1876, their judges in Nova Scotia had decided that it was not the issuing of the judgment, but its recording, which made it valid, and that a judgment once recorded, stood in the name and for the benefit of the party in whose favour it had been given alone. Therefore, he felt that no injustice could be done in placing judgments in the same category with all other transactions that might take place between the debtor and the creditor, even of the most proper kind, which required that 30 days should elapse between the date of the conveyance or sale and the time of the assignment, before it was valid. If the House refused to pass the amendment, the object of the section would be entirely frustrated as regarded the relations between debtor and creditor in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he apprehended that the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Justice must be of the same nature, and proposed the same effects as the amendment of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Goudge). The only difference was that it was transposed from one section of the law to another. He thought it a great hardship that a creditor, asking to recover a just debt from a man in perfectly solvent circumstances, who, to defraud his creditor, put in a dilatory plea with which lawyers were so familiar, should, if he recovered judgment twenty-nine days before the Act was committed, be put in the same category as the man who had neglected his claim.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD rose to call attention to two points of order. First, the Minister of Justice having moved that the Bill do pass, could not afterwards move an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand it becomes the motion of the member for Hants (Mr. Goudge).

Mr. Goudge's amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GOUDGE moved :

"That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to add after section 133, the following sub-section: 'In any Province in which the record or registration against lands creates a lien or charge against lands, any such record or registration effected against the lands of a debtor within thirty days next before a demand for an assignment, or for the issue of a writ of attachment, whenever such demand shall have been followed by an assignment or by the issue of a writ of attachment, shall be null and void.'"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not see how the House could go into Committee. He thought they could amend the Bill at this stage, but not by going into Committee, because they had already read the Bill the third time. The 47th rule was as follows:—

"After report the Bill shall be open to debate and amendment before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a Bill is reported without amendment it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time, at such time as may be appointed by the House."

Mr. HOLTON said there was another point. No amendment could be made at the third reading without a day's notice.

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought he had been hasty in putting the question that the House go back into Committee. It was very unusual that, at this stage, any amendment should be made.

Mr. MASSON said, if the rule stated that it should be done in one way, it meant that it should not be done in another way.

Mr. SPEAKER said, if the rule were interpreted rigidly, it precluded amendments after the Bill was ordered for the third reading, though after that, when the Bill came up for the third reading, it was the almost invariable practice to move to refer it back to Committee to amend. He thought there was another question involved—whether they were not bound by the law of the Imperial Parliament in any case. He was quite satisfied that the Bill, at this stage, could not be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Bill passed.

Mr. SPEAKER.

PAYMENT OF ACTIVE MILITIA BILL.—[BILL NO. 102.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

Order for second reading, read.

Mr. DESJARDINS said he tried to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the opportunity of extending further the enactments of this Bill. He read, in the 1st Clause of this Bill, that—

"Whereas it is provided that the Active Militia, or any corps thereof, may be called out for active service, in aid of the civil power, in any case in which a riot, disturbance of the peace, or other emergency requiring such service, and beyond the power of the civil authorities to deal with, occurs or is anticipated; and these officers and men, so called out, shall receive from the municipality, in which these services are required, pay and allowances."

It would seem to him that there were cases when it would be unjust to leave the burden and expenses of such calls of the Active Militia on the municipality where such emergencies would occur. Suppose the case of disturbances arising in the vicinity of large public works, undertaken for the benefit of the Dominion. For example: For the last two years a great number of strangers were employed on the Lachine Canal, and, as the authorities in the neighbourhood did not possess the means of controlling all these persons, serious disorders had ensued; and not only disorders, but even a case of murder had occurred. He called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that the municipality of Côte St. Paul had not enough means to go to the expense of maintaining a body of constables sufficient to act in such emergencies; and it was unjust to compel the municipality to do so, with regard to enterprises which concerned the entire Dominion; but he was answered that there was nothing to authorize the Government to interfere in the matter. He believed that, as the Minister of Justice had considered it proper to call out the militia in certain cases, as with relation to troubles on railways and in connection with enterprises of this nature, the law should go a little farther, and provide for their use in cases where troubles broke out on public works, as important as those which were in question. A municipality like that of Côte St. Paul should not be obliged to defray the cost of maintaining such a force, when the cause of the difficulty indirectly lay with the Dominion authorities.

Mr. BLAKE said the object of the Bill was to extend the law to cases where the local authorities found themselves unable to deal with an emergency, such as that of disturbances on a railroad running through several municipalities, and in such cases it was proposed that the Dominion Government should pay a portion of the expense of calling out the militia. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) had suggested that, where public works were being constructed in a particular locality and a disturbance arose, a portion of the expenses incurred by that locality should be borne by the Dominion Government. But there was an Act on the Statute-book which provided for the maintenance of the peace at public works; and any legislation such as that suggested, would be germane rather to that Act than to the present Bill. Personally, he was averse to calling out the militia, except in cases of the gravest necessity for the preservation of peace. He thought that, except under most exceptional circumstances, the force should not be called out, and he had very great objection to extending the function of the Dominion and applying its revenues to the maintenance of peace in any locality. Our whole system was opposed to it. Our system was that those matters were to be managed by the local authorities themselves, except in cases of grave public necessity. If a disturbance were local in its origin, it was the function of the municipality; and it was only in cases where disturbances extended to several municipalities that the Bill would apply.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the Bill had been introduced in consequence of the strike on the Grand Trunk Railway during the past winter; but it would be found that power would be given to the Dominion Government to call out a local force if necessary to suppress a riot or outbreak, where, possibly, the local magistracy, being in sympathy with rioters, were unwilling to interfere. He concurred with the opinion expressed by the hon. the Minister of Justice, that the militia should only be called out as a last resort; but he feared the Bill would tend to the militia being called out more frequently when the local authorities knew they would not have to pay the cost. True, there was a provision in the measure leaving the question of whether the expense should be paid or not in the hands of the Governor in Council; but if some persons in authority in municipalities advised the calling out of the militia, they would bring influence to bear on the Government to have the cost paid.

Mr. BOWELL said he agreed with the principle of the Bill, but it did not go as far as he had wished. He desired to point out a defect in the Bill, in regard to calling out the militia in cases of strikes that were not local or provincial in their character. He agreed with the hon. the Minister of Justice, that the militia was not the best force to put down riots. The weapon with which the men were armed was not such as they liked to use. From what he had seen he was convinced that a police force of half the strength as the militia force would be more effectual in cases of riot. Had a municipality the power, in case of calling out the militia, to put a body of the men on board of a train, and accompany it for five, ten or twenty miles? If they had not, then the power sought to be obtained by the Bill would not be accomplished. Belleville was surrounded by municipalities within a short distance, and, in case of a general strike on the railway, the town authorities might order out the militia and force the mails through the town; but the question arose whether the force would be able to remain on board the train and force it through adjoining municipalities. In case of a general railroad strike, the Government should assume the power and responsibility of placing a force upon the trains and compelling the carriage of the mails.

Mr. BLAKE said there was great difficulty in dealing with acts which happened after a strike, and which were no part of the strike. In cases of disturbances, where more than twelve people gathered together, the Riot Act could be read, and if the people remained at the spot one hour afterwards they were liable to punishment. In regard to the case of disturbances extending into several municipalities, difficulty might be obviated by concerted action on the part of the municipal authorities. Hon. members had urged that the Government should take to itself the power of calling out troops, and the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had suggested that the Government should take the extensive power of forcing the mails through the country with the aid of the militia, in case of a general strike and disturbance. Would the hon. gentleman consider for a moment what it was to take out an armed force. When it was taken under the law in aid of the civil power, it was to act under the orders of the civil magistrate, who was amenable to the law for the orders he issued. In what position would any Minister, entrusted with the discharge of the duties be, supposing the telegraphic wires were not cut and he was able to give his orders, if he did not have this power? To whom was he to entrust the command of 25 or 50 men who, with rifle and revolver in hand, were required, in time of peace, to preserve the peace by force of arms?

Mr. BOWELL: To the officer in command.

Mr. BLAKE said we could not do that and retain British liberties. It was the essence of British liberty that the forces could not be taken out in aid of the civil power except under the orders of the civil authorities; and, once grant the commander the authority in the manner suggested, and we destroyed every essence of British liberty, for it would be establishing martial law. That was a step he was not disposed to sanction or permit. We must submit to those inconveniences which were essential to the conditions of the liberties we enjoyed; we should leave it to the civil power to keep the civil peace. In this country, sparsely settled as it was, subject as it was to disturbances, although the peaceable character of the people rendered them rare, we had to depend on that peaceable regular habit of life and feeling, and upon the general co-operation of all good citizens to keep the peace when a time of disturbance came, and he did not propose that the militia should be called out except by the direction and under the responsibility of the local civil authorities. That was the line necessary to be drawn. Whatever inconveniences might follow from drawing that line were infinitely less than the monstrous results which would follow from taking a different view. The hon. gentleman had suggested that cases might arise in which the municipal authorities might be in sympathy with the rioters and would not call out the militia; but he must remember that one law provided that not only the chief municipal officer and two magistrates had the power to call out the militia but also the chairman of the Quarter Sessions who was allowed to call out the militia if the others failed. That official was not dependent on popular suffrage for his position, and his habits and duties were such that he surely could not be suspected of being swayed by sympathy. In the recent case of the strike the trouble was not local in its origin. Belleville was selected as a convenient spot to cease operations; and it would be unfair to say that the trouble was local in its origin. It was not even provincial in its character, because it had reference to a railway which extended beyond the Province. The whole case was met by this clause so far as it was possible to meet it. Power and responsibility went hand in hand. If we added, by legislation, the power to the Government to call out the militia if they saw fit, could we expect that any municipality would call it out under the circumstances. The municipal authorities would say: "The Government has taken the power, and we will wait for them to act." Manifest inconveniences would result. Imperfect as the system might be, it was the best available one under all the circumstances of the country. Without a change of our conditions we could not have a perfect system of keeping the peace, and we had to rely principally on the general principle of good order to which he had referred.

Mr. BROWN said he wished briefly to explain the circumstances connected with the calling out of the volunteers at Belleville. The request to do so was sent to him at 10 o'clock on Saturday night signed by the Mayor and two other magistrates. He at once handed it to the captain in command of No. 1 Co. of the 49th Battalion, the only company in town. Forty-two men responded at once to the call, and were marched down to the station. When they arrived there, they found a large number of things on the track to prevent the express train from coming in, and they set to work to remove them and guarded the men who did not belong to the striking party. Towards daylight the superintendent of the locomotive department volunteered to go out with an engine and bring up the express. The volunteers accompanied him and assisted in bringing the train in. They were sixteen hours on duty there, and he considered that time was long enough for any body of volunteers to be kept engaged at one time. If more men were required the country companies of the battalion could have been obtained at a short notice. The riot did not amount to anything. The men who formed the striking party were around all the time quietly smoking their pipes; and if there had been a well-organized police force in Belleville at the time there might have been no occasion to call out the volunteers at all. Hundreds of people assembled in the neighbourhood after daylight out of curiosity, and if a single shot had been fired he did not know how many innocent persons might have suffered. There was not much necessity for bringing the volunteers up from Toronto, because the Grand Trunk came to an arrangement shortly afterwards. At the same time, he thought it was very hard that a municipality like Belleville should have to guard the whole line from Coburg or Kingston to Napanee. He would, at the proper time, state the facts of the case with regard to the volunteers; but, whether they were properly equipped or not, that had nothing to do with the case, The volunteers had done their duty, and there was no sympathy between them and the strikers. Not one of the volunteers had broken from the ranks on that occasion. He was glad that the Minister of Justice had introduced the Bill. It would have the effect of preventing, not only disturbances of this kind, but also troubles in large manufacturing establishments, where employers were perfectly at the mercy of a great number of employes. He trusted that persons guilty of these disorders would be severely punished. No doubt when the organization in question was first started for benevolent and mutual aid purposes, no fault was to be found with it; but, when the members of it went so far as to dictate what amount of wages they should receive, and the terms, and the hours of labour, they exceeded their just rights, and they ought to be punished for it. He considered the Bill of the Minister of Justice a move in the right direction.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL said he wished to set himself right with regard to the remarks made a few moments previously by the Minister of Justice. While personally he felt very thankful for the homily read them by the hon. gentleman on British liberty, and for the information given them and for the instructions communicated with reference to the duties of the local magistracy on occasions of this kind, he could not admit, and he said this with all due deference and a great degree of modesty, that the hon. gentleman had met the case he had desired to put before the House; what he had desired to point out was, that in case of a riot—he would not use the word strike as it seemed to offend hon. gentlemen opposite—

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward): In the event of a row.

Mr. BOWELL: In case of a row, if this term was preferred, while the Bill to a certain extent would accomplish the object in view, it could not fully accomplish what he would like to see done. He had endeavoured to illustrate his point by instancing the fact of a number of stations along a line like that of the Grand Trunk, over which the mail was carried, at which, under such circumstances, it would be necessary for every municipality to call out some force to force—if he might use the expression—a way for the mail past these stations.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman said, "hear, hear," but how else could it be accomplished? Take Belleville for instance. If a force was called out there to scatter the crowd and put down the rioters, after the Riot Act was read, and send on the train; when it reached Trenton it would be stopped in the same way because this was an organized riot along every station along the line.

Mr. BLAKE: No, no.

Mr. BOWELL said he begged the hon. gentleman's pardon. He said "yes, yes." After passing one station, the train was stopped at other stations.

Mr. BLAKE: That is not every station.

Mr. BOWELL said the train was stopped at Trenton, and similar attempts were made at Brighton and Colborne, and at different other stations.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who stopped the train at Trenton?

Mr. BOWELL: The same organization, or the result of it, that did it in Belleville.

Mr. BLAKE: You cannot have a body of men all over the line.

Mr. BOWELL said this would not be necessary. If the hon. gentleman had been present on that occasion, he would have found that it was not necessary to have a body of men to stop a train. The hon. gentleman knew as well as he did, that one or two men, particularly of that class who understood the working of railways, could throw a train off the track, and do other damage as was done on such occasions, without having a body of men at all for the purpose. One or two men had succeeded, by rushing between the volunteers and the engine, to stop its progress before action could be taken to prevent it. And this might occur again. He was convinced that the Minister of Justice had made up his mind to go as he would go, and that he did not intend to recede or advance from the position he had taken. He understood that, in England for instance, if a riot or row occurred, the Government had the power to despatch a military force to keep the peace, placing it under the local authorities. He might be mistaken in this regard, but such was his recollection of the course pursued in Great Britain when difficulties of this or any other kind arose.

Mr. BLAKE: A requisition by the local authorities is the preliminary.

Mr. BOWELL: In all cases?

Mr. BLAKE: I think so.

Mr. BOWELL: If the hon. gentleman says so, it is no doubt the case.

Mr. BLAKE: I say I think so.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: The Imperial Government sends the troops to act under the local authorities.

Mr. BLAKE: The Imperial Government sends the troops, but it does not call out troops.

Mr. BOWELL said the difference between the cases was that in England there was a standing army, while we had to call out volunteers. They always, he believed, placed the troops under such circumstances not exactly under the power but under the guidance, to a certain extent, of the local authorities.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Under the the civil power.

Mr. BOWELL: Yes. He still repeated that what he desired could be done without infringing on what they all not only admitted, but also gloried in—British liberty. In case of a riot of an extensive character, such as had taken place last winter, occurring again—and he trusted this would never be the case—he thought some power should be centralized somewhere other than in the different localities where the difficulties occurred, in order to see that Her Majesty's mails were carried through, and that the lives of the people generally were protected.

Mr. BLAKE said that the military force was to be called out only in case of the existence of a riot or disturbance of the peace, which was beyond the power of the civil authorities of the locality to deal with. Special constables should be sworn in before the military were called out at all, unless the riot had assumed such proportions before any body interested in repressing it knew anything about it, that it was necessary to call out both. It was perfectly true that a riot might, at any place, be beyond the power of the local authorities, while a man at another station, or a couple of men at a third station were putting an engine off the track; but this latter act might happen under ordinary circumstances. Along a whole line a number of persons might be engaged in the criminal enterprise of throwing engines off the track, or of injuring them, and probably this would be a more efficacious way of accomplishing the object than by creating a great disturbance at one place; but would they call out the militia and the military force to prevent this, or would it be said that such acts were beyond the power of the local authorities to control?

Mr. BOWELL: Certainly it is.

Mr. BLAKE: Would it be beyond the power of the local authorities to arrest one or two men, who were breakers of the peace, at any station in a municipality?

Mr. BOWELL: I want to prevent the necessity of a force accompanying the engine under the authority of a central power.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman wants, in order to save the local authorities and peace officers from proceeding against one or two breakers of the peace, to call out the military force, in order that these one or two breakers of the peace may be shot.

Mr. BOWELL: Oh, no.

Mr. BLAKE: That is what the hon. gentleman wants. He wishes to do that by the central authority not acting under the responsibility of the law, for the shooting that may occur. That is what the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. BOWELL said he was glad to be informed as to what he wanted, but all he could say was that he wanted nothing of the kind. The Minister of Justice had no right, however prominent and influential he might be in the House, to put any such language in his mouth; nor had the hon. gentleman any right, from what he had said, to draw any such deductions. He desired to shoot no one; nor did he wish to have any one shot. The calling out of the militia should be avoided as much as possible on all occasions, and, if they had a Provincial or Dominion police force, it would be ten times more efficacious in putting down a riot of that kind, than volunteers with rifles in their hands could possibly be. He had stated this half-a-dozen times, and the hon. gentleman either designedly misrepresented his words or left an impression which was not justified in view of the remarks he had made on the subject.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he had been a volunteer for fifteen years, and he considered it a misfortune for Belleville to have sent to Toronto for volunteers, when there was a sufficient number of them in Hastings for the purpose; and if these had not been able to put down the strike, the volunteers in Prince Edward county would have been available.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Does the Bill provide for the payment of the expenses of the militia called out when the mails are stopped?

Mr. BLAKE: Has the hon. gentleman read the preamble?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: I have; and I see that it is divided into three clauses; and the second clause states that the municipality shall pay all costs, and is liable to be sued for it.

Mr. BLAKE said this was not the case. The Bill had two distinct objects. The existing law provided that in all cases in which a municipality called out the militia it should pay a certain per diem allowance for the men and provide accommodation for them; but it contained no provision for the municipality paying the cost of transport of the militia, although it empowered municipalities to make requisition on the militia at a great distance beyond their boundaries.

The second clause provided, in addition, that when the militia outside a municipality were called out, it should be liable to pay the cost of the transportation. This was complete in itself, and had nothing to do with the central Government at all.

Bill ordered to be reported.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

"1. That it is expedient to amend the Pilotage Act of 1875, by providing that steamships employed in trading from port to port in the same Province, as well as those employed in trading between any one or more of the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, and any other or others of them, or between any port or ports in the said Provinces, or any of them, and the port of New York or any port of the United States of America on the Atlantic, north of New York, shall be exempt from payment of Pilotage dues, except only in the ports of Halifax and Pictou, as respects each of which the Pilotage Authorities, with the approval of the Governor in Council, from time to time, may determine what steamships shall or shall not be wholly or partially exempt from such payment; and that no clearance shall be granted at any port where there is Pilotage Authority, to any steamship on which such dues are payable, until they shall have been paid or settled.

"2. That it is expedient to provide that the tonnage of all steamships registered in Canada shall be ascertained by the same rules, and that steamships registered under the repealed Act, Chapter 41 of the Consolidated Statutes of the late Province of Canada, shall be remeasured, and their tonnage ascertained by the rules prescribed in the Imperial Act, known as the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, as other steamships registered in Canada now are."

Mr. BLAKE.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he proposed to amend the Pilotage Act of 1875, so as to empower the pilotage authorities of Halifax and Pictou to make steamboats pay pilotage dues or not, as they chose. This change in the law had been asked for by the Pilotage Commissions of Halifax and Pictou, and it received the approval of the representatives of Halifax and Pictou in Parliament. It did not affect any other portion of the Dominion, and it supplied an omission in the Act of 1875. He also proposed, with the concurrence of the House, to direct that no clearance should be given to a ship unless a certificate was presented. He had received a communication from Halifax setting forth strong reasons why a change should be made in the law, as, under the present system, the pilotage authorities were exposed to very great inconvenience.

Mr. BLANCHET asked whether the resolutions affected the port of Quebec and ports below.

Mr. SMITH said not at all, save that steamboats passing from a port in one Province to another port in the same Province, were exempted from pilotage.

Mr. MITCHELL said the proposition altered the pilotage system as far as the ports of Halifax and Pictou were concerned, and also the other ports of the Dominion to this extent—that vessels enumerated in the resolution were exempt from pilotage. He entirely approved of this part of the resolution. Steamboats trading regularly between ports of a Province, or between them and ports on the Atlantic coast in the United States, ought not, where there were experienced men on board, to be compelled to undergo compulsory pilotage unless they desired it for the safety of themselves, their passengers, or their property. He did not think, however, that the ports of Halifax and Pictou should be exempted from the operation of the resolution. The system pursued in the ports of the Dominion should, as far as possible, be uniform. He was not prepared to say that he did not agree with the second resolution, but he did contend that the general principle of making a system, believed to be right as applied to one place, universally applicable, should be adopted, unless some reason was shown why it ought not to be made applicable to any particular point. He did not see why the ports of Halifax and Pictou should be exempted as was proposed. This was a departure from the general principle embodied in the resolution, of which he approved, and which certainly recommended itself to the good sense of the people of the country. He could give his hon. friend some reasons why this exemption ought not to exist. It affected every port in the Dominion in reality. Vessels must go to the port of Pictou, a locality in which public money had been spent in supplying a railway terminus, which formed the connecting link with the Intercolonial Railway on the Atlantic coast. These two points commanded and attracted, owing to the outlay of public moneys on these railroads and the existence of immense coal-fields at Pictou, an amount of trade and commerce which they would not possess had it not been for these adventitious circumstances. This resolution would clearly enable the pilotage authorities of these ports to tax the tonnage of vessels coming from other ports, and consequently it did not apply solely to the shipping of Pictou and Halifax, but also to that of the whole Dominion and the whole world. Therefore, he could see no just reason why this exemption should take place. He could quite understand that, if it was granted, the pilotage authorities of his own port of Miramichi or of Quebec might desire to secure similar powers, and he could easily see the impolicy of permitting any one of these local bodies to contravene at any moment the avowed legislation and policy of this Parliament on the question of pilotage. This question had been discussed at considerable length in 1875 and during preceding years, and he felt it would be unfair to the pilotage authorities of Montreal, Quebec, Miramichi, St. John, Yarmouth and other ports to give this exceptional power to the pilotage authorities of Pictou and Halifax. It was quite right to correct an oversight in the original Bill of 1875. Other ports would probably ask for this privilege if granted in this case, and he could not see that any good, but rather positive evil, could result from this portion of the resolution which he trusted would not be pressed by his hon. friend. Its effect would be unjust to trade, oppressive to the interests involved in the steamship lines, and unfair and unjust to the capitalists who had invested money in these lines. This principle was subversive of the theory of the Pilotage Law, and it would lead to a great deal of useless legislation and useless discussion on the floors of Parliament.

Mr. CARMICHAEL said that the resolution applied the same principle to steamship as to sailing vessels. It was made applicable only to the ports of Halifax and Pictou, whereas it should be applicable to all the ports of the Dominion. The Minister of Marine and the Governor in Council would not permit an excessive charge for pilotage to be made in the ports in question. If pilotage was to be compulsory at all, surely steamships should be placed in the same category with sailing vessels. This was only just, and this was all that was asked for in the resolution.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he could not agree with the resolution proposed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He did not see why, because a steamship left Quebec to go to New York, it should not be required to have a pilot as well as the steamships which sailed from Quebec for Liverpool. In the latter case, this was required to prevent accidents, but certainly both vessels were exposed to the same dangers. Why should pilots be required at Pictou and Halifax and not in the St. Lawrence? He could understand this proposition if the Minister of Marine had introduced regulations compelling masters and captains of the steamships going to New York and other ports mentioned to pass certain examinations placing them on the same footing with pilots. It was a dangerous resolution, unless the regulation he had mentioned were adopted by which all steamships should be obliged to make use of the services of pilots. He agreed with his hon. friend from Northumberland that there was no reason apparent in the resolution, at all events, why vessels entering the ports of Halifax and Pictou should be compelled to have pilots while this was not the case in the St. Lawrence. They should place as few impediments as possible in the way of the trade of Halifax particularly, because it was the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway. He wished to learn the reasons for the step it was proposed to take in the resolution.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said, if he understood the matter properly, this proposed law was altogether for the benefit of the ports of Pictou and Halifax. He would like to know whether the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had consulted the pilots of the port of Sydney, or whether the representatives of the county approved of the change. That port was second to none in the Dominion, and yet the pilots were more poorly paid than at any other port, their average salaries being only about $300 a year. He did not think it would be right to exempt Sydney and favour the ports of Halifax and Pictou. At present, the law exempted steamers from all ports if the captains chose to take out licenses for those ports, and he saw no reason for the proposed change in the law with a view to exempting all steamers.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he did not propose to change the law affecting Quebec at all, except in regard to steamers going from one port to another. A steamer now going from Halifax to Quebec was exempt, and he saw no reason why a steamer going from Sorel should not also be exempt. There was no reason for this discrimination, and all he proposed to do was to correct this manifest error in the Act. This application came from the Pilotage Commissioners of Halifax and Pictou, and was sustained by the representatives of those counties. He thought it would be wise to allow the local authorities to regulate their own pilotage affairs, as was the case in Great Britain and the United States. He acknowledged the importance of Sydney as a port, which was entitled to every consideration; and, if it was thought expedient that the pilotage authorities of that port should have the same power as was proposed to be given to Halifax and Pictou, there would be no objection if application came from the proper quarters.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said the port of Sydney was rather unfortunately situated with regard to its Pilotage Commission. The majority were interested in shipping and coal mines. It would be in the interests of the shipping of this country and also in the interests of the pilots of that port if some little change was made in the Board. One member was interested in coal mining and two were interested as charterers of vessels in getting ships out of the port free of pilotage.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he thought the gentleman referred to would be particularly interested in seeing that proper rules and regulations were made for securing efficient pilots, and making the port a safe one for vessels.

Mr. BLANCHET said he thought it was a mistake to exempt a steamer from pilotage, because it was more dangerous for a steamer to navigate the St. Lawrence than a sailing vessel. He would like to know what the opinion of the hon. the President of the Council, who had always acted as a protector of the pilots, was in regard to the proposed change in the law.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said his Department was the proper one to receive communications in relation to this subject, and he might state that no communication had been received from Quebec. He had reason to believe that the pilotage regulations at present existing there had given entire and complete satisfaction, not only to the commercial community, but to the pilots themselves. If it was thought desirable Quebec should have the same powers as were proposed to be conferred on Halifax and Pictou, he was not prepared to say that the Government would not meet their wishes in that respect.

Mr. CARON said he failed to see why steamers should be exempt. He would like to know whether the hon. the President of the Council had consulted the pilots of Quebec in regard to this proposed change in the law.

Mr. LANGEVIN

Mr. SMITH: This amendment does not affect them at all.

Mr. CARON: It must affect them, because certain steamers would not carry pilots.

Mr. SMITH: The law is not changed at all.

Mr. CARON said certain steamers trading between the different ports in Quebec were bound to carry pilots, and he understood the effect of the proposed alteration would be that they would not be obliged to carry pilots. That would make a great change in the receipts of the pilots.

Mr. SMITH: Do you object to that?

Mr. CARON: I do. Of course it may appear strange that the objection should come from this side, in view of the fact that the hon. the President of the Council has always pretended to look after the interests of the pilots.

Mr. BLANCHET said he would be satisfied if his hon. friend said that there would be no change in the pilotage system of the port of Quebec.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said there was no change whatever with regard to sailing vessels. There was no change in regard to steamers, with this exception: that, under the 3rd sub-section of the Act of 1875, it was provided that a steamer going from one Province into the port of another should be exempt from pilotage, and he simply proposed to extend this provision to steamers going from one port to another in the same Province. This was simply remedying an obvious omission in the Act.

Mr. MITCHELL said his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries proposed to take away the privilege given to vessels navigating between the ports of Halifax and Quebec, and compel them to employ pilots whether they would or not.

Mr. SMITH: Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL said his hon. friend said "no"; but they differed about that. The change proposed to be effected by the resolution was two-fold. In the Act of 1875, doubtless from an oversight, it was provided that, while vessels trading from a port in one

Province to a port in another Province did not have to pay pilotage dues, yet a vessel trading from one port to another in the same Province had to pay dues. The change proposed in the resolutions was most proper, as far as this was concerned. But the resolutions exempted from the operations of the third sub-section of the Act of 1875, the ports of Halifax and Pictou, provided the pilotage authorities for those ports should so declare. He contended that the principle of pilotage dues from steamships was one recognized by the House in the passage of that Act of 1875, and why Halifax and Pictou should be exceptions to the general rule, he could not understand. It was said that the pilotage authorities of these ports asked for the change; but, he would ask, was such a matter, so important to the trade and commerce of Canada, to be left with local authorities? It was said that these authorities would not, as a matter of course, act in a manner prejudicial to the maritime interests of Halifax and Pictou. But these two ports were so placed on the Atlantic seaboard, and with respect to the coal mines, that steam vessels had to call there for coal whether they desired to do so or not. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had said that the pilotage system of the St. Lawrence was entirely satisfactory. But he (Mr. Mitchell) would say that that system, as it existed to-day, was not satisfactory. He would admit that there were many unjust complaints against the pilots of the St. Lawrence, but his experience with the mercantile community, with Boards of Trade, with shipmasters and shipowners, convinced him that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in reference to the system. He knew that it stood alone in the world, with its distance ranging from 500 to 600 miles; and he knew that it was the most dangerous system in the world. But, while the difficulties were great, the administration of the system was also very defective, and the class of men on the service were not of that high standard of education which they ought to be. Commercial men found that pilots who had been negligent and thereby caused loss to property were not punished; traders had not the choice of their own pilots, they had to take whoever was sent them, no matter how incompetent they might be; and it was found that no remedies were proposed for the existing evils. Was it any wonder, therefore, that there should be dissatisfaction? It might be asked why he did not remedy this state of things when he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He would answer by saying that it was because of the obstructions placed in his way by hon. gentlemen opposite and by those who represented constituencies in which there were a large number of pilots. He made considerable progress, but there was a great deal to do yet.

Mr. SMITH said he certainly had no personal knowledge of the character of the pilots of the St. Lawrence, but he had always understood that they were a very respectable intelligent class of men. His hon. friend chose to malign and slander them, and he professed to speak from personal observation and experience; but he (Mr. Smith) was sure that the House would be disposed to give the pilots fair play. Notwithstanding all that had been said by his hon. friend he had believed the pilots were respectable and capable, and he believed so still. With reference to the changes in the law he had endeavoured to give full explanations, and he did not think it necessary to enter into the matter fully again. It would be admitted on all hands that, where a steamship trading from a port in one Province to a port in another Province did not have to pay pilotage dues, it was certainly right that a vessel trading from one port to another in the same Province should not have to pay dues. As to the other change he had always thought that one port should not be an exception to another, and he continued in this belief. In nearly all other parts of the world, each port had its own rules and was governed entirely by its own local authorities; and he would not oppose such a system here. It was not proposed to imperatively exempt steamships paying dues or to make them pay dues at Halifax and Pictou, but the resolution would leave it discretionary with the local pilotage authorities. This was proposed in consequence of the representations made by these authorities. He had no doubt that they were animated by a desire to promote the interests of these ports. He had already stated that the change would not affect the port at all. The general Pilotage Act was not altered, because, there being no complaints, or none of such importance as to warrant Parliament to be asked to consider them, it was presumed it was satisfactory.

Mr. MITCHELL denied that he had "maligned" or "slandered" the pilots. He had simply told the truth when he said that the pilots were not so capable as they ought to be.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he was sorry the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had not given a better reason for exempting Halifax and Pictou from the general Act than that the pilotage authorities of those two ports desired that it should be done. That was not sufficient. Why should steamships from New York to Halifax pay dues while they would not from New York to Quebec? There was no reason in the anomaly. He understood that by this resolution a steamship going from Sorel to Quebec would not have to pay dues; and also from Montreal to Quebec, and vice versa—was he correct?

Mr. SMITH: Yes; is not that right?

Mr. LANGEVIN said, if the steamships were commanded by competent captains, men who knew the river well, of course it was right. But there ought to be some safeguard against men who did not know the river keeping charge of their ships. This ought to be done for the safety of life and property. As to the pilots of Quebec, he must say that, as a class, they were a most respectable and deserving body of men, and they had always performed their duty, he thought, as well as any other pilots in the world. They might not be highly educated enough to take charge of vessels on the high seas, but they were educated enough to know how to perform their duties. He would admit, however, that it would be well to require the apprentices, in the future, to attain to a higher standard of education.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. BLANCHET asked that, to avoid any ambiguity or misunderstanding, the word "Quebec" should follow "Halifax and Pictou."

Mr. SMITH said he would assent to this addition.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said the same that applied to Halifax and Pictou would apply to the port of Sydney.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the Minister of Marine and Fisheries proposed certain advantages to the ports of Halifax and Pictou. It seemed to him that the same privilege should be given to the different pilotage authorities throughout, at any rate, the Province of Nova Scotia. He failed to see any good reason why the pilotage authorities of the city of Halifax and Pictou should be allowed to decide as to what steamers should enter their respective ports, and as to whether they should pay any pilotage dues or not, while the other pilotage authorities in Nova Scotia had not the same power. He drew the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to that part in the measure which would be looked upon as a piece of exceptional legislation, and he held that the same power should be granted to the pilotage authorities throughout Nova Scotia.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that, in regard to the second resolution, attention had already been called by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Cheval) to the great inequality and injustice which existed with regard to the payment by steamships of canal tolls and harbour and other dues, arising from the two systems of measurement in force. Under the Act passed in 1873, vessels registered according to the rates which prevailed in Ontario and Quebec were not required to be remeasured, but all vessels registered hereafter were to be measured according to the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. The consequence was that vessels were measured by two different systems. By the measurement under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, a vessel would measure about three times as much as a vessel of the same size under the old system. It was manifestly unjust that vessels should pay dues on different systems of measurement. The object of the Government proposal was to readjust the matter, and the Government did not propose to increase the income derived from vessels above its present amount. The Government also proposed, inasmuch as this was exceptional legislation, to bear the expense of the measurement of those vessels which would require to be measured; the number of which would be from two hundred to six hundred.

Mr. MITCHELL said he quite approved of the motives of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in introducing the resolution, and, having heard the hon. gentleman's explanations, he thought it would remove what at first blush appeared to be an act of injustice to existing vessels. In the debate the other night he understood the hon. member for Rouville to state that an act of injustice had been done by the passage of the Act of 1873, in not changing the registration of existing steamships, and the hon. member so far forgot what was due to hon. members as to imply that he (Mr. Mitchell) was influenced in his action owing to some interest he possessed in steamers, or because he was interested in the Richelieu Company's line.

Mr. CHEVAL said the hon. gentleman had misinterpreted his meaning. He had said he did not think the hon. member had submitted and carried the Bill for the purpose of protecting himself.

Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member for Richelieu had, on a former occasion, referred to the Richelieu Navigation Company. He had no interest in the company or in any ship affected by the change in the system of registration. The only vessels with which he was connected were measured under the new system. The shipping interests were similar in importance to the banking interests of the country, and the laws required to be modified and changed. He introduced the Bill of 1873 because it was necessary in the interests of trade and commerce. He found that, when vessels proceeded from the great lakes to ports of Great Britain, the tonnage measurement did not agree with that prevailing in the mother country, and frequent and serious difficulties had arisen between Custom-house officials and ship-owners. The Bill was introduced for the purpose of avoiding those difficulties and of creating a uniform system throughout the British Dominions, making the Canadian system the same as that of England, which was understood in the United States and on the European Continent, and which would prove beneficial to Canadian vessels trading with foreign countries. It was intended to obviate the great distinctions which existed between the system of measurement in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. The Government, when it entered upon the task of carrying the Bill was met by almost innumerable difficulties; it almost imperilled the existence of the Government, and during one whole Session it caused great difficulties which were not confined to the floor of Parliament. If he had made the system of registration enforced throughout the Dominion, as applicable not only to ships going to foreign ports, but trading on the inland waters, he would have done a complete injustice especially in regard to shipping on the lakes. In the case of the Richelieu Navigation Company, which owned 21 boats, if that system had been applied, twenty per cent. would have been added to the working expenses of each vessel. There was no particular reason why so great an injustice should have been committed to secure uniformity. The main object which he sought to accomplish was to provide for re-registration in the case of vessels going to foreign ports, and, therefore, he provided that the system of vessels should not be changed in respect to existing vessels, but that in regard to new vessels the system should be changed.

TRANSFER OF PUBLIC WORKS

RESOLUTION CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to transfer the control, management and maintenance, as respects ordinary repairs, of all harbours, wharves, piers and breakwaters, being the property of the Dominion, except those under the management of Commissioners appointed under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, and the harbours of St. John, N.B., and Pictou, from the Department of Public Works to that of Marine and Fisheries, the construction and extraordinary repairs remaining under the control of the Department first named; and to empower the Governor in Council, from time to time, on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to make, alter or rescind rules and regulations for the management and a tariff or tariffs of tolls and dues for the use of the said works respectively, and to impose penalties for contravention of such rules and regulations; such tolls and penalties to belong to Her Majesty for the public uses of the Dominion.”

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER said he would like to ask his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries how he proposed to discriminate in the class of cases falling under the administration of the Fisheries Department, and of the Public Works Department.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he supposed that the Government would determine what were ordinary and what extraordinary repairs.

Mr. MITCHELL said the same principle was applied to lighthouses. The resolution was founded on public economy and the public interest, and he therefore supported it. He might say he sometimes recollected an old statement made by the First Minister when in Opposition, to the effect that the Department he had had the honour to preside over as Minister of Marine and Fisheries was, like the fifth wheel to a coach, unimportant, one in which there was nothing to do, and which never amounted to anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said much worse things than that.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not doubt it; but his hon. friend, he thought, should now, in all candour, admit that this Department was efficient and useful, attracting a great deal of public attention, and representing important interests. His hon. friend should retract his former expression.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I retract it, Sir.

Mr. HOLTON said his hon. friend from Northumberland had succeeded, by his extraordinary activity and energy, in gathering in, from all quarters, business for the Department, which was correctly characterized by his hon. friend the First Minister as the fifth wheel to a coach, which was created when it became necessary to provide a Department for his hon. friend from Northumberland. The hon. gentleman's activity was, ultimately, useful there, no doubt, in doing a great variety of things which might, with greater fitness and advantage to the country, have been done by the Ministers of the other Departments. This was the position they held when they occupied seats on the other side of the House. Not being very much given to retraction, he adhered to his original opinion; but he admitted that his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell), by his unwonted energy in gathering to himself all sorts of odds and ends of business, had consolidated the Department into one of respectability and usefulness for his successor.

Mr. MITCHELL said the difference between his hon. friend from Chateauguay and the First Minister was that the former was a perfect man, never in the wrong, always in the right, and always knowing the rules of order. Everybody admitted this. His hon. friend the First Minister, however, was not perfect; and he (Mr. Mackenzie) admitted sometimes, though very rarely, that he was in the wrong. The resolution took away from the Department of the First Minister, the most powerful Minister in the Cabinet, a very important charge; and this showed that the Government, which his hon. friend from Chateauguay supported, believed the late Administration were right in pursuing the course they did with reference to this Department.

Resolution agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

APPEALS FROM JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL.—[BILL No. 78.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 78) To amend the law respecting appeals from convictions before, or orders by, Justices of the Peace.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said he proposed to make some trifling amendments, which he explained.

Mr. LAURIER said he would direct the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the fact that the Courts of Quarter Session were becoming obsolete in Quebec. There was a disposition in the Province that their jurisdiction in appeal and summary conviction should be abolished, and the powers given to the Court of Queen's Bench. Judge Ramsay had suggested the propriety of making this change, and, if such was the disposition, he thought, for the sake of harmony, the law should be altered in accordance. He would, therefore, propose an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BABY said he agreed with his hon. friend from Arthabaska that this change should be made. As properly remarked, the Court was becoming almost obsolete, and would in a short time disappear entirely from the cities of Montreal and Quebec. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would agree to the amendment.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentlemen who had spoken on this question were thoroughly conversant with the working of the law, and he could have no better guarantee in making this change than their representations. If he heard no objections, he would accept the views of those hon. gentlemen, and agree to the amendment.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Amendments read the first and second times and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

CULLING OF TIMBER ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 103.]

(Mr Laflamme.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. CARON said he altogether concurred in the provision of the Bill as to reducing the number of cullers, but, from all the information that he had been able to collect, he could not agree with the proposition to average the wages of the men at $700. If the expenses of the cullers were considered, this seemed to be almost a ridiculous remuneration. If he were correctly informed, in many cases these expenses amounted to 25 and even 30 per cent., and he thought it was not right to reduce their salaries as low as $700. When the deputation from Quebec waited upon the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, that hon. gentleman very kindly expressed his determination to take into consideration the views which were laid before him. He (Mr. Caron) hoped that even at this stage of the Bill the Government would find it possible to change it in such a way as to make the remuneration of the cullers, who were subjected to a great many hardships and were prevented by their business from obtaining other employment after the culling season was over, more commensurate to their positions.

Mr. LAFLAMME said it was first proposed that the remuneration should be $800, but it was ultimately agreed that $700 was sufficient under the circumstances. The Bill was the result of a compromise between the two parties interested, and he thought it would meet their approval.

Mr. THIBAudeau said, as one of the parties in the arrangement, he distinctly understood that the amount agreed upon was $800. The fact that that sum was first printed in the resolution supported him in this statement. He had just come from Quebec, where he had had interviews, with the cullers, and he could tell the House that they had come to the conclusion that $700 was far too little. As had been stated, the expenses of those men were very heavy, and, if the amount was not increased, they could hardly make a living. He had done his best to press this matter on the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, but perhaps other and stronger influences than his had prevented him from fixing the salary at $800.

Mr. McDougall (South Renfrew) said he had in previous Sessions taken some interest in this matter, and he wished to make a few observations on this occasion. During last summer he had occasion, in common with other persons engaged in the production of square timber, to meet frequently the hon. the President of the Council, and, if any one had formed the impression that that hon. gentleman had not paid as much attention as he ought to the interests of the cullers, he was happy to bear testimony to the fact that they were entirely deceived. In the conferences which he, together with other persons engaged in the lumber trade had with him, the hon. the President of the Council showed that he had no disposition to see the interests of the cullers neglected. If those gentlemen who represented constituencies where cullers lived were to consider the fact that the lumbermen were willing to pay the $200 superannuation, in case it could not be given out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and that they were agreeable that the cullers should earn an average of $700 each instead of $480, it would have to be acknowledged that they were making some concessions on their side. It was agreed at first that the cullers should have $800, it being understood that they would make out their own specifications, which he thought they were perfectly able to do. But the general impression was that the specifications had better be made out by the clerk as before, and he felt bound to raise no objections to that. When the Government found out what was acceptable to the lumbermen, they considered fairly the interests of the cullers, and he thought that every fair-minded man would say that justice was done to the cullers, especially in view of the fact that the lumber trade was in a very depressed condition and could not bear any undue burdens. Although it was true that the cullers could undertake no permanent work in the summer other than that of culling, yet there was nothing to prevent their getting employment during the winter. They did not have to work more than 35 or 40 days during the culling season, and it was unreasonable to expect that for this they should get enough to keep them all the rest of the year, although he would be very sorry to see them unfairly treated. Of anything, he would sooner see them overpaid than underpaid.

Mr. CAUCHON said the understanding was that the cullers should receive $800, making out their own specifications; but then it was thought that this would occupy too much of their time, and that it was better that the average of the salaries should be made $700, the specifications to be made at the office. This difference of $100 was really in favour of the cullers. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Thibaudeau) acceded to that arrangement, but he afterwards, in a letter, insisted that they should have $800. He (Mr. Cauchon) tried to get the several parties to agree to this, but could not.

Mr. CARON said under the old system it required thirty-six cullers to do the work, they receiving on the average $480 each; and as there were now only eighteen, they of course would have to do twice as much work, and consequently ought certainly to receive $800. If they prepared their own specifications, their position would be worth $1,000. From all the letters he had received, it would appear that the cullers had agreed that $700 was about the value of the work they were required to do.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) enquired the amount of the surplus fund paid into the Consolidated Revenue, over and above the cost of maintaining the cullers' office at Quebec, and whether a fair amount of interest had been allowed.

Mr. BLANCHET said it was to be regretted that the salaries of the cullers had not been increased. If there was any class of men deserving the consideration of the Government it was the cullers. The lumber trade could surely afford the trifle more required to make the amount $800, and if it could not the Government might make the advance. It was well-known that, since 1867, some $40,000 had been accumulated out of the surplus of the office, and, as the Government had used the money, they ought to be willing to deal with the cullers.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) remarked that the 36 cullers had not been paid $480 average each on account of the actual work performed by them, but with the view of giving them a reasonable sum to keep them for the year. They then worked on an average only about 18 to 20 days in the year, and now they would have to work 35 days during the season. He thought $700 a very good recompence. Without desiring to say anything against them, he would say they were in education and position very little beyond ordinary labours.

Mr. CURRIER said he thought $700 pretty good pay for a month's work, off and on, especially as the cullers could turn their attention to other things during the winter. This year lumbermen would have to pay a larger amount in fees and annuities than they had done before.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he would suggest, as some of the gentlemen interested in the lumber business wanted to be absent, the House should take the second reading now, and give an opportunity to discuss the Bill in Committee to-morrow. It affected the lumber interest chiefly, and the desire of the Government was to meet the views of the lumber trade as far as possible, with a reasonable consideration for those who had been engaged as cullers under the previous arrangement.

Bill read the second time.

ADMISSION OF NEWFOUNDLAND FISH AND FISH OILS BILL.

[BILL No. 104.]

(Mr. Laflamme.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said the object of this Bill was to allow fish and fish oil from Newfoundland, when it was ascertained by the Government here that the inspection there agreed entirely with the inspection ordered by the Federal Government, to be admitted as if they had been inspected in the Dominion of Canada. The Government of Newfoundland had adopted the same principles as to inspection as this Government, and this measure was intended to facilitate trade between the Dominion and Newfoundland, which supplied the greatest quantity of fish to the Dominion.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 91.]

(Mr. Laflamme.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 91) To amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said the object of this Bill was to secure a better collection of the revenue from Excise. It proposed to impose on those who imported stills or worms for the purpose of distilling, the obligation of taking a license, in order that the revenue officers might be informed where these stills or worms were destined to be used, so that they could follow their use and prevent illicit distillation. The second provision of the Bill was to establish four classes of licenses instead of three, in order to allow the smaller brewers to obtain licenses by paying duties.

Mr. TUPPER asked whether the operation of this change in the latter part of the Bill was not likely to be attended with a considerable loss of revenue. As he understood it, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue proposed to reduce the amount for licenses which were now required to be taken out by brewers, and the effect of that would be two-fold, and from both points of view would be injurious as far as the revenue was concerned. Parties who now took out licenses at a higher rate would take them out in the lower class, and the Government would receive a smaller sum for licenses than they now received, and, as it would tend to multiply the number of brewers, a largely increased cost would be entailed in the appointment of officers to supervise the different breweries. He did not know exactly the object aimed at by the Government in proposing this change, and it was open to these two objections.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that, as the law now stood there were really only two classes of licenses—the first class, which composed the largest number of brewers, and the second class, which fixed the license fee at two hundred dollars for those who manufactured only to a certain extent, and the whole of the brewers were actually comprised in these two classes. The third class escaped entirely, because the amount they manufactured was too small. The decrease of revenue would be quite insignificant, while it would allow those who produced a very small quantity to take a license at one hundred and fifty dollars instead of two hundred dollars. The cost of collection would be the same, because, as the law existed, wherever there was a brewery there must be an officer to attend to it. The only difference was that the Bill established a more equitable system in favour of those who paid less for the less amount produced.

On Section 4,

Mr. PATERSON said he would like to have an explanation with regard to the necessity of requiring persons who manufactured or imported stills and worms to take out licenses for which they were to pay $30. It seemed to him that the imposition of such a restriction on the trade might perhaps prove onerous and irksome.

Mr. LAFLAMME said it appeared that a great number of stills and worms were manufactured in a secret manner or imported them from the United States for the purpose of illicit distillation; and the object of the amendment was to secure information being given to the Excise officer of their manufacture or importation. The same practice had been adopted in the United States and in England. Any person who manufactured or imported a still or worm for the purpose of distillation, was there bound to give information to the Excise officer as to the object for which and the party for whom it was manufactured or imported, in order that the officer might ascertain its destination, and whether it was used for illicit distillation or not. This was the only mode by which this information could be secured.

Mr. PATERSON said he still perceived a difficulty. He could readily understand the desire of the Inland Revenue officers to secure this knowledge, in order to prevent illicit distillation; but this was provided for in Section 3 in the new sub-section proposed to be added. This required a license to be taken out and heavy bonds to be entered into; and yet it was proposed, in addition, to impose a further penalty of $30. The Excise regulations were very onerous, and very distasteful to the business portion of the community which they concerned; and, under the imposition of more stringent regulations, especially with regard to Excise, they would likely become restless. The manufacture of a single still or fermenting tun would require the carpenter engaged in making it to apply for a license in the first place, and to secure good and sufficient sureties in the second place; and, over and above this, he was to be obliged to inform the Excise officers for whom it was made, and of its capacity and dimensions. The article might not be worth the amount of money to be paid for the license. Again, a person might not need to import or make one of these articles in a year's time. In that case, it was a direct charge on the brewer or distiller, who already largely contributed to the revenue of the country.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that brewers and distillers were exempted from the operation of this section. There was no doubt whatever that the decrease in the revenue from the Excise on spirits during the last few years arose chiefly from illicit distillation, and the adoption of such a regulation was necessary to secure the requisite information, since, under it, no person would be allowed to manufacture or import a still unless he reported the fact to the Excise officers. As the law now stood, a person could not be punished for having in his possession a still which he did not use.

Mr. PATERSON said this regulation would more likely have the effect of inducing those who manufactured or imported these articles to refrain from giving such information to the Department, inasmuch as it would entail the taking out of a license and the payment of $30.

Mr. LAFLAMME said at present no means existed of ascertaining where stills were manufactured, consequently any tinsmith or coppersmith could manufacture them privately, without the knowledge of the Excise officer. When those stills were manufactured it was for the purpose of illicit distillation. This Bill provided that no man should enter into their manufacture unless he paid a license fee of $30. This was a very trifling amount, but it would undoubtedly have the effect of checking a great deal of illicit distillation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Suppose an importer or manufacturer pays the license fee, how are you to compel him to tell to whom he sells?

Mr. LAFLAMME: He is bound to report under Section 6.

Mr. MILLS: The Act makes him a distiller, treats him as such, and subjects him to all the penalties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said under the proposed law any copper-smith who should make a single still would have to pay this $30 fee, which would be very hard in many cases. The consequence would be that the manufacture of stills would be confined to the large centres, and brewers and distillers would be compelled, often at great inconvenience, to get their apparatus from those places, whereas, now, they could get them made in the vicinity of their establishments.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the manufacture of stills was now almost entirely confined to cities. Some establishments made them themselves within their premises, and in such cases no additional license was to be paid.

Mr. PATERSON said, if a copper-smith, in Guelph for instance, should make a still for a distillery, he would, according to this Bill, be violating the Revenue Law. He did not think that was right.

Mr. LAFLAMME: It would be at the worst only an additional tax on the distiller.

Mr. PATERSON said the hon. the Ministers should consider the distillers were weighed down enough now.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he did not suppose any distiller would complain, because it would tend to prevent illicit distillation, and so benefit the honest distiller.

Mr. LAFLAMME.

Mr. PATERSON said the Bill would have the effect of transferring the manufacture of stills and utensils to the large cities.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said illicit distillation had increased very much of late. They had found in practice that without stringent regulations this practice could not be suppressed. No doubt the proposed measure was a severe regulation, but it was undoubtedly in favour of the honest distiller.

Mr. TUPPER asked the meaning of the words in the clause "apart from the manufacture of beer, wash, or spirits."

Mr. LAFLAMME said they meant the beer, wash, or spirits from which spirits were made.

Mr. PATERSON said he understood the phrase was put there to distinguish the importer or manufacturer from the distiller.

Section agreed to.

On Section 8,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD pointed out that, under the first subsection, hammers, nails, iron, coppers, all of which were "suitable for making stills," &c., were liable to be seized or destroyed.

Mr. LAFLAMME said this was only when it was plain that they were in connection with the making of stills, &c. There was the same provision with reference to the illicit manufacture of tobacco. Revenue officers were obliged to destroy these articles every day.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the provision that "all horses, vehicles and other appliances which have been or are being used for the purpose of removing any spirits, malt," &c., should be seized, would cause a carter's horse and vehicle, engaged in removing dutiable goods without any knowledge that anything was wrong, to be seized. There was no discretion about it if even the carter was innocent of any wrong. And the unfortunate horse, by force of the words "have been," would, for the rest of its life, be subject to seizure by the Government if it had ever drawn contraband goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman knew very well that all horses engaged in smuggling were seized, and the provision of this Act was, on precisely the same principle, applied to the Inland Revenue purposes. The tools and appliances referred to were those "peculiar to the manufacture of stills and worms," which hammers, nails, &c., were not. "Peculiar" would be a more explicit word than "suitable." The words "have been" might also be struck out.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On Section 14,

Mr. LAFLAMME said that under the present law, 100lb. of barley was held to be equal to 82lb. of malt. It was proposed by the Bill to reduce it to 75lb. of malt.

Mr. BUNSTER said that every practical brewer knew that, under the floating test, 100lb. of barley would not produce 75lb. of malt.

Mr. WORKMAN considered the proportion too great. He had also been assured by a prominent brewer in Montreal that, if the Bill passed, half of the breweries in the Dominion would be closed.

Mr. PLATT said 75lb. was a very high average, though it was sometimes obtained from barley grown in Upper Canada; 75lb. was even a high average.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

Order for consideration of Resolutions 2 to 9, inclusively, as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, on Tuesday, the 20th of February last, read.

Mr. SPEAKER said there could be no discussion on the general policy of the Government, but merely on the subject matter of each resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: We cannot be robbed and cheated out of our rights. This is nothing more or less than cheating us out of our rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was perfectly understood that the debate should be taken on the previous particular stage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was no understanding of the kind. I say distinctly that there was no understanding of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, there was. The hon. gentleman should not get into a passion. He should keep cool. His contradictions affect us very little. The hon. gentleman has no right to make that statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do make it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has no right to do so. He is grossly out of order, and, is violating parliamentary propriety in using that sort of language. The hon. gentleman has no right to use such language.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is allowed to state his opinions and views on the Speaker's ruling, and, when I begin to state mine, he flies into a passion and uses improper language. I say that was the understanding.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The understanding on the last night of the debate was that the hon. gentleman was to endeavour to take a vote without any further general discussion, as far as he was concerned; and he made that statement explicitly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, as to the question of order, I am not out of order in stating that there was no such understanding. My recollection cannot be at fault, and I am sure that I am right. The Journals of the House show that I am right: "The House resumed further the adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion for the second reading of resolution number one as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto." It is quite true that, after a long debate on the first resolution, I stated, in my desire to assist in the progress of business, as far as I was concerned, that I would move a resolution respecting the tea duty, and aid in getting through business as fast as possible. The question was distinctly put on the first resolution, as the Journals say, and, if the Journals are altered or amended, they would be falsified; I have no hesitation in saying that.

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought he made a statement at the close of the long debate on the amendment that it would be then only open to hon. members to discuss the subsequent resolutions, and, in that view of the case, the right hon. member had concurred.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, I did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I so understood the hon. member, at all events.

Mr. TUPPER said it was quite true that the Speaker had made that remark. He had refrained from addressing the House in answer to a number of comments made on the remarks he had made when he followed the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech. The moment the Speaker had made the remark in question, he had observed to the right hon. gentleman that in this case he would be precluded from answering any of the speeches delivered, and his right hon. friend had at once said he was satisfied that the Speaker was entirely wrong; and that the matter would be brought up at a subsequent sitting. It was quite true that his hon. friend stated he would endeavour as much as possible to limit the range of the discussion at future stages of the question, but that was all. He thought that what had taken place between the hon. the leader of the House and the right hon. gentleman who led the Opposition, conclusive as to the view then taken was by the hon. gentleman who led the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had looked very carefully into the whole subject, as the last debate had been very protracted, and as he thought it was possible he might have to make a ruling on it. He found, as far as he could judge from the Journals of the English House of Commons, that a record was made there of the reading of the first resolution, which was then read the second time and agreed to. When read the second time, an amendment was proposed, and the second resolution was read the second time and agreed to. The question went on the motion for the reading of the resolutions, the second reading was allowed, and then, and then, only, could he find that the whole subject-matter was open for general discussion, as to the tariff and the policy of the Government. He did not find a single instance where this was subsequently allowed. He had, in his research, obtained the assistance of the Assistant Clerk of the House who was familiar with subjects of the kind, and he had consulted Mr. Todd, the Librarian, a very high authority, who took the same view he did on the point.

Mr. MASSON: When did the second reading of the resolutions en bloc take place?

Mr. SPEAKER: It was only a formal motion.

Mr. MASSON: But when was it done?

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe that it was not done.

Mr. MASSON said this was just the point. According to the rules, if he was not mistaken, the resolutions were to be read the first time; concurrence was moved on the second reading en bloc, and on that motion the discussion could take the widest range; and, when the Clerk read the resolutions one by one, any hon. member could move an amendment; but in this case the discussion must be confined to the particular amendment proposed. However, instead of following the proper practice and putting the resolutions en bloc, the Finance Minister, of his own accord, had moved them one by one, which could only properly be done by the Clerk. Consequently they could not discuss the whole question on its merits. They had, however, established their precedent, and they could not be deprived by the act of the Speaker himself of the right of discussing the whole policy of the Government on the second reading of the resolutions, for the Speaker, for some reason or other, had not put the second reading.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said a report was made by the Committee of Ways and Means to the Speaker, and that report was either read the second time, or it was not so read. If not, then the second reading had still to be moved. It was not read the second time, for the Journals said "Mr. Cartwright moved that Resolution No.1 be now read a second time," and he moved in amendment "that the said resolution be not now read a second time, but," &c. If, by some error, Resolution No.1 was read, instead of the whole report, then this must be read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER said their practice had been, after the first formal reading, that the question should be put from the Chair: "Is it the pleasure of the House that this resolution or resolutions be read a second time and concurred in?" He had followed this old practice, but it was exceedingly faulty and it was not according to the rules laid down in May.

Mr. MASSON said he would like to know how they could logically be deprived, under the circumstances, of going into the whole subject again on the second resolution. The House had made a precedent, and they acted on precedents. Were they going to decide one way one day, and the contrary on the day following? The Speaker admitted that they had not acted properly and the people and the Ministry should have the benefit of it. The Government should not be afraid to allow the freest and the widest discussion. They had expected the debate would continue, and he hoped that the Minister of Public Works would be in their favour in this respect and not hide himself behind the rules of the House. A wide range should be allowed to the discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had not known what the Government's views on the subject were, nor did he care. It was his duty as Speaker of the House to conduct the debates according to the laws of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think it competent for the Speaker to look into a question of order not raised by the House. This had been occurring during the whole Session.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he took exception to that statement, over and over again. The Speaker of the House of Commons in England made statements to the House regarding the order of the debates, and the order of business. The ground taken by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), was a remarkable one. The hon. gentleman said they must be governed by precedents even if they were bad; but this was, however, no justification for pursuing a wrong course. He had merely to say that he had had no communication with any one directly or indirectly on this subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Nobody said so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) spoke of my hiding myself behind something.

Mr. MASSON said he had intimated that, if the First Minister insisted on the course indicated being pursued, when they had established a kind of precedent for themselves, he would have a right to say that the hon. gentleman was not dealing quite fairly with the Opposition.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that every Speaker they had had had considered it his duty to allow the broadest and freest discussion on this subject. Supposing they had a Government which tried to stifle discussion, what would the country say to it? The people would think that an injustice had been done. He did not doubt that Mr. Speaker considered he was right, but he was taking a strong stand and a doubtful course and a course which, if not condemned by the majority in this House, would be condemned by the majority of the people. He was afraid the people would think that decision was not one calculated to aid freedom of discussion of those great questions which hon. members had been sent here to discuss. He would not have risen to address the House had he not felt that it would have been a dereliction of his duty to sit silently in his seat when such a decision was given.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So far as affording an opportunity to discuss the general policy of the Government is concerned, my impression is that that was very well availed of; but, if there should be any disposition to do that further, it is quite open for any hon. member to move that the Government does not possess the confidence of the House. Upon that, hon. gentlemen will have the most abundant opportunity to go into anything they please in regard to the administration of the affairs of the country, and, for my own part, I am quite indifferent how soon that should be done.

Mr. MASSON said that was not what they wanted. They did not want to be allowed to go over the whole subject and find faults, but they wanted the right to do it if they chose. Since he had not succeeded with the hon. the Minister of Public Works, he would ask the hon. the Finance Minister if he were not responsible for the position in which they were at this moment. He asked him as a public man whether justice was being done in depriving them of their privilege to debate this question.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they had had three weeks discussion of the general policy of the Government; and did his hon. friend propose to discuss this question at each of the nine resolutions? Personally, he had no objection. It would be merely an inconvenience to his hon. friend and the House, and not altogether in accordance with the understanding come to, which was that as much as possible the debate would be confined to specific objects. If the rules of the House did not permit such motions being discussed de die in diem, he thought it expedient they should be amended. The debates dragged when there were intervals of two or three days, and they would have had a much better debate, one which would have done more good for the country and been pleasanter all round, if it had been continuous.

Mr. SPEAKER said, on looking over the authorities, he had found a passage, which was to the effect that, when the resolution was read the second time, and the question was that the House should agree to the said resolution, no observations of a general character might be made, but the speakers must refer to the resolution under discussion. He had also sent for a copy of the Journals of the English House of Commons. He found that the whole report of the Committee on Ways and Means was given, and then this report was read the first time pro forma. Then, a motion being made and the question being proposed, that "the said resolutions be now read the second time," an amendment of a general character was proposed. That was discussed, and that question was put and disposed of; and then the record went on to say:—"Ordered, that the said resolutions be now read the second time." The first resolution being read the second time was agreed to; the second, third, and fourth resolutions were read a second time and re-committed; the fifth and sixth resolutions were read a second time and agreed to. So that, practically, the course followed in the English House was precisely that which it was suggested they should follow now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Minister of Finance had referred to the inconvenience arising from the debate being dropped for intervals, but the hon. gentleman should remember that he was himself responsible for that. From the discussion of Ways and Means, instead of going into Ways and Means, the hon. gentleman went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government wanted to have the debate go on de die in diem, but Mr. Speaker ruled that this was not necessarily a vote of want of confidence, and the rule did not apply.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he did not think they went into Supply when the motion was made.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said if the Government wanted to go their own road they must submit, and let the country judge of the way in which the Opposition had been treated.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he heard the mechanical majority over there, and he saw the hon. the Minister of Militia, who could agree to nothing else but laughing and jeering in such a derisive way.

Mr. VAIL: I do not think the hon. gentleman is in order in referring to me in that way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member (Mr. Vail) should behave with something like courtesy when he was in his seat. They would leave this matter to the country, for he knew the country were behind the Opposition. Hon. members on the other side knew that well also. The might laugh and jeer, and the hon. the Premier might whistle to keep their courage up; but their courage was sinking down to their boots. The Opposition must submit for a time, and they would submit with all the grace they could, and with all the resignation that they ought; but the honest indignation with which he spoke would resound from one end of the country to the other, and receive the support of the people from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. MASSON said he would not say they had been cheated out of their rights—he never used that expression—but he would repeat that, by the act of the Government, and by the putting of the question by Mr. Speaker, they were deprived of their rights.

Resolution 2 read the second time, and agreed to, on a Division.

Resolution 3 read the second time.

Question put on concurrence in the said Resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved in amendment:

“That the said resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions that they shall have power to substitute for the said duties on tea some tax that, while bringing to the Treasury an equivalent amount of revenue, will, at the same time, aid the various industries of the country.”

He said he had had occasion to say before, and he would repeat that this tax had no merit except that it was easily collected. In the first place it was a tax on the consumer, and upon everybody, whether farmer, agriculturist, mechanic, manufacturer or merchant; everybody who drank tea was made liable for the increase of the tax on tea, at the rate of two cents a pound additional. It had been said that this was a small tax, that it did not amount to anything. But, in raising the price of tea two cents on the pound, it did so not only on the tea which would be hereafter imported, but upon all the tea which was at present in the country. The Government had indubitable evidence from all parts that this country was suffering greatly from depression. They knew that they might have arranged this tariff so that, while it would have raised the revenue, it would, at the same time, in some degree have given encouragement, some support, some cheer to the various struggling industries, and thus have benefited both the labourer and employer. True to his promise he did not propose to make a speech on this occasion, and, therefore, he would be content with moving the resolution.

Mr. BOWELL said as a matter of dispute had arisen just now he would take this opportunity of setting the House right upon it. It was positively asserted that the Government did not go into Supply during the discussion upon the motion made by his right hon. friend from Kingston; and then again it was asserted, with equal positiveness, that they did go into Supply between the divisions which took place and during that debate. If they referred to the Journal, which he held in his hand, of the 15th March, they would find that the first division took place upon the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton, and on the 16th, on page 163, it would be seen that the Finance Minister moved the House again into Committee of Supply, and the debate continued after that, and the division upon the motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington and the hon. member for Kingston did not take place until the 23rd March. So that, as a matter of fact, the Government did move the House into Supply during the time when this discussion was going on, on a motion which the Government themselves said was a motion of want of confidence.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not intend to occupy the time of the House long in relation to this matter, although he considered it one of great importance.

The policy of the Government he considered a most unfortunate one in relation to the duty which they proposed to raise. If, in the present condition of the country, the Government had exhausted their ingenuity in endeavouring to discover some means more objectionable than another of imposing a tax upon the country, he did not think they could have been more successful than in increasing the duty upon tea. It was well known that tea entered into the consumption of all classes, and was a necessary of life to the masses of the people. The people, at the present moment, were suffering a great amount of privation, owing to the great depression which existed. As the hon. the Finance Minister had expressed it, the present condition of the country was one of deep distress. The poor man must have his tea. While it might be an article of luxury to the rich, it was one of necessity to the poor. There was no people ever discovered so savage but that they had some beverage which contained within it the essential principles of tea and coffee. Many persons supposed that tea was a luxury, and that the masses of the people wasted their means in the consumption of an article that was not a necessary of life. A grander mistake was never made. The fact to which he had just alluded established, beyond controversy, the fact that tea contained those principles that were necessary for the preservation of health. The rich could obtain an abundant supply of fresh animal food, and did not stand in the same position as the poor man who could not obtain this article. The rich man did not need to use tea to the same extent as the poor man, who used tea because it enabled him in a cheap way to obtain the nourishment necessary for his life and health. Under these circumstances, it would be seen that the plan of the Government for raising the revenue, so far as this was concerned, would press onerously upon the great masses of the people. At the very time when it was acknowledged that the employment could not be given to the labouring classes which they were desirous of obtaining, the Government imposed an additional tax upon one of their necessaries of life. It would be, in his opinion, impossible to devise a tax more mischievous, oppressive and injurious than the one which had been presented to the House. Not only was the tax objectionable itself, under the circumstances of the country, but the form in which it was presented was objectionable, the poor man being taxed to an inordinate proportion. The masses of the people were obliged to get the cheapest kinds of teas, say that at 25c. a pound, and yet as large an amount would be wrung out of their hard earned money for this tea as the rich man would have to pay for his tea at $1 a pound. Thus the form in which the tax was presented was most unfair in its distribution, as between the poor and the rich. If, from the condition of the country brought on by the mismanagement of this Administration, the Government were forced to increase the taxation on the necessaries of life, they were bound to consider how they could so levy it as to make the burden fall as lightly as possible upon the struggling masses of the people at the present time, instead of imposing it in the way they had. Had they imposed it in the form of an ad valorem duty, then the poor man would not be compelled to bear the burden to the extent he now would have to bear it. He would be compelled to pay for the article which his means would only enable him to obtain—the poorer and cheaper quality of tea—the same as the wealthier and richer portion of the community, who could indulge in the more expensive luxury of a higher class tea. Was there a man in the House who did not know that, as far as the essential principle was concerned, one pound of the tea consumed by the wealthier class contained more of that principle than that which the poorer class indulged in. The Government not only imposed this tax, but did it in such a way as to make the poor poorer and to lessen the burdens on the rich. He did not think they could congratulate themselves either on the subject of taxation or on the mode—the unjust, oppressive and unfair mode—in which they proposed to levy this tax. There was another consideration which, apparently, ran through the whole policy of the Administration, and the country were to be told: “We will levy an additional tax upon tea, and upon beer, and upon anything and everything that is at all innocent or beneficial in its nature; but we will leave free from any increased taxation the most mischievous, hurtful and injurious beverage in use by the people of Canada." The whole policy of this Administration was to drive the masses of the people of this country into drunkenness, and to leave, as the only beverage, the only stimulant, the only thing which the man suffering in strength and exhausted from the want of being able to supply himself with the ordinary amount of comforts which we desired the great mass of our people to have within their reach—neither tea nor beer, but a glass of whiskey. He thought if the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who had presented himself to this House as a champion of temperance, were true to his vocation, to the principles he professed so loudly, he would not be found sustaining the Administration in adopting a course which every one must feel could only conduce to the demoralization and injury of the great mass of the people. This was a question upon which any man, who felt what was due to the masses of the people of the country, was bound to raise his voice in protest. The course of the Government and their whole policy was one which he did not think could reflect credit upon them, or would be regarded by the people as just towards them. He believed, as he had stated, that the result would be to take an unjust and unfair proportion of the tax from those who were least able to bear it. And that would not be the worst, it would drive parties who otherwise would be unable to indulge in "the cup that cheers but not inebriates" to the same unfortunate result by leading them to partake of an article of a more stimulating, but less expensive character. If that did not result from this proposal it would not be because the Government had not done all in their power towards an end so undesirable and so much to be regretted.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it must be a great satisfaction to many members of this House whose memories extended back a few years, to discover how completely the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) and those who were in the same Administration with him had turned their backs on their previous course in regard to this and other questions before the House. It must be news to hon. gentlemen who were not in the House before to learn that the duty imposed by those hon. gentlemen amounted to seven cents specific on green tea and fifteen per cent. ad valorem. It must distress the mind of every true patriot to reflect what an immense amount of mischief, of increased drunkenness, of ruin to the whole labouring classes, those gentlemen must have had to answer for, who permitted that tax to exist for five years out of the six during which they held the reins of power. Moreover, as they were fond of following English precedent, it might be well to remind those extra loyal gentlemen that the English Parliament, who were certainly not to blame for indifference to the lower classes, lately, at all events, had placed a specific tax of twelve cents on every pound of tea, good, bad and indifferent. The hon. member for Kingston had charged against the Government, as a crime that they did not re-arrange the tariff. He (Mr. Cartwright) would do that if he saw any means of attaining the object which the hon. gentleman and his friends professed to think they could attain, but he knew that any so-called readjustment of the tariff must mean, not a lightening of the burdens of the people, but the transference of the burdens in favour of a small class of the people to a larger class of the people; that it must mean the loss of large sums, far larger than could come into the Treasury, to the great bulk of the people; and it was because the Government would not attempt to get cheap popularity with a small class at the expense of the whole people of the country that they had refused to so re-arrange the tariff. His hon. friend the member for Cumberland made it a ground of complaint that the Government had preferred a specific to an ad valorem tax. They had done so designedly, because any one who had experience in these matters knew that on tea, of all articles, an ad valorem tax was the one productive of the most unfairness to the consumer, the most injustice to the poorer portion of the community. It was not the case that the great majority of the people in Canada consumed cheap tea. That to some extent was the case in England, where a large number of the people were unhappily in a condition of far greater poverty than our people were. Our people, compared with them and the people of other countries, obtained a better degree of comfort and required a very good article in the way of tea, and the tea consumed here was comparatively of a high price. Inquiries made by the Government before they proposed the tax had convinced the Minister of Customs and himself that the proportion of low-priced teas was very small compared with the teas generally consumed in this country, so that they would have been chasing a shadow by putting on an ad valorem duty. The hon. gentleman declared that the labourer must have tea, and that it was a prime necessity of life, and that it was cruel to tax a prime necessity of life; but he and his friends would tax the fuel, the bread, the clothes, and the sugar of the labourer. What was it they would not tax if they had the opportunity, under the feeble guise of a National Policy, which nearly every man in the United States was beginning to see would produce a worse state of things than they now deplored? He would read from a speech recently delivered in Congress, and not contradicted. It was describing a state of things in the United States, where protection advocates had had their own sweet way:—

“ Even in the small manufacturing towns are found people seeking for work, and the general cry is: ‘ It is our trade relations that are wrong and unsound; what have you to suggest to lift us out of this slough of despond?’ ”

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is discussing the general question.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he thought something was said in that way before, and, when the hon. gentleman referred to the great injury done by the policy of the Government to the labouring population, he thought it desirable to show that this was not confined to our own country alone. Now, what was this tax which was to bring ruin and dismay to every labourer and struggling manufacturer? What was the additional tax per head which the Government proposed to impose? The average consumption of tea per head was three pounds per annum, and this tax would inflict a loss, at the utmost, of six cents per head per annum. This Government, which did so little to relieve the labourer, would, by the removal of the tax on coal oil, afford relief of at least thirty or forty cents per head per annum. He thought the distressed population of Canada would not find that they were dealing very ill with them when, in consideration of a tax of six cents per head, they gave them relief to four or five times that amount. The last argument the hon. gentleman brought forward was that all this tended to make the people drunk, because the Government would not levy a tax on whiskey. He (Mr. Cartwright) might remind the House that the first tax which they imposed was an additional tax on whiskey. If he thought that article could fairly bear it he would be the first to propose an additional tax on it instead of on beer, or on tea; but they knew that illicit distillation was making such progress that it was almost impossible to check it, and they were obliged to ask new powers from Parliament for the purpose. They knew that nearly four times the number of illicit stills had, within the last twelve months, been seized in Canada, than ever before; therefore, he thought the Government were not to be blamed for saying that they considered the tax on whiskey to be as high as could be collected. If the hon. gentleman could show him that, with safety to the revenue and the habits of the people, an additional tax could be imposed on whiskey, he would be glad to propose it, but he did not believe it would be either politic or wise for them to attempt, at present, at any rate, to add anything to the tax upon whiskey. These were the reasons which had induced the Government to impose a tax upon this article of tea. As the right hon. member for Kingston had said, it was a tax tolerably sure in its operation, easily collected, and sure to bring a good round sum into the revenue. He (Mr. Cartwright) did not pretend that this or the preceding tax was one which he would like to inflict. The circumstances of the country were peculiar. We had to raise a considerable sum of money in addition to the present taxes, which he thought were heavy enough, and which he did not desire to see increased, if possible, and he thought the House would concur with him that the Government had done wisely in selecting a tax which could be easily collected, and could be removed with a minimum of disturbance, and which would not take out of the pockets of the people as much as the taxes proposed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said the hon. the Minister of Finance had stated that the Government of which he (Mr. Pope) was a member had put a duty of seven cents on tea. It would have been only fair of the hon. gentleman to have stated that that Government took that duty off; that this country was relieved to the extent of a million of dollars of the tax on tea by the Government of his his hon. friend from Kingston. The hon. member had said that the present Government had brought down this proposition because it was easily collected, and because it was the most just and reasonable tax, and he took to himself credit for having relieved the country of the tax upon coal oil. The House knew all about coal oil; how the Government were opposed to reducing the tax upon that article, and how it was only on a resolution moved by his hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) that they took it off, and then only yielded to a pressure which they could not withstand. The hon. gentleman said that the Opposition would take the tax off tea, but would tax breadstuffs and other necessaries of the people of this country. Let him remember that the people would not complain, would not oppose his tax on tea if it had been necessary to impose it, if he had placed them in a position to buy that tea. It was the very policy of the Government which made this tax on tea even ten times worse and more obnoxious to the people of this country than it otherwise would be. The course hon. gentlemen opposite were pursuing was likely to lead to very great disasters in the country. It placed the poor man in such a position that he could neither secure labour nor money wherewith to buy his bread. The poor man would not object to pay one dollar more a barrel for his flour if he could get employment and money wherewith to buy it. The policy of the Government deprived the poor man of labour and money to purchase his bread. This was the position of the hon. gentleman opposite. The levy of a tax on tea was not the end of it. Public works would now cost more. If the Georgian Bay Branch, of which these gentlemen were so proud, were to be built, it would cost more than would be otherwise the case. This tax was going to be a heavy burden on the country. Besides, many and various works were being prosecuted in the country. Even printers used tea; and printers had work and jobs to do. The labouring man drank tea and, owing to its increased price, this must be paid for; and men who did work must be paid more for it. The country had to pay the piper. There was no escape from this position. Employers would have to pay more for the labour they secured. Men engaged on steamboats drank tea, and even when they were shipping steel rails they drank it, and they must pay the increased price. No encouragement was given by the Government to the various industries of the country, and still the price of tea was increased. Hundreds of men were employed on the St. Francis Locks, and they drank tea more or less. These public works must cost more in order to pay for the tax imposed on tea. The country must pay it. This was a bad policy. There were a thousand other things on which a tax might have been levied. Protection to our industries might have been granted, and the country relieved from this tax on tea. Undoubtedly every Government should consider the question how they could best distribute taxation and yet lay the lightest burdens on the people; but the tax on tea would not make these burdens less. It was not going to make the country richer or the people happier. The best thing the Government could do was to place the people in a position to buy the necessaries of life, and this the Government either refused or neglected to do. If he were to speak on the question of Protection versus Free Trade, he would say that the great question was how they could enable men to obtain a subsistence in the easiest manner in this country. Labour should be rendered valuable. The question was how to make it the most valuable; and this could only be done by protecting those industries which gave employment to the people, and not by placing a tax on tea. They should enable our people to obtain a living for themselves; when the manufactories were prosperous, this furnished employment, and that created competition, by means of which the labourer was enabled to buy his tea and flour as he would like to do. This was the position he would like to see the Government take. If, after adopting such a policy, they should find it necessary to put this tax on tea, he would not object to it; because they, by protection, would enable the people to pay the tax on tea. In the straitened circumstances of the country he objected to this tax being placed on this necessary of life, since no means were taken to place the people in a position to pay it. When his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) said that the Opposition wished to tax bread, he had only to reply he would guarantee that, if the Dominion was polled from one end to the other, nine votes would be found cast in favour of encouraging the industries of the country, by means of which policy they could buy bread and pay a little more for it, against one to the contrary. This was the sense and feeling of the country. It was perfectly absurd to suppose that his hon. friend was going to remedy all this by this tax on tea. The hon. gentleman had indeed declared that the Government had nothing to do with this matter, and nothing more to do with the distress or prosperity of the country than so many flies on a wheel.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: My hon. friend has mis-stated what I stated. I explicitly said that, in my judgment, the right hon. gentleman and his friends opposite had no more claim to say that they had created the prosperity of the country, nor had they any more power to create it, than so many flies on a wheel.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is the same thing. You said that your Government had no more to do with it than that.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I spoke of your own Government.

Mr. POPE said it followed that hon. gentlemen opposite had nothing more to do with the condition of the country than so many flies on a wheel. They were, no doubt, abler men, and much bigger flies, but after all they were nothing but flies, and they were not supposed to have more effect on the wheel than had his right hon. friend. He had wished to show that this tax would increase the cost of living, and consequently of employment and of public works. This increased cost must come out of the country, and the larger part of the cost would have to be paid by the poor men, who were now quite unable to meet it. Under these circumstances he desired to protest against the course which the Government had pursued. He could have mentioned many other matters, but from doing this he had been debarred by the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he objected, on the first reading of the resolution, as he did still, to the duty on tea and malt, these being two of the articles which he believed were largely consumed by the poorer classes of the Dominion. The duty was now six cents a pound on green and five cents a pound on black tea, and he thought that, if it was to be raised at all, it ought to be levied on the ad valorem principle. He could not see why the duty should be higher on Japan than on China tea. The ad valorem was the fairest system, if a duty on tea was to exist, because, under it, the purchasers of tea contributed to the revenue in proportion to their means. The Finance Minister should admit that he should pay more duty than the poor man who drank an inferior grade of tea. He wished to point out what he considered to be an illegality. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) said that a duty of six cents should be levied on coal oil per wine gallon, but in Chap. 47, 36 Vic., Sec. 4 it was provided that the imperial gallon was the only standard for the measure of liquids; and sub-section 3 of section 5 of the same Act provided for the use of the wine gallon by mutual consent, until the 23rd May, 1880; therefore the hon. gentleman's proposition was contrary to law and to the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act of which they had heard so much during the present Session, and which was passed in 1873. The use of the wine gallon had been distinctly abolished four years ago.

Mr. PALMER said the principle on which this tax was levied was objectionable. Indeed he could conceive of nothing so very objectionable as it was. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had stated, as he had said that evening, that the policy of the right hon. member for Kingston had had no more influence on the prosperity or want of prosperity of the country than so many flies on a wheel. If this was true, no Government could occupy any different position; therefore he took it that the hon. gentleman announced to the House that this was his view with regard to the Government, and then it would make no difference whether a tax was levied on tea or anything else. Hon. members on that side of the House had complained that this tax was obnoxious and that the people could not bear increased taxation in the present depressed state of the country; and he had been surprised to hear the hon. the Finance Minister say in this relation that, after all, what was it? It was only adding six cents a piece to the taxation of the people; and this was gravely adduced as a reason why this additional tax shall be imposed on tea. Had it come to this, that a Minister, who had imposed a tax upon an article, could afford to sneer at the amount of revenue which it raised? No Government should take money from the people in this way without giving reasons for it; the country would not accept mere sneers as reasons, however insignificant the amount might be. He hoped that no such principle as that would ever be advocated in this House again. Then, again, the hon. the Finance Minister excused his course by stating that this was an imposition which could be easily taken off. In that respect he agreed with the hon. gentleman, because he was satisfied that if the tax remained in operation a year it would raise such a feeling in the country that it would be hard to keep it on. The House had heard the hon. the Minister of the Interior on this subject of the tariff, and it seemed that the policy of the Government was somewhat at variance with the views of that hon. gentleman. If the policy were incidental protection, as had been frequently proclaimed, what kind of an excuse could there be for putting an additional tax upon tea. That, surely, could not be called incidental protection, for we did not, and could never be expected to, grow tea in this country. He appealed to hon. members to say whether any other article could have been taxed which would be a greater drain on the energies of the people than tea. If any principle of taxation were correct, it was that capital should bear its fair proportion of the burdens; but if the capital were not to pay the whole of the burdens, the whole tax should not be placed upon the energies of the men without capital. But, under this system which had been inaugurated, the labouring men would pay more than the rich men into the public Treasury. In view of the depressed circumstances of the country, this policy of the Government, instead of encouraging the industries and giving employment to the idle population, would have the effect of driving them out of the country. It was not too late for the hon. the Finance Minister to reconsider his decision in this matter, and he urged him to do so; otherwise, he would have to vote against the resolution.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he could not allow the policy of the Government, in regard to the tariff, to go unchallenged. What had the country been promised all along? We had been led to believe that, when the Government had an opportunity, they would give incidental protection to the industries of this country as far as lay in their power. That policy had been promised throughout the length and breadth of this land; had been promised on the floor of this House; but the first thing the Administration had done was to put a tax upon tea, one of the necessities of life. The hon. the Finance Minister used the tu quoque argument, and excused himself for the position he had taken, by stating that he had simply done what the right hon. member for Kingston did during his fifteen or twenty years' tenure of office; but he forgot to tell the House that, when the present Administration came into power, they found no tax on tea and coffee, and, as soon as they had the opportunity, instead of giving the promised incidental protection to our industries, they raised a million dollars out of those very articles which could not be produced here, by a duty of 5c. on green and 6c. on black tea. They had always promised that what we could not to advantage produce, or manufacture, or grow in Canada, the people should have free; and that our home productions should be protected; and yet the declared policy of the Government now was, according to the resolution under discussion, in open variance with those sound doctrines of political economy they had promised this House and the country. It might be said that the Government had put 2½ per cent. on the tariff and taken off the duty on coal oil. That latter change was brought about by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), who forced it upon the attention of the Government. Even now, however, there was a duty of 50 per cent. on coal oil, which was a sufficient answer to the taunt that the Protectionists voted for the reduction. They wanted no such duty on coal oil; they asked for no 17½ per cent., or other particular duty. What they wanted the Government to do, and what they had refused, and to-night confessed their incapacity to do, was to readjust the tariff and place it on a satisfactory basis, so that every interest, both agricultural, commercial and manufacturing, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, might be benefitted. Compare the United States Government with ours in this respect, and mark the difference. Notwithstanding the diversity of interests in that country, their southern interests of cotton, tobacco and sugar, they managed to carry out a fiscal policy which was beneficial to the people. They did not tax tea or coffee at all, they could not produce it, and it was altogether free, and they had shown themselves capable of adjusting a tariff, while our Government had confessed their inability to do so. The position of the Ministry was something like this: "We take our salaries and confess our inability at the present juncture, by any legislation that we could make, to assist our different interests, or alleviate the present distress." The hon. the Finance Minister read an extract from a speech made in the House of Representatives at Washington, to show that a worse state of things existed in the United States than in this country. But what were the facts? Their depreciated currency was coming to a gold basis; they were paying off their national debt rapidly; their blast furnaces were operating more continuously; and the country generally was advancing to its normal state. But, in contrast, we had a deficit of $2,000,000; all our industries were depressed; and now it was proposed to put a tax, in the most absurd manner, upon a necessary of the working classes, and, in fact, of every class in the country. He rose strongly to protest against the policy of the Government with regard to placing this duty on tea, and in such a form as would bear harder upon the farmer, labouring man and mechanic than upon any other class of the community.

Mr. FARROW said he had come to the conclusion to differ from his hon. friends a little. He thought the Opposition ought not to complain of the Government exactly, because they were doing a good turn to them. He was persuaded that the policy of the Government on the tariff would help to kill them the quicker. He would enquire whether the Government knew what they were doing. Women drank more tea than men, as he could vouch by an experience of twenty years in selling tea. When the ladies of this country saw that the price of tea was raised, the Government might be sure that they would oppose them; and, with the ladies of the country against them, they could not succeed. The Minister of Finance, referring to illicit distillation, said that it had increased very much during the last few months.

It was not the high duty on whiskey which caused this illicit distilling; it was the hard times. If the duties were advanced 50 per cent., this illicit distilling would still go on. In the back country, many farmers had failed in their wheat crops, and their coarse grain, if sold, would realize very little. So, many of them went into the swamps and manufactured "Swamp whiskey," which they could sell for 75c. a gallon. To a certain extent, the Government had brought on the hard times and to the hard times was attributable much of the evil of illicit distilling. It would seem, from what the Government said, that this extra duty of 2c. a pound on tea was the only duty; but it was not so; there was already a tax, and with the 2c. additional it would be 5c. and 6c. One pound of good tea was worth, in its properties, three pounds of poor tea, which the poorer classes had to buy on account of its cheapness. The poor man would therefore have to pay three times as much duty as the rich man on his tea, the duty being the same on each pound, whether good or bad. In every way in which the Government had handled the tariff they had acted against the interest of the poor man. When the Finance Minister meddled with the duties on wines, he put as much upon the light cheap French wines as upon the costly sparkling champagnes. Such a policy could not but end in the defeat of any Government, and he trusted that the reign of the present Government would soon end, as he believed it would.

Mr. PLUMB said the Finance Minister went back 18 or 20 years to criticize the fiscal policy of the country, and to show that the right hon. member for Kingston put a duty upon tea. He did not think it was necessary to go back so far. He thought it was quite sufficient to go back to the record of the last ten years, during which Canada had been a united Confederation. It would be seen that under the management of the right hon. member for Kingston, during that time, at least $13,000,000 had been spent upon permanent structures in the country, upon works properly chargeable to capital and not to income, besides putting $3,000,000 into the Sinking Fund. And, in addition to that, that Government had taken off the tax on tea and coffee, which had raised a revenue of $1,000,000. The Finance Minister had stated that the great majority of the people in Canada did not consume cheap tea, and that therefore an ad valorem duty would not be the true principle to apply to this tax. He (Mr. Plumb) had it from men practically acquainted with the subject that three-quarters of the tea used in Canada was that sold at less than 50c. a pound. The hon. the Minister of the Interior quoted to some extent from a letter written by a very able financier (Sir A. T. Galt), and the Finance Minister also read from a newspaper as if that letter strengthened the position of the Government. He (Mr. Plumb) had in his hand the reply of Mr. Galt to a letter sent by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, in which was the following:—

"The Government that, having the power, refuses to alter, must be held to occupy the position that no change can be made for the better; and you, as a member of the present Government, are therefore as fully committed as myself to the principle embodied in all our past fiscal legislation, that Free-Trade cannot be adopted—without grave modification—in Canada at least.

"If I may be pardoned for saying it, you have addressed me from the standpoint of a student of political economy—and not as a practical statesman. You appear to regard political economy as an exact science; but of all the eminent men you quote, I know not one who, having the power, has strictly applied its rules in all cases without discrimination.

"I assert that the true application of Political Economy to trade does not mean simply an absence of Customs duties, which in the present state of the world is admittedly impossible, but such a careful adjustment of burdens upon industry as will permit the interchange of products on the nearest practicable footing of equality.

"I deny that this has ever yet been done in any country in the world—certainly not in England, and I therefore hold and repeat that 'on the principle laid down in 1859, and having regard to our business relations with the Mother Country and other nations, especially the United States, a readjustment of the tariff now, would greatly tend to the amelioration of the present commercial distress, and would certainly place our suffering industries in a better position to take early advantage of the recurrence of more prosperous days.'

"I have now, I hope, with sufficient distinctiveness, reaffirmed my position, that the tariff of Canada must be dealt with on the basis of 'modified Free Trade,' or 'incidental Protection,' while I frankly admit any inconsistency there may be in desiring to impose differential duties on many articles of American production. The real question at issue, however, is whether the present tariff is the best possible for the present circumstances of Canada. You, by your inaction, assume the affirmative, and must, consequently, be held to the position that when unexampled commercial suffering exists in the country, you can, as a Government, do nothing whatever to relieve it. You allege that the causes are beyond your control, and that Nature must supply the remedy. I take the contrary position, and affirm that the present tariff is eminently artificial, and therefore open at all times to beneficial change, and that in a period of severe distress the duty of the Government is to try the effect of changes. It has a most gloomy and depressing influence on the mind of the country for the Parliament to assume the attitude of admitted incapacity to afford relief for two successive years.

"I contend, on the other hand, that it is false economy to purchase an evanescent and purely artificial reduction of a very considerable amount on refined sugar, at the cost of driving out of the country an industry regarded by all commercial nations as of the highest importance, and entailing the sacrifice of our foreign trade with the West Indies, who ought to be our best customers, and whose trade can alone make us commercially independent of the United States. To obtain this trade, I would rather reduce duties, so as to make refined sugar actually cheaper than at present.

"I might cite the working of the American law in reference to the Tea Trade and other instances connected with the development of our foreign trade, in which changes in our present tariff are desirable, but those two illustrations will, I think, sufficiently indicate the direction in which it appears to me a re-adjustment of the tariff might be advantageously made, and which would, I hope, as stated in my first letter to you, 'greatly tend to the amelioration of the present commercial distress, and certainly place our suffering industries in a better position to take early advantage of the recurrence of more prosperous days.'"

The views here expressed were even stronger than the views expressed by the Opposition. The gentlemen opposite had always made the House understand that in any tariff changes they made they did not contemplate any protection.

Mr. DYMOND: I rise to a point of order. Is not the course of the hon.

Mr. PLUMB.

gentleman directly at variance with your ruling, when the hon. the Finance Minister was on his feet?

Mr. PLUMB said he thought he was speaking directly to the point. It was intended to show that the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston was a pertinent resolution, that the tariff could have been distributed in some other way. He would support the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. DELORME said he could not reconcile the position of the right hon. member for Kingston and his supporters with that occupied by them a few evenings ago, when they sought to tax the flour and wheat of the people. Those hon. gentlemen seemed to be very nervous in regard to the question under discussion, and he would read to them a quotation from the writings of Mr. Horace Greeley, as follows:—

"The experience of Great Britain for the last twenty years in regard to tea, as a source of revenue under the Customs, had established this curious fact, that a decrease of the tariff on this article, brings no corresponding benefit in the way of reduction of price to the consumer. Thus, for example, while the duty on tea, under the British tariff, was reduced to the extent of 77 per cent. between the years 1849 and 1866 (from 2s. 2½d. in 1849 to 6d. in 1866), the average price of tea in bond or duty free, during the same period, exhibited a corresponding increase of about fifty per cent. (i.e. from 1s. 1d. to 1s. 7½d.); and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the supply through importation had in no wise abated, but, on the contrary, increased during the years 1862-63 to an extent sufficient to overstock the market. The explanation of this commercial phenomena is that there being practically but one tea-producing country, the trade partakes of the character of monopoly to such a degree that a decrease of the duty enures mainly to the advantage of the producer, and an increase, conversely, to his disadvantage. The opinion, therefore, so often expressed of late, that a reduction of the present duty on tea would result to the advantage of the American consumer, is not likely to be practically realized."

That was not the opinion of one authority only; but a consultation of various writers would show that the opinion was generally held that the price of tea could not be increased to the dealer without an increased price having to be paid by the consumer. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who had advocated the imposition of a duty on wheat and flour, would not be received so favourably in the Province of Quebec as they anticipated. If those hon. gentlemen hoped to obtain office, it would not be by supporting such a motion as that submitted by the right hon. member for Kingston; for, if that course were pursued, the people would keep them in Opposition twenty years more. The tax on tea was one which would not materially affect the people, for it would be distributed over such a vast body of the population.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he had listened with much interest to many speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and he found there were few of them who properly understood the tea question. Admitting there were 2c. per pound added this year to the price of the poor man's tea, it must be remembered that he obtained the article 50c. per pound cheaper than he did three or four years ago. Tea which was sold two years ago at 40c. was now sold at 25c., and that at 50c. could now be had for 40c., and there was little tea sold for over 75c. per lb. He represented a county which consumed as much tea as any county in the Dominion, but he was not afraid to go to his constituents and fight out the question. If the Government should be condemned for imposing a duty of 2c. per lb. on tea, they should get credit for removing a duty of 9c. per gallon on coal oil, an article which every farmer used.

Question put, that the resolution be now concurred in.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said that, if the Finance Minister's object in levying an increased duty on tea had been to injure everybody and benefit nobody, he had succeeded most admirably; and, if the hon. gentleman's object had been to do an injustice, he had succeeded admirably. If the hon. gentleman had wished to do an injustice to those who were least able to bear it, the result suited his purpose. According to the manner in which the duty was levied, tea which cost twenty cents a pound paid as much duty as tea that cost $1 a pound. He found that fourteen million pounds of tea were imported into the Dominion at a cost of a little over four millions of dollars, or at an average price of about thirty cents a pound. Hence a larger proportion of it must be of inferior quality, which would be consumed by the poorer classes. Among the many articles imported he thought that some articles might have been chosen on which the imposition of duties would have been less oppressive than in this case. It was true, as hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House said, that this was only a small—a trifling matter of two or three cents a pound; but, on the whole, it amounted to a tax of nearly a million of dollars, and this million could have been obtained in a way which would have been less injurious to the interests of the country. From the Trade and Navigation Returns, he found that there was imported into the country, of iron and of iron manufactures, something like ten millions of dollars worth; and a duty of five per cent. on this amount would have raised double what would be the result of this tax; and would any one say that such a duty would have been more injurious than this one to the industries and the people of the country? But this would not have suited the Finance Minister, who evidently intended to levy a duty in such a manner as to ignore everybody and benefit no one. It was possible that a duty of five per cent. on iron and iron goods imported, might have been beneficial to our iron manufacturers, and led to the use of some of the iron which was under our soil, but which would be valueless until utilized. Such a duty might have helped to develop the resources and to add to the wealth of the country. Of animals and their products, we imported to the value of something like $3,210,000, and a duty of ten per cent. on these would have procured $321,000 of revenue. But this might have been beneficial to farmers, and consequently it would not have suited the hon. gentleman's purpose. We imported, for consumption, 371,000 bbls. of flour, and a duty of 50c. a barrel would have raised nearly as much as would this duty on tea; but, again, this might have been beneficial to the farmers of this country. We imported for consumption 2,550,000 bushels of wheat, and a duty of 10c. a bushel would have secured a larger amount of revenue than this tea duty but this also would have been beneficial to the farmers. We imported 1,595,000 bushels of corn, the greater portion of which was used for distilling purposes, and a duty of 10c. a bushel would have, perhaps, been equal to 2½c. a gallon on whiskey, with which these hon. gentlemen who were advocates of the temperance could not have found fault; but such a duty would have been beneficial to the farmers. We imported to the value of something like $9,000,000 of what might be called fancy goods, such as musical instruments, silks, satins, velvets, &c., and a duty of 5 per cent. on these would have raised double the revenue that would be procured by means of this tax; such a duty would have fallen more largely on the richer classes of the people who were better able to pay duties than the consumers of tea, as a whole; but it would not have suited perhaps the hon. gentleman as well, because it would have imposed duties on those who were better able to pay them, and, therefore, this course had not been adopted. We imported, of copper goods, some $630,000 worth, and a duty on these of ten per cent. would have raised $60,000, and this might have been instrumental in calling into use the products of the copper mines of lakes Huron and Superior, and been a benefit to the industries in that respect; but the hon. gentleman in levying duties did not seem to care a straw about the interests of the country, but was only concerned to impose them in the way that they could be most easily collected without reference to whether this was just or whether it was in the interests of the country. He had heard it said that Parliament was the fountain-head of justice; but, if so, these hon. gentlemen, who controlled the House, were perverting the duties of Parliament, because they imposed duties in such a manner as to be positively unjust—and was it the duty of Parliament to enact an injustice? No man could say that it was just in principle to make twenty cents pay as much tax as forty, fifty or sixty cents, or even a larger sum. Yet the Government was about to commit this injustice; but it was easier to increase the duty on tea by two cents than to levy an ad valorem duty to raise an equal amount, consequently the specific duty had been adopted. It was said that the revenue could be defrauded if an ad valorem duty were imposed, but he did not believe that the mercantile community were ready to perjure themselves when making their Customs entries, for the sake of saving a little duty on anything they imported; and to declare the contrary was to insult the merchants, because the inference was that they were prepared to commit wilful and designed perjury. He would move in amendment:

“That the said resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions that they shall have power to amend it by substituting for the present and proposed specific duty on tea, an ad valorem duty, in such a manner as not to increase the burden of taxation, but which will be more just to the masses who are the consumers of cheap tea.”

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 4 and 5 read the second time and agreed to on a Division.

On Resolution 6,

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the House was probably aware that the reason why tubing of various kinds was put on the free list, by Order in Council passed, if he remembered aright, by their predecessors, was not to admit all kinds of tubing free, but certain portions supposed to be desirable for use in manufactures. They found that in practice this Order was construed by the Courts in a sense vastly wider than there was reason to believe the Customs authorities intended. In point of fact, as nearly as he could calculate, this had occasioned a loss of something like $50,000 to the revenue, though of this not exceeding $4,000 or $5,000 was intended to be admitted free. He did not believe it expedient to modify the wording of the clause, but, with the aid of the Minister of Customs, he proposed under the general power thus possessed, to hereafter modify, by Order in Council carefully prepared, the application of it, and a drawback would be allowed after they had received clear proof that the tubing in question had actually been used in manufacturing boilers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked by what authority it was proposed to prepare these Orders in Council?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was the general Act, which could be used for the purpose, because it was only fair to do this in order to encourage manufactures where the tubing was used as raw material.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman should well consider the matter before the resolutions were finally adopted.

Mr. TUPPER said he was extremely glad that the hon. the Finance Minister had got new light on this subject, and he was only surprised that the hon. gentleman had not the candour to confess to the House that he had imposed this tax without understanding the exact bearing of the proposition. Tubing was not manufactured in this country. It entered into all manufactures connected with steam, water and gas, and the proposed duty would have amounted to a complete reversal of the advantages which the manufacturers enjoyed in this regard. The House was told that a tube factory could not be established without an expenditure of $250,000 to $300,000, and the hon. the Finance Minister said if the House would allow him to impose this tax the Governor in Council would exercise his power to take it off. The same reason which induced the hon. gentleman to take that course ought to have led him to step forward and withdraw a proposition to impose a tax which would have had so injurious and oppressive an effect on our manufacturing industries. He was glad that the hon. gentleman had come to the conclusion that he had on this subject, but regretted that he had not done, what on a former occasion he was compelled to do,—admit that he had made a blunder.

Mr. YOUNG said he desired to express his gratification at the announcement made by the hon. the Finance Minister in regard to tubing. This article entered largely into the construction of machinery and also into the construction of fine buildings. In the latter case he thought it was a fair subject for taxation, and he thought the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister was a sufficient justification of the course he had pursued in regard to this matter. He was sure that the announcement would be heard with gratification by the manufacturers of the country. It had evidently taken the hon. member for Cumberland by surprise, and he had not been able to make the whole of his intended speech on this question. The announcement to which the House had listened went to show that the Government would, in every proper and legitimate manner, protect the interests of the manufacturers as well as those of other classes in the community.

Mr. WORKMAN said he was very much pleased to hear the announcement that had been made, because he knew there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in regard to the proposed treatment of tubing. A deputation had waited upon the Government, and, without having any positive knowledge of the fact, he was led to believe that this change would be made, and that a drawback would be allowed on tubing used in the construction of boilers. He thought the manufacturers would be satisfied with the arrangement.

Mr. WOOD said he was very glad the hon. the Finance Minister had seen his way to place boiler tubes virtually on the free list, which he thought was a step in the right direction. He wished to draw the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland to the fact that gas tubes could be manufactured in Canada under the outlay named. He was assured that a gas-tube factory could be established for $25,000, and he therefore thought the Government had done right in retaining the duty on that class of tubing which could afford to pay a duty.

Mr. BUNSTER said he thought it would have been much better for the Government to have left this item out altogether. A small manufacturer might not have sufficient money to pay the duty on the gas-tubes he imported. Then, when the trouble of applying for and getting the drawback was taken into consideration, he did not think there was much advantage in the change. He considered the duty would press unfairly on the manufacturers. In his city they had a boiler factory employing about 140 hands, and he thought the duty would injure that industry.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) asked what proportion of the duty would be allowed for a drawback.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The whole imposed on boiler tubes.

Mr. PLUMB asked whether it was not possible so to arrange that the duty upon boiler tubes could be remitted at once.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they had found in practice that great frauds had been committed on the revenue. It was quite clear that tubing should bear some small portion of the duty; and they would be only able to collect the small sums in this way. The hon. the Minister of Customs would take the point raised by his hon. friend (Mr. Plumb), and also that of the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), into careful consideration.

Mr. CURRIER said he could not understand how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) could justify his course in remitting the duty on boiler tubes and not upon other kinds of tubing. It had been stated that $25,000 would suffice to establish a gas-tube and water-pipe factory, but he understood that the same machinery was required for the manufacture of that description of tubing as would be required for making boiler tubes. He could not see how his hon. friend could justify himself in admitting pipe-tubing free and not gas meter-pipes. He would much prefer to see the duty remain on boiler-tubing, as there was no reason why we should not manufacture that as well as England and the United States.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he was not satisfied at all that it was a judicious act on the part of the Government to impose a duty on pipes, when they entered so largely into use in the different collieries throughout Nova Scotia. Nearly every article used at a mine was charged a duty of 17½ per cent., and he thought it unwise to add to that list. If drawbacks were to be allowed on anything, they should certainly be allowed on an article used at the collieries.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to, on a Division.

On Resolution 8,

Mr. CURRIER asked whether pork barrels would have a duty charged upon them.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

Mr. CURRIER said he did not think this was right, as, when pork was brought into the country, it was sent to the backwoods for the lumbermen, and the barrels were of no use.

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa County) said he agreed with this view. It was most unfair to tax both pork and barrel, when the barrel could not be used afterwards.

Mr. WOOD said it was no more unfair than to tax hardware casks.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to, on a Division.

On Resolution 9,

Mr. MILLS said it would probably be remembered that the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), during the discussion on the tariff, had quoted from a letter written by Sir Alexander T. Galt to Mr. Ferrier, as showing that that hon. gentleman advocated a retaliatory policy towards the United States, and a protective policy towards Canada. He (Mr. Mills) replied, quoting a letter of Sir Alexander T. Galt's in return. He had recently received a letter from Sir A. T. Galt on the subject.

Mr. BOWELL: Is the hon. gentleman in order, according to your ruling that only observations pertinent to the resolution can be made?

Mr. SPEAKER said he understood the hon. member rose for the purpose of making a personal observation.

Mr. DESJARDINS: We have all read that letter.

Mr. HOLTON called for the point of order to be sustained.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to, on a Division.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he hoped the House, before it adjourned, will give the hon. the Minister of the Interior an opportunity of replying and of reading the letter, in accordance with a promise to him that Sir Alexander T. Galt's letter should be read in the House.

Mr. HOLTON: The whole thing is out of order. The hon. the Minister of the Interior was called to order.

Mr. GIBBS: I am only requesting that the House might yet give the hon. member an opportunity to explain himself.

Mr. HOLTON: There is no question before the House which admits of the discussion of this question.

Mr. GIBBS: In order, therefore, to make the discussion in order, I must move the adjournment of the House. The hon. gentleman desires to carry out in good faith the promise he made to Sir Alexander T. Galt and myself, and I hope he will have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. BLAKE: He wanted to, but you would not let him.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he rose to second the motion for adjournment. In doing so, he desired to call attention to the fact that, if the Minister of the Interior had desired to read the letter to the House, he could have done so before now, when the debate was over, and it was two o'clock in the morning.

Mr. DYMOND: What question is before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question of adjournment.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he hoped the House would give the Minister of the Interior an opportunity to carry out the pledge he had given.

Mr. TUPPER said he hoped the House would give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of making a statement which was very much demanded at his hands. That hon. gentleman, a member of the Cabinet, stood in the position of having advanced what he claimed to be the views and principles of a gentleman of high authority and standing in this country. And yet, with information in his hand showing that he had misrepresented that gentleman, he permitted the debate to close, and it to be so very late before he attempted to make any correction, or to fulfil the promise he had made.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a question involved here of great importance: Whether it is desirable to allow gentlemen, not members of this House, to interpose in the debates of this House? It is directly contrary to the rule laid down, which also extends to any letter or newspaper article commenting on anything said in the debates of the House; and, entirely from a parliamentary point of view, I cannot imagine anything so improper as that any gentleman, no matter how eminent, should be allowed to take his place in the House, by having his opinions or his comments introduced upon what any hon. gentleman might say in his place in the House. I think there is a manifest impropriety. When I saw the letter, I saw there was a demand made that it should be read in the House, and it appeared to me to be objectionable on that ground. That the comments of any gentleman not a member of the House should be read in the House, that we should increase the debating powers of the House by means of gentlemen not members, is, I think, highly objectionable.

Mr. MILLS said he thought, after the observations made by the hon. member for Fontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) and of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), the House would permit him to make some remarks with reference to this correspondence. He had felt that there were parliamentary difficulties in the way of reading this correspondence, if any one should take objection, and he had stated to Sir Alexander Galt that he would read it if no objections were made. The letter bore date March 17th, but he (Mr. Mills) did not receive it till two or three days later. When he received it, a discussion was proceeding, and he had already spoken; and, having occupied the attention of the House for some time in relation to the tariff, he had no right to obtrude himself in an irregular way on the House, and by sufferance, until a vote had been taken. After that vote, which was taken at three o'clock in the morning, the motion of the hon. member for South Wellington was made, or he (Mr. Mills) might have read the correspondence. If he had misrepresented Sir Alexander Galt—which he denied, because he had said nothing except to quote the speeches he made in Parliament; but, so far as Sir Alexander Galt complained of anything he had said—it was his duty to correct any mistake or mis-statement he had made—if there were any such. When, however, that gentleman asked him to put before the members of this House the views he (Sir Alexander Galt) at present entertained, which were, perhaps, at variance with those of the Government, when he wished to be put in the position of a member of this House without having a seat, he (Mr. Mills) thought he was asking a great deal at his hands; and that it was not without the consent of his colleagues that he would be at liberty to read that portion of the letter. After receiving the letter and obtaining their consent, he named the fact to the member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), but, when the debate was renewed, eight or ten gentlemen had risen who had not spoken before. He (Mr. Mills) waited there with the intention of reading the correspondence, when the House permitted him or an opportunity offered. Hon. gentlemen knew at what time the debate closed that day; it was nearly five o'clock in the morning, and there was no opportunity of reading it. Hon. gentlemen were excited with the discussion, and he was sure no one would have patiently listened to his reading the letter of Sir Alexander Galt, occupying a column of a newspaper, and one two or three times as long which he (Mr. Mills) had felt it necessary to write in reply. He felt it necessary to show that he had not misrepresented Sir Alexander Galt, or stated or attributed to him any opinions he had not expressed on the floor of Parliament. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Mills) had a note from him stating he thought the letters might be given to the public, and he (Sir Alexander Galt) would write him in reply. The debate on the tariff had not been renewed until to-day, and he thought Sir Alexander Galt was desirous that the letters should be given to the public, and that he looked to the press, and not to Parliament, for the purpose of presenting his views to the public. This being the case, he (Mr. Mills) had crossed the floor of the House this evening and asked the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) whether he felt, after the long time which had transpired, and in view of the letters having been given to the public at the desire of Sir Alexander Galt himself, it was now desirable to read them. The hon. member said he thought he (Mr. Mills) was in honour bound to do so, and, that being his opinion, he had endeavoured this evening to read the communication of Sir Alexander Galt, but the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had raised a point of order and had stopped his doing so. He supposed there was not a gentleman in the House who had not read Sir Alexander Galt's letter, but, with the permission of the House, and Mr. Speaker's approval, he was ready to read it; but, if he did, he thought it was but fair that he should read his own letter in reply.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: Dispense.

Mr. BOWELL said the reason he had taken objection was on account of the decision given by the Speaker to-night, restricting the debate to the resolution under discussion, whatever it might be. He had no objection that Sir Alexander Galt's letters should be read to the House, but he thought that, at this hour of the morning and in this discussion, for the hon. Minister of the Interior to take advantage of it, after allowing a week or ten days or a fortnight to elapse—

Mr. MILLS: I had no opportunity.

Mr. BOWELL: I differ with the hon. gentleman; he had lots of opportunities on different occasions.

Mr. MILLS: When?

Mr. BOWELL: Whenever he asked leave of the House on the calling of the Orders of the Day, and he could have done it just as well when the debate closed at two o'clock in the morning as now; but he has written a long letter in reply, and I presume every member of the House has read the correspondence.

Mr. HOLTON: I rise to a point of order. You, Sir, have decided that it would not be in order to read Sir Alexander Galt's letter.

Mr. MASSON: No.

Mr. HOLTON submitted whether it were in order to discuss the propriety of doing that which the Speaker had decided to be out of order.

Mr. BOWELL said he was not urging the necessity of reading that letter, or defending the reading of it. He was pointing out that the Minister of Interior had the opportunity of doing it before he gave the letter to the public. He (Mr. Bowell) held that, upon the question of adjournment of the House, they had a right to discuss every conceivable thing they pleased, and, as the adjournment was moved for the express purpose, he did not think he was breaking the rule in giving reasons why he objected to the hon. gentleman's going on.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER said he did not exactly rule on the matter, but he saw from the tendency of the conversation what he thought to be very objectionable.

Mr. HOLTON: And objectionable because out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER said he did not intend it exactly as a ruling, but called the attention of the House to the exceeding irregularity of the proceedings.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he did not think the hon. member (Mr. Mills) had done himself or Sir Alexander Galt justice in the matter. He did not hesitate to say that the House would have allowed him to read the letter any day, whether the discussion was over or not.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SPECIAL ORDER MADE.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved :

Motion agreed to.

A DEFECTIVE RETURN.

QUESTION AND REMARKS.

Mr. STEPHENSON asked when the balance of the return he called attention to two days ago would be supplied.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he asked the hon. gentleman to send Mr. Kingsford word as to the portion that was extracted, and he had heard nothing of the matter since.

Mr. SPEAKER said endeavour had been made to ascertain how the missing portion of the papers was lost, but without success. He was informed that the hon. gentleman himself had had the papers in his possession.

Mr. MILLS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he had an interest in getting this return. Other gentlemen had an interest in not having those details exposed to the public eye, and he inferred as a natural sequence that those parties possibly might have extracted the papers.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not conceive of anything more improper than the hon. gentleman making that insinuation; it could only refer to himself and the members of the Printing Committee. He did not know anything about the return which it was the slightest interest of anybody to suppress. The hon. gentleman could not expect to get another copy of the missing part when he did not tell the officer of the Department what it was.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stephenson) had not insinuated anything against any hon. member of the House. The Speaker must remember that he (Mr. Speaker) said that his hon. friend himself (Mr. Stephenson) had the papers for some time, and at that moment the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) exclaimed “hear, hear,” as if here was a find. His hon. friend then alluded to the insinuation which came from the hon. member for Bothwell, and said he understood what it meant. His hon. friend said it could not be himself as he had an interest in the details, but some one who had an interest in suppressing them. His hon. friend had not made the slightest allusion to the First Minister.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Stephenson) had alluded to somebody. The hon. member's notions of honour and morality were such that he supposed some one had suppressed the details and made himself guilty of a crime and misdemeanour in abstracting papers in the possession of the House. It was the bounden duty of the hon. gentleman, if he could do so, to mention the member of the House who had been guilty of conduct that would disgrace him and render him unfit to retain a seat in the House. The hon. gentleman had no right to make such an insinuation unless he had evidence with which to support it, but, if he had made it without evidence, he ought himself to receive the reward of a calumnious accuser.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member for Kent had simply repelled an insinuation, and made no insinuation.

Mr. MILLS: He did.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. member for Kent made no insinuation.

Mr. MILLS: Yes, he did.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member had simply repelled the unwarranted and calumnious insinuation thrown across the floor of the House by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for Kent had made an insinuation against some hon. member, or an officer of the House. It was not unusual for papers to be lost or mislaid under such circumstances. The hon. member for Kent had dealt in slander through his paper over and over again.

Mr. TUPPER: I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. TUPPER: Who is out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is out of order.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he had not made any slanderous insinuations against any member of the House. The papers must have been, however, abstracted by some one. He did not think that any one, except one with a guilty conscience, would feel that he was accused touching this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER said Mr. Stewart had numbered the pages when they came into his hands, and the numbers marked were still to be seen. He assumed that the missing papers had been mislaid or lost by a page.

Mr. STEPHENSON said the pages had been numbered once, and then re-numbered.

Mr. HOLTON said a matter of this kind ought not to be brought before the House, unless with the view of complaining of the conduct of some member or some officer of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, when the matter first came up the hon. member for Kent, had simply asked for a copy of the missing papers.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. member then said it was a serious question to which he called the attention of the House.

INSURANCE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 36.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. YOUNG said he rose to move the amendment of which he had given notice. He fancied hon. members had already made themselves tolerably familiar with its import. He concurred in the principle of the Bill brought in by the Government. He regarded it as an improvement on the existing Insurance Law; but he considered that it contained one serious defect—it did not go far enough. It in fact stopped short of its legitimate and logical conclusion. To remedy the defect he moved:

“That the Bill be not now read a third time but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they shall have power to provide that the reserves to be held by all foreign insurance companies under this Act, shall be solely for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders.”

This amendment happily did not involve any political considerations, nor did it strike at the principle of the Bill; on the contrary, it aimed at carrying out more fully this principle than the Finance Minister had seen fit to do. He, therefore, hoped the Government would see their way clear to regard it as an open question, and that the House would consider it wholly on its merits and free from all party considerations. When the Bill was brought in last year, he understood that its chief object was to give additional security to the policy-holders of life insurance companies, and with this he was sure the House and country both sympathized, not only on account of the large amounts now being invested in life insurance in Canada, but also on account of the numerous failures and losses in these companies which had taken place in other countries, and notably in the United States. He observed, by the report of the Superintendent of Insurance last year, that there were written and existing in Canada at that time life insurance policies to the extent of $85,000,000, and of this amount no less than $63,000,000 as insured in foreign companies, chiefly in the United States. In fact, of the total amount of $85,000,000, more than half was written in American companies. He desired to say, with regard to the American insurance companies doing business in Canada, that, so far as he was aware, they were among the strongest and best of American companies; and, in the remarks he intended to offer, he wished especially to guard against any supposition that he cast the slightest suspicion on the standing and good faith of those companies who were doing business in Canada. The position of many other companies in the United States, however, was entirely different. In the State of New York alone, a statement he held in his hands showed that no less than twenty different companies, in that State alone, had either failed or disappeared within the last few years; and he felt, therefore, that it was the bounden duty of the Government to take up this subject of life insurance, and, being warned by the losses and failures resulting in the United States, from which tens of thousands of the American people had suffered great hardships, enact such a law as would prevent similar failures and disasters taking place in Canada. The most obvious mode of doing this was to enact that all companies doing business in Canada should hold full reserves—such reserves as they knew were, by actuaries, held to be necessary to meet the policies when they matured. Canadian companies had to do this. They knew that the assets of these companies were in Canada, and their shareholders were also in the country. The security to their policy-holders was ample; but this was not the case so far as foreign companies were concerned, and, therefore, he considered that this was the true course for the Government to take. This was the course proposed to be taken in the Bill before the House; and, in fact, he regarded it as the principle of the measure. The 7th clause of the Bill read as follows:—

“If from the annual statements, or after examination of the affairs, the condition of any Company (as hereinafter provided for) it appears that its liabilities to policy-holders in Canada (including matured claims, and the full reserve or reinsurance value for outstanding policies as hereinafter described, after deducting any claim the Company may have against such policies) exceed its assets in Canada, including the deposit in the hands of the Receiver-General, then the Company shall be called upon by the Minister of Finance to make good the deficiency, and, on failure to do so within sixty days, he shall withdraw its license.”

It was quite evident from this clause that the principle of the measure was, that companies should hold a full reserve in Canada as a security for the policies issued, and this object was laudable. In his opinion it was the true provision for the Government to make in this matter; but when he looked over the Bill he found in the 16th clause a paragraph which practically nullified the effect of this excellent provision. In this clause it was provided that, as to all persons insured in a mutual company, the reserve held against their policies should not be held for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders only, but be exposed to all the risks and vicissitudes of the business of these companies in all the various countries in which they operated. They must look at the practical effect of this exception, which was a very wide one. In fact it covered 90 per cent. of the whole policies written in Canada. He held in his hand a statement published in the official Gazette, showing the numbers of companies in Canada doing business with profits and without profits. He found that of 29 foreign companies doing business in Canada, 27 issued policies on the mutual system or with profits, and it must be recollected that all these policies written with profits, were covered under the exception of the last paragraph of the 16th clause. The practical effect was, therefore, as was well known to all those acquainted with the statistics of life insurance, that, as to 90 per cent. of all the policies written, the reserves would not be held for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone, but be exposed to all the vicissitudes of the business of these companies in all the different countries in which they issued policies. Not over ten per cent., as all acquainted with insurance statistics were aware,—and in fact the proportion was said to be less—of all the policies written by life insurance companies were without profits, while 90 per cent. of them were written with profits; and, therefore, the provision of the Bill that full reserves should be held for the benefit of policy-holders in Canada was applied simply to ten per cent. of those insured, while 90 per cent. would not have the security which the other ten per cent. had. It appeared to him that persons insuring would not be in one whit better position under the new Bill than under the old in this particular. It was known that under the existing law all new companies doing business in Canada had to make a deposit for the benefit of the Canadian policy-holders alone, and quite a large number of them had made a deposit in that way. So that, under the operation of the law as it at present existed, the position of the policy-holders was quite as good as it would be under the operations of this Bill. Some of these foreign companies did business in 30 or 40 different States and countries, and, if the reserves held in Canada were to be subject to all the wide ramifications of their business, and exposed to all the losses and frauds that might be committed, they would be like the fabled apples of gold, which, when grasped, turned to ashes. If there was to be reserve at all it should be made a real thing, something that the policy-holders could look at and fall back upon to recoup them to some extent in case any company became insolvent. It was urged that while this was a right and proper principle to apply to those who insured without profits it was not a sound principle to apply to those who insured with profits, and that in the latter case, the risks ought to be taken as well as the profits, and that those taking this policy ought to be able to judge for themselves of the soundness of the companies. But the great difficulty was that people who insured did not examine into these matters. They were compelled necessarily to take the statements of the agents; and it was a fact that the financial statements of many of them were so made up that even the best bookkeeper in the country could not tell whether the companies occupied a solvent position or not. An argument on this basis would be against any deposit being exacted from the companies at all. It went on the supposition that life insurance was as any ordinary business that might be entered into, whereas they all knew that it could not be so considered, and that all Governments had held that a reasonable security should be given by the companies, in order that they might be able to meet their policies when they matured. It must be recollected that those persons who insured with profits or on the mutual plan, paid a larger sum than those who insured without profits; and it appeared to him that it was a sound principle for the State to exact some protection for those who insured without profits. The same principle should apply to those who insured with profits. It was objected that, if they insisted on that legislation, if they enacted that a reserve should be held for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone, American companies would be driven out of the country. This was just the cry that had been raised on every occasion that Parliament had undertaken to improve our life insurance laws. When Sir John Rose brought in a Bill five or six years ago, the very same cry was raised: that the American companies would withdraw. And yet, it was a fact that only one American company withdrew. He would be very sorry to have the American companies withdraw; but he would say that, if these companies or any other foreign companies were not prepared to give a reasonable and fair protection to Canadian policy-holders, then the country was better without them than with them. The first duty of the House was to our own people, to Canadian policy-holders; and, in making the request that these deposits should be made solely for their benefit, in view of the numerous failures and losses, and even frauds and right-down dishonesty, such as were being exposed at the present time in the State of New York, they were doing nothing more than asking that a fair measure of security should be given to the people of this country, who were so very largely interested in these companies. If some of the American companies did withdraw, he was not prepared to say that it would be such a great calamity, but that the country could exist afterwards.

Mr. KILLAM: It would not be such a calamity to the Canadian companies.

Mr. YOUNG said that, while he would not wish to keep out the companies of any foreign country, he would say that no man ought to be ashamed to prefer to say that Canadian companies and Canadian enterprises should flourish above all others. He did not wish any partial or exceptional legislation. But Canadian companies had to give security. The whole of their assets and their shareholders were in this country, and could be got at if there was any failure. And the House would be doing nothing more than its duty in seeing that foreign companies should have to put up a reserve, as this Bill required, for the sole benefit of Canadian policy-holders. He could easily understand that, if all the life insurance business of Canada was done in this country, if the large amount of money that was being sent out of the country was kept here, the policy-holders would be in a safer condition. He wished particularly to call the attention of the House to the fact that in making the new proposition which he had, he was proposing nothing new, no new departure, but simply to keep the law in principle as it was at the present time, which was that no new insurance company could come into Canada, either stock or mutual, without putting up a deposit for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone. Therefore he was not making a new departure, but the principle of the last part of the 16th clause was a new departure, and seemed to be such a change as was not contemplated when the other portions of the Bill were drawn up. When they saw that such a large amount was being invested in life insurance, as was being done at the present time, it was their bounden duty to see that a fair and reasonable security was given by insurance companies, and that our people were made secure against the losses which had overtaken tens of thousands of people in the United States. The Superintendent of Insurance in his report said that $3,000,000 per annum were contributed by the people of Canada for life insurance. Of this, over $2,000,000 went out of the country, chiefly to the United States. It was also shown that there was held by these foreign companies, as reserves against the Canadian policies, somewhere about $9,000,000; and of this amount, some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 was held in the United States. When it was considered that the reserves represented policies to the extent of $63,000,000, and that the people who were dependent upon their payments were chiefly widows and orphans, he felt that it was their bounden duty as legislators, as it was in accordance with the dictates of humanity, that they should see that the security given by all life insurance companies was at once ample and real. In conclusion, he would only add, that the existence of this Bill assumed that additional security was necessary. The principle of the Bill was that a full reserve should be held in Canada, and the natural and logical conclusion from this was, that it should be held for Canadian policy-holders only. He hoped the Government would see their way clear to accept his amendment, which, he believed, would improve the very excellent Bill which the Minister of Finance had brought in.

Mr. COLBY said he agreed with most of the observations which had fallen from the lips of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young), only he was not sure that he would not be disposed to go even further than he did, in the same direction, although he thought that the end might be attained more effectively than by the method which that hon. gentleman had proposed. He could agree with his hon. friend that this question of life insurance was one that rose and ought to rise entirely above the sphere of party politics, and he knew that the members of this House would discuss it without any political or party end; but with the view of attaining what should be desired by every member of this House, namely, the utmost possible security to the policy-holders of this country, and at the same time that other and almost equal desideratum, the greatest cheapness of life insurance, by which the benefits of life insurance might be most widely disseminated and the greatest amount of insurance for the least money might be purchased. When they considered who the persons were in this and every other country who insured their lives, the objects they had, and the persons for whom they insured, and the methods to which they resorted in order to be able to meet their obligations, they must clearly see that this class of persons, of all other classes, had the highest claim upon the consideration of the members of this House. It was not found that the class who invested largely in life insurance had a surplus of money. Very few sought life insurance purely as a matter of pecuniary investment, because by handling their money themselves they could put it to better advantage.

But it was the labouring men, that class of men whose families were dependent purely upon their labour, whether professional or mechanical, that mostly sought the benefits of life insurance. And they only provided the funds through which they could do it by economy and retrenchment, and by denying themselves many of the luxuries and conveniences of life which they might otherwise enjoy. It was for no selfish purpose, but for the benefit of their wives and children and those most dear to them. It was for the support and education of their children; and the welfare of the rising generation of this country depended largely upon the security which surrounded life insurance companies. Therefore any effort made by the Government to provide further security was a laudable effort, and it should be sustained by every member of this House, so far as it could be done without restricting or impairing that other feature of life insurance which was next in importance, namely, cheapness. He was very glad to see that the Government had so far embraced this view that they had given the negative to the statement of the Finance Minister in his Budget speech last year, when he said that a Government could not be a free Government and a paternal Government. But the Finance Minister had shown that he had a paternal solicitude for one of the great institutions upon which the welfare of the people of this country largely depended. And he (Mr. Colby) thought they could not be too grateful to that hon. gentleman if the methods which he had selected proved to be as well-considered and as wise as the object of his Bill was laudable and patriotic. It must be borne in mind, in considering this subject, that two points must be kept in view. The first was the security of the policyholders, and the second was that to be attained by leaving these companies so open and unfettered, or by so giving them the control and management of their own affairs that they would be enabled to sell the largest amount of life insurance for the least amount of money. The clause which the hon. member for South Waterloo attacked, and which he proposed to modify, was a clause by which an exception was made in favour of mutual life insurance companies. The hon. member had stated that 90 per cent. of the life insurance business in this country was done upon the mutual plan. The remedy proposed by the hon. member for South Waterloo would exclude mutual insurance companies from the United States from doing business in Canada. That was its purpose. Its effect could not be otherwise, and it was for the House to consider whether the same security could not be obtained without this happening, whether this was a desirable result. Nothing was more evident than that the proposition of the hon. member would be entirely subversive of the principle of mutuality, and of the essential and distinctive principles upon which mutual companies were founded, if any portion of their funds were to be set aside for the exclusive benefit of any portion of the insured. It could not be done. It was unconstitutional. It was unsound, and struck at the very life and vitals of these companies. Any company so doing would expose itself to an injunction, at the suggestion or motion of any shareholder, who could prevent it being done. Without wishing to say anything to the disparagement of any other company, he would say that the most important mutual company, or stock company either, in the world, the New York Mutual Life Insurance Company, withdrew from Canada the moment Sir John Rose's Bill proposed that a portion, and but a small portion, of funds should be set aside for the exclusive benefit of any of its shareholders. They said they could not do it, for they would be breaking faith with every man who held a mutual insurance policy. Every other foreign insurance company joined it in that protest, but said, however, that they would hold on for a time; that they had an established business in Canada, which was profitable to all parties concerned, and they hoped that the Canadian Parliament would alter the law, and then the amount, $50,000, was comparatively insignificant, compared to $44,000,000 or $45,000,000 of assets, and, as their stockholders did not object, they tacitly acquiesced. The seventh clause—the security clause—of the Bill provided that the whole of the reinsurance fund, the fund reserved to reinsure all policy-holders in Canada, should be invested for the security of the Canadian policy-holders. That meant that three-fourths of the entire income in Canada should be invested in Canada or held in some form for the benefit of policy-holders in this country. That was an impossibility, and every mutual insurance company doing business in Canada would be obliged to walk out of the Dominion the moment that law was passed. Was it desirable that such should occur; or was it desirable in the interests of the people that they should continue to have in the future, as they had in the past, the benefit of cheap life insurance? He did not wish to draw invidious comparisons and to elevate one company at the expense of another. He was obliged, however, to illustrate his position, in order that the House might see the injury which would be done to the people by excluding the American companies. He held in his hand the report of one of the American mutual companies doing business in Canada. That document showed that the company's assets were $46,000,000, that over and above its reinsurance fund, which was sufficient for the reinsurance of all its policy-holders on a four per cent. basis, there was a surplus of four millions. It showed—and this was a point to which he specially directed the attention of the House and the Government, though no doubt the Government were aware of it—that it cost less than seven per cent. of the income to cover the expenses of management. If he paid the company $100, $7 were withdrawn and $93 were invested at compound interest for the benefit of him and his successors. He held in his hand the report of a Canadian company which might be considered a fairly representative company in Canada—a company which the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) would so recognize, for reasons which the hon. member well knew. That company, having a capital of $190,000 or thereabouts, paid 30 per cent. of its entire income for the management of its affairs. If he paid in $100, $30 would be withdrawn from his premiums to cover cost of management, and only $70 was invested at compound interest for his advantage. Was he to be unnecessarily deprived of that great advantage, amounting to about 25 per cent. of the entire amount paid in premiums, and of the greater benefit of investing in a company which was thoroughly established and solvent, and which had passed through its experimental stage, under which $93 out of $100 was invested for the benefit of the policy-holders, or was he to be compelled by legislation to invest in a company which set aside only $70? It would be an extreme hardship if he were compelled to do that. He was sure his free-trade friends at the head of the Government would never compel him to do that of their own accord; and it was for that reason—and he commended them for it—that the hon. the Finance Minister had been willing to give the people of Canada the benefit of cheap life insurance, and had resisted the importunities of the hon. member for Waterloo and other members, whose sympathies and interests were in favour of the Canadian life insurance companies, in the Banking and Commerce Committee. That 7th clause, the saving clause, and that which would permit foreign companies to do business in Canada, was introduced by their free-trade friends, as consistent with free-trade views; for, while they adopted a protective policy to give policy-holders security, they did not wish to obtain that security at so great a loss and cost to the companies as to drive them from the country. He commended the Government for the course they had pursued. If the security could not be obtained in any other way than by depriving the policy-holders of 25 per cent. of amounts paid in as premiums, it was, perhaps, better to have the security even at that cost. But he wished to call attention to a method by which the security could be more effectually gained than by such method as had been proposed by the hon. member for South Waterloo, and it was to permit the companies now doing business to continue their operations, which would allow both classes of companies to do business, and thus permit patriotic citizens who wished to build up Canadian companies, at their own cost, to deal with them, but to permit economical citizens, who acted irrespective of patriotic considerations, the privilege of making their choice, and trusting in those companies which they believed it was to their interest to patronise. The provision of the seventh clause was that every company doing business in Canada should invest or should have in Canada, either in the hands of the Government or in the hands of trustees, an amount which would be sufficient to reinsure all its policies in Canada. That was the Government proposal, and he commended them for their efforts to provide valid protection, but they had not succeeded in that object. The House should consider how the plan would work. A company might be, as to its Canadian policy-holders, perfectly solvent under the proposed law, having its reinsurance fund in Canada, and yet might be perfectly rotten and unsound in other countries. The effect would be, that when a company, doing business elsewhere than in Canada went into liquidation, the funds in this country would pass into the general funds of the company and be distributed among policy-holders everywhere. Consequently there was no security to Canadian policy-holders under the present law. Besides, there was always the liability to fraud. A company might commence business and deposit $50,000 with the Government. It might commence doing a little business and working up a connection, and, in the second year, make a big push, and might take a much larger amount of insurances than the amount of its deposit in Canada, then wind up its affairs; while the Company would lose the $50,000, they would gain $100,000, $200,000, or $300,000, acquired during the second year. The security proposed by the Government in the present Bill was not a sufficient and adequate one, and he wished the Government to go further and impose, in addition, other and more stringent security. In order that the House might understand his meaning he would now move his amendment, as follows:—

“That all the words after ‘to provide’ in the motion be struck out, and the following substituted therefor: That the following words be added to the first clause of the 7th section of the Bill: ‘Unless the said Company, if incorporated elsewhere than in Canada, shall establish to the satisfaction of the Finance Minister that it is possessed of well invested assets sufficient to re-insure all its outstanding policies, and pay all its liabilities, and has also a surplus sufficient to re-insure all its outstanding policies in Canada.’”

That was a more rigid test to be applied to foreign companies than any Canadian company would be willing or able to submit to. If such a demand were made upon the Confederation Life Company it would bring the company to a dead lock. His purpose in submitting the amendment was to drive out the weak and insecure American companies, if there were any such doing business in the Dominion, and to retain and permit to do business here only such foreign companies as would submit to the most thorough test, such strong and sound companies as we could not expect to have in Canada for many years. Unless the companies were prepared to undergo that test, and proved to be sound to the core, he did not wish them to be allowed to do business. But if there were companies which would subject themselves to such a rigorous test, it would be unwise in the interests of the Canadian people to drive out of the country companies of that class. He desired to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to this consideration: a company might, if it chose, deposit re-insurance funds enough to meet its liabilities. That was a very convenient method for English companies, from a financial point of view, because the rate of interest was higher in Canada than in England, and those companies would, and did, invest large amounts here for the purposes of investment alone. The English companies did not care, however, to submit to the test of examination. They were not so accustomed as were United States companies to an inspection by an Insurance Superintendent. They complied with the law by keeping their re-insurance funds good, and that did not put them to the slightest inconvenience. In regard to the American companies, the investment was to be made in a certain class of securities—bonds of the United States Government, the Canadian Government, bonds of the American States, and a class of securities which had a low rate of interest. He asked the House to consider how that regulation would affect not only the American companies, but the policy-holders of those companies. He would give an illustration. He had been personally insured for fourteen years in an American mutual company not doing business in Canada. During that period he had received yearly a dividend applied in reduction of the premium amounting to 40 per cent. That company was a sound and strong one, and its assets to liabilities were as 160 to 100. The company was able to return those amounts to policy-holders because they were able to invest their money advantageously. If the company had been compelled to invest its money in securities bearing 5 per cent., or a lower rate of interest, instead of returning annually 40 per cent. of the premium, they would probably have been able to return only 10, 15, 20 or 25 per cent. In mutual companies, the managers were the agents of the policy-holders and had no personal interest in the matter, and there were no stockholders to take away the profits. Many of the investments made by the companies consisted of securities which were as good as Government securities, but which paid better interest, such as mortgages upon farming property in Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota and other Western States to a limit not exceeding one-third of the value, the rate of interest being 10 per cent. Was it in the interest of the people of Canada that those companies should be asked to invest their money in securities bearing only 5 per cent., instead of leaving them to make judicious investments and give to the policy-holders that amount of dividend which they had been able to give, having control of the investment of their money? Hon. members might ask how the test proposed in this amendment was to be applied to the companies. The country possessed a Superintendent of Insurance, an actuary who had given his time and attention to that question. It would not be more difficult, in case the sworn statement of any company should not prove satisfactory, for the Superintendent to visit New York or Hartford and examine the vaults and books of the company, than for an Insurance Inspector from Michigan or Illinois to make that investigation. If companies would not submit to that examination, they might as well close their blinds and close business, for they would be condemned by their own action, and utterly discredited in Canada, where we have an actuary who was not appointed for political considerations, but a person of skill and peculiar fitness for his place—not liable, as such officers were in New York, to rotation in office, and dependent upon the varying exigencies of party. Where we had such an officer appointed for his skill and special knowledge, with power, and armed with the responsibility to make those examinations, we need have no apprehension that the examinations would not be made in the most thorough and satisfactory manner. The prestige, character, and everything which this officer prized, depended upon his making no mistake in his examination into the affairs of the companies; and they dare not impede him in the search, for, if they did, it would be an acknowledgement that they were unsound. That test was better than any re-insurance fund which could be put up in Canada. In the State of New York, the inspector was frequently changed for political considerations. In the State of Massachusetts, they made it a point, irrespective of political considerations, to keep a competent man in the office; and he was informed that no company which had ever done business in that State had failed since that law went into effect. Any company that stood the Massachusetts test was considered to be sound. Life insurance was becoming so general in the United States that nearly every man had a personal and direct pecuniary interest, overshadowing all political or other considerations, to make him vigilant and alert in securing the appointment of a good man. Unfortunately, from political considerations, in some States this had not been done; but, where this system had been inaugurated, it had produced good results. We had the benefit of that test in the first place, and then to that was to be super-added the test we might make for ourselves. He had no desire to weaken the security, but, on the contrary, he desired to strengthen it, and make the examination more thorough and searching—to retain all the burdens the Government proposed to lay on those companies, and superadd to the American companies this further test : that, if they failed to make their deposit, then they should not be permitted to continue business here, that their licenses should be withdrawn, and that they could not get licenses unless they submitted to this almost infallible test of solvency. The expenses of management of most of the leading American companies, including all costs, was from 6, 7, 8 to 9 per cent. in ratio to their income. He was not aware of a single Canadian company that did business at a less cost than 25 per cent. and in some that he knew the expenses amounted to more than 30 per cent. Now the Canadian people, our labouring people, who were anxious, by economy, to set aside the largest possible sum for insurance and desired to obtain the largest possible amount of insurance for their money, should not be deprived of the right of selection among companies sound and solvent, and limited to a class of companies that must for some time be more expensive than others. He wished the House to understand that he was not in the slightest degree criticising the Canadian companies unfairly. So far as he had any knowledge of them, they were under the control of sound men; he was not aware of any bogus company or one that was liable to adverse criticism. He believed them to be commendable enterprises, but with them, as with life insurance companies everywhere else, the early years were the expensive years. In getting their first policies they had to pay larger sums than in getting subsequent policies; and would be some years before they could offer the same advantages as older companies. He wished them to have every latitude in the world. He did not wish them to have a difficulty or burden resting upon them that was not absolutely necessary; but, at the same time, he hoped the Government might be willing to accept that further test on American companies. He sympathized and approved of the purpose and object of the hon. the Finance Minister, but he believed if this other alternative test were adopted, without driving out some companies or embarrassing them in the investment of their funds, it would prove sound, thorough and satisfactory.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he need hardly say he had and could have but one interest in this matter, and that was to provide, as far as might be, security for policy-holders without, as the hon member for Stanstead observed, unduly disturbing the existing condition of things. He did not come to this question as a new question. They found engagements to a great amount existing, which they were obliged to consider, and they were obliged in preparing this Bill to give full weight to the contracts existing between citizens and companies having their headquarters elsewhere. In justice to some of the American companies, he might say that the terms of the deposit originally made by them, enabled companies to make it without violating their engagements to their shareholders and policy-holders. Subsequently, by the Act of 1871, that was altered, and the deposits which had been placed in this country were subjected to special liabilities in favour of Canadian policy-holders, which it did not appear existed to its full extent under old legislation. It was quite true, as the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) had said, that about one-half of the total policies existing in Canada, amounting to $40,000,000, were held by American companies; and it was also true, which should be remembered, that they did not propose by this legislation to affect existing policies at all. It was held, and he thought the House would concur in the view, that after foreign companies had come here and entered into contracts with citizens, whatever might be done for the future, it was advisable, on grounds of public policy, not to have retroactive legislation affecting those contracts. It was only, therefore, as regarded future policies that this question raised by his hon. friend would have a practical bearing and force. The view the Government had taken of the matter was this: They fairly considered it part of the Government business, in a matter having such wide interest as life insurance, to see that the companies doing business here were able to fulfil their contracts; and that they proposed to do under the system of inspection which they had established. But the amendment proposed to go further than that. It proposed not only to take precautions to see that the companies could fulfil their contracts, but to prevent the people, with their eyes open, from entering into a particular species of contracts with those American companies. It must be remembered that every man who entered into a contract whereby he shared the profits and losses of the companies, did so with a full understanding of what he was about; and he did not think it was consonant with sound policy to deliberately attempt by legislative enactments to prevent him from doing that. If the hon. member had contended that it was necessary to take measures that those companies should state fully and explicitly that contracts under this particular clause were necessarily entered into in such a manner as to deprive the Canadian policy-holders of the special lien for the policies which they had expressly taken on condition of sharing the risks as well as the profits, the Government would have been happy to consider the proposition. The proposition, however, was this: that, if a Canadian should knowingly and willingly enter into a contract with an American company on the condition of sharing the risks and profits, nevertheless, the assets held in Canada should be held for his exclusive benefit. It might be quite true that a large number of policies were now held on this principle, and, as he had mentioned, it was not proposed to interfere with existing policies. As for future policies, with all the pains which he was sure his hon. friend and the company with which he was connected would take to extend to Canadian policy-holders the advantages they would have in insuring with Canadian companies, he felt tolerably confident that their interests would be well looked after. Those companies were keenly alive to pointing out the relative advantage which they had over their American brethren in this respect. He gave his hon. friend from South Waterloo the fullest credit for a desire to promote the interests of the Canadian policy-holders, and his other hon. friend who seconded the motion also a little credit for not being oblivious to their interests. It was not the interest of the House to provide for Canadian shareholders or for American shareholders, but for a fair inspection of this very important branch of business which was increasing in such rapid proportions in Canada, and reasonable security for Canadian policy-holders. He did not mean to say that the clause to which the hon. gentleman alluded did not, to a certain extent, interfere with the security which would be given by a stock company; but he desired to point out that from this time out everybody who did it would do it deliberately and with full knowledge, and he thought this a sufficient answer to the greater portion of the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Young). To the proposition of his hon. friend from Stanstead he would simply say they had taken power by an amendment introduced in the Bill to authorise the Minister of Finance, acting through the Superintendent of Insurance, to carry out such inspection as would meet the case of the American companies, should it appear desirable to the Government to have such an inspection made, as no doubt would be required if there existed any reasonable suspicion regarding the solvency of any of the companies doing business here.

Mr COLBY: May I ask if that is not an alternative test.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was not. He thought this proposition to a considerable extent met the point raised by the hon. member for Stanstead. As to the question of securities, though he was not very conversant with the rates of interest in the more remote western States, he thought he was correct in saying that any American companies investing in Canada would be able to get as good rates of interest on good security as they could in New York or Pennsylvania, or any of the New England States, where he was advised the greater part of their investments were made. They were able to invest here in municipal securities of various kinds paying a much higher rate of interest than Government securities, and those securities were only taken for the purpose of making good the deposit required by the Act. Their other securities might be of a class usually taken by insurance companies.

Mr. COLBY: Such as mortgages?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes. They were only required, as were our own people, to show that they held in Canada in the hands of Trustees or the Receiver-General, a sufficient amount of securities to enable them to protect Canadian policy-holders. On the whole, he thought the House—if it would consider the present position of the subject, and remember that very large interests had accrued which must be respected, and that there was no immediate likelihood of any very great increase of life insurance because, he was sorry to say, that one of the effects of the depression now unhappily existing always was that a smaller number of people were able to enter into new insurances—would see that no great peril could arise to any considerable class at any rate of Canadian policy-holders by allowing this Act to go into operation and to watch for a time its progress. If any evil should arise, they would have ample power to check and remedy it hereafter. His hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) was perfectly correct in saying that some of these great American companies owing to their long standing and perfect organization were able to transact business at much smaller cost than our Canadian companies, which were for the most part of very short existence, and although he believed they were well managed, and had every ground for hoping that they would grow and prosper, yet they did not give the same undoubted security which the best of the English and American companies furnished. For these reasons it was not desirable for them, in this initial legislation on so important a subject, to deprive our people who chose deliberately to do it with their eyes open of the power of entering into a special class of contracts with American companies. His hon. friends from Waterloo and Stanstead had placed their respective views plainly before the House, and he hoped that the House would very shortly be able to give a distinct expression of opinion on the subject.

Mr. TUPPER said he regretted very much that the Minister of Finance had not seen fit to accept the proposition made by the hon. member for South Waterloo; and, if he could not accept this proposal, that he had not seen his way clear to adopt the further proviso as to additional security proposed by the hon. member for Stanstead. He was quite satisfied that the House would agree with him that both proposals were calculated to afford additional security; and this was the primary object which was before them. The House, he was sure, would agree with the opinion expressed on a former occasion by the Finance Minister that this was one of the questions on which the Government could fairly rely, on approaching the House, without any fear of the influence of party feeling, on hon. gentlemen on either side of the House. He gave the Government full credit for the effort made in this Bill to deal with one of the most important questions that could be brought under their consideration—the affording of additional securities, as far as possible, to the large class of people who invested their money in life insurance policies. He was in favour of the Bill to a very large extent. He believed that in many respects it was an improvement on previous legislation, though there were some points in it—to which he would draw attention in Committee—which he thought were susceptible of some improvement; and, although in this relation the Finance Minister, might not be able to agree with him, he was certain that his suggestions would be received in the spirit in which they were offered. The very able and exhaustive argument addressed to the House by the hon. member for South Waterloo, in his judgment, covered the whole ground, and it was unnecessary to sustain that argument at any considerable length. He had been in hopes, as the hon. gentleman proceeded from point to point, making out a very strong case for the consideration of the Government, that the Finance Minister might be able, even at this period of the Bill, to somewhat modify his views so as to embrace, at all events to some extent, some of the provisions offered. He did not think it would be easy to have a more powerful and able argument addressed to the House in favour of American companies than that of the hon. member for Stanstead, to whom he had listened with attention, as did every member when the hon. gentleman addressed the House on any subject; but he failed to be convinced by the arguments adduced in support of the pretension that there was no reason for the apprehension expressed by the hon. member for South Waterloo with relation to the position the people of Canada occupied towards those foreign companies. The fact that over two million of dollars per annum went into foreign countries for life insurance purposes from Canada, was one which only required to be stated in order to present the magnitude of this question to the fullest extent. The Finance Minister met the proposition of the hon. member for South Waterloo with the very forcible argument that the House must have regard to existing engagements; and that a very considerable amount of responsibility devolved upon the Government in dealing with a question in which prior engagements had been made between the people and the parties with whom they contracted; but the Finance Minister should not carry this argument too far, or, if he did, they would have no legislation at all on the subject. The Bill introduced by Sir John Rose was based on the principle that, although this was a strong ground for consideration, yet it was not sufficient to preclude them from legislating where they considered it necessary, and this Bill rested on the broad foundation that, when it became requisite to have additional legislation for the security of the people, Parliament had the power to exercise it. The fear, on a former occasion expressed, that this would drive the American companies out of the country, was found to be fallacious. This convinced him that, if the proposal of the hon. member for South Waterloo was adopted in its entirety, it would not be attended with the result which seemed to be apprehended; but, if it were so attended, he had no hesitation in saying that, while he had no hostility towards the American companies, and while he preferred the British to the American companies, he preferred the Canadian companies to either, for the reason that the money of the people of Canada now sent out of the country would then be invested in Canada, a matter of no slight importance to a new and young country like this. It was most important that the capital brought into it for its development and expansion, should have the advantage of the investment of these two millions now annually drained out of the country; it would then be invested among our own people, who would have a better opportunity of judging of the character of their investments than otherwise would be the case. The hon. member for South Waterloo had drawn the attention of the House to a most important feature, which was this: that the great mass of the people who it was desirable should avail themselves of this means of preventing their widows and orphans from suffering from penury and poverty, were those who were not able to judge of commercial matters and questions in the broad sense and acceptation of the term. The competition going on in this country between these companies which sent their agents into every section and village and hamlet to induce people to invest their earnings in life insurance, rendered it incumbent on the Government to endeavour, as far as possible, to guard against imposition, owing to the want of knowledge of any portion of the people, from parties who were not entitled to their confidence. He regarded this proposal, confined as it was by the principle of the Bill requiring gigantic foreign companies doing business in all parts of the world to invest $50,000 in the hands of the Government of Canada, as worse than nothing, and useless, and for this reason: It would enable these companies to go to every ignorant man in Canada and in its back settlements, and say to him: "We have got the imprimatur of the Government of Canada; here is the certificate of the Receiver-General of Canada showing that we have deposited in your vaults a large sum of money, and this is the evidence we give you of our ability to meet at any time these claims"; and this would afford additional means of operating upon the credulity of the people, which they otherwise would never have had. He held that this amount was utterly insignificant and insufficient to secure the payment of policies when they became due. He believed it would be better for the people of Canada regarding foreign companies, if they were not in a position to make any such claim, if this amount was to remain unchanged. The additional security proposed to be provided was that of inspection. He had the fullest confidence in the gentleman appointed by the Government as Insurance Inspector, who was an able actuary and a man of high character, having every quality requisite to command the confidence of the House and country. He believed that this officer would be of great value because he was not only able to examine the books of companies, but also to exercise a wholesome judgment as to the character of the investments made; but what could he do when he went abroad. Where able and keen officials failed in the United States, how could a stranger be expected to probe matters to the bottom and ascertain the solvency or condition of foreign companies? He did not think that hon. gentlemen should rely too much on this plan as a means of security. He was struck with two or three admissions made by the hon. member for Stanstead. The hon. member said one of the results of the measure would be to drive out the weak insurance companies from the country, and here the whole case was given up. The Government was bound to take such measures as should prevent the existence in Canada of such companies. When one thought of the wide-spread misery that resulted from the breaking down of one of the large companies, he could see at once the duty devolving upon the Government of sparing no effort to use every possible means of rendering it impossible that the property of our citizens should be frittered away in an unwise attempt to provide security that would become perfectly delusive. But there was more than that. If the money that was paid for the purpose of life insurance was invested in the country the country would get the advantage of it, but if it was invested in a foreign company and that company broke down, not only would the policy-holders lose the money but the country would suffer to that extent, $2,000,000 annually being taken out. This amount would improve the foreign country so much and our country would be without that much to assist in its development. There was nearly $3,000,000 now paid. He could quite understand the Finance Minister when he said that this being a time of depression a great expansion of new policies could not be looked for. But he (Mr Tupper) and the Opposition believed that the rising tide of prosperity would set in before long, and then this $3,000,000 would be expanded. He did not make his objections from political motives, as he believed the Bill in many respects was a good one, and the object of the Finance Minister most praiseworthy and deserving. The Finance Minister said they must place reliance largely upon inspection, but it was well known that the system of inspection in the United States was not to be relied upon on account of the changes through political influence. The hon. member for Stanstead had referred to the cheaper rate at which insurance could be obtained in the American companies. But this was because they were older and had more business, and one reason why they gave such profitable returns was, to a certain extent, because of the $2,000,000 of Canadian money annually going into their coffers. The hon. the Finance Minister said people joined these companies with their eyes open, but the fact was that there were thousands of people in Canada who could not withstand the inducements and solicitations of American agents. He would call attention to several alterations which he thought should be made. On the third page where it was provided "that the requirements of this section shall apply to any policy issued," he would suggest that the words "policy issued" be struck out, and "premiums received" substituted. And after "1878" he would suggest that there should be added "but shall apply to all premiums received on policies, whether they are issued subsequent or previous to the date." The bill would make the provision apply to all premiums received on future policies, but he would make it apply to all premiums received on policies whether now existing or in the future. Another alteration that he would suggest was on page 8. Instead of saying that "the amount so tendered may be paid over to the Company and the policy shall continue in force," he would say that "the amount so tendered shall not be paid over." The money was there for the security of the policy-holders, and he would take away the power to divert it for any other purpose.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he could not agree to this alteration as it would be opening up the whole subject again and necessitate the Bill being sent back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, which could not be done now, after the understanding arrived at with the representatives of the Insurance Companies.

Mr. MILLS said he could not understand how the hon. member for Cumberland could say that, if the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) were not carried, he would vote for that of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young). They were directly in antagonism.

Mr. TUPPER said he understood that the latter amendment was proposed in addition to the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for Cumberland had told them that such was the extraordinary character of the American insurance agents that it was not possible for Canadians to resist their importunities. But the fact was that the class of people who insured were generally shrewd and intelligent and perfectly competent to make their own bargains. As the American companies only took 7 per cent. for administration expenses, and the Canadian companies 30 per cent., the position of the hon. member for Cumberland was that the advantages of the American companies were so great that, unless the Government interfered they would take the whole business out of the hands of the Canadian companies. To strengthen his argument, the hon. member stated that $2,000,000 of Canadian money was annually taken away by the foreign companies. But he seemed to forget to mention that this came back in the shape of payments. It would appear that the hon. member was the special advocate of the interests of the Canadian companies. While it was important that Canadian companies should not be placed at any disadvantage, it should be remembered that the Government could not legislate in the interest of any particular company, but must act in the interest of the whole country. It had also been urged that the measure was not in the interest of Canada and that such a policy as was embodied in the clause should not be placed on the Statute-book.

Mr. TUPPER: I did not say that.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for Cumberland had attacked the law, and pointed to the two millions going out of the country yearly, and that under a law for which the hon. gentleman himself was responsible. The hon. gentleman informed the House that inspection in the United States was delusive, and stated the reason was to be found in the fact that in every instance the Inspector appointed would be in a great measure unacquainted with the work, and before he became acquainted with it, he was superseded. While those observations might be practically applicable to inspectors appointed by the various States of America to enquire into the condition of the American insurance companies, they had no force in regard to the Inspector of Insurance in this country. Here a different system prevailed. The Canadian Inspector was quite as likely to be thoroughly competent to discharge his duties with respect to foreign companies as with regard to Canadian companies. If the argument had any weight, it was in the direction of the Inspector being a useless officer, who could not acquire any information which would be the slightest value to policy-holders and insurers. He was glad to have heard the hon. member for Stanstead urge the question in such an admirable manner. He had hitherto been under the impression that the hon. member had formed very erroneous opinions with regard to matters of trade and commerce.

Mr. COLBY said he had complimented the Government for having taken the Protectionist view of giving security.

Mr. MILLS said he was glad the hon. member did not call on the Government to build up Canadian insurance companies at the expense of the great mass of the population; that he was willing that individuals who were ready to effect an insurance should invest it in the company where they would obtain the best value for their money. He (Mr. Mills) believed that was an able and admirable doctrine, and it was that doctrine embraced in the Bill. He hoped the hon. member would not hold on to the little flag of protection, for it was a mere delusion. Inspection was not protection, in the sense protection had been so frequently referred to in the discussions. He congratulated the hon. member for Stanstead on having taken such a clear and common-sense view of the question, and on having come to the rescue and defence of the people against the few capitalists who wished to make a larger profit than they were entitled to make on the money which they invested in that particular business.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

INSURANCE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) resumed the debate on the Insurance Bill. He said no doubt the object of the Bill was a proper one. The question of life insurance was becoming of great importance all the world over, and it was necessary that it should receive careful consideration. When it was remembered that policies amounting to $35,000,000 were held in this country, and that a large portion of them were held in American companies, the advisability of protecting the policy-holders would strike everyone; and he was glad to see that the Government was taking a paternal view of the matter. He feared, however, that the Bill would fail to accomplish its object. When it was remembered that fully 90 per cent. of the insured were insured on the mutual principle, and those who insured in stock companies participated in the profits as well as the former, they would not receive any benefit from the deposit required to be placed in the hands of the Government. It would be better if this clause were eliminated from the Bill altogether, as he thought it would have an injurious effect, inasmuch as it would have the tendency to drive out solvent American companies. If the clause was intended as a security to the Canadian policy-holders, he thought it would be like Samson shorn of his locks. This matter rose above party feeling; both sides of the House were actuated with the same desire to give the best possible security to policy-holders; and he would be glad if the Government could see their way clear to strike out the clause under discussion.

Mr. KILLAM said it was strange that the hon. member for Cumberland should have fallen into the error he did in regard to the nature of the amendments before the House. If the hon. gentleman had listened as attentively to the able, eloquent and convincing argument of the hon. member for Stanstead as he did to the hon. member for Waterloo, whom he commended in the most flattering way, he certainly could not have been in doubt on this point. In his (Mr. Killam's) opinion the amendments were diametrically opposed to each other. The effect of the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo was to compel foreign companies to make investments of their re-insurance reserve in this country, which, in case of the insolvency of the company or its failure to comply with the regulations of the Finance Department, was to be confiscated for the benefit of the Canadian policy-holders alone. The amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead proposed to take away the clause compelling the foreign companies to invest to so large an extent in this country and require them to prove that they were in such a condition that there was no necessity for them to make such an investment. The reason why he was opposed to the Bill was because it was too much of a protective measure. It was not at all in the direction of free trade. As it stood its effect would be to compel foreign companies to invest their money in this country, and to prevent Canadians investing in foreign companies if they desired to do so. The Government had no right to dictate, as this Bill in a measure did, where the people should invest their money. Besides, in legislating in this manner, we also practically compelled the subjects of a foreign State to invest their money in this country. If the various States were to pass similar laws, this legislation would become inoperative, because they would take more money from the companies than they had to invest. He had not yet heard any convincing proof that this Parliament had the power to deal with this question at all. He did not, of course, agree with the hon. movers of the amendments in this respect, but speaking from a free-trade view he was bound to say that a great deal of legislation here in regard to insurance was unnecessary, undesirable and undue interference with the rights and privileges of individuals to make what contracts they chose. The whole force of this Bill was to restrict individual liberty to a very great extent. He was not interested in any company, Canadian or foreign; he had no personal interest whatever in the matter; but he had a large number of constituents who had been wise enough to invest their money in this way, and he had never heard any of them say that they desired the Government to interfere in this question in the way proposed. He was bound to say that his constituents who were insured in strong American companies felt as good security now as they would if this Bill went into law, and they did not want Parliament to meddle in their concerns at all. They were all wrong in fact in calling those companies foreign, as the United States mutual companies were just as much Canadian companies as American. The policy-holders were stockholders to all intents and purposes, and Government had no right to interfere with them by such legislation. He could not agree with the amendment of the hon. member for Waterloo at all. The absolute effect of it would be to prevent him from making any bargain with a foreign company or going outside the Dominion to make a contract with an individual, if it was carried to its full extent. It was the most ultra-protective resolution ever moved on the floor of the Canadian Parliament, though it came from one of the greatest apostles of free trade in this country. The real question he was anxious to ventilate was whether it was necessary for these mutual companies to invest their money in Canada at all. He did not think it was, nor did he consider that protection would be of any particular benefit to the Canadian policy-holders. If companies managed their affairs well, and kept their working expenses within a small percentage of their income, and the policy-holders were satisfied, no Government interference was required. Wherever this principle was adopted, the business of these companies would be entirely ruined, and the strongest, finest and most benevolent institutions in the world would be compelled to change their whole mode of doing business. The gentlemen who had advocated the views of the hon. member for South Waterloo were directors and shareholders of, and largely and intimately interested in, Canadian insurance companies. It would be quite improper for him to say that these gentlemen had any sinister designs in trying to deprive the Dominion of the advantages accruing from institutions like the Connecticut Mutual, the New York Life, and the Ætna Insurance Company to enable themselves to secure the business of these companies, but he must say he failed to see the reasons which induced these gentlemen to take the ground they did. He thought it would have been eminently more proper, and it would have looked much better, if such motions were made by gentlemen who were not at all interested in Canadian companies. He knew pretty nearly what institutions did business in his constituency, and he had never heard his constituents ask for any such legislation as was proposed by the Government, not to mention the more extreme steps advocated by the hon. members for South Waterloo and North Ontario. He, further, was not aware of any petitions having been presented to the House asking for the cure of the evils complained of, and he did not see why there should be such undue haste shown in providing this legislation. If they had two or three thousand petitions pouring in every Session for the protection of unfortunate Canadians against the abilities of these wonderful and terrible American insurance drummers, who were going about the country and defrauding people out of their honest earnings, he would not blame the Government for their action; but, as this measure was merely urged on behalf of a few weak, struggling offices in this country, one-half of whose premiums, obtained from unfortunate people in the back of the country, went to pay directors' and other expenses, he thought the Government was rather in too much of a hurry in paying so much attention to these representations. However, the Bill was reasonable and proper, compared with the outrageous one laid before the House last year. He hoped that the Bill would not be passed until the matter was fully looked into; it was not desirable to drive strong mutual institutions out of the country. If the amendment of his hon. friend from Stanstead was accepted by the Government, full security would be given to policy-holders, and more than was provided for in the Bill, which interfered with the rights of Canadian stockholders in foreign companies.

Mr. PLUMB said the late Government, with admirable foresight, had obliged foreign insurance companies doing business in this country to place a certain deposit under their control, as an earnest of good faith, of the soundness of the companies, and of their ability to carry on their business in a proper manner, giving also security to those insuring in these companies. The business of life insurance was increasing from year to year, and had become one of the most important features in social economy and modern life. A great many companies had been established and many of them had deviated from the original principle that a company should have a certain amount of capital for its basis. Many had thus been formed on the mutual principle, and the insurers depended entirely on the management and good faith of the managers for the final provisions to be made for the families they would leave behind them. Their business, which was now enormous, was growing larger from year to year; and anything tending to induce them to embark in speculations, seek high rates of interest, attempt to make large profits, and pay heavy expenses and large salaries, should be deprecated; therefore, to a certain extent, the argument, eloquently and ably put by the hon. member for Stanstead, failed in so far as he desired that a company doing business in the United States should not be required to make a deposit of their funds here, in order that they might swell their profits at home by investing in a class of securities which would not be recognized at all in this country. This was the weakest point in the hon. gentleman's argument. The clause now inserted in the Bill left the Canadian policy-holder insured in foreign companies under the impression that he was protected, when, in fact, he was not, inasmuch as the mutual principle on which a large amount of insurance was obtained in this country comprising 90 per cent. of the whole amount insured, as he understood, left the policy-holders under that principle without protection. The terms of the Bill "kept the promise to the ear and broke it to the hope." Holders of life insurance policies would suppose they were secured under the provisions of the Bill, when this was really not the case. The seventh clause apparently provided security; but its provisions were neutralized by the last paragraph of the sixteenth clause, which, in case of the insolvency of a foreign company, authorized that the assets held in Canada should be subject to the claims of all the policy-holders pro rata, whether in Canada or elsewhere. He thought it was very difficult to see that those who undertook engagements with mutual companies, going into partnership, as it were, were entitled to protection, but he also thought the Bill would be imperfect unless some such clause was introduced as that proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo, in order to give to Canadian policy-holders that protection which the Bill ostensibly proposed. If this was not the object, why was it necessary to frame the Bill at all. It would be perfectly easy to require every foreign company doing business in the country to continue increasing its deposit, in proportion to the increased business done in the country, and enough to re-insure its risks here, and to retain at all times a sufficient deposit to cover the amount of premiums taken in Canada. He feared the Bill would be fatal to the public interest, by leaving policy-holders to entertain false and erroneous impressions, lulling them into a false security and teaching them to depend rather on the Government than on their own judgment in taking out or continuing life policies. The strongest competition existed among the life insurance companies, and it was well known that those who were most desirous of extending their business were not always the soundest and the safest. Immense assets or a large income were not always satisfactory evidences of soundness. Insured persons who lived the longest and paid the largest premiums were often likely to suffer the most, owing to the manner in which so many companies were conducted. A late instance showed that an American manager had been paid $30,000 per annum as a salary. This fact had been brought out in a recent investigation into the affairs of an American company. With all due deference to the hon. member for Stanstead, he must say that he did not think there was any safety in the plan the hon. gentleman proposed. It was not a sound principle and it should not be embodied in any measure brought before the House. With this view he thought it sound principle to support the amendment brought in by the hon. member for South Waterloo.

Mr. BLAIN said he thought the Government had succeeded in striking the mean, so as to meet the necessities of the business. He did not agree with either amendment. Life insurance was so exceptional in its character that special legislation seemed to be required for it. There were three different kinds of life insurance, but for the sake of convenience there might be said to be two, namely, the stock and mutual plans. The Government had recognized the necessity of these companies giving ample security for covering the amounts of the policies. The mutual principle was essentially one of partnership. But, by the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo, the very essentials of the contract would be violated. It would be contrary to the constitutions of the companies, and any parties in the United States could enter an injunction against them and restrain them from so misappropriating the fund. The result would be that the American mutual companies would be forced to withdraw from the country. While he thought our own companies might eventually be able to compete with the American companies, yet this amendment would be altogether too violent and would throw nearly all the policies now in the hands of American companies into the hands of the Canadian companies before they were able to deal with them successfully. He held that it would be disastrous to take that course. It might be in the future that these companies would get into such difficulties with the policy-holders that they might not get that security which they ought to have. In that contingency the policy-holders could come to Parliament and make their representations, and, if thought necessary, the law could be changed so as to give them due protection. If the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead were adopted, it would place the companies in much the same condition as they were at present, and the entire Bill would be rendered of no effect, although it was generally conceded that legislation of some kind was necessary. It was rather strange that an out-and-out Free-trader like the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) should move a violent protectionist motion, while an outspoken Protectionist, like the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) should move a violent free-trade motion. He thought the only prudent course was to follow the Bill as the Government had presented it before the House.

Mr. CAMERON said the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) had raised an important question as to the constitutional powers of the House in legislating at all in the matter, or at any rate to the extent to which it had been proposed. The Local Legislatures claimed the right to deal with insurance companies. The question had arisen in the Province of Ontario, and ultimately it would come to the Supreme Court for settlement. The more prudent course to adopt would be to take the advice of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) as to the Prohibitory Liquor Law, namely, to defer legislation until the Supreme Court decided whether they had any right to legislate or not. He presumed, however, that the Government had decided that they had jurisdiction, and were prepared to take the responsibilities upon themselves. He must confess that it seemed to him that it pertained more to the nature of property and civil rights than to trade and commerce. Unless the matter came within the definition of these two latter classes he did not know under what head of the British North America Act it would come. As to the two amendments, it seemed to him that nine-tenths of the policy-holders in American companies residing in Canada would not be duly protected by the Government Bill as it now stood. While he did not desire to drive American companies out of the country, he felt that he would have to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo. If he thought it would drive the American companies out, he would not support it, as he did not think they should act rashly in such a matter. While, perhaps, the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead was inconsistent in principle with the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo, yet it was possible that a member of the House might, with perfect consistency, vote for both. He would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead, upon the principle that, inasmuch as the Bill as it stood afforded no security to Canadian policy-holders, he thought it better that the security offered by the amendment should be accepted, namely, that of Government inspection. Still, there were many objections to Government inspection, as developed in the United States. Mr. Lewis, who was considered the highest authority, said that the result of the system had been disappointment to its friends, and he also said it rapidly taught the public to rely upon the certificate of the company, instead of to discriminate for themselves between the good and the bad companies. He (Mr. Cameron) thought, on the whole, that the objects sought would not be attained by the Government Bill, and he doubted very much whether the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead would much improve matters.

Mr. WORKMAN said he thought the Canadian policy-holders should have as much protection as possible, and, therefore, he would support the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo. There were a great many respectable American companies which were perfectly solvent, and conducted their business with some regard for the interests of the policy-holders, but there were others which required to give special security. Any one who devoted attention to the question of life insurance, must know that in the United States, during the past six months, a very great amount of distress and of bankruptcy had taken place in connection with life insurance companies, and particularly with regard to mutual companies. He was not aware how many of those companies had been doing business in Canada, but the result in the United States had been disastrous. That arose in a great measure from the expensive manner in which the companies were managed. It was well known that some of the presidents and officials connected with New York companies received larger salaries than that paid to the President of the United States. Every official in the companies was paid an enormous salary, and the extravagance was something that was unknown in Canada. The natural result had been the failure recently of a company doing a very large business. He would read an extract from an American insurance journal, in order that the House might understand what kind of security the Canadian people would have if the United States companies were allowed to come in here and carry on business without a guarantee in the shape of deposits being held for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders. The journal said:

“The investigation into the affairs of the Continental Life Insurance Company, which failed in New York some months ago, shows that there is a prospect of policy-holders receiving forty to fifty cents on the dollar. The claims amount to $5,300,000, and the assets are set down at $2,630,000, but will likely be further reduced by litigation before payments are made.”

After the expenses of litigation were paid, the assets would probably not realize more than 20c. on the dollar. The following extract would show the House the character of many of those companies which were encouraging to force a business in Canada:—

“The Attorney-General of New York State having made application to the Supreme Court, receivers have been appointed for the five following Life Insurance companies:—The Guardian Mutual Life Insurance Company, the Widows and Orphans' Life Insurance Company, the Reserve Mutual Life Insurance Company, the New York State Life Insurance Company, the North America Life Insurance Company. An examination made previous to taking proceedings, had shown that their assets were insufficient to re-insure their outstanding risks. All were in business for a number of years, and exhibited in their dealings with the assured many of the evils which have come to light in American insurance matters within the past four months.”

It would be observed that they were mainly mutual companies. The Continental Company did a very large business, with a large staff of employes, and an establishment like a large London or New York banking house, and yet it would be unable to pay 40c. on the dollar. It was the duty of the House, and of the Government particularly, to protect Canadian policy-holders, and reserve money deposited by those companies for the benefit of the insured here. The House had been told that such action on the part of Parliament would drive a large number of American companies out of Canada. He thought that, with few exceptions, the companies would make the required deposits; if they did not, the sooner they left the country the better. It would be in the interest of the whole people, and especially of those who wished to provide a future maintenance for their wives and children, by means of insurance policies, that the funds deposited by foreign companies should be held to be specially applied for the benefit of policy-holders in Canada, and not to be divided among the general policy-holders.

Mr. DYMOND said that although the subject had been almost exhausted, he could not deny himself the gratification of expressing the delight he felt at finding the hon. member for Stanstead at last a convert to that school of political economy of which he (Mr. Dymond) professed to be a humble member. The hon. member, too, deserved congratulation for having, with the zeal of a new convert, applied himself energetically to destroying the protectionist amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo, over whose departure from the true faith he was bound to mourn, as he rejoiced over the conversion of the hon. gentleman to whom he had referred. He fancied, however, that on some not very remote occasion the hon. member for Waterloo would wander back to the true fold. He had no doubt that when the amendment had been voted down that hon. member would once more turn a loving glance to the pastures in which he usually wandered, and from which a very narrow line at present divided him. No hon. member was entitled for a moment to question the absolute disinterestedness of any hon. gentleman who addressed the House, but he could not help wondering, while listening to some of the speeches, and knowing a little of the connections of some of the speakers, whether any one, at this time, when the independence of Parliament was so especially dear to every one of them, had been very critically studying the sixteenth rule, which said :

“No member is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest, and the vote of any member so interested will be disallowed.”

He thought, if the spirit of that rule should be rigidly observed, they would find a very meagre vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo. That amendment had been fairly demolished by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain). It appeared to him (Mr. Dymond) simply to contravene the fundamental principle of mutual insurance. It assumed that men might enter into a contract, might reap all the benefits of that contract and all the profits accruing, but, at the same time, might be exempted from or protected against all loss, if loss should happen to ensue. In effect, the amendment carried to a mischievous, injurious and extreme extent what he felt was a somewhat doubtful principle in the Bill itself. He could not conceive any reason—except it were the one he had ventured to allude to in passing—why hon. gentlemen should be so terribly alarmed lest persons desirous of effecting insurances should patronize American companies. They were told that the Bill must be passed because several of the insurance companies had lately failed most disastrously. So much the less reason was there, then, for such a Bill as the present one. The old adage “a burnt child dreads the fire” applied in this case as in many other cases, and, if there ever was a time when it might be supposed Canadian companies were placed at an advantage, it would be the present, when something like a panic had been created with respect to the American institutions. Nor did he think it was, under any circumstances, the business of the State to protect those who were able to protect themselves, but who wilfully refused to do so. With regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), he could not speak of it as favourably from his (Mr. Dymond's) point of view as of the argument which the hon. member had addressed to the House in answer to the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Young). The hon. gentleman's amendment also appeared to carry out, what he would venture to call the coddling principle, the principle of saddling somebody else with the duty of taking care of persons who ought to be sufficiently intelligent, under most circumstances, to see where they were going and shape their proceedings accordingly. So far as the Bill itself was concerned, on which he supposed, as they were now at the third reading, they were entitled to comment, it was conceived, no doubt, with very excellent intentions, and would be carried into effect by a gentleman—the Superintendent of Insurance—of marked ability and most unquestionable integrity. Nevertheless, he believed, as giving actual security, it would fall very far short of the expectation of its promoters. It was calculated to convey the impression that the State was in some measure responsible where no real responsibility existed. He remembered, many years ago, hearing a remark regarding burial societies and some other small institutions of that kind in England, formed especially for the convenience of the working classes, that a great number of persons were deluded into entering them in consequence of the certificate of Mr. Tidd Platt, whose duty was to certify their rules in all cases. “Here,” said the representatives of those societies, “is the certificate of a Government officer; he would not, of course, put his name to anything that was not solvent, that was not responsible and not strictly to be relied upon." And the same idea would be created in a great number of cases, when people were told that there was a Government Inspector who presided over these companies at their birth, over their matrimonial arrangements when they amalgamated, as they often did, and as the undertaker at their funeral when they experienced the fate of dissolution. The reasons given for Government interference had been various but might be classified pretty generally under three heads. In the first place, it was said that a great number of persons accepted a policy without being fully aware of the terms on which it was to be granted; that an agent, perhaps in some country place, sought out his victims, made a specious representation, received a deposit, gave a receipt, and, at some subsequent date, forwarded a policy. It might not be amiss—not perhaps at that late stage of the Session and of the Bill, but at some future time—to enact that no agreement of that kind should be valid except when the receipt of the agent contained an abstract of the terms of the policy. If that were adopted, the objection would be to a certain extent avoided. Then it was said—he thought his hon. friend from Waterloo was very eloquent on the point—that this was not a matter so much affecting the contractor, the person who assured, as his widow and orphans. He believed he (Mr. Dymond) had as much right to be concerned with regard to those whom he would leave behind him as the hon. member for South Waterloo; but he did not consider it was his duty to ask Parliament to supply his deficiency if he failed to take care to provide for his family. If the country were to do that, they might as well have one vast infirmary, hospital or institute within which all could take refuge for whom proper provision had not been made by their natural protectors. Then it was said that agents and canvassers were especially deceitful. They all knew something about agents and canvassers. His (Mr. Dymond's) agents had no doubt been most trustworthy and reliable people, and when sent out on political missions were always fair and reliable. But there were agents, political agents, not trustworthy, who did sometimes make false representations, who libelled political opponents, who extolled highly the merits of political friends; but Parliament did not pass Acts to protect anybody against them. Then there were agents who furnished quack remedies and patent medicines, yet the State had not provided any protection against their representations; and it rather encouraged the importation of such remedies into the country as a source of revenue. Then there were agents who induced people to purchase spurious patent mouse-traps and many other things known as Yankee notions, by which, in some cases, people were defrauded of their money; but against which no legislative remedy was provided. Unless Parliament was prepared to enter into a grand crusade against agents in general, and against all persons who might be sent out on any mission whatever, as the representatives of certain principles or interests, either in the market, the political arena or elsewhere, he did not think they need be so specially concerned as to the acts of agents who might obtain a livelihood by canvassing for insurance premiums. Having offered those remarks as a mild protest against the Bill, he did not desire to offer to the measure any further opposition, for it had been well considered, both by the Government and in the Banking and Commerce Committee; he was, therefore prepared to surrender his judgment to those interested, not only in framing the Bill, but in submitting it to the House in its present shape. He desired to second the observations of the hon. member for Cumberland in favour of Government insurance. He believed that, instead of attempting to regulate and manage the affairs of private companies, it would be far better that the Government should act as in the case of the Savings Bank, and become the insurance medium of the country. But it would probably be a long time before that system could possibly attain anything like extensive proportions. He would therefore take the liberty of suggesting that in that matter they might proceed on an experimental and tentative principle. It had occurred to him that, in the first instance, it might be advisable through the medium of the Government Savings Bank, to take insurances or to grant deferred endowments for a certain limited amount, perhaps $500 or $1,000. That could be done at very little expense. Of course it could be confined to certain districts, but they would be chiefly in the neighbourhood of cities and large towns, where insurance of that class was most necessary and most likely to be availed of. If the cost of the medical examination were paid by the person who desired to be insured, there would be little expense incurred in issuing a class of policies of the description referred to. Then there came in another class of insurances which might also be subjected to a Government guarantee, and respecting which a scheme had recently been set on foot. By this plan, it was provided that the whole assets of the Company should be invested in Government funds at a low rate of interest, say 4 per cent. The premiums in that case would be low, the profits not large—as they were in the cases mentioned by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) where large amounts were invested by companies at very high rates of interest, and very high profits were divided,—but, while the premiums would be low, and the rate of profit not high, the security would be unquestionable. He thought, if the public were aware that there existed, first, the opportunity, so far as policies for small sums were concerned, of having the absolute security of the Government, and, secondly, that there were offices of which the security was almost absolute, those modes of insurance would be exceeding popular and the ordinary system of insurance might be left to take its chance without the costly machinery provided for supervising that branch of business throughout the country. Persons would have an opportunity of making their choice, and it would be their fault if they elected to go into an undertaking which was not able to give absolute security. The great principle of self reliance and individual independence, it seemed to him, would be imperilled by the class of legislation of which the present Bill was an illustration.

Mr. WOOD said the American agents had said that if this Bill passed they would be forced to leave the country. He held in his hand a letter from Mr. Walter Burke, agent of one of the leading companies of the United States, from which it appeared there was no foundation in this. The American companies, indeed, found the business here of too profitable a character for them to withdraw on account of the passage of this Bill. Mr. Burke said :

“ I wish you to understand that the New York Life Insurance Company is not going to cease doing business in Canada. . . . should the Bill you refer to pass as law . . . The questions involved are too lengthy to put here, but I can assure you the New York Life has no intention of being driven out of Canada, and should the Bill become law, we shall still continue to do business and we predict that nine-tenths of all the business in future will be done by two or three of the first-class American companies. We shall then be on equal footing with the Canadian companies as regards the terms of the law, besides having advantages of which they know nothing.”

It would appear from this that the American companies would remain in Canada, but even should they leave we had enough public spirit and companies strong enough to do all the business that was required. Insurance companies on the other side did not seem to be in a very good condition. They could scarcely take up any New York paper without reading that some company had passed into the hands of the receiver. The Security Life, which had borne a good name and might, if it had come to Canada, have been received with as much confidence as other American companies, had recently failed. It had been found that the most corrupt perjury had been resorted to by that company, in order to keep things straight before the Insurance Inspector. The report of the Inspector who examined into its affairs said :

“ The last sworn statement of its officials, as of Dec. 31, 1875, showing a surplus of $515,034, in comparison with the present deficiency of $2,053,824, makes it a plain duty to place on the records of the department a statement of the chicanery and fraud that characterize the previous exhibits of the company.”

This company had been doing business under a system of fraud and deception from the beginning. He was quite prepared to admit that the principal American companies doing business in Canada were respectable, and deserving of the consideration of the policy-holders; but their business should be surrounded with the safeguards provided in this Bill. The report went on to say:

“The next item, where my examination revealed a discrepancy between the statement as made to the Department and the facts as I found them, was the return of ‘cash in bank and office, $205,708.68.’ At no time during 1875 did any such balance exist as an asset of the company, nor has it existed as such since. By including the receipts up to the 20th January, 1876, the books were made to show a balance of $55,708.68; but, as a matter of fact, it is doubtful if, at any time during the period mentioned, there was one-tenth of that sum subject to the cheque of the officers. To the forced exhibit above described, $150,000 was added, ‘give a good appearance to the statement,’ although the credit had no foundation in fact, and involved deliberate perjury on the part of the company’s officials swearing to it.”

Hon. members had been asked how much of the money taken out of Canada had returned in the shape of matured policies. He had a statement which showed that only 20 per cent. returned, that 15 per cent. of the premiums was consumed in expenses in this country, and that the balance went into the pockets of the American companies. If they wished to give security to policy-holders, the amendment offered by the hon. member for South Waterloo ought to be adopted.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said very few questions came before this House which so intimately affected the interests of the whole people as the one under discussion. He thought the Bill was a step in the right direction, but it scarcely went far enough. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) seemed to consider that we should look upon the efforts of life insurance agents as we would upon sewing machine and patent medicine agents. He did not agree with the hon. gentleman. If a man bought a bad sewing machine or took a bad patent medicine, the effect rested with the individual; but the efforts of the life insurance agent went further than the individual, they extended to those dependent upon him and for whom he had to make provision. That being the case, policy-holders ought to have the largest amount of protection and security possible. The hon. member for North York seemed to think that the defection of the hon. member for Waterloo was to be regretted. He (Mr. Smith) thought it showed a spirit of independence on the part of that hon. gentleman greatly to his credit. This was not a political question, nor was it looked upon as such by the House; and he thought members on both sides, who wished to see the interests of Canadian policy-holders protected, would support the amendment of the hon. member for Waterloo, as without it the Bill scarcely went far enough. He did not think the American companies were in as solvent and secure a state as was desirable. The system of inspection had not met the case, but, in his opinion, the amendment would give the security which was required by the public.

Mr. YOUNG said before the question was put he wished to reply briefly to some arguments advanced in opposition to the amendment. It was very unfair for any hon. gentleman in discussing this question to declare that those advocating this amendment were actuated by a desire to favour Canadian companies. He might say for himself that he had been actuated by no such feeling whatever, and he threw back that statement to the hon. gentleman who had made it. He had taken the position he had after full consideration, and after he had seen the vast development of life insurance among the people of this country, and also the very great number of losses and failures among these companies across the line. Under these circumstances he felt it to be his duty as a representative of the people to endeavour, if possible, to see that, if additional security was to be given to Canadian policy-holders as proposed, it was a real security, and one that could always be depended upon when they went to look for it. He was very much pleased with the fair and candid tone in which the Minister of Finance referred to the amendment he had had the honour to move, but he was not at all convinced by the hon. gentleman's reasoning. The hon. gentleman took the ground, as he had done on other occasions—and he had no doubt he candidly held these views—that, in a matter of this kind, those who insured on the mutual principle did it with their eyes open, and could judge for themselves; and the hon. the Minister of the Interior told them the people could make contracts for themselves, and that they were asking the Government to do for the people what the people could do better for themselves. His answer to this was—the Bill of the Government. That argument, if it possessed any force at all, was an argument against the Government Bill, and against any security being provided for Canadian policy-holders. He submitted to the House, that having brought in a Bill, the principle of which was, that additional securities should be given to Canadian policy-holders, and a full reserve put up, the Finance Minister was debarred from arguing that the people could judge for themselves in these matters. It was just because the people were not able to do so, and because all Governments considered that life insurance differed from ordinary business, that guarantees were considered necessary for those who invested money in these institutions. He had listened with some attention to the remarks of the hon. member for North York, and, he must say that he (Mr. Dymond) was the first speaker, so far as he was aware, who had made any remarks of a nature calculated to cause any feeling between members who were discussing this question. It was not the first time he had addressed him (Mr. Young) in that tone, and it ill-became the hon. gentleman. It would ill-become an hon. gentleman, occupying a position in the Government of the day, to speak in that tone; but it was simply intolerable in an hon. gentleman who only held the same position he himself did, as a humble representative of the people; and he would tell the hon. gentleman that this tone, when adopted towards supporters of the Government, was not likely to be any more popular than when used towards hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the

Mr. Young.

House. The hon. gentleman charged him with moving a protectionist resolution, and the hon. member for Yarmouth had been good enough to refer to it in the same sense. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) had described him as an extreme Free-trader, but, as a matter of fact, he had never held extreme free-trade views. He had explained, on more than one occasion on the floor of the House, that, whilst he approved of the general principles of free trade, he believed the true fiscal policy for Canada was a Revenue Tariff running neither to extreme free trade nor extreme protection. He maintained, however, that this was not a question involving the principle of protection. It was improperly so described, and this argument was brought up with the view of defeating his motion by a side wind instead of on its merits. He regarded life insurance very much in the same light as the money placed by many people in savings banks, in order to lay up something for a rainy day; money was invested in life insurance in very much the same way, and he knew of nothing sadder than for a man to pay year after year for a large portion of his life an amount of money in this way, denying to his family and himself certain comforts and advantages, in order that when he died they might have some means of support, and then to find that, before this time came, the company failed, and that little or nothing was left of all he had devoted to this purpose during a large portion of his life. It was incorrect, he repeated, to describe this question as one to which the principle of protection applied, but, if it had applied, the member for North York ought to have urged it against the Government Bill itself. It was open to the very same objection in that respect, because, as he understood its principle, it was that those who insured in these companies ought to be protected to a fair and reasonable extent. The member for North York had not argued in a very courteous tone, nor was the hon. gentleman more consistent in his argument. The hon. gentleman had objected to the measure being placed under the control of the Government for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders alone, and yet he closed his remarks by stating that not only the reserves but the profits as well should be held by the Government for the benefit of these policy-holders. The hon. gentleman began by arguing in favour of free trade in life insurance and ended by arguing in favour of an extreme measure of protection, holding that the Government should wipe out all Canadian, British and American companies and do the whole business themselves.

Mr. DYMOND said he desired to correct the hon. gentleman. He had suggested that there were three or four methods—one based on absolute Government security; another on absolute security while Government insurance companies were allowed to carry on business, as was at present the case, availing themselves of any business that might come to them without the slightest interference, or without more interference, than the general inspection to which they were always accustomed.

Mr. YOUNG said the impression left on his mind by the hon. gentleman's argument was as he had stated it. What stronger measure of protection—if it was proper to use that term at all in this connection—could there be than for the Government to do the whole of the life insurance business themselves? The proposition of the hon. member for Stanstead was open to a serious objection—it was impracticable. It was difficult for the Superintendent of Insurance to examine into the state of companies in our own country; and he ventured to say that the ablest man that could be obtained could not make a full report on the affairs of some large foreign companies of this kind in less than five or six months; hence it was really impracticable. He entirely denied the correctness of the statement that, if his motion was carried, it would drive American companies out of the country. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) had read a letter shewing that the New York Mutual Company, with a capital of $30,000,000, one of the largest and best companies doing business in this country, intended to continue doing business here if the Bill of last year, which was more restrictive than the present one, had been adopted. They made too much money out of the people of Canada to be willing to withdraw without very good reason for doing so; and under the Bill they had until March, 1878, to get their charter amended if that were necessary. If his motion were adopted, in fifteen years it was calculated there would be a full reserve for the whole of the insurance policies held in this country. The hon. member for Stanstead said that American rates of insurance were lower than Canadian, and that the cost of managing a large American company, in which he was insured, was a mere trifle compared to its receipts; but there were very few United States companies the cost of carrying on whose business did not amount to at least 30 per cent., and in many cases it was 40 or 50 per cent. Some of these large American companies also failed—for example the Continental. It had swallowed up three or four other companies and then failed itself, paying but a small percentage on the dollar. A very large company, the largest he believed in the Western States, the St. Louis Mutual, a few years ago began business in Canada and made the requisite deposit. Since then it had failed, and although not many Canadians lost, still the failure ought to warn us of our danger. The recent investigation in the State of New York into the affairs of these companies revealed the grossest extravagance, dishonesty, and fraud as having been perpetrated on the public by some of them, caused largely no doubt by undue competition. He found the following in an article which appeared a few days ago in that able journal, the Toronto Globe:—

“Life Insurance Companies have, for some time past, in the United States especially, been on their trial, and it scarcely seems to be as yet quite settled whether they are to be regarded as a great blessing or something of a delusion and a snare. Recent investigations have shown that too many of these are conducted on a very loose, unsatisfactory basis, and that their officials have been guilty of frauds and cruelties which ought long ere this to have sent them to the States' Prison. Some of these companies have been forced into liquidation, and many facts of the most scandalous character have been brought out in the course of the investigations rendered necessary. Robbery, with some of them, has been shown to have been reduced to a science, and has been carried through with a remorselessness to the possession of which few ordinary foot-pads could justly lay claim. The investigations still going on under the care of the Legislature of New York have awakened a great deal of suspicion, and have interfered even with legitimate business."

The proposal contained in his resolution would not do any injustice whatever to the policy-holders in these companies in the United States. It asked that reserves in proportion to the premiums contributed by Canadians, should be held in this country for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders, and the portion paid in the United States could be retained and reserved for their people, as well as all profits obtained on the business done. He thought there was no injustice to American policy-holders in the proposal, but that it was fair and just and ought to commend itself to the members of the House. Their first duty was to look after the interests of Canadian policy-holders. The Bill of the Government admitted that some additional security was necessary; its principle was that a full reserve ought to be put up in Canada as against the policies issued by the foreign companies. The Bill either went too far or did not go far enough. If the argument that the people were able to judge for themselves in such matters were sound, then no additional security was necessary, and there was no necessity for a full reserve. But, if the principle of the Bill was correct, that additional security and a full reserve were necessary, then he maintained that the reserve should be made a reality by being held for Canadian policy-holders only. If it was subject to the losses of these companies all over the world, then it might disappear like the morning dew, and some day bring disaster to many a Canadian family.

Question put on the third reading.

Mr. CAMERON said he thought a more medium course should be adopted. As he understood it, the objection to the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo was that it drove all American companies out, inasmuch as all policies which were mutual would be affected under the words of the 16th clause. It seemed to him that the objection only applied to policies issued by mutual companies. It was said that putting up money in Canada for the exclusive benefit of Canadian policy-holders would be a violation of their charters. But that did not apply to cases of stock companies which also did business upon the mutual principle of allowing a number of the policy-holders to share in the profits. It would be reasonable to exclude them from the provision of the Act, so as to make their reserves for the exclusive benefit of Canadian policy-holders. He therefore moved:

“That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to Committee of the whole House, with instructions that they shall have power to amend Section 16 of the Bill, by providing that the reserves to be held by all foreign insurance companies, not incorporated as mutual companies only, and prohibited by their charter Act of incorporation, or articles of association of the Company, from setting apart any portion of their assets for the benefit of any special number of their policy-holders, shall be held solely for the benefit of Canadian policy-holders."

Mr. TUPPER said his hon. friend simply meant to strike out from the clause the words "and from the conditions of the policy."

Mr. BLAIN said he thought the Act correct as it stood. The amendment was intended to cover what were considered as "mixed" companies; that was, companies that had business upon both stock and mutual principles, and the Bill expressly confined the operation of it to those policies which had been effected upon the stock principle. He did not think the amendment would benefit the Act in any way.

Mr. COLBY said there were certain companies which were essentially mutual companies, but which had a small constituency of shareholders. Such a company would be virtually excluded from the intent of the Act, as being virtually mutual. He might instance a company of that kind doing business in Canada, whose assets amounted to $22,000,000, out of which only $150,000 was held by stockholders, and by the terms of organization of that company, the dividend which could be paid upon that stock was limited to 10 per cent. So that the interest of the stockholders was very moderate. If the amendment of the hon. member for South Waterloo was objectionable, so also was the amendment now proposed.

Mr. WOOD said it would be inconsistent with the vote already taken to sanction the amendment, which was aimed purely at stock companies.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Order for House to go again into Committee of Supply, read.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved that the Speaker do now leave the Chair.

Mr. BOWELL said, before the Speaker left the Chair, he desired to bring under the notice of the House a question which had been agitated in the press and among the people of the country for the last two years. He might premise by saying that he would have brought this matter before the House at an earlier period, had the Government made the motion at an earlier period to go into Committee of Supply; but, having taken up other business on all Government days without making the motion to go into

Supply, he was unable to pursue the course he had marked out for himself, and make the motion he desired to place in the Speaker's hands. It was well known that for some time, not only in the House, but out of the House and in the press, the question of Government patronage to members of the House had been freely discussed, and in order that the House might fairly understand the subject he desired to discuss at the present moment, he would read the resolution he was about to move:—

“That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract whereby public money is paid to members of Parliament—such as the Postmaster-General's Reports of 1875 and 1876, and the vouchers laid on the table of this House on the 15th of March ult., show to have been paid to Timothy Warren Anglin, a member of this House for the county of Gloucester; namely, $8,126.31 for the year ended 30th June, 1875, and $10,263.24 for the year ended 30th June, 1876, and $2,709.55 being for the quarter ended 30th September, 1876, in payment for printing and stationery done for and furnished by him to the Post Office Department of Canada ‘per agreement;’ as shown by the return laid before Parliament by the Postmaster-General on the 1st March last, and the vouchers reported to the House by the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts on the 16th March, 1877—as such payments are in contravention of an Act passed in the 31st year of Her Majesty's reign intitled: ‘An Act further to secure the independence of Parliament,’ which provides that: ‘No person, whatsoever, holding, enjoying, undertaking or executing, directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, any contract or agreement with Her Majesty, or with any public officer or Department, with respect to the public service of Canada, or under which any public money of Canada is paid for any service or work, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote in the same;’ and are calculated to detract from the independence of the members of this House.”

He had taken this course instead of that which had been pursued on many occasions in the Imperial Parliament, when circumstances of a similar or analogous character had been brought before the House,—that of moving for the issue of a writ or the reference to a Select Committee, in order to decide whether the member so receiving public money for services rendered had vacated his seat. He stated frankly that he had taken this course because it was the precedent laid down by the gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury Benches, when they occupied seats on that side of the House, and, as far as it was possible, other than relating to the circumstances, he had adopted the language used by the present Minister of Justice, when he moved his resolution condemnatory of the late Government, for employing Col. Gray, then a member of Parliament. It might not be, however, out of place, or improper, to refer to the course that had been pursued in the Parliament of England upon questions of this character, and, with the indulgence of the House, he proposed to recite a few precedents which he had been enabled to gather from looking at Hansard and other Parliamentary documents in the Library. He found, as early as 1826, that a most peculiar case was brought before the House in the case of Mr. Bish, who, at that time, had contracted with the Government for the drawing of a lottery,—he could scarcely conceive that such strong objections to lottery and gambling existed then as this Parliament, at least, had shown during the present Session,—but in that case the drawing of this lottery was to have taken place at a certain date; and, according to the agreement with the Lords of the Treasury, the drawing was delayed until a later period in that year, and before the drawing took place an election was held, at which Mr. Bish was returned. The drawing having taken place subsequently, this matter was brought before Parliament, and the election was declared null and void, and Mr. Bish was obliged to return to his constituency, Mr. Speaker having, on the order of a Special Committee, issued a new writ. In November, 1847, they had the case of Mr. Cowan, who was elected for the city of Edinburgh. After having been elected it was ascertained that he had an interest or was interested in a contract with the Stationery Department of the Government. The result of that having been called to his notice, the election was declared null and void, and a new writ was issued. In another case, in 1869—he was referring to these cases to show that the course pursued there had been consistent from the time of the passage of the Independence of Parliament Act up to the present day—in the Dumfriesshire election Sir Sydney Waterlow was the member elected, and a motion was made to vacate the seat, and it was subsequently ascertained that this member had a stationery account, or a stationery contract, and furnished some Departments of the Government; and, on motion of Mr. Chambers, a Select Committee was appointed and the result was that his seat was declared vacant and a new writ issued. This was considered to be a somewhat harsh interpretation of the law at that time, and Mr. Ryland asked the Government whether they intended to repeal it, and Mr. Gladstone replied that they did not. Mr. Ryland, however, thought it should be, and he used this language:—

“That the Act was passed when a vast amount of jobbery had been perpetrated in connection with the members of the House, and when members represented rotten boroughs, and only came into Parliament for the purpose of making merchandise of their seats.”

Notwithstanding this language, and notwithstanding the desire expressed by many members of the Imperial Parliament at that time in favour of the relaxation of the law, the Government steadily refused to do it, except to meet one case, and that was in the case of Baron Rothschild, a member elect for the city of London, whose case was also brought before the House by an hon. member, he having entered into a contract for the negotiation of a loan of sixteen millions sterling for the Government. That case was referred to the Select Committee, who reported in favour of the Baron, and he was not unseated; but so grave were the doubts in the minds of members of the House which seated him at that time, as to the interpretation of the Independence of Parliament Act, that it was so amended as to specially exempt members of that character, who were employed, or might, in the future, be employed, to negotiate loans on behalf of the Government. But they had a much later case—one as late as 1874

Mr. BOWELL.

—and this case was somewhat analogous to one that, in all probability, judging from the Notice Paper, would be brought under the consideration of the House at a very early date. He found, in referring to Hansard's Debates, volume 218, March 19th, 1874, that Mr. Ramsay was elected for Falkirk. Subsequently, he (Mr. Ramsay) ascertained that he owned 4-64th shares of a steamer which had contracted for the carrying of the mails between the mainland and one of the adjacent islands. The amount paid to this company was £150 sterling per annum. Mr. Ramsay divested himself of his share—that was, he sold it; but, notwithstanding this fact of his having done so, it was held by his legal adviser that he could not take his seat; he refused to take the oath, and a new writ was issued. In this case his share, as stated by himself, in the contract, amounted to the sum of £9 7s. 6d. per annum, and yet the receipt of that insignificant sum in the contract was sufficient to justify Mr. Ramsay in refusing to take the oath and his seat. It might be a matter of regret in this country that members did not hesitate to take much larger sums of money for the conveyance of freight by steamers in different sections of the country; but, however, as this was not pertinent to the question at the present moment, he would not refer to it. Now, what was their position in this country in reference to this subject? When the gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury benches were in Opposition, one of their principles, or, to use what he might term a Canadianism, one of the planks in their platform, was the question of the independence of Parliament. They well knew the many motions that were made in this House upon that question. He found, on referring to the Journals, that, in 1868, as early a period after Confederation as possible, Mr. Blake moved, seconded by Mr. Holton, a resolution to render all officials ineligible. In 1869, Mr. Mackenzie moved, seconded by Mr. Holton, a motion to render it impossible—or rather not impossible, because they had now illustrations of the fact that it was not impossible to do that which was even contrary to law—but declaring it to be objectionable for any member to receive payment under the grant for the assimilation of provincial lines. The House would remember at whom that motion was aimed, and what the effect of it was.

Mr. HOLTON: And the result.

Mr. BOWELL said they would come to the result presently. It seemed somewhat strange—though not at all strange, considering the strong opinions held by the hon. member for Chateauguay on this question—that he should find in every single instance, from 1868 down to 1871, the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) seconded all the resolutions he could discover moved in the direction of the independence of Parliament, and to prevent, if possible, the payment to any member of the House by the Government of the day, of any sums of money.

Mr. HOLTON: That is quite true.

Mr. BOWELL said he had no doubt he should find that, even now, notwithstanding what those with whom he (Mr. Holton) formerly acted might have done even at this day, he had not only not changed his mind, but also he would not be much mistaken, as also would be the House and the country, if he found the hon. gentleman voting in favour of the perpetuation of a principle that he had so long condemned. In 1871, he found Mr. Blake moving, seconded by Mr. Holton, a motion declaring it improper for any public emoluments to be paid to any member of the House. In 1871, Mr. Blake moved, seconded by Mr. Holton, the passage of a Bill to render the Senate independent. Not satisfied with endeavouring to make members of this House independent, they also took under their protection the other branch of the Legislature. Again, in 1871, he found that Mr. Blake moved, seconded by Mr. Holton, to declare the then Chairman of the Inter-colonial Commission ineligible, though the House knew well that the special Act, making him eligible for a seat in this House, was passed before the Chairman was appointed. Again, in 1871, Mr. Blake moved, seconded by Mr. Holton, a resolution to declare sheriffs and other officers of Local Governments ineligible to seats here. Another motion was made in 1871 rendering Provincial Ministers and other members of the Local House ineligible, for reasons which those in Parliament at that time knew well. Members of the present Government used very strong language condemnatory of this principle, and he would ask the indulgence of the House to show the position those hon. gentlemen occupied a few years ago to show how easily it was to change front, to change position, and to change opinion since they passed from the left side of the House to the right.

Mr. BOWELL said he understood the insinuation, but as he had never sat on that side of the House the remark could not apply to him, and if the hon. member for Chateauguay would refer to the Journals, he would find that he voted against the then Government, and recorded his name with that of the hon. the Minister of Justice on the question of rendering the Senate independent, and upon the motion attacking Col. Gray. During his first two years in Parliament he voted against the motion, but when he saw what he believed to be evil results which followed the employment of members of the House by the Government, he came to the conclusion that it must, in some way or other, interfere with their independence, and, having come to that conclusion, he steadily voted with those hon. gentlemen when this question came up.

Mr. HOLTON: I meant not that the hon. gentleman did, but that his party did.

Mr. BOWELL said that he had already explained that, while the party, of which he was an humble member, took the ground they did, he steadily voted against them, and he hoped the hon. member for Chateauguay would be consistent, and follow his example in that respect when the division took place. The motion to which he referred was as follows:—

“That in the opinion of this House it is inexpedient that any member of this House should, for the future, be engaged in the service of the Government of Canada in any paid employment, such as that in respect of which the Hon. John Hamilton Gray, member of the city and county of St. John, in 1868 entered into the receipt of $300 a month for the public service.

When that motion was made the present Prime Minister used this language :

“ A motion, however, to the same effect as the one before them was defeated, and it would be remembered that last Session the Opposition failed by only eighty votes to carry a resolution which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had proposed, so that the hon. gentlemen could not say that he ever had the slightest countenance or support in these transgressions of a good public law, from the Opposition side of the House. They had taken a consistent course on this matter throughout, and now, he was glad to see that the hon. gentleman was compelled, by the gross immorality of the Act, and by the force of public opinion, to put an end to system which had proved to be a scandal and disgrace to this Legislature.”

The terms of the resolution he had read showed that while the payment might be an infringement of the spirit of the law as it existed, it was not an infringement of the letter of the law ; still, it was declared by the present leader of the Government, that it created a gross public scandal and immorality. Now, if the payment to an eminent lawyer of $300 a month to codify the laws and do work in connection with the question of a boundary line, how much greater must that immorality and public scandal be when we found the Government of the day subsidizing, if he might use that expression, the First Commoner to the amount of from $8,000 to $10,000 a year? That was a question which he left for the House to decide, and for the country to decide hereafter. But the hon. gentleman did not confine his denunciations of the immorality of such a practice to the Commons. On every occasion, whether visiting his constituency or at public demonstrations, in the west or east, we found him using language equally strong. In 1870, at the Reform banquet given in Toronto, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie said :—

“ The Government have tampered with the Independence of Parliament Act. They have loosened the reins of Parliamentary immorality alike in the country and Parliament.”

Mr. BOWELL.

He could not conceive of any stronger language than that to condemn that of which he was now guilty. At London the hon. gentleman said :—

“ It was not right that legal gentlemen should be employed by the Government while they sat in Parliament, and were supposed to represent independent constituencies. The Reform party wanted to put it out of the power of any Government to wield an influence of this kind.”

At St. Catharines in 1870, the hon. gentleman used this language :

“ He would never accept office upon any consideration if, in doing so, he had to abandon the least of the principles he now professed. The man who taught one thing in Opposition and another when he was in power was a demagogue in whom the people could have no confidence.”

He might occupy the time of the House for hours with further quotations who the demagogues now were. An hon. gentleman he observed was smiling. There was a couplet he could quote, but it perhaps might not be polite or parliamentary to do so.

Mr. DYMOND: Quote.

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman was sufficiently well acquainted with the English bards to know to what couplet he referred to, and he might make the application. He had an extract or two for the hon. gentleman ; and would pay his respects to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) in a short time, and would endeavour to show the House that he could write one thing, when, if he had consulted documents on the table, he must have come to a different conclusion, or have written that which he knew to be incorrect. But the hon. the Premier went on to say :

“ He was prepared, at any moment, when any Reform Government should come into power, when they were ready to depart from the principles which actuated them in Opposition, to take the same ground against them that he took against their natural enemies to-night.”

The House would see whether the hon. gentleman proposed to take that ground against his own supporters who had been subsidised in the way pointed out in the resolution, or whether he intended to take what he (Mr. Bowell) should deem—but he did not want the hon. gentleman to accept his dictum—

the more honorable course of resigning himself, and leave his supporters to take what course they pleased. The hon. Minister of the Interior had a little to say on the occasion referred to, and as the hon. gentleman was now one of those who were responsible for the acts of the Government, whether in his department or not, he (Mr. Bowell) presumed he would not take it amiss if he quoted to the House a few of his utterances on the question. The hon. gentleman did not make a very long speech, as was his wont, but, as he usually did, he spoke pertinently and to the point. The hon. gentleman was referring to the rotten boroughs which existed in England; he remarked that the wealth of English members of Parliament placed them above the temptations of any representative body in this country. He said:

“Our position being different from that of the English Government in this respect demands different safeguards. Our Government should not be able to employ members of Parliament. It was no longer possible to influence English as it was Canadian members.”

Whatever patronage their predecessors might have exercised, it was quite clear that the present Government were not long in office before they began to pursue the same policy and to a much greater extent. He found, also, in this debate to which he had referred, that the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution spoke feelingly, eloquently, and much to the amusement of the House: and as the hon. Minister of Justice, upon one occasion, informed him that reading from his speeches was the best thing he could do, he would indulge the hon. gentleman's vanity for a few moments and edify the House by reading from the speech he made on that occasion. It would be a matter of curiosity to know whether the hon. gentleman was prepared to repeat the language with regard to the Hon. Timothy Warren Anglin which he applied to the case of Col. Gray. Mr. Blake was reported to have spoken as follows:—

“Shortly after the first Session of the present Parliament, the Act, mis-called a Bill, to establish the Independence of Parliament, was introduced; and, in spite of the protest of the Opposition, it became law in its present objectionable shape. It was passed in the shape that, while it acknowledged the independence of members of this House was likely to be sapped by a yearly salary, fee or emolument from the Government, it would not in the least be interfered with, only if the fee or salary be not annual. That was the distinction, that the independence of a member, who was employed by the year at a yearly salary, would be interfered with; but the independence of a member who was employed for two years at a two years' salary, or by the month at a monthly salary, would not be interfered with in the least. He agreed with the hon. members opposite that there was a distinction between them, but it had always appeared to him that the distinction was in favour of the man who was employed yearly, for then he might maintain his independence; but if employed by the month, he would be the more submissive servant. The Opposition had endeavoured to prevent the law from passing in that shape, but were defeated. On subsequent occasions, when appointments were made which they considered objectionable, they protested against them, but were defeated; and now, when this Parliament was about to close, and there had been ample evidence afforded of how badly the Act worked, he ventured to appeal to the House to re-consider the question, and to determine, guided not merely by reason, but by experience, that it was not expedient in future that a person, in receipt of such emolument, should have a seat in this Chamber. There were instances of the fact that a man need not have a long engagement, and yet remain a long time employed. The case to which he desired to apply a remedy was one in which a man held office for nearly, if not quite, two years. The hon. gentleman received large sums—sums which, he thought, would stagger the House when their attention should be called to them. For about two years the hon. member for St. John, while holding a seat in this House, received from the public funds as Commissioner, or while in the employ of the Minister of Justice in the codification of the laws, or in some work for the Government, $3,600,—no, not that; only $300 a month, which was the equivalent to that amount for the year, realizing for the two years a total of $7,200. Then as Arbitrator, $5,500 was paid to him. He received what each member got, a sessional allowance of $600 a year, $1,200 for the two years; and there was the mileage, the earned mileage, amounting to $584. The hon. gentleman received from the Government in various ways, the total sum of $14,844, while a private member of Parliament. He (Mr. Blake) would contrast this with the salary of a Crown Minister. The yearly salary of a Cabinet Minister was $5,000, which, with mileage, amounted to less for two years than the hon. member for St. John received within the same time. It was time that there should be an end of this system. The House should solemnly declare that it had not adduced to the independence or dignity of this Chamber, that its members should have been in the pay of the Ministry of the day, whether that pay were weekly, monthly or yearly. It did seem to him that there were plenty of gentlemen quite competent for the purposes of the Government, and by such men it should be done, and that hon. members who wished to pick up their crumbs from the public table, should resign their seats in the House. It seemed to him that the Act recognized, but in the wrong way, that the distinction between monthly and yearly hire had produced injurious results, and should be amended for the future. He had no desire to make personal attacks, but when the hon. member for St. John, as a member of this House, held an office of emolument under the Government, he should expect such criticism. He had no objection that the hon. member should be employed. But it was said to-day that the hon. member had ceased to be employed. He (Mr. Blake) was glad of it, for it now left the House clear of this case. For his own part he could say sincerely he desired, if the hon. member wished to be employed on the public service, that he should receive such share of the public patronage of the House as he was fit to earn, always on condition that the hon. member cease to hold a seat in this House while so employed. Long might his gallant bosom swell; long might his vest pockets fill with the stream of the treasury benches—but not while he represented the people here.”

He had no doubt that the hon. member held the same opinion to-day; but in the position he occupied whether he would have the same boldness in declaring them to the country that he had in 1871, was a question which the future alone could solve. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied even with that. He said, in relation to what might be called the “personalities” of the discussion:

“His opinion was, and he thought this might have proved it, that the best way of carrying an abstract principle was to impress upon the House the importance of it, by embodying in the resolution an illustration of its importance.”

Precisely as he (Mr. Bowell) had done to-day, he having been, on that occasion and upon that question, an humble follower of the hon. gentleman, and he adhered to his opinions.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman moved an amendment.

Mr. BOWELL: Yes, but not in the direction of destroying the principle. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the matter he will find that I voted for the principle involved in his resolution—as to the employment by monthly salary.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BLAKE: That is so.

Mr. BOWELL said these were the opinions held by the hon. gentleman at that time. He (Mr. Bowell) might occupy the time of the House long after six o'clock upon this very subject, in which that hon. gentleman so eloquently, and with that force he was known to possess, impressed upon the minds of the electors whenever he met them, the importance of adopting in the legislative halls of this country a law and rule in order to arrest this evil. One thing was quite clear, that the hon. gentleman out of the House reiterated the opinions he had expressed in the House. He (Mr. Bowell) would give one or two quotations. In London the hon. gentleman said:—

“In reference to this very expenditure on Col. Gray's employment, and to the appointment of Mr. Smith, of one of the ridings of Leeds, by the Ontario Government. * ”

In the case of Mr. Smith no emolument from the Government was attached to it. He was trustee for the holding and distribution of some funds, he thought.

Mr. BLAKE: Arbitrator of the municipalities.

Mr. BOWELL: For which the municipalities had to pay him. He supposed it would not be considered either invidious or improper, if he adopted the same line of argument adopted by the hon. the Minister of Justice to illustrate his subject and calculate the amount which the hon. gentleman, to whom the resolution referred, had received within the last two years. He had no doubt that, had not that precedent been set him, he would be denounced by gentlemen opposite for doing this, as travelling beyond the record. But what the Minister of Justice did in 1871 it might not be amiss that he (Mr. Bowell) should repeat in 1877. And thus he would show how much money had been paid to the hon. member of the House referred to, in his various positions. By the Postmaster-General's return for the year 1875, it appeared that there was paid to the Hon. T. W. Anglin, for Post Office printing and stationery, the sum of $8,126.31; for the year ending 30th June, 1876, for the same service $10,263.24. And a point to which he wished particularly to call the attention of the House, was the fact that for the quarter ending 30th September, 1876, there was paid the sum of $2,709.55. There were paid for two years, salary as Speaker, $8,000; Sessional allowance for two years, $2,000, mileage $584, taking the same calculation as the hon. the Minister of Justice had with reference to Colonel Gray, for both he and the Hon. Mr. Anglin resided in the same city. These sums made a total of $31,683.80 received in two years, or nearly $16,000 per annum, in addition to all the perquisites attendant upon his position as First Commoner of the land. Carrying out the same comparisons as the hon. the Minister of Justice had, they knew that in the Cabinet the Premier received but $8,000 a year, and other Ministers $7,000, with their sessional allowances. So that this favoured member, in order to violate the principle which they had professed, received nearly double the amount which the Cabinet Ministers received. He might go further, and paraphrase the hon. the Minister of Justice's speech, and say: "Let the hon. gentleman's gallant bosom swell, and his vest pockets expand with the overflowing of the wealth that streams from the Treasury benches, but not while he is a member of this House." Upon more than one occasion an excuse had been made for this departure from former principle, and for this grave violation of it. The leading organ of the hon. gentleman opposite had called it an "inadvertence," and stated that it was put a stop to as soon as it came to the knowledge of the Government. That excuse was given some months ago; it had been repeated, not only in the Press, but in the lobbies of the House. Whether the excuse referred to was written by an hon. member of the House or not he could not say. The article was written on the 4th inst., and was to the following effect:—

"About the principal facts of Mr. Anglin's case there was no dispute. The only room for difference of opinion is as to the sufficiency of the explanation. It is important to remember that as soon as the fact of Mr. Anglin holding the contract for printing came under the notice of the Government, they not only prevented the granting of any more work to him, but put a stop to the system altogether. The fact that his name appeared in the Public Accounts of 1875 and 1876, as well as of 1874 and 1875, is due to the contract not having been completed in time for the account to be closed in the latter year. They brought the whole system to an end of their own accord, and before any member or organ of the Opposition had even noticed the abuse. The fact that they did so is sufficient guarantee, not only of freedom from corrupt intent, but also of the non-concurrence in the future of any similar Departmental abuse."

He would see how far these statements were borne out by the facts as they were laid before Parliament. In 1876, when the House was in Committee of Supply, he called attention to the payment of $10,000 last year to the Citizen Publishing Company of Halifax for departmental printing, of which company the hon. the Minister of Militia and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), were charged with being partners, and they did not deny, or, at any rate, they appeared to be aware of the fact that the House would accept their silence as an admission, that a Minister had used his influence in putting printing in the way of this Company and had pocketed his share of the profit. He found, also, that the St. John Freeman had received $9,000 for similar work. In that debate the hon. the Premier took part, and spoke two or three times, which showed that the Government must have been aware of what their organ called an "abuse." This debate was on the 24th March. The hon. the Premier showed that there was a difference between job printing and advertising. Upon two occasions during that debate the hon. gentleman referred to the subject. The second report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts said:

"That it appears from the vouchers now before them that large sums of money have, from time to time, been paid to T. W. Anglin, a member of this House, for printing and stationery, while a member of this House."

That was evidence sufficient, without having the duty imposed upon him (Mr. Bowell) of showing that money had been paid on these vouchers to a member of the House. If hon. members would refer to the last account which had been passed, they would find that the last charge in it was July 25th, 1876, and the voucher signed for the money, $2,709.55, was for the quarter ending 30th September, 1876. So that the work was continued from March for four or five months afterwards. Hon. gentleman opposite, therefore, knew, for their attention was called to it, that the abuse had been continued ever since they had been in power, until, at least, the 25th July, the date of the last charge in the account, and how much longer he could not tell, because hon. members had not the Public Accounts before them, and they had nothing to shew that such was the case. But, apart from that fact, he hoped at this late day that, even supposing the Government did not know that the abuse had been perpetrated, or was being continued, the Government would not endeavour to shirk the responsibility attached to the giving out of work to members of the House by the late or present Postmaster General, whether it was by the Postmaster General of that day and continued by his successor, or not. If hon. members would examine that point in the constitution of this country, they would find that an excuse of that kind was not tenable. If hon. members would refer to the debates in the Senate in April last, they would find that the question was brought under the notice of the Government by Hon. Mr. Aikins who moved a resolution, and in the course of his speech he called attention to the facts which he (Mr. Bowell) subsequently brought before this House. Thus a plea of ignorance of what had taken place was neither tenable nor justifiable on the part of those who attempted to use it. He found that on the question of responsibility Lord Palmerston, in discussing the question when brought up in the House of Commons, laid down the principle very clearly. The question submitted to Parliament was with regard to acts of a subordinate which were considered improper, and some friends attempted the same excuse that had been attempted by hon. members in order to shield Lord Palmerston from the responsibility which attached to him as a responsible adviser of Her Majesty, but Lord Palmerston repudiated such a doctrine and said :

“ He could not constitutionally admit that any person who gave advice to the Crown upon the public service was an irresponsible officer. The truth was that the Cabinet—the Ministry of the day—were the parties who were responsible for everything that was done in any Department of the State.”

The principle, he (Mr. Bowell) thought, was one that was recognised in every British deliberative body, and it was plainly and clearly laid by that eminent statesman in that language, which it was impossible to controvert. The same principle was laid down by Lord Palmerston on July 16, 1861 in a debate raised on a motion by Col. Hillary in regard to some military matter; and that principle was laid down by Professor Austin, in his plea for the constitution of Great Britain, in language so plain that no one could misunderstand it. He thought he had placed the question sufficiently clearly before the House to justify it taking those steps which it was in honour bound to take. He had shown, from British precedents, that the Government could not be permitted to shirk the responsibility; that the Government of the day were the loudest in their denunciations of the employment of any member of Parliament while in Opposition; that so soon as they obtained the reins of power they not only exceeded their predecessors in the attempt, he would not say to influence the members of the House, but in giving to hon. members that patronage which they had no right to give, and which they had themselves declared could not be received by any independent member of Parliament. He had shown also that the subject was brought under the notice of the the House four or five months previous to the time they had evidence it was stopped; that, from the voucher of the Department, it appeared that nearly $3,000 was paid for work done for the quarter, the last item being dated 25th July, 1876. He found that the hon. the Secretary of State, in the debate to which he referred a few moments ago, on a motion regarding public printing made by Hon. Mr. Aikins, said that the Government had endeavored to inaugurate a new system (admitting that the system had been in existence), and he gave notice to all parties who had been doing printing and supplying materials, that it must cease at the end of the present half-year. That would have been in June. However bad the practice might be in principle, it was continued for at least four months after attention had been called to it. Now, to say that the work had not been completed was a fallacy, because an examination of the return would show such items as 100 reams of note paper at $4 a ream. If the Government desired to put an end to such a system, why buy the paper, when the whole matter could have been stopped at the moment? Any excuse on that head was, therefore, fallacious, and could not, by any possibility, be accepted by the House or the country. He, therefore, desired to submit a motion to the House, and, in doing so, he would not be surprised to find, not only the Government which enunciated the opinion he had presented to the House in their speeches, voting against him to-day, but he would be prepared, and he thought the country would be prepared, to find those hon. gentlemen in this instance proving as inconsistent upon this question as upon every other question. There was scarcely a principle hon. gentlemen advocated when in Opposition that they had not violated since they came into power. One of the principal planks of hon. gentlemen opposite was that there was to be no coalition. Such action by the late Government was denounced as vicious and immoral, and tending to demoralize the country. But the principle was violated by the Government in the case of the hon. the President of the Council and the hon. the Minister of the Finance. Yet the hon. members of Government worked, harmoniously, and no doubt would continue to do so just as long as they could retain their offices with the salaries attached thereto. Hon. gentlemen opposite would reply that the Government was not a coalition. But when an hon. member, formerly belonging to the late Opposition, crossed the floor and became a member of the Cabinet of the right hon. member for Kingston, then it was an immoral act, not only degrading but demoralizing the whole public sentiment of the country. There was a famous resolution passed by the House in respect to the Senate, in which the hon. the Minister of the Interior used very strong language, denouncing that body as a "Magdalene Asylum for political prostitutes seduced by the Government of the day." He thought he was quoting correctly the words of the hon. gentleman.

An Hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BOWELL said if the hon. gentleman would refer to the Globe, he would find the language used to be that which he had quoted. Hon. gentlemen opposite had declared that the Senate was an effete body, and, while not altogether unnecessary, it was an incubus on the body politic; yet, though those hon. gentlemen had been in power three or four years, no attempt had been made either to re-organize it or change its constitution. They had, too, the famous speech of the hon. the Minister of Justice at Aurora, according to which the whole British Empire was to be re-organized. It was true the hon. Minister had said he was afraid he had made a disturbing speech. But it did not disturb many people, for so soon as the great leader of the party, the controller of the political destinies of hon. gentlemen opposite, placed his foot upon them, and told the hon. member for South Bruce that he must enter the Cabinet, the hon. gentleman cast aside all his former professions, and acted as some of the more humble members of his party had done—lay them aside, and obey the command of his master. He had no doubt the expression used by that journal had its effect, not only upon the hon. the Minister of Justice, but upon his colleagues behind him, "that the stern realities of office would dispel those vagaries of the mind which they had been endeavouring to float upon the popular tide at the time." Everyone knew that no attempt had been made to change the constitution of the country; and, further, no attempt had been made to inaugurate that which they considered would be of the most vital importance to the interests of the country. Those opinions had been frozen, and he feared they would never be thawed out until they returned again into Opposition. Then, when it became necessary to arouse popular prejudice, to stir up turmoil, trouble, and difficulty in the country, as they had done, more particularly the hon. the Minister of Justice, in regard to the North-West troubles, hon. gentlemen opposite would be found just as ready in the future, as they had been in the past, to adopt the same system of arraying man against man in order to regain seats on the Treasury benches. If the hon. the Minister of Justice did not so act, he (Mr. Bowell) would be very much mistaken, and he would be only too glad to compliment the hon. gentleman on the fact that he was consistent with the opinions he had expressed, and was not that demagogue which the hon. the Premier had declared every man to be who was not prepared to advocate and carry out when in office those principles which he had advocated when in Opposition. He might go on and point out how hon. gentlemen opposite had carried out that principle of purity of which the country had heard so much; how they had elevated the standard of public morality in their political actions. But he would not weary the House with any such rehearsal; he would merely say that the composition of the present Cabinet was such as the country had never seen in the past, and, he trusted, never would see repeated in the future. He begged to move the resolution which he had read.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not propose to follow the example of the hon. gentleman in mingling with a special subject general remarks as to the position of the members of the Government in relation to general affairs. The hon. gentleman had chosen, while practically giving notice of his intention to bring this matter under the notice of the House, to diverge into a general attack on the Administration, and upon his hon. friend who sat beside him, and who might have, at some period of his political life, expressed opinions adverse to those he might at sometime have advocated. He trusted that he should never be one of that narrow class of men who would believe that it was impossible for men to associate together if a speech should be made by any one of them which should indicate a desire for political changes that might be or might not be desirable in the near future. And so far from having any fault to find with his hon. friend the Minister of Justice with regard to the celebrated speech to which reference had been made, he thought there was nothing more calculated to advance political intelligence in the country than to have new subjects of political interest discussed and developed in public addresses; and he dared say he was one of the very first to congratulate his hon. friend on his successful discussion of many subjects in that speech. But they might or might not agree upon matters of general interest which had not yet become actual living questions in the country, and which might so become in the future. He was always willing, as a member of the Reform Party, to consider anything which might have a tendency to advance the interests of political life, which might have a tendency to develop some better method of conducting public business, and which might have a tendency, in short, to advance national interests, even if they should conflict with the opinions which he might himself have previously held. He might say there were two or three subjects which he had assisted in legislating upon, regarding which he had held opinions somewhat diverse, he dared say, to every one of his colleagues. He had not been particularly in favour of the Ballot Act, but he recognized the fact that it was passed for the country. He recognized the justice in the argument for the ballot—an argument which could scarcely be controverted; and he himself admitted his difficulty in controverting it. He also had held diverse opinions from some, if not all of his colleagues on the subject of insolvency; and the mere fact that afterwards he had aided in legislating upon that subject, in the view taken by the country generally, did not mean that he was not in any way doing anything that would justify any one in saying that he was prostituting his public and political opinions. With these general remarks upon the last few sentences of the hon. gentleman's speech, he would merely say further, he should always be glad to discuss with the hon. gentleman, or any other of the hon. members of this House, the question whether the Government was, upon general grounds, entitled or not entitled to the confidence of the country; and when any considerable number of those who had usually supported the Government in the House, expressed any opinion of that kind they should certainly give it due weight. He did not expect the hon. gentleman from North Hastings to give them his confidence, he scarcely expected the hon. gentleman to give them fair play, they happened to have quite a sufficient number of the members of the House who would give them fair play; they happened to be able to set the exceedingly factious disposition that had been manifested throughout this Session by the Opposition at defiance, and they hoped to be able to carry on the public business, as they had done, to the satisfaction of the country generally. Now, the hon. gentleman had given notice of, or at least moved, a motion which he might, with propriety, have moved a year ago. It was brought under the notice of the House a year ago, that this work had been done by a member of the House—the member referred to in the motion. It was also stated to the House a year ago by the Postmaster General in his place, that this practice had been put a stop to. Had the hon. gentleman confined his motion to a simple expression of opinion, as contained in the earlier part of his resolution, “that it is inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract whereby public money is paid to members of Parliament,” he would probably have found no divergence of opinion on that side of the House from that professed to exist on the other side of the House. Whether there would be divergence of opinion to any extent on the other side of the House, he did not know; and whether they would adhere to the votes they had given on previous occasions, with reference to Col. Gray’s case, he did not know; but it could never make any difference to those who had expressed opinions adverse to the employment of members of Parliament in the manner in question. They must, of course, adhere to the views which they had always felt were the proper views on that subject. This subject which formed the subject of discussion at present was one, he did not hesitate to say, he exceedingly regretted. It was one, he did not hesitate to say, which the Government took steps more than a year ago to prevent occurring again; for whatever might be the precise nature of the understanding upon which these orders were executed by a member of the House, there was no doubt whatever that it was desirable to prevent, as far as possible, the interests of the public from conflicting with the interests of an individual member of the House. The Act was based on that general principle, and the Government had endeavoured to give effect to that principle. Sometime—he was not able to fix the precise day, but he was able to fix it as occurring after the Christmas Holidays—in 1875, the Postmaster-General had brought under the notice of the Government the fact that printing was being done in the Lower Provinces by private offices, as before it had always been done by the previous Administration in the offices of political friends. For economical as well as for parliamentary reasons, it was at once decided by the Government that this practice must be put an end to. It seemed that the members of the Government then present, individually, were not aware of the fact that it had been the practice of the Department since the organization of the Dominion, to have the printing required for the Lower Provinces performed at offices in Halifax and St. John; and the new Postmaster-General in the Administration, as seemed very natural, gave orders to change the printing from the offices, which were those of their political opponents, to the offices of their political friends. This was quite proper. It was quite proper that any public work that was to be done in this way, or any purchases which were to be made in this way, should be given to the friends of the Government. That was the principle, though it had since been changed into a system entirely of contract. The contractors for the public printing since that period were executing all the work which they were able to do, and it was only when they were required, for special reasons, to go to other offices, that they had any printing done elsewhere. This was the position of affairs revealed by the explanations given to them by the Postmaster-General of the period he had alluded to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: When was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Sometime after the Christmas holidays.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Was it stated by the late Postmaster-General?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; it was stated by the present Postmaster-General. His hon. friend (Mr. Huntington) behind him came into office, it would be recollected, he thought, in October, 1875, or in November; he was not sure of the precise date, but, in the course of having his report drawn up, this real state of matters came to his knowledge. This letter was, therefore, written to the Post Office Inspectors in the Lower Provinces:

“15th JANUARY.

“SIR,—I am to inform you that, from the receipt of this letter, no further printing of any description, either from your own office or from the Post Offices of St. John and Fredericton, is to be done in New Brunswick. When such printing is required, a requisition for the same must be addressed to this Department. I am requested to state that you will be good enough to advise the postmasters of St. John and Fredericton accordingly. Please acknowledge the receipt of this letter.

“To the Post Office Inspector

“at St. John.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: What is the daté?

Mr. MACKENZIE: January 15th.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of 1876?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of 1876. On the 3rd of March, the following letter was addressed to the Inspector:—

“SIR,—With reference to my letter of the 15th of January last, No. 787, I am to inform you that it has been represented to the Postmaster-General that the parties who printed the forms for your division have a large quantity of paper on hand only suitable for such a purpose. You will, therefore, be so good as to make enquiry at once into this matter, and obtain from the parties in question a statement in writing of the stocks so claimed to be on hand, and send a reply to this Department; and I am to request that you will be good enough to inform those parties that this Department is prepared either to purchase the paper from them at its market value or to continue the printing of such forms as the paper on hand may be suitable for, to the extent required by you for use in your offices during the ensuing three months, provided that no new stock whatever is to be purchased, and that the quantity to be supplied to you does not exceed what may fairly be required for use during three months. Of course you will understand that this instruction applies to the whole of the printing required for every branch of this Department within your division.

“Your obedient servant,

“WILLIAM WHITE,

“Secretary.”

The following letter was received on April 8th from Mr. McMillan:—

“Referring to your communication of the 30th of March, on the subject of printing for this division, I beg to report that Mr. Chubb, the head of the firm of H. Chubb & Co., was absent from the city when your letter reached this office, and nothing could be done until his return. The stock on hand when your communication was received was small, but orders were forwarded for a new supply in January or December. I enclose a letter addressed to me by Messrs. Chubb & Co.; I received it this morning. I had a personal interview with Mr. Chubb, and he represented that his firm will suffer considerable loss if the printing is not continued with him until the stock ordered is exhausted, and that a three months' ordinary supply would come far short of doing this. The Messrs. Chubb are highly respectable.

“Yours, etc.,

Mr. Chubb's letter was as follows—there was no date to this letter, but it was written prior to April 8th:—

“ST. JOHN, N.B.,

“DEAR SIR,—As the parties referred to in your communication of March last, we beg to reply, and, at the same time, apologize for the delay caused by Mr. Chubb's absence from the city.

“When we undertook to supply the paper and do a portion of the printing in connection with the Freeman office, we found that, in order to meet the requirements of the service, it was necessary to keep on hand large stocks, of particular sizes and weights, of paper especially adapted for that work. This, as you are aware, is necessitated by the frequent sudden demands for forms of various kinds occasioned by the alterations in the working of the Department (of which there have been many during the past year, as the frequent changes in the forms indicate), the opening of new post offices, changing way offices to post offices, etc., etc.

"We need hardly inform you that it is not necessary, in our ordinary business, to keep such large stocks, and the action of the Postmaster-General, by which this paper is thrown on our hands, without previous notice or intimation of any kind, seems to us to be scarcely fair in a business point of view. It was to prevent delays, and therefore for the benefit of the service, that we find ourselves in this position, and we certainly ought to be treated with ordinary business courtesy at least.

"We do not expect, nor do we ask for, any favour from the Department, but simply justice and an honourable appreciation of the situation.

"With regard to the stock on hand, and that expected to arrive, had the Freeman office been officially notified at the time that we had rumours of the change in the arrangements, we could have countermanded our orders. As the matter now stands, we can hardly send a detailed statement until the arrival of the goods; but, if we are to take last year's consumption as a criterion, we may safely say that we will have nearly a year's supply. The orders were sent forward in December and early in January, 1875-76.

"If any more particular account of the stock is required immediately, we, of course, will make up one of the amount in our store just now, but we should think that our business reputation, extending over nearly half a century, ought to be sufficient guarantee of the correctness of our assertions.

"As reference has been made to the probability of using up the stock in three months, we can only say that we will be very glad to do so, if it is possible, and this course might probably be more satisfactory to all concerned.

"We remain,
"Your obedient servants

He would also read the following letters, which completed the correspondence:—

Those letters would show that the Government had taken decisive and final action on this matter at the periods mentioned in the respective letters that he had read, and that, therefore, during the last session of Parliament, the matter was, practically, at an end; all except the finishing up of the printing that they were allowed to do on account of the allegations made in the letters of those parties that they had this stock in hand which would be useless for all other purposes.

Mr. BOWELL: Would the hon. gentleman inform the House what I have to do with reference to Mr. Chubb?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman will always ask my advice as to what he has to do, I will be glad to give it; but, I am afraid, he will not act on my advice.

Mr. BOWELL: I am not aware that I attacked Mr. Chubb, whoever he may be.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was the party supplying paper to the Freeman office; that is clear from what I read.

Mr. BOWELL: And doing part of the work?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, and doing a portion of the work. There was nothing special to give information upon that he was aware of. The hon. gentleman had laid a great deal of stress upon the alleged fact that $2,709.55 were paid in the September quarter of 1876, showing, if that were correct, that the system which they had informed the House last session was at an end, and which they now alleged was at an end, had been continued beyond the period to which allusion was made. It was quite true that the voucher the hon. gentleman read had a heading "For quarter ending 30th September," but he read the whole voucher in his place, and some how or other substituted September for June. The voucher was as follows:—

"Received from the Postmaster-General of Canada, at the hands of _____, $2,709.55, being for printing blank forms for the New Brunswick Postal Division, June quarter, 1876, as per annexed account."

The hon. gentleman also referred to an account accompanying the said voucher, and he stated certain items to bear out his statement. If the hon. gentleman examined the account critically, he would find that about three-fourths of it was up to the 30th June; the balance was between the 1st January and the 20th or 25th July, and that was settled for and accounted for in the June quarter. Therefore, the total amount alleged in the motion was wrong, and the question of $2,709.55, in other words, the $10,263.94, embraced the entire printing for 1875-6, and the few days in the month of July which appeared to have been necessary for finishing the stock they had in hand.

Mr. BOWELL: Do I understand, then, that the amounts were included in the Postmaster-General's account ending 30th January, 1876, and were not paid until the last voucher, which has no date?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is my information.

Mr. BOWELL: It cannot possibly be.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had sent to the accountant specially to ask with reference to that particular point, and that gentleman replied:—

"No payment for printing has been made to the St. John Freeman office since payment was made for the printing account to be found in the Post Office Report for the year ending 30th June, 1876, page 242, the total amount being $10,263.92

"H. WICKSTEED."

This was the reply of the accountant of the Department to whom he applied for specific information on the subject. He quite admitted that if the hon. gentlemen had been able to show that they had continued this practice, which they told Parliament last session would not be continued, into the September quarter, which his speech and reading of the voucher would seem to imply, it would have been a serious matter for complaint. So far as the accounts were concerned, he thought he had made the matter sufficiently clear that the hon. gentleman was mistaken, although it was, perhaps, a natural mistake from the heading. The only thing he could not account for was the hon. gentleman reading for the month of September when the word June was apparently intended. The hon. gentleman had enlarged a great deal upon the speeches made when they were made by gentlemen now on the Ministerial side of the House, but who were at that time sitting on the Opposition side, in reference to the case of Colonel Gray. He had no word to retract of all he said concerning that transaction. He had no change to avow or admit in his own views in regard to that matter. The hon. gentleman said that he pursued precisely the language used by us in reference to the motion in Col. Gray's case; but that case was materially different from this. There had always been a very great jealousy of office holders sitting in Parliament, unless they were such office holders as were recognized by Act of Parliament, and whose position was defined in such Acts. Col. Gray had no such position. He was simply employed and paid by the month, by the then Administration, in order to avoid paying him by the year, which would have unseated him. That was admitted, and Col. Gray continued for considerably over two years to occupy that unenviable position. He did not suppose that any hon. gentleman in the then House had the slightest personal ill-feeling towards that gentleman; on the contrary, he believed that he was generally very much liked by his fellow-members in the House. But Col. Gray, as the hon. member stated, received a sum of about $12,000 as direct payment of salary, every cent of which was profit. The party who did the printing did work for the money received,—work that was required for the Government, and no doubt there was a profit upon that work. But the difference in the two cases was that the one was sitting here, with the knowledge of every one, as being a salaried officer, but the salary was so arranged that they should be unable under it to contravene the Act of Parliament. Now, the hon. gentleman said that he adopted the precise language they used on that occasion. On the 27th February, 1871, Mr. Blake moved:

“That in the opinion of this House it is inexpedient that any member of this House should, for the future, be engaged in the service of the Government of Canada in any paid employment such as that in respect of which the Hon. John Hamilton Gray, member for the city and county of St. John in 1868, entered into, the receipt of $300 a month of the public monies.”

Mr. Savary moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Bowell:—

“That all the words after ‘Canada’ to the end of the question be left out, and the words ‘to which any monthly salary is payable or attached, and that the Independence of Parliament Act be amended in that particular,’ be inserted in lieu thereof.”

The Independence of Parliament Act was therefore admitted by the hon. member at that time practically to be opposed to what was going on.

Mr. BOWELL: Hence the amendment would meet all that was necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. It was so arranged to meet it that the Act of Parliament should be altered in the sense of the words employed by the hon. gentleman, and it was altered soon afterwards. If the hon. gentleman had confined himself to an assertion of what was practically carried out for the last year, he would have found no difference of opinion and would have had the support of every member of the House in the assertion of that principle. But he proceeded to state that such payments as had been referred to were in contravention of the Act, passed in the 31st year of Her Majesty's reign, for the further securing of the independence of Parliament. The hon. gentleman, by this part of his motion, stated in effect that the seat of the person who so offended was vacant; because, if that Act was contravened, in his opinion, if it was not a matter of controversy of any kind, then it was practically declaring the seat vacant; and proceeding upon an unusual motion, at an unusual time, without giving the slightest opportunity for any investigation—he passed no opinion as to whether a motion of that kind would be strictly correct—but he said, if a motion of that kind, which affected the seat of an hon. member, was to be made upon going into Supply, that the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to take advantage of a motion which could not be amended, to assert that which every member of the House might not be prepared to assert. The hon. gentleman was endeavouring, in fact, by moving, upon going into Committee of Supply, a motion which the rules of the House forbade that it should be amended in any way, in order that he might, by a side wind, have the House declare the seat vacant, and thereby require the issue of a new writ. Whether that was the case or not, it was tolerably clear from the speech of the hon. gentleman, from the previous records of Parliament, that when anything of this kind was intended that it should at least be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in order that that Committee might make due inquiry into the allegations, arguments and statements advanced, examine into precedents, and make a report to the House, on which report the House, at a future time, could act. That had been the case in some instances of precisely similar character to this—where printers and publishers obtained money from the Government to a greater or less extent, and were merely supposed to be liable to have the validity of their seats called in question. The hon. gentleman who led the Opposition, no doubt remembered some of those cases. The hon. member for Hastings was endeavouring to embarrass the Government in going into Committee of Supply by moving a motion which could not be assented to for the reason he had stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Why?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because it is a motion which ought to be made for reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections as it directly calls in question the validity of the seat occupied by an hon. member of this House. He had, therefore, no hesitation at all in asking the supporters of the Government to aid them in resisting an improper motion; while, at the same time, he did not ask a single one of them to sanction any practice which they considered irreconcilable either with past professions or that just regard to Parliamentary independence which every member of the Liberal party had always endeavoured to carry into practice. He did not, as he had said, intend to indulge in any general discussion as to the capacity or incapacity either of opponents on the opposite side or friends associated with him in the Administration; but he wished to say that the motion which the hon. gentleman had made was one which ought not to be sanctioned by the House, moved in the terms it was and with the object sought to be accomplished viz., simply to embarrass the Government, and especially when the Government, last year, instead of waiting to have their attention called to this matter, called attention to it, and placed themselves in a position which every one could understand and fully approve.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that no one could regret more than himself the necessity for his speaking, or that the circumstances were such as to necessitate the subject being brought up before the House and the country. But it was impossible that this case could be quietly passed over, for, if the subject had not been brought up in the House, the country from one end to the other would have been scandalized. He had no hesitation in saying that there was no one subject that had so greatly excited the minds of the people as this same subject. He had no hesitation in saying that the country demanded at the hands of this House some expression of opinion on this question. His regret was greatly heightened when he remembered that the name of Mr. Speaker was brought into the matter, more especially as it was his privilege at that moment to give his highest testimony to the ability and impartiality with which he had filled the Chair. It would be remembered that, when the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government proposed Mr. Speaker for his position, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) took occasion to say that he believed the House and the country would have been better satisfied if an abler and more experienced member had been selected, and that the voice of the country seemed to point to his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) as being the man, beyond all others, who ought to fill that position. But, at the same time, he said, from his acquaintance with the very great abilities of Mr. Speaker, his unwearied industry, his great knowledge of every political subject, he believed he would soon make himself in every way equal to the first Speaker in the land, even the equal of the hon. member for Chateauguay. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had to give his evidence to the ability and impartiality of Mr. Speaker so far as his evidence was of value, and his pleasure in knowing that his prognostications had been fully borne out by Mr. Speaker's conduct in the Chair. Occasionally, it was true, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) might have had occasion to differ with the judgment of Mr. Speaker; they sometimes could not agree upon decisions or points of practice, but to say so would be only to make the same statement with regard to him as would be made with regard to any Speaker in any representative body in the world. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) believed that Mr. Speaker had been impartial in performing his duty, and he said so freely and emphatically. The speech of the hon. the First Minister did not flow with its usual fluency or force. He avoided making allusion to Mr. Speaker, except to tell the House and country that he had no objection, so far as he was concerned, nor as far as his friends were concerned, for Mr. Speaker to be made the scape-goat. His (Mr. Mackenzie's) objection to the motion was that it did not declare the Speaker's seat vacant. All he wanted was to be let alone; but he would sacrifice the Speaker, or even sacrifice his wife's relations. The Speaker had been a supporter of the Government. He took no unimportant part in the fight which resulted in the victory which placed them in power in 1873, but he was now to be sacrificed, and nothing but a motion to void his seat and drive him out of Parliament would be permitted by gentlemen opposite. The hon. the First Minister took occasion to tell his followers that he would not ask them, he would not insinuate to them, to act contrary to their stern duty as Anti-Corruptionists, even though they might vote Mr. Speaker out of Parliament, but they must not censure the Government. The Government were censurable, and on two grounds—First, that they allowed these contracts to be entered into at all; and, secondly, that the moment they found it out they did not attempt to repair the error, although they might have easily repaired it if they had chosen. The hon. gentleman might have come forward and admitted that the Government had committed an error, and that the Post Office Department had infringed upon the Statute. They were, however, obliged to admit this at the last hour. If the Government had not desired to leave Mr. Speaker to be sacrificed rather than admit that they had, by any possibility, committed an error, they would not have placed him in the painful position in which he now found himself. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would say that the Government were censurable for entering into this arrangement at all. He had hoped and expected that some excuse would have been made; the hon. gentleman who moved the motion expected that some excuse would be made. It was expected that the Government did not know anything about it; that they never heard of it; that it was merely some subordinate who made the arrangement behind their backs; that it was an inadvertance of some blundering subordinate—for it would be easy to kill and cut off the head of a subordinate. But even that excuse was not set up by the Premier. It was, in fact, admitted that the Post Office Department had made the arrangement; that they had wilfully committed this enormous breach of the independence of Parliament. It was admitted that the order came from Ottawa to make the change. It might be said that the Government were merely following the example of their predecessors. As he (Sir John A. Macdonald) understood it, the late Government had the local printing for the local post-offices in the Maritime Provinces done there. Whether it was right or wrong, it was a mere matter of expense and expediency, the Maritime Provinces thinking they ought not to be left out in the cold, and not get any of the employment from Government which they got before confederation. Whether this was right or wrong there was no allegation that the late Government employed members of Parliament to do the work. They employed their political friends, it was true, and there would be no objection to the present Government giving it to their political friends, so long as these political friends were not members of Parliament. But the contractor in this case was a member of Parliament. There was the infringement of the Statute. There was the breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. The Government knew they were committing a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and they could not answer that assertion. The excuse was that it was inconvenient to change the work until the stock was worked out. It did not seem, from the correspondence, that the fact that a breach of the Statute had been committed, was the reason for the withdrawal of the contract. The reason given was, that it was advisable to concentrate the work at Ottawa. There was not the slightest indication that the contract was withdrawn because the Government had discovered they had committed a breach of the law of the land. The law was wilfully broken. The Government knew that the work was done at the Freeman office, and that a member of Parliament was owner of that office, and that the contract was with a member of Parliament. Consequently they must be held to know that they were deliberately committing a breach of the Statute. There was no reason, there could be no reason, for the statement made by the Premier. The Premier had admitted the whole case. True, he had tried to draw away the attention of the House in his speech. But there was a great difference between Col. Gray's case and this. Whether the late Government were right or wrong in employing Col. Gray, they did not commit a breach of the Statute, and the Government, yielding to the sense of the country, introduced a law for the purpose of preventing for the future the employment of persons in the position of Col. Gray. So, in the same way, with respect to the employment of Mr. Walsh as Commissioner of the Intercolonial Railway. Whether Parliament was right or wrong, there was a special provision in the Act relative thereto, that one of the Commissioners should have a seat in Parliament. The law was passed and no breach of it was made. But in the present case it was admitted there could be no such justification. It was admitted there was an open, avowed, clear, undisputed and undefended breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. And this came from the hon. gentlemen opposite, who were so loud in their professions of purity. The whole country had rang with their attacks upon the late Government for their alleged refusal to purify Parliament, and to make Judges the tribunal to try breaches of the Election Law. Every effort was made by those hon. gentlemen, in season and out of season, on the stump and in the House, to force the late Government to protect the electors from bribery. There had to be a provision to protect the voter in depositing his ballot, and another against undue influence and for assuring the independence of Parliament. But those hon. gentlemen had apparently found out an easier mode of attaining their ends than by bribing the electors. While they were protecting the electors from corruption, they were exercising an undue influence upon those elected. They were giving contracts here and contracts there. Not only in this House, but even in the Senate, the seducing influence of these hon. gentlemen opposite extended. They professed to be the guardians of this House, and the whole country, from undue influence and bribery and corruption. Nevertheless, they had introduced a system by which the independence of members was attacked and by which the most seducing

inducements were offered. Under these circumstances, the fact that Mr. Speaker had not departed from his duty as an impartial presiding officer, was all the more meritorious. This process was well known by Russia. Whenever it went to war with Turkey, it never bribed the poor soldiers, but it bought up the Pashas. When a Russian army approached a Turkish one, they would buy up the Vizier or the Commander-in-Chief, and not the common soldier. And so in the United States. No party could bribe the ten millions of electors there, but they bought up the rings and the monopolies, the man behind the scenes, and manipulated him. This was the course adopted by the Government, when they used their corrupting influences with members of this House and the other House. In comparing this case with Colonel Gray's, the hon. gentleman said Colonel Gray received $12,000 from the Government in two years. But he did nothing of the kind. He received $7,000 in two years for the codification of the Statutes, and $5,000 as arbitrator between Upper and Lower Canada, for which position he was selected as the most fit person; and this $5,000 was not paid out of the Dominion Treasury at all, but the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada paid it. So that Colonel Gray merely received the allowance that was given him to carry out the commission entrusted to him, he being considered more competent, it was believed, than any other man at the disposal of the Government for the codification of the laws of the different Provinces. He was employed in that; he had been one of the codifiers of the law in New Brunswick. The British North America Act had a provision by which all the laws of the Provinces, except Quebec, should be codified and he was employed for the purpose of preparing the consolidation and codification of those laws; and he was to receive, and did receive, the allowance which had been mentioned. But the hon. gentleman said every cent of that was profit. Colonel Gray had given his time for the whole of two years, and it was a very small professional remuneration at the rate of $3,600 per year, for the codification of the Statutes, while, on the other hand, the Speaker had not given an hour, a day, or any portion of his time as a return for the profits he made out of these contracts. The work was underlet to Messrs. Chubb and two others, so that the whole amount of the profit, whatever it was, was put into the hands of the contractor without his expending any money or giving any time or exertion, except signing the receipts and receiving the money. The hon. the Premier had said it was a very wrong thing, an excessively wrong thing to employ members of Parliament and give them salaries and emoluments. Why the law so declared it, and there was end to it; but he (Sir John A. Macdonald) assented that the giving of contracts was infinitely more dangerous—it sapped the very basis of the independence of members of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said in the case of a salary, it was known that the person was drawing it, and that he was under a compliment to the Government; his conduct was watched; his votes were watched; but contracts were given which might be secret contracts.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it might not be known; it might be a contract which nobody had heard of, in which the profits might be enormous, and might be increased or decreased in the manner which Governments and contractors well knew.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said yes. Let them look at Mr. A. B. Foster. The present Government knew right well how to remunerate a friendly contractor, and, instead of making Mr. Foster forfeit his deposit, they paid it all back and many thousand dollars more. The practice of giving contracts directly or indirectly to members of Parliament, was infinitely more destructive of the independence of Parliament than any known salary, however large. The great difference was that the transaction with Col. Gray, whether expedient or inexpedient, was a breach of no Statute. The contracts in this case were a direct breach of the Statute. If the hon. gentleman looked back at the history of England, he would find that the earliest attempt to purify Parliament was made in regard to sweeping out office-holders and contractors long before there was any attempt to protect the electors from corrupting influence, because it was felt that, injurious as corrupting individual electors was to the public morals and independent voting of the people, the ill was infinitely greater in corrupting a member, a representative of the people, in buying him up in his own person. So it would be found that the earliest and most strenuous efforts that were made by the Reformers of the House of Commons were made to sweep office-holders and contractors out of Parliament, but the hon. gentlemen had taken the other course. Oh, yes; they were going to protect the elector, but they had deliberately commenced, and were now carrying out, a system of corrupting the two branches of the Legislature at their very root and foundation.

After Recess.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that when the hour of six came he was referring to the sincerity of the conduct of the Government in having allowed this contract to exist at all. Now, what excuse had his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) to offer on behalf of the Government. He offered none; in fact he said that in the first part of the resolution, that it was inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into the agreement specified in the resolution, he (Mr. Mackenzie) concurred; and therefore there could be no doubt that the whole case was given up by his hon. friend; but he objected to the resolution so far as the second part was concerned. The first part the hon. gentleman admitted—that it was inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract, whereby public money was paid to members of Parliament, under the circumstances detailed in the report. The second part of the resolution was, in his opinion, equally incontrovertible with the first part, because it simply alleged this fact: it stated that such payments were in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act, and were calculated to detract from the independence of members of this House. How could any hon. member honestly vote against these two propositions; no matter on what side of the House he sat, and no matter what his political predilections might be? Could any hon. member put his hand on his heart and say, first—It is inexpedient and improper to enter into any such agreement between the Government and a member of Parliament; and then say, that such agreement, if made, was not in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act. Those were the two propositions contained in this resolution, and the only proposition contained in it; and they would see by the vote that night what hon. members were inclined or resolved, no matter at what sacrifice, to support the independence and purity of Parliament, and intended to carry out into strict and stern execution the Independence of Parliament Act. As regarded the conduct of the Government from 1874, there could be no doubt with reference to the personal responsibility of the Postmaster-General, who was at the head of the Department, and who was responsible for the management of it to the country, to his colleagues and to the House. This hon. gentleman had deliberately ordered that these contracts should be changed, and given to political friends—in other words, that they should be given to the Freeman office. There was no means of escape, personal or political, on the part of the Postmaster-General. It appeared by the statement of the Premier, that it was not until 1875, that this statement of the facts was communicated by the Postmaster-General to his colleagues. Up to that time although by the constitutional principle all the members of the Cabinet were politically responsible for the conduct of the Postmaster-General, there was no personal or moral responsibility on the part of the other members of the Administration; but from that time they all, as a body, shared the responsibility of their colleagues. From that time they stood in the same position with their colleagues. They were then informed of a contract for printing and stationery between the Freeman office, which belonged to a member of the House, and the Government, and this contract was illegal and invalid, and in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act; but they did not close it. What was their duty the moment this fact became known to them; and what should the Premier have done the moment he knew that a contract had been entered into behind his back without his knowledge, and in contravention of the law, and in decided opposition to all those principles which he, as a member of Parliament and a leading representative of the country and the head of the Government, had always professed should be carried out? There was only one thing for the hon. gentleman to do, and that was at once to say that this contract must be closed, no matter what the cost might be, no matter what the loss might be, and no matter what the inconvenience might be, because it was in direct, obvious and clear contravention of the law of Parliament and the law of the land. What did they find? From Dec. 1875, until, in fact, this Session, the country did not authoritatively know it. The House did not authoritatively know it until this Session. As he understood the facts, it came before the Committee of Public Accounts last Session, but it was not submitted to the House; it was not reported to the House, and it did not come before Parliament until this Session. His hon. friend the mover of the motion, as he understood it,—as a member of the Committee on Public Accounts, saw the accounts, and brought the subject before Parliament in rather an irregular way by discussion last Session.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: My hon. friend exclaims "hear, hear," but it is so.

Mr. BLAKE: Why, sir, they were entered in the Public Accounts, and mentioned on the floor of the House as being in the Public Accounts, and they were printed in the Public Accounts.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: But no names were given.

Mr. BLAKE: It was mentioned in the Postmaster-General's Report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the names were not before the House; the papers were not before the House; the receipts were not before the House, and the parties to this contract were not before the House until this Session. The course that ought to have been taken by the Government would have been at once to have closed the contract—at once to have stopped it, to have washed their hands of it, and to have freed their skirts from it. Had they done so, how infinitely better it would have been, not only for themselves but for the other parties to the contract. How infinitely better it would have been for the Speaker if they had at once conveyed to the Speaker the fact, that the contract must be closed, and that it was closed; and as to the idea that any presumed loss that would take place interfering for a moment with their action, it was too absurd to think of for an instant. Why, what was this contract for? It was for a supply of stationery, and for some printing. As to the paper and the stationery, they could be sold as they could be bought, and easily disposed of; and, as far as the printing was concerned, that might have been done by other parties; but whether the loss was great or little, the duty of the Government was the same. Then, had the Government treated Mr. Speaker as they ought to have done, and given it as their opinion that this contract must be closed as being in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act, Mr. Speaker's course would have been clearly indicated. It would have been the same as had been taken by Mr. Cowan and other parties quoted by his hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) in opening the case. Mr. Speaker could have at once resigned his seat, and he had no doubt that Mr. Speaker's constituency would have restored him to his position as a member and re-elected him; and he had no doubt that the House would have at once replaced Mr. Speaker in the Chair he now so worthily filled. But the Government did not have the magnanimity to do that. Rather than admit that they had committed any error, that any mistake had been made, that any breach of the law had occurred, that their colleague, the Postmaster General had placed them in this unfortunate position, and that they were politically liable to the charge of a breach of a solemn Act—rather than admit that, they allowed all this to go on, and to run from 1875 to 1876, and forced this discussion and all its possible consequences. His hon. friend, the Premier, said that there was no remark made by the Opposition, and no steps taken by the Opposition. Why, who was bound to defend the independence of Parliament; who was bound to assert and carry out the privileges of Parliament? Not the minority, surely. They could not do so. Responsibility and power went hand in hand, and the power rested with the hon. gentlemen opposite; the power rested solely with these hon. gentlemen, who were before their friends and supporters, and who alone could defend the privileges of Parliament and denounce any contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act. Had this been done before, no doubt it would have been called, as it had been called in the speech of the Premier, factiousness on their part. They were said to be guilty of factiousness for moving in this matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had complained of their factiousness. The Government, with their large majority, their strong majority, and their overwhelming majority, might have, if they had chosen, in 1875 and 1876, and now in 1877, risen in their places and stated the case as in contravention of the independence of Parliament Act, and said: "We find it our duty to call on our friends and the whole of the House to vindicate the privileges of Parliament and the independence of Parliament." It rested upon them to do so. They alone could do it. There was no obligation thrown on the Opposition as an Opposition. Every hon. member had the power to move that the purity and privileges of Parliament should be sustained, but who had called, who had roused the attention of the country to the necessity for electoral reform? Who had rung the changes over the whole of the vast Dominion as to the necessity for the protection of the purity of Parliament in and out of Parliament, among the electorate and among the elected; who had asserted that the late Government and the late majority were altogether wanting in their duty because they did not do so; and who stated, when they came into power, that a change would now take place; that a golden age was about to commence; that there would be no longer fraud or corruption, either in Parliament or out of Parliament; that no longer would the electors be bribed; that no longer would a contractor sit in Parliament; and that no longer would a member of Parliament receive a salary or emolument of any kind. These were the hon. gentlemen who said these things, and who declared that they would purify the infested atmosphere, and introduce purity, and honour, and candour, and independence, and freedom, where there had been corruption and bribery, and members improperly sitting in Parliament. These hon. gentlemen had pledged themselves to this; and his hon. friend, the member for North Hastings, had quoted the very prominent statement in the Premier's speech, in which he had condemned any man who would say out of power what he would not carry into effect and vote for in Parliament. Why did not his hon. friend the Premier carry out this principle when, in December, 1875, he knew that the law of Parliament had been broken. Why had not his hon. friend done this then, and why had he not done so during this Session? During this Session the Opposition had sat there waiting patiently to see what his hon. friend the Premier would do, and to see whether they would be true to their principles, and true to what they had said they would do when they came into power, and in accordance with what they did do, the Minister of Justice amongst the rest, with respect to Col. Gray, when they were out of power; but his hon. friend the Premier said: "Why, the Opposition did not move in the matter at all." Still, if the Opposition had been untrue to their duty, had they, in Opposition, carried to the left of the Speaker, those corrupt principles they were alleged to have carried into effect when on the other side of the House—if they had been false to their duty, was that any excuse for the hon. gentlemen opposite? His hon. friend might move in it; he might move in it; any hon. member might move in it; but these hon. gentlemen stated that they were a corrupt bribery party, and these hon. gentlemen had no right to wait for them to do it; they who had been charged on every stump and from every hustings through the country as being guilty of corruption. These hon. gentleman had no right to throw this duty on the Opposition; they (the Ministerialists) who were the purifiers and the rectifiers—the rectifiers of wrong and the purifiers of evil. The Opposition had sat still during the whole of this Session, up to the present, and during the whole of last Session, and yet the Premier complained of them as factious, because at the last hour his hon. friend moved that it was inexpedient and improper to make such contract with a member of Parliament, and that such a contract was in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act. The case now stood before the House, and it was for members of the House to say whether they would vote against the resolution or not. It was for the House to say whether they would vote against, and put down and reject the resolution containing these two simple propositions. The resolution contained only two propositions. They were explicit in themselves, and it was for the House to say whether they would reject that resolution. The first proposition was that it was inexpedient to enter into such a contract, and the second proposition was that the entry into such an agreement was in contravention of the law of Parliament. The whole country, as he had already said, was aroused to the matter. Hon. gentlemen opposite laughed at this now, but then they knew well what that meant. These hon. gentlemen knew, in their heart of hearts, very well that the country felt sensitively and sensibly and strongly in the matter. They had only to look at the press, and the Liberal press of the Dominion, to find this out. He believed that if there was ever any press in the world that was loyal and true to the hon gentlemen opposite it was the Liberal press of the Dominion. He believed that there was no set of newspaper writers or newspaper periodicals in the world that had ever stood more loyally and truly, fas aut nefas, right or wrong, by the hon. gentlemen opposite, than those of the Liberal press of the Dominion. He believed that many of them had gone contrary to their convictions, or rather had strained their convictions, in the exercise of all their ability and all their zeal, and all their ingenuity, to defend and support the acts of the Government; and yet, if they looked over the files in the Reading Room, it would be found that no newspaper which generally supported the Government, but came out and denounced this matter; and called for an investigation into it, and the attention of Parliament to it; and said it was a question which had risen to larger proportions than a mere party question, and they called upon the members of Parliament to carry out and defend the purity of Parliament and the independence of the House. He knew not what might be the course the majority of the House might pursue. Some hon. gentlemen, from a mistaken but a natural desire to support those in whom they were expected to confide, though it might be perhaps against their secret convictions and their wishes and feelings on this point, might sacrifice themselves for hon gentlemen opposite. They felt themselves bound to lead a forlorn hope, and to cast themselves into the breach; but he was afraid that if these hon. gentlemen did so, they would find that political virtue was its own reward, and that political sacrifice on the altar of party would not be appreciated by country. These hon. gentlemen might make of themselves martyrs, as they would make themselves martyrs for the sake of their party, and they would have the pleasing consciousness afterwards, that, by so doing, they might have sustained their party for a time, but that it was the ruin of themselves, the ruin of their political standing, and the ruin of their political future. This was a matter for them to consider, and for them to judge of.

He had no doubt that these hon. gentlemen had taken stock, and had considered the subject fully. Some of them would make the leap, and they must take the consequences from an indignant country.

Mr. BLAKE said that, in discussing this subject, he rejoiced that the opening remarks of the right hon. member for Kingston, however they might be consistent with several observations which the hon. gentleman had subsequently introduced into his address, had relieved the question of one of those elements which the speech of the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) might have imported into it. It was, indeed, stated at a subsequent portion of the address of the right hon. member for Kingston, by inference, and by comparison rather than directly, but by a sufficiently obvious inference, sufficiently clearly presented, that the transaction which formed the subject of this discussion had purchased a commander-in-chief, and that this Government was engaged in the corruption of prominent members of Parliament. Taken in connection with the subject matter of debate, he said that these observations were entirely inconsistent with the prefatory remarks of the right hon. member; but he was not willing to believe that the hon. gentleman was not as sincere as he was warm in these opening remarks. He was not willing to believe that the hon. gentleman did otherwise than express his genuine sentiments when he spoke of the way in which Mr. Speaker had discharged, from the time at which he had taken the chair, the high duties of that office, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman had stated, and stated plainly, and he assumed sincerely, and certainly in accordance with the views of members generally, that Mr. Speaker's duties had been discharged with the utmost impartiality and fairness; and hence they were enabled to keep this discussion free from anything of a personal nature, free from any consideration, such as was implied in some of his remarks, that there had been an attempted purchase of the Speaker of this House. Observations had been made by the hon. member for North Hastings with reference to the several opinions which he (Mr. Blake) had spoken, and several resolutions which he had moved at various times during his public life. Of these he saw nothing to regret, nothing to relieve the opinions which he entertained, and to which the hon. gentleman had been good enough to give redoubled currency. He had always believed that it was important to dissociate from the position of a member of this House any pecuniary relations whatever with the Government of the day. His efforts had been from time to time towards such an amendment of the law as would render such a thing impossible. What were the provisions of the law generally on this subject? There were provisions forbidding contracts with members of Parliament; there were provisions forbidding members of Parliament being appointed to office, there were provisions which vacated the seat of a member who accepted an office or entered into a contract. No crime was committed by the member in accepting, or the Government in offering, an office or contract. Members of Parliament were appointed to the bench or appointed to different offices, but the law said that the member who was appointed to an office or accepted a contract should vacate his seat. The only question in any particular case was, whether the circumstances brought it within the law. If the circumstances did not bring it within the law, then the case was not provided for, and the question was, whether it should be provided for by Parliament. The question was whether the law was wide enough and embraced all cases. The hon. member for North Hastings referred to the fact that he (Mr. Blake) had referred to the narrowness of the term of the Independence of Parliament Act. It was true that he pointed out that the law, as it formerly stood in the old Province, was more extensive than the law proposed to be enacted for the new Dominion; and he suggested that the law ought to be made conformable to the old law, and that temporary offices and employments should be embraced within it as well as the more permanent employments to which the old law applied. He failed in those efforts, and, if he rightly remembered, he was not sustained on that occasion by the hon. member for North Hastings. The hon. member for Kingston had told them that it was the prime, the sole duty, of a Government to sustain the independence and purity of Parliament—that it was their business to vindicate that independence, that it was their business to see that proper laws were enacted for that object, and to see that those laws were observed. Judge how long the hon. member for Kingston discharged that duty when leading the Government, when he deliberately determined and forced upon the House, against the wishes of the opposition, an alteration in the law in regard to the independence of Parliament, in order to enable the Government, designedly and openly, as the hon. gentlemen confessed, to avail themselves of the temporary services of members of Parliament. What was the answer to his (Mr. Blake's) question? The hon. gentleman said that occasions might occur,—and on that occasion he did him (Mr. Blake) the honour to suggest his name—in which the services of professional men might be required, and when it might be disastrous to the interests of the Dominion if eminent members of the bar, who were also members of Parliament, should not enter the service of the Crown as counsel and so forth. And acting upon that view, and expressly in order that he might be enabled to create those relations between members of Parliament and the Government, the hon. gentleman rejected the proposition to extend the law—not to extend it beyond what it was, but to retain it in its pristine character, and proposed to modify the law which was sarcastically called a law further to retain the independence of Parliament. Judge whether the hon. gentleman discharged, on that occasion, the functions which, he said, were not merely the chief, not merely the plain, but the exclusive functions of the Government. It was not so very many years after—only from 1868 to 1871—when the shocking example, which the hon. gentleman had produced to this very useful practice, which he insisted upon having the power to enter into, produced such a feeling in the House and country that he was forced, by the motion that was made, to amend the law, and to bring it to the condition in which it existed before Confederation, to deprive himself of the power of that law which he thought was essential to the interests of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman insisted that the practice of employing barristers who were members of Parliament, which was held to be useful, essential and necessary, be abandoned as indefensible, improper, and fit to be prohibited by the law which was introduced and carried by the Government under the pressure of the motion referred to. Let them contrast the virtuous principles which the abstractions and studies in Opposition had led the hon. gentleman into—by what painful processes he would not, at this moment, endeavour to account—with his practice. Did the House remember the proposition for the creation of the company to build the Pacific Railway? It was not the scandal connected with the taking of the money of Sir Hugh Allen to which he now referred, but to the conduct of the hon. gentleman, as leader of the Government, when he was proposing to Parliament a scheme for the construction of this great work, and for the creation of a company to prosecute it. They argued, as the hon. gentleman did to-night, and pointed out how dangerous it would be to allow members of Parliament to become directors in this great enterprise. Consider the project. The company was to have $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land, and the money and the acres were to be dealt out, in a great measure, at the discretion of the Government. Upon the good-will of the Government might depend the question whether the contracts might be profitable or ruinous; upon the good-will of the Government might hang the fortunes of the contractors; and, under those circumstances, it was expedient to secure the independence of Parliament that no member should be permitted to be a shareholder in that great company. They moved that, and the hon. gentleman resisted it successfully, and defeated the proposition; and he used precisely the same argument which he used in reference to the members of the Bar in 1868, and which he was obliged to repudiate in 1871. The hon. gentleman said: "There are two hundred prominent men of Canada in Parliament: are you going to deprive the country of the wealth, the energy, the prominent position, the advantages of having those men in the company? It cannot be; the company cannot get on without it." If the hon. gentleman had said the Government could not get on without it, he (Mr. Blake) would have understood the argument. No doubt the famous company would fare better at the hands of the hon. gentleman the more members of Parliament there were in it. But, although the hon. gentleman learned some wisdom upon that occasion, although he successfully defeated the motion, he found there was a feeling in the country which he could not afford altogether to ignore, even in that very matter, and his ultimate determination was one of those happy compromises which he was so fond of making, in which he threw away the shadow and kept the substance. Ultimately it was decided that none of the men who should appear before the public in connection with the company should be members of Parliament. So much was found in the records of the Royal Commission on the Pacific Railway matter. Why was that? Because the hon. gentleman thought though they could defeat the then Opposition in the House, it would be dangerous to affront the people by making an open contract with members of Parliament, and so he arranged to make the contracts with A, B, C, and D, not members of Parliament, and allow them to be sublet to E, F, G, and H, who were members of Parliament. They knew, by the records of the Pacific Railway scandal, that two hon. members were to be co-sharers in those contracts. There was an opportunity for secret and unknown influence in this matter of contracts, which did not exist in reference to the salaries, and he was sure the hon. gentleman would thank him for enforcing his arguments by those opposite illustrations. It was a comfortable thing to know that although for twenty years those views were unremittingly forced upon the attention of the hon. gentleman, and, admittedly, had no more effect upon him than the water upon the rocks, that conviction was all this time slowly stealing into his mind—that the impression was really being made, though he appeared as obdurate as ever, and that now he had been fully converted, and was now convinced of the propriety of the views he resisted while he had the power of enforcing them. The hon. gentleman had taken up the Gray case as a precedent for this one. Now, observe the course taken in that case. In the first place, no such unfair advantage of the rule of Parliament with reference to this particular motion to which this amendment was moved was attempted as had been done to-night. He did not, on that occasion, move a motion in amendment to go into Supply. He moved an independent motion so that the Government, or any hon. member, might have an opportunity of formulating, in resolution as well as in speech, his views, and the question might be decided upon its merits. If the hon. member for Hastings wished to follow the precedent of the Gray case, there had been many open days on which he might have moved this motion long ago; but having, as he said, chalked out in his own mind his course, he was obliged unwittingly to wait until the House should go into Committee of Supply so that he might put the motion just as he thought would suit himself, and just as he thought would be most embarrassing and produce the worst impression. This was the contrast to the course pursued in the Gray case, in which he (Mr. Blake) made an independent motion to which there were no less than two amendments. In the next place there was no doubt a difference between the Gray case, as he viewed it, and this case, as hon. members opposite viewed it. He did not pretend or contend that in the Gray case there was a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act by that hon. member sitting in the House. He knew that the law had been designedly so framed as to permit of a particular transaction. That he would admit. He used this particular instance as an apt illustration of the evil he had formerly contended would flow from a law so loose, and he proposed that it was inexpedient that any member in the future should be engaged in the same way as Col. Gray had been. Had the House adopted that resolution, the necessary consequences would have been that he would have proceeded to make provision to carry out by a Bill what had just been declared by resolution. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), who was so anxious to bring himself within the walls of precedent, said he was but following the precedent in the Gray case. He (Mr. Blake) had pointed out one distinction, and he would now point out another. The hon. member for North Hastings said he was wrong in addressing the particular illustration and he proposed to strike out all the words having reference to the individual case, and to substitute therefor general words descriptive of that class of cases as being, in his opinion, the most appropriate mode of bringing this matter under the notice of Parliament. Since that time the hon. gentleman had been converted, and he now thought it would have been better for him had he not moved that amendment, but supported the original motion. Whether that change had arisen from the change of the relations of the hon. member, in going to the opposite side of the House, he (Mr. Blake) would leave candid minds to judge.

Mr. BOWELL: While I have advanced, you have retrograded.

Mr. BLAKE said he was glad to hear that the hon. member had advanced. It was barely possible that they would be marching together some day, but he must say that, when he contemplated such an event, he could not but contemplate that he would be marching the wrong way. The hon. member for Hastings, however, did not succeed in comparing this case with that of Col. Gray, either by his course of action in voting against the original motion in Col. Gray's case, or by his argument now; nor did the hon. member for Kingston succeed any better. He (Mr. Blake) had pointed out that the Gray case was admittedly within the law, and that it was proposed that the law should be changed in that respect. This present case was a case in which the hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for North Hastings argued that there had been such an arrangement as was within the meaning of the Independence of Parliament Act; not without it, but within it. If there has been such an arrangement, a contract, a bargain, a transaction, call it what they would, within the meaning of the Independence of Parliament Act, of course, if the House were to affirm that principle, as his hon. friend beside him had pointed out, the inevitable result must instantly follow. This House could not affirm that an hon. member had made a contract which displaced him from sitting here by the Independence of Parliament Act, without immediately declaring the seat vacant and ordering the issue of a new writ. That was perfectly clear, and the hon. gentleman who said that the hon. the First Minister proposed to make a scapegoat of the person at whom the motion was aimed, had spoken in a manner most unwarrantable. His hon. friend beside him had pointed out that such being the object of the motion, and such being the declarations and arguments by which it was supported, and the proposition being that, at once, without a full enquiry into the facts, without an investigation by a Committee, such a conclusion should be arrived at it would render inevitable a motion for a new writ. No man who accepted the declaration that the case was in contravention of the Act could abstain from at once agreeing that the writ should be issued, because, if the Act had been broken, the seat was vacant, and consequently the writ must be issued.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo): Issue it.

Mr. BLAKE: My hon. friend from Monck says "issue it."

Mr. McCALLUM: I did not say so, but I say now that you had better issue the writ a thousand times than break the laws of the country.

Mr. THOMPSON: I said it.

Mr. BLAKE said there they found the real spirit that animated those

hon. gentlemen. They wanted the writ to be issued, they wanted this House by a side wind, to declare that it ought to be issued. They, without enquiry—although his hon. friend had referred to the fact that there had been investigations by Committees of the House which had caused exhaustive reports to be placed on the Journals which threw considerable light upon the subject—said: “No reference to committee, no consideration of precedents, no investigation of the facts;” and then, it having been determined that there was a breach of the Act, the writ would have to issue. If there was a contravention of the Act, then the Speaker could not occupy the Chair. His hon. friend was correct in saying that the almost invariable rule was for reference to a Committee when there was any dispute.

Mr. BOWELL: No.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman admitted it was proper.

Mr. BOWELL: I said it had been adopted, but was not the usual practice.

Mr. BLAKE: My recollection is that this is the practice where there is dispute.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Where there is doubt.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman said there was no doubt in this matter, and that the Speaker filled a seat which he had no right to fill. The hon. gentleman did not think they would be acting in a manner unworthy the relation of the House to the Speaker in not making an appropriate formal reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the matter. Last Session the question was raised with reference to the seat of an hon. member. The member who raised that question entertained a very strong conviction that, under the law, the member whose seat he had attacked was disqualified; but he did not adopt such a summary mode of judgment as was now proposed. He proposed the course of a reference. He (Mr. Blake) was sure none of them could recollect without pleasure the tone in which the discussion was conducted, and the mode in which the deliberations were carried on, and the ultimate result. He would now deliberately abstain from expressing an opinion as to whether this contract was within or without the Independence of Parliament Act. And for that course he had authorities, although no authority was required. That course had been recognized as the proper course: that hon. members should not commit themselves to opinions until there had been a full enquiry and investigation, and that the discussion upon the question should take as narrow a range as possible. That observation did not require to be supported by authority. All of them would feel the importance of preserving their judgment unprejudiced until they had obtained all the materials, had looked carefully into the law, and had got, through the medium of a Committee, that information which was essential to a correct judgment. He, therefore, would not anticipate judgment in this matter. He thought he had sufficiently demonstrated the impossibility, with fairness to Mr. Speaker and with fairness to the House, of proceeding to a motion, which, without that investigation, practically declared that the seat was vacant. And that alone was sufficient, if there was no other reason why they should decline to adopt the amendment which the hon. member for Hastings had designedly put at a period and in a form which admitted of no further amendment, and which rendered it incompetent for any other member to make an appropriate motion under the circumstances; and, as the appropriate motion could not be made, it left them no alternative except to reject the improper, premature, and hasty motion, anticipation of judgment, which, under pretence of shielding Mr. Speaker and condemning the Government, would practically condemn Mr. Speaker and leave the Government free.

Mr. BOWELL: If I thought that, I would withdraw it.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member for Kingston had pointed out that there was no question raised in the correspondence read as to the breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. Let them understand the history of this transaction. At a period not long after the original formation of this Government, when he did not exactly know, the first work was given to the Freeman office. His hon. friend the Postmaster-General of that day left office in May, 1875. He was succeeded by Mr. Fournier as Postmaster-General. Some time in October, 1875, his hon. friend the present Postmaster-General took office. In the Christmas holidays of 1875, a report was prepared by permanent heads of the Department, and the slips which contained this item of account were laid before him. Then, for the first time, it came to the knowledge of his hon. friend the Postmaster-General. That was either during or after the Christmas holidays. It was immediately after that, within a day or two, that the matter was brought to the attention of the Government. The Government decided that it should be discontinued, and they had produced incontrovertible proof of that decision by the official letter which, on the 15th January, was written to the Inspector directing and informing him that, from the receipt of that letter, no further printing of any description was to be done in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, but that it was all to be brought up to Ottawa. The hon. member for Kingston complained that, in directing a letter by the Secretary of his Department to the Inspector of the district, the Postmaster-General had not said anything about the breach of the Independence of Parliament Act; and that, in an official letter announcing a decision of the Government, the reasons for the decision had not been given. Such an idea was preposterous. It was sufficient for the Government to learn those circumstances, and then order that these relations should not continue; and that order was indicated by the imperative terms in which it was put. The hon. gentleman said this was treated merely as a matter of economy. He (Mr. Blake) would say this had not been done as a matter of economy only, although he had no doubt that the service could be performed cheaper at Ottawa than at New Brunswick; but it was also because the Government felt that it was inexpedient, to use the hon. gentleman's own phrase, that contracts of the Government should be performed by any member of Parliament. The Government felt so, and they acted upon that view. There was no doubt of it. Then the hon. gentleman said that the law was wilfully broken by the continuance of the contract. He (Mr. Blake) had already pointed out that they were not to determine to-night whether the transaction was within the letter of this Act or not. That was to be determined by the Standing Committee upon Privileges and Elections, but he had said, and he would repeat, that, if the contract or arrangement—he would not call it a contract—was within the Independence of Parliament Act, the simple and sole consequence was, that the seat had become vacant and that the member had ceased to be a member of Parliament. The law did not place in the hands of the Government the possibly dangerous and certainly improper power of continuing members of Parliament in their places while making contracts with them. The Executive had no such power. The law was inexorable, the penalty imposed for its disregard being two thousand dollars each day. But, dealing with this case on the general principle upon which he believed all such cases ought to be dealt with—that it were better there should be no pecuniary relations whatever between a member of Parliament and the Government of the day—the Government thought that this matter ought to be closed, and instructions were given to close it. If there was a violation of the Act there was no necessity to stop the contract, there was no obligation to do so.

AN HON. MEMBER: What did you stop it for?

MR. BLAKE: Because the opinion of the Government was that it was inexpedient there should be any relations of this kind between a member of Parliament and the Government, while continuing a member. But the Government did not determine that it was improper to offer an office or contract to a member of Parliament when it was understood that the usual consequences would follow. The hon.

member for Kingston said there was a breach of law. He called upon him to point out what breach of the law there had been on the part of the Government. He would ask whether there was anything in the Act which forbade their giving an office or contract to a member. There was not a word in the Act which could be interpreted into this meaning; but the effect of the law was that the member ceased to be a member.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The law also says if he does such and still continues to be a member of Parliament, he is liable to a penalty of $2,000 each day he so continues in the two positions. Then it follows that this is an offence to which a penalty is attached. The hon. Minister of Justice has himself said in this House that wherever there is an offence there must be two parties. Now there are two parties to this offence—the receiver as well as the thief.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman said there must be two parties to an offence. Now, if the hon. gentleman murdered him he did not suppose that he (Mr. Blake) would be an offender. There was nothing in the law which prevented the Government from giving a contract to a member, the latter ceasing ipso facto to be a member. The Government had carried out the spirit of the law in the present case. The hon. the Premier had declined to give a contract to Mr. Foster while he was a Senator—he was obliged to resign before he received it, although the law permitted such a course. His hon. friend had decided to act on the part of an imperfect law, and declared that no Senators shall receive contracts and remain members of Parliament. The hon. gentleman had stated as a reason why the matter was not brought forward before, that it was not known who was the proprietor of the Freeman office. It was just as well known to them all who was the proprietor of the Freeman office as what were the initials of his (Mr. Blake's) name. It was more worthy of a pettifogging lawyer in a Division Court than of a leader of the Opposition to say that the House was not aware of it. Last Session the hon. member for Hastings had alluded to it himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman had just said that the facts are not known even now.

Mr. BLAKE said the fact that the Freeman office had had some printing from the Government was known to every hon. member last Session. The Government stated last Session that the practice had been ordered to be discontinued, and the hon. gentleman had said that the Government was morally responsible from the period at which they knew it; politically responsible, for he knew not how long and for what offence he could not understand. The circumstances under which the temporary continuation of the arrangement had taken place, were detailed in the letters submitted by the hon. the Premier, and they spoke for themselves. It appeared that Mr. Chubb, who had the arrangement for supplying stationery and doing a portion of the printing, had complained that a very large quantity of stock of a peculiar description, not ordinarily saleable, had been ordered in view of the arrangements continuing during the summer, and that it would be unfair to him if that stock were not worked up. After having definitely ordered the arrangement to cease, an extension was given for a certain period for the purpose of working off the stock. The hon. the Postmaster-General thought he could not resist that statement made by Mr. Chubb, and that it was proper on the whole, finding this difficulty for which he was not responsible, that the arrangement should be closed as rapidly as possible without doing an injustice to Mr. Chubb. His hon. friend said the Government were engaged in corrupting the Legislature. This was a serious charge against the Legislature as well as the Government. He would leave the House to determine whether this general observation was warranted by the proof brought forward—if the hon. gentleman had, by a single incident, pointed out any case of corruption. His hon. friend said the Speaker should have resigned. If the transaction was within the law he had no power to resign. He could not see how the late member for Gloucester could resign at all. Disguise it as they would—disguise their argument as they would—there was no doubt that the motion declared that the transaction was a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and that the breach of the Act lay not with the Government giving a contract to the hon. member for Gloucester, but in his retaining his seat afterwards. He had pointed out the proper mode in which such a motion should be disposed of, and his observations on that point were specially applicable to the present case. It was a case in which the alleged contract by which the seat was vacated occurred two or three years ago. It was a case in which, during the whole of last Session, Parliament was aware of the fact that there were pecuniary transactions between the proprietor of the Freeman office and the Government. It was a case in which, from the earliest period of this Session, Parliament had been aware of the continuance of those transactions during a certain period, from the Public Accounts for this year. It was a case in which two months of the Session had been allowed to pass before Parliament was invited to act. When there was such deliberation in the inception, should there not be a like deliberation in the action? Although it took the Opposition two years to discover that this was a direct breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, they would not allow one day for that judgment, that investigation, that enquiry which, according to precedent, should take place. Did they want to avoid investigation? Did they desire that there should be no report of a Select Committee on the subject, as had been the practice in cases on these records? Did they want that the whole facts should not be brought out? No other reason could be given for bringing forward that motion when there could be no amendment, and when no such enquiry could take place. The true course would have been, if hon. members assumed to say that there had been a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, to make a motion to refer the question to a Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BOWELL—Why did you not do it?

Mr. BLAKE asked how often it depended on the Government to bring forward such motions. A Government was never known to bring forward such a motion, but the hon. gentleman seemed to think that this Government should be an exception. When the hon. gentleman had proposed the motion in the manner he did; when he was told that it could be done in the proper mode, if he asked; when the Government declared that the practice had been discontinued, when discovered, and when it was shown that it had been discontinued; when there was to be no reference to a Committee, and when, after two years' delay, they were to be asked to put the judgment into execution without a moment's delay, he believed the majority of the House would condemn the course pursued, and vote down the resolution.

Mr. TUPPER said he could imagine the derision with which the great mass of the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite would have received the statement a few years ago that the honest indignation which the hon. the Minister of Justice exhibited when on the Opposition side of the House would be succeeded by special pleading for one of the grossest breaches of the privileges of Parliament which had ever been committed. The hon. gentlemen whose feeble cheers had been heard attempting to sustain the hon. gentleman, would have treated with indignation the statement that he could ever be made a Samson shorn of his locks, and the object of amusement to the House and the country. It was unnecessary to recapitulate the facts of the case which had been so logically, ably and clearly stated by the mover of the resolution. That hon. member had established the fact that this Government had taken some $19,000 of the public money in violation of the law on the Statute-book with reference to services performed by members of Parliament. The hon. gentleman had placed the facts so lucidly and so clearly before the House that it was not necessary for him to go over them in detail. They required only to be stated to present a case, which ought to shock the members of the House as it had shocked, and as it would shock every intelligent and independent elector in this country. He felt that the course which the Government had taken in attempting to defend this matter, and in calling upon their supporters to sustain them in defending this transaction, which they were also called upon to condemn, was one that would rightly and properly cost these gentlemen the confidence of every free and intelligent and independent elector who had looked to them to sustain in Parliament the loud professions they had made with reference to this question outside of it. The Minister of Justice said that his right hon. friend had changed his opinions on this question. The hon. gentleman admitted frankly that the course which the right hon. gentleman had pursued, and which he had pursued openly, with the sanction and approval of Parliament, was pursued under the law; that his right hon. friend had vindicated the law, and that no law was violated. It was only in the spirit of the Act, that it could be supposed in the slightest degree to infringe on the Independence of Parliament. His right hon. friend had not, therefore, changed his position. What the right hon. gentleman did was done under the law; and what the right hon. gentleman now condemned, he condemned because the law of the country refused its sanction to the act. But supposing it were true, what was the position of the Minister of Justice, who was yesterday the great tribune of the people, and who yesterday was the man who held himself up for the admiration of the people of this country as an able, an independent, and an incorruptible exponent of the principles of purity and of the independence of Parliament, now used all the talents he possessed for the purpose of vindicating an act of open and flagrant violation of the law, not only of Parliament, but also of the Statute-book, by the Government of the country itself. What then, assuming that the hon. gentleman's statement with reference to his right hon. friend were true, was the position these hon. gentlemen opposite occupied? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) said that his right hon. friend was a convert to his opinions, but in saying this the hon. gentleman had admitted that if his right hon. friend was a convert, he (Mr. Blake) himself was a backslider, one who had gone back on all the principles he had professed to hold of old with relation to this question. The hon. gentleman had fallen from the high pinnacle to which he had elevated himself by these declarations to a position that would render him an object of sympathy with all who had been disappointed in the course which the hon. gentleman had taken. The First Minister, in opening his remarks, had stated that he had not so narrowed his mind—that he was grateful to think that his mind was too broad and too comprehensive and too expansive to prevent his being able to act and cooperate in the Government of this country with gentlemen who might differ with him on many and important questions. Well, when did the hon. gentleman thus expand his mind, and when did this great breadth of intellect present itself? It must have been since the honorable gentleman looked at these questions from the Treasury Benches, for when the hon. gentleman stood where he (Mr. Tupper) was then standing, no man so loudly denounced coalitions, and men who could combine together for the Government of the country; not because they were separated by any broad lines of demarcation or of division on the important public questions of the day, but because, some twenty years before, or some ten years before, they had been called by other names; and, although they could agree, and did agree, on all great questions in which the country and its progress and its prosperity were concerned, the hon. gentleman denounced them as necessarily corrupt, and called upon the people of the country to strike them down and drive them out of office. The hon. gentleman now, however, saw these matters through different glasses, and the hon. gentleman had obtained a greater breadth of intellect and a greater breadth of mind. The narrow limits in which the hon. gentleman had confined his mind had become enlarged, and he could now satisfy himself that it was not right and just that hon. gentlemen, whose lives had been spent, down to the hour of their combination, in open, avowed and strenuous antagonism on the greatest and most prominent public questions of the day, to combine for the sake of sharing office and for the sake of maintaining themselves in power. The hon. gentleman said, that so far from disapproving of the advanced views of his hon. friend the Minister of Justice, as announced at Aurora, he was glad to know there was nothing that would tend more to the progress of enlarged principles and of liberal sentiments than gentlemen advancing, bringing forward and discussing these great questions, even in advance of the time when the country was ready to take them up and Parliament to crystalize them into law. He would ask the hon. gentleman to go back to his speech at Prescott, delivered after he had intimation of the departure his hon. friend who was now Minister of Justice was about to take, in which he denounced the men who would split up their party by indulging in vagaries, and by pronouncing on the critical questions which were unworthy of the consideration of the country. The hon. gentleman read out of his party any man who would be so lost to what he owed to the party to which he belonged as to indulge in these views and expressions. He was only induced to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government to that fact, as evidence that it must be since he had experienced this wonderful change which had given such breadth to his intellect, and which had so enlarged and expanded his views, there was an elasticity about the hon. gentleman's mind, that no person could fail to admire. It was equal to any emergency. It could be narrowed down to a point, when criticising the act of an opponent, so small as to deal with the most minute matter, and to elevate it into the most gigantic proportions; and, at the same time, it was so elastic as to expand and embrace all and everything, however opposed to right and expediency, provided that this breadth of mind was necessary to bring within the charmed circle of the hon. gentleman's party those who were necessary to sustain the hon. gentleman in power. The hon. gentleman had, that night, given up the whole case before the House. What was this case? The Parliament of the country was asked, in defence of its own character, and in defence of its own reputation, to say that it was inexpedient and improper that the Government of Canada should pay $19,000 of the public money to a gentleman who held a seat in the Parliament of the country. A law on the Statute-book declared that any hon. gentleman receiving from the Government, directly or indirectly, a single dollar of public money for services performed for the Government, vacated his seat, and that it became void. And yet the Minister of Justice, and the men who yesterday were claiming the confidence of the people of Canada on the ground of what they intended to achieve for the independence of the Parliament of the country and for the elevation of political and public morality in this country, in face of the case which the First Minister admitted, and which the Minister of Justice admitted was so open, so clear and so palpable, that it warranted being sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, these hon. gentlemen had so far gone back on themselves and trampled under their feet the principles which they had proclaimed when seducing the people of the country into the belief that they were worthy of being entrusted with power and the control of public affairs, and had so far forgotten the professions on which they obtained the position which they now held, as to call on their supporters to vote down what was a plain, a palpable and a literal fact, which every man who saw could read, and which every intelligent man in the House or out of it was capable of grasping at a glance. It was inexpedient and improper, unless the Parliament of Canada was to become a by-word, and the Independence of the Parliament of Canada a by-word in the mouths of the people of the country, that while that law stood on the Statute-book the Public Exchequer should be used for the purposes of pouring money out of its coffers into the pockets of members of the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) said they stopped it so soon as they knew of it. And why did they stop it? Was it because it was wrong? If so, the very fact that they did stop it, and gave to the House the reasons they had for doing so, would convict these hon. gentlemen of having adopted a course which bound them in vindication of the Parliament and the honour of the House of Commons of Canada, to vote themselves with the mover of the resolution, declaring that this Act was improper and inexpedient. If it was proper and expedient, why did they take the patronage they had bestowed, and the money they had paid, from a member of the House? It was because they found that it was not proper and not expedient, and because they found that, having violated the law, they were compelled to adopt that course. The hon. gentleman took exception to his right hon. friend's statement—he did not hear him make it, but he (Sir John A. Macdonald) might well have done so—that the Government were corrupting the Parliament of the country. The hon. gentleman demanded the proof that this was the case. He would tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) that no more proof was necessary than the fact that, in open and flagrant defiance and in violation of the law on the Statute-book, they had committed this act for which they were to-day arraigned at the bar of the judgment of the House, and for which they must shortly, despite all the efforts to the contrary on the part of those hon. gentlemen who might be found ready to support them, be arraigned at a higher and greater tribunal,—the great bar of the great public sentiment and of the independent and intelligent public sentiment of the people of Canada. The hon. Minister of Justice who had just taken his seat, had ventured to tell the House that the Government committed no wrong in offering or the member in accepting; the hon. gentleman undertook to tell the House that the law on the Statute-book which declared that a member of Parliament who accepted a single dollar of public money, directly or indirectly, for services rendered to that Government, was no longer able to exist within those walls; the hon. gentleman undertook to tell the House that the Government, who had given $19,000 of the public money of the country to a member of the House, who still sat and was sustained by them in the position of the First Commoner of the country, had committed no wrong. Was there a gentleman in the House who supposed that had this hon. gentleman continued to sit in Opposition, he would ever have fallen so low as to be able to enunciate, in the presence of a deliberative assembly, a proposition so monstrous and so revolting to the common sense and intelligence of every man in the House and in the country. He said that the highest and the deepest wrong that any Government could commit was to take the public money of the country and use it for the purpose of violating the law, and, knowing that the law was violated, to continue year after year the transaction. If his right hon. friend had said that the Government were corrupting members of Parliament, he had good grounds for making that statement, and for saying that a doubt was cast on the integrity and independence of every gentleman who supported the Government of the day. And why? Because if they could, among themselves, secretly contract with a member of the House, having held the views they formerly had expressed, and having denounced those transactions and anything that had the colour of interfering with the independence of members of the House, what might they not have done? Who was there—was there a gentleman in the Liberal Party of that day, who supposed that Col. Gray's principles were practically influenced by the public money he received, and received within the law, for performing a public service, the money being voted year after year by Parliament, and paid him? Was there a member in the House who did not know that among the tried, the strongest, the warmest, and most devoted supporters the right hon. member for Kingston had in the House or in the country, Col. Gray was among the foremost? No man could pretend such a thing; and yet it was stated in the Journals of the House, that these hon. gentleman had voted and handed down their names to posterity as denouncing that act which they admitted to be legal, because they said it cast a doubt upon, and assailed in spirit the Independence of Parliament Act, and cast a doubt on the independence of gentlemen who sat in the Parliament of Canada; and accepting these views and yielding to the sentiment of the House and of the country, the Government came forward and put a law on the Statute-book, which the hon. gentlemen opposite demanded at their hands. And what had these hon. gentleman done? Had they observed the law? No; but with law in their hands, they treated it with the most open contempt. He was in error—it was not with the most open contempt, for this contract was a secret contract. It was going on secretly; a member of the Government had made the contract and the Government were paying the public money, month after month for a long number of years, to a member of the House without the knowledge of other members of the House; and he said that, if the Government could do it in one case, they could do it in another case. The hon. gentleman stated that they had stopped it; but he believed it would be found—he did not intend to travel out of the record—that, at the very time they said they stopped this contract, the Government were signing a contract under which a larger and an infinitely greater sum of money had been paid over by the Government to a member of the House. Members of Parliament, under these circumstances, could only resent the imputation that any doubt was thrown by their conduct on the independence of members of Parliament. This was a flagrant wrong unredressed; it was a flagrant violation of the law, sustained by the hon. gentlemen who sat on the Treasury Benches. There was no member supporting them who was not open to the imputation and suspicion of being in a position in which he was secretly making arrangements with the Government of the country to be, directly or indirectly, beneficial to that hon. gentleman; and yet the Minister of Justice ventured, in the face of these facts, palpable, known, open, admitted and proved by the records the Government had furnished the House themselves, to say that the Government had committed no wrong, because this resolution was not aimed at the individual, but at the higher and the greater offender, the Government itself. The hon. gentlemen asked their supporters to say—what? That it was proper and expedient, and that it was not infringing upon the independence of this Parliament to do what they had done. They might find supporters who, far removed from the ordeal which, at no distant day, they must undergo, and who, away from that higher tribunal to which at no distant day he was proud to know, they would have to appeal, would so far forget those they left behind them as to sustain the Government in this emergency. The cheers with which these hon. gentlemen in former days greeted the Minister of Justice on that side of the House, when he proclaimed to the world that lofty purity and public morality would be inaugurated under his rule and administration, if he ever obtained them, would strongly contrast with such action. These hon. gentlemen, however, must go back to meet the various faces of their intelligent constituents, who knew and felt that whatever the necessities of the Government might be, public principles were of vastly higher and of vastly greater importance than the exigencies of a Government, however deserving they might be of confidence in other respects. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) said he was opposed to the views of his right hon. friend with reference to the Independence of the Senate, and he voted and proclaimed the necessity of passing a law that would operate on that body of the Legislature in the same way as the law existing in reference to this House. He believed that the hon. gentleman had undergone not only a conversion, but a backsliding on this point. Having got on the Treasury Benches, the hon. gentleman found it necessary and desirable to use the members of the Senate on important public services, and to place in the hands of members of the Senate large sums of public money to disburse for their expenses. The hon. gentleman had found no danger to the independence of the Senate, provided that the hon. gentlemen were able to keep their seats on the Treasury Benches, and he did not further interfere with it. This body of gentlemen, once so obnoxious, who were represented formerly to be unworthy of the confidence of the House and of the people of the country, had suddenly grown in the esteem of hon. gentlemen opposite; and all their views and all their principles in relation to that professed reform which they had declared to be so necessary, were now treated as an idle dream that had passed away and the necessity for which no longer existed. It was only yesterday that they gave the best evidence of the sound statesmanship of the right hon. gentleman, when he refused to adopt the law they proposed and the principles they proposed with reference to the Senate. When they desired to send some one on the most important mission that any gentleman could be selected from Canada to perform—to deal with the question of reciprocity, these hon. gentlemen selected a Senator in the other end of the building, and, as far as the Public Accounts showed, he was not left without an ample supply of public money, directly or indirectly, to meet all his necessities. And to-day what did the hon. gentleman find or consider it necessary to do? On a still more recent occasion in connection with the great Centennial Exhibition, when these hon. gentlemen wanted to secure the services of able efficient and talented representatives for Canada, at a most important crisis, they again went back to the Senate and chose hon. gentlemen and supplied them with the public money they required in order to fully and vigorously and efficiently represent the Government of the country. So that these hon. gentlemen had become the strongest testimony to the fact that the views they held when in Opposition were held, not as principles, but as professed principles to be abandoned when the necessity for using them to obtain power had passed away. The hon. gentleman said that the practice of the right hon. gentleman did not agree with his professions, and that the hon. gentleman had voted down a resolution which was proposed to prevent members of Parliament from being shareholders in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He thought that the House would recollect that when the resolution was first proposed it was of a character that would instantly deprive any hon. gentleman of his seat who, in the most remote way, even if he inherited a share by the death of a relation, was connected with the railway. He told the hon. gentleman that the practice of the right hon. member would bear the closest scrutiny in relation to the Canada Pacific Railway. So thoroughly did the late Administration carry into practice that law, so completely was their position in accord with the essence and spirit of the Act of Parliament, that they determined no man, sitting either in the Senate or in the House, should be a director. When they took that ground his right hon. friend showed by his practice that he was prepared to go further in the vindication of the independence of Parliament than the law on the Statute-book required. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not have been occupying their present positions had they given way on that point. Had the Hon. Mr. Foster obtained the position of contractor that he wanted, the refusal of which threw the Government into the hands of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, had not his right hon. friend stood true to the great essential principle of having the Parliament of the country independent, those hon. members would not be in the position which they had proved themselves so unworthy of occupying. But was it such a crime on the part of his hon. friend to vote down a resolution providing that no shareholder who was a member of Parliament, should be a director of the Company? Did that show such an absence of a proper regard for the independence of Parliament as made him unworthy of the confidence of the people? Then let the hon. the First Minister tell them why when entrusted with the power and responsibility of getting a Government, he went to three hon. gentlemen who were opposed to him on that question and asked them to take seats in the Cabinet. The hon. the Minister of Justice used a boomerang which recoiled and struck one of the leading members of the Administration in the face. Three different times did the hon. gentleman throw it and each time it returned and struck in the face a colleague of his own who acted against him on that very question. The hon. the Minister of Justice said he did not contend that the law had not been violated. Then what was the hon. gentleman talking about? Did not the hon. gentleman hold the high position of Minister of Justice for the purpose of maintaining the law, for the purpose of giving, on a plain direct question submitted here, his deliberate opinion as to what the law of Parliament as well as the law of the Statute-book, required in reference to a question touching nearly and dearly the position of every hon. gentleman in the House—that of the Independence of Parliament. Then what was the reason of his reluctance to state whether the law had been violated or not? Why did he not say that the law had not been violated? Why he did not say it? Because he knew that all the respect which was felt for him in this House and the country as a great lawyer, would instantly disappear, and be succeeded by a feeling of a very different and opposite character, if he ventured on such a statement. But the hon. gentleman was ready to avail himself of the votes of the supporters of the Government, provided that they could be induced to declare that that which was improper was proper, and that which was inexpedient was expedient; provided that they would sustain the Government and declare to the people that the law on the Statute-book prohibiting one dollar of the public money being paid to any member of Parliament, had not been violated in taking $19,000 out of the Treasury and handing it over to an hon. member. The hon. gentleman had said there was no breach of the Act on the part of the Government. Did he mean to say that the Government of Canada stood in this position: that they were to sustain a man, as a member of Parliament, when they knew by their own act that his seat had become void, and that he had become as incapable of sitting in this House, as if he had never been elected by his constituency. But the hon. gentleman argued that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Did he forget that when an hon. gentleman was returned by the returning officer, and, having taken the oath in the presence of the Speaker, was directed to take his seat, that the hon. the Minister of Justice asked the House, by his own motion, not to send that question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to ascertain whether the return had been rightly or wrongly made, but he moved that that gentleman should be deprived of his seat, and that the person who had not been returned should be declared duly elected. He asked whether the hon. members opposite, who voted with the hon. gentleman on that occasion to refuse to send the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, were prepared to say that the Act under discussion must be declared proper and expedient before any action could be taken in relation to a transaction in which no proof was required, because documentary evidence in support of the charge had been furnished by the Government themselves. The hon. the Minister of Justice said he would deliberately abstain from expressing an opinion. He asked the House and the hon. members who sustained the hon. gentleman, what this meant when an unanswerable case had been made by the hon. mover of the resolution, supported by the cogent and argumentative speech of the right hon. gentleman (Sir J. A. Macdonald), while the hon. the First Minister and the hon. the Minister of Justice took their seats without being able to move or grapple with a single fact in connection with this matter. What did it mean when, in the face of such a fact as that, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) asked his friends behind him to sustain the Government in this matter, and yet deliberately refused to give his opinion in regard thereto? Why did the hon. gentleman refuse his opinion? Were not the hon. gentlemen behind him, before committing themselves by a vote which would deservedly consign them to political oblivion, entitled to an opinion so that they might state to their constituents:

"This was a legal question, and we did not quite understand it. We had the high authority of the hon. the Minister of Justice that this was right and proper and constitutional. We may have done wrong; but if so you must not blame us, because we are not lawyers. We had confidence in his law, and he assured us we had the law on our side, and we believed that we were not trampling the character of Parliament, and along with it the high place the Parliament of Canada occupies in the estimation of the world, beneath our feet in accepting the opinion of the hon. the Minister of Justice." They would forget everything that was due to the House of Commons and Parliament of the country when they were obliged to make that confession, but they took that position with their eyes open, when the great special pleader put forward to justify the action, admitted that he was unable to give any opinion to justify action on this question; and they would be obliged to go back to a justly incensed and indignant people, who would declare that they had betrayed their trust. He was told that 55 of the gentlemen he had now the honour of addressing were found to follow the lead of the hon. the Minister of Justice when he voted against sending the case referred to, which was entirely different from the present one, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In that case the man had been returned by the only power that could return him to the House; he had been sworn in at the table and ordered to take his seat. This was an insignificantly weak case in comparison to the present one. They had a case here which every man could read for himself. Yet 55 hon. gentlemen were found who voted that Mr. Claxton's case should not be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MILLS: That was because the returns showed on their face that a majority of the legal votes had been returned against him.

Mr. TUPPER asked if the hon. the Minister of the Interior claimed that the returns in this matter did not present, on the face of them, as strong a case as that. With the admission of the hon. the First Minister and the Minister of Justice, that the law prohibited the giving of a dollar of the public money to any hon. member of this House without rendering his seat vacant, in addition to the returns laid on the table by the Government, did the hon. gentleman mean to say that this case was not a thousand times stronger than the one to which he alluded? He did not envy the 55 members when they were obliged to vote up that which they voted down on that occasion, and to follow the hon. the Minister of Justice, whose necessities compelled him to right-about-face in reference to this important question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) said: "I do not call this a contract." What did he call it? Did he not know? Was the great authority, the great legal luminary, to whom the House had a right to look for an opinion upon a purely legal question, after two years of close and careful study and painful study, unable to give an opinion? The hon. gentleman fled from the assault made upon him. He ran away, saying "I refuse to give a legal opinion. I do not call this a contract." The word contract slipped inadvertently out of the hon. gentleman's lips, and he said, "I don't know what to call it." He asked the hon. lay members whose intelligence enabled them to contrast the position taken by the hon. the Minister of Justice when he had a particle of ground to stand upon, and the feeble, emasculated condition in which he had exhibited himself before the House to-night. Was there not a reason for the feeble cheers with which the Government followers tried to keep up the hon. gentleman's sinking courage? The hon. gentleman wound up by saying that the Government thought they ought to close the contract. The fact that they closed this contract was the best evidence to the House and the country of what they considered it. Had one of the hon. gentlemen, had either the First Minister of the Crown or the Minister of Justice, ventured to say that this was a proper transaction? He would appeal to the supporters of the Government whether either of these hon. gentlemen had ventured to insult the intelligence of this House by saying this was a proper transaction? No, they had not; but they had pleaded to their supporters to preserve their existence as a Government, which they had justly forfeited. The hon. gentleman had not been able to say that the transaction, if not proper, was expedient. The resolution of the hon. member for North Hastings asked that it be declared that the transaction was both improper and inexpedient. Hon. gentlemen who voted against that motion would be obliged to hand their record down to posterity—that, when called upon to exercise the highest duty a member of Parliament could perform, namely, to vindicate the honour and independence and the character of the Parliament in which they sat, they had voted for that which neither the First Minister nor the Minister of Justice had dared to say was either proper or expedient, or would not interfere with the independence of members of Parliament.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said it was not his intention to occupy the time of the House at any length in the discussion of this subject. After the admirable speeches of his hon. friend the Premier and the Minister of Justice it appeared to him that nothing remained to be said. But there was a painful phase of this case to which he might be permitted to call attention, a phase which he thought did not reflect honour upon public life in this country. If it were true,—and he was not now discussing whether it was or was not—that a great political offence had been committed under the circumstances represented by hon. gentlemen opposite, it would appear to him that they should deal with it fairly and in a judicial and respectable spirit. He did not see why it became necessary to make wild party harangues, and so degrade the discussion as to give it an entirely opposite complexion from that which they might have expected it would occupy. The First Minister had told the House that the Government discovered the state of things complained of last year, and that they thought it to be inconvenient and improper, and so a stop was put to it. He himself had announced, long before anybody had spoken of it, that the practice was inconvenient and improper. He was sorry to say that the Hansard report of the debates of last year gave very little idea of what took place in this discussion. It had been said that there were secrets in the matter, but there were no secrets. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) with that fairness and candour, and in that dispassionate manner in which he always addressed the House, spoke of the secrecy of the contract made. He (Mr. Huntington) could not say anything about contracts, but as to the secrecy the hon. gentleman was entirely wrong. The hon. member told the House that the Government were pushed by the opinion of the country and by the Liberal press into the condition of bringing this before the House. He feared that if the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office the Liberal-Conservative press would never indicate anything so laudable, and would not tell them when they were right and when they were wrong. The Liberal press was an independent press, and it was for this reason that it was not guided of necessity by the acts of the Government. The statement of the hon. gentleman was incorrect. Immediately the Government found out the transaction it was put a stop to. The House was notified by the Government of that fact. So, without any pressure at all, the arrangement was discontinued. He was very much pained at the circumstances under which the matter had been brought before the House. He wished our politics in a matter of this kind, where an hon. gentleman found himself in such a painful position as any man of delicate sensibilities must find himself, would permit the matter to be discussed calmly and without prejudice. Why had the hon. gentleman refrained from moving this motion last March? Why had the hon. member waited until tonight, until the House was going into Committee of Supply, to move a motion which could not be amended? Did anyone believe it was for the purpose of vindicating the independence of Parliament? Why was not the present action taken last year or at the early part of this Session? He (Mr. Huntington) could almost fancy himself at the caucus of the party at which this particular attack was planned. He could understand the right hon. member for Kingston with tears coursing down his cheeks at the position in which he stood in bringing this terrible charge against one of the ablest and most immaculable of Speakers. He could understand the hon. member for North Hastings being present—the two of them being old stagers and Parliamentary campaigners. He could understand how the younger members, the rank and file of the party, were eager to get at this. It was urged that they should not make a motion then, because the Government would vote it down, as the proper course was to send the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Then they said they would wait for Supply, and then the Government could not move an amendment, and the Government would be obliged to vote down a motion which perhaps some of them believed there was something in. The right hon. member for Kingston, taking out his pocket handkerchief and wiping his streaming eyes, said this, after all, was the true course to pursue. He (Mr. Huntington) believed that this position was not fair. It was the most extreme partizanship. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution knew that the fair thing was to refer these matters to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There should be an opportunity for discussion: the accused should have an opportunity of defending himself, and, upon the report of the Committee, the House should act. The motion was purposely framed for the purpose of entrapping the supporters of the Government into giving a vote which it was believed some of them did not wish to give.

Mr. OUIMET said it was not without grave consideration that he came to the conclusion to second the motion. It was always unpleasant for a member to speak upon any question which might reflect upon one of his confrères, and more especially when that confrère occupied the chief position in the House of Commons. The question before the House was of such importance that it was the duty of every member to carefully and seriously weight it. It was a question which involved no less a principle than that great bulwark of our constitution, the

Mr. HUNTINGTON.

Independence of Parliament. This was a principle which had been upheld by many distinguished men. It was a principle upon which depended the great strength of our system of legislation. Every member of the House must be independent; and this had been so well understood that laws had been framed to prevent anything like undue influence on the part of the Government towards an hon. member. The fact that the hon. member referred to occupied such a high position as he did, rendered it all the more imperative for the Government to state their reasons for giving the contract to him. The facts of the case were very simple, and still more clear when the admissions made by the different members were taken into consideration. These facts were presented by the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, when they stated that the vouchers before them showed that large sums of money had been paid from time to time to T. W. Anglin, a member of the House of Commons, for printing and stationery, while a member of the House. In the report brought before the House it also appeared that different sums of money had been paid to the St. John Freeman, to T. W. Anglin, on different contracts, according to prices as agreed upon. So it was clear that on one side was a party submitting prices in tendering for contracts, and, on the other hand, an agreement by the Government to accept this tender, and thus bribe the hon. member. The fact was indisputable that the Government had given a contract to an hon. member of this House. Quibbles and arguments might be used to try and lessen the fact, but the fact, namely, that there was a contract between the Government and a member of the House, remained. This was the bare fact standing before the House, and it did not require that the matter should be referred to the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections to show more clearly that a contract had been entered into on the part of the Government with an hon. member, and that that contract had been fulfilled and paid for. This appeared most clearly in the voucher dated 30th September, 1876, that $2,709 had been paid on account of the contract. The law, as it had been admitted by the different members of the Government who had spoken on the question, was that when a member of the House entered into a contract with the Government, the fact of his contracting with the Government disqualified him from sitting in the House. That was the law as interpreted by the different members of the Government, and more particularly by the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MILLS: I would ask the hon. gentleman, supposing an hon. member of the House should be the proprietor of a newspaper and should enter into a contract to take an advertisement, what would be the result? It is the same in principle.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Ask the proprietor of the Montreal Herald.

Mr. MILLS: Or the Belleville Intelligencer, or the Chatham Planet, or the Toronto Mail.

Mr. BOWELL: I will be happy to assist you in the Committee to investigate the account of the Belleville Intelligencer.

Mr. OUIMET said the question was whether there was a contract or not. If there was, the law applied; if there was not, the law did not apply; that was clear if anything was clear in the world. The reason why the law was on the Statute-book was that in old times contracts had been employed by the Government as bribes to different members of the House, and they knew that at that time money had been lavishly distributed among the members of the House in England in order to bribe support in favour of the Government. When those abuses became too numerous, a law was passed disqualifying any contractor from sitting as a member of the House of Commons in England; and that was the same law as now stood on our Statute-book. If accepting a contract was considered a bribe, he supposed that in a bribe there was the briber and the bribed party. In common law and election law they punished equally the briber and the bribed party. The Government might say what they liked, but they could not get out of this,—that they had given this contract, and were responsible for it. The hon. the Premier pleaded ignorance; but the House knew it last year; they all knew it. They considered that the fault was not with the Government, but with the party that accepted the contract from the Government. The moment the Government persisted in continuing the contract they persisted in their intended bribery. Now was not the time to say if the hon. member who was the contractor, was bribed or not, but whether the Government was justified in giving the contract to a member of the House. He (Mr. Ouimet) thought they were not, and that they must be held guilty of committing a breach of the privileges of the House. The question of the responsibility of the Government was in question. Who was the guardian of the privileges of the House? No doubt the Government. If they had committed a breach of privilege—and such a thing was done often and in more numerous cases—it would become worse than the abuses which existed in former times. A great deal had been said about Col. Gray's case. The members of the Government, and more particularly the hon. the Minister of Justice, could not exculpate themselves, or reconcile their line of conduct with the line of conduct they took at that time, and he (Mr. Ouimet) thought this case was still worse than that of Col. Gray. Col. Gray was employed as a barrister to arrange the criminal law for the whole Confederation, to assimilate that law. This work was an intellectual work, and intellectual work was not paid but indemnified. They, while sitting as members of the House, giving their time and intelligence to make laws for the country, were not paid for it; none would say they were paid for it, but they were indemnified. He mentioned this only to show that the case of Col. Gray was not the same; and, besides, the law was not then so strict as it was now. The only arguments which he had heard on the part of the Hon. the Minister of Justice to save the Government from this motion which had been made was, that it was a vote of want of confidence, a vote of blame and censure against the Government. He (Mr. Ouimet) knew it, and it had been a painful experience for him to know that votes which were given in this House must be distinguished in two very distinct classes. It was all very well for a member to vote according to his own mind and knowledge and according to his conscience, but when the Government was interested in the matter, it was all quite different. Members might vote on indifferent matters according to their conscience, but when the Government was at stake it was not allowed; what was just became unjust and what was unjust became just to suit the different members who were voting on the question. The members who were following the Government were told that the principles upheld by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) were incorrect. They did all uphold these principles a few years ago, but to night it was different; the Government now wanted a vote of confidence and they must give up all the principles they had held and vote down the motion of the member for North Hastings, because it would hurt the Government. The argument of the hon. the Minister of Justice reminded him (Mr. Ouimet) of something which had been said about Paul de Casagnac, the famous journalist. Jules Simon was arguing very strongly that Paul de Casagnac in his paper, as a Bonapartist, had insulted the Government and preached revolution, and ought, therefore, to be found guilty and imprisoned. Paul de Casagnac replied by quoting the long articles and speeches which Jules Simon had written, and pronounced in the Press and before the public, about the freedom and liberty of the Press, and said that according to those same principles of Jules Simon he ought to be exculpated. Jules Simon said as a joke: "You are not now to be judged according to my principles, but according to your own." This was about the argument of the hon. the Minister of Justice: the Government was not to be judged to night according to their own principles, but according to the principles which they stated at that time were the principles of the late Government, and this was the best reason they had to show against the motion. In relation to Col. Gray's case, the hon. the Minister of Justice said at that time, that it would be a very injurious precedent to be recorded in their Journals. Well, the vote of to-night would be a worse precedent; it would just confirm the wrong-doing on the part of the Government, and infringe the privileges and honour of the House, of which the Government ought to be the jealous guardians.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that, coming from the same Province as the Speaker, he would be recreant to his duty and unjust to the Speaker of the House if he allowed the vote to pass unchallenged. Had the House considered the result of the motion, if carried, to the Speaker? They must consider that he had not had fair play. Hon. gentlemen sought to injure the Government, to break down and impair the standing of the Government in this country; that was all right enough: but was it right to seek to injure the Speaker in order to obtain the end they had in view? If this resolution were carried, the Speaker's seat was vacant, he was no longer Speaker of the House, he was consigned to private life, and his little property, which he might have acquired in the course of years, was gone. If this resolution were carried to-night, he became liable to penalties exceeding £60,000. Was it not right that the people of the country should know that hon. gentlemen opposite said the Government had falsified their trust, and had been recreant to their duty.

Mr. TUPPER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH said his hon. friend from Cumberland professed to speak ex cathedra for the people of the country, but, looking to things past, he was not a true prophet, but a false one; his predictions had been falsified by facts. He said that if the Government would invoke the voice of the people, it would be hurled from power. This was all rhodomontade. It was all very well for hon. gentlemen to pretend to speak for the people of the country, but he could not do it; the Government would speak for themselves and justify their position. He (Mr. Smith) asked hon. gentlemen opposite if they were prepared to place in this position the Speaker who was their representative, and with reference to whom he might invoke the statement of the leader of the Opposition as to his efficiency in the Chair? Why did not they bring this matter forward last Session? Was it because they knew that the Speaker incurred a penalty and sought his destruction and ruin? Every act was known as well last Session as now. Why did they lie by, and wait till this Session? They sought now to condemn the Speaker of the House; they had tied his hands, sealed his mouth and stopped his tongue; they would not allow him to speak in his own defence, but sought to drive him from office and utterly ruin him. If they felt that the Speaker had violated the law, let them take the course prescribed by law and adopted in the British Parliament, and refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Was not that the proper tribunal?

Mr. BOWELL: Why did not you do it?

Mr. SMITH said they had asked the Opposition to do it, and they had refused. Were they going to try the Speaker behind his back, without his having the opportunity to say a word in his own behalf? Surely there was no precedent for this action, surely hon. gentlemen opposite would not ask for the conviction of Mr. Speaker, when his mouth was closed and he was unable to defend himself, he being exposed to a penalty of £60,000. This matter should be committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, before whom Mr. Speaker could appear entirely by himself or by counsel, and defend himself from the accusation brought against him. It was a pure question of law; and hon. gentlemen opposite in their expressions of opinion were biased and controlled by party and political feelings. It was not fair to so treat Mr. Speaker, who was exposed to such tremendous consequences. Mr. Speaker should have an opportunity of being heard in his defence. This seemed to be a fair and reasonable proposal. How any hon. gentleman could maintain the contrary he was at a loss to know. Everything possible to secure the condemnation of the Government had been brought up; what had they to do with the charge laid against Mr. Speaker? Was it fair to surround this matter with the question of dereliction of duty on the part of the Government and to condemn the Government as guilty of crimes? He thought not. Mr. Speaker should at least have a fair trial; and after the question of law was decided and heard fairly, then if Mr. Speaker was convicted for a violation of the law, this might be used to the prejudice of the Government. Let them condemn Mr. Speaker, if they would, but let him first be fairly heard, and a fair investigation be had. If it was shown that the law had been violated, then let condemnation be visited upon the Government. He appealed to the sense of justice of both sides of the House; Mr. Speaker should not be condemned behind his back.

Mr. COSTIGAN said the hon. gentleman who had seconded the resolution, and very properly too, he thought, had suggested that it would be right and proper for every member to express his opinion, and give his reasons for the vote he intended to cast on this occasion. In this regard he asked for the indulgence of the House while he placed his views before hon. members. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had made a strong appeal in Mr. Speaker's behalf. The hon. gentleman was of a very kind and genial disposition, and sympathised very readily with any one he might consider was unfairly attacked. But he entirely differed with the hon. gentleman when he said that an accusation and an attack had been made on Mr. Speaker personally. The course pursued by the mover of the resolution had, in his opinion, done Mr. Speaker immense service, as it had produced for Mr. Speaker on the floor of the House a defender in every member of the present Government. The Minister of Justice and the First Minister had tried to create the impression that a direct attack had been made on Mr. Speaker. They seemed to ignore the fact that they had any interest in the matter at all. If the simple and clear proposition had been made in the House that by the acceptance of this contract Mr. Speaker had violated the Independence of Parliament Act, he was led to believe that the Government would not have taken the responsibility of defending it, or of placing their supporters in the position of justifying the act. The Government said that no wrong had been committed, and that the question should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But in the first place, the contract had been given by a member of the Government, and sometime afterwards the House was informed that the contract would not be continued. Why was this step taken? It was evident to every member of the House, that the contract must have been awarded under peculiar circumstances, and the parties to the contract must have considered it unusual. The Government knew that the law had been violated, and had been, consequently, forced to announce that the contract would be discontinued. About this there could be no doubt. The Government, by their own act, admitted that this was the case; and their own Press did not attempt to deny it. In all these questions, the motive for, and the influence and consequences of these acts, had a great bearing on the cases in point. It was said that as Mr. Speaker had at all times supported the party in power, there was no object, such as the securing of his support, to be gained by giving Mr. Speaker the contract, or granting him favours. He admitted that Mr. Speaker had been associated with the party in power since he entered Parliament; and he also admitted that few members on that side of the House had rendered more material assistance in assuring the considerable and final success of the hon. gentlemen opposite than had Mr. Speaker. But there was a time when there was reason to believe that, whatever Mr. Speaker's political feelings might be, he must discontinue the strong support which, up to that time, he had given to the Government. This was known to members of the House, and to everyone who had paid attention to the progress of events when the Government was first formed; he could not say the Government as it now existed, for it was not precisely the same Government that had first entered into office in 1873. However, at that period, it was thought, for many reasons, that Mr. Speaker was entitled to a seat in the Cabinet. He would not say why this position was not tendered Mr. Speaker, or why Mr. Speaker's rights were ignored on that occasion. He had merely to say that not only Mr. Speaker, but his friends outside the House, felt that an injustice was then done him. There was no getting over this one fact, that when the present Government came into power, and before it was decided who was to be Speaker, it was rumoured in their part of the country in New Brunswick, that this honour was intended for Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that as it would not be seemly for the House to sit after twelve o'clock, the debate should be adjourned.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved the adjournment of the debate, to be resumed after routine on Monday.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes before
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 9th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion:—

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply."—

And the motion of Mr. Bowell in amendment thereto; and which motion was:—

"That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, 'That in the opinion of this House it is inexpedient and improper for the Government to have entered into any agreement or contract whereby public money is paid to members of Parliament, such as the Postmaster-General's Reports for 1875 and 1876, and the vouchers laid on the Table of this House on the 15th March ult., show to have been paid to Timothy Warren Anglin, a member of this House for the county of Gloucester, namely, $8,126.31, for the year ended 30th June, 1875, and $10,263.24 for the year ended 30th June, 1876, and $2,709.55, being for the quarter ended 30th September, 1876, in payment for printing and stationery done for, and printed by him for the Post Office Department of Canada 'per agreement,' as shown by the return laid before Parliament by the Postmaster-General on the 1st of March last, and the vouchers reported to the House by the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts on the 15th March, 1877, as such payments are in contravention of an Act passed in the 31st year of Her Majesty's reign, intitled: 'An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament,' which provides that:—'No person whosever holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing, directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, any contract or agreement with Her Majesty, or with any public officer or Department, with respect the public service of Canada, or under which any public money of Canada is to be paid for any service or work, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote in the same,' and are calculated to detract from the independence of members of this House."

Mr. COSTIGAN resumed his speech. He said, on the adjournment of the debate, he stated that he had very few remarks to make with regard to the legal point at issue in this question. He explained at that time that while he was ready to admit that Mr. Speaker had always been a consistent, intelligent and influential supporter of the Government and that he had contributed very largely to their success, but on one point, which was dangerous to the existence of the Government, there was a serious difference between the Government and himself. When the Government came into power they had a very large majority in this House. They feared no opposition on the ordinary questions of the day, but every one would remember that they feared, and had good reason to fear, the result of a vote in this House which was united on the New Brunswick school question. Notwithstanding the fact that they had this large majority, so great was the sympathy which existed in the public mind and in the House in favour of justice to the minority in New Brunswick, that the Government felt their greatest danger would come from that discussion. In order to argue this point, however, he would quote from the St. John Freeman articles which were written with more force and ability than any remarks he could make. He had endeavoured, from his point of view, to represent, in an humble way, what the feelings, interests, wishes and desires of the public were on that particular question; and he wanted to show that those feelings and views were entertained and shared and more ably advocated by the Speaker. The Telegraph, another paper of St. John, had tried to make a point against the Freeman, from the fact that the paper which had constantly advocated the rights of the minority had, for several days, appeared without any allusion to the subject it had been fighting for. The Freeman of the 14th March, 1872, said:

"It is probable that during this struggle for justice, which promises to be long, many numbers of the Freeman will appear without even one paragraph relating to the school question, as, unfortunately, we have not room to deal with all the questions which demand our attention as fully as we would wish. Nevertheless, of our views on this subject we do not fear that there will be at any time the slightest doubt; nor do we fear that our silence at any time will be misunderstood, how much soever the Telegraph may strive to misrepresent it. The Catholics ask for justice—nothing more, nothing less. This they will continue to ask for and to seek, by every constitutional and legal means until they obtain it; and the Telegraph and its associates may, in the meantime, shout 'No Popery; clerical intimidation; spiritual terrorism; Popish plots; our schools in danger,' etc., until every one in the Province becomes disgusted with the senseless clamor."

Mr. MACDONALD (Cornwall): Is the honorable gentleman in order in referring to such matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has stated that he sees some connection between this matter and the matter in dispute, and I think he has the right to proceed.

Mr. COSTIGAN said the paragraph he had read would prove what the views of the Catholics were at that time. It said that they were determined to seek, in every constitutional manner, redress for their grievances. It showed that the writer advocated those views and laid down the principle which every friend of the minority had felt himself bound by since that time—a principle to which several of their prominent men had sacrificed their interests and positions. Yet, about the time this question was finally disposed of in this House, views contrary to those were expressed by the same paper. On the 27th April of the same year, the Freeman, in speaking of the responsibilities of the Government on that question, laid down this principle:—

"The Constitution makes them guardians of the rights and interests of the minorities in regard to this question, going so far as to clothe them with special and extraordinary powers to enable them to make that guardianship effectual. Knowing this, the Catholics of New Brunswick, in their extremity, looked to them for protection from the terrible wrong with which they are threatened. They hoped that the Catholic members of the Government would make some effort in their behalf, but they found that their hopes of justice were as vain as when they appealed to the fanatical majority in New Brunswick, to whom alone they were coldly told they must look for justice.

The minorities had the right to look to them (the Government) for protection; that protection it was their duty to afford, and because they had refused to afford it the Catholics of New Brunswick now hold them as fully responsible for all the cruel, wrong and grievous injustice they must endure as even the Local Government itself."

This was written while the late Government were in power before the Speaker occupied his present position; and those opinions were freely received by the parties most interested in the discussion that took place at that time. In accordance with the principle laid down in the first extract he moved a resolution to effect a removal of the grievance of which the people of the Province complained. At the same time an amendment was moved, no doubt with a view of keeping clear of a direct vote on this motion—just such an amendment, though not so serious in its consequences, not so directly aimed at the rights and liberties of the minority, as the famous amendment moved to his last motion on this question, and was avoided, and they were for a time defeated; but during that Session, by the passage of the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead, this House expressed its regret at the act of the Local Legislature, and expressed a desire that it should remove the cause of dissatisfaction which existed in the Province. But they all knew that the amendment produced very little good at that time. On the 25th June, 1872, the following appeared in the Freeman :—

"The time when the New Brunswick School Act might have been disallowed has now passed, and for its refusal to protect the minority of New Brunswick in the fair and constitutional way from injustice and oppression, the Canadian Government are plainly, fully and directly responsible. If the Privy Council decide that the Act is unconstitutional, as we hope they will, no thanks whatever will be due to the Canadian Government. If, unfortunately, their decision be that the Act is constitutional, and therefore valid, and if the New Brunswick Government and Legislature refuse to yield to the unanimous wish of the Canadian Parliament, as we much fear they will, then will the agitation assume another and very different phase."

This was very strong language. They had done everything in their power to get the grievance remedied. Their representatives were united on the question, and did everything in their power to carry out the views of the article from which he first quoted. He must agree with this article to a certain extent; he felt that the Government of the country might have done more than they did. He blamed them at the time, and voted against them. When the question was disposed of by the amendment he referred to, and as they had not much hope of deriving any benefit from it, their only hope was to wait for the next session of Parliament, in order that they might bring forward their claims to be heard. In the next Session, in 1873, they had had to deal with another question. The Local Legislature of New Brunswick, instead of acting upon the advice of this House, or upon its suggestion rather, and instead of showing any disposition to amend the law, passed amendments which were still more objectionable, and which gave rise to a discussion in the House. He then made a motion asking for the disallowance of the amendments. At that time the members of the present Government and their friends were in Opposition, and the motion was passed asking for the disallowance of the amendments. The members of the present Government and their friends—he was speaking of them as a whole, though there might be some exceptions—voted unanimously as the party known as the Opposition of the day, with him on that occasion, demanding that these laws should be disallowed. It was true, that the vote was then a direct vote of want of confidence in the Government, who met it as such, but, notwithstanding that fact, thirty-nine Conservatives, supporters of the then Government voted against the Government and against their political friends, in order to do justice and give fair play to the minority of New Brunswick. He mentioned this circumstance to show the difference between the policy of the Conservatives in acting independently of the Government, which they uniformly supported, and the hon. members who belonged to the other party. When he first brought this motion before the House, he met with the cordial sympathy, co-operation and encouragement necessary to assist him in carrying the question before the House and contending for it from the Conservatives who were supporting the Government, although it was a matter calculated to embarrass the Government very much. He mentioned this as a proof of their sincerity, and their exceptional sincerity in contrast with what he would not call the want of sincerity, but the course pursued by the hon. gentlemen who were called upon when the time came for them to be placed in a similar position. And what did these hon. gentlemen then do? When he appealed to the House on behalf of the minority of New Brunswick, against the then Government, asking for the disallowance of the law—and this motion went further than any subsequent motion on the question—thirty-nine members of the Conservative party in the House, who had been misrepresented in the country with regard to their course on that occasion, voted against the Government and for the disallowance of the Bills, and with the members of the present Government, who then sat on the Opposition benches. The difference he wished to make was this: that when these hon. gentlemen afterwards came into power, and he asked not that this legislation should be set aside, that the rights of the Local Legislature be interfered with, or that the Act be disallowed, but that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, asking that the interpretation should be given to the British North America Act which they believed it was meant to express, a change took place. What did the honourable gentlemen on the Ministerial benches, who had previously expressed so much sympathy with them, do? Why, four members of the Liberal Party in the House voted against the Government on that question; four members of this Liberal Party who had been since held up in New Brunswick as the friends of the Catholics in this relation, and of that great party who stood in the House with a very large majority, the Government being then able, if ever a Government was able, to do justice to the minority in New Brunswick, only four members voted with him on that question. It was true that the names of more than four Liberals appeared on the division list, but he was not misrepresenting the facts. It was true that some of these Liberals voted with him, but they were from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and they voted against the Government because they did not desire any interference with the law at all. They did not wish to do anything with it, or refer it to the Privy Council; he wished to make the point that only four members of the Liberal party then voted against the Government, in order to contrast it with the conduct of Conservatives. When it was declared in the country that the minority had the sympathy of the party then in power, he said, let them meet this argument. When Liberals said that the Conservatives had ill-used this minority, they had a right to do so, but had the Liberal party done better? This argument stood unanswered. Thirty-nine Conservative voted against their own Government, on a motion going further than he had asked the hon. gentlemen at present in power to go; and were they under the same obligations to do so as the late hon. gentlemen? No. The question had never been previously raised. They had sprung it on their Government, against whom he had fought as hard as any man could fight on that question. He believed the minority were entitled to fair play, that to obtain it the Government should fall. He had contended that the minority should not yield, and that they had a right to secure the amendment of the law and protection; but the party on the other side of the House were under greater obligations towards the minority than the Conservatives, for they had made use of the question in order to get into power, and to the injury of the Conservatives before the country. They had wrested constituencies from the Conservatives because the latter had not carried out to the fullest extent the demands of the minority of New Brunswick.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cornwall) : What Government granted free schools in Ontario?

Mr. COSTIGAN said he had always had a great deal of difficulty in dealing with the question before the House, and if he could only do justice to this subject, he was satisfied not to allude to the question of separate schools in Ontario. He knew this, that he could not and did not agree with the action of the late Government on this question; that he had not truckled to them, and that he had not received favours from them. He had felt it to be his duty to fight against them in this respect. He had also felt it to be his duty when the hon. gentleman who had led them to believe that they sympathized with them, and who had given a vote in the House, not of sympathy but of interest, to bring the matter before them; but it was clear that the Liberals voted in the House, in 1873, to a man, with the view of reaching the Ministerial benches, and not with the view of granting to the minority protection. He appealed to Mr. Speaker on this question, as one who was a member of the Liberal party, and who must have known their feelings and wishes on that subject. While he, as a member of the Conservative party, was doing all he could in the interests of the minority, not a single member of the Liberal party was prepared to sympathize or vote with him. It was now known and admitted what the Liberals wanted in 1873; they had no sympathy with that minority. It was against their principles to vote for separate schools, and, if they voted with him on that occasion, it was only because they desired to attain office; and this was the vote on which they went to the country, and for which such great praise had been given to the Liberals in the Morning Freeman, and in other papers throughout the country. It was a vote which entitled them to the support and sympathy and confidence of every warmhearted and honourable Catholic in the country, believing that they were sincere in what they had done, and looking to them for protection; but there was every reason now to believe—and they had had proof of it—that this question was only made use of at the time to humbug the minority with that vote, and to injure and weaken their political opponents. It was unworthy of the position of any party in this country to take that course in order to make political capital out of the question. When that vote was demanded in the House, when it was carried, the minority of New Brunswick had reason to expect that their case was as good as settled. The expression of the House was strong in their favour, and a majority of thirty-four or thirty-nine had gone so far as to say that the law of the Local Legislature must be set aside. As the Local Legislature would not do them justice, they felt that, and they had every reason to believe, when they would ask for an amendment of the constitution in this regard, this step would be fairly met by the House. In the Morning Freeman, of December 4, 1873, when the present Government were in power, an article appeared, showing that the opinions previously held in this respect in this journal, had not even then changed. It was stated: "The New Brunswick school question was the not very remote cause of the downfall of the late Government; we hope that it will not prove equally fatal to the Government now in power. Because Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier trifled with that question, one day offering the Chauveau amendment as a compromise, and another day refusing to pass that amendment, and substituting for it the Colby amendment, but always refusing to exercise the power vested in them by the constitution for the protection of the minorities, they lost the confidence of a large portion of their supporters in Quebec and Ontario." This was just what he had stated. The late Government had not gone as far as the people in some of the Provinces thought they might have gone, and electors transferred their confidence to those gentlemen who had said they would go much farther, and to that party of which Mr. Speaker was a distinguished member. All those hon. members who now occupied distinguished positions in this country, stated at the time, that were they in power they would settle the question at once, but as they were in Opposition they could only offer the minority their sympathy. It was further stated:

"But for this loss of support they need not have sold the Pacific Railway Charter in order to retain their majority in the larger Provinces. They made the mistake of paying more regard to the threats and clamour of a few fanatics in the Maritime Provinces than to the honest public opinion of the Dominion."

He greatly feared that the present Government, with their very large majority, were similarly influenced by these gentlemen—he would not distinguish them by the same epithet—the representatives of that Province.

“And this mistake proved fatal, for because of it they might have come out of the election of 1872 with a minority, if they had not made the bargain with Sir Hugh Allan, which prolonged their power for a season, but eventually involved them in ruin and disgrace. The majority of the men now in power showed, when they were in Opposition, a disposition to do justice, despite the unreasonableness of men who trade in fanaticism. They profess to be, and we believe they are, men of high principle.

“Principle, therefore, and not mere expediency must be their guide in this school question, as in all other questions, if they would not sacrifice the high reputation gained by the self-denial and the efforts of so many years.”

These were the hon. gentlemen opposite who had disposed of the school question, and to which, with expressions of satisfaction, the hon. member for Halifax had alluded the other night. Was it principle or expediency that dictated the amendment moved to his resolution and pressed before the House? When the Government had spoken on this very question, and complained of the present amendment, he was reminded of their conduct on that former occasion. They had even asked His Lordship the Bishop of New Brunswick to accept an amendment which they did not dare show him. They had not even paid His Lordship the common courtesy of placing that amendment in his hands, though they asked him to accept it, though it might mean one thing or anything. He (Mr. Costigan) was not deceived. He suspected at the time what the amendment would tend to, and his fears were realized when he heard it read. He appealed to the House, and to the sense of justice and fair play which had actuated some at least of the supporters of the hon. gentleman on this question, previously, and to those who had then so readily voted, while in Opposition, for the disallowance of the Act; but they would not even grant an adjournment of the debate or give time to look into the amendment. The motion had been voted down. The amendment had been sprung upon them, and members of the House who had been canvassed had agreed to it; and it was dangerous to allow time to consider it. The hon. gentlemen opposite might well have looked back to the course they had taken in moving that amendment when finding fault with the amendment now under discussion. It was further stated:—

“We thought that the Catholic Bishops assembled at Quebec last spring blundered sadly, when, after the refusal of Sir John A. Macdonald to give effect to the vote of the House of Commons, they advised that no further action should be taken by the advocates of freedom of education.”

This, he took it, was another evidence of the sincerity of the views entertained by Mr. Speaker at the time, and if the independence and determination with which Mr. Speaker had put them before the country then, judging from Mr. Speaker's writing, no man was high enough, or important enough to make him swerve, or render him (Mr. Speaker) open to the suspicion of not being thoroughly consistent and sound on this question. He took it that this was the reason why Mr. Speaker had not even spared the assembled bishops of the Province of Quebec who did not adopt his views at the time, which were those Mr. Speaker then certainly entertained. It was very easy to understand the course of the Bishop and clergy of Quebec on this question. The motion for disallowance had been carried, and this would necessitate the Government to give effect to it. The then Government stated in the House that they were not prepared to take that course, and referred the matter to the Judicial Committee for adjudication, and provided means to defray the expense of the enquiry. He had not approved of this, and he was prepared, as honorable members on both sides of the House were aware, to follow up the advantage they had gained. The bishops of the Province of Quebec did not take the same view, for this reason, he supposed: they thought that time should be given in order to secure the judicial opinion in England, which had been asked for, and if it was not favourable, and if the minority required any assistance after that which they could afford, they would do all in their power; but they did not want, and perhaps they did not wish, to take such steps as would defeat the Government or produce a change in the country, while there was any tribunal before whom the matter could be laid. There was no doubt that they (the Bishops) were prepared to give their sympathy and support to the minority after this appeal had failed. The Hon. Mr. Dorion, in his address to the electors of Napierville, had made a statement which gave rise to a good deal of discussion in New Brunswick, and all over the Dominion, because he seemed to foreshadow that the present Government did not recognize the existence of any duty that they owed to the minority on that question, and that they, in fact, had nothing more to do with it. This was the way in which this matter was treated in an editorial in the Freeman :—

“ We would, as we have already frequently stated, very much prefer that justice were voluntarily done by the majority of the people of New Brunswick. We would like to feel that they were willing to do the minority justice as soon as they found that the school system was indeed regarded by the minority as a violation of the rights of conscience. Mutual respect and good-will would thus best be promoted. We would like to hope, as Mr. Dorion hopes, that the Local Legislature will, next Session, so amend the law as to satisfy all parties, but the minority, who are now suffering so cruelly, cannot wait passively for relief that may never come. In very many districts their children are growing up uneducated, and all over the Province they are oppressed and plundered. If the Legislature of the Province again refuse them relief, they must again appeal to the Dominion Parliament, and no doubt they will find the zeal of some of those now in Opposition greatly quickened in their behalf. It is hard to tell when the decision of the Judicial Committee may be obtained, and if it be not obtained before the close of the next Session of Parliament, and no relief be had, meantime, from any other quarter, it is evident that they will be compelled to look to those whom the Constitution makes the guardians of their rights and liberties.”

He had endeavoured, by reading extracts from this journal, to give the reasons why the Government had grounds besides those of the public interest for the course they had pursued towards Mr. Speaker, after the formation of their Government and before the school question was brought up for the last time in the House. He had shown from the Freeman what the policy of the minority of New Brunswick on this question had been; what had been expected from their representatives in the House; and what their representatives had always advocated up to a certain time. When they were last elected they were returned on this question, and for the purpose of pursuing the same policy with regard to the school question that they had previously followed. He, at least, understood it to be their duty to advocate it in every constitutional way, and obtain relief for this minority from the Liberal as well as from the Conservative Government. He and the Speaker were the only two representatives left on that side of the question from New Brunswick. In his own county, it was true, there was a small majority of Catholics who advocated separate schools, but there was a very large majority of Protestants who advocated common schools. If he thought that question was not a very important one, if he thought it was one which might have been passed over from time to time, there would have been no necessity for him incurring the strong opposition of those electors who believed differently from him; there was no necessity of him incurring the opposition of men in his county, men who were intelligent, and who fought their political battles with determination and energy. There was no reason why he should expose himself to defeat in advocating a cause that, when he came here, he found did not really exist. He came here thoroughly believing that he had the same duty to perform as he had before. The only difference was that he asked for the support of hon. members opposite, not only on account of the vote they had given before, but also on account of the appeal they had made to the country, and the answer the country gave in that respect. In 1874, when he attempted to move that resolution, he had an advantage over the Government, an advantage which he intended to use for the benefit of the cause he advocated. He intended to ask for an amendment to the constitution. He was determined that if the House refused that amendment he would ask for the disallowance of those bills which those gentlemen voted should be disallowed. The year had not expired, and although the late Government did not feel in a position to disallow them, hon. gentlemen opposite had said that they should be disallowed, so he had the present Government at a disadvantage. This was after the time when Mr. Speaker had accepted the position which he now occupied, and which he contended, while being an honour to Mr. Speaker, and a mark of appreciation of his very distinguished abilities, was a source of regret to the friends of the cause he advocated. There were only two representatives in Parliament of 100,000 of the population in New Brunswick, yet under this fact, and at the very eve of success, at the time when the question above all others assumed a more serious aspect than before, when blood had been shed in Mr. Speaker's own constituency and the lives and property of his constituents were sacrificed, this was no time for Mr. Speaker to abandon his position of independence as a private member of the House, and accept honours and favours at the hands of the Government of the day. It was because he (Mr. Costigan) did not endorse that arrangement that he was disposed to vote as he would that day. He would do this even though he might be censured by many of his warm friends. But he preferred to risk that censure. He preferred to be blamed by those who thought him blameworthy, and so have the consciousness that he was doing his duty; and he was prepared to take the consequences. Notwithstanding the Government's strong majority there was reason to believe that, had the member for Gloucester occupied the same position he had before, that the Government could not have defeated the motion. He (Mr. Costigan) contended that he had reason to complain, although he did not complain at the time. He thought that it was disadvantage enough for the honorable member for Gloucester to have occupied the position of Speaker. But he had a greater cause for regret afterwards. Not only had he lost the assistance of the honorable member for Gloucester, but he subsequently lost his sympathy in that respect. He said that a great change had come over the honorable member's views, and while he sought advice and encouragement, he found that the honorable member thought it was inexpedient to press the matter then. Their policy was to fight this principle out until they had obtained justice. But they had not obtained justice. No change was made in the laws, no concession had been made to their rights, their position was growing daily worse, and they had been deprived of their educational privileges for three years. He believed it was his important duty to press this question before the House, and he invited a vote on it. After the question had so been raised, Mr. Speaker, in his paper, admitted that it occupied a very prominent place in the consideration of this House, and that it was generally admitted that it would probably carry by a majority of 15. Therefore the question had not lost entirely its hold upon the feelings of the members of this House. It was believed that the Government would invite an open and free expression of opinion, and would not take advantage of their influence, which was very considerable, to vote that motion down. There was no doubt that a majority of the House were prepared to do justice to the the minority, and there was no doubt of the vote until the Government called for an adjournment, assembled their friends, and insisted upon the matter being voted down in the interest of the Government. The amendment proposed by the Government was sprung upon the House; it must have borne evidence that it could possibly do no good to the cause he (Mr. Costigan) favoured. He believed at time it was killing that cause, and he now thought he was right in so thinking. The Government by this vote closed the doors of Parliament against it, although they saw it was the true solution of the difficulty. The very morning after the debate, the mouthpiece of the Government, the Ottawa Times, of March 11th, 1875, contained the following article:—

“By reference to our Parliamentary report, it will be seen that this question was disposed of at a comparatively advanced hour this morning, at 3 o'clock, by a final vote of 119 to 60.

“Mr. Costigan's motion was not directly negatived, but it is a question if its author is the better pleased on that account. That any result in the direction towards which Mr. Costigan leads, will follow from the motion as amended, is not to be expected. We trust however, that he will take the broad hint, that in a kindly spirit has been given to him, and that he will seek relief from the only authority competent to afford it. That authority he will find nearer home than either Ottawa or Westminster.”

When the battle was over the organ showed what finesse had been used in order to produce the desired result. He did not know that it would interest the House, were he to justify himself with respect to articles questioning his course, and he would, therefore, content himself with saying that when he moved the motions it was with an earnest desire to secure the remedy sought for.

Mr. CASEY said that as this motion could not be amended it would be necessary for some who did not often trouble the House, to explain their position before voting. He objected to the motion both on account of the matter contained in it and on account of the way in which it was presented. It opened with the statement of an opinion on constitutional principles upon which they were all agreed, both in the Mother Country and in Canada, and which scarcely needed to be reasserted. If the motion had stopped at the assertion that it was inexpedient that any hon. member should receive a contract from the Government, there would have been an unanimous vote on the subject. But it went on to assert matters of fact. It asserted, at least by implication, that there was a contract between the Government and a member of the House.

Mr. BOWELL: It says an "agreement," not a bargain.

Mr. CASEY: An agreement of the nature of a contract. It asserted further that this agreement was in contravention of the law providing for the Independence of Parliament, and it asked the House to affirm the question of fact, and also that there was a direct contravention of the law. He held that the House was not in a position to pronounce a deliberate judgment on either of these two points, as to the fact of the contract or as to the effect of that contract in controverting the law. With regard to the question of fact, such evidence as had been laid before the House would certainly disprove the assertion that there was a contract. There was evidence, the absence of which would negative the assertion that there was a contract. That evidence could not be taken before this House in a proper form. Therefore it was not in a position to deliberately assert that there was a contract. As to the question of law he entirely agreed that the House was not in a position to assert the legal principle, that whatever understanding did exist between the Government and Mr. Speaker was a contravention of that law. Parliament was not a legal tribunal to decide questions of law, and he was glad that, in presenting that view to the House, to have the strong authority, the legal opinion of the Leader of the Opposition himself; for it would be within the recollection of a great many hon. members, as it was within his own memory, that, in the Session of 1873, when several legal questions arose regarding the validity of certain elections to the House, the right hon. gentleman objected to their being pronounced upon by the House without reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the South Renfrew case, for example, the right hon. gentleman held that the matter should not be pronounced upon by the House, and should not even be determined upon by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but should go to a sworn Election Committee. The poll-books and other papers were submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but the hon. leader of the Government, as the right hon. member for Kingston then was, went so far as to support, in that Committee, a proposal to the effect that the matter should not be pronounced upon by that Committee, but should be referred to a Special Committee, which alone was then empowered to examine witnesses under oath. The West Peterborough case was rather different from that at present before the House. The evidence was not of the incomplete character of that now presented. Returns were placed before the House showing, on their face, a different result at the election from that which had been reported; but, notwithstanding the strong, and to the minds of many hon. members, conclusive evidence before the Committee, the hon. leader of the Government insisted that the case should be referred to a Special Committee. The right hon. gentleman said, in effect, that if the House should constitute itself a tribunal for electoral and judicial decisions it would have no time to transact the business of the country, and that such cases—and he agreed with the hon. gentleman on that point, however it might apply to the case in question—should not be made the subject to party votes in the House. He hoped the right hon. gentleman would endorse the sentiment he advanced on that occasion, and induce the hon. member for North Hastings to withdraw his motion, and prevent this question, which was affecting not only the Government but the House, from becoming the subject of a party vote. From those considerations he deduced the opinion that as to the matter of the resolution, it was not such as could fairly be brought to a vote in the House. As to the manner in which the resolution had been brought forward, he held that it was very unfair, not only to the Government but to the Speaker, and to every hon. member who ordinarily supported the Government, that such a motion should be proposed in amendment to going into Committee of Supply. The motion contained much with which they all agreed, and also much which many hon. gentlemen must hold to be at least unproved, if not disproved. The hon. member for North Hastings had asked the House either to accept the motion as a whole or reject it as a whole. They were not allowed to amend the motion, to retain such portions as they believed were proper, and reject such portions as they did not approve, but they were called upon to either accept or reject the whole. He supposed the hon. member thought it would be a very bitter pill for supporters of the Government, though he had conveyed it with a sugar-coating, which was a very peculiar kind of sugar-coating, for he placed at the beginning of the resolution such an axiomatic statement of principle as no one could deny, and followed it up by statements which hon. members could not endorse, in order to be able to go to the country during the next summer and approaching elections, and tell his constituents throughout the country that the “mechanical majority” in the House had voted in negation of a principle which was admitted by all lovers of constitutional practice. He considered that the manner in which the hon. member for North Hastings had mixed matters in his motion so as to, per force, compel supporters of the Government to apparently oppose constitutional principles, was a sufficient reason in itself for rejecting the whole resolution; and he felt that, in rejecting that resolution, he was not violating the principle affirmed, which was a wholesome principle. He hoped every supporter of the Government would vote against the motion, by doing which they merely wished to show to Mr. Speaker and the Government that fair play and that chance to exculpate themselves from the charge, which every hon. member had the right to demand. It was worthy of notice that Mr. Speaker could not, in the House, defend himself from the frequent and bitter attacks made upon him, and had no opportunity to answer even misstatements, if misstatements were made. Mr. Speaker could not leave the chair and call upon any hon. member to fill it while he remained in the House to make explanations, and the only possible opportunity he could have to clear himself was, to make a statement on oath before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and he considered Mr. Speaker should have that privilege in justice to himself. The right hon. member for Kingston appeared to have taken the line of argument, that Mr. Speaker had been driven into the matter by the Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to have divided the management of the case: the hon. member for North Hastings inflicted the wound on Mr. Speaker, while the right hon. member for Kingston acted the part of pouring oil into the wound and wine into his mouth, in other words, that of the good Samaritan, as distinguished from the part played by the hon. member for North Hastings. He was sorry to have noticed that the oil was rather acrid, and the wine he was afraid was rather sour, judging from the tone of the right hon. gentleman's remarks, which, although appearing favourable to Mr. Speaker, were rather of a sardonic or sarcastic nature than otherwise. In fact, the right hon. gentleman seemed to have laid before himself the difficult task of urging that the seat of Mr. Speaker was made void, and, at the same time, contending that they of the Opposition were the best friends of Mr. Speaker, and that they with whom he had always worked had acted ungenerously. That was the task which the right hon. gentleman laid out for himself, but he would find it a very difficult one to carry out. He had now given his reasons for opposing the motion of the hon. member for North Hastings. It was impossible, as he had noticed, to amend the motion; he intended to do the next best thing, viz.: at the earliest possible moment, when the practice of the House would allow, to propose such a motion as would bring the whole matter before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and so give Mr. Speaker the privilege of stating his case under oath and of giving such evidence as could not be rejected by the Committee and the House, and also allow the Government a chance to state their case, and allow the House finally to come to a deliberate and judicial decision upon the whole matter. He pronounced no opinion on the merits of the case; such would be inconsistent with what he had already said. He had his own individual opinion, but he considered it would be inconsistent with constitutional practice if he should express any opinion at the present time. He would merely say that the question should be thoroughly inquired into by a Committee, and on its report the House should base its formal decision. He considered that in this matter the House should know the opinion of the Government; that after the statement he had made of his intention to move the motion he had indicated, the leader of the Government should give the House the opinion, more distinctly than he had done, whether such a motion referring the matter to a Committee would be agreed to and supported by them. Having thus placed the matter before the House and the Government, he would ask the leader of the Government what course they intended to take in regard to that question.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that no hon. member could rise to speak upon so delicate a subject as that under discussion, with Mr. Speaker in the Chair, without feeling he was treading on delicate ground; but he trusted that in any remarks which he might feel it his duty to make, he would not disregard any rule of propriety in debate. He could re-echo the sentiment expressed by the right hon. member for Kingston with regard to the able and impartial manner in which Mr. Speaker had discharged his duties. But personal feelings could not be allowed to come between an hon. member and the discharge of his duty. Hon. gentlemen opposite were endeavouring to get out of what they felt to be a very difficult and awkward position, not only after the professions made in the country, but after stating that they considered what the Government had done was improper. They, however, throw the blame upon Mr. Speaker, and called upon their friends to vote down the motion. The hon. member for West Elgin had declared that Mr. Speaker should be allowed the opportunity of appearing before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and denying the charge on oath. The motion did not, however, contain any charge against Mr. Speaker, the charge was made against the Government—that it was inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract by which public money was paid to any member of Parliament. That was the first proposition affirmed, and the reason given for it was, because such payments were in contravention of an Act passed to secure the Independence of Parliament. According to the rendering of the Act given by the hon. the Minister of Justice, it meant that there was no harm in the Government entering into such a contract, and that the Act did not say the Government should not do it. But the object of the Act was to secure the Independence of Parliament, and to take care that no contractors, placemen or office-holders should have seats in the House. He wished to call the attention of hon. members to the remarkable correspondence which had been submitted to the House, which was remarkable, not only for what it contained, but for what was omitted. They were told that when the Government acceded to office they wrote to the Post-office Inspector in the Maritime Provinces, instructing him to remove the printing from the friends of the late Government, and give it to the friends of the present Administration. Why was that letter not brought down? In 1875, the attention of the Government was called to the question of Government printing in the Maritime Provinces, and a letter was written, stating that hereafter the work would be done at Ottawa. It appeared, from the letters of the hon. the Postmaster-General, that the reason for making the change was not owing to the fact that the Government felt it was wrong and inexpedient to allow printing to be done by a newspaper office owned by a member of this House, but because the work could be done at less cost at Ottawa. Therefore, the attempt of the Government to gain a little credit for having changed the system, could not be sustained. In a letter from the Post Office Department, on March 3rd, 1876, it was stated that representations had been made to the Postmaster-General that the parties who supplied the stationery had a large quantity of paper on hand. Who made those representations? However, pressure was brought to bear on the Government which induced them, subsequently, to write the letter of 22nd April. The letter read:—

“I am to inform you that the Postmaster-General has consented to the printing, by the Freeman office, of such forms as are required in large quantities for the use of the office for the ensuing three months.”

That convicted the Government of having the facts before them, and of deliberately writing a letter to give work to a member of Parliament. No more damaging letter could be brought from the files of the Department, or could have been written by an opponent of the Government than that brought down by the Government themselves. They knew that they were giving work to a member of Parliament, and therefore they could not plead ignorance, and state that, as soon as it came to their knowledge they stopped the abuse. But the hon. the First Minister said he regretted it. Regretted what? The hon. the Minister of Justice said they had done no wrong; he said the Government had a perfect right to give a contract or an office to a member of Parliament. But what did the hon. gentleman wish the House to infer from that? That Mr. Speaker had done the wrong in taking the contract. That accusation was not made by the resolution, which threw the blame on the Government. When Mr. Speaker considered the fact that the hon. Minister of Justice had thrown the whole onus of the transaction upon him, he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) thought he might be thankful that, in describing it, the hon. gentleman used a little of the Christian virtue of charity which he did not always display when speaking of his political opponents. Mr. Speaker would be glad to know that this was no crime. He agreed with the hon. the Minister of Justice that there was not; but he had heard that hon. gentleman intimate that the conduct of the hon. member for Kingston was nothing short of criminal when he was enjoying the benefits of a contribution paid, but not contributed, by a railway company. He was glad to know that the hon. gentleman, in the course of a few weeks had become a little softened and mollified, and he hoped that hereafter the same charity would be extended towards his political opponents as he extended to his friends. What was the duty of the hon. gentleman in this matter? It was his duty, when the facts of this or any other case came to his knowledge, to lay them before the House, so that action, if action were needed, might be taken upon them. One month ago the report of the Committee on Public Accounts brought those facts to the attention of the House, and even late as it was then, it was the duty of the hon. gentleman to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to be inquired into. But as he had not seen fit to do so, they could only ask him to read the law and give his opinion on it. The hon. gentleman admitted the point in the resolution. He admitted that “it is inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract whereby public money is paid to members of Parliament,” and that those payments were “calculated to detract from the independence of the members of this House.” But the hon. gentleman said those payments were not in contravention of the Act to secure the Independence of Parliament. It was due to the House that the hon. gentleman should state whether the facts before the House did or did not bear out this case. Did he mean to say that the money was paid without any consideration; that no value was given? There was a return which stated that this money was paid as "per agreement." He would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether such a payment was in contravention to the Act. The hon. gentleman refused to give an opinion; he knew his reputation as a lawyer would suffer if he declared it was not a contravention of the Act. The hon. gentleman tried to hide himself by silence, but, at the same time, he would vote that it was not in contravention of the Act.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman said "no,"—he would vote for the resolution which declared that such payments were calculated to detract from the independence of members of this House if a different word to contravention were used; therefore, did he not say by his vote that it was not a contravention of the Act of Parliament? He would call the Speaker as a witness to prove that the seat was not called into question by the resolution under discussion. One of the Standing Orders of this House was that if anything should come into question touching the return or election of any man, the member was to retire during the debate. The very fact of the Speaker's presence now, demonstrated that he did not consider his seat was in question. Hon. members might laugh, but they were trying to laugh at a small matter and creep out of a small hole. The hon. member for West Elgin said he was very sorry for what had been done; but, in order to get the mechanical majority to support the Government, he promised to sacrifice the Speaker and then send the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Of course, the hon. the Minister of Justice was right in saying that there was nothing wrong in the Government giving a contract to a member; but it was wrong in them to conceal the facts from Parliament and the country, and not to issue at once a writ for a new election to fill the vacancy caused thereby, or to acquaint the House of the facts so that they might be enquired into by the Committee. It was the concealment of the facts that made this matter doubly wrong on the part of the Government. The hon. the Postmaster General said that the motion did not suit him, but that if the blame were put on some one else besides the Government he would vote for it. Now, with reference to the weeping and wailing of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who propounded the extraordinary position that the passage of the resolution would have the effect of extracting from the Speaker's pockets £60,000, he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) did not know whether the hon. gentleman was sorry for the Speaker or for the £60,000. It was the first time, however, that he had heard a person acquainted with the laws of the country give utterance to the opinion that the Judges would be governed by a simple resolution of this House. It was the first time that he had heard that a resolution of this House became law. Before anything became law it required the assent of the other chamber and the assent of the representative of the Crown. He hoped that the hon. gentleman would show that he had reconsidered this matter and found that his opinion of the law was wrong, and that he would vote for the resolution to show that he had recanted this erroneous doctrine.

Mr. MASSON said it was evident the Government felt keenly the sad and unfortunate position in which they were placed at this moment, when a person, occupying the position of the hon. member for West Elgin, informed the House that if the Government would promise to refer this question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the difficulty which existed would not be so great to overcome. He would ask that hon. gentleman and the Government if such a course would relieve them of the difficulties surrounding this question, why they did not, two years ago, adopt the course which was now suggested? How was it that they allowed an hon. member to sit here in contravention of the law, and placed one of their supporters under the necessity of saying, if they would place themselves right, he would swallow the pill. The hon. gentleman was giving a vote of non-confidence in his friends—he was blaming his friends for what they had done—a position out of which they could not get. How could the hon. gentlemen expect a Prime Minister to admit that he had been wrong for two years, and to say, in effect, that if his followers were only good children and swallowed the pill well he would at once refer the matter to the Committee. He thought that the House would agree with him that, never in the history of the country, at all events since Confederation, had any Government been placed in the humiliating position that the present Government were in by the assertions, demands and requirements of their own friends. There was no more difficult or disagreeable position than to be obliged to argue in favour of a thing which they knew to be false—than to be in the position in which the hon. gentlemen opposite were. Had it not been for the ability of the hon. the Minister of Justice nothing would have been said on the question from the Ministerial side of the House. When they saw the hon. the Postmaster-General, a master of language and ideas, was unable to say a single word in favour of the Government, when they saw the whip of the party stand up and admit what he had done, there must be something wrong. The Ministers, it was evident did not know how to defend the case; they each defended it in their own way. The effect of the speech of the hon. the Minister of Public Works was to make a scapegoat of the Speaker. Not having the intimation from the hon. gentleman, another hon. member got up and declared it was unfair to bring this matter up when the Speaker was in the Chair and unable to defend himself. The hon. the Minister of Justice came forward and said the position of his hon. friend was an absurd one—that the proper course would be to refer the question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Unfortunately another hon. gentleman, who had not received the hint from the hon. the Minister of Justice, said the motion was a very clever one, and was made to catch the votes of the pure Grits. That hon. gentleman seemed to think that the Rouges of Quebec would have no difficulty in swallowing the pill.

Now those gentlemen were from his own Province, and he did not like to see them abused; he would like it understood that they had as much virtue as the Grits. There was, however, a great deal of force in the position taken by the hon. mover of the amendment with reference to the Liberal party of Ontario. What was the position the Ministers of the Crown were taking in defending this hopeless case? When he spoke on Protection the other night, he never expected that this statement would be realized so soon. It was said, on the other side of the House, that they would not put into execution the promises they made while in Opposition if they attained power, and he had then said that a party who would advocate principles in Opposition which they were not ready to act upon when in power, was unworthy of the designation of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition; and also that the great reason for the reaction now going on in the country was because the Liberal party were, one after the other, repudiating all the principles they had advocated when in Opposition. And but a few days afterwards, they saw the Leader of the Government make an appeal to his friends to repudiate openly, and, for party purposes, the most important principles they had advocated before the country during the past twenty years, and to respect which they had taken a great deal of trouble to train the people of the country. They all knew that this had been one of the greatest planks in the platform of the Liberal Party throughout the whole Dominion. But a few years ago, since Confederation, he had been present in the Local Legislature of Quebec when the Independence of Parliament Act was being discussed. The Liberal Party was represented there by able men, and they all inveighed upon the great necessity for the Government to impose restrictions upon the employment of members of the House, and the giving to them of lucrative positions and contracts, also upon the necessity for purity everywhere; and they went so far as to desire the Government not to give a single contract for the building of a single colonization road, if it was for over $400. Hon. gentlemen opposite had held that no member of the House, while such, should be even employed in a legal capacity, and, nevertheless, he feared that these hon. gentlemen, or a great many of them would be so carried away by party spirit as to vote against the professions which they had so loudly advocated a few years ago. Their position must be a sad one, when they saw the Minister of Justice, who could manufacture arguments if they did not already exist, obliged to have recourse to defend himself to the tu quoque argument, which the hon. gentleman had so much despised a few nights previous. Then, when the Minister of Public Works was discussing a public question, the hon. gentleman sought to defend himself by casting a reproach at the right hon. member for Kingston; but the Minister of Justice, following his colleague, declared that the Liberal Party had lived long enough to be responsible for its own acts instead of justifying itself by the faults of its predecessors in office. The Opposition thought this rather hard on the Minister of Public Works, but this was a matter for the hon. gentlemen to settle between themselves; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake), notwithstanding his great ability, had, the other night, been forced, on this question, to have recourse to the tu quoque argument in order to defend the Government. The hon. gentleman reproached the hon. member for Kingston for having approved of the practice of allowing placemen to sit in the House, and stated that it was more important to keep placemen than contractors out of the House. He thought this was a great mistake. The reason why public opinion was formed in England against the appointment of placemen was because, in the time of George the Third, the House of Commons was crowded with what were called placemen. This became an evil. In fact, in the House, at that time, there existed a party which was neither Liberal nor Whig nor Tory, but which was called the King's Friends. It was then necessary to pass enactments to avoid the recurrence of such evils, but there were no contractors in the British House of Commons; and it was not necessary to create such a feeling in the old country against them as existed against placemen. The difference between placemen and contractors was similar to the difference between sentiment and reality. When the hon. member for Kingston allowed placemen to sit in the House, he stated that it was upon this great principle, that if men had special qualifications necessary for the public good, he could do as was done in England—take them from the House of Commons and employ them; and even, as was done in England, take them, if he chose, out of the ranks of the party and employ them; but the hon. gentleman never gave them contracts, and never allowed Government contractors to sit in the House. The reason for this was very simple: every body knew what a placeman was—he received a certain salary, so much a month; but who could tell the salary of a contractor? It was unlimited. A contractor could make any amount of money. The principle applying to these cases was, consequently, not the same. The Minister of Public Works had tried to smooth down the difficulty by saying that they had disapproved of this arrangement at the time, but that they could not cancel it entirely. This was the old story over and over again. The hon. gentleman sought to make of Mr. Speaker a scape-goat for themselves. In the Post Office matter the hon. gentleman knew that the Postmaster-General who had committed this blunder was no longer a member of the Government, and consequently this gentleman, who now occupied a high position elsewhere, was held up as the guilty party. The hon. gentlemen opposite turned round and said: "Oh, it was a bad bargain, but we had nothing to do with it. Attack the party who was guilty of it;" but the party said to be so guilty was out of their reach. This was not the only instance in which the Government had done a pusillanimous act unworthy of themselves. This was an act for which they must be held responsible, unless they had disavowed distinctly, fairly and honestly, all connection with it. Some five years ago when the question of reducing the tax on tea was brought up, and they were asked to take flour and bread stuffs off the free list, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) voted in favour of a tax on flour, and with his hon. friend the member for Kingston. This proved that this hon. gentleman could be sometimes responsible for the faults committed by his predecessors in office.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I want you to show me that.

Mr. MASSON said this was not all. It was the systematic policy of hon. gentlemen opposite always to get out of a scrape by throwing the blame on some one else when they were attacked. Hon. members recollected the discussion on the immigration question, and the immense blunder committed by the Government in sending back to Europe, at the cost of $5,000 or $6,000, immigrants brought out to this country at great expense; and what was the answer of these hon. gentlemen? Did they boldly and frankly, as Ministers of the Crown should do, say, "We feel ourselves responsible for it." No; but they said, as the Minister of Finance declared, that, as soon as they heard of it, they put a stop to it, and threw the blame on Mr. Letellier who had become Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. The Minister of Justice also in this case said, in as plain language as he could, that they were not guilty of paying money over to a member of the House, but that the member of the House who received their money was the guilty party. But there were always two parties to every infraction of the law. Only a few days ago the Government had stated as their reason for not giving some contract to some one in the Lower Provinces, that they could not do it according to the provisions of the Independence of Parliament Act. This was in answer to the hon. member for Victoria. If Mr. Speaker was guilty in receiving money from the Government while a member of the House, he submitted to every man of common sense whether the Government, who gave this money to the Speaker, were not as guilty as the person who received it. The Government were the parties who should have remedied the evil, and vindicated the independence of Parliament. It was unworthy of the Ministers of the Crown to fall back on Mr. Speaker, and say that they were not guilty in this matter, but that Mr. Speaker was guilty. The Government should not have allowed Mr. Speaker to remain in his seat after he had no right to it. Hon. members might say and argue what they chose, but these were broad facts before the House. An agreement had been entered into for the doing of certain printing, and the person with whom that agreement was made was a member of the House; he accomplished the contract, and he received the money. He believed that they were bound, unless they wished to repudiate the whole principles of their past, to vote for the motion and against the Government for the abuse of their power, committed in order to do an act which violated the law of the land, and which, though, under the present circumstances, he hoped and thought it had no bad results, under other circumstances, when a Government less pure and less honest in professions than the gentlemen opposite might hold the reins of power, might be made use of as a precedent for the awarding of contracts to members of the House, and probably to Speakers of the House.

Mr. RYMAL said he thought that a little boiling down would bring this matter into a more narrow compass. He presumed that it was right and Parliamentary usage, under the circumstances, for the Opposition to move a motion like the present one; but, after twenty years of experience in Parliament, he had never known of a Government who did not treat such a motion as a motion of want of confidence. If his hon. friends opposite were really so wonderfully anxious to secure the purity and independence of Parliament, they would have made this motion some time ago, when this arrangement or contract or whatever they might call it, was in progress; but the hon. gentlemen had waited their time and watched for their opportunity. As he had told his friends a few weeks ago, the Opposition meant business. They were piling up a record—if it were possible—against the Government to use at the coming elections. If there was any truth in the old saying, that the best protectors were manufactured out of old criminals, he warned his friends that any dereliction of duty on their part would be sure to be found out. He would give his view on the matter. He looked upon this motion as a call for a direct vote of want of confidence. He had taken his views on the duty of a member of Parliament as regarded votes of want of confidence, from the teachings of his hon. friend the member for Kingston. He had heard the hon. gentleman frequently say to his followers in times of dire necessity—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Like this.

Mr. RYMAL: No; the hon. gentleman was not in dire necessity. The hon. gentleman was in great want, which would be supplied, if, by any means, the hon. gentleman could cross the floor and take his seat on the Treasury Benches. The doctrine the hon. gentleman had taught him, and which he had received from prominent politicians in Canada eighteen or twenty years ago, when he first entered Parliament, was, that when a vote of want of confidence in one's friends was moved, if they had one's confidence as to the general administration of affairs, that part of the motion was altogether to be lost sight of, and that one was to vote with his friends if they otherwise retained his confidence, against the proposition of his opponents. This was the case to-day. He had no hesitation in voting against this motion, once, twice, and thrice if necessary, in order to sustain his friends, because the results of a vote against them was to be considered; and when he looked on the Opposition benches he saw the materials of which the former Government had been composed. That Government, he fancied, had not reflected a great deal of credit on Canada, nor had they attracted the admiration of the world. When he had to come to a conclusion between those who were in and those who were out, of whom a Government was to be manufactured if this Administration were defeated, he did not hesitate a moment in saying that he should vote for those who were in. He was not going to speak as to the merits of the question. He did not believe that it was right—Mr. Speaker, one of the parties concerned, being in the Chair—to condemn him without being heard. He believed in British fair play, and in the laws enacted by the British people, which secured fair play to each and every one of them. He thought that the matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that after a thorough investigation into all the circumstances connected with what was called a contract, the facts should be reported to the House; and if Mr. Speaker had violated the law, of course he would have to suffer the consequences. If his friends were shown to have corruptly entered into a bargain for the purpose of corrupting Mr. Speaker, he did not hesitate a moment in telling them that when he was convinced that they had been guilty of any corrupt act, he should no longer sustain them in the Government. He would inform those who had not had so enlightened an experience of Canadian Parliamentary life as he had himself enjoyed, that this was a trap set, according to the old saying, by knaves to catch fools. He trusted that the purely specious pleading which they had heard had had no effect on the minds of the friends of the Government. If they valued the position which the Liberal Party had attained in the Dominion, and recollected the long and ardent and almost violent struggle they had gone through to obtain it, and if they believed that the interests of Canada would be best served by the perpetuation of the rule of the Liberal Party, they should stand by the Government in the hour of need. What were friends worth if they were not friends in the hour of need? He had never heard his hon. friend from Kingston say himself, but he had frequently heard that the hon. gentleman had often said to his friends: "When I am right my opponents will sustain me, but when I am wrong I want to be sustained by my friends." He could quite understand how hon. gentlemen of that state of mind said that, because the Government had sinned in a slight degree, that was no reason why they should eject them from office, and call back those who, they believed, had sacrificed the best interests of the country. He, for one, would not do it, through fear of going back to his constituents. He had often heard it said that those who had a palpitating heart when they passed the graves of their friends, made a great noise in order to keep up their courage. This, he fancied, was the case with his hon. friends opposite. If they looked at the political graveyards, they would find their friends' tombs; and, when they passed, they fancied they saw some horrible hobgoblins.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: We see a resurrection.

Mr. RYMAL said there was a resurrection to two different conditions. Hon. gentlemen opposite talked about a great reaction in the public mind, and there was some slight evidence of a change. He had often heard reference made as to the different character of the representation of the two ridings of Ontario. Those who knew the history of the county of Ontario best, would know that, for the last twenty years, almost as regularly as an election occurred, the character of the representation was changed. He had heard his hon. friend from Kingston plainly tell the House that the riding was his especial property.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think not.

Mr. RYMAL: But it went into the hands of other owners at the next election. Some seats had been lost in Lower Canada, he knew; but he did not believe that the reaction, about which there was so much boasting, had occurred to any appreciable extent. He was not afraid to go back to the people. He did not believe that the Canadian people were so lost to all sense of shame that they would call back to power the men who disgraced the institutions of our country and degraded themselves.

Mr. MACMILLAN said, no matter under what circumstances the motion had been brought before the House, it was there, and had been discussed by both parties, and it was desirable that the Session should not be continued any longer until a conclusion had been arrived at as to whether the course pursued by the Government with reference to this matter was correct or not. The important point for them to consider was, whether Mr. Speaker had had a contract with the Administration for which he had received a certain amount, as stated by the Public Accounts Committee. If this was a fact, then it was certain that he committed a contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act. If they were to believe the Public Accounts that this contract had been running from 1873-74 until last summer, continually—and not only did the Public Accounts show this, but there had been positive assertions to the same effect from the First Minister and the Minister of Justice—then Mr. Speaker was not entitled to a seat in the Chamber, and his constituency was actually unrepresented at this moment. It was necessary to enquire whether Mr. Speaker had received any assistance in carrying out that contract. From the evidence adduced it was clear that he had received a certain amount of money for the performance of a contract, that the contract was made by a previous Postmaster-General, and that it was continued by the subsequent Postmaster-General, and that the Government, from time to time, had ordered the amounts to be paid. He contended the Government were as guilty as if the present Postmaster-General had ordered the contract in the first instance. Morally they were just as guilty for the political acts of their colleagues as if they themselves had committed them. Even supposing the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario had made the contract, who should the people of Canada look to as knowing that a breach of the Independence of Parliament was committed more than to the hon. the Minister of Justice? Even after the present Postmaster-General discovered the arrangement that had been made, he did not discontinue it immediately, but he allowed the contract to run, at least, until all the material was worked out. The hon. the Minister of Justice either drew attention to the Pacific scandal and Col. Gray's case for the purpose of diverting the attention of the House, or as a precedent. If it was for the purpose of a precedent, then he was astonished that an hon. gentleman who held that high position at the bar of Ontario, which the hon. the Minister of Justice did, should ever be guilty of quoting a precedent which he had held to be directly unconstitutional and which had been reserved. It might be that the hon. the Minister of Justice desired to call away the attention of the House, and he could readily understand why the Government should not wish the matter proved as it should be. Before the hon. the Minister closed his remarks, he asserted that he was not going to express an opinion upon this subject at the present time; that it was not customary to do so. This was much like a criminal who when arraigned and asked whether he was guilty or not guilty, replied that he was not certain until he had heard the evidence and the finding of the jury. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied as to whether the Government and Mr. Speaker had been guilty of a contravention of this Act or not until the case was sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to ascertain whether they were guilty or not. He (Mr. Macmillan) contended that this Committee was merged in the whole House. Its members were selected from and were a part of this House, and this House in its entirety was much more capable of hearing a discussion upon this important subject, and of giving a correct judgment with reference to it, than the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The majority of the members of the Committee would at least be favourable to the Government, and would show their kindness to them as far as possible. He had no doubt that all hon. members who supported the Government would be so on this occasion, but he did not think that one hon. member could conscientiously say that the course pursued by the Government in this matter was one to be supported. He was not going to say that any hon. member who voted for the Government would be defeated when he again went before the people, but he would say that he did not think they would have the chance of supporting their party as a Government in the next Parliament.

Mr. KERR said he knew it to be a fact that a large number of his constituents felt that there was a certain class in the Dominion who had not received that consideration to which they were entitled. He knew, further, that this class looked with pride and satisfaction to the fact that one of their members had been elevated to the highest and most honourable position that could be occupied by any hon. member of this House. And he knew, also, that the hon. gentleman who promoted this motion did so as a direct thrust, not only at Mr. Speaker, but at a large body of people in this Dominion. The motion was a two-fold motion, as it affirmed two things. In the first place, it stated that the Government was entitled to the censure of the House and the country; and, secondly, that the First Commoner in the Dominion was not entitled to a seat in this House. The hon. member for North Hastings, who, according to his own view, was the very High Priest of British liberty, was depriving a man, against whom he made the most serious allegations, of the power to open his mouth. He (Mr. Kerr) wanted this fact to go throughout the length and breadth of the country; from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver Island. If it was a sincere effort to purge the House of impurity, he would render his hearty co-operation; but if it was to make political capital, while the pretended purpose would not be accomplished, he had no sympathy with the motion. When the West Peterborough case came up in March, 1873, if his recollection served him, it was moved that it should be disposed of by this House. The right hon. member for Kingston, however, said the time of this House must not be taken up by trying cases of this kind, that there was only one proper tribunal before which cases of this kind must go.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You voted the other way.

Mr. KERR said, if there were any case at all presented by this motion, it ought to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Did not my hon. friend vote against the West Peterborough case going to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. KERR said he did not. His experience in Parliament was not very long, and, if he had to witness, Session after Session, what he had seen time and again this Session, he would not care how soon it was terminated. He hoped every hon. member would resolve to lift these discussions into a higher grade, and not take each other by the throat as if they were wild beasts. There was one point, if the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) were correctly reported, as to the amount of money received by the Speaker as a member of this House, to which he (Mr. Kerr) would refer, not because it was a remark made fearlessly and boldly in the discharge of duty, but he thought the hon. gentleman might have spared that remark—a reference to his having perquisites and all that, in his position as Speaker. Perhaps the Speaker had some perquisites, but he was sure the hon. gentleman shared the benefit of any hospitality he so liberally dispensed, and might have spared him the remark.

Mr. BOWELL: You are mistaken.

Mr. KERR said he rejoiced that the Government of the day, and the Speaker in common with them, made their residence in the capital of the Dominion a home for the members of the House.

Mr. BOWELL: Now refer to the Hon. Mr. Blake's speech, on the same question, will you?

Mr. KERR said the motion started out with the statement that it was improper for the Government to enter into contracts whereby any public money should be paid to any member of this House. He supposed they were all in sympathy with that. He did not find in the law that it was not legal for the Government to give out such contracts, but he hoped they never would do so. Then it stated that the Speaker had received that money in direct violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. In the first place, he (Mr. Kerr), and, he supposed, any gentleman accustomed to weigh evidence as a lawyer must weigh it, was not disposed to take these two statements as proven before the House. There might be a contract, but he did not know of it. He was not disposed to accept the statement of the hon. gentlemen opposite on that subject, as he had heard so many statements made by them not confirmed by facts. So he asked, if there were an agreement or contract, to let it go to the tribunal before which these facts could be established, and if the hon. gentleman desired to have the facts proved before the proper tribunal it was not necessary for him to make such a long or to some extent inflammable speech. In happy contrast to that speech was the speech of the hon. the leader of the Government. He said honestly he did not approve of the Government entering into contracts or agreements with members of this House, but he did not attempt to deny it; because, very properly, he did not consider this was the time to discuss whether that allegation was a fact or merely an allegation. Then they had the speech of the right hon. member for Kingston, a gentleman for whose talents and long public career he (Mr. Kerr) had a very great deal of respect and admiration, admitting, however, a great many drawbacks. But the most amusing part of the right hon. gentleman's speech was when he wished the Speaker to consider not only that he was not his opponent, but that he was almost his champion on the floor of the House. He (Mr. Kerr) supposed the Speaker did not wish the hon. gentleman or himself (Mr. Kerr) or any one else to be his champion, but so long as he was in the House he would always be a champion for fair play. The right hon. gentleman had, in times past, given the Speaker substantial evidence of his sincere, devoted and gushing friendship for him, and he had no doubt that the yearning gushing feeling of love for him had increased with increasing years. The hon. gentleman would not do the Speaker any harm, he seemed to sugar him all over that he might, like the whale—though the whale had a small throat—swallow him.

Mr. ROCHESTER: A white shark

Mr. KERR said he thought of how many of his own friends, politically, the hon. gentleman had slain, of how many political wrecks made by the right hon. gentleman—having come to grief through trying to follow him—were to be found in almost every riding of this Dominion.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. KERR resumed his speech. He said, when the Speaker left the Chair at six o'clock, the House was contemplating a very beautiful, but very extraordinary picture. They were just beholding the right hon. member for Kingston in the attitude of clasping Mr. Speaker to his fatherly bosom, and as Mr. Speaker was proceeding from this chamber and the right hon. gentleman followed him, it would require no very great exercise of the faculty of imagination to hear that right hon gentleman humming that innocent little ditty: "Glad to meet, sorry to part, and glad to meet again." He wished the smiling face of the right hon. gentleman graced this chamber at this moment, but no doubt his lasting, his sincere, his unadulterated friendship for Mr. Speaker would draw him to the Chamber to see that this side of the House at least did him no injustice in this debate. He would, however, ask Mr. Speaker to recollect a sentiment to be found in his classical reading in his college days, which, if he recollected right, ran this way: Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. He feared that this aptly illustrated the kind of friendship which Mr. Speaker had reason to expect from those who were professing it to-night. Let Mr. Speaker beware, notwithstanding all those professions of friendship, lest by to-morrow morning's cock crow, at any rate before the cock should have crowed thrice, they would not have denied him thrice. He could not understand the position or attitude of any man, much less a man of the commanding talent and high position of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, expressing friendship for Mr. Speaker, and stating that it was his intention to do him no political harm. While he was extending the right hand of fellowship to Mr. Speaker, he was, by the very vote which he said he was about to give, by the utterances which he had made on the floor of the House, he was holding a political dagger to take away Mr. Speaker's political life. The right hon. gentleman said: "What further evidence do you want than you have in the return on the table, that the law of the land had been violated, and that the Government deserves the censure of this House." He was not prepared to take that position. He would not do any man, much less a man who occupied, and so worthily and ably occupied, the proud prominence of Mr. Speaker as the First Commoner in Canada, such a wrong. Though he saw nothing but simply voting this motion down, yet he would not hesitate one moment as to the line of his duty. He felt that it was his duty to vote this motion down, not that he admitted that the facts were true, or denied that they were untrue—he neither did one nor the other—but that he wished to see the matter referred to the proper tribunal, and to give Mr. Speaker the inherent right which every British subject had, of being heard when he was attacked. Politically speaking, the members of the Opposition had Mr. Speaker by the throat, and he had to sit in the Chair, and, according to the usages and practices of Parliament, he had not the liberty of opening his lips. That being the case, how much more was it the duty of every honest thinking man in this House to give Mr. Speaker an opportunity to defend himself. He trusted that hon. gentlemen would see that that was the only just and proper course. He humbly submitted that it was. And let hon. members on the other side recollect that, in asking that this matter be referred to the proper tribunal, they did not ask that it be referred to a tribunal of the Government's own appointing, but a tribunal appointed by the whole House, and in a proper and constitutional manner. If that were done, then Mr. Speaker would have an opportunity of being tried by those who were, in the sense of the law, his peers. That was the only proper, honest and fair course, and he appealed to the honesty and sense of fair-play of hon. gentlemen opposite to take that course; and, depend upon it, they would never regret it. It was said that the object of the motion was to damage the Gov-erument in the eyes of the people. He had no right to impute motives, but he had a right to appeal to their sense of fair-play; and when that proper tribunal should have heard all that could be said in regard to the substantiation of the allegations, and all that could be said in rebuttal, if, unhappily, those facts were established so that no man could have a reasonable doubt, painful and heart-burning though it would be, it would be better that any man, however high his position, should be sacrificed, than that the law of the country should be broken. But let them go to work in a constitutional and parliamentary way to ascertain the facts of the case. He submitted that the motion before the House would not end in that, and had not that in view. It would not be many hours before they would see who were the friends of Mr. Speaker. That was an important matter, but the greater consideration and the all-paramount important fact was, that the House and the country would see who was prepared for fair-play. He did not intend to protract his remarks; it was his intention to have closed in a few minutes, had it not been six o'clock; but he was told that this was virtually, and was intended to be, a vote of want of confidence in the Administration of the day. To look at a vote of want of confidence, they should examine into its results and see what it involved. It not only involved a want of confidence in the present Administration, but confidence in the opponents of the Administration. If that be the alternative he must confess that he would feel sad if he thought a vote of that kind would pass. There might be a minority, but it was a comparatively small one in this country, who had not the fullest confidence in the Government of the day. He might be asked why the Government should not have confidence in the Opposition. He would tell them why. Because, at no very distant day, they pronounced a want of confidence in the gentlemen now forming the Opposition, so overwhelmingly, that it was heard all throughout the land. Now, he understood that if a man committed a fault, upon certain conditions being complied with, he might be forgiven.

It was the same in politics as in morals and other high questions. If a man did wrong and repented, then he had some reason to expect forgiveness. But what was the case with the Opposition of the day. They had not admitted that they were wrong. They said that the people were all wrong. The people did not think so, nor did they think so at the time. No sign of repentance came from the hon. gentlemen composing the Opposition. He referred now to their history, which culminated in that mammoth, gigantic Pacific matter. The only wrong about it was the fact that they had not succeeded in covering it up so that it could not be ferreted out; or, if he might presume to use the eloquent language of the eloquent and peerless Minister of Justice, when he said: "I have no sympathy with those moralists who regret not the commission of a sin, but the fact of the discovery of that sin." The eloquent member for Cumberland had referred to the supporters of the Government as the mechanical Opposition in the House, but they could afford to submit to this kind of thing, because as the old Englishman said, when he was asked why he allowed his wife continually to scold and upbraid him—"It pleases she and doesn't hurt I; and what is the difference." The hon. member for Cumberland had frequently reminded the House that, sooner or later, every member in it would have to appear before their respective constituents. He was aware of that, and he did not need to be told of it every afternoon and evening. He would not fear that time when it came, and the course he was now taking, he believed would strengthen him in the confidence and good judgment of his constituents. He was rejoiced to know that not only the gentlemen on that, but also those on the other side of the House, would have to appear before their constituents at an early day and give an account of their stewardship. He would like to know what kind of an account hon. gentlemen opposite would then give for having taken up an undue proportion of the time of the House in speaking of and abusing the Government and their supporters, for which, for the reason he had just mentioned, they need not care. He was told that the present Government were unworthy of the confidence of the country. He held that since the Government took office, they had shown an application and an amount of industry, and desire and skill and knowledge to advance the prospects and progress and prosperity of the country which none of their predecessors had ever shown. He trusted that if there was anything wrong in this matter, it would be brought to light. It was his view and theory that the Reform and Liberal Party of the country could not afford to do what their opponents had been proved to have done; and they might be sure of one thing, that if they ever attempted to do such things, they need not expect any considerable support from the hon. gentlemen sitting on that side of the House. As a celebrated man had once said, if he had none of that spirit which exalted the despised he had none of that other spirit which dragged men down. At the same time he would ask their friends to improve by the errors of others, rather than have their opponents finding fault with them; but when the hon. gentlemen opposite provoked a comparison, they must take the consequences and results of it. Their opponents had not resigned office, they had clung to official life with a tenacity hitherto ascribed by naturalists to the feline species; and now these hon. gentlemen talked of fair play. From the moment the present Ministry took power until now, they had moved every influence, good, bad and indifferent, to try and prejudice the public mind against the Government. He was very sorry, on the hon. gentleman's own account, to see it reported that the right hon. member from Kingston had said, that since Mr. Mackenzie had acceded to power, almost every measure he had submitted had been brought in not in the public interests of the country, but either to reward a friend or to bribe an opponent. This was not the kind of language for ex-Ministers to indulge in. Many of these very important measures had, besides, been promoted and advocated and supported by the right hon. gentleman himself; and it was not fair, because they all understood that it was not a very clean bird which fouls its own nest. He asked hon. gentlemen to consider well the vote they were going to give. He believed that the displacement of the present Ministry and their replacement by the hon. gentlemen opposite, would be little short of a national calamity. Although their British Columbia friends seemed to feel aggrieved because the Government had not made faster progress with that great national—and, as he believed, it would be in the course of time—and necessary public work, it was his solemn conviction that this railway would be built as soon, if not sooner, by the present Ministry than it would have been by the men who promised it and put on the Statute, book a solemn pledge, which they said they did not mean. The present Government had been faithful to the people of this great country on the temperance question. He would like to be understood from the remotest east to the farthest west, and he gave it as his solemn conviction, that if this cause had any really true friends on the floor of the House, they were to be found on the side of the Government of the day. He did not say that there were not good men and true in this regard on the opposite side of the House, but there was this great fact, that at every election, and especially at every general election, King Alcohol and his legions did battle for the Opposition. This great question was, however, so sacred that it ought not to be a foot-ball to be kicked from one side of the House to the other. If such a measure was ever initiated, it would be done by the gentlemen sitting on the Ministerial side of the House. They heard the cry of the poor man's friend up and down the country; and he was proud to be descended from the Green Isle, of which Mr. Speaker was a noble specimen. Who were shown in the Imperial House of Parliament to be the true friends of that country? It was the Liberal Party of Great Britain and Ireland who desired to elevate and not oppress the many, and keep them down for the benefit of the few. They were willing to consider every man as a man, and to legislate for the many instead of the few. He trusted that the present Ministry would pursue the even tenor of their way. If it had not been for the political God-send of hard times, he believed that their opponents would have been almost extinguished as a political party, and he thought that it would be a great deal better for them, as in all probability they would be obliged to do, to try the experience of about ten years of Opposition. He did not believe that it was well for the interests of the country that any one Administration should remain practically in power for the period of twenty years, whether it be Reform or Conservative. He asked hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House not to hesitate one moment as to what their votes should be on this great question. He had never faltered as to what his duty was; he should do what he trusted he would do as long as he occupied a seat in the House, and he would accept the consequences of the discharge of his duty, whatever they might be. He hoped that there would be no more attempts of this kind during this Session, as most hon. members had pretty well aired their views on the floor of the House. Whether it was the manufacturer, or the farmer, or the miner, whatever was his condition or pursuit, he had as good friends on that side of the House, and those who were as loyal to Her Majesty and as true to their country as any who ever sat on the Opposition Benches. He had but three articles in his creed—he loved his God, he honoured his Queen, and he loved his country; and he trusted that these principles would guide him to the end of his political journey, which he hoped would not be prolonged if his future experience was like that of the present Session. He did trust that the tone of their discussions would be raised, and that in this respect the example of the Imperial House of Commons would be followed. He would be told, perhaps, that they were a corrupt party, but he would ask—who tried to give to the country, before the general election of 1872, a proper Act for the trial of Controverted Elections? It was the then Opposition. The late Administration had refused to pass a law until they were returned to power. Many of their friends had suffered from the operation of this law. He deplored the fact that caused it, but he did not deplore their fall when the cause existed. This same law deprived him, but not by any act of his own, of his seat, and while he regretted the cause, he did not regret the consequences. He would rather be unseated twenty times if thereby he could get a pure election, as he believed he secured on the second occasion. He would wait and see not only who were Mr. Speaker's friends, but also who were the friends of British justice and fair play.

Mr. McCALLUM said he had a painful duty to perform on this occasion. In his remarks he would reflect not on Mr. Speaker, who occupied the chair, but on the Government, and not on Mr. Speaker as Speaker but as a member of the House. The hon. member from West Northumberland had started out by speaking of the respectability of the Party with which he was associated. But they had had nothing to say about the hon. gentleman's respectability. They had only to do with what he understood was a great breach of the law, which had been committed by gentlemen who formerly considered themselves to be the only guardians of the Independence of Parliament in this country, and with them he might have to deal. The hon. member (Mr. Kerr) said, that the hon. member for North Hastings should not have made the motion. And why? The hon. gentleman said, because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) had partaken of Mr. Speaker's hospitality. He did not think that was a sufficient reason. Although he and many members had partaken of Mr. Speaker's hospitality, was it to go forth to the country that Mr. Speaker had bribed the members of the House with his hospitality so that they could not exercise a fair and independent opinion in this matter? He raised his voice against any such statements. As far as he could gather, it was only one word for Mr. Speaker and two for themselves. The Government said they had not got information enough to enable them to deal with the question, and they made strong appeals that it should be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But he (Mr. McCallum) was not favourable to this reference of the case. In another Parliament, on another case similar to this, there was a reference to that Committee which was not at all satisfactory. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had made such a speech as he had never made before. From the beginning to the end it was evident that he was trying to stem the current of public opinion, but he would not be able to do this by-and-bye. The Minister of Public Works said the policy of the Government was to give patronage to their friends. There could be no objection to this, as long as they gave it according to law. But it was not for the Government to give contracts to members of the House. He (Mr. McCallum) would not say, for a moment, that this contract had influenced the decisions of Mr. Speaker, although when the right hon. member for Kingston admitted that the other night, the Government attempted to use the admission to their advantage. Hon. gentlemen seemed to think that the Government could give contracts to members of the House and yet do no wrong; but that was not the way the Independence of Parliament Act was to be carried out. Formerly the man that gave the bribe, and not he that accepted the bribe, was punished; but now the Government held that it should be the receiver only and not the giver who should be punished, and, in order that their ship might swim, they were prepared to throw Mr. Speaker overboard and make a political Jonah of him. The eloquent utterances of the hon. the Minister of Justice on the Col. Gray case and those he made on the present case were so different that people would have difficulty in believing that the special pleader of to-day was the same man who, from the Opposition side of the House, with a bosom heaving with virtuous indignation, thundered forth his condemnation of Col. Gray and the Government of that day. In fact, if the hon. the Minister of Justice would look in a glass he would hardly know himself. The hon. the Minister of Justice had been characterized as the great Gladstone of Canada, and he seemed to take all the Independence of Parliament under his own control. On the 16th February, 1857, Mr. Gladstone said, with reference to a similar case at Lancaster :

“I trust that the affairs of this country will never be in the hands of a Government that dares to tamper with the franchise and drive the people like serfs to the polls.”

Lord Redesdale, referring to the same case, in the House of Lords, made use of the following remarkable words, which might be regarded as the highest constitutional law :

“The Government that interferes in any way with the political freedom of the people, is guilty of high treason to the people; and high treason to the people is more heinous than high treason to the Crown.”

Aud hon. gentlemen opposite stood guilty of high treason to the people, according to that opinion, because they had exerted an undue influence upon the elected, if not upon the electors, for which they would have to answer, if not in the House, in the country. He was satisfied that the amendment would not carry, and that hon. gentlemen opposite would stand by the Government. He would not call them a “servile” majority, as the hon. the Minister of Public Works used to call his opponents when he was in Opposition; but he would call them, as somebody else had called them, a mechanical and confiding majority. The Government told them that, if they voted for the motion, they would have to cross the floor of the House, and then there would have to be a new election, and they would all have to go back to their constituents; and this was what made hon. gentlemen tremble in their shoes. He would see what the hon. the Minister of Justice, that great champion of purity and the independence of Parliament, said, with reference to a constitutional question. It was in February, 1870, at a demonstration at Stratford, he said :—

“We find a member of the House stating in a letter to the public press, that his reasons for not opposing the Estimates were because it would seem ungracious and impolitic for him to do so, because a large amount was to be expended in his constituency. If a member is to vote for or against a measure because it affected his own constituency, what was the country coming to? It would render honest Government in this country impossible.”—

Again :—

“I think that instead of relaxing the law relating to the Independence of Parliament, it should be made more rigid. I think no employment should be given to any man in Parliament. The hands of the people's representative should be free of any favours from the Crown."

Again, on the 27th November, 1867, in his place in the House of Commons, he said :

"If Premiers were allowed to infringe the Constitution and appoint members of the Executive Council ad libitum, they might create any number of offices, appoint members for them, and thus control the House by placemen."

The question was, whether the Government were not now trying to control the House by placemen, for it was not known how far the system had extended. In 1871, the hon. the Minister of Justice issued an address to the electors of South Bruce, in which he said :

"We desire to secure greater Parliamentary control over the appropriation of the public monies, to guard more strictly the independence of Parliament, and to inaugurate a purer system of administering public affairs."

But hon. gentlemen showed how much they cared for maintaining purity when they were now asking that wrong-doing should not be punished. The Postmaster-General said, the other evening, that he was proud of the Press; but he questioned very much if the Press was proud of him. It might be necessary to read some of the opinions of the Press, in order to show what were the opinions of the leader of the Reform Party in Canada to-day—not the leader in the House, but an hon. member in the other branch of the Legislature, and the real leader of the party in the country. Of Mr. Lemieux, on October 31st, 1857, the Globe said :

"If we had an institution for the encouragement of sleep, Mr. Lemieux might do very well for Chief Superintendent."

There was a saying "Like master, like man," and this Mr. Lemieux, who was termed an incapable officer, was afterwards taken into the Government by Mr. Brown. Again, the Globe said :

"It may be presumed that neither Mr. Lemieux nor Mr. Tirrell is inclined to offer himself as a sacrifice. * * * The Gazette will, sooner or later, announce that His Excellency has been graciously pleased to quarter these two good-for-nothing Ministers upon the public purse."

And, less than one year after this, Mr. Lemieux was Receiver-General in Mr. Brown's Cabinet. That journal also was not very complimentary to the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) in those days; but as he (Mr. McCallum) had more confidence in that hon. member than the writer of those opinions, he would, therefore, not read them. Hon. gentlemen opposite admitted that it was inexpedient that there should be any contract between a member of Parliament and the Government, but they said it was inexpedient that any change should be made at the time this irregularity was discovered; and they wished the question now to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to be whitewashed. If his memory served him aright, the matter had already been before a Committee. Last year it was brought before the Public Accounts Committee, and when the attention of the Government was called to it at that time, if Mr. Speaker had committed a wrong, the Government should not have allowed him to continue in the position, for it was an injustice to him. Looking back to the time of the formation of the present Government, when that happy family he saw across the House was coming into power, he remembered there were more aspirants for offices than there were offices to fill. The party did not then place the hon. member for Gloucester in the position which he, from his ability and prominence, deserved to occupy in the Government of the country. There was not room for that hon. gentleman, so they made him the Speaker of the House, and said to him, in so many words: "You ought to be in the Government, and if you have not got that position you ought to have had it; we will make it up to you in some other way"; and no doubt this accounted for the present contract, and the position in connection therewith which the Speaker occupied. While he respected Mr. Speaker, he respected himself, the country and the Independence of Parliament more. It would be better that they should go back to their constituents and return purified, than that they should sit in the House and be tainted; but hon. gentlemen opposite were afraid to do this, for if they had not the fear of the Lord, they had the fear of the people before their eyes, and a new election was the lash they held over their supporters.

Mr. LITTLE said that if he had noticed anything particularly in the debate more than another, it was the temperate tone displayed by the speakers on the Opposition benches, and the down-hearted and lukewarm manner in which the utterances of the members on the Ministerial side who endeavoured to excuse the Government were made. It was no wonder that so few, other than the Ministers themselves, had spoken in vindication of that political crime, for it was bad enough for the general supporters of the Ministry to be called upon to vote in the Government behalf, but ten times worse for them to be required to speak to whitewash their offences. The hon. the Premier did not attempt to deny the crime. The hon. the Minister of Justice spoke like a lawyer, but not as a high-principled statesman; and the hon. the Minister of Marine, who possessed what honour there was in the Government, and did he not keep such bad company, would be a useful member, could not say anything but invoke sympathy. Not all the waters of our great lakes and mighty rivers, which were under the immediate control of the Minister of Marine, could wash out the stains that were apparent on the conduct of the Government in connection with that and other matters. Contracts had been given to the Speaker of this House, the hon. member for Gloucester, to the extent of $18,000. The hon. member for Halifax has also received a large contract; the hon. member for Lincoln, and even one of the Cabinet themselves, the hon. Minister of Militia, another. It brought back the corrupt times of Sir R. Walpole in the reign of George II.,—but that statesman was degraded. The present Ministry seemed to have taken a lesson from that book; but he trusted they would be degraded by this House, as they were in the eyes of the country. The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) has just spoken on behalf of the Government, but his jubilant air was gone. That hon. member generally appeared as a keeper of a menagerie. Last Session he introduced a

she-bear, this Session a wolf and domestic poultry. But no trotting out of his beasts now; he could only talk about graveyards and ghosts, and invoke pity for the Government and call upon the faithful for their support. He would like to hear what the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) had to say on the subject. He remembered a time when that gentleman made himself conspicuous in shouting 'privilege, privilege.' What would he say now about the privileges of this House and the safeguards of the constitution being invaded? He would like to hear the hon. member for Selkirk speak on this occasion. There was a time when that gentleman said his delicate conscience would not admit him any longer to support the right hon. member for Kingston. If that gentleman (Mr. Smith) had shown a firmer attitude, and a more conscientious principle at the time of the disturbances in the North-West, there would not have been scenes of turbulence or bloodshed, and to him, and the company he represented, a good deal of the commotion was to be attributed. And how would the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Cook) face his constituents at the next election if he supported the Ministry. The electors of the county of Simcoe were an intelligent and a practical people; they called things by their proper names; they called a spade a spade; and they believed and said that the giving of contracts to hon. members was a political crime. The danger did not end there. How could they tell the number of those members who had received similar favours, in the shape of contracts from the Government. If it was proper for the Speaker to hold a Government contract, every hon. member in this House had the same right; and grave suspicion would rest on those members who supported and defended the action of the Government in that instance, that they also had been illegally favoured. He cared not how high the position hon. members might hold, the law had been violated, and he trusted that the House would not attempt to whitewash the offenders after the manner in which some hon. members of the Government whitewashed a political offender in the Province of Ontario, and absolutely placed the transgressor in a high and lucrative office, which he now enjoyed. In the case now before them there was no getting out of this position: that honourable and able as had been the conduct of Mr. Speaker in the chair of the House, still a wrong had been perpetrated, the law had been broken, and the people and the country expected that the offender should not go unpunished.

Mr. DAVIES said he had greater difficulty in making up his mind upon that question than upon any other which had come before the House since he became a member. His opinion was that the work done in the office of the Freeman was in the nature of a contract, because when the Government became aware that the work was being done there, they immediately gave notice that the arrangement should be terminated, and if they had not thought it was in the nature of a contract, he presumed they would not have given that notice. He regretted that the Government had not at once terminated the arrangement, and not have extended it. Then the question arose as to whose duty it was to bring the matter before the notice of the House. He believed it was the duty of the Government, not of the Opposition. The Opposition in making the motion had placed hon. members in a very awkward position, for no amendment could be moved and they were on the horns of a dilemma, they must either vote one way or the other. Hon. members had thus been placed in a somewhat false position. Had the Government taken action, the Speaker could have had the opportunity of placing his case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He had no doubt the hon. member for Gloucester took legal advice before accepting the work. It therefore appeared to be exceedingly unfair to condemn Mr. Speaker without giving him an opportunity of stating his case, which should be given to every hon. member placed in such a position. The question came home to him (Mr. Davies) with peculiar force. When he entered the House he was called upon to vote on the Pacific scandal. On that occasion, coming from the Conservative ranks in his own province, where they ran elections rather for men than measures, he had stated that he would join the Conservative party if the Pacific scandal could be cleared up. It was not cleared up to his satisfaction, and the opinion he formed was, that the right hon. member for Kingston had taken a large sum of money for the purpose of corrupting constituencies. This was a very similar case, because if the Government connived at the hon. member doing this work it was in a certain sense highly improper. His constituents would clearly say to him when he returned to them: "So, Mr. Davies, you voted against Sir John's party because they raised money to corrupt a constituency; but here is a case where large patronage was thrown in the way of a supporter of the Government in contravention of the Act of Parliament and you were prepared to support it." He wanted Mr. Speaker to have fair play. As he said before, no doubt Mr. Speaker had reasons and consulted some legal adviser before accepting this work, because he must have known the matter would come before Parliament one day or the other. It seemed to him that the work which was accepted was in the nature of a contract and that by accepting it the seat was vacated. He thought that was a fair inference to draw; that members of the Government thought so also, for had he thought differently, they would not have taken the action they did in the matter. If this motion only affected the Government, he would have no hesitation in voting for it; but he could not make up his mind to say Mr. Speaker was guilty of this without being heard through the proper channel.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said the hon. member for South Simcoe was good enough to refer to him and the course that he thought proper to pursue on a former occasion. He felt that he had no cause to regret acting as he did; and he trusted that whatever course he might now take he would feel equally at ease the same length of time afterwards as he did at the present moment with reference to the matter alluded to—his somewhat delicate mission in the North-West. He might say that had he not displayed firmness on that occasion, which the hon. gentleman was good enough to say he did, the condition of the country would be very different from what it was at the present time. With regard to the question under discussion, he intended to discharge his duty with conscientiousness. Every hon. member in this House ought to have British fair play accorded to him; and he thought it would be wrong to the hon. gentleman who occupied the chair were he to join with those who thought him guilty before he had an opportunity of answering for himself. He would, therefore, without hesitation, and without feeling that his name, with those of others who might vote in the same way, would be considered infamous by posterity, as the hon. member for Cumberland had suggested, vote against the motion of the hon. member for North Hastings.

Mr. McCARTHY said he did not propose to take any part in this discussion until he heard the very extraordinary explanations that were offered by the Government for their share in the transaction. He thought, looking at the past, and having regard to the language of hon. gentlemen who now sat on the opposite side of the Chamber, looking at the motions which they had made not only in this House, but in the Local Legislature of the Province of Ontario, that there were hardly two sides to the question, and that it would be impossible for the Government to offer any opposition to the plain, simple and straightforward language of the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Hastings. Looking at it in that light he did not conceive that there would be any opportunity for discussion, but he was amazed to find that not only the hon. the First Minister had brought his courage to the sticking point, and was able to call upon his followers to support him in voting down this resolution, while at the same time he told them they would keep their principles unimpaired; but the hon. gentlemen who followed him on the same side of the House seemed to have no hesitation in taking the same course. Let him briefly review the arguments by which Ministers of the Crown had endeavoured to uphold the transaction in which they took part. The hon. the Postmaster General, in whose Department this contract was made, ought, in justice to himself, have given some better reason than he did in support of the vote which he proposed to give, and in support of the position which he called upon his followers to take. But that hon. gentleman, of late, as far as his (Mr. McCarthy's) observations had gone, had been so anxious to be courteous to the Opposition side of the House that he had forgotten almost every other necessity in argument, and rose and sat down again without giving one solitary reason for the course he was taking. He would have passed by the hon. gentleman's observations without comment or remark, but that he spoke of the resolution as being an obnoxious one, as it had been referred to by his leader as an embarrassing one. He thought it was both embarrassing and obnoxious, and he trusted that his hon. friends on the Ministerial side would not find it so embarrassing and obnoxious as to deprive many who voted against it of their seats. It was desirable that the matter should be placed in such a position that there should be no side issue. It was desirable, at all events, that they should have a direct and distinct vote upon it, and, therefore, the course was adopted of bringing it forward in such a manner that no amendment could be offered by which the hon. gentlemen opposite might delude themselves or attempt to delude the public. Another observation fell from the hon. the Postmaster General; he did not see the hon. gentleman in his place, and, perhaps, he ought not to refer to it in his absence. The hon. gentleman proceeded to detail what he supposed took place at the Opposition caucus. From any person else that might be taken as a joke, but when it was remembered that that hon. gentleman had a reputation of prying into the secrets of his opponents, that he was a man of notoriety from being able to do perhaps more in that way than most gentlemen could do, it should perhaps call forth a denial; and he would, therefore, tell the House, that, from first to last, there had been no doubt as to how this question should be submitted, or the gentleman who should move it. The hon. member for North Hastings was the first who brought this matter before the Chamber, and the duty properly belonged to him of taking this step. They had a remarkable effort—a remarkable oratorical display from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That hon. gentleman must have surprised everybody by the great interest he took in Mr. Speaker's cause, and his touching reference to Mr. Speaker's liability to a fine of £60,000, melted the hearts of gentlemen on this side of the House. They felt that it was an exceedingly hard case, and that it was a wonder the Government would go on from the 1st January, 1874, to August, 1876, inducing Mr. Speaker to break the law and placing him in the position of being liable to the forfeiture of £60,000. He watched Mr. Speaker's face particularly, to see his capacity for taking that kind of soft solder—or, perhaps, in reference to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries it should be called chowder—and he thought Mr. Speaker did not pay much attention to the hon. gentleman's eloquence. He thought Mr. Speaker remembered that the hon. gentleman was the Minister who had deprived him, as it were, of his birth-right; who had stepped into the place Mr. Speaker had honourably won. How much of the hon. gentleman's professions were sincere? Did he care much for Mr. Speaker? Did he care, if he might refer to Mr. Speaker's nationality, about his little pig and cow being swept away by the tax collector; or was the hon. gentleman more alarmed at the attack made on the Administration, and regarding that attack and not the assault that was made upon Mr. Speaker? What was the case the hon. gentleman set up on Saturday? That the Opposition were striking Mr. Speaker over their heads; that they were not making an attack upon the Government at all, but endeavouring to pass a resolution which would deprive Mr. Speaker of his seat. One day of peaceable rest intervened, and they found the Whip of the party, whose duty it was to feel the pulses of his friends, saying: "We are going to sacrifice Mr. Speaker; only vote down this resolution. Don't condemn us as having done a political wrong, and I promise you, as a salve for your conscience, that next day I will move a resolution to refer and sacrifice the obnoxious Speaker." There was a great difference in that tune; it was not at all the music they listened to on Saturday evening. It was, perhaps, no great wonder that the tune had been changed. But let him come to the more important gentlemen of the Administration who had endeavoured to argue out their position. The First Minister of the Crown was, generally, very forcible in the remarks which he uttered in this Chamber, but he evidently could not fall in; he was not able to understand the fine argument which the hon. the Minister of Justice had spun for him; and when he rose to answer the hon. member for North Hastings, it was quite plain he was not at home in his position, that he felt it sorely and keenly, and that he wished he occupied this side of the Chamber, and was denouncing the transaction which he felt called upon there to defend. The hon. gentleman admitted that, when the Administration was formed in 1876, an arrangement was then made by the then Postmaster-General for Mr. Speaker to do the printing for the Government in New Brunswick. By the accounts brought down, it was shown that Mr. Speaker entered upon a contract on the 24th January, 1874. The hon. the First Minister said he did not know of that. That might be so, and they were bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he was ignorant of it. But, if he was ignorant of it, he did not attempt to repudiate the Postmaster-General; there had been no attempt to separate that unity of responsibility which of necessity must be assumed under responsible Government. But if the hon. gentleman did not know of this transaction at that time, he could not have remained long in ignorance. In the Montreal Gazette of the 18th July, 1874, this transaction was brought to light and was exposed through the public Press of the country. So, unless his hon. friend was blind not only to what went on in the Departments of the Government of which he was the head, but also deaf to the sentiment of public opinion, he must have known it at that date. Here was the article to which he referred; it was a letter from St. John's, N. B., and in it was stated:—

“ There is a good deal of talk in the City about a job perpetrated by the Dominion Government in behalf of Mr. Anglin, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

It was to be remembered that these were not his words. He would express his opinion with perfect frankness, but with courtesy he trusted before he sat down. These however were not his sentiments. The letter continued:

“ It is said that his Honor, not satisfied with the salary which he receives as Speaker, not satisfied with being permitted to turn the Press out of the rooms which they have occupied since the Parliament Buildings were erected, and which were expressly built for them, in order that he may have larger quarters for his family, has demanded and received the printing patronage of the Province, and that, notwithstanding that he has no job printing office of his own; he is farming out to other printers, making a comfortable commission for himself out of the transaction. There are two objections to this proceeding. It is a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, which forbids members of Parliament receiving gratuities from the Government. It is disgraceful that the Speaker above all men should become thus the recipient of favours, from the Government, a fact which must entirely destroy all confidence in his impartiality, and makes him, what he proved himself to be last Session, a mere partizan Speaker; and it is a violation of the law which places the ordinary privileges of the Government as well as of Parliament in the hands of contractors who obtain the contracts after fair competition. It is, however, but another illustration of the difference between the precept and practice as exemplified by the policy of the so-called Liberal Government.”

This letter appeared in the month of July, 1874; but perhaps this also escaped the attention of the Government. He thought they had a right to assume, until the contrary was stated at all events, that the Government were aware that the Press of the country had discussed, in no undecided tone, the contract made with Mr. Speaker. However, let them follow the hon. gentleman down in his statement of the facts. A new Postmaster-General came into office, as he understood it, in the spring of 1875; and during all this period the work was being done at the Freeman Office in New Brunswick in violation of the law, and in violation, contempt and defiance of public opinion. A new

Postmaster-General succeeded to office; the hon. gentleman was not at present in the Chamber, and therefore was not able to tell them what he thought or knew, but the present Postmaster, who was responsible to the House, did know in the Fall, or about Christmas, of 1875, that this work was being done, and drew the attention of his colleagues to it, and they discussed the question in Council, as the First Minister had told them. If the Premier was consistent, and if the hon. gentleman wanted them to understand and accept his statement, that up to that time he was in ignorance of this violation of his own opinions and of the plain letter of the Statute, and of the unwritten law of Parliament, then he should have put an end to this state of things. But what did take place? A correspondence was opened, but not with Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker was not called to account. Mr. Speaker was not asked to surrender his contract, or told that the Government could not go on giving him patronage in that way; but a correspondence was opened with Chubb and Company who, whoever they might be, were not represented on the floor of the House. Chubb and Company were told that for some reason or another the Government were going to do the printing at Ottawa and not any longer at St. Johns; but Mr. Speaker, who was the person who had the contract, which alone was objectionable, seemed to have been passed over sub silentio. It might be, however, that there was some other correspondence which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had not seen fit to bring down. It did appear, at all events, after Parliament was in Session in 1876, according to a letter which had been read, representations were made to the Government, and that owing to those representations, on the 22nd of April, 1876, the following letter was written. He would read an extract from one of the letters which had been handed in by his hon. friend the First Minister the other evening, as follows:—

“ That the Postmaster-General has consented to the printing by the Freeman office of forms as are required, in large quantities, for use in your Province for the ensuing three months.”

Mr. McCARTHY.

This of course applied to all printing. This Government discovered it, they told the House, and discussed it in Council in December, but they did not put an end to it even then; but on the 22nd of April, 1876, a Departmental letter was written to the Superintendent of the Department telling him to continue this job and this contract. Looking at the accounts brought down, what did they find? They would find something worthy of consideration—and here he desired the attention of all hon. members who preferred their country to their party, if there were any such on the floor of the House, and who were not willing to sacrifice themselves simply to keep in office men who had violated their principles. He would draw attention to something which he thought required explanation, and he did not know that it had yet been brought before the House. They found that in 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872, the same practice which had been followed by the present Administration in having the printing for New Brunswick done at St. John, was pursued by the preceding Administration, and also, that in 1868, this cost $3,947; in 1869, $3,411; in 1870, $4,733; and in 1872, $5,314; but when they came to the time when the hon. member for Gloucester received this printing the amount jumped from $5,000 to $12,000. In 1875, when the printing was done by a member of the House, who ought to be pure and above reproach, either twice the number or quantity that was required was done, or more than twice the former rates, had been paid. Did this open the eyes of any hon. gentleman to the nature of the transaction? What in the name of fortune could they do with all this stationery in New Brunswick? He imagined that the postmasters there must have clothed their families in post-office stationery. He could imagine the baby christened in a robe of post-office stationery; that the postmasters even stuffed their walls with it, in order to keep out the cold in the inclement season; that they stuffed their beds with it; but, otherwise, in the name of fortune what did they do with $12,000 worth of stationery in the course of a single year? He trusted there would be some explanation of it. He did not know that he was particularly suspicious, but this raised a very strange suspicion in his mind. He believed that he was addressing and speaking in the presence of the party of economy and retrenchment. He himself belonged to a body of men who had been designated as Corruptionists, and who had been hunted down year after year as men who were extravagant and who had mismanaged the affairs of the people of this country; and yet he found that the average paid by them during the years they had dispensed this patronage was $4,705, while the average for the years during which the present Administration did so, was $10,792. If there was any reason for this difference it ought to be explained. Had the post offices in New Brunswick become twice as numerous as they were before.

Mr. MILLS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY said then he was to understand that in one year, under this paternal Administration, the necessities of the Post Office service in New Brunswick had doubled. So he was to understand the "hear, hear" of the Minister of the Interior. He hoped that this statement would be justified by the figures and the facts, and not simply by cries of "hear, hear." It made a case at all events for enquiry. He would now come to the grounds of defence offered to this motion of his hon. friend from North Hastings. The First Minister said there was no reason to object to the first part of the resolution,—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract whereby public money is paid to members of Parliament."

The Minister of Justice echoed this sentiment; and yet, during all of 1874 and 1875, and during half of 1876, they had just been doing what they said they had no objection here, by vote, to condemn. This was the part of the resolution which affected the Government most chiefly. The Minister of Justice, in a fine-spun legal argument, told them that it was no crime, nor was it an offence, for the Ministry to give a contract to a member of the House; and that the offence consisted in the continued retention of his seat by the hon. gentleman who had obtained the contract. He was not going to deny that as a bare proposition of law; there was no penalty attached to any person save the unfortunate member; and he was not going to pretend that they could sue the Administration of the day for any penalty for having given such a contract; but they did want to know how hon. gentlemen opposite could make such assertions as they voted for and supported with regard to the case of Col. Gray, and in the face of all their past declarations that this was contrary to that unwritten law of Parliament which said that the Administration were not to corrupt or buy any person, not to give contracts to placemen, and not do anything that would prevent a member of the House from discharging his duty towards his constituents and the country, without doing violence to their own interests. This was the ground he took, and this was the ground of condemnation against the Government. It was not simply a matter of giving the contract to Mr. Speaker. He thought that this position was quite easily understood. Mr. Speaker assumed the responsibility of accepting this contract. Mr. Speaker had a perfect right to do so. Mr. Speaker had a perfect right, if he pleased, to run the risk of sitting in the Chamber, under the penalty attached to his retention of his seat; for this Mr. Speaker was responsible, and although it might be a very serious matter, it was not of the same vital importance, he contended, as the conduct of the Administration, which from hour to hour, from day to day, from week to week, and from year to year, doled out the contract to a member of the House, paid him public money, knowing that this member kept his seat, and concealed it from the country as long as they could, and then came down and endeavoured to induce their followers to back them up in the matter. They were told that they were taking an unfair advantage of Mr. Speaker; that they were dealing with him unjustly in asking the House to pass a resolution which would deprive Mr. Speaker of his seat and expose him to the penalty of which Mr. Speaker's eloquent friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had spoken on the Saturday evening previous. Did they do anything of the kind? They could, it was quite true, have moved for a Committee of enquiry into the matter, or for a writ to issue for Mr. Speaker's seat, if they pleased; and such a motion, if made, might or might not have been referred to a Committee as the House thought that there was anything of law or of fact to enquire into; but if this were done it would not dispose of the matter. Would they thus satisfy public sentiment? Would they be doing their duty to their country if they simply moved that Mr. Speaker's seat be vacated and for the issue of a writ for a new election in the constituency of Gloucester, and left hon. gentlemen opposite who had violated their own principles and the law of Parliament by giving this contract to Mr. Speaker? He was astonished to find hon. gentlemen opposite sheltering themselves—but drowning men would catch at straws they knew—in the vote they proposed to give, and deluding themselves into the belief that by voting for the motion they would be depriving Mr. Speaker of his right to be heard before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He would ask these hon. gentlemen whether they had consulted the authorities. He would put this question to his hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), who had made a speech so condemnatory of the Administration, and who, he dared say, would be read out of the ranks of the Liberal Party for having declared that this case was a parallel to what was called the Pacific Scandal. This hon. gentleman told them that he must vote against the motion, but that the only possible excuse he could give to either his conscience or his constituency for doing so was, that he would otherwise be taking an unfair advantage of Mr. Speaker. If this was so it was certainly one reason why they should stay their hand. If they were doing anything that would prejudice the position of any member of the House, he was free, for one, to admit they should pause and hesitate in moving and asking the House to adopt a resolution which would have that effect; but although many members had addressed the House, and although the first lawyer, not only in the House but in the country, had spoken on the question, had they yet heard one solitary word of doubt as to the position Mr. Speaker occupied? Had any member of the House pretended that the law had not been violated; or that a contract had not been made, or that a breach of the law had not been committed? Then what had they to refer to a Committee? He saw that the practice was, that if there was anything of doubt either in fact or in law, it should be sent to a Committee,—“Whenever any question is raised affecting the seat of a member and involving matters of doubt, either in law or fact, it is customary to refer it to the consideration of a Committee.” This was to be found in May’s Parliamentary Practice, page 594. He admitted that the motion affected Mr. Speaker’s seat. If it was adopted, it must inevitably follow that they must move for a writ for a new election. He accepted this responsibility. He was not blind to this fact, and he also wanted hon. gentlemen opposite to accept their responsibility when they voted against it, and said that the law had not been violated, and that no contract had been made. It would not do for these hon. gentlemen to blow hot and cold, and to cast back upon the Opposition the reproach—“You are destroying Mr. Speaker and depriving him of his seat.” When hon. gentlemen opposite accepted the responsibility of voting down this motion, they declared by their vote that there had been no breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and that Mr. Speaker had not been guilty of a violation of that law; and, therefore, if his hon. friends would consider the matter for one moment, they would see that no further motion could be made about it during the present Session. His hon. friend from West Elgin had risen that evening, posed in very graceful attitude before the House, and made his little speech. The hon. gentleman said that his conscience was afflicted. The hon. gentleman really could not swallow this resolution, and he could not, Whip as he was of the party, support the Government unless he felt that he was to move next day for a Committee to enquire into the conduct of Mr. Speaker, and to investigate the facts of the case. The hon. gentleman called upon the leader of the Government to learn whether they would accept this. It was a very pretty piece of acting. The hon. gentleman wanted the Premier to rise at once and make a statement, but the First Minister had not—if the expression was not unparliamentary—quite cheek enough to rise and play the little game that had been arranged in caucus. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had not yet told the House, whether he would accept this proposition or not. The Speaker was safe for this Session, so far as he could see, when they voted down this motion and declared that he had not violated the Independence of Parliament Act, as any further reference to the subject during this Session would be out of order, as he understood the rules of the House. He thought Mr. Speaker would have great pleasure if this measure was voted down, in telling his hon. friend from East Elgin, who, he dared say, understood it much better than he (Mr. McCarthy) did, that the motion having been passed upon he (Mr. Speaker) could not allow the matter to go any further. Perhaps that was their “little game;” but he could not say. He wanted the House to understand, however, the position they were in, so that every member should understand how the case stood. The Opposition affirmed that there had been a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. gentlemen opposite said “no.” If they said “no,” the question was settled. He accepted for his part the full responsibility, with full knowledge of what the vote affirmed. No lawyer of reputation would venture to say, looking at the papers in the case, that Mr. Speaker had a right to a seat in the Parliament. He perfectly well understood and was willing to accept that responsibility. He could quite understand that when the case of the other hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Norris) came to be considered, there would be some sense in asking for a Committee. But there was not the slightest doubt about the present question. From his very great Parliamentary knowledge and experience Mr. Speaker must have known the consequences, and if he chose to accept them it was his own business. If he chose to do the Government printing he did it with his eyes open, and he (Mr. McCarthy) was not to be told that he was not to vote that this was a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, simply because it entailed consequences which Mr. Speaker must have known from the very first. While he (Mr. McCarthy) did not pretend to extenuate this act on the part of Mr. Speaker, he would say that it was a trifling wrong in comparison with the conduct of the Administration. And these were the gentlemen who taught the country to believe in their virtue and patriotism and who rang the changes from one end of Canada to the other upon the importance of an independent Parliament. They all knew there was nothing their constituents were so inclined to suspect them of as making money in some way or other; their constituents were always suspecting that they were "feathering their nests," and there was nothing which the people of this country were more jealous than that members of Parliament should stand above all suspicion. Yet he had heard the First Minister call upon their supporters to say that black was white, and that the motion was not, as it assuredly was, a plain declaration of a matter of fact, which they all knew it to be. He was sorry the hon. the Minister of Justice was not in his place.

Mr. BLAKE: I am here.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Come forward.

Mr. McCARTHY said if his hon. friend was not in his place he would not say what he had intended, he would not feel disposed to make the remarks he proposed making, behind the back of any hon. member. It was, perhaps, strange, but it was nevertheless true, that the Press of this country had drawn a line between the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. the First Minister. It had been stated in the newspapers that it would be seen that the Minister of Justice could not so far forget himself and his principles as to support and endorse this conduct of the Government. The hon. the Minister of Justice entered public life at a time when the great party to which he belonged was suffering from tyranny and despotism, perhaps of a more grinding character than had been known in many a land. Their own newspaper, which professed to represent them, ground them down, and they looked to some man who would save them from the tyranny. The hon. member for South Bruce was to lead them out of the wilderness and save them from the despotism of that newspaper. The hon. member fully entered into that sentiment, and he appeared before the public as one who was not to be brow-beaten and bullied by any newspaper; and he took a stand which gathered around him many young men; indeed young men looked up to and admired him, not only for this, but also for his genius. In that way had his hon. friend built up his reputation; in that way had he taught the people to believe that he was incorruptible, and that for no consideration would he have his name connected with a transaction that was either dishonourable or impolitic. If the scales had fallen from their eyes, and they saw the hon. gentleman in his true colours, if they found that he spent one-half of his life in enunciating principles, and the other half in violating them, it was not to be wondered at.

An HON. MEMBER: It is false.

Mr. McCARTHY: He did not know whether this expression was Parliamentary, but he would meet it and prove that it was true. The first declaration of the hon. member for Bruce was, that it was improper and unconstitutional that more than a given and suitable number of Cabinet Ministers should hold office, whether with or without salary; and yet the hon. gentleman himself had been the only instance of violating the rule which he himself had made. Not only had he done this in the House of Commons, but also in the Ontario Legislature; and he had shown the difference between a man standing in Opposition and laying down certain rules, and when he had an opportunity of carrying them into practice. This had not been the only instance of inconsistency of which the hon. gentleman had been guilty. At Aurora he told the people—and much wonder and excitement was there in the land at it—that he wanted no office; that he would sooner be a private in the grand army of freedom than holding command of the ranks; that he would sooner be leading on as a private, endeavouring to do justice to his fellow-countrymen, than drawing the emoluments of the Treasury. That was in October, 1874. His hon. friend kept in that mind for one short Session. He was next found sitting to the left of the First Minister, an humble follower of the chief whom he had ineffectually tried to destroy; he became a most complacent place-man, attending to his Departmental duties with the regularity of clock work, and with all the ardour one might expect from the hon. gentleman's character. He (Mr. McCarthy) would not insult his hon. friend by supposing that the emoluments of the position brought him here, for it was believed he was above that, but it was clear the hon. gentleman had failed to show that he had the back-bone to stand to his principles when they and the interests of his party clashed. The partyship was brought to bear upon him; he was told that he must be either in or out of the party; that he must no longer be "a private in the grand army of freedom," but that he must take his proper position or be drummed out of it; and he succumbed and accepted office. Knowing all this, it was not to be expected he would find much difficulty in voting for or against this or any other resolution which would place his party in jeopardy. He (Mr. McCarthy) had not been mistaken in his estimate of the hon. gentleman. It was found that he came here and aided the First Minister in calling upon his followers to declare that the Independence of Parliament Act had been held intact. The position which he (Mr. McCarthy) took was simply this. He believed there was no subject for enquiry by a Committee. If there was any doubt which would render a reference to a Committee necessary, he would not support the resolution. But no person had suggested that the facts could be questioned. The contract was made and the money was paid. No person could doubt that. The receipts were given by Mr. Speaker. These were the facts. The law said that was a contract. He did not care whether that was in writing, signed, sealed or delivered; a contract was a contract without any writing. It might be a contract within the meaning of the Act if a word was never said; an implied contract was quite different. There was no question as to the facts. There was no question of law; and it was not the practice of this House to send matters to a Committee when there was nothing to be investigated, when there was nothing to be determined, when the House as a body, as the whole Assembly, representing the people of Canada, were quite as able to pronounce upon the question as any Committee delegated by them could possibly be. What could the Committee say or do? It could only say that the member for Gloucester had entered into a contract for printing with the Government, for which he received the money, and that they found this to be a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. But the House knew all about that without a Committee. Then there was no object in sending the matter to a Committee. Her Majesty's loyal Opposition had a duty to perform, which, if they failed to do, they would be unworthy of their position. A square issue had been arrived at. They asserted two propositions in the resolution. They asserted in the language used, "that, in the opinion of this House, it was inexpedient and improper for a Government to enter into any agreement or contract whereby public money was paid to a member of Parliament, such as the Postmaster General's report of 1875-6 showed to have been entered into with the Speaker of this Chamber." Was that so or was it not? Could hon. gentlemen vote "nay" to that, and preserve their consistency and their duty to their constituents? The second proposition was, "that such payments were in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act, the words of which were quoted in the resolution. Was that so or was it not? Neither the First Minister nor the Minister of Justice would not say it was not so. The hon. the Minister of Justice said he would not express any opinion upon it. Had the Government known they were right, they would have had an opinion, they would have said this was not a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. Their silence was just as pregnant, just as conclusive against them as would be the open and candid admission that the resolution was correct. Then let the hon. the Minister of Justice take the responsibility upon himself. He (Mr. McCarthy) had no right to dictate to hon. gentlemen, he only rose to express his own convictions and to endeavour to clear away what he thought to be the sophisms with which the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches had endeavoured to delude the members of the House, and to show that the House was as fully able to deal with the matter as a Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not his intention to ask leave to make a second speech. He rose merely to say that, in taking the ground that the motion of the hon. member for North Hastings was an improper one, as it was aimed at the seat of a member in an indirect way, as it was a motion which could not be amended, he stated that the proper motion would have been to have referred the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The course that he conceived to be the proper one was sufficiently indicated by his remarks. The hon. member who had just sat down stated that the motion did directly attack the seat and that it was intended to attack the seat.

Mr. BOWELL: He did not say so. I rise to explain that I have no objection to the hon. the First Minister making a second speech provided that I am allowed the opportunity of replying, and of controverting some charges brought against myself personally.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no intention myself to make any speech, but I only rise to mention one point with respect to this reference to the Committee.

Mr. MCCARTHY.

Mr. MACMILLAN rose to a point of order, and said that if the hon. the First Minister had the right to reply, not only the mover, but every member also had the right.

Mr. SINCLAIR said it was not his intention to speak on this important question, had it not been for the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy); but he thought he showed conclusively, that if any resolution whatever ought to go before a Special Committee, this was the one. He stated that whenever there was a resolution about which there was a doubt, the proper way, according to May, was to send it before a Committee of enquiry. He (Mr. Sinclair) must say he had great doubt in regard to this. He did not see by any means that the matter was as clear, as it was brought before the House, as he would like it to be, in order to give an intelligent vote upon it. They had Messrs. Chubb & Co's. correspondence with the Government, and in another place it was stated that the business was done there. It was a common thing for printers to rent their offices and get business done there, and the only thing that troubled him (Mr. Sinclair) about giving a vote against this resolution was the Speaker's name to some of the payments made, though no attempt had been made to show that the signature was a genuine one. He would like to know, from the hon. member for Cardwell, if he had a case in Court, if he would take such proofs as were brought before the House—the highest tribunal in the land? If he had a criminal before him in the meanest Court in the land, would he allow him to be condemned unheard in this way? The Speaker had been eulogized for his conduct in his position, but what treatment had he received? The right hon. gentleman who had eulogized him put an order on the paper in quite a different manner. Let any hon. member place himself in the position of the Speaker, with an undue advantage taken of him, and he not allowed to open his mouth. If any question should come up before the Committee on Privileges and Elections this was the one. He was very well pleased to hear the leader of the Government state that it was his desire that it should go there, and he (Mr. Sinclair) would never feel it his duty to vote condemning a fellow member unheard. He was sure that the proper mode was to send this before a Committee of enquiry, and he was prepared to vote so.

Mr. MILLS said, as the First Minister was not permitted to make the statement he desired to make, he now rose on behalf of the Government to say that they were quite ready to agree to the reference of this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where, in fairness to the Speaker, it ought to go.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said the point of the member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Sinclair) would be a most important one if there were any doubt about the matter; but he thought the House might consider itself entirely relieved from any doubt, from the fact that he (Mr. Gibbs) held in his hand the report of the Committee on Public Accounts which, in the most unmistakeable manner, set forth the facts in the following words:—

“The Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts beg leave to make their second report. That it appears from the vouchers now before them that large sums of money have from time to time been paid to Timothy Warren Anglin, a member of the House of Commons, for printing and stationery while a member of this House.”

And, if any hon. gentleman in the House had any further doubt upon the point, he desired to say that in the Committee on Public Accounts, if he might refer to what took place before that Committee—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. GIBBS: I knew I should be called to order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to order.

Mr. GIBBS: The hon. gentleman may rise to order if he likes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to anything that took place in the Committee-room.

Mr. GIBBS said he had asked permission of the House to do so before he did so, and he quite expected that the hon. the Premier, or some one on the Ministerial side of the House, would object to it. If not allowed to refer to what took place in that Committee, he might be permitted to allude to what he read in a newspaper, which, he believed, correctly reported what took place in another place.

Mr. CAUCHON: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER said he did not think that the hon. member could indirectly make reference to what took place. The fact of its having been reported did not alter the matter.

Mr. GIBBS asked if, during this debate, any hon. gentleman on the other side had been called to order? Had not the amplest opportunity been given them of making statements when they desired? Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House had expressed themselves as placed in a delicate position. The Speaker, the First Commoner in the land, was charged by the resolution with having been a public contractor. He held a position which the law declared he had no right to hold, and which, as one hon. gentleman had stated, ever since he had been a member of Parliament he had no right to occupy. If he (Mr. Gibbs) repeated that, it was because the hon. gentlemen opposite had prevented him from making a statement to relieve the member from Prince Edward Island from the doubts he seemed to have. As to the genuineness of the receipts which were in the Postmaster General's Department, it was stated, by a gentleman having authority to make the statement, that he had no doubt about it, and the Committee reported that the Speaker did receive large sums of money when he was a member of Parliament. If there was any doubt about it, he might refer to the printed report, which was before every hon. gentleman present, as to whether there was any doubt or not. The question for every hon. member to decide was this: Was public money paid to an hon. member of this House while he was a member of this House? Had any gentleman who heard him, or any one in the land, from the evidence deduced, any doubt upon the point? If there was such an one to be found, he agreed that he might vote to refer this to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Opposition had been charged with not having brought this matter up at the proper time, or in a proper manner. They had waited patiently that gentlemen opposite might take the course open to them, had waited for them to bring forward a motion to refer the question to a Committee on Privileges and Elections. Had they done so? It had been proved conclusively that this had been a matter of public notoriety for two years. The Opposition had waited until the evidence was brought down and put in the possession of the Committee on Public Accounts and brought down to this House, so that hon. gentlemen might have all the facts and all the evidence in their possession before one word should be said on the floor of this House in reference to this case. They had produced their evidence on the first opportunity after it was in the possession of this House. When such a motion could be made, the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had presented this motion for the approval of the House. But those members who were here years ago could remember the thunder of the hon. the Minister of Justice when a case, having in a very faint degree some relation to that before the House, was brought forward. When it was stated that Colonel Gray had violated no Act of Parliament by sitting on the floor of this House, and by receiving payment of $300 per month by order of the House, hon. gentlemen opposite contended that not only one member might be found on the floor being a placeman and holding office, but dozens and scores, and that the Government of the day might pack the House of Commons with placemen, and they demanded that an amendment to that Act should be made to meet their objections. What did the Government of the day do? Feeling the importance and cogency of the arguments deduced by the hon. gentlemen opposite, they did amend the Act of Parliament; but it remained for those hon. gentlemen, who declared they would elevate the standard so high that honest and honourable men might range themselves under it, to violate the Act of Parliament in the spirit and the letter, in a way that no other Government, in this or any other country, had ever done—

of late years at all events. He regretted that the Speaker had found himself in his present position. None regretted it more deeply than they who were on the Opposition side of the House. It might or might not be a coincidence, but it was a fact, that late in the Fall of 1875, in December he believed, the hon. the Postmaster-General delivered a speech in Argenteuil in which he denounced Ultramontanism, and it was a fact known to many persons, particularly those residing in the part of the country from which the Speaker came, that the St. John Freeman took occasion to condemn the speech of the Postmaster-General, and it was remarkable that, a few days after that, the then Postmaster-General sent down instructions to the Province of New Brunswick that the printing should be withdrawn from the other papers there and given to the Freeman. He (Mr. Gibbs) did not say that that was the reason, but there was a striking coincidence as to the date. He had no sympathy whatever with the position the hon. gentleman had taken. Those of them who had sat on the other side of the House in days and years gone by, knew the arguments used by their opponents on occasions of minor importance compared to this. They had abandoned this case, so far as meeting it with argument was concerned. They had admitted that there was no case, and had accordingly abused the plaintiff's attorney. When charged with wrong-doing they said: "You did the same when you were in power." He (Mr. Gibbs) was happy to know, speaking for the Conservative Party, that in no case in its history, since Confederation at any rate, had there been a parallel to the case presented in the motion of his hon. friend the member for North Hastings.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he had not intended to trouble the House with any remarks upon this very important subject, had it not been for one or two statements which had dropped casually from hon. gentlemen opposite. He agreed with what had been said by his hon. friend from Kingston, as to the impartiality and fidelity with which the Speaker had discharged his duties as the presiding officer of this House. He remembered, however, in the Session of 1873, when the hon. gentleman entertained very different opinions in regard to his ability and the position he held before the House and the country, and his fitness to hold a position on the floor of the House. It would be remembered that, when the gentleman then representing the county of Pictou, brought a charge against the member for Gloucester, as the publisher of the Freeman, the charge was discussed, and remarks, not at all complimentary to the present Speaker, were made by the hon. gentleman, who, the other evening, had spoken in such complimentary and gushing terms of his fitness as presiding officer. He (Mr. Ross) held a quotation from the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), who always had especial force when he thought he saw discreditable or dishonourable conduct on the part of hon. members on the Ministerial side of the House, but who, during 1873, when the late Government were in the throes of dissolution, could not see anything in the conduct of the hon. gentlemen with whom he was associated in the transaction known as the Pacific Scandal. Here was what he said in the House in 1873:—

“Such language placed a man outside the pale of gentlemanly intercourse, and he asked gentlemen opposite to say whether a man who used such language could expect to receive anything but the loathing and contempt with which he had tried to invest the Parliament of his country. Such deserved no pretensions to consideration, and he generally found that these charges brought against others, emanated from the corrupt darkness of his own heart.”

That report was copied from the hon. gentleman's own organ in Toronto, and was such language as they would expect him to use when his righteous soul was overflowing with indignation. The member for Kingston was equally complimentary. He said: “No insult could be considered more vile than those contained in the article referred to.”

Mr. DEWDNEY: What were the remarks referred to?

Mr. ROSS: You will find them in the Journals of the House, on the 17th April, 1873.

Mr. DEWDNEY: What were they?

Mr. ROSS: It would take up too much time to read them.

Mr. TUPPER: I would like, as the hon. gentleman knows I shall not have an opportunity of speaking in reply, to ask him how many of the present Administration voted with me on that matter?

Mr. ROSS said he had not referred to the Treasury Benches, but to the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite. His hon. friend was too old a politician not to know that it was unbecoming to interrupt, in so unseemly a manner, so young a member of the House. He was exceedingly pleased to find that the remarks which he made had the effect of calling his hon. friend to his feet. No doubt he felt the position he was placed in when remarks that he made three years ago were compared with those he made on Saturday. He did not propose to follow the course of this discussion in all its varied phases. One feature of the discussion had pleased him—to see that his hon. friends opposite who, a few years ago, were prepared to vote down the resolution moved by the Liberal party in favour of the independence of Parliament, were to-night exceedingly anxious to vindicate those principles which they opposed so strenuously when on this side of the House. Reference was made to the position occupied by a member of this House on the Intercolonial Railway Commission. When the Liberal party were opposing the position which Mr. Walsh occupied as Chairman of that Commission, where were his hon. friends opposite? They found vote after vote recorded against the resolutions which the Liberal party moved in regard to that matter as being a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. When the hon. the Minister of the Interior moved his resolution in regard to the Pacific Railway, when he was supported by the whole strength of the Liberal party, where were his hon. friends opposite? Among the nays he found recorded such names as Sir John A. Macdonald, Mr. Tupper, Mr. Langevin, Mr. Bowell, and the whole strength of the Conservative party. To-day they found the same gentlemen on the opposite side of the House endeavouring, by unfair means, to attack the present Administration because of certain disclosures which appear to have been seen in the Public Accounts. He called the attention of the House and the country to the fact that this was an evidence that Liberal principles were fast gaining ground. At one time they were almost beginning to despair of ever creating an impression on hon. gentlemen opposite. They had thought that nowhere, except in the ranks of the Liberal party, could there be found advocates of true Parliamentary Independence. But what did they find now? Hon. gentlemen who, four or five years ago voted against resolutions affirming the Independence of Parliament, were now endeavouring to vindicate those principles and were trying to be more zealous and anxious for the Independence of Parliament than hon. gentlemen who fought the battle a few years ago. That battle was not confined to resolutions on the Intercolonial Railway. On this side of the House, when they were advocating simultaneous elections, hon. gentlemen opposite were opposing them. They thought that if the elections were held on one day the Independence of Parliament would be better secured and the opinions of the constituencies better obtained; but the Opposition opposed them on that question. Where were his hon. friends opposite when the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Justice was before the House in favour of controverted elections being tried before the Judges? They were opposing it, contending that the old system of the trial of such cases before the House was the true one. He called attention to this fact that the country might see that the true advocates of the independence of Parliament were not to be found among hon. gentlemen opposite. The elections of the last few years had disclosed that hon. gentlemen opposite were not the true advocates of the purification of this chamber. What had the report of the Northern Railway Commission disclosed? It had shown that no hon. member on the Ministerial side could be charged with anything like the violation of the Independence of Parliament that was proven against hon. gentlemen opposite. It justified the conclusion he was drawing, that at this late day the Reform party was still the part that could truthfully stand up in defence of those great principles of Parliamentary Independence for which they had fought in the past. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) called attention to the increased expenditure for printing in New Brunswick since the present Government came into power. What were the facts in connection with that expenditure? Previous to the year 1873 the post offices in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were simply way offices involving little or no expenditure, comparatively speaking, for printing; but under the new system they were changed to regular post offices, and required to make daily reports, as in Ontario. The result was a large increase in the printing and stationery bills; and he challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to prove, from any information in the possession of the House, that Mr. Speaker received one cent more proportionately for the work that was done than under the old system. It had not been shown that the work done by Mr. Speaker was done at exceptional prices, or that he received more money for the work than was paid to the friends of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald) when they did the same work. In New Brunswick in 1872, the expenditure for this work was $2,740.72; in 1873, when the work was done under the old Administration, it was increased to $5,535.92, so that the "jump up," as the hon. member for Cardwell expressed it, occurred under the old Administration. In 1874 it increased to $6,341.15—something less than 20 per cent, while in the following year the expenditure was reduced to $6,303.58. The charge had not been made, and could not be proven if it were made, that Mr. Speaker received an increased price for the work he performed, as compared with the prices paid under the old Administration. The hon. member for Cardwell said that an anonymous letter appeared in the Montreal Gazette during the summer of 1874, charging Mr. Speaker with receiving contracts from the Government, and he was very much surprised that the hon. the First Minister did not become aware that Mr. Speaker was in peculiarly close relations with the Government. Did his hon. friend expect that every Minister of the Crown was to make it his particular business to read over the columns of all the newspapers in the country, or to pay attention to every anonymous scribbler in the public journals? The very idea would be absurd. If hon. gentlemen opposite were anxious to purge this House of a member who was unworthily filling his position, why was it that action was not taken until now? This information was in the Public Accounts and in the report of the hon. the Postmaster-General, and action might have been taken at a much earlier day. But if it were so very disreputable for Mr. Speaker to receive public monies because he owned a printing office, what was to be said of many hon. gentlemen opposite who were shareholders in newspapers representing their party? Was he exceeding Parliamentary privilege when he said that it was almost beyond doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite were largely interested in the Toronto Mail; and it had lately been been shown, through the Commission of inquiry into the Northern Railway matter, that $1,000 were subscribed by a gentleman closely connected with the Conservative Party as his share in that paper. He had the curiosity to examine a report brought down to the House, and found that, for 1872, the Chatham Planet received $52.92 in the shape of advertising, and there was an hon. gentleman in this House representing that paper. It might be said that was a small sum, but, according to the representations of the Opposition, the amount had nothing to do with the grave question of public morality which was involved in such transaction. He found also that the Belleville Intelligencer, connected with which was an hon. gentleman in this House, received $183.26, not a large amount to secure his allegiance. Then there was another gentleman, who occupied a seat in the House in 1873, who was publisher and proprietor of the Toronto Leader, and he received $543.80. He found, also, other organs similarly situated which received the same kind of attention from the late Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite should be consistent. If they wanted to carry consistency to its legitimate length, let some hon. member opposite move, "it is inexpedient that any hon. gentleman holding a seat in this House should receive any amount of money from the public treasury for advertisements and printing; that the receipt of that money is a gross violation of the Independence of Parliament, and this House should be purged of all hon. members who receive public moneys of any kind." It was, however, only in matters that would embarrass the Government, that the righteous indignation of those hon. gentleman took the form of such a resolution. It was only in matters that they thought would place the House and the Government at a disadvantage, that they were prepared to contend for the Independence of Parliament. During the election of 1872, what were the members of the Opposition doing at the very time when the Liberal Party were fighting for the Independence of Parliament? He found correspondence going on between the then First Minister and men who expected, to receive considerations for anything they might do. He found such a letter as this:—

"The friends of the Government will expect to be supplied with funds in the pending elections, and any amount which you or your company may advance to us for that purpose will be recouped to you."

Then followed the amounts wanted: Sir John A. Macdonald wanted $28,000; the Hon. Mr. Langevin wanted the small sum of $15,000, but he got $32,000; Sir George E. Cartier wanted $20,000. Then they found that Sir John A. Macdonald wanted an additional $10,000; that the Hon. Mr. Langevin wanted an additional $10,000, and that Sir George E. Cartier wanted an additional $20,000. Those were the hon. gentlemen who were now talking purity and fighting for the Independence of Parliament. Hon. members who knew their political history could scarcely realise the change. He was prepared to support the Government on this occasion, and he was prepared to take full responsibility for it; and he was prepared at the next election to argue every point of this resolution with the hon. member for Cumberland, at any moment he chose. He was satisfied that the intelligent constituencies of Ontario would not be "taken in," to use an American expression, with any sudden effervescence of public morality on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, but would stand by the Government and party that placed on the Statute-book resolutions and laws by which the Independence of Parliament could not be violated with impunity.

Mr. PLUMB said he was not surprised to learn that the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) intended to support the Government; he did not think that statement of the hon. gentleman would create any surprise in the House, for hon. members knew well what a slavish follower of the Government that hon. gentleman was, and that he would be prepared to support them on any question upon which his support was required. It did not need any argument on the part of that hon. gentleman to justify any vote that he would give to the Government. He (Mr. Plumb) had not intended to say anything on this question until he found that his hon. friends were debarred from saying anything in reply to arguments urged on the other side of the House. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had chosen to say that by a sort of parity of reasoning, many members of the House were guilty of a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act by being interested in certain newspapers who did public printing. He admitted the same. Hon. members were shareholders in corporations publishing newspapers. No one doubted it, but no one presumed to say that this was any ground for complaint. Indeed, this was so well understood that no one proposed to attack an incorporated company in the City of Halifax which had a very large share of Government printing, and in which it was well known that two prominent members of this House, one being a Minister of the Crown, were large shareholders and largely interested. He saw that it appeared in the Public Accounts that these hon. gentleman had not been without their share of the advantages given to the Faithful Mr. Ross.

who stood by the Government. In 1874, the whole expense connected with printing in Halifax amounted to $7,449, but in 1876, under the application of the glorious principles of Reform, Retrenchment and Economy, of which they had heard so much, and under an Administration which had come in to correct all abuses and to introduce retrenchment in the administration of public affairs, these gentlemen received the modest sum of $15,196. He would not have referred to the tu quoque argument had not the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex, by alluding to these matters, provoked a retort. He regretted that the motion of his hon. friend from North Hastings did not suit the hon. gentlemen opposite, but he would be very much surprised if anything the Opposition brought forward did suit them, and, more, he would be very suspicious of any resolution that hon. gentlemen opposite would accept. He would at once instinctively suppose that there was something wrong in it, or else these hon. gentlemen would not take it up. He was very much surprised to find that throughout the discussion no one had pretended for a moment to attack the principle asserted in this resolution; no one had presumed so far to forget what was due to the Parliament and the country as to attack the kernel and essential principle of the resolution. But hon. gentlemen opposite merely said that the course the Opposition had pursued was not acceptable to them. The Opposition had not supposed that this resolution would or could be so acceptable to the Government; or that having sat silent for two years under such a state of things, these hon. gentlemen would accept, at this hour, a resolution emanating from the Opposition benches, and proposing to remedy the difficulty. The language used by hon. gentlemen opposite was in strange contrast to that they employed during October 1868 and 1871. On May 19, 1868, the Minister of Justice said:—

"Was it known that for the paltry patronage of a county, for the mere power of distributing tide-waiterships and post office employment, the independence of many members had in times past been sacrificed."

On April 11, 1871, Mr. Mackenzie said:

"Their object was to render every member of the House thoroughly independent of outside influence. The first thing to be done to protect the liberties of the people was to make its Legislature thoroughly independent."

On February 28, 1871, during the debate regarding the position of Col. Gray, an amendment was moved by the then Opposition making it improper for any member of the House to receive any salary or emolument from the Government, whether annual or otherwise; and the Minister of Justice said:

"The principle contended for was, that no person should receive profit or advantage or any contract or salary from the Government while sitting in Parliament."

An amendment was moved at the time by the Minister of Justice, seconded by the hon. member for North Hastings; these hon. gentlemen then were in accord upon this subject, but now, as far as he could judge, they were wide as the poles asunder.

Mr. BLAKE: To what matter do you refer.

Mr. PLUMB: To the Col. Gray matter.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. member for North Hastings moved an amendment to my motion. I never had the honour of having that hon. gentleman as a seconder.

Mr. PLUMB: It is so stated in the proceedings.

Mr. BLAKE: No. Mr. Savary moved and Mr. Bowell seconded an amendment to my motion.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon. member for West Middlesex had introduced into the discussion several matters which he might well have left out, which it would be painful to discuss, and which would never have been alluded to by the Opposition if they had not thus been brought forward. The hon. gentleman must needs allude to what was familiarly known as the Pacific Scandal. This allusion hon. gentlemen opposite always seemed to consider as a sufficient answer to any charge brought against them. No matter how closely a charge was pressed, no matter how absolutely it was proved, no matter what corruption was practiced by these hon. gentlemen, no matter how they had falsified their promises of reform, no matter what extravagance and corruption entered into their administration of public affairs, or how completely they had belied all their promises with which they occupied office,—all they considered necessary by way of reply to any charge, was to say that on a certain occasion there was a Pacific Railway charter granted by the late Administration, and to repeat the unfounded charges by which the then Opposition had made it notorious. Many gentlemen occupied seats in the House now who were not there when that event connected with the Pacific Railway charter occurred, and such was not a sufficient answer to them, or to himself, or to many gentlemen who sat on the Opposition benches. They were dealing with the present and what concerned the future, and he appealed for the support of his position, to every man who lived in this country, and to whom the independence and the purity of Parliament was dear; and to none was he supposed to be better warranted to appeal, than to the gentlemen on the opposite benches, who had made the professions they had made while out of power,—to assist and aid in any movement intended to correct any abuse which might have grown up in Parliamentary practice, or in connection with Parliamentary government. The hon. gentleman from West Middlesex claimed that these contracts—he admitted the contracts—were all fulfilled at reasonable prices. The Opposition had not presumed to go into this part of the subject, and he did not think that it was the intention of any one of their number to attack a gentleman who had not the power of reply. They did not dream of such a thing. The resolution was simple, plain and clear; it attacked and censured the Government for having permitted an abuse in their administration of affairs to exist, and to go on from year to year; and when the attention of the Government was called to it, they sought to escape from their position by permitting a victim to be offered up as a sacrifice—as a sacrificial scapegoat, according to the manner of the Jewish Dispensation—for their sins. The Government proposed to lay their hands upon this scapegoat, and let him flee to the mountains, while they retained their places and the semblance of virtue, which they had not proved by their acts that they possessed. He approached this painful subject with the greatest reluctance, and he endorsed in the most emphatic manner the remarks which the right hon. member for Kingston had made at the opening of his speech. He disclaimed any personal feeling in the matter. It seemed to him that it was the duty of the Opposition to repel and reject the arguments which had been addressed to them from the Ministerialist benches. It was the duty of every member of the Opposition to appeal to the manly and independent sentiment of the House, and he hoped no one would be bound by party feelings, or governed by party considerations, which often affect men in such a way, that—

They hate the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.”

THE SEAT FOR GLOUCESTER.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. CASEY rose to a question of privilege. He said he desired to carry out the intention of which he had given notice, and with that view he moved :

“That the attention of this House having been called to the reports, returns and vouchers laid upon the table touching the payment of public moneys to the Hon. T. W. Anglin, member for the Electoral District of Gloucester, for printing and stationery for the Post Office Department, the said papers be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they be directed to enquire into the facts, to search for precedents, and to report the result of their enquiries; and whether the said Hon. T. W. Anglin has vacated his seat.”

In formulating this resolution he was guided by the action taken in two cases under the Independence of Parliament Act, one a Canadian case last Session, when the seat of the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Daoust) was questioned. That case was referred to the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections to look into the legal question arising in the case and to search for Parliamentary precedents applicable thereto and to report to the House. He had followed strictly the wording of the resolution in that case, not thinking it necessary however to add a clause relative to further proceedings, because, if the Committee reported that the seat was vacated, future proceedings would be regulated by the practice of the House. The other case on which he had based his resolution was that of Baron Rothschild, in the English House of Commons, in 1855. Attention was called to the fact that the firm of which Baron Rothschild, who was then the sitting member for London, was a member, had entered into a loan with the Government of £16,000,000. It was moved that a new writ be issued, Baron Rothschild having vacated his seat. In amendment it was moved that the matter be referred to a Select Committee, and the motion was finally carried in the following form :—

“That the contract entered into by Messrs. Rothschild & Co, with Her Majesty’s Government on the 20th day of April last, for a loan of sixteen millions for the public service be referred to a Select Committee, and that they be directed to report their opinion whether Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild has vacated his seat by reason of the said contract.”

He drew from this case, and also from the case of Daniel Whittle Harvey, with reference to a contract for hackney coaches, that he had ample reason for moving his resolution. In consequence of what had taken place in the House he would not say now all he had intended to say. He wished merely to state that he felt convinced that this case was a proper one to be investigated by a Committee of this House, because, according to May, any case in which there was a matter of doubt, should be referred to a Committee. He thought there certainly was a matter of doubt as to fact as well as to law. The circumstance that, in a similar case, the hon. member for Kingston had taken no action against a like motion, was good evidence that it was right to refer it to Committee when there was room for doubt. As to the other point, he would merely remark in reference to the case of a contract laid upon the table of the English House of Commons, it was held by various authorities, among them Mr. Disraeli, that that contract of itself was not sufficient evidence of the seat being vacated, and of a contract having been entered into between Baron Rothschild and Her Majesty’s Government.

Mr. BOWELL: No.

Mr. CASEY: It was held not to be sufficient evidence of the contract.

Mr. BOWELL: By whom was the contract signed?

Mr. CASEY: It was signed by the firm of which Baron Rothschild was a member.

Mr. BOWELL: That is correct.

Mr. CASEY said, in the present case, in the absence of any contract whatever, in the absence of any proof that there was any agreement or understanding amounting to a contract, there was stronger ground for arguing that there was sufficient matter to send to a Committee. He considered that the Committee would do Mr. Speaker justice, notwithstanding that the gentlemen opposite had tried to prevent it being done.

Mr. MITCHELL: Don't say that; that is not true.

Mr. CASEY: I do say it distinctly. The Committee would also afford the country an opportunity of having the matter cleared up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, and so it had come to this, that the Government had not performed its duty, and, because the Leader of the Opposition had not done his duty, it had been left for the Patronage Secretary of the Treasury, the Whipper-in of the Ministerial party, to make this motion in vindication of the privileges of Parliament. Why was not this moved earlier in the Session? Why was it not moved last Session? It was simply because the Government did not desire to bring this question before Parliament, and to have the privileges of Parliament vindicated; because they did not desire to have the Independence of Parliament protected. But they had been forced, by public opinion outside the House, and still more by the opinion in the House, to induce this motion to be made at the last hour. Why had the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) called upon the Opposition to move this resolution? Why should he think it the duty of the minority to call the attention of this House to the matter, and to protect the rights of the people? Why should it be supposed that it rested peculiarly upon the weaker half of Parliament to vindicate the independence and the rights of Parliament? It was not always so. It was only last Session that the hon. member for Drummond, and Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier), a supporter of the Government, made a similar motion with reference to the hon. member for Two Mountains. It was just the same as if the Government moved it in reality. The strings were pulled, and the bobbins went up; the key was touched, and the note responded. Wherever there was power, there was responsibility. Wherever there was weakness and inability to carry out responsibility, then it rested upon the power to fulfil its responsibility. What were the facts? In 1874, a member of the Government made, corruptly, a bargain with a member of the House by which he gave him a contract, and a secret contract. Who knew of that contract? Who knew that the member for Gloucester had anything to do with the printing or supply of stationery for New Brunswick? Who knew that the Postmaster-General, and consequently the Government—because the Government were responsible for the acts of a colleague performed within the scope of his jurisdiction—was giving this contract? Who knew that the Government in 1874 was giving a contract to a member of Parliament and yet allowing him to retain his seat? Who knew this and yet made that member the Speaker of this House? Who knew that the Speaker, who was to be the impartial Judge between parties, who was to hold a judicial position, who was to hold the scales of justice equally between the right and left, who was to protect the minority against the pressure of the Government—who knew that he was the subsidized contractor of the Government? Who knew that, in 1874, the Government held the Speaker, the First Commoner of the land, in the hollow of their hand? Who knew that the Speaker was, week after week, and month after month, and quarter after quarter, receiving his commission at the hands of the Government for which he signed receipts? Who knew all this but those who elected him Speaker? Upon them be the responsibility, upon them be the offence and the great political crime against the first principles of justice, against the first principles of the Independence of Parliament and against fair play. He had no hesitation in saying that the hon. gentlemen were again and again disappointed at the result of their actions, because Mr. Speaker rose superior to their inducements. But the inducement was made all the same; the payment was made all the same; the breach of the Statute was made all the same.

Mr. MILLS: I rise to point out that the hon. gentleman is to be one of the Speaker's judges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had already judged him, and already acquitted him. The hon. gentleman had already stated in his place as a member of the Government and as the member for Bothwell, as one of a representative body of men from the Province of Ontario, that it was quite right, that it was quite expedient, that it was quite proper for the Government to give a contract to a member of Parliament and to keep him a member, and to retain him Speaker of this House. He, one of the apostles of liberty, had voted that it was perfectly consistent that the Government should be held blameless, and that the fact of a contract between the Government and the Speaker, between 1874 and 1876, did not constitute a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. But there were occasions when the whirligig of time brought in its own revenges, and if ever there was a time when the finger of scorn would be pointed at the hon. gentlemen opposite by the people of Canada, it was now. Now was the day when the hon. gentlemen opposite would be pointed at by the country as an "organized hypocrisy." Those gentlemen who, month after month, and year after year, had pointed to the Conservative party as being alive with corruption of all kinds, were found out under the most suspicious circumstances, under circumstances which almost amounted to a certainty. Looking at the dates, at the time, at the circumstances, by the light of the speech of the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Mr. Costigan) that morning, the House could understand the means by which a certain unquiet, bold and restless spirit had been quieted and appeased. The whole thing could be understood now. It was attempted to be concealed, it was attempted to be glossed over. The matter was brought up last Session by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell.) The House had waited and waited to see if the Government would do their duty but they would not. And those were the hon. gentlemen who were to cause undue influence and corruption to disappear for ever. No more were there to be the regretful scenes of the last twenty years. A new age was to commence. There were to be no infringements of the Independence of Parliament. But what was the case in 1874? Through their colleague, the Postmaster-General, the Government deliberately subsidized a man whom they had selected to be the impartial Speaker of the House. They subsidized him. They paid him money and kept the secret. It was known for a year afterwards by the admission of the Premier himself. About Christmas, 1875, he was aware of it, and he said there must be no more work done. They knew perfectly well, by the act of their colleague, that the seat of the Speaker had been vacated; that he had no more right to a seat than any one of the lads who runs around this floor. They knew his seat was vacated, and yet they did not take the steps which ought to have been taken, but made the country believe that Mr. Speaker was member for Gloucester, which he was not, and that he was the Speaker of this House, which he ought not to be. That was the conduct of the Government. It was a great triumph to the Opposition when they saw that those gentlemen opposite had belied all their professions and had taken the course they had, and as the hon. member for Cardwell said—

Mr. DYMOND rose to a point of order—the hon. gentleman could not refer to a past debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could do so if he chose by going over the hon. gentleman's (Mr. McCarthy's) arguments and making them his own, after the fashion of the hon. gentleman who had interrupted him. As he understood, one hundred and eleven gentlemen of this House had voted as members of Parliament, as men of honour, as men of understanding, that it had been quite expedient and quite proper for the Government of the day to make such a contract with the Speaker as had been proved had been entered into between the Government and him. Those one hundred and eleven members of Parliament, representatives of the people, defenders of the rights of the people, defenders of the Independence of Parliament—had also voted that it was no infraction of the Act in relation to the Independence of Parliament. It was solemnly declared that the whole transaction between the Postmaster-General and the member for Gloucester was quite proper and quite expedient, and with the same conscientiousness these one hundred and eleven voted that it was no infraction of the Independence of Parliament Act. Now, how could those hundred and eleven, after having solemnly recorded their votes, which would stand against them as long as they lived, and a long time beyond, after they had voted that there was no infringement of the Act, how could they now say that there was prima facie evidence of it to be enquired into by the Committee on Privileges and Elections? Why, no reference could be made to the Committee unless there was prima facie evidence. The member for Elgin, who moved to send the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, had actually previously voted that there was no case on which to found his motion. He had no doubt they would unseat Mr. Speaker. He had no doubt that they would take the course as indicated by the hon. the Premier on Saturday, when he said he would vote for the resolution if the second part had only been omitted. What was the first part of the resolution? "It was inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any contract whereby any money was paid to members of Parliament, such as the Postmaster-General's report of 1875 and 1876, and the vouchers laid on the table of the House showed that sums of money have been paid to Timothy Warren Anglin, member for Gloucester." That was the first part of the resolution, and the hon. the Premier would be quite willing to vote the Speaker's condemnation, but not his own. He was quite willing to eat the extremity of humble pie, to sign the Speaker's condemnation, to admit that the Postmaster-General in the first place, and the Speaker in the next, had committed a grave constitutional wrong; but he could not go to the second part of the resolution, that it was in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act. He had to whip in his friends even to that, and compromise with them by the resolution he got the Whipper-in of the party to move afterwards, that the Speaker should be put on his trial. As he had already said, what was there to be tried? Hon. gentlemen had voted that it was not in contravention of the Independence of Parliament Act, and there was now a motion admitting that on the face of the papers a prima facie case was made out, and that the recipient of the money should be heard. And what would the Speaker state? He would state that he made certain arrangements with the Government to perform certain contracts; that the Government knew he was a member of Parliament; that the Government did not ask him to resign his seat; that the Government after having made these arrangements which had vacated his seat, and by which Timothy Warren Anglin was no longer a member of the House, actually moved that he should be Speaker of this House. Why every one would remember the riots in Montreal in 1849 when an unauthorized man walked into the House and took possession of the Speaker's chair. Everybody was surprised. Now suppose one of the crowd that waited on the Prime Minister the other day had walked into the House and taken the Chair, and the leader of the Government desired to have him removed, he could have said that he had as much right to the Chair as Mr. Anglin had. He was as much a member of Parliament as he (Mr. Anglin) was. And what had been the result? The House had had an hon. gentleman in the Chair who was not a member of Parliament, and not being a member of Parliament, he was no longer Speaker. The Opposition had their triumph, and it would ring through the country that the Government shelved the arrangement to the last moment, and only at the last moment, when driven to a corner, were compelled against their will to admit that they had been in this unconstitutional arrangement from the beginning. If they had done their duty they ought never to have placed the Speaker in that Chair, and had they not done so they would never have placed themselves in the humiliating position in which they now stand before the House, and the country, and themselves, and their followers.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had often heard the hon. gentleman performing some very extraordinary political antics, but never heard that hon. gentleman deliver such an indecent, shameful speech as he had just delivered. They heard the hon. gentleman claim, not half an hour ago, that he did not take the ground that the seat was vacant, but he now declared that it had been vacant for years. He had made every available statement which could satisfy political rancour and political passion. The hon. gentleman had not shown a particle of that decency which should characterize one who sat as a judge in the House in a case where judicial fairness was to be expected. What was to be expected from the hon. gentleman as a Judge in this or any other case? The hon. gentleman had shown that he was unfit to sit as a Judge in every case where there was the slightest difference of political opinion. The right hon. gentleman did not hesitate to declare in advance what his opinion was. Let the facts declare whether there was an agreement or not, the hon. gentleman had avowed his determination to give his verdict before the jury assembled, before the evidence was heard, and had interlarded his speech with allusions to every person around him, casting dirt as if he sat upon some eminence where he was justified in throwing filth in every direction. What was the hon. gentleman's record in this House? He must presume greatly on the credulity of his audience, particularly at this late day, if he thought they had forgotten what had been done by himself even in election cases.

Mr. MASSON: Pacific Scandal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not allude to the Pacific Scandal.

Mr. MASSON: You might have.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he might have alluded to a thousand things if time permitted. The hon. gentleman must think him very ignorant of political history, if he thought he could not occupy hour after hour in summing up the political iniquities which had characterized the career of the right hon. gentleman, as if the hon. gentleman had ever done anything which would justify him in holding up his hands in holy horror at anything that could be done in Parliament. The hon. gentleman's career as a political Reformer was tolerably well known; his career as a political intriguer was still better known. His success at corrupting the country was, if possible, still better known. He promised the right hon. gentleman something in a very short time in the way of revelations, which the hon. gentleman supposed he would not recollect. The hon. gentleman knew what had transpired within the last twenty years with regard to election trials. What was the case at the present time? The particular charge was that of having a contract with the Government. The statement had been made that the work was done in the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Speaker's) office last year; yet no member of the Opposition moved for an enquiry into the matter. Every person knew then what was known now. The hon. gentleman knew this, but they went back a year and spoke of the matter as newly discovered, newly found out, and as if the Government were continuing the system. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had condemned such transactions as inexpedient and improper; but without any enquiry into the facts of the case, without any search for precedent, hon. gentlemen proposed to pass judgment. He could produce cases in which the right hon. member for Kingston had justified an exactly similar transaction to that under discussion. It did not matter whether the sum was $10,000 or $500. He mentioned the case of Mr. Ramsay, who had resigned because he was interested in a contract amounting to $47. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had mentioned a case the other day where Mr. Ramsay had to resign because he had a share in a contract amounting to $47; and yet they knew that a number of hon. gentlemen opposite, including, if he remembered rightly, the very member who had made this motion, were included in the same condemnation. More than one voted on that side to condemn a transaction which he would not call according to its enormity—transactions in which they themselves were engaged. Such was the extent of political rancour which actuated hon. gentlemen opposite that nothing seemed too ferocious for them to indulge in, nothing too extravagant to say, nothing too indelicate to touch upon, no matter whose feelings might be hurt or offended. The system which the Conservative party had inaugurated this Session was one of constant, interminable warfare of the worst and most intolerant character. The hon. gentleman was very bold. He went through the country denouncing him (Mr. Mackenzie) as a dishonest man—declaring that the Government continually and systematically kept contracts from the lowest tenders and given to the highest. He went through the country telling other stories, which he could only characterize by the strongest Anglo-Saxon phrase that could be applied. He ventured to attack Mr. Speaker, knowing that he was powerless to defend himself. He gave the hon. gentleman credit for the discretion to know that had Mr. Speaker been on the floor of the House, he would have had a much more civil tongue in his head. Considering the intensity of the ferocity manifested during this debate, the hon. the leader of the Opposition might well have allowed the amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin to have passed in silence; or, if not in silence, at least in a much more quiet manner. But the hon. gentleman had chosen his road. He was one of the Judges, and a most upright judge he must be.

Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 10th April, 1877.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVE CRIMINALS.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

Mr. MACKENZIE.

“1. That the Parliament of Canada has all the power necessary for making provision for the extradition from Canada of fugitive criminals.

“2. That the Parliament and Government of Canada have all the powers proper for performing the obligations of Canada, as part of the British Empire, towards Foreign States, arising under treaties between the Empire and Foreign States.

“3. That several Extradition arrangements extending to Canada have been made between Her Majesty the Queen and Foreign States, and that other such arrangements may from time to time be made.

“4. That it is proper to make provision by one Canadian law for the execution, as respects Canada, of all such arrangements.

“5. That a Bill has passed both Houses of the Parliament of Canada, and now awaits the Royal assent—providing for the execution, as respects Canada, of all such arrangements, so soon as the operation of the Extradition Act of 1870 of the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall have ceased or been suspended within Canada.

“6. That by the said Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, certain provisions are made for the extradition of fugitive criminals, and by the seventeenth section it is enacted that the Act when applied by Order in Council, shall, unless it is otherwise provided by such Order, extend to the several British possessions in the same manner as if throughout the Act the British possessions were substituted for England, as the case may require, with certain modifications, and by the eighteenth section it is enacted that if any by-law or ordinance, made before or after the passing of the said Act, by the Legislature of any British possession, provision is made for carrying into effect within such possession the surrender of fugitive criminals who are in, or suspected of being in, such British possessions, Her Majesty may, by the Order in Council applying the Act, in the case of any Foreign State, or by any subsequent Order, either suspend the operation within any such British possession of the Act, or of any part thereof, so far as it relates to such Foreign State, and so long as such law or ordinance continues in force there, and no longer, or direct that such law or ordinance, or any part thereof, shall have effect in such British possession, with or without modifications and alterations, as if it were part of the Act.

“7. That the provisions of the said Act of 1870 are unsuitable to Canada.

“8. That when the said Bill now awaiting the Royal assent becomes law, it will be expedient that the said Act of 1870 should not extend to Canada.

“9. That it is expedient to present an address to Her Majesty, based on the preceding resolutions, and praying that she will be graciously pleased to invite such legislation in the Parliament of the United Kingdom as will cause the operation of the said Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom to cease in Canada, and that in the meantime she will be graciously pleased, by Order in Council, to suspend the operation within Canada of the said Act so far as it relates to any Foreign State with which there may be an extradition arrangement."

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to; and referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Blake, Mackenzie, Mills, Laurier and Young, to prepare an address to Her Majesty embodying the same.

Mr. BLAKE presented the report of the said Committee, with the draft of an address to Her Majesty embodying the said resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE moved:

"That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that that honourable body will concur in the Address."

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not know if it will assist the Government, but I have received a letter from Toronto, signed with initials, telling me that, if I could induce the Minister of Justice to prevent this having a retroactive effect, I would be handsomely rewarded.

Mr. BLAKE: I am afraid my right hon. friend has not gone the right way about it.

MEASUREMENT OF REGISTERED SHIPS BILL.—[BILL No. 106.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported.

PUBLIC WORKS TRANSFER BILL.—[BILL No. 110.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time, and passed.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 108.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said as the resolution on which the Bill was based had been discussed very fully the other day, he did not think it necessary to discuss it any further. He might say however to his hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Caron) that the Bill in no way affected the Harbour of Quebec. He had had an interview with two intelligent and respectable pilots from that port, and they expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with the Bill as it stood. He had no particular objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton, (Mr. MacKay) who he was sorry to see was not then in his place.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved that the Pilotage District of Sydney be included with the ports of Halifax and Pictou.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would merely re-state his objections to the Bill. He saw no reason why they should so exempt Halifax and Pictou any more than the District of Sydney. He might as well ask that the Miramichi District should also be included; but he would not make any such request, because he considered that this exemption was wrong in principle, detracting from the effect of the present Pilotage Laws. He was aware that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would not accept any of his suggestions; but he would, nevertheless, call the hon. gentleman's attention to a difficulty connected with the second clause of the Bill stating that no clearance should be granted to any ship, unless a certificate from the pilotage authority, or some person authorized by such authority to give it, was shown. Now, in the Harbour of Miramichi there were two ports, Chatham and Newcastle. These were included in the pilotage district, and the pilotage authorities lived at Chatham, six miles from Newcastle; consequently, under this regulation, parties would have to drive from Newcastle to Chatham and back again, a distance of twelve miles, and cross a ferry twice in order to obtain such certificate. This would cause a great deal of annoyance and trouble, and he trusted that the clause would be so modified as to make it applicable only to a port in which there was a resident pilotage authority. Chatham and Newcastle were one port for the purpose of pilotage, but not for those of customs or shipping.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said it was unfair to state that he would not consider any suggestions made by the hon. member from Northumberland. He quite recognized the hon. gentleman's good judgment regarding matters of this kind, and he was always ready to consider the hon. gentleman's suggestions. He had no objection to consider the suggestions now made before the third reading of the Bill. Perhaps the inconvenience mentioned would not be so great as the hon. gentleman supposed.

Mr. MITCHELL said that in an experience of forty years he had never known of a case in which a pilot lost his fees. They always looked after them sharply.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said Sydney was now made a port of call. Some eight hundred vessels arrived there in the course of the year, a number being steamers, and it was a matter of considerable moment as to how the pilotage dues should be collected there, not only to the authorities of the port, but also to the pilots, who were a very large and useful class of people. He thought that the pilotage authorities should be left to decide in what cases sailing vessels or steamers should be exempt from the payment of compulsory pilotage, and he saw no reason why Sydney and North Sydney should not be included with Halifax and Pictou. He would not complain if the latter ports were entirely left out of the Bill, but he could not understand why the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should bring down exceptional legislation in favour of the ports mentioned. He hoped that the Minister would see the justice of granting the same power to the authorities of Sydney as to those of Halifax and Pictou. He could not see what rights Pictou and Halifax could have which Sydney was not entitled to.

Mr. CARON asked whether the Bill affected the port of Quebec.

Mr. SMITH said he could assure his hon. friend that it would not affect the port of Quebec in the slightest degree. He had no objection to include the pilotage districts of Sydney in the same category with the ports of Halifax and Pictou.

Mr. KILLAM said, if Sydney and North Sydney and Halifax and Pictou were so included, he could not see why every other port in the Dominion should not be placed in the same position. Under the circumstances, it would be better to abolish compulsory pilotage altogether as regards both sailing vessels and steamers. He could not perceive any reason why the ports named should be exempt from the operation of the Bill. He hoped that the House would not agree to any amendment of the kind proposed.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he really saw no objection why the clause should not be made more general. The regulations regarding pilotage should be in the hands of the local authorities as was the case in England and in almost every other country. Cork was a port of call and pilotage, there it was purely voluntary; at Falmouth, another port of call, it was compulsory. It was fair to assume that the local authorities had the interests of their respective ports at heart, and different regulations might be advisable for different places.

Mr. PALMER said he could not agree with the principle laid down by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. While, perhaps, it might be well to give such ports as Halifax and Pictou the power to make fees compulsory or otherwise, he thought it would be dangerous to the general shipping interest to allow small ports of call to charge what fees they chose.

FORT FRANCIS LOCK.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Order for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, read.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he desired to call attention to some papers that had been just brought before the House. As the private members' day had been taken away, this was the only means he had of calling attention to the matter. In doing so he hoped he would not be stigmatized as "offensive," as other gentlemen of the Opposition had been for making similar observations and enquiries as to the manner in which the Public Works Department was managed. The paper he referred to was a return to the House, in answer to an address for copies of Orders in Council relating to the construction of the Fort Francis Lock or Canal. It appeared that this work was entered into in order to connect the waters of Rainy Lake and Lake of the Woods. In 1875 an appropriation of $150,000 was made for it, the Premier stating that it was to be in connection with the second section of the Pacific Railway—not a branch, as would be found by the Pacific Railway Act—from Kaministiquia Bridge to a place called Sturgeon's Falls, at the head of Rainy Lake. Then it was intended to use the waters of Rainy Lake and overcome the falls at Fort Francis by constructing this lock, using the Rainy River and Lake of the Woods until the North-West Angle or Keewatin was reached, where the railway from Winnipeg would touch the navigable waters. It was understood that there was one chief portage to be overcome, and that with a certain expenditure there might be a continuous water stretch from Sturgeon Falls to the North-West Angle or Keewatin. But, even then, he contended that this work would practically have been of no use. It was intended to connect the waters for vessels drawing seven feet of water. The lock was being constructed to a depth of eight feet. It might naturally be expected that the water leading to this would have the same depth. But on page 26, it would be found:

"According to Capt. Cameron, of the Rainy Lake steamer, the low water draught through the lake and river above the Fort, a distance of 44 miles, does not average more than 4½ feet. Between the Fort and the foot of the Long Sault, a distance of about 45 miles, the draft during low water is about 7 feet on the first 12 miles, 6 feet on the next 6 miles, 5½ feet on the following 10 miles, and 5 feet in the remainder, according to the Captain of the small tug steamer which plies on that section of the river. At the Manitou there appeared to be no difficulty as regards the depth of the water at the head of the rapid, but there is a declivity of a few feet in a short distance and a current of about five miles an hour or more, against which a steamer of small power cannot ascend without being hauled by means of a rope and capstan or otherwise. At the head of the Long Sault there is also a swift current, too much for an ordinary steamboat to overcome. In the Long Sault Rapids, some two miles or more in length, the worst of which I sounded to within one quarter of a mile of the wharf, to which the Lake of the Woods steamer ascend. I found eight feet of water on two of the shoals, this represents a depth of 3½ feet during the lowest observed stage of the water, the river surface at that time being 4½ feet higher than in October, 1875."

It would be found that expenditure would have to be incurred of which they could see no end, and that the mere fact of the construction of this lock would not end the expenditure by any means. The Engineer said "that no definite scheme or estimate can however, be submitted, unless the necessary levels, soundings, and measurements are taken along the entire length of the proposed navigation." The work had been entered into without any estimate and without any idea as to the utility of the result. On August 3rd, 1876, Mr. Eailairge, the Engineer, was detailed to go up and examine the Fort Francis Canal, and give such directions as he thought desirable, according to the revised plan lately furnished. Mr. Baillairge said: "This plan was prepared from somewhat limited information, and is based on the high and low water levels originally observed by the Engineer who first laid out the work; the low water levels have since been found to be fourteen inches lower at the lower end, than represented in the plan." Here was found a public work entered into with only limited information, and it would be found, by the report, that its utility could not be carried out without considerable further delay. When he told the House that the whole original scheme was changed, and that the road would not run near that point, but 100 miles away from Fort Francis, and that the nearest point where there was water connection was Port Savanne, a distance of 184 miles, it would be seen that the work was of no use to carry up supplies and rails for the Pacific Railway, as was proposed, especially when seven portages, in addition to that at Fort Francis, had to be got over. Any gentleman looking into the report would see that the construction of the work was a mistake. The following were the portages between Lac des Mille Lacs and Rainy Lake:

No.	—	Land carriage.		Difference in level.
		Miles.	Chains.	Feet.
1	Baril Portage.....	.....	16	+1.86
2	Brulé Portage.....	.....	21	-47.02
	Descent in Windgoostegon lakelets and streams.....	.....		-9.50
3	French Portagé..	1	60	-99.71
4	Fine and Deux Riv. Portages..	2	.....	124.12
5	Island Portage, Sturgeon River.....		13	42.56
6	Nequaquon Portage.....	2	.....	72.00

	Land.....	6	41	403.46
	Off.....			+1.86
Difference in level between Lac des Mille Lacs and Rainy Lake.....				401.60

There was thus a total of 6 miles 41 chains which would have to be crossed by carriage. The question was, whether it was desirable to go on with this work. It might be of use in connection with a canal system, but not otherwise. Were a canal constructed between Lake Shebandowan and Lake of the Woods, it would be necessary to expend, as estimated, no less a sum than $1,500,000, and it would not be less by making that canal from Port Savanne.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is that?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said this estimate would be found in Sessional papers, No. 42, 1869, in the report of Mr. Dawson. Was this country going to enter into the construction of a new canal system, unless it was to be of use in connection with the Pacific Railway? In four or five years they had been told this road between Fort William and Selkirk would be completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say that. I said it could not be completed in less than that time. It might be twenty years.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the House ought to know whether the work was to occupy twenty years or not. Was that road leading into the wilderness to stand still for twenty years; was all the money expended on that road to remain useless for that length of time? If that work would be of any benefit, it ought to be pushed forward as quickly as possible. They were evidently expending money on a work of doubtful utility. We had a low-draught canal at our own doors, which was constructed forty years ago at a cost of £1,500,000 sterling, which it was proposed to abandon a short time ago. It seemed rather strange for the Government to enter into the construction of a similar work. He could not find a single certificate of an engineer recommending the construction of this work; nor was there any Order in Council in the return authorizing or relating to the construction of Fort Francis locks or canal. Was this the way in which our public works were being constructed? This morning they heard a prominent politician, a person acquainted with all the minutiae of Parliamentary law, state that when money was voted it was not voted to the Ministry, but to the Crown. He agreed with that opinion; and it was necessary that an Order in Council should be issued before the money could be used for the construction of this or any other work. Section 11 of the Pacific Railway Act of 1874 was clear on this point. But where was the Order in Council in this case? The Act further stipulated that the works should be let for contract by public competition. This had not been offered to public competition, but was being constructed by time-work in direct contravention of this Act. But this was not the first time the provisions of the Act had been violated. Section 5 provided that a line of telegraph be constructed in advance of the railway, as soon as the location should be determined upon. Before the road was located, a line of telegraph was placed under construction. He moved a resolution to the effect that this was a violation of the law, and he had the moral support of the present Ministers of Justice and the Interior, and the hon. member for South Renfrew. True, they did not vote for the resolution, but they did not vote against it. But what was the result? The day after that resolution was defeated, the hon. gentleman opposite telegraphed to British Columbia to stop the contract, causing great expense to the contractor, and the country had to pay the piper for the damages incurred. It was better, when a mistake occurred, for the First Minister to acknowledge it, rather than to brazen it out and rush the country into an expenditure of this character. For the purpose of letting the House express its opinion on this question, he would move the following amendment:—

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved: That Fort Francis Lock is said to be a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the money spent thereon has been expended out of the Pacific Railway appropriation, and that the said work is, therefore, subject to the provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874.

“That by Section 11 of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874, it is enacted that ‘no contract for any portion of the main line of the said Railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the House of Commons for one month without being disapproved, unless sooner approved by a resolution of the House.’

“And by Section 12 of the said Act, it is enacted that ‘in case it shall be found by the Governor in Council more advantageous to construct the said Railway, or any portion thereof, as a public work of the Dominion of Canada, the construction thereof shall be let out by contracts offered to public competition.’

“That the construction of the Fort Francis Lock has been carried on as a work of the Dominion by time work, and has not been let out by contract offered to public competition.

“That no Order in Council has been passed authorizing the construction of said work, or the application of the Parliamentary appropriation thereto.

“That it does not appear, from the papers laid before the House, that the Chief or any Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway Survey has ever recommended the construction of the said lock; nor does it appear that there was, or is, any estimate of the cost of the improvements on Rainy Lake and Rainy River, and water stretches connecting therewith, necessary to attain the object for which the said lock is being constructed:

“That, in the opinion of this House, the commencement of said work without any Order in Council authorizing the same, and the construction of the said work, otherwise than by contract offered to public competition, is unconstitutional and a violation of the express terms of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874.”

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman might have extended the courtesy of letting me know that he proposed to move an amendment of this character on going in Committee of Supply. It is usually done. The hon. gentleman has dealt in many assertions which he cannot expect me to deal with on the moment, without an instant's notice. I have, therefore, merely to say with regard to this work, that it was contemplated long before the Pacific Railway was undertaken at all, one that was estimated for in various ways by parties who had engaged in the exploration of the country, and one that I consider essential to the route through our own country for many years to come, unless, indeed, we should be able to proceed with unexampled rapidity, a rapidity which would involve our entering upon an extra expenditure of money, with the construction of the railway from port to port, that is from Selkirk on Red River to Thunder Bay on Lake Superior. By the plan that the hon. gentleman himself sketched out, as the plan that was understood by the Government in 1875-76 to be the one which would be followed, and to which I referred the other night, it would be nearly a direct line from the bridge over the Kaministiquia, by Lake Shebandowan, to Sturgeon Falls, and then in nearly a direct line to Keewatin. But, as explained a few nights ago, after thorough exploration that route was found to be unpracticable. It was therefore diverted a little to the north to touch the north-east corner of Lac des Mille Lacs, thereby saving some portages which existed on the previous travelled route. The hon. gentleman stated the distance of the portages with tolerable accuracy. Let me state the entire distance of the various routes. When the railroad is built to Lac des Milles Lacs we shall have built 65 or 66 miles of road from Lake Superior. We shall then have 276 miles of navigable water between that point and the north-west point of the Lake of the Woods, to the place which the road would reach from Red River. In that distance there are 6 $\frac{46}{100}$  miles of portages, the longest one of which is 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  miles; the next one is 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  miles, and none of the others exceed a little over an eighth of a mile. When we are able to touch Lac des Mille Lacs with the railway, we shall then have a free channel for carrying our own traffic and passengers by rail that distance, then by water to Keewatin or the crossing of the Winnipeg River, and then by rail, 110 miles, to Selkirk. The entire distance then will be, by water navigation, 276 miles; by railroad, 176 miles, as near as may be, with some six miles of portages. Accordingly, it will be a comparatively easy route over which to carry a large traffic. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has enlarged upon what he considers an assumed fact, that this is solely and purely a part of the Pacific Railway, and intimately and wholly connected with it. The truth is, as I have explained on many occasions in this House, that this Government found itself burdened with the Pacific Railway project. We were at once bound to husband the resources of the country, and to endeavour to carry out, as far as was possible, a scheme which would be satisfactory to those with whom we had entered into obligations, and to that end it was desirable that we should construct these works as speedily as possible. I expressed, at the very commencement of the reign of this Administration, my firm conviction that for many years to come we would have to be indebted to these stretches of water navigation which intervened between different points. It has been assumed, I might say maliciously and wrongfully assumed, that we were to diverge the railway from point to point so as to reach the water at various places. That never was our proposal. Our proposal was simply that where we should find large reaches of water we should avail ourselves of them, until the resources of the country would permit the completion of the railroad in the part of the country served by the water stretches. This water stretch of 276 miles in the heart of the country between Selkirk and Thunder Bay, is one of these reaches, and it is one which we could not use to any advantage without having this particular work constructed. All the other portages are on comparatively level ground; with one exception, they are very short, and it would be an easy matter, if we found it desirable, to construct a tramway over these portages. But at this particular portage, where there is a very large descent, and where we had a steamer on Rainy Lake, and another steamer on the Lake of the Woods, it became exceedingly desirable that we should have this work executed, if possible, as soon as we could have the road built to Thunder Bay, the nearest point of water we could touch for the purpose of navigation. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) says there is no report of an engineer recommending this work. It was a matter of policy, as well as a work of engineering. There is no difficulty in getting the approval of an engineer to the plan. The plan had been made by Mr. Page; the work had been so far constructed under the charge of the engineers, and was being carried forward under their charge. There was no engineer's recommendation for the construction of the Pacific Railway for a distance of 2,700 miles, but it was determined that it should be done. It was not necessary, in a matter of policy, that an engineer should recommend any work; but, as a matter of fact, this work at Fort Francis was the result of long and anxious consultation with the officers of my Department and my colleagues as to the wisdom and the propriety of proceeding to construct this work. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) proposes that now, when the work is somewhat more than one-half constructed, that we should abandon it. That is not my opinion; it is not the opinion of any man who will give the matter dispassionate consideration. It may be the opinion of those who are only anxious, and constantly anxious, to find some cause of fault and some means of getting a vote of some kind against the Administration. While that may be the opinion of those hon. gentleman, I am sure it cannot be the opinion of any one who has studied the country, the difficulty we have in gaining access to it, and various considerations that have to be looked at not merely in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway, but in keeping the route in our own territory only with the intervening lock constructed. The construction of 180 miles of railway in the heart of the country is no easy matter, and it is not a cheap matter, and it will depend entirely upon the financial resources of the country and upon political reasons which have to be developed, and upon our obtaining offers for the construction of the road what they would be able to do within a reasonable time or not. I do not choose at the present moment to enter into a discussion of the general question, further than to allude to the fact that, the expenditure must govern us in regard to that as well as any other works of that character. I have merely to say that the road known as the Dawson road, during five or six years, cost one million and a quarter dollars. The last year hon. gentlemen opposite managed that road it cost \$399,628.11. The St. Francis Lock and its approaches at the two ends has been estimated to cost \$200,000; a little over \$1000,000 has now been expended. As to the charge that I have violated the Statute in not having an Order in Council passed providing that the work should be done by days' labour instead of by contract. I may say I differ with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and I hope the hon. gentleman will allow me to differ with him. We have the right, when we consider it is in the public interest that a public work should be carried on by days' labour, to do so, because the Act gives us some discretion. We carried on the work connected with the interior of the Library by days' work for a sufficient reason, and thus we carried out a large proportion of the work upon the Parliamentary grounds, spending a much larger sum for those purposes in the heart of this city for days' labour than on the St. Francis Lock. I found a legacy from the hon. gentlemen opposite, in the shape of a difficulty regarding the two boats built for those lakes by contract. They were assumed to be built by contract, but were in reality finished by days' labour, and the disputes concerning payment are not ended yet. It is one of the most difficult parts of the country to reach. We had our own means of transporting men and materials to that quarter, and we believed—it is quite possible we may have been wrong—the work could be done cheaper than if it had been given out by contract at that time.

Mr. MASSON: I desire to ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works a question. Does the hon. gentleman consider he is building this work under the Pacific Railway Act or not? He would simplify matters by stating on what authority he is spending the money.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am spending the money on the authority of Parliament, which voted $150,000 for the purpose, and subsequently voted $500,000 for works of navigation in connection with the Pacific Railway. I explained, at the time the vote was taken, what we proposed to do with it. There is no doubt about that point. The vote was not objected to by any hon. member, and it was passed unanimously by the House. It was perfectly well understood for what the money was wanted. It has been used for that particular purpose, and it has been used with discretion and economy. The work is a success, and will prove of general advantage both for opening and maintaining a route during the construction of the Pacific Railway and for purposes connected with the Pacific Railway itself.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated that the Opposition were all anxious to find fault with the Government when they introduced a motion connected with any of the Departments. He regretted that the hon. Minister should take that ground, because if the House agreed with him (Mr. Mackenzie), hon. members had only to remain silent and sanction all measures submitted by the Government. They had not been sent to Parliament for that purpose, but rather to watch the business of the country, and see that the taxes paid by the people were properly used. If they found that an amount of money voted by Parliament had been used in a manner which they thought was not justifiable, surely the proper mode to adopt was that pursued by the hon. member for Frontenac, to submit a motion to the House in order that the matter might be discussed and the truth obtained in regard to it from the mouths of Ministers and from public documents. The hon. member had presented the case very justly before the House, and he had shown from documents, the report of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and by the return published a few days ago, that the work had not been executed in accordance with the law. The subject was referred to at the early part of the Session by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, when he stated that the St. Francis lock was built in connection with the Pacific Railway for the purpose of facilitating the work, and in order that the supplies might be carried in with greater facility. It appeared from the hon. the Minister of Public Works that the nearest point to the railway was 184 miles, and it was not worth while expending one-half or three-quarters of a million dollars to facilitate the carrying of supplies to that distance from the railway. This money had been voted, it appeared, to give work in connection with the railway, and under the Railway Act. He could not see how the Minister of Public Works could and should proceed with the work under this Act without calling for tenders. If it had been a small work costing $20,000 or $30,000, perhaps the hon. gentleman might have taken this course; but there was no such excuse in this case. It was a large work, and most likely when completed it would cost nearly half a million of dollars.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. LANGEVIN: It looks like it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. LANGEVIN: If I am rightly informed the amount of money now expended on it is nearly $200,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. It is $108,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN: I see that is the case up to a certain point, but I do not think that it is the whole amount of money expended.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes, it is. We expect that the work will be easily completed within $200,000.

Mr. LANGEVIN said, at all events, it would cost about $200,000, and he thought that tenders should be called for in relation to a work of this kind. It was stated that its object was to afford communication between the Rainy Lake and Lake of the Woods. The report went on to say:—

“The object for which the Fort Francis Canal is being constructed cannot be wholly obtained unless Rainy River is improved so as to insure the requisite draught, and the ascent of vessels against the current in the rapids. The obstacles to the navigation appear to be:—1st. The deficiency of water in the channel, especially in the rapids,  $1\frac{1}{4}$  miles above Fort Francis, and at various places in the river below the Fort; 2nd. The swift current at the head of the canal of the Manitou Rapids, 36 miles, and of the Long Sault Rapids, 42 miles below the Fort; 3rd. The crooked channel and the shoals of the Long Sault.”

Further down in the report, one of the Engineers of the Department stated:—

“So far as I can judge at present, the most effectual mode of connecting the navigation of Rainy Lake with that of the Lake of the Woods, apart from the canal in process of construction, will be:—1st. To raise the water in Rainy Lake by means of a dam or pier closing or contracting the channel at the head of Rainy Falls; 2nd. To construct a lock and dam at the foot of the Long Sault, so as to raise the water above the Manitou, and into the remainder of the river up to the lower entrance of the canal; 3rd. Before the water is raised, to remove, during the season of low water in spring and autumn, the boulders obstructing the channel.”

It was evident that these works were of great magnitude, and that they must cost a large sum of money,—larger probably than that of the canal itself. Not only a new canal but a new lock and dam were to be built, and all these works must cost a large sum of money. He was not aware that Parliament had been made aware of the facts of the case; or that such works would be required. There should have been an estimate prepared regarding all these works, and it should have been laid before Parliament, in order that they might have judged whether this expenditure was advisable. Their object, the Minister of Public Works said, was to aid in the construction of the Pacific Railway. These works were very large, and they were never undertaken by the late Government, although they used this North-West route for the transportation of passengers and immigrants passing from the head of Lake Superior to Fort Garry. The late Government had never thought of building this work, because it would be too expensive, especially in connection with the other works which its construction made necessary. The Minister of Public Works was pleased to say that he (Mr. Langevin) had left him a legacy; perhaps this was the case, and perhaps, when the hon. gentleman withdrew from his Department, he would also leave a legacy to his successor. Of course, this was inevitable. The hon. gentleman could not settle everything before he went out of office, if this ever should occur.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman spent three or four times as much on the Dawson Route, and did he do it by contract?

Mr. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman knew that, at the time this money was expended, it was done not only on works but also on the working of the route.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But was the road built by contract?

Mr. LANGEVIN said that the money voted in this instance by Parliament was voted for the purpose of working the route, as well as building certain works on the way. Besides, these were small works which were scattered from one end of the route to the other. It was well known to Parliament for years past that they were done by days' work, and the late Government even used their own men, when not otherwise occupied, on them in order to save money. These could really not have been built by public tender, because they were scattered, and required the constant attendance of the surveillants, and the direction of skilled men.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They were done by day's labour.

Mr. LANGEVIN said they were done by day's labour; but whenever they had had a large work in hand, they had let it out to public tender. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) said they had completed them by day's work; but this was because the contractor had failed. His men left him, and he could not proceed; he thought that the contractor could not pay them; and this happened at a period in the year when, if they had not put men on the works to complete them, the boats would not have been finished, and there would not have been any communication open; therefore, the works had to be completed. The hon. the Minister of Public Works must see that if he had had a legacy in this relation, as the dispute between the contractor and the Department, it was because some great difficulty existed which had not been settled. The hon. gentleman admitted that since November, 1873, he (Mr. Mackenzie) had been unable to arrange the matter. The hon. gentleman said that the Government had a right to carry on a work by day's labour, if it was necessary and more advantageous; but the law stated that such works must be done by contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; it does not.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he understood fully that latitude must be left to the Government, and especially to the Minister of Public Works, under whose control these undertakings were; but this latitude could not extend to works of the magnitude of those under consideration. This was quite a different matter. Unless very strong reasons existed for a contrary course, such works must be done by contract. The Minister of Public Works had not stated how it happened that no Order in Council had been passed in this regard. It appeared from the papers that neither a contract nor an Order in Council existed. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Page had prepared a plan of the work; but, nevertheless, Mr. Sutherland was instructed to go up and engage men to go on with the work before the plans were sent to him and before Mr. Sutherland knew they had been prepared. The location of the lock had not then been decided upon; at that time there were no plans, and no estimates, and no place selected for the lock. Mr. Sutherland, under date of May 11, 1875, received the following instructions:—

“On reaching Fort Francis you will see Mr. Mortimer, Resident Engineer, who will be at once instructed to take soundings with a view to determine the exact points at which it would be most desirable to construct the canal locks at each, and you will then as speedily as possible ascertain the nature of the rocks and the depth of various points, so that Mr. Mortimer can make a section.”

Evidently nothing had been done in this respect, and the work nevertheless had been determined upon. Mr. Sutherland was also written to as follows:—

“Referring to your letter of the 1st inst. relative to the construction of the proposed locks on Rainy River, at Fort Francis, I am to state that you will have entire charge of the working parties, but in engineering matters will be subjected to the general directions of Mr. Hazlewood, or his assistants, who may be detailed for that purpose.”

The Minister of Public Works had clearly determined that the lock should be built, and that without tender, but by day's work, and without plans, without estimates, and, in fact, without anything being done. So much so that Mr. Sutherland was instructed to this effect:—

“When your force shall have been organized and on the spot, you will send a list of the men, with rates of the pay agreed upon. It is understood that these rates will be such as are generally paid by the contractors on the railways east and west of you.”

It was evident that Mr. Sutherland was to go to work without plans, without soundings and without estimates. He could not perceive that this work would be useful for the purpose mentioned; or that the building of the locks was for an object that Parliament should sanction. The intention clearly was to carry rails by this route to the Pacific Railway, which, however, ran more than one hundred miles to the northwards; and, therefore, this work could not be used for that purpose. Above the works, as was stated in the papers and by his hon. friend (Mr. Kirkpatrick), the water was only four and a half feet deep. Why, then, was a lock built with a depth of eight feet of water, in order, he supposed, to admit of the passage of vessels drawing seven feet?

Mr. LANGEVIN.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that one of the last things the hon. gentleman did was to take a vote for a lock, as near as may be of the same extent, for seven feet of water, when it was only three and a half feet in depth.

Mr. LANGEVIN said this was the tu quoque argument. If the late Government were wrong, this was no reason why the hon. gentleman should also be wrong. The hon. gentleman should not repeat mistakes; he (Mr. Mackenzie) should profit by experience, and should not squander the public moneys as had been done in this case.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not admit that.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman should not have been guilty of such an interruption as this. The money voted for this purpose had not been employed as the hon. gentleman stated it would be. When the hon. gentleman discovered that the depth of water along the route would not allow a vessel drawing seven feet to pass through, he should have stopped the work, and come back to Parliament, and stated that the undertaking would cost half a million, and that he must not expend $200,000, until Parliament was aware that $300,000 or $400,000 would be required for other works in connection with it, in order to secure the depth of water necessary. But, no; the hon. gentleman went on expending the public money, though he knew how faulty the work was. It could not be used for the object alleged to be in view, and yet the hon. gentlemen spent the money and defended his case. The hon. gentleman would call, no doubt, on his followers to vote down this resolution, and they might do so, and carry the motion in the negative, like other votes; but they (the Opposition) despite all that, desired to place the matter properly before the House. If the matter was wrong, it would still be wrong, even though the majority did vote down the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But it is not wrong.

Mr. LANGEVIN said, of course, the hon. gentleman would allow them to differ from him; he would allow the House to find out whether he was right or wrong. It was much more pleasant to find the hon. gentleman right than wrong; but it was very seldom that he gave them that pleasure. The hon. the Premier said that the water reaches would be 276 miles long, and the railway would be 176 miles long.

Mr. MACKENZIE: About that.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the railroad was to be in two pieces, one at this end and one at the other; and the water reaches, with seven portages, were between them. The hon. the Premier seemed to think that the Fort Francis Canal was essential to the work, and he seemed to think the route would be a favourite one. But he (Mr. Langevin) could not see how this could be. Starting from the head of Lake Superior by rail, persons going that way travel a certain distance and then reach one of these fine water stretches, and occasionally they would have to leave the steamer and go through one of the portages. Finally, after going through six or seven of these portages, the rail was again taken for Winnipeg. It was impossible, with all these changes, that this could ever be a favourite route either for emigrants or for the transportation of goods, and the works at Fort Francis were not worth entering into. By the Public Accounts it was found that the Government had resorted to a practice which, he must say, would not receive the approval of this House, and it was a practice which no one had ventured to advocate here. The Government had taken money voted for the Pacific Railway and used it on this work. In the other House this transaction was justified on the ground that it was a work of a similar nature. But this was not a sufficient justification. The Government had expended money at Fort Francis without asking the permission of Parliament. The money voted was for the Pacific Railway and should not be used for any other purpose, however similar in character.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said he had had experience during most of his life time with the navigation of the waters of Canada, but he did not speak on the matter of this canal in the North-West from personal observation, only from what he had read and from what had been told him by those familiar with the locality. He did not think by building the Fort Francis Lock this route would be of any utility at all in the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway—the water stretches could not be used for six or seven months of the year—and he did not see any necessity for continuing this work at the present time, seeing that the route of the Pacific Railway had been changed, and was now located 40 to 50 miles north of Rainy Lake and Rainy River. The First Minister said it was necessary for a through route across that section of the country. This might be so in 50 or 100 years, but certainly it was not the case now, when the district was a mere forest and nearly uninhabited. Anybody who had any idea of transportation of heavy freight would see that this was an insane project. He had received a letter from a friend of his who was a practical man, and acquainted with the place, and who had made a valuable accompanying sketch. The letter was as follows:—

“GANANOQUE, March 7th, 1877.

“D. F. JONES, Esq., M. P.,

“Ottawa.

“I herewith send you a sketch of Rainy River, from Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods. The distance is laid down at 76 miles; Mr. Dawson always called it 75 miles. It is two miles from where the Rainy River commences to Fort Francis, say 2 miles; Fort Francis to Manitou Rapids or Falls 28 miles; Manitou Falls to Long Sault Rapids, 8 miles; Long Sault Rapids to Lake of the Woods, 38 miles; Rainy River, whole length, total, 76 miles.

“The present Government say that, by building the Fort Francis locks, they will have an uninterrupted navigation of 160 miles. That is I suppose, Rainy Lake, from Kettle Falls to Rainy River, 45 miles; Rainy River from Rainy Lake to Lake of the Woods, 75 miles; and across the Lake of the Woods, 40 miles; total, 160 miles.

“But this is not clear navigation, for there are the Rapids at the head of Rainy River, the Manitou Rapids and the Long Sault Rapids to be made navigable before there can be any heavy freight carried, except what can be packed on men's backs to get through with. Then, again, suppose the railroad to be finished from Thunder Bay to Lake Shebandowan, from there to Kettle Falls; at the head of Rainy Lake there are eight portages, which no boats can pass either way, except by drawing them across, and all the freight has to be carted or packed across. There is one portage of four miles, and three of two miles, one of one mile, and the other five portages from 200 yards to half a mile wide to get over with freight; and then, again, there is no boat on this route fit to carry freight, except the boats taken up on the first expedition to Fort Garry, which are now nearly all useless and worn out. There was a commencement to build three or four small barges for the largest lakes on the route, but they were abandoned in 1874, after Carpenter & Co. undertook to run the line. There is no feasible way now for getting freight through on the Dawson Route, except by building a new stock of boats, and they would never do to carry railroad iron, as it would require to be transhipped at every portage, except by taking them across with teams, the same as you have to do with freight, and by going to work and building locks at every portage, which would cost per mile about the same as the Pacific Railway given to Foster. And then, I think, they would have to fall back on Foster's plan of abandoning the whole job in the end. There is no navigation on the Dawson Route except for small class boats, and very often it is almost impossible to get through with them unless they are hauled along, in many places, by the strength of the crews. There is no doubt whatever that the money laid out on the Fort Francis locks is thrown away completely.

"Yours truly,

"CHAS. B. CRYSLER."

He did not rise for the purpose of saying whether this lock was being constructed contrary to the Pacific Railway Act, or contrary to Order in Council or without the work being done by contract. Reference had been made to the Dawson Route not having been made by late Government by contract; but he believed that it would have been quite impossible to construct that work by contract. The work now under consideration was a special undertaking, a lock for the passage of steamers, which would cost a considerable sum of money, and tenders could easily have been asked for, had proper plans and specifications been made; in which case the work could have been performed by contract, and not by day's work as at present. But, as one having some experience of river navigation, speaking with all sincerity, he did not think that this lock would be of any utility whatever to the Government in building the Pacific Railway, but would, with a very large expenditure, open up an inland navigation which might be of some use in fifty or one hundred years. He thought the railroad should be built from Thunder Bay out, and that supplies should be carried over it as it progressed. He thought any money expended on this lock would be completely lost to the country; at all events it would be fifty or one hundred years before it would be of any service, and then it would only open up an inland navigation on Rainy River which laid between the State of Minnesota, U.S., and Canada, and would be much more useful to the people of the United States than to Canada. He would, therefore, vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. TROW said he deprecated the assertions made by the hon. gentleman in reference to what was called the "insane policy" of the Government in proceeding with this work. If that was an insane project, it was well to remember that it was begun by the late Government, which spent some $1,500,000 on it prior to going out of office. The question arose whether, if that were the case, this Administration would do right if they left the work uncompleted. He considered Fort Francis Locks highly essential and necessary. That magnificent river, Rainy River, extended through a fertile country, which would sooner or later be settled. Even at the present time there were large settlements about the Sault and Manitou Rapids. The locks in question were situated about midway between Thunder Bay and Fort Garry, and the water stretches were magnificent, and should be utilized. Rainy River had probably as large a volume of water as the Ottawa, and the land on our side of it was of the very best description, and was likely to attract a large stream of immigrants. The difficulties alluded to on the route were purely imaginary. Some of the portages were only a few rods across. But the route could not be utilized without some such improvement as that in progress; when the locks were completed there would be communication from one end to the other. The obstacles at Sault and Manitou Rapids consisted of loose boulders, which could be removed without blasting at a trifling expense, and give 10 feet to 12 feet water. Competent authorities told him that when the locks were completed, the passage from Fort Garry to Thunder Bay could be made in about 36 hours. He had travelled in that section, and a more delightful trip he never had in his life, and he believed that immigration, sooner or later, would go in that direction. In his opinion the Government were perfectly right and justifiable in carrying on the work, as it would be one of the means for the development of the North-West. With regard to letting the work by contract, he did not think there was any possibility of doing that, as very few contractors would undertake to tender for a work so remote from settlement. A more honourable or reliable man than the one to whom the work was entrusted could not be found. He had every confidence in him, and had no doubt he would do the work as cheaply as possible. He hoped the Government would not merely finish the locks, but finish the other portions of the road, and thus make a practical highway to the North-West for the surplus population of Europe and Canada.

After Recess.

Mr. MASSON said he thought the hon. the Premier and his followers should not be under the impression that hon. members, in the accomplishment of their duties, when they were sometimes obliged to find fault with the Administration, did so with a desire of making a factious opposition to the Government. Events had occurred to-day which would lead them to believe that the hon. Minister, seeing the opposition that was made to him and to his measures, appeared to think it was personal to himself, or that it was with a desire—to use his own expression—of maligning the Government. He (Mr. Masson) deprecated any such idea on his part, and although he had no right to speak for the Opposition, his belief was that there was no such desire on their part. They were here pledged to do their duty, and it was a part of that duty to examine severely into the acts of the Administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman himself knew well that the duty of the Opposition was to scrutinize the acts of the Government, and that while he was on the Opposition side of the House, no man had known more than himself that duty of an Opposition or had been more severe than himself in the criticism of the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, no.

Mr. MASSON said that he should, under these circumstances, take the hon. member (Mr. Mackenzie) for his leader, if he had taken that course when he was in Opposition. He had now willingly, and gracefully, to admit that his acts could be criticised by those now sitting on the left of the Speaker. He (Mr. Masson) could readily understand how it was that the hon. gentleman was sometimes impatient to see that very often the Opposition were obliged to criticise his acts. The reason was a very simple one,—because his acts were often open to criticism. It was because that since he had taken the reins of power, perhaps no Government in the world had been more exposed to a just criticism than the Government of to-day. The hon. gentleman knew very well that if the country had believed four years ago, that the present Government were only men of flesh and blood like others, the disappointment would not exist which did exist to-day. The hon. gentlemen on the other side contended that they were so pure and so innocent of wrong-doing, that the people began to believe that they were of a different nature from their opponents; but now the view taken was not, perhaps, that they were worse, but they were like their predecessors and no better. That was a very great disappointment for the people of this country, as the hon. gentleman had always contended that they were better than any of the Ministries which preceded them. The people naturally believed that when they came into power they would revolutionize the whole system, and that there would be purity where there had been corruption.

Mr. DYMOND: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said the people were always disappointed when they had great expectations and then saw the reality. They had seen the reality in this case, and they were getting seriously disappointed. Now, a little discussion had taken place in Montreal between a Liberal and a Conservative, about two or three years after the accession of the present Government to power. The Liberal said: "I admit that many men on both sides are corrupt." "Oh, no," said the Conservative, "they are not so corrupt as they make them appear." "But," said the Liberal, "on your side you were corrupt." "Well," said the Conservative, "we are flesh and blood, but we have this consolation—we took twenty years to become corrupt, but you have become corrupt in eighteen months."

An HON. MEMBER: They were corrupt before they got there.

Mr. MASSON said he understood the hon. the First Minister to say that this work was no part of the Pacific Railway scheme; that it was considered before there was a question of the Pacific Railway. If that were so, he was in a bad position. If it was a part of the Pacific Railway, he could only go on with the work according to the provisions made in reference to the Pacific Railway; he must give it out to contractors. If it was not a part of the Pacific Railway, he had no authority to build it at all, because he had obtained the money by pretending that it was a part of the Pacific Railway. In the Supply Bill, when the $150,000 was voted, it was stated that it was to build a part of the Pacific Railway. He asked if that was not obtaining money from this Parliament—he would not say under false pretences—but he had no other English word for it. Did the hon. gentleman think for a single moment that if the House had believed that the $150,000 that the Government were asking to build the St. Francis Lock was not to be devoted to a part of the Pacific Railway they would have voted the money? The hon. gentleman, therefore, stood in this position: that he was expending upon a work, which he said was no part of the Pacific Railway, money which he could not deny had been voted specially for the Pacific Railway; consequently he had no authority for the expenditure of the money, or, if he had, it was only because the House had been unaware of the circumstances under which it had voted it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The House is very innocent.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman had always been a good Democrat, a good Liberal, and he believed it had always been the policy of the Liberal Party, both in Canada and England, that no money could be spent without the authority of Parliament, nor with that authority, unless it was spent specially for the purpose that Parliament had consented that it should be spent. The hon. gentleman had asked the House to spend $150,000 on a part of the Pacific Railway, and to-day he said that it was no part of the Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say that.

Mr. MASSON said if it was no part of the Pacific Railway, the hon. gentleman was obliged to show them how it was that he had obtained the money; and then he placed himself in a very bad position. Though it was allowed, if he remembered well, by the Public Works Act, for the Government, in certain pressing circumstances, to proceed with public works by days' labour without contract, it was a principle which had been disapproved by the party to which he (Mr. Mackenzie) belonged, the party of purity, which contended that nothing should be done which had the appearance of giving favours to anyone; that no work should be done except by contract, and that that contract should be let by tender. The hon. gentleman could not divide his case from that of the Liberal Party in Lower Canada, though that party was very much weakened, as the Opposition had a majority of eleven from Lower Canada last year; but the hon. gentleman must not repudiate them entirely for that, and punish them in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say it has never been the policy of any party to do work by days' labour?

Mr. MASSON said he was not as conversant with the English language as the hon. gentleman, but he thought that he generally made himself understood. The Liberal Party had contended that work should be done by contract, and on tenders asked.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear. But no tenders were asked.

Mr. MASSON said the Liberal party from Quebec, who he was bound to say, had done their duty last year when the Act for Colonization Roads was brought up in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, allowing the Government to do works in the wilderness far away where it was advisable to send a numerous population,—insisted that no work should be done on any route, no matter at what distance, except by tender. The result was that the Government could hardly carry a motion that they should be allowed to give out work to the amount of $400,000, though it was not given by tender.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a different thing.

Mr. MASSON said the difference was between days' labour and contract labour given by tender. The Liberal party from the Province of Quebec required and expected that no work should be given unless tenders were asked, and though he freely admitted that the Liberal party went too far, they showed the feeling they had on the subject. Under these circumstances, what was there to prevent the Government, even if this was not a part of the Pacific Railway, from continuing the work by contract? Was it because it was too far away? It could not be, because the Government at the very same moment gave out work by contract in places quite as inaccessible.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. MASSON said "yes." The hon. gentleman was asking for four or five hundred thousand dollars to reach these inaccessible places where the Government were giving out works by contract and by tender. This proved that he was going, if not against his principles, as he (Mr. Masson) believed, it was, at all events, in the face of the principles of the Liberals from Lower Canada, who, he hoped, would show their consistency to-night as they had last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It would be better to allow them to expound their own principles.

Mr. MASSON said if they could expound their own principles they must be happy to see men, sitting on the other side of the House, agreeing with them, and asking them to put them into execution. The more people there were who were found to agree in a principle, the more certain it was that the principle was right. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) had given the House a glowing picture of the country through which the famous water stretches extended. According to him, it was the finest country in the world, and, of course, the Government were entirely right in making the expenditure there to allow emigrants to spread about and throw wealth into that country. He had the greatest respect for the opinions of that hon. gentleman on the question of colonization. He had taken such an interest in it that his views were worthy of the highest consideration; but he had not met the question at all. He (Mr. Masson) admitted with him that it was a fine country, and that it would be proper, if they could, to get colonists there; but, in that case, let the Government say "It is a colonization scheme, and we ask you to vote money to enable us to pour population into that country." Then the Opposition would consider what they ought to do. But did the hon. gentleman say that the Government had the right to take money which had not been voted for that purpose, but for the Pacific Railway? He was too good a Liberal to say that. The great principle of the Liberal party was that a change of appropriation was forbidden because the Government could have sums voted for a purpose perfectly right, and then expend half the amount on a thing which the House would not have voted the money for if they had known. The hon. the Premier said that this work was very important, and was necessary to bring in supplies for the building of the Pacific Railway. It was extraordinary how the opinions of these

hon. gentlemen changed from one thing to another. It was extraordinary how the thing which was ridiculous last year could become a very reasonable one this year. He thought it an absurdity last year to think of bringing supplies or rails or anything else for building the Pacific Railway by the water stretches, but to-day he contended that it was absolutely necessary to complete the water stretches in order to bring the rails into that country. Last year, when he was saying that it was absurd to bring rails into Manitoba by the Dawson Route, the Government were expending money on the St. Francis Lock in order to bring rails into Manitoba by the Dawson Route.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not to Manitoba.

Mr. MASSON: Well to the North-West Territory, or as the hon. the Minister of the Interior would say, "to Ontario," because he contends that Ontario extends to the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not to the North-West Territories either.

Mr. MASSON said, as Mr. Speaker and the Minister of Public Works would remember, last year the hon. member for Lisgar found fault with the Government because they had allowed $15 a ton for the transportation of rails to Manitoba by the Kittson Company. The hon. gentleman stated that this should have been given out by tender, and that the Merchants' Company, he believed, should have had an opportunity for tendering, in order that the Government might secure a lower rate. At the same time the hon. gentleman spoke of the Dawson Route; and the Government understood him to say—though he (Mr. Masson) thought erroneously—that the Government should abandon the Dawson Route, and send rails, in future, by the water communication, over which the Government had now determined to send them, and asked the country to expend certainly over $500,000, in order to send out these rails.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend forgets that the place the hon. gentleman referred to was two hundred miles west of this.

Mr. MASSON.

Mr. MASSON: There are no rails, 200 miles from Fort Garry.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But from Fort Francis.

Mr. MASSON said he was speaking of Fort Garry. The hon. gentleman surely did not think they were so ignorant as to believe that they could send rails to Fort Francis by Red River, and the Kittson Company only did business on this river. The Kittson line ran from Moorhead to Selkirk, to which place the hon. gentleman was only building the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman must know this. Mr. Laird, in reply, told the hon. member for Lisgar that it was ridiculous to believe that the Government could send rails by this route to Manitoba.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And it was ridiculous.

Mr. MASSON said the interruptions of the hon. gentleman were too numerous. Mr. Laird had shown how ridiculous it was to attempt to send rails by water communication, and by the route over which the Minister of Public Works now wished to send them. The reply of Mr. Laird, given in Hansard, was:

"It was simply absurd to talk of shipping steel rails over this route, and, in this relation, he could not but think that the hon. member for Lisgar had been perpetrating a huge joke."

He left to the consideration of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) the opinion of his recent colleague, who made that statement in the presence of the Minister of Public Works. This was the very route over which the hon. gentleman now desired to send those rails. The reason for Mr. Laird's view was quite simple, and it was well exposed by the hon. member for Leeds. Was it to be supposed that they could, advantageously, send rails to the North-West by a route on which there were numerous portages? Could it be thought, for a single moment, that it would pay to send rails over a line over which a company had contracted to transport rails from Fort Garry to Fort William for $40 a ton? This was preposterous; and it was so difficult to do so, that the Government had paid the Carpenter Company $40 a ton to convey freight from Fort William to Fort Garry. Was it to be believed, for a moment, that this was the route over which the Government should send supplies and provisions to the North-West? There was a far more sensible way of treating this question. There were splendid water communications, either from Sarnia or Collingwood; and, by this channel, rails could be taken to Fort William where, in fact, the Government had to-day 14,000 tons of rails. These, with supplies, could also be sent to Selkirk, the other present extremity of the railway. In this manner the road could be built from both ends, and the road as it was built, could be used as a means of communication for the conveyance of supplies. It could not be pretended that this was impossible, because the Premier, two years ago, when he did not know what to do with the steel rails he had purchased, had sent 12,000 tons of rails by way of Red River, and they now laid rusting behind St. Boniface. If the Government could send rails economically—and they should not have done it if this was not the case—to Selkirk or St. Boniface two years ago, why could it not be done to-day as cheaply and to as great advantage? The Government now possessed more rails than were sufficient to build the connection between Fort William and Fort Garry; there were 14,000 tons at the former place, sufficient to build 160 miles, and 12,000 tons at St. Boniface, sufficient for 136 miles; in all, about 300 miles. The Government must admit either that they had made a mistake, or that they were making one now. The hon. gentleman said it was in order to economize in the transportation of supplies, that he was building the St. Francis Lock and improving the navigation in that quarter. It was established that $108,000 had already been spent on the lock in two years, and the work had not been pressed forward with all the activity that might have been shown. The Engineer who superintended the undertaking told them that though on the 26th of September last $108,000 had so been spent, such little advance had been made that it would require two more years to finish the work with improved implements, and a large staff of men, and, consequently, with a much greater expenditure; and that, in December last, only one-fifth of the rock cuttings had been finished, so four-fifths of these cuttings remained to be completed, and, besides, the greater part of the work was in rock. The Engineer added that with the plant on hand and greater facilities than the Government possessed to-day, it would require two years more to finish the undertaking. If the Government had spent $108,000 in two years with a small staff, with more plant which they would be obliged to send up there, it could be imagined what the expenditure of the next two years on the locks would be. The Premier said that the work would only cost $200,000; but the hon. gentleman, despite his great knowledge of the affairs of his Department for which he (Mr. Masson) gave him every credit, could not now tell what this expenditure would be, any more than he himself (Mr. Masson) could. This was impossible. The hon. gentleman said what he could not know would be a fact, and what was entirely in contradiction with the opinion of his own engineer as mentioned. According to the reports, the lock would cost $200,000 more,—this could not be otherwise, and it would make a total sum of $300,000. But when the lock was completed, would communication be opened between the Lake of the Woods and Rainy Lake? No. It would require a large amount of work to render the lock of any use; and, in consequence, it was vain to tell the House that the expenditure would be closed when work on the lock was terminated, because this work would be useless unless navigation was opened both above and below. The Engineer in this regard stated:

“The object for which the Fort Francis Canal is being constructed cannot be wholly obtained unless Rainy River is improved so as to insure the requisite draft, and the ascent of vessels against the current in the rapids. The main obstacles to the navigation appear to be: 1st. The deficiency of water in the channel, especially in the rapids, one and a quarter miles above Fort Francis, and at various places in the river below the Fort; 2nd. The swift current at the head of the proposed canal of the Manitou Rapids, 36 miles, and of the Long Sault Rapids, 42 miles below the Fort; 3rd. The crooked channel and the shoals of the Long Sault.”

Now he asked whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had ever given to the House, as he was bound to do, any proper estimates as to what would be the cost not only of the lock, but of the improvement of the navigation of the whole river? Had the hon. gentleman done what he was obliged to do, and what he (Mr. Masson) had pressed for,—and what it was the duty of every Minister to do? When a Government asked Parliament to vote a certain sum of money for any public work, it was their duty to secure such information as to be able to tell the House what would be the probable and ultimate cost of the work in question. They should show reasonable grounds at least, for the belief that the vote would be sufficient for the works contemplated; otherwise the House would always be led astray, and the Government would be obtaining money—he did not want to use any offensive terms—on false pretences from the House, which would not know what it was doing. The hon. gentleman to-day did not and could not know, with all his wisdom and ability and the care he gave to the affairs of his Department, what this work would cost. This was impossible. When the hon. gentleman said it would cost $200,000, he (Mr. Masson) said the hon. gentleman was mistaken. If they could believe the reports—and they were as able on that side as on the other side of the House to judge of these reports—the estimate of his hon. friend from Charlevoix, $500,000, was too moderate, and, as he considered, $250,000 short of the expenditure that would be required. It was true that he had no data to speak upon, but neither had the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) any data. It was not reasonable to believe, under the circumstances, that the cost of improving the navigation of the river from Fort Francis to the Lake of the Woods, would only cost some $200,000. If the hon. gentleman pursued his present policy in this respect—and he was pained to say he believed the hon. gentleman would, because the hon. gentleman never receded from any of his decisions—this work which was undertaken without the consent of Parliament, would not be completed in two or three years from the present time. An Act passed in connection with the building of the Pacific Railway could not be used to authorize this undertaking since it was no part of that railway. The hon. gentleman should take a more sensible view of the whole question than he (Mr. Mackenzie) had done. In December last, at the close of the working season, $108,000 had been expended on this work, and only one-fifth of the rock cuttings was then completed; and it would require two years, with a larger staff and more plant, to finish it, with a cost, perhaps, of $400,000 or $500,000 more to improve the navigation of the river. The hon. gentleman should abandon the undertaking entirely, and devote the money, now uselessly expended, to the construction of the Pacific Railway. This work might be useful when the question of the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba was settled. Either the boundary line of the latter Province would be brought down to Lake Superior, or that of the former Province would be extended to the Lake of the Woods; and this undertaking might be advantageous to either of these Provinces as a colonization route, but it was of no use as a Dominion work, and should be abandoned and the money applied as he had mentioned. The hon. gentleman had told him in the House two years ago, that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had abandoned the system of water stretches, and that probably the whole road from Fort William to Selkirk would be built in four years, and of this period only three years remained. Then what was the use of going on with this work, which would not be finished in three years? Was it to be believed for a moment that a single traveller would go from Fort William to Manitoba by water and portages when he could go by rail? The thing was preposterous. He was sorry to say he believed that the hon. gentleman would not abandon the undertaking, because he (Mr. Mackenzie) wished to say that he never went back on his decision. The work would be completed at any cost despite the protests of the Opposition, and, as he had no doubt, the private protests of some of the hon. gentleman's supporters. The hon. gentleman stated, as his excuse, that this work was begun by the late Administration. But what were the circumstances when it was commenced? They had just acquired the immense territory of the North-West, and they were not then bound to build the Pacific Railway. This project was not mentioned. They did not even dream at the time of the annexation of British Columbia, and it was necessary to pour a numerous population into the North-West. To do so it was thought advisable to make use of the Dawson Route, and Mr. Dawson was instructed to push the work forward as fast as he could. Another emergency forced the Government to proceed with the undertaking,—they were obliged to send troops to Manitoba. This was necessary, according to the opinions of the hon. member for Lambton. If he was well informed, it had since then been decided to build the Pacific Railway, which was to bring wealth and prosperity to that great country, and the works were stopped, being only afterwards kept in repair. The Government saw that if the railway was to be built, it was absurd to make use of the water stretches. He considered that the rights of Parliament had been infringed in this regard, the Government having undertaken to build this work without the consent of Parliament. The Government had gone on building the work on a quibble. They pretended that the sole fact of $150,000 having been voted to complete this work, authorized them to do it; but would any true Liberal say, that the Government was so authorized since they themselves had placed on the Statute-book a law declaring that this work should only be completed as part of the Pacific Railway, and only as such? Would any one say that had the House known at the time that they did not intend to make use of it for the Pacific Railway, but in the manner now apparent, they would have granted the money to build this work? He would ask any Liberal whether this was according to their principles, and if they would again that night sanction the action of the Government in spending money on a public work which it was not the intention of the House to spend in that way?

Mr. DYMOND said, in his remarks, he would make no reference to what might be called the political aspect of this debate. The resolution was, of course, of a hostile character. It censured the Government for certain administrative acts, but for those they would be quite able to defend themselves. He would venture to say, however, and he hoped without offence, that he thought the introduction of this question, without any notice whatever, was neither just to the subject nor fair to the House. He could quite understand, when certain questions were to be originated, that a little surprise was not altogether unfair in party warfare. But if the hon. gentlemen were—and he was bound to believe them, as they said they were—sincerely desirous of dealing with this matter purely as one of general interest to the country, he thought it would have been only right that they all should have had some opportunity to prepare themselves for the debate. The hon. the Premier himself, who was, perhaps, as well acquainted with the public works in operation as any Minister of Public Works could be, could hardly be supposed, at a moment's notice, to spring to his feet and justify himself as to every minute detail of a particular undertaking. The hon. mover of the amendment had not only taken his opponents by surprise, but even his own friends, for the former Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Charlevoix, had actually fallen into the error of stating that the work would cost, not $200,000 as alleged by the Premier, but as much as $500,000; he was just $300,000 out in his reckoning. The hon. member for South Leeds had also shown that he had not prepared himself for the discussion. The deviation of the temporary terminus of the line from Thunder Bay, from Lake Shebandowan to Lac des Mille Lacs, did not affect the question to any appreciable extent. He did not believe it was ever intended that the railway should run so far south as to bring it within the range of Fort Francis, so closely as to have any direct and immediate effect upon the question they were now discussing. The Rainy River improvements should be considered as involving something more than the construction of a mere highway. He did not propose to touch upon the question as to whether they would be able to make a profitable use for freights and passengers of the line of water communication from Lac des Mille Lacs to Fort Francis. But, as a question of public policy, they must bear in mind that all these great public works, the Great Pacific Railway itself, were supposed to be carried on concurrently with settlement. It was not simply as a road whereby they might travel from one part of the Dominion to another; it was not simply as a means of developing a general carrying trade that they should look at what was called the Dawson route and the improvements upon it. The grand object was to settle up the country. With regard to the nature of the country around Rainy Lake, he might quote the authority of Mr. Dawson and of Mr. Sandford Fleming. Mr. Dawson in his report in 1858, and, therefore, without any possible political views in connection with the present question, said:

"About Rainy Lake, and from thence to Rainy River and Lake of the Woods, following, from the latter, the proposed route across the Red River, the country is as well adapted for settlement as any other part of North America. The climate is good; the soil, in general, fertile; water power is to be had in abundance, and in the woods are many kinds of valuable timber."

Mr. Sandford Fleming, in his Progress Report of the Survey of the Canada Pacific Railway, 1874, wrote:

"With regard to material for building purposes, I have every reason to believe that no great difficulty will be experienced on this score. The woodland region fortunately possesses an abundant supply of timber suitable for railway work, and will be able to furnish all that may be required in the prairie region."

It was that prairie region that they wanted to reach, and these improvements would enable that to be done. The timber of that portion of the country lying between the southern bend of the Rainy River, where it formed the boundary line between Canadian territory and the United States, and the Lake of the Woods, had not yet suffered from the ravages of fire, and contained large quantities of white pine, elm, and other woods. In fact, this country, for its area, was about as well timbered as any part of the North-West. There was another topographical feature which was also very favourable to the use of Rainy River as a means of transportation. The height of land to the north of Rainy River, was situated, he believed, between that River and the proposed line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The consequence was that the rivers from that point all took their course either to Rainy River or the Lake of the Woods; and the whole of that country was filled with streams and rivers that might be used for the transport of timber. But this was not all. To the south of Rainy River there was also a rich country within American jurisdiction; that country was also very well situated, and at nearly equal distance between their boundary line and the Northern Pacific Railway, came the height of land from the Northern slope, of which numerous streams flowed into Rainy River. So that there were two large districts, both richly timbered, north and south of Rainy River, assisted by the provisions of nature for floating their forest wealth into Rainy River, from which they would take their course westward into the Lake of the Woods, and thus supply the wants of the Railway and the settlements in the North-West. Nor was it correct to state that the canal at Fort Francis was being constructed in an uninhabited region. Partly in consequence of these works, partly from the provisions formerly made in connection with the Dawson Route, and partly also from the richness of the land and the large supply of timber, a very considerable population had gone in there already. Last year he was told the Dominion agent at Winnipeg had to send down an agent to open an office there in order to accommodate the numerous applicants for lands for settlement. Then, again, timber limits were being taken up. Already three persons with very considerable capital had started mills, and it was necessary, in order to assist their operations, that this canal should be constructed. With regard to the expense, of course, information could only be given by those officially connected with the work. But he did not think the House could complain that the Government had not taken it into their confidence thereupon. He would be sorry to misquote the hon. member for Terrebonne, but he understood that hon. gentleman to state that no specific vote had been taken for this lock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He did not say that.

Mr. DYMOND: He understood the hon. member to make this statement, but it could only have been made from forgetfulness, for the object of the vote was designated, with $150,000 against it, of which $100,000 had already been spent. He thought it was hardly fair for the House to attempt to saddle the Government, two years after the money had been voted, with the responsibility of acts which the House itself had deliberately sanctioned. Hon. members should make themselves acquainted with the subject before they voted the money in the first instance, and then there would neither be necessity for subsequent controversy, nor the mistakes made into which some honorable members had fallen during this debate. He believed this was one of the most important public works of the Dominion, if not as a link in the chain of communication, certainly as a link in the chain of settlement, and the interest of the whole country would be consulted by its being pressed forward.

Mr. MASSON explained that he had contended that, while the Government had technically obtained a vote for the canal, they had obtained it in an improper way. The money was appropriated on the understanding that the work would be part of the Pacific Railway. If it had been known for what the vote was asked, it would not have been carried.

Mr. PLUMB said, in a moment of enthusiasm, flushed with the victory of 1873, at the time of the great revolution of which they had heard so much, the hon. the Premier, perhaps in a happy, or, perhaps, in an unhappy moment, spoke in his address to his constituents at Lambton, of the utilization of the magnificent water stretches which nature had provided in such lavish profusion between Lake Superior and the capital of the North-West Territories. The scheme that was then suggested consisted of part railway, part water and part foot and waggon communication across a country which, on further investigation, proved to be utterly impracticable for purposes of traffic in the manner shadowed forth. Not long afterwards there were signs that that plan was to be modified; and within two years the scheme, as far as the railway and water stretches combined were concerned for permanent purposes, was abandoned. But the impression had gone abroad that the hon. the Minister of Public Works thought it possible to continue the work in another way, and that the water stretches could, to a certain extent, be made available, and that the proposed expenditure would be made in another direction. Out of this had undoubtedly grown the project of improving the navigation of Rainy River in connection with the route from Lac des Mille Lacs to the North-West Angle. It was in respect to that that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) had moved the resolution to ascertain what was to be done in that direction, the reason for the expenditure, the Parliamentary authority for it, the probable results to be attained by it, &c. Upon looking at a report made by Mr. Dawson in 1869, in connection with the Dawson route, he found that there were obstacles of a formidable character to be overcome before this improvement could be made of service. The river was a swift and ungovernable stream. In many places the channel was only three feet or six feet deep, and for nearly ninety miles it was obstructed with granite and gneiss rocks and boulders; and, in order to produce uniform navigation, the whole bed of the river would have to be deepened. On further examination, the line was also found disadvantageous on account of the difficult character of the portages, which were eight in number. Tramways would be absolutely necessary for facilitating any traffic that might offer; but it would be almost impossible to construct tramways available for traffic purposes, even if it were at all possible to get traffic over a road broken up in so many places. A gentleman who had been over the road, wrote as follows:

“The distance at Fort Francis, where the work for the lock has been done, is about 200 yards from deep water to deep water above and below the falls. The falls have a fall of about 25 feet, and the rock is granite, very much the same as our rocks here among the Thousand Islands—not in layers, except perpendicular—the hardest kind of granite. I cannot see the use of building locks at Fort Francis, for, in the first place, there is no boat, and all the tramways will require good roads or a railway to handle any freight going forward. Then, again, a great portion of the water communication, except the lakes, you can get through only with boats the size I mentioned before—five to seven tons. Where Rainy Lake runs into Rainy River, there is a fall of some four or five feet in about 50 yards, and full of rocks. So strong was the current and eddies that neither the steamer Rainy Lake, nor any of the small tugs on the route, could get up those falls without strong assistance. Then, down Rainy River, about 30 miles, there is another fall of about four feet, near square across the river, the Manitou, where none of our small boats or tugs could ascend without being widdressed up from the shore, and that on the American side. On our side there was no getting up at all with boats. Then, ten miles below the Manitou Falls, we came to the Long Sault Rapids on Rainy River, which are about three miles long and full of rocks. It was very nice work to go down with our small boats and tugs, but there was no getting up again, except by the help of a gang of men, from twenty upwards, after taking all the freight out of the boat and carrying it forward by back loads, or, as it is called, “backing.” Steamers were built at Fort Francis in 1871, 1872 and 1873—one was built above the falls and the other one below—and, after getting ready to start, we had great work to get the Rainy Lake steamer above the falls at the entrance into Rainy Lake; but with a great number of men, and a heavy anchor at the head, and all the steam that we could raise, we got up into Rainy Lake. Our route was from there to Kettle Falls, a distance of 45 miles, and it was all that could be done in daylight to run this steamer, drawing four feet of water, through those Rainy Lake rocks and shoals. In many places we had to buoy out our channel on both sides, and then there was only width enough to get through.”

It would appear from this testimony that there were great difficulties to be overcome before anything could be made in any way useful on this route. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) said the channel was to become advantageous for business purposes, and its difficulties were not to be regarded in an engineering but in a commercial light. The hon. gentleman in this connection alluded to the valuable growth of timber which could be brought to market if this improvement were made. Had the hon. gentleman consulted anyone who was acquainted with the lumber trade, he would have learned that locks were rather obstructions than advantages to carrying down timber, which was done upon such streams by rafts during the spring freshets, and a lock in the midst of rapid water, or anywhere else on the stream, would prove a serious obstruction to its use as a means of transporting timber. The natural inference from the papers brought down to the House was, that if the work proceeded as it had begun, the expenditure would be far beyond what was estimated. He had the report of the gentleman entrusted to do this work, which was an evidence, an earnest, a sort of prophetic foretaste of what the ultimate expense would be. It was the duty of this Government to see that the plans of the work were properly carried out, and that the money was economically expended. He reported as follows, under date of March 1, 1876:—

“DEAR SIR,—I beg leave to report the following for your information, in connection with the construction of Fort Francis Canal:

“In the first place, there has been erected, and I may say finished, according to your plans and instructions, one of the most commodious and convenient buildings for the accommodation of the employees on the work, seldom found on any public work.

“The building, 60 feet by 24, 20 feet high, with a kitchen 24x16x10 feet and woodshed 24x10, 8 feet high, attached, the dining-room is 40 feet long, and is fitted up with three tables, running the whole length, with sitting capacity for 120 men at one time. It is furnished with self shelves enclosed with glass doors. The front part of the building is fitted up and furnished with seats and tables, and used as a sitting and reading room by the men; there are four bed-rooms upstairs, 9x10, for the use of the foremen on the work. The main sleeping apartment is the same size as the dining-room, fitted up with bunks on each side and down the centre. Sleeping rooms for 100 occupants. The building is lighted and ventilated, lined overhead and on the sides with felt and matched stuff.

“There is also a floating bath-house, built by your instructions, on a scow 24x12, 8 feet high, where the employees wash, and may retire after their day's labour and refresh themselves with a bath or wash their clothes, cleanliness being conducive to health, health essential to labour. In connection with the boarding-house are two root houses for storing vegetables during the winter and keeping meats, milk, &c., &c., during the summer. One is 12x12, 8 feet high, the other 12x18, 10 feet high, both with double doors and covered with clay and sodded.

"Also a bake-house 12x18, by 8 feet high, with an earthen oven inside, capacity 50 loaves at a baking; it has a solid earthen floor to prevent the possibility of fire.

"The warehouse, built according to your instructions, is a good substantial building, well adapted for such a purpose; size, 24x50, 12 feet high, with front shop, counter, shelves, etc., and bedroom, and is suitable in every way for keeping and storing the great variety of stores required on a work of this kind.

"The blacksmith shop is also in every respect suitable, being well lighted and ventilated; size, 18x38, 12 feet high, having two forges, and most of the necessary tools for the execution of the work required.

"The tools now on hand have nearly all been made in the shop, there being none here to prosecute the work with when we came.

"The stable, put up according to your instruction, is a great benefit to the stock; size, 24x36, 16 feet high; stalls for 10 horses, capable of accommodating 14; has loft overhead which will store 10 to 12 tons of fodder; oat and feed bins, harness racks and all necessary conveniencies within.

"The stock, which now represent nine head of cattle and two cows, are in excellent condition.

"The office is truly a beautiful building, built according to your instructions and plans; its dimensions are 18x25, 16 feet, one and one-half stories high, two rooms down stairs, one used as an office, the other by Dr. Robinson as office and bedroom. Two rooms upstairs, with a small room now used as a stationery room.

"The accommodation of all concerned has been thought of."

It would thus appear that the first thing the gentleman in charge did, was to pay attention to the comfort of himself and those engaged with him. The House could imagine what kind of economy would be exercised by a man who reported all these trivial, but most costly and extravagant, details to the Department. The fair inference was that the Superintendent's principal idea was to make himself comfortable. The member for Perth (Mr. Trow) had stated that this route would be a great attraction to summer travellers, but, in view of all that, they now discovered he (Mr. Plumb) reported that such an idea was preposterous. He would like to know how it was proposed to keep up useful communication. Steam communication would be impossible, and boats and canoes would be inadequate for the necessities of travel in that country.

quate for the necessities of travel in that country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are some vessels there now.

Mr. PLUMB: But not between the portages.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; in all the large reaches.

Mr. PLUMB said he had no doubt about that, but it was the short reaches he was talking about. The portages were most difficult of navigation, and it could not be supposed that they could carry women and children over that route. As to the question of cheapness, it was altogether out of the question that they could be carried by that route as cheaply as by the American route. The route adopted by the present Government might be termed an amphibious route. There was a nondescript animal, the Ornythorincus Platypus, in Australia, living partly on land and partly in the water, which was slow of motion, but had an enormous bill. That would be found to be an accurate description of the route of which they had heard so much. He admitted it was, perhaps, possible that the St. Francis Lock alone could be built for the amount set down, but that would only be a commencement of the work. The report submitted gave only part of the difficulties which would have to be encountered. The report of 1869, which was probably an honest one, for it was not written in the interests of the railway route, presented a formidable list of the difficulties embarrassing this proposed line of communication. The sessional proceedings of 1875 gave them hints of other serious difficulties. The report of the Minister of Public Works for the current year, now before the House, stated that obstacles existed not mentioned in the previously mentioned documents, and now they found, in the returns brought down to the House, that even the three preceding reports had not exhausted the appalling catalogue, and the letter he (Mr. Plumb) had read in the course of these remarks suggested obstructions and hindrances still more important, and which had not been mentioned in the reports that he (Mr. Plumb) had before referred to.

The expenditure which had been entered upon by the country at St. Francis Lock, was but the beginning of the outlay, and the House had been informed the other day that the whole expenditure was undertaken for the purpose of carrying up rails and supplies for the Pacific Railway. That idea had, however, evidently been abandoned by the Government, who were now endeavouring to make out that the country in the vicinity of the river was soon to be settled, and to supply for its traffic a large quantity of lumber. But nothing had been said about the black flies, bad water, and the low-lying lands alternating with rocky ridges. The expenditure on the lock, with a view to rendering the whole system of navigation available harmonious, was almost preposterous, it was childish and puerile in every respect. The hon. member for North York had declared that the work would be useful in transporting timber in that region. That alone was sufficient to show how little was known of the practicable possibilities of the route, and how necessary it was that some grounds should be shown for that expenditure, which he could only characterize at present as inexpedient, unjust and unnecessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he desired to address himself rather to the constitutional than to the other part of the question. The first point taken in the resolution was that the Government had not at this moment a vestige of authority to spend one single sixpence of the $100,000 that had been spent. To be sure, there was the grant in 1874 for the Pacific Railway; but it was a constitutional practice that when there was a vote given for any such purpose, the money had to be in the public treasury until the Governor-General in Council ordered its application for the purpose for which Parliament had voted it. There never was any authority by the Governor-General from any advice given to the Governor-General in Council to give that authority in this case, so that the expenditure of every single sixpence of that $100,000 was without warrant, without authority of any kind. There was, therefore, a grave breach of the constitution. It might be said that the Premier could have got the Order in Council if he had desired, but that was no excuse for his not getting it. It simply showed that he had exercised the one-man power of the autocrat by putting his hand into the treasury without going to the trouble of getting the Order in Council. The Premier had given no reason for it, no justification of it. Why should there be a distinction between this work and other work? It was provided that the work should be done by tender, in order to prevent favouritism, and to keep the expenses down to the lowest figure. The Minister of Public Works might shelter himself behind the Public Works Act, but its provisions only allowed for the giving out of work in cases of emergency, under which class the Fort Francis Lock did not come. Then, why was the work not given out by tender, unless it was to favour some friend, to make some of his political partizans as comfortable as possible? Why, as the hon. member for Niagara pointed out, everything was done to make the men engaged up there extremely comfortable, and there were almost as many overseers there as there were workmen. There were some twenty overseers and forty men or twenty men and forty overseers. It reminded him of the old story of the McTavishes, with their four and twenty men and four and twenty pipers. The Fort Francis Locks were not on the main line of the railway, nor were they part of the branches as laid down in the Act, and the Government was in this dilemma: if they held it to be part of the Pacific Railway, they had spent the money without having the work tendered for as the Pacific Railway Act provided it should be; and if they held it was no portion of the railway, then they had been spending money which they had no right to expend. There was no getting out of that. They either had no authority to have the work done or they had no money to pay for it. The money was voted for the work as a part of the Pacific Railway, and the first subsection of the Act provided that the work of any section should not be given to any contractor except by tender, and such tender should not become binding until it had been laid on the table of this House one month. The 12th clause of the Pacific Railway Act stated as follows:—

“In case it shall be found by the Governor in Council more advantageous to construct the said railway, or any portion thereof, as a public work of the Dominion of Canada, the construction thereof shall be let out by contracts offered to public competition, and the Governor in Council may establish, from time to time, the mode and regulations under which the contract shall be given; and the railway, or such part thereof, shall be constructed and worked after it shall have been completed.”

The 11th clause, which he should have read first, declared:

“No contract for the construction of any portion of the main line of the said railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the House of Commons for one month without being disapproved, unless sooner approved by a resolution of the House.”

And this clause, perhaps, gave one of the reasons why the Government thought it more convenient, and infinitely more handy, to do the work themselves than to offer it to public tender, and bring down the contract afterwards to be laid before Parliament, and to be subject to the approval of Parliament. It was to avoid this that the Government had acted as they had done. There was no other reason for it. What other could there be, which could be supposed or imagined? Why ought not this work have been given out by contract as well as Section 15 and Section 14, the Pembina line and all other portions of the road? Why was this section alone not awarded by contract? There could be no other reason imagined, or that a man could conceive of, save that it was more handy and more convenient for the Government to do as they had done, in order to assist a friend here and a friend there, and to remove the work from the supervision of the House—of both Houses, and of Parliament. There had been a distinct breach of the law and a distinct breach of the statute. The Government had committed a violation of the law of the land. This resolution embodied the three propositions; first, that there should have been an Order in Council passed; secondly, that the work should have been offered by contract, and that it should have been open to competion; and, thirdly, that as a Dominion work, it should be equally offered to contract. All these were the provisions and safeguards which the hon. gentleman himself had put in his Act—that recent Act of 1874. All the provisions, inserted for the protection of the public and the public interests, had been deliberately violated by the Government; and this lock had been proceeded with, and money had been expended, when the work had not been offered to competition or been subject to tender, because it was very handy to bestow favours on persons whose names were familiar in the public Press, such as the name of Oliver, and people of that kind. The names of the persons employed on this work were familiar in the public Press; and he said this was all done in direct violation of the law of the land.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, in the first place, they had the distinct authority of Parliament for this expenditure. A section of the Public Works Act stated: “It shall be the duty of the Ministry to invite tenders by advertisement, for the execution of all works, &c.” The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had said that “officers and servants of the Department” meant the ordinary staff of the Department; but it could mean nothing of the sort. This was pure nonsense to say so. They did not keep a staff of ordinary mechanics—plasterers, ironmongers, and masons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You said it meant the ordinary staff.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I stated, except in cases where the ordinary officers and servants of the Department can do the work, and it applies to where they can do the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, yes. At all events, that has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it had a great deal to do with the question. He had stated that they had executed the whole work in the alignment under this Section, and he contended that they were justified in doing it. He justified and defended it under the Statute, and, he had a perfect right to do so. They had executed the work in the particular place he had mentioned under the same clause. In the 12th Clause of the Railway Act, it was stated :

“If it shall be found by the Governor in Council more advantageous to construct the said railway or any portion thereof as a public work of the Dominion of Canada.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD : Go on. Read the rest of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they executed this as a public work, and this rule applied to the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD : Oh, no ; you cannot do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE : But we can do it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD : Read the clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not object at all to the hon. gentleman pointing out any defect that might exist in the management of public business. He was quite willing to be criticised and to be assisted by any member of the House, in any such case, but not, however, in the manner indicated by the tone of the hon. gentleman's remarks, which were uttered in a tone of vehement denunciation, and not in a tone of deliberation at all. It was not a tone which hon. gentlemen would find used in the House of Commons in England, where members discussed such matters with deliberation and candour, and care as to whether a particular Statute had been observed or not. He was quite willing—nay, he was bound—to consider any representations made to him by any member of the House, and especially by experienced members, as to whether any technicality had been omitted or not ; and where there had been any such omission, he was always quite willing to consider any point raised and to supply any defect that might exist. In this particular matter, as he had formerly explained, they had not departed from their primary intention of using the water stretches, as they called them, until they could have a railway connecting the various points. He had stated last year, and he now said, that it was quite possible to construct a railway from Thunder Bay to Selkirk within probably five years. He did not think that it could well be done in less time, but that depended on financial arrangements.

Mr. TUPPER : And what time from now ?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think it possible to build it within less time than he had mentioned, and he thought he was somewhat sanguine in saying so. This depended, however, on other arrangements which Parliament might or might not sanction. They had left it to be decided by Parliament last Session, when they would have obtained farther information ; and, in the meantime, some gentlemen, including the hon. member for Niagara, who was usually very anxious to help his party friends in debate, and who was somewhat extravagant in his statements—he was afraid that the hon. gentleman was every day becoming worse in this respect—said that they had moved this line 100 miles further north than the line they hoped at one time to obtain ; but it was not 50 or 40 miles farther north. If the hon. gentleman, or any of his friends, would take Mr. Sandford Fleming's map, the most recent one on which most of the late surveys were laid down with comparative accuracy, they would find that the line was not more than 40 or 45 miles farther to the north, so that this route from Lac des Mille Lacs could be made available. If this was the case formerly when they had to begin at Thunder Bay, it would be much more so when they had a railroad built to Lac des Mille Lacs overcoming all the difficulties situated at the eastern end, and had the railroad begun from the Lake of the Woods westward overcoming the western difficulty. These were the two points needed in order to make travel over the route possible. Hon. gentlemen opposite, as he had already stated, had spent one and one quarter millions in making a road to the North-West, not one inch of which had ever been placed under contract. Where was the hon. gentleman then with his law ; how did the hon. gentleman violate the law in that case ?

The hon. gentleman had spoken that night in condemnation of himself. The hon. gentleman who had acted as Minister of Public Works in the late Administration had stated that the work was one of considerable difficulty, that it was composed of pieces here and there, and that they had had men employed to carry on the work. There were, however, 45 miles of macadamized road laid from Thunder Bay at a cost of over $4,000 a mile, and all by days' labour; why was not this let out by contract? The late Administration had also constructed 100 miles from Lake of the Woods, westward, at a cost of between $2,000 and $3,000 at the very least per mile, not one inch of which was under contract. It was all done by days' labour; and yet that hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) now came down and attacked him because in the very centre of this difficult district, he had employed men by days' labour for the very reason that they could not well get contractors to go in there and do the work, and for the reason that the hon. gentleman opposite themselves, close to the lake shore in both cases, had done more extensive works at enormous cost without putting one mile of them under contract. The hon. gentleman set up and affected an air of indignation—of constitutional indignation. The hon. gentleman was very good at this sort of affectation, and surely he (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not expect them to take all that as in earnest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Well, now is it not a breach of the law? Is it not breaking the law?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was willing to consider whether it was a breach of the law. At all events, he had such excellent authority as the hon. gentleman who had preceded him in this very district, and who had spent twice the money they had proposed to spend by day's labour, exactly as they were spending it. He could not, therefore, imagine that they had done wrong from a constitutional point of view. He did not believe that they were wrong on this point; but he was quite willing to consider the matter, and if anything was wrong in this regard, he should be the very first to set it right. He did not think it was in the interest of Parliament, or of any one, that anything should be done in violation of either the spirit of the letter or text of the law or statute. This was the ground he took, and he said to the hon. gentleman and his hon. friend who moved the resolution, that no such resolution should be moved without previous notice, in order that he might have been able to come to the House fully armed at all points. If the hon. gentleman desired merely to move motions in order to consume another day of the Session, and to have so much talk and to obstruct business, then he left him with the House, and the hon. gentleman's eloquence would not relieve him from the dilemma in which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) and his followers were placed.

Mr. MASSON asked whether, at the time this work had been done by the late Administration, there was a Pacific Railway Act distinctly forbidding any work to be given, save by contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that there was a Pacific Railway Act and a Public Works Act at that time, and yet, during their very last year of office, these hon. gentlemen had spent on this road $399,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Dawson Road was commenced immediately after they had acquired possession of that country, and they had no means of sending out troops or supplies or anything else at the time, save by the wilderness. Consequently, this road was constructed; but it had no connection with the Pacific Railway. Long afterwards, in 1874, the Premier passed this Act himself; and therein it was provided that this canal and lock was to be a portion of that railway. The country then became settled,—settlers had poured into it. Towns had grown up, and a Province had been established, where formerly had been a wilderness and Indians. There was no comparison between the two cases. The hon. gentleman had given out contracts for everything else, for sections 14 and 15, and for the Pembina Branch. Why was this the single exception? The hon. gentleman had given no fitting answer to this question. The hon. gentleman should not have said that the Opposition were delaying the business of the House. He put it to hon. gentlemen whether the case was not grave enough, and whether the fact that the law was being broken was not consequence enough, to render it the duty of a member of the House to submit to the consideration of the House an infraction of the law which was such beyond doubt, and which the Premier only faintly denied to be such. He was quite sure that no constitutional lawyer would agree with the Premier on this point. The country might not have suffered any great or irreparable injury in this case, but he did say that the resolution was very properly placed before the House. As to want of courtesy in not giving notice of it, he remembered the time when hon. gentlemen opposite had sprung motion after motion on the late Administration, Session after Session for some fifteen years.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had given a reason for the course they had pursued. It would have been much easier for them, and it would have saved the officers of the Department a great deal of trouble, if this work had been placed under contract. The part immediately east of Red River, and immediately west of Thunder Bay, had no railway communication with this place, which was a wilderness for 200 miles. The hon. gentleman had talked about a host of foremen having been employed. This was entirely incorrect, and it was quite unworthy of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HOLTON desired to say a word with respect to the practice. Of course, in this country, motions of this kind could be put without notice. He did not deny it might have been done by them, when in Opposition, on some occasions, but the usual practice was to give verbal notice of their intentions. In England notice was uniformly given. The practical inconvenience of the present system was very apparent. He had looked hurriedly over this motion. It raised important questions, he admitted, which, as far as constitutional practice went, were entitled to the gravest possible consideration; but it was not possible, under the circumstances, to give to this motion the consideration it deserved. He claimed he was a tolerably diligent member of Parliament, but he confessed that this subject had surprised him. He had not been able to verify the averments of the motion; and if they were to vote without notice and without the possibility of considering the arguments pro and con., the motion necessarily became one of want of confidence. He generally desired to consider these motions on their merits; but, under the circumstances, the supporters of the Government should treat the motion purely and simply as a question of confidence.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not rise for the purpose of prolonging the discussion. Had he intended to do so it would have been before the hon. the First Minister made his second observations. He merely rose for a single moment to reply to a serious objection on the part of his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) and of the First Minister. He was quite free to admit that, in a discussion of a question of this character, there would have been a serious objection to springing it upon the House without due notice. But he held this motion was not in that position. On the 21st February the motion was made for these papers. The attention of the Government and the whole House was directed to the fact that there were gentlemen in the House who regarded the question of the construction of the Fort Francis Locks as a very important one, such as to warrant the production of the papers and the Orders in Council, and everything of that kind. He thought the hon. member for Chateauguay would admit that this was a tolerably fair notice that that subject was going to be brought under the notice of the House. His hon. friend from Chateauguay knew that there was a great deal more notice than that. He knew that in another place witnesses were called, the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway was subjected to an examination, and the best possible means taken to inform the Government that this was a question which was agitating the minds of a number of gentleman in this House, and every intimation possible was given to the Government that they had better be prepared.

Mr. HOLTON: Not on the legal question.

Mr. TUPPER said, as far as the legal question was concerned, he thought his hon. friend from Chateauguay would not be in a great deal of doubt when he had heard the question put by legal gentlemen on the Opposition side with the force and clearness with which it had been put, and he had not heard any attempt by the very able legal gentlemen on the other side of the House to controvert the position taken with regard to it. He (Mr. Tupper) did not consider that this was a motion which could be fairly characterized as one sprung upon the Government without notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD remarked that the Premier had said nothing about the Order in Council which had been omitted. He really thought that was a constitutional error.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no doubt the law has been complied with.

SUPPLY.

X. PENSIONS.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee).

58. New military pensions	$5,632 26
59. To meet the probable amount required for pensions to veterans of war of 1812 .....	50,000 00

Mr. MASSON enquired whether this amount included the payment of new claims.

Mr. VAIL replied in the affirmative, and said the number of those new claims, so far as he could recollect, were from 140 to 160.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he presumed all the information would be given on Concurrence.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he thought the information desired had already been furnished in the returns.

Vote agreed to.

60. Compensation to pensioners in lieu of land ... $8,000 00

XI. MILITIA.

61. Salaries of Military Branch and District Staff 28,600 00

62. Salaries of Brigade-Majors..... 20,000 00

Mr. MASSON enquired what was the principle upon which the services of different Brigade-Majors had been dispensed with. He understood from the First Minister that it was intended to reduce the staff, and that employment would be found for those whose services had been dispensed with.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought any gentleman who had been in the public service should be dealt with as tenderly as possible, and that those Brigade-Majors, whose services had been dispensed with, should, if possible, without detriment to the public service, have other employment given them. Some reductions had been made which would be followed up by others.

Mr. MASSON said he knew several officers around Montreal who had done good service in the volunteer movement when it was much required, but who had been removed. He thought, as Civil Servants were given an annuity, these gentlemen should have something by way of compensation.

Mr. VAIL said, when the House was prorogued in 1875, he asked the Major-General for a report, and some recommendation with regard to the reduction of officers. The Government did not see their way clear to making the reduction then, and so the matter remained over until last year, when the Major-General repeated his recommendation, and the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) referred to the excessive number of officers outside. When the House was prorogued, a second report was asked for, and the Major-General was also asked to name the officers in the several districts that could be dispensed with. The Government gave him to understand that reductions should be made in the several Provinces proportionately, according to the number required to hold positions, which was three to every 5,000 men. All Brigade Majors dispensed with received fourteen months pay from the time they were notified.

Mr. BOWELL: Did the Major-General select those who were to be removed?

Mr. VAIL: Yes.

Mr. BOWELL: And named those who were to be retained?

Mr. VAIL: Yes.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he would like to know how far that change affected Nova Scotia, and particularly the Island of Cape Breton. He would draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the fact that the Island of Cape Breton was geographically separate and distinct from the Province of Nova Scotia proper, and that it was proper there should be an efficient militia organization there to keep in check the lawless and violent men who congregated about the coal mines. During a recent disturbance the Imperial troops were brought from Halifax, and he would like to know why the volunteers at Londonderry were not called out for suppressing the rioters. He thought the militia should be used for preserving the internal peace of the country, and that the Imperial troops ought not to be called out except in cases of absolute necessity.

Mr. VAIL said, owing to the peculiar position of Cape Breton they had retained the Brigade-Major there. In regard to the other point raised by the hon. gentleman, he might state that there were very few militia men about Londonderry—in fact, there were scarcely any nearer than Truro; and it was quite as easy to get the troops from Halifax as it was from Truro. In all probability the Imperial troops were got for nothing, whereas the calling out of the volunteers might have entailed some expense on the company.

Mr. MACKAY said there were a great number of volunteers in Halifax who would have responded gladly to the call. He was glad to hear the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Militia with respect to the retention of the Brigade-Major, because that officer did good service during the disturbance. If proper efforts were put forth and due regard paid to the requirements of Cape Breton, he did not think there would be any difficulty in getting men for the force.

Mr. POULIOT said that if any retrenchment was possible, it should be made in this item, for the force was, at present, a means of demoralizing the young people of the country. They were informed in the newspapers, that some 200 French Canadians had just gone to the United States for work. This was humiliating, and something should be done to remedy this state of things. In 1775, their ancestors were among those who met Montgomery; and in 1812, their fathers also defended their country against the invader; but the same necessity did not exist to-day, and they should not continue a useless expenditure of money. They should rather expend money for colonization purposes. He protested, for his part, in the name of his own county and in the name of several other counties, against the useless expenditure in this connection. This money was being spent for no good purpose whatever; it was rather doing evil than good, and if retrenchment was to be begun, it should commence with regard to this vote.

Mr. BOWELL said, when he looked at the list of removals from the Brigade-Staff, and considered the length of service rendered by those officers, and the youthful service of the officers who had been retained, he could not help expressing surprise at the course that had been pursued by the head of the Department. Those removals were contrary to all military principle, and contrary to the principle which governed the administration of all military departments. It would appear that political rather than military reasons had governed in this matter. He could not conceive it possible that the Major-General, an old and experienced officer, who knew thoroughly his duties and what was requisite for the good of the service, had anything to do with this matter. He found that the services of Mr. R. P. Servis, of No. 1 District, were dispensed with, and that Major Henry Smith, of No. 3 District, who had been in the service a number of years, was removed. Last year the hon. the First Minister, when speaking on the question of a reduction of the staff, said:—

“He might state at once that the policy of the Government was to fill no vacancies occurring in the staff until it was reduced to almost one-half of its present proportions; and, secondly, that the positions vacant at Kingston for some months had not been filled, and it was not the intention of the Government to fill them. It was the intention of the Government to reduce the staff, and it was a matter of consideration in what way this should be done. They were undecided whether to wait for vacancies or to reduce it at once, which was always an awkward thing to do, as they would have to dispense with officers who had been in the service for years, or introduce a measure making allowance to those whose services were dispensed with. They thought it well to take a vote this year without making any reduction, and reserve for early consideration the precise mode in which this reduction could be affected. That was the settled policy of the Government.”

How was that promise carried out? Just as soon as Parliament rose the opportunity presented itself to fill those vacancies which the Premier had declared should not be filled, and the Brigade-Majorship of District No. 3 was given to Major Worsley, a gentleman, no doubt of good repute as an officer, who had been in the Grand Trunk Brigade, which had been disbanded, but who was a comparatively new man, and had no claims to justify his appointment. Then, instead of promoting an old and efficient officer to the position of Deputy Adjutant-General, a gentleman—a very worthy officer it was true—was appointed who had never served in the Volunteer

Militia Force of Canada, but who had political influence. He had always combatted this practice of raising men over the heads of old officers, which which seemed to be gaining ground under the present Administration more than ever before. It could not but have a bad and disastrous effect upon the officers of the force if they knew that when a vacancy occurred their claims were to be overlooked on account of family or political reasons. The Major-General in his report, no doubt owing to the political influence which has been engrafted upon the system of late more than ever before, declared the force was becoming demoralized from one end of the country to the other. This was not his language, but the language of the Major-General himself, who said, in his report of January 19th, 1877:—

“ The system pursued this year appears to me demoralizing, because we retain nominally a large body of men, who, if not brought together long enough for some amount of instruction, are no better than recruits; and if we continue to maintain the present numerical force, and only train them, such as it is, for eight days in each alternate year, we teach them next to nothing.”

Now the causes which had led to that was the point to which he desired to call the attention of the House.

Mr. MILLS: In the extract he stated the cause.

Mr. BOWELL said he would give another cause, and he thought, from his knowledge of the facts, that he was as capable of giving the true cause as the Major-General, who visited them very seldom and knew so little in this respect. Why, with a solemn pledge of the Government on record that these vacancies in Kingston were not to be filled, and that promotions were to be made from the officers at present in the force, had new men been appointed? In No. 3 District there had not been a better officer than Major Henry Smith, who resided in Cobourg, and why should he be removed in order to make a place for Major Worsley? Why was the latter not appointed to the Deputy Adjutant-Generalship and Major Smith allowed to retain his position, if he were worthy of preferment? The reason was obvious. Why was Lieut.-Col. Van Straubenzie, who had never served in the Volunteer Militia, but who was formerly in the regulars, selected to fill the position, and old officers, equally capable of commanding and managing the volunteer force in that district, overlooked or dismissed? The same principle had been carried out in reducing the service in the Province of Quebec. He had taken some pains to make himself acquainted with the facts as they really occurred, and that was one of the reasons why he moved for the returns brought down some time ago. The first officer on the list whom he found removed from the staff was Lieut.-Col. Hanson, an officer whose name was familiar in the force, whether in Ontario or Quebec. No officer or private who had had any experience for the last ten years but knew that he was one of the most efficient volunteer officers in that Province. He had been almost the father of the force in Lower Canada, and had done more than anyone else to organize and make it effective in the districts where he visited. He had occupied his present position, according to the return, for five years, eleven months and thirteen days, but in fact over ten years; Lieut.-Col. Bellefeuille had occupied his for a similar time. Col. Duchesnay, it was true, had been promoted, but he was the only one who had been. Whom did the Government retain in the militia service in the Province of Quebec? They dismissed this old and valued officer, Col. Hanson, and likewise Col. Bellefeuille, and retained in office the Hon. Mr. Aylmer, who had been a Brigade-Major for one year, nine months and nineteen days only. Was it because Col. Hanson had a near relative in the House who opposed the Administration, while Major Aylmer had a brother who supported the Ministry in this House? If that was the doctrine to be carried out, the Minister of Militia and his colleagues must be held responsible for it. He said, with all respect to the gentleman who presided so gallantly over the military destiny of the country—the Minister of Militia—that it was impossible, without some interference by the head of the Department or those under him, that Major-General Smyth would send adrift two old Brigade-Majors and keep in the service a gentleman who had only been in the service one year and nine months. If that was the principle on which promotion in the force was to be carried on, the sooner volunteer officers knew it the better. It might be said that they did not reside in the particular Military District where they were wanted, but this was no good military reason. The Department should, as in the regular force, have allowed juniors to retire, had their services to be dispensed with, instead of removing the old and more efficient officers. In Ontario one gentleman had been retained a Brigade-Major who had been in the service only two years and six months, while others who had been five years and eleven months, and three years and eleven months respectively, had been dismissed, because it amounted to nothing less than dismissal. He said, in all frankness, that the Brigade-Major retained in No. 4 District, though only two years in the service, was as efficient an officer as anyone in the force. He did not complain of any of the younger members being retained, but of the older officers being dismissed. In New Brunswick, Lieut.-Col. Inches had been in the service for three years, eleven months and thirteen days, and Lieut.-Col. Caleb McCulloch for five years, eight months and eight days.

Mr. MITCHELL: He has been in the service 40 years.

Mr. BOWELL said he was speaking of his services as Brigade-Major, as exhibited in the return before the House. The two gentlemen had served the full time, but there was a Mr. James R. McShane, he did not know his peculiar qualifications, but he had been in the service only four months, yet he was retained and the services of the old officers dispensed with. This officer, who had been serving for four long months—whether they were cold winter nights he did not know—was retained in the service, while two old valued officers were dismissed and sent adrift. In Nova Scotia the same principle had been carried out, the youngest brigade-major having been retained in the force.

Mr. MITCHELL: I fancy he was created for the purpose.

Mr. BOWELL said he thought that perhaps McShane was. He did not know his military title; he did not know whether it was the famous McShane of Montreal or not.

Mr. MITCHELL: He is a very decent young gentleman. I have nothing to say against him; he is a lawyer.

Mr. BOWELL said, of course, in that case, his military qualifications must be all right. He asked especially the volunteer officers in the House whether, from the debates and figures he had laid before them, showing the services done by those who had been removed and those who had been retained, this was the way of accomplishing the end that any Government or Minister of Militia should have in view with respect to affairs of this kind. If this course was to be continued, the sooner they abandoned the whole force the better, and save the expense to the country. They had better commence at head-quarters, for so long as the Department was presided over by a gentleman who knew so little of the requirements of the force, their absence would be better for the country. He found that the officers at head-quarters did not seem to be able to agree among themselves as to the actual state of the force. The Major-General, speaking of the clothing furnished to the men, did not agree with the remarks made by his Brigade-Majors and Deputy Adjutant-Generals, who had made reports to his Department. He (Mr. Bowell) was glad that the Government had taken steps in the direction of reducing what, to his mind, had been an expensive and unnecessary staff throughout the country. He had always been of the opinion, and was so still, that the work to be done and the duty to be performed in the different districts were done better formerly with a less number on the staff than of late by a larger number, for they seemed to have nothing to do but report from one to the other, and so on, till they got by this round-about way to head-quarters. With respect to the question of clothing, he found the Major-General, in his postscript to his report, in speaking of the difficulties which occurred in the face of the complaints which were made with respect to the clothing of the Department, said:—

“As to great coats and clothing, the Militia Department is not in fault if any suits were deficient, that blame, if there really is any, rests elsewhere; but my belief is, their clothing is complete.”

He (Mr. Bowell) did not say that the Major-General did not believe what he wrote, but he must have been misled by some one, or he had not read the reports sent to his Department, especially by the Deputy Adjutant-General of District No. 3, and the Brigade-Major of that District. Lieut.-Col. Van Straubenzie said in his report, referring to the 3rd Provisional Regiment Cavalry, that:

“Major Rogers complained (and very justly so) of the trowsers recently issued to the men as of inferior quality, and totally unfit for cavalry soldiers.”

Again, in reference to the Loughborough troop of the 4th Provisional Regiment of Cavalry, he said:—

“In their clothing and equipments, I regret to say, I found many deficiencies.”

In reporting upon the state of the infantry in one district, the same officer uses this emphatic language:—

“In making my inspection I was sorry to observe that in many of the companies there were men deficient in articles of uniform, thereby giving an unsoldierlike appearance to the whole company.”

In addition to these extracts, he found that Brigade-Major Worsley in his report said, in commenting upon the uniform of one of the companies in his district, that:

“The officers wore the uniform of the 49th, with civilian wide-awakes as a head-dress, and the men generally were without uniform.”

Again, referring to No. 1 Company of the 49th Battalion, he said:—

“This company has actually, I am informed, no uniform belonging to the company, but that the officers had purchased tunics for them.”

With respect to No. 3 Company of the same Battalion, he said:—

“They had little uniform, giving an unsoldierlike appearance.”

Yet there was a report from the head of the force in Canada, dated a month later than the Deputy Adjutant-General's and Brigade-Major's reports, declaring that he believed the complaints in regard to clothing were not correct; but, on the contrary, “that the clothing was complete.” Then he found a strong and, he thought, a very peculiar report made by this new Brigade-Major, Lieut.-Col. T. W. Worsley; it was, to say the least of it, a unique military document, the most peculiar he ever read as emanating from the brain of a military officer. He commenced in this singular way:

“It is with regret that the duty of making up the inspection reports of corps in the Military District No. 3 has devolved on me, owing to your severe illness, which I trust will soon be at an end.”

Whether the regret is on account of having to perform this extra labour, or at the illness of his superior officer, is not very clear, and what kind of an end he trusts the illness will terminate in is still less clear, though charitably it is to be hoped that a speedy recovery was hoped for, and not a vacancy for promotion. Its ambiguity was charming, and its diction of a character not to be envied or copied by others. Speaking of the drill of 1876-77, this officer said:—

“I shall make a few remarks on the effect the drill has had this year in this district: It has kept companies together, which is something, and that is about all.”

Again,—

“But this kind of knowledge is fast dying out in the district.”

And then follows this statement:—

“Good instruction is worth paying for, but it by no means follows, because a man has been a non-commissioned officer in Her Majesty's regular army, that he should be a good instructor; it is quite a special gift, and I have seen as good a one as I ever knew a volunteer, but he must have practice, and come (to use the expression) fresh from the mill in order to do his work effectually; he is then a host in himself.”

This military phrase “a host in himself” was quite new to him, and he dare say to most persons who had served in the force. Regarding target practice this officer reported:—

“I send you details of target practice; the results are not what I could wish. There are, no doubt, in Canada some first-rate marksmen, but they are few in number. To shoot well with a rifle, a man must be taught, or he must take such pains with himself, by practice, to become a marksman, otherwise he will be more dangerous to his friends than his enemies. At various times I have visited the camps of instruction and watched the practice, when the shooting was so bad that I am certain people would not credit it, but the results on paper would be good; but I find it easier to shoot on paper with a pen with good results, than with a Snider at a small target at 500 yards."

This was clearly a reflection on the whole volunteer force, for, if it meant anything, it meant that every officer of the force to which Lieut.-Col. Worsley referred had made a false return of target practice. Falsehood and deception were seriously charged; and Lieut.-Col. Worsley ought to be compelled to substantiate them or be sent adrift, and a more competent officer put in his place. The report continued:—

"I have much pleasure in informing you that the arms and accoutrements in the 7th Brigade Division are in a much better state than they were, and I find that stopping the allowance for care of arms in cases where they are in a bad condition has a wonderful effect."

In other words, it was charged that, if the officers did not receive a paltry $40 a year for keeping the arms in repair, they would allow them to get into bad condition; or that they received the money and made false reports concerning the condition of the arms and accoutrements. If this matter was not serious, the last clause might amuse. It was:—

"It has come to my knowledge that the men in many companies are not really legally enrolled when they are called out for training."

If this was so, it was Lieut.-Col. Worsley's duty to report the officers and see that the men were properly enrolled. Notwithstanding these charges, and the deplorable state of the force, as depicted by himself, he says:—

"Notwithstanding many drawbacks, I think the militia force here is now in better order than it ever was."

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward): How does he know it is? It is the first time he has inspected them.

Mr. BOWELL said he was not aware of what this officer knew; but thought, however, that he (Lieut.-Col. Worsley) knew very little about the question or he would not have made such a report. Yet this was the officer placed in the force over the heads of older and more deserving men.

Mr. MITCHELL: He was a pet.

Mr. BOWELL said, if Col. Worsley was a pet, older and more efficient officers, who did know their duty, had been got rid of in order to find a place for him. If what this officer reported was true, they would have to go somewhere else for defenders of the country. He did not hesitate to say that the charges made against the force in District No. 3 were not borne out by the facts. He knew of cases, however, in which men who should not have been promoted had been placed over the heads of those who should have received promotion, and therefore the force was not in as efficient a state as it was many years ago. The force had not been properly treated, for the Department had refused to furnish the men with ammunition for target practice. The ammunition they had had in his county they had bought and paid for out of their own pockets. Yet complaint was made that the men have not a better knowledge of the rifle. The same complaint was made with regard to "A" Battery of Artillery; but Lieut.-Col. Jackson gave the solution of this difficulty in his report, when he said:—

"The want of a better knowledge of the rifle is owing to the cost of ammunition, and many who would make good shots are deterred from taking part in the practice."

He believed the system pursued lately, both in the treatment of the officers of the staff; in promoting men who had no claims, other than those of a political character; and in the management of the men in the various districts, would soon so demoralize the whole force as to render it not only useless, but an expensive toy, kept together more to furnish an excuse for the extravagance at head-quarters than for any good purpose; and if the system were not changed it would not be long before there would be neither officers nor men in the force in any part of the Dominion.

Mr. MONTEITH said that Colonel Service, an able and worthy officer with whom he had been acquainted for twenty years, had been dismissed in his county, and he had no hesitation in saying he believed that this officer owed his dismissal to his having taken part in his (Mr. Monteith's) election in 1874. Col. Service was superior to many who had remained in the force, and this officer had felt so bad over his dismissal, that he (Mr. Service) not many months after died.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this poor man had been utterly incapable of doing any work. It was a matter of charity to suffer him to remain so long in the force as was the case; Colonel Service had no ability at all, latterly, to serve.

Mr. MONTEITH said he could assure the First Minister that he had lived in Stratford at the time, and that he never knew Col. Service to be in the position stated.

Mr. CARON said he concurred completely with the hon. member for North Hastings, so far as this statement with reference to the militia was concerned. Political influence should have nothing whatever to do with the selection of officers, who should be chosen simply for their merit. Instead of diminishing, this vote seemed to increase year after year; but he for one would not object to it if they received value for their money. It seemed to him impossible to imagine that in eight or twelve days men could be drilled sufficiently to render them of any great service to the country. He had already enquired whether the Government intended to distribute among the force the general orders published in the official Gazette. He was told that this was only now done to commanding officers and not to captains and subalterns. If this were the case, of course it was an inconvenience. Under the late Government he believed these orders were freely distributed to all officers in the militia. He had also asked, whether the Government intended to arm the different rifle corps with the short rifle and sword bayonet. He did so because he was told that a couple of companies in Montreal had been provided with this important weapon. If so, it should be equally and generally distributed. He understood that such was the intention of the Government, but he was not informed when they intended to do so. He took it for granted that in military matters there should be no preference to any one individual or to any one corps. But he was informed that this rule was not carried out, and that some corps had special privileges. For instance, one corps, the Governor-General's Guards, no doubt a most efficient corps, had full dress uniform allowed for its officers, whilst other corps were not allowed the same privileges; the same corps were also allowed very stylish and expensive caps. This gave rise to complaint on the part of other corps. The 8th and 9th battalions of Quebec, which he thought was as fine a body of militiamen as any in the country, were only served with common woollen caps worth from 40 to 50 cents. It seemed to him as an act of justice that every militiaman should receive exactly the same privileges at the hands of the Government. His attention had also been drawn to another fact, which it seemed impossible to explain. He was told that an application had been made to re-organize Company 6 of the 8th Battalion of Quebec, which was refused. Just about that time the 5th Fusiliers of Montreal sent in a similar application, which was granted. He could not see why this difference should be made, Quebec also was not allowed proportionately the same strength as other cities, as would be seen by the following figures, nor was the strength generally proportionate.

Halifax, with a population of about half, and Toronto about the same, have each a force double in number to Quebec; and St. John, N.B., has an almost equal force.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said he did not think it was advisable for the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Monteith), to have brought up the matter of the removal of Col. Service. He (Mr. Higinbotham) had served under him five or six years and had no hesitation in saying that he was perfectly incapable of performing the duties of his office.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he did not often agree with the Government, but there was one or two things that he could agree with them. Major Worsley had been connected with the Grand Trunk Brigade, which he had kept in a very efficient condition; in fact, there was not a more efficient brigade in the country. For reasons best known to themselves, the Government had seen fit to do away with the services of the brigade. Brigade-Major Worsley was sent to Kingston to do duty for the late Brigade-Major, and he had been acting as Brigade-Major there when this vacancy occurred. He was senior to the other Brigade-Major whose services had been dispensed with, and on that account he had some ground for consideration, and, besides that, he was a very efficient officer. With regard to the other officer, Col. Van Straubenzie, although he was an active supporter of the Government—for which he, perhaps, was appointed—it could but be said that he was an exceptionally fine officer. He had served in Her Majesty's army with distinction in various parts of the world, and had been several years in this country. His abilities and qualifications admirably fitted him for the position he held, and no doubt he would be of service to the Department. But, by the report of the Major-General it would appear that there were many defects in the present system. It was stated in the report that four days' drill was totally insufficient to give the men soldierly habits. The clothing was very bad. Being of serge and of very bad quality, it would not last the time it was supposed to wear—three years. The Government should direct their attention to the training of non-commissioned officers, without which there could not be an efficient service.

Mr. BROWN said the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) had made some remarks which were un-called for, and not borne out by the facts. There was a powder magazine at Belleville, and he made no complaint about ammunition. As to the company not being entitled to great coats, the regulations said that a report must be made on the destruction of a uniform, but where a company was regularly entitled to uniforms, there was no necessity of making any statement. In October, 1866, the company received 51 great coats; in April, 1867, 14; and in 1872, 65; making a total of 130 in seven years. The hon. gentleman would have the House believe that 42 men received this number, but the fact was, that the company formerly numbered 65, which made a considerable difference. In regard to the drill pay, he was of opinion that 50c. a day for being at headquarters was useless, and that it would be much better to give the Major-General and Staff leave of absence. If he had been guilty of any dereliction of duty, his conduct ought to be inquired into in a proper manner, and not made the subject of newspaper articles.

Mr. ORTON said he would have said nothing on this subject had it not been for the attack of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Higinbotham) on the memory of a brother officer. He considered that that officer was a worthy man, and one who contributed largely to the success of the volunteer movement in Canada. The hon. member had not had the same opportunities for judging with reference to the discharge of the duties of that officer for a number of years as he (Mr. Orton) had, or he would not have taken the position he did. He had no hesitation in saying that the remarks of the hon. gentleman were not warranted by the conduct of the officer.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM said he had never stated a word in this House which was capable of being impeached as being untrue. He stated that he served with the officer in question from the first day that he entered the service; indeed he belonged to the service before the hon. gentleman entered it; and he said distinctly that he could prove by the Adjutant-General at London that he was utterly incapable of discharging his duties four years before he was dismissed. He denied that he had made an unwarrantable attack. What he did was in defence of the profession to which he belonged, and in defence of the Government, on whom an attack had been made.

Mr. MONTEITH said the officer was efficient, and, he believed, had been discharged on political grounds and not for inefficiency.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no hesitation in saying it was for gross inefficiency, incapacity and drunkenness.

Mr. TROW said he had been acquainted with the gentleman as long as the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Monteith), and while not aware as to his inefficiency, he knew that the officer had become so demoralised that his usefulness had been impaired for many years.

Mr. MITCHELL said that whatever might have been the faults of the officer, the remarks made by the hon. the Premier were quite uncalled for. He thought that when the force was reduced the most able and experienced officers should be retained, and he, therefore, asked for explanations in regard to the removal of Cols. McCulley and Inches. Col. McCulley had long been connected with the force, was a sober man, and no one in the community was more ready to defend the country than he. Col. McCulley had, however, supported him (Mr. Mitchell) in election contests, and that, he feared, was the reason of the removal of the officer. Col. Inches was a first rate officer, who had devoted much time to the organization of the force. While those officers had been removed, Major McShane, who had been appointed only four months before, was retained. In regard to the militia force, General Smythe had reported that the grant would have to be largely increased in order to have the present force in a state of efficiency. He (Mr. Mitchell) did not, however, believe the country was prepared to increase the estimates under that head beyond the amount of last year. He objected to the expenditure involved by Col. Ross and General Smythe in making trips across the continent.

Mr. GILLMOR said that Col. Inches, who was one of his constituents, had opposed him at the last election. He was not aware that the officer was to be removed on that account, and he (Mr. Gillmor), being a supporter of the Government, would no doubt have been consulted if any such step had been proposed. He would not have consented to his removal, and while political opponents, they were very good friends. He did not believe that this officer, who was undoubtedly very efficient, was removed for political reasons.

Mr. VAIL said he had listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. gentlemen, particularly those who were military men, and from the hon. member for North Hastings. In the first place, he was curious to know what the hon. member (Mr. Bowell) would say with regard to these removals, because he (Mr. Bowell) had last year suggested this reduction in the Brigade staff. He had not, however, expected that he could satisfy the hon. gentleman, even if he complied with the hon. gentleman's request. Last year the Hansard stated:—

“Mr. BOWELL said he was not a little gratified on reading the report of the Major-General dealing with this particular branch of the service. When the Bill was introduced in 1868, he (Mr. Bowell) took exception to the clause which provided for the appointment of so many staff officers, and moved several amendments which had the support of the hon. gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury Benches. At that time he had declared that the staff was ‘useless,’ for which he had brought down upon himself the condemnation of a former Adjutant-General, who went so far as to demand his (Mr. Bowell's) dismissal from the force for daring to give expression to such views in the House. He was the more gratified therefore, to find so eminent a soldier as the present Major-General, after a couple of years experience in Canada, using still stronger language in reference to this staff. Now, did it not prove that he (Mr. Bowell) was right? He had hoped when the present Government found themselves in power they would carry out their professions when in Opposition, and reduce this useless and expensive staff. Every year the cost of it was increasing. At the present time, taking the staff in Ottawa and the outside staff, it cost the country nearly $100,000. In 1873-4 it amounted to $90,480; it was now about $99,640, showing an increase of about $9,000, owing to the fact that there were two or three men to do the work of one nearly in every office.”

He (Mr. Vail) afterwards referred to the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Bowell), and asked if he took this ground with regard to the different officers of the Department in Ottawa, and the hon. gentleman had given him to understand that he alluded to the outside staff. The hon. gentleman also said:—

“There was a reduction of half a million in the Estimates for the Militia this year; but it was not of a permanent character, being only for clothing, drill and other items which might be added again next year.”

Under these circumstances, he had been curious to know what the hon. gentleman would say on this occasion. He denied, most emphatically, that anything of a political nature had been considered in the removal of the Brigade Staff, which was entirely done on the representations and report of the Major-General. Until he had now learned the politics of one or two of these officers, he had not known, with one exception, what their politics were.

Mr. BOWELL: Who was that?

Mr. VAIL said this was Major Hanson to whom reference was made. He was aware of this gentleman's politics, because several gentlemen friends of the Government, and one or two members of the Government, had pleaded very strongly that this officer should be retained in his position. He had replied that this could not be permitted; that they were acting on the Major-General's report, and that, notwithstanding the fact that this officer was a friend of theirs, he must be removed with the rest. The hon. member for North Hastings had referred to the removal of Major Smith of Cobourg. He found that Major Worsley was appointed December 22nd, 1870; and Major Smith, January 12th, 1872, two years later. He had not read the report of the Major-General in this regard, because it was to some extent confidential, and it would be highly improper to read the report respecting the efficiency or non-efficiency of these officers. Had he chosen to have done so, however, he could have shown the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Monteith) that the gentleman he had referred to, had been reported to him as being quite inefficient. He had not a word to say against Major Smith, who, he believed, was an efficient officer; but it happened that the headquarters were at Kingston, and Major Worsley, who had previously held the position of Brigade-Major at Kingston, being reported a good and experienced officer, was retained for the reasons given by the Major-General, and Major Smith had to be removed. Major Worsley was appointed an officer on the staff, in the Grand Trunk Brigade, in 1870. In the next district, No. 6, the Major-General reported:—“2,800 men; one Brigade Major to be retained, and two to be reduced—Lt.-Col. Hanson and Lt.-Col. DeBellefeuille, both of seven years service, and both had very little to do.” This was a private report, so far as it belonged to the Department. He would hand it to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) if he wished to see it. On this report he had framed an Order in Council, which passed, removing both the officers named from their positions.

Mr. MASSON: Do you say that Mr. Hanson only served seven years as Brigade-Major?

Mr. VAIL: Yes.

Mr. MASSON: He was Brigade-Major when I was, and that was before 1867.

Mr. VAIL: I think that the report is correct. I give it as an authority.

Mr. BOWELL: His figures are not in accordance with the return laid on the table.

Mr. MASSON: If the rest is as reliable as that statement, it is bad enough.

Mr. VAIL said he found that Major Hanson was appointed November 17th, 1872. The only change made in Quebec was to appoint a Brigade-Major to the Deputy Adjutant-General's place. In No. 8 District, Col. McCulley lived in one extremity of the Province (N.B.) while Col. Inches lived in the other extremity, while the headquarters were in Fredericton, in the centre of the Province. Mr. McCulley was 75 years of age; and regarding him the Major-General reported that he (Mr. McCulley) was aged and inefficient. The Major-General reported two to be reduced, Lieut.-Col. McCulley and Lieut.-Col. Inches. Before the latter was notified of the change that was to be made, he (Mr. Vail) thought that he sent in his resignation. Nevertheless, this officer was allowed fourteen months pay.

Mr. MITCHELL said that Lieut.-Col. Maunsell reported in this relation as follows:—

“On the 2nd June last a reduction of the Brigade Staff of the militia having been ordered, the services of the following officers of this District, who were permitted to retain their rank on retirement, were dispensed with, viz: Lieut.-Col. J. A. Inches, Brigade Major 1st Division; Lieut.-Col. C. McCulley, Brigade-Major 3rd Division.”

“As to the retirement of Lieut.-Col. Inches—in expressing my sincere regret that such a step has been deemed necessary, I think it due to that officer to repeat that which I have already stated officially with respect to his services:—

“9th February, 1875. ‘From the period—early in 1866—when he commanded a force of Volunteer Militia at St. Stephen, at the threatened Fenian invasion (for which his services were acknowledged in a special manner by the then Commander in Chief, Hon. A. Gordon) to the present time there has scarcely been an annual report submitted in which the force in the 1st Brigade Division, in Lieut.-Col. Inches charge, has not been commended both as regards its complete numerical strength, and its efficiency, and it may be observed in my annual report for 1874, as well as that of 1875, that I took occasion, at the breaking up of the camps in his Brigade Division, at St. Andrews, to advert in my brigade orders to the satisfactory state of efficiency of the force, and I subsequently reported favourably thereon, as ‘reflecting high credit upon the Brigade-Major and officers commanding corps.’

“Lieut.-Col. McCulley had also served long in the Militia force, and as President of the Northumberland County Rifle Association, took much interest in rifle practice. He did his best, moreover, for the good of the force. Under the new regime—with reduced staff (although this District extends over a large area, and corps are in many instances widely separated) with zeal and activity on the part of the Brigade-Major, with promptitude and alacrity on the part of the District Paymaster and Storekeeper, and with forethought and intelligence on the part of officers commanding corps in the discharge of their important duties, respectively, I entertain no doubt that the duties of this District will be as correctly performed in the future as I assume they have been in the past.

“And here I must express my acknowledgments to the Staff and to officers commanding corps for the valuable support and assistance they have invariably accorded me in the discharge of my duties as Deputy Adjutant-General.”

It struck him (Mr. Mitchell) that Lieut.-Col. Beers had been appointed Deputy Adjutant-General; what had become of this officer?

Mr. VAIL: That was only a temporary appointment.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will tell you the rumour down our way. It is said he was appointed because a certain gentleman, a member of the House, desired the appointment, and very probably claimed a share of the patronage. He is a first-class officer, but he did not suit the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the member had to give way to the Minister, consequently Mr. Beers after being gazetted had to retire, and step down and out, and Mr. McShane received the position.

Mr. VAIL: The hon. gentleman is mistaken; Mr. Beer was never gazetted.

Mr. DOMVILLE: He received his appointment.

Mr. VAIL said Lieut.-Col. Beers might have had some little encouragement, but he felt quite safe in saying that this officer was never gazetted. He was not aware of the politics of Col. Beers and Col. McShane. This point was not taken into consideration, but Col. McShane was reported to be a very good officer.

Mr. MITCHELL: He is a very good officer.

Mr. VAIL said that the clothing, now served out, as he had stated two years ago, was taken on trial. It had not, however, given the satisfaction hoped for, and it was just possible that they might go back to the old system. Ever since the formation of the volunteer force—and certainly since he took office—ammunition had only been kept at district headquarters. It was not possible to distribute it about through the country. This would lead to its destruction in the first place, and, in the next place, it would cost a good deal to have it properly taken care of. He made this remark with reference to reports in the newspapers as to what had taken place at Belleville last winter. Complaint was already made as to the expense of the outside force.

Mr. BOWELL: I never complained, as the hon. gentlemen well knows, of expense with regard to the men.

Mr. VAIL said the hon member for Quebec stated, he was one of those who did not find fault with the money spent on the militia, as a rule; the only complaint made referred to the cost of the Department. It was impossible to make the men efficient unless a very large sum of money was expended. General orders were forwarded from the Department to staff officers of battalions, and captains of companies belonging to battalions. Officers of isolated companies were not furnished with them unless they contained some change in that connection. The Adjutant-General informed him that they were invariably sent to commanders of companies. They had tried every possible means not to increase, but to reduce the force where it could be done without injury. When the Royals of Montreal made the application mentioned, a year before the Stadacona Rifle Company applied, a peculiar state of things existed in Montreal. This was about the time the volunteers there were called out; and it was thought that the force in Montreal was probably rather short, and that it would be advisable to allow that corps to take its place on the roll. With reference to the number of militia at Halifax and St. John, it would be found that nearly all the volunteer forces of the Lower Provinces were situated in these cities, there being more men who enrolled there, at the inception of the movement, than in the outlying districts. Quebec, he thought, had its full quota, when his hon. friend considered there was a battery there. That city was pretty well taken care of. The Foot Guards at Ottawa were not treated, so far as he was aware of, better than outside corps. The officers paid for their own uniforms. The men were furnished with little better caps, but this seemed to be absolutely necessary. They were at headquarters, and wore a peculiar kind of uniform, and had to wear an appropriate cap. As to the want of clothing referred to by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Brown), he was satisfied that the renewal had regularly been made in that district. He believed that some of the officers purchased their uniforms in preference to using those furnished.

Mr. BROWN said the men had not obtained their renewal of clothing, because, as was alleged, application had not been made.

Mr. VAIL said one reason why the clothing did not last the full time was that some of the men used it in their ordinary work.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked whether the Government had any intention to establish free military schools, as recommended by the Major-General in command.

Mr. VAIL said the Major-General in command had made this recommendation three times, but it was a matter which he (Mr. Vail) did not think the country would agree to, as it was feared it was but the commencement of what might grow to be a standing army.

Mr. CARON enquired whether any special allowance had been made to the Guards at Ottawa. He understood that there had been.

Mr. VAIL said a certain amount had been paid to the officers, which they claimed in consequence of a change in their uniform, made just before the present Government took office.

Mr. BOWELL said this change was made during the present Government's incumbency of office.

Mr. PLUMB asked whether the drill buildings at Niagara, which were in a very dilapidated condition, were going to be refitted and rebuilt.

Mr. VAIL replied that this was a matter for the Public Works Department. Whenever the military authorities, in a certain district, represented that new buildings were necessary, or that the old ones needed repairing, the Department of Militia reported to the Department of Public Works, which was then responsible. No such representations had been made in the present case.

Mr. DOMVILLE referred to the case of Brigade-Major Beers. That officer had the influence of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Militia, and received letters notifying him to take up the position. Nevertheless, without any cause, Col. McShane was appointed to his place, in order, perhaps, to please some other member of the Cabinet.

Mr. VAIL said Major Beers was only appointed temporarily.

Mr. DOMVILLE: I deny it.

Mr. VAIL said he had no further information to give.

Mr. BOWELL called attention to the inaccuracies of the returns, or else of the statements of the Minister of Militia. That hon. gentleman had told the House that Col. Hanson was appointed Brigade-Major on the 17th November, 1862, which would show that, up to the time he was removed, he had been Brigade-Major 14 years. But the return brought down stated that he had only been Brigade-Major for five years, eleven months and thirteen days; his appointment taking place on the 19th January, 1869. Col.

Mr. VAIL.

Hanson's name was a familiar one, and it was strange that there should be this inaccuracy. There must have been some reason for that. The reason for Col. McCullough's removal was his age, but there was no reason why Col. Inches should have been dismissed and another gentleman appointed in his place. He was anxious to know what deduction the hon. the Minister of Militia was going to draw from his (Mr. Bowell's) remarks of last year. What he said then was in accordance with what he said in previous years, and with the position he was now taking. He did not complain of the reduction of the staff, but of the manner in which it had been effected. He would like to ask the hon. the Prime Minister if the recommendations of the Major General were not only considered and acted upon in all those cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sure I cannot tell.

Mr. BOWELL: I understood the hon. gentleman to state that such was that practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. BOWELL said it would appear from the report that the recommendations of the Major General had not been carried out. They had no explanation why the Hon. L. Aylmer, who had served little over a year, was retained, and Col. Hanson, who was equally efficient, and had been in the service fourteen years, was dismissed.

Mr. VAIL said the reason for Mr. Aylmer's retention was because he was the only Brigade Major in the district. Action in a good many instances was taken on the recommendation of Major General Smythe.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said there had been a great deal of discussion about the officers, but he thought the men ought to be looked after first. The payment of 50c. a day without rations was enough to demoralize the force. It would be better to keep a smaller force and have the men well drilled and reasonably remunerated, than to support 40,000 under the present system. He would advise the hon. the Minister of Militia to retain the old officers if they were efficient.

The Duke of Wellington was Commander-in-Chief until he was 80 years old. What arrangements were to be carried out in regard to drill this year?

Mr. VAIL said the present intention was to drill 20,000. The artillery, cavalry and infantry would be drilled twelve days. When the reduction was made last year, they hoped it would only be temporary. The hon. the Finance Minister had this year granted an additional $30,000, and if they were able to afford more money in the future, they would drill more men. His own opinion was that the force would have to be reduced in the future, as he did not think the country would grant the money to drill the whole 43,000 men.

Mr. MASSON said if we could not maintain the 43,000 efficiently, the advice of the Major-General should be followed and have fewer men drilled well. In his opinion it was an absurdity to drill the cavalymen for eight days and expect them to become proficient, it took longer than that for the horses to become accustomed to their work. Even twelve days were not enough, nor could the artillery be expected to learn much in that short period. He congratulated the hon. the Minister of Militia on the determination he had formed. The Government were not expected to give more men than were required, but they were bound to make the force that was maintained efficient. The great mistake in the Belleville affair was owing to there not being ammunition at headquarters; it was nothing to keep a few barrels of ammunition at the headquarters of a battalion. Then, as to the great coats. In the good old time, when he was a Brigade-Major, he never heard of volunteers going out in winter without great coats. Those little details should be attended if we wished to make the service equal to the requirements of the country.

Vote agreed to.

65. Allowances for drill instruction..... $40,000

Mr. BUNSTER said this was a large sum to devote to this purpose in the present state of the country, especially when it was desirable that we should have the means for building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hence, he, as a British Columbian, had a right to object to the foolish expenditure of money in this matter. He saw that $300,000 was asked for the Mounted Police in the North-West Territory. He would like to know what they were worth. The hon. gentleman said the Mounted Police were required to protect the Indians. In his (Mr. Bunster's) country two or three constables handled them well. He did not see that men who were well off should get these large salaries for doing nothing. General Smythe went across the country, and he thought his trip was not worth the money. Every contract made with British Columbia had been laughed at, and yet $966,956 was to be voted for militia purposes. He did not think the country received value for that expenditure. He would much rather see a reasonable amount put down for military instruction—say $25,000 or $250,000 to run the whole machinery, now costing a million.

Mr. MITCHELL: You had better go for half a million.

Mr. BUNSTER: No; half of half a million; especially when the Government says the railroad can only be built as the resources of the country allow.

66.		Drill pay and all other incidental expenses connected with the drill and training of the Militia.....		155,000

Mr. BOWELL said he had been given to understand that in the drill last year, the officers in connection with the Batteries, or with the Garrison Artillery, received pay in accordance with their rank, while the pay given to the Infantry officers was a certain allowance per diem, equal to one dollar per day.

Mr. VAIL said he believed the Garrison Artillery were paid the same as the others who drilled at head quarters—$1 per day, but the Field Artillery, who drilled in camp, received the usual allowance.

Mr. BOWELL: But the Infantry that drilled in camp that went out last year?

Mr. VAIL: There was no drill of Infantry in camp that I am aware of last year.

Vote agreed to.

67. Contingencies and general service not otherwise provided for, including assistance to Artillery and Rifle Associations and bands of efficient corps..... $45,000

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked why there was a reduction in this grant.

Mr. MITCHELL said the country understood that the sooner the Rifle Association business was wiped out altogether the better.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought it was right that there should be something said about this when the House was fuller. He had always considered it a good vote to promote practice with the rifle. How much that was promoted by the expedition to England was a matter for discussion, and the Government were quite prepared to receive the views of members, and to be guided, to a great extent, by them. It was the duty and the desire of the Government to receive suggestions from members of the House who were intimately acquainted with the service and had studied the method best adapted to create good firing in the country.

Mr. MASSON: Has not the Government already decided the matter by this reduction?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; we desire to invite discussion.

Vote agreed to.

68. Drill - sheds and rifle ranges..... $10,000

69. Care and maintenance of military properties transferred from the Ordnance and the Imperial Government, including rents..... 10,000

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. MITCHELL said a lot of land had been given in the town of Newcastle for a drill-shed, and it had never been built.

Mr. VAIL: We will consider it.

Mr. BUNSTER asked if a drill-shed was to be built at Nanaimo this year.

Mr. VAIL: We are not sufficiently informed on that point, whether there are sufficient volunteers and whether they are entitled to it.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MIRAMICHI RIVER.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. MITCHELL asked whether it was the intention of the Government to continue during the present season the improvement of the navigation of the south-west branch of the Miramichi River.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not the intention of the Government to do anything there.

Mr. MITCHELL asked whether it was the intention of the Government to continue the improvements commenced on the Horse Shoe Bar at the entrance of the Miramichi River with the Government steam dredge, and resume operations on that work at the opening of navigation, or how soon thereafter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not for about a year thereafter, I think. Our information is that vessels frequenting the river can obtain entrance without very serious difficulty at present, while other places on the coast require improvement more than this.

Mr. MITCHELL: The improvements, I presume, will be continued the year after.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I presume so.

APPOINTMENT OF HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

Mr. CHEVAL asked, whether it was the intention of the Government so to amend the Act respecting the appointment of Harbour Commissioners, as to provide that no shareholder of any navigation company should be eligible or should be appointed as a member of any Harbour Commission.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): It is not the intention of the Government to amend the law in that respect. In fact, I never heard of any difficulty before.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

Mr. DEWDNEY asked whether the claims made by Mr. Seeley, Mr. J. Galbraith and Mr. J. C. Haynes have been settled according to the recommendations made by Mr. T. C. Dupont, the Inspector appointed to report as to the justness of those claims. If not, what was the reason of such delay.

Mr. BURPEE replied, that Mr. Seeley's claim had not been settled yet. The belief was that it was wholly unauthorized, and they did not know whether all the articles were there or not, and had to wait for further information. Mr. Galbraith's claim had been settled by the return of some of the articles furnished by him, and the balance was paid over. Mr. Haynes' claim was a very large amount for building purposes and was wholly unauthorized.

PORT COLBORNE HARBOUR MASTER.

QUESTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked, 1st. The name of the Harbour Master at Port Colborne; the date of his appointment, and the amount of his salary? 2nd. Whether it was a new appointment? 3rd. Whether the Department of Marine and Fisheries was not informed that the Harbour Master was the proprietor of a steam tug or steam tugs at the time of his appointment?

Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the information was not in the Department of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he had not received sufficient intimation of the question to give the desired information. His impression was that there were some private letters in his Department stating that the Harbour Master (Mr. Carter) was an owner of tugs, and there was also a letter from the gentleman denying the fact. The duties of the Harbour Master at Port Colborne were chiefly connected with the canal, and there was no ordinary harbour duty. He would bring down an exact statement when the vote for canals was reached.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

QUESTION.

Mr. TROW asked, whether it was the intention of the Government to abolish the collection of postage from the publishers of newspapers in the city, town and county of publication?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Postmaster-General is not able to attend to-day, being unwell; but I think there is no intention to abolish the postage collection at the present time.

DISMISSAL OF ARNPRIOR SLIDE-MASTER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) moved for copies of all correspondence and papers relating to the dismissal of John Harvey from the position of Slide-master at the village of Arnprior. He said the gentleman referred to in this motion had occupied the position of slide-master, having charge of certain works on the Madawaska River, in the vicinity of Arnprior, for twenty years. During that time, he appeared to have discharged his duties in a manner satisfactory to those who were engaged in trade on that river. It was true that, in the year 1871, the boom at the mouth of the Madawaska broke, and certain timber contained therein became scattered. It was alleged, by those interested, that the breaking of that boom was caused by the neglect of Mr. Harvey; and application was made to the Government for compensation for the loss or damage sustained by the persons who owned the timber in the boom at the time of its breaking. The case of one of the parties, Mr. Rochester, was referred to the Dominion Arbitrators, and, in 1873, evidence was taken before them, and their decision was adverse to the claim of that gentleman. It was contended by Mr. Rochester and his friends that the decision of the arbitrators was unjust and partial, and was biased by their political proclivities and affinities. He (Mr. White) might say that that decision was made during the tenure of office of the hon. gentleman who now led the Opposition. After the present Administration attained office, and the personnel of the arbitrators was changed, two gentlemen on the Board having been replaced by nominees of this Government, the question was brought before them again, and the decision given in 1873 was confirmed. There was, therefore, he thought, very strong evidence that the breakage of that boom was not caused by negligence on the part of the officer of the Department. He had not had an opportunity of looking at the evidence, but it seemed quite clear that, if the loss these gentlemen sustained was caused by the negligence of an officer of the Department, compensation would have been granted them by the Dominion arbitrators, and the Department would have been held liable. Not only that, but, when it was known that Mr. Harvey was about to be dismissed in April last, a petition was sent to the Minister of Public Works praying that he should continue him in the office he had occupied for so long a time, and expressing regret that he was about to be dismissed. Although he had discharged his duties honestly and faithfully, it was his misfortune to be a Conservative, and also to be open and frank in the avowal of his political opinions, and, during the election contests in South Renfrew since 1872, Mr.

MR. WHITE.

Harvey had always, he believed, been consistently opposed to the hon. member for that Riding (Mr. McDougall). It had been stated, and he (Mr. White) believed could not be denied, that it was at the suggestion of the hon. member for South Renfrew that the dismissal had taken place. Mr. Harvey had occupied the position for twenty years, and up to the 21st April last had received no intimation that the Department was dissatisfied with his conduct. On that day he received a letter from the Department of Public Works, stating that his services were no longer required. No reason was given for his dismissal, and no charge, as he (Mr. White) understood, was brought against him by any person. If he was correctly informed, certain deputations also waited upon the Minister of Public Works to endeavour to get Mr. Harvey reinstated in his position, and the Minister stated that the reason for his dismissal was that he had spoken disrespectfully of the Government and the Minister of Public Works. He made this statement subject to correction, and hoped, if he was inaccurate, the Minister would correct him. The gentleman who was appointed to succeed Mr. Harvey in the position of slidemaster, was a gentleman against whom he (Mr. White) had nothing whatever to say. He had no doubt he discharged his duty faithfully and properly, but he had been, and now was, engaged in the lumber trade upon the River Madawaska; and it seemed to him that it was not in the public interest that a gentleman, whose private interests might conflict with the interests of those he served, should be appointed to the position Mr. Macdonald now held at Arnprior. He hoped, if there was any correspondence in this matter, it would be brought down to show the real reasons for Mr. Harvey's dismissal.

MR. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said the motion of his hon. friend, though apparently aimed against the Government, and although he had no accusation to make in this regard against his hon. friend personally, yet he had no doubt that it was put in his hon. friend's hands to injure himself (Mr. McDougall) personally. A good deal of talk had taken place in his counstituency about this matter, and they all knew it was much more easy to cause excitement and interest in a small matter of this kind, in any part of the country, than in questions of much greater importance. At the same time, he could say he had not been actuated by any mean, tyrannical spirit towards a political opponent in doing the little he had done in connection with Mr. Harvey's ceasing to act for the Government at Arnprior. Had he done so, he would have been justly open to the censure of every right-thinking man. He was glad that the hon. gentleman had taken this course, as his conduct had been free from anything like injustice towards any person. His hon. friend said that Mr. Harvey had been dismissed from office; but this he denied. Mr. Harvey had for years acted for the Government at Arnprior, but was only employed by the day and temporarily, on his own account and in his own interest. Had Mr. Harvey been engaged by the year he would have been prevented from taking contracts under the Government, his chief source of livelihood. Although Mr. Merrill, the Superintendent of the Ottawa works, had often suggested to this person that he should make application for permanent employment, he had not done so for the reason stated, and surely, under these circumstances, a man should not lay claim to be continued in office as a permanent employé could have done. He did not say that because he was an open opponent of the Government, Mr. Harvey should have been dismissed, but he believed that this person had so acted, not because he wished to uphold the views of the Opposition, but because he thought that, by taking this course, the Government would be afraid to dismiss him from office. Opposition to the Government should not be made a cloak for every sin Mr. Harvey had committed in the discharge of his duties as slidemaster. What the Premier might have said with reference to the reasons for dismissing Mr. Harvey did not affect him (Mr. McDougall) personally. The First Minister could defend his own course in this matter. He had drawn the attention of the Premier to the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Mr. McDUGALL: Oh, no doubt. He would not shirk any portion of his responsibility. He had informed the First Minister of the fact that Mr. Harvey, according to sworn evidence, had neglected his duty, and that he was the means of having persons, many of whom were strong opponents of the Government, lose a large amount of money. Moreover, he had the testimony of the Hon. James Skead, to the effect that Mr. Harvey had formerly been suspended, owing to neglect of his duties, and this was done by that person's political friends. This was confirmative evidence showing that there was reason why attention should be drawn to such neglect of duty. He had the evidence taken before the arbitrators in this matter. Mr. Snedden, a well-known and respectable gentleman, testified before them: that he knew Mr. Harvey, the slidemaster, at Arnprior, who was in Ottawa when the boom broke; that he and Mr. Harvey came down to Ottawa on the Wednesday or Thursday of the week preceding the breaking of the boom; that he returned home on that Saturday the boom broke; that he returned to Ottawa on the following Tuesday morning, when he saw Harvey at Mr. Graham's hotel; that he asked Harvey if he had heard the boom was broken, and Harvey said yes; that Harvey had the appearance of having been on the spree, and that he (Harvey) was under the influence of liquor at the time, and that he did not see Harvey drinking. This showed how Harvey had attended to his duty as slidemaster at the time. The losses occasioned by the breaking of the boom had exceeded $10,000. This was pretty strong evidence to show that such a person ought not be continued in his office. Harvey had left Arnprior when the water was at its height, and had been warned by persons interested as to the precautions that should be taken, and had not only neglected to take them, but also came to Ottawa where he was when the breakage took place.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: When was that?

Mr. McDOUGALL: It was in 1871 or 1872.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew): When was the evidence taken?

Mr. McDOUGALL said the late Government perhaps would not have been eager to draw attention to the matter, but this information was given before the arbitrators to whom the matter was referred a second time. The person who had committed the wrong had no cause to complain because the punishment was not as speedy as it ought to have been. Hon. Mr. Skead testified that Harvey had been suspended from his functions as slidemaster some years previously; and that although a sufferer by the accident which caused that suspension, he was one of the first to solicit Mr. Merrill to reinstate him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Mr. McDOUGALL: Oh, yes; they all knew very well that when any officer was suspended there was always pressure brought to bear in so many forms to secure re-instatement. His hon. friend said the decision of the arbitrators was adverse to these claims against the Government; but the reasons for this decision were not known, and the Government might occupy a different position to other persons in these matters. He would not impugn the soundness of this decision or the motives of the arbitrators; but he did say that whatever this decision was, it did not rebut the evidence taken before them with respect to Harvey's conduct and neglect of duty; and this was before them. Any one could tell whether it was right and proper for an officer in Mr. Harvey's position to have acted as he had done. His hon. friend said a petition was sent to the Government, asking that Mr. Harvey should be reinstated, but they all knew how easy it was to get signatures to petitions, especially when the signers had no interests at stake. He thought that fully half of the names on this petition were those of men who had no interest in the business on the river. Even if most of them had been so interested they knew it was very easy to secure signatures to such petitions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

His hon. friend seemed to think that, as a political move, this was a good thing for him to have done; but the removal of a person from office in a constituency, rendered the man, if a political opponent, a personal enemy, whose friends also espoused his cause, and while the man who obtained the place vacated was, perhaps, satisfied, the 99 out of the 100 applicants who were unsuccessful were dissatisfied. The new officer would also soon probably become discontented with his remuneration. The man who had succeeded Harvey, however, was a respectable man, in every way suited to the position; and he did not, for a moment, say that this officer would act in such a manner. He was always sorry when any vacancy occurred in his constituency. He believed his hon. friend had said it was a surprising thing that, if there were no objections to re-instate Mr. Harvey, and if the Premier had no such objections, he (Mr. McDougall) should have any. It was generally considered that the patronage of such offices belonged to the representative of the constituency.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not constitutional.

Mr. McDOUGALL said if that practice was changed, the change had taken place within the last three years. It was the rule under the late Administration, and he never blamed the right hon. gentleman for it. He nominated the successor to Mr. Harvey, and considered that, if there was no objection on the part of the Government, his nominee had a right to the place. If the statement that he had made was not sufficient to clear the Government from any imputation of having acted unfairly in this matter, he did not know what would satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said when the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) first got up to address the House, he supposed that he was speaking on behalf of the Government as a kind of Assistant Minister of Public Works; but he afterwards discovered that the hon. gentleman was not speaking in an official capacity. The hon. gentleman commenced by saying that this was no office, and that there was no appointment, and he ended by saying that there was an appointment which lasted over twenty years, and that he claimed the right of nominating a successor to the office. He did not know whether the popularity of his hon. friend had increased in the county he represented, owing to his action in this regard. The hon. gentleman seemed himself to doubt whether such was the case or not. He must congratulate the hon. gentleman on his high-souled patriotism, notwithstanding that he knew he was making enemies, he rushed to Ottawa to inform against Mr. Harvey and get another man appointed in his place. But what was the exact date of this patriotism, when the hon. gentleman rose superior to all considerations of personal advancement? It commenced after Mr. Harvey had worked against the hon. gentleman and almost defeated him at the last election. Then it was he rushed to Ottawa to have this officer dismissed. The complaint was an old one, and had been examined by the arbitrators of the late Government, who reported that there was nothing to show that this man had been so neglectful as to cause the Government to become liable for damages. The case was also submitted to the arbitration of the present Administration, who came to a similar decision. Under the circumstances, however, the hon. Prime Minister might have felt it his duty to listen to the hon. member for South Renfrew. He had no doubt that that hon. member considered he was performing a great duty, and that he would find out that virtue was its own reward. The hon. gentleman had got his revenge; but he (Sir John A. Macdonald) contended that neither in the House nor out of it, the hon. gentleman stood in a position equal to that he occupied before he made this announcement.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no objection whatever to the correspondence being brought down. The remarks of the hon. member for North Renfrew were, generally speaking, correct. He did state to a deputation that called upon him, that he had been informed that this man had spoken most disrespectfully of the Government and himself, and he told that deputation, as he now told the House, that he would permit no public officer to speak disrespectfully of the Government they served. Apart from that, however, his attention was called by a number of lumbermen to the repeated acts of carelessness on the part of this person, and he found that during the first year of his incumbency that Mr. Harvey was frequently engaged away from home attending to small contracts on the river. These considerations compelled him, apart from any political considerations, to direct his deputy to inform Mr. Harvey that his services were no longer required. It was also quite true, as the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) stated, that the arbitrators decided that there was no ground upon which to charge the Government for damages; but he was not aware, until a year and a half ago, that this slideman had ever been charged with carelessness in the matter. It was, however, not quite true that the case was referred to new arbitrators. There only was one new arbitrator, and the verdict was a partial one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE said one of the arbitrators dissented, and stated that he considered the Government liable. There was never a clear case made out of any person neglecting his duties, but that person was dismissed without the slightest hesitation. He protested against any one bringing up a case in the House when a man was removed for sufficient cause. He was quite sure that the hon. gentleman opposite knew very well that it had not been a peculiarity either of his own or of the Government to dismiss people for political reasons. They had great reason to do so on many occasions, and they had exercised a forbearance towards people in office that never was manifested by the hon. gentlemen opposite. They had allowed that forbearance to go a great deal too far in protecting men who had used their offices in order to injure the Government they serve. But he could tell the hon. gentlemen opposite, and all such office holders, that that was at an end.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said he presumed it was perfectly justifiable for the hon. member for Kingston to turn and distort what he had said in the way he did, but he could not permit it to go unchallenged. There was ground for stating that this man was engaged temporarily; he was paid by the day, and could not be considered to have any regular office. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) said his popularity was waning. It was true he did not get a very large majority at the last election, but, small as it was, it was three times as large as the majority of the hon. gentleman; and it was, moreover, despite the fact that the hon. gentleman himself introduced special legislation under which he (Mr. McDougall) was suffering, to legislate him out of the House.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he had no intention of injuring his hon. friend from South Renfrew; nothing he could do in or out of the House would have that effect. It was quite true that Mr. Harvey was paid by the day, but his office continued from year to year, and he had occupied the position for 20 years. This might appear to be a small matter to his hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) but it was of great moment to Mr. Harvey, who was suffering, not only from the loss of the office, but under the imputation which always attached to a man who was dismissed in this summary manner. The first name upon the petition asking that this gentleman should be retained in office was that of the Hon. Jas. Skead, so that if Mr. Harvey had been at one time derelict in duty he must have condoned his offence in the eyes of Mr. Skead. Among other names on the petition were those of McLaughlin Bros., Wm. McKay, E. B. Eddy, J. R. Booth, and almost every firm doing business on the river. It was rather strange that three years after the evidence was taken before the arbitrators, it should suddenly be discovered that Mr. Harvey had neglected his duty in 1871, and that he must therefore be discharged. While he knew that the practice had been under party Government, that hon. members supporting the Government should have the patronage in their counties, he thought in this instance this principle had been strained. He would like to enquire of the hon. member for South Renfrew how he would feel if the members for Quebec had secured the dismissal of an officer from the cullers office in that city in the face of a petition signed by a large majority of those who contributed to the support of the office. That hon. gentleman would be found to say that it would not conduce to the interest of those engaged in the lumber trade, nor to the efficiency of the public service. The hon. the leader of the Government had stated that the reason Mr. Harvey was dismissed was because he had spoken disrespectfully of the Government and himself (Mr. Mackenzie), and that no person would be allowed to remain in the public service of this country who did not have a due respect for that hon. gentleman and his Government. This was the first time it had been announced that public servants were servants of the Government and not of the country, and that the measure of respect a public servant had for the Government of the day was the test of his efficiency. The statement that Mr. Harvey was engaged in other employment he (Mr. White) believed was tolerably correct; but with the fact that all those interested in the river had certified to his efficiency, the inevitable conclusion must be arrived at, that the dismissal was made to gratify the political spite of the hon. member for South Renfrew. The hon. the Premier had neglected to notice the statement he (Mr. White) had said he was prepared to substantiate, namely, that the present incumbent was not a person who ought to have the position, as he was engaged in the lumber trade at Arnprior.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew): I deny that.

Mr. WHITE read the following declaration of partnership:—

“PROVINCE OF ONTARIO, }
“County of Renfrew. } ”

“The undersigned, James Hartnev, of the Village of Arnprior, in the County of Renfrew, and Province of Ontario, Merchant; Neil Robertson, of the Township of McNab, in the County and Province aforesaid. "ANDREW IRVING,

Mr. McDOUGALL: When was it dated?

Mr. WHITE said it was dated on the 25th September, 1875, six months before he was appointed to the office. Although he had searched in the registry office and the Canada Gazette, he had been unable to find that any dissolution of partnership had since taken place. He claimed this: that it was not in the public interest that a man engaged in the lumber trade at that point should be slidemaster.

Mr. McDOUGALL: He had ceased to have any interest in the trade before he was appointed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He could not by law according to the registry.

Mr. McDOUGALL: I know the fact.

VOTING BY BALLOT ON THE DUNKIN ACT.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. ROBINSON moved:

"That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—That it is expedient to provide that so far as the concurrence of the Parliament of Canada may be necessary for the purpose, the Legislature of the Province of Ontario or the Province of Quebec shall be authorized and empowered to provide that the votes of the electors under the Act of the late Province of Canada, 27, 28 Vict., chap. 18, therein called the Temperance Act, and commonly known as the Dunkin Act, shall be given by ballot in such manner as the Provincial Legislature may direct, subject to such provisions and changes only as may be deemed necessary for the purpose, but retaining all the provisions of the Act which are not inconsistent with the voting by ballot."

He said hon. gentlemen would see that there was no attempt in this resolution to affect the principles contained in the well-known Dunkin Act. It merely involved a new manner of carrying out these principles. The principle of voting by ballot had been found to be most useful in more important matters than even the Dunkin Act, and was very popular. He thought he was authorized to say that the principle of voting by ballot in reference to this measure, was approved of, not only by those who were inclined to oppose the principle of the Dunkin Act, but also by those who were in favour of the principles of that Act; and it was, therefore, as much in the interest of one party as another that he had drawn the attention of the House to the question. The well-known Dunkin Act was passed in 1864, and applied to Upper and Lower Canada—now Ontario and Quebec. The powers under it were to be exercised by municipalities and by the British North America Act, section 92, legislation respecting municipal institutions in the Province, was assigned exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures. But by section 91 of that Act, legislation respecting trade and commerce was assigned exclusively to the Parliament of Canada; and the Dunkin Act, where in force, made the trade and commerce in intoxicating liquors unlawful and so restrained trade. By section 129, laws in force at the time of the passing of the British North America Act remained in force, but could only be altered or repealed by the Legislature which could legislate on the matters to which they respectively relate; and if they related both to matters under the control of the Provincial Legislature and Canadian Parliament, it would seem that the action of both was required to repeal or alter them. He would point out to the House the examples of such joint action, in support of the principle involved and asked for in his motion. In 1869 Parliament passed Mr. Sandfield Macdonald's Act, 32 and 33 Vic., chapter 35, authorizing County Judges or their deputies to try certain offences; but, as the constitution of courts, fees of sheriffs, &c., for carrying the Act into execution belonged to Ontario, the Provincial Legislature passed their Act, 33 Vic., chapter 10, and called the Court "The County Judge's Criminal Court." It had no name under the Dominion Act, nor was the Judge said to hold a Court. In 1874 the Canadian Parliament passed Mr. (now Judge) Moss' Act about Permanent Building Societies in Ontario, and the Legislature of Ontario, thinking their powers encroached upon, passed their Act, 39 Vic., chap. 32, repealing the Canadian Act, except section seven about interest, which was not a matter they could deal with, and confirming things done under the Canadian Act. In 1870-71 the Ontario Legislature passed their Act establishing the Central Prison, and in 1873, chapter 46, and again in 1875, chapter 69, the Parliament of Canada passed Acts to enable the Lieutenant-Governor and officers to carry out the Act, and to transfer prisoners to it from the common jails, and do other things to which the Provincial legislative powers did not extend. In the present Session the Minister of Justice's Bills, numbers 55, 77 and 94, all had the same effect of supplying, by the powers of the Canadian Parliament, the want of legislative powers in the Ontario Legislature; and the Finance Minister's Bill, No. 36 (Insurance Bill of last session), after reciting that the Act, chapter 52, of The Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, respecting Mutual Insurance Companies, was repealed by the Ontario Legislature, but that doubts might be entertained as to their powers over the said chapter, repealed it once again, so far as it might be within the legislative jurisdiction of Canada. He could find no more precedents, but the House would see that those already cited were sufficient to bear out the principle of jurisdiction, for which, in his motion, he had asked the concurrence of the House; and as, apart from the question of jurisdiction, the principle of voting by ballot, another important question, was now approved of by the people, and found to be beneficial, he hoped the House would see no objection to its being adopted in voting for the Dunkin Act.

Mr. BLAKE said, without entering into any controversy, which he did not think it was expedient to enter into in the present state of the dispute as to whom the jurisdiction in this particular matter properly belonged, he would say that it seemed to him that the proposition of the hon. gentleman was one which could not be at all assented to. There were, no doubt, many classes of subjects upon which it was difficult to find the precise line which separated the jurisdiction of the Local and Federal Legislatures. There were some subjects of a different character to each other, but yet which ran very much into one another, in reference to which both the Federal and the Local Legislatures were liable to find themselves overstepping their several jurisdictions. But this proposition he took to be clear: that whatever might be the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, it was bound to execute that authority itself. It could not delegate to any other power the execution of its legislative rights. If they had power to repeal, amend, alter, or supplement the provisions of the Act of 1864, they, of course, had the right to do it, but they had not the right to authorize Local Legislatures to do it. They were responsible to the people for the execution of their legislative powers. They were bound to exercise for themselves this power, but they could not entrust their responsibility to, or confer their authority upon, Local Legislatures. Doubts might occasionally arise, in which it might be found expedient—although it must only be pursued in emergency to avoid the possibility of serious difficulties—that there should be legislation in both the Federal and the Local Legislatures. But this was upon the very principle which underlay the objection he had to the hon. gentleman's motion, namely, that the exercise of the legislative power of a Parliament, whether it were Federal or Local, must be performed by that Parliament itself. Therefore, it was that he felt it necessary to enter into no other considerations which might occur upon this motion. He regretted very much that circumstances had prevented the question of jurisdiction being disposed of by the highest court. While he thought it would be more expedient that legislation in connection with this matter should not take place during the present Session, in the hope that the difficulties now existing might be cleared up in the interval, he would not say that the argument which he was here presenting would be an argument of more than expediency. He would not say that Parliament might not, if it pleased, take upon itself, even at the present time, and with the risk of inconvenience which might arise, to assume jurisdiction; but what he would say was that, if Parliament assumed jurisdiction, it must perform its own legislation and exercise its own powers and not delegate them to any other body. He could not, therefore, support the proposition of the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was to be regretted, as the hon. the Minister of Justice had truly said, that the conflict of jurisdiction which had arisen in regard to that vexed question that seemed to agitate the people, especially those of Ontario, had not been finally settled by an authoritative decision. They could not, however, help it. Meanwhile, he ventured to differ entirely from the contention of the hon. the Minister of Justice that the Canadian Parliament could not hand over its powers to a subordinate body. It was the first time he had heard of any such limitation. The power of putting into effect the Dunkin Act was delegated by the Legislature of the late Province of Canada to the different municipalities. The Dominion Parliament had the power to impose a tax throughout every municipality, town, and county in Canada, and yet it handed over that power to municipalities. Parliament might give them certain powers, and might limit or increase them, or take them away. It was clear to him that if the question of a Prohibitory Liquor Law was within the jurisdiction of Parliament, it had the power to delegate its authority to a subordinate body, and could even distinctly limit the Legislature of Ontario or Quebec to dealing with the subject in a certain way; and so in the case of municipalities. So long as Parliament had jurisdiction over the subject for legislation, as a matter of administration it could employ the medium of any subordinate body. It did not appear, moreover, that those subordinate bodies were to be merely machines; Parliament could call on them to exercise their judgment as quasi-legislators.

Mr. MILLS said the doctrine laid down by the right hon. member for Kingston was a most extraordinary one. He had not only confounded the principle of administration with legislation, but he had asserted that this Parliament might deprive itself of the power of legislation when it pleased. The British North America Act provided for a division of the powers between the Dominion Parliament and Local Legislatures. If the right hon. gentleman's views were correct, that division was a mere imaginary one. That contention did not rest on a substantial basis. If it were true, Parliament might pass a law declaring that Provincial Legislatures should deal with the subject of criminal law, or might pass a law declaring that Provincial Legislatures should determine whether Parliament should be elected for five or ten years. There was not a power possessed by Parliament under the British North America Act, which power was declared to be exclusively vested in the Parliament of Canada, but might be handed over to and vested in Provincial Legislatures, if the argument of the right hon. member for Kingston was valid. There was a provision in the British North America Act regarding property and civil rights, which provided that with the consent of Provincial Legislatures, the Canadian Parliament might legislate upon that subject. If the right hon. gentleman's views were correct, there was no necessity for such provision; the Provincial Legislatures would have had that power with the consent of the Dominion Parliament without their being any special provision on the subject. That would not be a Federal system under which Provincial Legislatures had an independent existence within their own sphere, distinct from the power of the Dominion Parliament. He stated, without hesitation, that the right hon. member for Kingston could not find, from any Federal constitution, a law which would, in the smallest degree, sustain the view which he had promulgated. There was no authority for any such view. The right hon. gentleman had declared that Parliament could form municipal councils and boards, distinct from those which had an existence under the authority of the Provincial Legislatures. If Parliament had that power, what necessity was there to expressly mention that it was vested in the Local Legislatures; it was not expressly stated that it was vested in the Parliament of Canada. If Parliament had the same power to create a municipal body, having a distinct legislative power, there might be a legislative power independent of the Provincial Legislature; instead of giving the power to the Provincial Legislature, Parliament might create a separate and distinct body; and such a body would have its existence, not under the constitution, but under the Act of Parliament. The position of the right hon. member for Kingston was, not only untenable, but it was not consistent with common sense that any such power should be asserted. Instead of having two legislative bodies, distinct and separate, existing under the constitution there might be a number created by Government and a number created by the Provincial Legislatures, each undertaking to discharge the duties specially and exclusively vested by the British North American Act in the Provincial Legislatures and in Parliament. The object of administration was quite distinct from that of legislation. Parliament might provide machinery for the administration of the laws, and it might, in some cases, make use of local machinery, where there was no objection to its doing so; but to say that because Parliament had the power to provide the necessary machinery for the proper administration of the laws, that therefore it had the power to surrender the power it possessed and put an end to its existence and authority, was an entirely different proposition. The right hon. member for Kingston had claimed that this was a paramount Legislature, and declared that it possessed paramount power. There was nothing of that kind in the Constitution, and the Canadian Parliament had its functions as well as the Local Legislatures. Its functions might be more important in the eyes of hon. members than those of the Provincial Legislatures, and in that view they might be correct. More ability and information might be required for the proper and efficient administration of the affairs of Parliament, and they might be more dignified in the estimation of the people. But Parliament was not paramount. The functions of Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures were separate and distinct. If Parliament were paramount it would have the power to determine on what subjects they would legislate and what not; but the British North American Act provided that certain subjects should be exclusively vested in the Provincial Legislatures. Those Legislatures had their own legitimate sphere and were as independent of Parliament as if they were separate and distinct sovereignties. There could be no question about that point, and the idea of paramount power was one wholly inconsistent with the federal system of Government which, under the constitution, had been established in this country. There could be no question that it was the British North American Act that gave the Canadian Parliament power to legislate upon the subject of licensing or refusing licenses to sell intoxicating liquors. If the Provincial Legislatures possessed that power under the British North America Act, the Canadian Parliament could not divest them of it; if they did not possess that power, Parliament had no legal power to interfere, and any legislation on the part of Parliament, without the authority of the British North America Act was simply ultra vires, and would be so held by the Courts of the country. There was nothing Parliament could do which could extend the powers with which it was invested, and nothing which could limit and take away any portion of the authority imposed upon it; and the legislation proposed would be quite improper under the Constitution on the authority of which hon. members were in the House undertaking and executing the legislation of the people. Parliament had all power and authority so long as it attended to its own business and kept within the limits of the Constitution. The French Minister once said to Charles II that if the English King would keep within the limits of the Constitution he would be one of the greatest monarchs of the world, but if he were outside of the Constitution he was nothing. That was precisely the position of the Dominion Parliament; its power was absolute within the limits assigned to it, but when it went outside it was nothing.

Mr. PALMER said he quite agreed with the hon. the Minister of Interior that the powers of the British North America Act were divided, and they could not be encroached on either by one side or the other. The power to legislate given to the Provincial Legislatures was just as absolute within the limits of the British North America Act as was the power given to the Canadian Parliament within the class of subjects relegated to Parliament. He also agreed with the principle laid down by the hon. the Minister of Justice, that it was impossible for Parliament to abrogate its legislative powers. That meant that whatever it could enact, it could repeal; that it was impossible it could grant any power—the power to legislate—to any other body whatever, whether a Provincial Assembly or any other body, that it could not take away at any moment.

He agreed with the right hon. member for Kingston in regard to the paramount power of Parliament. That meant that it was impossible that Parliament could grant a power to anybody which it could not repeal. It would be extraordinary to limit the power, if they could not declare upon these subjects, when, where, and how it should be enforced. He could understand no such limit being placed upon their powers. He considered that their power of legislation over the class of subjects delegated to them was absolute. They could deal with them in any way they chose. It would be impossible for them to act with relation to the great variety of subjects under their control on any other principle. It might be perfectly right to trade in alcoholic liquors, but it was not in the power of the Local Parliament to prohibit such trade. While he entirely agreed with his hon. friend opposite to a certain extent, he must concur with the argument of his right hon. friend from Kingston, as far as it was applicable to this subject.

Mr. MILLS said he wished to ask the hon. gentleman if he understood the hon. gentleman to argue that they could create a Parliament and confer upon it the power to legislate—say upon the subject of promissory notes, or upon the interests of shipping or navigation? Could they call a second Parliament into existence to legislate on these subjects as long as they pleased?

Mr. PALMER said he did not think they could do that. They might create a tribunal in this relation, but it would not be a Parliament. Power was delegated by Parliament to the Governor in Council, and if his hon. friend the Minister of Justice was able to draw any distinction in this regard, he was not so able. This question came within the class of subjects upon which this Parliament could legislate. He had never heard it suggested whether or not the Local Legislatures had power to regulate the sale of liquor, or, if there had been, to what extent they could do so. He knew of no case in which the point was raised. He apprehended that there could not be a conflict of opinions in this respect unless they knew exactly the extent of the particular sale. He thought that the New Brunswick decision was, that whenever the real scope of regulations and powers entirely interfered and stopped the trade in that particular article, it was unconstitutional. Whether anything further than that had been decided he did not know; but he had never heard it suggested that this Parliament could not regulate the trade in alcoholic liquors, but of course they could not interfere with the local rights of the Local Legislatures.

Mr. BLAKE said he was supposed to have said that they could not delegate power to anybody; but what he had really said was that this Parliament could not delegate any of its legislative powers, except so far as administrative powers were concerned, and sometimes the line might be drawn so that they could not delegate these save to be properly executed by Ministerial officers.

Mr. PALMER: May I ask, whether this Parliament has any power to delegate exceptional legislative power, or not?

Mr. BLAKE: This Parliament has power to legislate, and to legislate touching things to be administered, and to make provision by law for the administration of affairs and the powers of the various administrators.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said, he took it that they had a right to pass a law stating that the manner of voting with regard to the Dunkin Act should be the same adopted for voting at the municipal elections in the Provinces, and in the manner adopted by the Provincial Legislatures, for any election they choose to name, as they had already done. They had delegated or given power to the Local Legislatures to say who should vote for members of this House.

Mr. BLAKE: No, no.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Yes, we have.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said they had declared that the persons who should so vote were those who voted for members of the Local Legislatures.

Mr. PALMER.

They had divested themselves of certain powers. The Local Legislatures might change, from day to day or year to year, this regulation without reference to this Parliament, and almost legislate them out of existence by adopting universal suffrage or raising the franchise very high. He knew his hon. friend would say they did not delegate this power, and perhaps they did not; but they could say that the manner of voting for this law should be the same as was adopted in certain other cases.

Mr. BLAKE: That is not what is proposed.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said they could change the resolution, and say that the manner of voting for this Act should be the same as was adopted for municipal or provincial elections; and this, in fact, would attain the object of the resolution. He agreed certainly that it would not be expedient, and, perhaps, not possible or right, for them to delegate their legislative powers, but they could prescribe the manner of voting.

Mr. BLAKE: That is to say, if the jurisdiction exists.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Assuming that we have jurisdiction at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE said another and very serious difficulty existed with regard to dealing with the Dunkin Act. Could they delegate their powers? He understood the right hon. member for Kingston to say that they could do what the Imperial Parliament had done, and add to the list of subjects concerning which the Local Legislatures were clothed with jurisdiction by the British North America Act, the subject of prohibition. The very statement of the proposal seemed to show that it was untenable. No doubt there was a general desire on the part of both those who opposed and favoured the Dunkin Act, that certain amendments in its provisions should be made. He had intended to propose a very important amendment—had it been clear that the House had jurisdiction on the subject—and this was to strike out the five-gallon clause, which allowed any merchant or trader without a license to sell liquor in quantities of five gallons or one dozen bottles, where the Dunkin Act was in force. Another amendment would be to increase the number of polling places as, in some municipalities only one poll at present existed, voting was rendered very difficult. People had to travel many miles to vote, in some cases fifteen or twenty, and he thought this might well be amended. Voting by ballot should also be adopted. These were all points of importance. The difficulty was to decide where the power of amendment lay. If they assumed that they had power to authorize it, why should they not do it themselves? The very fact that they could authorize another Legislature to do so, would presuppose that they had such power; and, if they possessed it, they ought not to shirk the responsibility or to transfer it. There were reasons for not doing so, and which rendered it inexpedient at the present time. These reasons were well known to members of the House. The proposal of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Robinson) implied that difficulties surrounded the question and did not relieve it of any.

Mr. ORTON said it was well known that the question of the adoption of the Dunkin Act was now causing a great deal of excitement. In many counties much ill-feeling was shown, and many County Councils had refused to submit the law to a vote, on the ground that in interest of fair play and of both classes, the bitter feeling existing between the respective parties should be removed. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would reconsider the question and be able to frame some form of motion, or devise other means by which this vexed question could be settled. If this could be done, a very great benefit would be conferred, and it would be well received throughout the country. As the Dominion Government had control over the portion of the Act which referred to the trade and commerce of the country, there was some way by which they could, by an expression of opinion, state that voting by ballot would not interfere with the trade and commerce of the country in reference to this particular subject; and it would then be

Mr. ROBINSON asked whether he had understood the Minister of Justice to say that the principle involved in this motion, as to the power of the House to delegate legislative powers to the Ontario or Quebec Legislatures, was one of the questions about to be argued before the Supreme Court, and that until it was decided one way or the other, he (Mr. Blake) would object to any motion containing any such principle.

Mr. BLAKE: I do not know how the hon. gentleman understood me; but I know that if he understood me in that way he misunderstood me entirely.

Mr. ROBINSON: I asked a civil question and I expected a civil answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hope the hon. gentleman does not wish to put it to a vote. The motion ought not to have been proposed at all.

Mr. ROBINSON: Under the circumstances I will withdraw the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

SPECIAL TARIFF FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for a return of all correspondence respecting a Special Tariff for the Province of British Columbia. He said that this subject had engaged the attention of the Legislature of the Province of British Columbia before they entered the Dominion, and since that period; and it was at the present moment under discussion. This subject, he believed, had gained a conquest even in this Parliament. The fact that the hon. member for Sunbury had seconded his motion, was an evidence of his belief that a special tariff for British Columbia was desirable. The people of that Province had never asked that a tariff should be imposed with a view to exclude the products or manufactures of any other Province or territory of the Dominion. They had always held that the produce and manufactures of one Province should freely pass into any other, as at present; but British Columbia was so remote from the Eastern Provinces, that there was a natural barrier to interchange of commodities. All that they had asked was that their tariff should be so modified that American products and cattle would be met with a heavier duty than now existed. When the Dominion Act was passed, the Legislature of the Province had the right to say whether they would accept the tariff of Canada or make their own. They rejected the existing tariff and accepted that of Canada, but it was done under a misapprehension. It was expected then that the national policy, inaugurated by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), would have been continued and the farming interests of the country would have been protected. Instead of giving such protection, however, the Canadian tariff had allowed American produce to come into competition with the section of the Province east of the Cascades, the representatives of which in the Local House voted to accept that tariff in the hope that they would be free from American competition. But what had been the fact? Between 10,000 and 11,000 sheep passed from Puget Sound to Victoria last year, 2,000 head of cattle, 1,000 horses, besides nearly 30,000 barrels of flour. The men behind the Cascades had for years been hoarding up their stocks in the hope of having an opportunity to make their fortunes. Up to a recent time stock-growing was one of the chief sources of profit among the farmers, but the competition of the Americans had destroyed this branch of their industry, and to day many men who were formerly wealthy were becoming embarrassed from this cause. He wished the correspondence brought down to the House and printed for the use of members. He was aware that last Session the hon. the Finance Minister declined to take this question into consideration, believing that it could not be done, and that the hon. gentleman had taken the same position this Session. He (Mr. DeCosmos) saw no reason why this Parliament could not delegate to the Local Legislature the right to make such a tariff as they deemed necessary, providing that they paid the same per capita tax as other portions of the Dominion.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was no objection to his hon. friend obtaining any correspondence existing on the subject, but, so far as he was aware, it was of a very limited character. The request was made by some of the authorities of British Columbia, but the Government had not yet seen their way to accepting the proposal made by those gentlemen. That was the substance of the correspondence.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he thought that, after examination was made, it would be found there was more correspondence than supposed. It extended from the time they entered the Union, up to the last Session.

Motion agreed to

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BOWELL moved for a return of all fees paid by the Government of Canada to, and the names of all Counsel, Solicitors or Attorneys employed in connection with the Royal Commission appointed to enquire into the affairs of the Northern Railway; also the names of all Counsel, Solicitors or Attorneys that have been employed at Toronto by the Dominion Government, or by any Department or Head of Department of said Government, and a statement of all fees paid to such persons by the Government for fees or service in connection with the business of the Government of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE said no fees had been paid to the Counsel, and, therefore, it was impossible to give a return of them. There was no objection to the other part of the motion.

Mr. BOWELL said, as he could not obtain the information desired, he would withdraw the motion and make it at another period.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

CANADA CENTRAL EXTENSION.

MOTION FOR ENGINEER'S REPORT.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) moved for the Engineer's Report of the Bonnechere and other possible routes of the Canada Central Extension.

Motion agreed to.

CHANGE OF MAIL ROUTE TO GRANVILLE, N.B.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. TUPPER moved for petitions and correspondence relating to the change made in the mail route between the Intercolonial Railway and Granville. He said the change had caused a great deal of trouble and annoyance to the people in that district. He desired more to call the attention of the Government to the matter than to obtain the papers.

Mr. MILLS said there could be no objection to the papers being brought down. Of course, the hon. gentleman was aware that the new arrangement was much less expensive than the old one.

Mr. TUPPER said by a parity of reasoning the Post Office Department would be done away with entirely.

Motion agreed to.

WINTER NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE moved for a Committee of the Whole on a resolution declaring it expedient that the Government should be advised to take proper steps to test the possibility of navigating the St. Lawrence from Quebec to the Gulf during the winter season.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READING.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 97) To amend the Act to incorporate the National Investment Company of Canada (Limited).—(Mr. Blain.)

Bill (No. 99) To amend the Act respecting the Canadian Engine and Machinery Company.—(Mr. Workman.)

NORTHERN RAILWAY OF CANADA BILL.—[BILL No. 62.]

(Mr. Macdonald, Toronto.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT, by command of His Excellency the Governor-General, acquainted the House that His Excellency having been informed of the purport of this Bill, gives his consent, as far as the interest of the Government is concerned, that the House may do therein as they may think fit. He remarked that, although the Government would assent to the Bill taking this stage, it should be understood that negotiations on the subject were not entirely concluded, and, therefore, the passing of this stage was not to be understood as at all compromising the claim the Government held against the railway.

Mr. OLIVER asked if the clause in the original charter of the Company, as to the control over the track, was in the Bill, or would be restored to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was under consideration.

Bill read the second time.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Mr. Schultz's proposed motion, "That in the opinion of this House a Prohibitory Liquor Law is the only effectual remedy for the evil of intemperance, and that it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable;” and the motion of Mr. Ross (West Middlesex) in amendment thereto, and which motion was:—“That all the words after ‘that’ in the original motion be expunged, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—‘Whereas grave doubts exists whether, under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1876, this House has the power to deal with the sale of intoxicating liquors, as a beverage; and

“Whereas the Court of Error and Appeal in the Province of Ontario has referred a case to the Supreme Court, whereby the relative jurisdiction of the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures over the liquor traffic will be argued;

“Be it therefore resolved, that this House, while not receding from any previous declaration on the importance of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, deems it inexpedient, under these circumstances at present, to express any opinion regarding the action to be taken by the Government in dealing with this question,” read.

Mr. DYMOND said he regretted having to address the House in the absence of the mover and seconder of the original motion, because the design of those gentlemen, and the appearance of one of them in the character of a champion of this movement, was a point to which he might feel it his duty very briefly again to allude. He would now, further, refer to one or two of the subjects to which he had alluded on a former occasion. He had ventured to remark then, that it did not appear to him any time was being lost in regard to the progress of Temperance legislation; that in all parts of the country the most active agitation was on foot; that in all directions the two parties, those who upheld the traffic in liquor under certain restrictions, and those who were desirous of imposing upon that traffic further restraints, were brought into collision with one another, and in Ontario the Temperance, or as it was popularly termed Dunkin Act, had been carried in Prince Edward, Lambton, Oxford, Brant, Lennox and Addington, Ontario and York; and in Quebec, in Argenteuil and Missisquoi, and there were isolated townships up and down both Provinces in which the Act was in force. The municipalities in which it had failed to be carried in Ontario were Peel, Haldimand, Frontenac, Kingston, Ottawa, and, he believed, Carleton.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Frontenac carried it.

Mr. DYMOND said he was very pleased to hear that. He was glad to put Frontenac for once, at all events, in such good company. He might further remark that there appeared to be every disposition to carry on this agitation in many counties where the question had not been raised, and he believed that if it were possible for this House or the Local Legislature to amend the Dunkin Act so that it might be more easily worked, they would find that it would be appealed to more frequently than it had been hitherto. Some of the objections to the present Act, and the difficulties to be overcome, had been alluded to in the course of the debate. The period for voting was a great deal too long. It would be far better that the system pursued at municipal elections generally were adopted in relation to a Temperance Act By-law. In one important township in the county of York, the township of York, the voting continued for something like six days, at a very large outlay of time and trouble. Regarding the restrictions upon the sale of liquor, he thought that those in earnest in regard to the Dunkin Act would be willing that further limitations should be imposed. As to the adoption of the vote by ballot he confessed he had a little doubt. Human nature was so weak that he had sometimes feared those who did not like to vote against what was universally acknowledged to be a great and crying evil, when they were compelled to go to the polls and openly register their names, might find a cover under the ballot for an adverse vote. The position was entirely distinct from that which existed in political elections. He confessed that the eagerness he had seen displayed for the ballot on the part of some persons—he would not say in this House, because then he would trespass on forbidden ground—but the eagerness displayed by persons who were not formerly interested in the ballot, and by those interested in the liquor traffic, showed that they at all events expected to gain from it; and as there was no principle involved in it, but simply a question of convenience, he confessed that he did not feel very sanguine as to its adoption in connection with the Dunkin Act. He desired once more to call the attention of the House to the charges thrown out against the leader of the Government in connection with temperance legislation. He had not at his disposal, when he last addressed the House, the report which he now held in his hand of the deputation which waited upon the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) a year ago, when Mr. Malcolm Cameron was led into a slight misunderstanding and used some expressions which did great injustice to the hon. gentleman. He found that the remarks of the hon. the First Minister were somewhat in this wise:

“Nothing would delight him more than to be the means of effecting the great moral reform which the deputation and the friends of prohibition desired by legislation or otherwise, but he would not be blind to such evidence as the increased consumption of liquors and other facts brought forward supplied, and could only act as the public opinion of the country would sustain him. He would be delighted, however, to receive suggestions from the Council and others on the subject and to give them the closest and most considerate attention.”

On the 31st October of the same year, the hon. gentleman was waited upon by another deputation, this time from Montreal. Referring to the previous deputation he said:

“I pointed out to a deputation from the temperance bodies last spring the political difficulties that existed. The operation of the existing law and the enactment of another law must necessarily depend very largely upon the amount of sympathy or opposition which it may receive from one or other of the great parties into which our political world is divided. As a member of the present Administration, I must simply endeavour to do what for the moment seems to be right, and just so far as we have the power legally and morally of carrying what is right and practicable into operation.”

He (Mr. Dymond) ventured to say that there was not in those expressions a single tinge of insincerity, but they were necessarily couched in that guarded language which a Minister of the Crown was pre-eminently bound to use when dealing with a subject upon which public opinion was admitted, even by its most strenuous advocates, to be at the moment unripe. There was not a member of this House who believed that if a prohibition measure was passed at that moment, it would be effectually sustained by the public opinion and legal power of the country. He did not believe there was any one there prepared at the present time to say, that even if the Government themselves came down with a measure, it would be likely to be so effectual as it probably would be if deferred for a considerable period longer or shorter, the opportunity being taken, in the meantime, to avail of such legislation as they now had at command. The speech delivered by the seconder of the motion (Mr. Farrow) was a political speech. It assumed the form of a political attack by a strong political opponent against hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House. He (Mr. Dymond) considered that the introduction of politics into the question was greatly to be deprecated. There had been no attempt on the part of his hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who might be said to be the leader of the movement in the House, or on the part of any temperance organization to isolate itself from the parties of the day, or to set men of one political party against those of another in that matter. When some hon. gentlemen two years ago met together in one of the Committee rooms to concert measures to carry on this movement, they were honoured by the presence of the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow), and he (Mr. Dymond) held in his hand a document addressed to the friends of the Prohibitory Liquor Law agitation, and sent widely through the country, referring more particularly to the Convention about to be held in Montreal, and there he found in common with the name of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) and many other members who supported the Government in that House, the name of the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow). So far then there was no occasion on the hon. gentleman's part to complain that his services had not been welcomed by those who favoured the Prohibitory Liquor Law movement on the Government side of the House. And why, because he was impelled by a desire to second the motion of the member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) and run a little ahead of those who had as much experience on that question, or stood before the country in regard to it in the position of his hon. friend from West Middlesex, he should suppose they were all insincere and agitating it as a piece of political machinery, it was not necessary for him (Mr. Dymond) to attempt to show. The inference might be left to be worked out in the mind of everybody who had taken the matter into consideration. If the Reformers were forced to take up the question as a political party, they had nothing to fear for the result. Throughout the country, the Temperance cause and Reformers were, to a considerable extent identified. A great many Conservatives, like the hon. member for North Huron and some hon. Senators on the same side in politics, were and long had been identified with the Temperance cause; but it could not be denied that so far as the liquor traffic and the agitation against the Dunkin Bill were concerned, the great majority of its opponents were Conservatives. He had an illustration of that fact in his possession. The Ontario Government had recently been engaged in enacting very stringent License Law legislation, and it was to the honour of the Reform Party that the first Government that ever fairly grappled with this subject, and carried and enforced without fear or favour, an effectual License Law, was a Reform Government. It was alleged that in the operation of the Licensing Act, favouritism to the Reformers had been shown, and the Government, through the Provincial Secretary, ordered the License Inspectors to ascertain what were the politics of the persons who had applied for licenses. It was then found that last year 2,017 Conservatives and 852 Reformers had applied for and received tavern licenses, while the respective number of unsuccessful applicants was, Conservatives, 758; and Reformers, 316; the proportion of refusals being rather in favour of the former. The total number of applicants was—Conservatives, 2,775, and Reformers, 1,168. Of shop licenses, Conservatives received 511, and the Reformers 264, while the refusals numbered—Conservatives, 103, and Reformers, 62. Total number of applicants—Conservatives, 614, and Reformers, 326. This return was the more significant when they remembered that the overwhelming majority of the people of Ontario was composed of Reformers—a fact demonstrated by their representation in the Dominion and Local Houses. He had, however, another evidence of the reliance placed by hon. gentlemen opposite on what might be termed the partnership or confederacy existing between those hon. gentlemen and the liquor selling interest. Some time since an election trial took place at Kingston, and there, as unfortunately in most of those cases, the questions of treating and of the use of taverns came up; and he found the right hon. member for Kingston, who was the respondent on that occasion, giving his evidence with the greatest possible frankness and making the remark:—"Every tavern-keeper is a little power in his own locality; it is very good support to get the publican interest." It was not very often that people threw away what they felt to be a very good thing, and it must be a great consolation to hon. gentlemen opposite to find that, even under the auspices of a Reform Government, they had still left to themselves the vast majority of the liquor sellers of the Province of Ontario, and that, therefore, they would receive that "very good support" which their leader had approved.

Mr. BOWELL: Is that practice ever followed by Reform candidates?

Mr. DYMOND: Unfortunately, they sometimes follow where Conservatives lead. It would be a good thing if no bad example were set them.

Mr. BOWELL: Will you point to the instance where Reformers took people after church to taverns and treated them on Sunday? If we are to have distinctions and inferences drawn between parties regarding the liquor traffic, we may as well bring it home.

Mr. DYMOND said he made no charge against any gentleman in that respect. He had merely quoted public statistics regarding the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, who had attacked members of the Government and their friends in the House. He did not believe that a Reformer was more sober, personally, than a Conservative; nor was he one of those persons who would go to a public hotel and slander some unfortunate gentleman who might profess temperance principles, but who happened to have a bottle of claret before him, in obedience to the Apostolic injunction, to take a little wine for the stomach's sake.

Mr. BOWELL: Does the hon. gentleman mean to insinuate that I did so—because as to the remark I just made, if the hon. gentleman desires, I have no objection to make it personal. I had no reference whatever, either directly or indirectly, to the case to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. DYMOND said he was quite aware of that. He had only ventured on an illustration of the folly and injustice of calling attention to matters which certainly ought to be questions of honour between themselves.

Mr. BOWELL: The case to which I called the hon. gentleman's attention came out on trial before the Courts. There was nothing in it of a private character.

Mr. DYMOND said that, with the exception of Frontenac, every county that had carried the Dunkin Act was represented by Reformers in the House. He alluded to Ontario. One constituency, Missisquoi, which had carried the law in Quebec, was represented by a gentleman with whose politics he was not familiar. Neither to find those who were sent out to oppose the Dunkin Act would any one go to the headquarters of the Reform Association. The missionary opposition to the law certainly consisted of Conservatives. He was aware that some Reformers opposed the Dunkin Act, either because it went too far or did not go far enough. In his own Riding some earnest temperance men considered that it might be a barrier to a more comprehensive measure. In the Counties of Waterloo, Haldimand and Peel, one of the most trusted agents and confidential fidetial lieutenants of hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. E. King Dodds, who was well known in Ontario, was regularly retained in the liquor-selling interest. He (Mr. Dymond) was opposed to the introduction of the political element into this controversy. He had only wished to show that, if it were made a party question, the Reformers had nothing to fear. It would be worse than useless for them to pass a law of the constitutionality of which eminent men amongst them were now altogether doubtful. He had heard his hon. friend (Mr. Ross, Middlesex) assailed in that city by ardent temperance men who thought he was lagging behind because he was not prepared to propose prohibitory legislation in that Parliament. A couple of years ago this question was before them, and he (Mr. Dymond) had then said, he would never vote again on a mere declaratory motion. Whenever they had to deal with the subject—and that he did not doubt would be the case at no distant day—they must do so as a matter of practical legislation. He did not believe that the difficulties, provided public opinion was ripe for it, would be so great in the way of such legislation as many believed. An enormous accession to the revenue from dutiable goods would take place when a Prohibitory Law was passed, for then a general impetus would be given to what they might call legitimate traffic in the absence of the trade to which he had alluded, and a large saving would be effected in the case of the administration of justice, for no one doubted the intimate relations existing between the liquor traffic and crime. The whole country would also be a moral and social gainer, and the loss of four, five or six millions of revenue, which would take place in the first instance, would be wholly or partially recouped to the Treasury. At all events, there could be no doubt if there were a public opinion thoroughly favourable to the passing of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, it would sustain the Government in laying on such taxes as might be necessary to recoup to the Treasury any portion of the revenue lost by it.

Mr. McNAB said he desired, as one who had advocated the passage of a Prohibitory Liquor Law for a number of years, to give his reasons why he had seconded the amendment. During some years of municipal life, he had endeavoured in his official position to throw around the liquor traffic all possible restrictions; and he was not receding in the slightest from his belief that such a law would be the best remedy for this great evil. His reason for seconding the amendment was this: He believed it was in the interest of this great question, that this amendment should now be proposed. The motion ought not to be pressed upon the House at an unfavourable period; it ought not to be brought forward when the House had no reason to expect that it would be favourably entertained. The circumstances were most unfavourable. He had no right to impugn the motives of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz), but the hon. gent. was making a very great mistake in now pressing this question. A defeat was inevitable, and this would be injurious in a very great degree to the temperance cause. The judicial mind of the Dominion was very much divided on the question of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia had declared that this lay in the Local Legislatures, and the Court in New Brunswick had decided that it lay in this Parliament; and high legal gentlemen in Ontario and in the House had great doubts in this relation. Under these circumstances the motion should not have been brought before the House, as hon. gentlemen who entertained these views conscientiously though warm advocates of the measure, were obliged to oppose it. It was to be regretted that one hon. gentleman should attach so much importance to a party triumph. He entertained very strong opinions on this question, and he regretted very much indeed that it should be at all mixed up with party matters. The foremost advocates of the measure throughout the country had agreed that the course pursued by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) was a wise one; and they owed him a debt of gratitude for his consistent and able advocacy of temperance principles. When the jurisdiction question was settled by the Supreme Court, and when the temperance people considered the time had arrived for the pressing of this great measure, he promised his hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) that he would support such a resolution as he had proposed.

Mr. CHRISTIE said he would not occupy the time of the House at any length; he simply wished in a few words to express his views on this, the most important question now before the country. The county he had the honour to represent had passed the Dunkin Act by a large majority, and they desired that the Temperance Act should be amended, that further provision should be made for the enforcement of that measure, and that it should be extended over the whole Dominion. He quite concurred in that desire, and was prepared to give his hearty support to any measure which would effect that result. The decision given by several of the Judges in the Province of Quebec had led them to believe that the question of jurisdiction was well nigh settled; but subsequent events had proved that a very great diversity of opinion still existed among legal minds as to where the jurisdiction really lay. The comparatively recent decision of the Superior Court of Nova Scotia appeared to establish the right of the Provincial Governments to deal with this question. Under these circumstances it was certainly desirable, perhaps he should say it was absolutely necessary, that they should get the decision of the Supreme Court upon this point; and, as there was now a case pending before that Court, which, in all probability, would settle the question of jurisdiction at an early day, he thought the wisest course would be to wait for that decision. He was aware that any delay, even that of a few months, would be a cause of great disappointment to many of his friends. It was a great disappointment to himself, as he expected and desired that some legislation would have taken place this Session; but they must bow to the inevitable, and it might be that this unavoidable delay would tend to the furtherance of the temperance cause. A very considerable number of constituencies having passed the Dunkin Act, they would know by experience what amendments were necessary to secure the more efficient working of that Act, and he hoped that they would be in a position next Session of Parliament to carry out such amendments or to introduce a local Option Act for the whole Dominion. He quite agreed with the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) that it was desirable to move slowly and surely, but, at the same time, they should move steadily forward. This question should be taken up and dealt with, so far as might be practicable, at the earliest moment, and they should not allow another Session to pass without the introduction of some practical measure which could be adopted by the House and endorsed by the country. He would record his vote in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member from West Middlesex, who, he believed, was the recognized leader of the temperance movement in this House. That hon. gentleman was a true, consistent temperance man, one who had enacted a Prohibitory Law for himself. He had fought the battles of temperance nobly in the past, and was still entitled to the confidence of the temperance men in this House and throughout the Dominion.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) said this matter of prohibition was something which should not be approached from a Conservative or Reform standpoint, but be considered on broader principles. If hon. members were sincere in their desire for a Prohibitory Law, they should not refuse the support of anyone, no matter what his politics were. He claimed that the Government had a right to state whether they were favourable or opposed to this measure. If the hon. the Premier would treat the matter in a statesman-like way, he had no doubt a great deal of good would be effected. It was a well-known fact that the hon. member for West Middlesex claimed to be the leader of the great temperance party, and that the hon. member for North York presided at temperance meetings, advocated prohibition, and, he believed, indulged in temperance in every shape and manner. He supposed, in fact, that the latter was a gentleman who would neither "touch, taste, nor handle the unclean thing." It would be a good thing if the Governor General followed the example set by Her Majesty Queen Victoria and the Lieut.-Gov. of New Brunswick, who would not allow a drop of liquor to enter his house. It would also be a good thing for the hon. the First Minister to adopt the same course. The whole Government of Canada seemed to encourage the sale of liquor, on account of the revenue derived therefrom. It would be unfair to stop the business of the distillers, brewers, and saloon-keepers without indemnifying them to a certain extent. In numerous parts of Upper and Lower Canada, the Dunkin Act had been carried, but that had not the effect of stopping the traffic; it was sold in low grogeries, where the worst kind of morality was encouraged. He would ask the hon. member for Prince Edward if there was not just as much liquor sold in his town, where he resided, now, as before the adoption of the Dunkin Act? In a village in East Hastings, where he believed there was as good, industrious, and generous a people as any in the country, the Dunkin Act was adopted; but it was admitted by every temperance man in the village that just as much liquor was used after as before its passage. The hon. member for West Middlesex, when this amendment first came up, kept going from one Minister to the other, and the House must have come to the conclusion that he was dodging the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order. He has no right to say the hon. member was dodging the question.

Mr. WHITE: I will withdraw the "dodging" expression and say avoiding the question. Prohibition would never be carried by such methods; it must have the support of members of both parties and be accepted by the country.

Of course, the hon. member for North York was a temperance man, sound in every respect; he wished he was as temperate as that hon. gentleman. Every one was not like that hon. gentleman, of whom it was said, however, that he liked his "drop" as well as other people. If the temperance people knew how hon. members stood on this question they would know what course to pursue. For himself, he would support a proposition to submit the question to the people, because he believed they should have the right of deciding this question. He thought hon. members on the Ministerial side had forgotten the pledges they gave before election, for then they pledged themselves that when they came into power they would support such a law; but in this, as in other questions, they had signally failed in carrying out their promises. He believed that the House should decide in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said this was a question which involved changes of the most radical character, and should be considered with the greatest deliberation and caution. Hasty legislation might have the effect of throwing it back for many years. In 1855, a Prohibitory Law was passed in New Brunswick, and the experience there ought to be a warning to the House not to be too hasty in enacting laws in advance of public opinion. He believed, however, that a Prohibitory Liquor Law would do incalculable benefit. It would, of course, involve many sacrifices, but he believed hon. members and a large number of people would willingly make them. If it were necessary in order to obtain a Prohibitory Liquor Law, he would be willing to sacrifice both the Government and the Opposition. At the same time he could scarcely see the utility of making an attempt when they were satisfied that the country was not in a position to carry it out. In the first place, as had been well said by the hon. the mover of the amendment, the conditional question as to the jurisdictions of the Local and Federal Governments was not yet settled. When this question was decided he was prepared to vote for a Prohibitory Liquor Law, no matter what the consequences were. But he did not think any Prohibitory Liquor Law should be put into operation at once. Some notice should be given, in order that parties who had invested money in the sale, manufacture or importation of liquor, might have an opportunity to clear off their stock and prepare themselves for the coming change. The question should also be submitted to the people. When the matter was taken out of the arena of politics, and the people affirmed their acquiescence in the matter by a direct vote, he was willing to put the law upon the Statute-book. He was not prepared to vote for the proposition of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz), but would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross).

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said Prince Edward County had always set a good example to the other counties of the Dominion. For the last eighteen months there had not been so much drinking there as before the Dunkin Act came into force. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) said he knew there had been. But he (Mr. Ross) would say there was not. He believed there never was a county in the Dominion more noted for sobriety, and especially now. A very large vote, 3,400, was taken, and, although the battle was fought perhaps more severely than any which had been fought for many years, the majority was 247. Whenever there was a Prohibitory Bill brought up in the House, he would support it. With regard to the motions before the House, he thought the amendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex was the more honest, and he would be glad to support it.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) explained that he had said that the sale of intoxicating liquors had not been entirely stopped in Prince Edward County. He would ask the hon. member whether a good deal was not still sold?

Mr. ROSS said not to his knowledge. He hoped other counties would follow the example of his county.

Mr. OLIVER said, in his remarks, he desired more particularly to reply to the observations of the hon. member for North York. That hon. member and the hon. member for Sunbury had defeated the open system of voting on the Dunkin Bill. The county which he (Mr. Oliver) represented had recently gone through a contest of this description, and had carried it by a very considerable majority. In particular sections, influences were used, on both sides, in open voting on the Dunkin Act, which required the ballot to counteract. All other elections, both Parliamentary and municipal, were by the ballot. That system had been adopted by the people of Canada, and the Dunkin Act, as well as all other elections, should be under it; in fact it was more important in this than in anything else. His hon. friend from North York had said that the Conservatives in his county were opposed to the Dunkin Act. In his (Mr. Oliver's) county, there was one Conservative township which gave a large majority in favour of the Dunkin Act; and two of the strongest advocates of that cause in his county were Conservatives, they not confining their labours to their own county, but extending them to the counties of Ontario and North York. He desired to keep this question apart from political feeling. He, therefore, regretted that the hon. member who had seconded the motion of the hon. member for Lisgar, had indulged in a strong political speech, condemning the Government and his hon. friend from West Middlesex for not immediately passing this Act. He agreed, most cordially, with his hon. friend from North York that there had been a great change in public opinion on this question. You could not go into any part of Canada but what you found parties who had formerly been strongly opposed to the measure were now its strongest advocates. One of the strongest advocates of prohibition in the House, was, until very recently, engaged in the traffic himself.

Mr. BOWELL: He has seen the evils of it, I suppose.

Mr. OLIVER said that was one of the signs of the times. He was rather amused at his hon. friend from North Hastings appearing very anxious for the passage of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, when he had asserted that in the counties where the Dunkin Act had been passed there was more liquor sold than previously. So, according to this, if a Prohibitory Liquor Law was passed, there would be more liquor sold than at the present time. But there were difficulties to contend with in the passing of this Act. One was in reference to vested rights. He was not going to express his opinion upon it, but it was a subject worthy the serious consideration of the House, as to whether parties who had put a large amount of money in the business should be remunerated for the losses they must inevitably sustain if a Prohibitory Liquor Law was passed. This was one of the difficulties with regard to the Dunkin Act. Another great difficulty was that of smuggling. If a prohibitory liquor law was passed there would be smuggling on an extensive scale. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had stated that, as it was, there was a large amount of smuggling, and it would be seen by the public press that illicit stills were seized at various times in various parts of the country. If the legitimate trade was suppressed it would encourage illicit distillation as well as smuggling. It was of the utmost importance that the public should be prepared for the passing of an Act of this kind in order that they might be prepared to assist the authorities in carrying it into effect. When the proper time came, and the question of jurisdiction was settled, he would be prepared to vote for a Prohibitory Liquor Law, as he would be for an improved Permissive Bill. He thought the latter ought to be passed, as its operation would give the Government an idea whether a Prohibitory Liquor Law could be carried out or not. It was his intention to vote for the motion of the hon. member for West Middlesex.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said there were one or two things which he regretted had been introduced into the discussion. He regretted, for instance, the attempt which had been made to cast reflections upon the hon. member for West Middlesex. He thought that gentleman was entitled to a very great deal of credit for the part he had taken in the matter of temperance. He regretted, on the other hand the remarks made as to Conservatives or Reformers in this discussion, and the attempt made to show from papers and tables the number of men who applied for licenses that were Conservatives or Reformers. His own impression was that outside of this House the remarks would be regarded as bids for votes. He thought the matter of temperance would have been immensely promoted if it had been looked at altogether apart from politics.

Mr. DYMOND: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. member says "hear, hear," and yet he introduced it himself.

Mr. DYMOND: Possibly the hon. member was not in the House when this question originated. I deprecate as strongly as he does the introduction of politics into this question, and I only took the line I did because this principle was departed from by the hon. member who seconded the motion. I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver); but, if this question was to be made a political one, I was determined that it should be shown on which side was the better record.

Mr. MACDONALD said he had hesitation in stating his own opinion as to the difficulties which surrounded this question. It was, to his mind, a matter of very grave doubt whether the passage of a Prohibitory Act to-day would secure the advance of the temperance cause. Every reader of history knew that the enforced piety, if that was not a paradox, of the period of the Commonwealth was followed by the licentiousness of the reign of Charles. And he maintained that the steady example of one man who through his life abstained from intoxicating liquor for the benefit of the rest, was better than 10,000 men who did not drink liquor because they could not get it. In the matter of prohibition, it required no little resolution in a day like this for a man to dare to be singular when that beverage was handed about so freely. It required more fortitude for a man now to put it away from his table than it would if, by an Act of Parliament, every man was obliged to appear an abstainer, while not so in principle. He wanted to glance at one or two of the difficulties connected with the object. There was, first, the simple question of vested rights. The Government was obtaining revenue year after year for those who had invested large sums of money in plant connected with their business. He admitted that the traffic was bad from beginning to end; but the Government had recognized it. He maintained that, by a reasonable and fair view, they could not by an Act sweep away the capital invested without making some provision for compensation. When men had wares to sell they displayed them wisely and well. In the case of saloons he could almost fancy he saw written over the door: "He leaves all hopes behind who enters here." Another objection to a Prohibitory Law was the displacement of revenue which would ensue. He thought the people should be consistent. He was often spoken to in regard to prohibition, and he asked his interlocutors in what way they would make up the six millions of revenue which would be displaced. Hon. gentlemen said out of manufactures. That was another objection. But to his mind the most serious objection lay in the amount of smuggling, deceit and fraud which would follow the enactment of a Prohibitory Law—an amount of evil perhaps almost as great as the law would prevent. There was, however, a Prohibitory Law which they could all adopt. Every hon. member in this House could tomorrow morning pledge to become an abstainer. If they really were consistent let them cease talking about Conservatives and Reformers, but become pledged abstainers, and he would venture to say that the effect of such action would be felt throughout the entire Dominion, and would make this one of the most successful Sessions of Parliament ever held in Canada. Then, he thought, there was a great deal too much said about what Parliament was expected to do. Were there no other agencies which should speak out? Should not the Press speak out on the question? Did they not know that wherever a temperance paper was started it had only a poor, sickly life for a very short time, and then died a natural death? Why did not the Reform and Conservative Press throughout the country speak out on the question? That would afford the best evidence of what Reformers and Conservatives felt in regard to it. Then let the pulpits speak out; let every Christian man and woman throughout the land banish alcoholic drinks from their tables. An immense advance had been made in the temperance cause. Any one who was in Parliament thirteen or fourteen years ago—there were only thirteen or fourteen in the House—would agree that there was an immense improvement in the House as compared with the legislative body of that time. He had great hope for the temperance cause, but he liked to speak plainly in regard to it. If he were allowed to refer to a private matter for a moment, he would mention that a deputation expressed a desire to wait upon him before the day of his nomination. They said they would only vote for a man who would vote for prohibition pure and simple. "Then," he said, "don't vote for me." As the matter of prohibition progressed, the question of vested rights must be considered, and a scheme propounded for providing the amount of revenue that would be displaced. He held that that was the only fair and square way to meet the question on either side of the House. He was not afraid to say he was a temperance man, one who had rigidly abstained; and he was glad to see the cause advancing.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he desired to say a few words on this question. The hon. gentleman who had moved the resolution, he believed had moved it prematurely, and he quite approved of the resolution of his hon. friend the member for Middlesex. The seconder of the resolution had alluded to a report of a conversation which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had had with Mr. Knowlton regarding the course the Government would pursue. He had only to say that Mr. Knowlton had denied that statement over his own hand, and had given a corrected statement of what took place between them. The House knew he had been in favour of a Prohibitory Liquor Law for 30 years. It was nearly 30 years since he gave utterance to these views on the public platform, when few men, either in public or private life, gave utterance to similar views on this question. He always held, however, that it was useless to give legislation on this or any other question until the public was ready for it. He quite admitted that public men of standing and ability might lead the public mind to a considerable extent. To legislate in advance of public opinion was merely to produce anarchy instead of maintaining law and order. He did not believe that public opinion was ripe for a Prohibitory Liquor Law, even if the power was located. He believed a great advance had been made towards it, and the mere fact that a Prohibitory Law had been voted upon and practically carried in many counties,—though in many large counties, notably his own, by narrow majorities,—proved a willingness on the part of a very large proportion of our population, if not of a majority, to have such legislation as that. He quite admitted that ordinary political life, ordinary political affairs, and ordinary political questions, were quite secondary to a question of such vast importance as would be produced by a reform in the drinking habits of the country. But abundant evidence was furnished in the shape of the Inland Revenue returns, in the figures presented every year, that, while there had been more intelligent appreciation on the part of the public generally of the views of temperance men, and a nearer approach to that state of public opinion which would justify a not very remote Legislature in enacting a somewhat stringent measure in that direction, it was quite evident from these returns that the drinking habits of the people had not to any extent been affected as to the quantity used, by the agitation which had prevailed and been useful in its way. There was more ardent spirit consumed this moment than ten years ago. It was quite true that there had been a diminution in the amount last year. Whether this resulted from an improved public opinion, from the greater advance of temperance views with the people generally, or produced to some or the entire extent by the inability to purchase as compared with former years, he would not venture to say. They could hope for the best, though personally he thought it was partially due to those reasons. He could only say in such matters that it was not desirable to have it made a political foot-ball. He did not believe that any of his friends, certainly not himself, were seeking to make a political foot-ball out of the question for the benefit of their own party. He was bound to take a fair and reasonable view of the difficulties in the way, and believed at this moment, if the Legislature had the power and in the exercise of that power should enact a Prohibitory Liquor Law, it would be impossible with the support which was to be obtained at present from public opinion, to carry it practically into effect. He believed they would run great danger of vastly increasing the opportunities for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, instead of having it controlled by some sort of licence system as at present. Any backward step in this movement would be a fatal calamity to the prosperity of the temperance cause and of the country generally. On the other hand, the revenue difficulty raised by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) would have to be met. No doubt, as had been stated, if, by passing a Prohibitory Law you could compel people to avoid spending their money in the consumption of ardent spirits, and spend more for the necessaries and luxuries of life, it must necessarily result in increasing the revenue from Customs, and otherwise promoting the prosperity of the people by making them better able to pay taxes from some other source. At the same time, it must be remembered that they derived nearly one-fourth of the revenue from Excise, and they would have to face the responsibility of imposing some sort of direct taxation, for some years at least, in order to make up the deficit caused by such a law as this. It might be stated, and with a good deal of reason, that they should let no revenue considerations interfere with what would prove a great moral reformation in the country. He was bound to admit that that should have due weight. He would not be the last to recognize its force when they came to deal with the subject at close quarters. They would have to decide on the course to be recommended by Parliament to pursue. In the meantime, it was quite clear that the motion indicated by the hon. member for Lisgar was premature, and could serve no purpose. It might embarrass the Government a little if the House should declare it to be the duty of the Government to do what they believed it was not their duty to do; but he did not believe that the House was of opinion that the Government should at the present moment do what the hon. gentleman indicated. After the argument advanced by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, he believed there would be no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the amendment made by his hon. friend, the member for West Middlesex, was the one which should have their confidence and support.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had taken a very wise course in making the declaration which he had done, as the statement would no doubt dissipate the idea which was entertained to some extent, and had found expression in the Press, that the hon. the Premier was in favour of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. The hon. gentleman had just told them that he was not in favour of it; he was opposed to it. Although, he thought, the hon. gentleman said he was in favour of a Prohibitory Liquor Law thirty years ago, he was opposed to it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am as much in favour of it as ever.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then it follows that you never were in favour of it, for you are opposed to it now. The Premier thought the time had not yet come for such a law, that the public mind was not sufficiently educated up to it, and if the House was quite ready to pass the law by a majority, yet he (Mr. Mackenzie) himself would not be in favour of it, as it could not be enforced and would be of no service. For his part he agreed that it would be wrong to pass a law which the people would not obey. But he could not vote for the amendment for two reasons. First, it expressed a doubt as to the power of the House to legislate on the question. He had no doubt whatever that the House had such power, and he believed that the Supreme Court would so decide when the case was laid before the tribunal. But there was another proposition in the amendment, "that this House, while not receding from the opinion expressed in favour of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, deemed it expedient," and so on. Now the House had never taken any step towards prohibitory legislation, and therefore it could not recede from a position it had never taken. It was true there had been a Committee and a report, but the report was never adopted by this House. The House had never been asked to concur in it—never had concurred in it, and had never taken any steps on it; therefore, it was a recital which was not true as a matter of fact. They could not recite any such previous declaration. On these two grounds, in first place, because they had power to legislate, and, in the second place, because the statement was not borne out by the facts, as shown by the Journals of the House, he must vote against the amendment.

Mr. APPLEBY said he thought this the most important question that had ever come before the House. Being a moral question, affecting life, property and social happiness, it was far superior to such matters as trade, commerce and finance. He had long been associated with the temperance reform, and he believed that the only sure remedy for the existing evils of intemperance was the enactment of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. The aspect presented by the debate was peculiar. The Premier told them he had been for thirty years, and was still, in favour of such a law, but thought it unwise to legislate in advance of public opinion. He hardly agreed with the hon. gentleman on this point. The right hon. member for Kingston had criticized the position of the First Minister, and had, he thought, unfairly attempted to interpret that hon. gentleman's language by giving it a meaning that the hon. gentleman did not intend to convey; but the right hon. gentleman sat down without telling them what his views and opinions on the question were. He believed that such a law was of the first importance to the country. Aside from party politics, he was bound to unite with that party, whatever its shade or stripe might be, which honestly would endeavour to pass such a law. The right hon. gentleman was an old politician and statesman, who had been in the field for thirty years, and his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) opinions on this subject, as on every other, were well formed and established. He asked the hon. gentleman to tell the House and country what his views on this question were. He would not let the hon. gentleman escape; and if the hon. gentleman would inform the House that he was in favor of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, and that as soon as he crossed the House and took a seat on the Treasury Benches, which the hon. gentleman expected to do at an early day, he would introduce such a law, he (Mr. Appleby) would pledge to the hon. gentleman his honest support, forgiving the hon. gentleman the many political offences he had committed, as he was prepared, under such circumstances, to forgive him (Sir John A. Macdonald) the many faults he would probably commit, as any Government necessarily did in the administration of public affairs. The right hon. gentleman had acted most unfairly in trifling with the House as he had done. One of the first things he (Mr. Appleby) and the people he had the honour to represent, had in view, was the passage of such a law. He had associated himself in the House with temperance men, and after frequent discussions, they had agreed it would be better to wait until the question of jurisdiction was finally settled, before they should press on the Government the great importance of introducing this measure, when lo! and behold, almost at the eleventh hour, the hon. member for Lisgar made this motion. The hon. mover, at the same time, told them that he (Mr. Schultz) had never been connected with the work of temperance reform; and it was, consequently, astonishing that this hon. gentleman, of all the hon. members, should have introduced this question. He had no doubt as to the matter of jurisdiction, but when it was settled beyond dispute, he would associate himself with the party which was prepared to introduce a Prohibitory Liquor Law. He again called upon the right hon. gentleman to express at once his views on this question.

Mr. FARROW said the Premier had stated that he had misquoted the hon. gentleman. He asked the Premier to set him and the House right in the matter. He would read the words over again, as to the interview the Premier had with Mr. Knowlton at the Queen's Hotel. His words were these:—

“Mr. Knowlton, about half-past eight o'clock, entered the hall and said: ‘Grand Worthy Chief Templar, I have a very important communication to make to this Grand Lodge. I have just come from the Queen's Hotel, where I have had an interview with the Premier, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, and he assures me that he is strong for prohibition; and that if we will only back him up by plenty of petitions, he will do his best; and he will do his utmost to have enacted, as speedily as possible, a Prohibitory Liquor Law. He also assures me that he is a strong temperance man, and a Good Templar; and that, were it not for pressing engagements elsewhere, he (the Premier) would be with us to-night.’”

He did not ask in an impertinent way, but earnestly, to be set right on this point. He paused for a reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have already stated what were my views to the House. I have never stated my views anywhere else. I could not have said that I was a Good Templar, because I never was; and I could not have gone to that meeting, because I had no business in other people's houses.

Mr. FARROW: And you did not state what is here said?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; I never stated that.

Mr. FARROW denied that he had made of this matter a political question. All he had said was that the Premier ought not to have led temperance people to believe he desired to introduce a Prohibitory Liquor Law. Whatever the hon. gentleman had said to Mr. Knowlton, the words he had quoted were said by Mr. Knowlton in the Grand Temple, then assembled. The hon. member for North York had said that the late lamented Mr. Cameron had been misled, or he (Mr. Cameron) never would have said what he did at the meeting on the 12th March, 1875. He believed he could say distinctly and positively that the late Mr. Cameron knew what he stated at the time. This was the last temperance speech the lamented gentleman had ever made, and he believed that he (Mr. Cameron) had never spoken more earnestly to the question than he then did. He now asked the hon. member for West Middlesex, if he (M. Ross) was at that meeting. The hon. gentleman was there, and what did the hon. gentleman in coming out from it say to a friend. He wanted the House and country to know. The hon. member then said:—

“I see clearly that some one has got to be hurt with this question of prohibition before it is through with, and I will take good care that it shall not be I.”

What did the hon. gentleman say to this? He thought that the hon. gentleman had taken most excellent care that “it shall not be I.” The hon. gentleman's whole manœuvring at the Montreal Convention had been “it shall not be I.” What consolation had the hon. member received this night from his chiefs? What did the hon. gentleman's amendment say? It asked for time. This was reasonable; all the hon. gentleman asked for was a few months. He (Mr. Ross, Middlesex) declared that they must come to some conclusion shortly, and before the next Session. Was this what the hon. gentleman really meant? Did he understand that the hon. gentleman would move in the matter next Session? The hon. gentleman's leader, however, said he (Mr. Mackenzie) had had this question at heart for thirty years, and that he saw no signs favourable to the passage of such a law yet. He would judge from his remarks that the hon. gentleman would not propose such a law for another thirty years. The hon. gentleman from West Middlesex appeared to be a great admirer of the Dunkin Act. He (Mr. Farrow) was not. He thought that this law was onesided. He ardently and earnestly desired prohibition for the whole country, but the hon. member seemed to be in love with this Act. It had been on the Statute-book for 13 years, and why had not the hon. gentleman thought of it before, if it was such a very good thing. Why had not the hon. gentleman submitted this law in West Middlesex? The hon. gentleman was evidently determined that whoever should be hurt—"it should not be I." This was the hon. gentleman's motto. The hon. gentleman had stated the other day that he had the endorsement of all temperance men and organizations for his course; but the hon. gentleman had not had the earnest endorsement of Hon. Mr. Cameron. Mr. McNaughton, of Cobourg had published the following statement in the Temperance Advocate:—

"I charge the Government with eluding, tampering with, postponing, and in any and in every way, by their organs and their hired defenders, evading the issue of temperance. I am sorry to say these words. I am a Reformer and have never given a Conservative vote; but I do love this cause yet more, and I am very anxious that our party in the House of Commons should do better than in the Ontario Legislature."

This gentleman's opinions were worth something as well as those of the Hon. Malcolm Cameron. He wished to call attention to what the Rev. A. A. Cameron, a well-known clergyman of Ottawa, thought of the Montreal Convention. In a letter written to an earnest temperance worker, in May, 1876, the rev. gentleman said:

"I am perfectly convinced that we have been completely sold by the Montreal Convention leaders."

This was written several months after the Convention was held. The Rev. Mr. Cameron was not only a very reliable Reformer, but also a great friend, he believed, of the hon. member for West Middlesex. He had given reasons, with these proofs, for saying what he had the other day on this question. His complaint then and now was, and should be, that, until the hon. gentlemen in question showed more earnestness in dealing with this matter, they were unworthy of support. These hon. gentlemen, at the general elections in 1873, had made professions which had never been fulfilled to the country, and which, to all appearances, were hollow. Every time they were desired to walk up to the mark, they ran back. How was the Premier to know when the country desired prohibition? How many petitions were required? If the hon. gentleman waited until every one consented to it, they would never have prohibition, and this the hon. member for West Middlesex knew. Having gone to the expense of sending a Commission to Maine to ascertain how the law worked, and having received a favourable report, he thought the Government ought to have done something. He hoped the question would not be viewed in a party light, but that all true friends of the cause would support a prohibitory measure.

Mr. GREENWAY said he had been more or less connected with the temperance movement in the West for some time, and he felt it was his duty to make a few remarks on this question, and give a reason for the vote he was about to record. He regretted that politics should be mixed up in a question of so much importance as this. During the discussion more than one hon. member had referred to politics. This was certainly to be regretted, as it was the duty of all temperance men, whether Conservatives or Reformers, to try and drive from the country that monstrous evil of intemperance. He heartily agreed with the hon. member for Centre Toronto, that it was necessary first of all that those who advocated intemperance should first pass a Prohibitory Liquor Law for themselves; it would do a great deal of good, not only for themselves but for the temperance cause. The hon. gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Farrow) asked why the Dunkin Act was not brought out before. The temperance people wanted something whereby they might express an opinion in regard to prohibition, and that was the only means at their disposal at present. It was not their ultimatum, but it afforded an opportunity of testing the feeling of the people on this question. He believed that prohibition was the only cure for the evil of intemperance. The Dunkin Act was unfair. If it were passed in one county, it simply gave an unfair advantage to the dealers in the adjoining counties; it decreased the value of one man's property and enhanced that of another. It might be possible at the next general election to take the sense of the people in regard to a Prohibitory Law. As soon as a majority declared in favour of it, the House would be justified in passing such a measure. The fact that the Dunkin Act could not be enforced in many counties merely proved that public sentiment was not ripe for prohibition. As a temperance advocate the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) required no defence at his hands. He agreed with that hon. gentleman that they should go slowly, securing their position at each step. It would indeed be unwise to proceed hastily in this matter, and any hon. member who advocated a Prohibitory Law at this time was one of the worst enemies of the temperance cause. Taking that view, he believed it to be his duty to record his vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex, and he hoped that before the next election some means would be devised to obtain an expression of the people on this important question. He hoped it would be treated here, and in the country, without reference to political feeling or party prejudices, and that all friends of the cause would unite with one common object, the suppression of the evils arising out of the liquor traffic.

Mr. GOUDGE said he had always been in favour of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, as he believed it to be the only effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance. But, before any legislative action was taken, Parliament should be in possession of knowledge to enable it to judge whether a majority of the people were favourable to the passage of such a law. The hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) had taken occasion to challenge the sincerity of hon. members on that side of the House, and characterize their professions as hollow and meaningless. Yet before the hon. gentleman sat down he made an appeal to both sides to lay aside sectional and political difficulties, and to unite on this question. He thought this question might safely be left to the hon. member for West Middlesex, who had long carried the banner of temperance in this House. He thought they should give that hon. gentleman credit for his sturdy, consistent advocacy of the cause, both in his public and private life. Before the hon. member for North Huron charged anyone with insincerity, the House ought to be placed in possession of the fact whether he was a practical teetotaller or not. For himself, he had been strictly teetotal since he was nine years of age, and he had no hesitation in saying that when the proper time came, and he was in possession of the information that the majority of the people were favourable to it, he would record his vote in favour of prohibition. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Farrow) said no benefits were derived from the Dunkin Act; but he (Mr. Goudge) thought that Act would furnish the information to enable them to arrive at a practical solution of the question. By observing the vote on this Act in the different counties of Ontario they would soon see what the sentiment of the people was. While they had no Dunkin Act in Nova Scotia, they had another which practically enabled them to gain the information desired. Any one wishing to obtain a license to sell liquor was obliged to obtain the signatures of a majority of the ratepayers, and then submit the petition to the Grand Jury of the county. That amounted almost to prohibition as far as the issue of licenses was concerned. He would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex, as he hoped that before next Session they would be in possession of information as to the sentiment of the people in regard to this question.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) called the attention of the hon. member for Kingston to the first clause of the resolution in reference to the words "grave doubts." The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia had decided that the Local Legislatures had jurisdiction over the liquor traffic. Chief-Justice Ritchie had decided that the Dominion Legislature had jurisdiction. There were other decisions of like character.

Mr. GILLMOR said he had some experience in the passing of a Prohibitory Liquor Law in New Brunswick. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Ferris) and himself were the only members present, who were members of the New Brunswick Parliament at the time a Prohibitory Liquor Law was passed. There was no difficulty in obtaining a majority in the New Brunswick Legislature at that time. A dissolution of that Parliament was the result of the passage of that law, and the members were sent back to the people. There were other issues mixed up with that contest, but it was the question which caused the dissolution, and it was the main question to be decided at that time. And on the reassembling of the new Parliament only two out of the forty-one members returned were returned to vote against the repeal of that law, he being one of them. He believed the introduction of the question was premature, and did not aid in advancing, but rather retarded, the progress of total abstinence. It was not his business whether hon. members of this House indulged in a glass of wine or not; but it was his opinion that representing, as they did, the opinions of the people of the country, unless a large number of them were themselves total abstainers, a Prohibitory Liquor Law could not be carried out because they must be assumed to represent the social habits, intelligence, and practices of the people. If the evil of intemperance was so great that they must compel other people to abstain from drinking, they would certainly be more consistent to abstain themselves before seeking to compel others; and until there were a larger number of total abstainers in Parliament than there was at present, it was to him pretty good evidence that a Prohibitory Law would not be successfully carried out. He believed the temperance sentiment was advancing, but to introduce a Prohibitory Law now, would, in his opinion, be premature, and he would, therefore, vote for the amendment. He would not venture on a temperance speech to those who knew the great evils of intemperance as well as he. It was, undoubtedly, the greatest social evil of the day, and so great that it would justify a Prohibitory Law, and he was prepared to vote for it just as soon as he thought it could be successfully enforced. Moral suasion was doing a noble work; but, when public sentiment was sufficiently advanced to carry out prohibition, he would, if in Parliament, be prepared to vote for it. He was himself a total abstainer, and all members, as well as all others who acknowledged the extent of the vice of intemperance, would do more good to the cause by abstaining themselves, than by prematurely enacting a compulsory law; and they would find much more freedom in advocating the cause of temperance. The question should be dealt with outside of party politics, although it would seem as if this were impossible, party feeling in connection with this question being manifested both in and out of Parliament. Intemperate indulgence in strong drink was undoubtedly the greatest social evil, but the extreme to which party political prejudices and rancour extended, was almost as great.

Mr. FLESHER said he recognized the importance of the question, and the desirableness of public opinion being known before any action was taken upon it. No policy should be adopted which would have to be retracted in the future. But, while he recognized the force of the arguments of the First Minister in this respect, he thought every hon. gentleman should acquaint himself with the views of his constituents on the subject, as had been suggested by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow). He understood that a number of gentlemen who were prominent abstainers had waited upon the First Minister in Montreal to obtain his personal opinion, and he understood that that hon. gentleman had given encouragement to the view that the question should be submitted to popular vote. In the absence of this popular vote, the best expression of public opinion was the vote of hon. members themselves. Although he thought the Dunkin Act was a very imperfect measure, a majority of 800 had been given in favour of it in his county. He, therefore had no alternative but to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Lisgar, and he did not see that any hon. gentleman who represented constituencies which had declared in favour of the Dunkin Act, had any other alternative.

Mr. McCRAANEY said, from the fact that he had the honour to represent the most temperate county in Ontario, he must say that he felt somewhat uneasy with reference to this great question. The people of his county also felt somewhat uneasy. They felt that some advance ought to be made in this question. In 1864, he believed, the Dunkin Act was submitted to the electors of his county, and it was carried by about 500 majority; but through some legal technicality the by-law was quashed. The question had not been submitted since, not because it could not be carried by a large majority, but because they were desirous of either securing prohibition pure and simple, or else some amendments to the Dunkin Act. He believed the people would be satisfied at present, as a step in the direction of prohibition, if the ballot was applied and the number of polling places increased, if there was only one day's polling, the five gallon clause abolished, and it was made compulsory on County Councils to submit the by-law. He did not entirely approve of prohibition in spots, it being too circumscribed in its character; but even that was better than no prohibition. There was no doubt that there were great difficulties surrounding this question; they had already been referred to by the hon. the Prime Minister, and he did not wonder that the Government hesitated in their action. If they desired to obtain a prohibitory measure they must throw aside all political differences, and make the temperance question the great question before the people. For his own part, he was quite willing to sink every other political question in order to obtain prohibition. He would support prohibition every time, when he believed it was advocated by those who were sincere. But he paused in regard to this motion of the hon. member for Lisgar. It was a significant fact that neither the mover nor seconder of the motion was a total abstainer or Prohibitionist. He was satisfied that no man who was not a total abstainer himself could consistently ask others to advocate a system on which he himself was not sincere. He hoped the Supreme Court would soon settle the question of jurisdiction. Then the people of this Dominion could have prohibition whenever they were ready for it. In view of all these considerations, especially the fact that the question of jurisdiction had not been settled, he did not see his way clear to supporting the motion of the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. SMITH (Peel) said the discussion was a pretty fair indication of the fact that if a majority did not desire prohibition, at least a very large proportion did. As the temperance people had decided a short time ago that it would not be expedient to force prohibition now, the House would, in passing the motion, go directly opposite to what the temperance people asked. Moreover, we had 3,000 miles of a boundary line between us and a country where illicit distillation had given a great deal of trouble, it having even dragged down some of the best American politicians, and at the present time the Mounted Police in the North-West were fully occupied in preventing liquor being brought in from the United States illegally. If a Prohibitory Liquor Law were passed, the same difficulties would exist here as existed in the North-West.

Mr. SCHULTZ said some hon. gentlemen had expressed doubts as to his sincerity in making this motion, but if there were one evidence of his sincerity as a Prohibitionist more than another it was the part he had taken in assisting the passage of the first Prohibitory Law in the Dominion. The passage of this resolution would commit the Government to immediate action in this matter, but it would place them in this position: that, having taken the sense of the House on this matter, when the question of jurisdiction was settled by the Supreme Court, they would be able to go on and pass a prohibitory measure which he believed, all the speakers on both sides of the House had admitted, was the only remedy for intemperance. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) had dwelt in a very interesting way on the injury which would accrue to vested rights. Did the hon. gentleman forget that this was not an agitation of a day, or of a year, but of many years, and that these gentlemen who are engaged in the manufacture of spirits in Canada must know that, if the assertion of the hon. gentleman were correct, that the temperance movement was advancing, and we were all the time steadily progressing towards prohibition, sooner or later that from which they derived so much revenue would be left upon their hands. It was, therefore, the duty of those people themselves to look out for the possible ending of this lucrative traffic. He (Mr. Schultz) did not agree with his hon. friend from Centre Toronto that they should have this tender feeling for these vested rights in dealing with this question. In regard to the matter of revenue, notwithstanding the fact that the passage of a Prohibitory Liquor Law would make a difference of six millions to the revenue, the same argument applied. The Government of the day must have known of the agitation which had been proceeding in this country; they, too, must see that sooner or later, if this agitation kept on, this question must be met, and it was not to be met by the suggestion of any individual member of the House. It was the duty of the Government to provide for those exigencies themselves, and hon. gentlemen were not, in his opinion, called upon to advance any suggestion with a view to relieving the Government of what might possibly be a source of embarrassment. A good deal had been said upon the Dunkin Act. A good many gentlemen seemed to be of the opinion that it would be better to be contented with the Dunkin Act. That would be all right for hon. gentlemen who represented counties in Ontario and Quebec, because he believed it was only there that that Act applied; but even if they wanted that Act in Manitoba, in the present state of the question in regard to jurisdiction, he did not believe the Government would consent to its extension to that Province. While, therefore, in Ontario and Quebec they might see some chance of averting, with this lesser measure, some portion of this evil, in Manitoba, they were entirely deprived of any redress whatever. He (Mr. Schultz) looked upon drunkenness as a disease to a very great extent, and he was not disposed to hold so highly the efforts made by temperance societies and organizations of various kinds, as gentlemen who had spoken in regard to them were. He believed that after a certain stage drunkenness so far became a disease that they could not reach the man who was the subject of it by moral measures at all, and that all the commendable efforts of temperance organizations, all the efforts made in the pulpit and elsewhere by temperance lecturers, were, in many cases, utterly thrown away. Therefore, in the consideration of this subject, which was first brought up in this House by his hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), he felt that no Dunkin Act, no success, however great, would be applicable to it, and the only remedy would be the passage of a Prohibitory Law by the Supreme Court of the Parliament of Canada. He hoped, if the measure which he had placed before the House did not carry, it would have at least a sufficiently large number of hon. gentlemen to support it as to give it that prominence which he thought it deserved. If he could see in the amendment offered by the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex, any middle course, any way of getting out of the difficulty, any way which, if the Government found—as they would probably find—the question of jurisdiction settled this summer, would compel the Government to take action upon it at the next Session of Parliament, he would have been disposed to support the amendment. He had no feeling of hostility towards it whatever; he merely differed with the hon. gentleman, and would vote against his amendment.

Mr. KILLAM said he had the honour of representing a constituency in which for many years no licenses had been granted for the sale of liquors. He believed that not more than one-half the adult male population there knew the taste of ardent liquors. He did not say that liquor was not sold there, but it was a temperance county, and he did not doubt that half the voters were members of temperance organizations.

From a constituency of that sort they would not expect to see a member returned unless he were a pretty good friend to the prohibition movement; and having both from choice and necessity been a friend of that movement in the past, he expected to be a friend to it in the future, and hoped to have pleasure some day, if the confidence reposed in him by that constituency were not forfeited, to support a Prohibitory Liquor Law, if the jurisdiction were here, or to assist it in some other place if the jurisdiction were not here. However, at the present time, he believed the friends of temperance in his own county, in common with those in the rest of the Dominion, were not prepared to see a Prohibitory Liquor Law forced upon the country. They had seen some of the effects of passing a law of that kind hastily, and, although they had understood pretty well the argument of some of their temperance friends, that if the people left off drinking rum, they would buy more clothes, cabinet organs, and things of that kind,—still, no doubt, the revenue would be seriously diminished, and the result might be, perhaps,—what it might not be fair to impute to his hon. friends on the opposite side of the House—that they would have the pleasure of defeating the present Administration, because they would not have sufficient money to carry on the public service. He (Mr. Killam) believed, and thought the Government believed, that the only hope of securing good and sound temperance reform, and a Liquor Law when the time came, lay with the Reform Party; and, as far as he knew, the great friends of temperance throughout the country had a majority upon the Reform side. Whatever motion might be moved in this House, either with an honest view of promoting the interests of temperance or for any other purpose, he had no doubt the temperance men of this country were intelligent enough to be able to weigh the arguments pro and con used in this House or outside of it and to take into consideration the motives impelling friends of temperance in this House to take either side of the question; and, he had no doubt, the great body would support the course of the temperance members in opposing the motion of the member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) and voting for that of the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), because they knew the conflict of jurisdiction. In his own Province they had reason to complain of the operation of their own law which was better than the Dun-kin Act, and which, if passed in Manitoba, would go far to prevent undue indulgence in intoxicating liquor. But the friends of temperance were willing to wait, first, to see where the jurisdiction lay; and after that was ascertained, he believed they were willing to wait to ascertain pretty nearly what public opinion was before they proceeded with the measure. He thought the suggestion which had been made at different times—that as the temperance organizations extended through the country, in every town and village, and had such a perfect organization, it would be quite possible for them, through their different divisions and lodges, to ascertain whether a majority of the people of the Dominion were or were not in favour of prohibition, by petitions presented to the House, was worthy of notice. They had had an example of what could be done in this matter a year or two ago. If each division canvassed the country, and a majority of the people could be got to petition, it would be a convincing proof that the majority were in favour of prohibition. In the meantime, he was sure that temperance men did not desire to see the question unduly hastened, and would be willing to wait for the decision of the Supreme Court of the Dominion.

Question put on the motion as amended.

Mr. BUNSTER: I certainly feel it my bounden duty to thank the Premier of the Dominion for his good judgment in putting down this question. I am glad to see he takes such a sensible view of it, and has instructed his colleagues on the other side of the House in the way he has done. Even the hon. member for West Middlesex has been converted to what I have been advocating for the last three or four Sessions. I give them credit for their conversion to the principles I have been advocating.

Motion, as amended, agreed to on the same Division, as follows:—

“Whereas grave doubts exist, whether, under the provisions of The British North America Act, 1867, this House has the power to deal with the sale of Intoxicating Liquors as a beverage; and whereas the Court of Error and Appeal in the Province of Ontario has referred a case to the Supreme Court, whereby the relative jurisdiction of the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures over the Liquor Traffic will be argued: Be it therefore Resolved, That this House, while not receding from any previous declaration on the importance of a Prohibitory Liquor Law, deems it inexpedient under these circumstances, at present to express any opinion regarding the action to be taken by the Government, in dealing with this question.”

QUEBEC BUILDING SOCIETIES BILL.—[BILL No. 53.]

(Mr. Jetté.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 53), To make further provision respecting the constituting and management of Building Societies in the Province of Quebec.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. JETTÉ said he had drafted another clause in place of the last section, which had been struck out. The object of the amendment was to render the Act immediately applicable to building societies. In the meantime, it would allow societies with less capital than was required by the Act—a quarter of a million—to continue business, and those who borrowed money, either on debentures or deposits, to receive deposits until the 1st July, 1878, to give ample time for the amendment of the Act if this clause proved obnoxious to their business.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendment read the first and second time and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

House adjourned at Thirty-five minutes after Eleven o'clock.

ORDNANCE AND ADMIRALTY LANDS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. MILLS asked leave to introduce a Bill, (No. 111), respecting certain Ordnance and Admiralty lands in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Bill read the first time.

THE OLD RAILS DISTRIBUTION.

QUESTION.

Mr. BOWELL asked when the return concerning the distribution of old rails, for which he had moved early in March, would be brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the time of their Engineers had been of late taken up in cases before the Courts, and they had been in this respect somewhat delayed. He would, however, then state roughly, that he believed twelve tons of rails had been distributed to the Elgin Branch, nine tons to the Chatham branch and about four and a half tons to the branch of the Albert Railway.

Mr. JETTÉ.

He thought that was all that had been so far actually delivered.

Mr. MASSON asked if returns were taken up in the order in which the motions for them were passed,

Mr. MACKENZIE said he gave no orders at all on the subject. This was left to the Deputy Ministers, as a matter of course.

MEASUREMENT OF REGISTERED SHIPS BILL.—[BILL No. 106.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading, read.

Mr. CHEVAL moved :

“The Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the said Bill by adding to the third section thereof the following words :—And any amount which may have been paid previous to the passing of this Act, by the owner or master of any steamship, over and above the amount which under this Act he is held to pay, shall be refunded to him.”

Mr. SPEAKER : I must inform the hon. member that he cannot move such a motion unless a message is previously received from His Excellency, the Governor General.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved :

“That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding the following words after the word ‘tonnage’ in the 35th line in clause one :—For all purposes except those of the Act respecting the inspecting of steamboats and for the better safety of passengers by them passed in 1868, and the Acts in amendment thereto, for which last mentioned purposes the tonnage shall remain as it is at present.”

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

Bill amended according to instructions, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendment read the first and second times and agreed to.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) asked the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, why there was no fee allowed to the surveyor of the ships for measurement, and whether measurement was paid for by the Government or not. It seemed to him unfair that an official should be asked to travel perhaps a long distance to measure a vessel and receive no payment. He should be paid either by the Department or the owner of the vessel.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said, of course, these services would not be gratuitous. Compensation would be allowed, but not according to the scale of fees prescribed by the present law. This work could be done for a less amount, and they proposed that the charge would fall on the Government and not on the owner of the vessel.

Bill read the third time and passed.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 108.]

(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. SMITH moved :

"That the Bill be not now read the third time, but be re-committed to the Committee of the whole House with instructions that they have power to add an amendment after the word 'authority,' in the 28th line of Clause 2, the following words :—" Which collects the pilotage dues."

This amendment, he said, was proposed to meet the objections of the hon. gentlemen from Northumberland and Cape Breton, and other persons, who had knowledge of the subject. Its effect would simply be to require a clearance certificate to be produced from a Customs' officer only in places where the pilotage authorities collected pilotage dues ; where the pilots themselves collected the dues, this would not be required.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was very glad that this amendment was proposed. He would take back what he had said the other day about the Minister of Marine and Fisheries not accepting any of his suggestions.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

Bill amended according to instructions, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendment read the first and second time and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

ONTARIO MARITIME COURT
BILL—[BILL No. 41.]

[Mr. Blake.]

BILL FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for consideration of amendments made in Committee of the Whole read.

Mr. BLAKE moved the discharge of the order and the recommittal of the Bill. He said certain alterations had been made, but it would probably suit the convenience of the House if they were not discussed until the Bill was reprinted.

Mr. MITCHELL asked if the hon. the Minister of Justice had considered the suggestion he made, that the experts who were to assist the Judges should be sworn and examined like other witnesses.

Mr. BLAKE: I have considered it, but unfavourably.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not think my hon. friend would give any consideration to a really practical suggestion, and, therefore, I am not disappointed.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Bill amended, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

CULLING OF TIMBER ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 103.]

(Mr. Laflamme.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider Bill (No. 103), To amend the Act respecting the culling of timber.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CARON said when this Bill was before the House he was absent, and he took advantage of this opportunity to make a few remarks. He was glad to find his hon. friend for Quebec East (Mr. Thibaudeau), who represented a considerable number of cullers, concurring in the views he expressed on this subject. It was considered then that the average salary of $700 was too low, and he had since presented a petition from the Board of Trade of Quebec concurring in the views that he (Mr. Caron) had submitted to the hon. Minister in charge of the Bill. The Board of Trade seemed to think that the sum was not at all adequate, and it was beyond a doubt that if it were not increased a large number of efficient men would give up the culling of timber. He hoped that the Government, even at this late stage, would find some means of altering the clause governing the salaries, and allow the cullers a reasonable sum for their services.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the measure had been discussed and weighed by the parties most interested. The friends of the cullers suggested that $50 be added to the amount. This proposition was also submitted to the gentlemen conversant with the matter, and they arrived at the conclusion that $700 was ample remuneration. As the average earnings of the cullers were between $400 and $500, he also considered that this was a fair remuneration. The hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Caron) had stated that if the amount were not increased some of the most efficient cullers would be inclined to withdraw from the office; but he (Mr. Laflamme) understood differently, and there had been a large number of

Mr. CARON said he had no doubt a large number of applications were made from parties who would be perfectly willing to step into the shoes of those now engaged. Without pretending to be familiar with the subject himself, he expressed the views of those who were. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would admit that the Quebec Board of Trade were competent to express an opinion, and no doubt their views would have considerable weight with the Government, and they had unanimously stated in their petition that $700 was a perfectly inadequate compensation. He could quite understand how hon. gentlemen engaged in the lumber trade were willing that the amount should be limited to $700. He inclined to the belief that, if the amount were not increased, inefficient men would get into positions. He did not know whether the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had had sufficient time to look into the petition, but he would see that it was directly opposed to the Bill. He did not expect that his representations would have much influence with the Government, but he had no doubt that the hon. the President of the Council, as representing Quebec interests, would be willing to substantiate what he had said. No doubt that hon. gentleman would pay due respect to the petition from the Quebec Board of Trade, especially as a considerable number of them were his supporters.

Mr. ROCHESTER said his hon. friend from Quebec County had quoted largely from the Quebec Board of Trade; but those gentlemen had nothing to do with the payment of the cullers. He (Mr. Rochester) thought $700 ample remuneration, as the cullers were only employed a month in the year, and they had the rest of the time to themselves. Some deal cullers made from $2,000 to $3,000 a year, which he thought far too much. Cullers, in the winter, could go to the woods and get from $1.25 to $1.50, with board, for culling logs.

Mr. CARON said he only referred to square timber cullers.

Mr. ROCHESTER: A great many of them act in both capacities.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) expressed his surprise that the hon. member for Quebec County should make the attempt he had to place an additional tax upon lumbermen. The evils which they had been suffering from, and which the Bill was intended to remedy, were induced by the political necessities of gentlemen representing Quebec constituencies; but he did not refer particularly to the hon. member for Quebec County. In years past, and under the administration of his own friends, cullers had been forced into office beyond the requirements of the service. To remedy that evil lumbermen were willing to tax themselves for the purpose of pensioning off those not required, and also to pay an amount of remuneration equal to 50 per cent. over the average earnings of the last five years. Lumbermen were quite willing to risk not getting efficient men for $700. He himself had received applications from some of the most competent men—and he had no doubt other hon. members in the lumber trade had also—who were anxious to be retained, with a full knowledge that the average salary would be $700. He did not think it judicious that the question of salaries should be again reopened. He would like to know from the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue whether he was prepared to answer the question put to him a few days ago, as to the amount now at the credit of the cullers in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, which it was intended to apply to the payment of the annuities.

Mr. LAFLAMME said, if the hon. gentleman referred to what had been collected and what was now due, the amount to the credit of the fund was, he supposed, about $40,000. Some years the receipts did not more than cover the expenditures in the office, but generally there was about $7,000 over and above the expenses.

Mr. WHITE said he understood that, since 1867, the surplus had amounted to $43,000, but he was informed by Mr. Langton that there was a surplus prior to that date, which he presumed would be applied to this fund.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the amount every year fell into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and a vote was required to take it out.
