CHAPTER XVII.

A slight noise at the door attracted the attention of Ebenezer Lupus, and he glided toward it. He could have declared that he had closed the outer Moor, but it was open, and he passed into the clerk's office. He was absent some two or three minutes, and when he returned his manner had undergone a marked change. There was a dark-red spot on both of his sallow, hungry-looking cheek bones, and his eyes were restless and more brilliant than usual.

"Well, Sir Charles," he said, briskly, "I think that I understand what to will begin to work this very day."

"This very hour!" the young man added, vehemently. "You shall have a substantial check to-morrow. Name your own figure."

thought that you would see to it, sir. Lupus waved him away, and in one minute he reappeared with a lady behind him. She was richly dressed, but lacked the repose and reserve that always distinguish good breeding. She was young, and many would have considered her pretty. She was dark, had small, regular features, and eyes of a peculiar brilliancy. They were now flashing with some inward working of her passions, and but for a warning gesture from Ebenezer Lupus, she would have spoken before the inquisitive office-boy.

The lawyer carefully closed both of the double doors with his own hands, then he seturned to his seat

"I am delighted to meet with you again, Lady Hastings. What a wonderful coincidence that you should have come here to-day! He has never crossed the threshold, until this morning, since the wedding day!"

In the meantime, the young baronet was on his way home; his mind racked by hopes and fears. He would wait until he knew whether his wife was living or dead before he saw Lady Gladys again. He would then break to her the awful story. He did not think for one moment that she could forgive him. The wrong he had committed was beyond pardon. If his wife still lived, he would bid his love an eternal farewell. There was nothing on earth that might bridge the gulf that would be between them-nothing! He pictured his life without Gladys, and a grean escaped him. It was too horrible—it was worse than death-it would be a life of lingaring torture. He told himself that he could not live under the weight of his grief—his remorse his despair! CHAPTER XVIII.

It seemed that there had never be ore been so long a spell of beautiful mmer weather in England. For veeks there had been a succession of glorious sunrises, and the monarch of day climbed the blue walls of the sky, to sail in magnificent state, and disappear in golden grandeur to his ouch of fire in the west. After the heat of the day, the dew fell in soft showers, and moistened the verdure and nature bloomed afresh each morning, and loaded the air with her in Four days had passed since Sir Charles Hastings had parted from ady Gladys, and promised to return again soon. He had received her fond etter, and had replied to it. The reply was short, and had been hastily written. He was coming to the abbey that day—he was coming to see her ather, and her heart bounded joyously. She-took the little letter from her pocket again, and read the dear writing:

MY DARLING—I am going to see the earl to-morrow. Will you meet me in the park before I see your father? I shall be in the spot that you have so aptly named the Fairy Dell, at eleven o'clock. I have not written to the earl, so that my visit will be somewhat of so that my visit will be somewhat of a surprise to him. Yours in death. CHARLES.

She felt that there was something this letter that was very vague and unsatisfying. What did he mean by "Yours in death?" Why should he finish with these dreadful words?" Her father had recognized the handwriting and the Hastings crest, when he passed the letter to her.

STAGE ARTISTES WORK FOR

LONDON-Thousands of actors and actresses in England are out of work. The hot summer, the closing down recently of six London playhouses, and the exodus of the theatre-going public to the seashore have been the main factors. In their efforts to keep the wolf from the door, men and women of the histrionic art have accepted small parts in cinema productions. An endeavor is being made to relieve the situation by the formation of a kind of co-operative theatrical company for the benefit of the working actors and actresses. Those taking part receive $15 a week. "East Lynne" was the first play given, but after a four-weeks' season it was found that the company had lost $250, after pay-ing artists' salaries, so the venture Knowling's

Where the breezes howl and whiff, But we didn't see the game at all.

Owing to the cold, only the dyed-inwool fans turned out last night to see the game between the C. E. I. and the Feildians. It was rather a colorless exhibition, the Feildians having matters practically all their own way, though towards the end the red-andwhites made some desperate attempts to break through the defence of their opponents but without result. In the first half Duke Winter scored two goals, and in the final period Tommy Payne notched up another, leaving the Feildians victors by 3 to 0.

One of which he often repeats concerns a mass meeting which he held at the Railway Station during the General Election of 1913. FLOWER DAY.

During Saturday morning, a bevy of pretty girls sold flowers to passersby in aid of the Industrial Home. Although people profess to be tired of tag days and flower days, the flower sellers had no difficulty in disposing of their wares and quite a large amount was raised. The supply of flowers were limited or a great deal more would have been obtained.

Talking about dancers reminded me of something I heard a girl say recently, which struck me as being very amusing, and perhaps typical of the times. She was discussing a certain boy with a friend, and the latter had some unkind things to say about him. "But, my dear he is such a wonderful dancer," was the defence, and the tone used showed that to be able to walk well on ones' toes, for that is what modern dancing appears to be, condoned a multitude of wrongs.

LAUNDRIES.

His Highness the Sultan of Shehr and Makalla, in Southern Arabia, who has just died, used to send his washing all across the Indian Ocean because there are no laundry experts in Arabia. Judging by the time it takes me to get my things back from the laundry they must travel a great deal further than across the Indian Ocean, and in the course of their journeying are walked on by elephants and eaten by rats. This may be imagination on my part, but they certainly look like

NEWSPAPER SERIALS. I have noticed that practically every serial which appears in local newspapers has a peer for either the hero or the villian. This is the sort of story which appeals to the majority of newspaper readers. In this connection, Miss Morris, the Legislative Librarian, once told me an amusing story. A well known local lady was very much startled one evening, when her maid rushed into the room, wav ing the Telegram excitedly, and shouting "Belinda's not drowned, Belinda's not drowned." She afterwards discovered that Belinda was the heroine of the serial then running in the Tele gram, and in the last instalment had been in danger of finding a watery grave. The maid had been following the serial with great interest, and when she read the next instalment in which the noble hero saved Belinda, her excitement was such that she had to shout the news all over the house.

AFTERNOON BRIDGE.

Bridge is, I must admit, a fascinating game, but one has to draw the line somewhere. Of an evening, when it is not fine enough to go motoring there is nothing more enjoyable than a good game of Bridge, but how girls can remain in the house on fine afternoons and play it, is more than I can understand. Scarcely an afternoo passes now when there is not a girl's

For I can hear the houses there
Speaking a language of their own
And telling all their jev and care;
The close-drawn curtains, sombre still
Tell me that some loved one lies ill;
And then I watch to see again

You may not know the people there,
But you can read their lives by signs
Which all their houses daily wear.
As out of them their story shines;
