STATEMENT BY H.E. MR. JEAN CHAPDELAIN
REPRESENTATIVE OF CANADA IN THE SPECIAL POLITICAL COMMITTEE
IN THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Agenda Item 82: Question of Equitable Representation on the Security Council and on the Economic and Social Council.

ORIGINAL: FRENCH

Mr. Chairman:

I thought when I prepared this statement that the Committee would be agreed on the necessity, nay the urgency, of action to give adequate representation to new Member States on two of the principal organs of the United Nations: the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, even if there were to be some variants as to how best to achieve this most desirable end. The statement of the distinguished delegate of the U.S.S.R. on Tuesday has shattered this most reasonable of assumptions. The spokesman of this important group in these United Nations, one whose government has it in its power to refuse its assent and thus prevent a ratification of a proposal for enlargement of the Councils has interposed his veto, a compounded veto, a Peking/Moscow veto. This veto is starkly directed at the rightful aspiration of the Africans and Asians to equitable representation on the Councils.

However, ukase or no ukase, it nevertheless remains of the utmost importance that the United Nations maintain comprehensive character and that all groups and shades of opinion be adequately reflected in the composition and membership of the various organs of the United Nations. This is particularly so in the case of the Security Council which from time to time is called upon to deal with potentially explosive situations in many parts of the world. It also holds true for the Economic and Social Council which is continually dealing with questions of far-reaching importance. The ECOSOC not only deals with questions which affect the relationships between the economically advanced nations and the less-developed countries; it also is concerned with the whole field of human rights, and with the almost unlimited range of social questions. The need for a balanced representation of Member States on the Councils therefore cannot be over-emphasized. The claim of the new members in this respect is valid and just. But, Mr. Chairman, the older members have an equally valid and just claim that this be not done improperly at their expense. With the increase in membership of the United Nations, from 51 at the beginning in 1945 to 111 today, and the number grows, it is obvious that mere re-distribution of existing seats on the Councils would leave some groupings without representation from time to time, and even permanently. It would make it particularly difficult for most countries to be represented even once in a generation, many of which, because of their contribution to the purposes of the United Nations, have a definite claim to have a voice more frequently in its Councils. It would be difficult, if not impossible, in such a case, to achieve real representativeness on the Security Council. The equitable solution is therefore not re-distribution of the existing seats, but expansion of the Councils.

As we all know, present arrangements for the Security Council under the Charter provide for five permanent members and six elected members who hold their seats for two years. In accordance with the Gentleman's Agreement of 1946, the six elected members are to include one representative from the Commonwealth, one from the Communist states of Eastern Europe, two from Latin America, one from Western Europe, and one from the Middle East. This arrangement was made when the membership of the United Nations stood at 51. Today the United Nations includes 111 members and additional members are expected to join shortly. Consequently, it is more than understandable that we should be considering as a matter of urgency in this Committee today ways and means of dealing with the changed situation.

In ordinary circumstances, it would be expected that the question of adequate representation on the Councils would be dealt with as part and parcel of a general review of the Charter. This is an undertaking of the utmost importance. Canada would have preferred that expansion of the Councils should take place in that context. In a general review, all implications of one change would, and could, receive thorough consideration and the consequences drawn in other Sections and Articles before the change was effected. Obviously, the membership of the Councils is but one facet of the Charter review made desirable by the profound changes which have taken place in the world, and the additional

The first part of the document discusses the importance of maintaining accurate records of all transactions. It emphasizes that every entry should be supported by a valid receipt or invoice. This ensures transparency and allows for easy verification of the data.

Furthermore, it is noted that the records should be kept in a secure and accessible format. Regular backups are recommended to prevent data loss in the event of a system failure or disaster. The document also mentions the need for periodic audits to ensure the integrity and accuracy of the information stored.

In addition, the text highlights the role of technology in streamlining record-keeping processes. Modern accounting software can automate many tasks, reducing the risk of human error and saving valuable time. However, it is stressed that users must be properly trained to utilize these tools effectively.

Overall, the document serves as a comprehensive guide for anyone responsible for financial record-keeping. It provides clear instructions and best practices to ensure that all records are maintained in a professional and compliant manner.

heavy responsibilities which the Organization has assumed since San Francisco. Any change will have important effects on the other facets, and it would be preferable if the carefully balanced construction which the framers of the Charter sought to erect was to be looked at in its entirety and not piecemeal.

As my Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, said in his speech in Plenary on September 19, on the assumption that we must make that, we, and I quote, "want the United Nations to be an effective international instrument for practical and positive action in carrying out United Nations decisions, a comprehensive re-appraisal should be made of certain basic questions of function and organization which have been pushed into the background of our thinking because of recurring tension in international relations leading to the fear that the questions themselves may contain the seeds of possible further friction". And later, he said: "To be fully effective, United Nations machinery and organization should adequately reflect the present membership, without giving undue weight to any single factor, whether it be military or industrial strength; population or financial contribution; politics or race or geography".

However, it seems clear from the report submitted by the Committee on arrangements for a conference for the purpose of reviewing the Charter - Document A/5487 of September 4, 1963 - that a majority of Member States believe that international circumstances at the present time are not propitious for the holding of a general conference to review the Charter under Article 109 of the Charter. This would seem to indicate that we cannot expect a general review of the Charter in the immediate future and that we must therefore deal with the matter before us on an ad hoc basis by enlarging the Councils through an amendment to the Charter under Article 108. As I indicated earlier, Mr. Chairman, this is the only equitable solution. Nevertheless, it is earnestly to be desired that Charter review will not be unduly delayed. The changes now contemplated in adjusting the composition of the Councils would, in this perspective, be regarded as ad hoc and interim arrangements, which the whole membership of the United Nations may wish to review in the not too distant future, when the Charter is reviewed as a whole.

Faint, illegible text, possibly bleed-through from the reverse side of the page. The text is too light to transcribe accurately but appears to be organized into several paragraphs.

Whatever the arrangements contemplated, I should like to make it clear that my Delegation could not accept that the Gentleman's Agreement of 1946 should be regarded as having been overtaken by events and be scrapped without the concurrence of the parties to that Agreement. The Gentleman's Agreement is still valid, and cannot be modified without the concurrence of the parties to it. As a member of the Commonwealth, Canada is not prepared to give this concurrence, and surrender its claim to representation on the Security Council. Could the Eastern European group, whose seat was considered as counterbalancing the Commonwealth seat under the Gentleman's Agreement? And would the Latin American group, the Western European group, or even the Middle Eastern group?

New seats must be provided to accommodate the new members and to give them the representation, the equitable representation, to which they are entitled. The urgency of doing this has already been demonstrated by the "liberties", if I may use that expression, which have been taken in recent times with the agreed allocation of seats. If I understood the Soviet representative correctly in his statement on Tuesday, it was to these "liberties" that he objected. He did not contemplate the disappearance of the East European seat. In fact, he wanted a full one, all the time, for a group whose numbers are in the mathematical ratio not fully sufficient to warrant it. And in the General Committee, again, he was providing for a Vice-President every year, for a Chairmanship every year, and for a rotation of the Presidency purely on a group basis, irrespective of whether a group was of eight or sixteen or even thirty-two.

Certainly the arrangements for recasting the Councils will call for the most careful consultation of all the interests concerned. This could be achieved by the establishment of a negotiating body, the desirability of which could become evident in view of the multiplicity of the interests involved and the considerations which have a bearing on the allocation of seats within the expanded Councils.

In considering to what extent the Councils should be enlarged, my Delegation considers that the figure decided upon should take into account not only geographical factors but also the institutional needs of the Councils.

Faint, illegible text covering the majority of the page, likely bleed-through from the reverse side. The text is too light to transcribe accurately.

Adequate geographical representation on the Councils is of course essential.

But the geographic aspect should not be inflated to the point where it obscures other important factors which should also be taken into account in determining a Member State's eligibility to serve on the Councils. That was never the intention of the United Nations Charter. In fact, Article 23 of the Charter provides that "the General Assembly shall elect six other members of the United Nations to be non-permanent members of the Security Council, due regard being specially paid in the first instance to the contribution of members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization and also to equitable geographical distribution". In the opinion of my Delegation the criteria of Article 23 should continue to apply to elections to an enlarged Security Council. The language of the Article was obviously the result of careful thought by the framers of the Charter and it is understandable that they should have taken the reasonable position that the best interests of the United Nations would be served by giving first priority to capacity to contribute, and making geographical distribution a secondary consideration.

When one considers all the factors mentioned in Article 23 of the Charter, the contribution made by the Commonwealth as a group is substantial indeed. For example, if I may be permitted to cite a few statistics, (these statistics are restricted to the 15 Commonwealth countries eligible for non-permanent membership in the Councils, exclusive therefore of the United Kingdom), the percentage of the combined contribution of the Commonwealth countries ranges from 8.41 per cent (Canada 3.12) for the regular budget of the United Nations to 15 per cent (Canada 9.8) for the regular programmes of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Commonwealth members contributed 7.7 per cent of the budget of the Special Fund (Canada 3.4), 9.9 per cent of the budget for UNICEF (Canada 3.15) and 9.8 per cent of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance budget (Canada 4.75). Voluntary contributions to meet the shortfall for UNEF and the United Nations Congo Operation on the part of three Commonwealth members have been substantial indeed: over 9 per cent (Canada 5.52). The Commonwealth countries have contributed on a large scale in terms of money, of men and of equipment to United Nations peacekeeping operations. Canada, amongst others, has provided military personnel for every one of the 15 odd peacekeeping operations undertaken since 1945. In July 1961, two Commonwealth countries, Canada and India, made up 43% of the total UNEF force. In October 1963, this percentage was even slightly higher, 44%. In the Congo, as of September 1962, the Commonwealth contribution constituted 61% of the United Nations force; six Commonwealth countries, Canada amongst them, were supplying nearly 11,000 officers and men. In November 1963, this Commonwealth contribution, by only four countries, including Canada, was still of 2,166 officers and men, that is 31% of the force. In West Irian, Pakistan provided the bulk of the force in which Canada also participated.

Commonwealth countries have also played a prominent and useful role in the work of the Economic and Social Council. In these circumstances it is perhaps not out of place, Mr. Chairman, to ask the question: "Can the General Assembly expect Member States to contribute substantially to the political, economic and social activities of the United Nations unless it is prepared to offer them a reasonable prospect of representation on the organs controlling these activities?"

almost to the exclusion of all others -

With the emphasis in recent years on geographic loyalties -/there has grown a tendency in some quarters to write off the Commonwealth as a group in the United Nations. My Delegation, Mr. Chairman, does not accept this viewpoint. In our view, the Commonwealth represents a happy combination of both geographical and functional considerations which make it eminently suitable as a group for purposes of representation on and effective contribution to the work of the Councils. I would also remind the Committee that the Commonwealth group itself in the United Nations, which consisted of a small number of six members at the birth of the United Nations, in 1946, has since grown to a total of 16. In a few days there will be two other applicants for membership, both from the Commonwealth. And the number is not closed. My Delegation is therefore firmly opposed to any suggestion which does not take fully into account the existence of the Commonwealth and its contribution to United Nations affairs.

The first part of the document discusses the importance of maintaining accurate records of all transactions. It emphasizes that every entry should be supported by a valid receipt or invoice. The text also mentions the need for regular audits to ensure the integrity of the financial data. Furthermore, it highlights the role of the accounting department in providing timely and accurate information to management for decision-making purposes.

In addition, the document outlines the procedures for handling discrepancies and errors. It states that any irregularities should be reported immediately to the supervisor and investigated thoroughly. The text also discusses the importance of maintaining confidentiality of financial information and the consequences of unauthorized disclosure. Moreover, it mentions the need for ongoing training and development for the accounting staff to stay updated with the latest industry practices and regulations.

The document concludes by reiterating the commitment to transparency and accountability in all financial reporting. It expresses confidence in the accounting team's ability to deliver high-quality results and support the organization's strategic goals. Finally, it provides contact information for any further inquiries or assistance.

Indeed, it would be ironical if the United Nations failed to recognize a group of nations dedicated to international cooperation over and above regional and racial differences. After all, this is one of the main objectives which the United Nations itself is pursuing.

The task before us is to give adequate representation on the Council to the new members who have joined the United Nations since 1945. We want to do this. There is not the slightest doubt in our minds that enlargement is the answer to the problem, and that it must be adequate in both the Security Council, and in ECOSOC, to permit an equitable allocation of seats. This equitable distribution of seats cannot be based exclusively on geography but must take full account of the criteria set out in Article 23, <sup>(of the Charter)</sup> the most important of which, as I have noted, is the contribution of members to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization. It must therefore take into account the existence of the Commonwealth and of its contribution to U.N. affairs, a consideration to which my Government and the people of Canada attach the utmost importance. Finally, we must remember that the membership of the United Nations has more than doubled since 1945 and is still growing. It is apparent therefore that while avoiding undesirable inflation we should move in the direction of restoring the ratio between the total of the membership and the number of seats open to election in order to satisfy each grouping - those provided for under the Gentleman's Agreement of 1946, and the new members. ✓

Expansion, which would make for a just re-distribution (and provide adequate representation on the Councils for all groups, the old members and the new members) may be prevented unless the Soviet Delegation reconsiders its attitude. If it does not, it will be responsible for this injustice to the new members from Asia and Africa. But, it is to expansion and equitable representation for all that we have to address ourselves now, in order that we may lay the ground for a happier and more fruitful future in this Organization, remembering however that a patch-up job in these last days of an Assembly may do more harm than good. It is in this light that my Delegation will examine all concrete proposals put before the Committee for expansion of the Security Council and ECOSOC.
