and he did so the greater part of the time at such extortionate rates that those who borrowed could never recover from their dependent position. The interest ate up their capital. Would hon. members, in view of these facts, be surprised to find that our industries were in a languishing condition, or to hear that there were so many failures, so much ruin, and so much misery in the country. There was no reason for such surprise, because with these excessive rates of interest at which money was loaned, our industries could not prosper, and in view of these facts, they might be certain of one thing, that failures instead of diminishing, would continue to increase in number. One of the hon. gentlemen who had preceded him had said that money was merchandize. Admitting which—however, he would not do—that money was merchandize, he could never consent that it could be looked upon like any article of ordinary merchandize. Money, for instance, did not deteriorate in value like other effects. It could vary in value, it was true, but slowly. It was the basis on which depended the valuation of all other merchandize. It was then a good thing—he would even say it was necessary—that the rate of interest should be fixed from time to time. Moreover, money always had its course. If a man borrowed a hundred louis, he would not be uneasy if he had a hundred louis in money in his pocket to pay them; but he might be ruined if he were asked for this money at any moment, when he might not have it to spare, even though his property and merchandize were worth double the sum that he owed. It would be said in favour of the usurer before this House, that usury rendered a service to the poor, since there were so many borrowers, in spite of the high rate of interest demanded; but it might more particularly be said that necessity knew no reason, and that he who borrowed was forced to do so by the necessity of the moment. Besides, where was he, however poor he might be, that had no hope? and, when he borrowed this money, in 99 out of a 100 cases he felt sure he could repay it; but once in the hands of the usurer, he was not allowed to escape from the toils until he had sold his property and his family was plunged into misery. He, for his part, believed that all those who wished to protect our agricultural class and our industries, and who wished to see our industries assume their proper position in this country, as well as all those who further desired to do an act of Christian charity with regard to the greatest portion of our population, ought to support with all their power the measure which was now before the House. An hon. member who had spoken before him had said that he could not support this measure because it fixed the rate of interest too high—at 8 per cent. For his part, he would not support this Bill in its present shape, if it was so fixed irrevocably; but, as the hon. member for Richelieu had explained, when moving the second reading of the Bill, 8 per cent. was but the maximum rate at which money was to be loaned. What the hon. gentleman wished, and what he desired, for his part, was that the legal rate of interest should be fixed at six per cent. Having made these remarks, he would not detain the House any longer.

LAW OF EVIDENCE AMENDMENT BILL.

[Bill No. 41.]

(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the principle involved in the Bill had been affirmed by the passing of the Bill of the hon. member for North York. It was of much greater consequence to extend the principle to the class of cases set forth in this Bill, than to cases of common assault. When the Bill of the hon. member for North York was before the House, he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) stated that he was not prepared to go the length of allowing criminals of every description to plead on their own behalf, and that, if defendants in cases of common assault were allowed to give evidence, the principle should be applied to cases where a man's right to property might be involved. There were cases where a man's right of property might be brought in question in a criminal suit, and in such cases the defendant should be admitted as a witness on his own behalf. Such a principle was in accordance with the law of Ontario. A case in point had lately come to his knowledge. It appeared that a bridge over a stream, and which went across a man's farm, was used by the public, and when he attempted to close the bridge, not having obtained compensation from the municipality, he was indicted for destroying the bridge. He was not allowed to give evidence on his own behalf, and had he been found guilty, he would have been liable to a very severe penalty. He proposed, therefore, that in such cases, defendants should be compellable witnesses.

MR. DEVLIN said the Bill should not now be read a second time, as it was not desirable, on the eve of dissolution, if he might use the expression, to deal with so important a question in a loose way. He thought it should be left over till next Session, in the hope that some large and comprehensive measure might be introduced, which would settle the question once and for all. He was opposed to the mode of procedure, which had prevailed for years, being changed in this way.

MR. PALMER said he was entirely opposed to any alteration in the procedure laid down in the ordinary criminal law, because he thought criminals might, if that law was altered, come to trifle with an oath. But, in the cases referred to in this Bill, which were almost similar in their character to civil cases, he did not think it would be right to entirely exclude a man from giving evidence on his own behalf. With regard to criminal matters, he might say that he did not approve of a man being "badgered" into making a statement, as was the case in France, which might damage him, but preferred the old English method of believing a man innocent until he was found guilty.

MR. BABY said that when the Bill proposed by the hon. member for North York was before the House, he called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that its tendency was to change the present system of criminal procedure in toto, and that it would be opening a wide door for further changes. His prediction had, to a certain extent, been verified, for the hon. member for Frontenac, now introduced a Bill which would infringe on the Civil Law of Quebec and other Provinces. This Parliament had no right to legislate for the Province of Quebec or other Provinces in civil matters, and he would oppose the Bill to the utmost of his power. It would tend to cause perjury, which, as legal gentlemen well knew, was of too frequent occurrence already. A woman might, on behalf of her husband, be tempted to state that which was false, or she might do the same thing to injure him.

MR. CAMERON said the House had already affirmed the principle of the Bill. It had been conceded that, in cases of common assault, a person might be a competent witness on his own behalf. The class of cases referred to in this Bill were of a similar character, and he could not, therefore, concur in the objection taken by the hon. member for Montreal East.

MR. LANGEVIN said that what they contended was that the rights of Local Legislatures should not be infringed. If the Bill, passed to its second reading it must be understood that it would be amended.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Fifty minutes past
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 11th April, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ELECTION OF A NEW MEMBER.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificate of the election and return of Thomas Robert McInnes, Esquire, to represent the electoral district of New Westminster, Province of British Columbia.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

MR. COSTIGAN said he wished to raise a question of privilege, and read an article in which he had been seriously attacked. He thought the House would admit his right to justify himself, and he considered the rules of the House gave him the right to defend himself. He believed that he had been so attacked in several newspapers.

MR. HOLTON: I venture to say that it is very inconvenient, and that it is no question of privilege—

MR. MASSON: How do you know?

MR. HOLTON: For hon. gentlemen to answer strictures of the Press on their conduct. We have had somewhat too much of that this Session. I do not know to what the hon. gentleman proposes to call attention, but he avows that it relates to remarks of the Press on his public conduct. We really cannot waste our time in controversies with the Press, which is open to any hon. gentleman who feels himself aggrieved. It is an abuse and not a vindication of the privileges of the House for an hon. gentleman to bring up these controversies here.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that he differed toto cælo from the hon. gentleman. He was surprised that an old parliamentarian like the hon. gentleman should make such a statement. Unfortunately, he had perceived that during the past two or three years the hon. gentleman changed his ideas of parliamentary practice according as the views of the day on a particular question made him lean one way or the other. Every hon. gentleman was the guardian of his own honour.

MR. HOLTON: Undoubtedly.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And as a representative of the people in this House, he not only had the right and the privilege, but he was bound in duty to himself and his position, and those he represented, to bring any matter affecting his position before the House. No one knew better than the hon. gentleman himself that the first thing done when a respectable periodical in England made a statement at variance with the fact regarding a member of the House, was, as a privilege and a duty, to bring it up in the House; and this duty and privilege was always respected and recognized in the Imperial House of Commons.

MR. HOLTON: Quote precedents for that. I deny it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman asked him to quote precedents. If he only had half an hour in the library—

MR. HOLTON: You had better take that half hour.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He would undertake to show that this was the case. There were innumerable precedents for this kind.

MR. HOLTON: I dispute the fact.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had never before heard this matter questioned. This seemed something like an attempt to muzzle an hon. gentleman. It was quite clear that the hon. gentleman was getting blasé with his long parliamentary experience and labours. If the hon. gentleman was ennuyé with this kind of thing he could retire. In what free body of representative men would anyone interfere between an hon. gentleman, a colleague and a brother member, who stated that he felt that it was his bounden duty to make an explanation in consequence of what was stated against him in the public Press.

MR. HOLTON said that such a practice would not be tolerated in England, and it was never tolerated here until a few years ago, when the right hon. gentleman led the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) was going to make use of his seat in the House to engage in a controversy with several journals.

AN HON. MEMBER: No; it is a defence.

MR. HOLTON said that this was a breach of the privileges of the House. The time of 206 gentlemen should not be taken up for an indefinite period with such a controversy. As to his being blasé, the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had been some years longer in Parliament than he, and he was not disposed to exchange compliments with the hon. gentleman; but, if either of them were blasé he thought that the hon. gentleman was entitled to the palm. The hon. gentleman had shifted his position on this and various other questions with an alacrity and a facility of which he was by no means a master. He stood by the privileges of the House; and he would repeat, that it was an abuse of these privilege, for an hon. gentleman to engage the time and the attention of the House with any such controversy.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman ventured to say that he had shown an alacrity to change in this relation, which was characteristic of himself (Sir John A. Macdonald), in one breath, while previously the hon. gentleman alleged that the practice of quoting newspapers arose in his time, when he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was leader of the House: If this were so—and it was not—he was merely carrying out the course which was sanctioned by himself.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. HOLTON: Since Confederation ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. gentleman did not know but that the hon. member for Victoria would move to bring parties before the Bar of the House. The hon. gentleman knew nothing about the matter which it was proposed to bring up. There was a reason for [this attitude; the hon. gentleman thought that there was going to be some other matters besides newspapers to be brought up hereafter; and this they all knew.

MR. MASSON: Mr. Speaker—

MR. HOLTON: I have the floor. I rise to a question of privilege. The right hon. gentleman has made a statement, the purport of which I do not at all understand. He has made it in a menacing manner; he pointed his finger at me, and I call upon the right hon. gentleman to explain the meaning of this statement.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: All I can say is, that, if I pointed my finger at the hon. gentleman, I take my finger back.

MR. MASSON said that, if there was anything without precedent in the House, it was the conduct of the hon. member for Chateauguay, who had disappointed his political and personal friends under the present circumstances. In his ten years' experience, he had never heard an hon. member oppose the bringing up of a question of privilege. Did the hon. gentleman not remember the newspaper correspondent which was brought before the Bar of the House by his late leader, Mr. Dorion, because of an article in the paper which displeased his own political and personal friends; and would he deny the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., the right of bringing up a question which affected him. The hon. gentlemen did not know what was in this correspondence. It might be an attack on another hon. member. During the past few days he had been disappointed with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton), not only here, but in other places, forgetting the position he had formerly taken in this House. The hon. gentleman had not impartially considered the rules of the House, even regarding ordinary routine business; and he had allowed his partizan feeling, to interfere with his action; of this, they had had an instance, no later than that morning in Committee, when the hon. gentleman was overruled.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order.

MR. MASSON: I bow to the Chair, but I wish you would also stop the hon. gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: As to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) means to say, it is entirely out of my power to determine in advance, or even to anticipate; but, with regard to the discussion of matters that appear in newspapers, the practice of replying to them in this House, I must say that I think, as far as I can judge of Parliamentary practice, and precedent, and law, that it is exceedingly objectionable. If any hon. member finds, or thinks he finds, in a newspaper article reason for bringing the proprietor or writer to the Bar of the House to answer to a charge of breach of privilege, it is clearly within his right to move in the matter in this House, to bring it under the notice of this House, and to move a resolution, and ask the House to pass it, for the apprehension of the party. The whole practice of referring to newspaper articles in Parliament is of very modern date. It is not very long ago since it was not allowed, even in debate, to quote a passage from a newspaper article in the House. With regard to quotations from newspaper articles in the House of Commons in England, by way of explanation, I may say that I believe that such a practice is exceedingly rare at least. Hon. members have this Session called attention to newspaper articles, stating that they were unfounded and unwarranted, and there the whole matter rests. The House has chosen to tolerate it, and I did not feel at all justified in interfering, though I felt all along that the practice was objectionable, and growing to very extraordinary proportions. Although I did not desire to assume the position of a lecturer to the House, I very often felt tempted to express an opinion; but I now feel that the hon. member for Victoria should have the same opportunity which several other hon. members have had during this and previous Sessions.

MR. MACKENZIE: I must express my surprise at the extraordinary vigour of the remarks of the hon. member for Terrebonne. I would have said something then had not the hon. gentleman been called to order for impropriety.

MR. MASSON: No; I was not.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, for referring to Committees.

MR. MASSON: That is not impropriety.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Chateauguay had, on one or two occasions this Session, prevented some of his own friends from bringing such matters before the House. on the ground that it was an improper proceeding, and had repeatedly spoken to him (Mr. Mackenzie) about the matter. It was his (Mr. Mackenzie's) intention to have asked the opinion of the Speaker regarding a practice which was, undoubtedly, inconvenient and served no useful purpose. The mere fact that a newspaper had said something wrong or improper concerning a member, was no reason why it should be read in the House. Those who had been in public life for a lengthened period must know that it was utterly impossible to attempt, even if they were disposed to do so, to correct all the mis-statements which appear in newspapers. He was willing to believe that such mis-statements as regarded himself were innocuous, and that they would be corrected by the Press on the other side, if they were of a gross character. Of course, it was open to any hon. member to take the method which the Speaker had referred to, but if every hon. gentleman was to exercise the right which the hon. gentleman who, in this case, felt himself aggrieved was about to exercise, it would lead to great delay of business; besides, it would be altogether unparliamentary to do so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would call the attention of the House to a case which, to the best of my recollection, occurred during the present Session of the Imperial Parliament. Sir Robert Ferguson, I think that was the hon. gentleman's name—

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Sir James, most likely.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He made a speech in the country wherein he attacked Mr. Gladstone, or Mr. Lowe—I forget which—and that speech was reported in a newspaper—

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman, I think, has forgotten the circumstance. It was not a newspaper which made the attack. One hon. gentleman asked another whether he really made a statement which he was reported to have made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But there was a correspondence in which the person attacked said, he saw a certain speech in a newspaper, and asked an explanation. Sir Robert Ferguson's contention was that he was not responsible in the House for statements he made outside, but only for statements he made in the House. The complaint was brought up on a report made in a newspaper of his speech.

MR. HOLTON: I believe it was Mr. Hardy who challenged the member to read on the floor of the House what he was reported to have said outside.

MR. SPEAKER: That is similar to the O'Connell case, where Mr. O'Connell was called upon before the House to state whether he made a certain speech outside or not.

MR. COSTIGAN said he was sorry to trespass on the time of the House, but as he had not, since he took his seat in the House, spoken on a question of privilege, he thought he might be permitted to make an explanation. He thought the hon. member for Chatoanguay deserved great credit for his perfect knowledge of Parliamentary rules, but he doubted if the hon. gentleman was quite competent to anticipate what he (Mr. Costigan) wished to say. Having perfect confidence in the hon. gentleman's spirit of fair play, he would state his case to show that he had a right to move in this matter. What he complained of was published in the telegraphic news, dated April 1st, to the St. John Freeman, and the name of an hon. member of the House was used as the authority for a charge against himself contained therein. He took this opportunity of contradicting it, and leaving the hon. gentleman, whose name was mentioned, to contradict or substantiate it. The paragraph was as follows:—

“De Veber intends bringing before the Public Accounts Committee the circumstances connected with two contracts given by the late Government in 1871 to Costigan and Mr. Renaud, then an M.P., for supplying ties to the Intercolonial Railway. Though these gentlemen got the contracts, they took them in the names respectively of Collins and Girouard, who were supposed to do the work. The latter gentleman is now here pressing for the payment of $7,000, which he alleges is still due on the contract, but which it appears from the accounts of the Department was drawn by Costigan under authority, which he claimed was granted to him by Girouard. Now, Girouard denies that he ever gave Costigan such authority; that he, in fact, really performed the work of supplying ties at a remunerative figure, but the profits of the transaction were, it is alleged, gobbled up by his partner, who was a member of Parliament, and one of those exceedingly virtuous gentlemen who took strong ground against Anglin.”

This article stated in so many words, on the authority of the hon. member for the city of St. John, that he (Mr. Costigan) had gobbled up $7,000 belonging to another man, and that this man was in Ottawa to press his claim. Now, he characterized that as a slander against himself; he defied any man inside the House or out of it to establish by the slightest proof that he had ever gobbled up either public or private money. If the hon. member for St. John did not give authority for his name being so used, it would certainly be most unfair if he did not state clearly that he did not furnish the information upon which that despatch was founded. If he did not choose to do so, he (Mr. Costigan) contended that it was his duty to bring him before a Committee and give him an opportunity of proving how false and how unworthy this attack was which had been made upon him as a member of the House. It was clearly the hon. gentleman's duty to do either the one thing or the other. He hoped the House would excuse him for taking up so much time, but he thought it would be admitted that, amongst the questions of privilege which had been brought up there was not one in which a member had more right to rise in his own defence than in this.

MR. DEVEBER said he had nothing to do with the article which the hon. gentleman had read; he had not himself seen it, and he certainly did not inspire it. Beyond this, he did not think it necessary to say anything.

MR. MASSON said if the hon. member for Chateaugay would allow him, he would read a quotation to show that newspapers could be brought into the House:

"When a complaint is made of a newspaper, the newspaper must be produced, in order that the paragraphs complained of may be read. On the 30th May, 1848, a member complained of the report of his speech on the previous day——"

MR. CASGRAIN: I do not know why I should listen to a lecture which the hon. member for Terrebonne may wish to read to the hon. member for Chateaugay.

MR. SPEAKER: The question as to the propriety of a proceeding having been raised, I think it desirable that the House should have full knowledge of what the law is. I do not think the hon. member for Terrebonne was going to discuss the question, but merely wished to cite an authority which he has placed in my hand:

"When a complaint is made of a newspaper, the newspaper must be produced, in order that the paragraphs complained of may be read. On the 30th May, 1848, a member complained of the report of his speech on the previous day in a newspaper, and was proceeding to address the House, when he was stopped by the Speaker, as he had no copy of the newspaper on which to found his complaint. The member who makes the complaint must also be prepared with the names of the printer or publisher, if he intend to follow up his complaint with a motion."

That, however, was a complaint as to an inaccurate report of a speech made in the House of Commons, and therefore might be held to relate immediately to proceedings in the House. Whether hon. members having other grievances, have a right to bring them into the House, is an entirely different question. In the case under discussion, a certain statement has been made in regard to a transaction which took place some years ago. The question whether an hon. member had a right to vindicate his own character and conduct by making a statement in the House contradicting a newspaper article, is a very serious one for the House to consider, as there might be no limit whatever to a discussion arising between members of the House and newspapers out of doors.

MR. DYMOND said he might be allowed to say one word in vindication of the course pursued by his hon. friend from Chateaugay by mentioning one little incident which had occurred during the last few days, which would show that he was perfectly even-handed in the advice he gave to the hon. members on both sides of the House. About a week ago, a base article reflecting on his (Mr. Dymond's) personal honour as a member of the House appeared in a newspaper published in this city but the paper in which it appeared immediately apologized, without any action on his part, for what had been somewhat inadvertently inserted. That article, however, had been extensively copied and sent broadcast over the land by newspaper correspondents opposed to him politically. He did not know whether those persons would do him justice by inserting a retraction or apology. He conferred with the hon. member for Chateaugay as to whether it was not his duty to call the attention of the House to the matter; but he suggested, just in the same way as he had done to the hon. gentleman opposite, that there had already been too many of these discussions in the House as to false statements by the Press, and that it would be far better for those on the Government side to set an example, so that they might be discontinued. He took the hon. gentleman's advice, and he mentioned this incident to show that he had acted fairly between members on both sides of the House.

Mr. HOLTON said that, as he took the responsibility of expressing his views to the House, he wished simply to remark, in order that the discussion might not be continued, that it was with reference to this practice, not with reference to the merits of any particular attack made on the hon. gentleman, he had made his previous observations. He thought the course he took had been abundantly vindicated. If, during the many years he had been a member of Parliament, he had called the attention of the House to the strictures of the Press upon himself, he should have projected himself in a very disagreeable manner on the attention of the House. He thought that, unless some definite action was intended to be taken by hon. gentlemen, the custom of bringing forward these strictures by the Press was one not to be cultivated or adopted; he would even go the length of saying, not to be tolerated.

Mr. TUPPER said it was due, not only to the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., but to every hon. gentleman in the House, that he should bring forward this matter. The hon. gentleman had done wisely in taking the earliest opportunity to meet a charge of so grave a character in so straightforward and manly a way. This was particularly shown by the fact that the hon. gentleman whose name was mentioned in the article as the authority for the information refused, in any way to become responsible for the statement which had been published. He (Mr. Tupper) did not think that the advice given to the hon. member for North York by the hon. member for Chateauguay was good advice, because it was absolutely necessary for the personal honour and character of the hon. member for North York that he should bring the matter of which he complained before the House. When he (Mr. Tupper), on a former occasion, took the liberty of insinuating that the hon. member for North York had some connection with the reporting staff of the Globe, the hon. gentleman rose in his place and not only reprimanded him—

Mr. YOUNG: I rise to a question of order. If the hon. gentleman is to be permitted to go into this matter, other matters, of a cognate character, will have to be brought before the House also. I would ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to the question before the Chair.

Mr. TUPPER: I want you to bear in mind that I am simply referring now to the statement made by the hon. member for North York when the matter was under discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman spoke of the matter only to show that the hon. member for Chateauguay was not actuated by any personal bias, or by anything else than a sense of the proprieties of Parliament. A serious charge was made by himself, and the hon. member against him (Mr. Costigan) advised that it should not be brought before the House. Of course the whole matter was only conversational. Under the circumstances, he would like to say a few words with regard to this matter of privilege, as a great many hon. members often rose with the idea that they were privileged to do so when there was no question of privilege at all; and if they spoke, they did so only on suffrage. As he understood it, a question of privilege, according to the modern practice, at all events, must be something attacking a member of the House, as member of the House, attributing to him corrupt and improper motives because he spoke or voted in a certain way, assaulting a member of Parliament going to or coming from the House, on account of his behaviour in Parliament, because it was held that no member of this House should be accountable in any way except to the House; therefore, attacking a member outside the House was a breach of the privileges of Parliament. This was the rule, and he considered it was a proper rule. Where charges were made against any member, he was satisfied they were breaches of the privileges of the House. He thought that if the hon. member chose to ask for an enquiry he had a right to do so. If it was only conversational, any member had a right to put an end to the conversation at any moment by calling attention to the fact.

ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

MR. MACKENZIE: I rise at present to perform a duty which I feel, in a sense, to be one in which I may take great pleasure; in another sense, it is one which gives me some pain. I rise to propose an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General, expressive of the feelings of this House towards him on the occasion of his departure from this country, and I am sure that I completely represent the feelings of every member of this House, when I say we look upon that event, now near at hand, as one which will be regretted by every resident of Canada, as well as every member of this House. The position of Governor-General of a great colony like Canada, a country exalted above the ordinary condition of colonies, and embracing within its borders an entirely new system of Government—although that system of government is consistent with that of other great British colonies. Here we have many Provinces, forming part of the federation, though they exist in a semi-independent condition as regards the Dominion. Under such a system, the duties, labours, anxieties and responsibilities of the Chief Executive of the country are correspondingly increased, and we can easily understand the difficulties which must beset even the most experienced statesman coming from the Mother Country to assume the conduct of affairs, and act as the representative of Her Majesty in this country. We are, therefore, expected, on the arrival of a new Governor-General, to aid him by our sympathies in the discharge of the responsible duties which he is called upon to discharge. It may, however, be thought by some, that the office of a Governor-General or Lieutenant-Governor of any of the British colonies is one of comparatively small importance as regards the political life and general prosperity of that country. I do not believe that to be the case. I believe that the Governor of any country has a great deal to do, by judicious management of the affairs which are committed to his hands, in promoting or retarding the general prosperity of that particular colony. We have had in Canada a long experience of the public men of England who have been sent out here in that capacity. We have had some of the ablest men that could be furnished by the Empire sent to rule over us in the name of Her Majesty; but, I venture to say, that amongst all the celebrated men who have held that position in this country, none will be remembered with feelings of greater gratitude or kindness than the present Governor-General, Lord Dufferin. He has endeavoured, since his advent as Governor-General, not merely to discharge his high duties with impartiality, and in that manner which becomes the representative of Her Majesty, in a constitutionally-governed country, inhabited by a high-spirited, intelligent people; but he has endeavoured, by every means in his power, to make the name of Canada known all over the world, so far as his personal influence and efforts, aided by his political position, would enable him to do so. He has exerted himself to accomplish this end in a way that no other Governor-General has done. To be sure, no other Governor-General has had quite the same opportunities, because Canada, as an aggregation of smaller Provinces, has not been in existence many years. His Excellency has endeavoured to make himself intimately acquainted with the wants and resources of all portions of the vast Dominion over which he was called to rule; and, by his successive journeyings through the various Provinces of the British Empire on this continent, he has, perhaps, made himself better acquainted with the entire political system under which we live, and the people which inhabit the various Provinces, and their resources, than any Governor-General who ever lived in this country. It is a matter of congratulation to us to know that such effort has been made by one who holds so distinguished a position among his peers in the mother land; and, although we shall very soon have occasion to lament his departure from among us, we may yet calculate with absolute certainty that the intimate knowledge and warm appreciation of this country, which he has shown in all his public utterances, will lead him to give a hearty response to any request made by this Dominion to him, and that he will do anything in his power which can advance the material interests of this country. I have often remarked the extraordinary influence which some of His Excellency's speeches have had in the Old Country. During his visits to several of the Provinces, speeches have been made by him which commanded the attention of all parts of England, Scotland and Ireland, as well as other countries, especially with reference to the various resources of this country. Those speeches were the opinion of a distinguished English statesman as to its capacity for maintaining a vast population proud of its relations to the Empire, and the certainty of future greatness; and I venture to say that no agency has been more potent in making Canada known to the world than these utterances of His Excellency, circulated as they have been through the Press of Europe. Whatever may be His Excellency's future, we can never fail to look upon these speeches of his, and his other efforts, otherwise than as efforts made for the advancement of Canadian interests, as efforts which we have no doubt—which we have abundant proof already—have conduced greatly to that end. It is, therefore, with the very greatest pleasure that I assume the task, as a member of the Government, of moving an Address expressive, in some degree, of the feelings which this House holds for His Excellency, of our approval of his course as Governor-General, and our hearty good wishes for his future career. I should but ill-fulfil the task which I feel to be a difficult one, were I to refrain from saying one word regarding our personal relations. It has been my fortune, as a member of the Government, to have, as a matter of course, the most intimate relations with His Excellency for a number of years and I can only say that, in this respect, as anyone else who has had the same relation must say, that they have been of the most gratifying kind, and it is always a matter of congratulation to find that the experience of our public men with those who have been sent from Britain for a time to act in the capacity of representative to Her Majesty, should be of such a character as to leave no ill-feeling behind. It will be observed, Sir, that I have made a reference in this Address to His Excellency's distinguished consort, and I need only say, in regard to that distinguished lady, that she has amply and fully seconded His Excellency's efforts in all that could possibly be expected by the most exacting, in the position she has occupied. Every member of this House will always gratefully remember Her Excellency's efforts to minister to their enjoyment, and all good wishes will accompany her from Canadians through all her future life. I beg to move, seconded by Sir John A. Macdonald:—

“That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, expressing the deep feeling of regret of this House at his approaching departure from Canada, and it is our duty to assure His Excellency that the zealous devotion of his great abilities on all occasions to the public interests is held in high appreciation; and that especially the visits to each of the Provinces and Territories of the Dominion, by which His Excellency has familiarized himself with the character of the people and the resources of the country; and the eloquent speeches in which His Excellency has enlarged on those topics have been attended with the most beneficial results in attracting attention to Canada; and that we are highly sensible of the great degree in which literature and art and the industrial pursuits have received encouragement from His Excellency's efforts and liberality; and assuring His Excellency and his distinguished consort that they will bear with them on leaving us our warmest wishes for their future welfare and happiness; that we rejoice in the conviction that, though Canada may no longer possess the advantage of His Excellency's experience and knowledge of public affairs in so exclusive a degree as she has enjoyed them in the past, she will continue to have in His Excellency a friend and advocate; and that it is our heartfelt wish that, for many years, the Empire at large may have the benefit of His Excellency's ripe wisdom, experience and eminent abilities.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, like the hon. the First Minister, I rise with mingled feelings of regret and pleasure to second this resolution. Like him, like the people of Canada and like the members of this House, I feel the greatest regret at the approaching departure of the illustrious representative of our Sovereign in this country. But I rise with pleasure to express in my humble way my great appreciation of his great qualities as the representative of our Sovereign during the six years he has fitly and fully represented the dignity, the responsibility, the power and the influence of the Crown. Like the hon. the First Minister, I would say that the office of Governor-General is not a mere formal office. It is one of great power. It is one of great dignity. It is one of the greatest responsibility, and the Governor-General is a person elevated, like the Sovereign, far above the shifting party politics of the day. He is at the helm of state. He guides, advises, warns and counsels, and he—while others, absorbed in party politics, may forget for the moment the interests of the country—has only one object before him, and that is the common interests of all. That is a duty thrown by the Sovereign upon her representative, and everyone must admit, and everyone cheerfully admits, that the duty has been fully and ably performed by the Earl of Dufferin. It is especially important on this continent, where Republican institutions prevail, that monarchy should show its beneficent side; and if every monarchy was rendered pleasant, if ever the principles of monarchy were vindicated, and the usefulness of monarchical institutions fully vindicated, they have been vindicated in the manner in which the representative of the monarch has performed his duties during the last six years. And so it is that feelings of regret prevail on both sides of this House, and among both political parties into which this country is divided, at the approaching departure of his Excellency; and that they unite, as I know they do cordially, sincerely and from the bottom of their hearts, in their tribute of respect and affection to the Earl of Dufferin. As the hon. the Prime Minister has said, the Address would not be perfect if it did not contain our sentiments towards His Excellency's consort. Under a Government like this, under monarchy, and in a country governed by monarchical institutions, the consort of the Sovereign, or the consort of the representative of the Sovereign, always holds, and must be held to assume a political character, and that illustrious lady, as the Prime Minister has truly said, has fitly and well seconded the efforts of the Governor-General to maintain the dignity, the honour and the popularity of the position which they have held. While we regret, Sir, that so soon we are to be bereft of the presence of these two illustrious personages, we have the consolation to which my hon friend opposite alluded, that we have not lost their services for ever. Fortunately, the Governor-General is still a young man, is still in the prime of life. Although ripe in experience gathered from many lands, and through holding many positions, he is still a young man, and we may look forward to many years of his influence in a higher position,—high as his present position is,—in the counsels of the Mother Country. He has won, as we all know, and we have evidences of it from the honour that has been conferred upon him since he has been Governor-General, the confidence of the illustrious Lady he represents. Any one who reads the Press knows that he not only has the confidence of the fourth estate in England, but that of the Sovereign, and with the Sovereign and the Press both fully appreciating his great qualities, he will, I am satisfied, if Providence spares his life and health, for many years hold as high a position as, aye and a still higher position, than that he is about, to our infinite regret, to vacate. As this Address says, truly we, everyone of us, know that wherever he goes, whatever position he may be placed in he will always have a kindly remembrance of the Dominion of Canada. He knows quite well with what a feeling of affection the people of Canada regard him, and he would be less than man, or more than many if he did not return that feeling, but we know that he will do it. It is fortunate he is so young a man. If we look back, as I can, it will be seen that it is our mis-hap that of all the representatives of the Sovereign that have governed the old Provinces of Canada, there is only one still left, and he, from the position he at present holds, is deprived of the opportunity, whatever his desire to do so may be, of standing as the advocate of the future interests of Canada. But with a certain future, if God spares him, and health before him, we know we shall have, in the great sphere of usefulness that is open for him, when he leaves this country, after such a successful reign, for reign it was, a powerful, firm and sincere advocate of the best interests of the Dominion, in the Earl of Dufferin. These sentiments, I believe, must impress themselves, and do impress themselves, upon the hearts and reasons of everyone. With these remarks, I have the greatest pleasure in seconding the resolutions of the hon. the Prime Minister.

MR. LAURIER said he rose with much pleasure to support the motion. Nowhere, he was sure, would its sentiments be re-echoed with more sincerity or a warmer appreciation of the merits of its distinguished object than in the Province of Quebec, of which he was an humble representative. The kindly disposition of His Excellency, his admirable qualities as a public man, his studious desire to soften the asperities of public life in Canada, and above all, the respect and affection he had shown for all the institutions of Quebec on account of its inhabitants, had endeared him to them all without distinction of party or creed. He had shown more sympathy with its people than Governors of the same French race. The same good qualities had been displayed by him—happily in more tranquil times—as Lord Elgin had manifested at a troubled period of Canadian history. The people of Lower Canada would, like all their fellow-countrymen, deeply regret His Excellency's departure, and never cease to follow him with the kindest wishes for future happiness and suitable opportunities of well-doing. Lady Dufferin always enjoyed the respect and affection of the people, and would always retain a place in their hearts.

MR. LANGEVIN: I am happy to have this opportunity of being able, and in company with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who has just taken his seat, in the name of the French-Canadians, who formed such an important part of the population of the Dominion of Canada, to express their sentiments of deep regret on the occasion of the departure of His Excellency the Governor-General and his worthy consort. I concur fully, and I know that my countrymen in Lower Canada, the French-Canadians, equally with the people of other origins, will wholly concur in the sentiments that have been expressed by the hon. the First Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken on the subject of the regret we all feel to see His Excellency leave us. We have had, previous to the arrival of His Excellency, other Governors since 1841, and some of them have rendered themselves more popular than others with the Province of Quebec; their names will remain in the memory of the people of Lower Canada; that of Sir Charles Bagot especially is honoured and venerated by our population. The name, also, of Lord Elgin is still a name which is received with respect and applause by the public when mentioned in speeches here and elsewhere, and I am convinced that the name of Lord Dufferin will rest not less dear to the people of my Province in particular. His name is popular in Lower Canada, in the cottages and the villages, and in the most remote parts of the Province. This name of Lord Dufferin is so popular among the French Canadians that they have popularized it; he is by them called, not Lord Dufferin, but Lord Dufresne. They make of him a French Canadian, to such a great degree have they found him in sympathy with our race. Mr. Speaker, Lord Dufferin, since he has been at the head of the Government, has made himself acquainted with all parts of this country, even to its remotest and least populous Province; he has endeavoured to know and to identify himself with the population, and to make himself familiar with their necessities, and even with their prejudices. We have seen him on the shores of the Atlantic, and again on the shores of the Pacific. Later, we saw him in the midst of the Western plains, and why? Because he desired to acquaint himself with all our needs, and to visit the whole country; and I am convinced that when Lord Dufferin returns to his native country, if he is accorded some degree of leisure, he will not forget this country which he has governed with so much wisdom; and perhaps we will have some work from his able and elegant pen, which will, no doubt, not be a work on the subject of "High Latitude," but will speak with authority on the subject of the latitudes in which we live. Mr. Speaker, if we judge by the past, this will be an excessively interesting and important production; and I am thoroughly convinced that if our gracious Sovereign does not before long call His Excellency to some position higher even than the one he now fills in the Empire, he will cause to appear this work which will certainly be one to which we will refer with great pleasure, and which will be a most interesting and most useful production. In thus speaking of His Excellency the Governor-General, we cannot forget the amiable Lady who is his worthy consort. Lady Dufferin has always shown a most excellent and gracious disposition in meeting the requirements of our works of charity, in patronizing the bazaars, the fêtes, the examinations, and all that is interesting in connection with our great institutions of charity or education, not only of Lower Canada, but also of other parts of the country. Hence, her name will remain associated with that of Lord Dufferin, and long after they have left this country, their names will be remembered and blessed. They are going to leave this country, but they do so with our best wishes; and we will not cease to pray for their good fortune and prosperity, and, I am convinced that, before long, after His Excellency has quitted our shores, we will see and hope that our Gracious Sovereign will not fail to utilize his services, his talents, his great experience and ability, in some other eminent position. Having thus expressed myself, Mr. Speaker, I beg to thank the House for the attention it has accorded me, and to say that I fully concur with the terms of the proposed Address:

MR. MACKENZIE moved:

"That the said Resolution be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Mackenzie, Blake, Sir John A. Macdonald, Holton, Lafamme, Tupper, Smith (Westmoreland), Langevin, and Mason, to draft an Address to His Excellency thereon."

MR. MACKENZIE, from the said Committee, reported the draft of an Address, which is as follows:—

"To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir FREDERIC TEMPLE, Earl of Dufferin, Viscount and Baron Clandeboye of Clandeboye, in the County Down, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baron Dufferin and Clandeboye, of Balleleidy and Killeleagh, in the County Down, in the Peerage of Ireland, and a Baronet, Knight of the Most Illustrious Order of Saint Patrick, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, and Knight Commander of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Governor-General of Canada, and Vice-Admiral of the same, etc., etc., etc.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

"We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach Your Excellency with the expression of the deep feeling of regret which we experience at your approaching departure from Canada.

"We feel it to be a duty to assure Your Excellency that the zealous devotion of your great abilities on all occasions to the public interests is held in high appreciation; and that especially the visits to each of the Provinces and Territories of the Dominion, by which Your Excellency has familiarized yourself with the character of the people and the resources of the country, and the eloquent speeches in which Your Excellency has enlarged on those topics have been attended with the most beneficial results in attracting attention to Canada.

"We are highly sensible of the great degree in which literature and art and the industrial pursuits have received encouragement from Your Excellency's efforts and liberality.

"We venture to convey the assurance that Your Excellency and your distinguished Consort will bear with you on leaving us our warmest wishes for your future welfare and happiness; that we rejoice in the conviction that, though Canada may no longer possess the advantage of Your Excellency's experience and knowledge of public affairs in so exclusive a degree as she has enjoyed them in the past, this country will continue to have in Your Excellency a friend and advocate; and that it is our heartfelt wish that for many years the Empire at large may have the benefit of Your Excellency's ripe wisdom, experience and eminent abilities."

Address read the second time and agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed, and to be communicated to the Senate for their concurrence.

THE QUEBEC CRISIS.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved—

“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of bringing before the attention of this House the late political events which occurred in the Province of Quebec, and I may as well now read the motion which I propose to place in your hand. I move, Sir, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland—

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved that the recent dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec of his Ministers was, under the circumstances, unwise and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown since the concession of the principle of Responsible Government to the British North American Colonies.”

It was suggested the other day that the motion to be made on this subject should be an independent motion, standing upon its own merits, and in an amendable form, and my hon. friend from Chateauguay alluded as an example to the course taken with respect to the celebrated resolutions relative to Responsible Government which were passed in September, 1841. There is this difference between that case and this. Those were a series of propositions for the future Government of this country. Before that, Canada, which had long been fighting for Responsible Government, had not succeeded in obtaining that great boon, and those resolutions contained, in fact, a measure, not certainly in the form of a Bill, but still a measure for the future government and administration of this country. This, on the other hand, is an expression of a grievance. It is not a resolution for laying down a new rule for amending any rule for the administration of the affairs of this country, but it is a statement from the point of view to which I venture to call the attention of the House, of a grievance, of a breach of the constitutional system which now exists in Canada. It is a well-understood principle that the demand for supply and the assertion of grievances go hand in hand. It is the proper mode, and the expedient time for asserting grievances when supply is demanded by the Crown. And if that be so, the grievance must be stated in the language of the party who claims and states it as a grievance. It is no satisfaction of the right of the party wishing to make his complaint that he should be told by amendments that his grievance is not as alleged, but that it is another kind of grievance, and must be dealt with in another way. Therefore, I have thought it expedient to adopt the constitutional mode of making this motion at this time. This question, as I have already stated, I hope and believe should be approached without any party feeling one way or the other. It is a constitutional question, rising far above and beyond the temporary party struggles of the day. The hon. gentlemen opposite are as interested as we are on this side in the good government of the country, in laying down correct principles for its government. I have had something to do, and I am proud of having had something to do, with the Confederation of these Provinces, with the establishment of the present system, and the inauguration of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government is one of those, to their credit be it said, who forgot party feelings and party antecedents, forgot for the time all the old struggles, in a common effort to lift, if it were possible, the scattered Provinces from the slough into which they had in some degree fallen—at least in which the late Province of Canada had fallen—and to form one great Dominion under her Majesty's Crown and Government. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, as well as myself, and all the leading men of that day who were concerned in laying the foundation of the Dominion, must desire to see that a fair superstructure shall be raised on that foundation, and that it shall not be undermined, shall not be weakened or destroyed, or prejudiced by any mistake so early in our history. It is of the very greatest consequence that we should make no bad precedent. A bad precedent is a dangerous thing, especially when we are in the commencement of our history. A flaw, a disease at the roots of the young tree, is surely to lead to early decay, and, therefore, it is especially our duty to see that the tree planted by us, to change the metaphor from the building to the tree, shall be sheltered from every possible disease or infirmity which might destroy its value. A bad precedent is an exceedingly bad thing. If there is a mistake in administration, that can be cured by a change of Government or of policy. If there is bad legislation, that can be cured by repealing or amending the objectionable Acts; but a precedent once established, always has its influence. If you take up constitutional authorities, you will find precedents quoted from very early times. It is amusing to see how, when any constitutional question arises, gentlemen interested in such subjects follow out the line of precedents, and you will see sometimes quoted precedents in the time of George III., if not earlier, as of equal value and weight with the precedents that have been set in our own day and in our own time.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is good Tory doctrine.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Tory doctrine is a doctrine which says there must be a conservation of the constitution. It is good Tory doctrine to say that the treatment bestowed on the tree should vary with its growing wants and developments. A bad precedent being a bad thing, it is of the very greatest consequence, on this, the very first occasion when a great constitutional question has arisen, that we should deal with it in a manner worthy of it. I had thought, looking at public affairs from my point of view, that at this time, in the nineteenth century, and with all the advantages we have derived from English precedents, and our own system, a question of this kind could not have arisen in Canada again, but it only shows that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, when at this time, here in Canada, after having gained Responsible Government at the point of the bayonet, the first principles of Responsible Government should require to be discussed and defended in this House. The resolution I have submitted to the House states that the act of the Lieut.

Governor of the Province of Quebec, "was unwise and subversive of constitutional Government," and unconstitutional in every way. The first question that arises upon that resolution is whether we have any concern with that in this House. I need scarcely discuss the question, I suppose, and I hope, I believe, that the Lieutenant-Governors of the different Provinces stand now precisely in the same position with respect to the Governor-General and his Cabinet, as the Governor-General stands with respect to the Queen and her Cabinet; and, if that be admitted, then it must be held that the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada has a supervision of the acts of the Lieutenant-Governors. Before Confederation, as we all know, each of the Provinces had a Lieutenant-Governor. We had a Governor-General of British North America, who had, by his commission, a nominal supervision of the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, but that was a merely nominal supervision. Unless the Governor-General was personally present and superseded the Lieutenant-Governor, then those Governors stood in exactly the same relation to their respective Provinces as the Governor-General of British North America did to the old Province of Canada. They reported direct to Her Majesty's Government, or rather to the Colonial Minister who represented Her Majesty in that respect. It is well known that before Confederation all these Governors were liable to have their conduct discussed in the British Parliament. Every Governor of every colony in the British Empire was liable to have his conduct discussed, to have a motion made for his recall, or for his censure, or to censure Her Majesty's Government if they did not recall him. I need scarcely quote the numerous cases which occurred in days of old; but in modern times we all remember the case of Governor Eyre, whose conduct was discussed in the British House of Commons again and again, who was dismissed by Her Majesty's Government in consequence of the action that was taken in the House of Commons. We all know the case of Sir Charles Darling, who was recalled by Her Majesty's Government, and whose conduct and deportment and mode of Government were frequently discussed in the British Parliament. If hon. members would like to have reference to the discussions I will give them. The discussion on Governor Darling's case will be found in the English Hansard, volume 191, page 1964, and that on Governor Eyre's case in volume 184, pages 1069 and 1763. There was a remarkable case showing the freedom with which the British Parliament discussed the conduct of Colonial Governors on the motion made by the late Jos. Hume against successive Governors of British Guiana, where he attacked most strongly the conduct of the Government, charging them with a breach of honour and of duty in respect to these Governors, who were two rather distinguished men—Sir Henry Light and Governor Barkley. In this country, within my experience and that of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), Lord Cathcart announced in a very unusual way, rather as a soldier than as a politician—

MR. HOLTON : By your advice.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It was long before my time.

MR. HOLTON : It was after Lord Metcalfe came, and before Lord Elgin arrived.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It was before my time. The first Governor under whom I served was Lord Elgin.

MR. HOLTON : It was your party.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I never served either under Lord Metcalfe or Lord Cathcart. Only a year or two ago we had the case of Mr. Pope Hennessy, whose conduct in Barbadoes was discussed. Although he was not recalled, the debate in the House of Commons went so far as to show, perhaps in his superabundant zeal, because I believe it was such, he had, perhaps, outrun discretion, and he was, a very short period afterwards, removed to another colony. These cases, however, are not required in order to establish the fact that the Imperial Parliament have dealt with the acts, the merits and demerits of Colonial Governors with perfect freedom, and with perfect right, and the Imperial Government are held responsible, as they were in Governor Eyre's case, when they resisted several of the motions made to follow up his dismissal by punishment, and censure was endeavoured to be cast on them by several resolutions. In fact, it is said by the present Lord Grey in his book on Representative Government, that, in some respects, the colonies have an advantage over the Mother Country. The Sovereign can do no wrong, but if the representative of the Sovereign does wrong, the people of the colony have the right to appeal to the foot of the Throne, and hold the Imperial Ministers responsible if they do not do justice to the colony. I will quote a short passage. Earl Grey says, at page 346 :—

“But there was this most important difference between a Colonial Governor and an English Sovereign of the Houses of Plantagenet or Tudor, that the former was responsible to a distant and generally an impartial authority, to which the Colonists could always appeal to relieve them from a Governor who abused his power. The Crown could recall any Governor who failed in the discharge of his duties; and if it refused to do so on a well-grounded complaint from the inhabitants of a Colony, they were entitled to lay their grievance before Parliament, to which the Ministers on whose advice the Crown had acted were bound to answer for what had been done.”

My contention is, and I do not suppose it will be disputed, that the same power that rested in the Imperial Parliament with respect to Colonial Governors appointed by direct command of Her Majesty, exists with respect to the Dominion Parliament as far as regards Lieutenant-Governors appointed by commission of the Governor-General. In the remarks which I shall address to the House, I assume that the Lieutenant-Governor of each Province has the same power, represents the Crown to the same degree as the Governor-General represents the Crown with respect to the Dominion Parliament, within the jurisdiction of his own Province. I do not mean to say, it is not necessary for the purpose of my argument, that this is legally so. A very strong argument has been used lately by a distinguished lawyer in Montreal

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

(Mr. Kerr) upon that point. He has gone to show and to argue that by law the Lieutenant-Governor, being a creature of the Statute, a creature of our constitutional Act, appointed by commission from the Governor-General, and not from the Sovereign directly, has not the same power, or the same attributes, or the same position as the Governor-General. Well, there is much to be said from a merely lawyer's point of view in that respect.

MR. HOLTON: Not much.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And I would not be at all surprised if a case were brought up before the Courts, which would be obliged to set aside the constitutional question, and look at the strictly legal question, whether that might not be maintained. We know with respect to the powers of the Speakers of the different Provinces that that question has been decided twice, if not thrice, perhaps oftener. The different Legislatures, the different representatives of the people, the Colonial Assembly have always contended that the Speakers in the different Colonies had the same power within their limited Colonial jurisdiction as the Speaker of the House of Commons, and that it is absolutely necessary for us that the Speaker should have that power. But we know that it was decided in an action brought against the Speaker of Newfoundland in the case of Kelley and the Speaker, that the Speaker had no such right. That the right of the Speaker of the House of Commons rested upon prescription. That the Speakers under the Colonial constitution were creatures of the Statute, and that they had no common law Parliamentary rights, as the Speaker of the House of Commons had. Still, all the Colonies said it was absolutely necessary that that power should be given them. It was accorded to us. In the case of McNab against Bidwell, when Sir Allan McNab brought an action against the Speaker of the old Province of Upper Canada for false imprisonment, because he had, under order of the House of Assembly, and as Speaker, issued a warrant for his arrest, the question was raised, though I am not sure that in that case it was formally decided. For the purpose of this discussion I will assume that the Lieutenant-Governor held precisely the same position in reference to the Province of Quebec, its Legislature and its Ministry, as the Governor-General does in regard to this Legislature and the Ministry that advises him. In this discussion, as far as I am concerned, I assume that he has the same power and responsibility, the same right of exercising the prerogative within the limits prescribed by the Confederation Act, and the same responsibilities, and that he must be subject to the same checks. I have been speaking about the legal right of Speakers, and I will now also speak of the legal right of Lieutenant-Governors, of Governor-Generals, and of the Crown. A great deal of confusion arises, as is evident from the arguments we read in the Press, from the intermingling of the question of prerogative power and constitutional right. The Crown has great powers, great legal powers, and if they are exercised, every Court must sustain the exercise of that prerogative power, the legal power, because it is a power conferred upon the Crown by law. At the same time, every one of these Acts, which are sustained, and may be sustained in the Courts as perfectly legal, may be as thoroughly unconstitutional as the Court declared them to be legal. Formerly, it was otherwise, but now the distinction is drawn in practice and in theory. All the constitutional writers lay down that principle beyond cavil, and to say that the Crown has the right to dismiss a person, or to appoint a person, the right to veto an Act of Parliament, the right to make a treaty, that the Crown has an infinity of prerogative rights, is no answer to any charge which may be brought against the Crown, or the advisers of the Crown, that the legal prerogative of the Crown was unconstitutionally exercised. The Sovereign, for instance, can declare war, as we all know. The Sovereign can make treaties without reference to Parliament. The Sovereign could, by a treaty, give away the Isle of Man, or the Channel Islands, or the Duchy of Cornwall, and that treaty would be legal, and the country would be gone. But, at the same time, there is the right of impeachment, and no Minister in his senses would ever recommend such an exercise of the royal prerogative. It is very important, Mr. Speaker, that we should keep that difference distinctly and steadily before us. We see it mentioned in some of the newspapers, which one usually styles Liberal, but which, in this case, were the reverse of Liberal, that the Constitutional Act gives the Lieutenant-Governor the power to dismiss his Ministers, that they only held office during his pleasure, and that pleasure can be exercised whenever the Crown thinks proper so to exercise it. That is not the constitution, and I will call attention to the difference shortly, because it is well to lay down this principle, and to understand the difference between the legal power and the constitutional exercise of it. Lord Brougham, who is, I must say, however, not perhaps the strongest authority on constitutional questions, who was a little erratic, though his general idea, as my hon. friends opposite, who have studied these questions, must know, was that of a man whose statements should be received with respect, said:

“In discoursing upon the frame of our Government, I have frequently used the term constitutional, notwithstanding the disfavour in which it is held by political reasoners of the Bentham school. They regard it as a gross absurdity, and as the cant language of the ‘factions’ whom they hate. They say that the word has either no meaning at all, or it means everything and anything. A thing is unconstitutional say they, which anyone, for any reason, chooses to dislike. With all deference to these reasoners, the word has a perfectly intelligible meaning, and signifies that, what it is always most important to regard with due attention, many things that are not prohibited by the law, nay, that cannot be prohibited without also prohibiting things which ought to be permitted, are nevertheless reprehensible, and reprehensible because contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. Thus the Sovereign of England is allowed by law, like any other person, to amass as much money as he pleases by his savings, or by entering into speculations at home and abroad. He might accumulate a treasure of fifty millions as easily as his brother of Holland lately did one of five, and he would thus, besides his parliamentary income, and without coming to Parliament for a revenue, have an income of his own equal to two or three millions a year. This would be an operation perfectly lawful and perfectly constitutional, and the Minister who should question it would be justly liable to severe censure accordingly. So we speak with perfect correctness of a law which is proposed being unconstitutional, if it sits against the genius and spirit of our free government, as, for example, against the separation of the executive from the legislative and judicial functions. A Bill framed into a Statute which should permanently prohibit public meetings without the consent of the Government, would be as valid and binding a law as the Great Charter, or the Act of Settlement, but a more unconstitutional law could not be well desired. So a law giving the soldiers, or the militia, the power of choosing their officers, or a law, withdrawing the military wholly from the jurisdiction of the courts of law, would be as binding and valid as the Yearly Meeting Act, but it would violate most grievously the whole spirit of our Constitution. In like manner, letting the people choose their Judges, whether of the Courts of Westminster, or Justices of the Peace, would be as unconstitutional a law as letting the Crown name the juries in all civil and criminal cases.”

But, Sir, I will quote the language of a man of the present day, the mention of whose name will be sufficient to ensure respect for his opinions; one who is extremely liberal in his views, and who, as an historian, has assumed in England the first place. I refer to Mr. Freeman. This passage is so instructive that, at the risk of being tedious, I shall read it, especially as the point I am now discussing is put far more aptly and with greater ability than I can pretend to put it. He says:

“Since the 17th century, things have, in this respect, greatly altered. The work of legislation, of strictly constitutional legislation has never ceased. A long succession of legislative enactments stand out as landmarks of political progress, no less in more recent than in earlier times. But alongside of it there has been a series of political changes, changes of no less moment than those which are recorded in the Statute-book, which have been made without any legislative enactment whatever. A whole code of political maxims, universally acknowledged in theory, universally carried out in practice, has grown up without leaving among the formal Acts of our Legislature any trace of the steps by which it grew up. To the end of the 17th century, we may fairly say, that no distinction could be drawn between the Constitution and the law. The prerogative of the Crown, the privilege of Parliament, the liberty of the subject, might not always be clearly defined on every point. It has, indeed, been said that those three things were all of them things to which in their own nature no limit could be set. But all three were supposed to rest, if not on the direct words of the statute law, yet, at least, on that somewhat shadowy, yet very practical creation, that mixture of genuine ancient traditions and of recent devices of lawyers, which is known to Englishmen as common law. Any breach, either of the rights of the Sovereign, or of the rights of the subject, was a legal offence, capable of legal definition, and subjecting the offender to legal penalties. An Act which could not be brought within the letter, either of the statute or the common law, would not then be looked upon as an offence at all. If lower Courts were too weak to do justice, the high Court of Parliament stood ready to do justice even against the mightiest offenders. It was armed with weapons fearful and rarely used, but none the less regular and legal. It could smite by impeachment, by attainder, by the exercise of the greatest power of all, the deposition of the reigning King. But men had not yet reached the more subtle doctrine, that there may be offences against the Constitution which are no offences against the law. They had not learned that men in high office may have a responsibility practically felt and acted on, but which no legal enactment has defined, and which no legal tribunal will enforce. It had not been found out that Parliament itself has a power now practically the highest of its powers, in which it acts neither as a Legislature nor as a Court of Justice, but in which it pronounces sentences which have none the less practical force, because they carry with them none of the legal consequences of death, bonds, banishment, or confiscation. We now have a whole system of political morality, a whole code of precepts, for the guidance of public men, which will not be found in any page of either the statute or the common law, but which one in practice held hardly less sacred than any principle embodied in the Great Charter, or in the petition of right. In short, by the side of our written law, there has grown up an unwritten or conventional constitution. When an Englishman speaks of the conduct of a public man being constitutional or unconstitutional, he means something wholly different from what he means by conduct being legal or illegal. A famous vote of the House of Commons, passed on the motion of a great statesman, once declared that the then Ministers of the Crown did not possess the confidence of the House of Commons, and that their continuance in office was, therefore, at variance with the spirit of the Constitution. The truth of such a position, according to the traditional principles on which public men have acted for some generations, cannot be disputed, but it would be in vain to seek for any trace of such doctrines in any page of our written law. The proposer of that motion did not mean to charge the existing Ministry with any illegal act, with any act which could be made the subject either of a prosecution in a lower Court, or of impeachment in the High Court of Parliament itself.

He did not mean that the Ministers of the Crown committed any breach of the law, of which the law could take cognizance by retaining possession of their offices till such time as the Crown should think good to dismiss them from those offices. What he meant was that the general course of their policy was one which, to a majority of the House of Commons, did not seem to be wise or beneficial to the nation, and that, therefore, according to a conventional code as well understood and as effectual as the written law itself, they were bound to resign the offices of which the House of Commons no longer held them to be worthy. The House made no claim to dismiss those Ministers from their offices by any act of its own. It did not even petition the Crown to remove them from their offices. It simply spoke its mind on their general conduct, and it was held that when the House had so spoken it was their duty to give way without any formal petition, without any formal command on the part of either the House or of the Sovereign. The passing by the House of Commons of such a resolution as this, may perhaps be set down as the formal declaration of a constitutional principle. But though a formal declaration, it was not a legal declaration. It created a precedent for the practical guidance of future Ministers and future Parliaments, but it neither changed the law nor declared it. It asserted a principle which might be appealed to in future debates in the House of Commons, but it asserted no principle which could be taken any notice of by a Judge in any Court of law. It stands, therefore, on a wholly different ground from those enactments, which, whether they changed the law or simply declared the law, had a real legal force, capable of being enforced by a legal tribunal. If any officer of the Crown should levy a tax without the authority of Parliament if he should enforce martial law without the authority of Parliament, he would be guilty of a legal crime. But if he merely continues to hold an office conferred by the Crown, and from which the Crown has not removed him, though he hold it in the teeth of any number of votes of censure passed by both Houses of Parliament, he is in no way a breaker of the written law. But the man who should so act would be universally held to have trampled underfoot one of the most undoubted principles of the unwritten but universally accepted Constitution."

Now, Sir, what is the case of the Lieutenant-Governor, and what were his relations to his advisers constitutionally, setting aside the legal question altogether, which I have attempted to discuss. Setting aside the legal right to dismiss every officer holding office under him during his pleasure, what is the position of the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisers? They hold precisely the same position, I contend, with respect to the Lieutenant-Governor, as Lord Beaconsfield and his Government hold with respect to Her Majesty, and the hon. member for Lambton and his Ministry hold with respect to the representative of the Sovereign, the Governor-General. Under the Constitution as it now stands, I contend that the Ministry of the day, so long as they have the confidence of Parliament, so long as they are sustained in Parliament, must, and have the right to claim the confidence of the Sovereign, or the representative of the Sovereign. I contend that, although it was otherwise formerly, and although the doctrine has grown up by slow degrees, and although we read of dismissals of ministries by the Crown in the earlier days when the Constitution of England was still undeveloped to the state of perfection in which, I think, it exists at this moment; yet, in this day, so long as the advisers of the Crown have the confidence of Parliament, they have a right to claim the confidence of the Sovereign. That is the great principle. If we do not hold to that then we are all at sea, and in great danger of being wrecked. Then, indeed, our institutions are not only on their trial, but we have great reason to dread that they will fail, and this promising commencement of our new Dominion will, by an abandonment of that great landmark, fail to carry out its future as a Dominion founded on British constitutional principles, and carrying them out under more favourable terms, and under less fettered conditions than even our fellow country in Great Britain and Ireland. As I said before, this is a question which appeals to all of us, to every man, to every lover of his country, every lover of free institutions, every one who wishes to embalm, as it were, British institutions in this great offshoot of the British monarchy. It is so necessary that we should consider this question as it exists now in England, and not according to old precedents, that I will take the liberty, before I sit down, of calling the attention of this House to the gradual growth, the very gradual growth, in the face of such immense discouragements, and immense pressure from the Crown, and occasionally from immense weaknesses on the part of the advisers of the Crown, that it is only by slow degrees that we have evolved the now present system that exists in England, and which I hope by the vote of this House, and by the advice of this House, and by the general concurrence of this House, will be carried out in this country. When I speak about the failure of Ministers in England, we know that they have failed, and that the desire of continuing in office has again and again made them make unworthy compliances to the Sovereign; but, notwithstanding the obstinacy, the wrong-headedness, if I may use the expression, from the Queen or King wearing the Crown at the time, in the unworthy compliances and weaknesses of the advisers of the Crown, yet by slow degrees the Constitution has been evolved, until we now have that principle fixed in England, and I hope that the action of this House will fix it in Canada, and that so long as the Ministry of the day have the confidence of the people, they will have the confidence of the Crown, and that the Crown will be advised by those men who have the confidence of the representatives of the people. There is only one case, Sir, in which it seems to me that this doctrine can be impugned, and that is when the Sovereign has a reason to believe that the representatives of the people who maintain, who support the advisers of the Crown, have forfeited the confidence of the people themselves. In such a case, Mr. Speaker, if the Crown has that opinion, the Crown has a fair right to say to its advisers—

“Though I admit that you have the confidence of the representatives of the people, though I admit that you are sustained in Parliament, yet my idea is this: that those who do so sustain you have, from one cause or another, forfeited the confidence of the people themselves, and I desire that there shall be an appeal under your guidance. I hold you, my advisers, to have the confidence of the people until the contrary is shown, but I call upon you, and I insist upon it, that there be an appeal to the people, and if you come back from the people sustained in the future, as you have been sustained in the present Parliament, then you will have again the confidence which has been in some degree weakened by late events.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

For instance, Mr. Gladstone himself, did not wait for any such intimation from the Crown. He did not wait to be told that there was unmistakable evidence that a reaction had set in in England. He did not wait to have the Crown send for him and say to him—

“You see single after single election going against you. You see that there is a very strong reaction in the country, and I think that you ought to appeal to the country as a whole. I think that you ought to see whether the country has such confidence still in you, that you have a title to the renewal of your lease of office.”

No, Mr. Gladstone felt that it was due to himself and his position to go to the country. He believed, and it may or it may not have been so, that these elections which had gone against him were indications that he had, to a certain extent, lost the confidence of the people; and, of his own accord, he advised the Sovereign to dissolve, so that there might be an appeal to the people, and, as we all know, the appeal to the people was against him. In the first place, I would call your attention shortly to the act of the Lieutenant-Governor in the Province of Quebec. He had found his Ministers in when he came into power, and found them sustained by the representatives of the people in the House of Assembly. He found them in the Upper House, which was a judicial House nominated by the Crown, and they were there also strong.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is so. I state so as a matter of fact; as a matter of fact the Lieutenant-Governor found them in office. They had then the confidence of the representatives of the people, and they had the support, if that suits better.

MR. BLAKE: To the term “a judicial House” we were objecting, because every man in it was nominated by themselves.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Every man on the bench is nominated by the advisers of the Crown, and yet they are not judicial officers.

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: They have judicial functions.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I know, Mr. Speaker, it is the fashion in some places, and in some ways, to attack the Senate or the Legislative Council—these nominated bodies. That is a point by itself which, perhaps, we had better not import into this discussion.

MR. BLAKE: We did not import it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: When I say “judicial,” I mean to say that their functions are supposed to be somewhat analogous to those of the House of Lords. The House of Lords is supposed to have judicial functions; that is to say, they are not to resist the well-ascertained will of the people, and they are to sit judicially upon the measure of the representatives of the people—the House of Commons—so that they may give the people themselves the opportunity, if they think right, of considering that question, the question they are dealing with. They are a check on the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, and in this respect they hold an advisory and quasi-judicial position. That is all I mean in that respect, but the Lieutenant-Governor found a Ministry having the confidence of both branches of the Local Legislature in office, and they were very strong, I believe, in the House of Assembly, but I do not know what the proportions were in the Legislative Council. I believe that they were two to one.

MR. DEVLIN: More than that.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Two to one. In the Lower House they had a majority of 20 in 65. The Lieut.-Governor had their assurance that his advisers had the confidence of the representatives of the people, and of the other branch of the Legislature, which, wisely or unwisely, was a constituted authority in this case. The whole or nearly the whole of the Session dragged on. The Ministry of the day introduced their several measures. They carried them almost to completion. They brought down, for instance, a system of taxation, which is not a very popular thing for any Government to do, as perhaps every Finance Minister in his lifetime has found out. This was allowed to go on until it had almost come to completion. The principle measures of the Government were about to become law in a day or two, and all these measures had been supported by strong votes in both Houses. They had been supported, and there was a vote of want of confidence against them on one of these measures, but it was out-voted by a numerous majority, considering the small body of which that House is constituted, and yet, at the last moment, just before prorogation, when they had the proof that both Houses had determined on this, and the proof that the representatives of the people, and until there is an appeal to the people it is to be held that they had the confidence of the people, approved of it, then the Lieutenant-Governor took the opportunity to dismiss these men on the ground that these measures were unconstitutional. Not one of these grounds was sufficient, not one of these grounds can hold water for a moment. I am quite satisfied that if the illustrious individual, or the illustrious personage of whom we spoke to-day, had been in the position of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, he would rather have cut off his right hand than permit what he would consider an outrage on the British Constitution. I said that by slow degrees England was educated up to the present position of constitutional law. The Constitution is developing every moment. Here, as Bristow says: the Constitution is not now what it was in 1860. The Constitution is not certainly now what it was in 1838, at the time of the Bed Chamber plot. The Constitution of England, at this moment, is being developed to a perfect system, and what we contend, as the right of the people of the Dominion, and the right of every Province of the Dominion, is that we have a right to claim that we have precisely in our several Legislatures, and in respect to the several Legislatures and this Parliament, the same right as the English people have with respect to their Parliament. Now, Sir, look at the case of dismissals even in the time of George III., and he, as we all know, said if we draw our authority from the Liberal writers and the Liberal writers of that day are the Liberal Conservatives of to-day—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. HOLTON: Do not slander them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Edmund Burke made his appeal from the new Whigs to the old Whigs, and he would be in this country what we call a Baldwin Reformer, or in other words, a Liberal-Conservative. Now, Sir, in 1774, it had been laid down by all the writers that the present British Constitution only commenced to get fair play, and that the Rockingham Government was established over the ruins of old George III's Government, Lord Bute and the rest of them, by the influence and by the genius, and by the efforts, and by the writings of Edmund Burke. In 1774 Fox or rather the Duke of Portland, who formed the famous Coalition Government, was dismissed by George III. Well, Sir, even then, although it was admitted by all writers, as well by those who may be considered to be writing on the Conservative side, or the Tory side if you like, as by all Liberal writers, that looking at the unactions of that day by the present light of the present Constitution as at present administered, George III. was wrong, and that George III., if he did now what he did then, would be considered to have committed a great breach of the Constitution. What was the case? It is quoted, and it is one of the examples of how far a bad precedent reaches, and how it may be to the latest instant quoted, when it should be looked upon as a rock to be avoided rather than as a precedent to be followed. The Indian Bill was introduced in the House of Commons. It was carried in the House of Commons, and it was defeated in the House of Lords. George III. was known to be opposed to that measure. George III. knew that it was taking away all the patronage which he was eagerly holding in his tenacious grasp. It was known that its terms transferred the patronage of the Crown to the Ministry of the Crown of the day. Although he was aware of that, and he felt, too, in his heart's core that this was a blow at what he considered the monarchical principle, and the monarchical power, yet he allowed it to pass through the House of Commons. Although he was opposed to it, and the Ministry knew that he was opposed to it—although they knew that every feeling, and every principle, and every emotion of George III. was opposed to that measure, and yet he allowed his Ministers to introduce that Bill—it was carried through the House of Commons. It came to the House of Lords, and only when it was defeated by the other branch of the Legislature and thrown out, did he say, "You have lost the confidence of one branch of the Legislature." And mind you, Mr. Speaker, that then the House of Lords was of as much consequence, if not more consequence, than the House of Commons. If this was long before the Reform Bill, it was at a time the House of Lords had not only its own power and prestige as a great branch of the Legislature, but it was at a time when it controlled more than one-third, aye, and approaching to nearly one-half of the House of Commons. So that a great peer in the House of Lords was an infinitely greater political man than a political man in the House of Commons, and it was more necessary at that time, if possible, and certainly as necessary, to have the confidence of the House of Lords as it was to have the confidence of the House of Commons; and it was not until there was a vote of want of confidence by throwing out this measure, on which the Administration had staked their whole existence, did he venture to dismiss them. And yet, notwithstanding that case, it is now held by all constitutional writers, held by all statesmen, and held by every man who has carried the constitutional principle into action, that the conduct of George III. cannot be defended as being constitutional.

MR. HOLTON: Hear, hear.

MR. BLAKE: He brought about the vote.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is only another instance of the King interfering improperly. I am not defending George III., who certainly brought about the vote.

MR. BLAKE: I am simply pointing out that this was an ingredient in his conduct.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Still George III. certainly had no right to write that letter to Lord Temple. Certainly this act would not be borne with for a moment now. Although we had under a great State exigency, under the danger of there being a great revolution in England, William IV., doing very nearly the same thing with respect to the Reform Bill. It is admitted that this was a breach of the Constitution, but it was like the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in time of war or insurrection. In 1801 Pitt was not dismissed, but he resigned because the King insisted upon his abandoning his project of Catholic emancipation. It was a resignation. It was not a dismissal in terms, but it was approaching very much to a forced resignation. He resigned on the Catholic question. The next dismissal was that of Lord Grenville, in 1817. It took place on one form of the Catholic question, namely, in regard to allowing officers professing the Catholic religion to hold high rank in the army. The King at first consented, but afterwards stated that a misapprehension had occurred as to the extent of his assent, and, therefore requested the Ministry to withdraw the Bill. That the Government consented to do, but the King required a still further pledge from them in writing, that they would never introduce a similar measure. They at once said it would be unconstitutional and derogatory to their position, and they were dismissed. There were two cases in the time of George III.—that of Lord Grenville and of the Portland Administration, the coalition Administration of Fox and Portland. During the whole reign of George IV., there was no dismissal. Although he was opposed to Catholic emancipation, although he had a hysterical abhorrence to that measure, yet he finally yielded to his Ministers. There was no dismissal by George IV., there was one dismissal by William IV., in 1834, and that we have all seen quoted as a precedent for the dismissal in Quebec in 1878. Now, in the first place, there was a great excuse which was not so well known at the time as it is now, for the conduct of William IV. in dismissing the Government of Lord Melbourne in consequence of the death of Lord Spencer and the elevation of Lord Althorpe, who led the Lower House, to the House of Peers. That you will find described in Greville's memoirs, and in order to show that there was an excuse for William IV. in that case, which does not exist now, I will quote shortly the statement the King made, which is given in Greville, and which has been confirmed in the memoirs of Baron Stockmeyer. When Lord Melbourne went down to Windsor to see the King, on the elevation of Lord Althorpe, the following is stated to have occurred :

“Lord Melbourne told him (that is the King) that as he had only undertaken to carry on the Government in consideration of having the assistance of Lord Althorpe in the House of Commons, his removal made it necessary to adopt a new organization altogether, that some considerable concessions to the principle of Reform were judged to be necessary, and the appointment of a successor of Lord Althorpe, who should carry them into effect. That he was of opinion that, without these the Government could not go on, and at the same time it was necessary to state that there were members of the Cabinet who did not coincide with these views, and who would retire when Parliament met if they were adopted. These were Lord Lansdowne and Spring Rice. Lord John Russell was to lead in the House of Commons, but the loss of Rice would be a severe blow to them. The concessions related principally to church reform, the disunion of the Cabinet being thus exhibited, it was clear the Government could not go on without some material alteration in its composition. The King urged this, and asked Lord Melbourne from what quarter the necessary accession of strength was to be procured, and whether he could hope for it from the Conservative interest. He owned that nothing was to be expected from that quarter. It remained, then, that it was only from the more extreme party that their ranks could be recruited. To this the King would not consent, and he, therefore, imparted to him his resolution of placing the Government in other hands.”

In a note made by Mr. Reeve, who was Clerk of the Privy Council at that time, and who edited Greville's memoirs, it was stated :

“This account of the transaction was confirmed in almost every particular by the statement drawn up by King William himself, or by his directions, for the information of Sir Robert Peel, and first published in Baron Stockmeyer's Memoirs in 1872. That when Lord Melbourne formed his Government he told the King that it could not continue unless Lord Althorpe remained in the House of Commons, and unless it became more Radical and less an old Whig Government. That Lord Lansdowne and Spring Rice, who were known as the leading Whigs of that day, were going to retire, because they would not go with the more extreme party, and that, unless the Government was reorganized he could not carry on the Government.”

Such was the excuse given by the King, and it bore considerable force. Yet, by the entire consensus of practical statesmen and theoretical writers, it had been admitted that William IV. was wrong. Let it be remembered, moreover, that there is this marked distinction between that case and that in Quebec. At the time Lord Melbourne told the King he could not go on without a Radical change in his Administration, and in fact have it recast, he was in a minority in the House of Lords; whereas in Quebec a vote of confidence in the Government was adopted both by the Commons and the Upper House.

After Recess.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD resumed. He said: At the time the House took recess I was speaking of the last instance in the history of England when the power of dismissal of Ministers by the Crown was exercised. Such a case had not occurred since then. It was unsuccessful then, as it deserved to be. It received the reputation of Parliament and of the people by the triumphant return of Lord Melbourne and his supporters at the general election, which was forced on unconstitutionally. It has been pointed to with scorn by all writers on the subject ever since; and it is, therefore, an important landmark in the history of constitutional law in England, of an act which can never happen again in the Mother Country, and I would fain have hoped, if it had not been for the recent occurrence in Quebec, it would never have happened in any country having English institutions. I shall have to quote several authorities with respect to this last outrage and offence against Responsible Government in England, and against the British Constitution. Since recess, I have opened the second volume of the memoirs of Lord Melbourne, written by Mr. McCullagh Torrens, an old Parliamentarian, and a man of high standing in Parliament, than whom no one was more competent to deal with the subject. The writer, who treats the memoir as a narrative, took the ground that, if a change of Government were to be made, it should be carried out in a constitutional manner. Lord Melbourne felt it to be his duty to remind his Sovereign that the Ministry had a large majority in Parliament on a question of importance. The King replied that they were in a minority in the Peers, and he had reason to believe that they would speedily be in the same condition in the Commons, and he added peremptorily they had better, therefore, resign without loss of self-respect. William IV. was quite right according to the principles of the Constitution. If Lord Melbourne thought his Administration had not the confidence of the people, they had the right to appeal to the country if they desired to do so, and it was when he had declined to do so, and not before that, the King should have dismissed him, and brought in another Administration to try the experiment whether the people supported the new or the old Administration. The writer further said that it appeared as though his Majesty—(change Majesty to his Honour)—had been misled into the unconstitutional course of taking counsel from others without the knowledge of his legitimate advisers, and he was about to follow some secret or irresponsible counsel in opposition to their advice. Lord Althorpe, who was of such importance in the King's opinion that his removal from the leadership of the House of Commons to the House of Lords as Earl Spencer on the death of his father, might be supposed to feel flattered by the declaration of his Sovereign, and that his withdrawal from the House of Commons was sufficient to break an Administration. He had made up his mind never more to enter politics and he never did so. But what did Lord Althorpe say?

“He remained for some weeks at Althorpe in seclusion, and finally made up his mind to take no further part in public affairs. But in the calm of his retirement, he was peculiarly qualified to weigh the motives which had led to the dismissal of his late colleagues, and the consequence of that dismissal, and his judgment was unwavering and stern. He suggested to Mr. Hume, with whom I had never had any private confidence, and very intermittent public agreement, that an early opportunity should be taken to ascertain what the opinion of the new House of Commons was upon the mode in which Lord Melbourne had been dismissed. In his view the conduct of William IV. was not only reprehensible, but far too dangerous an example to be suffered to pass unrephehended by Parliament.”

That would be found in a letter dated January 31st, 1835, from Lord Althorpe. It is said that in this age the people do not know the history of their time. In looking at the imperfect histories written of recent days you find little allusion to the philosophic and constitutional reasons affecting the course of the Administration of the nation. I will quote from a well-known History of England, written by Charles Knight, who everyone knows is a great literary man, and great politician, and a great Liberal. The sentences are few, but the words are pregnant with meaning. The author wrote:—

“The sensation produced in London by the reported dismissal of the Ministry was a natural consequence of the suddenness of the act, as it presented itself to the body of the people in its really unconstitutional character, as it appeared to thoughtful and well-informed men. The Sovereign had a constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers, but it must be on grounds more capable of justification to Parliament than the simple exercise of his personal will. The suddenness of the resolve rendered an arrangement necessary, which could not be justified by any precedent, except on an occasion of critical emergency in the last days of Queen Anne.”

That was when it became a question whether a Pretender, a Stuart, should be raised to the throne, or that the Hanoverian succession should be maintained. Let me quote from a periodical, then of considerable more weight than it has now, viz.: The Edinburgh

Review, on this subject, and I think the House will agree with me that the sentences are pregnant and the language forcible. The Edinburgh Review said:—

“The power of the Crown to choose its Ministers is clearly a necessary attribute of the monarchy. But is it now exercised under adequate checks? Some intriguing courtiers, some clamorous friend who has access to the Royal ear, some politician who has a purpose to serve, and cares little if a new Ministry lasts no longer than his own gratification requires, may abuse the Royal confidence, and blindly bring on an experiment, all but desperate for both King and country, of changing the Ministry. By the strict letter of the law, the Minister who accepts office is responsible for the charge which removed his predecessors. But suppose one Ministry displaced, and that no one agrees to take its place. Suppose this suspension of ministerial functions to continue for weeks, who is answerable for that? Indeed, if the King has once dismissed his Ministers, or he is left without a Government, hardly any practical responsibility could ever be incurred by the men who only entered into the places made vacant long before they were consulted.”

The language used in this article is so strong, that I do not care to read it all, lest it should be supposed that I did it for party purposes, or with the intention of applying it expressly to the circumstances in Quebec. Further on it proceeds:—

“If any one thinks that the view here taken of the late change of Ministry is too strong, let him reflect on the wholly unprecedented circumstances which distinguished that strange event. Between his majority and his confidential servants there existed no difference of opinion upon any subject of policy, foreign or domestic. This is now explicitly admitted by the Tories themselves. Among the Ministers reigned the most perfect harmony on all questions, and personally the members of no Cabinet ever were on more cordial terms one with another. This, too, is admitted, and the King's speech describes their whole policy as perfectly unexceptionable and uniformly successful. Lord Althorpe became a peer, Parliament was not sitting, and therefore, and for no other reason whatever, as is now allowed by all, the King changed his Government, called to his Councils the most opposite class of statesmen he could find, to give his confidence to the men whom the country most distrusted and disliked, and would not even wait a few days before he cleared out his House. That he had been wishing to change the Ministry for some time is very possible. But when his Royal father, said to be one of the ablest professional men of his day, wanted to make such changes, he always waited his opportunity, and seized on some measure, or on some pretext in some moment when there was a cry against his servants, to deliver the Ministry into the people's hands, and appoint more popular successors, men whom he liked, not certainly because of their popularity, but in spite of it. It was thus that when Mr. Fox died in September, 1803, His Majesty waited till a no-Popery cry could be raised, and only turned out the Whigs six months after they had lost their mighty chief. The secret advisers of the present King have done much, certainly, to dispirit and to alienate by their late proceeding, but nothing to show that they are gifted with his Royal parent's kingcraft. They seem to think that a King should turn off his Ministers much as a gentleman does his livery servants.”

That is the opinion of the Edinburgh Review. I have said that no dismissal has taken place since that time. George III. dismissed his Ministers in two instances, William IV. in one instance, George IV., with all his faults, never thought of such a thing. He fainted on one occasion; he wept; he deplored his sad fate in being obliged to submit to his Administration on the Catholic question, but he yielded; and Queen Victoria has, in no case, committed such an outrage on the Constitution as to dismiss a Ministry which had the confidence of the representatives of the people. The nearest approach to that in the Queen's history is what is called the Bedchamber Plot in 1838, not two years after she ascended the throne. On the resignation of the Whig Administration, Sir Robert Peel was sent for, and he insisted that the Ladies of the Bedchamber, who were the wives of the defeated Ministers, should also retire. He did not interfere with the Maids of Honour and others, but he said it was unseemly that the great ladies of the Court should be the wives of the members of the defeated Administration, that the wife of the defeated Prime Minister, for instance, should be continually at the ear of the Queen, conveying her husband's sentiments and the opinions of the Opposition. The Queen, then a young woman, naturally clung to the friends of her youth, and she declined to have them removed. Sir Robert Peel declined to form an Administration unless they were removed. There was, at the time, great sympathy with the Queen. I remember it quite well. I remember how it rung through the press in England about the attempt to force upon Her Majesty, this young lady, strange women, instead of those she respected and esteemed and had been brought up with. But, in 1842, when the Queen had become a little more acquainted with kingcraft, and knew her position, and when Sir Robert Peel was called in again she admitted that she was wrong, and allowed the Ladies of the Bedchamber to be removed, and in the "Life of the Prince Consort," in the previous book, you will find some leaves written by the Queen, where she gracefully and frankly acknowledges that she made a mistake. That is the only instance, and it has a very remote resemblance to this case. It was the cause of the refusal to take office of Sir Robert Peel, because the Queen insisted on her personal predilections in opposition to the principle that even the entourage of the Sovereign should be selected under the advice of the responsible Ministers of the day. The only case that at all appears to give a justification for the course taken in Quebec is that which happened the other day in South Africa; the action of Sir Bartle Frere, who dismissed a Ministry and sent for a new one. That is defended, faintly defended, perhaps, and if it proves to be on true ground, it will be upheld. The result will show whether he will be upheld or not. But his justification is salus populi suprema est lex. It was a case where all constitutional practice must be set aside in the presence of a great danger. There were a few white men in the South African colonies. There were 200,000 Noulos threatening them on one flank, and the great body of the aborigines threatening the whole frontier, and Sir Bartle Frere said: "I must take this course, or I may have upon my conscience the blood of every white man in South Africa." We know how fractious the Molten's Government has always shown itself. That Government declined to give the control of the militia force in South Africa to the commander-in-chief. England had her military forces there, and was responsible for the safety of those great and growing colonies. England said: "If we are to fight your battles, we must have the control of your martial force. We cannot have a divided command. We cannot have our Sir O'Grady Haly controlled by Col. Walker Powell, your Adjutant-General. We cannot have two separate and independent forces acting under different commands and without a common responsibility." This was defended, I think, in the Saturday Review, and certainly in the Pall Mall Gazette, upon the same ground on which the Habeas Corpus Act, the charter of British liberty, might be suspended in the presence of threatened rebellion, or certain war. On that ground, and on that ground only, is it defended, and on that only is it defensible. There can be no application of that case to the present, where there is no war, or expectation of war. Where there is no fear of external attack or internal commotion. Peace, thank God, dwells on our border, and we can carry out the British system in its entirety without any such infringement as we have seen on this occasion. Look at the different course of Sir George Bowen, where the circumstances were more than suspicious, when the apparent action of the Government, so far as we can understand it, was such as to propose to disarrange the whole machinery of the Government. The Judges, the officials were all paid off, and the threat was made that unless the Upper House yielded to the Lower, and passed a Bill to pay the latter their wages as Members, the lunatic asylums and prisons and penitentiaries should be opened, and all the idiotcy and madness and crime should be poured out upon the colony, and yet the British Government sustained Sir George Bowen in saying: "I must sustain my Administration, who have the confidence of the people, unless Imperial interests are threatened. It is not for me to judge; I must take my advice from my Administration." And the Liberal press in England sustain him in that. No more able article has been written than that in the London Daily News on this subject, showing that if the Colonies were to be really a fac simile of the British Constitution, it must be carried out to its utmost extremity short of war or bloodshed. And the natural consequence had proved to be that a compromise, from the necessity of the case, had arisen between the two Houses, simply because Sir George Bowen, though the course of his Ministers was opposed by every newspaper in England, supported them, because they had a majority in Parliament. I said a little while ago that we must judge of the British Constitution as it is now, as it has been developed, and not as it was fifty years ago, seventy-five years, or thirty years ago. I shall call the attention of the House to what I believe to be the true principles of the British Constitution on the point which I am pressing upon the consideration of the House at this moment in 1878. I shall first quote an author who has been quoted again and again, Mr. Bagehot, whose lamented decease struck England with sorrow, especially all political constitutionalists, for he was considered the authority of the day on constitutional law. If I am permitted in this argument to relate a little anecdote, I would do so with reference to this gentleman. This book from which I quote was in the first place published in the Fortnightly Review. I had read some of the numbers before I went to England in 1865, and I was dining with the "Political Economy Club," of London, of which the hon. the Premier is a member, when in the course of a conversation on political economical matters with a gentleman who sat near me, I said: "I have been very much struck with some articles in the Fortnightly Review on the English Constitution. It seems to me that they give the only true picture of the British Constitution as it now exists. They are written by one Mr. Bagehot." He said: "I am very glad you like them, because I am Mr. Bagehot." From that time an acquaintance grew up between us, which only ceased with his lamented death. Let me now read from him:

"Principle shows that the power of dismissing a Government with which Parliament is satisfied, and of dissolving that Parliament upon an appeal to the people, is not a power which a common hereditary monarch will in the long run be able beneficially to exercise.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"Accordingly, this power has almost, it not quite, dropped out of the reality of our Constitution. Nothing, perhaps, would more surprise the English people than if the Queen, by coup d'état and on a sudden, destroyed a Ministry firm in the allegiance, and secure of a majority in Parliament. That power indisputably, in theory, belongs to her; but it has passed so far away from the minds of men, that it would terrify them if she used it like a volcanic eruption from Primrose Hill. The last analogy to it is not one to be coveted as a precedent. In 1835, William IV. dismissed an Administration which, though disorganized by the loss of its leader in the Commons, was an existing Government, had a Premier in the Lords ready to go on, and a leader in the Commons willing to begin. The King fancied that public opinion was leaving the Whigs and going over to the Tories, and he thought he should accelerate the transition by ejecting the former. But the event showed that he misjudged. His perception, indeed, was right; the English people were wavering in their allegiance to the Whigs, who had no leader that touched the popular heart, none in whom Liberalism could personify itself and become a passion—who besides were a body long used to Opposition, and, therefore, making blunders in office—who were borne to power by popular impulse which they only half comprehended, and perhaps less than half shared. But the King's policy was wrong; he impeded the reaction instead of aiding it. He forced on a premature Tory Government which was as unsuccessful as all wise people perceived that it must be. The popular distaste to the Whigs was as yet but incipient, inefficient, and the intervention of the Crown was advantageous to them, because it looked inconsistent with the liberties of the people, and in so far William IV. was right in detecting an incipient change of opinion, he did but detect an erroneous change. What was desirable was the prolongation of Liberal rule. The commencing dissatisfaction did but relate to the personal demerits of the Whig leaders, and other temporary adjuncts of free principles, and not to those principles intrinsically. So that the last precedent for a royal onslaught on a Ministry ended thus: in opposing the right principles, in aiding the wrong principles, in hurting the party it was meant to help. After such a warning, it is likely that our monarch will pursue the policy which a long course of quiet precedent directs, they will leave a Ministry trusted by Parliament to the judgment of Parliament."

And so he winds up the whole of his discussion on this subject by this pregnant phrase:—

"The Queen can hardly now refuse a defeated Minister the chance of a dissolution, any more than she can dissolve in the time of an undefeated one, and without his consent."

This quotation has been already used in a speech made by Mr. Chapleau, and he made a long quotation from Bagehot which I did not recognize and which I could not find. I thought that I knew this work by heart. It has been my guide as regards the principles of the British Constitution. I searched the different editions but I could not find it. I telegraphed to Mr. Chapleau to find out where he got that quotation, and he gave me the reference. It is a rather singular thing that it has never yet, (until it was translated by Mr. Chapleau, or for Mr. Chapleau in his speech), appeared in English. Bagehot's book at once took public attention, and a French edition was published of it. It was published in 1872, I think immediately after a book on the British Constitution was written by the late Monsieur Prevost Paradol; and in the French introduction to his book, which otherwise as a translation of this he discusses some of the points taken by Monsieur Paradol, in his book on the British Constitution. I have the original edition here in French, but I shall not trouble you with my imperfect French, I will read to you Mr. Chapleau's translation of it, which I have verified as being a correct translation. I have already read you the first passage he quotes, and I shall read it on account of its importance again:—

This is the quotation which only appeared in French, but I shall read you a translation:—

“And no monarch should dissolve Parliament against the will and the interest of the Ministry which is in power, no doubt the King can dismiss such a Ministry and replace it by another Administration whose advice to dissolve Parliament he could take; but even with this precaution, to act thus towards a Ministry, which had a strong majority in Parliament, would be to strike a blow which it is almost impossible to suppose. We do not believe that Queen Victoria herself, in spite of the popularity and respect by which she is surrounded, to a greater extent perhaps than any of her predecessors, would even have recourse to such a measure. What would be thought if she should venture to reason thus.”

Apply the reason to Quebec, and you will at once see the pregnancy of this passage:

“The Whigs are in a majority in the existing Parliament, but I think that the country would favour a Tory Administration; let us, therefore, dissolve Parliament, and see whether the country will not elect a Parliament of opposite opinion to those which prevail in the present Parliament. What would be thought of this? No Englishman can dream even of a catastrophe of this nature, but it to them appears to belong to the phenomena of a world altogether different from that which he inhabits. In practice, in England the Sovereign considers himself obliged to follow the advice of the Ministry which the House of Commons desires to maintain in power. All prerogatives at variance with this principle have fallen into disuse, but the Sovereign may accord to the people a majority which is denied it in the House of Commons; but to strike from behind, so to speak, and strangle, by means of an appeal to the country, a Ministry sustained by Parliament, would be an event which no longer enters into the calculation, although, in former times, instances of this occurred in our annals.”

No stronger passage could be written, and it could be written by no stronger authority than by Mr. Bagehot. I read you, Sir, a long passage as to the difference between the legal prerogative and the constitutional exercise of it, from Freeman, in his “Growth of the English Constitution,” which has just come out, you know; and I shall only read you one, that sentence which agrees in every respect with the language of Mr. Bagehot:

“The written law leaves to the Crown the choice of all Ministers and agents, great and small. Every appointment to office and dismissal from office, as long as they have committed no crime which the law can punish, is left to the personal discretion of the Sovereign; but the unwritten law or the unwritten constitution makes it practically impossible for the Sovereign to keep a Ministry in office when the House of Commons does not approve, and it makes it almost equally impossible to remove from office a Ministry whom the House of Commons does approve.”

But, Sir, we cannot do better than quote what has been quoted again and again, and I feel that my remarks on this occasion would be imperfect unless I quoted an authority which we have to-day admitted to be an authority—the authority of our respected Governor-General. What said the Earl of Dufferin, our Governor-General, at the time, in 1873, when he was at Halifax :

“My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada. I believe in Parliament, no matter which way it votes; and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the Confederate Parliament of Canada may assign to me as my responsible advisers, can I give my confidence. Whether they are heads of this party or of that party must be a matter of indifference to the Governor-General. So long as they are maintained he is bound to give them his unreserved confidence, to defer to their advice, and to loyally assist them with his counsels. As a reasonable being, he cannot help having convictions on the merits of different policies, but these considerations are abstract and speculative, and devoid of practical effect in his official relations. As the head of a constitutional State as engaged in the administration of parliamentary government, he (the Governor-General) has no political friends; still less can he have political enemies. The possession, of the being suspected of such possession, would destroy his usefulness.”

But, Sir, we have more than that. In our own history we have got the practical instructions given by Her Majesty to Lord Elgin at the time Lord Elgin had before him the difficult question of the position of his Government in 1847. When he came out to this country, what did he find? He found the two Canadas almost at a dead-lock. He found the Government of that day, of which I was a member—my first entry into politics—supported by a majority from Upper Canada, when all Lower Canada was banded against it. He found that this Government was formed on what I must say was the unwholesome principle of one race against the other. He was very anxious, for he was not mixed up with the questions connected with the formation of the Government, and all the questionable proceedings of Lord Sydenham with it, in carrying the elections of 1844.

MR. HOLTON: There was Lord Metcalfe later.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am coming to Lord Metcalfe. Lord Elgin was not mixed up in any way with the personnel of the Government which Lord Metcalfe tried to keep up in Canada. He came out here for the purpose of carrying out the principle which they adopted in September, 1841, but which had never, in fact, been worked thoroughly, either by Lord Sydenham or by Lord Metcalfe, and he consulted his chief in the Colonial Department as to his position at that time. You will find what the present Lord Grey then, and sometime before and longer afterwards, an able Colonial Minister, did. These were the instructions which Lord Grey then gave to Lord Elgin, and which Lord Elgin carried out :

“The object with which I recommend to you this course is that of making it apparent that in any transfer, which may take place, of political power from the hands of one party in the Province to those of another, is the result, not of an act of yours, but by the wishes of the people themselves, as shown by the difficulty experienced by the retiring party to carry on the Government of the Provinces according to the forms of the Constitution. To this I attach great importance. I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable with such fair support from yourself.”

Mind you that, even then, although Lord Elgin was of opinion that for the good of Canada, a new Administration should be formed, in which the French element and the English element should equally or nearly equally predominate, yet even then the instructions to Lord Elgin were :

“I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the Government of the Provinces satisfactorily, and command the confidence of the Legislature.”

These authorities are, I think, sufficient to prove the case that in England the power of dismissal of a Government having the confidence of Parliament is gone forever, and that, if it is gone there, it ought never to have been attempted to be introduced in a colony under the British Crown. But, Sir, if you will look at the causes, if causes they can be called, why the Administration was changed in Quebec, you will find that all the objections are taken by the chief of the Executive to the legislation of his Ministers, and not to the administrative acts of his Ministers, not to anything they had done. It is true that he quotes an act of administration respecting the appointment of a Councillor in Montmagny; but that does not appear, however, in the case laid before Parliament, and we have no right in one sense to look at it, or quote it at all, because the case of the Governor and his advisers must be governed by the paper laid before the Legislature of Quebec before its prorogation; but, for the purpose of illustration, I will take the only act he complains of in administration, and this was that this Councillor was appointed by the Crown instead of being elected by the people. The circumstances were that there was a real or supposed irregularity in the appointment. The Attorney-General reported that the appointment was null and void, and that the Crown by law had the power to fill up this vacancy. Filled it was on the report of the Attorney-General, and the Lieutenant-Governor sanctioned it, but afterwards he thought that he was wrong, and he pressed that opinion on his Government. The Attorney-General still held to his opinion, but the First Minister yielded to the pressure brought upon him by the Lieutenant-Governor, and took his opinion upon it, and the appointment was cancelled, and yet it was actually made a charge, apparently made a charge, against the Administration that they took a step on the advice of the Attorney-General; but afterwards, on the head of the executive remonstrating with him, in deference to his opinion, they took his advice. With that single exception, it occurs to me, from my recollection of the paper, that all the objections made to the course and action of the DeBoucherville Government were that there was a difference of opinion as to the legislation which was carried on in the Quebec Legislature. Now, Sir, there is a distinct difference between acts of administration and acts of legislation, and that I think will be obvious from the nature of the case. The Sovereign is the chief of the executive. The Crown, with its advisers, is appointed to carry on the administration of affairs, public or executive, and to administer matters. The Crown, it is true, nominally is a branch of the legislative power, but it has really ceased to be a branch of the legislative power. There is a mighty distinction between the legislation and the administration of Ministers, and you can well see the reason of the difference. With the single exception of matters involving a charge upon the people, any member of this House, whether he is a member of the Ministry or not, can introduce a measure. Any member of the Quebec Legislature could have introduced an Act stating that if these municipalities did not pay up there would be no necessity of going to the Courts, and the Governor-in-Council should make summary proceedings to enforce their obligations. Any member could have done it, and if the House chose to carry it, then the Ministry would be obliged to yield. And not only that, Mr. Speaker, but if that legislation, no matter how important it may be, is brought before Parliament, it is a contempt of the privileges of this House for any man even to quote or suggest what the opinion of the Crown is respecting any political question. But it so happens that all the changes that have taken place in England are mostly—indeed all the changes except two that have taken place, have been on questions of administration, or questions of want of confidence in the capacity of the Government to administer affairs. Only two instances are known since the time of George III. until up to this present moment, when there was a dismissal or resignation of the Ministry in consequence of the difference between the Crown and the advisers of the Crown on matters of legislation, and these were on similar questions—that is, on the question of Catholic disability. The dismissal of Lord Melbourne was founded on the opinion of the King, that they could not satisfactorily administer affairs; but no difference of opinion, no question as to legislation, arose at all. The only two instances, as I said before, in which Ministers were dismissed on account of difference of opinion between the King and his advisers on matters of legislation were in—no, there were three cases. In the first place, there was the Mora Bill. It was objected to by the King because it deprived him, as the chief of the executive, of his patronage as chief of the executive. Then he objected to the Catholic Emancipation Bill, in 1801,—which Pitt had promised,—and he forced Pitt to resign, because Pitt would adhere to the promise which he had made to the Irish people at the time of Union in 1800. The next dismissal on account of legislation was when Lord Grenville was dismissed, in the manner which I have already mentioned, because he would not sign a pledge never afterwards to bring up the question of allowing Catholic gentlemen to hold high commands in the British army. There were only three instances, and they were instances only to be mentioned to be considered, to be cited, to be pointed at as outrages on the British Constitution. There was this difference: it had been conveyed to poor old George III. by the Chancellor, the head of the English Church, the Archbishop of Canterbury, that he would be committing a breach of his Coronation Oath if he allowed such legislation. Lord Melbourne, then Mr. Dundas, declared that such allegation was absurd. That when he swore as King that he would preserve the rights of the Protestant Church, as by law established, it meant that he would defend those rights as by law established, but if the law changed then he must defend them as altered. The answer of the King, which was well known, was that he did not want any Scotch metaphysics, that he had taken the oath and was bound by his conscientious scruples. We may regret that he had that conscientious scruple, because it has been the cause of much misery and misfortune to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It has been one of the principal causes that England and Ireland are not now one in heart and feeling, as Scotland and England have been ever since 1700. Still we must have respect for the conscience of the King. But, I point out to the House that, with the exception of the cases I have quoted, cases not to be repeated, but cases to be held up as warnings, that British Legislatures and people should never fall into committing the same mistake again, all the causes of dismissal and of forced resignation were on matters of administration. On that point I quote "May," 1859. Some gentleman has handed me this paper:

"What of Sir Edmund Head's refusal of a dissolution to the Brown-Dorion Government?"

I am not bound to defend Sir Edmund Head, but my answer is this: Sir Edmund Head, at the time he sent for Mr. Brown, told Mr. Brown he was going to charge him with the formation of a Government, but Mr. Brown must understand that he must not suppose that, if he did form a Government, he would have the right of dissolution, as a matter of course. That, after the Government was formed, he would hear reasons given for it, and then he would judge for himself. The Sovereign of the day can send for any person he likes, and can charge that person with the formation of a Government, stating on what conditions he could form it.

MR. MILLS: That is not consistent with Bagehot.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say it is. The Sovereign can attach certain conditions to the power given to a member to form a new Ministry. The only power the Crown can exercise personally, was that of attaching conditions to the power to form a Government, and of insisting on a dissolution by his Ministry. Sovereigns have again and again, in English history, given permission to form an administration on certain terms. If the person did not choose to accept the terms, the Sovereign must form an administration and get the confidence of Parliament. Sir Edmund Head in this case told Mr. Brown that he must not understand, if he accepted office, that he was to get a dissolution, as a matter of course, and that such would be granted only after sufficient reasons to convince him as to its necessity were given.

MR. MACKENZIE: He was working in accordance with Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You say he was working in accordance with the majority of Parliament. I was arguing that matters of legislation stood on quite a different basis from matters of administration. As a general rule, the Crown did not interfere in matters of administration, but left those to Parliament, and the only instances in which the contrary had been the case are those I have quoted, which are precedents not to be followed, but which are held up by all constitutional writers as infringements on the true principles of the British Constitution. Not only is that held to be the case when Pitt took office and a resolution was moved in consequence of its having been reported through the country that the King was against the Portland and Fox coalition Government, and the India Bill by Mr. Baker on December 17th, 1783, which, after denouncing secret advices to the Crown against responsible Ministers, and the use of the King's name set forth—

“That it is now necessary to declare that to report any opinion or pretended opinion of His Majesty upon a Bill or other proceeding with a view to influence the vote of the members, is a high crime and misdemeanour, dangerous to the honour of the Crown, a breach of fundamental principles of Parliament and subversive of the Constitution.”

The motion was carried by 153 to 80, notwithstanding all the opposition of Pitt, who was ultimately successful in the struggle, though, according to our present views of constitutional principles and laws, he was altogether wrong in the course he pursued on that occasion. Why, it is impossible that the same principles can apply to acts of administration and acts of legislation. I tried it the other day in this House. The hon. Minister of Justice introduced a Bill respecting penitentiaries, and I rose and asked him if the Governor-General had assented to the measure. He said, “No”. He looked at the Premier, and the Premier looked at him, and said to me:—“I do not think it is necessary.” I said, “Neither do I, but the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec thought it was necessary he should be consulted about all measures.”

MR. MACKENZIE: The right hon. gentleman is not now quoting me quite correctly.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think so.

MR. MACKENZIE: I thought the right hon. gentleman referred to some financial part of the scheme. When I said it was not necessary, I referred wholly to the usual sanction for Bills.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He thought of no financial clause in it requiring the previous assent of the Crown.

MR. MACKENZIE: Every Bill the Ministry introduces has the assent of the Crown.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have been a member of five Administrations. I have sat under five Governors—Lord Elgin, Sir Edmund Head, Lord Monck, Lord Lisgar, and Lord Dufferin, and I never heard that doctrine proclaimed before. We know perfectly well that the Governor-General, as the Queen can, if he chooses, send for the Ministers, and say: “I do not like that Bill, and I would like to discuss it with you. I think you must modify it or hold it over.” The Sovereign can thus interfere if he chooses, but practically he leaves all legislation to the country. The proof of that is found in the fact that any member of the Opposition, in all matters excepting those connected with finance, which must be preceded by a message from the Crown, were just as competent to introduce every Ministerial measure as hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and as competent to amend any measures. The House saw the other day a Bill introduced by the hon. the Postmaster-General, to which the hon. member for South Bruce moved an amendment which entirely destroyed and changed the whole aim and end of the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman accepted it. He did not propose that it should be deferred until he went to Rideau Hall to consult the Governor-General. So it is with all other Government Bills. I venture to say that, with the exception of the general statement, which, of course, is made by the hon. the First Minister at the beginning of the Session as to what is contained in the Speech from the Throne, all Departmental Bills were introduced without the sanction in any shape of His Excellency. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not deny that statement. Yet the whole cause of objection to the course taken by the Quebec Administration was because the Lieutenant-Governor did not agree with the policy of the legislation, although that policy was passed and approved by the representatives of the people by a large majority. The Lieutenant-Governor allowed his Ministry to introduce their Bills, he saw day after day the discussions in the House, every day received the Votes and Proceedings, and, in fact, laid in wait for his Ministers. He allowed them to bring down the Supply Bill, and almost allowed them to carry the Appropriation Act. He allowed them to carry through their Bill respecting railways and that respecting the doubling up of the subsidies, and, strange to say, that the same Bill for doubling up the subsidies, which was one of the first causes given why they were dismissed, received the Royal assent of the Lieutenant-Governor on the advice of the successors of the late Government. That Bill in no way increased the burthens of the people, the subsidy having been voted years before Mr. Letellier was Lieutenant-Governor, there being a provision that if a portion of the subsidy was not taken advantage of for certain railways, it could be applied for the benefit of other railways. That was the law before Mr. Letellier was Lieutenant-Governor. The Act was merely carrying the law into force. The Lieutenant-Governor gave, as one of his first reasons for dismissing his Ministers, that they had passed the law without consulting him. Yet it was by the advice of Mr. Joly that it was now the law. As an hon. member near me says, Mr. Joly was President of one of the roads, and voted for the measure in regard to which he advised the Lieutenant-Governor to dismiss Mr. DeBoucherville. Actually he who voted and supported the measure, and was in one sense interested in it, and was now responsible for the measure becoming law, was a party to the dismissal of Mr. DeBoucherville, because he had introduced the Bill and carried it through the Legislature. He approves of the Act, but procures the dismissal of the man who obtained its passage. The Stamp Act, which was introduced last Session, was a very important one. Before the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue got his Amendment Bill through the Committee, he must not have known his own progeny. It was like the gun which had a new lock, stock, and barrel. Was the assent of the Governor-General obtained to the Bill, or to any amendments made to it? And yet, forsooth, the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was to decide and govern what the legislative policy of the people is to be. He, like Jupiter, shakes his ambrosial locks, gives his nod, and the legislators have merely to register his decrees. No such thing could happen in England. The Queen knows too well what her duty is. She keeps a sharp and watchful eye upon the foreign policy. No one can read the memoirs of the Prince Consort without feeling what a great woman, a great stateswoman, if there is such a word, she is, and with what watchful and patriotic a care she guarded, and studied, and considered the administration of the nation. But, as regards the legislation of the nation, she left that, as it ought to be left, to the people through their representatives. She was satisfied with the old sliding scale of the corn duties in the old Corn Law times. She was satisfied with the fixed duty of four shillings a quarter declared by Lord John Russell, and with the free trade in corn declared by Sir Robert Peel. She was satisfied with the sustaining of the Established Church in Ireland so long as her Ministers advised her so to maintain it. She was satisfied with the disestablishment of her own Church, of which she was the head, as soon as the representatives of the people in Parliament decreed it. She received with like equanimity a Reform Bill from one Government or a retroactive measure from another. She knows it has ceased to be a portion of the attributes of the Crown to possess any power in legislation, and the strongest proof of that is that the power of veto has gone, and that while the Sovereign is still the head of the Executive, she is only nominally the head of the Legislature. She cannot veto a bill. It has not been done since Queen Anne's time. It is as effete as the dodo. It is no part of the Constitution of England. This is laid down by all the writers. I shall quote again from Mr. Bagehot, page 143:—

And that is the duty of a Sovereign. If any legislation, carried on by a Ministry having a majority in Parliament, and, of course, they cannot carry it on without that, was opposed to the view of the Sovereign, he had the right to send for his First Minister, and say, “I will continue to support you, but I have had experience for years, and I warn you,” and that is substantially the only power he has in matters of legislation. On page 125, Mr. Bagehot says:—

“The popular theory of the English constitution involves two errors as to the Sovereign; first, in its oldest form, at least, it considers him as an estate of the realm, a separate co-ordinate authority with the House of Lords and the House of Commons. This, and much else, the Sovereign once was, but this he is no longer. That authority could only be exercised by a monarch with a legislative veto. He should be able to reject Bills if not as the House of Commons rejects them, at least as the House of Peers rejects them. But the Queen has no such veto. She must sign her own death warrant if the two Houses unanimously sent it up to her. It is a fiction of the past to ascribe to her legislative power. She has long ceased to have any.”

Nor can the House of Lords interfere effectually, if the House of Commons declares in favour of the policy of the Government of the day. May says:—

“The responsibility of Ministers has been still further simplified by the dominant power of the Commons. The Lords may sometimes thwart the Ministry, but they are powerless to overthrow a Ministry supported by the Commons, or to uphold a Ministry the Commons have condemned. Instead of many masters, the Government has only one, that is the people. Nor can it be said that master has been severe, exacting, or capricious.”

Sir, I contend that the Government of Quebec having a majority in both Houses, should be sustained by the Governor. If the Governor thought they had forfeited the confidence of the people, he had a right to insist on having a dissolution, but he must leave it in their hands. I have quoted these authorities to show that it is utterly impossible for a Ministry to be maintained if they lose the confidence of Parliament, and utterly impossible for a Ministry to be dismissed if they have the confidence of Parliament. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, if he had chosen to pursue the legitimate course, would have said to his advisers: “I do not agree in this policy of yours, and I do not think that the people do.” He should have said that the moment when he knew the policy of the Government, when he knew the measures were introduced, and he had the right to send for his Ministers and say, “I see that a measure has been, or is to be, introduced, and I ask what it means.” Although the Crown never does interfere, he might have sent on theoretical grounds for the Prime Minister, and said, “I do not approve of it, and I will insist upon you leaving it to the people, upon your hurrying through the Session, and withdrawing the measure, and submitting it to the people to see if you have their confidence on general grounds.” That would be an extreme measure, which the Queen would never think of taking, a step which she would think would be an outrage on the Constitution. But still in that case there would have been an adherence to the letter of the Constitution. But what was done here? The Legislature had met, and had passed a series of laws. It was known what the policy of the Government was. All their measures were submitted to Parliament. They were going on from day to day, and from week to week, without objection or without a warning such as that mentioned by Bagehot. The measures were almost completed when at last the Government were told: "There is the door, and you must go." It was a coup d'état. It was an outrage on the Constitution. It was an outrage on free institutions, and above all on British institutions, and as such I move that the course taken by the Lieutenant-Governor was both unwise and unconstitutional. Unwise it certainly is, and its unwise-ness is obvious from the imputations thrown out as to the motives which govern him in that course. In this discussion, I have tried to sever the condemnation of his acts from any charge against the Lieutenant-Governor. I am sure he has made a mistake. I know he has committed a breach of the Constitution. I condemn the act, but it is not for the purpose of my argument to say anything against him, except that the act which he has committed was an outrage on the Constitution. It was unwise, not only because it was against the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution, but because it was liable to the imputations thrown out, and the suspicions which it has engendered. Here we are, just before a general election in which there is to be a struggle of considerable, perhaps, of extreme, warmth, from one end of the country to the other. It is alleged that the present Government has not the confidence of the people of Lower Canada. It is alleged that Mr. Letellier was a partizan of the present Government. He had before been one of its Ministers, and it is alleged was sent down there as a partizan. It is alleged that he allowed a Ministry having the confidence of both Houses, having the confidence of the representatives of the people, to carry their measures almost to the end of the Session, and, at the last moment, when he thought the legislation was complete, he sent them adrift and brought in new men belonging to the same political party as himself, who had supported him when he was a member of the Government, and that all this was done for the purpose of getting hold of power in the Province of Quebec to be used at the general election. This is a widely spread charge, be it untrue or be it true. The very fact of this act being done by the Lieutenant-Governor at the time, as it must have been obvious to him, and to any man of common sense, that it would be liable to do, has given rise to that charge, to that imputation, to that suspicion. It was a matter of unwise-ness, as it tended to show, perhaps, that the Government did not exhibit the greatest discretion in choosing him for that office. But it is not without some foundation, that those who are opposed to the present Government may think perhaps that their suspicions are well founded, and those suspicions grow, among other things, from the remarks which had been made by the Ministerial Press itself. The Halifax Chronicle, a paper which the hon. the Minister of Militia will not disavow, says:

"If a general election should take place in Quebec now, the Liberals would have good prospects of capturing the Government of the Province, which is supposed to be the stronghold of Conservatism."

The Hamilton Times, a paper which I fancy the hon. the Premier will not disavow, says:

"The dismissal of the Quebec Government is the talk of the Lobbies. The Tory members are gathered in groups and discussing the situation, which is most grave. They condemn the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. Their fear is that the new Ministry will cause their names to be announced to-morrow in the House, and the moment that is done have Parliament prorogued. This would give the new Ministers time to ferret out the rascality of the old Cabinet, and make a full exposure of it when they appeal to the country, which would take place at the time the Dominion elections are held, and would give the Liberal party an unusual strength in the Province."

The rumour was, therefore, such that it actually appeared in type that the elections were to be held about the same time. If so, I think I am fully outborne in expressing in my resolution, that the dismissal of the Ministry at this time, of all others, is unwise; that it is a breach of the British Constitution, and has shaken Responsible Government to its very basis. And there is one thing that is worse than all; it is throwing upon the people the decision of a great constitutional question, in an election that will not be fought on that question. The elections coming on in the Province of Quebec, will be decided on the railway question, on the tax question, on every other question than the constitutional question. It was a grave responsibility for that Lieutenant-Governor to take a responsibility which no man fully aware of the consequences of his conduct would take, a responsibility which no man who was not utterly reckless of the sanctity of the constitution and the necessity of preserving all the bulwarks of the Constitution, would have undertaken. Unless this House is firm, unless this House rises to the occasion and is true to itself and to the constitution under which we sit here, and unless it desires to sacrifice the principles of Responsible Government, and to go back to the old autocratic times, we shall establish a precedent which may be worked for the evil of this Constitution for all time. What would be said of the Earl of Dufferin, if he had said to hon. gentlemen opposite: "I am of opinion you have not the confidence of the country. I have seen that a number of casual elections have gone against you from one accident or another. I think there is a reaction in the country, that the people do not support you with the same alacrity as formerly, and I shall dismiss you and send for the Opposition." You could not suppose that the Earl of Dufferin, that a man imbued with the spirit of the British constitution, that an English statesman, or an English gentleman, could commit such an offence. Take another case. Suppose now that the elections are just coming on. Mr. Archibald, now the Governor of Nova Scotia, who formerly belonged to the same party as myself, and was recommended by me as the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, has in that Province an Administration opposed to the policy of the Opposition here, and supporting with all their power the present Dominion Government. Suppose he took a leaf out of Mr. Letellier's book and picked a quarrel with his advisers just before the elections. Suppose he said: "I see you have only a majority of two or three, that you have lost election after election, and I do not believe you really represent the people. I shall dismiss you and call a new Administration. I shall call a friend, personal or political, of my own, and assign to him the agreeable duty of dissolving the Legislature, and using the patronage, the power, and the influence of the Government in favour of the present Opposition, and against the present Government." How my hon. friend at the head of this Government would, in that case, rise in his place and recall the good old days when the Liberal party fought the battle of Responsible Government, and denounce the destruction of the old Tory method of dismissing a Government with a majority, which it was true, might be a limited one, but was still a majority. How this House and the country would have rung with lament over such a return to the old days of Metcalf and Toryism and tyranny. Sir, I do not believe the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will belie his previous professions. I do not believe, until I hear and see it, that because the Lieutenant-Governor of Lower Canada happens to be his appointee, he will sacrifice his own great principles in defence of a Minister who, I believe, has committed a great constitutional wrong. Every Ministry is liable to make mistakes in appointments. Every Ministry is liable somewhat from the mistakes or errors, or the worse than errors, of their subordinates. Though they may not be, responsible for them, still they may be to a certain degree, responsible in public opinion for having made a wrong choice; but until they condone the offence, until they approve of the offence, until they say "We approve of that policy, and will support them in that policy," they are not justly amenable to attack. I have made no attack. God forbid that I should do so, for as yet I know not that the present Ministry, at the head of which is the hon. member for Lambton, is liable to the charge, liable to attack, or liable to censure for anything that has taken place. As yet I do not know this, and, therefore, I will not say it. But it depends upon that

hon. gentleman to say whether he, the head of a Liberal Government, be upon whom the mantle of Robert Baldwin and others has fallen, be the distinguished leader of the Liberal party of the country, will—but I do not believe that the hon. gentleman will—sacrifice those great principles. It may be a warm-hearted, it may be a kindly, and, perhaps, in some respects, a polite act to do so, looking at the mere temporary advantages of an election; but I do not believe that that hon. gentleman will turn his back upon those principles which he has so long professed, and which have been the chief credit, the chief honour of his party. Mr. Speaker, I move the resolution.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with the greatest possible interest to the somewhat lengthy lecture on Constitutional Government, given by the hon. gentleman. A very large proportion of what he has said I entirely agree with.

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: Many of his quotations are apposite enough, and many quotations, which might be given, are entirely missed. Reference to precedents are given so far as they suit the hon. gentleman's own purpose, but when they touched upon a tender point, they were passed very gently over. The hon. gentlemen are scarcely, from his history as a public man in the country, in a position to give a lecture to Liberals as to the mode in which they are to deal with the exercise of the Royal Prerogative, or the manner in which the Royal Prerogative has been exercised in regard to themselves, Sir, the Liberal Party have had a long struggle with the hon. gentleman and his friends in order to establish the principle of Responsible Government. That principle has been established alike in the Provinces and in the Dominion, but I maintain that the Governments of the Legislatures of the respective provinces occupy precisely the same position towards the Crown that the colonies, having Lieutenant-Governors appointed immediately by the Crown, occupy, to the Imperial authorities. If we depart from that principle, we depart at once from the only holding ground upon which we can constitutionally anchor, if I may use that expression. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, by his motion to-night, has undertaken to set at defiance the principles of responsible government as applicable to the Provinces. I do not deny at all the premises that the hon. gentleman laid down as to the right of this House, to criticise the action of the Lieutenant-Governors appointed by this Government. It is quite true, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that the actions of the Governors of Colonies are criticised sharply and vigorously in the House of Commons, although I do not admit there is any analogy between the cases of Governor Eyre and the Governors of British Guiana, because responsible Government did not obtain in these Colonies; and their actions were dealt with by the House of Commons somewhat as the actions of a responsible tyrant would be, who exercised political dominion under the authority of the British Crown.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Governor Darling.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; Governor Darling, and several others. I quite admit, and say that this is a legitimate subject for criticism in the Imperial Parliament, and that this criticism has been exercised. No one would seek to deny this, and far less should I seek to deny it than anyone else, as I desire to maintain that principle of responsibility alike by the colonists and by the Imperial authorities; but, on the other hand, I admit that we are entitled in this House to discuss, if we please, in this manner, the actions of the Lieutenant-Governor appointed by ourselves. But I hold, at the same time, that it is only under very extreme circumstances that it is wise or politic for that criticism and that discussion to be indulged in by this Parliament. Now, what is the position at the present time in Quebec? The hon. gentleman, in his resolution, is very mild. He characterizes the action of the Lieutenant-Governor simply as unwise. Well, Sir, whether it was wise or unwise is a matter of opinion, and who is that to be decided by? Are we to constitute ourselves as a Court of Justice to sit upon Lieutenant-Governors?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says "yes." Well, I deny it, I deny utterly that assumption. We, no doubt, may exercise a judicious policy in criticising such actions, and I do not deny that cases may arise wherein it might be the duty of the authorities at Ottawa to interfere; but where it is simply the case of the removal of one Ministry and the appointment of another—

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where a Governor has dismissed his Ministry, and, to use the hon gentleman's own expression, has forced them to a resignation, then, we have to consider the question that arises immediately succeeding that. The position in Quebec is this: that Lieut.-Governor Letellier removed the members of his Administration and appointed others in their place; that the Ministry by Mr. Joly assumed the full responsibility of the Governor's action as he was bound to do. He could not possibly accept office under the circumstances without making himself and his colleagues responsible for the action of the Governor. In his bold and manly address to the electors of the Province of Quebec—

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am glad that hon. gentlemen opposite appreciate that boldness.

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: He states explicitly that he assumes the full responsibility. Of course, his declaration was not necessary to constitute his responsibility. His responsibility began the moment when he assumed office, and the election is, at present, proceeding where the question is before the people as to whether the action of the Governor was wise or unwise. Now, suppose that this House exercised its discretion, and accorded to the hon. gentlemen opposite more wisdom than to the Governor, and should condemn the action of the Governor, and that the electors of the Province of Quebec, on the 1st of May, should say that the Governor's act was wise, in what position, would the Federal authorities and the Federal Parliament be in condemning the course which the people of the Province themselves had sanctioned and approved?

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is precisely the position which the unwisdom of the hon. gentlemen opposite would have us rush into, and it is one which I, for one, will not take the responsibility of incurring any danger upon. I believe it is an unwarranted use of the powers of the House to attempt, under the circumstances, to pass any vote of censure or of approval of either party. The matter is left with the responsible Administration, and nothing could be more fatal to the provincial autonomy which exists under the Confederation Act than such an unwise and unwarranted interference with its proper functions.

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why, that was the hon. gentleman's own argument in the case of the reserved Bills from Ontario five years ago. The hon. gentleman will remember, and the House will remember, that the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario reserved two Orange incorporation Bills for the assent of the Governor-General. It did not suit the hon. gentleman opposite either to sanction these Bills or to refuse his sanction to them; and I do not say that his action was wrong or the decision that he gave, but it was a convenient decision, at all events, under the circumstances; and, in order to ensure the popular opinion in favour of his decision, and in order to place himself right constitutionally, the hon. gentleman entered into a long argument to show what the real position of the local authorities was relative to the federal authorities. The paper was a good one, and I shall take the liberty of reading some extracts from it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no doubt that it was a good paper.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was a very good paper, and entirely subversive of the hon. gentleman's argument to-day. I will read, as follows:

"The only object of these Associations appearing on the face of the Acts is the holding of property, real and personal; that this being a Provincial object, the Acts are within the competence and jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. Such being the case, in the opinion of the undersigned the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario ought not to have reserved these Acts for Your Excellency's assent, but should have given his assent to them as Lieutenant-Governor. Under the system of Government that obtains in England as well as in the Dominion and its several Provinces, it is the duty of the advisers of the Executive to recommend every measure that has passed the Legislature for the Executive assent. The provision in the British North America Act of 1867, that Your Excellency may reserve a Bill for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, was solely made with the view to the protection of Imperial interests and the maintenance of Imperial policy, and in case Your Excellency should exercise the power of reservation conferred upon you, you would do so in your capacity as an Imperial officer, and under the Royal instructions. It then rests with the Governor-General or the Lieutenant-Governor, as the case may be, to consider whether the Act conflicts with his instructions or his duty as an Imperial or a Dominion officer, and if it does so conflict he is bound to reserve, whatever the advice tendered him may be; but if not he will doubtless feel it his duty to give his assent in accordance with advice to that effect, which it was the duty of his Ministers to give. Under these circumstances, the undersigned recommends that the Lieutenant-Governor be informed that Your Excellency does not propose to signify your pleasure with respect to these reserved Acts, or to take any action whatever. The Legislature of Ontario will, at its next Session, which must meet before the expiration of the year within which, by the constitution, Your Excellency has the power to signify your pleasure, have the power, if it pleases, of considering these measures and re-enacting or rejecting them at its discretion. If the Acts should again be passed the Lieut.-Governor should consider himself bound to deal with them at once, and not ask Your Excellency to intervene in matters of Provincial concern, and solely and entirely within the jurisdiction and competence of the Legislature of the Province."

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, on this occasion, caught the Lieutenant-Governor endeavoring to make an appeal to sanction certain Acts to the Governor-General of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman opposite acted upon his interpretation of the constitution which I am bound to say, I think, was right. He refers then to their own powers and points out that this is entirely within their own competence and jurisdiction. But to-day, he comes to this House, and asks this House to declare, by a hostile vote, that the Governor of the Province of Quebec has not acted within his competence and jurisdiction. He enters upon a long argument to show that a measure or a Government act might be lawful and yet be unconstitutional. The whole of the original part of the hon. gentleman's speech was directed to this, and his quotations from Freeman, I think, and others, were to show that a certain policy might be perfectly legal, that it might be lawful, but that under the well known principles of the British constitution, it should be considered as an unconstitutional act. In other words, that an unconstitutional act was not necessarily an illegal or improper act, while a certain act might be both legal and unconstitutional. Now, the hon. gentleman did not venture to characterize the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec as unconstitutional. He did not venture—until in his last words he spoke of its being an outrage on the Constitution—he did not venture to say, or to affirm, or make any attempt to prove, that Governor Letellier had acted beyond his powers and competent jurisdiction.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: My whole speech was to that effect.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I can only say that I am very glad to have that interpretation of the speech. I supposed that the speech was intended to show what the hon. gentleman's resolution says, that the action was not unconstitutional, but was unwise, in his opinion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Unwise and subversive of the great constitutional principle of responsible Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: It does not say so. It says "subversive of the position of his advisers." It is a very cunningly drawn resolution, no doubt. It is a resolution, like most of the resolutions the hon. gentleman draws up, capable of being interpreted two or three ways. I shall not go into a long argument to prove whether Governor Letellier was right or wrong, since I think it is a question that we have no right to entertain. I think it would be an outrage on the constitutional system of government to try to do so. We have only to await the natural result of the working of the constitutional system which is in full operation at the present moment in Quebec. If the people sustain the Administration which has assumed the responsibility of this act, it is not within the power of this House to condemn or set aside the Constitution those people sustain. If, on the other hand, that Ministry which has assumed the responsibility of the act of the Lieutenant-Governor in dismissing his Ministers should not be able to sustain itself, then we would have entered upon another phase of the constitution question, coming up in regular order, and subject to the natural laws which flow from our written constitution and responsible system of government; and upon that ground I argue that we ought not to pass any vote of censure upon the Lieutenant-Governor or upon his advisers. You could not in this House pass a vote of censure on Governor Letellier's action without censuring the Ministry at present in power in the Province of Quebec. The one involves the other as certainly as cause and effect are connected.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I should like to hear him controvert that statement.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: When Governor Darling was censured or recalled there was no censure upon the Government of New South Wales, whose policy was afterwards carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has not stated the ground of Sir Charles Darling's dismissal. He was dismissed because he sanctioned, and not only sanctioned acts of his advisers which were legally unjustifiable, but he also placed himself in a position of personal antagonism towards almost all those whose antecedents pointed them out as the most likely material to be available to him in a change of Administration.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He was recalled and sustained.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Government was sustained, and Governor Letellier may be sustained in Quebec for anything the hon. gentleman knows. I observe my hon. friend for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) dissents, and I have the greatest possible respect for the wisdom concealed in that head; but I did not at all affirm whether he will or will not be sustained. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, knows more about it than I do. I profess to know nothing. My ground is this: that I propose not to interfere; that I have not interfered; that nothing shall be done by the Government of the Dominion which would in any way place us in the position of having taken part in a political controversy which affected the Province and the Province alone. The hon. gentleman, on the other hand, wishes us to place ourselves in that position. The hon. member for Kingston supposed a case a few minutes before he sat down. The hon. gentleman says: Suppose the Governor-General should say to the present Administration that they had lost particular elections, that in his opinion they had more or less lost the confidence of the country, and, therefore, he felt it necessary to dismiss them, and he asked me what I would have thought of that. Well, Sir, whatever I would have thought of that I recall to mind that his own newspaper, the Mail, advocated this very proposition that the Governor-General should dissolve the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. I am sure he is wrong. The Mail never advised that the hon. gentleman should be turned out and that a dissolution should take place. The Mail advised that the hon. gentleman should himself dissolve.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I observe that the hon. gentleman has an intimate knowledge of the character of the article in that paper, and, of course, if he controls that paper, he ought to know.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says he does not control; the Globe. I take it that he does not, and I say I do not control the Mail.

MR. MACKENZIE: All I can say is that it is very much to the hon. gentleman's credit that he does not control the Mail. It is to be sure a matter of very little consequence in a discussion of this question what the right hon. gentleman's opinion may be of facts in regard to which the conduct of the Government is called in question, or what my opinion or that of any other member may be. But, as the hon. gentleman has chosen to discuss that particular question with reference to certain Governors once in Canada, I may, for a moment, stop to correct his remembrance of what took place under Sir Edmund Bond Head in 1856. The right hon. gentleman says that when Mr. Brown was called on to form an Administration he was told of the conditions on which he should form his Government, and that unless he acceded to these conditions he had no right to form a Government. I can only say, Sir, that there was no condition except the one which the right hon. gentlemen has mentioned, that the Governor-General would not pledge himself to a dissolution. This was the one given. I think, by the Minister at the time of the Ministerial explanations. I think it was a gross outrage, to use his own words, on constitutional authority that a Governor-General should have told the man whom he had called to form a Government that he would not be advised on a certain matter, except by those who were not in a position to give advice. Mr. Brown, very properly, told the Governor-General that if he was authorized to form a Government, he would endeavour to accomplish the task, and if he should succeed in accomplishing it he should deem it his duty to tender his advice on the question of dissolution, and that, if he did so, he should expect that advice to be acceded to. The right hon. gentleman makes out that Sir Edward Bond Head occupied the position of a political partizan, and, if he were alive and in this House, I should say of a political conspirator. There is nothing more base in the history of this country than the action of Sir Edward Head on that occasion. Yet, Sir, that action found a ready apologist in the right hon. member for Kingston. But, as my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) says, the right hon. gentleman took all the responsibility on that occasion, and thought that ex-Ministers were in a position to give advice when Ministers were not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is an assumption.

MR. MACKENZIE: I admit it is an assumption. It is one I have always believed, and is one I will always continue to believe.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was denied by the Governor-General at the time and those who had been advising him.

MR. MACKENZIE: I accept the right hon. gentleman's statement.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has been stated in the old Parliament of Canada that it was "as false as hell," and it was as false as hell.

MR. MACKENZIE: I can only say that I continue to believe that there was communication of an improper and irresponsible character between some of the ex-Ministers and the Governor-General. I have no doubt of it, and anything more outrageous than that proceeding can scarcely be conceived. If the matter had been left in the hands of the people, as it has been done in Quebec, it would have assumed a different aspect altogether. The right hon. gentleman says they had just come from the people. How long had they come from the people? The elections were held in December, 1857, and these transactions took place in August.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The first Session afterwards.

MR. MACKENZIE: Very well. The right hon. gentleman says they had just come from the people. Does he know that an appeal was granted to an English Ministry three months from the general elections? Does he mean to say that there must be no dissolution because one had to take place within the year? This was the right hon. gentleman's excuse for the gross perversion of the Royal authority by the Governor-General, and he stands here to-day as its apologist and defender while he assails a matter which is now fairly and constitutionally placed before the people of Quebec. Now, as I said, I do not propose to discuss the question as to whether Governor Letellier was strictly within the line of duty or not—for the reason I stated. I may observe, in passing, that very extraordinary things were being consummated in the Province of Quebec; I may observe that I could point out that extraordinary acts were in progress.

MR. MASSON: That was their business.

MR. MACKENZIE: Sir, it is true it was. It is true our Constitution consists of three distinct branches; that one of them, perhaps two of them, were intervening directly between judicial and legislative authority; that they were interposing legislative where judicial authority was the proper method—they were endeavouring to shut the doors of the Courts against those who were appealing against a course of justice. I do not forget, Sir, that one of the most distinguished men who has ever lived in Canada—and though it was my misfortune for many years to differ from many administrative acts of his, still it was my glory to belong to the school of which that gentleman was a bright example and a bright representative—I allude to Sir Francis Hincks, has completely defended the position of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and he is an authority which no gentlemen on the opposite side can venture to despise. I recollect well, a few years ago, when they got him into the seat where we now sit, they thought they secured a prize—and they did. They secured his abilities to prop up a falling Administration. And, Sir, for years afterwards that distinguished statesman was held up as a model of all that was bright and able—as our ablest financier. Sir Francis Hincks has given his opinion in favour of the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and he is decried and abused by the Tory newspapers because of his course in that matter. I merely refer to his opinion to show that the best authorities on constitutional government may fairly differ about the propriety or the wisdom—to use the right hon. gentleman's own words—of the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. Why did not the hon. gentleman venture on a stronger expression than he had chosen to employ in this resolution? It was because he knew, with his extensive legal ability and his constitutional knowledge, that he could not do so. I never believed that he would venture on an absolute condemnation in a constitutional sense of the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. It was in fact, a fatal slip against Constitutional Government that he chose to couch his resolution in the mild terms in which he did couch it. Yet he now expects, because his language is mild, and his phrases almost indifferent, that we should pass a vote of censure upon Governor Letellier within a few days of the time when the electors of Quebec should pronounce upon the wisdom of the unwisdom of the Ministerial events which have transpired lately in that Province. Sir, I say that a more indecent, and, politically speaking, a more unwise step was never proposed to be taken by the head of a political party in this country. I join with him and others in this Parliament, or out of it, in maintaining our free institutions, in maintaining the responsibility of Ministers to the Crown and their responsibility to the people, and in taking steps in the direction of that end where there is a dispute as to the course to be pursued; but the justification of the course that has to be pursued, and has been pursued, in that matter is, that it has to be referred to the ultimate tribunal, the great national inquest, which can only give the verdict at the polls. But until other causes are shown for interference than have been shown to-night in the hon. gentleman's very long and very able address on constitutional government and its principles, and a narrative of what took place under the reign of English monarchs who were more or less despots in their character to show the necessity of leading to another conclusion in reference to the present dispute, I say, notwithstanding all these arguments, the question simply is this: Shall we interfere with Constitutional questions which are in the process of being settled? For the reasons I have given, I object to that interference, and shall resist that interference; and I ask every one who loves responsible Government to vote down the hon. gentleman's resolution as being contrary to the very principles on which responsible government is based, as injurious in its results, and reflecting on the character of the people to whom it is to apply.

MR. MASSON said he thought the hon. gentleman could not make a stronger speech to prove the Hon. Mr. Letellier acted against responsible government than the one he had just given. They had a right to insist that the hon. gentleman should take the matter up, they had a right to insist on his doing what would have been his duty; but he had distinctly stated that he would not even consider the question, or give his opinion upon it at the present moment. The hon. gentleman said they had no right to enquire whether Mr. Letellier acted rightly or wrongly. Had the hon. the Premier forgotten that the Union Act imposed upon him the obligation of seeing whether the gentleman whom he had appointed, acted wrongly or rightly? The Act was in these terms:—

“A Lieutenant-Governor shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General; but any Lieutenant-Governor appointed after the commencement of the first Session of the Parliament of Canada, shall not be removable within five years of his appointment, except for cause assigned, which shall be communicated to him within one month after the order for his removal is made, and shall be communicated by message to the Senate and to the House of Commons within one week thereafter, if the Parliament is then sitting, and if not then, within one week after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament.”

Was the meaning of this clause that the Government was not responsible for the Act of the Lieutenant-Governor? Were they not to judge whether he had acted wisely or unwisely? The hon. gentleman, who well knew the duty imposed upon him by this Act, would nevertheless venture to interfere, as he had done, with the rights of the people to legislate for themselves if they wished. This was not the proper place to judge whether the people of Quebec were right or wrong, whether the majority of the people of Quebec, by their representatives, acted wisely or unwisely; but it was the proper place to enquire whether the Lieutenant-Governor had acted constitutionally or otherwise. The hon. Premier had been willing to judge of that of which he had no right to judge, but was unwilling to judge of that which his duty called upon him to judge. A great question had been raised in Quebec, and the whole of their system of Government depended upon it. There was a great man in France, a man who had his defects, his faults and his failings, but was considered a great man; he referred to M. Thiers, and he would cite his words upon this question. At a sitting of the National Assembly, after the capitulation of Paris, M. Thiers said:

“If I had the power, which no mortal possesses, I would have given to my country that which, in the measure of my ability, I have for forty years toiled to give it—the constitutional monarchy of England. Yes, gentlemen, I believe those men are free, nobly free, at Washington; that great things are there achieved; but I also believe that men are equally free in London; and, may I be allowed to say so, more free than those at Washington. The reason of this is, that in London, Government is placed in a region equally distant from the passions from above and the passions from below. Never, in any country, nor at any time, has Government been placed in a region where calm reason is more likely to predominate, and is less troubled. But, gentlemen, I have always held that princes who govern must accept the conditions of this form of Government. If they wish to attract to themselves the Government, they must also attract a responsibility which, in these stormy times, soon becomes the ruin of the throne. * * * Princes must bring themselves to the idea that monarchy is often all but a Republic, a Republic with an hereditary President.”

Those were the ideas of a great French statesman; and, as his hon. friend had said, those ideas should be practiced by the monarchy which ruled at the present moment. The hon. gentleman had said that it was none of his business to interfere with what occurred at the Local Legislature, and that it would be interfering with the rights of the people. If there was a danger of allowing the Government to interfere with the free will of the people, that danger existed more in Canada than anywhere, and in Quebec more than in any other Province. If the will of the people of the Province of Quebec were to be put aside by the Lieutenant-Governor of that Province, their condition was weak; if every aspiration of the people could be foiled by the act of a man who was appointed by the Government at Ottawa, the Federal Government might interfere through an act of their political appointee, and stop the legislation at a time when it was most dangerous for the liberties of the people, and for the maintenance of Responsible Government in this country. He who ruled over men must be above the smallest taint or suspicion of partiality. If there was a Sovereign who had given them an example of this, it was Her Majesty Queen Victoria. It was well known that in the first years of her reign she had a preference for the Whigs that was so strong that even Lord Marlborough said the time had come when she should tender her branch of olive to the Tory party of England. If impartiality was required in England, it was more required here, because our position was entirely different. The Imperial Governors that were sent to this country were not subject to the aspirations of party and the influence of political bias, which could affect Governors coming from this country. The latter were subject for their future promotion or future advantage to the Act of the Federal Government which appointed them. The system had been adopted by the Dominion Parliament of appointing Governors from their own ranks, and it might be a bad system, for the men appointed might have been assiduous in their efforts to destroy the party over whom they were called upon to rule. The hon. the Premier said this was a very small question, that it was only a question of removing a Ministry. Very small question indeed. He would take a point of comparison having some bearing upon the conduct of the hon. gentleman. He would not go back and read what were the opinions of the great statesmen of England, but would read something more immediately bearing upon the question as it was almost of actual occurrence. It would be remembered that in France, last year, there were occurrences which called upon Marshal MacMahon to dismiss the Ministry, and the cry that was raised all over the Dominion with regard to that, showed that it was considered as an attack upon the Constitution of the French people. He would show what was the opinion of the Liberal Press of England, relating to the coup d'état and its analogy to the present case. The Daily News, in an article, answered the point which had been raised in the Province of Quebec by the friends of the party opposite—that the act being legal, they had nothing to say against it, that being in accordance with the letter of the Statute, they had no fault to find with the Lieutenant-Governor, who had acted according to this rule. This was what the organ of the Liberal party of England, the party of his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, who said that his models were not to be found in this country, but in England:

“It may be argued that Marshal MacMahon has acted thus far within the strict limit of his legal and constitutional rights. But a constitutional ruler who tries the very extreme of his constitutional rights when a much less strenuous assertion of authority was all that the occasion called for, is already dangerously near the verge of the unconstitutional and even of the despotic. The Sovereign of England has various constitutional rights, carefully secured by theory, and even sanctioned by many precedents, the unexpected exercise of which rights in our day would throw the whole country into bewilderment. Whatever the privileges and powers which the constitution of the French Republic may have assigned to the individual action of the President, it is certain that their exercise would have to be justified in every single case by the urgency of sufficient national necessity calling for their application. No such necessity could possibly be pleaded in the present instance. The Ministry were in full accord with the opinions of the majority of the representative chamber, and of the country outside. If Mr. Jules Simon had in any way failed to perform what the President may have considered his ministerial duty or official engagement, that fact could not furnish the slightest excuse for the sudden imposition of an Orleanist and Bonapartist combination on the country.

There is no getting over the plain fact that the whole of Europe regards Marshal Macmahon's proceedings as something very like a coup d'état. The appearance of a difference, says Mr. Mill, is a difference. In times of excitement and high political tension, the appearance of arbitrary action is to all intents and purposes arbitrary action."

This was sound doctrine and exactly tallied with the doctrine his right hon. friend from Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had propounded. It was his duty to take his officers from among the majority of the House and not from among the minority. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue shook his head; perhaps he wished to come a little nearer home and hear the opinions of people in Quebec. He would give the opinion of an influential Canadian writer upon MacMahon's coup d'état, Hon. Senator Penny, Editor of the Montreal Herald. In the Herald of 16th August, 1877, appears the following:—

"In the first instance there was some pretence on the part of Marshal MacMahon and the Duke of Broglie, that, while acting in opposition to the spirit, they would keep within the letter of the constitution. They would, in fact, according to the representations they made, cover their attack upon the late chamber by appealing to the people, and asking their assent to be declared through the voice of newly and freely elected representatives. As we have pointed out on former occasions, though this would be an extreme, and, in the best sense, unconstitutional exercise of the prerogative of chief magistrate, as it is understood in the British Empire, it would still conform to the main requirements of our unwritten law. It is indeed hard, under the British system, to conceive of any political measure, however improper in itself, which, taken in the name of the Sovereign, may not be legitimized by the subsequent sanction of the election fairly invoked and freely given. Only, though for many generations, there have been no impeachments for evil acts of the kind, nor, indeed, in England itself are there such acts, there are historical examples of very severe punishment, capital punishment, for men who adventured on arbitrary courses and failed to obtain popular condonation. It would be quite in order of British precedents to inflict such punishment on the advisers of the President, if having wantonly interfered with the regular course of constitutional proceedings, they found their attempt defeated."

That was exactly what was effected after Napoleon's coup d'état of 1851. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would not say that coup d'état was legal; nevertheless, it was approved by the votes of the people, and the approval of the people, according to the Herald, legalized the Act of the President. What did the Herald say on that point?

"Though for many generations there have been no impeachments for civil acts of this kind, nor, indeed, in England itself, any such acts, there are historical examples of very severe punishment, and of capital punishment, having been inflicted on men who adventuring on arbitrary courses, failed to obtain popular condonation. It would be quite in the order of English precedent to inflict such punishment on the advisers of the President, if, having wantonly interfered with the regular course of constitutional proceeding, they found their attempt defeated."

He thought that was rather hard upon Mr. Letellier and Mr. Joly. He was sure that the hon. gentleman did not want such severe punishment to be inflicted upon them under present circumstances. Why should they suffer that punishment if the act was constitutional? It was because an Act might be strictly constitutional, according to the letter of the law, and, nevertheless, be, to all intents and purposes unconstitutional, and bring upon the man who had acted unconstitutionally the highest penalties the law could inflict. He would cite from Le National, which now defended the coup d'état Letellier, an extract from an article of the 24th September, 1872:

"The recent act of MacMahon overthrows all parliamentary notions. Formerly men used to say (le roi regne et ne gouverne pas) "The King reigns but governs not," and today the President reigns and governs as he pleases without taking any heed of the nation than if it did not exist. Does Marshal MacMahon know where the path he has entered is leading him? Is he taken up with that spirit of error and folly, the forerunner of the fall of kings, and is he disposed to make a coup d'état? He seems to forget that he is responsible to the nation for high treason, and if he is ever accused of the crime of lese-nation, treason to the nation, he may not find in his judges the clemency which he himself has shown to the traitor of Metz."

What had MacMahon done to deserve such strong language and grave accusations from the Liberal press and the Liberals throughout the whole Dominion? He had done less than Letellier had done in the present circumstances; he did not dismiss his Ministers, they resigned, and after the appointment of a new Ministry he appealed to the country. He (Mr. Masson) would explain the difference between President MacMahon's act, which had been so severely blamed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and Lieut.-Governor Letellier's act of which they approved. In France, then, as at present, Responsible Government did not exist as it did here and in England. If his hon. friend opposite would refer to the October files of the Globe of 1875, he would find that organ stating that "The ideas of Responsible Government cannot exist in France because French Republicans do not consider the form of Government which prevails in England as the proper form of Government. They are more intent on looking to Washington and on adopting the system of irresponsible Government, as it exists in the United States or in France." He had passed some time among the French people himself, and knew their feelings. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue knew quite well that in France the idea or principle which predominated, was the one-man principle; the French people were naturally inclined to be carried away by the high achievements of a single man, to group around and to defend him, and to personify power in one and the same man. This was the reason why contests there, instead of being constitutional, and against a particular Ministry, were dynastic—one dynasty against another dynasty—consequently Responsible Government could not exist in France as in this country, because public men were not equally devoted to the Sovereign. There was another distinction to be made between MacMahon and Letellier, entirely in favour of the former, who had been so severely treated by hon. gentlemen opposite. MacMahon had the support of the Senate, which was an entirely independent body and co-equal to a representative House, and without which he could not have acted. The Constitution was more an unwritten one than ours, and by that Constitution MacMahon had the right, with the consent of the Senate, to dissolve the House. He did not do as Lieutenant-Governor Letellier did, dismiss the Ministry and appeal to the people on his own individual account, but he did it in accordance with the power given him by the Constitution of France, to himself, with the consent of the Senate, to dissolve Parliament. Another difference which existed between MacMahon and Letellier was the different character of the questions which agitated France and Canada. In France MacMahon, who every body holds to be an honest man, believed, rightly or wrongly, that society was in danger; that the liberty of a section of the people was in danger—the Bishops of France, for instance, could not publish a mandement without the authority of the civil authority, and greater restrictions were demanded by certain parties—and that he was supported by the people, who would not submit to that temporary majority which wanted to impose their will on the minority, and, in their opinion, lowered France in foreign estimation. But not only were the questions widely different from those in Canada, but the opponents were different. In France, the opponents of the Conservatives were the most rabid Rouges, so much so that the Liberal party in Canada, in order to retain a hold on the people, were obliged to disavow them, to say they had nothing in common with them, though on one occasion the hon. member for Quebec East had said he admired Gambetta as a great patriot. Those were the men against whom MacMahon had to contend. Under the circumstances which then existed in France, it would, he contended, be a question to decide whether even a constitutional monarch would not have had a right to dismiss his advisers and appeal to the country. He was a Conservative, and maintained the prerogative might sometimes become the safeguard of the liberties of the people against a corrupt and overbearing majority, and he held that circumstances might occur which would justify the Crown in taking an arbitrary view of a question and trust to the people for approval. He would now come to what touched the question, more particularly in the comparison of the much-attacked coup d'état MacMahon and

Hon. Mr. Letellier. What were the motives of MacMahon in dismissing his members? Did he dismiss them because they had slighted his authority, or had not consulted him, and after having dismissed them, did he give them the certificate which Mr. Letellier gave to Mr. DeBoucherville, that the latter had not intended to infringe on the prerogatives of the Crown? The position in France was the opposite to that in Quebec. He would read the letter of MacMahon blaming his Ministry, and hon. gentlemen would see whether the cases were not altogether different.

MR. MILLS: This is a defence of MacMahon.

MR. MASSON said the hon. gentleman ought to have legal acumen enough to see that if he could prove that the position of MacMahon, whom the Liberals condemned, was a more favourable one than that of Mr. Letellier, whom they now attempted to condemn, that he had established his proposition that, to be consistent, the Liberals were at least bound to condemn Mr. Letellier as well. The following was the text of MacMahon's letter, from the Journal Officiel of 17th May, 1877:

"Monsieur le President et Conseil :

"I have just been reading in the Official Journal the report of yesterday's sitting. I have seen with surprise that neither yourself nor M. le Garde des Sceaux has been the exponent of the grave reasons which might have prevented the abrogation of a law on the Press which had been voted only two years ago on Mr. Dufour's own proposition, and the application of which you were yourself demanding from the tribunals only very recently; and, nevertheless, in several of the deliberations of council, and even especially in that of yesterday morning, it had been decided that the President of the Council, as also M. le Garde des Sceaux, would perform the duty of defending it. It was also already a subject of astonishment that the House of Representatives could, in its last sitting, have discussed a whole municipal law, adopted even some dispositions, the danger of which you have yourself, in council, admitted, such as the publication of municipal councils, without the Minister of the Interior having taken any part in the discussion. This attitude of the head of the Cabinet entitles one to ask whether he has preserved over the House the influence necessary for the adoption of his views. An explanation on this subject is indispensable, for if I am not responsible as you are to Parliament, I have a responsibility towards France which to-day, more than ever, must engage my attention."

Hon. gentleman would admit there was a difference in the accusations which MacMahon had a right to make against his Ministry, and he charges his Ministers with having refused to act as agreed at the Council Board only the day before, and the flimsy pretences on which Letellier turned out his Ministers was, that he was not generally consulted, yet he was always absent or ill; and his Ministers had to conduct affairs while he was at his country seat, several leagues away from the seat of Government. It was too late in the day for him to make that accusation against DeBoucherville. He had stated that DeBoucherville had no intention of acting improperly towards him, and the best proof of the confidence which he reposed in Mr. DeBoucherville was the simple fact, that when Mr. DeBoucherville wanted to introduce his money resolution into the House, Mr. Letellier, instead of coming back from his country seat, sent to Mr. DeBoucherville a blank paper, telling him to fill it up as he chose, which he would not have done had he not placed implicit confidence in him. If this were not a proof of implicit confidence, then it was a snare intended to entrap DeBoucherville and ruin him later. It was said that De Boucherville had not consulted Letellier before bringing in his railway policy. The right hon. member for Kingston had proved that that was not absolutely necessary. What, however, could be thought of a Lieutenant-Governor, who could not help knowing that the resolutions had been introduced to the House, and had been voted for by a large majority of the House; of a Lieut.-Governor to whom the Votes and Proceedings of the Legislature had been delivered daily, yet who came down at the last hour and said he was not cognizant of the legislation going on. But this was not all. Mr. Letellier must have known the nature of these resolutions, since, in the conversation of the 19th February, Mr. DeBoucherville spoke to him about them; and why did he not then tell his Minister that he could not allow the Bill to go on any further, if he wished to interfere? If Mr. Letellier had then told Mr. DeBoucherville that the measure could not go on further, it would have been time to stop it, and to avoid the disagreeable necessity of dealing in this manner with a Bill which had been passed through the two Houses of the Legislature. But no; he knew the resolutions had been introduced, he knew the policy of the Government, and, instead of then telling Mr. DeBoucherville that he could not sanction it, he allowed it to be pushed through, and then when the position was irretrievable, he told Mr. DeBoucherville that he disapproved of his whole policy and turned the Ministry out. Could any one, on reading the whole document of Mr. Letellier, claim that it was an impartial statement? Was it not, rather, the statement of a political partizan? He went into the Province of Quebec as the Governor of the Province, with the intention of controlling the legislation. In the letter he had written he intimated he went there not as a constitutional Governor determined to take the advice of his constitutional advisers, but went there with the determination of having his views prevail. He would take, however, a moderate way of doing it.

MR. DEVLIN: I would like to know where the hon. gentleman finds it printed or published that the Lieut.-Governor stated he did not enter upon the duties of his office as a constitutional Governor.

MR. MASSON said what he had before stated was taken from Mr. Letellier's document, in which he said he had become convinced that legislative and administrative changes were becoming more and more necessary, but that they would have to be effected with moderation and the greatest possible discretion, in order to obtain the realization of what he deemed to be of the greatest advantage to the Province of Quebec. That was to say that he went to the Province of Quebec with the intention of imposing his views upon his advisers, upon the Legislature, upon the people of the Province of Quebec; but he was not clever enough to draw up his document so moderately that it was not easy to define what his intention was. We knew that before Mr. Letellier entered upon the Government of the Province of Quebec he was a bitter partizan. The answer given him by Mr. DeBoucherville was a most triumphant one. He said: "I am your adviser; you are not my adviser; it is for the people to advise, not for the Crown to advise the people. It is for the constitutional advisers of the Crown to give their opinion and the Crown to follow that opinion." The best proof that the document to which he (Mr. Masson) had referred was written in a partizan spirit, would be found in an expression which he would quote, and he would leave it to every hon. gentlemen in the House to say whether that was a document which should have emanated from a Lieut.-Governor. Instead of discussing matters impartially as he should have done, he repeatedly in his document made those accusations which the Liberal Press of the Province had since repeated. The Conservatives of the Province were accused of having incurred enormous expense by granting enormous subsidies to several railways, and exception was taken to their having increased the salaries of the Civil Service at a time which seemed to him inopportune, as they were negotiating with the Bank of Montreal a loan of half a million, with power to increase that loan to $1,000,000, at an interest of 7 per cent. The loan made by the Provincial Government was only a temporary one, in order to meet a necessary expenditure, and the taxation imposed on the people was less than that which the Minister of Finance said he would be willing to impose in this Parliament if he had the power. Now, if the reasons adduced were those for which he had dismissed his Ministers, what would be the position of this Government if the same course was pursued towards them? One of the reasons adduced by the Lieutenant-Governor for dismissing his Ministers was the passing or putting into execution of the Civil Service Act passed by the Province of Quebec. That Act had received the approval of the Crown and the country; and why should the Lieutenant-Governor complain that the people had given, of their own accord, too much money to remunerate their own servants? What would hon. gentleman opposite think if, because they, in 1875, had attempted to increase the salaries of all the Civil Service employes in the Dominion by $100 to $200 each, the Governor-General had stepped in and said, "You do not deserve my confidence." What would the hon. the Minister of Public Works have said? Would he not have answered, that the people had the sole right of granting money, and that it would be a most absurd position in a constitutional country to see the Crown complaining that the people wished to be too liberal. Many of the charges made by the Lieutenant Governor as set forth in his documents were most puorile. The Montreal Herald even was obliged to admit that many of these accusations were not so strong as others, which was for that purpose going a great way towards saying that they were worthless entirely. Mr. Letellier would find it difficult to make people believe that Mr. De Boucherville had been so recreant to his duty towards the Crown as to have made use of his power, or convened Parliament for the despatch of business without consulting the Crown, and against the will of Mr. Letellier. Mr. DeBoucherville, the Lieut.-Governor, had called Parliament without his consent, or that a proclamation, summoning the Legislature, was published without his being consulted or informed of it. Under existing circumstances, however, there were good grounds for looking on the memorandum, sent by the Lieut.-Governor, with distrust. The proclamation referred to was probably the usual formal one, which was regularly published from time to time, and if Mr. Letellier wished to act fairly towards the Governor-General, to whom he complained, and the people of this country, he should have told the truth, and nothing but the truth. Mr. Letellier complained that another proclamation was also published, under similar circumstances without his assent. Now, the fact turned out to be this: that Mr. Letellier knew everything about the affair, and that Mr. DeBoucherville knew nothing. The more important accusation against Mr. DeBoucherville was evidently made for the purpose of ruining him in the estimation of the country. Mr. Letellier tried to make the people believe that Mr. DeBoucherville had not a majority in the Legislature of Quebec, but was controlled by "rings"—by men whose only object was gain. The whole country knew that that was not correct; the whole country knew that the policy of the DeBoucherville was a broad general one, as far as railways were concerned, for the benefit of the whole Province of Quebec. That policy was inaugurated with the view of giving as much as possible to residents in all sections of the country, railway communication. No doubt, members were desirous to obtain railway communication to their particular localities; but when it was proposed to give up the contract for the North Shore Railway, Mr. DeBoucherville stepped in and said: "This enterprise must not be allowed to drop; we must have this railway for the north of the St. Lawrence; it will, in future, be a link between the Pacific and the Intercolonial railways, and be a boon, not specially to the Province of Quebec, but to the whole Dominion." Mr. DeBoucherville saw this, and the Government being about to enter into that railway policy was not able to do it, and, at the same time, carry out, with equal vigour, what was legitimately asked for by the representatives of every part of the Province. There might have been pressure put upon Mr. De Boucherville to adopt this policy, but it was a legitimate pressure. But there was one particular fact which must not be forgotten: those representatives who brought the pressure were friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and not content with the character of the policy of Mr. DeBoucherville they moved resolutions that the policy should be extended to other railways on the south shore, in which they were interested. And, yet, hon. gentlemen told them it was ruinous to spend more money on the south shore railways, and that the country was involved in distress owing to the scheme for the North Shore Railway. The great difficulty Mr. De Boucherville experienced was in resisting the pressure of the hon. Premier's friends. But Mr. DeBoucherville refused to yield to that proposition, and compromised the existence of his Government rather than do so. It was said in Quebec that the whole policy of the North Shore would be compromised if the Government allowed a p<sup>o</sup>l<sup>e</sup>icy of such magnitude to interfere with it; but the hon. gentleman's friends said that they would ruin Mr. DeBoucherville and his Government if he did not yield, although the representatives of the South Shore district were opposed to it, because they understood that everything could not be done in one day. After this, the friends of the hon. Premier declared to Mr. Letellier that Mr. DeBoucherville was controlled by "rings," the very fact that he resisted power, to the contrary; and the hon. gentleman could not show that those rings, if they existed, ever received assent from Mr. DeBoucherville; yet, this was the way he was treated by the Lieutenant-Governor and the Liberals of Lower Canada. When Mr. Letellier brought before the Legislature all the grievances, and asked Mr. DeBoucherville to answer them, he had no right to bring forward another set of accusations which Mr. DeBoucherville would have no opportunity of answering. He (Mr. Masson) asked whether this Government, having taken a certain responsibility, were not to blame in not advising the Governor-General to call upon Mr. DeBoucherville to answer the accusations against him. He held that it was the duty of the Government to do this in time for Mr. DeBoucherville to make his reply.

MR. DEVLIN: Better late than never.

MR. MASSON said the hon. member said "better late than never;" that implied they were to blame. In what position was Mr. Letellier to-day with the people of the Province of Quebec? He would not discuss the overwhelming majority there must be on the date of the late Government, but let them suppose parties were evenly divided, what position was the Lieutenant-Governor in to-day? He had, by his action, prejudiced against himself one half of the people of the Province of Quebec, the present Government and even His Excellency the Governor-General. He had proved himself unworthy the support or countenance of all parties. There was no man so well received upon his appointment as Mr. Letellier, notwithstanding everyone knew that he was a bitter partisan, and had been called an intriguer, because they believed he would act impartially. What was the position of affairs to-day? Let them look at affairs here in 1843, when Lord Metcalfe went against a large majority of the people of this country, when he forced Mr. Lafontaine to resign. He was supported, it was true, by a small majority of the people; that was to say, he obtained what the hon. gentlemen on the other side did not expect to obtain—the verdict of the people at the polls in favour of his action. But what was the opinion given by Lord Grey in 1844, when he examined the position of Lord Metcalfe? He said:—

"The effect of this action was to place him in direct hostility to one of the great parties into which the colony was divided, though the difficulty of carrying on the Government was thus obviated for the moment, as the party into whose hands he threw himself possessed a small majority in the Assembly. This advantage was dearly purchased by the circumstance that the Parliamentary Opposition was no longer directed against the advisers of the Governor, but against the Governor himself and the British Government, of which he was the organ."

Mr. Letellier had thrown himself at the mercy of the friends of the hon. the First Minister, and was at their mercy. His position was not one to be envied; it was not a sound one by any means; though the statements against him might be disproved, he was not in the position they should wish to see the representative of the Crown in Quebec occupy. In what position would he be if his friends were defeated at the poll? He (Mr. Masson) knew it was absolutely indispensable for the working of a Government that there should be a reciprocal understanding and confidence between the Governor and the Administration, and how could it be obtained in this case? Could he expect men to serve him with that cordiality which should exist between the advisers and the advised? Was it to be expected that any man would say, Mr. Letellier would hold the balance fairly between the two parties? He dared say they would hear a protest from the whole of the Provinces, as they had heard one from this House to-night; and, without a single word of mitigation, Mr. Letellier would be universally blamed for his views, blamed even by the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had only taken a side issue in order to avoid a verdict for party purposes.

MR. LAURIER said the hon. gentleman who had just addressed the House, had endeavoured to influence the question by casting upon the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec, what could be termed by no other name than foul slander. He commenced his remarks by quoting M. Thiers in favour of constitutional monarchy, in order to show that in the ranks of the Liberal party in Quebec, there were men opposed to Constitutional Government. Such an accusation coming from the member of Terrebonne surprised him very much. It surprised him that a man, whom he believed to be the fairest Conservative in Quebec, should have made use of such language. Yet it was not surprising, for it was only a continuation of the tactics which had been used, again and again, in the Province of Quebec for the last twenty-five years, and the day had not yet dawned in that Province when it had been their good fortune to discuss any public question upon its merits. When they were discussing any question, his party were always met with the taunt that they were Communists, or something of that kind. He defied the hon. gentleman, or any of his followers, to quote any utterance by any member of the Liberal party of Quebec, that could justify such an accusation. They were Liberal in the sense in which Liberalism was regarded in England. It had always been the tactics of the hon. gentleman to throw that accusation against them; it sounded well to the people; it had been repeated again and again, and would be all through the elections. Upon this question, he would not charge the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) with a deliberate falsehood, but he would make a counter-charge. While the hon. gentleman charged them with being Communists, he (Mr. Laurier) charged the party which the hon. gentleman led with being hostile to the principles of Responsible Government; and he made this charge advisedly. The doctrines could be judged by the tone of its Press. He could cite from articles of their most authorized organs in which the principles of Responsible Government were condemned. It was well known that the French Charter of 1830 was a close copy of the English Constitution. And yet, what was the opinion which a Conservative paper put upon that Constitution in France:—

“Under the Charter of 1830, the Crown was in a most humiliating position, and Louis Philippe was reduced to extract from the majority, by means of corruption, the principle of authority which had been taken from the Crown.”

This was the estimation in which hon. gentlemen opposite held the British Constitution, of which the French Constitution of 1830 was a copy. But it might be said that this was simply an opinion as to its applicability to the French people. He knew this defence was made. If that were the argument, he would simply answer that in these quotations the hon. gentlemen opposite showed what were their ideas of Responsible Government. But he could give them, also, what were the opinions at this very moment of those who stood here as the champions of Responsible Government. He would cite from an article published in one of their leading organs, Le Courrier du Canada, on the 13th March last:—

“The electoral contest is now engaged in everywhere, and we know that, under the circumstances, it may be extremely violent. These elections will be followed by the Federal elections, these will be followed by school elections, and these by municipal elections; in fact we have elections everywhere. We may, therefore, consider that for a long time election agitation will be permanent. The friends of tranquility are, for good reasons, frightened at the system of the age. We must drink the cup to the dregs. Everything indicates that elections will continue to become more and more frequent; Liberalism is fond of election. These elections will increase agitation. When we speak of Liberalism, we speak of Liberalism in Canada as well as elsewhere, because here as elsewhere it has recorded on its programme universal suffrage. This is what the Liberals call the vindication of the rights of the people. For this prerogative, the poor working man is bound to give away many hours from his labour."

Here was an organ of the Conservative opinion in Lower Canada stating that this system of Responsible Government was an invention of the devil. On the floor of Parliament the Conservative party stood as the champions of free Responsible Government: in the Press they openly denounce this same system. How was it that such a contradiction existed? There was in that article one paragraph which gave the key to the whole mystery. It was a part of the system which had been always carried out against the Liberal party in Lower Canada. On the floor of this House, they palmed themselves off as champions of free, Responsible Government, and, in the Press, they denounced the same system with the object of merely making political capital against the Liberal party. He was right in charging the party with being decidedly hostile to the form of Responsible Government under which they lived. Of course, they would not say so openly on the floor of this House; he did not expect any of those gentlemen to repudiate the language made use of in their Press; but, if they were as devoted as they pretended to be to the principles of Responsible Government, was it not their bounden duty to repudiate such language? They had never repudiated it.

Mr. BABY: Did you repudiate DeCelles' doctrine about annexation?

Mr. LAURIER said, if he were to name all the gentlemen who, at one time, held annexationist views, he would find many among the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No. Name?

Mr. LAURIER said he could cite many, but this was an old and dead issue. There was another organ of public opinion, the Journal de Trois Rivières, upon which he could not, unfortunately, lay his hands just then, as it was not received in the Library, in which, hon. gentlemen would remember, a series of articles appeared, some four or five years ago, in support of the doctrine that the minority was not bound by the decree of the majority. Under the Constitution in which we live, the decrees of the majority, when expressed in the proper channels and in the proper form, must be respected by the minority. He did not mean to say the majority would not fall into error, but the remedies for errors were provided by the Constitution. Then it became the duty of the minority to agitate and have this error corrected, and he believed they could do it; and that justice would always in the end prevail. He held that this was true and sound doctrine; but in one of the papers of the hon. gentlemen opposite, a series of articles was published to establish the proposition that if a by-law was passed by the majority it would not be binding on the minority. The circumstances which gave rise to the articles was this: a by-law had been passed by a county, according to the terms of the law, granting a bonus to the North Shore Railway, upon a vote of the majority. These articles claimed that the by-law was not binding upon the minority who voted against it, but only on the majority who voted for it. Such language as that was used under a free Responsible Government by those who now taunted the Liberal party with being Communists. Strange to say, the late Quebec Government passed a law which had not been sanctioned, in which on frivolous pretexts, they compelled every one to pay the bonuses, whether the conditions were complied with or not. These gentlemen were here as the champions of Responsible Government upon the floor of Parliament, and, at the same time, in the country, they were attacking it with their own Press and with all the other weapons at their hands. In the country, they denounced the present system of Responsible Government; on the floor of Parliament they defended it. Just hearken to their language to-day. They the champions of civil rights; they the apostles of the doctrine that all royal power is superior to the people; they this time reduced the representative of the Crown in the Province of Quebec to a mere automaton, which had nothing to do but what he was told by his Ministers. His (Mr. Laurier's) party were Liberal; they contended that the majority must govern, and that the power of the people must prevail, and that the Crown had its rights and the people had its rights. The best regulated State was the State in which the rights of the Crown and the rights of the people were clearly defined and greatly respected. This was not the doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite. In connection with this, he claimed that it was not their duty or their province to criticize the conduct of Mr. Letellier. The proper judges were the people of the Province of Quebec. He would not follow the hon. gentleman in the controversy respecting the action of Mr. Letellier; but would leave it to the judgment of the people. But he would say this: that it would be the most dangerous principle and the most serious blow that could be effected against our institutions if the proposed motion were carried. The carrying out of this proposition would be a direct invasion of the federal system under which we lived. It was a well known fact that, had the Province of Quebec not represented a minority of a different creed, race and language, the union would not have been a federal one. It was federative to give to the Province of Quebec its autonomy. He was especially jealous to keep up the principles of the Federal system under which we lived. He submitted that the Dominion Government had no power to interfere with a matter which affected the provincial constitution of Quebec alone. It would be a most dangerous principle for this Parliament to interfere. He agreed with the hon. leader of the Opposition when he said that the Provinces were free and responsible Governments. If that proposition was a correct one, even though a great wrong had been committed against the people of Quebec, was it not a fact that they had the remedy in their own hands if they did not approve of the conduct of the late Government? It would, indeed, be better that a wrong committed in the Province of Quebec should remain than that the system of Federal Government should be jeopardized. He did not mean to lay down the proposition that no matter what changes might take place in the Government of Quebec, Parliament should not interfere; he frankly admitted that a wrong might perchance be committed in the Province of Quebec which would justify this Parliament to step in. It would certainly be the duty of the Dominion Government to interfere in order to redress a wrong which the people could not themselves remedy. But if this power was exercised on slight grounds, what would become of our federal machinery which they had been at such a pain to establish? He submitted that the resolution placed in the hands of Mr. Speaker would, if carried, be an invasion of the rights of the people of Quebec. But hon. gentlemen opposite said that the rights of the people of Quebec had been trifled with and invaded by the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. Well, as he had already pointed out, the people of Quebec could remedy the evil themselves by overthrowing the present legal advisers of the Crown. It was not for this Parliament to say whether the Lieutenant-Governor had acted judiciously or injudiciously, wisely or unwisely, that was a question which would be decided afterwards.

MR. BROOKS said it was with diffidence he rose to join in the discussion of the important question now under the consideration of the House. That question was of more paramount importance than any of those which had been before the House during the present Session. It was a question of such importance in relation to the privileges of Parliament and the liberties of the people, that it should not be treated with reference to any particular party, but in a judicial spirit, simply and solely upon its merits. He would not have spoken upon this subject had he not, as one of the representatives of the English-speaking minority in the Province of Quebec, felt it due to his constituents as well as himself to do so. The transaction now under discussion was one which belonged peculiarly to his own Province, but it affected the whole federative principle in this Dominion. When it was considered that the majority of the people in that Province spoke a different language and professed a different creed from the majority of the people belonging to other parts of the Dominion, and also that the minority there differed in language and religion from the great majority of the people of that Province, it was of the highest possible importance that the privileges of Parliament and the liberties of the people should be preserved and guarded by every constitutional means. Let it be remembered, too, that while the action of the Lieutenant-Governor might today affect a certain section of the community only, to-morrow the tables might be turned, and another section equally adversely affected. He would, while referring to his own Province, take this occasion to state what he believed would be conceded by all parties: that if those of French Canadian origin and those professing the Roman Catholic religion throughout the Dominion, should receive, as he believed they always would receive, the same consideration, the same fair treatment which the minority, the English-speaking people and Protestants of Quebec, had always received from the French Canadian brethren of whatever political party, they would have no reason to complain, and harmony and good feeling would, as it should, ever prevail throughout the Dominion. As he had said, the question should be discussed upon its merits, but he found the hon. the Minister of Public Works declining to do so, and saying that the resolution which was brought before the House was an indecent one. He did not propose to answer the Minister of Inland Revenue, who was the last speaker, because he was not competent, nor was it the proper occasion, to go into the great national question of Liberalism and Conservatism as discussed by him. He (Mr. Laurier) had declared that the Conservatives of Lower Canada were never willing to discuss fairly any question on its merits. In this case the tables were turned, and the hon. gentleman had shown his skill by avoiding any reference to the question under discussion. He might remark that the question had been dealt with in a one-sided way by hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of being discussed on its broad principles. It was certainly the first time he had ever heard the assertion made, that it was incompetent for an authority which conferred certain powers to discuss any matter which affected their powers. On looking to the brochure, published by Mr. Todd, at page 30 he found the following declaration:—

"Under the British North America Act (section 59), a Lieut.-Governor of a Province holds office during pleasure, but he is not removable within five years from his appointment, "except for cause assigned, which shall be communicated to him in writing within one month after the order for his removal is made," which cause is also to be communicated by message to both Houses of the Dominion Parliament. This enactment establishes a direct responsibility to the Canadian Parliament, not only for the selection of the fit and proper persons to fill their important posts, but also for any needful exercise of Executive authority in removing a Lieutenant-Governor from office before the expiration of his term of service. Accordingly, either House of the Dominion must be regarded as constitutionally competent to express an opinion, or to tender advice to the Governor-General, upon any matter arising out of the appointment of a Lieutenant-Governor, or his fulfilment of the duties entrusted to him, just as the Imperial House of Lords and Commons are competent to deliberate and advise the Crown upon any question affecting the welfare of British subjects in any part of the realm, but with this proviso, that inasmuch as an exclusive jurisdiction, in certain specified matters, is conferred upon the Provincial Legislatures, by the Imperial Act under which both the Dominion and the Provincial Constitution are regulated, it is alike incumbent upon the Dominion Parliament, upon the Governor-General as an Imperial Officer, representing the Crown in the Dominion, to respect and uphold the federal rights secured to the several Provinces, by that Statute, and to refrain from any encroachments thereupon, or interference therewith."

He took it that the only exception to this rule would be for the Dominion Government to interfere with the rights of local legislatures to deal with matters which, under the British North America Act, were extended to them.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. member will allow me, I will put him right. He says I denounced it as improper and indecent to discuss this subject. I did not do that. I say that to move a vote of censure when a constitutional mode of dealing with it was in progress was an indecent proposition. I stated precisely in so many words, that I recognised the full right of this Parliament to discuss it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But that it was indecent to do so.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; that is a different thing.

MR. BROOKS said he certainly did not wish to misrepresent what the hon. gentleman said. He took a note of it at the time and the words used were "indecent proposition."

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, but not applied to the discussion.

MR. BROOKS said that if it was allowable at any time to discuss the Lieut.-Governor, an officer appointed by the Governor-in-Council, he could hardly see how any proposition which affected that appointment could be styled an "indecent proposition." In the consideration of this question, he might, perhaps, take up some time, but to his mind the question was one of such importance that, perhaps, a little time might be well spent in that consideration. He thought it would be well, in the first place, if they were to go back and review as briefly as possible the history of Responsible Government, the time when it was adopted, and the manner in which it had been carried out. It was a matter of history that, under the Constitution of the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, we were represented in 1792 by a Legislative Council, the members of which were nominated by the Crown. Almost from the very outset of the working of that Constitution, difficulties of a very serious nature arose between the representatives of popular franchise and the Crown, and from the year 1791 up to the year 1841 there were constant discussions, constant broils, constant difficulties, arising between the several branches of the Legislature, which, during many years, rendered it almost impossible to carry on the business of the Government. Particularly did this occur prior to the passage of the celebrated Ninety-two Resolutions in 1834. It would be perfectly remembered that in the Province of Lower Canada for years the supplies were refused by a popular branch of the Legislature, because the Legislative Council, whose members were nominated by the Crown, and consisted, in many instances, of the actual servants and employes of the Crown, refused to pass measures which were conceived in the interests of the Province itself. In 1834 the celebrated Ninety-two Resolutions were signed, and in 1836 an address was moved by the Legislative Assembly of what was now the Province of Quebec, and their platform (as it was now called) contained the following: Elective Legislative Council, Executive responsible to Parliament, and the control of the revenue of the country to be placed in the hands of the Lower House, inasmuch as a large proportion, notably the Crown lands, had been before that time under the control of the Government. They all knew to what extreme matters went subsequent to that time, how there was a rebellion in the Province of Lower Canada, and also one in Ontario, from very much the same cause, and that it was with the greatest difficulty, after even the shedding of their blood, that the people in Lower Canada obtained what they had been struggling for during many years. In Upper Canada, in 1837, they found the Administration of the day resigning simply because they could not obtain Responsible Government, and the result of the whole matter was an investigation by a Royal commission. Then they found that in 1841 the Union Act was granted, and gave what they had been so long contending for. Perhaps it might not be amiss to refer to the resolution in regard to it, as showing what was the disposition and desire of Parliament at that time, and of those who were the leaders of the Liberal party of that day, as indeed also the desire of nearly every member of the Assembly. On the 3rd September, 1841, it was moved by Mr. Baldwin and seconded by Mr. Viger:—

"That in order to preserve that harmony between the different branches of the Provincial Government which is essential to the happy conduct of public affairs, the principal of such subordinate officers, advisers of the representatives of the Sovereign and constituting as such the Provincial Administration under him, as the head of the Provincial Government, ought always to be men possessed of the public confidence, whose opinion and policy harmonizing with those of the representatives of the people would afford a guarantee that the well understood wishes and interests of the people, which our gracious Sovereign has declared, shall be the rule of the Provincial Government, will at all times be faithfully represented to the head of the Government and through him to the Sovereign and Imperial Parliament."

This was amended by a motion proposed by Mr. Secretary Harrison, seconded by Mr. DeSalaberry, which obtained the support of the whole Assembly, with the exception of some seven members, and was as follows:—

"That in order to preserve between the different branches of the Provincial Parliament that harmony which is essential to the peace, welfare and good government of the Province, the chief advisers of the representative of the Sovereign, constituting the Provincial Administration under him, ought to be men possessed of the confidence of the representatives of the people, thus affording a guarantee that the well-understood wishes and interests of the people which our gracious Sovereign has declared shall be the rule of the Provincial Government, will, on all occasions, be faithfully represented and advocated."

That was passed by a vote of fifty-six to seven, the fifty-six including Messrs. Baldwin, Draper, Day, Harrison, Morris, Simpson, Viger, and other well-known names in the history of the country. In reference to the same subject, he would take the liberty of reading a short extract from a letter written by Lord John Russell to Lieutenant-Governor Thomson, on the 4th October, 1839. Lord John Russell said:

"The Constitution of England, after long struggles and alternate success, has settled into a form of government in which the prerogative of the Crown is undisputed, but is never exercised without advice. Hence the exercise only is questioned, and, however the use of the authority may be condemned, the authority itself remains untouched. This is the practical solution of a great problem, the result of a contest which, from 1640 to 1690, shook the monarchy and disturbed the peace of the country."

In conclusion, he said:

"Every political constitution in which different bodies share the supreme power, is only enabled to exist by the forbearance of those among whom this power is distributed. In this respect the example of England may be well imitated. The Sovereign using the prerogative of the Crown to the utmost extent, and the House of Commons exerting its power on the purse, to carry all its resolutions into immediate effect, would produce confusion in the country in less than a twelvemonth. So in the Governor thwarting every legitimate proposition of the Assembly, and the Assembly continually recurring to its power of refusing supplies, can but disturb all political relations, embarrass trade, and retard the prosperity of the people. Each must exercise a wise moderation. The Crown must only oppose the wishes of the Assembly where the honour of the Crown or the interests of the Empire are deeply concerned; and the Assembly must be ready to modify some of its measures for the sake of harmony, and from a reverent attachment to the authority of Great Britain."

That, in 1839, was the declaration of Lord John Russell, and he (Mr. Brooks) might be pardoned if he referred to an authentic declaration by May, upon this very subject, as to the time when Constitutional Government was founded in this country, and the effects of it. In speaking of this matter, with regard to Canada, May says:—

"After the reunion of the Canadian Provinces a remedy was sought for disagreements between the Executive and the Legislature on the principle of Ministerial responsibility, which had long been accepted as the basis of constitutional Government in England. At first Ministers at home were apprehensive lest the application of that principle to a dependency should lead to a virtual renunciation of control by the Mother Country. Nor had Canada yet sufficiently recovered from the passions of the recent rebellion to favour the experiment. But arrangements were immediately made for altering the tenure of the principal colonial offices; and in 1847 Responsible Government was fully established under Lord Elgin. From that time the Governor General selected his advisers from that party which was able to command a majority in the Legislative Assembly; and accepted the policy recommended by them. The same principle was adopted about the same time in Nova Scotia, and has since been the rule of administration in other free colonies. By the adoption of this principle a colonial constitution has become the very image and reflection of parliamentary government in England. The Governor, like the Sovereign whom he represents, holds himself aloof from and superior to parties, and governs through constitutional advisers who have acquired an ascendancy in the Legislature. He leaves contending parties to fight with their own battles, and by admitting the stronger party to his Councils brings the Executive authority into harmony with popular sentiments.

"As the recognition of this doctrine, in England, has practically transferred the supreme authority of the State from the Crown to Parliament and the people, so in the colonies has it wrested from the Governor and from the parent State direction of colonial affairs.

"And again, as the Crown has gained in ease and popularity what it has lost in power, so has the Mother Country in accepting, to the full, the principles of local self-government, established the closest relations of amity and confidence between herself and her colonies."

Although passed in 1841, responsible Government did not in reality, immediately come into force in the united provinces. Sir Charles Bagot was sent out as Governor in 1842, and recognized the principle; but Sir Charles Metcalfe, the subsequent Governor, failed to recognize it; and it was not until Lord Elgin was sent out that it was fully recognized and acted upon. Then Messrs. Lafontaine and Baldwin came back to office, and they found in the administration of the first Governor, who really helped Responsible Government, the names of Messrs. Lafontaine, Caron, Viger, Taché, Baldwin, Hincks, Cameron and Blake. Then was finally granted to Canada the right to manage her own affairs, the Imperial Government only reserving her prerogative with regard to her own interests. Having shown the time when Responsible Government was introduced, he might be pardoned if he enquired as to the principles of Responsible Government, and the violation of them, although the able address by the mover of the resolution before the House had almost rendered it unnecessary. He might say that the premises laid down here had never been contradicted; but in an investigation of this question it was well to consider this point. In the English Parliament in 1870, a resolution was passed which declared that the power of the Crown had increased, was then increasing, and should be diminished, and from that time to this the tendency had constantly been in this direction. He might fairly make a distinction and say that the principles of Responsible Government were not the same as they were at the time the Union Act was passed. It had been properly stated this evening that there had been a change, gradual and slow in its growth, and now in all important questions of Legislation the popular branch had the initiation of measures, and, in reality, the power which truthfully belongs to the King, the Lords and Commons, still having the right by vote or disallowance by vote to the other branches of the Legislature.

MR. BROOKS.

The only three cases which had been referred to as precedents for the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, were the action of George III., in 1781, after the defeat of the India Bill in the House of Lords, the dismissal or resignation of the Grenville Administration in 1807, and, between those dates, in 1801, the resignation of Pitt, and the dismissal of Lord Melbourne's Administration by William IV., in 1834. The question was whether we were to be guided by the principles which prevailed one hundred years ago with regard to matters of this kind. Would they in England be willing, or would we in Canada be willing, to submit to some of the rules which then prevailed? It had been very properly stated that the three examples had all been condemned as violations of the Constitution. The last case referred to was that of the dismissal of Lord Melbourne. He would cite in regard to that, as the declaration of an eminent authority, the opinion of a writer upon English history, which, he thought, could hardly be questioned. In the first volume of Molesworth's History of England, page 453, with reference to the last of these precedents which had been cited as being a constitutional one, at any rate, for the dismissal of a Government by the Crown, it was stated:—

"Such was the outcome of the attempt to force a Conservative Ministry on the country. The results were the needless turmoil and expense of a hotly-contested election. A great expenditure of money, a great loss of time, wasted in party strife, which should have been devoted to the public business; a diminution of the Liberal majority, and a proportionate increase of the Conservative opposition; a consequent weakening of the Melbourne Administration, compelling it to seek strength and stability in a closer alliance with O'Connell and his followers. And now the question arises: Who was really responsible for these mischievous results? On the principle that the King can do no wrong, the blame of this must be thrown, 1st. On the Duke of Wellington, who consented to fill Lord Melbourne's place provisionally; and, next, on Sir Robert Peel, who accepted it definitely, and accepted it with the responsibility of Lord Melbourne's dismissal, as he honourably and frankly acknowledged. But history must not be arrested in its decisions by constitutional factions. It judges Sovereigns as well as their Ministers. And in this instance it must condemn William IV., as having made an unwarrantable use of his prerogative in order to transfer the Government of the country to the party he preferred. Had Lord Melbourne stated his inability to carry on the business of the country, the King might have accepted his resignation. But Lord M. did nothing of the kind. He had a large majority in the House and country, and was prepared to go on when so unexpectedly dismissed for reasons which soon proved to be utterly groundless. This act was consummated before any adviser, that the King might have recourse to in accordance with the form of the constitution, could have been consulted. It was an act done by the King on his own judgment, or on the advice of persons to whom he should not have listened in such a matter."

This was the last instance in English history in which the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had been followed. With respect to this last case, reference had been made to Lord Brougham; and he would quote his declaration of the principles involved with regard to that, a declaration which, he presumed, would not be contradicted. In 1835, immediately after this, in a speech delivered by him upon that occasion, he said, in regard to choice of officers :

"By whom is it vested? In the King. But it is a power exercised for the good of the people; it is not to be dealt with capriciously, it is not to be used as an amusement, it is not to be played with, not to be employed as a man would the power to discharge his servant without notice, to gratify his own whims. A man might exercise this power of arbitrary dismissal if he pleased, and he would be the worse served, he would be the loser, but he alone would be the injured party. But the King holds the power in question, not for his own gratification, not at all for his own purposes. It is not he that is to be benefitted or injured by the exercise of it; he is a trustee; he is himself a public servant; he is appointed and empowered for the benefit of his people. The trust which he exercises is wholly for their sake. No Sovereign of this country has a right by the Constitution. The Sovereign, I say, has no right by the Constitution it is illegal, it is prohibited to the Crown, it is a wrong, an unlawful, a criminal Act, to exercise that high function of dismissing his Ministers and choosing others unless on grounds capable of being stated and defended. I will now defy my opponents to give, unless in the times of the Tudors or of the Stuarts, a single instance where there has been any great Ministerial change, otherwise than on assignable constitutional and public grounds. If they were torn among themselves by endless dissensions, if they differed from the Sovereign, if they defended the country at large, if their measures were evidently ruinous, if dishonour abroad and disaster at home marked the whole tenor of their Government, any of these might be constitutional grounds for their dismissal, and, above all, if there happened to be a general feeling of distress, and disapprobation throughout the country, that would be a sufficient ground for such a procedure."

They had a right to discuss in this House the grounds upon which the action of Mr. Letellier, in dismissing Mr. De Boucherville as Prime Minister, was capable of being stated and defended. They had also received intimation that his conduct would be discussed; otherwise, for what purpose were the returns sent down? The Government of the day had sent down all the information which it was possible to obtain, both from the Lieutenant-Governor and his late Prime Minister, and it was competent for this House to discuss this question, having all the data that could be obtained before it. Upon this question, Todd in his book on Parliamentary Government stated :

"Once a Ministry is formed, it becomes the duty of a Constitutional Monarch to give it his implicit confidence and support, co-operating heartily and sincerely with the members of his Cabinet, so long as he may consider that the best interests of the Empire are served by their continuance in office. Should he have reason to believe that those interests would be promoted by a change in his advisers, he is at liberty to insist that they shall give way to others in whom he can impose more perfect trust : but he must always take care to assure himself beforehand that the proposed alteration in the Ministry is one that will satisfy the nation, and will meet and secure the approbation of Parliament."

In this extract a principle was laid down with regard to the action of the Lieutenant-Governor which, certainly, did not fall within the facts as they had been laid before the House. Now, there was a celebrated instance where no action was taken by a responsible Governor in Canada, Lord Elgin, at the time of the passage of the Rebellion Losses Bill. Although he disapproved of that Bill, although it was one which had excited throughout the length and breadth of our land the greatest possible indignation amongst a large portion of our people, although public meetings had been held, and resolutions, almost innumerable, had been sent to him against the Bill, the Government of the day having a majority, he assented to it, although it was directly contrary to the policy which he would have advocated. He would also refer, although it might not be considered the highest authority, to what was said by Lord Melbourne himself, at the time of his dismissal. Referring to the precedents which had been cited, he said :

were bold, daring and desperate measures, all of them, and were admitted to be so by those who advised them. As to the dismissal of his own Ministry, my Lords, I believe the fact to be, that there has been no object in view but a change of men by a wanton act of power."

The authorities which he had cited were all anterior to the date he had mentioned as being the period when the principles of Constitutional Government received any material change, and if they were to look at what those principles were now, how within the last thirty years they had been considered and declared by those most competent to judge, they would find that, without a single dissenting voice, all the authorities, in referring to this matter, declared that, although in theory there might be the prerogative of power, there was no constitutional right under the circumstances to exercise that power. In looking at Todd's pamphlet, he found their first Constitutional Governor make a declaration which was an important one in this respect. Lord Elgin, in carrying out as he was instructed to carry out, and as he was determined to carry out, the true principles of responsible Government, made this declaration in a letter to Earl Grey:

"I give to my Ministers all constitutional support, frankly and without reserve, and the benefit of the best advice I can afford them in their difficulties. In return for this I expect that they will, as far as possible, carry out my views for the maintenance of the connection with Great Britain, and the advancement of the interests of the Provinces. I have never concealed from them that I intend to do nothing which may prevent me from working cordially with their opponents, if they are forced upon me, showing my confidence in the loyalty of all the influential parties with which I have to deal, and being devoid of personal antipathies. A Governor-General, by acting on these views with tact and firmness, may hope to establish a moral effect in the Province which will go far to compensate for the loss of power consequent on the surrender of patronage to an Executive responsible to the Local Parliament."

Todd further adds, speaking of the difference between those years and Lord Elgin's experience under a different system in another Province, that of Jamaica, where there was no responsible Government:

"To the question whether the theory of the responsibility of Provincial Ministers to the Provincial Parliament, and of the consequent duty of the Governor to remain absolutely neutral in the strife of political parties, had not a necessary tendency to degrade his office into that of a mere Roi fainéant, Lord Elgin gave an unqualified negative. 'I have tried,' he said, 'both systems. In Jamaica there was no responsible Government, but I had not half the power I have here with my constitutional and changing Cabinet.' Even on the vice-regal throne of India, he missed, at first, something of the authority and influence which he had exercised as Constitutional Governor in Canada. This influence, however, was wholly moral: an influence of suasion, sympathy and moderation, which softens the temper while it elevates the aims of local politics."

All the authorities agreed on this point, that so far as this power which had been exercised by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec under the circumstances set forth, it was an unconstitutional use of the prerogative of a power which had become almost, if not quite, obsolete. He had cited all those authorities in order that, if possible, they might be answered by their friends who held contrary views. He would cite, from a work published in 1875, with many of whose tenets he did not agree, that of Harrison. He stated, in the most concise and emphatic manner, with regard to this power of the Sovereign:

"The King cannot insert a sentence or a phrase in his own speech. The old Whigs would rend their garments in sacred indignation at such protinity. The Tories would prophesy in the market place. He cannot add a clause to a Bill in Parliament. The very thought would raise a smile, to act on it would cause a revolution. The exercise of his legal vote would not be permitted in practice; a public attempt to effect legislation against the will of the nation would be the end of the dynasty."

Further on he says:

"There is only one moment in the practical working of our system when the Sovereign has even in appearance the slightest legislative power. That moment is when a change of Ministry occurs. But it is perfectly well understood that an outgoing Minister really nominates his successor under forms more or less circumlocutory. Mr. Disraeli once explaining the formalities with that delicious sense of humour in which, without moving a muscle, he contrives to quiz the British Constitution said: In extreme cases a venerable peer—a sort of family lawyer—is confidentially called in. Even if we could conceive a Sovereign so old-fashioned as to insist in personally nominating a Minister, the House of Commons would sharply call him to order. Shades of the wise and good Lord Somers, of Blackstone, of Hallam, and Macaulay, what radical speeches would be echoed from the benches of the Lords! The cause for which Hampden perished on the field and Sidney on the scaffold, would cease to rest and be thankful, and would begin to rub its eyes. The very lawn of the Bishop would ruffle in wrath. We may, however, be perfectly tranquil. No Sovereign has yet been seen to attempt any gambols with the Constitution, any more than the cream-coloured horses are given to kick to pieces the gingerbread coach. The Sovereign here, as we repeat with serious pride, has no part in government."

Mr. Brooks.

There was another authority to which he (Mr. Brooks) desired to refer. An authority which he was satisfied no one in the House or in the country would for a moment question, that of the eminent statesman, who, for the last five years, had been the representative of Her Majesty in this Dominion, and whose merited success had been greatly owing to his strict adherence to constitutional principles. He had declared it in 1873, in his celebrated speech at Halifax, at a time of great excitement, and this he (Mr. Brooks) believed no one would question, had been the rule of his conduct throughout the whole of his residence amongst us. His Excellency then said:—

"No, gentlemen, I understand my duty too well ever to allow my judgment or my sympathies to be surprised into political partizanship. My one thought and desire is for the welfare of Canada as a whole. My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada. In fact, I suppose I am the only person in the Dominion whose confidence in the wisdom and infallibility of Parliament is never shaken. Each of you gentlemen only believe in Parliament so long as Parliament acts according to your wishes and convictions. I, gentlemen, believe in Parliament, no matter which way it votes, and to those men whom the deliberate rule of the Federal Parliament of the Dominion may assign to me as my responsible advisers, can I give my confidence. Whether they are the heads of this party or of that party must be a matter of indifference to the Governor-General, so long as they are maintained by Parliament in their positions, so long as he is bound to give them his unreserved confidence, and defer to their advice and loyally to assist them with his counsels."

He (Mr. Brooks) should have occasion presently to apply this last particular remark to the conduct of his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, under the circumstances which were in question. The only other authority which he would read would be one from a work that had been quoted by the right hon. member for Kingston, and one which not only in this but in every country was a recognised authority upon this subject,—Bagehot. In speaking of the policy of the Government—and the great question at issue came in here, for, according to what they had before them, it was a difference in policy which caused the dismissal by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Administration,—Bagehot said, on page 79, last edition of his work, as to the present rule, not that which prevailed a century ago, to which period the precedents cited by the hon. gentleman opposite related:—

"A century ago the Crown had a real choice of Ministers though it had no longer a choice of policy. During the long reign of Sir R. Walpole he was obliged not only to manage Parliament but to manage the palace. He was obliged to take care that some court intrigue did not expel him from his place. The nation then selected the English policy, but the Crown chose the English Ministers. They were not only in name, as now, but in fact the Queen's servants. Remnants, still important remnants, of this great prerogative remain."

Mr. Bagehot next referred to the dismissal of Lord Melbourne by William IV., and stated:—

"The discriminating power of William IV made Lord Melbourne head of the Whig party when he was only one of several rivals. At the death of Lord Palmerston it is very likely that the Queen may have the opportunity of freely choosing between two, if not three statesmen. But, as a rule, the nominal Prime Minister is chosen by the Legislature, and the real Prime Minister for most purposes—the leader of the House of Commons—almost and without exception is so. There is nearly always some one man plainly selected by the voice of the predominant party in the predominant House of the Legislature to head that party, and consequently to rule the nation. We have in England an elective First Magistrate as truly as the Americans have an elective First Magistrate. The Queen is only at the head of the dignified part of the constitution. The Prime Minister is at the head of the efficient part. The Crown is, according to the saying, the "fountain of honor," but the Treasury is the spring of business."

Then, with regard to the mode of selection of English Ministers, this author said:—

"The particular mode in which the English Ministers are selected; the notion that they are in any political sense the Queen's servants; the rule which limits the choice of the Cabinet to the members of the Legislature, are accidents unessential to its definition—historical incidents separable from its nature."

With regard to what had been during the reign of our present Sovereign the rule of conduct, the author said:—

“If we look at history we shall find that it is only during the period of the present reign that in England the duties of a constitutional Sovereign have ever been well performed. The first two Georges were ignorant of the English affairs, and wholly unable to guide them, whether well or ill, for many years. In their time the Prime Minister had, over and above the labour of managing Parliament, to manage the woman—sometimes the Queen, sometimes the mistress—who managed the Sovereign. George III interfered unceasingly, but he did harm unceasingly; George IV and William IV gave no steady continuing guidance, and were unfit to give it.”

As to the question of the theoretical powers referred to as to the prerogative powers of the Sovereign under certain circumstances, these powers, as had been very correctly stated under our Constitution, if they were exercised, would put an end to all Government. Bagehot, in his introduction to the last edition of his work, speaking of the abolition of purchase in the army, stated:—

“But this is nothing to what the Queen can by law do without consulting Parliament. Not to mention other things, she could disband the army (by law she cannot engage more than a certain number of men, but she is not obliged to engage any men); she could dismiss all the officers from the General Commanding-in-Chief, downwards; she could dismiss all the sailors too; she could sell off all our ships of war, and all our naval stores; she could make a peace by the sacrifice of Cornwall, and begin a war for the conquest of Brittany; she could make every citizen in the United Kingdom, male or female, a peer; she could make every parish in the United Kingdom a “University”; she could dismiss most of the civil servants; she could pardon all offenders; in a word, the Queen could, by prerogative, upset all the action of civil Government within the Government; could disgrace the nation by a bad war or peace; and could, by disbanding our forces, whether land or sea, leave us defenceless against foreign nations.”

Mr. Bagehot went on to explain why this could not be in reality accomplished. He would not detain the House by reading any other authorities, but simply say, as he had already mentioned, that upon these points all these writers agreed. Bagehot, on page 49 of the introduction, as to the power of dissolving the Assembly, and while contrasting their powers with those of the Sovereign, declared:

“By our Constitution, nominally the Queen, but really the Prime Minister, has the power of dissolving the Assembly.”

MR. BROOKS.

Throughout the whole of the work, as well as that of Freeman, which had been referred to, and throughout all the late constitutional works the constitutional principle was clearly laid down, that this power could not, and ought not, to be exercised, and could not be constitutionally exercised at the present day, except under the most extreme and urgent circumstances. In the investigation of this case, it was for them to enquire, what were these circumstances; whether His Honour, Mr. Letellier, was justified, from the facts which he had stated, in doing what he had done? What were the grounds which His Honour had given for his action? They found that His Honour was, in December, 1876, appointed to the position he now held as an officer under the Governor-in-Council, and also that on the opening of the Quebec Provincial Parliament of that year, the present Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the Province, Sir Antoine Dorion, who, during the illness of the late lamented Governor Caron, acted as administrator of the Government, in the speech from the Throne, delivered on the 11th of November, 1876, said:

“The financial crisis which has everywhere made itself felt has been, and still continues to be, a source of serious embarrassment for such railway companies, as have, with an energy worthy of all praise, made very considerable progress, but which now find themselves arrested by the difficulties in the money market. It is the intention of my Government to come to the assistance by a measure which will, I hope, meet your approval. A Bill for the organization of the public service, and to render it more efficient, will be laid before you.”

Such was the declaration of the Administrator of the Government on the 11th November, 1876. The present Lieutenant-Governor was appointed in December, 1876. Before he went into the question referred to in that speech of the Administrator of the Government, he wished it to be distinctly understood that the question was not a question of the DeBoucherville or the Joly Administration with which the House had to deal, nor was it a question as to which party had their sympathies. It was not a question whether the measures which were passed during the last year of the De Boucherville Government, and which led to his dismissal from power, were such as this Parliament approved of or not. With regard to the railway resolutions he might very fairly and frankly state that he considered the manner in which they were passed was an unwise one, because, however desirable the object, it could not have been attained by the enforcement of the payment of the subsidies which were sought by the passing of the Act, because they could never have been imposed otherwise than by process of law. That, of course, was merely a question of policy; it was also a matter of opinion how far the Lieutenant-Governor was constitutionally justified in taking the course which he did. Before going further, he (Mr. Brooks) would refer to some propositions which had been made by Mr. Todd, when speaking of the position of a constitutional Governor. The first of these was, that there should be a strict neutrality; the second, that he should advise and so co-operate with his Ministers; and, third, that he should accept the advice of his Ministers. Now, let him enquire what were the facts and how far the principles of constitutional Government as he understood they were carried out by His Honour. Although an explanatory letter had been written since, the first letter written by Mr. Letellier to Mr. DeBoucherville should previously be considered in the meantime. Take the first sentence and see whether the Lieutenant-Governor was preserving in that a strict neutrality, whether he was accepting and endeavouring to carry out the government of country, and whether he was co-operating with the Administration which had the support of upwards of two-thirds of the members of the Local House. The Lieutenant-Governor said a constitutional error had been committed. But in what way? He said it was only an error committed in good faith by the Premier. The Lieutenant-Governor said to the Ministers: "You have done a thing which you ought not to have done and which I did not authorize you to do, but which you believed I authorized you to do." Now what was the course he or any constitutional Governor of a British Province ought to have pursued? Was it not his duty, in the first place, to have sent a memorandum to the Ministers insisting upon their undoing what they had, as he believed, done improperly, and to have made a record of it? No record had been made of this transaction, however, up to the time of the actual dismissal. There was but a word and a blow, and, unfortunately, the blow came first. Now, what were the reasons given for this dismissal? He said first, and that was the point regarding which he (Mr. Brooks) wished particularly to speak, it was because of the enormous expense occasioned by the very large subsidies to certain railways (the southern railways), while, as he said, the public funds were burdened with the obligations incurred in the construction of the North Shore Railway from Quebec to Ottawa, which had precedence. Now, if the Lieut.-Governor had been acquainted with the condition of affairs in our country, he would have known, that every one of these roads had received a grant of a subsidy during the last Parliament; that not a single dollar had been added since, and he said incorrectly that the great railway from Quebec to Ottawa was to take precedence of all others. And why? Those who were acquainted with affairs in Quebec must know that the legislation connected with railways commenced in 1869, and various enactments had been made since. In 1873-4, the third Session of the second Parliament, resolutions were passed and, under an Act based on these resolutions, a large number of roads received the sum of $2,500 per mile. This was made a ground, forsooth, on which to attack the DeBoucherville Administration. In the Session of 1873-4 Mr. Laframboise moved, seconded by Mr. Bachand:—

"That this House regrets that the importance of the South Eastern Railway Company and the Montreal Chambly and Sorel Railway, and the great services that these roads are destined to render to the country, have been overlooked, and that these two companies have not been placed on the same footing as those mentioned in the first of these resolutions."

To this an amendment was proposed by Mr. Pelletier, seconded by Mr. Langellier:—

"That this House, moreover, regrets that the great importance of the Lévis and Kennebec road has not been appreciated at its just value."

This amendment was proposed, although the Lévis and Kennebec road was receiving the same subsidy as the other lines of railway. In the last Session of the last Parliament, an additional $1,500 per mile was granted to a certain number of roads, and just before the general elections a resolution in amendment was proposed to this effect:—

"That this House regrets that the importance of the Quebec and New Brunswick Railway, to which a grant of land was made by the Railway Act of 1876, and also of that portion of the South Eastern Railway which belonged to the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Counties Railway, as well as that of the Missisquoi and Black Rivers Valley Railway has not been recognized or mentioned in the Land Resolutions, for which, amongst others, voted the following members of the present de facto Government: Messrs. Bachand, Chauveau, Joly, Langellier and Marchand."

He found, in addition to that, in 1875—after the railway policy with regard to the southern roads had been adopted—subsequent to the grants being passed, and the Legislature which gave these grants had been returned with an overwhelming majority—these same gentlemen, who were now the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor, declaring:

"That this House begs to express the hope that in carrying out such contemplated arrangement—the assumption of the North Shore and Montreal, Occidental and Western Railway, no expense will be incurred which will add to the burdens of the Province by rendering any increased taxation necessary, and that in distributing the funds now at the disposal of the Province for railway purposes, those enterprises which have already been aided by the Legislature and are now suffering from similar causes to those which have retarded the progress of the North Shore and Montreal Occidental and Western Railways do receive their fair proportion of the assistance."

That was supported by Ministers Bachand, Joly and Marchand. Immediately afterwards a motion was brought forward by the same gentleman, with the addition of Mr. Laframboise:

"That in the opinion of this House the policy of the Government endangers the construction of the North Shore and Montreal, Occidental and Western Railways, and is at the same time unjust to the railways on the south side of the St. Lawrence."

MR. BROOKS.

Now, one of the first reasons why the Lieut.-Governor did not agree with his Ministers, and summarily dismissed them was, that these enormous subsidies had been granted to several railways, while the Province was burdened with the construction of the great railway from Quebec to Ottawa, which was to take precedence of the others. Now, there was no law under which that railway was to take precedence—in fact these subsidies had been granted prior to the time when assistance was given to the Quebec and Ottawa Railway. Then he blamed them for not having reduced the expenditure at a time when their embarrassments prevented them from doing so. Surely that was no reason for dismissing the Ministry as he had done. The third reason given by him was that they had increased the salaries of the employés in the Civil Service. Now, he found that this was done under the provisions of the Act passed during the previous Session, and which had been sanctioned by Lieut.-Governor Letellier. Coming back to this question, he might state that in the Session of 1876, a declaration was made, that it was the intention of the Government to come to the assistance of these railways, and great hopes were entertained by the promoters of these southern roads that additional assistance might be granted. These hopes never were realized, and the greatest dissatisfaction was felt, from the fact that Mr. De Boucherville refused to increase by one dollar the grant to any of these roads, except in one case, where he did raise it, as was provided by law, from a lapsed subsidy. On glancing at the Public Accounts for the year 1875, it would be found that there was granted to the Quebec and Montreal road $6,500.76, to the South Shore $3,980.57; in 1876 there was granted to the South Shore $1,957.45, and the Quebec and Ottawa road $1,332,025; and he found that Mr. Letellier in assuming office made this declaration, which certainly was not put into his mouth by his constitutional advisers. On the 28th December, 1876, he said:

"Having been called upon to fill the important position of Lieutenant-Governor of this Province, which became vacant by the decease of my lamented predecessor I cannot allow his opportunity to pass without rendering homage to the memory of the statesman whose long career has been an honour to himself and to the country.

"It will be my earnest desire, as it will be my duty, to comply with the spirit of the Constitution under which we have the happiness to live.

"I have much pleasure in congratulating you on the zeal and assiduity which you have manifested in the discussion of the important measures which have been submitted to you. I trust that the result of your labours will be to give a new impetus to the great improvements which have been undertaken in the Province."

He thus ratified what had been done, and referred to these very roads over which he said the railway from Quebec to Ottawa should take precedence as far as the finances of the Province were concerned. Now, it would be observed that, during the Session, His Honour did not consider that the circumstances of the Province were so very precarious as to oblige him to remain at the seat of Government; he found it better for his personal convenience to be absent. He (Mr. Brooks) might say also, that whatever occurred prior to the meeting of Parliament in this last Session, he had condoned. On the 29th January, 1878, he expressed by his action, confidence in the Administration. He did this when he was asked by the Premier, who wished to obtain from him authority with regard to the measures affecting the finances of the Province. He had such confidence in the Premier that he sent him a blank authority. And in addition to that, it was admitted, throughout these papers, that on the 19th February there was a conversation between the Premier and the Lieutenant-Governor with regard to certain measures. Then was the time, if the Lieutenant Governor desired to express and record his dissent from the legislation of the Administration, to do so in a constitutional way. He left an impression on the mind of the Premier, as he himself admitted, of such a vague and uncertain character, that he thought he was authorizing these different measures. They found that the result of this was, that resolutions referring to the South Shore roads were passed and signed by him. It certainly seemed to him that additional reasons should have been given, if there really were any reasons, in support of the dismissal. There was no opportunity, prior to the dismissal, for any consultation between the Lieutenant-Governor and the Premier; there was no attempt to reconcile the difficulty, no apparent desire on the part of His Excellency, that these difficulties should be reconciled; but they found that on the 25th February he called for a certain document, and on the 1st March he dismissed his Ministers. Then the House had it before them, that the only reasons which at the time of the dismissal were given by him, were not sufficient, and they found that he afterwards sent to the Governor General additional reasons. The reasons were not sufficient to justify the course he had taken. In the exercise of the power to dismiss under these circumstances, he should have remembered that "though it was excellent to have the giant's strength, it was tyrannous to use it like a giant." Immediately after the declaration that he had determined to produce legislative and administrative changes, he gave the reasons which induced him to adopt that course, which reasons the hon. member for Terrebonne had truly stigmatized as puerile. If any lawyer having a brief, had given reasons for his conclusions similar to those assigned by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, they would have been ruled out without any consideration. The first reason given was, that during the Session of 1876, a Bill had been read three times in one branch of the Legislature, and only twice in the other. That might be quite true; but, if it were, it was purely a clerical error which amounted to nothing, and in any case, the Lieutenant-Governor had not been called on to sanction the Bill, after the error had been discovered, and the Bill did not appear on the Statutes. Another reason he gave was, that during the same Session, a Bill had been submitted to him for sanction, in which he perceived a blank had not been filled up, but, as he admitted afterwards, it was probably a clerical error which amounted to nothing; and in any case, the Lieutenant-Governor had not been called on to sanction the Bill after the error had been discovered, and the Bill did not appear on the Statutes. Another reason he gave was, that, during the same Session, a Bill had been submitted to him for sanction in which he perceived a blank had not been filled up, but as he admitted afterwards, it was probably a clerical error. Another grave reason was, that the word "amender" was in the infinitive mood, instead of being in a past tense. He thus quoted a petty, paltry quibble of a grammatical error as a reason for dismissing his responsible advisers. Then came the important matter of the appointment of a municipal councillor for Montmagny. The Attorney-General had recommended the Lieut.-Governor, on a petition from Montmagny, to appoint a councillor for that village. The Governor had some doubts about the appointment at first; but, after a second conference with the Attorney-General, he made the appointment. He (Mr. Brooks) did not think, in any case, the office of councillor to the village of Montmagny was such an important one, that one councillor, more or less, would endanger the safety of the Province of Quebec. Subsequently, other facts came to his knowledge, and he was asked to rescind that appointment, which was agreed to, and there the matter ought to have ended. The next two reasons for this important breach of the Constitution were, certainly, very serious if they were correct. The Lieut.-Governor stated that, in the Official Gazette, two Orders-in-Council were published without his signature. The first one was for the convening of Parliament, not for the despatch of business, but merely the usual formal order, which was repeated month after month in the Official Gazette; the other was the fixing of Thanksgiving Day. With respect to the convening of Parliament for the despatch of business, it appeared the proclamation was not published until the 24th November, and Mr. Letellier's letter, drawing attention to the fact that the two proclamations had been issued without his signature, it appeared, from the record, was dated 6th November, and the day appointed for the convening of Parliament was the 24th December. He declared he had not signed the proclamation. He (Mr. Brooks) was not in the secrets of the Governments, but he found it stated that this Order-in-Council, as well as the subsequent one, had been actually signed by the Lieut.-Governor with his own hand and signature and was dated 6th November; so that this particular Order-in-Council for the convening of Parliament was signed by him and on record in the proper office. With reference to the latter Proclamation, fixing a day for Thanksgiving, it was the result of a suggestion of the Premier of the Dominion to Lieut.-Governor Letellier. Then came the real substantial reason which he gave as an additional cause for dismissing his Ministers. Mr. DeBoucherville had stated he was governed by "rings" which were forcing him to making additional grants to different roads throughout the country. He (Mr. Brooks) had proved from the documents which he had read that if there were "rings," if any constraint or force were brought to bear upon the Lieut.-Governor in this matter, it was brought by those men whom he had called to replace his former advisers. It was a matter of fact that for two years, not one additional dollar had been granted to any of these other roads, except to advance to certain roads a part of the subsidy on the un-built portion. Time after time deputations had waited on the hon. the Premier, desiring him to grant additional assistance to those roads; they failed in their appeals, although some of the roads would be of the greatest possible benefit and deserved to be assisted by the Government; and still he (Mr. DeBoucherville) was to be turned out of office, because he declined to grant what they had endeavoured to obtain. It might be said that this matter was not one of the very greatest possible importance, that at any rate it should not be brought up here, and that they ought not to agitate it or discuss it here or interfere with the choice of the electors of the Province of Quebec. The answer to this was, that they had a right at any time, and at all times, to discuss this constitutional question. There was no period, when an event of this kind occurred, that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor, an officer appointed by the Governor-in-Council, and responsible to them, might not properly be brought under the consideration of this House.

MR. BROOKS.

which was the ultimate authority that should determine upon the constitutionality of any act or any violation of the Constitution, in any particular, and not the country. This was an attempt to change the issue, and to have the country to declare what Parliament was not sufficiently educated to decide. This was an attempt to divert the issue. So far as this was concerned, he did not know what the country might say; but, whether it declared for one or the other Government, whatever might be its decision on this point, it was the duty of the hon. members and of the House, either now or at some other time, to enter on record their deliberate opinion with regard to the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in the exercise of his duties. If there had been a violation of the political Constitution, it was not to be allowed to produce all the evil effects intended, and have full sway, and then to pass a mild resolution which would condemn such violation. If there had been a violation and an undue or improper use of the prerogatives of the Crown, he certainly could not, in this regard, cite a better authority than that of the late Minister of Justice, given on the memorable occasion in 1873, touching the prorogation of this Parliament, when the hon. gentleman declared that such prorogation by the Governor-General was a violation of constitutional principles, although the prorogation was only for a short time. The hon. gentleman then said:

"What I say with reference to prorogation, I say with reference to the Commission, that its appointment was a violation of the ancient landmarks and rights of Parliament, and an invasion of the rights and privileges of the people by the exercise of the prerogative, which ought not to be tolerated."

And why? The hon. gentleman cited the very best possible authority on that occasion, and this was taken from a celebrated writer (Junius), an authority which, moreover, had as much force now as then, and which justified the action at the present time being taken with regard to this matter. This authority was as follows:—

"Never suffer any violation of your political constitution, however minute the instance may appear, to pass by without a determined, persevering resistance. One precedent makes another; they soon assimilate and constitute law. What yesterday was fact, to-day is doctrine. Examples are supposed to justify the most dangerous measures; and, where they do not suit exactly, the defect is supplied by analogy."

With regard to this same question of the prerogative, he might also cite the hon. the Minister of the Interior as an authority. On the 14th August, 1873, a resolution was proposed by the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, seconded by Mr. Mills, as follows:—

"That the prorogation of Parliament without giving the House of Commons the opportunity of prosecuting the enquiry it had already undertaken, was a gross violation of the privilege and independence of Parliament, and the rights of the people."

If that was such a gross violation, what should they say regarding the action of the Lieutenant-Governor in this case, where two-thirds of the Legislative Assembly not only supported the Administration of the day, but also declared this both before and afterwards, and represented to the Governor-General that they had full confidence in the Administration of the day; and that the Ministers who had been named to replace the Administration did not have the confidence of the country. Then, if a case of simple prorogation for a short time was a breach of the prerogative which ought not to be tolerated, this case now before the House was certainly one that ought not to be tolerated.

MR. MILLS: Do you concur in that opinion?

MR. BROOKS said he cited a very good authority in favour of this opinion—the Minister of the Interior. He was very glad to state that he did not believe that the hon. the Premier, or the hon. member for Chateauguay, or the late Minister of Justice (Mr. Blake), ever had any knowledge or intimation with regard to this action of the Lieutenant-Governor, or would ever have sanctioned or approved it. He certainly should not believe otherwise until he heard it from the lips of these hon. gentlemen. He believed that their regard for constitutional precedents and authority was so great that not one of them would be willing to stand up in the House, and declare to the country that they approved in any way of that use of power, even though theoretically within the prerogative of the Crown. There had been a coup d'état, not as bloody as that of 1851 in France, but, so far as concerned the object to be attained, as effectual; and, although they might not now know, they would before long know, who were the advisers of this coup d'état. They knew perfectly well who was the Napoleon, but they did not know who were the Marny, the Fleury, Maripas, and the St. Arnaud, formerly Roy, who assisted at this coup d'état. Their names were not known, but, possibly, before very long, they might get some light on this subject. He was afraid that he had wearied the House, and as the Premier had given him the hint that time was fleeting, he would cut short his remarks. He would just observe that, if the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was justifiable, it would be just as right for the Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada to write a letter to the Premier declaring that he was dismissed from his Councils because he did not agree with him upon the Protection policy. That would be no greater violation of the constitutional principle than what had occurred in the Province of Quebec. There was only one other point to which he would refer, and that was to the Premier having found fault with the moderation of the motion; at one time he called it an indecent proposition, and then said the hon. gentleman who moved it did not go far enough. He (Mr. Brooks) would have been disposed to go much further than the resolution, and to declare in stronger terms that the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was unjust and unwise, and a violation of the constitutional principle of our Government. He certainly thought it was too moderate, and he believed it was so framed in order that it should meet the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. The question was of such great importance that he hoped to be pardoned for having so long occupied the time of the House. If the Lieutenant-Governor of one of our Provinces were permitted, without question, to do what neither the Sovereign nor the Governor-General would venture to do, there would be no safety and no peace in the Dominion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 12th April, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INTRODUCTION OF A MEMBER.

Thos. Robert McInnes, Esq., representative for the Electoral District of New Westminster, British Columbia, was introduced to the House by Mr. Dewdney and Mr. Macdonald (Centre Toronto), and took his seat.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SURVEY.

QUESTION.

MR. TUPPER: I would again like to ask the hon. the First Minister, when he thinks that he will be able to place in our hands the report of the acting Chief Engineer in connection with the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the hon. gentleman, in response to my enquiry, the other day, questioned the source of my information, I was taken a little aback, but I put myself in communication with the gentleman who spoke to me on the subject, and asked for his authority for the facts as to there being a report in the hands of the Government, and he stated to me that his authority was the statement of the hon. gentleman's colleague, the Secretary of State, in the other House, who said that this report was in the hands of the Government, and would be submitted at any early day. I take this opportunity of mentioning to the hon. gentleman the source of my information.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am very glad to know that authoritatively. I have only to say that as soon as the other reports that were given, are in, they will be laid before the House; but I am not prepared to place that particular report on the table until the others are ready.

THE QUEBEC CRISIS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order to resume the adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply"—and of Sir John A. Macdonald's motion in amendment thereto: "That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That the recent dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec of his Ministry, was under the circumstances unwise, and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown, since the concession of the principle of Responsible Government to the British North American Colonies," read.

MR. LANGEVIN said that when the House adjourned last night, he was about to say to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue that he was astonished to hear him begin his speech on this question by calling the attention of the House to the principles of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. He had thought that the question before them was another, a great constitutional question, and that, at all events, for the moment, the discussion of the principles of the Liberal party might be left over for another occasion; but, as it had pleased the hon. gentleman to call the attention of the House to these principles, and to take his hon. friend (Mr. Masson) to task for the allusions he had made during his able speech on this matter, he (Mr. Langevin) must say he was bound to answer the hon. gentleman, take up his different propositions, and endeavour to meet them. The hon.

gentleman began by saying that the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec held the same principles that the Liberal party in England professed. He had read that the hon. gentleman on another occasion had advocated this claim on the part of the Liberal party of the province of Quebec; but he had yet to see that the hon. gentleman had proved his case. The hon. gentleman, in order that he might prove his case, began by placing aside the principles advocated by the Liberals of the Province of Quebec up to the time when he became a public man. The hon. gentleman said that all this must be left out of sight, that all this was to be forgotten, that they need not now consider these matters; and that these were their principles. It was very easy for the hon. gentleman to repudiate all his leaders, some of whom he (Mr. Langevin), had no doubt were able and great men in their way, and to say with regard to some of them, that "they were all young men, and the principles which they advocated at that time were repudiated." The hon. gentleman then came to others of these leaders, and touching them he said: "As to this man, he was an extremist, and a man who did not really belong to the party which we now have in the Province of Quebec." Yet he came and said: "Here are our principles. Our principles are those of the English Liberals of to-day." Now, in order to see what the principles of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec were, they had only to look back to the great programmes of that party. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue might say that was ancient history, but he did not hesitate to go thirty or forty years back, and say that at such and such a period the Opposition had done so and so. Well, to go back to the famous programme of 1847, we found therein this item, "Annexation to the United States." He wished to know from the hon. gentleman whether the programme of the Liberals in England contained such an item—"The annexation of any part of the British Empire to the United States or any other country." The Liberals of England were a great party, but they maintained the integrity of the British Empire as much as any other party in the country. When the Government of England came down, the other day, with a message from the Queen in reference to the reserves, what was the vote given in the House of Commons? Why, only a small minority went against the proposal and a large majority on both sides assented to it. So much for the famous programme of 1847, which was in 21 articles and which lasted seven years. In 1854, the Liberal party had become stronger and more numerous. They had a number of representatives in the Parliament of Canada; they had a number of talented young men in their ranks, and they thought they might let the public into their confidence, and let them know exactly what their true principles were. And what did we find in the famous programme of 1854? We found that the 29th article enjoined "Independence," "Republic," "Annexation to the United States." Had the Liberals in England ever put forward such a programme? No; the Liberals as well as the Conservatives of England were in favour of monarchical institutions, of the Queen, the Lords and the Commons. They did not desire any change in the great institutions of England. What, then, did these hon. gentlemen mean by "Independence," "Republic," "Annexation to the United States"? He wanted to know whether there was one hon. member in the House who would rise in his place and say he wished the separation of this country from England. He knew that some of them had disguised their professions and aspirations. Some of them had gone as far as to lecture their constituents; but while speaking of independence had twisted it round in such a way that they might not be caught as really wishing the independence of the country. One hon. gentleman had published a lecture in which that principle was advocated; but when had he come upon the floor of the House and advocated his ideas? He had not done so, and the House knew the reason why. When a gentleman took the responsibilities of office he forgot the ravings of his younger days and became more sober in his views. Perhaps when he went out of office, he might revert to his former ideas.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. LAFLAMME: Will the hon. gentleman tell me where he obtained that programme?

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. the Minister of Justice would surely not repudiate the programme of 1854. The hon. Minister was now the only representative in the House who belonged to that association of young men in 1854, and surely he was not ashamed of them. These young men, many of whom had gone down to early graves, might have erred in many respects, but the hon. gentleman ought not to be ashamed of them, because their voice and exertions had helped him to attain the position which he now occupied. The hon. gentleman ought not to be ashamed of the position he assumed in his younger days, although he might never recognise his former folly. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was not then associated with these young men, because he must have been a mere baby at the time they flourished, but having joined the Liberal party he ought not to repudiate the programmes of his party; otherwise he had no right to a place in their ranks. One of the most able men of that period now almost forgotten by his party, though not forgotten by the party now in Opposition, who knew him sometimes to their detriment, was Mr. J. B. E. Dorion, l'Enfant Terrible, as he had been nicknamed. This gentleman had been spoken of by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in a way he would not dare to have referred to him, had he been in the House at the present time; he could not withstand the fire of his eloquence and his talent. Although he (Mr. Langevin) had always acted and voted against Mr. Dorion, he recognised his talent, and he certainly thought it ungenerous, now that he had gone to his grave, that he should be alluded to in such terms as had been applied to him. Did any leading member of the Liberal party in England ever advocate a republic? No; the great men of that party in England were not so forgetful of their allegiance and their duty to the great interests of the country to advocate such a policy. Both parties in England were more loyal to the Crown. The next item on the programme was annexation.

tion to the United States. Of course, as the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue stated, this was now a dead issue. This programme was, however, signed by the hon. gentleman, and, no doubt, it was exceedingly inconvenient for him, that the attention of the House was called to the fact. The people of Lower Canada repudiated such a programme, and would have nothing to do with a party which was not loyal to the Crown. But there was also another programme, because the Liberals changed their programmes as often as there was a new Parliament. At the present moment, these hon. gentlemen imagined that, by having in their hands the Governments of the Province of Quebec and Ontario, their principles would ultimately prevail. As had been stated on the previous day, there was now an appeal to the people of Quebec, which would show hon. gentlemen, as well as the Lieutenant-Governor, that the electors of the Province would not sanction the unconstitutional policy of the Lieutenant-Governor, and would not tolerate in power the Government of Mr. Joly. It would not be long before hon. gentlemen heard of it. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue thought it was better to wipe out the past, and he said that no extreme Liberal in Canada had advocated communistic principles. To prove that they had done so, however, we had only to go back to the paper published by the gentleman whose name he had just mentioned—Mr. Dorion—who was then the great oracle of the Liberal section of the House. That hon. gentleman was not bashful to say in that paper of his, what his principles were. One of these principles was abolition of privileges of all kinds. There were a great many privileges in this country and in all countries. We had, for instance, the privilege of the right of property. Before the seigniorial system was done away with, many seigniors of the Province of Quebec were possessed of wealth and large property. It was thought, by a majority in that Province, that the object for which the seigniorial system had been established by their forefathers had been attained, and that the time was arrived when that system should disappear. The Conservatives went on this ground—"These seigniors have acquired rights which must be paid for; we will not allow one single dollar of their rights to be taken from them without giving them a dollar of compensation." But the idea set forth by other hon. gentlemen in their programme was a communistic one. Hon. gentlemen, however, very soon saw that this article had better be taken out of their programme, and, in 1872, it disappeared. They believed the electors of Quebec would side with them on the great principle. They said: "We thought for a time this principle should prevail, but now that we are older and have more experience, we are of a contrary opinion; but trust us, only trust us." Hon. gentlemen had been trusted in this House for four years, and they had been weighed and found wanting. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue went further than this, and charged his (Mr. Langevin's) side of the House with being hostile to the principles of Responsible Government. Let them go back a little, and see who were those who preceded them in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman went back thirty years. He would go back forty. They had, at that time, under the union of the two Canadas, a sort of Crown Government, but they had no Responsible Government. Our forefathers, the great men, who were always respected and always would be, voted for the principles of Responsible Government; those principles might not have been so well defined or so well understood at the time, but they voted for them. And then they had the insurrection of 1837 and 1838, which was not against the Crown of England, for a more loyal people than the French, English, Scotch and Irish of Lower Canada could not be found; it was against a bureaucracy, and any interference with Responsible Government. After the union of the Canadas, they saw all those great men, the Lafontaines, Morins, Tachos and others, fighting for that same principle of Responsible Government. They thought they should not be governed by the Government without responsible Ministers, and they left office, remaining in Opposition four years, when the principle having been organized, they returned triumphantly to their old places. Those were, therefore, the men who were then the chiefs of his (Mr. Langevin's) party, the Papineaus, Nelsons, Lafontaines, Morins, and Taches. He worked and fought with those men, and if they lived now they would be found on his side of the House. So he thought he had disposed of the charge that the Conservatives of Quebec were hostile to the principles of Responsible Government. The hon. gentleman had quoted La Nouvelle Monde; he had no doubt that would be found by the hon. gentleman a useful and interesting paper. He had also quoted the Courier du Canada, to the effect that Local elections were coming on, they had the Municipal elections, School elections, Provincial elections, Federal elections, and, in fact they were always having elections. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) found fault that this paper objected to these numerous elections, and to the many crimes, or great sins, as he called them, that were committed during these elections. Well, the hon. gentleman knew that at election time there was a great deal of drunkenness and quarrelling and other crimes, and he should recollect the Bill which the hon. Minister of Justice, a few days ago, brought down at his (Mr. Langevin's) suggestion, to eliminate from voting the facilities for fraud, and adopt the same system as was now carried out in the Province of Quebec. But once more, what had this to do with the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec? Did it prove that Mr. Letellier was right in the course he had taken? The hon. gentleman was afraid to touch the question, and he did not want the House to take it into consideration, he did not want it to have a motion about it; he said that the adoption of the motion of his right hon. friend would be an invasion of the rights of the people. It might be very convenient for the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; but if he had so far forgotten his duties as to violate the great principles he was entrusted to protect, they must tell him so; they must consider the facts, of the case and say whether that high functionary had not violated the Constitution, and did not deserve rebuke, if not something else. The hon. gentleman said he was jealous of the constitutional rights of the Province and the great principles of Responsible Government; but how did he permit Mr. Letellier to treat those principles? The Legislature had been supporting the Government of Mr. DeBoucherville for the last two or three years. Mr. DeBoucherville had a large majority, sometimes amounting to one-third of the whole House, and the Session had been a most successful one. Just three or four days before the end of the Session the Lieutenant-Governor called on Mr. DeBoucherville, and said: "Notwithstanding your majority, I must dismiss you and have other Ministers." If this was Responsible Government the sooner it was known the better. It was a tyrannical Government, he did not think Prussia or Germany to-day would do anything of the kind; for, although the Emperor of that Empire had great power, he would not dare to do that. That act was left for the great Liberal party, that were in favour of nothing which was liberal, nothing which was in favour of the rights of the people. It was left for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) to say, "All is right, Mr. Letellier has done nothing wrong." He said that the Governor and the Federal Parliament, no matter how erring the conduct of Mr. Letellier might be, had no right to interfere, so long as there was no remedy in the local Constitution of Quebec; the remedy was in the hands of the people of Quebec. If we had no right to interfere, then the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was independent of all authority; there he was for five years, and might do with the Province as he thought proper. But the case was quite different. If the Lieutenant-Governor had good reason to say to his Ministers that he thought they had lost the confidence of the House and the confidence of the country, and that, therefore, he wished them to go to the people and test whether they possessed their confidence or not, he could have understood it, because in that case he would not have taken from the hands of his Ministers the constitutional right of going to the people.

If he had done that, the dissolution of the House would have been perfectly constitutional, and the people would have decided, not between Mr. Letellier and his late Ministers, but with respect to the policy of the Administration on the measures which they had introduced and carried through Parliament, and whether Mr. DeBoucherville's Government had their confidence or not. When the Legislature met again, then a vote of confidence or of non-confidence would have shown whether Mr. Letellier had been right or wrong; and, if he had been right, the Ministry would have gone out, and Mr. Letellier have called other men to advise him. But, no; that was not the position. Mr. Letellier began by dismissing his Ministers, who had the confidence of both Houses. He said: "I do not believe in those measures; I will call other men." And he called other men to his Councils to advise him; and for three, four, and five months those men, who had been all the time in a very large minority in the Legislature, would have the administration of the affairs and the expenditure of the people's money, up to July next, the supplies having been voted to them; and would have all the patronage of the Crown in our Province, although they had never had the confidence of the people, and might never have that confidence. Nevertheless, Mr. Letellier thought this fair and just, and in accordance with the great principles of Responsible Government. The hon. member for Chateauguay would not say, he felt sure, that this was in accordance with the great principles of Responsible Government. He hoped they would hear from the hon. gentleman; he hoped the hon. gentleman would not remain dumb on such a question. The hon. gentleman was one of the oldest members of this House, and they had a right to have his opinions on this subject, to know whether he approved or condemned the act of Mr. Letellier in putting aside the Legislature, and in putting aside the will of the people, the Ministry which had the support and the confidence of the country; and in taking in their place men who represented a small minority to administer the public affairs, and to control the whole patronage of the Crown of that Province. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was jealous of the great principles of Responsible Government. He (Mr. Langevin) wished him joy of his jealousy on that point. The hon. gentleman had said, on the same subject, there might be cases in which Parliament might interfere, but only when the people had not the remedy in their own hands. They were all waiting to hear what those cases were, but evidently in vain. The people of the Province of Quebec could not help themselves to-day. The Legislature had been dissolved and they must now look to new men. What right had Mr. Letellier to send away those Ministers, which the majority of the representatives of the people, and, therefore, the people themselves, had put in office? For, the true principle and practice of our institutions were that the electors elected representatives, and from those representatives the Crown took its advisers. He admitted there might be some cases when under those circumstances, a Ministry might be dismissed; for instance, in the case of Ministers who might be guilty of high treason, who used their office to destroy the Constitution, and allow the enemy to enter the country. That would be an occasion in which the Crown might and should interfere; the action might be unconstitutional, but the safety of the country was the first thing to be considered. It would be on the same principle as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, which was the great charter of our liberties. Yet there were cases when the safety of the State required its suspension. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had said that as long as there was a remedy in the hands of the people, he did not want the Crown or Parliament to interfere. He (Mr. Langevin) would put this point; he would suppose a case Mr. Letellier had dismissed his Ministers; he had called on Mr. Joly to form a new Government, which now existed. He had dissolved Parliament on the advice of Mr. Joly; the electors were now called on to vote for new men. The elections would take place on the 1st May, after which the Legislature would be called together. Mr. Joly's Ministry would then find itself, as he sincerely believed in a minority. Mr. Letellier, with that determination which he had shown, not to stand by the Constitution, but to violate it, would then say to his party: "Though you are in a minority of five, ten, or twenty, yet I will not submit to that; it is not a proper verdict; I will dissolve the Parliament again, and send you a second time to the electors to try to obtain a majority." Of course, according to the hon. gentleman, neither the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue nor the hon. the First Minister would interfere. Why? Because the remedy still remained in the hands of the people; the electors were still there. How long was Mr. Letellier to play with the people, with our institutions, and with our constitution? That is the question. Once the constitution was allowed to be violated, inch by inch it would disappear, and the rights, the privileges, and the liberties of the people would go with it. A gentleman from the great Province of Ontario, with whom he had been conversing, had said to him: "Well, the remedy is in your hands. Mr. Letellier has dismissed the Government, it is true, but the electors are called upon to say whether that is proper or not." He (Mr. Langevin) told that hon. gentleman: "If this had been done in your Province by the late Lieut.-Governor Crawford; if he had dismissed his Ministers and replaced them by a Conservative Administration, how many days would you have stood it? Would you have hesitated a moment?" The great city of Toronto would have seen the yeomanry and the people of the other cities coming into it to defend the constitution. They would have said: "This is our great right, and there is not a Lieut.-Governor nor a Minister who can violate it with impunity." They would have taken the law into their own hands as a remedy. He (Mr. Langevin) did not know whether that was the remedy of which the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue thought. In the Province of Quebec they were less fiery, perhaps, than their good friends in Ontario. Perhaps they had been accustomed at a later period by their forefathers to those great institutions of Responsible Government, and were more patient; but they valued them as much as did the people of Ontario, and they would not allow them to be violated by Lieut.-Governor Letellier. If the people of the Province of Quebec could not obtain justice from this House or from this Government, they would obtain it by their own strength; and let hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec on the other side of the House remember that the electors of that Province would soon give their views as to the shameful manner in which they had been treated by this Government. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, in order to strengthen his position, went on to say that it would not be within the power of the British Parliament to interfere should the Governor-General dismiss to-day the present Government and dissolve Parliament. For the same reason that he (Mr. Langevin) condemned the act of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, would he condemn an act of this kind; unless, as he had stated, there was a strong and supreme reason to justify it, one which concerned the first law, the safety of the State. To believe for a single moment that the hon. gentlemen who sat on the Treasury benches, would submit tamely to an act of this kind by any Governor-General of this country, who would dismiss them only for such reasons as Mr. Letellier had given, and that they would not appeal to the British Parliament, to Her Most Gracious Majesty, for redress, would be absurd; it would not be human nature. They would be the first to denounce the Governor-General; meeting after meeting would be called; petitions would be signed in every parish, village, concession, in every range of these parishes, and would be sent to the Queen and to the House of Commons, asking for the recall of the Governor-General who had committed such an act. However, the hon. gentleman did not thus feel just now, because that act had been committed against the rights and liberties of the Province by one of their own friends. But that was narrowing the question too much; these gentlemen should rise above party considerations of that kind. They should remember that this was not a question of to-day alone, nor one which would affect them alone, but it was a question which would affect the future of this country. Let hon. gentlemen suppose the same thing should occur in the other Provinces. Suppose the Hon. Mr. Archibald, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Nova Scotia, had, under similar circumstances, dismissed his Ministry and called in another set of men of the opposite party, which was in the minority in the House of Representatives, would not they be the first to say that that Lieutenant-Governor, appointed by the late Government of Canada, had committed an outrage on the Constitution and should be recalled, and a Liberal Governor sent to replace him. Hon. gentlemen from other Provinces would feel as the majority of Quebec did, if their Provinces had been summarily treated. The people of Quebec were patient, but they knew their rights, and they wanted to hand them down to their children. For this reason they had come here to demand protection to both Houses of Parliament, to the representatives of Her Most Gracious Majesty. By that petition they had laid a great grievance before Parliament, and his right hon. friend had placed before the House the motion under consideration. This question was not a party one. Was there a censure on the hon. gentlemen opposite? No; they might have put a censure in it, had they thought proper to make it a party question. But, this motion considered only the act of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and said it was an unwise act, one destructive of the great principles of Responsible Government. If hon. gentlemen voted against it, they would thereby say that Mr. Letellier's act was a wise one, and by doing as he had done, he had acted according to the great principles of Responsible Government. It would be for such hon. gentlemen a dark day when they would have to go and explain such a vote to the electors of the Province of Quebec. The principles of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue were, of course, the principles of the hon. the First Minister. The First Minister spoke first, and the Minister of Inland Revenue followed. It was quite natural that the latter should follow in the footsteps of the Minister of Public Works, under whom he acted as a Minister. But he should have remembered that before being a Minister, he was a representative of the people of the Province of Quebec; he should have remembered that he was not here to favour the First Minister's views, but to defend the Constitution of his own Province, and, by defending that Constitution and that people, he was defending the Constitutions and the people of all the Provinces. The hon. the First Minister had said he had no right to condemn the Lieutenant-Governor. If the hon. the First Minister were able to defend his late colleague, his friend whom he had appointed to preside over the Government of the Province of Quebec, would he not have done so? Yes. He was too good a friend to his friends not to defend Mr. Letellier if he could. He once said: "I always defend my officers and employes, high or low, who are under or appointed by me, until they are found guilty." If he could defend Mr. Letellier, one of the highest officers whom he could appoint, why did he not do it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do you call the Lieut.-Governor an employé?

Mr. LANGEVIN: I call him an employé, an officer of high position. An employé is a person employed and paid for filling an office; he may be a clerk, a stipendiary magistrate, or a police officer, or he may be a sub-chief of a department or a Lieutenant-Governor.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Or a Judge.

Mr. LANGEVIN: No. The law had made Judges independent, thank God, of hon. gentlemen opposite. Yes; he thanked God they were independent of any Government. He did not desire to insinuate that hon. gentlemen opposite were endeavouring to tamper with the judiciary of this country. If he could substantiate such a charge, he would in his place in Parliament, ask for the appointment of a Committee of investigation, and it would not be refused. But thank God, the Judges of the Dominion are independent of the Government, and he used the term in a broad sense. The Lieut.-Governor of Quebec was not independent of the present Government at Ottawa. He was independent only so long as he remained within the limits of the Constitution; but if he violated the Constitution, it was for the Dominion Government to take the matter in hand and impeach him. The Constitution even went further, and laid down that the Lieutenant-Governor might be dismissed by the Governor General in Council, but that the causes of the dismissal must be signified to Parliament within a certain specified time. That showed the Constitution was intended to keep the Lieutenant-Governors in check, and within its bounds. Suppose the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec determined to leave the Province for two months without obtaining leave of absence, would hon. gentlemen opposite not interfere, dismiss him, and punish him? They would not hesitate to do so, because he would have neglected to perform his duty. He would ask the hon. the Premier what he would think if His Excellency the Governor-General, who was such an admirable scholar, and used such admirable language, were to call the Ministry to account for their bad spelling and defective grammar? True, it might not be their fault, but if the Governor-General had acted on the principle that directed Mr. Letellier, hon. gentlemen opposite would not now be in power. If the Address submitted yesterday were to be criticized paragraph by paragraph, with the grammar, the Ministers, he was very much afraid, would have to resign their seats. The House could not perceive how far the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had proceeded of his own accord, and how far he had been badly advised, because there must have been some one behind the throne advising him. He had not done that act by himself alone. He had had irresponsible advisers to direct him. Some one had strengthened his nerves in order to enable him to dismiss his Ministers. But when he called Mr. Joly to the head of affairs, and before a new Government had been formed, the representatives of the people by a large majority—43 or 44 out of 65 members—declared that they had full confidence in Mr. DeBoucherville's Administration. They passed an Address to the Lieutenant-Governor, asking him to retrace his steps, and not commit the unconstitutional act that was being carried out at that moment. They went further. Mr. Joly had not been in office for an hour before the representatives of the people, assembled in the Legislature, declared that his Administration had not their confidence, and that the only men that possessed their confidence were the late Administration. But Mr. Letellier having passed the Rubicon, was bound to go forward. The Legislature had, therefore, been dissolved, and the electors were now called upon to give their decision. They had not yet ascertained how the Press and people of England viewed the question. He had no doubt, however, that if it were taken up by the great Constitutional authorities, they would declare that the act of Mr. Letellier was most unconstitutional, and such as could not be committed without his being censured and punished, that it was antagonistic to the British Constitution, that it was a violation of the Constitution of the Province of Quebec, and of their rights, privileges and liberties, and that Mr. Letellier should be condemned for attempting to take the law in his own hands, or rather for making a law for himself. He would quote a passage, a very important passage, from Bagehot, on the Constitution of England. Bagehot said:

"The Queen can hardly now refuse a defeated Minister the chance of dissolution, any more than she can dissolve in the time of an undefeated one and without his consent. And no monarch should dissolve Parliament against the will and interest of the Ministry which is in power. No doubt the King can dismiss such a Ministry and replace it by another Administration, whose advice to dissolve Parliament he should take, but even with this precaution to act thus towards a Minister which had a strong majority in Parliament, would be to strike a blow which it is almost impossible to suppose. We do not believe that Queen Victoria herself in spite of the popularity and respect by which she is surrounded, to a greater extent perhaps than any of her predecessors, would ever have recourse to such a measure. What would be thought if she should venture to reason thus: 'The Whigs are in a majority in the existing Parliament, but I think that the country would favour a Tory Administration. Let us, therefore, dissolve Parliament, and see if the country will not elect a Parliament of opposite opinions to those which prevail in the present Parliament! What would be thought of this? No Englishman can dream even of a catastrophe of this nature, but it to them appears to belong to the phenomena of a world altogether different from that which he inhabits. In practice, in England the Sovereign considers himself obliged to follow the advice of the Ministry which the House of Commons desire to remain in power. All prerogatives at variance with this principle have fallen into disuse, but the Sovereign may accord to the Ministry the opportunity of securing by an appeal to the people a majority which is denied it in the House of Commons; but to strike from behind, so to speak, and strangle by means of an appeal to the country, a Ministry sustained by Parliament, would be an event which no longer enters into the calculation, although in former instances of this occurred in our annals."

Mr. Bagehot asked what would be thought if the Queen or King was to reason in this manner: "The Whigs have a majority in the present Parliament, but I believe the country is favourable to the Tories. I will dismiss the Whig Ministry, choose a Tory Ministry, and, afterwards, dissolve Parliament to ascertain whether the people will not elect a Parliament holding contrary opinions to the present Parliament." That was exactly what Mr. Letellier had done. He had not found the Whigs in power with a majority in the Legislature, but the Conservatives in that position. The Lieutenant-Governor said to himself: "The people are favourable to the Liberals, I will therefore dismiss my Ministers; I will choose a Liberal Administration, and then I will dissolve the Legislature in order to ascertain whether the Province will not return a Legislature holding opinions contrary to those of the present Legislature." That was condemned by the best constitutional authorities. He would also read an extract from Lord Brougham's speech in the debate on the late Melbourne Administration. Lord Brougham said:

"The noble duke asks, however, 'were not other persons, as well as Lord Grey, to judge of the effects of Lord Althorpe's removal—was the King himself not to judge? I am perfectly ready to meet the noble duke on the point involved in that observation; it is indeed, my Lords, one essential to the present question—I mean the nature of the Crown's prerogative of choosing and changing its servants. It is the undoubted, the unquestioned power of the Crown to do so: that I set out with; but let us examine what is the meaning of this proposition, in order to apply it, and let us see how that prerogative is founded, in order to perceive how it is limited. In every State the public service must be provided for, and officers must be appointed by some one. Our constitution—that of a limited and hereditary monarchy—will not allow the principle, generally speaking, of election, either as regards the highest office of all, or as regards the inferior offices of the Ministry; descent provides for the one, selection for the other; and accordingly, in some one power of the State, the nomination to those offices must be vested. In whom is it vested? In the King. But it is a power exercised for the good of the people. It is not to be dealt with capriciously—it is not to be used as an amusement—it is not to be played with—not to be employed as a man would the power which he has of sending off one servant without notice, to gratify his own whims, and choosing another. A man might exercise this power of arbitrary dismissal if he pleased, and he would be the worst served; he would be the loser; but he alone would be the injured party; his interest alone would suffer. But the King holds the power in question, not for his own gratification—not at all for his own purposes. It is not he that is to be injured or to be benefitted by the exercise of it. He is not a party to the risk—he is not a party to the gain or the loss attendant on the exercise of the power—he is a trustee—he is himself a public servant—he is appointed and empowered for the benefit of his people. The trust which he exercises is wholly for their sake. It is not because some one should say, 'Turn out this person and get another,' that his power is to be therefore put in operation. He is not to place and displace his servants because somebody may say, 'Lord this is better than Lord that,' or because somebody else may cry, 'Oh, do turn out these men, and just let us have the Duke again.' That is not the theory of the Constitution—that is not the condition on which the power exists—that is not the tenure by which the power is holden. So long as this power is exercised as it ought to be, it will be safely holden; and no one would think of questioning its foundation, or objecting to its existence, or of wishing to restrict it; but it must be exercised soundly, publicly, and on stateable grounds. No Sovereign of this country has a right by the Constitution—(and your lordships will be pleased to observe that, in speaking of the Sovereign, I speak, of course, only of his advisers, using his name merely to avoid circumlocution, and, in reference to the present occasion, be it always remembered that those who succeeded my noble friend were, in point of fact, and of constitutional law, the advisers of the Crown, as I have already shown)—the Sovereign, I say, has no right—by the Constitution it is illegal—it is prohibited to the Crown—it is a wrong, an unlawful, a criminal act—to exercise that high function of dismissing its Ministers and choosing others, unless on grounds capable of being stated and defended.

That was as strong language as could be found to have been used on any question that had come before Parliament; and it might almost be thought that this speech of Lord Brougham had been prepared for delivery on this occasion. Mr. Letellier had no right to take the action he did. He had even acknowledged that the Constitution did not give him that right; on the contrary, he was bound to keep his Ministers and abide by the decision of the electors. If he thought his Ministers had lost the confidence of the Province, after having been three years in office, though they had a large majority in the Legislature, he might say so to them, and send them back to the people. They would have had a chance of explaining their position to the public and the electors, who would have then decided whether this minority had their confidence or not. But no. His Honour the Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Quebec said: "No; I will bring my own friends into power, though they number only 22 or 21 in the House out of 65; I will give them power and patronage, and all the influence that the use of patronage can give them, and office and titles, and the opportunity of electing a majority for themselves, though the present majority in the House is in favour of another Government; I want a Liberal majority in the new House." His Honour had no right to do that, and this was the reason why they said the Lieut.-Governor had violated the principles of our Constitution. When Fox died, what was done? Lord Brougham gave them this example to show what respect they had in England, and what respect we should have for the great principles of Responsible Government:—

"Mr. Fox died on the 13th of September, 1806, there being ample notice of his approaching end for two months before, in consequence of the operation he was obliged to undergo. There was no hurry, neither public nor secret advisers, nor illustrious dukes were taken by surprise. Did His Majesty, then, on the 14th of September, on the death of Mr. Fox, act as his present Majesty on the 14th of November last was advised to do on the death of Earl Spencer? Did those great statesmen who counselled George III.—experienced, sage, eminent and discreet men as they were—so well versed in the theory and practice of the Constitution, so skilled withal in the arts of Cabinet-making,—ever think of advising him, because Mr. Fox was dead, instantly to turn out the Whig Administration? No such thing; no such advice was given: the Ministers were allowed to remain in office till the end of March following; not from any want of inclination to turn them out: on the contrary, there was every inclination, steadily, unremittently, uninterruptedly manifested to employ any opportunity that could be taken advantage of for dismissing them; but they were allowed to remain in office six months longer, because the Constitution would not allow them to be turned out without some assignable cause. Nay, the King even allowed them to dissolve the Parliament after the death of Mr. Fox; although he very plainly must have foreseen that a second dissolution would thus be soon rendered necessary, and he only removed them in March, when the Catholic question occurred to create a disagreement."

So the great principles of the Constitution of England and of our Constitution in this particular were well understood in England and by all their statesmen, and by all those who had made a study of constitutional law. He must say that these great principles must be understood by the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches and the hon. the First Minister, because the hon. gentleman had not had the courage to say that Mr. Letellier was right. If the hon. gentleman had thought that Mr. Letellier was right, he would not hesitate a moment to say so; but, in order that hon. gentlemen might not have to condemn his friends and injure the Joly Government in their elections in the Province of Quebec, the hon. gentleman said he was not there either to defend or condemn the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. This was not conduct worthy of the position of the hon. gentleman. The question of partizanship should not be considered under the circumstances. The great principles of our Constitution should alone be what should be defended, and alone be what should have the attention at the present moment of the hon. gentlemen who sat on the Treasury benches. These hon. gentlemen should say: "Although Mr. Letellier had been a colleague of ours, although he was a Liberal Minister, and although he is a Liberal Lieutenant-Governor, nevertheless he has committed an act which is censurable and which must be condemned and punished, and though he has to be condemned and punished he shall not be allowed to violate the Constitution." The Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec dismissed his Ministers by a letter dated the 1st of March, 1879, the last paragraph of which was as follows:—

MR. LANGEVIN.

"For all these reasons, therefore, the Lieutenant-Governor cannot conclude this memorandum without expressing to the Premier the regret he feels in being no longer able to retain him in his position, contrary to the rights and prerogatives of the Crown."

The Lieutenant-Governor, when he dismissed his Ministers, gave them his reasons in this letter. These reasons were few in number. Some of them were very futile, and all of them had been refuted by his late Ministers; first, by the Hon. Mr. Angers, and subsequently in a letter transmitted to the Governor-General, which was before the House. In this letter the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville defended his position, and showed how His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor was mistaken, to use no stronger word, as to the reasons he gave, not on the 1st of March, 1878, when he dismissed his Ministers, but in another letter which His Honour addressed to the Governor-General, eighteen days afterwards, on the 19th March, 1878. His Honour had recovered his senses a little by this time; he saw the indignation which his rash act had aroused from one end of the country to the other, and that this feeling of indignation was not confined to the Province of Quebec, but extended from one end of the Dominion to the other, being condemned by all who were not blinded by their partizan views. His Honour found that the reasons he gave and laid before the Legislature of the Province of Quebec would not hold water; and, consequently, he had to find new views and new reasons in order to prep up his previous document which he had laid before the public; therefore, on the 19th of March, eighteen days afterwards, His Honour wrote to the Governor-General a letter, in which he gave a number of additional reasons as having determined him to dismiss his Ministers. But all this was an after-thought. No doubt Mr. Joly and his colleagues found that the document by which His Honour had dismissed his Ministers was so weak and feeble that they could not go to the country on the strength of it. They were afraid that this document, coming before this House and before His Excellency the Governor-General, would not allow this Administration to keep Mr. Letellier in office; and, therefore, no doubt, they advised His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to strengthen his position; and one could see, from this fact, that these Ministers said to the Lieutenant-Governor: "Now, Your Honor, do not be uneasy; only give us a little time, and we will arrange matters for you and prepare such a fine legal paper that will strengthen your position and enable you to stand well with the Ministers at Ottawa, so that they will have no reason to condemn you, and that we may have a platform to go upon to the country." This was why this letter of the 19th of March was written to His Excellency the Governor-General. He believed that it was laid before the House on the 26th or 27th of March, and as soon as Mr. DeBoucherville saw it, he addressed to the Governor-General a paper, dated Ottawa, 2nd of April, and in it Mr. DeBoucherville met step by step all the allegations, all the affirmations and all the charges made by the Lieutenant-Governor, or by his advisers for him, but to which His Honour put his signature. This document was rather lengthy, and he (Mr. Langevin) must be excused by the House, if he considered it for a few moments. The first document to be considered was the first letter of Mr. Letellier to his Ministers, dated the 1st of March, in which His Honour re-affirmed and brought against them the charge of overlooking the prerogatives of the Crown. What did His Honour say in his letter? He stated:—

"The Lieutenant-Governor, taking into consideration the communication made to him verbally (on the 27th February) by the Premier, and also taking into consideration the letter which the Premier then gave to him, is prepared to admit that there had been no intention on the part of the Premier to slight the prerogatives of the Crown, and that there was only on his part an error, committed in good faith, in the interpretation that he gave to words used by the Lieutenant-Governor, in the interview which they had on the 19th February instant."

If there was only an error committed by the Government, and if the Lieutenant-Governor looked upon this act as one which could be overlooked, and as he had in reality overlooked it, why should any further notice be taken of it? Continuing on the same subject His Honour stated:—

"With this interpretation and the instructions given in consequence by the Premier to the Hon. Messrs. Angers and Church, these gentlemen did not, wittingly, do anything against the duties of their office."

If an error was committed, surely this error was not such an one as to require the dismissal of the Ministry. Besides, His Honour forgot that he had condoned it; he said that there was no desire, no intention of committing this error. It was committed, but in the same way as that poor word was placed in the infinitive instead of in a tense in another mood. Surely this error was not a crime. But, no; His Honour held to his position and declared that this error, though simply an error, and though he had forgiven it, was a crime; and that for these great crimes and misdemeanors his Ministers must go out of office. Farther on, the Lieutenant Governor made the following complaint:—

"From time to time, since the last Session of the Legislature, the Lieutenant-Governor has drawn the attention of the Premier to several subjects regarding the interests of the Province of Quebec, among others: 1st. The enormous expenditure occasioned by very large subsidies to several railways while the Province was burdened with the construction of the great railway from Quebec to Ottawa, which should take precedence of the others; and this, when the state of our finances obliged us to undertake loans disproportioned to our revenue."

How did Mr. DeBoucherville meet this complaint? He said that those laws respecting these railways were passed by a previous Administration; that he, therefore, was only carrying out measures passed by another Government; that, while he was in office, and since, Mr. Letellier had been Lieutenant-Governor, the DeBoucherville Government had not added one dollar to the expenses of the country with regard to railway construction; and that, therefore, His Honour could not properly bring this forward as an excuse for the dismissal of his Ministers on the ground of their having incurred enormous expenditure, owing to the granting of very large subsidies towards several railways undertaken in the Province, besides the building of the great railway to Ottawa. All these subsidies had been voted by the previous Government and House prior to the appointment of Mr. Letellier as Lieutenant-Governor, and therefore His Honour could not complain of his Ministers in this connection. His Honour had kept them in office for a year and a half, while Lieutenant-Governor and, during that period, he had not complained of this; these laws were passed previous to his appointment, and, therefore, His Honour could not bring them up now against this Ministry. But this was only in keeping with the second complaint of the Lieutenant-Governor. His Honour frequently complained as to the necessity of reducing the expenses, and said that he had directed the attention of his Ministers to the necessity for reducing the expenses of civil government and legislation, without having recourse to new taxes, in order to thus avoid financial embarrassment. The law with respect to the increase of the salaries of the Civil servants was, however, passed two years previously, in 1876; and how could His Honour complain of this when the Government was only carrying a law passed in 1876, in effect, a year before His Honour became Lieutenant-Governor? Were his Ministers not to obey the law? The law was there; it was not devised for the Civil Service alone. It was also made for the masses. It had to be obeyed by the Ministers and by Mr. Letellier himself, no matter how high his position was, because Mr. Letellier must understand that the law was for everybody; and that he could not, though he had tried it, place his personality and power and will, over and above the law of the country. The De Boucherville Government had the right, and they were bound to see that this law was executed, and to use the words of his hon. friend (Mr. Masson), it was none of Mr. Letellier's business, if the Legislature of the Province of Quebec thought proper to give 10, 15, 20, or 50 per cent. more to the Civil servants. This money was not Mr. Letellier's money, it was not the money of the Crown, but the money of the people; and if the people thought proper to vote their money and to give it in this way to the Civil servants of the Crown, the Crown had only to thank the people for their liberality and generosity, and to execute the law that had been passed. If the Crown could set aside the laws passed by both Houses of Parliament, then our Responsible Government and Constitution would come to nothing, because the Crown alone would rule the country. But the old constitutional authorities said that the law was made not only for the Commons, not only for the House of Lords, but the law was made for the Sovereign himself. Queen Victoria, our most gracious Queen, had shown, during her long and glorious reign of over forty years, that she understood the great principles of our Constitution. The will of the people, as expressed by their representatives, had always been respected. Whenever votes of money had been given by the people through Parliament, the Queen had been most thankful to her faithful Commons, and it was left for Mr. Letellier to do other wise, and violate the Constitution of the country.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

THE QUEBEC CRISIS.

Mr. LANGEVIN said before Recess it was his intention to call the attention of the House to the memorandum or letter addressed by Mr. DeBoucher-ville, the late First Minister of the Province of Quebec, to His Excellency the Governor-General, refuting the charges made against him by the Lieutenant-Governor. The first of these charges made by Mr. Letellier in his second memorandum, was as follows:—

“During the Session of 1876, a Bill had been read three times in one of the two branches of the Legislature, and only twice in the other. This Bill, bearing all the certificates which were necessary to induce me to believe that it had been regularly passed and adopted, was submitted to me by the Premier for my sanction. In consequence of being left in ignorance of these facts by my advisers, I sanctioned the Bill. Not long afterwards I was informed of the irregularity, and I immediately spoke of it to the Premier. I made the observation that such an Act would entail too serious consequences to allow of its being passed over. As a favor to him, however, I passed over this instance of irregular legislation, which was then irreparable.<sup>3</sup>

Mr. DeBoucherville answered this charge by stating that the Bill was passed three times in the regular way; but it had been sent to the Lower House or Legislative Assembly, and was passed there twice at the end of the Session. The Clerk marked by mistake on the back of it, that it had been read three times and passed, and it was sent back, amongst other Bills, to the Upper House. Along with others, it was then forwarded to the Lieutenant-Governor and signed. After it had received the Lieutenant-Governor's assent, the Hon. Mr. Angers found that the Bill had only been passed twice in the Lower House, and Mr. DeBoucherville having called the attention of the Lieutenant-Governor to the matter, it was referred to the then Minister of Justice here, the hon. member for North Bruce, with the intention of having the Bill disallowed. The Minister of Justice reported that it was blank paper, and it was not, in consequence, inserted in the Statutes, so that no harm was done. He (Mr. Langevin) must say that this was a very poor charge for Mr. Letellier to bring against his Ministers, and there was no reason why they should have been dismissed on so slight a pretext. He would ask the hon. the First Minister and his colleagues if it would be right for the Governor-General to dismiss his Ministry because a mistake had been made by a clerk without their connivance. So much for the first charge. The second charge was, that, during the same Session, another Bill was submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor for his sanction, and, on examining it, he found there was a blank which had not been filled up. In a letter to the Premier the Lieutenant-Governor pointed out the omission, and also pointed out that a certain word was in the infinitive mood. When this second charge was read by outsiders, what would they think of a Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec who complained that, in a Bill passed by the Legislative Assembly and Council of Quebec, a blank was left, which omission was corrected by another

Bill? Yet, though both these Bills were sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor, he brought forward these charges as an excuse for dismissing his Ministers. If hon. members looked into the Statute-book, they would find that, more than once, Bills passed during a Session have been amended during the same Session. What ground, then, had Mr. Letellier, to dismiss his Ministry? If this House were of opinion that the Lieutenant-Governor had acted rightly, posterity would give a very different verdict. The next charge was with reference to the appointment of a new Municipal Councillor for the South Ward of the village of Montmagny. Now, it appeared that, on a recommendation of the Attorney-General, it was decided to make the appointment. But, what were the facts? A municipal election having been contested, it was decided by the Court of Justice that a new election should take place. A day was fixed, and a gentleman appointed by the Court to preside over the election. As, however, that gentleman afterwards refused to preside, for want of the notices required by law, another person was, by the vote of a meeting, put in his place, and a new Councillor selected. The person originally appointed by the Court to preside over the meeting wrote to the Lieutenant-Governor, stating that the election was null and void, because the formalities required had not been attended to. A report was then prepared by the Attorney-General, and sent to the Lieutenant-Governor, who appointed a Municipal Councillor. After this there was a quarrel in the Municipal Council; and the Lieutenant-Governor becoming alarmed that there would be a breach of the peace, gave instructions that the appointment should be recalled. The Attorney-General was appealed to, and he said the advice he had given should not, in his opinion, be changed, because it was the advice which, under the law, he ought to give. Nevertheless, as the Lieut.-Governor insisted so strongly, the First Minister and his colleagues said "Very well we will give away," and so an Order in Council was passed recalling the appointment. Now, although Mr. Letellier's wishes were acceded to in this matter, he brought forward this charge as a reason for dismissing the Ministry. Was that proper, was that worthy of his position? But still another charge was made against Mr. DeBoucherville. Mr. Letellier said:—

“On the 19th March, 1877, being on the eve of absenting myself for a few days, I wrote to the Hon. Mr. Chapleau, and in a postscript I said: Please oblige me by telling the Premier that if he needs my concurrence, Mr. Gauthier may bring down to me the documents requiring my signature. Mr. DeBoucherville should have understood from that, that if I was ready to give him my concurrence, it was on condition of having all documents submitted to me before signing them.”

Mr. DeBoucherville showed by comparing dates, that this postscript related to the Montmagny election case, and that evidently Mr. Letellier's memory here again was at fault. This charge, therefore, fell through, and disappeared like snow before the rays of the sun. It was not worth mentioning. The fifth charge brought against his advisers was as follows:—

“Under date of the 6th of November last, I addressed to the Honourable M. DeBoucher ville the letter, of which the following is a copy:

“QUEBEC, 6th Nov 1877.

“THE HON. C. B. DEBOUCHERVILLE,

“MY DEAR DEBOUCHERVILLE,—In the last Official Gazette were published, over my signature, two Proclamations which I had not signed.

“One was for the summoning of Parliament, which I reserved in order to confer with you; the other, which I did not even see, appoints a day of Thanksgiving.

“These proceedings, the nature of which I shall not characterize, are productive, apart from their impropriety, of nullities which you will easily understand.”

“Yours very truly

“(Signed) LETELLIER.”

It appeared to him (Mr. Langevin) that the Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Quebec had no legitimate grounds for making this statement. The proclamation summoning the Legislature was not published until the 24th November; the proclamation of the 6th November was purely and simply to prorogue Parliament to another day. This document surely could not have been written by the Lieut.-Governor; it had been written by some one else, and the Lieutenant-Governor, with the greatest confidence, had put his name to it. In it, he accused his advisers of haste, and stated that they called Parliament together for the dispatch of business without his sanction, on the 6th November; but it appeared the proclamation of that date was not calling Parliament together at all; it was the ordinary formal proclamation, and was signed by the Lieutenant-Governor himself. And now about the proclamation for a Thanksgiving Day. The Lieutenant-Governor says that one proclamation was put in without being signed by him, and the other, which he did not even see, appointed a day of Thanksgiving. But Mr. DeBoucherville answered thus:—

“As to the proclamation fixing a day of Thanksgiving I have to remark that this was the result of a communication from the Premier of Canada, the Honourable Alexander Mackenzie, to the Lieutenant-Governor, and handed to me by His Honour with the request that I would carry out the suggestion. It will appear sufficiently strange under these circumstances, that I should be accused of acting without his knowledge, even if the clerical duty of obtaining his signature had been omitted. I am informed, however, that in this case also, the Order in Council, as well as the proclamation, were signed by His Honour, and are of record, bearing his signature, in the office of the proper officer.”

Thus it appeared that the Lieutenant-Governor received a communication from the Government of Canada suggesting a day to be fixed for Thanksgiving Day, and when he read that communication he called in his First Minister and requested him to carry out the suggestion; and yet he said it was done without his consent, while the documents with his actual signature were now in the hands of the proper officer. How was this to be accounted for? The Lieutenant-Governor had evidently forgotten all about this matter, or this document had been drawn up by a stranger, and Mr. Letellier had, with the fullest confidence, put his signature to it. He had no doubt that by this time the Lieutenant-Governor had found out that it would have been better for him to keep his own Cabinet around him, and to be advised by them.

MR. DEVLIN said he was sure the hon. gentleman must be mistaken as to the wisdom of His Honour keeping the old Cabinet.

Mr. LANGEVIN said there was another accusation against Mr. Letellier's Ministers brought forward by the Lieutenant-Governor. Indeed, he did not know where they would find an end of these charges. This was how Mr. Letellier spoke:—

"But my Lord, there is another point still more important, which I cannot any longer refrain from mentioning.

"From the conversation which I have held with Mr. DeBoucherville, there results a fact, which, if it were known, would of itself have sufficiently justified me in believing that he did not possess the confidence of the people of this Province."

Now, what confidence could there be between the Ministers and the Governor, if those conversations between the ruler and his advisers were to be brought before the public in this manner? It had been thought these conversations were privileged and could not be made use of by the Lieutenant-Governor against the Ministers, or by the Ministers against the Lieutenant-Governor. But it was because Mr. Letellier had placed himself in a false position that, after months and months, he must needs bring up these private conversations. Those who held official positions, such as the Minister of Inland Revenue, could best decide whether Mr. Letellier was right in making such conversations public; and if they could be brought up at any time, then there could and would be no such thing as confidence between the Ministry and the Governor. However, Mr. Letellier inferred, from this conversation he had with Mr. DeBoucherville, that Mr. DeBoucherville had not the confidence of the people of the Province. The Legislature was then sitting, both Houses sustained Mr. DeBoucherville's Government, and upon various measures there were majorities of from 15, 18, 20, and 25 out of a House of 65; and yet Mr. Letellier said the Ministry had not the confidence of the country. Even if they had not the confidence of the country, Mr. Letellier had no right to take such a course, he had no right to infringe upon the rights of the people. He (Mr. Langevin) would like to go on with the charges, but he did not wish to fatigue the House. He had shown to the House that Mr. Letellier was amenable to Parliament; that he violated the great principles of our Constitution; that he had trampled on the liberties, the rights and privileges of the people; that the will of the people, as expressed by their representatives in Parliament, had been overlooked and set aside by him. He, therefore, had only now to express his deep and sincere regret that it was a Liberal, a French-Canadian, a Liberal Lieutenant-Governor, who had violated the Constitution that had been given by the Mother Country, and under which we were so proud and happy to live. He for one, belonging to the same race to which Mr. Letellier belonged, must say that it deeply pained him to think that, despite all he could say or do, despite all the motions that might be passed by the House, or this Parliament, the act of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, of that Liberal Lieutenant-Governor, of that French-Canadian Lieutenant-Governor, could not be destroyed. That act must remain on record for all time to come, that violation must remain there, the name of that Lieutenant-Governor must go down in the history of the Province, in the history of this Dominion, accompanied, with what? Mr. Letellier knew the history of the Province of Quebec. He should have remembered the history of its struggles; he should not have forgotten what happened previous to 1837. He knew enough of the history of Lower Canada to remember the venerated names of Papineau, Viger, Nelson, Panet, Bedard, Bourdages, Vallière,—names which were registered in our history with veneration, names which our people never pronounced without the greatest respect. But Mr. Letellier had forgotten all that; he had forgotten that, for forty years, our forefathers had fought against the bureaucracy which had weighed upon them. He had forgotten those troubles, and that those men had refused place, honour and emoluments. Why? In order to stand by the rights, the privileges and the liberties of the people. Mr. Letellier, a French Canadian, one of his (Mr. Langevin's) race, had forgotten the former Governors of the Province of Quebec, under the French and English régimes, and that he was bound, as their successor, not to act as a tyrant, but to take, as many of them had done, the part of the people, and protect the charter of their liberties. He should have remembered that the names of Haldimand and Craig, Governors of Lower Canada, had gone down in history, accompanied with the execration of the people, because they had trampled on their liberties and had tried to destroy the rights and privileges of the people. One of them acted against all law, against the Constitution of the country; he put aside the guarantees the people had for their liberties, and imprisoned some of our best men. He (Mr. Langevin) remembered that one of his ancestors had been imprisoned in one of those dungeons for nearly two years. They had been imprisoned on the pretext of treason, of plotting against the King of England. This happened in 1810; but after the lapse of two years, in 1812, our neighbours across the line were in arms. The Governor then found that his (Mr. Langevin's) ancestor, and the others who had been imprisoned on the ground of treason, were good and loyal men enough to give them guns to fight the battles of our country. They went to the frontier, they defended our country, and they never remembered the harsh, cruel treatment they had received. Mr. Letellier should have remembered these things, and should not have followed the example of Craig and Haldimand, and not have allowed his name to go down to posterity coupled with theirs. Unfortunately, he could not help himself to-day; his name would be coupled with those names, and history would say that in 1878 Lower Canada found another Craig; but that, when the vote of the people was taken on the 1st of May, 1878, they dismissed that Craig, and sent him where Craigs should go. The hon. the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec should have remembered another thing. He should have remembered that, after the union of the Canadas, the patriots of those days, the Lafontaines, the Tachés, the Morins, the Nelsons, the Cartiers, and others, did not hesitate for a moment to say to the Governor, when he would not recognize the great principles of the Constitution, "We leave you our portfolios, take our offices, our emoluments; we go into Opposition, we go again as our forefathers did, to fight the battles of our country, to defend our people's liberties." They were four years in Opposition, after which Lafontaine and Baldwin came into power and governed the country in accordance with the great principles of our Constitution. But between those two periods, the period when our forefathers were fighting, previous to 1837, the battles of our country in the halls of Parliament, and the period when Lafontaine, Morin, Nelson, Cartier, and others, were doing the same in Parliament under the union of the Canadas, another period intervened. Mr. Letellier knew of this period. His respected father had been fighting those battles as well. He should have remembered that his respected father would not have approved of his conduct. But if all that were not enough, the hon. the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec should have remembered that in 1837 and 1838, the blood of eleven of his compatriots, Duquet, Decoigne, Robert, the two Sanguinets, Cardinal, Hamelin, Narbonne, Nicolas, Douais and DeLorimier had been shed on the scaffold for the liberties of their country. They had fought, not against the Queen, but against those men who were trying to crush their liberties, to prevent the large majority of the people from having any share in public affairs. They had fought against that minority which Mr. Letellier had put in office at Quebec, and who wanted to crush the people of that Province. That minority, when in office under those Governors, would not allow the people to have any voice in the affairs of their own country. The supplies were refused, but those men took the people's money without the sanction of a vote from their representatives. The people considered the last resource left them as British subjects, was to fight that minority. Once more, they did not take up arms against our Most Gracious Queen, but they took them against those leeches that were destroying their liberties. He (Mr. Langevin) would quote what one of those men who had perished on the scaffold, DeLorimier, had said previous to his execution. He was sorry he could not quote the words in English. Here was the quotation:—

“ Je meurs sans remords. Je ne désirais que le bien de mon pays dans l'insurrection, et son indépendance; mes vœux et mes actions étaient sincères, n'ont été entachés d'aucuns crimes qui déshonorent l'humanité et qui ne sont que trop communs dans l'effervescence des passions déchainées. Depuis dix-sept ou dix-huit ans, j'ai pris une part active dans presque toutes les mesures populaires, et toujours avec conviction et sincérité. Mes efforts ont été pour l'indépendance de mes compatriotes. Nous avons été malheureux jusqu'à ce jour. La mort a déjà décimé plusieurs de mes collaborateurs. Beaucoup sont dans les fers, un plus grand nombre sur la terre de l'exil, avec leurs propriétés détruites et leurs familles abandonnées—sans ressources—à la rigueur des froids d'un hiver canadien. Malgré tant d'infortunes, mon cœur entretient son courage et des espérances pour l'avenir. Mes amis et mes enfants verront de meilleurs jours; ils seront libres, un pressentiment certain, ma conscience tranquille me l'assure—voilà ce qui me remplit de joie, lorsque tout n'est que désolation et douleur autour de moi. Les plaies de mon pays se cicatriseront; après les malheurs de l'anarchie et d'une révolution sanglante, le paisible canadien verra renaître le bonheur et la liberté sur le St. Laurent. Tout concourt à ce but, les exécutions mêmes. Le sang et les larmes versées sur l'autel de la patrie arrosent aujourd'hui les racines de l'arbre que fera flotter le drapeau marqué des deux étoiles des Canadas.

Mr. Letellier must have forgotten the great labours and sacrifices of these men, their life-blood shed for their country. He should have remembered that that blood which flowed in his veins was the blood of the best men of our Province, men who were recognized, even by Lord Durham, as men who had a just cause and fought for their country. Mr. Letellier had forgotten all that, and his name would not go down to posterity venerated, but would go down attached to this great event, as that of a traitor to his race, a traitor to our liberties, a traitor to our beloved country.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. JETTÉ said that, in rising to offer a few remarks on the resolution now under consideration, he could not fail to remember that the right hon. mover of that resolution had stated that he offered it in no party spirit, and without being moved by party interest. He would, therefore, try not to follow the example of some of the speakers who had preceded him, and discuss this very important question in the spirit in which it had been moved. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Brooks) had said that this question was of special importance to those who, like him, represented in this House the English minority of the Province of Quebec. But it was still more important to those who, like himself (Mr. Jetté), represented the French minority in the Dominion of Canada. The rights of the English minority in Quebec had been protected and assured by the terms of the Constitution. Those guarantees which had been asked by the English-speaking population of the Province of Quebec, had been granted them, not as a favour, but as a right: and, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke had acknowledged, no attempt had ever been made to deprive them of those rights. It was a fact of which French Canadians could be proud—that they had never shown any illiberality towards any other race or creed. In this connection, he might mention that for years past it was a well-established and known fact that members speaking the English language had been frequently returned by French-speaking constituents, without any objection as to their creed or nationality. He believed, therefore, the rights and privileges of the English-speaking minority in Quebec were safe. But the rights and privileges of the French minority in the Dominion, might, by this resolution, be impaired, according to the view taken by the House. Up to the present, the line of argument taken by the right hon. mover of the resolution had been closely followed by all the speakers on the other side. He found no fault with the interpretation given by the right hon. member to our Constitution, because it was well known that when the Constitution was under discussion, he was not in favour of the Federal system, but of a Legislative Union. The remarks he had offered followed in the same strain, and would probably lead to the same result, if adopted, namely, to destroy our Federal Constitution and to substitute a Legislative Union. But if the right hon. member for Kingston was logical in so arguing, he (Mr. Jetté) was surprised to see the hon. members from the Province of Quebec take the same view, and to find that the speeches of all the hon. gentlemen opposite had tended to demonstrate the fact established by the right hon. member for Kingston, that, according to the principles of the British Constitution, the act of Governor Letellier could not be defended; that this House had a right to pass a condemnation on it, and that it was justly called to pass an opinion on and to condemn that act. It had been shown that the British Constitution for centuries past was improving every day; that the rights of the people had been increased and the rights of the Crown diminished, and from this starting point the speakers on the other side of the House had come to the conclusion that Parliament had the same powers as were possessed by the House of Commons in England, and stood in the same position towards the Provinces as the British House of Commons did towards the Colonies. The hon. the Premier had taken exception to that view, and he (Mr. Jetté) believed the exception was well taken. Our Constitution was not that of England; it was a limited Constitution, a written Constitution, contained in the British North America Act, not one that had been created by time and precedents. It was a treaty accepted by the different Provinces that agreed upon it; a treaty which was afterwards confirmed by the British Parliament. It was a limited Constitution and we could not go outside of it, but must accept it as we received it. To well appreciate and understand that Constitution we must carry ourselves back to the time when it was accepted by this country. It would be remembered especially by members of the old Parliament of Canada that in 1865 and for years previous, great difficulties had occurred in the government of the two Provinces of Canada. A great question was discussed, not only in Parliament, but at the polls, namely that of representation by population, which received the approval of the immense majority of the electors in Ontario, while those of Quebec were entirely opposed to the adoption of such a system. About that time the conclusion was arrived at that it was impossible to carry on the government of the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, unless some change should be made in order to meet the existing difficulties, as to continue the existing state of things might prove dangerous. A project was decided upon to avoid those difficulties, and he found it stated in the speech of Sir George Cartier in the Confederation debates. Sir George said:—

"The consequence of representation by population would have been that one territory would have governed another, and this fact would have presented itself Session after Session in the House, and day after day in the public prints. The moment this principle had been conceded as the governing element, it would have initiated between the two Provinces a warfare which would have been unremitting. * * * He did not mean to say that the majority from Upper Canada would have tyrannized over Lower Canada; but the idea that Upper Canada, as a territory, had the preponderance in the Government by a large number of representatives, would have been sufficient to generate that sectional strife to which he had alluded. * * * He took this ground, however, that when justice was done to Upper Canada, it was his duty to see that no injustice was done to Lower Canada. * * * He did not intend to go into the details of the question of Confederation, but merely to bring before the House the most conspicuous arguments in order to induce members to accept the resolutions submitted by the Government. * * * The matter resolved itself into this: either we must obtain British North American Confederation or be absorbed in an American Confederation."

It was therefore decided to adopt a new form of Government, and the present form was adopted, after discussion and differences of opinion between the two hon. gentlemen who were at the head of affairs, the late Sir George Cartier and the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald). The latter was in favour of a Legislative Union. Sir George Cartier was in favour of a Federal system, and the reason was obvious; it was because he understood that the special rights of the French population of Québec would not admit of the adoption of a Legislative Union, and he would not have done his duty towards his co-patriots unless he had secured a Federal system. He said:—

“Under the Federation system, granting to the control of the general Government these large questions of general interest, in which the differences of race or religion had no place, it could not be pretended that the rights of either race or religion could be invaded at all.

The magnitude of the scheme now submitted, perhaps, the reason why those who had not made themselves conversant with the question, felt some apprehension in contemplating it; but when we came to discuss it clause by clause, he would be ready to state that no interest would be harmed in any way if Federation took place.”

Those views were not only held by Sir George Cartier, but were also those of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin). That hon. gentleman had stated at that time:—

“We are considering the establishment of a Confederacy, with a Central Parliament and Local Parliaments. The Central or Federal Parliament will have the control of all measures of a general character, as provided by the Quebec Conference; but all matters of local interest, all that relates to the affairs and rights of the different sections of the Confederacy will be answered for the control of the Local Parliaments. The position in which Confederation will place us is very different from that which we should have occupied under the system proposed by the hon. member, inasmuch as the seventeen members, which Upper Canada will have more than Lower Canada, will have nothing to do with our local affairs, our religious questions or our particular institutions, and the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Dorion), by his scheme, would have entrusted all that to the good will of the Upper Canadian majority; but for my own part, I would rather entrust the management of these matters to my own people than to them.”

Further on the hon. member for Charlevoix, who was then Solicitor-General, stated:—

“Now we have different interests in Lower Canada, in which reside two populations differing in origin, differing in religion and speaking different languages. On the other hand, Upper Canada has a homogenous population, but one professing different religions, and so it is with respect to the several Maritime Provinces.”

And they were told further:—

“You wish to form a new nationality. Let us come to an understanding on this word, Mr. Speaker. What we desire and wish, is to defend the general interests of a great country and of a powerful nation, by means of a central power. On the other hand, we do not wish to do away with our different customs, manners, and laws; on the contrary, those are precisely what we are desirous of protecting in the most complete manner by means of Confederation. Under the new system there will be no more reason than at present to lose our character as French and English, under the pretext that we should all have the same general interests; and our interests in relation to race, religion and nationality, will remain as they are at the present time. But they will be better protected under the proposed system, and that again is one of the strongest reasons in favour of Confederation.”

Those extracts indicated what was the spirit that inspired our public men at the time of the adoption of our present Constitution; it was to protect the different interests of the people that were to be governed by it that the scheme of Confederation was decided upon and that of a Legislative Union was not adopted. It was not necessary to dwell at length upon the different features of a Federal Constitution, and a Legislative Union, to show that the difference between the two systems was so great that really no comparison could be made. All the arguments that had been brought forward were drawn from the principles of the British Constitution, which was not a Federal Constitution. It had been argued that the Dominion Government stood in the same position towards the different provinces as the Parliament of England occupied towards the Colonies; that the relations the Provinces should have with the Federal Parliament and Government were similar in character to those the Colonies should sustain with the Imperial authorities. It was only necessary to mention the fact to show that they were not the same. The relations of the different Provinces towards the Federal Parliament were certainly not those of Colonies towards the Mother Country; the Provinces were not Colonies of the Dominion. As was said when the discussion on Confederation took place, the Federal Constitution was a treaty. It was accepted as a treaty by the four Provinces that at first formed Confederation, as a treaty between the inhabitants of the different Provinces of British North America stipulating on equal terms. And we find this interpretation of the Federal Act in the Press of the time. When the Constitution was under discussion in Quebec, and before it was put into operation, some of the newspapers contained apprehensions of the failure of the Constitution. The Minerve, a newspaper then inspired by one of the fathers of the Confederation scheme, published an article in May, 1876, containing the following:—

“Confederation is not only a solution, but a way to something else. For us it is salvation, it will preserve us from annexation; it is the only way open to us to attain political, commercial and industrial independence.”

Thus it appeared that in the opinion of the editor of that paper, Confederation was a sure way to obtain political independence. Sir George Cartier, in a speech delivered at a banquet tendered to him at Lennoxville in May, 1867, speaking of Confederation, said:

“It is impossible to regulate in advance all the details of so complicated a measure; but we can congratulate ourselves of what it has been possible to achieve. Our Constitution will, no doubt, require amendments, but it will be in the way of extension, and of according new guarantees to rights already existing.”

It appeared from those facts that those who devised the scheme of Confederation which, though not perfect, nevertheless was, perhaps, the best that could be devised, for the people of the different Provinces, felt satisfied that when it was amended and improved it would not tend to restrict the rights of the people, but to extend them. The rights that had been secured were not those of a general character, because they could have been protected as well under a Legislative Union; but the Confederation system was so devised as to secure the rights of the different Provinces, because a Legislative Union would not have given a guarantee to those rights. If the House considered the question under discussion in the light of those principles, hon. members could not accept the numerous precedents that had been cited as furnishing any light on the question under consideration, as those precedents were all furnished by the working of a Constitution entirely different from the one we now have. So they could not decide this matter in accordance with what had been done in England, because there a Constitution different from ours existed. Our Constitution was a written and limited one, as he had stated. It was to be interpreted, it was true, according to the principles which prevailed in England, but we were limited to our Statute, we could not go any further or outside of it; and this was not only his opinion, but that of Sir George Cartier himself. In the debate regarding Confederation, Mr. Cartier, speaking of the Union Act and the Constitution of 1841, which much more closely resembled the British Constitution than did the Confederation Act, stated that the Union Act was our law. In answer to Mr. Dorion, who said that we had the same rights as the Imperial Parliament, Mr. Cartier remarked that Mr. Dorion's observation was absurd, that we had no such rule, that the Union Act was our law and we could not go out of it. Well, if the Union Act of 1871 was to be so interpreted, what interpretation should we give to the Federal Act, so limited and restricted, and much more different from the British Constitution than the Union Act? He (Mr. Jette) maintained that we had to-day to take our Confederation Act, limited as it was; we could not go outside of it; and we had to interpret it in the best possible way. If we had a Federal Union and not a Legislative Union, as was evident, the relations of the different Provinces to the Federal Government must necessarily be different from the relations of a British colony to the Imperial authority, and, these relations being different, the principles to be applied could not be the same. The consequences of these principles could not be the same; and we were not now to regulate ourselves by what had been done in the past, but we had to create a precedent for ourselves. It was the first time that a question like this had been brought before the House, and we had to interpret our Constitution on this point; and he held that we consequently must take good care not to interpret it in such a way as to infringe on the rights and privileges of the Provinces. If they were wise they would try to increase the rights of the Provinces, not to diminish them; and more especially to diminish the rights of the Federal Parliament, because the tendency of the Federal authority would rather be to concentrate than to grant to the Provinces more powers than they now had. To this he looked for the future of the Province of Quebec, for which it was more especially necessary that these principles should be more carefully guarded. For these principles granted to us by the Constitution, were our only guarantee for the future; and if we allowed the Federal Parliament to interfere with our local affairs, and to intervene in matters that we could settle ourselves, this would be a bad precedent, which would be revoked in the future, all of which would do much, probably, to deprive us of the liberties and rights that we ought to enjoy. It had been already stated, and he repeated it, that they had in their own hands, in the Province of Quebec, the remedy for the evil complained of. If, really, an injustice, and a condemnable act had been committed, an appeal had been taken to the people of the Province, who would pass judgment on it in a few days. He would ask the House what, if the judgment of the people was in favour of Mr. Letellier's course, would become of the judgment of this House? Suppose they adopted the motion now before the Chair, and passed condemnation on the conduct of Governor Letellier, what would be the result? They could not restore the De Boucherville Government to power, nor bring back these Ministers to their offices. What then would be the practical result of passing this motion? He could understand, and they would be probably told, that this was within their right, and that even if it was of no effect, they could exercise it; but a right which was of no effect was, in his view, a poor remedy. Unless there was something in the Constitution that would guarantee a result from the exercise of this right, he was not disposed to pass this resolution, the only effect of which would be to prejudge the free judgment of the electors of the Province, and to tell them before-hand that they must do so and so, and, instead of allowing them full power and liberty to say and do what they pleased. It had been said by the previous speaker (Mr. Langevin) that he was defending the rights and the liberties of the people, and that Governor Letellier had committed an act which would be a stain on his memory.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. JETTÉ.

MR. JETTÉ said he was very much surprised to hear such strong language, when, in reality, the question which was to be decided was not, properly speaking, within the jurisdiction of this House, but, in the first instance, within the jurisdiction of the electors of the Province of Quebec. He could very well understand that if, after the elections had taken place, Governor Letellier would persist in refusing to restore to power the DeBoucherville Government, if the result of the elections—which he did not believe—was against the Joly Administration, and against maintaining the latter in power, then, and then only, resort could, perhaps, be had to the Federal Government acting in the limits of its responsibility to this House. But, before resorting to this Federal intervention, let the people of the Province of Quebec apply the remedy that, by the Constitution, they had in their own hands. Their judgment would be rendered in a few days; the question was now before them, and he (Mr. Jetté) was sure that they would not be deterred from the great questions at issue by the petty objections presented and discussed by some of the previous speakers. They would stand by Governor Letellier because they would see in him the protector of their rights; they would understand that it was to protect the people that he stood between them and his ex-Ministers, to stop them from imposing on the Province the most unjust and tyrannical legislation. He was certain that, at the polls, the majority would be in favour of the new Ministry, because the electors, in passing their judgment, would not fail to consider, above all, the two great questions, upon which, in reality, the resignation of the DeBoucherville Government had been brought about—the railway and the tax legislation. If the electors sustained the Joly Government, the act of the Lieutenant-Governor would be approved and sanctioned, and no other authority could prevail after the judgment of the great jury of the nation had been pronounced. Taking this view of the Constitution, and arguing that it was a limited one, although it was to be interpreted according to British principles, as far as possible, he held that in our Constitution there was no distinct stipulation that they could bring this matter before Parliament at the present moment, and under these circumstances. This Parliament had no authority to pass a resolution the effect of which would only be to pre-judge the opinions of the people of the Province solely interested in the question. Moreover, he considered that it would be most unwise for them to say to the electors of Quebec that Governor Letellier was wrong, when, in a fortnight, the electors might answer that Governor Letellier was right, and they entirely approved of what he had done. For these reasons, and in order to protest against any encroachment of the Federal authority on the rights and privileges guaranteed to the Provinces by our Federal Constitution, he would vote against the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston.

MR. DEVLIN said, as he understood it, this was a very simple question. The Lieutenant-Governor thought proper, for reasons which he considered sufficient, to dispense with the services of his Ministers, and the Ministers, feeling that he ought not to have dispensed with their advice and services, had appealed to the Governor-General. The question was taken up here because the Provincial Ministry was dismissed, and the right hon. member for Kingston had brought forth a motion to the effect that the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was unwise and subversive of the position of his advisers. It was evident that the mover of the resolution desired to evade the responsibility of bringing nakedly before the House this question, and he (Mr. Devlin) held that it was the duty of the House to stamp out every effort to deceive the people, and he unhesitatingly declared that the right hon. gentleman who made this motion was afraid to commit his reputation to a statement that the act of the Lieutenant-Governor was unconstitutional. The motion did not state under what circumstances that action was unwise. Giving the motion the most favourable interpretation, it simply amounted to this: that the Lieutenant-Governor had committed an error of judgment.

If the Opposition were anxious to test this question as it ought to be tested from their point of view, why did not they move a motion condemnatory of the action of His Honour? Now he (Mr. Devlin) believed the Lieutenant-Governor had an unquestionable right to dismiss his Ministry when circumstances justified such a course. The right hon. member for Kingston laid down the principle that no Governor or Queen could dismiss a Ministry so long as they commanded a majority of the people's representatives. But where, he asked, would be the freedom or liberties of the people if this doctrine were to obtain? The effect of the hon. gentleman's argument would be that in the case of destructive measures being introduced, measures which might impair the efficiency of the public service or the liberties of the people, the Sovereign or Governor would not have the power to express disapproval of such acts by dismissing the Ministry. How was it the hon. gentleman, in the course of his able speech, did not quote the pamphlet of Mr. Todd? Simply because that gentleman, who was an acknowledged authority on constitutional questions, had expressed an independent opinion on this important subject. According to Mr. Todd, it was plain that the Governor-General could dismiss his Ministry when he differed in opinion from them, and that the Lieutenant-Governors were vested with a similar power. As to the constitutional difficulty in Nova Scotia in 1860, when a similar question was in dispute, he considered that the position the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) took on that occasion prevented him from openly and publicly expressing his dissent from the opinions yesterday enunciated by the leader of the Opposition. The then Cabinet of Nova Scotia, of which the member for Cumberland was one, censured the Lieutenant-Governor and resigned because His Honour would not grant a dissolution. He also cited two recent cases in New Brunswick in which the Lieutenant-Governor dismissed his Ministers after they had refused to accept his advice in regard to legislation, and his conduct was sustained by the Imperial Government. He read from an article in the Dominion Monthly, in which the writer, after citing a number of precedents in justification of the course of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, said that the notion that a Sovereign could not dismiss his Ministers was one of the wildest hallucinations that had ever haunted the brain of a political enthusiast. Referring then to the course of Opposition members in regard to the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, he said that he pitied the small minds who were incapable of appreciating the statesmanship of Mr. Letellier. He sympathised thoroughly with that honourable and high-minded gentleman, and he hoped the day would soon come, if Toryism was to exist longer, when the Province of Quebec would produce a race of just such statesmen. Hon. gentlemen opposite had spoken of Her Majesty's representative in the Province of Quebec as if he were a foul and dishonoured traitor. This was their language in speaking of the man who had been chosen as her representative by the Sovereign to whom they professed such undying allegiance. This was the way they showed their love for and loyalty to Queen Victoria by traducing her representative. But it was now as it had always been. When the Crown acted in opposition to Tory interests, Toryism was ever ready to trample on the Crown and slander its representatives. Toryism had burned the Parliament buildings; Toryism had stoned Lord Elgin on the public streets, and whenever or wherever the authority of the Crown was exercised in such a way as to militate against the interests of Toryism, Toryism rose then and there in all its wickedness, forgot all its professions of loyalty, and abused the representative of loyalty. The House had had lectures on loyalty—save the mark—from hon. gentlemen opposite. The House had been told that the Liberals of Quebec were Communists, that they were annexationists. Did these hon. gentlemen forget the proclamation of 1849? But this mode of attack was played out. It no longer produced the effects that it did in years gone by. The Liberals of Quebec were able to stand up in this House to-day, and to point to their record and show that they had been true to their religion, true to their principles, true to their Queen. The cry of Communism and Annexation was an old game, but it was one that could be played no longer. The Liberal policy had now been before the people for many years, the people knew its record, and it was for them to say whether they were Communists or Annexationists. He alluded, then, more particularly to recent political events in the Province of Quebec, and said that, day after day, the late Ministry was pushing the country nearer and nearer to insolvency, until at last they had not a dollar in the treasury. The day they were dismissed they had not a dollar in the treasury. True, as the hon. gentleman said, they had a majority in the House, a majority of twenty, a large majority, and that accounted for the depletion of the treasury. They boasted of their majority, and it was a majority that would have stuck to them for ever. There were powerful reasons why that majority should stick to their banner. In fact, there were about 32,000 reasons why they should stick to their banner. Mr. Letellier was a French Canadian and an honour to his race, and, though he (Mr. Devlin) was an Irishman, he felt it his duty to defend Mr. Letellier against—he was ashamed to say—the assaults of his (Mr. Letellier's) own countrymen. When the country was on the verge of bankruptcy, Mr. Letellier had said to his Ministers in regard to the Railway Bill: "You are passing an Act, the object of which is to destroy the liberties of the people over whom I preside. By making this measure law the people of Quebec will no longer be able to claim the protection of the judiciary of the Province. You are shutting the doors of the Courts against them." The truth was, that Messrs. DeBoucherville, Angers, and a few of their friends, had constituted themselves the sole tribunal to which the people of Quebec would be able to appeal. He referred also to the character of the Taxation Bill, and traced out the details of the relation existing between the DeBoucherville Government and Mr. Letellier, to show how the former had actually overridden the authority of the Lieutenant-

MR. DEVLIN.

Governor, and asked if His Honour was not justified in saying: "The hour has come when I must exercise, in Her Majesty's name, and for the protection of the people, the royal power she has conferred upon me. The time has come when I must arrest you in your mad career, and the only way in which I can do that is to say to you: you no longer command my confidence." Would any lover of fair play or justice say that Mr. Letellier had not done his duty? The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had said of his fellow-countryman, Mr. Letellier, that he had betrayed the people, that his name would go down to posterity a dishonored one. He (Mr. Devlin) knew the reason for this strong language. The House knew the reason. An election was going on in the Province of Quebec, and these hon. gentlemen did not care a straw about the constitutional question, but had made their speeches simply with a view to the effect they would have upon the electors of Quebec when they came to read them. He would, however, give the hon. member for Charlevoix one word of consolation before he left the subject, and that was that the latest news received in Ottawa was that Mr. Joly's Government would come in with at least a majority of twenty. Perhaps the right hon. member for Kingston would undertake to frame another resolution dealing with this new phase of the constitutional question. He then referred to that portion of Mr. Letellier's statement in which allusion was made to the prevalence of "rings" and "combinations" in regard to railway legislation, and asked if that was not another good reason why His Honour should stop his Ministry in their mad career. But perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite would say that they did not believe the Lieutenant-Governor. The majority of this House, every man who was not influenced by the consideration of the local elections, would believe the Lieutenant-Governor. The majority of the people of Quebec believed the Lieutenant-Governor. Mr. Letellier had not dissolved the House until he had a Ministry who declared themselves ready to assume responsibility for his acts. He (Mr. Devlin) knew Mr. Letellier, and the people of Quebec knew him, and the slanders and abuse of the Opposition would not detract an iota from the respect in which they held him. He (Mr. Devlin) believed him to be the right man in the right place; he believed that it required a strong hand to stay the progress of Tory corruption, and that Mr. Letellier had done his duty and nothing but his duty. He had checked the career of his late advisers at the right time, and under such circumstances his conduct would receive the favourable judgment of this country and every other country where the matter was made the subject of discussion.

Mr. PALMER said he was not disposed to let this important question go to a division without offering some observations on the important matters involved in it. Coming from another Province, he was completely disinterested with regard to the several constitutional questions concerned; but he did not propose to discuss at any great length the different points in dispute, which were purely local. He intended to offer a few observations upon the different questions involved without offering any opinion with reference to the disputes themselves. This was a question which, they must all admit, was new in Canada. He was rather surprised at the first proposition of the hon. the First Minister that this House had no right to pass judgment upon the Governor of the Province of Quebec. If this were true, and if this was not the proper form in which to discuss this question—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say so.

Mr. PALMER said, then he entirely misunderstood the hon. gentleman. If the hon. gentleman said that this House had a right to do so still, many of the hon. gentleman's friends would assert the contrary proposition. Certainly, many of the hon. gentleman's followers, and his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, had entirely taken that ground. Before entering into this matter, perhaps it was his duty to notice the point raised by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Jetté) that, inasmuch as the Constitution under which we lived was granted to us by an Act of Parliament, and as it was a Federal Constitution, the precedents and authority of the English Constitution did not govern us at all. If this were so, certainly they stood there in a very different position from what anyone in this country had ever suspected, and it was as well for this Parliament, at the outset of our career, to settle, once for all, whether this country was governed by the principles of the British Constitution or not. If it were true, that English precedent had no place in this Parliament, and if the Government of Canada was not to be carried on in pursuance of British precedent, then the sooner that this Parliament discovered and settled it the better. He thought that his hon. friend was entirely in error. It was quite true that we had a Confederation, and that, as we now stood, the country was governed by virtue of the British North America Act; but he thought that this Act not only did not take away the Constitution which we before had, but that it guaranteed and settled what this Constitution was; and he believed that he would be able to show the House from the Act itself, and from the Constitution as it stood before, that his hon. friend was entirely in error as regarded that proposition; and that Canada and the Federal Government of Canada must be governed, with reference to the subjects which the Federal Parliament had jurisdiction over, entirely by the principles of the British Constitution. He, of course, reserved in this relation, matters of Imperial interest, and matters reserved to the Home Government and the Imperial power; but with reference to every function which the Government was capable of and had the power of at all exercising, he contended and insisted that it was the right of Canadians to have the full and free exercise of that Constitution in complete harmony with the British Constitution as exercised in England. His hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Brooks) had given a long and most interesting history of the concession of Responsible Government to this country. He did not propose to follow the hon. gentleman at all, for two reasons: first, he thought this would be entirely unnecessary, for he considered that the British North American Act, if Responsible Government had never existed in this country at all before, was a free grant of it. Of course, he agreed with the hon. gentleman, that this Act did not grant to this country Responsible Government, neither did the Great Charter in England grant to the English people anything that the English people had not before. At the same time it secured to our ancestors that which their Saxon forefathers had had from the foundation of their power. It was simply keeping secure the principles that had always existed among the free English people, and so he took it that Responsible Government, as conceded to the colonies, was not a new grant in any regard. It was the right of the British people settled in this country to have the free Government that they brought with them from the Mother Country. The struggle to sustain it and secure it was simply made against a usurpation by an oligarchy or other authorities, self-constituted in most cases in this country, which attempted to usurp and take from the people their constitutional rights and liberties. As a lawyer, he would contend that so far from the contention of his hon. friend from Montreal East being correct, he thought that by the terms of that Act itself, he could prove to this House that the pretention of the hon. gentleman was an utter fallacy. He would refer hon. members to the preamble of the Act. Of course, hon. members would understand him to say that he did not at all impugn the force or authority of this Act. If new powers were necessary to be granted, they might be granted by this Act, and if anything could be done as to taking away or altering the condition of things by that Act, of course it could be done, but in construing this Act, he thought they had a right to look at the state of the law at the time it was passed, and at the condition of this country at that time, and at the Government of this country, and exactly how it was then carried on, and they had also a right to look at the words of the Act itself. First they were to regard the preamble which Lord Coke said was the key by which to find the mind of the Legislature that passed it. What did it say? This—“Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion, under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar to that of the United Kingdom.” He also referred his hon. friend to the Act of Parliament which told them that this country had a Constitution similar to that of the United Kingdom; and yet the hon. gentleman wanted them to declare that they were not to be governed by the precedents of the Constitution of the United Kingdom at all; and that in point of fact, we had not a Constitution similar to that of the United Kingdom but a Confederated Constitution, which was something very distinct and different from it, and we were governed by entirely different principles; and therefore that no comparison could be drawn from these precedents at all. As he had already said, if we never had Responsible Government in this country and had been a Crown Colony, and if every right we have had as Englishmen was taken away from us, and we were reduced to the condition of serfs, the moment that the British North America Act was passed, it would have conferred on this country all the rights and all the privileges of a Constitution similar to that of the United Kingdom; and by consequence, it would be exercised in the same way, except so far as this was restrained by the provisions of the Act itself. Therefore, he thought that no man in this country would pretend to say that the argument of his hon. friend from Montreal East had any possible weight or course, this was a Confederated Parliament, at this time of day in this country. Of course, this was a Confederated Parliament, and a Confederated Government. He held, with the hon. gentleman, that it was of the utmost importance, not only that we should take care that the proper working of the Constitution in all its bearings was carried out, but also that neither one nor the other infringed in the slightest degree upon the powers that were exclusively within the other. And now when this difficulty had first arisen, it was of the most paramount importance to the people of this country that there should be a right interpretation secured of the distinct powers conferred, and as to what was to be done under the circumstances. Was it to be, that there would be persons in office in this country for the exercise of whose functions nobody was responsible, or was it, as he contended, that some person was responsible for the act of every person who undertook to administer either the law or any office which was necessary in order to carry out the executive Government of the country. He was pained to think that it should be for a moment disputed that some person should not be responsible for the act of a Lieutenant-Governor of a Province, because, if what was contended for on the other side were true,—that the action of a Lieutenant-Governor could not be called in question in this Parliament, and by the Government that appointed him, he could not see, for the life of him, who was to call such Lieutenant-Governor to account. Such officer would then, certainly, have the power to do an immense amount of mischief in this country. He had heard, almost with pain, the suggestion of his hon. friend from Montreal Centre, who held that the Governor, when he saw the representatives of the people about to destroy the liberties of the people, should be able to strike and strike quickly; and who boasted that some party—a party which his hon. friend from Montreal East designated as a minority—had been able to strike down some injustice which would have otherwise been inflicted upon the country. Had it come to this that the Governor of a colony was to be a judge over the representatives of the people, and was to decide where they were destroying the liberties of the people, and to say when these representatives were to be struck down? It did appear to him that all idea of the principle of Constitutional Government was then gone, when he heard his hon. friend from Montreal Centre boasting, in the most eloquent terms, that this Lieutenant-Governor was just the man they wanted, and just the man for a coup d'état, and just the man to strike down the representatives of the people, at the time he, in his judgment, said they were overburdening the people with debt, and destroying the liberties of the people. What did all this mean? It meant that this power was safer in the hands of an irresponsible Governor than in those of the representatives of the people themselves. Surely he had not heard aright; surely his hon. friend did not contend here, on the floor of Parliament, for the judgment of the Lieutenant-Governor against the judgment of the representatives of the people. Pursuing the argument and putting it upon logical grounds, of course the next enquiry was what were the class of officers under the British North America Act who were appointed Lieut.-Governors? He contended that a Lieut.-Governor under this Act was an Executive Officer of the General Government; and that his functions were identical with the functions—and in this he agreed with his hon. friend from Montreal East—of the Lieut.-Governors that were appointed by the Home Government. His view of the functions of the Lieut.-Governor was that he was not in the same position as the Queen herself. He admitted that the Lieut.-Governor exercised certain functions in the name of the Queen, and so did numbers of other officers of hers. His hon. friend the Premier was annoyed at his calling the Lieut.-Governor an employé of this Government. Well, that view was strictly correct, but he would express himself in a different form. He held that the doctrine of the personification of the Sovereign did not apply to the Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Quebec. The rule in England with reference to the Sovereign was that she could do no wrong, but surely that doctrine could not apply to the Lieut.-Governor. That point, which was strictly a point of law, was raised in the court with reference to whether the Queen could be sued. We all knew that that doctrine was raised in many cases with reference to the Lieut.-Governors in the colonies, and with the indulgence of the House he would cite a case which must be an authority, because it was a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which was the ultimate Court of appeal from this country. Lord Brougham, in his decision in the case of Hill v. Bigge, said:—

MR. PALMER.

“The reference to analogies, or the supporter of inconvenient consequences, must be much more pregnant than any that can be urged in this case, to support or even to countenance such a claim. If it be said that the Governor of a Colony is quasi Sovereign, the answer is, that he does not ever represent the Sovereign generally, having only the functions delegated to him by the terms of his commission, and being only the officer to exercise the specific powers with which that commission clothes him. ‘The Governor’ (said Lord Chief Justice De Grey, in Fabrigas vs. Mostyn, when that case was before the Common Pleas, which afterwards came by error into B.R.) ‘is the King’s servant, his commission is from him, and he is to execute the powers he is invested with under that commission; which is to execute the laws of Minorca, under such instructions as the King shall make in Council.’ ”

The point he made in reference to that was this: If we looked at the British North America Act we found that the proposition laid down by his hon. friend from East Montreal was entirely correct, and that these Lieutenant-Governors within the powers assigned under the British North America Act, were exactly on the same footing as the former ones were. The case he had cited showed that Lieutenant-Governors were appointed by the Government, and did not represent the Queen at all, but simply the law by a commission. In the British North America Act, Section 58, we found:—

“For each Province there shall be an officer, styled the Lieutenant-Governor, appointed by the Governor General in Council, by Instrument, under the Great Seal of Canada.”

Now, he appealed to every hon. member of the House who knew anything of the working of the Constitution, whether that was not the exact position of every employé of this Government except the Judges. Certain duties were assigned to the Lieutenant-Governor by law, and did it not follow that the Government that appointed him could also cause his removal and were responsible for his acts? Were they not bound, as the Imperial Government were bound, to have a supervision over him, to see that he administered the law, to see that he rightly exercised the prerogative which, by the appointment, was put in his hands? If, therefore, the Lieutenant-Governor did not properly exercise the functions committed to him, was it not necessary for them to do that which was needful in order properly to carry out the working of the Constitution? He was not now speaking with regard to whether the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec did his duty or not; he was dealing entirely with the question whether he was responsible to the House and to the Government. He was dealing with a question of great magnitude, one involving a question which, if tolerated, would be destructive of the liberties of the people. Local Governments would now be overturned, turmoil and disaster would be introduced throughout the length and breadth of the land if this principle, fraught with evil to the people of this country, was endorsed. He understood the position on the other side was that neither the Government nor the House had any right to call Mr. Letellier to account for his acts, that they had no right of supervision over him. Now, he certainly held that the question of whether the policy of Mr. Letellier was a correct one or not was a matter with which the House had no business to deal, and admitted that it must be entirely disposed of by the people of Quebec; all this Parliament had to do in the matter was to see that the election was not held there by the will of one man in an improper manner. The question whether the Lieutenant-Governor fairly held the scales, and the question whether the matter had been fairly dealt with on its merits were entirely different ones. The hon. member for Montreal Centre had no business to discuss whether the policy pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor was for the interest of Quebec or not; that was a matter beyond the powers of this Parliament to deal with. This Parliament had only to consider whether, as an officer of the Government, he had acted constitutionally or not. He would now pass on to one or two matters connected with the cases referred to by his hon. friend from Montreal Centre. Mr. Tupper, who was then in the Ministry, was an adviser of Lord Mulgrave, but the latter did not take his advice. There was no pretence that he was at liberty to go against the advice of his constitutional advisers. But it was quite probable that Mr. Tupper pressed it too far, and there was an election. It was true that after the election Mr. Tupper said some members were returned falsely, but what had that to do with the case before the House? Another case he referred to, was the New Brunswick affair, in regard to which no less than four members of this House signed their names to a petition against the Lieutenant-Governor. Now, if he could show that a number of the members of this House, notably the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, put his name to a petition to the Queen, complaining of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, then, I apprehend, he should show that it would be right to complain in this case. It was one of the most important privileges of this, and every other free country, to be governed in a constitutional manner; it was the right of these Provinces to conduct and manage their own affairs, so long as in so doing they did not interfere with the general policy of the Empire. This was held by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his friends. He did not intend to enter into a discussion of that dispute, he merely put it forward to show the principle laid down by them, and to argue that what was right for New Brunswick, in such a case must be right for Quebec. The case put forward by his hon. friend the Member for Kingston, was very mild in comparison with the charge made against Governor Gordon. They asked the people whether they wanted confederation or not, and said that the Lieutenant-Governor should be brought to account for having violated the first principle of the Constitution. Now, they said that the Lieutenant-Governor had a perfect right to dismiss his Ministers at any time. He (Mr. Palmer), contended that the country never could be governed if that doctrine was to be carried out in this House. He appealed to the Liberal party of this House, and more particularly the Liberals of Quebec, to vote against so unreasonable a proposition. The hon. Members for Montreal East and Montreal Centre, had put forward the still more extraordinary doctrine, that this House had no right to discuss the question. He thought the people of this country would hold the Government strictly to account for the conduct of officers appointed by it.

The resolution now before the House might justly have been much stronger in its terms, but its object was not to excite hostility against the Lieutenant-Governor, but to obtain the expression of the House, with regard to the wisdom and constitutionality of his conduct. He thought it was important that the House should carefully guard every constitutional principle, and trusted they would adopt the resolution.

MR. BABY said that, of course, this was a very important question, not only to the Province of Quebec, but to the whole of the Dominion. Now, he contended that Mr. Letellier was appointed here, and this Government was therefore, responsible for him and his deeds. Surely, notwithstanding the argument of the hon. Member for Montreal East, they had a right to censure the Lieutenant-Governor, and to dismiss him, if had taken upon himself to throw aside the Constitution and to trample upon the rights of the people. The hon. member for Montreal East had said that our Constitution was not framed on the English Constitution, but was a treaty between the different Provinces, which had entered Confederation and that treaty was written. Now, by the principle of the British North America Act, it would be seen that his hon. friend erred in his pretensions, for it was therein specially said that the Act should be interpreted in the sense of the British Constitution. The resolution before the House had been narrowly criticised, but he did not think it could be construed in any way as an intrusion upon the rights of the people of Quebec, as had been contended by Mr. Jetté. In that resolution complaint was made that the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had violated the principles of Responsible Government as laid down, not only by books, but by many living and reliable authorities, as so ably shown by the right hon. member for Kingston, in his remarkable speech on the question. The constitutional rights of the people were becoming more and more defined, and it had been shown that, although the Sovereign possessed certain powers which were made the basis of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, those powers had never been exercised for a number of years, and no Sovereign would now dare to exercise them. The cases of two Lieutenant-Governors, one of New Brunswick and the other of Nova Scotia, had been cited by the Liberal Party, but two blacks did not make a white, and because nothing was done in those cases, that fact was no reason why no action should be taken in the case of Mr. Letellier, when all precedents were against his conduct. The hon. member for Montreal Centre, had called them (the Quebec Conservatives) weak, poor-minded men, and the words had been received with cheers and derisive laughter by a number of hon. members behind him. He (Mr. Baby) was not at all surprised to hear the cheers and laughter, because they came from men of the same high order of mind as the member for Montreal Centre. So was it when the hon. gentleman's countrymen lost their political rights, when the Irish Party voted its own death, they greeted with cheers and derisive laughter, those who denounced that thrice unpatriotic action. No doubt there were "Devlins" in those days, as in ours, who said: "You gentlemen are weak-minded men, and have not our strength of brain, because we see no cession of the rights of the Irish race in our action. That was about the reasoning of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin), who, though a Catholic Liberal, and as such should always be prepared to defend the rights of the people, had called hon. members on the Opposition side of the House weak-minded men because they disapproved of the action of Mr. Letellier. The hon. member for Montreal Centre declared that the Lieutenant-Governor had done right by casting aside, by his tyrannical will, the wish of the people as expressed by the majority of the Legislature, and had said that his name would go down to posterity and would be upheld as a kind of demigod. He (Mr. Baby) was glad he was not a high and strong-minded man of the stamp of the hon. member for Montreal Centre. No, the hon. member for Montreal Centre was not actuated by patriotic motives when he thus took the part of the Lieutenant

MR. PALMER.

Governor, and he had let out the word of the situation when he had said that His Honour was the "right man in the right place," meaning evidently that, by his coup d'état, he had prepared and paved the way for the Liberals in the Province of Quebec, at the general elections for the House of Commons. The Conservative Party had been told that they could not understand the question, because they did not know what were the principles of Responsible Government, that they ignored Responsible Government, that they had no traditions, and were to a certain extent considered as political pariahs, who knew not what they desired or could obtain. That declaration was made by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. Of course, the hon. member had traditions, and they extended into the far distant past. He (Mr. Baby) would show the House what was the political creed of that hon. gentleman and his followers, what it had been in the past and what was proposed as the political creed for the future. Let hon. members consider the facts, and they would perceive which was the political party that had some knowledge of Responsible Government and British political institutions. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue belonged to the Liberal party. That party was organized in 1848 to combat the parties who had established Responsible Government in the Province of Quebec, the late Judge Lafontaine, and the late Robert Baldwin, who were then young men full of patriotism, vigour and good intentions. The Liberal or Rouge party was, indeed, founded to oppose Lafontaine, the idea being to inculcate Radical ideas setting aside Responsible Government altogether. The views thus enunciated were very well known to every student of political history; he would state what they were, and the House would then be able to judge whether they had been repudiated by the Liberal party or not. The programme included amongst other things universal suffrage, "annexation to the United States," and abolition of pensions. Among that so called glorious phalanx were Sir A. A. Dorion, the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Laflamme), Mr. Wilfred Dorion, Mr.

Joseph Doutre, Mr. Charles Laberge, the late Mr. Papineau, and a number of others, and perhaps the hon. member for St. Johns, though he hardly believed that the hon. gentleman entered into all those erratic ideas. In every respect they were an obstacle to the carrying out of Responsible Government. Their ideas were that those who had fought to obtain Constitutional Government and who had obtained that boon from the Imperial Government were traitors to their country, with being the humble servants of England, and desirous of carrying out the British Constitution instead of that of the United States. He was glad to say that the bulk of the people did not accept those erratic ideas, and that the good sense of the French and English population of Quebec rose far above such opinions, and the Liberal Conservative party triumphed by the good sense of Lafontaine and his patriotic followers. In 1854, seeing that those ideas were not implanting themselves on the minds of the people, the Rouge party came forward with another programme, the first plank of which was the "abolition of Responsible Government," and yet hon. gentlemen opposite declared the Conservatives knew nothing as to what Responsible Government was, and were not in a position to discuss the question. They, the Conservatives, had however, carried on Responsible Government up to 1854 on a true political and constitutional basis; and yet the first plank in the Liberal platform was the abolition of that system, and giving to Canada republican institutions. The other planks of the platform included the election of members to the House of Commons every two years, reduction of the Governor-General's salary to $40,000, reduction in all Departments of the public service, special laws respecting the formation of companies which intended to build railways, abolition of pensions, and, finally, annexation to the United States. The Liberals thus understood the principles of Responsible Government. Whether the Conservatives understood the true principles of Responsible Government or not, they understood what was in the interests of the people, and, in the present instance, they clearly saw that those interests were, that the people should have a voice in the Legislature of the Province, and that such voice should not be disregarded by the Lieutenant-Governor. He (Mr. Baby) was somewhat surprised at the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, but it was well known that when the hon. gentleman entered the second phase of his political life, he published to his countrymen a kind of manifesto. The hon. Minister, in a speech, in which he invited the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec to accept him as their leader said :

"There were at this time (1848) a number of young men of great talent and of still greater impetuosity of character. Disappointed in being too late to risk their lives in the war of 1837, they rushed blindly into the political movement of the day. They were the foremost supporters of Mr. Lafontaine in his glorious struggle with Lord Metcalf. They afterwards abandoned him for the more advanced policy of Mr. Papineau, and, while they followed him, as it was quite natural they should do, they had soon outstripped him. Emboldened by their success, and carried away by their own enthusiasm, they established a paper, L'Avenir, in which they assumed the position of reformers and regenerators of their country. Not satisfied with attacking the political state of things, they audaciously fell upon social institutions. They started a programme, which contained not less than twenty-one articles, commencing by the election of Justices of the Peace, and ending with annexation to the United States, and which meant nothing less than totally revolutionizing this Province. If it had been possible by a wave of a wand that the twenty-one articles of this programme could have been realized in the course of a night, the country could not in the morning have been recognizable. Any one having left it the day before, and returning the next morning, would have been completely bewildered."

Now, here was his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, who severely condemned his colleague the hon. Minister of Justice, who, the other day only, said that he did not, or had ever belonged to the "National Party," but had always been a member of the old Liberal party, and, therefore, was the very embodiment of all the glorious political principles promulgated to the world by the celebrated programmes of 1848 and 1854. On the other hand, here was also, from the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue himself, the proof, the undeniable proof, that the Conservatives had carried out the principles of Responsible Government in Canada, and had never entertained the erratic ideas of annexation and Republican institutions for Canada, to which the Liberals of Quebec still adhered, as of old. The hon. member for Quebec East said annexation was an old issue, dead and buried. Not later than 1872 or 1873 he (Mr. Baby), however, had listened to a lecture, largely attended, given in Montreal by a very worthy Senator, one of the foremost gentlemen among the Liberal Party, on annexation, on which, he said, depended the salvation of the country. The traditions of the Liberal Party on this score are still followed. Yes, be it said to their honour, if the Province of Quebec to-day possessed a Responsible Government, it was not due to the Liberal Party, but to the Liberal-Conservative Party, which had kept the traditions and followed in the footsteps of Lafontaine, Morin, Taché, Cartier, and the others who had fought for the principle of Responsible Government. On the contrary, annexation had always been a plank in the platform of Lower Canadian Liberals. The very Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had uttered the reasonable sentiment that he was in favour of annexation, when at Kamouraska in 1873, and it was, therefore, not surprising that he should now trample on our Constitution, so as to render it odious to the people, and try, thereby, to get them to look to the other side of the line for the protection of their political rights. But he will be happily frustrated in his designs, by the good sense of the people of the Province of Quebec, as were the Liberals in 1848 and 1854. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue nor the members of the party, did not try to condone the act of Mr. Letellier, but by side issues, by special pleading, they tried to waive the effect on the people. It was left to the hon. member for Montreal Centre, to whom he would revert again for a few minutes, to stand up alone and defend the Lieutenant-Governor. He (Mr. Baby) would not go over all the reasons urged by the hon. member for Montreal Centre in his defence, but he would only say that had his honor, Mr. Letellier, been a Conservative, he would condemn him in the same language in which he condemned him to-day, because the interests of the country must rise far above party spirit. Here was a precedent set by a Liberal of the Province of Quebec, and which, from what he could judge, would be approved by hon. gentlemen on the other side. The hon. member for Montreal Centre had invoked precedents laid down in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as above stated. Well, the same question might come up again, only the rolls might be changed, and here would be a precedent, which the Liberals would not be able to disallow. Certainly there should be such a vote on this subject as would say to this man: "You have not done your duty; you knew what your duty was; it was shown to you by the Constitution, and indicated to you by your predecessors, and by the Government, even from whom you hold your commission." He was sorry to say that the Liberals of this country, of whom they might have expected better things, to judge from their professions, were exactly what the Liberals were in other countries. Yes, Liberals were everywhere the same. When in Opposition there was no limit to their cries for liberty; but when in office there were no greater tyrants. Now, the Opposition had been accused of disloyalty, and that, most extraordinarily by the Liberals. But no; they had always respected the rights of the Crown as well as that of the people. They were called the Tory Party; and the Liberal Party was held up as the embodiment of purity, and of everything that was good for the people and as respecting the rights of the people. Suppose, for argument sake, it was true that the Conservatives did not desire to do anything for the good of the people, then the Liberals should not conform their acts to those of the Conservatives; the former should have a policy of their own, and in accordance with the principles they had laid down and exhibited to the world. But no, this was not the policy of the Liberal Party. They were no greater tyrants than the Liberals when they were in power. The hon. member for Montreal Centre had reproached the Opposition with disloyalty to the Queen, and the hon. gentleman said that the hon. member for Charlevoix had cast aspersions on the character and head of the Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Quebec. Was he then not right in saying that when these gentlemen were in power they said things which they would never otherwise utter, and when in power they disguised and sugar-coated—if he might employ that expression—their principles. The Government, on the day after the 13th of August, stated:—

"Le coup d'état dont Ottawa a été hier le théâtre nous reporte aux plus mauvais jours de notre histoire, et Lord Dufferin, jusqu'ici si populaire, vient d'inscrire son nom à la suite de ceux de nos anciens gouverneurs LES PLUS EXÉCRÉS. Ce qui ajoute encore à l'indignation soulevée contre lui, quoiqu'il ne soit en cette circonstance que le SERVILE INSTRUMENT DU GOUVERNEMENT IMPÉRIAL, c'est le ton HYPOCRITE du discours qu'il a prononcé à Halifax et qui avait fait un instant illusion sur ses intentions. Il prononçait une parole qui aurait dû s'arrêter sur ses lèvres, lorsque dans ce discours, il s'écriait que son seul guide était le Parlement. Ce Parlement réuni pour procéder à une enquête impérieusement réclamée par la conscience publique, qu'en fait-il? Il le baffoue, il lui interdit de délibérer, et il le renvoie sans vouloir l'entendre.

"Était-ce bien la peine de revenir exprès d'Halifax pour infliger à la représentation du pays solennellement convoquée cette grossière insulte? Lord Dufferin aurait aussi bien fait d'y rester à tourner le madrigal et à conter fleurette aux oisifs que d'aller à Ottawa donner le démenti à ses propres paroles. Ce qu'on avait pris pour de l'empressement à remplir son devoir, n'était que du zèle à servir ses ministres. Il se hâtait d'accourir pour leur obéir, pour les couvrir.

"Eh bien! puisqu'il le veut; puisqu'il préfère au respect d'un peuple libre l'accolade d'hommes qui renoncent à revendiquer leur honneur outragé; puisqu'il abdique le rôle d'un arbitre impartial n'écouant que la voix du Parlement, pour se faire le serviteur docile de ministres prévaricateurs, et qu'il n'est qu'un LAQUAIS PORTANT LA LIVRÉE IMPÉRIALE: qu'il reçoive donc sa part du MÉpris public et qu'il tombe au rang de ceux qu'il protège contre la justice populaire. .... Tandis que les représentants du peuple délibèrent, il ose se présenter sur le seuil, non pas tout à fait comme Louis XIV en habit de chasse et le fouet à la main, mais en costume officiel et de l'air d'un VALET qui exécute une consigne! N'hésitons pas à le dire: le peuple se serait fait alors justice à lui-même que l'on aurait pu déplorer sa colère, mais NON CONTESTER SON DROIT.

"Que l'on fouille notre histoire, et que l'on y recherche la trace des actes de tyrannie qui ont rempli tant de pages de nos annales; on n'en trouvera aucun de plus odieux que celui dont nous sommes les témoins indignés. Jamais le droit du Parlement n'a été violé d'une façon plus flagrante; jamais l'intervention de l'autorité impériale dans nos affaires n'a été plus directe ni plus VIOLENTE. On met de côté le Parlement, on dédaigne l'opinion publique, on nous impose un gouvernement dont nous ne voulons plus et qu'une majorité des députés repousse."

These were the very gentlemen who said that the members of the Opposition were disloyal, because they stated that Governor Letellier had acted unconstitutionally in summarily dismissing his Ministers. When Lord Dufferin, the Governor General, was acting in the plenitude of his rights, and doing what he should have done, constitutionally speaking, in retaining his Ministers in office because they had a majority in the House, there were no expressions too strong that could be used against His Excellency, who, they represented, had thus violated the constitution, and set aside all the rights and trampled upon the liberties of the people. What, then, could they believe as to the political perfections of these hon. gentlemen? Neither they nor the country could have any confidence whatever in these hon. gentlemen. He did not intend to weary the House, but it was his duty to rise in his place as a French Canadian, and as the member of a large community in the Province of Quebec, and to protest most emphatically against this act of the Lieut.-Governor in the Province of Quebec, and to say that the people would not stand it, nor allow any man, no matter how high he might be in the political hierarchy, to trample upon their rights. Gov. Letellier, on the most flimsy of motives, had set aside and dismissed his Ministers. What kind of arguments did his honor employ? Arguments that no reasonable man or any man of the least intelligence, and much less a statesman, could admit as being reasonable. His Honour was certainly justified in sending about his Ministers. The hon. member for Montreal Centre must know that the principle laid down by the ex-Ministers, in regard to the collection of the municipal subscription, was not a new one, and not at all odious. It was to be found in the Revised Statutes of 1867. He knew right well if a person was illegally seized, he could always have recourse to another tribunal. The collection of our municipal and school taxes were based, to a certain extent, on that principle, which appears so odious to the hon. member. Besides, an Act had been passed by the Legislature of Ontario on the very same principle, and about the same subject, without creating any alarm in the Province, but the municipalities were not prevented thereby, if they so desired, from taking out a legal process in order to have a case decided before the Courts. The hon. gentleman must know this, because he had a high legal standing at the Bar, though he seemed to be blinded by his political partizanship. The arguments made use of by the other side, were evidently only thrown out as a kind of electoral dodge. Had the Lieutenant-Governor been the man he was supposed to be, had he been a man possessed of high constitutional attainment, which he was presumed to have, he would not have acted as a schemer or trickster. He would have held a high and honoured position in the Province of Quebec, whereas now, his memory would be execrated, even by his friends. He would be treated as a man who respected not principle, but was influenced solely by political partizanship. Most emphatically must it be stated that the act which Mr. Letellier committed was one unpatriotic and unconstitutional—one, also, which would cover his name with infamy, politically speaking.

MR. LAFLAMME said he did not, at that late hour of the night, intend to take up much time, but would merely answer a few observations made by the hon. member for Terrebonne, and the hon. member for Charlevoix. Well, once for all, he felt he must answer the miserable, insignificant accusations made against him by those gentlemen. He had heard these accusations put forward seriously and bombastically, but had not before thought they were worth answering. A great deal had been said about a certain programme laid down by a certain newspaper. Now, what he would ask had that programme to do with the Liberal party. The fact was this: In 1848, twelve boys, the oldest of them not being over twenty years of age, subscribed a few shillings to start a newspaper of a quarto size. He was one of these editors, and with the others sent his contribution. This was the paper, however, to which these hon. gentlemen must resort, in order to stigmatize the Liberal party, pretending that the doctrines enunciated by these twelve boys were the gospel of the Liberal party. These boys were attached to the Liberal party, of which they were members, and out of their zeal sought to introduce some new ideas in that paper of theirs. When, therefore, it was represented that these programmes emanated from the Liberal party it was done for the purpose of scaring the intelligent electors. Hon. gentlemen opposite tried to make out that the Liberal party formerly sought to bring about a revolution, by pointing to the writing of these twelve boys. He hoped the House would never hear any more of this; it was certainly a miserable thing for leaders of the Conservative party to argue that the Liberals, in their programme, had formerly insisted on a severance from England. The articles in the newspaper referred to were written at a time when the leaders favoured such a severance, because they feared that, by the change in the English tariff, they would suffer pecuniarily. These young men had no such mercenary motives; they saw a grand vista opening, and they laid down this programme in their paper. In 1854 another programme was laid down. By that time every one of these boys had become young men and were occupying respectable positions. Now, he (Mr. Laflamme) never wrote a word about annexation, except when a youth of about twenty years of age. He was one of the secretaries of the Annexation Association when the Hon. John Ross was one of its vice-presidents. He did not want to be held responsible for the nonsense that appeared in every newspaper in the country. If he took the trouble to go over the Nouveau Monde for the last ten years, he should be able to make the Conservatives responsible for many things. But it was like a play to witness what they had seen that evening,—to have seen the emotion, the enthusiasm, the zeal, the patriotism and the frenzy which had inspired hon. gentlemen of the Opposition with regard to the violation of the Constitution, because the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had acted properly, under a principle which was admitted to be one of the principles of the British Constitution, in dismissing his Ministry. He would not take up the time of the House by going through the history of that party; but when he heard gentlemen speaking as Conservatives, and as protectors of the liberties of the people, he thought it was well to call attention to a few of the principles which had been advocated by that hybrid party. It was from the day that those who claimed to maintain the true principles of the Liberal school, who pretended to be the inheritors of the doctrines of the old Reformers, the true Reformers, seceded from the new compound of conservatism and liberalism, and it was in order to have some accusation to make against the Liberal Party, to terrify those who were attached to the British Constitution, that they were accused of being annexationists. There was no man in the Dominion who was a more thorough and a more sincere admirer of the British Constitution than the liberal French Canadian of Quebec, or who understands it better. Had he time, he could show where destructiveness, not only of the British Constitution but of all liberty was lurking and actually at work during the past ten years in the Province of Quebec, but he would avail himself of an opportunity afterwards.

MR. CAMERON said he had listened attentively to what had been said by hon. gentlemen opposite and had failed to hear any one of them answer the argument, advanced by the right hon. member for Kingston. He had expected when the hon. the First Minister stood up to address the House, to hear a discussion of the subject, an explanation of his reasons for dissenting from the views of the right hon. member. Instead of that his whole speech consisted of this one argument, that in his opinion it was inexpedient that an opinion should now be expressed on the subject. He conceded the absolute right of this House to discuss the subject in every point; he admitted the position which the hon. mover of the resolution had taken that it was within the functions to censure the Lieut.-Governor of any Province if he had violated the Constitution or set aside the propriety which ought to govern his action in dealing with his Ministers, but concluded by saying that it was inexpedient to enter on any such discussion. What was this House to do? Could that be a correct principle that this House of Commons had a right to discuss the subject and had no right to express an opinion on it. That was what the argument of the First Minister amounted to. He said practically: say what you like upon it, discuss the constitutional question but do not express an opinion by passing this resolution, because the question is under the consideration of the people and will be decided at the approaching elections in Quebec. If the Lieutenant-Governors have any responsibilities to this House, it must be within the power of the House to discuss the manner in which they have discharged their duties, whether the question be under consideration of another tribunal or not. Had this House or had it, not the right to discuss the grounds on which the Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Quebec had dismissed his Ministers, the reason which he had assigned in his memorandum to the Governor-General, or his course of action on an important subject? If they had, then they had also the right to express an opinion. But, however, put it on a different ground. The hon. the First Minister had said it would be an interference with those principles of Responsible Government if they ventured to express an opinion on a subject which the electors had now before them. He (Mr. Cameron) did not see that it followed at all, that because the electors of the Province of Quebec had now before them the condemnation or justification of the Joly Ministry, this House had not the right to pronounce an approval or condemnation of Mr. Letellier's course. The two things were entirely different. Mr. Joly might be sustained or condemned at the polls, for reasons which would have no influence whatever on the question, as to whether Mr. Letellier's action was justifiable or unjustifiable, wise or unwise. The people of Quebec had before them the policy propounded by the Joly Government. It was true the Joly Government had taken upon themselves, as they were bound to do, the responsibilities of the course taken by Mr. Letellier in dismissing his former Ministers. They had boldly accepted that responsibility; no thanks to them; they could do nothing else, according to the first principles of Constitutional Government. It would be a violation of the elementary principle of our Constitution to say that the succeeding Ministry was not answerable for all that the Governor had done, which had led to their formation. No principle was more plainly laid down than that, but Mr. Joly had accepted a far greater responsibility, and had appealed to the electors of Quebec on far different grounds. Mr. Joly did not say: "Vote for us because the Lieutenant-Governor was right in dismissing the DeBoucherville Ministry, but vote for us because the policy we propose is a better one than theirs; we are going to pursue a policy of economy, to have no taxes on the various proceedings of a commercial character, to adopt a certain policy with regard to the railway question, to introduce reforms of various kinds; for all these reasons it is desirable you should support us." Was it not possible the elector might say, when considering the propriety of voting for a particular candidate, "Although I condemn the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, yet I think the policy of the Joly Government is so superior to that of the DeBoucherville Ministry, I will vote for their candidate." If that were possible, nothing else was required to show the two questions were entirely different. While this House might and ought to condemn the Lieutenant-Governor if it considered his reasons unfounded, it did not follow that the fact that the Joly Government might hereafter be sustained at the polls, would be a justification of his course. If that were the case, surely this House was not limited to an important conclusion as to whether Letellier was right or wrong, and not follow that up by a formal expression of its opinion. The argument of the hon. the First Minister seemed to him to sum itself up in that single position. Surely that was a concession of the whole argument, and the House was brought to the consideration of the question whether the dismissal of his Ministry by Mr. Letellier was wise or unwise, and whether the circumstances of that dismissal were of such an extreme character that it was proper that the censure of Parliament should be expressed against him. With the single exception of the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) no hon. member had attempted to sustain the propriety of the course of the Lieutenant-Governor. That hon. gentleman had attempted to defend the Lieutenant-Governor's action on constitutional grounds. It was not contended that the Lieutenant-Governor did not possess the right to dismiss his Ministers, and, therefore, the question to be decided was as to whether Mr. Letellier was justified in the action he had taken. It was impossible for hon. members to peruse the documents that had been submitted to the House, and then deliberately declare that the Lieutenant-Governor, under the circumstances of the case, was in any sense justified in the course he pursued. The Lieutenant-Governor in the summary of his argument as to his action submitted to the Governor-General, justified it on three grounds: 1st, that his conduct was constitutional; 2nd, that the conduct of the Ministry endangered the prerogative of the Crown; and 3rd, that it also endangered the most important interests of the people. That his conduct was constitutional, it was highly necessary to discuss. While it was admitted that under the Constitution Mr. Letellier had the constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers, it did not follow that his conduct was right, and that he had exercised his constitutional functions in a proper manner, which was the question under discussion. Mr. Letellier referred to the prerogative of the Governor. If he could show that by the course of the Ministry the prerogative of the Crown had been in any way interfered with, then he, the representative of the Crown, in the qualified sense in which he was the representative, could call the Ministers to account, and, if it was necessary, dismiss them. His Honour, however, conceded that position when he stated that he was satisfied that his late advisers had no intention to disregard the prerogative of the Crown. Mr. Letellier had also charged his Ministry with having invaded important interests of the people. He (Mr. Cameron) was not, however, prepared to accede to the position that Lieutenant-Governors of Provinces were, in an especial manner, the guardians of the interests of the people when the Ministry was sustained by two-thirds of the representatives of the people in each branch of the Legislature. No paragraph in the Confederation Act, and nothing in the Governor's instructions gave Mr. Letellier the power to summarily dismiss his Ministers under such circumstances. It had been urged by the hon. the Premier that Lieutenant-Governors possessed exactly the same powers as the Governor General and as the Crown in regard to those matters. He (Mr. Cameron) did not concede that position, and Mr. Todd, in his brochure which he had recently published, expressed a different view.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where?

MR. CAMERON said that on page 27 there was the following:—

"Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies (Earl Carnarvon) in a despatch to Lord Dufferin, the Governor-General, dated 7th January, 1875, observes, that these officers, 'However important, locally, their functions may be, are a part of the Colonial Administrative Staff, and are more immediately responsible to the Governor-General in Council. They do not hold Commissions from the Crown, and neither in power or privilege resemble those Governors, or even Lieutenant-Governors, of Colonies to whom, after special consideration of their personal fitness, the Queen, under the Great Seal of Her own hand and signet, delegates portions of Her prerogatives, and issues Her own Instructions.'"

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman give that as Mr. Todd's opinion?

MR. CAMERON said he granted he had been misled in saying that this was Mr. Todd's opinion, but it was that of a far higher authority, namely, that of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Secretary of State does not pretend to be an authority on such questions.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He is an authority in England on those points.

MR. CAMERON said it was quite immaterial whether Mr. Todd approved that opinion or not, because it was maintained by a higher authority. And then the hon. the First Minister tried to belittle this discussion and this matter, and he said that this was only the case of a Lieut.-Governor removing the Ministry and appointing another. He (Mr. Cameron) should like to know whether there could be a more important exercise of the functions of a Governor or a Lieut.-Governor than the removal of one Minister and the appointment of another. There was no doubt that Lieutenant-Governors had certain powers; but, if it was boldly asserted that they had the same powers, which meant as extensive and as large powers in every respect, as the Sovereign or the Governor-General, he dissented from that position, and said that Mr. Todd did not take it; and, if he understood the First Minister aright, he stated the proposition in a much larger sense and in larger terms than Mr. Todd stated it, and certainly in terms quite contradictory to those stated in Lord Carnarvon's despatch. When the hon. the Minister of Public Works rose, he was speaking of the manner in which the hon. gentleman had treated this matter as one of little moment. He had asked the House if they had had, during the whole progress of this Session—he certainly, speaking from his own recollection, could say that, during the short time he had had the honour of being a member of this House, they had not had—a discussion of a more grave character, or of more importance to the interests of the country, than the present one; or which involved the good government of the country in a more important degree, or upon which the future of Canada and the proper working of our Confederation system more completely and entirely depended. Moreover, was it of such little importance that a Ministry should be dismissed, or that a Ministry should be appointed? Would the hon. gentlemen opposite think it of little importance if His Excellency the Governor-General some fine day, if he did not agree with some of their measures, should summarily dismiss them; or would the country at large think it little matter, or would the large majority of hon. gentlemen opposite who sustained the Ministry and who occupied the Government benches, think it was a little matter and one undeserving the attention of Parliament, if His Excellency should be advised, or think fit in his own discretion, summarily to dismiss them because he thought that they were not governing the country, and not proposing measures to Parliament, in the interests of the public. With respect to that subject, and the view which the party of which the hon. the First Minister was a member held, he would refer to the words of the leading organ of that party. Perhaps the hon. member for North York, would be able, if he addressed the House on this subject, to show whether there was any distinction between the position of facts at that time in Ontario, and those now existing in Quebec. The Reform Press characterised in bitter terms what certainly was an Act in no degree approaching in enormity of power and in its unjustifiable character as to the exercise of power in the then Province of Canada, compared to that which the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec had recently exercised. All that Sir Edmund Head, did on that occasion was to refuse to notify Mr. Brown, when he assumed the task of forming a Ministry, that if he advised a dissolution he (Sir Edmund Head), would consider it on its merits, but would not pledge himself before hand to dissolve Parliament. Mr. Brown did form a Ministry and did advise dissolution, but Sir Edmund Head declined to accede to this request for reasons which he had stated in a memorandum at the time; and because he did so, and would not dissolve a House which had voted want of confidence in the previous Ministry a few days before by an overwhelming majority, and because he refused to give to a Ministry which was evidently not possessed of the confidence of Parliament, and which was in a large minority in the House—a dissolution, and that of a Parliament but recently elected, he was stigmatised in severe language; and the people of Canada were told that we were in days worse than the worst of the days of the Stuarts, and subject to one man power and one man government; that the Ministers and members of Parliament might as well be abolished, and that we had come to those days in which we had the single man dictating to the people what the government of the country should be; and, in fact, carrying on single man power and single man government. He would like to know whether a Lieut.-Governor was to be invested with the power of saying whether measures which two-thirds of the representatives of the people in both Houses had passed, and had in their wisdom said were necessary for the good Government of the country, should be allowed or not; and of not only expressing, but also acting upon a different opinion, and of saying: "I won't have these measures, although an overwhelming majority of my Parliament says that they are right and proper." What else was this but one man power? Was it ever intended that the Lieut.-Governor, under our constitutional system, should be vested with such power? Certainly it was not; and if the hon. the First Minister went through the Province of Ontario and tried to convince his Reform followers there, that in sustaining Mr. Letellier in his action in the Province of Quebec, he (Mr. Mackenzie) was adopting a course in accordance with Reform principles, or in accordance with what the Reformers and every intelligent man in Ontario believed to be the proper system of good Government, he would utterly fail in convincing them of this; and they might depend upon it that when this question came to be discussed before the people of Ontario, as soon would be the case, there would be an unmistakable expression of opinion from one end of the country to the other, that the action of the Lieutenant Governor was unjustifiable; and if the House sustained it by a vote that night, such action by this House would not be carrying out legitimately and properly those principles of Responsible Government by which they believed they were governed and on which they wished and intended to be governed. They had no idea of submitting to the power of any Lieutenant-Governor, or of investing him with the absolute right to say that, "Although the Parliament of the country thought that one particular course was right, or that one particular measure was proper, because he thought different, I will have none of it, and if you do not agree with me, I will dismiss you and send you about your business, and I will go on and try Parliament after Parliament and dissolve the House again and again." Because if the Lieutenant-Governor could do it once, when a large majority supported the Government of the day, he could do it again and try with all the assistance of the Executive to cabal, and to go on as apparently they had been going on in the Province of Quebec, in order to get a Parliament elected with the undue exercise of the Executive power to favour the views of the Lieutenant-Governor. Under such circumstances he held that the whole Dominion would rise in rebellion rather than submit to such an exercise of tyrannical and over-ruling power. In reference to this matter he would like to know why hon. gentlemen opposite had not adopted the position which, when the matter was first before the public it was conceded by their leading organ it was necessary they should adopt. In an article published in that paper it was said:—

"But any point may be constitutional and yet wrong in itself. Lieut.-Governor Letellier may have had a clear right to dismiss his Ministers and yet his doing so might have been thoroughly unjustifiable, and it seems to us this is the vital issue of the controversy."

And yet this was the issue hon. gentlemen opposite wished to evade now. Why did the hon. member for South Bruce take so little interest in this debate seeing he had been able to write such an exhaustive production on the subject as he did in his memorandum to the Colonial Office two years ago? Why had not he risen in his place and justified the course which the Lieut.-Governor had pursued, if it was capable of being justified? Why had his hon. friend from Chateauguay, a great authority on constitutional questions, remained so silent. The hon. member for Montreal Centre certainly, though an Irishman, rose in his place and pronounced a tribute of praise in favour of Lieut.-Governor Letellier. He had done what hon. gentlemen of French extraction on the other side of the House had failed in doing. The whole secret why the action of Mr. Letellier was so satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite was that he had endeavoured to get rid of Toryism in Quebec with a high hand. If time allowed, he would have liked to go through some of the cases which his hon. friend from Montreal Centre had referred to and show his errors in statement. For instance the hon. gentleman stated with reference to the New Brunswick case that Mr. Sutton required his Government to repeal the Prohibition Act and that because they refused to do so he dismissed them. Now what Mr. Manners Sutton required his Government to do was nothing of the kind. What he required them to do was to dissolve Parliament, or rather, he recommended them to concur in dissolving Parliament, in order that an appeal might be made to the people, inasmuch as he believed—and subsequent events showed he was right—that in carrying out the Prohibition Act, they were going against the wishes of the people. He desired a constitutional course; the Government dissented from it; then they retired and held office till he formed a new Ministry. He took the responsibility of dissolving Parliament, and appealing to the people, and he was sustained in every step he had taken by a vote of 32 to 9. His hon. friend also referred to Lord Palmerston's case, and the complaint of the Queen as to his violation of those rules under which the intercourse of the Sovereign and Minister should be carried on. But the hon. gentleman, in quoting that case, also mis-stated the facts. If he (Mr. Cameron) recollected rightly, the complaint of Her Majesty was that Lord Palmerston had indicated to the French ambassador as a conclusion, that the Government had decided upon a certain course of action, upon which she had not been consulted, and upon which the Ministry, as a whole, had pronounced no opinion. Lord Palmerston then stated that he had only been expressing, informally, his own individual opinion, and not stating the conclusions of the Government. The subject under discussion was too long a one to be entered into at the present. It had been dealt with to some extent by his hon. friend from Sherbrooke, particularly with regard to two measures of a public character, which the Lieutenant-Governor disapproved of—the Railroad Act and the Stamp Act. The chief complaint seemed to be that Mr. DeBoucherville stated, in reference to the Railway Act, that the Legislature was controlled by rings. That statement was not sufficient, however, because rings existed and would exist in Parliament, yet it might not be a coerced Parliament. The other complaint, in reference to the conduct of certain financial matters was rather a complaint against the mode than the principle. Then with regard to his statement that all legislation was manifestly amenable to his authority, he (Mr. Cameron) did not think that could be sustained. Of course there were certain acts which must obtain his assent, and he had a right to be consulted as to the general policy of the Government, but to say every act must come before him would be to say what was manifestly unwarrantable by authority. The whole of the complaints, therefore, were of a flimsy character, and no hon. gentleman had attempted to defend them upon their merits. He contended that the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor were open to the criticism of this House, and that in the exercise of their duty they should pass a vote of censure upon him, if he was found deserving of censure.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he should be ashamed to occupy, at this late hour, much of the time of the House, but there were some points in this discussion it might be convenient to briefly consider. They had been told by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A Macdonald) that the relations of a Lieutenant-Governor of this Parliament were similar to those of the Governor-General to the Parliament of England; but there was a wide difference. Suppose the Parliament of England sent out a Governor to one of the Colonies and a similar difficulty to the present one arose, the members of that Parliament were far removed from the politics of the Colony, and the tribunal before which the difficulty would be considered, would be a non-partisan tribunal—where nothing was known of the politics of the Colony and where the alleged offence was committed, and where the adjudication would be above partisan views. But, he asked the hon. member for Kingston, the hon. members for Terrebonne, Charlevoix and North Victoria, and others, whether it was possible to conceive the discussion of such a question being carried on here with the same impartiality and absence of party feeling, as would characterise an inquiry by the Imperial Parliament into the conduct of a Colonial Governor. This was, at all events, sufficient evidence to prove the impossibility of making Parliament the tribunal for the trial of the offence, if offence were committed. He (Mr. Huntington) had taken the occasion to state his belief, when the right hon. member for Kingston had introduced his motion, that it was not entirely in accordance with constitutional views, and that it would develop into a partizan discussion. He would say for the benefit of those who chose to listen to him, for the people of Quebec, that during the elections which were to take place in Quebec during the next three weeks, there would not be an assembly in a single parish where the speeches made by those for or against the action of the Lieutenant-Governor would relate, in a more intense degree, to the local politics of the Government, than those pronounced here. They had an exhibition ground made in this House pending the elections in the neighbouring Province, which was intended not alone to vindicate the views of this Parliament on the constitutional question, but to afford pabulum to the speakers in the meetings which were to take place during the next three weeks, at Quebec. There would not be in the whole Province of Quebec, so able, so fervid, so partizan a speech against the Lieutenant-Governor, as that pronounced by the hon. member for Terrebonne, and he might include the others who followed him. In the exercise of that right which they admitted to exist, they found themselves holding a Quebec political meeting in which hon. members were charged with the duty of discussing the constitutional question, but in which they were, in fact, pronouncing political speeches to influence the elections about to open in that Province. This was to be inferred from the fact that there was, he would not call it an indecent, but an inconvenient haste in seizing upon the opportunity of discussing this question now, in order to disturb the minds of the people to whom it had been relegated, at all events, in a constitutional way, whether an unwise one or not. This Parliament, which found this Conservative Party with an interest only in the great political issue, could have afforded to wait until the opportunity had been given the people to decide upon their own affairs. And if this House passed to-night this motion, and if, according to current rumors which the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) had shown to be correct, Joly would be supported and maintained during the coming election, in what position would this Parliament stand did it declare his action to have been unconstitutional? In what position would the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) stand if, when he went before his constituents, they demanded of him why he interfered with the question pending before this House, and he undertook to tell them that he had taken right constitutional ground, after having dealt, not only with the Constitution question, but having denounced with a denunciation which he (Mr. Huntington) would not characterize, the Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Quebec as if he meant something more than partizanship? The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had stated that the Lieut.-Governor was a violent, bitter partizan. Was Mr. Letellier more violent and partizan than most men in public life? Did the hon. member for Charlevoix, who had fought the Lieut.-Governor throughout a long political career, hold that he was above partizanship and had not taken an opportunity to stab his old adversary on this high Constitutional question which the people of Quebec had been promised yesterday, would be only a Constitutional and not a partizan vote. The efforts of the hon. gentleman to-night, which had been a failure, to start up the worst possible considerations among the people of the Province of Quebec, in a histrionic, dramatic and tragic manner which he had never, perhaps, attempted before, was an evidence of the deep study which the hon. gentleman had gone through when he had prepared himself to pronounce a speech which he expected would be read and repeated in every parish in the Province. It would not be dignified for this Parliament to enter upon that struggle. If he (Mr. Huntington) were to propose a resolution it would be that it was unwise at this time to interfere in this matter and bring on a discussion which was not intended to have any effect but that of influencing the local elections of Quebec. The hon. member's speech was one which might have been pronounced in some rear parish. The responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor's action had been taken by his Ministers, and had gone to the people for a verdict, and it was only fair they should exercise this right. The hon. member for Montreal East had sounded the warning truly, that this disposition of the Parliament to interfere was a danger to the liberty of the Local Legislature, to its existence, and to its entity. They had no right to interfere with the local elections, and it was indecent and improper that they should undertake at all to interfere in the sense claimed by the Opposition.

MR. PLUMB quoted copiously from eminent authorities in support of his view that the Lieutenant-Governor had exceeded his constitutional functions.

MR. McDUGALL (Three Rivers), said that he wished to express his opinions with regard to the great constitutional question which was then before the House, which was of extreme importance, and which interested the Province of Quebec in particular. It was the duty of Lower Canadians to do so on this occasion. Very elaborate speeches had been delivered by hon. gentlemen sitting on that side of the House on this subject, which, by them, had been treated in an extraordinarily able manner, but less ably by the leaders of the hon. gentlemen opposite. He did not attach the same importance to the latter as he did to the former speeches. The address of the right hon. member for Kingston was a chef d'œuvre in every respect; and he had proved that a Governor or a Lieutenant-Governor had not the right at the present time to dismiss the Ministers under these circumstances. The right hon. gentleman had treated the constitutional question in every possible light. At the present time, under the working of the English Constitution, it was not possible even for the Queen to dismiss her Ministers, unless for reasons of an extraordinarily grave nature, and for causes which intimately affected the very existence of the State itself. In a recent case which happened at the Cape of Good Hope, where the Colony was menaced with an attack from the natives, a grave reason of State existed for such interference, as the interests of the Empire were there concerned. But what interests were at stake in the present instance? None at all in reality. The complaints of the Lieutenant-Governor were puerile, childish, and quite insufficient to justify his conduct. Since 1831, the power of the Crown had disappeared to a certain point. Nevertheless it could not be forgotten that the Crown had certain power at the present time; but the monarch had no right to dissolve the House or dismiss his Ministers, and to arrogate to himself purely and simply the power of the people. Power rested under our present system of Government with the people; this was an undoubted fact. It was necessary that some rules should exist for the guidance of the exercise of this power, which was regulated here by Parliament to begin with. In England this was done by the House of Commons and the House of Lords; and in all cases, the power was always placed with the people. Unless the people were consulted in the exercise of authority, this power was exercised in an arbitrary manner, and a manner contrary to all constitutional ideas and to our system of Government. This was undoubtedly the fact. If, in England, at the present time, the Sovereign committed such an act as Mr. Letellier had been guilty of, he would most certainly disappear from the scene. The Queen had perhaps a right to dismiss her Ministers in theory, but in practice, she could not do it without running the risk of losing her head, or without endangering her throne. No King or Queen in England would dare to dismiss her Ministers without incurring the danger of being dethroned, and destroyed. Let them apply this principle to our system of Government. A great error had been committed in forming this Confederation and our constitutional system. He was not an admirer of the working of this system of Government, though the fault of its origination might fall upon his political friends as well as upon his political opponents. He considered that this was an extremely hard system. It was conceived at a moment when political ideas as to Confederation were deranged by the American war. The impression was then formed that the American system was then defective, because the sovereign power was vested with the Local Governments, and the power of the Federal Government was limited to certain provisions inserted in the Constitution. The founders of our Constitution believed that they were much cleverer than other people; and that they had prepared a system which was superior to the American system. The consequence of this was that the supreme power was placed in the hands of the Central and Federal Governments, while the powers of the Local Governments were well defined. A very grave error had been committed in placing the supreme power with the Federal Government, and this was the cause of the danger in which they today found themselves. This Government was given absolute control over the Local Governments in such a way that all local legislation was capable of being submitted to the approbation and sanction of the Federal Government. What were the consequences of this state of things? The Federal Government, whatever it might be, or the Governor in Council, which always meant the First Minister, and the other members had the right to disavow every law passed by the Local Governments; and the moment they were disavowed, they were no longer law. This was unquestionable. Hence this Government could control the Local Legislatures; and not only so, but owing to the action of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier in this instance, the danger with which their system was threatened was visible. The Lieutenant-Governor was appointed by the Federal Government; and the Governor-in-Council here was not the Governor General, a perfectly impartial authority, but the Ministers who were controlled by the First Minister, who was the dominating spirit in his Cabinet as at present organized. Everything depended on the First Minister, who appointed the Lieutenant-Governor. The Provincial Governments might be politically hostile to the Premier here, and his party, and he to assure to himself the support of a Province, could appoint one of his tools a Lieutenant-Governor. He was not now making any personal allusion. He was well acquainted with M. Letellier de St. Just, who, he had every reason to think, was a gentleman; but at the same time he admitted that His Honour was an extreme partizan. This was the state of things in the Province of Quebec. The Federal Government had appointed an out and out partizan Lieutenant-Governor, who would do, no matter what, for his party; even, perhaps, beyond the limits of reason. The facts of the present case were well known; and it was unquestionable that a coup d'état had been committed at Quebec. The correspondence and the explanations given, proved this beyond cavil. This was excessively clear. He did not know who had inspired His Honour to make this coup d'état, and all the appearances proved that it had been inspired by the Ottawa Administration, in order to seize upon power in the Province of Quebec, and to influence the approaching elections, notably in that Province, but also throughout the whole Dominion. He judged of the matter as every reason ing man did. Certainly all the appearances and all the proofs led them to believe that this coup d'état was inspired with this object. The truth was this: The Province of Quebec had its particular institutions, as far as the French portion of the population was concerned, which merited preservation. Its laws were different to those in the other Provinces; the predominant religion was different, and then they had this peculiar feature, the use of the French language. In fact, the peculiar situation of the Province rendered the Confederation system a necessity. He was not a French Canadian, but simply and purely a Scotchman; but he represented a constituency which was in great part French Canadian, and the preservation of these institutions was considered a matter of very great importance to the French Canadians. The danger he wished to indicate was this: The moment they gave the power to a Lieutenant-Governor appointed by the Federal Government to dismiss his Ministers and control the legislation of the Province, they abandoned all their safeguards. There was no doubt that the First Minister of the Federal Government was the principal power in this organization, and this Minister would possibly be an Upper Canadian, a Scotchman, and a Presbyterian, one who probably would have no sympathy whatever with the institutions peculiar to Lower Canada. This Minister appointed, as Lieutenant-Governor, one of his tools, who need not necessarily be a Canadian Frenchman, nor always necessarily a Letellier de St. Just; and by these means, which were due to a very grave mistake made in the original plan as to our Constitution, the Provincial Ministry and Legislature might be controlled by the Federal Government.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is speaking after moving an amendment which was lost.

MR. SPEAKER: The point is well taken. May states that it is a desirable rule that where a member has moved or seconded a motion for the adjournment of a debate, after his motion has been negatived, he is not entitled to speak again to the main question.

MR. McDOUGALL (Three Rivers): I am speaking to the point of order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

MR. CIMON said he would complete the speech of the hon. member for Three Rivers, which was of the greatest importance. The noises made by hon. gentlemen opposite were their cries of conscience, produced by remorse, owing to the vote which they were going to give against the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston. There were no two roads by which one could arrive at a decision respecting the question which was before the House. He heard cries which hon. members certainly could not make. There were evidently strangers in the House. He thought that Mr. Speaker should repress the disorder or leave the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Speaker will discharge his duty as he thinks it ought to be discharged. I have again and again appealed to hon. members of the House to try and conduct the debates, if they are to proceed, in a quiet and proper manner; and I now appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to come to an arrangement, and put an end to what I must regard as a most unseemly style of proceeding.

MR. CIMON said these noises were necessary to stifle the cries of the consciences of hon. gentlemen opposite. The day would yet come when these hon. gentlemen would have to go before the people and their constituents, and then they would find that these interruptions would be to them of little avail. The liberties of Lower Canada were now in peril. Popular rights and popular liberties were in danger. Two French-Canadian members of the present Government had instigated Mr. Letellier's coup d'état. The British North America Act was their charter of liberty; and its provisions had been atrociously violated by the Lieutenant-Governor. He demanded a hearing. If Sir John A. Macdonald returned to power, a Conservative Lieutenant-Governor might be sent to Quebec, where Mr. Joly might possibly have 25 of a majority ; and, acting like Mr. Letellier, open the door and expel him from office. Their ancestors had conquered the rights and privileges which they enjoyed at the price of their blood on the scaffold and on the field of battle, and yet this was treated by hon. gentlemen opposite as a matter of little importance, when it was in reality of vital moment. There was not a man in the House who would vote against the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston, who would not say that this act of the Lieut.-Governor was not only illegal but an outrage. He left this matter with the consciences of hon. members, who would each feel that in voting against this motion, that he was committing an act for which he would be subject to reproach until the end of his life. He did not share the hypocrisy of hon. gentlemen opposite. He had the greatest respect for the hon. member for Chateauguay, the Nestor of the House, who, if he would tell the hon. gentlemen opposite conscientiously what he thought, and what he believed about this matter, he would certainly exercise a great influence, and be of great utility in bringing these hon. gentlemen to vote for the motion of the right hon. gentleman ; but the Nestor of the House saw that the counsel which he would give to the hon. gentlemen would be to vote for this motion. The House should not reject this motion, and place itself fifty years behind the age. What had happened in this relation was known as about to occur three months ago, when he had heard of it, and six months ago he had heard that a great coup d'état was contemplated in the Province of Quebec. This affirmation was not made lightly, but seriously ; and he could sustain it by proof, viz. :—this coup d'état was meditated over six months ago, and meditated by members who sat on the other side of the House. This act was advised by hon. gentlemen opposite. To vote down this motion would be to declare that a Lieutenant-Governor had a right to dismiss Ministers in favour of his own political party. It had been proposed by the hon. the First Minister to hold the local and federal elections together, but the coup d'état was not well received by the House, and the hon. the First Minister was obliged to change his plans. The local elections were then ordered first ; and the hon. gentleman was trying to justify himself before the people of the Dominion of Canada. Hon gentlemen opposite had changed their tactics. The hon. the First Minister said that they had nothing to do with local elections ; but in 1872, the New Brunswick School question came before the House, and it was brought up by the hon. gentlemen opposite, who, though they had made this pretension, then held when they sought to obtain a vote against the Conservative Government of the day, that this House had something to do with provincial affairs. A manifest outrage had been committed in the Province of Quebec. The Lieutenant-Governor wished to govern the people against their will, and to chain down the popular will and privileges. In order to restore His Honour to his senses, some authority should be exercised by this Government. If this Administration did not do so, what could bring a Lieutenant-Governor under such circumstances to his senses ? Had the supplies been granted before the De Boucherville Government was dismissed, the Joly Cabinet could have remained for a year in power against the will of the people. He thought that if the hon. member for L'Islet would reveal the interviews that had taken place before this coup d'état occurred, the hon. gentleman would have something very interesting to say on this subject. Some authority over the Lieutenant-Governor must exist, and it rested with this Parliament and the Government of the Dominion, and in the hands of the hon. the First Minister. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) dare not say that the Lieut.-Governor was right ; and, in failing to defend the act, the hon. gentleman admitted that His Honour was guilty of the serious offence laid to his charge. This House had jurisdiction over and could censure the Lieut.-Governor, who had done a great wrong. Supposing the Governor-General dismissed this Ministry because a large number of the members had had contracts with the Government and did not occupy independent positions, these hon. gentlemen would not approve of this action. The "rings" to which the allusion had been made as to the Quebec Legislature had been composed of men sent there by their constituents to advocate and seek from the Local Government the construction of railways. These were honest rings and not dishonest rings such as were in this House during other Sessions in connection with the Government. The latter were contractors who sought to enrich themselves, not to benefit their constituents; this was the difference between those two kinds of rings. The Lieut.-Governor had advanced false assertions in his letters to His Excellency the Governor-General. The Lieut.-Governor was a representative of the Crown; and in case the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston was defeated, the Crown would be placed in a false position. The rights and liberties of the people, acquired by such great sacrifices, were in serious danger. Hon. gentlemen opposite were bent on stifling these liberties, and their consciences troubles them. The DeBoucherville Government had been supported by a majority of the people in the Province. Three years ago, Mr. DeBoucherville was urged to build a railway from Quebec to Hull, but he informed the towns interested, that the Province had not enough means to build it. The towns replied: "Build this North Shore Railway, and we will subscribe the three millions." This was done; but when the work was terminated, and it was necessary to pay the contractors, these towns refused to meet their obligations; and the Liberal members, who were accustomed to advocate the interests of the people, came to the inhabitants and told them that the Conservatives were increasing the taxation for the benefit of the towns. Liberals had no principles; they never had had any, and they never would have any. The conduct of the Liberals, under these circumstances, reminded him of the fable concerning the rat of the town and the rat of the country. The Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Inland Revenue, were involved in this matter. He had a great speech to deliver on this subject, but he would reserve it for another occasion. He now begged to move that this House do now adjourn.

MR. MCDUGALL (Three Rivers) said that Lieutenant-Governors were purely and simply creations of this Government, under whose control they were. He would frankly say, that he believed Governor Letellier had been influenced in his action on the part of the Federal Government, with the view of seizing upon the Government of Quebec, in order to bring about and control the elections. The hon. the Premier said that they had nothing to do with this question, which ought to be simply referred to the people for decision. But this was not an expression of opinion worthy of a statesman. The Lieutenant-Governor, as well as the Local Government derived his power from this Parliament. The Lieutenant-Governor was certainly the creation of this Government, and under its jurisdiction and control. Had they a right to speak of the Lieutenant-Governor, and not to criticize his conduct? If the Governors of colonies did not perform their duties strictly according to the letter of their commissions, these matters could be brought up in the Imperial Parliament; the same thing was true with regard to our Lieutenant-Governors. These gentlemen were employed under the jurisdiction of the Government that appointed them. Lieutenant-Governors were strictly under the control of this Government and Parliament, and not only so, but this Government was responsible for their conduct. It was an absurdity to say that the Constitution was written. The English Constitution had not been written, because it never remained the same for twenty four hours together. It constantly varied, according to the exigencies of the time and country. Our Constitution had been extremely badly devised. The power had been distributed in a manner of which he did not approve. Lieutenant-Governors should not have the attributes of the Sovereign, who was wholly placed above party, while our Lieutenant-Governors were the creation of party. Mr. Letellier was appointed by the party now in power, and he held extremely pronounced partizan views. This fact was recognized even here; and he could not divest himself of partizanship during his term of office. The same remark applied to the other Lieutenant-Governors. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew the advantage obtained by going to the people with the reins of power in their hands; they well knew that the DeBoucherville Government had a strong majority in both Houses. And what had they done? The Lieutenant-Governor menaced his Ministers with a change; and, having dismissed the DeBoucherville Administration, it was known that the new Government exercised not only patronage, but also terrorism. It had not only favours to accord, but also debts to collect, and their rights in Lower Canada would be sacrificed, if the Lieutenant Governor, the creator of the Ottawa Administration, could control or dismiss Governments at pleasure. What guarantees had they then against danger to their privileges? The Lieutenant-Governor, under such circumstances, arrogated to himself the right of making the legislation. This attempt upon the rights and liberties, could not be allowed to pass without criticism and condemnation.

Mr. METHOT said that taking the floor of the House at this late hour, seven, a.m., he did not intend to quote largely the authorities and precedents in regard to the constitutionality of the act. Many prominent members had done so before him, and all that he intended, was to show the character of the facts by the contradictions of the facts themselves, as they had stood in the Lieutenant-Governor's memorandum. We had no need of genius, but only a little common sense and judgment to consider the matter at issue. He did not know, for his part, much about the Constitution of this country. He had not studied it particularly, but we had only to read the Message of the Lieutenant-Governor, to see at once that the man who wrote it, had, long before he committed this coup d'état, decided to commit it; and that as soon as he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, as was plain from his Message and acts, he premeditated this step. He (Mr. Methot) for his part, would not accuse the Government here with having appointed Mr. Letellier, in order to destroy the late Government of the Province of Quebec. This was not his intention. He did not wish to impute bad motives to any of the hon. members of this House; but he must say that a crowd of circumstances in connection with this coup d'état presented themselves before the country, which were of a nature to make it believe that there was premeditation, if not on the part of those who made this appointment, at least on the part of His Honour himself. In common with all the members of the House, the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec was, previous to his occupancy of this high position as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen, a strong politician and a warm political partizan, and a man who, from the commencement of his political life, had actively engaged in political contests; he had energetically taken part in the discussions in Parliament, he was habituated to political struggles, he was passionately fond of these political contests, and it was easy to see that His Honour taking this position was not immediately able to become thoroughly impartial. His Honour could not at once free himself from the influence of party spirit when he went to Quebec, where he had for his advisers gentlemen who were entitled to his cordial support, people whom he had always bitterly opposed politically. He had stated a moment since that there was no need for great political knowledge or great knowledge of the Constitution in order to judge of the question now before the House; they only required to consider the message transmitted to His Excellency the Governor-General to perceive that it was imbued with party and partizan spirit. The hon. member for L'Islet seemed to have a cordial feeling towards His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor; this he (Mr. Methot) did not doubt, for in that gentleman's family this cordial feeling always existed, and it did not surprise him, because, if he could rely on what he had seen, that family had drawn from the Government over one hundred and eighteen thousand dollars in five years. In the Message which His Honour sent up, were visible three, and even more than three, falsehoods of the strongest character — falsehoods which His Honour himself was incapable of uttering, but of which, uttered by others, he, nevertheless, approved. When the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec dismissed the late Ministry, what was declared by the Liberal Press? A falsehood of the most extreme and unequivocal character. This portion of the Press at once alleged that the late Provincial Ministry had not been driven from office. They wished to cause the impression in this country that these Ministers had resigned, and this rumour was supported and circulated by the hottest partizans of the Lieutenant-Governor. It was distributed by the persons whom he now heard making a noise in this House, interrupting hon. gentlemen who sought to discuss the great constitutional question of the day. He must say that these hon. gentlemen had endeavoured to make the country believe that these Ministers had not been able to agree among themselves, and that, having some difficulties with the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, they had resigned their portfolios. They did not dare to face the constitutional and political issue that was opened by the action of His Honour. They at first tried to avoid it and to escape from it; the same as to-day they endeavoured to escape from the present discussion and to prevent the members of the Opposition from defending the position which the latter had taken on this great question, and which they were defending successfully. Hon. gentlemen opposite tried to make out that the late Provincial Ministry had not been driven from office, but, on reading the message from His Honour, they would find proof to the contrary. His Honour distinctly declared, in his letter to his late advisers, that, under the circumstances, he had no further need of their services. This was not the only inaccuracy that was contained in His Honour's memorandum. The hon. the First Minister had risen and said that they had no right and should not discuss this question at the present moment, because to do so would influence the elections in the Province of Quebec. Why, then, did the hon. the First Minister come and place on the table of the House, not explanations such as those which the late Ministers had presented, but a plaidoyer by His Honour in justification of his conduct? It was His Honour then who had forced them to discuss his position and to defend their own position before this House. This was what the members of the Opposition had done, and they had performed this duty in a courageous, and, as the English said, in a manly manner. They had not acted as hon. gentlemen opposite were conducting themselves at that moment. They had not endeavoured to elude the issue. They had on the contrary considered it frankly, and he was to-day proud to belong to the Conservative party and proud to act under the leadership of the right hon. member for Kingston. And why? Because he had seen that when the right hon. gentleman had an opinion on any subject, he was not ashamed to defend it before this House, and this was what he could not say to the honour of their opponents, who sat on the other side of the Chamber, among whom he had many friends. The inaccuracy he had mentioned was not the only inaccuracy contained in the memorandum of His Honour. They found among the reasons which His Honour gave for having expelled his late advisers from office, two statements, which in order to express himself in a parliamentary manner, he would term inaccuracies and not falsehoods. These were reasons which were utterly untrue. One of them gave it to be understood that His Honour had had very disagreeable relations with his Ministers and that they had acted in an unconstitutional manner. His Honour came before the House, not only to utter a menterie, but also to endeavour to insinuate and make believe what he knew was false; he came before the House to declare that a measure which was presented to him for his assent was then incomplete. But did not his Honour know that when he sanctioned this measure, he approved on the same day of a measure which was introduced to amend the typographical error which he dared say was committed in that Bill. This measure had passed through two stages in the Legislative Council, in accordance with Parliamentary usage. It was the custom therefore, not perhaps the practice in this House, in the Legislative Council when a measure originated there, which imposed some penalty, not to fix this penalty; and this was done in the present instance. The Bill then came before the House, and this happened in the last days of the Session. It passed through Committee, but whether the amount of the penalty was fixed or not he did not know. By some error the Act was sent to the printer, without any amount being named, and this was one of the reasons His Honour gave for dismissing his Ministers. Was this due to bad faith or an error on the part of His Honour? He thought that it was difficult to decide. He was greatly perplexed to decide between the two; but it seemed to him that it was difficult to believe that it was an error. The Bill had passed through three readings, and this defect could not be amended in the same Bill. The Ministry then at once introduced another measure to amend this Bill; and this was so much the case, that if the two Bills were examined, they would be found to follow one another in the Statute. These two Bills were at at once submitted, but in lieu of sanctioning this other Bill His Honour objected to it. For his part he (Mr. Méthot) believed that His Honour should have approved of it, and not devoted himself to the work of pointing out typographical faults. If he did so, then the hon. member for Lévis would have little to do. He (Mr. Méthot) must confess he believed that His Honour showed bad faith when, with his knowledge of the facts—that there was another Bill to amend this one—he gave, in his memorandum, this statement as a reason for disagreement between himself and his proper advisers. There were manifest falsities in the statements of the Lieutenant-Governor, and there was no need to peruse the memorandum of the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville to discover them. They were easily discerned, and they could be clearly pointed out. Were the pettier reasons given by this House in justification of his arbitrary conduct—such as a sensible man could accept for such an action? His Honour alleged that his late Ministers had not done their duty, and that they had not known enough to correct and revise the Statutes; but the man who held so strongly to his Ministers doing their duty, had to tell the House that when the Legislature was in full session, and at a moment when the Lieutenant-Governor should be as much as possible at the seat of Government, he was at River Ouelle. During this period His Honour was seen at Montreal, and from one town to another, though his presence was required at the Provincial Capital. His Honour said to his Ministers: "Do your duty strictly; do not infringe upon my prerogative—I will not suffer it—but I will go promenading." If His Honour had so much regard for the interests of the country, and had them so much at heart, and was sincere when he alleged that he had acted with a pure desire to defend the country's interests, he should have remained at the seat of Government, at all events, during the Session, where he would have had full knowledge of the measures introduced by his Government, and would have followed them; and as an hon. member had stated the other evening, His Honour would then have performed his duty, which consisted in notifying his advisers of the fact, if a measure did not please him. On the contrary, His Honour abstained from adopting this course, and kept away from the capital, sending up forms signed in blank to serve for the introduction of measures, which required his support and authorization. In this His Honour had acted as if his Ministers had his entire confidence; but in his memorandum His Honour showed the greatest reserve, and a reserve which was not justified by the practice here. As the right hon. member for Kingston had stated, a great number of the measures which were introduced here, did not have the approval of His Excellency the Governor General at the time of their introduction. His Excellency had at this period, indeed, never seen them. And why? Because a great many of these matters were mere questions of routine. He would ask Mr. Speaker whether he signed his name to the votes and proceedings in the issue for each day of the Session. Did not His Honour authorize the Clerk of the House to sign these matters for the most part. The same thing ought to be true in connection with the position of Lieutenant-Governor. There ought to be a great number of measures, or resolutions, which were brought before the House, but which, even the Governor might not have seen. If, however, this officer wished to see and follow them, he should remain at his post; but when he went away and stationed himself at a distance of from 60 to 100 leagues from the capital, where was his seat of Government, and sent the Government blank forms of authorization, had the Government not a right to say that the Lieutenant-Governor had sanctioned every measure which they had submitted to the House? And these were the facts which had been established in this case. But, nevertheless, His Honour, in the manifesto, or, rather, the plaidoyer, which had been presented to the House, assumed the position of a lecturer on these points. His Honour told a falsehood when he pretended that the late Government proposed to tax the country and increase the Provincial debt in aid of railway construction; but he (Mr. Méthot) was a member of the Quebec Parliament when the law was passed which authorized the Government, in case the subsidies granted to different railways on the south shore for a certain number of years, lapsed, to divert them to other purposes; and this was what had been done by the DeBoucherville Administration. Nevertheless, this was one of the reasons given by the Lieutenant-Governor for driving his advisers from office, and forcing them to abandon their positions. It could not be pretended that the late Government of the Province had, without good reason, decided to impose the tax of 15c. on the hundred dollars on all contracts and obligations. In this relation he would merely point out to the House what had not yet been mentioned, but what, nevertheless, everybody understood, viz., this tax was decided upon simply because the subscriptions to the North Shore Railway by certain municipalities and towns which ought, in justice, to have been paid, had not been paid; and it, consequently, became necessary to take this step, in order to enable the Government to fulfil their obligations; but, when the Government declared that it would force these municipalities to pay their subscriptions to a great work which they themselves had caused in the first instance, to be undertaken, and without which this law would never have been proposed, or the Province so heavily burdened with debt, a great outcry was raised. He would, for his part, merely say that there was a contradiction, and a flagrant contradiction, in the two declarations which were made with regard to the present Government of Quebec. On the one hand, it was pretended by the Joly Administration in the Address issued to the Electors, that the law which would have forced the Municipalities to pay their subscriptions to the railway was unjust; and on the other hand, it was alleged that this 15 cents tax ought not to be imposed on the population, but if the Municipalities had honoured their subscriptions, the late Government of the Province would never have been obliged to propose the tax in question; and if they did not force the Municipalities to pay, then it was necessary to obtain money in some way, and to impose this tax. He would say more; that by the delay which this action of His Honour had rendered necessary with regard to the completion of the North Shore Railway, at least double the amount which this tax would have realized would be lost to the Province, for thus the chance of leasing this Railroad would certainly be deferred for at least twelve months; and the lease of this line would bring into the Provincial Treasury a sum at least equal to, if not double, the amount which the tax of 15 cents on the hundred dollars would have contributed to the revenue. But it was easy to see what His Honour wished, and hoped, and here really lay the whole cause of His Honour's conduct in this connection. They saw His Honour at Quebec working in order to bring into power a Government which would aid his political friends in conducting the general elections that were to take place this Fall, and in consequence of this state of things, he pursued a policy with as much prudence and wisdom as he could show, calculated to embarrass his constitutional advisers; and when they brought before the House, measures which he knew were dangerous as regarded the popularity of his Ministers, he allowed them to do so and to introduce these measures in the House. And why? Because he intended to make a move later, and to take advantage of their position for the benefit of his political friends. After all, His Honour hoped to obtain the support of a number of Conservatives in the Legislature; but he was deceived in this expectation. The members of the Legislative Assembly showed that they were worthy of their positions. Above all, they proved that they were independent, as members of the House ought to be independent. This was true independence, for they proved themselves independent of public opinion, which naturally was always opposed to taxation, and, to a certain point, they exhibited independence with regard to their leaders. To-day, this matter was before the electors for judgment, and the country would now judge, as they always did, the men who had chosen to pursue an honourable, an honest and an inflexible course. The Lieut.-Governor had been deceived in his hopes. His Honour believed that the members of the Legislature would overthrow the Government; that he would bring his friends into power, and that the elections would be carried on with respect to the question of the taxation, which he had, in fact, recommended; but again His Honour was deceived in his expectations, and he acted too hastily to secure his objects. His Honour did not know that the supplies had not been voted, otherwise he would have waited longer before acting; but his hopes made him do what he did. When he dismissed his Ministers, he expected that he could delay the local elections, which he knew would be unfavourable to him, until after the Federal elections; but, unfortunately for His Honour, the supplies had not been voted, and it was necessary that, by the 1st of June, the elections should take place. In their embarrassment, His Honour's friends hurried up to Ottawa for council, and if rumour was true, they came here to ask the Federal Government to order their elections at once. During several days after His Honour had expelled his Ministers from office, the Local Legislature was in complete ignorance of the reasons which had induced him to take this step; and when these were communicated they were felt to be so futile, that they must be improved upon; and hence the long plaidoyer which had been presented to this House. He believed that His Honour had shown that there was no need for understanding the constitutional question, or any part of it, or to be a distinguished advocate in order to be able to form an opinion on the matter which was before the House. It sufficed to read the documents which were presented for their consideration, to see how matters stood; and to-day, from what they had been able to see, it was plain that the country would judge impartially these facts and condemn energetically the coup d'état which had been committed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec; having made these few remarks, he would conclude by stating that he would support, with all his power, the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston.

MR. DOMVILLE followed, dwelling on the gravity of the charges against the Lieutenant-Governor, and urging that steps be taken to prevent a recurrence of his acts.

MR. ORTON said he had listened to a most eloquent description of the British Constitution from the right hon. member for Kingston, who had shown that up to the present time Canada had enjoyed all the privileges and benefits of Responsible Government. Indeed, the people of Canada had in times past been accustomed to pride themselves on the fact that in this Dominion were exemplified to greater perfection than even in the Mother Country all the beauties of the British Constitution. It had been the pride and the desire of every true patriot in this country to try and perpetuate on this continent the institutions which they all so much revered. But when he viewed the events which had occurred within the past few weeks, he felt that there was serious danger threatening the institutions of this country. They must lead to doubts as to whether this Confederation was one that would adhere together, that would perpetuate the principles of Constitutional Government. It was a matter of grave doubt as to whether the giving to the Provinces the privilege of local self Government was one that would not in the future be fraught with great danger. It was also a matter of grave doubt whether the multiplying of the representatives of the Crown in this country was not a source of serious danger to our institutions. It was not his intention, at present, to enter into the constitutional portion of the question, which had been so ably discussed by those hon. gentlemen who had preceded him, on this side of the House. The marked silence of the hon. the First Minister and his supporters, in discussing this question, on the constitutional point involved, was sufficient proof that they felt themselves unable to justify the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. Why had not the hon. member for South Bruce spoken on this subject? Was the Lieutenant-Governor's action endorsed by the Government? If it was, the House should have heard the opinions of that eloquent and able member on the subject. Surely the daring stretch of authority of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was sufficiently serious to call for his opinion. But, no; the hon. member for South Bruce remained significantly silent, not only silent, but absent during the greater part of the discussion. Not only did the hon. member for South Bruce remain silent, but the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who prided himself on his knowledge of constitutional questions, had not given his views on this action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, which had shaken to their very foundation the institutions of this country, and had created consternation from one end of the Dominion to the other. Not only was the silence of hon. gentlemen opposite significant, but the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government as well as that of the hon. the Premier, were of a character to create alarm in the minds of all anxious for their country's welfare. The light, flippant manner in which the hon. the Premier treated this question proved that he was not equal to the occasion. He should have risen above party prejudices, and have thoroughly grappled with the question and discussed its merits from a constitutional point of view. He would quote from May, in referring to events which occurred in the reign of George III. He said: "From this time no question has arisen concerning the exercise of the prerogatives or influence, of the Crown, which calls for notice. Both have been exercised wisely, justly and in the true spirit of the Constitution, Ministers enjoying the confidence of Parliament, have never claimed in vain the confidence of the Crown. Their measures have not been thwarted by secret influence, and irresponsible advice. Their policy has been directed by Parliament, and not by the will of the Sovereign or the intrigues of the Court. Vast as is the power of the Crown, it has been exercised, throughout the present reign, by the advice of responsible Ministers, in a constitutional manner, and for legitimate objects. It has been held in trust, as it were, for the benefit of the people. Hence it has ceased to excite either the jealousy of rival parties or popular discontents. This judicious exercise of the royal authority, while it has conduced to the good government of the State, has sustained the moral influence of the Crown, and the devoted loyalty of a free people has never been disturbed by the voice of faction." This was a description of how the prerogatives of the Crown should be exercised. No intelligent member could read the causes given by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec for his conduct, without being struck with their trivial, and almost absurd character. One of them appeared to be the setting aside of a day for general thanksgiving, which, it appeared, had been officially communicated by him to the DeBoucherville Ministry on instructions from Ottawa. He would not further refer to the reasons given, but he would say that if such a proceeding had taken place in Ontario, there would have been indignation meetings from one end of the Province to the other. Living in close contiguity to a great and powerful republic, there was great danger that the disrespect for our institutions caused by the action of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, would develop itself into an admiration for republican institutions, and tend to subvert our Constitution. It not only endangered Responsible Government, but it brought into disrespect our noble Queen. The danger was very great that the high handed and tyrannical conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier would bring disrespect upon the Crown, not only in this country but it might have an influence even upon the British Empire. They all knew that reverence for the Queen was one of the strongest powers in preserving the loyalty and fidelity of the inhabitants of this country; this great respect for our Queen and her authority was in a great degree an element, which held together the great British Empire in India. It behoved them, therefore, if they were to remain true to Great Britain, and true to their country, to denounce this unworthy and unwise step which had been taken by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He could not help contrasting the Speech made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, on this subject and that made by the hon. gentleman last summer at Quebec, a speech in which he laid down the principles of the Liberal Party at that day, which were mingled with expressions of the loyalty and devotion to the Crown that he and the party to which he belonged held so steadfastly; for when the hon. gentleman the other night made his flippant remarks, they did not hear his eloquence in support of preserving the dignity of the Crown and the duties of Responsible Government in this country, but simply to forward the sordid interests of his party in the Province of Quebec, and enable them to grasp office at any sacrifice. He (Mr. Orton), could not help feeling that the occasion was one which might justify the impeachment of the Lieutenant-Governor as a traitor to his Queen and his country, when they took into consideration that it might be used as a precedent by other Lieutenant-Governors for dismissing their Ministries, and tending to alarming disputes and other confusion between the different authorities in our constitutional system. It had been said throughout the country, that the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was simply the outcome of a deep laid scheme; and when they saw the position of the present Government throughout the country, as so plainly indicated on many occasions,—when they saw the great unpopularity of this Government, and its action denounced through the length and breadth of the land, not by Conservatives, but even by Reformers—when they saw the Liberal newspapers denouncing the leaders of the present Government as traitors to the Reform party, and saw assemblies of Reformers passing indignant resolutions, as they had done in his county, against the course of the Government during their reign, and when they saw these and other evidences of unpopularity,—they, the people, could not help thinking there might be some truth in the motives applied by the public to the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. They could not help thinking that he had been influenced by this Government, that it was the desperate game of a desperate Ministry, the game of a Ministry who knew they were about to meet a disappointed people, and wished to bring to bear upon the people the influence attaching to the patronage of the Crown in the Province of Quebec. He dared not allow himself to believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie) allowed himself to be a party to this plot, as he had a higher opinion of him individually; and if it had been done, it was by those who were desirous of power, regardless of the best interests of the country. The conduct of the Government and its followers on this occasion, would lead one to suppose they intended that the whole power of the Dominion Government should be used to condone the offences of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and in that way enable him to carry through the elections, and form a new Cabinet successfully. Such a course was as traitorous and deserving of censure as the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. What the result of the resolution before the House would be, he knew not; but he hoped there would be found some hon. members, supporters of this Government, sufficiently independent, and with a due sense of the responsibility of their position, and with sufficient patriotism to vote for it, and thus show their disapproval of the dangerous course of the partizan Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. It was, however, he was sorry to say, doubtful whether hon. members on the Government side would have courage to take up such an independent and patriotic position. The House had seen too many instances of the too confiding character of the followers of the present Government. They had seen many gross wrongs upheld by the Government followers, such acts as the Goderich Harbour contract, Kaministiquia job and other gross improprieties on the part of the Government. He would now proceed to read some quotations in reference to the position of the Lieutenant-Governor in Quebec, and to show the language in which similar actions had been referred to. In the reign of George III. there was an occurrence in many respects identical with the present difficulty. The King conceived against his Ministry a personal hostility, of so bitter a character that after restraining himself for a great length of time he at last took a step, which was fraught with great danger to Responsible Government, and the progress it had then made in Great Britain at that time. He would read a few extracts with regard to that event from May. Referring to the latest precedent in British History, to the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, that of George III., dismissing the Pitt Government, he said: "It was the King's object not only to supplant one party, and establish another in its place, but to create a party faithful to himself, regarding his personal wishes, carrying out his policy, and dependent on his will." And then referring to what a Constitutional Government was, he went on to say: "A Constitutional Government insures to the Government a wide authority in all the Councils of the State. He chooses and dismisses his Ministers. Their resolutions are submitted to his approval, and when that approval is withheld, his Ministers must either resign or abandon their policy. They are responsible to the King on one hand, and to Parliament on the other, and while they return the confidence of the King by administering affairs to his satisfaction, they must act upon principles and propose measures which they can justify to Parliament. And here is the proper limit to the King's influence. As he governs by Responsible Ministers, he must recognize their responsibilities. They are not only his Ministers, but also the public servants of a free country. But an influence in the direction of affairs thus limited, by no means satisfied the ambition of the King. It will be seen that when Ministers, not of his own choice, were in office, he plotted against them; and when he succeeded in establishing his friends in office, he enforced upon them the adoption of his own policy. The King's tactics were fraught with danger as well to the Crown itself as to the constitutional liberties of the people. To revert to a policy under which Kings governed, and Ministers had executed their orders, was in itself a dangerous retrogression in the principles of Constitutional Government. But the liberties of the people were exposed to greater peril than the Crown." There they had a King plotting against his Ministers, and that seemed to be the position of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. There were grave grounds for thinking that it was a plot into which he had been led by others for party purposes. They could not help but admire the course taken by the DeBoucherville Government, and the temperate manner in which Mr. DeBoucherville remonstrated with the Lieutenant-Governor with regard to this. Mr. DeBoucherville had the confidence of the Local Parliament by a large majority, and it remained yet to be seen whether the tactics of Mr. Lottellier were to be altogether successful. It was true, he had succeeded in dismissing his Ministry, in bringing an appeal to the people, under such circumstances as might divert them from the real issue they had now before this House, namely, the danger to Responsible Government of this daring exercise of authority by the Lieutenant-Governor. But he (Mr. Orton) thought it was the sincere desire of every patriotic man in this House and country that ignominious failure should be the result of such a step. It appeared to him that Mr. Letellier had been moved more by party influences than by any desire to preserve, as it should be, the Constitutional purity of the Crown. He (Mr. Orton) felt that he had faithfully fulfilled a duty which he owed to his constituents, in expressing, as he had done, the indignation which he knew was felt throughout his county at the course taken by Mr. Letellier; having done that, he left the matter in the hands of the House, trusting that the patriotic feeling of members on both sides would be sufficiently strong and expressive; that good judgment and wise counsel would prevail, and that the result of this vote would be such as to show that this House had given it as its opinion that it was unwise, that it was against the best interests of the country, that it endangered the liberties of the people of our young and promising Dominion, and was calculated to bring into disrepute the prerogative of the Crown, and therefore traitorous, at the very foundation of our system of Government, to have dared to act in the manner Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had done.

MR. OUMET said that hon. gentlemen opposite were trying to prevent hon. members of the Opposition from expressing their sentiments, as they had a right to do in the House, with regard to the question of vital importance which was before them for discussion. The conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite would be accepted in the Province of Quebec and elsewhere, as proof that the Government had decided to endormir the House, so to speak, in order to prevent the continuation of this debate, which, probably, was not very agreeable to the Administration. It was the habit of those hon. gentlemen to prevent free debate. The Government and their Liberal friends agreed with marvellous unanimity on this point. Everywhere they commanded the majority; the Conservatives were hindered from speaking, and forced by them to keep silence. But, he nevertheless believed that, at the present moment, the voice of the people was too strong and too unanimously supported in the House to allow the advocates of the people's rights, members of the Opposition, to be tyrannically and arbitrarily dictated to by the Government and its followers, as was done in the Session of 1874. He remembered that in 1874, the Liberals, through their journals and on the hustings, said that the twenty-three incapables who represented Lower Canada in the Opposition, were unable to make their voices heard in this Parliament, or to be heard by the flexible and servile majority which supported the Administration. No one present during the first Session of the present Parliament had forgotten that, in fact, they could not then be heard; but since that period the good sense of the people had triumphed, and on each occasion that supporters of the Government had been sent back to their constituents, the people had returned Conservatives to come here, and defend what the people of Lower Canada called their rights, their language, their nationality, and their institutions. He regretted the painful occurrence which had given rise to the present discussion. The French Canadians had been proud to have secured the free exercise of their rights, their language and their institutions in the beautiful Province which their forefathers had watered with their blood to gain those liberties; they, in fine, had obtained the right of having one of their countrymen to act as the representative of Her Majesty, and they were proud to have a French Canadian wearing not precisely the Crown but, acting as the representative of Her Britannic Majesty, who ruled the glorious British Empire. But he considered that they ought now to be deeply humiliated on seeing that this high position had fallen into hands so unworthy as those of the person who now presided over the destinies of Lower Canada, despotically and tyrannically—His Honour, Mr. Letellier, whom the people of Lower Canada in view of recent circumstances called Luc the First, (Luc Premier.) He hoped that the cry of indignation which the act of His Honour would raise throughout the whole Province of Quebec, would prevent any such act ever again being attempted. The French Canadians were proud to say that they understood British Institutions. To such a degree was this the case that the noble Lord who presided over the destinies of the Dominion as Governor-General, had complimented the French Canadians on understanding the importance and the manner of working British Institutions, and there were none more loyal to Her Majesty or more worthy the name of British people than they in the Dominion. But to-day this opinion must be changed since Mr. Letellier had deemed proper to play the tyrant, and reawaken in their midst the traditions of the middle ages, the age of barbarism, which had for a long time past disappeared for the glory of the world, and which he hoped would never reappear in their beautiful Province. He begged permission to pass in review as briefly as possible the different propositions placed before the House by the right hon. member for Kingston, which propositions by the way had been admitted to be correct by the hon. the First Minister. The first proposition was, that Lieutenant-Governors under the British North America Act, were appointed by the Governor of Canada in Council, as the representatives of the Governor-General in the Provinces, and their relations towards the Governor-General were precisely the same as the relations which existed between the Governor-General and Her Majesty in Council. The Governor-General in all that concerned British institutions was responsible to Her Majesty in Council, and his acts might be censured or approved by the Imperial Government, the same as the Lieutenant-Governor in the Province of Quebec was responsible to the Governor-General here; and as the conduct of the Governor-General could be criticised in the Imperial Parliament, so could the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor be discussed in this House. This principle was admitted on both sides of the Chamber. If followed from these premises that the present debate was essentially constitutional, and essentially in agreement with the spirit of the Constitution by which we were governed, and if this debate was constitutional and in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution, and if they could discuss the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor with regard to the circumstances which determined him to dismiss his Ministers, it equally followed that their opinions on this important subject should be freely expressed inasmuch as the passage of judgment upon His Honour's conduct was in question. What was the reason given by the hon. the Premier for putting a stop to this debate? The hon. gentleman held that this discussion was improper and inopportune; and that an expression of opinion on the part of this House would be an infringement upon the people's liberties, because His Honour had formed a Ministry and chosen advisers who had assumed the responsibility of his acts, because His Honour's conduct in the person of his Ministers was now submitted to the decision of the electors of the Province of Quebec, and because to these electors alone belonged the right of deciding the constitutional question which was now before the House. The hon. gentleman pretended that an expression of opinion on the part of the House in this relation would unduly influence the verdict which the people would give under the present circumstances. He (Mr. Ouimet) admitted that this was very cunning reasoning, but he did not believe that, as a serious argument, it would hold water. There were now two parties whose conduct was to be judged: the Lieut.-Governor on the one hand, and his Ministers on the other. The Lieut.-Governor, constitutionally speaking, was not responsible towards the people, who, in consequence of this fact, were not called upon to decide upon the conduct of His Honour in his quality of Lieut.-Governor, who, as chief of the Quebec Legislature, could do no wrong. The Lieut.-Governor, in the exercise of his functions, was only responsible to the Government here, by which he had been selected and appointed, and, according to the instructions given him by this Government, it would be found that this Government ought to judge His Honour's conduct. The people of Quebec had to decide on the other hand upon the fate of the Joly Ministry; and he hoped that this judgment would not be long delayed, and that the condemnation of that Ministry would be overwhelming, and of such a nature that henceforward they would never find a public man capable of assuming such a responsibility as Mr. Joly had undertaken. As to the Lieut.-Governors his case ought to be pleaded before the Governor-General in Council, and if the advisers of His Excellency did not deem it apropos to advise His Excellency under the present circumstances, the members of this House were certainly justified in making their voices heard, and in claiming that a decision should be arrived at by this House with regard to the conduct of His Honour. They had a right to complain to His Excellency that the Royal Prerogative had been exercised illegally and unconstitutionally in the Province of Quebec; and also that the Lieut.-Governor had consented to take advantage of his position to exercise an influence in favour of his political friends, which was certainly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, as interpreted by modern authorities. Distinction was to be drawn between the illegality and the unconstitutionality of the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor. In spite of the opinion expressed by a learned authority, he believed that the act of His Honour was legal, it was in conformity with the written Constitution; but contrary to the spirit of the Constitution as amended by the good sense of the people, as years rolled by, by our public men and by the enlightened patriotism of those who had endowed this country with Responsible Government in 1841. The hon. the First Minister had taken advantage of a subterfuge to evade his own responsibility in this regard, and, above all, to prevent those members of his party who had still at heart the traditions of the founders of their party from judging this question upon its merits and condemning the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, and in doing so, taking away from the Liberal party all the advantages they expected to obtain from this arbitrary act of His Honour, which they had considered necessary in order to secure their interests in the Province of Quebec. Everybody knew that the Liberals, before this coup d'état, had little confidence of success in the approaching general elections; but since this coup d'état had taken place, they had raised their heads, as they believed that this act, by giving them control of the Government patronage in the Province of Quebec, would enable them to carry a portion of the counties in Lower Canada. The Liberals had never hoped to carry more than half of these counties; but since this coup, Liberals had stated before him that they hoped to secure by this subterfuge as much as one-half of these counties, and in doing so to take over to their side some Conservatives, as had already been done, and thus obtain a majority until the federal elections arrived, and then use the influence of the two Governments in the Province to carry the Federal elections, and maintain themselves in power at Ottawa as well as at Quebec. He wished that the good sense of the people would do justice to this extravagant hope, as had been the case in the past, and to the principles subversive of the Constitution, of which these gentlemen had given such striking proofs since the formation of their party. He would now pass in review some of the motives given by His Honour in justification of his having taken the arbitrary proceedings of dismissing his Ministers and replacing them by their political opponents. His Honour alleged that he had a right to give his opinion on the measures introduced by the Government, and to oblige his Ministers to receive his advice in lieu of having his Ministers advise him. Every sensible man must be convinced that this singular idea was contrary to the Constitution and highly injurious in its results. His Honour had determined, when he accepted the position and went to Quebec, to change the way in which the public affairs of the Province were conducted, and to replace the Conservative Administration with Ministers belonging to his party. His Honour had had a long political career, and had discussed political questions with great warmth, zeal and enthusiasm. His Honour went to Quebec imbued with all his prejudices, which had acquired the force of nature, and which dominated his mind, as the consequence of participation for twenty years in active political struggles, and had resolved that if he could not change the way in which the affairs of Quebec were managed by the aid of Conservatives, he would do so with the aid of his political friends. This had been the determination of His Honour from the moment that he was appointed to this position. This inference, apart from facts known in the Province, most clearly followed from His Honour's memorandum to the Governor General. His Honour had played a hypocritical game, and endeavoured to take his Ministers from behind. He often absented himself from the seat of Government in order not to see what passed, and to be able to say later that he knew nothing of it. He would not dwell on the small matters which His Honour had alleged in justification of the dismissal of his Ministers. There were only two important questions brought up in this regard—the Railway and the Taxation Bills. He believed that the Railway Bill was not more arbitrary than the one by means of which municipal corporations collected their taxes. The principle of the Railway Bill was not a new one. It had been admitted long before His Honour was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. It was embodied in an Act passed in 1875, 39th Vic., and His Honour was not appointed until the month of December, 1876, after this law was sanctioned. This clause provided that these By-laws became obligatory. This was the principle concerning which so much complaint was made. The Bill introduced during the last Session of the Provincial Legislature was merely intended to put in operation this clause of the Act of 1875. Everybody interested in the prosperity of Quebec, and in this great enterprise, would admit that the means which the late Government had taken to secure the payment of these subscriptions in aid of the railway were proper, and not contrary to justice. There was nothing unjust in making a man pay what he ought to pay, nevertheless it was easy to imagine that this provision would excite a feeling of hostility; and in proposing this Bill the late Provincial Government had shown extraordinary courage. Demagogues had taken advantage of this measure to prejudice public opinion against the late Government. But the Crown ought to have been above the temptation of aiding these demagogues, although political friends were seconding their purposes. The action of His Honour had been in the highest degree unworthy of his position, and it would be condemned by the independent and honest electors of the Province. His Honour had descended to the arts of a demagogue, and sullied the dignity of the Crown, of which he was the representative. The Liberal party had always been distinguished by the violence with which it had denounced to the people the taxation which the Government thought proper to impose for the benefit of the public and the encouragement of the country's industries. The Liberals of Lower Canada had always the word "taxes" written in red letters on their programme, as being an épouvantail (bugbear) to the people of that Province; and it was considered an excellent opportunity by the Lieutenant-Governor when the DeBoucherville Ministry was obliged to force the different municipalities to pay their subscriptions in to the Provincial Treasury, to take advantage of this cry. The Liberals sought to profit by this occasion to rouse the people against the Conservative party, and to bring into power, and to the control of Provincial affairs, the extremely small minority of which the Liberals were composed in the Quebec Parliament. The introduction of this measure, together with the Stamp Bill, was the only means by which the DeBoucherville Government could repair the deficit and honour their engagements with regard to the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway. This policy was a necessity in order to restore the equilibrium of the Provincial finances, and it was certainly a courageous act to adopt it on the eve of the elections. Certainly the Liberals could not complain, because the late Provincial Government had not followed the same line of policy which this Government had adopted. The Ottawa Government had admitted the painful fact that a deficit of three and a half millions for the current year had occurred in the revenue of the Dominion, but, in view of the coming elections, that they would not now recur to the imposition of new taxes in order to cover up this deficit. Hon. gentlemen opposite had said they hope that Providence would come to their assistance, and at all events they thought that if Providence did not favour them at the present time, it would be time to propose new taxation after the elections. But, although he wished the contrary to happen, he was very much afraid that when the Federal elections were over, they would still see deficits increasing from day to day, and year after year, and it would then be found necessary to impose new taxes. The hon. gentlemen opposite were very wise, however, in postponing the question of new taxes until they were sustained at the approaching elections for a new term of five years. He confessed that the DeBoucherville Government had not been so politic; seeing a deficit and wishing to keep the credit of the Province unimpaired, they took bravely and honestly the only way left to them to meet the deficit, resting on the good sense of the people to sustain them in that emergency. They considered themselves pledged to the completion of the Q. M. O. & O. RR., and facing the position as courageous and honest men, they resolved to go ahead, even though they exposed themselves to lose for a time their popularity. The Liberals of Lower Canada were unable of such courage and honesty; they only thought of retaining power and of securing for themselves and their friends good positions. Another object, but unavowed by them, was to secure the annexation of this country to the neighbouring Republic. The present Government, whenever it was possible, favoured the Americans at the expense of the Canadians. This was the case with regard to our manufacturing interests and the award of contracts in connection with our public enterprises. He believed that the desire of this Government was simply to bring about annexation, and to oblige us in order to subsist and share in the advantages which this Government refused us, to place ourselves under the protection of the American flag. He would not dwell upon the pettiness of the reasons given by the Lieut.-Governor in justification of the arbitrary act of which his Honour had been guilty in dismissing his Ministers; but he would simply say a word as to the consequences which would result to this country if such conduct was approved. If His Honour was able to dismiss his Ministers once, what could prevent him repeating the same another time, until the people, tired with the elections, showed themselves disposed to support the Joly Ministry. Of course His Honour would be more prudent on the next occasion, and he would not again send his letter of dismissal, until the supplies were voted. By this means, the Government of the Province could be carried on for twelve months. What could prevent His Honour from dismissing again his next Ministry, if the majority of the next House was opposed to Mr. Joly, who would then be obliged to resign. If Mr. Letellier had the right to do it on this occasion, he certainly had the right to do it a second time; and, if so, what purpose did a Legislature composed of the representatives of the people serve? They would then return to the period which was so painful to their countrymen, before 1841, when the principle of Responsible Government was secured by them. If the arbitrary conduct of "Luc the First" was permitted, this country would return to the days of despotic influence and irresponsible Government. His Honour alleged that he believed that the railway and the Civil Service were costing too much. He (Mr. Ouimet) had believed that taxes were offered to, and accepted by the Crown, as imposed for the maintenance of its dignity and the proper carrying on of the affairs of the country. This was the doctrine laid down by many authors. If His Honour was the guardian of the deniers of the Province, why was it that, dissatisfied with his Ministers, he had increased the burden of taxation which was laid upon that Province. In dismissing his Ministers he had rendered necessary a dissolution and general election, which would cost the Province from $45,000 to $50,000; in the second place, this act had also rendered a new Session necessary, which would cost, at least, $90,000 or $100,000; and, in the next place, owing to the action of His Honour, the construction of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway could probably not be finished before the end of this year or the beginning of next year, so that the Province would, in the meantime, be deprived of the revenue which this road could return and thus pay the interest on the sums borrowed for its construction, and everyone knew that tenders for the leasing of this road, at the figure of about $300,000, had been sent in; in consequence of these facts, the conduct of His Honour, who was so much troubled by the contemplated increase of taxation, would cost the Province the extra sum, in all, of about $450,000, or nearly half a million, which would have to be raised by taxation. Instead of lightening, His Honour would increase the public burdens, and the people of the Province would be greatly astonished to learn that all this was done in order that the electors might anew express their opinion regarding the railway policy of the late Government, which was submitted to them and approved of at the general elections in 1875. It was a new sort of testimony of respect for the opinion of the people, for His Honour to dismiss his Ministers and call in a new Administration, formed from a party which did not possess the confidence of one-third of the electors of the Province. It was for this that His Honour had expelled the people from his confidence, in the person of its representatives, and said to the people, in a hypocritical and deceitful (mensongère) manner: "It is for love of you, and in behalf of good government, which has been absent for a long time, that I have done this." Though all this had been done for His Honour's political partizans and friends. His Honour had succeeded, stupidly, it was true, but, nevertheless, he had succeeded in placing the Joly Administration in control of the affairs of the Province, and the Conservatives were thus obliged to demand again the confidence of the electors, which the electors had already granted them in the most complete possible manner. His Honour had certainly misled the people, for, instead of aiding economy, his coup d'état would necessitate increased expenditure on the part of the Province, and an addition to their burdens in the shape of taxation. The statements of His Honour were certainly deceitful.

MR. HOLTON: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Lieutenant-Governor had adopted a hypocritical and lying course in the interest of his friends in the Federal Government, and in connivance, and in conspiracy with them. I understood this to be the substance of his statement, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to repeat the same in English.

MR. OUMET, in English, said he had not precisely stated that the present Ministry here was a party to the kind of conspiracy which had brought about the perpetration of what he considered to be a constitutional outrage on the people of the Province of Quebec. The first paragraph of His Honour's memorandum to the Governor-General set forth that, from the very moment that His Honour had left his colleagues and this Government to go to Quebec, he became convinced, on looking into the affairs of the Province, that everything was wrong, and that he had to put everything right, and that this was his duty to His Excellency and the Crown, of which he was the representative. His Honour also represented that he had advised his Ministers in this direction a great many times, but that they would never listen to his counsel. This he (Mr. Ouimet) held was sufficient to, make them believe, or, at least, infer that when Mr. Letellier went to Quebec, he went there as a partizan of this Government, with all the prejudices which he had accumulated during a long career of active political life. Whether His Honour had acted in good faith or not, his idea was that everything was to be changed, and it appeared that the only parties who were to benefit from this state of opinion, and of these acts, were members of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, and in this House. This might be insulting, and and he supposed that the hon. member for Chateauguay wished to convey that impression.

MR. HOLTON: It is open to construction, but it appeared to me that your statement in French, involved the very grave charge against the Government here, of having conspired with the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. I understood that the charge was made first against the Lieutenant-Governor for having acted entirely in the interest of his political party and friends, and then against the members of this Government of having conspired with His Honour in order to bring about this crisis in Quebec.

MR. OUMET said he had repeated in English the substance of what he had stated in French.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have simply to say that if the hon. gentleman did make the charge which my hon. friend from Chateauguay says he did, it was only a part of what is called bearing false witness against one's neighbours.

MR. OUMET said he begged to state distinctly that he had said nothing in French other than what he had stated in English; and he thought he had made his statements in Parliamentary form. What the hon. the Premier had stated, might justify one in thinking that Parliamentary phrases meant little. One could not, in accordance with the rules of the House, call a man a liar; but one could say that a member was bearing false witness against his neighbour. He did not thoroughly understand all the secrets of the English language; but, as he had so many occasions for making the same statement to the hon. gentleman, he was greatly obliged to him (Mr. Mackenzie) for having suggested to him this mode of conveying that idea. They had heard so many statements from the hon. gentleman, and so many emphatic denials, and so many affirmations, which had been subsequently proven to have been rash assertions, and to be—well, bearing false witness, for he supposed that this was now the proper expression, that it was fortunate to have this mode of characterizing them. He had never before thought he could tell a man to his face that he was a liar; and this had been done to him, who, though not Prime Minister of the Crown, considered his honour as important, and pure, and unable to be attacked as that of any member of the House. And he hoped that he would never be Prime Minister of the Dominion, if he was to have the reputation for rectitude and truthfulness which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had acquired since he had occupied his present high position. It was very well to insult a young member, and his influence in the House might not be very great; but, after all, a man could live an honourable life without being either a member of this House or a member of this Government. He would say more: that some of the hon. gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches would stand higher in public estimation if they had never attained their present positions, because the people had learned to know the standard of morality and honour according to which these hon. gentlemen lived. He sincerely wished that, if he were to have the same destiny as these hon. gentlemen, he would never again be returned to this Parliament. He had spoken in as Parliamentary a phrase as possible while expressing his opinions on the great Constitutional question which was before the House. He never meant to insult anyone, and did not expect to be insulted by anyone. His first proposition was that this Parliament had a right to discuss the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in the exercise of his prerogative, in the position to which he had been appointed by the present Government; and if His Honour exercised his prerogative in a sense contrary to the spirit of our Constitution, and contrary to the form and spirit of the instructions which he received from the Governor-General in Council, he held that this Parliament had a right to discuss His Honour's conduct, and to express an opinion, whether in the form of censure or in approbation of it. They had before the House the different documents which contained the whole question to be considered, viz.: the memorandum of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, and the memorandum of the late First Minister of the Province, Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville, who was dismissed. He maintained that the Government here, acted hypocritically in endeavouring to cover up its responsibility, and in doing so in the eyes of its partizans who wished to act in good faith, and of those who in Upper Canada were the political friends of the hon. the first Minister, but who were nevertheless prouder to say that they were the political descendants and heirs of Mr. Baldwin, and of the old leaders of the Reform Party in Upper Canada. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie), acted hypocritically in seeking to cover up his responsibility, under these circumstances, and in declaring that it was not opportune to discuss in this House the conduct of his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, because at the present time, the Joly Ministry were appealing to the country. He held that the Lieutenant-Governor and the Joly Ministry were two separate parties. They had nothing to do with the Joly Ministry, whom the electors had to judge; but the Lieutenant-Governor was not responsible to the people, but only to the authorities who appointed him to his position, in the same manner that the Governor-General in the exercise of his prerogative, was not responsible to the people of Canada, but simply to the Imperial Government which appointed him; and which gave him the instructions that His Excellency was obliged to follow. He maintained in the third place that in the exercise of his royal prerogative, Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had conducted himself in an arbitrary and partizan manner, and further that the reasons which His Honour had given in his memorandum in justification for his action, were utterly futile and could not be entertained by any enlightened man, who was zealous of the privileges and liberties which he enjoyed by virtue of the Constitution with which this country was endowed. These reasons were unworthy of consideration on the part of any man who believed that the people and not the Lieutenant-Governor nor the Crown governed. They had, it was true, a Lieutenant-Governor at Quebec, the same as there was a Governor-General here, and Her Majesty the Queen in England, as the head of the Executive, but with regard to all questions of legislation, and all matters that touched the interests of the people, these personages had nothing to do, they had nothing to say with respect to the manner in which the people deemed it proper to govern themselves, or to impose, or not to impose, taxes; and in consequence of these facts, he held that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had no right to intervene with respect to the policy of the DeBoucherville Government which was supported by the great majority of the people of Lower Canada. The conduct of His Honour could only have been prompted by partizan zeal, for he could not believe that His Honour had acted simply in obedience to inclinations and a spirit of demoralisation that previously existed in him. He considered that the greatest insult which could be offered to His Honour, would be to say, that in the exercise of his prerogative in this fashion, he (Mr. Letellier) had simply followed the instincts and promptings of his nature. He believed, on the contrary, that he had left Ottawa inspired by bitter political prejudices, the accumulation of warm political struggles and a long political career, and with the consciousness that the Liberal Party would be exterminated politically at the approaching general elections of the Dominion; and with the intention that if ever opportunity offered for changing the state of things—as His Honour mentioned in his memorandum—which then existed in the Province of Quebec—and bringing his party into power—and he supposed this could also be naturally inferred—and aiding them in carrying the Federal Elections, he would render that immense service, not to the country, for it was proved that this act on the contrary would only impose a burden of one-half million more of debt on the Province, but to his party. His Honour desired to bring about the state of things which now existed at Ottawa, and which, according to His Honour, ought also to exist in Quebec. This House would assume a great responsibility towards posterity if it approved of this arbitrary act of His Honour. If Lieutenant-Governor Letellier could to-day dismiss his Ministers without incurring censure or running any risk, he could not see why, after the next turn of the political tide, a Conservative Lieutenant-Governor could not be sent to Quebec; and in case the Joly Ministry then chanced to be in power, turn them out. What could the Liberals say to this, if they now approved of His Honour's conduct. The hon. gentlemen opposite said that the members of the Opposition were Tories, and reminded them of the arbitrary acts of which the Tories were ready to approve in the time of George III. They were Tories, but not the Tories of a hundred years ago. They were simply Liberal-Conservatives; that was to say, they inherited the traditions of Sir L. Hypolite Lafontaine; but since 1873, instead of doing like Papineau, dreaming of Utopias impregnated with the Republican ideas of France and the United States, and of annexation to the American Republic, they had followed a different course. Hypolite Lafontaine said that since, with the blood of their countrymen, they had conquered all the grandeur and the privileges of the British Constitution, there was nothing else to do but to endeavour to work at this Constitution and make it bear fruit for the prosperity of their country in general, and of the nationality in particular. Hence Hypolite Lafontaine, and Mr. Morin, and Sir George Cartier had deemed it proper to follow constitutional traditions—traditions which they had preserved in the Liberal-Conservative Party. There was much more liberality and breadth of view in the Liberal-Conservative than in the Liberal Party; for, after all, the Liberals of Lower Canada were the same as the Liberals of all other countries. What was a Liberal? A Liberal was one who wished to have liberty at the expense of the liberty of everyone else; and this was the Liberalism of hon. gentlemen opposite, who trampled under foot the rights of others, in order to boast that they themselves were free: that was to say, free to do evil, and this was Liberalism everywhere, in religion as well as in politics. These hon. gentlemen wanted liberty to do evil as well as good; the liberty to abuse the rights of others, and to accomplish the interests of the moment, no matter by what means. This was the Liberalism of these hon. gentlemen. The Liberals said that the Tories of Lower Canada were hypocrites, who made use of religion for mere political purposes. It was true that the Conservative party had the glory of possessing the assistance of the clergy since the time of Hypolite Lafontaine, and even previously; but those who said that the Conservatives were the servants of the Catholic clergy lied. The Catholic clergy were the allies of the Conservatives, but why? Because in Conservative principles they had the stability of Catholic principles; because, in these principles, they had liberty and liberality, a liberality which was shown to each and to all; because they had respect for the traditions of their ancestors, and never denied them from day to day, according to the demands of the moment, as did a certain member of the Government, who was now in the House, and who had the evening previous confessed that when he committed his follies he was a mere boy, although he (Mr. Ouimet) believed that the people who had known the hon. the Minister of Justice for a long time still considered him a mere boy. The hon. gentleman had, some years ago, a great reputation, and no one regretted more than himself (Mr. Ouimet) that this reputation, of which he was so proud as a French Canadian, and as a member of the Bar of Montreal, had disappeared. He was to-day really confused and humiliated to see that this man as he had aged, had lost so much of that nerve which had distinguished him in his youth. To-day the hon. gentleman was not a Tory, but a taré, no one should regret the écartades of his youth, especially when they were prompted by noble sentiments. He could never have believed that the hon. the Minister of Justice would care to say that, when he did what he had done, he did not know what he did.

MR. LAFLAMME: I never said, and I never pretended that I was ashamed of what I had done at that time. I simply said that I was then young. If one is not a Republican at the age of 20 years, he is condemned to be a fossil at the age of 45.

MR. OUMET: It is in this manner that the hon. gentleman has finished. I would rather have remained a Republican as at 20, than to have become a fossil at 45; and, above all, to have said what the hon. gentleman had stated in this House.

MR. LAFLAMME: These are mere personalities.

MR. OUMET said that they were political personalities. He believed that he had sufficiently demonstrated that this question was one of great importance to the House; and that if a verdict of approval of the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was rendered by the majority of the House, it would be disastrous in the future as respected our free institutions. Such a verdict ought to be deeply regretted by the majority of the citizens in all parts of the Dominion. He hoped that this precedent would not be elsewhere followed in this country. He had heard it frequently stated by a great number of the members from Ontario, that such an act in the Province of Ontario would be followed by rebellion and émeutes, and that a Government which would take the reins of power, under the circumstances in which the Joly Administration had acceded to power, would be driven ignominiously from office by the people, and replaced by those in whom the people had confidence. He could not terminate his remarks without protesting against the statement of the Minister of Inland Revenue, that the Conservatives were people who did not understand what Responsible Government was. He believed that the debate which had been carried on by members of the Opposition, would amply prove to the satisfaction of the House, that the Conservatives did know what constituted Responsible Government. If, in the past, and 100 years ago, those who bore this name were extravagant (outrés) admirers of the privileges of the Crown, those who had succeeded them had made rapid progress, and were committed to the support of the proper working of the principles of the English Constitution, and especially of the principles of Responsible Government; and, above all, by their warm attachment to these principles they had secured the deep esteem and admiration of all true lovers of their principles and their nationality.

MR. COSTIGAN said he fully understood the very great importance of the question which had so long engaged the attention of the House. No greater proof of this could be required before the country than the fact that the able, the eloquent, and the forcible speech of the right hon. member for Kingston had, as yet, remained unanswered before the House; and no greater proof as to the force of the case now presented to the House and country could be had, than the fact that no hon. gentleman among the able gentlemen who held seats on the Treasury benches and the eloquent gentlemen who supported these Ministers, was found who would even consider the question from a constitutional point of view, or attempt to meet the arguments of the right hon. member for Kingston. He dwelt on the dismissal of his Ministry by Governor Gordon of New Brunswick. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries was leader of that Government; he had for his colleague the hon. member for Charlotte, and himself (Mr. Costigan) was a member of the House supporting the Government. Against the action of the Governor twenty-two members of the House led by the leader of the Government sent an address to Her Majesty complaining in the strongest way of the Governor's conduct. Surely men who could so act in a matter affecting their own Province could not take a different course when a similar outrage had been committed in Quebec. The reason hon. gentlemen opposite had not come forward to defend Mr. Letellier was because they knew they had a hard case. There was this similarity between the cases of Quebec and New Brunswick—that while the Governor in both cases refused to be advised by those who were the legal and constitutional advisers, they were accused, he would not say with how much truth, of having taken counsel other than those entitled to give them counsel. Besides, the hon. Mr. Smith at that time complained of difficulty in the transmission of documents, and that the answers he gave at one time bore a very different interpretation in the papers next day. He (Mr. Costigan) regretted to say that a fair expression of opinion had not been given in the New Brunswick case, and he challenged any one to say that if the people of New Brunswick had been appealed to three-fourths of them would not have given the high-handed conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor their entire condemnation. The reason it was not so condemned was that other influence was brought to bear, and the question tried was not one of constitutionality, but of Confederation, and many were prevented from giving their moral support to the cause of justice during the struggle because of strong political reasons. In the same way, be believed, that some hon. gentlemen would be prevented from voting for the amendment, though it was very mildly and judiciously drawn up. It had been kept free of every political character in order that the House might pronounce an impartial judgment on the course taken by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. He hoped he might not be considered offensive if he said that political feelings might enter into the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side in giving their opinions. He thought that after all it was a benefit to the country that the hon. the Premier had resisted the desire of the minority for an adjournment, because if that request had been complied with only one side of the question would have appeared on the records, and that would have been in favour of the amendment. He thought no more serious a question could have been discussed by the House than that now under consideration, and no graver opposition could have been offered to any question than that with which this amendment was met. If the House approved of the action taken by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, it would be impossible for the people of any Province of the Dominion to maintain free, independent Responsible Government. It must be quite evident to any man possessed of common sense that if the House endorsed the principle laid down by Lieut.-Governor Letellier, they would be endorsing a most dangerous one. The whole case amounted to this, that Mr. Letellier, finding a Conservative Government in Quebec, and finding, also, that he could not, as a Liberal, concur in their administration of affairs, dismissed them. Now, in order to show the unfairness of such a proceeding, he would suppose a case—a very unlikely one, no doubt. Let them suppose—what was certainly very unlikely—that the Liberal leader of Quebec should be returned with a very great majority, and that Mr. Joly had succeeded in forming a Government there. Then suppose, also, that under a new state of things a Conservative Government was formed in Ottawa, and that the Lieut.-Governor of Quebec was also a Conservative, the latter might, after the same fashion, go down to the Province of Quebec, and, saying that he did not approve of the legislation of its Liberal Government there, might dismiss them. Would hon. gentlemen opposite approve of such a proceeding? He opined they would not. If this kind of proceeding was allowed to go on, a Liberal or Conservative Central Government might control the whole of the Local Legislatures as they pleased, through the Lieut.-Governors, exercising those powers which they undoubtedly possessed. With regard to the character of the hon. gentleman who had given rise to this long and important discussion, he would not attempt to say one word which might be considered offensive, as he did not think he could there by strengthen his argument. The hon. member for Montreal Centre, being a lawyer, was well able to handle a bad case, but he (Mr. Costigan) was surprised that the late Minister of Justice, the hon. member for South Bruce, should not say anything regarding the matter under consideration. This was to be regretted, because it was generally the case that the hon. member for Montreal Centre imagined he found new light, and, in the present instance, he had failed to do so. He hoped these few remarks would be taken in good part by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, whose speech, he might remark, was not intended to wound the feelings of any one. He had expected that, after the able manner in which the discussion had been opened by the hon. member for Kingston, points of constitutional law would be taken up by members on both sides of the House, and elucidated. As far as hon. members on the Opposition side were concerned, his anticipations had been fully realized, but he regretted to say that the heads of the Government party had remained silent.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he did not intend offering any observations on the question now before the House, and should not have done so, but that the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, who had addressed himself to the subject with great ability, had made special reference to himself, in regard to transactions which took place in his (Mr. Smith's) Province, to show that the action he was now about to take would place him in a false and inconsistent position. He thought that he should satisfy the House that it would place him in no such position, for the action he took in New Brunswick he was ready to defend now. He thought this, and the other case, quoted by the hon. member, were precedents that rather justified Mr. Letellier than otherwise. The first case took place in New Brunswick in 1856, when the Lieut.-Governor, Mr. Manners-Sutton, dismissed his Ministry. Mr. Todd had referred to this case, and, as that author described it, better, perhaps, than he (Mr. Smith) could do, it would be as well for him to read it.

"In 1855 a Prohibitory Liquor Law was passed by the New Brunswick Legislature. But the Act proved to be wholly inoperative, and incapable of enforcement. Whereupon the Lieut.-Governor, J. H. Manners-Sutton, without expressing any opinion upon the principle of Prohibitory Legislation, sent a memorandum to his Ministers in which he expressed his conviction that a continuance of the existing condition of affairs was fraught with peril to the best interests of the community, and called for immediate remedy. He, therefore, suggested a dissolution of Parliament with a view to a decided expression of public opinion in favour of, or in opposition to, the Prohibitory principle. Ministers dissented altogether from His Excellency's conclusions, and would not advise a dissolution. Further correspondence ensued without a change of opinion on either side. Finally, the Lieut.-Governor stated that as he "never contemplated a dissolution of the Assembly without the concurrence of responsible advisers" he claimed that either the Executive Council should assume the responsibility for the issue of a proclamation of dissolution or that they should retire, and enable him to seek for other advisers who would consent to this Act. As Ministers still demurred to either course, His Excellency directed the Provincial Secretary to prepare and countersign a proclamation dissolving the Assembly. His request was complied with, but, immediately afterwards, the Ministry resigned. The Governor requested them to retain office until their successors were appointed. In nine days he notified them that he had succeeded in forming a new Administration, who, agreeing with him in the necessity for an immediate dissolution of Parliament, were prepared to resume responsibility for the same."

Now, in this case, as they were aware, the Government had a very large majority, and the Liquor Bill was introduced by Mr. Tilley, who was a member of the Government as well as himself, and it properly passed. The Lieut.-Governor asked them to take the responsibility of dissolution, but they refused; in a few days, however, they thought it best to do so, and dissolution took place. The people were appealed to, and they sustained both the Lieut.-Governor and the Government, and when Parliament again met, resolutions, approving of the course taken by the Lieut.-Governor, were passed, so, as far as the people were concerned, they approved of the constitutionality of the principle. The Imperial Government was appealed to that time, but they did not remove Mr. M. Sutton, nor even censure him. He argued, therefore, that this precedent was in favour of the course pursued by Mr. Letellier. Then, with regard to the other case, they found it entirely dissimilar to the one under discussion. In that case, a dissolution took place, and the country was appealed to on the question of Confederation, and a decisive opinion was given upon it, notwithstanding which, the Lieut.-Governor (Mr. Gordon) dissolved Parliament. They complained that, inasmuch as the people had decided upon that question, he had no right to dissolve again. They petitioned the Queen with regard to it, charging the Lieut.-

Governor with moral turpitude and misconduct, and with having consulted, behind their backs, with their political opponents. The people afterwards sustained the Government and approved of his conduct; so this, too, was surely a precedent in favour of Mr. Letellier. Her Majesty did not displace the Lieut.-Governor, although he had done a worse act than Mr. Letellier. The ground he (Mr. Smith) had taken was this: he did not consider they were called upon to express an opinion as to the constitutionality of the act of Mr. Letellier. He had appealed to the people at the polls; and if they approved of his conduct, should not that influence this House in the course to be adopted? Surely Mr. Joly had assumed the responsibility of that act, he became a particeps criminis; he was on his trial now before the people of Quebec, and was it right that this Parliament should take any action that could prejudice him before the people. They found there was a dispute as to the facts of the case, and surely they ought not, under these circumstances, to prejudice the case. If Mr. Joly had done wrong, the people had power to punish him by dismissal from office; they had no power to dismiss the Lieutenant-Governor, but if they condemned him, it would then be time for this Parliament to act. He believed he had shown that the course he was taking was not inconsistent with his past action, and that it would be approved by his constituents.

MR. ROULEAU criticised Mr. Letellier's objections to Mr. DeBoucherville's conduct and administration, commenting on Mr. DeBoucherville's replies.

MR. HAGGART contended that the Lieutenant-Governor had struck an almost vital blow against the liberties of the people of Quebec, and he was surprised that anyone should attempt to justify it in this House.

MR. POPE said he was a little surprised at the moderation of his right hon. friend in drawing up this motion, as was the hon. the First Minister. He considered this question as one of extremely grave importance, and that a stronger resolution would have been warranted. Their forefathers had fought and struggled for these rights, which now were in danger. And was it to be said that, in the Province of Quebec, these great principles which they had inherited from their forefathers, were to be forgotten and given up, though these rights had been handed down to them unimpaired. At the first moment that this wicked, unconstitutional, unwise and unjust act had come to the knowledge of the hon. the First Minister, he could have remedied the evil, and placed things in the position in which they would have been had there been an honest, Constitutional Government in the Province of Quebec. But the hon. gentleman had not interfered, though he dared not defend the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman had known of this matter a month ago; and he should have restored the late Ministers to the places from which they had been driven by an unjust, an unconstitutional, and a tyrannical act. He felt certain that a majority of the House would vote against the motion, and as positive that a majority of the people would support it. The people would not consider lightly the responsibility assumed by those who opposed this motion. If this sort of thing continued, it would lead to trouble and rebellion. The majority could not be bound down by a tyrant or a power not exercised freely before the law. If the majority of the people's representatives were to be turned in this manner, where was the thing to stop? It was idle to talk about a remedy obtained by an appeal to the people. The railway policy of the late Government of the Province of Quebec had been pronounced on at the polls, and the other questions brought up were hardly worthy of consideration—they were almost ridiculous. He was afraid that the question of taxes would be dwelt on too much, and that the constitutional question would be almost lost sight of. The Liberals had tried to charge the issue that Mr. DeBoucherville was no favourite of his; but he felt that a great injustice had been done to that Minister. He felt very strongly about the way in which Mr. DeBoucherville had been treated. He had always felt it was unfortunate that the Government had built the road from Montreal to Ottawa; that they ought to have given some round subsidy to a company to do it; but that had nothing to do with the case here, whether it was wise or unwise. It had been said that every single farthing raised in the country should have gone on that road, and that the other road should not have got a dollar. He (Mr. Pope) disagreed with this contention, because the faith of the country had been just as much pledged to the other roads as to that one; not, perhaps, to so large an extent, but in a proportionate sum. Under all these circumstances, looking at the position in which the House of Assembly at Quebec stood, with a majority of twenty, he would ask the hon. member for Westmoreland if he could conscientiously say that the Lieutenant-Governor acted wisely? His hon. friend had to say one thing or the other. His hon. friend had objected to the course taken by the Government of New Brunswick in connection with the Prohibitory Liquor Law. The case was not nearly as bad as the Quebec one. Had the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec said to his advisers: You must appeal to the country? That was the position which had been taken by the Governor of New Brunswick. Without expressing any opinion on the principle of prohibitory legislation, the Governor of New Brunswick sent a memorandum to his Ministers expressing his conviction that the continuance of the present state of affairs was fraught with danger to the best interests of the community and called for immediate remedy. He, therefore, suggested a dissolution of Parliament. The Ministers dissented altogether from His Excellency's conclusion and would not advise a dissolution. Was there any comparison between them and the Quebec Ministers?

MR. BOWELL argued that Mr. Letellier had exercised undue pressure in the dismissal of his Ministry.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman will stop now, I will admit that he has convinced me.

MR. BOWELL: Then, resign.

MR. POPE.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Kingston had agreed upon certain conditions upon which an adjournment could be had. The conditions were that the House should adjourn now, and that a vote should be taken without debate on Monday evening, after the trains came in, and that until that hour the House should proceed with other business.

SIR JOHN MACDONALD said he had agreed to those terms, and hoped to have a vote at about ten o'clock on Monday night.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then the understanding is that the debate be adjourned.

Debate adjourned.

THE IMPERIAL CATTLE BILL.

MR. MACKENZIE, in moving the adjournment of the House, said perhaps it might be gratifying to members generally, to know that by a telegram received to-day, from our agent in London, the Government ascertains that the Imperial Government has agreed to a modification of the Cattle Bill in the interests of Canada.

House adjourned at Five minutes past
Six o'clock, p.m., 13th inst.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 15th April, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. MITCHELL said that he had left on Friday last for Montreal, having paired with the hon. member for Lisgar, and he now found that with regard to the motion respecting the Quebec crisis, an arrangement had been entered into to take the vote this evening at ten o'clock, without debate. He did not consider himself bound by any arrangement made by any one for him in this House, and on a subject so important as this. He felt that the circumstances imperatively required him to express his views. His name had been mixed up in the matter, and an incident connected with the political history of his Province had been referred to as an authority and precedent. The name of a gentleman, who was then Governor of New Brunswick, had been mentioned, and as the great political question involved to his mind the future of this country, he felt that he ought to submit his observations on it to the House. He did not desire to protract the discussion, and he would suggest to the hon. the Premier that the order should be called at eight o'clock, after recess, in order that he might express his views and convictions on this important matter. He did not wish to be bound by any arrangement, but at the same time he did not desire to break through such arrangement.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have such an intention. The agreement arrived at, with the leader of the Opposition and by the unanimous assent of the House, was one that ought not to be broken, especially when there was no cause for it, except the hon. gentleman's own absence. The hon. gentleman would have had abundant opportunity for expressing his views on Saturday. He thought that no one should seek to infringe upon this arrangement; but, of course, there was no authority in the House to compel such an arrangement to be adhered to. Under these circumstances the hon. gentleman must take his own course. He could only regret that, under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman should feel it necessary to say anything on the subject.

MR. MITCHELL said he believed that his name had been exempted from this arrangement. He was so informed by the hon. member for North Hastings, who had known that he was anxious to speak on this subject.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the leader of the Opposition had stated that he could not absolutely speak for every person, but that he would feel very much disappointed if any one would feel at liberty to break through this common agreement.

MR. BOWELL said he thought the Premier would recollect that he had used these words:—"I think we can speak positively for all the members of the Opposition then present, but if the irrepressible Peter comes, we cannot guarantee that he will not speak," and the hon. gentleman's answer had been: "Of course, you cannot guarantee him."

MR. MACKENZIE: I quite recollect that; but I had not such a bad opinion of the hon. gentleman as to imagine that he would speak.

MR. BOWELL said he had not said so because he had a bad opinion of the hon. gentleman, whom he knew was very desirous of speaking, and intended to speak with reference to the difficulties that had arisen in his own Province.

MR. MITCHELL said that in justice to the right hon. member for Kingston he felt bound to say that he had a few minutes since mentioned his intention to the right hon. gentleman, who had said he thought he (Mr. Mitchell) ought not to do it. He had told the right hon. gentleman, however, that no person had a right to speak for him in the House; and he felt it was due to himself, to others, and the country, that he should express his opinion on this question.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that this arrangement was made across the floor in good faith; and he considered, of course, that it was obligatory on every hon. gentleman on both sides of the House. He would be disappointed if it was not adhered to, because the debate had not only been exhaustive, but it had also exhausted the members. He had pointed out to the hon. member for Northumberland that if this arrangement had not taken place at 5:30 Saturday afternoon, it was very likely that a division would have taken place before twelve on Saturday night. He thought that the hon. gentleman might easily find another opportunity for making his explanations.

MR. MITCHELL said he had a right to speak, and, if afforded a fair opportunity, he would endeavour to make his remarks as brief as possible.

MR. DEVLIN: It re-opens the whole question.

MR. MITCHELL: Let it be re-opened.

PROPOSED ACQUISITION OF THE GRAND TRUNK, RIVIÈRE DU LOUP BRANCH.

GOVERNMENT NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

That the Government be authorized to enter into an arrangement during the recess with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for acquiring control of the Rivière du Loup branch of the said Company's line, by lease, purchase or otherwise, in order to obtain complete control of the Intercolonial Railway to the City of Quebec. Any such arrangement to be subject to the ratification by Parliament at the next Session.

He said that it was unnecessary to say anything in explanation of this motion, as hon. members generally understood that difficulty was at present experienced by having the Intercolonial Railway terminate at Rivière du Loup, where there was no harbour and no means of transferring traffic, save by means of the Grand Trunk branch, which, through the impecuniosity of the company owning it, had got into such a state that if this winter had not been severe, they would have had exceedingly great difficulty, indeed, in carrying the traffic over it. He did not know how this was to be done during another winter. Many things were to be considered in relation to this matter, which he did not think were fit subjects for discussion; but, as the Government asked for no power but simply for authorization to enter into negotiations, he scarcely imagined that any hon. member would consider it necessary to discuss this matter, or the difficulties connected with it, or the different modes by which this subject might now be accomplished. It was manifestly highly inexpedient, it not highly improper, for him to enter into any such discussion at the present moment; and he hoped that in this the House would generally agree with him.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The question at once arises whether this resolution ought not to be proposed in Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this was precisely the same authority which the late Government had taken with reference to the Windsor Branch Government Railway; and by this Government, with regard to the Truro branch. Authority was given in both instances to alienate this part of the public property or domain, and afterwards the agreement arrived at with the respective companies was submitted to the House and a Bill based on it introduced. The Government would get no power under this resolution to alienate any public money, or land, or domain in any shape, and before this could be done, resolutions must be brought in at the next Session. He did not think it necessary to introduce this motion in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEAKER: This asks particularly for no more than authority to enter into negotiations.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the Government could do what the motion proposed without passing it, and any arrangement made could afterwards be submitted to Parliament. This was connected with a very important matter, and, if pressed, the motion should be considered in Committee.

Mr. HOLTON said that if the resolution meant anything at all, it meant an affirmation by the House of the desirability of entering into these negotiations with the Company in order to reach certain results, which would involve the disposal of public money and public property; therefore, even at this initial stage, the proposition ought to be considered in Committee. Sound practice required this to be done. For his own part he was not disposed at this point of time, without fuller explanations than they had hitherto received, to affirm the desirability of any possible arrangement whatever being made in respect to the acquisition of the Rivière du Loup Branch of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. A good case might be made out, but it had not as yet been made out. The resolution affirmed that it was desirable to get possession of this road by lease or purchase; and it would authorize the Government, without full explanations, to enter into such negotiation during recess, and any arrangement made was to be submitted at the next Session. It would then be placed before members who were not exactly free agents. Owing to the pressure that a Government could bring to bear in order to secure the adoption and confirmation of their acts, it became then, whatever the Government might do during recess, a question of confidence in the Government, and he did not think that this was a position in which the House ought to be placed with respect to a matter in the inchoate position in which this proposition now was. He did not know what arguments might be produced in favour of getting possession of this road; but for his own part, though he was open to conviction, yet, as at present advised, he did not think it necessary, or essential, or that it would be useful to the Dominion, to procure control of this road on any probable terms. This was his conviction, and therefore he held that if the matter was to be submitted to them at all, full explanation of the reasons why such negotiations should be entered into should be made to the House.

Mr. BLANCHET said that the resolution proposed the acquisition of control of the Rivière du Loup branch by lease or purchase; and the hon. member for Chateauguay knew very well that traffic was not carried over this portion of the line as expeditiously at the present moment as was desirable, owing to the bad state in which it was. The step proposed was only initiative, and he did not suppose that it pledged the expenditure of any sum of money. Everything would depend on the conditions to be submitted to the next Parliament. As far as the submission of resolutions in the Committee was concerned, he thought that it was the safest mode even though no expenditure was demanded. Moreover it was known that the Government could not acquire control of this branch without expenditure.

Mr. BOWELL said that his hon. friend from Bellechasse had not caught the objection of the hon. member for Chateauguay. He thought that this resolution clearly affirmed that it was desirable to acquire this section of the Grand Trunk Railway by either lease or purchase; and if it was passed without any information in reference to the necessity of obtaining this road being given, the House was committed to that declaration; and it seemed to him that they ought not to be asked to affirm this principle without full discussion and investigation into the matter. Various points had suggested themselves to members of this House as reasons why this should be done. There were many arguments, he knew, in favour of acquiring that section of road, but he was not prepared to enter into a discussion of these at the present time. He thought the Premier would see the force of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Chateauguay, in reference to pledging the House to the necessity of acquiring a portion of any road without explanation of any kind.

Mr. SPEAKER asked if the hon. gentleman meant that it was absolutely necessary for the consideration of this particular point that the House should go into Committee, there being no details submitted but simply an abstract proposition.

Mr. BOWELL said he was not prepared to state that it was absolutely necessary. He was not discussing that point, however, and would leave the question of order entirely in the hands of Mr. Speaker. It was quite clear that, as this resolution affirmed a principle, the House should have an opportunity to discuss it, and, perhaps it might be well to have a full discussion in Committee.

Mr. BLAKE said that as far as precedents went, the hon. the Premier was warranted in pursuing the course which he proposed to adopt. He apprehended, indeed, from what had transpired formerly, that his hon. friend was justified in intimating to the House the views which he had expressed. Notwithstanding that, however, he (Mr. Blake) would venture to submit whether the whole legitimate purpose that could be secured by such an intimation had not been accomplished and the force of these precedents taken away as far as this particular transaction was concerned. He thought it an undesirable thing that the House should be asked to affirm in advance the desirability of accomplishing a particular transaction when next Session, after making this affirmation, Parliament would have to consider whether the terms were desirable. Indeed, the whole question was one of terms. After the intimation which had been given to the House, it was of course competent to any hon. member to dissent from the policy proposed, even to propose a resolution. He believed the general opinion of the House was that some arrangement should be made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but it was difficult to determine in advance what arrangement should be made without knowing the terms.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would like to know whether the precedents cited had originated in Committee, and been concurred in afterwards. It was admitted that the Intercolonial Railway would not be a complete railway till the acquisition of this line was effected. That was his own individual opinion, and he had always expressed the same thing to hon. gentlemen privately and in the House as well. There was a great deal of force in what the hon. member for North Bruce said, as to these precedents being vicious, that they committed the House in advance without the Government being committed. This was a matter in which public revenue and property were concerned, whether the acquisition of the road was made by purchase, lease or some other method. When, therefore, the Government came down with their proposition, they should be able to submit a message from the Crown assenting thereto. The hon. gentleman who introduced it, however, had said he did not consider it right, under the circumstances, to go into detail until he got some authority from the House to proceed. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) considered that that was putting the cart before the horse. In propositions of this kind, where any surrender of money or money's worth was concerned, the Government should get their plans affirmed before they came down to the House with them. The House did not know what sort of arrangement was to be made, whether it was to be a running arrangement, the surrender of the line, or an absolute purchase; or whether an annual payment for lease should be made, instead of making a purchase. Then, as to the point of order, he thought that if the hon. gentleman were to persist in his motion, the House should be allowed to go into Committee, so that hon. gentlemen might give expression to their views. It was rather a serious matter for the House to be asked to concur in the proposition without a single word of explanation.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was quite impossible that he could enter into any explanations at present, because he would have to discuss the whole subject in anticipation; and whether Mr. Speaker should rule it out of order or not, he should absolutely decline to enter into details. He would content himself with having given hon. members an opportunity of expressing their views, and he understood the general opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite were rather hostile to any arrangement. It was purely a matter of business, not a political question at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You cannot expect it to be a political matter; personally, I am in favour of it.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be absurd for him to put the railway authorities in possession of his views, and, under the circumstances, he would withdraw his motion.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought the remarks made by the hon. the First Minister were concurred in by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. For his own part, he was entirely in favour of the country getting possession of the portion of the road referred to, and such also was the opinion of other hon. gentlemen with whom he had conversed. There was nothing like a hostile feeling towards the proposal—quite the contrary. He agreed with the Premier in thinking that it would be improper for him to enter into a free discussion of this matter, because as there were strong reasons for obtaining the line, there might also be strong reasons against it. Every argument which the Premier could bring forward in favour of the scheme might be used against him by the railway company when he endeavoured to negotiate with them. He did not think it desirable that anything should be done which would interfere with the successful carrying through of an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. Premier must recollect that the objection taken to the course he was pursuing did not come from the Opposition side, but from the hon. member for Chateaugay. There was no desire on their part to obstruct the arrangement, and hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, instead of expressing themselves as being hostile to it had remarked that it was absolutely essential that the acquisition should be made for the safe working of the Intercolonial road. The belief was that if the Government were not hampered, the Premier would be able to make a better arrangement than otherwise during the recess, subject, of course, to the approval of the House next Session.

MR. BLAKE.

MR. HOLTON said he thought the First Minister had acted wisely in withdrawing his motion. By doing so his hand would not be exposed, and if the Government thought the public interest would be best served by obtaining possession of this road, it would be their duty to submit a proposition of that kind to the House. It seemed to him that if the House had now affirmed, that it was necessary or expedient to acquire this road, the advantage would be all on the side of the parties with whom the Government would have to negotiate. These parties would be in a position to say: "The Parliament of Canada says, it wants this road; it cannot get on without it, or make its own lines productive or useful in any other way, ergo we will take advantage of the position and obtain all we can." He thought the logical effect of offering this motion, by his hon. friend the First Minister, was simply to give notice to the House that if reasonable propositions were submitted to him during the recess, he would enter into negotiations subject to the approval of Parliament.

Motion, withdrawn.

NORTHERN RAILWAY FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Tuesday to consider the following resolution:

"That it is expedient that the Government be authorized to subscribe the sum of £15,000 sterling first mortgage bonds of the Northern Railway Company of Canada, at the rate of ninety per cent., in satisfaction of the sum of £13,500 sterling, being balance remaining due by the said company to the Dominion of Canada."

He said the nature of the transaction was as follows: The House would remember that last year they agreed to accept for certain third mortgage bonds of the Company, amounting to £50,000 accumulating interest, the sum of £45,000 sterling, or thereabouts, and also a further sum of as nearly as might be £6,000, in liquidation of claims against the company, making a total of £51,000. This sum, together with a large amount in first mortgage bonds and certain other claims, was to be raised by issuing first mortgage bonds of the company, intended to be issued in London. Owing to the state of the money market, the company were unable to negotiate these bonds as they intended, in the ordinary way, and, after considerable delay, the second bondholders, of whom the Government formed part, agreed partially voluntarily and partially by assessment, to raise this sum. They applied to the Government of Canada in its capacity of second bondholders to the amount of £50,000, to allow an assessment to be made on them for a certain part of the amount, and, after some negotiations, the Government now recommended Parliament to subscribe £15,000 in lieu of the sum of £13,500, the balance remaining due. Technically, this would be that Parliament agreed to accept £38,000 plus £15,000 on stock at 90, on first mortgage bonds, in liquidation of their claim of £51,000, or thereabouts. It appeared to him that, under the circumstances, and looking at the fact that a good many of the second bondholders were voluntarily raising large sums, it would not be well for Parliament to throw cold water on the transaction; besides which, the first mortgage bonds were an undoubted security, and the rate of interest which they would pay,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., would make it a very tolerable investment as things were going.

MR. BLAKE: I understand, then, that we have received the cash for all but £13,000, for which we are to receive £15,000 first mortgage bonds.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That is the exact position. They have paid over the £38,000, and this is the balance.

MR. BOWELL: Why was the balance not paid also?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Technically, they proposed to do so. The reason they did not was the very considerable difficulties, owing to the condition of the money market, which were experienced in floating the first mortgage bonds. In order to obviate this, a number of the second bondholders volunteered to become purchasers of these bonds; but I may add that a number refused to consent to this if the Government of Canada did not subscribe. I think, under the circumstances, and considering that we have got nearly £40,000 in cash out of the affair, and a good security, that it is a reasonable investment to make.

DUTY ON MALT BILL.

(Mr. Laurier.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. LAURIER said he would simply call the attention of the House to the provisions made in this Bill, to secure the collection of the excise duty on imported malt. It was provided that as soon as malt was imported it should be at once warehoused in bond, and that when it was taken out of bond the same excise duty should be paid on it as was paid on malt made in Canada. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read the second time.

MR. LAURIER moved that the House go into Committee on this Bill.

MR. BOWELL: If any objection be taken to this proceeding, can it proceed?

MR. SPEAKER: I am not prepared to say that.

MR. BOWELL said he merely wished to understand precisely the rule on this point, and not to take any such objection.

MR. SPEAKER: Our rule prohibits the reading of a Bill twice on the same day.

MR. BOWELL: Or the taking of two stages.

MR. SPEAKER: No. It says that two stages may be taken.

MR. MACKENZIE: A Bill may be advanced two or more stages in one day.

MR. BOWELL: It may be read three times in one day.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In case of urgency.

MR. SPEAKER said that the very frequent practice of the House had been to go into Committee of the Whole immediately after the second reading, where it was desirable to carry a Bill through rapidly, and to this practice no objection had been taken, so far as he was aware.

MR. HOLTON said that this was especially the case with regard to Bills like this, which originated in Committee of the Whole, and were founded on resolutions. Of course he could readily understand that, with regard to a Bill of an important character, and containing a great many clauses not originated in Committee, it might be considered objectionable to go into Committee at once; and, although he did not think that the rules of the House could be invoked against it, this might then be claimed to be an inconvenient practice. He thought that only one reading could be taken in any one day.

MR. SPEAKER: I think that has always been the rule, and I consider it the correct rule; but, if a measure for the appropriation of public moneys or the imposition of taxes were under consideration, I should certainly suggest to the hon. Minister in charge of it that it ought not to proceed more than one stage each day.

MR. BOWELL said his impression had been that, in the past, when objection had been taken to any two stages being proceeded with in one day, it had been sustained by the Chair; and, for the obvious reason that every possible opportunity should be given to object to or discuss any measure before the House, whether important or otherwise. Rule 43 stated that every Bill should receive the three readings on three different days, though on urgent or extraordinary occasions, a Bill might be read twice or thrice or advanced two or more stages in one day. This was permissive; and, if it meant anything, it simply meant permission to do that which otherwise could not be done.

MR. HOLTON: No doubt two readings can only be taken the same day by unanimous consent.

MR. BOWELL said that the only matter in dispute referred to two stages being taken in the day. To read a Bill a second time, and then to go into Committee were certainly two stages; but if this were ruled by the Chair, to be only one reading, this was an end to the matter.

MR. BLAKE said that there was no express statement in the rule that each stage should be proceeded with on a separate day. Of course, the rule was not very well written, but he considered that the rule permitted that to be done which was proposed.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that May stated that a Bill might be recommitted as often as the House thought fit to do so; the report could be received at once, and the Bill, as amended, should be ordered to be taken into consideration on a future day. He now referred to the action taken concerning the previous Bill, and he held that the amendments should have been considered on a future day.

MR. SPEAKER: The authority is a little too late. The amendments had all been passed, and the question was on the third reading when the hon. member raised the objection.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I beg your Honour's pardon; I said "to-morrow."

MR. SPEAKER: On the third reading.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I did so on both occasions.

MR. SPEAKER: When a Bill comes out of Committee, it is open to any hon. member to take that objection. The hon. member took the objection on the third reading, but the authority cited did not apply to the other reading, though it did to the other stage.

MR. BLAKE: And even then the House has the power to consider the amendments at once.

MR. SPEAKER: Of course.

MR. BOWELL said that it was then quite clear that the minority had no protection under these rules of the House, as the majority could at any time declare any motion to be urgent and extraordinary. Any objection taken by a member of the minority would have no effect if the majority thought proper to overrule it, and, no doubt, they would do so, if the majority was such a one as they had at present.

MR. BLAKE said he thought that this was a very objectionable observation, and one that was not justified by anything that had taken place during the past five Sessions, when Ministers had continually yielded when it was proposed to defer discussion until a later day, if there was any objection taken. He thought that at present it was extremely convenient, at this late stage of the Session, to proceed more rapidly, in order to send bills up to the other branch of the Legislature, which, of course, was now the object of the Government.

MR. BOWELL: I am very glad that the hon. member for South Bruce has taken the Government under his wing. No doubt, they will now get on better.

MR. BLAKE: I only repudiate the allusion made by the hon. member to the majority.

MR. BOWELL: That does not change the fact.

House resolved itself into Committee on said Bill.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

MR. SPEAKER reported that a Message had been received from the Senate, acquainting that House that they have agreed to the Address to His Excellency the Governor-General, expressing the deep feeling of the regret of that House at his approaching departure from Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE moved :

That the said Joint Address be presented on the part of this House by such members as are of the Honorable the Privy Council.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL

[Mr. Laflamme ]

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

MR. LAFLAMME moved that the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction that they have power to amend the same by substituting the following for the first sub-section of the first section thereof:

MR. BLAKE.

(a) No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary in the service of the Government of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance or emolument or profit of any kind is attached.

(b) No person entitled to any superannuation or retiring allowance from the Government of Canada.

(c) No Sheriff, Registrar of Deeds, Clerk of the Peace, or County Crown Attorney in any of the Provinces of Canada, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote therein.

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he very much regretted that the hon. Minister of Justice had not thrown out the clause rendering ineligible men in receipt of Government pensions. The only argument that had been brought forward in its favour was, that these officers who had been superannuated might be called upon to perform some Government service. There was not a single instance where an officer had been called upon to do service after his superannuation; therefore, why should they not consider it as not in the Act. In England a special Act of Parliament had been passed to remove all doubts with regard to men receiving Government pensions being eligible.

MR. IRVING said that in respect to the law of England, the Act referred to by the hon. member for Kingston did not refer to all pensions.

MR. BLAKE said they were only considering certain amendments now, and this discussion would more properly come upon the third reading.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.*CANADA PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 52.](Mr. Taschereau.)THIRD READING.

Order for consideration of amendments made in Committee on said Bill read.

MR. MACKENZIE said the amendment simply rendered it obligatory to have any lease sanctioned by the House.

MR. LANGEVIN said this Bill met one of the objections made the other day, but it did not meet the other objection, that the Government asked leave to make arrangements with a company which had no direct connection with Lake Superior.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is discussing a thing not before the House. There is no company mentioned here. The House will pass upon that when it will be brought down. We are simply asking authority to make an arrangement to submit to the House.

MR. LANGEVIN said, if this Bill were not passed, the Government could still make an arrangement with that or any company, subject to the approval of Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: The law officers say not.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood the law officers, or he must have asked the question in another shape, namely: whether an agreement made by the Government with such company would be binding before being ratified by Parliament. But the Government could enter into negotiations with any company, and draw up the terms of agreement to be submitted to Parliament. If the Government had not that right, they would not exist at all; they would have no power whatever.

Order for the House to resolve itself into Committee on said Bill read.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that having considered the provisions of the Bill, it seemed to him that if passed in its present shape, it would cause very serious losses to creditors of insolvent insurance companies. If he understood the provisions of the Bill aright, it was intended to facilitate the winding up of the affairs of insurance companies, so that the assets of those companies might be more speedily distributed to the creditors than was possible under the present system. He found that in the 12th clause it was provided that:—

“Holders of policies or contracts for insurance on which no loss has accrued shall be entitled to claim as creditors for any loss which may accrue during the continuance of the risk within six-months after the issue of the writ of attachment, or the making of the assignment; and in case no such loss accrues, for a part of the premium paid proportionate to the period of their policies or contracts respectively expired at the end of the said period of six months; and such claims shall rank with judgments obtained and claims accrued in the distribution of the assets: Provided always, that whenever the company, or the holder of the policy or contract of insurance, exercises any right which it or he may have to cancel the policy or contract, the holder of the policy or contract shall be entitled to claim as a creditor for the sum which, under the terms of the policy or contract is due to him upon such cancellation.”

Now, while that clause provided very effectually for the class of creditors who might claim as having sustained losses under the terms of their policies, he thought it did not provide sufficiently for the claims of those policy holders, who might choose on the insolvency of a company to reinsure with other companies; and he submitted that, in passing a bill of this kind, it was necessary to provide for the interests of that class of creditors. He would call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to the case of a local company which became insolvent during the past summer—he referred to the Provincial Insurance Company. That company, on the 27th June, issued a circular to their agents in which he found the following paragraph:

“It is with deep regret I have to inform you that the great fire at St. John will cause the suspension of this company. We think it would be your duty to inform all your customers of the position of affairs at the earliest possible moment. We hope to be able to pay a respectable dividend to all creditors but there may be many policy holders who may desire to protect themselves fully by insuring afresh in some other company.”

Now, it was within his knowledge that some of these policy holders, in order to protect themselves, did insure in other companies, and it was held by the Provincial Insurance Company that the fact of their having done so cancelled their policies and they were precluded from participating in the division of the assets of that company. He desired that some amendment should be introduced whereby the holders of policies in insolvent companies, should be free to insure in other companies from the time that the insolvency was made manifest, and be entitled to claim for the amount of their premiums from the time such re-insurance was effected until the expiration of the policy. He found in the third clause it was provided that:

“No application for a writ of attachment and no assignment of the estate shall be made until after the company has, whether before or since the passing of this Act, become insolvent by failure to pay any undisputed claim arising, or loss insured against, for the space of sixty days after being due and payable, or, if disputed, after final judgment and tender of a valid legal discharge, and, in either case, if the company be licensed under the Acts respecting insurance, after notice served on the Minister of Finance, as provided by the 16th section of an Act respecting insurance, passed in the thirty-eighth year of Her Majesty's Reign, and chaptered twenty.”

Now a case of this kind might arise: it might be manifest to every person that a company was insolvent, and the policy-holders might deem it necessary in their own interests to reinsure. If that was done, the parties so insuring would not, if he understood this Bill aright, be entitled to participate in the division of the assets of the company when placed in the hands of a receiver or assignee; and he thought, therefore, that the clause should also be amended so as to provide that policy-holders should be entitled to claim for their premiums from the time they might have insured in other companies, provided that reinsurance should not begin more than two months previous to the issue of the writ of attachment against the insolvent company.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Has the hon. gentleman prepared any clause carrying out his views.

MR. WHITE said he would suggest that the following be substituted:

“From the time the said policy-holder shall have reinsured, provided that if the said reinsurance shall have been effected more than two months previous to the issue of a writ of attachment, he shall not be entitled to claim unless with the consent of the company.”

House resolved itself into Committee on said Bill.

On the 12th clause.

MR. BLAIN said he would suggest that the Judge should have the power to extend the time beyond for 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6 months beyond the six months of application it was thought desirable. It had been stated by parties who knew exactly how this company was situated, that, if it were permitted to go on and wind up its business, 10 cents on the dollar would be paid; but if it had to stop short, the company would probably be hopelessly insolvent.

MR. WHITE.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that with the 60 days given, under the existing Statute and the further period of six months, there was not much ground for asking for further delay. All things considered, he thought it would be neither safe nor prudent to extend the time.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he thought that the claims of parties who sustained loss at the time a company became insolvent, or continuing its risks, caused them to sustain loss afterwards, should be fully provided for. Policy-holders who deemed it prudent to reinsure in other companies, on the fact becoming known that the company in which they had insured was insolvent, should be allowed to enter their claims on the unearned premiums, and these claims should be collected with those of the parties who had sustained loss. A case in point had occurred: a company becoming insolvent gave notice of this fact to their policy-holders, and when those had reinsured presented their claims on the unearned premiums, they were told that because they had reinsured their policies were cancelled, and having done so without the consent of the company, they were not at all entitled to be considered in the distribution of the assets. He would propose an amendment in the sense he suggested, providing however, that where reinsurance were effected more than two months before the issue of the writ of attachment no claims on the unearned premiums should be valid without the consent of the company which issued the policy; consequently persons who reinsured within these two months would be entitled to enter such claims from the time they had reinsured.

MR. BLAKE said that the suggestion offered only showed what a degree of embarrassment was connected with the treatment of this question. There was some merit in, and argument for both propositions, but he thought that on reflection the difficulties in the way were almost, if not quite, insuperable. The suggestion of the hon. member for North Renfrew would interfere with contracts entered into between the policy-holders and these companies, which would be always exposed to the risk of reinsurance, which would void these contracts, etc. He considered that the Bill was fair enough for both the policy-holders and the companies. He thought that it would be better for insolvent policy-holders who reinsured to suffer the insignificant loss which this would occasion, than to attempt to change the contract between them and the companies.

MR. WHITE said he submitted that if a writ of attachment was issued within two months from the time of reinsurance, such policy-holder was entitled to enter a claim on the unearned premiums to as great a degree as a person who might have sustained loss in this connection.

MR. DAVIES said he thought that the suggestion of the hon. member for North Renfrew was a good one.

MR. BLAIN said that it was shown before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, that the company whose case was under consideration, made a condition that it might put an end to the policy at any time and return a proportionate premium, or put an end to the policy and demand back a proportionate part of the premium paid. He held that the rights of policy-holders should be allowed to remain as they were when the policy was issued. The combined operations of sections 12 and 14 would make it necessary that all these policies should come to an end at any time within six months. He thought it was reasonable and desirable that the time should be extended, as the Bill at present simply and entirely tied up the hands of the company. He would suggest that, in a proviso, the time should be extended to six months.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that as to a provision that policy-holders should have the right to return their policies to be cancelled, and should then be entitled to receive back a certain portion of the premiums they had paid, he ventured to say there was no other insurance company that made a provision of that kind, and this Bill was not intended to apply to the Agricultural Insurance Company, but to all the insurance companies in the country. But he did say that on a company proving insolvent, the policy-holder was entitled to be looked upon as a creditor, just as much as one who had sustained a loss.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that the policy-holders, finding the company becoming insolvent, and knowing there would be a loss of time in collecting their insurance, went and insured in another company. That act cancelled their policy, and they had no claim. But they should have a claim, because what forced them to insure in another company was the insolvency of the company in which they were insured.

MR. BLAKE said the contract between the insured and the company made a further insurance on the part of the former with the consent of the company, void the whole contract. When the hon. gentleman said they were to make another bargain for the insured, although he had already a bargain that if he again insured without their consent, his contract should be void.

MR. BOWELL said such a stipulation on the part of the company was, no doubt, necessary, because, without it, a man would insure his property for double or treble what it was worth. But, surely, in cases where the company became insolvent, the insured should have some claim upon the non-earned premium he had paid in. He would give an instance: The Provincial Insurance Company, after the fire at St. John, sent out a circular from the head office to their various agents announcing the suspension of the company. Acting upon that, many parties reinsured in other companies, but when they made their claim against the company for unearned premium, they were told that they had insured without consent of the company, and, therefore voided the contract. He fully agreed that when notice had been given of the insolvency of a company, the policy-holders should be enabled to claim, notwithstanding that they had re-insured.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he would suggest a few words to follow the 12th clause: "Provided, also, that the policy-holders are re-insured after the issue of the writ of attachment, shall be entitled to claim as creditor upon the unpaid premium, notwithstanding any condition rendering the policy voided on the occasion of re-insuring with consent."

MR. BLAKE said he would recommend his hon. friend the Minister of Justice to take this into consideration before the next stage of the measure.

MR. WHITE said the 15th section was somewhat objectionable in providing that assignees should be entitled to re-insure in any other company they might choose.

MR. BLAKE said: 1st, the majority of creditors had to agree, and premium holders had a right to vote, though, of course, the majority would not; 2nd, the Judge had to consider the matter; 3rd, the discussion as to reinsurance was limited to companies certified by the superintendent to be of good standing.

MR. KERR said the 15th section was objectionable in not giving the companies the option of repaying the unearned premium for reinsuring in other companies. The policy-holders could not expect to be placed in any better position than that for which they originally contracted. In nine cases out of ten policy-holders would prefer to demand a return of the unearned premium rather than allow the company to reinsure in other offices, even though these offices were approved by the Superintendent of Insurance. He quite understood in many instances it would be much more advantageous to the company to reinsure in other offices than to refund the unearned premium; but, according to the provisions of this 15th clause, that option was taken entirely from the company or assignee and was placed wholly with the creditors, which gave them advantages they did not originally possess, for by reinsuring in companies of good standing they would, in almost every case, save money. Suppose a risk were taken for three years at a premium of $9. Out of that there would be the agent's commission and expenses, and although the holder paid $9, the net premium to the company would amount to about $4.60. Suppose one year had elapsed, the policyholder would claim two-thirds of his premium, or $6; or, in other words, the company would have to pay $1.40 more than they realized from the risk. The Government should reconsider this matter, and leave it optional with the companies to reinsure or not, and if they did not exercise this option after the expiration of six months, then the policyholders could claim to rank as creditors for the unearned portion of the premium.

MR. BLAKE said under the contract the assured made with the company the company had no right to transfer its liability to another company. In case the company became insolvent, it was proposed that it should have the right to transfer the policy to another company with the consent of the assured. To give the company the power to force the assurers to take up any arrangement with another company, seemed to him to be unreasonable.

THE QUEBEC CRISIS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order to resume the adjourned Debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply,"—and of Sir John A. Macdonald's motion in amendment thereto:—"That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, that the recent dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec of his Ministry, was under the circumstances unwise, and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown, since the concession of the principle of responsible Government to the British North American Colonies,"—read.

MR. MITCHELL said he had listened with great attention to the debates which had taken place in relation to this matter, especially to the admirable political and constitutional speech of the right hon. the member for Kingston, replete, as it was, with information connected with the history of the past, and filled with the records of the decisions upon which the Constitution of our country was founded; but, he must say, he listened with disappointment to the statement made in reply by the hon. the Premier. One would have expected that on this the first occasion upon which a strain had been put on our Constitution, a reply from the First Minister to the admirable speech of the right hon. member for Kingston, the authorities produced, the statements made, the allegations put forward, the reasons given, would have been met in a manly straightforward way by the hon. the Premier, or by those hon. gentlemen who so ably supported him when occasion required. But what was the fact? There was no such manly statement made, no such answer given to the constitutional objections raised, no such quotations of authorities made as would meet the case put by the right hon. mover of the resolution. The reply of the hon. the Premier was, to his mind, an evasion of the real question at issue; he raised false issues, spoke of events which occurred in Canada which had no bearing on the subject, of questions in which the people of the Maritime Provinces had no interest. What was the question to be considered? The question was, had the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec been constitutional and right, or had it been of a character to lead to the subversion of the constitution and to anarchy and confusion. To his mind, the course pursued by Mr. Letellier de St. Just had been one, which, if sustained by the vote of this House—and he very much feared from the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it would—would lead to anarchy and confusion. He had expected, from the proposition made by the right hon. member for Kingston, that this matter would be considered irrespective of party politics, with that calm consideration which ought to be brought to bear on questions concerning the future of our country. He had found, on the contrary, an attempt made to stifle the debate, to prevent the free expression of public opinion, to avoid meeting the issue and say whether Mr. Letellier was right or wrong. The Government and its supporters sat in silence and called for a vote without discussion, in order to precipitate a vote on the country and obtain a snap verdict; he would not say for what purpose, but he would tell the result. If the decision which hon. gentlemen opposite expected, were arrived at, the result would be that every Lieutenant-Governor in any of the Provinces, would find that he had been created, by a vote of this House, a despot, not bound by constitutional rules and principles. He had expected that the hon. member for Chateauguay and the hon. member for South Bruce, both of whom, he regretted were absent to-night, those two gentlemen who so carefully guarded the constitutional rights and privileges of Parliament, who were so well able to speak on questions of this character, than whom none understood better what was right or wrong, in relation to them, would not have remained silent, but would have given expression to their views, as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of this arbitrary act of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He was amazed at their silence. He felt they had abdicated their functions, they had failed to maintain the position they had hitherto occupied as great constitutional authorities, as arbiters of this country. He regretted they were not here to-night to answer his charges. Why had they remained silent? Because they knew they could not justify the act, and because their party proclivities would not permit them to condemn it. These were the reasons which, he feared, had caused their silence. But he had hoped these hon. gentlemen would have been here to answer for their silence, and to explain it. He had come to this House as an independent representative; one free from party politics, who occupied an independent position, and who had the courage to express his opinions, and to warn the people that our Constitution was now on its trial, in its earliest stage, and that if party were allowed to predominate over patriotism, and a party vote were given on this question, a precedent would be created which would undermine the first principles of our Constitution. If it were permitted that a precedent should be created, which was not justified by British constitutional history, he trembled for the future of Canada. He would not consider the reasons which Mr. Letellier had assigned for dismissing his Ministry, but would simply relate the facts as he understood them, and refer to some authorities which had been referred, to in his absence, by hon. members who, with himself, had taken part in the case which had occurred in his own Province. The reasons given by Mr. Letellier for his action were of a flimsy character, and unworthy of any one occupying the position of Lieutenant-Governor. What right had Mr. Letellier to dictate to his Ministers as to whether it was judicious to tax the people or not? It was the representatives of the people who had the right to decide on that point; and while Mr. DeBoucherville possessed a majority in the Legislature of Quebec, it was none of Mr. Letellier's business as to whether the taxation imposed was large or small, so long as his responsible advisers were prepared to assume the responsibility of the measures they passed. It had been alleged that there were precedents for Mr. Letellier's act. He would not enter into the constitutional question and endeavour to prove that such was not the fact, for that had been done already; but he would show by analogy that some of the cases brought forward in opposition to the course taken by hon. members on this side of the House, and in support of Mr. Letellier, did not apply. Two precedents had been quoted in connection with New Brunswick, and with these he was perfectly familiar. The Manners-Sutton case in 1856, and that of Governor Gordon, had been quoted as justification for Mr. Letellier. In the former case, what was known as the Maine Liquor Law, had been passed in New Brunswick, under the auspices of the Fisher-Tilley Government, which was supported by an ample majority to enable it to carry on the business of that Legislature. Within ten days after the rising of the Legislature, the Governor called upon his Ministers to re-assemble Parliament, for the purpose of repealing that Act, which had been passed. They refused to do so, and they were not dismissed, as was said, but they resigned rather than consent to recall Parliament to repeal the Act. True, that on an appeal to the people all the members returned, except two, voted for its repeal. Was that a complete justification of the Lieutenant-Governor's act? Within twenty-four hours after the Legislature had repealed the Act, they placed on record a resolution declaring want of confidence in the members who had induced the Governor to dissolve the Assembly in an unconstitutional manner. He (Mr. Mitchell) had been informed that it had been stated that the Governor was sustained by the Colonial Office. But there was a simple acknowledgment of his statement, and Mr. Manners Sutton very shortly afterwards had to leave the country. That case presented no analogy to the DeBoucherville case. In the former case there were numerous petitions presented from all parts of the Province asking that the Marine Liquor Law should be repealed. It was on these petitions the Lieutenant-Governor acted, and although he and others did not sympathize with this action, but he considered he did a very high-handed act. On an appeal to the people his former Government, who resigned, were sustained by a large majority in the House of Assembly. In regard to the second case, which was considered one of greater importance, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was said to have made certain statements. He did not know whether it was a correct report, but for the purpose of his argument he would assume it was correct, until it was disavowed. If the report were correct, it was not a true representation of the facts as they occurred at the time. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and himself were somewhat prominent figures in the events of 1866, and when the hon. gentleman undertook to cite the experience of that year as a precedent for the action of Mr. Letellier, he should have told the whole story. He (Mr. Mitchell) would state the facts.

It was very well known that after the Quebec Conference, to which he had the honour of being a delegate, and before they went down to New Brunswick, it was decided that they should not disclose the terms at which they had arrived, until every one of the delegates had explained them to their colleagues in the respective Governments. When they, the delegates, returned to New Brunswick, the Press clamoured for information, which was not given, their mouths being closed by the arrangement entered into at Quebec. The opponents of the Government made use of that fact to create antagonism and opposition to the scheme. Party politics were brought into play, and most violent attacks were made on those supporting the Quebec Conference, and before the delegates could take the public into their confidence, the terms became known, and that portion of the Press which was hostile to Confederation made capital out of the fact that they had not taken the people into their confidence. That was the first stone thrown at Confederation, and the blow was a pretty severe one. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Smith), who had left the Provincial Government some time before, because he was opposed to Confederation, took advantage of what he saw was the turning-tide against the Government, and came out against Confederation, and an appeal was made to the people—New Brunswick being the only Province in which an appeal was made—to endorse the terms of the Quebec Conference. The result of the elections was that the Government returned with only 11 members out of 41, and the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries was called upon to form an Administration hostile to Confederation. His (Mr. Mitchell's) party was, comparatively speaking, annihilated; but, when he handed in his resignation, he told the Lieutenant-Governor that before twelve months had passed there would be such a change of feeling on the Confederation question, the Ministry would scarcely be able to carry on the Administration. He felt that the condition placed upon the delegates at the Quebec Conference had paralyzed their efforts and given to the Opposition an opportunity to crush their action at the outset. He felt, however, that when the sober second-thought of the people of New Brunswick considered the question, they would perceive there were advantages, as they had found, in entering into a great Union of the Provinces, and that before long the tide would turn in favour of Confederation. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries got through one Session, and before he reached the second, he found that the policy of the British Government was to carry Confederation, and simplify the system of Government at the Colonial office, and deal with one Government instead of six. The Provinces, if united, could, also, more effectually maintain British power and rule, and diminish the influence of the United States on the continent, than if the Provinces were separated. The Imperial Government, therefore, instructed Governor Gordon that it was desirable to endeavour to bring about Confederation, and that the interests of the Empire were involved. When the Governor returned, after visiting England, he sent for the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, informed him of the wishes of the British Government, showed him a despatch from Mr. Cardwell, instructing him to use his best efforts to bring about the Confederation of the British American Provinces; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith), as he (Mr. Mitchell) was informed at the time by Governor Gordon, expressed his approval of the object that was contained in Mr. Cardwell's despatch, and led Governor Gordon to believe—as the Governor informed him—that he would co-operate with him and endeavour to influence his colleagues to bring about Confederation.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): That is not true.

MR. MITCHELL said the House would have an opportunity of judging whether it was true or not. The hon. gentleman, who was Premier of the New Brunswick Government, was sent down to Washington on the eve of the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty, Messrs. Galt and Howland proceeding there from the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. When he (Mr. Smith) returned, he was informed by the Lieutenant-Governor that it was the wish of the Imperial Government that Confederation should be carried. The hon. gentleman informed the Governor, as the correspondence showed, that he was very doubtful whether he could carry the Confederation scheme or not; he asked time to consult his colleagues and friends, and when he returned he informed the Governor that he hoped to be able to carry it, and in the manner pointed out in the record. What did the hon. gentleman do? When the Legislature met, he placed a paragraph in the Speech promising to carry Confederation, or rather stating that the wish of the Imperial Government was that the Provinces should be united, and that the suggestion would receive respect and attention. The hon. gentleman was, therefore, elected by the people to oppose Confederation, and yet, as head of the Government, he inserted the following paragraph in the Speech from the Throne. No. 11 was as follows:—

“The correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Governor-General of Canada on the affairs of British North America, when laid before us will receive due attention, and the opinion expressed by Her Majesty's Government will command that respect and attention which is due to the suggestions emanating from so high a source; but in any scheme for a Union of the British North American Colonies which may be proposed, it is, in the opinion of this House, absolutely essential that full protection should be afforded to the rights and interests of the people of this Province, and no measure which fails to obtain these objects should be adopted.”

This paragraph was placed in the speech of the Minister, who was only elected a year before, against Confederation. It was true that the hon. gentleman proclaimed that he was going to carry Confederation. The result was that the hon. gentleman led the Governor to believe that he was favourable to the carrying of Confederation, but that he required to do it in his own way; and he suggested that he could get Committees of the House struck, or a Joint Committee of both, as, after consultation with His Excellency, was thought most desirable for the purpose of having Parliament committed to Confederation; but this the hon. gentleman failed to do. The hon. gentleman continued for forty days without making an answer to this Address, and every day he lost his supporters. The members numbered 29 to 11, in favour of the hon. gentleman when he came in, and when he wound up the Session, he had only 22, out of 41, to sign the protest he uttered against Governor Gordon; and the result of all this was that the Governor believed that the hon. gentleman was sincere in his desire to carry Confederation, that he hoped he would be able to accomplish it, and that he was desirous of doing so; but the hon. gentleman kept his answer back from the Legislative Council of which he (Mr. Mitchell) was a member for something like thirty odd days. They had waited this time for a reply. The hon. gentleman allowed business to come to a stop, because he had not pluck enough to come down at once and say to his supporters in the House that he had changed his views in relation to the Confederation of the Colonies, and that he was prepared to submit a measure, and would ask them to support him in order to carry it. This was the reason; but the negotiations which lasted for something like four weeks, between His Excellency and the hon. gentlemen, led the Governor to doubt the good faith of the hon. gentleman, and, finally, His Excellency found out that the professions made by the hon. gentleman, as to his desire to carry out this scheme, either could not be fulfilled, or, if they could be carried out, that the hon. gentleman was unwilling to take the risk, and responsibility, and danger of attempting it. When this matter was quoted as an authority and precedent for the unexampled conduct of Mr. Letellier de St. Just, he was amazed that the hon. gentleman had had the courage to dare to do it. There was no analogy between it and this case. He would not say that the Governor dismissed that Ministry, for he did not dismiss it; but the reason why the Governor placed these gentlemen in the position they occupied, was this, they led him at the outset to believe that they could carry Confederation, and that they were inclined to do it.

Mr. GILLMOR: They did not do any such thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member from Charlotte says they did not do so, but I say that they did; and I can prove it. They led him to believe that they could carry Confederation.

Mr. GILLMOR: They did not.

Mr. MITCHELL said, that despite the hon. gentleman's assertion to the contrary, he would prove it. His hon. friend from Charlotte might not have been in the confidence of the then Premier; but he would prove by the statements contained in this book and the records, that this Ministry led the Governor to believe that they would carry Confederation and they kept His Excellency in that belief during the sitting of the House for nearly 40 days, when no business could be done. They were afraid to pass the Address and a vote of want of confidence was then pending in the House in which a year before the hon. gentleman had a support of something like 29 to 11 or 30 to 11; and after failing to carry this Address—and to this hour that Address had never been answered,—the Legislative Council passed an answer to the Address. When the Governor found himself in this position, he felt compelled to reply and give the answer which he did give to this Address. The hon. gentleman objected to undertaking the responsibility of this answer, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. gentleman had led the Governor to believe that he would do so, the hon. gentleman refused to take this responsibility and the consequence was that the Governor said:—"Well, you have either got to do that or you have got to take the other course; you have led me to believe that you would carry out Confederation; you have read the despatches which I have sent you, and you have read my statements as to the wishes of Her Majesty's Government; you have encouraged me to hope that you would carry Confederation, and carry it out in your own way; but you have failed to do that, and now, when the Legislative Council has passed an Address in response to that paragraph in your speech, you turn round and tell me you will not take the responsibility of the reply I make, though it will be meeting the wishes of Her Majesty in endeavouring to carry out the Confederation policy which you endorsed." This was the cause of the hon. gentleman's resignation; and there was no analogy whatever between this case and the case of Mr. Letellier de St. Just. The hon. gentleman knew, and His Excellency knew, that in their repeated conversations they had agreed to carry Confederation, and to do so in their own way, but they had agreed to carry out this policy, and he (Mr. Mitchell) had aided them to do it. He had aided them in this relation; and when he found that his hon. friend did not get up in the House and boldly proclaim his position, and what his intentions were, he felt the great danger in which the hon. gentleman stood, either because of his insincerity, or because of his inability to carry out the propositions which had been agreed upon between His Excellency and himself (Mr. Smith.) When it was pretended that Mr. Letellier was justified by this action of Governor Gordon in the course he had pursued, he (Mr. Mitchell) was bound to say that there was no analogy whatever between these two cases. In the one case Mr. Gordon did not ask for the resignation of his Ministers, or they voluntarily sent them in; and for what? Because they were unable to carry out what they had encouraged His Excellency to believe that they could obtain, or because they were unwilling to carry out this policy, finding that it was going to place them in a position of embarrassment in the country. In this other case, the case of Mr. Letellier, what did they find? That Mr. Letellier de St. Just, with a Government which had a majority of from 18 to 20 in Parliament which was able to carry on all its measures, which had the confidence of the country, which had no embarrassment in the Upper House, which was in perfect accord with the Legislative Council, and which had no difficulties whatever, except that Mr. Letellier de St. Just thought that it was desirable to get rid of them—had taken this action; and he made the pretext, the flimsy pretext, stated in these papers, the ground for his having forced them to resign, or rather for dismissing them; while, in the other case, Mr. Gordon was compelled so to act by his instructions from the Imperial Government. The fact was that it was an Imperial concern in the case of the New Brunswick embroglio, and of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. His Excellency was compelled by regard for the Imperial interests, which he was representing, to pursue the course which he did; and, therefore, there was some justification even for dismissing those gentlemen, because His Excellency was dealing with a question in which Imperial interests were concerned. But the other case had no connection whatever with Imperial interests. It was a pure question of domestic policy, and a pure family quarrel; and there was a desire, he took it, on the part of Mr. Letellier de St. Just, to get possession for his political friends of the administration in the Province of Quebec, for the purpose, also, of controlling the Dominion elections when they came round. This, after all was really the case in point. As the correctness of his statement had been impugned in relation to this matter, he would show the House what the Lieut.-Governor said on the subject.

Mr. SMITH: You ought to read the whole of it.

Mr. MITCHELL said he would certainly do so if the hon. gentleman desired it; but he would rather read what he considered necessary, and then the hon. gentleman could read the rest. He would quote as follows:—

"Memorandum of Conversation between His Excellency and Mr. Smith:

"On Saturday, the 7th instant, about 11 o'clock, a.m., I called at Government House, and had an interview with His Excellency, and, in the course of conversation, the proceedings of the Legislative Council were referred to, when I spoke in terms of disapproval of the course which they had adopted in reference to the subject of Union. Something was said about the presentation of the address, and His Excellency's reply thereto, when he asked me what answer I would advise? I replied that, in my opinion, the answer to be given should simply be that he would transmit it to Her Majesty. His Excellency said he would think of it, and see me again. He did not state that he intended to receive them that day, and I had not the most distant idea that he intended to do so. I then parted with him.

"A few minutes before three o'clock of the afternoon of the same day, in my place in the House of Assembly, I received a note from him, saying that he wished to see me at once. I immediately repaired to Government House, and after a short conversation with him upon other matters, he informed me that he was going to receive the Legislative Council, with their address, at three o'clock. I expressed my surprise at this, and enquired what answer he intended to make. He then handed me a paper which contained his proposed disapproval of it, and complained that he had not advised with his Council before preparing it; that as they were responsible for it, they should, at least, be consulted before it was given. He remarked that if they did not approve of it they could relieve themselves of responsibility. I replied, even if that were true, was it courteous and fair that the Council should be treated in that way; that what they asked from His Excellency was fair play, not as a favour, but as a matter of right. He then proposed that I should drive down to the House of Assembly and see my colleagues, and return in half an hour, and he would keep the Legislative Council (who, in the meantime, had arrived at Government House) waiting until I returned. I said I could not do this, that the debate on the Vote of Want of Confidence was going on, and that they would not leave the House, and besides they could not possibly consider so important a question in a few minutes. His Excellency then proposed to send one of the carriages that were standing at the door for them. I then stated they could not leave the House. He replied, 'I suppose not.' I further stated that it was unfair and ungenerous, and not such treatment as the Council had a right to expect, to be called upon in this sudden and extraordinary way in a matter so important. I expressed my condemnation of the course adopted by the Legislative Council, and urged the impropriety of their praying Her Majesty the Queen to cause a law of the Imperial Parliament to be passed, giving effect to a scheme of Union which both the people and the House of Assembly had rejected by overwhelming majorities, and that I never would consent to any address which authorized the Imperial Government to pass an Act for Union without reference to the people. I thought His Excellency seemed disposed to yield the point and strike out the last paragraph of the answer, which I considered very objectionable. He then asked me to excuse him, and left the room to consult, as I thought at the time, and from information received since I am confirmed in that opinion, a gentleman of the Opposition and a member of the Legislative Council, who was in the House at the time. He returned in a few minutes, and after some conversation similar to that already detailed, told me that he would deliver the answer as it was, and sent me a copy in the evening. I remonstrated against such conduct, but concluded by saying, that if he had resolved upon that course, it was in vain to protract the interview. I then left him:

"(Signed) A. J. SMITH.

There was the letter from the Governor to Mr. Smith after he had understood from Mr. Smith that he was in favour of coming into the Union. He would further quote as follows:—

"His Excellency considering that the speedy accomplishment of a measure of Union was now a matter of almost absolute certainty, addressed to Mr. Smith, on the 7th of March, a letter, of which the following is an extract:—

"I have been much gratified, though not surprised, to find that you are disposed to approach the question of Union, as it now presents itself, in a large and statesmanlike spirit, and to realize as facts the necessities which are imposed by the actual condition of affairs. There is nothing which more distinguishes a statesman from a man incompetent to deal with great affairs, than this power of appreciating the changes, the mode and the obligation (often a most irksome one) of acquiescing in a course which, per se, he considers open to objection, in order to prevent evils of yet greater magnitude."

"Mr. Smith did not contradict the presumption on which this letter was founded, and verbally acknowledged the terms in which His Excellency therein spoke of his conduct.

"Upon the distinct understanding, therefore, that the Government would endeavour to procure the passage through the Legislature of resolutions affirmative of the principle of Union, and with the impression that an address, praying Her Majesty to move the Imperial Parliament to give effect to such resolutions, was to be subsequently adopted. His Excellency felt justified in omitting, at the request of his Council, from his Speech at the opening of the Session, the strong recommendation of Union which he would otherwise have felt it his duty to introduce, but the responsibility for which his Ministers felt they could not then assume.

"Since the commencement of the Session, however, the course of the Government has shown little indication of a movement in this direction.

"His Excellency has never ceased to urge on Mr. Smith, the expediency, and indeed necessity of a bold avowal of his intended policy; nor has he failed to express his apprehensions as to the consequences of delay in doing so, believing until that avowal was made, Mr. Smith would become daily more and more entangled in contradictory pledges from which he would find it impossible to extricate himself, and which might act most prejudicially on the prospects of the cause; whilst at any time circumstances might call for such action on the part of His Excellency as would place him in a position of apparent antagonism to his Council, and prove productive of very serious embarrassment. This course, however, the Government did not pursue, and it became more and more clearly apparent to His Excellency that they lacked the power—he will not suppose that they lacked the will—to carry out their original intentions. Their hostility to the particular form of union agreed to at Quebec, was distinct and emphatic, whilst their approval of even an abstract union of an indefinite character, became daily more vague and uncertain.

“On more than one occasion His Excellency noticed these facts to Mr. Smith, who replied that the reports received by His Excellency as to the language used were inaccurate; and that it was desirable not to indicate too soon the line he meant to take, as it would give an advantage to his opponents, and might estrange some of his friends.

“Mr. Smith frequently expressed a hope that the Lieutenant-Governor did not entertain any doubt as to the sincerity of his intention in carrying out to the letter the understanding between them, as to the passage of resolutions on the subject of union.

“If the Lieutenant-Governor’s advisers cannot concur in the sentiments, and decline to become responsible for their utterance by His Excellency, it is no doubt their duty to tender, as they have done, the resignation of the offices held by them.

“His Excellency accepts those resignations with regret. His relations with his advisers during the past year have been harmonious and cordial—for many among their number he entertains strong feelings of personal esteem; nor can he forget to acknowledge the attention which his views have generally received at their hands, or the readiness with which his wishes have on most occasions been met by them. But he has no doubt as to the course which it is his duty to pursue in obedience to his Sovereign’s commands, and in the interests of the people of British America.

“That a leading member of the Opposition was more than once communicated with by His Excellency is perfectly true. This communication was made with Mr. Smith’s full knowledge, and in the belief on His Excellency’s part, that it would facilitate Mr. Smith’s accomplishment of the end in view. The gentleman in question met Mr. Smith at the Government House, on the 5th of March, and His Excellency believes that a very protracted interview subsequently took place between them; nor was it until a very late period that His Excellency relinquished the hope of seeing a combination effected to smooth the passage of the contemplated resolutions.”

MR. MITCHELL.

The whole of this correspondence was filled with statements of that kind; but it would take too long to read the whole of it, and he did not intend to take up the time of the House by doing so, though if hon. gentlemen wished him to read any more, he would do so. He did not desire, however, to read any more of this correspondence than was necessary. What he wanted to deduce from this correspondence was this: he had been informed, and he had read from a paper, that it had been stated by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with relation to this gentleman, who was not here to defend himself, and a gentleman who had the confidence of our Sovereign, and who had administered the affairs of the Province over which he presided, in an honest and upright and sincere manner, that his conduct was brutal. If the hon. gentleman ever said that the conduct of His Excellency was brutal, he (Mr. Mitchell) could only say that this statement was untrue.

MR. SMITH: I made no such statement.

MR. MITCHELL: And this gentleman not only prior to, but since that time, has enjoyed the confidence of Her Majesty, and is now doing so.

MR. SMITH: I wish to make a statement. The language which I am reported in the Press to have used, I never employed at all. The word “brutal” certainly was never used in the whole of my remarks.

MR. MITCHELL said he had given the hon. gentleman an opportunity to contradict this at the outset, but the hon. gentleman had failed to do so. He would now read an account of the hon. gentleman’s speech, given him by a member of the House. This was as follows:—

“Mr. Smith said, in reply to Mr. Costigan, that he was not inconsistent in taking his present position. The two New Brunswick precedents justify Letellier’s position, inasmuch as they have been sustained by the popular vote and by the Imperial authorities. In 1855 passed a prohibitory liquor law, which proved inoperative. The Lieutenant-Governor called on the Government to repeal it. They refused. He asked them to dissolve. They advised dissolution and resigned. Another Government took the responsibility and were sustained by the people. In Governor Gordon's case the Legislative Council passed an address in favour of Confederation. His Excellency's reply contained remarks favourable to Confederation, committing the Ministry thereby. Mr. Smith objected. The Governor said if they did not choose to take the responsibility, they must retire. They did not immediately retire, but did soon afterwards. The people sustained the Governor. The Governor acted falsely to his Ministry. He refused to take any advice. He consulted with the Opposition, and his conduct was marked by moral turpitude. The people sustained him, but (in reply to Mr. Plumb) I did not forgive him and would not speak to him."

Mr. SPEAKER said the reading of letters and from newspapers, was entirely out of order. An hon. member could not read any portion of a speech made during the same session, from a printed book or newspaper. This rule applied to all debates, whatever, though speeches delivered during former sessions might be read. It was also irregular to read extracts from letters, newspapers or other documents, referred to debates in the House. This was laid down by May.

Mr. MITCHELL: As this related to this debate, I thought that I was in order.

Mr. SMITH: The manuscript notes are, in substance, correct.

Mr. MITCHELL said that he did not desire to infringe on the rules of the House, or to do anything which was not strictly in accordance with them; but in this debate, he was under the impression that any reference or report made of a speech delivered during the same debate, could be used. If he was wrong in this impression he should like to be corrected.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have read what May states.

Mr. MITCHELL said that as the hon. gentleman admitted the correctness of the report given to him, as to what he had uttered in this very debate, and, as he had acknowledged that this report was in substance, correct, he would simply say this: When the hon. gentleman stated that the conduct of Governor Gordon was improper or unconstitutional, or that he was guilty of "moral turpitude," the hon. gentleman stated what was incorrect, and performed an act of injustice to a gentleman, who, from that time to the present, had retained the confidence of Her Majesty, and who had been in the position of Governor ever since that period. When the hon. gentleman attempted to quote this precedent, as an authority, to sustain the action of Mr. Letellier de St. Just, did he forget that he, with some twenty-one others, signed a protest to Her Majesty, asking for the recall of Governor Gordon.

Mr. SMITH: I do not forget that.

Mr. MITCHELL: You recollect it?

Mr. SMITH: I do.

Mr. MITCHELL said, then his hon. friend signed a protest asking for the recall of Governor Gordon, on the ground that His Excellency had performed, what he (Mr. Smith) considered to be an unconstitutional act. This protest, he understood from the remarks which the hon. gentleman had made the other day, had not been complied with; and they were justified in concluding that Governor Gordon had behaved rightly, and that consequently Governor Gordon was right in placing that Ministry in such a position, that they had either to adopt the responsibility of certain views, and of certain acts, or resign.

Mr. SMITH: Will my hon. friend allow me for a moment. I did not say that Gordon acted rightly; I continue to repeat what I stated, and declare that he acted unconstitutionally.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not say that the hon. gentleman had so stated. If the hon. gentleman contended that Governor Gordon was justified in what he did, and that, because of this, Mr. Letellier de St. Just was justified in dismissing his Ministers on the flimsy pretext on which he dismissed them, he (Mr. Mitchell) held that the hon. gentleman was quite logical. Governor Gordon was led to adopt the course which he was bound to pursue, from the fact that he was led to believe that they who had his confidence, and who were his Ministers, were prepared to adopt the policy forced upon him as the representative of Her Majesty, by the Government of England, namely—the policy of Confederation. These gentlemen led His Excellency to believe that they would adopt this policy, or, at all events, His Excellency believed that they had done so; but they failed to carry it out, and they deserted him after placing him in a certain position. The Governor then felt that it was necessary to look around him for others to carry out that policy, and he found them. When he got into this difficulty, the Governor felt that it was a case in which he had been either misled intentionally, or that when these parties had placed him in that position, they found that they were unable to carry out this policy; and, in place of coming out manfully and acknowledging this, they tried to make it appear that the Governor had misunderstood what they had agreed to do, and that they had not agreed to carry out Confederation in this way or that way, or contemplated it. The Hon. Mr. Wilmot and himself accepted the responsibility; they both appealed to the people of the country. And what was the result? Within four weeks they went back with a majority of four to one. They were sustaining the principle which he believed the country would sustain—the principle of Confederation—whereby one grand nationality was created. What he intended to prove in relation to this matter was this: that Mr. Gordon's act was an act inspired by the Imperial necessity; it was an act inspired under the direction of Her Majesty's Ministers in England. It was far beyond and above a local or domestic quarrel; and therefore the Government had a responsibility as well as a duty to perform. In the case of Mr. Letellier, there was no such necessity—no such national policy, it was a domestic act; so that no parallel could be drawn between the cases of Mr. Letellier and Mr. Gordon. The hon. the Premier propounded what seemed to him to be a very startling doctrine, that because the people of the Province of Quebec, had the matter under their consideration, the Dominion Parliament had no right to deal with the question at present. But if the act of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was sustained by the House, it would form a precedent upon which other Governors of Provinces might act. If that precedent was laid down Mr. Archibald, Governor of Nova Scotia, Mr. Tilley, Governor of New Brunswick, and Mr. Macdonald, Governor of Ontario might dismiss their Ministers. Any Governor could then suppress freedom of action in his Province, and the expression of opinion in relation to constitutional acts in the Provinces. Such a doctrine could not be held to be consistent, because it would have the effect of binding the English-speaking race by precedents established by a different nationality, and binding constituencies and Provinces with a precedent established by the arbitrary acts of a gentleman who chose to exercise the arbitrary power with which he happened for the time to be vested. He held that the Premier was entirely in error when he made the statement referred to, and took up a position which could not be sustained. He would now come to another branch of the subject. He found, on looking over the Confederation debates, that this very charge which had arisen was foretold by the two gentlemen who were the principal actors in it—Mr. Joly and Mr. Letellier. He found that Mr. Letellier made use of the following words in 1867 in the course of the Confederation debate:

“ It is also asked what kind of Local Government we shall have; but the Government will make no statement respecting it until Confederation is voted. What kind of a Constitution and what Governor we shall have? What Governor? Perhaps that is where the great secret lies, for I believe that for some time past the idea or the hope of being Governor has filled the head of more than one political man. What is to be the amount of the Governor's salary?”

Then Mr. Joly said:

“ We already possess under our present Constitution, and without Confederation, a central power stronger than any power you can create, and to which we submit without complaint, because it is perfectly compatible with the existence of our local powers—I mean the power of England. It is exercised by men who live too far from us to hearken to the bickerings of race or of party, or to be mixed up with them in any way. But if that central power was wielded by men taken from among ourselves, men who have taken part in our quarrels and animosities, and who would make use of it to give effect to the views of their party, it would become insupportable.”

That was a correct statement of what was now taking place. The Lieutenant-Governor seemed to have entertained a feeling of antagonism and hostility towards the party to whom he had been opposed for years. He did not say that Mr. Letellier had acted under the direction or approval of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, but it did seem as if the Dominion Government had done a great deal to facilitate the progress of Mr. Letellier's acts. He noticed in a paper today the following paragraph:

"Mr. Letellier had no confidence in his former advisers, yet, in acknowledging the reception of a box of cigars from one of his Ministers, he was on such happy terms as to add a postscript—'If you should want any blank authorizations telegraph me to Rivière Ouelle.' Imagine a Lieut.-Governor who gives as a reason for dismissing his Ministers the fact that they did not consult him—having thus stultified himself."

He did not know what truth there might be in this paragraph, but if it was true that that letter was sent to Mr. Chapleau by Mr. Letellier, he thought it was another evidence of a variety of reasons which the Government had given for the dismissal of the DeBoucherville Government. If it was true also, that they had got half a million dollars at 1 per cent. less than the DeBoucherville Government had obtained money, because the Dominion Government had placed funds at their disposal, it looked very much as if the Government were aiding Mr. Letellier for the purpose of driving his late Government out of power and getting possession of the Administration in the Province of Quebec for the purposes of the next Dominion election. He felt that at a crisis like this in the history of the country, when it might be said our constitution was still on its trial as to whether Canada could be governed correctly by her own people, and be trusted with the selection of her Governors, it behoved them to be careful as to how they should conduct themselves, and what countenance they should give to Mr. Letellier's acts. He was not going to occupy much further time, but he must certainly say that it seemed strange if the principle of Representative Government which the people had striven and struggled for during the last fifty years, which, indeed, they had fought and bled for, should be wiped out in one day by a man who failed to recognise the first principles of responsibility. He would appeal to the memory of Cartier, Papineau, Fletcher, Lafontaine, and other great men, who had for years struggled in this cause, and ask hon. gentlemen on the other side if partisans were to be allowed to undo what these men had secured for us and our children. He would go further than the amendment which, he thought, was characterized by too much moderation, and say that the course which Mr. Letellier pursued was a most unconstitutional one. If his act was established as a precedent, the Governor of a Province would have more power than the Premier himself, and the effect of that would be that we would be deprived of those liberties which our fathers and forefathers had fought for. It had been contended that Mr. Letellier was not responsible to this Parliament, but he (Mr. Mitchell) held that he was the servant of the Parliament, being appointed on the recommendation of the Premier, by His Excellency the Earl Dufferin. Yet, the Government said, "Although we appointed him, he is not responsible to us for his conduct towards the constituency over which he rules; we will not arrest him and try him for the illegal act he has committed." What would his hon. friend the Premier, with the majority he had behind him, say if His Excellency Earl Dufferin was to meet him with the proposition, that he had not the confidence of the country, that because he lost $2,000,000 in a steel rail purchase he ceased to have the confidence of the people, that because he spent $2,000,000 in a useless Fort Francis Lock operation, or spent $100,000 over the Kaminstiquia land job and other operations in the North-West, he had lost the confidence of the people? Or that he had lost their confidence by failing to carry out his promise in relation to the Pacific Railway? He appealed to the House whether, if there was any justification for Mr. Letellier dismissing his Ministry, there was not ten fold more justification for Earl Dufferin to tell the hon. gentlemen opposite to take a back seat and make way for better men? He was convinced there was not a man on the Opposition side who would not resist any attempt to exercise such an act of arbitrary power. That he had this power nominally was correct; but that he had the right to use it was incorrect. A man might have the power to cover another man with his rifle, but he had no right to shoot him. A pilot had the power to run a ship on shore, but he had no right to do it. And so Mr. Letellier had no right to dismiss his Ministry, though he possessed the power. Although hon. gentlemen opposite referred so confidently to the 1st of May, he (Mr. Mitchell), was convinced that when the people were appealed to it would be found that they were not so dead to their liberties as to support a man who had acted in so arbitrary a manner. It was true that Mr. De Boucherville might not have possessed that urbanity of manner which was characteristic of hon. gentlemen on the other side, he might, in fact have been somewhat austere, but he was a man who was universally spoken of with respect, as being thoroughly honest and upright. Yet Mr. Letellier had removed him on the flimsiest and most unworthy pretext. These were his opinions upon the matter. He was sorry to have detained the House in giving utterance to them, but he had a duty to perform, not only to the people of Northumberland, but to the country, and he had taken this opportunity of doing it. He had made some remarks with reference to the hon. member for Chateauguy (Mr. Holton) who was not in his place at the time; so now that he had come in, he would repeat them. He mentioned the names of the hon. members for Chateauguy and South Bruce, as two gentlemen looked up to in this House as the highest authorities in constitutional law, upon whom this House depended for sound solid information as to what was right in the constitutional Administration of the country, and his surprise that they had not come forward to defend the liberties of the people. He had hoped that, on an occasion like this, the first occasion on which a strain had been put upon the Constitution since 1867, that they would not have been led by the Minister they followed so devotedly, but that the great mentor of the House, as well as the hon. member for South Bruce, would have let the people know what their opinions were upon the subject. The whole of the gentlemen opposite, in fact, had sat for forty-eight hours listening to arguments against the course taken by Mr. Letellier, and had never attempted to answer them. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin) did say something, but that was the only exception; he had not heard any other member of that side of the House attempt to justify the conduct of Mr. Letellier, and say it was either just or right for him to dismiss his Ministry in the way he had done. He yet hoped the hon. member for Chateauguy would give the House the benefit of his valuable opinion.

MR. YOUNG: Breach of arrangement.

MR. MITCHELL asked what arrangement should be allowed to tie a man's tongue when the rights of his fellow-citizens demanded his speaking. There was something higher and nobler than the mere temporary arrangements for party interest and party policy. While he would be as true a party man as could possibly be, yet where his party stood in the way of the liberties of the people in endangering their rights or imperilling the Constitution, he would sink party. A high-minded, honest man, always soared above party considerations on such occasions as these.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there had been no change made in the agents since last year. They had one gentleman at Liverpool, one at Glasgow, one in the North of England, two in Ireland, one in London, and one in Paris. The salaries of these gentlemen were $1,200 a year, with $4 a day travelling expenses. The latter item was included under the head of travelling expenses of travelling agents,

MR. POPE (Compton) asked if many immigrants came to this country from France.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not think there were many from that country.

MR. POPE said he objected to the item, and in doing so knew that he would be met with the statement that it stood in the same position as 1873-4. This was not so, however, for the Government of that day appointed these agents for short periods, not longer than eight months, and it was never intended to make them permanent officers. He would suggest, too, that this item should no longer stand a lump sum, without a single explanation. If these agents were made permanent officers, the House should receive reports from them as to the way work was being done.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he saw no objection to this, and he would make a note of the suggestion, with the view, if he was concerned in the matter again, to have it remedied.

MR. WALLACE said that, in the present state of the country, immigrants were not wanted. He suggested that the whole item be struck out, for, under the circumstances, it was a useless expenditure of money.

MR. POPE (Queen's) said he thought there was a very large amount of money squandered under this head. Last year he had objected to the salary of an agent at Prince Edward Island, and the Finance Minister had promised that it should be struck out, but it again appeared in the Estimate; as, also, $1,000 for quarantine, both of which were not of the slightest use.

MR. JONES (Leeds) said he believed that three-fourths of the emigrants who were assisted out here went to the United States. He did not see why so large a sum should be voted year after year, when the results were so very small.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he might call the attention of the last speaker to the fact that according to the best information that the Department could get, not less than 27,076 emigrant settlers came to Canada in the year 1877-8. That was a statement made by the Department, which had the best opportunity of ascertaining the real facts of the case.

MR. DAVIES said an emigration agent was not required at Prince Edward Island, and he doubted whether any were required at Halifax, St. John, or New Brunswick. But he believed a quarantine officer ought to be retained on the Island. Where so many sailors frequented, it was absolutely necessary to have such an officer appointed.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said it was not necessary to retain the staff as at present. One gentleman at Quebec had $1,500 per year, and another, an assistant, had $1,000; one gentleman would be sufficient.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that 27,076 settlers had come to Canada and made it their home in 1877. The vote for Quarantine, which was for the protection of the Public Health, was a subject for discussion as to how far it was necessary.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) said the statistics of immigrants from the old country were inaccurate.

MR. POPE (Compton) called attention to the largeness of the expenditure under this head, compared with the smallness of the immigration, reaching only 15,323. He declared that the immigration was not due to the action of the agents, but to natural consequences. The agents of steamship companies possessed great influence as emigration agents.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that people, not properly speaking immigrants, took advantage of the facilities for them to save their passage outwards, or a portion of it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the instructions to guard against such abuses were very strict. The member for Compton was wrong in his comparison, as $80,000 of the nominal expenditure for immigration was chargeable to the Mennonite and Icelandic loans, which which were to be repaid. The instructions to the agents in the North of England, Ireland and Scotland were to confine their operations to the encouragement of farmers and farm labourers, and at present the Minister of Interior had many enquiries as to the advantages of Manitoba. The officials at Quebec and other points were useful as distributing agents for emigrants and could not well be dispensed with, but he would recommend some economies in this direction which offered the only opportunity of some retrenchment. He did not think any considerable reduction in the expense of the London office practicable.

MR. BOWELL said that Mr. Doré had conducted this office after the resignation of Mr. Jenkins as efficiently and as well as it was attended to either before or since; he gave all the information that was necessary, and was courteous and affable in his demeanor to every one who visited the establishment. And why this man, save for political purposes and to find a position for some friend who required a situation at the time, was not appointed to this office, neither he (Mr. Bowell) nor any one else who had paid attention to this matter could see. He believed that what had been intimated by the right hon. member for Kingston last year, in this regard was then true, and had been proved to be true. A situation had to be found for a certain Nova Scotia politician, who was put in a place where he was not required at the expense of the country. This person's own report was the best evidence of this, though, it was very able in its way. He found no fault with Mr. Annand's talents and ability; he might be well fitted for the position if there was anything for him to do. He contended that there was nothing for Mr. Annand to do which Mr. Doré could not do, and did not do, before he went there. There was no necessity for filling up this place, except for the reason he had stated. Besides, 13 travelling agents were employed in Great Britain and Ireland, and at this office were employed eight or ten persons from Mr. Annand down to the door-keeper. A part of the instructions given to these agents who travelled at the expense of the Dominion, was to dissuade a certain class of immigrants from coming to this country. They and the Government must know that while the advantages held out to emigrants who desired to go to Australia or New Zealand were greater than those held out on the part of Canada, there would be very few emigrants who would come to this country unless they did so of their own accord, and with their own money. New Zealand offered a free passage, a free kit, and £2 for each adult; and anyone who had been around the Immigration offices in England, knew that, when the farm or other labourers, who had no means, but who desired to emigrate in order to better their position came to the Canadian office, they found that no assistance was given them, and, consequently, they proceeded to the Australian and New Zealand offices, where the advantages mentioned were held out. This was what Canada had to compete with. Mr. Annand pointed out this fact very forcibly in his report. While this continued, and while the depression lasted, what necessity was there for keeping 13 agents travelling through England, Scotland and Ireland and foreign parts, to induce emigrants to come to this country. He thought that this matter ought to receive the very serious consideration of the Government and of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: No doubt.

MR. BOWELL said he found that Mr. Annand also proved himself very useful to his Province and country, with which he found no fault. Mr. Annand stated that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, since his appointment, had dispensed with their agencies in London, and that he had performed these duties; but he (Mr. Bowell) did not understand that those Provinces contributed towards the payment of this officer's salary and the expenses of the office in proportion to the labour done by Mr. Annand for them.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: They do not contribute as much as the Dominion, but they contribute.

MR. BOWELL said that, with reference to the Mennonite immigration, he had understood very lately that some 100 families desired to come to this country or to Manitoba, and that they had asked from the Government an advance of $15,000.

MR. POPE (Compton): Of $20,000.

MR. TROW: $15,000 is right.

MR. BOWELL said he should conclude that this would represent 500 souls, as there would be very likely five persons to each family; but the Government, owing to the depressed state of the country's finances, had not felt justified in doing so. He further understood that ample security was offered for repayment of such sum. He thought it would be well if this Immigration Fund was distributed in this way; and this system would bring into the country a class which, he was informed, made the best settlers that had as yet gone to the North-West; and this amount for these numerous agents, who were utterly useless, could be reduced.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: They are by no means utterly useless. They are of very considerable benefit.

MR. BOWELL said that the reports showed they were utterly useless at the present time. They were instructed to dissuade the classes with a little means likely to come to this country from doing so, while those without means accepted the superior advantages offered elsewhere. Those with some means would not come here owing to the reports concerning the depressed state of the finances and business. Hence the withdrawal of two-thirds of the large proportion of the agents now travelling through that country, would be not only a saving, but also an advantage, for a number of years to come. Mr. Dyke, the agent at Liverpool, was, however, a most invaluable officer, who had done more to assist in bringing the question of live stock and Canadian meats before the English people, than all the other agents put together. If these officers were kept in the principal shipping ports here, their services could be utilized in the same manner, there would be ample reward and return for this expenditure; but this lecturing through the country was an utter waste of money. The landlords and tenant farmers were opposed to the movement, and he was told that some lecturers had adopted the mode of announcing a temperance lecture, and then dragging in the question of immigration.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is throwing cold water on immigration.

MR. BOWELL said he hoped that the sooner this item of $120,000 for keeping up a staff, as Mr. Annand states, to dissuade a certain class from coming to this country, and to induce others to come who would not do so, as Mr. Kingsmill said very properly, on account of the depression, was cut down one half, the better it would be for the country's finances.

MR. POPE: Will you tell me under what authority or clause of the Dominion Lands Act that item of $47,700 is given?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: It is secured, not given.

MR. BOWELL.

MR. POPE: Well, under what clause is it secured or given? I do not find that authority is given by the Dominion Land's Act. It was alleged with respect to quarantine, that there had been a large expense for small pox. Well, he remembered that in 1872 there was a large expenditure in Nova Scotia and the lower Provinces for cholera, so there had always been an item of $20,000 since then which might or might not be used for these purposes. He was quite willing to admit that the expense per capita for emigrants might have increased during the last three or four years, but he must complain that the expense had increased in a much larger ratio than it ought. He did not say that an emigrant was not worth the money paid, but he would say that emigrants could be got for less money.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that in 1873, 52,000 emigrants were brought into this country at a total expenditure of $304,000 or a net cost of $296,617, being $5.90 per capita. In 1877, 27,082 emigrants were brought over at a net expenditure of $11,670, being at the rate of $4.08 per head, against $5.90 in 1873. It was principally for the purpose of inducing employers of labour in this country to put themselves into communication with emigrants on the other side, and to advance money to bring those emigrants out, instead of Government having to pay the whole cost.

MR. CURRIER said he thought that taking into consideration the large number of men in this country out of employment, it became very questionable whether we should spend money for emigration purposes. He did not say that the agents were to be withdrawn from the old country, but their number might be reduced. He also thought it should be pressed upon the notice of emigration agents that farm labourers were the only class required. If they could reduce this vote in the manner he had suggested the surplus might be used to assist men from Montreal, Ottawa and other cities in this country who were starving from want of employment, to the North-West.

MR. POPE (Queens) said he should like to ask why Mr. Doré, the London agent, had had to give way for Mr. Annand, from Nova Scotia. Mr. Doré was a capital man for the position, and had attended well to its duties. He understood that the only reason why Mr. Annand should be put over the head of so excellent an officer as Mr. Doré was, that he had rendered certain political services which the Government felt bound to reward.

MR. BLANCHET said he thought the emigration staff at Quebec was much too large and should be reduced.

MR. TROW said these officers were really needed, they were very useful; and the Government was penurious if anything with regard to the remuneration of their services. He was confident that the number of agents in Great Britain and Ireland was not too many. An efficient staff was necessary to obtain immigrants; and agents must be placed in the immigration market, where great competition was experienced. Even Australia paid £10 a head for passage besides providing an outfit worth £2 or £3. If immigrants could be secured at £4 and £5 a head, it was a good investment and the very best investment that the Government could make. He thought that the Government had committed an oversight in not acceding the request of the Mennonites mentioned, particularly as ample security was offered. Better settlers never came to this country. He had visited their settlements, and they promised to become a very prosperous people. The agents in Ottawa, Toronto and Hamilton, were busily employed, within a radius of ten miles from Ottawa, in sending people to the North-West; probably 400 people had emigrated during the past two weeks. The staff in London was not too large, and useful information of all kinds was furnished at the London office, which was centrally situated. Any one who had visited it, would come to the conclusion that no extravagance whatever was committed there.

MR. BOWELL said they had not received an answer or information respecting the position held by Mr. Doré. His name did not appear among the names of the staff at the London Agency. The hon. the Premier had stated that he was appointed a temporary clerk to fill up the vacancy made by the resignation of Mr. Jenkins. What position did Mr. Doré occupy and where was his salary charged? It was not under the head of Civil Government.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: He was then acting chief. He was taking charge of the London office, and his salary was in the London pay list down to January 30th, 1877.

MR. BOWELL: When was Mr. Annand appointed?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: He was appointed sometime in May, but he arrived there, I think, in July.

MR. BOWELL: He says in his report that he arrived in London on the 8th of June.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I thought it was later.

MR. POPE (Queen's): What salary does Mr. Dore receive.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Either $2,000 or $2,400 when in England.

MR. MACKENZIE: His salary here is $2,000.

MR. MITCHELL: What is Mr. Annand's salary?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: $4,000.

MR. MITCHELL: What are his expenses?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: He has no expenses allowed. He is not required to travel. His proper quarters are in London.

MR. LANGEVIN said he thought that this item should be reduced, owing to the hardness of times, the want of money, and the paucity of present immigration. The last two or three items concerning agencies and travelling expenses of agents, were susceptible of large reduction. They could be diminished certainly one-half, and still provide for a sufficient staff, in view of the present reduced immigration. The statement concerning immigrant passengers and settlers who had come to this country, from 1857 to 1877, via. the St. Lawrence, set forth the following figures: 1869, 43,000, and for the succeeding years, 44,000, 37,000, 34,000, 31,000, 23,000, 10,000, 10,000, and for the last year 7,000. In 1877, the smallest number that ever had come by this route during the past 23 or 21 years, had so arrived. Nevertheless, the expenditure of this Department was kept at the same figure that it was ten years ago, when there was a large immigration. The Public Accounts did not give all the details of the expenditure under this head. He would call special attention to the report of Paul DeCazcs, the special agent in France, who stated :

"Nothing has occurred in regard to French emigration to Canada deserving of notice since the date of the last report which I had the honour to address to your Department in December, 1876. The operations of the Steamship Agents have been suspended, in consequence of the stoppage of the special bonus by your Government, on account of the crisis from which Canada was suffering ; matters have remained in the same condition as they were then. I have, therefore, as I did last year, restricted myself in drawing attention to our country, to publishing a series of articles on Canada in a leading Parisian journal ; several of these articles have been copied, in whole or in part, by some of the most widely circulated publications in Paris and the Provinces. I have, besides, been always ready to supply all persons applying to me for information. I am of opinion, in view of the dullness of business and of the general uneasiness now complained of in France, in case of the definitive cessation of the crisis in Canada, that next spring a fresh impulse might be given to French emigration to Canada."

That agent might be a most deserving gentleman ; but, if he had nothing to do, he might be more useful in Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE said in the meantime he could be utilized at the Paris Exhibition.

MR. BUNSTER said it would prove highly advantageous if the agent at British Columbia was removed to San Francisco. Runners went on board ships at the latter port and endeavoured to dissuade emigrants from going to British Columbia.

MR. BLANCHET wished to know whether there was any necessity for continuing the quarantine for cattle at Lévis.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was first undertaken when there was great fear of diseased cattle being imported from England. At the present time there was no reason to believe that cattle disease existed in England, and the quarantine had been practically abolished.

MR. MITCHELL said he found there had been a charge made for some policemen, and he wished to know what they were required for.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he believed they were employed at Grosse Isle quarantine station.

MR. POPE (Compton) said the work was done under the old Government a great deal cheaper and the results were much better in proportion, the agents being paid so much per head of the emigrants sent out. He thought it was a bad system to make these agents permanent officers ; in time, too, they would be expecting superannuation. Under the late Administration these agents were appointed only for a short time, about eight months—

MR. MACKENZIE : Some of them two months. It depended upon how long they wished to make their excursion.

MR. POPE said that if these agents were to be made permanent officers the House should be supplied with details as to their work.

MR. MACKENZIE : When the hon. gentleman was in office he asked for a vote of $150,000, and gave no particulars. He appealed to us publicly and privately to allow it to pass, and it would be all right.

MR. POPE said the explanation of this was that he had succeeded in entering into a private arrangement with a steamship company which was bound, under an agreement, with the United States, and it was expressly stipulated that the arrangement with the Canadian Government should not be divulged. He explained to the hon. gentleman, therefore, that he could not explain this to the whole House, and asked him to allow it to pass. But this $150,000 was for 40,000 or 50,000 emigrants, while the hon. gentleman wanted that sum for 10,000 or 15,000 emigrants.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was only one item in the hon. gentleman's estimate. There were other items.

MR. POPE: I can tell the hon. gentleman that there is not a single item in the estimate for 1873-4 larger than in the present item with the exception of the $150,000.

MR. MACKENZIE: I will read from the Public Accounts. There is one item of $150,000 towards immigration and immigration expenses, another of $70,000, the same item $20,000, another of $14,000 and a second at $14,000: and the entire sum is $327,000.

MR. POPE said the items were pretty much the same as now, with exception of the $150,000. In the present estimate there was one item of $14,000, then one of $24,000, one of $20,000, and one of $26,000. The item of $70,000 in the 1873-4 estimate he explained the other evening. That was the result of a conference which met before his time, and decided that each Province should have a certain sum to assist emigration objects. $20,000 was allowed to Ontario, $20,000 to Quebec, $10,000 each to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and $5,000 to British Columbia. The other items were exactly the same.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) suggested that it would be well to spend even a quarter of a million or more in removing to Manitoba those who could not find work in this Province.

MR. MACKENZIE said that a million dollars would go but a little way for such a purpose, as if they undertook to remove men from here to Manitoba they would be inaugurating a system of assisting men to go from any one part of the Dominion to the other. If men could not find work in Ontario they could not find it in Manitoba, and as there were free grant lands in all the Provinces, it would hardly be wise to commence moving round our people from one part of the country to the other.

MR. CAMPBELL said he considered this vote thrown away. It was an immense expenditure to support idle men for no purpose whatever. Manitoba should not be peopled to the prejudice of the older Provinces. When the Government did not provide employment for our own people, they ought not to bring out to this country immigrants who, in great part, were obliged to go to the United States to obtain employment. The Mennonites, a people who would not fight the battles of the country, should not be encouraged to come here; and if brought, they should not be placed on the border, in the post of honor. The whole system was wrong. The Government would not encourage our own industries; they would do nothing for our people who were starving. These immigrants were deceived. It was no wonder that the Government was falling into contempt, even with the most illiterate in the country. The people saw these facts. The country was tired of the Government which was composed of tyrants, and contemptible men. One of his constituents, who had held an office under this beautiful Reform Administration, had recently resigned it.

α. Immigration expenses, including transport and Mennonites.....$110,000

MR. SCHULTZ said he believed it was proper to bring these Mennonites to Manitoba, and he had supported that vote from the first; but while the Government expended so much money to bring foreigners to the North-West, it did not appear that any assistance was given to the unemployed in Canada, who were suffering great hardships in our cities, to transport them to that country.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that would have to be put in a separate vote.

MR. SCHULTZ said he could not understand why a small portion of the $110,000 could not be devoted to that purpose.

MR. MACKENZIE said that it would take about a quarter of a million dollars to do that.

MR. JONES said, though it would involve an expenditure of $500,000, it would be better to assist people at home than to bring foreigners to the country.

MR. SCHULTZ said that one-half of the public works of the west being carried out by Government, it would be well to assist some of the workingmen starving in our cities to Manitoba, and to find them employment. Here they had said to the Monnonites: "If you will come to the country of the North-West, the choicest portions of that land shall be taken from Canada and set apart for you; if you want money to induce you to come, we will lend you money." Yet, while the Government was willing to do all this for the people of some other nation, for their own countrymen, out of employment in their own cities, they refused to give any assistance whatever.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the matter of James Somerville et al (petitioner), appellants, and the Hon. Rudolphe Laflamme (defendant), respondent.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD BILL.

(Mr. Archibald.)

FIRST READING.

MR. ARCHIBALD introduced a Bill (No. 76) to amend cap. 8, 37 Victoria, entitled an Act to impose license duties on the compounding of spirits, and to amend the Act entitled: an Act respecting inland revenue, to prevent the adulteration of food, drink and drugs. He said that in examining the Act of 1874, relating to the adulteration of food, he found that while it provided for those cases in which articles of food had been adulterated, it did not provide for those in which substitutes were sold as such articles of food. This difficulty existed in England regarding the Act of 1872, upon which the one Act of 1874, he believed, was chiefly based; and in 1875 the Imperial Parliament repealed all former Acts concerning the adulteration of food, and enacted a law relating to the sale of food and drugs. One of its clauses met the case he had mentioned, and this Bill simply imported into the Act of 1874, and made part of the 23rd section this clause of the English Act. It was, doubtless, within the knowledge of the House that on this continent of late years, an article which was sold as a substitute for butter had been manufactured to a greater or less extent. It was known as oleo margarine or butterine, and he was informed that when properly made, it required almost an expert to detect the difference in appearance, at all events, between the genuine article and the substitute. This article had not been manufactured to any large extent in Canada as yet, although the manufacture of it had grown to some considerable proportions in the United States; but its manufacture was growing in Canada, and it seemed to him that some steps should be taken to prevent the imposition of this article upon purchasers as genuine butter. This substitute in itself, he believed, was not deleterious, but it was no less a fraud upon the pockets of the consumers, inasmuch as this was a cheaper article than butter, and made from beef suet. The great dairy State of New York had found the evil so great that it was necessary to take some steps to guard and protect not only the consumers, but also the producers of butter. Accordingly, last Session the Legislature of the State passed an Act which compelled the manufacturers of this article to brand their packages distinctly with the words "Oleo Margarine." He had introduced the clause making this provision from the New York law into this Bill, and he thought that the House would agree with him that no injustice would thus be done to the manufacturer of the substitute, as it took away from him the opportunity, as far as might be, of palming it off on the public for an article which it was not.

Bill read the first time.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

A Message was received from His Excellency the Governor-General, desiring the immediate attendance of the House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House, went to the Senate Chamber; —and being returned;

MR. SPEAKER reported, that the House had, in accordance with a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General, attended His Excellency in the Senate Chamber, and that His Excellency had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills, viz:—

An Act to reduce the capital stock of the Merchants' Bank of Canada.

An Act to incorporate the Société de construction Mutuelle under the name of the Société de prêts et placements de Québec, and for other purposes.

An Act to revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway.

An Act to extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island the Railway Act, 1868, and certain Acts amending the same.

An Act to amend and consolidate, as amended, the several Acts relating to the Quebec Fire Assurance Company.

An Act respecting the Bank of Liverpool.

An Act to incorporate the Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company.

An Act to authorize and confirm the scheme of arrangement of the Canada Southern Railway Company.

An Act to authorize the National Insurance Company to reduce its Capital Stock, and for other purposes.

An Act respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.

An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

An Act to amend the Post Office Act, 1875.

An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Sydenham Harbour Company.

An Act respecting the Maritime Court of Ontario.

An Act to incorporate the Regular Baptist Foreign Missionary Society of Ontario and Quebec.

An Act respecting the Montreal and City of Ottawa Junction Railway Company.

MALT DUTY BILL.

(Mr. Laurier.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said that before the motion for the third reading was passed, he desired to make an observation or two on the Bill, concerning which he made some observations when it was before the House on one of the former stages. He conceived that the system under which the revenue was proposed to be collected under this Act, was erroneous and one that might be better attained if another principle were adopted. If the principle adopted in the United States were put into force here, in place of following out the English system in accordance with this Bill, it would be far better for all parties concerned, and better in the interests of the Government and revenue of the country; and he thought that it would also be much more advantageous to all those engaged in the trade which was affected by this Bill. He conceived that in the interests of temperance, which it was the duty of Parliament to encourage and foster as far as possible, it would be better if the revenue were collected in another and entirely different way from that proposed under this Bill. The system adopted on the other side of the line, concerning which he had not very long ago made some enquiries, gave very general satisfaction; and under it the duties were easily collected, while its operations were not so vexatious and annoying to the parties engaged in the trade as the mode for which this Bill provided. There the duty imposed amounted to the sum of $1 a barrel on the beer which was consumed, and it was not collected until it was sent out of the country for consumption. A stamp was placed on the barrel which could not be used until the stamp was effaced, and therefore, the duty was collected as easily as the stamp duties were by the process in vogue for the collection of this portion of the revenue. He considered that if the American system was enforced here, it would be found to be much better adopted to the wants of the country, while it would enable the revenue to be collected more readily than was the case at present. Although he did not intend to ask for a discussion on this Bill, he thought that the subject was one which might fairly attract the attention of the Government, and if a little information on the subject was obtained, which could be readily done, he felt that the system in vogue here would be abandoned at the earliest opportunity. The duties which were imposed under this Bill were enormous, and he could not see why the duties here should be any higher than they were on the other side of the line. According to this Bill a duty of 2c. a pound or 72c. a bushel was levied, which imposed a tax on every barrel of beer consumed in the country, amounting to nearly $2 a barrel, as between 2½ or 3 bushels of malt were used to each barrel of beer; whereas the duty imposed on the other side was only $1 a barrel. He had previously made a general statement to the effect that for the first time the maltsters of this country were now enabled to manufacture and export. He was met by a statement from the hon. member for North Wellington, who quoted from the trade reports to show that during the past several years a quantity of malt varying from 150,000 to 300,000 bushels per annum had been manufactured in this country and exported; and this was received as evidence that a very large business was done by Canadian maltsters. This was a statement to which he confessed—although he was aware of the fact at the time—he did not suppose so much importance would have been attached, as appeared to have been the case with the hon. gentleman who made it. If it was supposed that the quantity named by the hon. gentleman, taking the largest quantity, 300,000 bushels, into consideration, was very considerable, he would only say that he made the statement advisedly when he said that the whole of the export of malt manufactured in Canada by Dominion maltsters, and exported, did not exceed, and, in fact, was not equal to the amount of malt manufactured by one of the large malt-making houses in the cities of New York, Newark and Philadelphia, or in the other large cities of the American Union. The whole quantity of the malt manufactured in this country and exported, in proportion to the amount of barley raised in this country, was little more than 2½ or 3 per cent. at the most, and in any one year, it had not exceeded 4 per cent. Under the duties levied in the United States, he believed and hoped that the malsters of this country would be enabled to export four or five times more than they were able to do during any of the years past; and he begged to congratulate the hon. gentlemen on the fact that they had made the admission that the legislation of Canada might so affect the legislation of the United States, as to induce the latter country to modify or revise their tariff. He trusted that this admission would lead to further changes in the tariff, and that the effect it would produce upon the legislation of the United States might be all that hon. gentlemen opposite expected to accomplish from this change, and which the people of this country hoped to accomplish by a tariff which we should like to see adopted here, believing that it would lead to the modification of the tariff on the other side, in the direction which the people of Canada generally desired.

MR. ROCHESTER said his hon. friend from South Ontario was not correct in stating that the law here was the same as in England, because the duty in England, if his memory served him right, was 62c. on the bushel of 50 lbs. Another difference was this: that the English maltster's account ran for three months, and at the expiration of that time he got a note for three months more. Now, in the Dominion of Canada, as soon as the malt was taken off the kiln and put in the dry malt-house, the law demanded that that malt should be paid for to the Inland Revenue Department before a pound of it could be used by the brewer. The English maltster, on the other hand, could brew his malt and sell his beer before he was called upon to pay tax on malt. Then in the United States there was a duty on beer but none on malt. When, therefore, an American brewer converted his malt into beer, he might keep it for twelve months or for twelve years, as the case might be, without paying any duty; all he did was to put a stamp on the barrel when he sold it. He knew many brewers in Canada who were forced to shut up their establishments because they were compelled to pay a duty on malt before they sold their beer. He thought, therefore, when the Government took the matter into their hands that they would have made some modification in the existing law. In Scotland, Ireland, Germany, or the United States, brewers were not so burdened as in Canada, and he thought it was not right that our brewers should be treated as they were. He did not know that he thoroughly understood the proposed change, but he believed it was intended that the duty should be altered from 2½c. to 2c. per lb., and that the Inland Revenue Department be charged with the collection of the tax, instead of the Customs Department.

MR. LAURIER said he conceived that the arguments made use of by the hon. gentlemen who had just spoken, did not apply so much to this particular Bill as to the general system. Upon a question of this sort, as upon many others, it was, he thought, quite impossible to satisfy everybody. The hon. gentlemen who had spoken had taken up separate grounds; and he might state that the brewers of this country were not agreed as to the manner in which this duty should be collected, some desiring that a tax should be placed on malt, while others wished a duty to be levied on beer. By the English system a duty was collected on malt, while in the United States it was levied on beer. During the short time he had been in the Department he had received strong representations against a duty on malt, but he was bound to say that equally strong representations were made against removing the duty from malt to beer. Several brewers stated that it would be for the best interests of the country if the American system was adopted, while others expressed the decided conviction that its adoption would lead to enormous losses. When, therefore, brewers themselves were not agreed as to the best course to be pursued, hon. gentlemen must admit that without further knowledge the Department could not do otherwise than they were doing.

MR. MITCHELL said the argument put forward by the hon. member representing the Inland Revenue Department was a very weak one, because it was the undoubted duty of the Government to find out what would be best for the interests of the country. What might be good for the large brewers might not be beneficial for the small brewers, and vice versa, but the Government should be able to regulate for the advantage of the country at large. That the policy of the Administration of Canada—he did not refer exclusively to the present Government—was a wrong one, was shown by the fact that out of seventy-seven distillers who formerly carried on business there were now only six.

Mr. YOUNG said the question which had been mooted as to whether the excise duty should be levied on beer or on malt was one of very considerable importance. A few years ago the practice was to collect the duty from the beer, and the result was that very strong objections were urged against it; just as many complaints were made regarding it as there were with reference to the present system. He would not refer to the objection which had been raised by the Minister of Inland Revenue, that the adoption of the American system would probably lead to the revenue being defrauded to a very considerable extent, but he would point out that under that system many brewers would have to pay more than their fair share of duty. He believed he was correct in stating that the quantity of malt used in making beer was from two to four pounds to the gallon, the average quantity, probably, being three pounds. Taking that average, the amount of duty at the present time on a barrel of beer of 32 gallons was $1.98. Now, in the county of Waterloo a most excellent article of beer, called lager, was made, which contained a very small quantity of alcohol, and which, he believed, could be made with about two pounds of malt to the gallon. If, then, the proposed tax on beer was carried out, the brewers in Waterloo would have to pay $1.98 per barrel as duty on beer, instead of $1.28 as they paid under the present system on malt. A description of beer like lager, which contained only a small percentage of alcohol, was preferable and should be encouraged more than a liquor which contained more alcohol. However, while he admitted that this was a question well worthy of the consideration of the Department, he did not wish to pronounce any dogmatic opinion upon it, but it was a fact that the objections raised against the present system were just as strongly urged against the other when it was in existence. He desired to further state: that, if people would drink—and it was a fact that many did—he thought it better that they should drink beer than whiskey and other strong spirits, which had a very pernicious effect; and, as he recognized the necessity to obtain revenue from this quarter, he thought it would be better to impose more duty on whiskey and less on beer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And yet the hon. gentleman voted with the Government when we proposed that the tax should rather be raised on whiskey than on malt.

Mr. YOUNG: The revenue required it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Now, however, when a general election is coming on, and because there are a number of Germans in Waterloo who like lager beer, he proposes a reduction in the duty on beer.

WINDING UP INSOLVENT INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.—[BILL No. 65.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that, in accordance with the understanding arrived at, he proposed to amend this Bill by making provision for the recovery of a proportional part of the premiums paid on policies in cases where parties reinsured after the issue of a writ of attachment, or the making of an assignment, as suggested by his hon. friend from Frontenac. His hon. friend from South Bruce, to whom, as the House knew, they were indebted for the Bill, had been kind enough to prepare for him an amendment, which he would submit when they went into Committee. He moved:—

“That the said order be discharged, and the Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction that they have power to amend Section 12, by inserting the following words after the word ‘accrues’:— ‘or in case (whether or not any such loss accrues) they have, after the issue of the Writ of Attachment, or the making of the assignment re-insured without the consent of one of the Company, then’”—

Motion agreed to.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said, whilst he was quite willing to admit that the claim for insurance should not take effect unless reinsurance was effected after the issue of a writ of attachment, yet he thought the claim for insurance ought to commence from the time that the reinsurance was effected. It did not seem to him that there was any good reason why six months' premium should be lost on a policy. It might seem a small matter in some cases, but in the case of steam mills in which the premium to be paid amounted to 7 per cent., the loss of six months' premium would be very serious indeed to the owner. He ventured to suggest that the claim for insurance should take effect from the time reinsurance was effected.

MR. BLAKE said the result would be that everybody would reinsure at once. Unless these policy holders who did not reinsure were allowed to claim for the whole time of the issue of the writ of attachment, it would destroy what the Banking and Commerce Committee had decided was a fair compromise between the respective interests of the policy holders and the company. It was probable that the policy holders gained an advantage to a certain extent, as the contract was altered rather in their interest, although not unfairly altered, by what was being done; and, under these circumstances, he did not see how it was possible to adopt the suggestion of his hon. friend from North Renfrew.

MR. ROCHESTER said that if the amendment of the hon. member for Renfrew was carried, it would place companies in a false position. The policy holders were very well protected as it was; the companies had got a certain amount of subscribed stock, and the Finance Minister, after the official investigation, might order a call to be made.

MR. WHITE said he should feel himself called upon to move the amendment he had spoken of upon the third reading.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD asked that the third reading might be taken at a subsequent period. The hon. member for North Renfrew would require time to prepare his amendment.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had no objection to complying with such a request.

MR. OUMET said that after the passing of the Bill insolvent insurance companies would be wound up according to the insolvency law. By this law three inspectors were appointed to control the winding up of the liquidation of the estate of the insolvent. These three inspectors—or sometimes there might only be one—were appointed by the creditors to watch over their interest in the debtors' estate. When a party became insolvent he had scarcely any interest in the winding up of his concern, except inasmuch as he was desirous that it should produce 50 cents in the dollar, so that he might have his discharge. The case of an insurance or joint stock company whose subscribed stock was not all paid was different; such a company might be solvent, but the shareholders seeing they could not carry on their business properly might desire to liquidate. He would like to see some provision made so that the shareholders might be enabled to have a certain control in the liquidation of the company. He would suggest that this might be done in a very simple way, without altering the Bill as it now stood, by one of the three inspectors of the estate being appointed by the shareholders and two by the creditors. This might be inserted as an additional clause and would be for the benefit of the shareholders.

MR. BLAKE said that in the Insolvency Law, which the wisdom of Parliament had devised, there was no provision for the interests peculiar to the shareholders of the company, but the shareholders or the company itself would be heard before the Judge as a party interested. He believed the interests and feelings of the shareholders would be to postpone the calls as long as possible, while on the other hand the creditors would require that the estate should be wound up at once. By making this arrangement with regard to the inspectors they would have two against one; they would have a house divided against itself. He did not believe there was the least practical danger of any Judge or Assignee authorizing a call unless it was necessary, and it would be inconvenient to introduce legislation specially to be applied to the insolvency of insurance companies. He thought it would be better for his hon. friend to leave the matter until next year, when a proper wind-up Act would come under consideration.

House resolved itself in Committee to consider the following Resolution:—

“That it is expedient that the Government be authorized to subscribe the sum of £15,000 sterling of first mortgage bonds of the Northern Railway of Canada, at the rate of ninety per cent., in satisfaction of the sum of £13,500 sterling, being balance remaining due by the said Company to the Dominion of Canada.”

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

(Mr. Laflamme.)

Order for third reading, read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

He said every British subject should have a right to be elected to Parliament if the people chose him, so long as he was independent of the Crown and could act as an independent representative of the people. He saw no reason why the people should not choose a man who had been trained in the public service and had proved himself an honest, worthy man, nor should there be any stigma thrown upon those men in declaring they should not have the same privilege as their fellow subjects, because they received a reward for their long service to the Crown. This reward was not a favour granted them, they had earned it; it was a freehold estate, an estate for life which the Government could not take from them. The hon. the Minister of Justice had suggested that under the Superannuation Act, any civil officer superannuated, could be recalled into the service. As a matter of fact that was a dead letter, not a single instance of this kind had been suggested, and if he were recalled he forfeited his seat and that was an end of it. In England a special Act was passed removing such disabilities.

MR. LAFLAMME said a superannuated officer could not be independent of the Crown since the Government could, at any time, force him to re-enter the service and thereby lose his seat, and perhaps gain a majority. Again, superannuation was supposed to be granted to a man who was incompetent to further discharge his duties, who had exhausted his life almost in the public service, and was therefore unfit to sit in Parliament. With respect to a Judge the case was still more delicate. A judge was entitled to obtain a pension after fifteen years service, and it was then optional with the Government to grant it or refuse it. Many Judges of late had been appointed at forty years of age, and at the age of fifty-five the Government might arrange with the Judge to superannuate him, and to use him as a candidate. The Government should not be allowed to have such influence.

Mr. LANGEVIN said according to the law a superannuated officer or pensioned Judge might sit in Parliament now, and no inconvenience had yet arisen from it, in fact not one had found his way here. It would be an advantage to have a retired Judge in Parliament, because he would be a man of experience and learning and who would be of great service in the House.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. OUMET moved in amendment.

“That the Bill re committed to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction that they have power to amend the same by adding to it the following clause: ‘No member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada shall be appointed to any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the Service of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance or emolument, or profit of any kind is attached, unless he has ceased for six months previous to hold a seat in the said Senate or House of Commons of Canada.’”

MR. WALLACE (South Norfolk) moved in amendment:—

“That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction that they have power to amend the same by adding to Section 5, the following words:—

‘If any Minister of the Crown shall knowingly be a party to any transaction whereby under any of the provisions of this Act the seat of any member of the House of Commons shall be voided, he, the said Minister, shall void his seat and forfeit his office, and shall be disqualified for seven years thereafter from being appointed to, or for holding any office under the Crown.’”

He said the Government was one party to the transaction, and was just as guilty as, and more so than the other party, the hon. member, as Ministers should know what the law was.

MR. BLAKE: Will my hon. friend tell me whether the Ministry committed a crime that appointed Mr. Dunkin a judge.

MR. POPE said that a crime was not then committed. What constituted a crime was an infraction of the law; but no law was broken when Mr. Dunkin was appointed a judge.

MR. BLAKE: But his seat was voided.

MR. POPE said he would like to know whether the hon. gentleman proposed to carry out the law to what he (Mr. Pope) considered its legitimate results. His complaint against hon. gentlemen opposite was, that they had continued to enter into these arrangements and put their friends in a false position; and he thought that those hon. gentlemen ought to suffer as well as their friends.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said an hon. member could accept an office or contract if he left the House; but if the motion went a little further and declared that if any Minister of the Crown, a party to a transaction by which a member obtained an office or contract, should allow this party, knowing that the getting of this office, or the promise of it or a contract, voided his seat—to remain in the House, such a Minister thus became a party to the transaction and ought to be removed; this would make it a crime on the part of the Minister to allow such a party to sit in the House, as much as it was a crime for such member to sit in the House. Thus, for instance, if any member had the promise of a seat in the Senate, as soon as prorogation took place, and he was allowed to sit in the House, the Minister who knew this, and who, having made the promise, allowed such a member to remain in the House, would be equally liable with the said member. He understood that this was the effect of the resolution of his hon. friend, but as this resolution certainly did not contain that provision, he, therefore, thought that he for one could not vote for it.

Amendment (Mr. Wallace) negatived on a division.

MR. BOWELL said it was quite evident that the House was not prepared to accept so sweeping a resolution, as that moved by his hon. friend from North Norfolk, and he would therefore propose one in a more modified form. They had seen in the House in the past when questions had arisen and motions were made, which were supposed to effect the seats of certain members, the Government shelter themselves under the plea that they were not liable to any penalty on the ground that it was only the person who accepted the work from the Government or a Minister that was affected by it; and that therefore the person who so tempted a member of Parliament was not guilty of any act, whereby he either forfeited his seat or was subjected to any penalty. His view then and now was that the person who knowingly and wilfully tempted a member of Parliament to violate the law, and to accept either a contract or agreement by which to put public money into his pocket, against the provisions of this Independence of Parliament Act, was equally guilty with the member who received such work; and, therefore, he would propose to make the Minister who offered such contract or agreement to any member subject to the same penalty as such member. The tempter and the tempted should be treated alike. Within these last few days an investigation had taken place before the Public Accounts Committee; he would not enter into the details, but he would merely say that the Public Accounts showed that a member of Parliament had, during the last year, received from this Government between $30,000 and $40,000 for supplies furnished to the Government Departments. The Government might say that they knew nothing of this; but it was in evidence that the contracts entered into were sent down to the Government for approval; and it would be futile and nonsensical to say that this Government or those members of it in whose Departments these contracts were given, did not know that the parties who accepted the contracts and tendered for them were members of Parliament. Was it at all likely that members occupying positions of the kind could hold independent positions while they sat in the House; and it was equitable to declare that those who tempted them, and knew of their entering into these contracts, should be punished as well as those who took and profited by them. He therefore moved in amendment:

“That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction that they have power to amend the same, by adding to section 5 the following words:

“If any Minister of the Crown shall knowingly be a party to a contract or agreement, whereby under the provisions of this Act the seat of any member of the House of Commons shall be vacated, the seat of the said Minister shall thereby be also vacated, and the said Minister shall become subject to the penalties imposed by this section.”

Mr. BLAKE said that this amendment was open to precisely the same objection as that of the hon. member for South Norfolk. It varied only in this particular, that the penalty on the Minister for not violating any law, and for not doing that which the Bill permitted, was not quite so severe as the hon. member for South Norfolk proposed to make it. He thought that it involved disqualification for seven years as to sitting in this House, but how long a disqualification was not proposed, he did not precisely know. This motion was again based on a misapprehension of the structure of this Independence of Parliament Act, and of all preceding similar Acts. They were all based on the theory that it was legitimate to appoint a member of Parliament to an office, and to make a contract with him and that he must then cease to be a member of Parliament. The seat must be annulled by the acceptance of office or the making of a contract. If the House was disposed to alter the proposition and disable a man while sitting here, and until a certain period afterwards from being a contractor or public officer that was one thing, but the structure of the Bill remained sustained, by the decision of the House, so that it remained lawful to appoint a man to office or give him a contract while he was a member; and this being so, it was nonsensical to attach a penalty to a Minister for doing an act which the Bill did not prohibit and which it was not the policy of the House to prohibit. The practical solution of this question seemed to him to be very plain, and to differ from the hon. member's plan. Either a resolution or a Bill, or a clause, or an understanding which, should make it the duty of a Minister who had been a party to the disqualifying act, to give the requisite notice of that disqualification, so that the member's seat should be vacated, should be introduced; and it should also be the duty of the Minister who made the disqualifying contract to announce that fact to Parliament at the earliest possible period afterwards, in case the seat should not have been vacated before. This was all that was necessary to guard against the difficulty, and make the whole Bill harmonious. It was, however, just as impossible to sustain this amendment as that of the hon. member for South Norfolk.

Mr. WALLACE: I think we ought to go further and declare that a Minister who does not give such notice, should void his seat.

Mr. BLAKE: You may attach what penalty you please to the branch of duty, but you may be quite sure that such a clause will carry its own results.

Mr. HAGGART: The difficulty could be avoided by requiring the resignation of the seat before a member could receive a contract.

WINDING UP INSOLVENT INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.—[Bill No 65.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

MR. WHITE (Renfrew) moved :

“ That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same, by inserting after the word ‘ months,’ in line 8 of clause 12, the following words :— ‘ from the time such re-insurance shall have been effected.’ ”

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he hoped the hon. the Finance Minister would be able to accept this amendment, because, as the law stood at present, when re-insurance was in such cases effected, an insolvent company ceased to be liable to pay the risk if it was allowed to retain the premium for the period between the time that re-insurance was effected, and six months after it would run no risk. He saw no reason why the Government should insist on an insolvent insurance company being allowed to withhold a premium till six months after re-insurance was effected.

MR. BLAKE said he had already endeavoured to explain the difficulty of going further than the hon. the Finance Minister did go. In the first place, the hon. gentleman said that an insolvent insurance Company retained possession of the premium for a portion of time during which the risk no longer existed. It was certainly true that the risk no longer existed, because if an insurer re-insured, the contract between himself and the insolvent company was at an end. The Government proposed, in compliance with the request made, to allow a partial relief in case of re-insurance, but what the hon. gentleman proposed would place an insolvent company at great disadvantage. The wholesome practice of insuring for short period risks was the best safeguard the public could have. He hoped legislation would put an end to the three years’ system, because he believed that to have been the cause of a great proportion of the losses, and reckless trading of insurance companies. The public had the remedy in their own hands, and he did not think it would be judicious to go further in the meantime.

XI.—MILITIA.

ORDINARY.

66 Salaries of Military Branch and District Staff..... $28,600

MR. BOWELL said he did not think that much required to be said since the new Minister had taken control of the War Department of this country. He had had the audacity in the past to criticise the manner in which the volunteer militia of this country was managed formerly ; he regretted to say there was little improvement at the present time. Most of the reports presented to the House by the Major General had been of a character to meet with the approval of volunteer officers, to those who had watched the progress of that force from its inception. The Major General had shown a practical knowledge of the wants of the volunteer force of this country which had not been exceeded by his predecessors. Still there were, he must confess, some strange sentences and passages in this report. It did seem to him that if the Major General had directed his attention more particularly to the Government, and asked them to do that which he had asked the independent members of this House to do, he would be more likely to accomplish the object he had in view. It was quite evident he was a soldier, and not a civilian, or he never would have written this passage :— ‘ I trust that some of the many members of the Militia, who represent constituencies in Parliament, may undertake to hold up their voices in their behalf. I have often felt how meagre is the support the militia receives from those who by practical experience of their requirements, have it in their power to make their case clear before the Legislature." This passage was evidently one that the Major-General could not have thought much over when he wrote it, because he must have known, as everyone in the country knew, that independent members of the House had, on previous occasions, called the attention of the Government to what they conceived to be defects in the management of the force, and not only of this, but the preceding Government; and it had been a constant source of regret to those who took an interest in the volunteer force that the suggestions which had been made by the various commanders had not been attended to. It had always been the opinion of many in this House that the staff swallowed up a large amount of the appropriation, and that a reduction of this item was desirable. It was reduced to a certain extent last year, and he found the Major-General said:—"We have twelve Deputy Adjutant-Generals, one for each military district, and eleven Brigade Majors, a small reduction in the latter was made two years ago, and the result has been good instead of the reverse. With trifling exception the staff, as a whole, is efficient, and some of them as good as could possibly be desired." He (Mr. Bowell) had no desire to find fault with the gentlemen composing the staff; on the contrary he believed most were efficient and faithfully discharged their duties, but it would be in the recollection of hon. members that so long ago as the passing of the Bill which created these Brigade Majors, he, with others, took exception to this branch of the staff, and he never ceased to believe that it would be just as efficient without that branch. He quoted this as much in justification of what he had been striving for during nine years as anything else. There was one of the most experienced officers in the Kingdom at the head of our volunteer force, and two years ago he recommended this reduction of the staff. A partial reduction had been made, and this had resulted in more good than might have been expected. There was another passage, however, in reference to this staff, which seemed to be uncalled for. In the 6th paragraph he said:

"I before suggested that the Brigade Staff should be paid a consolidated allowance proportioned to the amount they now receive, instead of being paid eight dollars per annum for each efficient company. It is hardly to be expected from the most conscientious officer that he will willingly bring to notice and recommend the disbandment of an inefficient company at the price of reducing his own income. I am aware the present system has this result--which has a bad effect and deters officers from independent action."

He (Mr. Bowell) thought this was a statement scarcely to be expected from an officer holding so high a position. It was a direct intimation that the brigade majors, in order to obtain these extra eight dollars, hesitated to report those inefficient who really were so. That was a reflection upon those officers, and he thought scarcely a reasonable one. Still, he was bound to believe that the Major-General knew it to be a fact, or he would not have placed it in his report. At all events, it called for an investigation on his part and on the part of the Government; and, if it were found to be true, then the sooner the brigade majors were dispensed with the better. He had no desire to go through the whole of this report, but he would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia whether it was the intention of the Government to carry out the suggestions made in that report? For instance, the Major-General had drawn attention to military schools, in reference to which he said very little or no good had resulted from their establishment. He spoke of those particularly in the Maritime Provinces, and called the attention of the Government also to the neglect of the city of Montreal in rebuilding their drill shed. He said the city had received $12,000 to aid them in the erection of a drill shed, which $12,000 they had kept to themselves, without carrying out the agreement; and he recommended that the sum should be sued for and collected from the city. That opened up a very large question, and he (Mr. Bowell) thought it must be evident that it was scarcely fair or equitable to this section of the country, which raised a large volunteer force, to ask men to build armories and drill sheds for themselves. The force was for the benefit of the whole Dominion, and the funds of the Dominion should be used to construct sufficient drill sheds and armories, in which the clothing and arms could be properly secured and the men properly drilled. He knew that the voice of the country would not justify them in maintaining an active force in a country like ours, but he thought that, from the experience of the past, they should adopt some system permanent in its character. The suggestions thrown out in this report if adopted, might add a little to the present expenditure, but it would more than repay the country by ensuring an efficient force that would be useful if required. That increased expenditure might be met by striking out the staff officers he had referred to. The Major-General also called attention to the necessity of compelling those who took no active interest in the militia organization, who spent no time in drill, and who only endeavoured to turn the whole movement into ridicule, to pay a capitation grant towards the maintenance of these forces. This was not a new idea, and he believed that if this system was adopted, perhaps it might be sufficient to impose it at the present moment, but there was a time when the imposition of such a tax would have been acceptable and would have been received by the country as a step in the right direction. As he did not desire to continue the discussion on every item as it came up, he had made these general remarks, and he would only repeat that the staff at headquarters might be reduced and the money spent upon other matters which would tend to the efficiency of the force.

MR. DEVLIN said this was, perhaps, a fitting time to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia to the want of an armoury in the City of Montreal. He concurred with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat, in reference to the necessity he had pointed out to provide proper drill sheds and armouries all over the country, and he should like to know what steps the hon. Minister of Militia had taken to secure the Montreal volunteer force that accommodation for dilling which was absolutely necessary, if the force was to be kept together. It was true, as the hon. member for North Hastings had stated, that the Government made a grant of $12,000 to the City of Montreal to assist in erecting a suitable armoury for the use of the volunteer force of that city, and he (Mr. Devlin) was himself in the Council at that time, and took an active part in promoting that object. The armoury was constructed, but a short time after the roof fell in and the building became a ruin, and from that time up to the present no step had been taken on the part of the city to replace the building or return the money which the Government had granted for that purpose. It was a matter of very great importance to have a proper drill shed erected in that city. He presumed the hon. Minister of Militia knew very well that the men who were members of the force throughout the Dominion could only devote their time to drill in the evenings. They were engaged during the day in various employments which rendered it absolutely impossible for them to devote the day to drilling purposes. Therefore, if they had no place to go to at night where they could acquire that knowledge which was absolutely essential, of course the efficiency of the force must become impaired. Not only that, but the taste for volunteering was also considerably impaired. When volunteers felt that interest was not taken in them, and that they were left without means for perfecting themselves in military knowledge, they began to think they were losing their time. The corporation of Montreal had dealt unjustly with the volunteer force. They had kept possession of $12,000 which the Government had given as a grant toward the construction of this building, which money they had kept since the destruction of the former one. With the interest added the sum would now amount to $20,000, a sum amply sufficient to provide the necessary accommodation for the volunteers of that city. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Militia would take immediate steps to oblige the Corporation to return the money or to construct the building. He wished to make one remark with reference to the statement made by the hon. member for North Hastings, in speaking of providing suitable places for the preservation of arms, which as he (Mr. Devlin) had already said, was absolutely necessary, that he had read in the Montreal papers that arms had been lent by some volunteers in that city, and he deprecated the practice. He (Mr. Devlin) agreed with the hon. member that arms should not be permitted to leave the armories except for military purposes. He desired also to say that the arms lent, on that occasion, were simply half-a-dozen for a performance in one of the theatres in the city. It had been the practice of regiments of volunteers, in Montreal, to lend a few rifles on occasions of that kind. On that occasion, a very great deal of feeling had been caused by mis-statements in public newspapers. He trusted the Minister of Militia would be able to inform them that he had taken steps to place the volunteer force in Montreal in a more efficient state than it had been for the past ten years.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said it was quite natural that the Major-General, in discussing the position of the militia in this country, should have made reference to members of this House. He was aware, no doubt, that there were a great many gentlemen in this House who, for a long time, had held very important commands in the militia service of the country, and he naturally thought that he had good reasons to hope that these gentlemen, who represented constituencies in Parliament, might undertake to say a good word in carrying out some of the recommendations which he had, year after year, made on this subject. The Major-General probably knew, as well as members of this House, that the expenditure for military purposes had not been very popular in this country for some time. Therefore, was this reference made to hon. gentlemen that they might aid the Government of the day in carrying out the expenditure, and in popularising, if possible, the vote which the Government would think necessary to ask for that purpose. The hon. member for North Hastings had referred to recommendations made by the Major-General on a previous occasion in favour of reducing the brigade staff. That reduction had been made to a considerable extent, as the General had stated in his present report, without in any way impairing the efficiency of the service. He was not prepared to deny that there was a great deal of force in what the hon. member for North Hastings had said with reference to a farther reduction of the staff. He had always thought there was a large amount of money expended on the staff, and was always of opinion that the Militia force might be managed with a smaller staff; but, looking at the position elsewhere, he felt that it was not proper at the present moment to make an important reduction, until it could be seen whether the position of affairs in the near future would be similar to that enjoyed in the past. On that point he did not differ much from the hon. member for North Hastings. The Lieutenant-General had pointed out that the amount which these Brigade Majors received for their official companies was an objection to the system. It certainly was. It could hardly be expected that these men, receiving a certain sum of money, could always report as promptly as they should do, if the company was not as effective as it ought to be. The hon. member for North Hastings had asked whether the Government had taken any steps to enquire into this, or whether the Government was aware of it. The Government could only be made aware of this through the officers, through the Deputy-Adjutant-General or military staff of the district, and could hardly otherwise be made aware of the fact, whether a certain company was up to its effective force, or whether the Brigade-Major had reported the company as effective, when it was not quite up to the standard. That system had been formed in the old Provinces, for the purpose of paying these Brigade Majors according to the duty they performed. He did not mean to say it was a good system; it was one which might be very much improved. With regard to Military schools in the Maritime Provinces, he quite agreed with the Lieutenant-General in his recommendations, and means were now being taken and information obtained with a view to placing them in a different position. He believed they had not worked as satisfactorily as had been expected. With regard to the Montreal drill-shed and the question of drill-sheds, the system had been settled by previous Governments. The system in providing drill-sheds was to divide the expenditure between the localities requiring them and the Government of the Dominion. Following up that principle, the Government some time ago, by an arrangement with the corporation of Montreal, gave them $12,000 towards building a drill-shed in that city, and also paid them $1,200 yearly rent. That was continued until the roof fell in. Since then the Skating Rink of Montreal had been hired by the Government for the use of the volunteer militia. No doubt the position of affairs in Montreal was extremely unsatisfactory, and he had deemed it his duty, on taking charge of the Department, to draw the attention of the Corporation of Montreal to the position of affairs, and insist on their returning the money or provide the necessary accommodation for drill and armoury purposes. He was glad to say that this question was now being considered by the Corporation. The attention of the Government had been drawn to the fact that the Champ de Mars was being used as a place of deposit for rubbish, and that the fences had been allowed to go down, and that it had been made worthless for military purposes. He had called the attention of the Corporation to that also, and hoped they would remedy it. The policy of the late Government had been followed with regard to drill-sheds, and if a change were desired it was for Parliament to decide. With regard to the condition of arms, no doubt many arms belonging to the Dominion had been distributed throughout this country without that proper care which was necessary to keep them in a good state of preservation. The chief difficulty had been to find proper persons to take charge of them. The Government had lately sent to England for two first class armoury sergeants, who were now on their way out, and would arrive the coming week or ten days. He intended sending them about the country to examine the different armouries and see that the arms were in a good state of repair. The system of distributing arms to independent companies could not but result in what the hon. gentleman pointed out. Many of these having no armouries, the members took the arms home, and they were sometimes not taken proper care of. It was the object of the Government to consolidate the Militia as much as possible. From his short experience, he perceived that the system pursued of having so many independent companies throughout the country at a distance from control and inspection had not been satisfactory. It would be much better to have a smaller and better trained force, located in the larger cities, towns and villages, where they could be got at readily.

MR. McNAB said he desired to submit to the notice of the Committee, and more particularly to the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia and the Government, the case of an old militia man who was enrolled in the militia of 1812. The case was one of considerable interest to members of the militia force, and worthy of the sympathy of the House. The militiaman in question was Angus B. McDougall, of the Township of Lancaster, in the County of Glengarry, who was enrolled in 1812, in one of the regiments of incorporated militia of the then Province of Canada. He served as a soldier faithfully for a period of three years in the rank of sergeant; he was present in three or four engagements, and in 1814 was severely wounded in the arm, head and shoulder, at the battle of Lundy's Lane. He was discharged from the regiment in 1815. About the time of his discharge he was examined by the Board of Examiners appointed for such cases, and he was recommended to be placed on the pension list, his wounds being found to be such as rendered him unable to do any service to support either himself or his family. He drew a pension of $80 a year until 1819. At that time, for some reason or other, his name was struck from the list, and he was consequently deprived of his pension. He made several attempts to have his pension renewed, which were ineffectual. He travelled to Toronto to have an interview with the Governor General of the day, who promised to take his case into consideration, and led him to hope the pension would be restored. However, for some reason the case was overlooked for a number of years. He then underwent an examination before the surgeon of the regiment in which he was enrolled, who certified that his wounds were of such a character that he was unable to perform manual labour. Two years afterwards, by command of the Governor-General, a Medical Board was again appointed to re-examine him—that was in 1837—which Board recommended that Mr. McDougall's name should be again placed on the pension list; and he had drawn from that period to the present, the pension of $80 a year. That old, gallant militiaman, who had been wounded in the service of his country, claimed he had a right to be paid for the period between 1819 and 1837, and his claim appeared to be a just and equitable one. Mr. McDougall had made several efforts to have his claim recognized, but men living in the country districts were not in a position to advance their claims as successfully as those living near the seat of Government. It might be objected that Mr. McDougall's claim was one which should have been pressed against the old Province of Canada, and not against the Dominion; and that objection might undoubtedly have some force. But it would be noticed that Mr. McDougall urgently pressed his claim, though unsuccessfully; and the Province of Upper Canada being now a part of the Dominion, any just claims against it should receive due recognition and consideration, and although the claim was an old one, that should be no bar to its being paid, if a just one. He hoped, therefore, the Minister of Militia would give the case that careful attention which it deserved, and satisfy Mr. McDougall's claim; and should the Government not be able to pay him the whole claim, he trusted that they would deal with him fairly and equitably, and pay him, at least, a portion of said claim.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said the hon. member had, no doubt, stated the case fairly; but the difficulty of dealing with the case at the present time, was obviously very great. Mr. McDougall was struck from the pension list in 1819, and replaced in 1837. It appeared, also, from the papers, that Mr. McDougall had made several ineffectual efforts to obtain arrears of pay between those years, from the old Province of Canada. The Government of the Province of Upper Canada refused both in 1838 and 1845, to entertain the proposal. Of course, the case might seem a hard one, but he (Mr. Jones) did not perceive how the Government could entertain a claim at this remote period, which was refused by the Government of the day, although aware of the circumstances.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he was glad to find that some steps were being taken to keep the expensive and delicate arms scattered over the country in the hands of volunteers in order. He was very much afraid that, if required, a great number of these arms would be found to be so much damaged as to be utterly useless. Efficient armourers should be placed in the different districts to see that these arms were kept in repair. The inspecting officers too, often passed over the arms without taking care to see that they were in good order, or they simply withheld the money without seeing that it was expended to put them in order. This money should be expended under armourers. The hon. gentleman told them that armourers were about to arrive in this country; and he was entitled to a great deal of credit for this step, which was a step in the right direction.

MR. BUNSTER regretted that no appropriation was made for the erection of a drill-shed at Nanaimo, where one was urgently required; where there were now 70 volunteers, a number which could be raised to 150, two companies, if proper encouragement was extended by the Department, which was not at present the case. The officer in command was only an ensign, though admirably qualified for his duties, and the best officer in the Province, while there were a major and captain at Victoria, and also a captain at New Westminster. They had also discharged naval officers at Nanaimo, who would drill the volunteers for a very small remuneration.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said that the affairs of British Columbia had received the attention of the Department. The Major-General recommended last year that guns should be placed in position at Point Macauley, for the protection of Nansimo and Victoria Harbours. Application had been made to the Imperial Government to have this done, and they have every reason to suppose that rifled guns would be sent out for this purpose. They were building a magazine at this point, and repairing the place where the stores were kept, and had given instructions for the raising there of a battery of artillery. They were doing everything they could, consistent with the sum at their disposal, to protect that part of the coast. He confessed that the question of placing a drill-shed at Nanaimo had not engaged the attention of the Department, but if the hon. gentleman would show the necessity of it, he should be disposed to give the matter favourable consideration.

MR. CARON said that the question of engaging armourers for the different districts deserved the consideration of the Government. He believed that the artillery, cavalry and infantry forces of the Dominion numbered about 25,000 men, and he thought that special attention had been given to the promotion of the artillery branch, though it comprised only about 5,000 men. "A" and "B" Batteries had been established, and artillery schools had been opened. This was, no doubt a very important branch, especially as regarded Quebec, owing to its fortifications; but, nevertheless he considered that some more attention should be paid to the infantry branch, of which the bulk of the force was composed.

MR. DOMVILLE said that all the various reports brought down by the General in command pointed to the advisability of having proper and efficient forces, though, as the hon. Minister of Militia said, it was very difficult to accomplish this without a sufficient appropriation. The hon. gentleman was a vast improvement on his predecessor. The hon. gentleman evinced a desire to improve the service generally, as could be seen by his action regarding Wimbledon. No doubt the hon. gentleman saw that it would be difficult to make the service effective unless judicious change was made. The hon. gentleman suggested there should be a small and better trained force, and perhaps this was a good idea, though then the question arose as to where we would get a large number of men, if occasion required them. To keep up the various corps in the country properly, some other inducement beyond the eight days' drill should be given, the men should have some esprit de corps, and made, as far as possible, to feel like real soldiers. The commanding officer should take an interest in the corps, and every inducement should be held out to make the service popular. They had one cavalry corps in New Brunswick, and as the men were greatly scattered, there ought to be some means furnished for bringing them together—say for fifteen days' drill at least, once in three years, if not oftener. Very little inducement existed at present to keep these men together, though the corps had never as yet been disbanded. Last year he had brought this point up, but he was informed that this was the course adopted through Canada. He could understand that this would do very well for cavalry corps in Toronto. There the men lived near each other, but in New Brunswick the state of affairs was altogether different. He thought greater satisfaction would have been given if their military had been employed in St. John at the time of the great fire. The General himself stated that the drills should extend to a period of not less than 28 days. He thought that an Infantry School should be established in the Lower Provinces. It was rather humiliating to find the Lower Provinces censured in the report for not being as efficient as they should be in this relation, but the truth was that sufficient inducement was not held out to make the service popular. Captains might be given an allowance to collect accoutrements after drill and keep them together, for he did not believe that armourers could be had everywhere. It would be impossible to employ an armourer in connection with this cavalry corps. Complaint was made in the report about the loss of a few marquees, etc., in connection with the great fire; but he thought the country should be able to bear this loss, without having such particular notice taken of the fact. He mentioned this because the Corporation of St. John was called upon to pay for certain tent poles, mallets and other articles which were really handed over to the Relief Committee, in whose possession they were now, or, at least, ought to be. Though the volunteers of New Brunswick were not so well up in drill, yet the corps were well commanded, especially the cavalry, who were praised by so distinguished an officer as the Lieutenant-General. He hoped the Opposition would be able next year, though on a different side of the House, to accord the Minister of Militia some praise for the present efficiency of the forces.

MR. BLANCHET thought the Minister of Militia must be congratulated on his accession to such an important Department, and he thought the country must be congratulated on the defence of Canada being entrusted to the hon. member, whose manliness, military air and degagé, convinced all that this Department was in proper hands. The people of this country were not very favourable to a standing army, though they were all pleased to see grand reviews and other military spectacles—because our resources did not allow of our keeping a large number of men on a permanent footing. The eminent officer who came to this country a few years ago had ascertained, as far as possible, our requirements, and had made recommendations which, if carried out, would enable us to have a force ready for any emergencies. There were some corps in this country, principally in the fortified towns like Quebec and Kingston, which were on a very efficient footing, and he would merely allude, therefore, to the infantry, which was the most important branch of the service and the most difficult to maintain. If the recommendation of the Major-General were carried out, if military schools and armouries were established, good staff officers appointed, and a proper number of days set aside for drill, the infantry would be made really efficient—eight days' or twelve days' drill, per year, were not sufficient. He thought, also, ammunition should be supplied to rifle clubs at cost price; he did not suppose the Government desired to make a profit out of this ammunition.

MR. FLESHER said his firm conviction was that it would be unwise, if the esprit de corps of the force was to be maintained, to make such changes as would allow them to remain for one or two years undrilled. He was glad to hear that it was the intention of the Government to send armourers around, because, from his own personal knowledge, he could say that nearly 10 per cent. of the arms were at the present time rendered useless, especially in rural districts where there were no persons skilled in arms to inspect them. In these districts it frequently happened that persons who wished to become expert shots secretly made alterations in their rifles, which frequently damaged them, and a very large proportion also were destroyed by oxidization in consequence of there not being a suitable armoury or well-warmed apartment in which to store them. In his own neighbourhood he had found it necessary to build a compartment above the level of the ground, and, by introducing double floors, render it warmer than the majority of armouries in this Dominion. Then, until recently, there had been a conflict between the standing rules and orders and the statutory rules as to how companies could be called out to aid the civil power. That, however, had been amended by a recent Order in Council, but there was still a difficulty as to how they should be paid when called out in any locality. The word "locality," as mentioned in the Act, was of very vague significance. He (Mr. Flesher) was with his company called out last Fall, in anticipation of a riot, to a place which happened to be without the town line. Application was made to the county for pay, but it was refused, and on the town authorities being applied to, he was referred back to the county. This was not, perhaps, a matter of grave moment, but it might be found in a case of emergency that the militia would possibly display considerable reluctance to respond to a call if they were not certain of being paid. He hoped the hon. Minister of Militia would more clearly define whether the word "locality" meant township or county.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said that as the hon. member for Bellechasse doubtless knew, it was difficult for any one in charge of a Department like that of the Militia, to deal with all the branches of the service with the limited means at his disposal. No doubt it would be a great advantage to have a training school for the infantry, but that would entail considerable expense. At present there were schools of gunnery at Quebec and Kingston, where young men might receive such education in infantry tactics as would qualify them to be infantry officers. He confessed it was not desirable that the two offices should be mixed up, but at the present time the Government had not sufficient funds at their disposal to establish separate schools. With regard to the division of the forces, they must, of course, be largely influenced by the General commanding them. If his hon. friend looked at the reports of the Lieut.-General accurately he would find certain propositions were laid down that it was necessary, in certain places, to utilize the forts already in existence. He would also find that great stress was laid by the Lieutenant-General on the necessity for increased fortifications at Quebec and Kingston. The Government had taken some steps to supply the deficiency at Quebec, and had ordered one battery there, with two infantry companies, and intended to give a company to Lévis to man the forts on that side of the river. His hon. friend would be aware also that Sir William Pallister lately offered some rifle-cannon for the fortifications of Quebec, which were accepted, and were now on their way out. Since then, Sir William Pallister had been kind enough to make another offer of a ten-inch gun for Nanaimo, but, considering that skilled men were required to work at it, and that each time it was fired it would cost $40, it was deemed advisable to place it at Quebec, where it might be of service in case of need. Orders had lately been given for the raising of two companies in Manitoba. Offers to raise companies were being received every day, but only those were accepted at places where, from a strategical point of view, they were considered necessary. With reference to ammunition, he might mention that the rule of the Department had been to sell it considerably below cost to volunteers requiring it. Ammunition for the Snider Enfield rifle, which cost $21.72 per thousand, had been sold at $16, without the boxes, which cost $2 each. That would be about three dollars per thousand less than they cost the Department; and the volunteers obtained them at this reduction, for rifle purposes, because the Government were anxious to encourage the use of fire-arms in that way.

MR. BLANCHET thought it would be well to have a detachment of artillery at Quebec, because it was necessary that the forts should be kept in repair.

MR. JONES said they proposed at an early date to raise a battery at Lévis.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was not surprised at his hon. friend from Bellechase (Mr. Blanchet) wishing to see the guns at Quebec; but he (Mr. Langevin) thought there were also other places that ought not to be forgotten. He hoped that Esquimault Harbour had not been forgotten, for, although it was a place very far from Ottawa, the people of British Columbia were under the same rule, and had the same right to the protection of the Dominion. He was thankful to the hon. the Minister of Militia for the readiness with which he had attended to his remarks with regard to the rules and regulations for the Dominion Cadets. But the change made in the rules had not been advertised except in the Official Gazette, which was read by very few people. It should be published in all the papers, irrespective of party, so that the young men would be made aware of the change. If he was rightly informed.

it was intended there should be two cadets from each district. Would it not be well to insist that each of those staff officers should furnish two cadets from his district? He hoped the hon. the Minister of Militia would take measures to make the College accessible to all sections.

MR. PLUMB said he would be glad to hear from the hon. the Minister of Militia whether he intended to provide camps, and whether one would be held at Niagara. He also suggested that the sum of $1,000 be set aside out of the amount appropriated for repairs to be used on the barracks at Niagara, to prevent them from falling into ruin. The remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix respecting the desirability of obtaining French Canadian cadets in the Kingston College, were well put and worthy of being attended to.

MR. BOWELL said he was strongly in favour of company drill, which was of the greatest importance. It was true that commanding officers and members of the staff desired battalion, brigade and division drill, but raw companies should be first thoroughly drilled at headquarters, and then their movement in masses was a comparatively easy matter if the officers knew their duties. College education was highly important, and those succeeded best in life who had it, while those who lacked it worked at a great disadvantage. He was surprised to hear any one in this House declare that a young man well educated, whether in a Military College, or in any other school, was unfitted for any position save that of a gentleman. The very fact that General Grant had managed successfully, first a tannery and then an army, was the best evidence that a man who was educated was fitted for any employment. He did not attach a very great deal of importance to that recommendation of the Adjutant-General, that there should be a new muster or a re-enlistment of the militia; but, he wished to know whether this was intended. The suggestion, however, that our guns, which numbered some 300 or 400, should be rifled in this country, was admirable and should be carried into effect. Mr. Pallister had pointed out that this could be done. It would also have the advantage of giving additional employment, and it would save a great deal of expense that would be incurred if they were sent to England. No doubt it would receive the serious consideration of the Government.

MR. JONES said that they did not propose to drill the men in camp this season. The same plan as last year—company drill at headquarters for twelve days would be followed. If they could afford the expense, he thought that the drill should all be performed at battalion headquarters. As to the fuel question at Kingston and Quebec, this would engage the attention of the Department. They had tried two furnaces at Quebec during last winter: and they could now learn what saving had been effected. A large number of rooms and casemates had to be heated there; but he would admit that the item seemed large. They were endeavouring, however, to reduce it; and if the present scheme was not successful, they must try something else. They had transmitted the representation concerning the state of the barracks at Niagara, to the military authorities in the District; and would act on their report. They were also obliged to heat the quarters at Lévis, and keep them from becoming damp and mouldy. The Government had been extremely anxious to meet the representations of the hon. member for Charlevoix concurring the rules for the admission of the students into the Military College; and these had been altered to conform to the hon. gentleman's views. It appeared to him that the proposition to print these rules in the newspapers would involve a very heavy expense, and, instead, it was decided to print them in French and English and distribute among the schools and colleges of the Dominion. This could be done without much expense, and afterwards, if necessary, they could be published in the Press. The college was equally open to English and French-speaking Canadians, and it was not the fault of the Government if the number of French Canadian cadets was not larger.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that he thought it would be desirable to publish the advertisement in question in the leading newspapers, by which it would reach every part of the Province.

Mr. JONES said that the establishment of this college had been considered necessary in the public interest, and for Imperial considerations rather than to serve for our own defence at the time. We had to pay a certain deference to the British Government in all these matters; and he had always felt that the amount we paid annually for military purposes was more to show the Home Government our willingness, as far as possible, to take upon ourselves a fair share of our own defence, than for any other purpose. He thought we should have in our midst a class of young men or officers who would, in the case of certain eventualities, be found useful in the public interest or service. If necessity arose, no doubt, the young men educated in our college would be found to be as useful as the American West Point Cadets were when occasion presented which required their services. No doubt there was a great deal of difficulty as to how these young men might be utilized. It was of great importance that young men going to a college of this kind should have opened to them some useful career. With that object application had been made to the British Government to ascertain under what circumstances two or three commissions might be placed at the disposal of the Department, for such cadets as might pass with the highest honours. It was also proposed to give those cadets who passed through the college, the first claim for such positions in the Civil Service of Canada as they might be qualified for. They might, for instance, be utilized as engineers.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are too many engineers already.

Mr. BLANCHET: Not at all.

Mr. JONES said there were not too many good engineers. The hon. member for North Hastings desired to know what would be the policy of the Government with reference to the enrollment of the militia. The hon. gentleman was no doubt aware that the militia were enrolled in 1875. Previous to that time they were enrolled every second year at an expenditure of about $50,000, but as it was considered unnecessary to enroll them so frequently, a law was passed in 1875 under which the next enrollment was postponed until 1880—the year of the census—after which they would be enrolled every five years. The hon. gentleman would find, on referring to page 19 of the Major-General's report, that Sir William Pallister when he stated after consultation with a firm in Montreal, that the guns referred to could be altered on the spot at much less expense than would be paid for guns of the same calibre imported from England. By an agreement with that firm in Montreal, the Government undertook to bear the expense of altering one of the guns.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was instructed to ask what security regimental paymasters gave. He wished to know whether "dummies" were not put up and the money pocketed by the officers; and whether it was not known that in many cases the musketry returns were not bogus ones.

Mr. JONES said, if the person who communicated that information to the hon. member for Northumberland, was a good citizen, he would have placed himself in communication with the Department, so that the matter might receive an immediate investigation.

Mr. BUNSTER said he considered it most unfair that the guns intended by Sir William Pallister to be given to Nanaimo should be sent to Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton) thought it was desirable that paid adjutants and sergeant-majors should be attached to each regiment.

Mr. JONES said it would, no doubt, be a great advantage to have a paid adjutant and sergeant attached to each corps, but that would necessarily involve a much larger expense than it would be, at present, wise to appropriate.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he had one or two suggestions to offer with reference to the militia force in that part of Canada from which he came. It was well known that at the present time there existed, particularly in the Western States of the Union, a large class of that element from which Fenian organizations had sprung, and there was nothing to prevent these ruffians from coming to Manitoba and seizing the arms stored there. There were, it was true, volunteer and militia forces in Manitoba, maintained at very considerable expense; but they were not concentrated, and in winter it would be perfectly easy for a body of Fenians to collect in the city of St. Paul and do serious mischief in Manitoba. He was of opinion, looking also to the serious state of affairs which existed in the North-West at the present time, that a standing force was required. There were just now on our soil a large number of those Indians whom the Americans characterized as "Hostile Sioux," whose cavalry had been able to route an equal number of the finest cavalry of the United States. It was rumoured, and he was inclined to believe the rumour, that the Sioux had entered into an alliance with the Blackfoot Indians. Now, although that alliance might have no immediate results, it might still become an element of danger, especially after the ill-advised act of the Government in asking American Commissioners to visit the Sioux in our territory. There was a standing offer on the part of the American Government to every hostile Indian, or a member of a hostile band, that if he would give up his arms he would be clothed and fed and be perfectly safe, so it was evident if these Sioux would not accept such an offer while in the United States they would not likely go back from our territory. It was important that they should possess a good force in this Province, and he sincerely trusted that the hon. Minister of Militia would take the matter into his consideration and make enquiries for himself in regard to it. The combination which he feared had taken place between the Sioux and the Blackfeet, rendered such provision all the more necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand) asked whether the twelve days training would be battalion or company drill. He thought battalion drill would be preferable.

Mr. JONES said that where it could be carried out with much expense in moving the men it would be battalion drill at headquarters.

Mr. THOMPSON said the men only received 50c. per day last year, and this was insufficient for their expenses. He hoped a further allowance would be made this year.

Mr. PLUMB said that, with regard to the heating of armouries, a new patent had lately been introduced for heating whole towns by steam, to be laid on in the same way as the gas was at present. He thought this would supersede any existing system; and, therefore, in any new drill-sheds or armouries that the Government erected, they should take this scheme into consideration, and have the buildings so constructed that the new process of heating might be easily applied. As to the yearly drills, Niagara was certainly a good camping ground, and last year the corporation sank artesian wells and put themselves to other expense for the convenience of the camp.

Mr. BUNSTER said he wished to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to reorganize the British Columbia artillery or not?

Mr. JONES: We have to take that into consideration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: With respect to this first item, I would be glad to know whether the Department intend to make any further reduction of the staff?

Mr. JONES said they had not decided upon any further reduction. He thought it might be held, from what had been said in the course of the discussion upon these items, that a further reduction might be made without endangering the efficiency of the service, but he was of a different opinion. But all these things would be carefully considered; at present the Department had no fixed determination in the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was another point to which he wished to call attention. They took an old officer and appointed him to a post as district adjutant-general. The office was a sinecure for life, and the man felt that he need not exert himself. In England that system was completely altered; every staff officer was changed every five years, as it was supposed that in that period he would have become somewhat rusty. Under the present system all these adjutant-generals would have to be replaced in the event of war; not one of them would be of the slightest use.

MR. JONES said he had long felt that some change was necessary in this respect, or some of these old gentlemen would have vested rights, and go on for half a century.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that this matter was spoken of by the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) two years ago, and yet no steps had been taken to provide a remedy.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM said he wished briefly to call attention to the extraordinary statement made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and he might state that that gentleman did not express the views of his own constituency, or of the people of New Brunswick, with reference to the volunteers. The people of that Province were much in favour of the movement, and would be glad to assist it.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not know what the experience of the last speaker might be in Ontario, but in his (Mr. Mitchell's) section of the Dominion, he found no such enthusiasm for squandering money on military displays.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said, with reference to clothing imported from England, that it was far superior to that made in Canada. Two pairs of the imported trowsers were equal to three of Canadian make. The tunics were also better made and of better material, in fact superior in every way. They were the same as were supplied to the Service. It was also impossible to obtain the clothing in Canada of a uniform shade. The English tunic cost $4.00 and lasted four years, while the Canadian tunic cost $3.60 and lasted three years.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said steps should be taken to have permission given to the students at Kingston, to compete for commissions in Her Majesty's Service. Here was a Military College provided without any expense to the Imperial Government, the standard of which was as high as the Imperial College, and no doubt Her Majesty's Government would be glad to avail themselves of the services of these young men, trained to fight the battles of the Empire.

MR. JONES said, no doubt the people of Canada considered they should have the first claim on the services of these young men, in the event of their services being required. They might not be satisfied that this Dominion should educate men for the Imperial Service.

MR. MITCHELL said when the qualification of masters and mates was established in Canada, the English authorities showed great objection to recognizing these qualifications, and it was only after two or three years they understood the fact that there were as many able men in Canada as in England.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 17th April, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S REPLY TO THE ADDRESS OF BOTH HOUSES.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I beg to present to the House the reply of His Excellency the Governor General to the Joint Address of both Houses.

The CLERK read the reply, which was as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen:

It is difficult for me to find befitting words in which to thank you for the signal and unprecedented honour which has been conferred upon me by this Joint Address from your two Houses.

Regarding as I do the utterances of Parliament as the most august and authoritative expression of the popular sentiment, it affords me unmeasured satisfaction to be thus assured of the confidence and esteem of the inhabitants of the Dominion.

To win the good will of a nation is the greatest achievement open to human ambition, and to learn from you that I hold a place in the affections of the people of Canada is alike the highest triumph and the greatest pleasure I am ever likely to enjoy.

It would not become me to inquire how far this result is to be attributed rather to your own generosity than to any exertions upon my part. It is a happy principle rooted in the nature of Englishmen of all estates to content themselves with the simple discharge of those duties which lie to their hand, without considering too curiously to what degree their conduct may influence the personal estimation in which they are held by others, and their reward, when it arrives, is often as great a surprise as it is a satisfaction. All that I can say is that, from the moment I came amongst you, I have had but one thought—the desire to render faithful service to our Queen, to the Empire, and to Canada.

If there are no positive advantages to which I can point as having resulted from my administration, there is one boast I can fairly make. No act or word of mine has had a tendency to damp your personal devotion to the Crown, to discourage your attachment to the Empire, or to discredit the system of Constitutional Government under which you live.

I found you a loyal people, and I leave you the truest-hearted subjects in Her Majesty's Dominions. I found you proud of your descent and anxious to maintain your connection with the Mother Country; I leave you more convinced than ever of the solicitude of Great Britain to reciprocate your affection, of her dependence on your fidelity in every emergency. I found you men of various nationalities—of English, French, Irish, Scotch and German descent, working out the problems of Constitutional Government with admirable success; I leave you with even a deeper conviction in your minds that the due application of the principles of Parliamentary Government is capable of resolving every political difficulty, and of controlling the gravest Ministerial crises, to the satisfaction of the people at large, and of their leaders and representatives of every shade of opinion.

When I resign the temporary Vice-royalty with which I have been invested into the hands of my Sovereign, I shall be able to assure her that not a leaf has fallen from her Maple Chaplet, that the lustre of no jewel in her transatlantic diadem has been dimmed.

Thanks to the opportunities afforded me by the liberality of Parliament, I have been enabled to traverse the fertile regions of your North-West, to appreciate your inexhaustible resources, and to scan the vast expanse of your territories from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The speeches to which you refer in such flattering terms have been but the natural, the irresistible exclamations evoked by the sights I have beheld.

Closely associated with me in the discharge of all my duties has been the Lady to whom your Address refers in so kind a manner. Moving amid a society, where the proverbial gallantry of Frenchmen combines with English and Celtic chivalry to create in every Canadian home an atmosphere of purity and refinement, she naturally regards the six years she has passed amongst you as one of the happiest periods of her life, and I am commissioned to convey to you her warmest thanks for the good wishes you have expressed in her regard.

In conclusion, allow me to assure you that I shall esteem it one of the greatest privileges of my future life to watch the progressive development of your prosperity, to advocate your interests in the British Parliament, and to confirm our fellow-countrymen at home in their conviction of the high degree to which Canada is destined to contribute to the welfare, the strength, and the renown of the British Empire.

CANADA PACIFIC RAILWAY SUPPLIES.

QUESTION.

MR. BUNSTER enquired, Whether the Government will take what rails and iron may be required for the construction of the western section of the Canada Pacific Railroad from a company which will manufacture the same at Nanaimo, and supply them as cheaply as they can be imported from abroad?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I have no doubt that if the rails are as good and as cheap as they can be got elsewhere, the Government will have great pleasure in patronizing the establishment my hon. friend refers to.

CASCOMPEQUE HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. PERRY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during next summer, to appoint a Commission to examine and report on the best means to be adopted for the improvement of Cascompeque Harbour in Prince Edward Island?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I understand that this matter is under consideration, and if the hon. gentleman wants any more explicit information, I would ask him to renew his question in the course of a couple of days.

POSTAL FACILITIES AT LAVELLEE CORNERS.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to open a Post Office at the place called "Lavellee Corners." on the line of the South Eastern Counties Railway, at the intersection of the said railway with the front road of the 9th and 10th ranges of the Township of Grantham, in the Parish of St. Germain de Grantham, County of Drummond?

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I may say, that this matter was brought to the attention of the Government last year, but is still under consideration.

MEASUREMENTS OF SHIPPING.

QUESTION.

MR. KILLAM enquired, Whether the Government have learned that an arrangement has been made between Spain and the United States under which the measurement of the Shipping of the United States is accepted in the Ports of Spain and Cuba, for the purpose of collecting tonnage duties; and whether any steps have been taken by the Government to place Canadian vessels upon an equal footing?

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): I may say, to my hon. friend that the Government have no official information that any arrangement has been come to between Spain and the United States, by which the measurement of the United States is recognized by Spain; but they have reason to believe that there is such an arrangement, and steps have been taken with a view to bring about—if that is the case—the same arrangement between England and her colonies and Spain.

DALLAS AND STONEWALL POSTAL FACILITIES.

QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish Post Offices at "Dallas" and "Stonewall," in the Province of Manitoba?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I may state that, as the hon. gentlemen knows, with regard to one of the Post Offices to which he alludes, the matter has been referred to the Inspector, from whom no report has been received; but as regards the other, the Inspector's report has been received, though no determination has as yet been arrived at.

RED RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to light and buoy the navigable mouth of the Red River, in the Province of Manitoba?

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): This subject is now engaging the attention of the Government, and information is being acquired; and if it is found necessary, in the interest of shipping, to light and buoy Red River at its mouth; this will be done in the course of next season.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said that, before the Orders of the Day were called he desired to move the adjournment of the House, in order that he might bring before the attention of this House and the people of this country certain articles which had appeared in some of the newspapers of the country animadverting on the conduct and scenes which occurred in this House during the memorable night of Friday last and Saturday morning. He alluded to articles which had appeared in the Daily Globe yesterday, Tuesday, in the Montreal Herald, in the London Daily Advertiser, and in the Hamilton Evening Times. He dared say that some of these articles, of any note, had been read by some hon. gentlemen, but in case they might not have been read by all the members of the House, he might be obliged, before he closed, to read short extracts from each of these newspapers in order that he might not misrepresent or misstate what appeared in them. It was desirable, he thought, whatever might be said on the subject of bringing any accusation—if accusation it might be called—against the writers or proprietors of these papers, that it should be stated in exact and the clearest possible terms, so that there might be no misrepresentation with reference to the important matter to which he should now call the attention of the House. He took it that the character of every public man in this country was not a matter simply affecting himself, his own personal honour and his own personal reputation; but it should be, and he had, no doubt, was a matter which was dear, not only to the members of this House, who were, perhaps, more interested in the matter than anybody else, and not only to the interests of the constituents which they represented individually, but also to the whole people of the Dominion. He regretted that these articles had appeared in the newspapers for several reasons. One reason was, that if the statements which were made in these papers had been true, it would have been painful, not only to the gentlemen whose characters were attacked—as in the case of the hon. member for Kingston—and to the gentlemen in this House who were the followers of the hon. gentleman, but also to the people of the Dominion of Canada, to know that the prominent public men, whom they sent to represent them here, were guilty of the base conduct which these papers represent them to have been guilty of on the occasion alluded to. There were none of them free from the attacks of newspapers. Public men were accustomed to them. There were articles which appeared in the newspapers from time to time to which public men were unable to reply, and if a public man commenced to reply to any attacks which might be made on him in the newspapers, it might take the whole of the rest of his public life to attend to such attacks, and to reply to them. There were attacks which public men could afford to let pass, they came in the natural order of party warfare; and in some respects they might be legitimate. Every public man must expect to have his conduct not only criticised, but severely criticised by the party to which he was opposed. He did not object to that, and no hon. member in this House objected to it. He would only say for himself that if the statements had been true which were made in these papers, he should have regretted the occasion which also called them forth, and he should have allowed the parties who were affected by them, and slandered by them, to have made the best answer they could to this House and the people of this country. He felt that the attack which has been made on the leader of the Conservative party, was made, not only on him, but also on the members of this House generally, and he considered it his bounden duty on this occasion to call the attention of Parliament and of the country to it, in his place here, and to give an utter and distinct denial to the truth of the allegation as set forth in the Toronto Globe. Before he proceeded any further the House would permit him to read an extract or two from the Toronto Globe. This was an editorial article, and the leading one in the issue of the paper of yesterday, and was headed "The disgraceful scene at Ottawa." He should not read the whole of it Sir; but he would come down to that part of it which immediately bore on the subject which he was now bringing before the attention of the House. It stated:—

"We shall not say that there never can be a case when it is necessary to take advantage of all the forms of the House and all the powers of individual physical endurance to prevent a certain course being followed, or to secure a certain object reckoned vitally important by a minority. All acknowledge that such case may occur, though the circumstances must be very peculiar which would justify them or excuse a systematic and continuous talking against time. That there was even the shadow of an excuse for such a proceeding in the case cannot be shown, and indeed is scarcely alleged. The matter under discussion had been fully ventilated. All had been said that could be said, and except for the purpose of delaying business, and of preventing the vote being taken till after Sunday, there was not the slightest reason why it should not as well have been voted on at a reasonable hour on Friday as at the time eventually agreed upon.

"But even though there had been something like a reasonable excuse for persisting in talking against time so as to secure an adjournment of the debate, that would have afforded no palliation whatever for the outrageous course actually pursued by the leader of the Opposition and many of his prominent followers. Even in that case they ought to have remembered who they were and where they were, and ought to have tried at any rate to do their work of obstruction with some measure of decency.

"Did they do so? On the contrary, they vied with each other in proceedings which brought down the House of Commons to the level of one of the lowest saloons.

Now, he thought he might appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite and ask them if whether the conduct of the Opposition was as described in this newspaper. It was desired on the part of the Opposition, as was well known, to have an adjournment on Saturday morning about three o'clock, but objection was raised to it by the leader of the Administration, and the Opposition acting in its right, pursued the course which was here stated, and endeavoured to discuss the question until from their point of view, it had been fully ventilated. Repeatedly they asked for an adjournment, and repeatedly it was refused, and in self-defence they were obliged to continue the debate; but if the House of Commons was brought down to the level of one of the lowest saloons, he might fairly ask hon. gentlemen opposite, not only who were the cause of its being so brought down to this level, but who were the parties who actually brought it down to this level. Without desiring to attack hon. gentlemen opposite on this score, he did not hesitate for one moment to say, that if ever a party maintaining its rights as an Opposition behaved not only with decorum but with forbearance, and with magnanimity, it was the party which was speaking to the question during the debate of Saturday last, composed of the members of the Opposition of this House. Now, he did not say who the author of this article was, but he desired to state here for the benefit of the hon. member for North York, and for the purpose of giving him an opportunity of denying the writing of the editorial here referred to, that public opinion distinctly pointed to him as having been the writer of this article. He did not make the charge, he simply made the statement.

MR. DYMOND: It is a cowardly insinuation.

MR. GIBBS said that when a man made a cowardly insinuation, he did it in a way in which the party referred to was unable to make a reply. He stated distinctly that the public opinion both in-doors and out points to the hon. member for North York as the writer of this article.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. GIBBS: Now, this may be a mistake and it may not. That may be a mistake, or it may not be; he may have inspired it, or he may not; but I make the statement in order that the hon. gentleman may here, as on former occasions, rise in his place and give a denial to the statement. The article goes on to say:—

“To say that Sir John A. Macdonald was on Friday night somewhat under the influence of liquor would be a grossly inadequate representation of the fact. He was simply drunk, in the plain, ordinary sense of that word. As the night wore on, he became still more so, and from six to eight on Saturday morning he was, to quote the conventional language usually employed on such occasions, ‘thoroughly laid out,’ and had to be hid away by his friends; if not in shame, at least in pity, and as an absolute providential proceeding.”

Now, if Sir John A. Macdonald has been in the condition to which this article refers, I would not have risen to make any defence. But what are the facts? I had several communications with Sir John A. Macdonald during the night referred to, between ten o'clock in the evening and six or seven o'clock on the following morning; and I state here that if he was in the condition referred to by this newspaper, then the hon. member for South Ontario was in the same predicament. About four o'clock in the morning, feeling that the debate was to continue through the whole night, I was obliged to take some refreshment. Sir John A. Macdonald was then giving directions to those who were to speak on this side, and citing treatises bearing on the question, which would enlighten the House. I am sorry Sir John Macdonald is not in his place to defend himself, but so far as he is concerned, I take upon myself to say that this article is a wilful and unfounded statement. Not only is it a slander on himself, but it is a foul calumny on the members of the House of Commons generally, because it affects the standing of every hon. member.

MR. DYMOND: No; no.

MR. GIBBS: The hon. gentleman may say “no, no,” and I hope he will have an opportunity of getting up and stating whether he is the writer of that article. I hope he will have the manliness to rise in his place and contradict my statement if he can. Then this article goes on to refer to other gentlemen present, who will answer for themselves. We are not teetotalers on both sides of the House. I am not one myself, and I claim the right to take any refreshment I choose; but no one can ever say that I took too much. If, however, the hon. member for Kingston was in the condition which this article says, then I was in the same condition myself. Between the time that Sir John Macdonald retired to rest, and when he made his re-appearance in the House at half-past four, I know nothing, and of that I am not going to speak; but I believe he was in a room of this building while the discussion was going on. I am glad to find there are other newspapers in the country which have not taken the same view of the proceedings of the House that night. I allude particularly to the Montreal Witness. I think if there is a paper supporting the views of temperance people, generally, and which is desirous of making their views felt, it is the Montreal Witness; and I am convinced that, if Sir John Macdonald had been in such a state, that paper would not have hesitated to make use of the argument to affect the feeling of the country against the Conservative Opposition. The London Advertiser, speaking of the “Disgraceful exhibition,” refers to the member for Three Rivers, and then refers to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell) appearing on the floor of the House in a beastly state of intoxication, beginning to shout and gesticulate like a madman. It also refers to the hon. member for King's New Brunswick, saying he appeared to be in a very disorderly condition, and commenced to read from books in a serio-comic way. Now, I have only to say, that, if ever the hon. member for King's made a good speech, it was upon the occasion referred to. Gentlemen, in the position he was said to be in, are not generally able to make such speeches as he did on that occasion. I shall not read what the Montreal Herald says, nor what the London Advertiser says. These papers have obtained prominence for publishing scandals; some newspaper correspondents, indeed, think it necessary to send a sensational article every day.

I now leave the matter with the House to take such action as it may see fit; for my own part I pronounce the article in the Globe, so far as Sir John A. Macdonald is concerned, a foul slander.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he believed there was no right thinking member of the House who would not regret that there should have been any occasion to introduce such a subject as this; but when they found an article in a leading paper of the Dominion, such as the Daily Globe, commenting on scenes in the House, which had a tendency to disgrace members of both sides of the House, and lower them in the estimation of the people, he thought it deserved some consideration. It was a great pity such an attack had been made because it would tend to lower the Legislature, not only in the eyes of our countrymen, but across the lines, and even in Europe; but when they knew that the statements contained in that paper were false, he thought no other course was open to him than to rise in his place and state what he knew of the facts. He saw the hon. member for Kingston several times during the night, and he was perfectly sober. The hon. gentleman had not to be led away by his friends, but was advised to take that rest which exhausted nature required. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) could therefore state most unquestionably that the article in regard to the hon. member was most unqualifiedly false.

MR. LANGEVIN said he never deserted his post during the whole of that night, or the following day and he was constantly in communication with Sir John A. Macdonald. About half-past seven or a quarter to eight he said to the hon. member for Kingston: "You have not been sleeping during the whole night; you had better retire and I will take your place." Sir John A. Macdonald said "If you promise not to desert your post I will go away," to which he (Mr. Langevin) replied: "You may depend that I won't leave the House a single moment." He then asked the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Stephenson) if he could find a place, when Sir John A. Macdonald and he went away together to the room of the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms. Sir John A. Macdonald remained there till half-past four in the afternoon, when he was sent for in connection with negotiations which were going on to have the House adjourned at six o'clock. These were the facts of the case. During the whole time he was in communication with Sir John A. Macdonald he was as sober as he (Mr. Langevin), and he did not suppose that any hon. gentleman would say that he was not a sober man. The article in the Globe was a slander of the worst kind.

MR. MCDUGALL (Three Rivers) said as his name had been brought into this question, he might be permitted to remark that the writer and inspirer of the article in the Globe must be both blackguards and liars so far as he was concerned. He was not a teetotaler, but he was not in the habit of getting intoxicated, and if ever there was occasion on which he was careful in regard to taking any refreshment it was that night, because it was his desire to address the House on the subject which was being discussed. The other side of the House did not think proper to listen to a serious speech, and he had to go on amidst all the noises made by gentlemen on the opposite side—he thought they were scarcely entitled to be called gentlemen.

MR. SPEAKER: Order.

MR. MCDUGALL said that if these gentlemen, through their newspapers, published such calumnies, it was only a mere Parliamentary expression to call them not gentlemen.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman was entirely out of order.

MR. MCDUGALL said he would bow to the Speaker, but he must say that the writers and inspirers of these articles were liars and blackguards. The article which was quoted stated that he went down to the House in a perfect state of inebriety, and talked the greatest nonsense in the world. Now, owing to the noise, it was with the greatest difficulty he could make hon. gentlemen opposite hear him, and he did not suppose the reporters in the gallery could hear him. How, therefore, could the writer of the arti-

He tell whether he was speaking foolishly or wittily. Besides, he spoke for the most part in French—except when the interruptions became so preposterous, and he addressed himself to the Speaker to obtain order—and there were ninety-nine chances to one that the writer of the article did not understand that language. He spoke for the most part in French, until the interruptions became uproarious, and, whether the hon. gentleman was acquainted with the language or not, he (Mr. McDougall) would like to know whether there was any wit in the hon. gentleman enabling him to judge of the wit of other people. He (Mr. McDougall) fancied that he knew what humour was just as well as any other man in the House; but the man who wrote that article had no sense of humour, when he said in the newspaper that he (Mr. McDougall) always talked nonsense. He did not always talk nonsense.

MR. HOLTON: Only occasionally.

MR. MCDUGALL said many of the expressions he used might not have been pertinent to the subject of the speech, but still they were suitable to the occasion, and the humour of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. He gave a flat denial to these calumnious articles with regard to himself. He knew how he was, and the exact way in which he wished to treat the subject. The scene in the House had been much used in the Press, and it was easily seen what these calumnious reports were written for. He contended that the "row" in the House on Friday night and Saturday morning was brought about by the obstinacy of the Government party, and by the obstinacy of the leader of that party. He should throw the blame upon him, because he had the control of the House, but refused the adjournment. The attempt to throw the blame on the Opposition was done with a view to influencing the Quebec elections, and the elections of the Dominion Parliament later on. He wished to throw back the blame upon the really guilty party; there could be no question that the gentleman who made the caterwauling and other unseemly noises were on the other side of the House; and when the party in Opposition was treated in that way, was it to be expected that they were to quietly submit to it? There was no preconcerted arrangement when he made his speech or after it. He rose with the intention of speaking for ten minutes, but not being able to get a hearing, and it being the feeling of his friends on that side that he was being unjustly treated, he retaliated by taking up a much larger amount of the time of the House. They knew that it did not make the slightest difference, they knew what the vote would be, with the ordinary mechanical majority of the Government. They never expected to influence, by their eloquence or arguments, one single vote. However, they did influence one vote; they drove the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) out of the House. They did not hear his voice during the debate, and knew nothing of what his views were on the subject; yet he was one of the most able men in this country, or any other country, speaking seriously, to express an opinion upon such a subject. They did not get that opinion; they did not even get his vote. So that they did accomplish something; they drove the only Constitutional lawyer on the Government side out of the House, and he might add, that the Opposition intended to make as much use of this fact, as an argument, as much as possible. They also saw that the hon. member for Chateaugay did not express an opinion.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman must speak to the question before the Chair. He was going into entirely different matters.

MR. OUMET said his name having been mentioned by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. McDougall) he desired to say a few words upon this question. He was with the hon. member on Friday night, and was told by him that he intended to speak on the question before the House. Between twelve and one o'clock the hon. member submitted his arguments on the question, and they discussed them together. The hon. member was quite as sober as any man could be, as he (Mr. Ouimet) was himself. He was very happy to confirm what had been said both with respect to the really able speech delivered by the hon. member for Three Rivers, and as to his being perfectly sober at the time, and he felt that he could do this without bearing false witness against his neighbours.

MR. DOMVILLE said his personal reputation was at stake, and he did not think that any member of this House would give him a bad character, even if they happened to be opposed to him in politics. But a newspaper had an article containing the following:—

“Domville turned up at six a.m., after having slept off a strong potation, and took his seat beside Plumb, who had also slept a great part of the night in his place, and looked as if he likewise had been afflicted with the prevalent complaint.”

The writer went on further to say:—

“Mr. Méthot gave way to Domville, at 8 a.m., who stood up with his garments in such a disordered condition that he was met by cries of ‘Button up your pants.’ ‘Shame,’ etc. Having buttoned up, Mr. Domville commenced to read from books, and in a serio-comic way to discuss the constitutional question.”

This was the London Advertiser. He held that such a newspaper was not fit to go into the house of a decent family. It disgraced this House if it was received into the Library. If the paper did not hold itself responsible for that statement, it should be contradicted at once; if it did hold itself responsible, the reporter, or whoever gave the information, should be driven out of the gallery. It should be remembered that the reporters were here on sufferance, and although he did not intend to say anything against the Press, as he had always received the greatest courtesy from its members, and believed it was an institution of the greatest possible use, still he held that those who degraded the profession in the way the correspondent of the London Advertiser had done, should be expelled from this House. The newspaper said he was met with yells when he rose to speak, while, as a matter of fact, the House was very quiet when he spoke. He remarked, on sitting down, that if the House had not treated him with such courtesy he would have gone on longer, but said it was impossible for him to trespass longer on their time at that late hour of the morning especially when the matter was only one of keeping up time. He defied any hon. member, if there was one who wished to do it, to say that the description of him contained in that paper was in any way correct. He thought this a very fitting occasion to ask the Speaker to rule that the bar, where liquor was sold, in connection with this building, should be shut up. It was not only members of the Government, but members of his side (the Opposition) also went there. The country was led to believe that there was no liquor sold in this building. When the change of Government took place, it was proposed that the bar should be done away with, yet, although that vote passed unanimously, that bar was still kept open. If no liquor was sold there, there would, perhaps, be no reason to make these charges, and certainly it would help to promote sobriety among those who might have a weakness that way. In the next place, the actions of hon. members would not be always watched, when they retired for a little refreshment or rest, if these lobbies were kept clear. As regards the right hon. member for Kingston, he would vouch to this House that the right hon. member was not in the state mentioned, nor was he in the least affected by spirituous liquors of any kind. Every hon. member should vote down this grave imputation against the character of the right hon. gentleman. He hoped the Speaker would seize this occasion to order the closing up of the restaurant below, in order to free members of this House from being continually under the eyes of certain spies who communicated false impressions to the Press.

MR. SPEAKER said he had given instructions to close the restaurant, and had not been aware, up to the present, that they had been infringed.

MR. CAMERON said he felt it his duty to say, with respect to the hon. member for Three Rivers, that, after the hon. member had finished his speech, he (Mr. Cameron) had walked up and down the corridors of this House with him for a quarter of an hour, during which they discussed several points connected with the question then before the House, in all seriousness and gravity; and not only that, but also conversed on the case then being argued in the Supreme Court, the hon. member explaining the point before the Court, and the line of argument taken; and he (Mr. Cameron) could assert that the hon. member was as sober as any hon. member of this House, and as well able, in all seriousness and gravity, to discuss the Quebec question. He would say a few words about the right hon. member for Kingston. He believed the refutation of the falsehood, the infamous falsehood, which was published in this newspaper could come as well from hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side as from those in any other part of the House, as they could equally well bear testimony to the utter falsehood of the charge. He, himself, had been in the right hon. gentleman's company the whole night; had discussed the matter under debate with him; and had conversed with him a few minutes before he left, and had no hesitation in saying that this charge was a vile, infamous slander. It, however, was part of the general policy of slander pursued by the Government party. He would refer to another article, of the 6th April last, in the Morning Advertiser, which led the line of calumny about the right hon. gentleman. This article stated that the evening previous to the 6th, the right hon. gentleman was drunk and reckless of all consequences. On that day, the right hon. gentleman was present in this House, in the evening he dined at the Government House, and any hon. member who was then present would know the charge was an utter falsehood. It could not have meant the 4th April, for on that evening the right hon. member was on the floor of this House trying to put into shape the Stamp Bill of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. The whole of this policy of calumny, now adopted by the Reform Press, was simply an attempt to influence the temperance vote against the Conservative party. He was glad to have had this opportunity of exposing the foul, infamous, unfounded, and slanderous articles which had been published from time to time on various members of this House.

MR. PLUMB said, as one of those included in the attacks respecting the scenes on Saturday, he felt it his duty to say a few words. While the hon. member for Three Rivers was addressing the House, the noise was so great that nobody could tell whether it was a coherent or an incoherent speech. The leader of the Government stated distinctly that he could not control his followers, which statement excited them to continue their unseemly interruptions. When he (Mr. Plumb) rose to speak, the interruptions increased. He had sat near the right hon. member for Kingston the whole night, and could bear testimony to the statements.

MR. SPEAKER said he would suggest to the hon. member that he was not giving a personal explanation.

MR. PLUMB said he intended to show that the charge of disorderly and riotous conduct brought against members of the Opposition was without foundation. So far from the right hon. member for Kingston not being entirely himself, and not competent to direct the affairs of his party, the very reverse was the fact, and he endeavoured to cause his followers to keep order. The right hon. gentleman was perfectly well aware that, with the unseemly opposition which they met with from hon. gentleman opposite, they felt that unreasonable tyranny was being exercised against them, and the right hon. member for Kingston endeavoured to prevent his followers doing what they might have very properly have done, retorted upon hon. gentlemen opposite. The whole attack made in the Press was entirely unfounded in fact, and he hoped there were some hon. members opposite who had sufficient regard for the reputation and character of the public men of this country to rise and corroborate the statements made in the denial of the charges.

MR. CHEVAL said he would ask to be forgiven for what took place some time since. The hon. member for Vancouver had then challenged him to go to Room No. 13 for interrupting him by means of music. He had at once done so, and he found the hon. gentleman seated in a chair with a knife in his hand. He was a little scared, but knowing that the hon. member was a gentleman he shut the door. He said to the hon. gentleman: "You sent me a paper, asking for an explanation. What do you wish?" Mr. Bunster replied: "Why did you send me a blank card? You insulted me by not putting your name to it." He then said: "I never sent you any card at all." The dialogue continued, as follows: Mr. Bunster: "The page who brought it said it was from you." Mr. Cheval: "Send for the page, and if he says I sent you the card, I will pass you for a mean man and a mean pup." Mr. Bunster: "Why do you play music when I address the House?" Mr. Cheval: "I never played any music when you addressed the House to-night." Mr. Bunster: "You did." Mr. Cheval: "If you deposit $1 with a friend, I will deposit $100, and if I do not at once prove that I did not then play any music, I will forfeit my $100." Mr. Bunster: "You did do it." Mr. Cheval: "I did not." Mr. Bunster: "You lie." Mr. Cheval: "I don't lie, but you do lie." Mr. Bunster then struck him on the cheek, and he caught hold of the hon. gentleman, who hit him again. He did not blame the hon. gentleman or wish to insult anybody. Afterwards, the hon. member for Kingston said to him: "Cheval, your face is split." He then passed his hand over his face, and replied that this was not the case, though he thought that his face was split into three faces, he was so scared.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member mean to move any motion to refer to any statement in a newspaper.

Mr. CHEVAL: I would like to have this in Hansard. I do not blame the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa County) said he deeply regretted the unpleasant occurrence which took place the other night; as to him it had been indescribably painful. He wished, however, to see fair play. He remembered that at a Conservative meeting in his county, a gentleman had accused Mr.

Mr. CHEVAL.

Mackenzie of being a wine-bibber and a drunkard. He had at once stated that, to his certain knowledge, this assertion was completely false. Regarding the statement about the right hon. gentleman for Kingston, he would say that it was his pleasure that night, with his hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), to meet that hon. gentleman, he thought at four o'clock in the morning, and he believed that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) would corroborate his statement, that the hon. member for Kingston was not intoxicated. Indeed, the hon. gentleman was perfectly sober. The same remark applied to the hon. member for Three Rivers, who had previously told him that he intended and wished to speak on this subject then under discussion, and to enlarge on certain points relating to the interests of Lower Canada. He had sat beside the hon. gentleman for a great portion of the night, and he knew that he (Mr. McDougall) was not in a state of intoxication. The whole scene was indescribably painful, and he might say that it degraded the House; and the highest lady in the land was a witness of their humiliation. He trusted and hoped that such a scene would never be repeated in the House. Between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning in the restaurant, and at the same table with himself and the hon. member for South Grey, were the hon. member for Compton, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the hon. the Premier. While there, the right hon. member for Kingston came and sat down at the table and breakfasted with them. To the best of his recollection none of those then present took anything stronger than tea or coffee. The right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. the Premier, meanwhile, discussed the matter of adjournment. He never saw the least sign of intoxication on any gentleman present at the table, and his hon. friend from Three Rivers was as sober that morning as he was this afternoon when he spoke in relation to this matter.

Mr. ORTON said he could not refrain from expressing his great indignation at what he might characterize the ruffianly rowdyism of the article of the Globe in question. He was sorry to say he had to relate an occurrence which would not reflect very creditably on two hon. members of the House. Shortly after the hon. member for Victoria had stated in his rather demonstrative way, his indignation at the conduct of the hon. members on the Government side of the House, on which side he (Mr. Orton) was sitting at the time, he heard the hon. the Minister of the Interior say, in a very loud voice, that the hon. member for Victoria could not have conducted himself in that manner unless intoxicated, and further, "What else can you expect when his leader is in the same condition." The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) at the same time looked up to the reporters' gallery; and the hon. member for North York, with the hon. the Minister of the Interior, repeated and reiterated the same statement. If the hon. member for North York was not the writer of this article, it was fairly chargeable that these two hon. members gave countenance to it. He would not attempt to characterize the motives which incited these hon. gentlemen to make that loud and unseemly remark concerning another hon. member of the House. He (Mr. Orton) felt indignant at the unseemly conduct which then took place. A few minutes previous to the occurrence he had mentioned, the hon. member for Kingston had asked him if he intended to speak and he had replied in the affirmative; and the hon. gentleman had then said that he might follow the hon. member for Kings. About the same time the right hon. gentleman congratulated the members of the Opposition on the decorum they had observed during the debate; and he (Mr. Orton) could testify and solemnly declare that if the right hon. gentleman was intoxicated at the time, there was not a sober man in the House. Two or three minutes afterwards, the remarks he had mentioned were made. He had, at the time, asked the hon. the Minister of the Interior what he meant, and the reply was: "I mean what I say." He then told the hon. gentleman that his statement was not true.

MR. LANDERKIN said that it had not been his intention to make any observations respecting the subject under consideration. He never liked, in fact, to discuss such matters, as he thought that this was not a portion of his public duty. He was well aware that public journalists, in the discharge of their duty, might find it necessary to scan both the public and private records of members of the House. How far the journalists were justified in doing so, he would not say. He had not desired to say anything in this connection, but as he had been appealed to by the hon. member for Ottawa County, to make a statement of the facts that occurred on the night in question, he would comply. He had gone down to take a cup of tea on the morning in question. It was true that the right hon. member for Kingston was there, and also quite true with the hon. gentleman, and would not pronounce whether he was sober or not, because he (Mr. Landerkin) had not investigated the subject. He, however, was never more astonished in his life, than when he heard the hon. member for South Ontario speak in the manner he had done that afternoon. He had always regarded this hon. gentleman as being thoroughly consistent and straightforward, but when he denounced this article as being a calumny and a slander on the hon. member for Kingston, he (Mr. Landerkin) was startled, as, no doubt, was the hon. member for Ottawa County, because a Senator came to their table and said that he had been accused by the hon. member for South Ontario of getting the hon. member for Kingston drunk. The Senator had made this complaint publicly, and had also stated that he was not guilty of doing so, and that Brother Gibbs had better mind his own business.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): I have just simply to say that this is all news to me.

MR. WRIGHT (Ottawa County): A good deal of conversation passed, but I really have no recollection of any such statement.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that there was no foundation whatever for the charge made in the Globe against the right hon. member for Kingston, as he was personally aware. He thought that hon. gentlemen opposite could not but corroborate this statement. He did not think that much would be gained by publishing such reports and by trying to degrade the House in this matter. On several occasions he had heard it whispered in the lobby, that the right hon. gentleman was taking too much, when he knew that the hon. gentleman who said so ought to know better, and that the right hon. gentleman had not taken a single drop. These statements were made for effect; but he did not think that the object in view would be gained.

Mr. BUNSTER said the right hon. gentleman had said to him in the morning that it was necessary to have some refreshment if things were going on in that way. The hon. gentleman (Sir John) said, at the breakfast table, what was the proper course to pursue. He (Mr. Bunster) said that a paper which was taken by some few respectable people was in the habit of indulging in wilful lies, and it might be properly distinguished as that villifying rag of the Press.

Mr. MILLS said it was with great reluctance that he rose on this occasion, and he would not have done so had it not been for the observations that had fallen from the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), who come across to the Government side of the House to see what he could see and hear what he could hear. After giving his recollections of what took place on Saturday morning, he stated that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell) came to that side of the House, used profane language to the First Minister, and conducted himself generally in such a manner that it was suggested that the Sergeant-at-Arms should interfere. When the member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell) was being taken out of the House the hon. member for Kingston looked up, and he (Mr. Mills) then said, "Look at the condition of the leader of the Opposition." He did not say the hon. member for Kingston was drunk, and he would not say anything more on this occasion, notwithstanding the fact that if he chose he could speak from personal knowledge.

Mr. POPE.

Mr. ORTON said that in going to the other side of the House, as stated by the hon. Minister of the Interior, he was not influenced by any unfair motives. While in the reading-room he heard an unusual noise in the House and stepped into the Chamber, by the door on the other side, to ascertain what was the matter—not for any dishonourable purpose.

Mr. PALMER said he took no part in the debate of Friday last, but hearing it stated that the right hon. member for Kingston was in a state of intoxication, he endeavoured, by every means in his power to discover whether the imputation thrown out by the other side was well founded or not. He entered into conversation with Sir John A. Macdonald, and he had no hesitation in saying that the charge made against him was utterly without foundation. He was sorry to hear the hon. Minister for the Interior insinuate that his hon. friend from Three Rivers was in an intoxicated condition. After the testimony which had now been given by hon. gentlemen, he thought it was the duty of the hon. Minister to apologise to the House for the statement he made.

Mr. MÉTHOT said that, as the hon. the Minister of the Interior had chosen to point out the exact time when the right hon. member for Kingston was in an intoxicated state, he wished to remark that, at the precise moment mentioned, Sir John A. Macdonald was asking him (Mr. Méthot) to address the House. He was, therefore, in a position to state that the right hon. member for Kingston, at the time alluded to, was in a state of perfect sobriety.

Mr. DYMOND: I should not pretend to notice the allusions unwarrantably made regarding me by the hon. member for Centre Wellington—a gentleman who admits that he comes to this side of the House to overhear what is said—

Mr. ORTON: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Centre Wellington distinctly denied that he went for that purpose.

MR. DYMOND: I will put it differently. I do not think it worth my while to notice gentlemen who, while complaining of an injustice done their leader, will not allow a man, against whom insinuations have been thrown the whole afternoon, to say a word. We want fair play. I say it is not worth my while to notice the observations of a gentleman who has admitted what the hon. member for Centre Wellington admitted in his remarks this afternoon.

MR. ORTON: I wish to call attention to the fact that I neither implied nor stated that word.

MR. SPEAKER: This is a very unpleasant affair, and, I hope, hon. members will preserve some order. The last statement made by the hon. member for North York may mean anything or nothing. It cannot be held to be parliamentary, for it merely says that the hon. member for Centre Wellington has admitted what he has admitted.

MR. DYMOND: In his opening remarks this afternoon, my hon. friend from South Ontario chose to say that public opinion attributed a certain article in a daily paper to me. If he, or any other hon. member of this House, has the courage or manliness to say that he conscientiously believes or charges me with doing anything that is unworthy of my character as a member of Parliament, he shall have the satisfaction he has a right to demand. No man in this House believes me slow to defend myself, and no man in his heart of hearts believes that I would be guilty of meanness, or shuffling, or equivocation. There are plenty of gentlemen on the other side of the House who may find great fault from their point of view with my political conduct, but they do not believe me to be guilty of meanness, shuffling or equivocation; and I am sure if I were to appeal to my hon. friend from South Ontario, he would be the last of all to do so. But I am not called upon to defend myself with reference to this article; no one has charged me with having written it; no man has dared to get up and say he believed I wrote it. I shall not defend the article; the Globe can take care of itself, and it is a pretty high tribute to the power of the Globe that so many gentlemen are ready to wince here at its lash. I take this opportunity—than which no better occasion could present itself—to stand on my privilege as a member of this House and a public journalist, in refusing to be called to my feet to answer any insinuation, any suggestion, any imputation which hon. gentlemen may choose to throw against me; and having said that I will say no more.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): I have nothing more to say. I desire to withdraw the motion for the adjournment of the House.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

NAMES AND SALARIES OF OFFICIALS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. MCCARTHY moved for a return of the original papers made and signed by the deputy heads of the different public Departments, purporting to be made in obedience to the order of this House of the fifth day of March, 1877, as follows:—

“The names of persons appointed to office between 1st January and the 7th of November, 1873; the names of the officials whose salaries were increased during the same period; the names of those so appointed whose appointments were cancelled subsequent to the 7th November. A statement showing whether the positions which were filled up by those whose appointments were cancelled have remained unfilled or have been since filled up—and if so when and by whom—and whether the salaries of those officials which were increased during the period named have been since reduced or increased, and showing the reduction or increase in each office respectively.”

He said he desired to state why he had asked for the production of the original documents. The order which he referred to in the motion was made on March 5th, of last year, but the return purporting to be in obedience to that order was not brought down during the Session of the House. In the month of September following, a return was brought down, printed, sent to the newspaper Press throughout the country, and, he believed, furnished to hon. members of the House. Now, on looking at that return, he was amazed to find the manner in which the order of the House had been obeyed. He understood that orders of the House ought to be obeyed implicitly, and that it did not comport with the authority of the head or deputy head of a department to alter or mutilate these orders to suit themselves. But he found from the very first page of this return that the order given in this case, which was perfectly plain and explicit, had been altered as far as the Governor-General's office was concerned, and that the return sent was not in pursuance of the direction of the House. The latter part of the order which was the most important, had been entirely altered so as to make it apply simply to the person who held an office. Now the object of this was quite apparent. When an official was superannuated, or resigned, or died, there would appear to be a saving in the expense of these departments, whereas the reverse was the case. Take page 60 of this return which contained a recapitulation with regard to the Department of Customs, and what did they find? That these officials who had been appointed during the last months of the late Government—from the 1st January to the 7th November—and where salaries had been increased during this period, appeared to be in receipt of $143,630, whereas, according to the return brought down, it appeared that these individuals were only receiving from the Public Treasury the sum of $347,850. This remarkable and extraordinary saving was made out by taking credit for all the superannuations and resignations which had taken place since the present Government came into power. He did not wish to say anything unparliamentary or improper, but the result of this was that the people and the Press of this country were imposed on. An impression was created which the facts did not warrant. The hon. the First Minister went down to the county of South Ontario while the candidature of the present representative of that constituency was going on, and proclaimed that the late Administration had, during their late years of office, created 230 appointments prior to the 1st of July, and 274 new appointments after the 1st of July; that they had increased the salaries of 360 officers up to the 1st of July, and 973 after the 1st of July, which, he said, necessarily imposed a great burden on the shoulders of the people. The hon. Premier went on to say that $52,286 had been expended on these appointments, and that he had taken the liberty of cancelling them. He (Mr. McCarthy) took upon himself to doubt the strict accuracy of that statement, as the figures employed by the First Minister were incorrect. He did not mean to say that what the Premier had stated was false, but he had done what was almost as bad—he withheld a certain amount of information, and suggested a falsehood, which was the next thing to stating one directly and deliberately.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I think the hon. gentleman is not in order in stating that the Premier of this Dominion suggested a falsehood; and, on his behalf, I deny the accusation.

MR. SPEAKER: It is entirely out of order and unparliamentary to charge an hon. member of this House with a falsehood, unless the hon. gentleman making that statement is prepared to prove it.

MR. McCARTHY said that, whatever he might believe, he would bow to the decision of Mr. Speaker.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

(Mr. Irving.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee on said Bill, read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the hon. gentleman ought to allow the Bill to stand over until the Government Bill was passed. He thought the Government had almost promised to bring down a complete Bill next Session. It was of very great importance that the law upon this point should be simply and easily understood, but we had already three bills on the subject.

MR. LAFLAMME said the alterations proposed by this Bill were not of a serious character, but were improvements that ought to have been introduced long ago. The Bill related chiefly to the circulation of bills drawn outside the Province, and which were to be paid here, for which there was no provision in the existing law. It also provided for the stamping of bills which were found in possession of executors. He considered the provisions good, and they would not confuse in any way the existing law.

MR. JONES (South Leeds), said it seemed to him that this Bill was putting an additional burden upon the people of this country. A bill drawn in a foreign country certainly could not be stamped, then when they came here a double stamp had to be paid upon it.

MR. MITCHELL said he had stated, on a former occasion, that there ought to be a consolidation of the Stamp Acts. If he required any proof to sustain that position, it would be found in the discussion which had taken place during the last few minutes. The hon. member for South Leeds claimed this bill required double stamps, the promoter said it required only single stamps. There were three Stamp Acts already on the Statutes, and, in addition, were proposed the Stamp Act of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and that of the hon. member for Hamilton, now under discussion. The revenue derived from stamps on bills of exchange, promissory notes and the other documents referred to, amounted to the trifling sum of $200,000, which the hon. the Finance Minister might derive from some other source, and relieve the country from the annoyance and litigation caused by these Acts. He advocated the abolition of the duty; or, if not, the consolidation of the different Acts.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said the 4th section provided that any promissory notes, bills of exchange, etc., being found among the papers of a deceased person, and not properly stamped, the representative could make them legal by affixing double stamps. This was placing the representatives in a better position than would have been the deceased had he lived; and placed the note in an entirely different and better position than that in which it would have been placed had it not been destroyed. The 6th section stated that every instrument liable to stamp duty should be admitted as evidence in any criminal proceeding, though not according to law. If a note were not properly stamped, it had, legally speaking, no existence at all and should not be permitted to be used as evidence. It could not be used as evidence in a civil action, and why should it be allowed to be used in a criminal proceeding?

MR. GUTHRIE said a very large amount of litigation had arisen out of the various Stamp Acts during the last ten years. The time had now come when the Government should consider the consolidation of the whole law. He would go further, and say the law ought to be abolished. The litigation it brought on was so great that it was not worth to the country the revenue derived from it. Although profitable to the lawyers, it was, in the long run, an unfavourable one for the business of the community. He would suggest that the Bill should stand over.

MR. KILLAM said this Bill ought to be discussed in Committee, in order to arrive at a fair understanding of it. He thought the Stamp Act was as fair a mode of levying taxation as could be adopted. It was vexatious, of course, as was all taxation.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland, nothing would give him greater pleasure than to abolish this tax, did the state of the revenue allow it. But he agreed that, on the whole, it was a reasonable and a fair tax.

MR. HOLTON said he was strongly opposed to the statement that the stamp tax was a fair one, as it was a tax on credit and an addition by so much to the interest paid on money. He did not say that in the present condition of the Treasury the Act should be repealed; but he hoped that as soon as the revenue would allow, it would be repealed.

MR. NORRIS said it was unfair that stamps should be required for sight drafts drawn in a foreign country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD defended the stamp tax as being a fair means of collecting a revenue and as falling upon classes who were by no means the poorest in the country.

MR. IRVING said the Bill was intended to obviate certain difficulties which had grown out of the operation of the present law.

House resolved itself into Committee on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,

MR. McDOUGALL (Three Rivers) said that on the whole legislation as to the stamping of promissory notes had travelled out of the course of the legislation on this subject in Great Britain. We had legislated to give validity to bills that had no stamps affixed when made, but the whole principle of the law regarding promissory notes in Great Britain, where the Stamp Act had been in force for a considerable length of time, was that no bill could be valid unless stamped when made. He thought that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue should not have abandoned the principle of his Bill which required the use of stamp paper. He had suffered considerably from the fact that stamps had been placed on bills and irregularly obliterated, and he thought that they should come to some regular legislation on this subject, and not be content with the partial legislation proposed by this Act. It was now really impossible to follow the legislation that took place with respect to promissory notes. The use of stamp paper was the correct system, and the objection that this provision would be prejudicial to rural localities did not lie as post-offices being located all over the country, stamped paper could be easily obtained in all parts of Canada. Under the present system notes were frequently left unstamped, and if the use of stamped paper was compulsory, the revenue would greatly benefit thereby, and it would inure to the convenience and safety of all parties concerned. In such event, individuals who traded in promissory notes would not be exposed to the loss of their amount owing to the committal of a clerical error in the defacement of the stamps. He objected to the whole principle of this law, because it was not sufficient to avoid the dangers that arose in connection with transactions of this character.

Mr. GUTHRIE said a bill or promissory note should be stamped at the time of acceptance or endorsement, instead of when it was paid, because a large amount of revenue would otherwise be lost.

Mr. IRVING said the difficulty suggested was obviated in practice, because no bank would take bills unless a stamp was put upon them. It would be a great hardship to make it compulsory to affix stamps to bills and promissory notes at the time they were drawn, especially in the lumber districts. These bills could be stamped when presented for payment at Quebec or elsewhere, and that was all the Department required.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) hoped the hon. member for Hamilton would allow this clause to remain. There was no danger of the revenue being defrauded, and the provision made would save a great deal of inconvenience, particularly in cases where a bill drawn in Canada was payable in a foreign country. Of course, it was the law as regarded bills of exchange, but he did not see why foreigners should be placed in a better position than our own people. He thought that if a man purchased goods in Toronto, and offered a draft on Montreal, he should not be in a worse position than if he happened to give a draft on New York.

MR. IRVING said it had been the policy for many years that these foreign drafts passing through the country should not be subjected to the tax of a stamp, and he did not see why a foreign promissory note should not be placed on the same footing.

MR. McDOUGALL (Three Rivers) said that he considered the Stamp Act a very vicious law, that led to great grievance and great loss, and that we should be very much better if we had no such law. They should have a system of stamped papers for making the note, and that would do away altogether with the many mistakes that were now made with regard to obliteration, and there would be no question that the note was properly made. It was really not safe now to deal in promissory notes.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he would recommend the affixing of stamps on notes to the amount of $200, and that stamped paper be used for larger amounts.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Three Rivers) said the 4th section was a departure from the principles of the Stamp Law. The law required that the holder of the bill of exchange or note or other instrument should prove that such instrument was not properly stamped when it came into his possession; he immediately rectified the omission. By this section the representative was placed in a better position than would the deceased person have been had he lived, inasmuch as the former was not required to give this proof, but simply to affix double stamps. It was a departure from the law of evidence, which did not permit the evidence of executors, administrators or representatives of deceased persons to be sufficient to establish any claim which had arisen previous to the death of the principal, but required corroborative evidence. He warned the Committee there might be an imposition on the revenue by adopting this clause. There might be men who were in the habit of negotiating notes and bills of exchange, who, in order to relieve themselves of the payment of the duty, would let the stamping stand over. He knew persons who did not stamp certain notes because they knew the signers would not take advantage of that omission. If those notes were brought into Court, they knew what the result would be. But if found among a deceased person's papers, the result would be different. This was an innovation on the general principle of the law.

MR. CAMERON said a good deal could be advanced in favour of the 4th section. He had been appointed an executor, and among the papers of the deceased were several unstamped notes, which, he was confident, had not been stamped through ignorance of the Act. He affixed the stamps, and the question of his right to do so came up in one of the Courts. The case was, however, arranged out of Court, and no decision called for. He thought it was only right the executor should have the power to affix stamps.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved that the words "Or for any other holder of such instrument" be struck out.

MR. CAMERON said he believed it would be in the interest of the whole country if the Stamp Acts were abolished in toto. The revenue obtained from this source was wholly incommensurate with the trouble and loss, and litigation and difficulty in connection with commercial transactions which were produced by this law; and he had no hesitation in saying that the amount of loss to individuals, and of costs wasted in litigation, arising from the existence of the Stamp Acts, far excelled the amount of revenue derived by the Dominion from the whole stamp system; he was, therefore, in accord on this subject with the hon. member from Northumberland.

MR. McDUGALL.

MR. GOUDGE said he quite agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland that the House should, at a very early day, abolish the Stamp Act.

MR. PALMER said that he was of the same opinion; but, at the same time, as this could not now be done, they were endeavoring to make the law as perfect as possible.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) thought the bill should, in the meantime, be passed. The Committee reserving to themselves the power to make such alterations as they thought fit at another stage.

MR. MITCHELL said this measure ought to claim the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue. The Government should incorporate it with their own Bill. Indeed, if the Finance Minister could devise some other means of raising the $200,000 realized by the Stamp Act, and abolish the tax altogether, he would confer a greater boon on the country than had ever been conferred by the present Government.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 20]

SECOND READING.

House resolved itself into Committee on said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that no provision was made for the return of writs on a certain day. This must be done. It had nothing to do with the nomination or polling day. Every election writ must, or ought to have a day of currency, during which it ran. The existence of Parliament could not commence on the issue of the writ, but when the writ was to be fulfilled, and the writs were to be in. The writs for this Parliament were made returnable on the 31st March, and, consequently, this Parliament would not reach its term until the 31st of March, 1879.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the proclamation fixed the time when Parliament was to meet. The day of election was appointed, and the writ was returnable within four days afterwards.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, that is simply a direction to the returning officer.

MR. LAFLAMME: The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery informed me that a returning day was never fixed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the Crown had no power to issue a proclamation to fix a day for the return of the writs, save by this clause. The Governor-General had no prerogative power to appoint such a day, that he was aware of. This might appear in the proclamation, but it was only for the general information of the public. If this provision was struck out, what power would exist for fixing any day whatever? This was not a prerogative, but a statutory right, and it was being struck out.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the Governor-General could not fix such a day, because the Statute declared that these writs should be returnable within four days after the election, which period must necessarily vary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the day for summoning the new Parliament was not fixed; and it was ordered that the writs should be returnable on such a day. In regard to a common writ of execution, the return was fixed for the next term, but before that time came the writ was executed, the sale took place, and the money was paid over, and the return was made. The performance of this duty under the writ must be within that time, which was the extreme limit of the currency of the writ. Within eight days after the reception of the writs for the election of members, public notice of the elections must be given, and four days after polling, the writs had to be transmitted by mail; this was all to be done long before the returning day; but it had nothing to do with the currency of the writs. What the practice of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had been, he did not know; but, at all events, if the day for the returns of the writs was put in the proclamation under this clause, the writ was returnable, and should be returnable whenever the Government directed; but they were actually taking away this power from the Crown.

MR. BLAKE said the only objection he entertained to his hon. friend's proposition was, that writs should be returnable on the day of issue; and, he thought, some time should be allowed in order that the most remote districts might be embraced.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that he thought the writs for British Columbia were returnable on the 12th March. Those for Cariboo were not returned till the 1st of April.

MR. CAMERON said his hon. friend had shown that the Returning Officer's powers were at an end before his (Mr. Thompson's) return to the House, and his election was therefore a delusion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Bill, as amended, read: "and be returnable at the day of issue." Who was to fix the day of issue? The object of the clause was, that the Governor-General should determine the day of issue, but the whole clause had been drawn by the Clerk of the Crown under a perfect misapprehension. He thought the clause should be struck out.

MR. CAMERON said the effect of the amendment would be to leave them without a day of issue.

MR. LAFLAMME asked the Committee to allow the clause to stand over for a time.

On the 4th section,

MR. McCARTHY said the 4th section provided that either the agent or two electors for each candidate must remain in the booth, and gave the agent the right to exclude the electors. He should also have the right to assist him if he chose.

MR. BLAKE said that might be inconvenient. There might arise a difference of opinion between the unauthorized elector and the single agent. The candidate had given a written authorization to one agent, and it must be presumed he considered his interests would be sufficiently protected by that single agent. If this agent absented himself at any time an elector could be introduced. It was only when the agent was present that an elector could not be introduced.

MR. MILLS said this authorization was frequently given blank by the candidate to the agent, who could use it to appoint another agent to assist him if he chose.

MR. McCARTHY said that, supposing an agent came, and two electors were excluded, the returning officer might find a difficulty in admitting anyone else. He would not admit two agents to act for half a day and two for the remaining half.

MR. BLAKE said, in the absence of an agent, the returning officer would be bound to admit two electors.

MR. McCARTHY said, under the Bill of 1874, agents were permitted to vote where they were appointed, although not otherwise entitled to vote there. Under that system a good number of agents might be appointed during the day merely to be permitted to vote.

MR. CASGRAIN said section 8 provided that an elector who could not read or was incapacitated from any physical cause from voting in the manner prescribed by the Act, should be allowed to apply to the deputy returning officer to assist him in the exercise of his franchise, and required that the returning officer should swear every such person that he was so incapacitated. This section should not go so far as to take it for granted that every one applying for this assistance came under false pretences. Instead of saying the returning officer shall take the oath, it should be left optional and say, "may take the oath."

MR. LANGEVIN said that in his own county, or the County of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, there was only one Judge, who lived at Murray Bay; and in winter it would be out of the question to go before him and act as the Bill directed. He thought that Stipendiary Magistrates might be authorized to replace the Judge under such circumstances.

MR. MACDONNELL said that many counties in Nova Scotia were without Judges, while they also had no Stipendiary Magistrates.

MR. LAFLAMME said that in the Province of Quebec, there was only one Judge for a whole district, which sometimes comprised five counties; and the law must equally apply to the Province of Nova Scotia. It would be too dangerous to give the power mentioned to Stipendiary Magistrates.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that to the 25th line of the clause there should be added, "or for the purpose of a petition questioning an election or return."

MR. BLAKE thought the addition should be made to read thus: "Or for the purpose of a petition which had been filed," etc.

MR. LAFLAMME: I have no objection to make that alteration.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. LAFLAMME: said that Section 66 of the Act was repealed, and a clause inserted to the effect that no person should be allowed to inspect any ballot papers in the custody of the Clerk in Chancery, except under an order from one of the Judges, the Judge having first to be satisfied that the inspection was required for the purpose of instituting or maintaining a prosecution for an offence in relation to ballot papers. The inspection should not be allowed for curiosity, but only where a party really wished to inspect the ballots in order to see whether he had a fair chance of contesting the election or not.

MR. CAMERON said he fully agreed with that, but he was in favour of having a clause that would give the recount only before a Court.

MR. LAFLAMME said the clause, as it stood, was merely for criminal prosecutions. The parties should not be allowed to inspect the ballot papers in the Chancery office, but should have a regular order given by the Judge presiding at the trial summoning the Chancery officer to bring down the ballots.

MR. CAMERON said that an inspection should be allowed before the trial, because then, probably, the whole expense of the trial would be saved.

MR. BLAKE said he quite agreed that the ballots should be produced at the trial, and also that they should be produced at an early stage of the proceedings. At the same time, he had a great objection to these ballot papers being unnecessarily sent through the country for the purpose of interlocutory examinations before a Judge, and thought it would work well to leave it as it was now, in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown, the present safeguards surrounding it being sufficient.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought the whole course of this legislation was in a wrong direction, that there were so many safeguards surrounding it that nobody but a Philadelphia lawyer could understand it.

MR. BLAKE said it was provided that there were six days during which the returning officer could not send the papers.

MR. LANGEVIN said this arrangement would not suit the majority of counties in Quebec. The hon. the Minister of Justice should go beyond the city of Montreal and its immediate neighbourhood where the population was not so scattered as in the remainder of the Province. In the latter districts, one Judge was appointed for two or three immense counties, and was, therefore, constantly on circuit, and would be absent from one county for three or four weeks at a time. Provisions should be made to meet this difficulty by appointing other officers of high rank in those counties; the stipendiary magistrates, for instance, who were out of politics, and had not, he believed, even a vote, might be appointed for this purpose. He had drawn attention two years ago, and especially last year, to the heavy costs on actions in the Supreme Court, and nothing had yet been done to reduce them. This Bill put other heavy expenses on the shoulders of members of Parliament. The defeated candidate might take advantage of this clause to subject the member to inconvenience and expense. The proceedings in the Supreme Court were more costly than those in any other courts in the Province of Quebec. This had not been the intention of the Legislature. Parliament required the appellant to deposit $100 as guarantee of costs. Had the members who passed that law thought the costs of appeal before the Supreme Court would have amounted to between $1,800 and $2,500, they would have hesitated before passing it. Not a move could be made in that Court without paying a fee, the registrar could not be asked to go into his office without paying a fee. He did not see why another law should be introduced to make the costs heavier.

MR. LAFLAMME said the hon. gentleman could not point to a single instance where the Judge could not be got within twenty-four hours. As to the additional expense it would be a very trifling matter.

MR. CAMERON said the right to a recount should be limited to cases in which the majority was fifty or under. In Ontario it was limited to cases under thirty. He would suggest also that the power to order a recount be not limited to the County Court Judge of the particular county, but be extended to any Superior Court or County Court Judge.

MR. LANGEVIN was glad the hon. gentlemen had met the views of the hon. members for South Essex and Victoria, but he thought the section of country which he represented should be considered also. There were no railways in that district, and the Judge might be 90 or even 190 miles off, so he thought some exception should be made in that case, so that a recount might take place before a district magistrate.

MR. LAFLAMME said he was willing to meet the hon. member's views as far as possible. He had no objection to make an exception, so far as delays were concerned, in the case of that part of the country, but he thought it would be highly injudicious to give powers to district magistrates in one neighbourhood which were denied to the same class of judges elsewhere.

MR. LANGEVIN said it would be a great injustice to his county if they were denied the right to have a recount, and he would oppose the Bill at every stage.

MR. BLAKE said the difficulty might be got over by allowing the order for a recount to be made by a stipendiary magistrate, if necessary.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. LANGEVIN said that was a step in the right direction, but it did not go far enough. If the notice was given as suggested by the district magistrate to the returning officer, the latter would fold his arms and quietly wait for, perhaps, three weeks till the Judge came back, and during that time Charlevoix would be unrepresented.

MR. LAFLAMME said the proposal made by the hon. member for South Bruce ought to meet the difficulty. If a candidate was elected by a majority he would naturally be desirous that the delay should be as short as possible, and as those who desired a petition would have to pay a deposit, the hon. gentleman was not likely to be annoyed if returned by a majority. As he understood the object of the clause was to appeal from the returning officer, and to select a person who would commend himself more to the confidence of the electors, than the ordinary returning officer was likely to do. The principle of the hon. member appeared to be to appeal to the gentleman whose official positions required no higher qualifications and were not of such a nature as to entitle them to a larger share of public confidence. It would be better to leave the decision of the returning officer a finality than to introduce such an appeal.

MR. LANGEVIN said the people of his county would not receive the same justice as others. The Bill refused them access to the Judge, for he would be miles away and they could not reach him for some time.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought it was important that these amendments should be reprinted so that they might be understood.

MR. LANGEVIN said this clause had been amended three or four times, and as it was a very important clause it should not be passed until it had been reprinted. The Bill did not do justice to his county (Charlevoix). His constituents had a right to be heard. The hon. gentleman was not the Minister of Justice for one region only, and, therefore, he must consider the position of Charlevoix. They must not be left in the position of having to travel ninety miles to Quebec or to Saguenay to see a Judge, while all the other counties in the Dominion were treated in a different way. Why should they be kept waiting three weeks until a Judge came from another county? Might not the Magistrate take the place of a Judge in such cases? The counties of Chicoutimi, Charlevoix and Saguenay had a right to be treated as well as the other counties. The clause also stated the Judge was to give notice in writing to candidates or their agents. Suppose the candidate was not of the county and had no agent, or the agent was also out of the county, to whom would the notice be given? And supposing the candidate was out in the country? The Election Law provided that if a man was not in the county he might be nominated without his accepting the nomination. He had no agent, how was the notice to be given? If there was no candidate present and no agent, to whom would the notice be given? This portion of the Bill would in such case be rendered inoperative.

MR. MILLS: There must be an agent.

MR. LANGEVIN said it was not necessary. It did not follow, because a candidate was not in the country, that an agent should be appointed. The clause should be amended to meet the difficulty. The candidate might be out of the country, he might keep out of the way, and have no agent. Another difficulty he would refer to in case the amendment giving power to other Judges than the Court Judge to order a recount did not pass. Would the Judge have to come to the county or would the counting take place where that Judge resided?

MR. LAFLAMME: The Judge must come to the county.

MR. LANGEVIN: There was nothing in this Bill providing for the Judge's expenses. Provision would have to be made, otherwise the Judge would refuse to act. The provision of the other law could not apply to this, because there was nothing in this Bill making it a portion of the other law.

In case of contestation of election the matter in the first instance might be taken before the proclamation in the case of the county of Chicoutimi and Saguenay and of any other counties where it was not easy at all times to obtain the presence of a Judge.

MR. TASCHEREAU said it was not advisable to have recourse to an officer inferior in position to a Judge.

MR. LANGEVIN said he hoped that the matter would be considered.

MR. LAFLAMME: I will consider it.

MR. ROBITAILLE said they had no Judge at all in Gaspé county, while though there was a Judge in Bonaventure county, this officer did not reside in it, but at the city of Quebec.

MR. MACDONNELL said that counties in Nova Scotia occupied a similar position. He suggested that the clerks of the County Courts should be empowered to issue the order in question, which a Judge was bound to do on affidavit being made. No discretion at all was allowed in the matter. County clerks and prothonotaries were at present permitted to grant orders in cases of fully as great importance as these.

MR. LAFLAMME said that these matters would be taken into consideration. At the same time he would remark that these officers were not under the control of this Government, and could not be bound to perform any duties that they imposed on them.

MR. COSTIGAN said that the Judge for his constituency resided about 150 miles from the shire town, and easy access to him to make these applications was not always possible. All the counties should be placed on an equal footing in this respect.

MANITOBA LAND CLAIMS BILL.

(Mr. Mills.)

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENT.

The Order for taking into consideration the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 46 respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba, read.

MR. MILLS moved that this House doth disagree with the said amendment, for the following reasons:—

1st. That the proposed amendment is at variance with the general scope and title of the Act respecting conflicting claims to lands in Manitoba, under which the question whether any person has a claim against the Crown is not referred to the Commissioners, but only the cases of persons who had acquired some estate or interest in land from the Hudson's Bay Company, or the cases of adverse or conflicting claims between persons under sub-sections three and four of section thirty-two of the Manitoba Act, and in respect of which it has been previously established to the satisfaction of the Minister charged with the administration of Dominion Lands, that there has been undisturbed occupancy of the same. The question whether any person has a claim against the Crown, is and should be determined by the Minister prior to any reference to the Commissioners.

2nd. That the machinery provided by the Dominion Lands Act enables the Minister in charge to make the necessary investigation in the cases provided for by the amendment more expeditiously, efficiently and cheaply than can be done under this amendment, should it become Law.

3rd. That the amendment would prevent any Minister from deciding adversely to the claimant without first making a reference to the Commissioners, although the evidence accompanying the application may conclusively shew that the person asking for a patent has no valid claim.

4th. That the amendment will injuriously impede the administration of Dominion Lands in Manitoba, and delay the allotment of some of the Half-breed reservations.

MR. RYAN said the Senate amendment intended to refer to an independent tribunal that class of claims which are not recognized by the Department of the Interior under its restricted interpretation of the word possession.

MR. SCHULTZ said that it was quite evident, from the discussion in the Senate, that there existed a strong feeling in relation to these stake claims, and in reference to such grievances he must call attention to a peculiar class of them existing in the Parishes of St. Clements and St. Peter, in Manitoba. He had occasion to speak of these before, and had assisted in giving all sorts of data and evidence. No action had been taken, and no hope, apparently, of a speedy settlement, while the greatest inconvenience was experienced by the occupants of these lands. In the neighbourhood of the Stone Fort also, there was a number of quarter-sections sold to Stephens and others, in Montreal, and given to the Hudson Bay Company, which were in the Haypoundage belt, and which, consequently, belonged to the people in that district who owned the river farms, and if the Government desired to receive the good opinion of that section, these matters must be looked into and redressed, and at once. As regards the amendments to the Disputed Claims Act, he very much regretted that if that Act needed amendment, why the necessity had not been discovered a year ago, and was surprised that the Commissioner appointed under the Act should have drawn his pay to the last moment, and only then repented that the Act was unworkable. Too much time, by far, had been lost in this way, and, apparently, in every other way in the Province. In fact, a fatality seemed to attend all Manitoba matters in connection with land matters. The blocks taken by parishes, and notably that of St. Andrews, had not been preserved intact, but had been altered to suit the convenience of the Department. The issue of scrip had been delayed till all benefit from it had passed away, and the continued delay in the distribution of the minors land was an injustice to all parties concerned, and was too palpable to need comment. Session after Session he had spoken of these matters, and would now make a last appeal. He had been often promised the attention of the Government to these matters, and he trusted that these promises would be fulfilled, and believed that in view of these long and grievous delays, and the peaceful and quiet manner in which the people had borne them, that the Government would be only performing a just and graceful act were they to remit the payment of the seed grain which they had received.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no reason why the Minister of the Interior, who had control of the matter, should not accept the amendment proposed, which would make the law the same as before, under the Statute 53 Victoria.

MR. BLAKE said it was now proposed, for the first time, to refer to a commission, the question, whether there was a right, as against the Crown or not. There was a great distinction between the class of cases dealt with under the Act hitherto, and those under consideration.

MR. PALMER said there could be no doubt that the Senate proposed to do what never had been done before. The rights of the people were at the present time disposed of by the arbitrary will of the Minister of the Interior, without any proper investigation being made by the Department. He did not mean to insist that the Department should be compelled to adopt the principle suggested by the Senate; but would it not be well in cases where they felt themselves unable to decide, for want of evidence, to refer the matter to a tribunal which could dispose of such cases? There was, truly enough, no claim apart from the Crown, but the claims which were perfectly well founded, were determined, in the meantime, by political power. He assumed that was not proper. It would be better, he thought, for the Minister of the Interior to refer such cases to a Commission.

MR. MILLS said he did not think the hon. gentleman would care to administer a department and give effect to a provision of this sort, which was strictly at variance with the administration of public affairs in this country. If the principle laid down was adopted in this instance, it ought to be adopted in all disputes, whether in regard to supplies, lighthouses, or with regard to Indian or public lands. The principle was not a proper but a nugatory one. It was in a great measure a direction by Parliament as to the manner in which certain affairs, with regard to public lands, should be administered. That, as he had already pointed out, was the introduction of an entirely new principle. A provision was introduced to take evidence some other way than through the ordinary officers of the Department, in cases where it was sought to be ascertained whether the Crown had parted with its rights, and whether a patent should be made out in favour of the person who set up the claim. As the law stood at present, the Minister must be satisfied that some party had a claim, before the case was referred to a Commission. A commission was simply a convenient mode of taking evidence for the use of the department in a particular case, and there was no reason why the Minister should not act on the evidence which he obtained in the first instance. In the proposed amendment to the Bill, it was provided that when a person made application for letters patent, and the Minister was not satisfied that that person was entitled to send letters, he was to refer the matter to a commission to do what he had already done—to take evidence which he had already in his possession, which might conclusively show that the claimant was not entitled to letters patent. He still adhered to the resolution he had moved.

MR. POPE (Compton) said the proposition made might be novel in the legislation of this country; but he thought it was a very proper one. At one time the free grant system existed in Lower Canada, and for a long time after it was abolished, settlers or squatters took possession, imagining that that system was still in force, and a Commission was appointed to obtain information just as was proposed at present. It was, of course, to the benefit of the Dominion that spare land should be occupied as soon as possible, and the broadest construction should, for that reason, be put on the Act.

MR. MILLS said that question was not touched in this Bill.

MR. POPE said he thought so. He (Mr. Pope) stated that it was most important, in the interests of the people going into that country, that these people should have a broad liberal construction put upon this section of the Act. He quite agreed, notwithstanding what the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) had said, that the Minister of the Interior should be able to have a Commission which would obtain for him full and complete evidence with respect to these claims.

MR. LANGEVIN said he thought these people should have the same right as any other individual—as a contractor, for example, had. If a contractor had a claim against the Government, the Minister of Public Works examined that claim and decided. If he decided adversely to the claimant, the latter might ask that the matter be referred to arbitration; or if it was a large claim, he could have his case tried before the Supreme Court. These settlers were the pioneers of the country; when they came there and wanted wood for their fences or houses, they went to the nearest land, and, according to the custom of the country, they said, "this is my piece of land," and having staked it in, they had a perfect right to it, because that was the custom of the country. In regard to marriages, the custom of the country was for the ceremony to take place before one or two witnesses; they had no minister of religion present, and that marriage had been recognized by the Courts of Law. These were customs of the country before we acquired it; why should we then dispute the rights of the few individuals? Was it worth our while as a powerful Government?

MR. MILLS: That is wholly beside the question.

MR. LANGEVIN said that if the right to some millions of acres were involved, it would be a different matter.

MR. BLAKE: Is the Crown to be represented before the Commission, and to cross-examine witnesses and so forth?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, most decidedly, there must be somebody there in the interests of the Crown, but he took it that it was only when the evidence was conflicting and unsatisfactory that such a Commission would be appointed.

MR. BLAKE said he entirely agreed with what had been said as to the unsatisfactory nature of the affidavit evidence as a mode of ascertaining the truth, but this was not a case for obtaining evidence at all. There was no party antagonistic to the claimants. It was not a case in which two parties were contending for possession; it was a case in which the claimant was called upon to make out their single point of undisturbed possession to the Crown. If they were to have the Crown represented before the Commission, they would have legal gentlemen on either side, and the proceeding would be made a very expensive one. It was admitted that the object of the amendment was to obtain a more liberal construction than the law allowed. Another gentleman had said that the lawyers of this House had framed a law, but the people of Manitoba were not lawyers, and they wanted the bargain changed. If so, let them change it. Let them say what should be the character of possession; what should be sufficient to entitle people to possession; there was no use for one side to endeavour to obtain greater latitude than the Act of Parliament had given, which would be the effect of the amendment. He perfectly agreed with the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) that this Bill would not be worth spending so much time in talking about if its practical results were simply permissive; but he contended that its practical results were compulsory. The Act having provided that in cases where the Minister of the Interior was dissatisfied there should be a Commission, he was therefore bound, in such cases, to have a Commission. The bulk of these cases had been determined as liberally towards the claimants as was at all consistent with the law of the land.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MILLS moved, that a message be sent to the Senate, acquainting their Honours, that this House had disagreed to the said amendment for the foregoing reasons.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

XIII.—OCEAN AND RIVER SERVICE.

Dominion Steamers.

113 Maintenance and repairs of Steamers Napoleon III, Newfield, Druid, Glendon, Sir James Douglas and Northern Light .....$130,000

In reply to MR. LANGEVIN,

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said there was practically an increase this year of $10,000. They took a vote for $100,000 for the steamers mentioned with $20,000 for the Northern Light. They found the latter sum, however, insufficient for the maintenance and repair of that vessel, and therefore they had put it at $30,000, though he did not believe the whole of that amount would be required.

MR. LANGEVIN: I believe this Northern Light, although it was said would be only an experiment, has proved a very costly experiment?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I quite agree with you.

MR. LANGEVIN: Would it not be better to get rid of the vessel altogether?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the Government were bound by treaty to make communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and had found it extremely difficult. The steamer had done the work up to February, but was now stopped, owing to injury to her machinery.

MR. LANGEVIN said he did not find fault with the service itself, which the Government was bound to perform. But the hon member for Queen's had pointed out that the service could be more regularly performed and at much less cost between two ports other than those between which the steamer plied at present. He would ask the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether any change of line was contemplated?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the subject was under the consideration of the Government. No particular points between the island and the mainland had yet been decided upon. He rather agreed with the hon. member for Queen's that Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine would be the two points between which the steamer could ply with greatest regularity, the distance between the two being only nine miles. Before next winter the Government would arrive at a conclusion on the subject.

MR. LANGEVIN asked whether it would not be necessary to build wharves at those places?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that the hon. member for Queen's and other gentlemen skilled in this matter, thought that wharves were really not necessary, because the board ice extended a considerable distance from shore, on which could be landed the passengers and freight.

MR. SINCLAIR said they would be required at the commencement of the season, until the board ice became formed. New arrangements ought to be made for next year. It could not be expected that any vessel could for a length of time do the work of pounding through ice for 45 miles, the distance between Pictou harbour and Georgetown. The natural connecting link between the island and the mainland was between the two capes. The Government should put in the Supplementary Estimates a sum to extend railway communication from Cape Tormentine to the Intercolonial, and from Cape Traverse to the Prince Edward's Island Railway, the one a distance of 30 or 35 miles, the other 12 to 14 miles. This line of communication could be kept open winter and summer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD asked could the Government not get rid, by some means, of the Northern Light, which had proved a perfect failure.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said they had testimony to show she was not by any means a failure. If the change of line were adopted she would still be useful.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By using the longer route during the summer, and the shorter route during the winter? Of course the Government could not undertake to make the railway connection mentioned, which would cost a million dollars.

MR. PALMER said the practical mode of solving this difficulty was to get rid of the Northern Light and establish communication between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse, which would involve the completion of railway communication. The right hon. member for Kingston had stated that would cost a very large sum, and that the Government ought not to build the railway. He (Mr. Palmer) believed that only a very small subsidy would be necessary to build the New Brunswick line, to connect with the Intercolonial, a distance of thirty miles, which would pass through a very fertile country. The same policy should be pursued on the other side, and then employ a powerful but much smaller steamer, than the Northern Light. This route possessed another advantage, that of being easily traversed by ice-boats. The passage need never be delayed. When it was impossible for the steamboat to cross, ice-boats could be used. The interest of the money necessary to complete this route with railway connection would be small, compared with the sum necessary to be expended on the Northern Light, even were she able to run regularly.

Vote agreed to.

120. To provide for the examination of Masters and Mates..... 4,250 00
 121. For the purchase of Life Boats Life Preservers, and Rewards for Saving Life..... 3,000 00

MR. ANGLIN called attention to the fact that inadequate provision was made for manning the lifeboats, and that at St John many lives had been lost on that account.

MR. McCALLUM said it was necessary that lifeboats should be placed in charge of the lighthouse keepers on Lake Erie.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said instructions had been given for the placing of a lifeboat at the places indicated by the hon. gentleman.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH.

MR. BUNSTER urged the placing of lifeboats on the west coast of Vancouver Island, where a great many lives had been lost in consequence of the absence of life-saving apparatus. If proper lifeboat provision had been made many lives would have been saved at the time of the Pacific disaster. Boats should be placed at the different lighthouses, where they were required, and where, according to the information furnished the hon. gentleman's Department, they would be of great benefit to the country. He trusted the Government would act on the hon. gentleman's suggestion. Many valuable lives, which were always exposed to danger in connection with immigration, would thus be saved. He wished that the Government would place at Cape Veal, on the western coast of British Columbia, a steam pelisse, which might be obtained for a very small amount of money from one of Her Majesty's men-of-war. He thought that if the Government would apply to the Admiralty, they would probably be presented with one of these boats, which would be the means of saving a number of lives on that coast, where they had had several shipwrecks, attended with considerable loss of life. In fact, he had been negligent in his duty in not having called upon the Government to bring down the number of shipwrecks which had occurred on the west coast, in order to show the great number of lives that had been lost there.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: You will find that information in my Report.

MR. BUNSTER said he had not observed it. He would impress upon the Government the necessity of having boats, as the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries suggested, stationed at the different lighthouses in British Columbia, where Indian crews could be had almost within hailing distance. There men were just as good boatmen as the Whites; they pulled as good an oar; they had muscle, and could always command crews, and thus, with very slight expense to the Dominion, many valuable lives could be saved. He heartily endorsed the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

MR. LANGEVIN said that last year he had called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the condition of our lifeboats, and stated that some of them were quite useless, being left in such a state that they could not be used. He had directed attention especially to the lifeboat at Murray Bay, and he now wished to know whether this boat had been removed or whether it was intended to provide a new one at that place.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I am not now prepared to answer the question, but I will procure the necessary information. General instructions, I think, were given to our officers, to direct their attention, at their annual visits to the lighthouses, to the condition of the lifeboats at these stations.

MR. LANGEVIN said that this particular boat was under shelter, the door was locked, and it was placed in a very nice building; but he did not know how far it could be used for the saving of life. There were always a number of boats at the wharf, belonging to private individuals, and he thought that if occasion arose, these boats would be used instead of the lifeboat, which was placed at a distance inland, as there certainly would not be time to launch it. He thought that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should order an investigation to be made as to the location of this boat, which should be so placed as to make it available in case of need. At present this was out of the question, and the boat was of no use whatever.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I will have the matter looked into.

MR. BLAKE said that this boat could be easily placed in the water in twenty minutes.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman well knows that it is under cover.

MR. BLAKE: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN: If lives are to be saved this boat will not be obtained. The hon. gentleman knows that twenty other boats are available and these will be used in case of need.

MR. BLAKE: I have no doubt that, under ordinary circumstances, when there is not a very great storm, those already in the water will be used; this is always the case.

Vote agreed to.

122. To provide for investigation into wrecks and casualties, and collection of information relating to disasters to shipping.....$500.00

MR. DAVIES said he desired to call attention to the insufficiency of the investigations into the causes of wrecks as at present conducted. About 30 years ago in England a law passed requiring masters of all sea-going vessels to be examined before a competent tribunal; and this law had been attended with the very best results. It had, moreover, been extended to the colonies, and to the Canadian colonies in particular. Afterwards the Imperial Parliament enacted a law which compelled a close investigation into the causes of wrecks, and a Wreck Commissioner was appointed. No sooner did a vessel get ashore than this Commissioner constituted a Court in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and made a searching enquiry into the circumstances. This Court had power to suspend masters, if their conduct was ever to blame, for 3, 6, 9 or 12 months, and even to cancel their certificates altogether, reducing them to the condition of ordinary seamen. We had a somewhat similar law—32 and 33 Vic., Cap. 38, but was not so efficient. It was permissive and the authority was vested in the Commissioner of Customs, who might summon a Court of Enquiry. Practically, this law was inoperative. In the Province of Prince Edward Island, about which a great many wrecks took place, owing to its insular position, they had never had one investigation. It was not convenient for the Collector of Customs to make them; they were attended with a great deal of trouble and no remuneration. He thought that this had a very prejudicial effect. Naturally they had a great many shipmasters on the Island, where the young men had a fondness for sea-going, and he was proud to say that among them were a great many first-class master-mariners. A different state of things would exist if rigid investigation into these matters took place, and if the English system was properly carried out. Within the last two years, a new ship laden with cats, has been lost within a quarter of a mile of the place where she was launched, and it was very well known in the Island that this vessel was sold and taken over to Pictou the following spring when navigation opened, and put on the slip; no expense at all was incurred and the underwriters and others were swindled out of the proceeds of the vessel. This had a very prejudicial effect on honest people. He had to pay his share of the loss resulting, for, as they were aware, the underwriters fixed the rate of insurance on the average rate of losses, say for the half of the St. Lawrence, and honest insurers had to pay for these fraudulent losses. He contended that this state of things ought to be changed. The present Act was permissive and practically a dead letter. He believed that two or three investigations had been held in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in very flagrant cases, but he did not remember of any having been made in Prince Edward Island, which was a very convenient place to lose shipping at, now that shipping was depressed and not worth over fifty per cent. of its cost a year or two ago. People so disposed could very conveniently lose an old ship at the Island and defraud the underwriters; and as the shore shelved gradually, the loss of life was very small. He said that they should have a Wreck Commissioner and several deputies. This would necessitate considerable expense; but in order to make the system complete, masters should be examined and wrecks investigated. Such Commissioner should be clothed with the same powers which the Commissioners in England possessed. Such investigations would be a wholesome check. He ventured to say that with such a system not one-half of the ships which were now lost would become wrecked. Ship-masters would then take very good care that they did not lose their certificates. He hoped that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would attend to this matter.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that this suggestion was worthy of the most serious consideration; but it must not be forgotten that this country was quite different from England, which was comparatively small in extent, its coasts on every part being approachable at all seasons. A great many wrecks occurred there, and the Wreck Commissioner, on the first information, had to repair to such spots. This was utterly impossible here. With such a system, a Wreck Commissioner would certainly be required on Prince Edward Island. Wrecks there generally occurred when it was impossible to get there; and the same remarks applied to localities down the St. Lawrence,—to the Magdalen Islands, to Anticosti, and farther down. It would be quite impossible for a Wreck Commissioner to repair to these spots when wrecks took place; and he would have to wait until the men came to Quebec or some other place in order to examine them. It was at present the duty of Commissioners of Customs, to enquire into the causes of and the circumstances attending wrecks; and the Government had power to appoint a formal judicial Court to hold an enquiry into these circumstances, and, as in England, to suspend or cancel the certificates of masters or mates. This was very similar to the English Law; our country was very much larger than England; and it seemed to him impossible to carry out here the English system which was totally unsuited to our circumstances. He had never failed, when a case was brought under his notice, where the circumstances excited suspicion as to bonâ fide loss, to appoint, if necessary, a Court of Enquiry, but it had never seemed to him fit and proper to incur the very heavy expenses that naturally resulted from the holding of such an enquiry, unless the circumstances were suspicious. It only took a very short time, by Order-in-Council, to establish a Court.

MR. DAVIES said he regretted to differ from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The law as it stood was nearly altogether inoperative.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: In a sense.

MR. DAVIES said that in order to carry the system out properly, Wreck Commissioners should be appointed. This would cause some expense, but it was a necessity. This officer should have one deputy on the Pacific Coast, and two or three on the Atlantic Coast. This would not require a very great expenditure. At present he contended that there was no check. The law was permissive, and as no fees were attached, the general result was that no enquiry took place. This was the case in his own Province, and the effect was very prejudicial there and in the Maritime Provinces. Canada was now the fifth largest ship-owning country in the world; her merchantmen were on every sea, and it was a matter of great importance to have this law operative and complete.

MR. PALMER said he was surprised to hear his hon. friend (Mr. Davies) make this statement, which, if true, ought to be investigated. It was a grave charge to make on the floor of Parliament against a class of men whose equals for integrity and usefulness did not exist in Canada, or in any country. He was not prepared, however, to say that his hon. friend's statement was not true; but this country could not afford to have it go forth to the world without contradiction or investigation.

MR. DAVIES: You cannot contradict it.

MR. PALMER said he entirely agreed with the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that, in the present state of the country, it was asking too much to request the appointment of a Wreck Commissioner. This would involve an enormous expenditure, which this country could not afford. He hoped that the hon. gentleman was mistaken. These statements would be very injurious to the character of the country, and he, therefore, protested against their being made at all. If they were true, as regarded the Island, they were not true with respect to this class of men in general.

MR. DAVIES said that what he had stated with regard to fraudulent wrecks was not only true with respect to his own Province, but also with regard to the Province of New Brunswick. If a ship went ashore, say at Shediac, N.B., or on the coast of Prince Edward Island, there was not much danger of loss of life. The captain knew that no investigation would be made into his conduct as master-mariner; a survey was made; the vessel was sold, and the whole property, perhaps, was sacrificed. If there were a Wreck Commissioner, this would not occur. Captains would then be very careful lest they should get into trouble. At present no enquiry was made and the Act was practically a dead letter, because it was not compulsory on Collectors of Customs to hold these surveys. More than once cases of the kind to which he referred had taken place; but it was not his place to become a common informer, and thus make enemies. It was the duty of the Government to protect insurance companies and their agents.

MR. McCALLUM said he regretted the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) had thought proper to reflect on a class of men which was as honest and as well behaved as any class in the Dominion. The hon. gentleman would have the Government spend money in order to protect the underwriters. If officers of vessels ran them ashore, they were exposed to the loss of their certificates and to punishment as felons; but certainly this country had no money to expend for the protection of underwriters.

MR. DAVIES said he only wished the Imperial Act to be applied to the Dominion. The few dollars which would have to be expended would not be any great loss. If the country could afford to spend large sums on the Pacific Railway and other schemes, an expenditure of $2,000 or $3,000 in a matter of this kind would not be felt to any appreciable extent.

MR. GOUDGE thought this was a matter of very great importance now that the shipping of the country represented between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Kings was, he thought, an excellent one, though it might not, of course, be convenient for the Minister of Marine, at the moment, to state whether he would accede to the hon. gentleman's wishes. To appoint a Commissioner of Wrecks would be a step in the right direction, and would probably prevent the loss of many wrecks. He should be sorry to say that our master mariners would throw away a ship. He believed they were a very excellent class of men; but cases might occur in which, for want of supervision, ships might be thrown away. It might be said that the underwriters should look after the matter; no doubt they did, but sometimes before they could get to the place where a wreck occurred, it was surveyed, sold and beyond their reach. He thought the Minister of Marine should seriously consider whether a Commissioner or some other person should at once proceed to a wreck and hold an official investigation.

MR. McCALLUM: The hon. gentleman says before the underwriters can get to the scene of a wreck the vessel is sold? By whom is it sold?

MR. GOUDGE: By those who surveyed it.

MR. McCALLUM: And would you have the Government to do the business of the underwriters?

MR. DAVIES said it was not so much a question for the underwriters as for the owners of ships, because they fixed the rates, and the owners had to pay them.

Vote agreed to.

123 Expenses in connection with Canadian Registration of Shipping.....	$500 00
124 Montreal Water Police...	14,090 00

MR. BUNSTER said there were no Water Police at British Columbia where they would be of great advantage in the way of arresting deserters from Her Majesty's navy.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: There is no tax on the ships there.

MR. BUNSTER: Then you should put a tax on our shipping and give us a Water Police.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: If I am in my place next Session, I will introduce a measure of that character.

Vote agreed to.

MR. GOUDGE.

124. River Water Police..... $23,500.

MR. BLANCHET: Perhaps the Minister of Marine will state what changes have been made in that Department. I know that Mr. Miller took Mr. Russell's place, as shipping-master, and it is reported that the situation of Chief of the River Police is vacant.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I may say frankly that a change is contemplated, but it has not been effected yet.

Vote agreed to.

126. Removal of Obstructions in Navigable Rivers..... $500

MR. LANGEVIN: Will the hon. gentleman say what was done with this money last year?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Up to the 20th June, 1877, we expended $193 for removing obstructions in Summer-side Harbour, and $12 in advertisements giving notice of some obstructions. These are the only items I know of, but I will look into the matter further, and give the hon. gentleman the information he desires.

MR. STEPHENS said, in the county which he represented, there was a river called Sydney River, and the customs paid last year on the shipping in a port some miles up, amounted to $3,387.10; in 1876, the duties amounted to $2,950.86; and in 1875, to $3,298.34, making a total of $9,636.30, a great part of which was collected on the imports of a vessel which plied between that port, Detroit and the city of Brisbane. Two other steamers also plied now between the same ports. From the shipping of the River Thames in the same county, $19,087.76 were collected in 1875, $23,332.70 in 1876, and $23,696.45 in 1877, making a total of $66,116.91, and for the two rivers a total of $75,753.21. He held then that the sum of $500 asked in this vote was a very paltry one and would not suffice for the two rivers he had referred to.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said his hon. friend was under a misapprehension. The object of this grant was merely to remove artificial obstructions, such as timber in rivers and harbours, but did not apply to natural obstructions or the improvement of rivers.

MR. STEPHENSON said he generally received the explanations of his hon. friend the Minister of Marine with a degree of satisfaction, but in the present case he might express the belief that $5,000 were required to remove the obstructions in these two rivers.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that if the hon. gentleman called the attention of the Department to the existence of obstructions in either of these rivers, from floating lumber, he would cause an enquiry, and, if necessary, remove the obstructions.

Vote agreed to.

XIV. LIGHTHOUSE AND COAST SERVICE.

127. Salaries and allowance of Lighthouse Keepers..... $151,583 00

MR. LANGEVIN asked why the lighthouse keeper at Kamouraska had received an increase of $50.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said it was because the light there was changed from a fixed to a revolving light, entailing more responsibility, time and care.

MR. LANGEVIN said the salary of the keeper at Metis had been reduced by $20, and he presumed that was done because the light there was changed from a revolving to a fixed one.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he did not think any actual reduction had been made, but he would enquire into the matter.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. LANGEVIN asked how long the keeper had been at Tadousac Range Light.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I think about three years.

MR. LANGEVIN said the man had been there for three years taking care of the two lights, which were a quarter of a mile distant from each other, for a salary of $150, and now, all at once, it was proposed to double his salary. His duty would not be more than during the past three years, and the only reason given for the increase appears to be that it was a lonely place, and that there was no garden to cultivate to render him less lonely. He might say that there were other lighthouse keepers who were as lonely, some whose lighthouses were situated in the middle of the St. Lawrence, three or four miles from shore. These had not had their salaries increased. He thought there should be a rule for these increases, and that they should not be allowed to be made in this discriminate fashion. Last year he pointed out the case of a lighthouse keeper, whose salary had been gradually increased, until it was $350, simply because he had a friend at Court. It was the same in the present instance. They might have increased the man's salary by $50, but there was an object in doubling it; it was doubled so that next year the man would not want an increase, and some other relation could receive an augmentation of his salary. At the lighthouse of Port Charles, a very important point between Montreal and Quebec, and where a large sum of money had been expended, the man only received $150, and had to keep the lights from the middle of April to the 1st December. Why was not that man to receive $300? He was quite as lonesome as the other. The Cap aux Oies lighthouse was as lonely a place as could be found on the Lower St. Lawrence; notwithstanding, the lighthouse keeper there had $200 only. The fact that the man at Tadousac had been increased $300 would have this effect: that all lighthouse keepers would be applying to be put on the same footing. He did not say that the man's work was not worth $300; but, if so, the work of the other man was worth as much. He should like to ask if the Department had any explanation with regard to the increase.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that, before he yielded to the solicitation of the keeper, he had an enquiry made, and Mr. Gregory visited the locality. He reported to the Department that $150 was too small a salary, and represented that the two lights were one-third of a mile apart, over a rough, rocky road, most difficult to traverse, and that he required occasional assistance to attend to both lights. That it was lonely was no reason, certainly; but the Department thought the claim a meritorious one.

MR. McCALLUM asked why a decrease in salary of $35 had been made at Scotch Bonnet, an increase of $25 at Port Stanley, and a decrease of $133 at Lancaster Pier?

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said that the Port Stanley light was one of the most important on the north shore of Lake Erie. Port Stanley was the principal harbour on the north shore.

MR. McCALLUM said he knew that it was not the principle harbour there.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that, under an Order-in-Council passed in 1870, before he came into office, the salaries of various lighthouse keepers in the Dominion were fixed; some were decreased on the appointment of new officers, and Scotch Bonnet came in the latter list. The appointment at Lancaster Pier was also a new one; hence the decrease.

MR. CAMPBELL said he wished to know why the lighthouse keeper at Bird Island, N.S., had been allowed to come on shore during winter, while Mr. McPhee, the manager of the Government institution at St. Paul's Island three years ago, had been turned out in the middle of winter, when he could not remove his family or effects from the Island. This man remained on shore all winter, and his wife and part of his family stayed alone on the Island, with a superintendent over their heads. His constituents had repeatedly asked him why the action of the Government was so arbitrary in the one case and so generous in the other, as in the case of Bird Island lighthouse, the keeper farmed out the work done for $200, and pocketed the balance, making a political canvas at the same time. This lighthouse keeper had abandoned his post twelve months ago. He had moved for the papers relating to this matter some time since, and he had just received them.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that the lighthouse keeper on Bird Island was the brother of Hon. Mr. Ross, and having spoken to him (Sir Albert J. Smith) about this matter at Halifax, he had told Mr. Ross to make his application for leave of absence on the ground that his family was ill the winter before, and that he desired to live on the mainland in winter, in writing. Mr. Ross promised in his letter to provide an efficient person (Mr. Mackenzie) to take charge of the property during his absence, and to return to the post in the spring. If he did not return, of course he would have to resign the position. These were the facts, and he thought that the House would justify him in granting this leave of absence under the circumstances.

MR. STEPHENSON said that, as was well known, the lighthouse property at Rondeau was very valuable. The lighthouse keeper at this point had entire charge of two lighthouses, one of which was provided with a revolving light, and, nominally, he believed, this man had control of the harbour itself; but no person had actual charge of the harbour, into which large vessels went and lay during storms, to the great damage of piers, upon which a large sum had been expended. No one had authority to order the vessels to go into the harbour and anchor there, and the result was that these piers sustained very considerable damage. This lighthouse keeper received a salary of $400 per annum; he lived several miles from any inhabited house; he did not have the advantage of any school or of any land to cultivate; and he had ten or twelve miles to go to market; in fact he was completely isolated. Last year the Government had been kind enough to give this official a boat, but it was only large enough for one man to use to go to market, to the post-office etc. He had the nominal and ought to have active control over these entire works. Moreover, he was compelled to remain at his post during the whole of the year, and, in addition, he had to take charge of these two lights. He (Mr. Stephenson) thought that in view of these facts the salary was altogether too small; and if such a request was not previously made, he now applied for an increase of this man's salary, or if this were not done, for the appointment of an assistant. He believed that this matter had been brought before the Government before, and he trusted that the Government would at once see the absolute necessity of increasing this man's salary, so that he might secure assistance, or else that assistance should be secured for him. This officer should also have power equivalent to those of a harbour master in the Eastern Provinces, or some such powers which would enable him to have entire control over the vessels which entered the harbour. He had seen 14 or 15 vessels go into it during a storm, and some of them had from 50 to 60 hands on board. It was necessary that some person should have the authority of which he spoke at this point. Otherwise he thought that the Government would do an injustice to themselves, to the country, and to this great work which existed at Rondeau for the advantage of navigation generally.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that his attention had recently been drawn to the facts as stated, and he had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to appoint a harbour-master at this port. It was in contemplation to do so at an early day, and his hon. friend knew that the powers of a harbour-master were very considerable. He understood that foreign and other vessels made use of these piers, causing considerable damage. A wharfinger, at the same time, would be appointed.

MR. STEPHENSON said that this was an outport of the Port of Chatham; and although it had a Customs officer, it might not be known to the Department that this officer lived some ten miles away from the spot, and, of course, this being the case, he was very useful. This man lived in the electoral district of Bothwell, and he hoped that the man appointed to the position named would live near the harbour.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that they proposed to appoint this lighthouse keeper harbour master.

MR. STEPHENSON said that at the same time it would be just as well to have the Customs officer located somewhere in the vicinity of the harbour, instead of ten or twelve miles away. Though he did not attend to his duties, he (Mr. Stephenson) presumed that this officer, nevertheless, drew his salary regularly, because his efficiency had been recognised by an increase in salary from $200 to $500.

MR. MCCALLUM said that he knew something about Rondeau harbour. He did not think that vessels went in there to lie alongside the pier to get knocked to pieces. He did not object to the appointment of a harbour master there, but he thought it would be absurd to make vessels go alongside the pier at the risk of being seriously damaged.

MR. LANGEVIN said he understood that the pier had been carried away some years ago, and he wished to know what arrangements had been made with the railway company to have it rebuilt.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was built by the Government, the town of Collingwood and the railway company, jointly.

MR. LANGEVIN wished to know in that case whether these harbour works at Collingwood were in the hands of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said all harbours were in the hands of the Government. The mere fact of local authorities contributing part of the expense did not relieve the Government of the maintenance of harbours.

Vote agreed to.

128. Maintenance and Repairs .. $260,675 00

MR. LANGEVIN wished to know what kind of new boats were required for the various lighthouses.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said some were lifeboats and some were ordinary ones.

MR. LANGEVIN said he noticed there was an increase of $684 for the maintenance of lighthouses above Montreal. Then there was an increase of $500 for oil, and on the next page there was a further increase of $2,000 for the same purpose. Were these required for new lighthouses?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said they were.

In reply to Mr. LANGEVIN,

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH, said there were 110 lights in Nova Scotia, and ten fog whistles. The amount was not quite sufficient last year, and, besides, the Department had entered into a new contract for oil of a higher standard at a slight increase. This accounted for the increase in the Estimate.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would like to draw attention to the need of a good boat at Cape Beale lighthouse. If they had had a good strong boat at that lighthouse when the steamer was lost a short time ago, in Vancouver Bay, many lives would have been saved. The cost would not be much, and he strongly recommended the Department to consider the matter.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It will be considered.

XV. FISHERIES.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

130. Salaries and disbursements of Fishery Overseers and Wardens. $52,500

MR. MITCHELL said he wished to learn whether it was proposed to place the fishermen of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island on the same footing with the fishermen of New Brunswick as regarded certain taxation. He had called attention to this matter last year. He had then thought that an injustice was done, and he was still of the same opinion.

MR. LANGEVIN.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that they collected as much money in Nova Scotia as New Brunswick. There was no tax on the salmon fishery in Nova Scotia, but this was the case in New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario. He understood that the salmon fishery in Nova Scotia was quite different from the New Brunswick salmon fishery; and his hon. friend knew very well that the fisheries in the Miramichi and Restigouche Rivers, as far as salmon were concerned, were superior to the fisheries in the other Lower Provinces. The taxation in question was very slight, only 3c. each on the net used for the catching of salmon. He presumed that the time would very speedily arrive when this tax must be extended to Nova Scotia.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not know there was any material difference between this fishery in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Ours is a coast fishery.

MR. MITCHELL said that a great deal of the New Brunswick fishery was also a coast fishery. A very large number of salmon were taken off the entrance of the Miramichi River, and around the islands in and along the shores of the Bays of Chaleurs and St. Lawrence. He had objected to the tax as originally proposed, and he heard his hon. friend (Sir Albert J. Smith) had afterwards come to an amicable arrangement whereby a small tax for merely registration purposes was imposed on the fishermen's nets, ensuring the maintenance of the Departmental control over these fisheries. He still contended that this same Departmental control, which was necessary for the New Brunswick fisheries, should also be extended to the Nova Scotia fisheries, and that a tax should not be placed on New Brunswick fishermen which was not also levied on Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island fishermen. His hon. friend, last year, had promised to consider this matter, and this tax should either be extended or removed altogether. There was no difference between the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick fisheries in this connection. He entirely approved of the tax in question, which was reasonable.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said that the Nova Scotia salmon fishery differed very much, in his opinion, from the New Brunswick salmon fishery, inasmuch, as far as he was aware, the latter was confined mainly to rivers and their mouths, whereas in Nova Scotia this fishery was conducted on the Atlantic coast, a different thing entirely. Very few salmon, indeed, except in the way of sport, were taken in the Nova Scotia rivers. He might say that all their salmon were caught off the headlands on the Atlantic coast and around Cape Breton. As regarded collections, $1,520 had been received last year from Nova Scotia, and $1,289 from New Brunswick in this relation.

MR. MITCHELL said that no difference existed between these fisheries in the two Provinces. If the taxation were equalised, the revenue thus derived from Nova Scotia would be very much larger than it was. The cases were exactly parallel; and there was no reason why this tax should not be imposed on these other fishermen.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he had felt that it was wrong to levy a tax on the fishermen on the Quebec side of the Restigouche River, which was not paid by the fishermen on the New Brunswick side of this river. He thought it was only fair that these fishermen should be treated alike, and it seemed equally fit and proper to place this tax on the Miramichi fishermen. He must admit that there was an apparent unfairness, but he was instructed by his officers, and those who understood the subject, that there was nothing at all like the Miramichi and Restigouche fisheries in Nova Scotia, where there were no river fisheries of any consequence. It was but right that taxation levied on New Brunswick fishermen should also be imposed on Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island fishermen. Taxation should be equalized, but his hon. friend knew that it was very difficult to make these changes all at once. They had to do it gradually as was the case during the incumbency of the hon. gentleman, when there was such a tax in Quebec and no such tax in New Brunswick. He thought that in a short time it would be necessary to tax in this manner the fishermen of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. It was in contemplation to impose a tax on British Columbia fishermen.

MR. JONES (Halifax): It costs more to protect river than coast fisheries.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that the $1,520 mentioned were obtained, he believed, entirely from a tax of $40 each on pound nets or fish traps. The $1,289 mentioned as returned from New Brunswick were similarly collected.

MR. DECOSMOS said that he did not think that it was at all desirable to impose any tax on this important industry. Fishermen should be as free from special taxation as machinists, lawyers, or any other class of citizens. He considered that it would be a mistake to impose any tax on the fishermen of British Columbia in any way, shape, manner, or form. He believed that under a mistake the fishermen of Fraser River had asked the Government for the imposition of some kind of taxation, and also that under the terms of Union, they were entitled to equal favours with respect to fisheries, with any other Province. He disagreed with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) who, he understood, favoured this taxation, and urged that it should be imposed in Nova Scotia as well as upon New Brunswick fishermen. He (Mr. DeCosmos) would as soon be in favour of putting a special tax on carpenters, or blacksmiths, or farmers, or editors, even gentlemen.

MR. MITCHELL: Or on knights.

MR. DECOSMOS said that this was one of the great industries of the country, and he for one strongly protested against the imposition of any tax in any way, shape, manner or form on any of the fishermen of the Province of British Columbia in this connection, or on the fishermen in the other Provinces of the Dominion.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. member had put words in his mouth which he never uttered, and attributed to him views which he never entertained. What he did say was there should be a nominal registration fee for the purpose of controlling fisheries—not for the purpose of revenue. He objected to a tax being put on fisheries for the raising of revenue.

MR. DECOSMOS asked the Minister of Marine and Fisheries what he proposed to do in the way of controlling net fishing in British Columbia.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he had been waited upon by several gentlemen and the matter discussed at considerable length, but no conclusion had been arrived at. He would like to receive any suggestion or information from the hon. member for Victoria.

MR. MACDONNELL said he quite agreed with the hon. member for Victoria that there should be no tax on this industry, because if there was any class of the community who should be dealt with leniently it was fishermen. The hon. member for Northumberland advocated a tax on the fishermen of Nova Scotia because those of New Brunswick were subjected to taxation. Now, there was no reason why such a tax should be extended, he would rather hear the hon. gentleman propose its abolition. The product of the Dominion fisheries in 1876 amounted to $11,147,950, of which Nova Scotia produced $6,290,000, or more than one half of the whole, while New Brunswick only produced a fourth of what was produced in Nova Scotia. He quite agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland when he said that if there was any taxation it should not exceed what was necessary in order to protect fishermen in the exercise of their rights. Fishermen were continually quarrelling among themselves, because their rights were not properly protected. He brought this matter to the notice of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries some time ago, in the expectation of having something done, in order to have disputes arising between fishermen along our coasts settled in a satisfactory manner. He was told the inspectors of the river fisheries had the power of seeing to this, but it did not appear that that power was exercised, and it was quite useless for all practical purposes. Speaking of the question of taxation, he might remark that no class of men consume more dutiable goods than fishermen. The right hon. member for Kingston had contended for agricultural Protection, but he had never sought to protect the interests of fishermen. Having the honour to represent an agricultural county himself, he was in a position to state that agriculturists produced, on their farms, nearly all the necessaries of life and clothing which they required, so that they contributed very little to the revenues in comparison with fishermen. Our fisheries were one of our great sources of wealth, and yet the Government had never exercised any fostering care over this important industry.

MR. DAVIES said he thought sufficient interest was not taken by the Government in the fisheries of Prince Edward Island. That Province was intersected in all directions by tidal rivers and arms of the sea, which, fifty years ago, were filled with fish, but, by reason of the fish being taken in the spawning season, and sawdust being thrown into the rivers by millers, these streams had been depleted of fish. He was afraid that Free-trade principles would hardly apply to inland fisheries; he believed Protection was wanted. Whether that Protection was afforded by leasing the fisheries to certain individuals or appointing a sufficient number of wardens and overseers, he did not care. There was no part of the world, he believed, where finer streams for sea trout and salmon fisheries could be found than in the Province of Prince Edward Island, but it was necessary that they should be protected, because in the month of October, when salmon ascended these rivers to spawn, they were pitchforked by farmers and others. It was time that a Department had been organized in the Province; but the rivers were not sufficiently protected; perhaps it might be found too expensive at the present time to enforce the laws.

MR. PALMER said that last Session he ventured the opinion that the fisheries of non-tidal rivers belonged to the owners of the soil, and, consequently, belonged rather to the several Provinces than to the Dominion at large. He would like to know whether since last Session the Department had granted any leases on non-tidal rivers; and whether any means had been taken to discover to whom they belonged to.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he did not think any leases had been granted since last year. Several had been advertised, and tenders were asked in some cases where leases had expired; also in cases where there had not hitherto been any lease. The Department had taken no means to ascertain the real facts in the vexed question of ownership.

MR. PALMER said that if parties received leases of the fisheries in non-tidal rivers, and it appeared hereafter, that the Crown had not the right to dispose of them, the Dominion would be put to very great expense hereafter, when these leases were cancelled. Another matter of vital importance which the Dominion Government ought to consider, was the regulation of net-fishing in the deep sea along our coasts. No doubt it would take a long time to utterly destroy the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy, but the Government should take care that the rights of fishermen were thoroughly understood, and that a proper system was carried out which would render these fisheries valuable in time to come.

MR. MITCHELL said he would call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that a very fair and equitable arrangement was made last year, whereby the fishermen of this country were freed from practical taxation while, at the same time, the Department had the right to charge them with a nominal fee for the purpose of controlling the fisheries. When the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that $1,520 were collected in Nova Scotia, while only $1,289 were collected in New Brunswick, he forgot to tell the House that there were four times as many fish taken in Nova Scotia as in New Brunswick. He admitted, practically, that there was no difference between the bay and shore fisheries of these Provinces, and he (Mr. Mitchell) would like to know why there should be a registration tax in New Brunswick, and not in Nova Scotia. The hon. Minister was quite right in stating that any radical change must be introduced gradually. He tried to make a radical change all at once in New Brunswick, and found that he must go back to first principles. He could not see why the two Provinces should be treated differently. At present the representatives of New Brunswick were liable to be charged by their constituents with having neglected their interests, inasmuch as they allowed a tax which took money out of their pockets, while that tax was not applied to the sister Provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The system was changed in Ontario and Quebec, and at Confederation it was agreed that such a system as they found existing should be established. But there was no such system in the Maritime Provinces as there was in Ontario and Quebec, and when the Maritime Provinces came into Confederation, it was tacitly agreed by this House, that no change should be made in the fisheries of those Provinces. Since then the same system had been applied to New Brunswick, and the point he wished to make was, that the system of charges upon the fisheries of that Province should be extended to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. These Provinces were exempt, for what reason he did not know. He said, either make them all alike, or wipe off the charge from New Brunswick.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton): Had not the hon. gentleman better wait until the people of Nova Scotia petition the House against their being left out of this taxation?

MR. GOUDGE said the difference between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was that the representatives of New Brunswick, agreed, to permit this system to be adopted in the Province of Nova Scotia they resisted it. The principal reason why it should be applied to New Brunswick, perhaps, was that a change was made on one side of the Restigouche and not on the other, and the people on the Quebec side complained of it; or it might be that gentlemen wished to preserve the rivers of that Province, and the only way to do so was by the issuing of licenses. The income of revenue was derived from these rivers, the amount received from the shore and deep sea fisheries amounting to comparatively nothing.

MR. MITCHELL: You do not understand it.

MR. GOUDGE said he understood it very well. His hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) was desirous of doing now what he dared not do when in power: he wished to increase the taxation of the Nova Scotian fishermen. If any class should be exempt from taxation, it was the hardy but poor fishermen of that Province; besides, a very large portion of the fish was from deep sea fisheries, consequently the argument of his hon. friend fell to the ground. They should resist this tax, or any attempt to force a system upon them that was not required.

MR. MITCHELL said he agreed with the principle that the tax upon the fish caught should be swept away, but considered a registration fee was necessary to keep the fisheries under the control of the Department. He said it was right to have such a system of registration to give the Department proper control, but be objected to its being applied to New Brunswick and not to Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, and he believed the hon. Minister of Marine would extend it to those Provinces, and to the other Provinces of the Dominion.

MR. McINNES said that from the discussion which had been going on for the last hour or hour and a half, one would almost arrive at the conclusion that the only fisheries in the Dominion of Canada were in the neighbourhood of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. He desired to inform this House that such was not the case, that the western extremity of the Dominion had important fisheries, and that if a tax was proposed to be imposed on the fishermen of that Province, he considered a great injustice would be done from the fact that they, in British Columbia, did not enjoy the advantages of the Fisheries Clause of the Washington Treaty, which enabled Ontario and the other Provinces to send their fish free of duty into the American market. He must certainly, very strongly object to any tax being placed on the fisheries of British Columbia until such times as they were placed on a par with the rest of the Provinces in other respects. On the Fraser River, at the present time, they had no less than five establishments, shipping something like 125,000 cases of fish per annum, and if any restriction was placed upon them, it would be a great injustice. He considered, however, that the Government ought to establish a hatchery there as early as possible, in order to preserve that industry.

MR. GOUDGE said the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) seemed to think the fishermen of Nova Scotia at present possessed an advantage over those of New Brunswick, and was most anxious that both should be taxed alike. He told them that this tax was only for the purpose of control; if so, they had no need of it in Nova Scotia. The Minister of Marine might use his discretion about taking this tax off New Brunswick, but he (Mr. Goudge) and his colleagues should certainly object to its being applied to Nova Scotia.

MR. PALMER said the last speaker had objected to this system being applied to Nova Scotia, on the ground that New Brunswick consented to join the Union and Nova Scotia did not. If this was a ground for the two Provinces being treated differently with regard to this question, he thought the principle should apply with regard to other matters.

MR. MACDONNELL said this discussion arose from the fact that New Brunswick gave a certain tax which the hon. member for Northumberland complained did not exist in Nova Scotia. There should be no tax on the fishermen of this country, for the purpose of adding to the exchequer of this Dominion; any tax imposed should be for the purpose of improving the fisheries. The hon. member for Northumberland, while admitting there should be no tax for the purpose of revenue, used a childish argument when he complained that Nova Scotia was not taxed equally with New Brunswick. If it was an unjust tax, and injurious to the latter Province, he should rather endeavour to have it abolished than to have it extended to Nova Scotia. This was supposed to be a tax for the benefit of the fishermen; if it were not, it ought to be abolished.

MR. KILLAM said, he believed that New Brunswick did not contribute more to the revenue than Nova Scotia. The Miramichi river had received from the Marine and Fishery Department, for the propagation of fish, no less than 700,000 spawn of salmon, and possibly it was worth while to the people of that locality to pay to the Department a small sum of $1,200 for the privilege of having fish put in their river. He had applied to the Department to have some spawn put in the river which intersected his county, but could not get them, owing to the impossibility of conveying them thither in safety. He did not consider the license charged fishermen in New Brunswick was excessive, considering the quantity of salmon caught in the Miramichi and Restigouche, and the large shipments made to the United States over the Intercolonial. If this tax on New Brunswick is intended to be continued, the county of Northumberland should not object to paying its share. The Province of Nova Scotia paid $1,700 annually for fishing privileges, of which the county of Yarmouth contributed nearly one-half, some $700. The latter county paid $10 for each fishing license, while in some parts of the Province brush weirs were built by the dozen and no license charged whatever; and in British Columbia those weirs were constructed and no license imposed. He would like to know whether one rule was to be adopted in one part of the Dominion and a contrary rule in another.

MR MITCHELL said the hon. member for Yarmouth had stated that privileges had been given to Miramichi which had not been given to his county in relation to fisheries, and referred to the amount expended on breeding establishments on Miramichi. The amount expended on fish-breeding in

New Brunswick was $1,388; in Nova Scotia, $3,803.

MR. KILLAM said that he had not complained of the expenditure in New Brunswick. He merely wished to remark that in Nova Scotia the fishermen were obliged to pay for the privilege of setting nets in front of their own premises, to the amount of some $1,700, and that in his county they paid one-half the revenue. While his hon. friend objected to the tax levied on the fishermen of Northumberland, he had as good reason to feel aggrieved at the amount levied on the fishermen of Yarmouth. He desired to know whether in all parts of the Dominion the same tax was levied on trust weirs and fish traps or pound nets.

MR. MITCHELL said that under the regulations established three years ago, no fish traps were allowed in the rivers of New Brunswick.

MR. KILLAM said none were put in the rivers of Nova Scotia.

MR. MITCHELL: No; but they were put in the bays. These traps were considered so destructive to fishing interests that they were prohibited except on special application, but his hon. friend's Province had, in this respect, special privileges, being allowed the use of those traps without special permission. The question was not as to more or less taxation, but whether New Brunswick had not privileges which were not possessed by other Provinces.

MR. KILLAM said he did not assert that the county of Northumberland had privileges to which it was not entitled. He did not consider that any improvement could be made on the present system pursued in the Marine and Fisheries Department.

MR. BUNSTER said he would call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the fact that there were no officers in British Columbia to settle disputes with respect to fisheries. There was no proper fish inspection. Through misrepresentation to the Minister of Marine, incompetent persons had been appointed to the work. He differed from the hon. member for New Westminster on the question of a tax, his opinion being that the fishermen would not mind paying a tax to have the fisheries properly looked after.

MR. PLUMB said there had been a great deal of complaint at Niagara among the fishermen, with reference to the regulations connected with the catching of whitefish. While recommending that the difficulties should be looked into, he would also suggest that steps should be taken to deal with that class of men who, though living on the American side, fish in Canadian waters during prohibited seasons. He also pointed out that shad had been taken for the first time in Lake Ontario. Shad was a very prolific fish, and would, no doubt, take the place of the whitefish, which were dying out.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH asked the hon. gentleman to communicate with his Department on the subject.

MR. PLUMB said he would do so.

MR. MITCHELL said he believed by a convention, which might be held by mutual agreement, arrangements might be made for the protection of fish in streams that were common to both the United States and Canada.

MR. DAVIES asked the hon. Minister that instructions should be given to stock the rivers of Prince Edward Island with some of the fry bred in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It is intended to deposit some young fry in the spring in Prince Edward Island.

Vote agreed to.

131. Maintenance and repairs of steamers for protection of fisheries..... $18,000

MR. LANGEVIN: Where is this steamer, the Lady-Head, now?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: She is at Halifax; and is to be soon sent to Quebec.

MR. LANGEVIN: Was she not required early in the spring at the Magdalen Islands?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: She will go on her first trip to the Magdalen Islands.

MR. BUNSTER.

MR. LANGEVIN: Is she to leave Halifax soon?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN: When?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I think within a week.

MR. LANGEVIN said he had in his possession letters which stated that the captain and crew of this vessel were now constantly engaged in electioneering in the county of L'Islet. He had no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not aware of this fact.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I never heard it before.

MR. LANGEVIN said that this was the case. In the meantime the fishery service was neglected. This officer and the crew should be on their ship and engaged in the protection of the fisheries. An improper use was being made of them. He called attention to this matter because he knew that it was yet time to give the necessary order to have them go on board their ship and attend to their duty.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he was not aware that the captain and crew were actively engaged in electioneering, though they had a right, he supposed, if they chose, to take part in the elections. He could assure the hon. gentleman that the movements of the Lady Head would in no respect be influenced by the elections. She never went out before the 1st of May, he believed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is an early season.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that the vessel would leave Halifax within a week.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Immediately after the 1st of May.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I think before.

MR. BLANCHET said that the expenses of the Lady Head were in 1875-6, $10,000; in 1876-7, $17,000, and in 1877-8, $20,000, while the rate now proposed was $18,000. He thought that this rate should be reduced to the figure of 1875, $10,000. He was not aware that she was repaired last year, or that she would require repairs next year.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that vessels and steamers every year required more or less repair, but they did not think that this vessel would require as much repair next year as this; consequently the vote was reduced from $20,000 to $18,000.

MR. BLANCHET: I do not see Commandant Lavoie's report for the summer before last, in the report of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It is in the supplement.

MR. BLANCHET: I have not seen his report for a number of years.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: You will see it in last year's report.

MR. BLANCHET said that Mr. Lavoie's salary was $1,400; nevertheless $448 were allowed him for disbursements. He did not think that this was necessary.

MR. CARON said he would like to know how the captain and crew were paid.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The captain has a yearly salary; he is under pay all the time, and also the engineers, but the crew are only paid from the time they go on board. The crew are not yet on board.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that this vessel ought now to be ready to go out and protect the fisheries. The captain who was under pay all the time, and who should now be looking after his vessel and its repairs, was electioneering for his uncle Mr. Letellier, in L'Islet county; this was the way in which this Department was managed.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: This Department is managed honestly.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not honest.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I say that the captain has nothing to do with the repairing of the vessel.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: She is being repaired at Halifax.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He ought to be there.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: He will be there as soon as he is required.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He ought to be required to be there now.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: This steamer never commences her trips before the 1st of May.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But she is fitted out before that.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The captain has really very little to do with the repairing of the vessel. It is proposed to make the first trip to the Magdalen Islands. The question as to the pending elections in the Province of Quebec will have no effect on her movements.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was now called to this matter. He would also mention that last spring, during the election in the county of Gaspé, this steamer was used for party purposes—to carry the Rouge candidate over to the Magdalen Islands. In fact, Commandant Lavoie was all the time acting as an electioneering agent all along the coast. This was the way in which this officer did his duty; he was electioneering on the coast, from the beginning to the end of the season, instead of protecting the fisheries, the duties for which he was paid. Mr. Lavoie was simply an electioneering agent. This officer should at once be sent about his duty, and should be now looking after his vessel. Either last year, or the year before, this vessel was behind time, and the fisheries were not properly protected. Letters, complaining that this was the case, had been sent up here. Mr. Lavoie was not paid to act as an electioneering agent.

MR. CASGRAIN said he knew Mr. Lavoie, who was a good and efficient officer, and who had done and was now perfectly performing his duty. He had not imagined that the right hon. gentleman would complain of one of his own nominees. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman now regarded this office in a different light, because he (Mr. Lavoie) had changed his politics. He (Mr. Casgrain) recollected that two employés of the late Government had worked hard against him in his own county, and they were not paid for this service.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You objected to it did you not ?

MR. CASGRAIN: I did not approve of it at the time. It was against me. I would not like to have public officers interfere in the elections in any county on either side. If Mr. Lavoie helped me I would like to have his assistance, but I would never ask for it.

MR. MITCHELL said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) was very ungenerous when he referred to the appointment of Mr. Lavoie, and attempted to create the impression that this officer had changed his politics since he was appointed. This was not the case. He (Mr. Mitchell) was responsible for this appointment, which was made while he sat in the Senate. It was at the special request of Mr. Letellier de St. Just, then a Senator, that he (Mr. Mitchell) induced his hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) to consent to this appointment. Mr. Letellier had mentioned the fact that Mr. Lavoie was not a Conservative, but he had said that he did not want to know what a man's politics were. He thought that these matters should be decided without reference to political matters. It was stated that Mr. Lavoie was a good and efficient medical officer, having some knowledge of the sea. He was recommended as a capable candidate, and it was at the special request of Mr. Letellier that he got the appointment, for which he had since received very little thanks. As far as he knew, Mr. Lavoie had performed his functions well, although he had frequently heard that this officer had taken a very warm interest against the party with which he (Mr. Mitchell) had been associated. It did not come with a good grace from the friends of Mr. Letellier and Mr. Lavoie, to make this charge. Mr. Lavoie's politics were well known to be Rouge at the time of his appointment, as the hon. member for Charlevoix knows. Perhaps it would have been just as well if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) had not taunted the right hon. member for Kingston with finding fault with one of his nominees.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he thought he could contradict the statement that the Lady Head had been used for political purposes last year, at the election in Gaspé county. He recollected distinctly that the facts were as follows: this vessel was going to the Magdalen Islands, and application was made to know whether Mr. Flynn could pass over to the island in her. He had telegraphed to say that this could be done, and also that Dr. Fortin, Mr. Flynn's opponent, should have the same privilege. He had directed the captain to communicate this to Dr. Fortin, and this was all he knew about the matter.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was informed at the time, on good authority, that the vessel was not going to the Magdalen Islands on public business, but that she went there merely to serve the interests of Mr. Flynn. When Dr. Fortin was invited to go also, it was well known that he could not comply; and, in fact, he had not gone in this vessel.

MR. MACKENZIE said that application was made to learn whether the vessel could be delayed, which was refused. Permission was given Mr. Flynn to visit the Magdalen Islands simply because there were no possible means of getting over to the Islands from the place where Mr. Flynn was, unless a stray vessel proceeded in that direction. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) was, therefore, quite incorrect in his statement. If hon. gentlemen opposite wished to raise a discussion about the use of vessels for political purposes, he dared say that they could meet the case of these hon. gentlemen.

MR. LANGEVIN said that this line of argument would not do. They had the case before them, and it should be discussed. There was no need of throwing out threats about other cases. They held that this was an improper use of public money.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had a perfect recollection of the telegram being received, asking permission to take a passage in the vessel, and permission was given on condition that the vessel should not be delayed. As the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries had further explained, the same privilege was given to Mr. Flynn. These were the sole facts of the case; so far as the Government were aware, the vessel had not been used for political purposes, nor in the interest of any candidate.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would telegraph to his informant, and submit to the House what detailed information he might obtain. But he would repeat, that the officer to whom he had referred was certainly using his influence and his Government position for party purposes. He was an electioneering agent, and if his (Mr. Langevin's) hon. friend from Gaspé was present, he would corroborate this statement.

MR. MITCHELL said that, during the time he administered the affairs of the Marine and Fisheries Department, no vessels were used for political purposes.

132. Fish-breeding, Fishways and Oyster Beds..... $16,000

MR. MCKAY said he wished to draw the attention of the Government to an oyster-bed in his neighbourhood, which was leased ten or eleven years ago, on the understanding that the party holding the lease (which extends over 21 years) was to use it for the cultivation of oysters. Now, the person who held the lease of the oyster-bed had made no use of it whatever; not a dollar had been spent on it, nor a bushel of oysters taken from it. Formerly, the farmers of the locality used the mussel mud collected there for the purpose of fertilizing their lands, but they were now prevented from doing so. He had been in correspondence with the Department during the last five years on the subject, but nothing had been done, though the reports of the overseers and inspectors who had examined the oyster-bed corroborated his statements. The farmers of Prince Edward Island were allowed to take mussel-mud without any restriction whatever; and not only so, but large quantities of it were forwarded by the cars to great distances inland. He thought, therefore, the Government should cancel the lease in question, and that the farmers in Nova Scotia should be permitted to take what mussel-mud they required for the fertilization of their lands.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he had given a good deal of consideration to this subject, but he could not see his way to cancel the lease. The Government of Nova Scotia would require to be approached in the matter before anything could be done.

MR. MCKAY said he would ask the Government to allow farmers to take mud for the enriching of their lands.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was a matter with which the Government had nothing to do.

MR. LANGEVIN asked whether any new artificial oyster-beds had been made.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he believed there was one in Prince Edward Island.

MR. MITCHELL said the oyster bed in question had been a great success, and their oysters had, during the last two or three years, driven American oysters out of the market, between the months of September and June when they could be obtained. He regretted to say that the Caraquette oyster-beds seemed to be used up, and he would ask Mr. Speaker if he could give some reason therefor.

MR. SPEAKER said Caraquette oysters were sent to Montreal and elsewhere as formerly, though only at a certain season.

MR. MITCHELL said they had become so small that they were really of no commercial value.

MR. SPEAKER said he could only recommend, as he had formerly done, that portions of the Caraquette oyster-beds should be set aside as a reserve for future years. To clear them altogether would be to deprive a number of poor people of a means of subsistence, but they might be preserved in the way he had indicated. He believed as many as 19 or 20 schooner loads had sometimes left Caraquette towards the close of the season.

MR. MITCHELL said foreign schooners came in there and took away oysters indiscriminately, without any authority or permit to do so.

MR. SPEAKER said he believed, on the contrary, that the people in the neighbourhood sold them at a cheap rate to the schooners.

MR. COSTIGAN said it would be a great boon if a fish-pass was erected in the river St. John. It might be urged that the Grand Falls might prove a serious obstacle, but to this he would reply that a channel had been already blasted out there for another purpose, and that by an expenditure of from $1,000 to $2,000 a perfect fish-pass could be obtained. Another matter to which he would refer, was a claim made by a man named Violet, who, about four years ago, was shot by an official in the employ of the Government, for an alleged trespass. This poor man had been obliged to sell land, home and furniture, to pay doctors' bills, and the fact that the Government still retained the person, who committed the act, in their employment, was a sufficient reason why the claim should be preferred against them. When the matter was formerly before the House the justice of the claim was admitted by members on both sides; he would like to know whether the hon. Minister had made up his mind on the subject.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the Government saw no reason to alter their decision. The case might be a very hard one, but he wondered that the officer had not been charged with a criminal offence if he was culpable.

MR. COSTIGAN said that if the case was such that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries recommended criminal proceedings against this officer, the Government certainly ought not to retain him in their employment.

MR. MITCHELL wished to know on whose recommendation changes in the fishery regulations had been made in his county.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the changes had been made in compliance with a numerous signed petition, which he had no objection to submit to the hon. gentleman.

XVI. SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTIONS.

133. Observatory Quebec.....$2,400

MR. MITCHELL said it was very extraordinary that in this Department the superannuation tax should be paid by the Government instead of the officers.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It is always paid, I understand.

MR. MITCHELL: It was not paid in my time.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I believe it is deducted from the officers' salary, but I will make enquiries.

Vote agreed to.

134. Observatory, Toronto..... $4,800

MR. MITCHELL: There is the same objection in this item. If it is found that this superannuation tax is paid out of the Public Treasury, I think the officers in other Departments should be placed on the same footing.

Vote agreed to.

135. Observatory, Kingston.....	$500
136. do Montreal.....	500
137. do New Brunswick	850
138. Grant for Meteorological Observatories, including instruments and cost of telegraphing weather-warnings .....	37,000

MR. LANGEVIN said that he considered this was $37,000 for a very small thing, and he should like to know the practical benefit to the country.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the service had been of great public service in giving indications of coming storms; and, as to the cost, it was certainly a large sum, but he was pressed constantly for more money for this service.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was glad that the hon. Minister had not conceded a larger amount this year, and would suggest that an attempt be made at reduction.

MR. MITCHELL said he believed the service, when in proper working order and properly conducted, would be of great benefit to this country. He believed that to the maritime interests, to say nothing of the farming interest, it would be of great service. The United States service, on which this had been modelled, required a vote of something like $70,000 annually; and, in addition, there was a charge for the telegraph branch of the army. He was responsible for establishing this service in the country, merely as an experiment, and, of course, it would take some time to render it efficient. In England and the United States no ship would go to sea without consulting these reports as to the probable storms, and sometimes a vessel would put back for a day or two in consequence of them. He believed this was a service to be encouraged. He held in his hand a letter from the head of the University of New Brunswick, in which he complained of the great injustice that was being done the college, by paying the amount of appropriation to an individual, instead of to the college itself. He (Mr. Mitchell) wished to know why the change had been made.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I recollect something of the correspondence, but not the terms of it. I will look into the matter.

MR. MITCHELL asked why the telegraph line, for which appropriation had been made last year, had not been built.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the amount appropriated, $10,000, had not been sufficient. The Montreal Telegraph Company had refused to build the line for that amount. It was proposed this year to vote an additional $5,000, which, with the former appropriation, would suffice.

MR. MITCHELL said the Committee had prepared last year, or the previous year, a valuable report recommending telegraph lines to be built to certain points, which would benefit the principal ports. In his own report, it was recommended that Point Escuminac, a fog-signal point, should have telegraphic communication with Chatham, about fifteen miles distant. This would prove of great service to vessels in distress. A sum should be appropriated for this purpose out of the additional $5,000.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the Government would try to get value for their money.

MR. MITCHELL said he could get nothing done for his county.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that was owing to the fact that so much had been done for the hon. member's county already.

Vote agreed to.

XVII. MARINE HOSPITALS FOR SICK AND DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

139. Marine and Emigrant Hospital of Quebec..... $20,000

MR. MITCHELL said reforms had been promised in this item for several years. Had the hon. Minister equalized the cost of the patients and made the city of Quebec pay its share of the expense?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said no change had been made.

MR. MITCHELL said the Report showed that 11,000 seamen, 502 emigrants, and 12,412 residents had been treated in the hospital; thus, over one-half were residents. The amount subscribed by Quebec, he believed, was only $5,000, utterly out of proportion to the number of patients from that city.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the Government had been obliged to reduce the amount to $2,000.

MR. MITCHELL said the late Government obtained $4,000. The last year they were in power, he, as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, opened a correspondence with the Quebec Government, on the recommendation of the hon. the First Minister, who had complained of this Government sustaining the sick and disabled of the city of Quebec at the expense of the whole Dominion, with a view to obtaining an increased amount. While the hospital cost $20,000, Quebec only subscribed $4,000. That correspondence had been going on when he left office. Yet, in place of getting a proportionate allowance from Quebec, about $11,000, the Government had reduced the amount.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The Quebec Government refused. It is a very hard case, but it is almost impossible to make a change.

MR. BLANCHET said the hospital was supported by dues collected from the shipping, which amounted to $15,723, and the total amount collected in the Province of Quebec was a little over $19,000. The excess was, therefore, but $300. True, there was a disproportion between the number of mariners and residents attended and the amounts paid by each, but that could not be helped. Were an epidemic to occur, the balance would be greatly in favour of the seamen. There was cause for congratulation that so few accidents had occurred and such a small amount of sickness had existed among the seamen frequenting the port of Quebec.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. member thought the country ought to be congratulated, because $20,000 had been collected for the sick seamen's fund, and that more than one-half of it had been expended on the residents of Quebec. This money had been collected from seamen to attend to their sick, and should be used for that purpose alone. This was an abuse of a public trust, and Parliament should not allow it to continue. If the Quebec Government refused to pay their pro rata share of the expense, the seamen's dues should be reduced as they had been before, since Confederation, and the residents of Quebec refused admission.

MR. BLANCHET said the hon. gentleman had been in power many years and had not been able to reform the system. In the Estimates of 1873-4, the appropriation asked was $24,000. Now, the amount asked was $20,000, and the staff in charge of the Administration was exactly the same. No institution in the country was conducted more economically than the Marine Hospital at Quebec. Were his hon. friend to return to power, he would not be able to change the system.

MR. LANGEVIN said there were nine medical men on the staff who were paid £300, amounting, on an average, to about $400 each.

MR. MITCHELL said he trusted the Minister of Marine would endeavour to impress upon the Government of Quebec their duty to pay, at least, the $1,000 this Government used to get out of them, towards a general hospital for sailors. He found, by the Estimates, that $373 were paid for the insurance of this building. He understood that it was the policy of the Dominion Government not to insure their buildings. If they were going to insure, this should be done generally.

MR. CARON said he thought it would be very poor policy on the part of the Government to close this hospital up during winter, as it must be heated to prevent the building from being damaged; also, that the city of Quebec should pay a certain sum of money proportionate to the use made by the people of this institution for its maintenance, and it was a matter fairly open to discussion, whether the amount now paid should remain as it was or be increased. It was, however, not fair to ask the public of Quebec, who could do without this hospital, to pay as much as the mariners towards the keeping up of this institution. He protested energetically against the latter being called upon to pay the same as the mariners, for whom this establishment was maintained. He believed that the use of it for the benefit of the few sick who went to it from the city, did not increase its expenses. As far as salaries were concerned, if all the staffs were placed on an economical footing, no complaint would be made. The gentlemen who attended it were very able, and their salaries were very small indeed. He did not see that, in fairness or justice, these could be reduced. Between $2,000 and $4,000 would be a fair sum to pay for the services the city expected to obtain from this institution.

MR. MITCHELL said that this hospital was used by the city of Quebec at all seasons of the year. He thought that it was unjust to tax the seamen for the support of an institution from which the people of Quebec obtained a much larger share of benefit than they themselves did.

MR. LANGEVIN said that this question was discussed some years ago, when it was found that this sum, with a small reduction, would be required even if no patients from the city were sent to the hospital. If he remembered right, the vote was then $24,000, though it was now reduced to $20,000. He did not think it would be unfair to ask the Quebec Government to pay $4,000. Even if no city patients were admitted, this hospital would cost from $15,000 to $16,000 a year.

MR. LANGEVIN: Where can we find the number of the patients that were treated in these hospitals—in the Halifax General Hospital and in the other hospitals.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: In Halifax, we have an arrangement similar to that in force in Montreal, to pay so much a day.

MR. LANGEVIN: How much?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: We cannot tell precisely. Some years it is more, and some less. The number is not given.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would suggest that, in future, these reports should give the number of patients admitted into these hospitals; the number of days they remain, the diseases with which they were attacked, the cost per head, etc., as these statistics would become important. They could then make comparisons in these regards.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: In Halifax we pay $5 per week per patient. I can get the information my hon. friend desires on the points mentioned.

MR. MITCHELL said that great discrepancies in the charges existed; in Montreal, 90c. a day were paid; in Halifax, 71c. and a fraction; in Miramichi, 40c., and in St. Andrews, $1.50 a week. He admitted that the charges were not more regular under his administration; but, nevertheless, it would be well to have these matters looked into.

149. Expenses in connection with the inspection of Insurance Companies.....	6,000

MR. TUPPER asked the Minister of Finance whether he had given further consideration to the question discussed last Session, as to the propriety of adopting a system of Governmental life insurance

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the matter had received considerable attention, and it was not deemed expedient, having regard to the extremely distressed condition of the country, to adopt the principle in the meantime. Besides, the Government had not been able to obtain as much information as they thought desirable.

MR. LANGEVIN said that while the House was asked to vote this $6,000, under the Statute 38 Victoria, chap. 20, section 23, the salary of the inspector of insurance was added, making altogether $10,000. Last year, however, the expenditure only reached $7,512.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it would be noticed that the salary of one clerk was only paid for three months, and, if other items were taken into consideration, it would be found that the actual expenditure would amount to $8,200 or $8,300. The expenditure for printing this year might also be larger, as the reports would be much more voluminous than in former years. He did not propose to expend a penny more than was required, but it must be recollected that, since 1876-7, the work had greatly increased, in consequence of a great many more insurance offices being brought under the operation of the Act. He was not prepared to say the exact figure required, but his impression was that it would be something over $9,000, and, as it was inconvenient to be taking supplementary votes, he proposed that the item should be allowed to stand as placed on the Estimates; and if, next year, it was found to be materially less than $10,000, it could be reduced.

MR. MITCHELL asked if it was a fact that several foreign companies had given notice to withdraw their deposits?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said such was the case, but they could not withdraw till they had satisfied the claims of Canadian holders.

MR. LANGEVIN said that if a larger sum than was necessary was voted there would be a tendency on the part of the officers to spend more than they actually required.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that though $10,000 were voted in 1876-7, the Department were not induced to expend that sum. He would, however, look into the matter before concurrence, and if he found that the gentleman's suggestions were practicable he would adopt them.

MR. PLUMB said that with respect to the inspection of these insurance companies, he would like to ask whether the Government took the responsibility of sending out officers to inspect these companies, and in what manner was the inspection carried on.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the Inspector visited all these companies once a year, and sometimes oftener, and made an examination into their condition. They were also obliged to return him a detailed statement of their affairs, and the Government possessed power to demand further information if they were of opinion that the information supplied was not sufficiently full. This was the present mode, and, he might add, that it had been productive of beneficial effect; several companies that probably would have gone on and become hopelessly insolvent, had been induced to put themselves into a solvent state or to discontinue the business. The work was done by the officers of the Department, and at present it had not been necessary to call in other assistance, although it might be necessary under certain circumstances.

MR. MITCHELL said he had to complain each year that there was a company at St. Catharines which extended its operations all over the country, in all cases refusing to pay its claims. It sheltered itself under the plea that they had received a charter from the Parliament of Ontario, and, therefore, the parties who had effected insurances had no hold upon them. The company admitted claims against them, but refused to pay.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the power the Government had over these companies was in refusing the license. In the present case all the Government could do was to notify the company that they must cease doing business in the way they were doing. He believed it was notified by the Minister of Justice to cease operations. It was his opinion that parties would have a good ground of action against the company for obtaining money by false pretences.

XXI. GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

150. Geological Survey..... $50,000

MR. LANGEVIN said that $6,050 was a large amount for maps and reports. Perhaps the hon. Minister would state the number of these maps that were published, where published, and how they were distributed.

MR. MILLS said they were now printed at Montreal; each member of the House received two copies, and sometimes more. He believed 4,000 were printed, but he would bring down the whole details of the information asked for.

MR. CURRIER asked what arrangements had been made for removing the geological museum to Ottawa. It was said last year, that arrangements were about being made for its removal.

MR. MILLS said it would require the expenditure of a very considerable sum to furnish a proper museum, before that branch of the Department of the Interior could be transferred from Montreal to Ottawa, and, until a proper building had been erected here, no steps could be taken. It would, certainly, be more convenient if located in Ottawa. In Montreal, they were paying $1,000 per annum for rent, and this sum, if capitalized, would be something towards the expense of the new erection.

MR. LANGEVIN said they were called on to vote $50,000 for geological surveys, without having any report from the Geological Department as to the way in which the money had been expended, or what progress had been made.

MR. MILLS said the report was prepared, and would shortly be published.

MR. TUPPER said this was the first time the House had been asked to vote money in advance of having a report.

MR. MILLS: It has always been the case in this item.

MR. TUPPER said he was quite satisfied that the report was, at any rate, furnished during the Session. In the absence of a report, the Minister of the Interior ought to favour the House with an outline of what had been accomplished. It might be extremely convenient to the Government to pay $6,000 or $7,000 per year to a partizan printing company, the Herald Publishing Company of Montreal, to publish this report, but the public would feel more assured that justice was being done to the revenue of the country if the work had to be let out by contract in the usual way. The House should not be called on to vote this money without having an explanation from the hon. the Minister of the Interior, as to the amount of work done, and how the money had been expended.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman would find in his report the information he now asked for, giving the districts in which geological explorations were carried on, the general outlays, and the work done up to the beginning of the winter. There was the work of explorations done in British Columbia by two exploring parties; the exploration of the phosphate regions about Ottawa, the coal regions of Cumberland and St. John, Quebec, and the copper mines in that Province. A full and complete detail in regard to these explorations would be given in the report. The report was being published at the contract price paid previously to Dawson, publisher in Montreal.

MR. BOWELL said the work could be done cheaper in Ottawa. The reason given for having the printing done in Montreal was, that it would be more convenient for the Geological Department in having the proofs examined, but there could be no difficulty in sending the proofs to Montreal. He did not see why the hon. member for Cumberland should find fault with the Government for having this work done by a partizan newspaper establishment. If there was any truth in public rumour, there were members in the Cabinet interested in that establishment. It was known a venerable Senator was interested in it, and it was necessary, for party purposes, that those devices should be adopted to prevent those difficulties occurring to the Herald Company which had occurred to another Government organ. The probabilities were, that the sums paid to the different printing offices throughout Quebec, especially the Montreal Herald Company, were much larger than it was found necessary to pay in the city of Ottawa; but, until the accounts were before the House, it was impossible to say. Judging, however, from the past, and from the evidence of the Postmaster-General, he thought they would be justified in drawing the inference that the amount paid for printing the Geological Report was much larger than it would have been if the work had been done in this city. The Minister of the Interior shook his head, but until he had seen the account, he (Mr. Bowell) questioned whether he was in a position to give a negative. He supposed this system would be carried on, however, until some action was taken in Parliament to expose the action of the Government in subsidizing their partizan press, and allowing money to be paid to institutions in which members of the Ministry had large interests. That might not be true; but if so, it would be well for the Minister of the Interior to say that none of his colleagues had any connection with the Montreal Herald Company.

MR. MITCHELL: They cannot say that, because we know to the contrary.

MR. MILLS said he did not know anything about the matter. His deputy had called his attention to the fact that the Geological Report had been printed at the Herald office, and at a rather lower rate than it was done by Dawson or Lovell, and this year it had been printed at the same place. The Geological Report had always been printed with more care and on better material than the reports of the public departments; and Professor Selwyn, who was in charge of this branch, had insisted on its being done in Montreal, because it was impossible to get the scientific or technical portion of the work done in Ottawa, and to keep a person here constantly to revise the proofs, would have added to the expense.

MR. MITCHELL said he was surprised that the hon. gentleman should admit that one of his servants had dictated to him where certain printing should be done. The work had not been let in the proper manner, but had been given to a company in which a Minister of the Crown had been, and he believed still was, interested. He supposed it was for having objected to this, that he (Mr. Mitchell) had been served up with a column of criticism, tinged with abuse, in the columns of the Herald. He did not see why they should abuse him. The general manager of that paper was a particular friend of his, but when he received a quid pro quo, he supposed he had to do the abuse. There was one gratification when the press attacked members—they could have a little shy at them from their places in Parliament. If the Minister had advertized for tenders, he would have had this work done for a great deal less than either Mr. Dawson or the

MR. BOWELL.

Herald Company had done it for, owing to the general depreciation of the prices of all kinds of work.

MR. BOWELL said he knew this report was usually printed in better style than others, but surely that could be done in Ottawa as well as in Montreal. They had the Finance Minister's Budget Speech printed on gilt-edged tinted paper, with nice bronzed covers, and costing a good deal.

MR. MITCHELL: The country does not pay for it.

MR. BOWELL said the country did pay for it, and it was one of those jobs that ought to be put an end to. In 1874, it cost $590.55; in 1875, $433.65; in 1876, $1,330.75; in 1877, $755.72. He had been unable to get the return of the number of copies printed in each year; but in 1877 the number of copies was 12,240, and if that cost $755, they could calculate what number must have been printed for $1,330 the year before. In these four years no less than $3,100 had been paid out of the funds of the country for the printing of Budget speeches.

MR. POPE (Compton) What was done with them?

MR. BOWELL said no doubt they were used to enlighten the benighted electors of the county of Carleton. He did not know who distributed them, but if his information was correct they were sent out as electioneering pamphlets to convert the people generally to the views of the Government. The work was given to favourite offices, which charged what they pleased for the publication. They were not taken from the Hansard report or done by the Parliamentary Printer under the contract, as, if necessary, it should be done. It was given to such newspapers in Ottawa as supported the Government and abused the Opposition. If his hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), abused stockholders in newspapers who sat on the Ministerial benches, he must expect abuse from their papers in return.

MR. MILLS: I do not know of any stockholders here.

MR. BOWELL said it might be true that there were not, but he should be glad to know if every other Minister could state the same and tell the truth.

MR. MACKENZIE: I can, for one.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was sure the hon. gentleman would be gratified to learn that he was not a stockholder in the Montreal Herald. He should not be at all ashamed if he were a proprietor of that paper, but he was not now and never had been. He had held some stock in the Herald in trust, but he had supposed that his private affairs belonged to himself, and he had never taken the trouble to contradict the rumour which had been repeated in the House to-night. He took the present opportunity, however, to say for himself that he was not a stockholder, and he believed no member of the Government was a stockholder in the Montreal Herald.

MR. LAFLAMME said that as he might have been suspected and pointed at by the gentle insinuation of the hon. member, he could say, also, that he had had no interest in that paper since he became a Minister.

MR. MITCHELL said he had always understood that the Postmaster-General was a member of the company which bought out the original company, and was a stockholder. He had never heard that he had held the stock in trust. He was gratified to learn that the hon. gentleman was free from the imputation of deriving benefit of doing the printing of the Geological Department. He had also heard that the Minister of Justice was once a stockholder. He did not blame them. He should like to be one himself. It was a well-managed concern, had a large commercial patronage, and he had no doubt a large Government patronage. As a partizan paper it was unsurpassed—except by the Globe.

MR. BOWELL said he thought the Postmaster-General should be thankful for the opportunity of setting himself right in this matter. While he agreed with him that no one had a right to interfere in his private business, it ceased to be a private business if a Minister of the State was interested in any establishment upon which the Government were bestowing their patronage, and from which a large profit was derived. There were businesses in which a Minister of the State might be interested, into which the House had no right to inquire, but the House had a right to enquire into the truth of such a rumour as this. The Minister of Justice should also be thankful that he was able to correct the false impression that was abroad. It was known that after the last Session of Parliament one Minister had been obliged to resign his seat, because he was connected with just such transactions, and the result was that he was rejected by the people.

In answer to MR. DOMVILLE,

MR. MILLS said that they did not expect to carry on any geological explorations in the Icelandic district this Session.

MR. MITCHELL said he was handed a memorandum by the hon. member for North Hastings, which showed that the cost of printing the Budget Speech in 1874-5, 1876-7, amounted to a total of $3,110.91, but he could not believe that this statement was correct. In 1875, $433.15; 1876, $1,331.35; and 1877, $750.92.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the hon. gentleman was out of order.

MR. MITCHELL said he could not believe that the Government had squandered over $3,000 in publishing financial speeches. He would refer to this matter at another time.

MR. LANGEVIN said that a number of advances were mentioned. He wished to know how and why these were made.

MR. MILLS said that these advances were made to these gentlemen when they went out on exploring expeditions. They must all go to their respective fields for the current year before the 1st of July, and the advances had to be made on that account.

MR. MITCHELL asked, why the Government should insist on this work being done at Montreal, when it could be performed much cheaper at Ottawa? The only reason given was that the Department would be more immediately under the superintendence of the officer at Montreal; but why not, as was suggested last year, remove that Department from Montreal? He would also like some information as to a charge made in connection with organic remains.

MR. MILLS said he must refer the hon. gentleman to page 37 of his report for information as to the work performed by Mr. Whiteheaves, who was preparing a work on the palæontology of the country, illustrative of the organic remains to be found in the various geological strata of Canada, particularly of British Columbia.

MR. MITCHELL said he noticed that a charge of $3,942 was made for sending down specimens to the Philadelphia Exhibition, and he considered that the sum set down was enormous.

MR. MILLS said he believed the entire cost amounted to nearly $10,000.

MR. BUNSTER said that notwithstanding the amount of money devoted to geological surveys, British Columbia was in this respect totally neglected. He felt sure that if the Dominion Government would pay more attention to the Province, the influx of population would more than compensate for the outlay. Some gold fields had lately been discovered in British Columbia, and the necessity for geological surveys became more urgent.

MR. MILLS said the expenditure for these surveys was larger in British Columbia than in any other Province.

MR. DOMVILLE said New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were comparatively neglected. There were some very valuable seams of coal to be found in these Provinces, and instructions should be given to the geologists in the service of the Government to make exploratory excursions there.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said that when the geological formation of a country was settled, it became the duty of private individuals, and not of the Government, to explore and develop the mineral resources.

MR. MILLS: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER said that, but for the "hear, hear" of the hon. Minister of the Interior in reference to the statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton, he should not have spoken. He joined issue with the hon. member for Cape Breton. He believed Parliament did not spend this money for the purpose of elucidating certain theories with reference to the geological formation, but for the purpose of enriching the country by carrying these explorations to a practical issue, and showing the mineral wealth of the country. Take, for instance, the anthracite coal in New Brunswick; who was more interested than the Government in bringing scientific information to bear upon it, so as to secure as far as possible the valuable results which would flow from the working of those mines, which would not only be of benefit to the locality, but would increase the trade and revenue of the country? Look, too, at the mineral region of Spring Hill; those mines had resulted, not only to the advantage of the parties who had speculated in connection with these mines, but of enormous practical benefit to the Government and to the country. At this moment the Intercolonial Railway was being worked at a great saving per annum, in consequence of these mines. In the same way, wherever the Government had it in their power, by sending Mr. Selwyn and the staff under him, to assist in the development and exploration of those sections of the country where valuable minerals were supposed to lie, this would not only pay the money expended, but would benefit the country a hundred-fold.

MR. BLANCHET said that if the exploration of the country was left in the hands of private individuals, very little progress would be made, and very little information be obtained of the natural resources of Canada. He was strongly in favour of the museum and matters relating to geology being removed to Ottawa. He saw that nearly $2,000 was spent in Montreal for rent and taxes, and $563 for fuel every year, and the interest on that sum, capitalized, would be nearly sufficient to erect a building and all the necessary accessories.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he would repeat that it was not the duty of the Government to do anything more than to mark out a certain district, showing its geological formation; but it was not the duty of the Government to explore or examine a seam of anthracite coal as to its thickness and extent. This was more a matter for private enterprise.

MR. DAVIES said he agreed with the hon. member for Cape Breton, and thought private enterprise was all that was required. He really thought the Government could not be expected to do more than to prepare a geological survey.

MR. PLUMB said he was astonished that the hon. member for Cape Breton should make such a statement. It was his opinion that it was the duty of the Government to, as far as possible, discover the hidden resources of the country for practical business purposes, and to encourage speculation in the development of those resources.

MR. DAVIES said he did not think it was the duty of the Government to sink shafts in search for metals.

Vote agreed to.

XII.—INDIANS.

151. For Indians of Quebec..... $2,200

MR. BOWELL said, before the item of $2,200 for Indians of Quebec was passed, he desired to call attention to the fact that there was no report from the agent of the Lake of Two Mountains tribes of Indians in the report of the Minister of the Interior. Why was this? He understood the Government had an agent at Oka, and that he had made a report upon the state of these Indians. It would also be well to have a statement from the Minister of the Interior as to the progress of the suit which had been entered to test the legal rights of the Oka Indians in that locality.

MR. MILLS said the Government had no fund specially applying to the Oka Indians. The Seignior of Two Mountains had been claimed by the Indians as their property, which claim was resisted by the gentlemen of the Seminary. That had been a matter of dispute for several years. When the hon. member for Charlevoix was Secretary of the Provinces, he made a report on the subject. He (Mr. Mills) thought there had been an Order-in-Council passed affirming that the title to the Seignior was legally vested in the Seminary. Since then a number of gentlemen had interested themselves on behalf of the Indians, and insisted on saying that the property belonged to the Indians, and was held by the gentlemen of the Seminary simply as trustees. Considerable feeling existed on the subject, and difficulties arose last summer. A number of the Indians had been arrested for cutting fences and other timber on what they claimed to be their property, but which the Seminary claimed to be theirs. A good deal of ill feeling was engendered, property was destroyed, and criminal actions were taken out in consequence, and the Department having charge over the entire Indian population, under the British North American Act, sent a person there to reside upon the land and report upon the subject, to advise the Indians and endeavour to smoothe over the difficulties as far as possible, and prevent the Indians from breaking the law. That agent, a young man named McGurr, formerly a resident of this city, was still there. He had not been sent to make any special report on the subject. That was a matter upon which the Department sought the advice of the Department of Justice. No special report was made by this agent, but the Department received letters from him from time to time in regard to the matter.

MR. BOWELL said the public understood that a report had been made on the subject. It seemed to him, after what had taken place, that the Government which, as the hon. the Minister of the Interior admitted, had a general supervision over all Indian tribes imposed on it under the Confederation Act, and also imposed on the old Parliament of Canada by the Imperial Government, should not have allowed these difficulties to have been carried to excess. He had put the question last Parliament, as to the course to be pursued by the Government in order to test the rights of the Indians in that locality in the courts of law, and he had been informed that the Government still intended to advance the money in order to contest these rights. It had been reported that a snap verdict had been obtained, either through the neglect of the lawyer for the Indians or by sharp practice upon the part of their opponents. It had also been charged that this question had been used for political purposes. On these points, however, he gave no opinion; but what position had the Government taken in this matter? It seemed to him that the Government had been remiss in its duty in not pushing this point to an issue in order to settle, beyond doubt, the rights of the Indians in that locality. He had read with great care the report of the hon. member for Charlevoix on this subject, which was accepted as exhaustive by his successor, who refused to reopen the question, and could not fail concluding that while the gentlemen of the Seminary had rights to the soil, and, perhaps, the fee simple in it, there were reservations in all the deeds granted and in the Act affirming their title, and certain duties imposed on them towards these Indians. The difficulties which had arisen out of this dispute between the Seminary and the Indians should have impelled the Government to effect a settlement and prevent their recurrence in future. He might be wrong in his inference, but from his reading of the law and of the report of the hon. member for Charlevoix, he could but draw the conclusion that there were certain duties imposed upon the Government in connection with these matters, and also upon the gentlemen of the Seminary by the deed of cession and subsequent legislation, which should be faithfully fulfilled.

MR. MILLS: What are those duties?

MR. BOWELL said it was unnecessary for him to point out those duties. If the hon. Minister was prepared to state that no duties devolved on the Government, and that the Indians had no rights, then the position of the Government would be known. If the Indians had no rights, or supposed rights, the Government should not have advanced money to test their legality in courts of law.

MR. MILLS said he had not understood to what the hon. gentleman alluded in many of his observations.

MR. BOWELL.

The duties imposed on the Seminary were wholly spiritual. There was not a single provision that they should feed and clothe the Indians and provide places of residence. If there was a trust imposed upon the gentlemen of the Seminary, it was one over which the Government of Canada had no control whatever. If any Government had any control over the matter, it would be the Government of Quebec. He admitted, if the Indian had a right to the property, that right should be protected. That was the only matter with which this Government had any concern. Certain gentlemen of Montreal held very strongly to the opinion that the Indians had certain legal and equitable rights in this property, and that these rights were capable of being successively maintained in courts of law. His predecessor, upon the advice of the Minister of Justice, had said to these parties, if you will select a favourable base to ascertain whether the Indians have any title, the Department will pay the expense. Those gentlemen engaged a legal gentleman of Montreal to test these rights. They selected the strongest case they could. The matter was deferred from time to time, and when the case came for trial, they failed to put in an appearance, and judgment went against them by default. So far as he knew, matters still stood precisely in that position. He was not going to say to-night whether these opinions were well or ill-founded, but the hon. member for Hastings would agree with him that if the Department, after taking the best possible legal advice, were informed that the rights of the Indians could not be successfully maintained in law, the best mode of acting would be to obtain a compromise with the Seminary. If the matter were brought before a court of law, and it was held that the Indians had no rights whatever on the soil, it would be impossible to obtain any compensation from the Seminary, for the rights the Indians would be supposed to have. The Government were acting on behalf of the Indians in the way they believed to be the most consonant with their interests. All they could do was to seek to allay the irritation as soon as possible, and await a favourable opportunity for a complete settlement of the question.

MR. BOWELL: Is the Government still furnishing any money to carry on this contest?

MR. MILLS: I do not think we have ever furnished any money. Since I have been in office, we have never furnished a cent.

MR. BOWELL: Mr. Laird, in a letter to the Imperial Government, stated that a certain amount of money was furnished to contest the rights of the Indians in that locality.

MR. MILLS: That has not been proceeded with.

MR. BOWELL: It was proceeded with, and judgment was given against the Indians, in consequence of their lawyer failing to file a proceeding. Then there was a re-hearing.

MR. MACKENZIE: The re-hearing is the part that has not been proceeded with.

MR. BOWELL: Why not?

MR. MACKENZIE said the Indians were governed entirely by some self-constituted committee in Montreal, and their movements were, apparently, altogether guided by them. He had informed the Chiefs themselves that the expenses of the appeal would be paid by the Government, but it was impossible to take the matter out of their own hands, when they, themselves, placed it in the hands of this committee in Montreal.

MR. BOWELL: Was this original amount paid at all?

MR. MILLS: About $100.

MR. BOWELL said a stop should be put to the political purposes to which this case was being directed, and the sooner the Government did this the better.

MR. MACKENZIE said if the matter were left with the Government entirely, it would soon be settled.

MR. BOWELL said he understood, from the explanations of the Minister of the Interior, that the Indians had no rights in the land either of a spiritual or educational character.

MR. MILLS: I did not say that.

MR. BOWELL: They had rights in the past. Why have they not now?

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman is referring to the question of abstract justice, which may be entirely different from the right of property. The Government could not control the action of private persons in the matter.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was at the head of the Department of State when this matter came up for the first time; and he was sorry to say that the whole trouble between the Indians and the Seminary had arisen from a conversation between some of the Indians and the late Mr. Spragge, the head of the Indian Department at that time. Mr. Spragge thought, no doubt conscientiously, that the Indians had some right to the Seignior, and he mentioned that to some of them. The claim came before the Department, and he (Mr. Langevin) was called upon to report upon it to the Governor in Council. That case had given him more trouble than any 20 cases in the Department. After going into the whole subject he reported, and his report was referred to the Minister of Justice, and was sanctioned by the Law Officer of the Crown, and afterwards assented to by the Governor in Council. He had not changed his opinion since, and he had no doubt that if the Indians had not been ill-advised, he could have made a settlement between them and the Seminary of Montreal. But when the gentlemen of the Seminary found their title attacked, and law suits threatened, they said: "Don't let our title be attacked, and we will hear any proposals made to us;" and he (Mr. Langevin) knew that they were disposed to give the Indians a liberal settlement. It was true the Indians were under the care of the Government, but the Government could not give them lands which did not belong to them. Certain parties in Montreal had thought the decision against the Indians was not a proper one, and asked that the question might be decided before a court of justice. Two or three years ago money was voted for that purpose, and the question came before the court when it went by default against the Indians. If the Minister of Justice was satisfied that the Indians really could not succeed, would it not be better to abandon the lawsuit and say so definitely; and then try to make an arrangement with the gentlemen of the Seminary, whose feelings, no doubt, prompted them to do something in favour of the Indians who had been so long under their care. If not, he thought Parliament would feel it its duty to do something for them. He hoped the Government would see that the matter was settled during recess.

MR. MILLS: How does the hon. gentleman propose to settle if the Indians refuse?

MR. LANGEVIN said, if the Indians refused they would be unreasonable. They had friends in Montreal who might bring them to reasonable terms.

MR. MILLS: Those friends say their interests are worth $10,000,000. The Seminary offers $20,000; there is a wide difference.

MR. LANGEVIN: I am not trying to find fault. I found it a difficulty in my time.

MR. MILLS: And did not settle it.

MR. LANGEVIN said he could not settle it. If the Indians had not been ill-advised, no doubt they would have come to terms. Their pretension to have $10,000,000 was all moonshine. They should have a comparative small sum of money from the gentlemen of the Seminary as a settlement of the question. If the matter went on, they would see repeated the deplorable events of last year, when arson and bloodshed took place, and the Indians, being the weakest, would suffer. If the Government took the thing in hand, it could be settled in a short time.

MR. DESJARDINS said he thought that they could not expect any peaceful and satisfactory arrangement to be effected by means of third parties. It would be best for the Government to act with these Indians directly, and to use the influence which the Federal Government always enjoyed with the Indians, to bring them to a reasonable disposition. It would be wise to try.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the hon. the Minister of the Interior had first stated that these gentlemen in Montreal had advised these Indians that they were entitled to ten millions of dollars, and, therefore, these Montreal gentlemen were in the way of a settlement. This was why he said that, if these Indians were so much under the control of the Montreal Committee, it would be better to have these gentlemen conferred with, and try to induce the Indians to consent to some reasonable arrangement.

MR. DESJARDINS said his information led him to believe that the Government would have a better chance of affecting a satisfactory arrangement by treating with the Indians directly, and not through those parties who had interposed between the Indians and the gentlemen of the Seminary.

MR. BOWELL said he thought that the hon. member for Hochelaga was mistaking the facts as to the desire or intention of the gentlemen in Montreal who had been advising or taking under their protection these Indians. He was of the opinion, and he had it on very good authority, for saying that these gentlemen were very desirous of having this difficulty settled, for more reasons than one. The responsibility having fallen in a great measure on them during the past winter and the winter before, of providing, out of their own means and charities, these Indians with food and the necessaries of life, he could scarcely conceive it possible that they would throw obstacles in the way of an equitable settlement if the Government approached them properly. On the contrary, he thought he could say that some of the gentlemen who in this regard had taken a very active part with a philanthropic view and desire to ameliorate the condition of these people, would only be too glad to meet the Government and come to some settlement. The sooner that this was done the better. The Government might feel it beneath their dignity to take a step of this kind, but where deputations composed of Senators and some of the most respectable men—certainly not of those who could be accused of a desire to create animosities, being headed by Hon. Mr. Ferrier—interested themselves in these matters, he thought that if these negotiations were pushed on and proper overtures made, there was no doubt that it could be settled. He believed that it was the desire of these gentlemen that a settlement of this kind should be come to, in order that these Indians might not continue to be a tax on the charities of those who had taken them under their immediate care. This was a very important matter, owing to the events which had taken place and the difficulties that had arisen out of this dispute. He understood the hon. the Minister of Interior to say that the reports he had received were not official—to be made public,—but simply letters from the agent whom he had sent there, and which he did not feel at liberty to make public. But he (Mr. Bowell) was led to believe they were of an official character, containing information which would not only be of advantage to the Government, but also to the country generally, both as to what were conceived to be the rights of these people and the treatment they had received. Whether it was in the interest of the public or the Government that these should be made public, must be a question, he supposed, for the head of the Department to decide. He was very glad, indeed, to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for Charlevoix in connection with this very important matter; and he hoped that the Government would act on the suggestion thrown out by the hon. gentleman, and take energetic steps to provide for these Indians, being their guardians to all intents and purposes, as well as the guardians of all the other Indians in the country.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government have done all they could.

MR. DESJARDINS said he was glad to learn from the hon. member for North Hastings that the gentlemen who had constituted themselves the tutors of those Indians were willing to settle the matter in a peaceful way; and he hoped that if they were seriously so inclined, this would be speedily brought about. If the hon. gentleman was well informed, he was sure that the Government would settle this question without difficulty.

MR. MACKENZIE said that they had received no such overtures from any parties who claimed to represent these Indians, as would lead them to understand that the offers of the Government would be accepted. The Government proposed to locate these Indians on lands somewhere else, and to ask Parliament to vote a sum of money to provide houses for them, and to obtain as much as possible from the Seminary. The question of law was one with which they could not meddle. The previous Government appeared to have settled this question, as far as the officers of the Crown could do so. It subsequently went into court, although they considered that the judgment obtained was rather a catch judgment than otherwise; but it was not carried by those who acted for the Indians to the Court of Review for decision. When deputations came to Ottawa, as had been the case on several occasions, to visit him, it was simply to plead the rights of the Indians, under the territorial rights which had been claimed; but it was quite impossible for the Government to deal with this point, and to say that the Indians had or had not such rights. This was a question of fact, and the courts alone could decide it. These persons determined to appeal to the courts, but when it became known that the Government were making an effort to induce the Seminary to make an advance, and that possibly the Indians themselves would be willing to accept it, violent letters appeared in the Montreal papers, denouncing the Government for sacrificing the rights of the Indians—as they called it—and giving fabulous values to this property. The rights of the Indians, as they existed before this difficulty arose at all, appeared to have been of this kind: the land was located to different Indians. These Indian families would have eight, ten, or twenty acres in a particular quarter, and they would clear up a certain number of acres. Occasionally some of these families desired to leave the reservation altogether, and invariably, as he was informed—and he believed that he was informed correctly—when any of them desired to do so, the improvements were valued and paid for. These valuations reached occasionally from $8 to $9 per acre, but generally varied from $5 to $6 per acre. The average would be somewhere between $5 and $8, which the priests, who exercised surveillance over this property, paid to the Indians, who would thereupon lease the reservation and take up their residence elsewhere. It would appear, therefore, that up to the time when this difficulty arose, there was no further idea of territorial ownership on the part of the Indians than what was implied by ownership and the improvements made on the soil. This seemed to have been the position from all the investigations he had made personally; and it was pure nonsense to say that this Government had in the past or now any power to press a settlement. They had done everything in their power to obtain a settlement, and he believed that if the Government proposal had been accepted three years ago, it would have been far better for the Indians, and it would be far better to accept this settlement now; but, as long as the Indians committed themselves into the hands of other people, who thought different from the Government, and who might have reasons with which the Government were unacquainted for this, and whose advice the Indians followed, it was evidently impossible for the Government to come to such terms with the gentlemen of the Seminary as would enable them to effect a settlement. As soon as the Indians were prepared to leave the whole matter in the hands of the Government they would undertake to endeavour to effect the best settlement possible, and he had no doubt that they could do this if they were let alone.

152 Purchase of blankets for aged and infirm Indians of Ontario and Quebec .....	$1,600
153 Indians of Nova Scotia, relief, etc. ....	4,500

MR. MCKAY (Colchester): Has an agent been appointed for District No.

MR. MACKENZIE.

3, in place of Mr. Davey, who, I think, has resigned?

MR. MILLS: The subject is at present under consideration.

MR. MCKAY said that owing to the absence of an agent, a great deal of inconvenience was incurred. Several men who had attended sick Indians, found a great deal of trouble in getting their bills settled, and the Indians themselves went to other agencies trying to get supplies and blankets. Several delegations, and, in fact, he believed the whole tribe in his county, had waited upon him before he left home, in this connection. He had made application to the hon. the Minister of the Interior for assistance, and $40 were granted for this purpose. This was a very small sum. A number of these Indians were lying within the limits of the town, and were dependent entirely on charity, putting the town to considerable expense.

MR. MILLS said that the fund in question was very limited. The Government did not hold itself responsible for the support of the Indians any more than for any other portion of the population, though they had power of surveillance over the Indians under the British North America Act. If the Indians were enfranchised their control would be at an end, and these persons would then be under the charge of the Local Government in every particular, as any other portion of the population. At Confederation certain funds were taken over from the Provincial Government, and they had endeavoured, as far as possible, to confine the Indian appropriation to what it was at the time of Confederation. In Ontario lands of the Province, as they were set out for settlement, were surrendered by the Indians, and certain reserves and compensations were given them; and the Indian fund of Ontario and Quebec, which amounted to something like three millions of dollars, was created in this way, and a lapsed balance of statutory or other appropriations. The whole fund at their disposal for Nova Scotia, was $4,500, and they used this money in the way they thought would be most serviceable to the Indians. Aid must of course be given from legal sources, and the poor among the Indians were dependent, like other poor, on the people living in the various Provinces. When the Government saw to the proper expenditure, their duties were at an end.

Mr. MCKAY said he thought that it would be for the benefit of the Department and the Indians of Colchester County, if the latter were placed under the agent at Picton, instead of under the agent at Halifax.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said that, on the whole, he must say that the administration of Indian affairs, both under this and the late Government in Nova Scotia, had not exactly been successful; but they were now about making an arrangement by which each county would manage its own affairs in this regard, and he hoped that the system would be attended with most satisfactory results.

Mr. MITCHELL said that there was a considerable number of Indians in his county. The administration of these matters under the late and present Governments had been equally bad and very unsuccessful. He could see no change. The Indians of New Brunswick were not becoming enlightened. They were not getting the benefit of education. They were dwindling away, and becoming demoralized. The whole system, as far as the elevation of the character of the Indians was concerned, seemed to be a complete failure. Sickness appeared to be more prevalent among them than formerly. In a few years, unless something was done, he was afraid that they would disappear. Something might be done for these people, even with the small means which they had at their disposal. The Dominion had bought up the great North-West, and the money of the people in the Eastern Provinces had contributed to this purchase. As an enormous sum was being paid out for the Indians of the North-West, he thought that more liberality should be extended towards the Indians of the Eastern Provinces, with the view of preserving them, and, if possible, elevating their condition, which was most lamentable. The hon. the Minister of the Interior, being a philosopher, might endeavour to see what philosophy would do, as regarded practical utility, towards the elevation of the poor creatures.

Vote agreed to.

154. Relief of the Indians in New Brunswick .....	$4,500
155. Relief of the Indians in P.E.I.....	2,000

Mr. LANGEVIN wished to know how the sum voted last year had been expended.

Mr. MILLS said it was appropriated for the purposes of the Commission, a record of whose work would be found in the report by Mr. Sproat. Therein it was stated that the Commission had carried on their operations in British Columbia up to December, 1876, and since April 4th, last year, they had been engaged in the settlement of disputes between the Indians and white men, the former of whom alleged that the latter had encroached on lands which they held from time immemorial. The Local Government proposed that the Commission should continue until all the reservations in the vicinity of the White settlements were agreed upon, and that in future all matters affecting the Indians should be settled by an agent of the British Columbian Government. When the season closed, it was found that the Indians were indisposed to give up their reservations, and Mr. Sproat had been retained to act as Commissioner during the coming summer.

Mr. LANGEVIN said no better man than Mr. Sproat could be found to act in this capacity. If the Government could induce the Indians to leave these settlements at Victoria, it would be a great boon both to themselves and the white men there.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Laflamme.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he wished to move that section 11 of the Dominion Election Act of 1874 be repealed and be re-enacted, as amended by the insertion of the word "constituted" in the 12th and 20th lines. This was to apply to incorporated municipalities, which, in part, lay in two electoral districts. In the Ontario Act it was provided that, in cases of this kind, such municipality should belong to the electoral district having the smaller population. He proposed to alter the law so that the returning officer could constitute the part lying in each electoral district into a separate polling subdivision, which could not at present be done. Otherwise no provision would be made for taking the vote. The Ontario Legislature had provided that each municipality should have the power of establishing polling divisions. The village council passed a by-law or resolution, establishing the village as a polling subdivision, consequently the township from which this village had been erected, established their polling sub-divisions under the authority of a by-law, and these sub-divisions would not include the village for the very reason that the village, by the authority which it possessed under the Municipal Law, had the power of establishing itself as a polling sub-division. It was to overcome this difficulty that he proposed this amendment.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said he believed that at the general election in 1874, the hon. member for North Huron had stated that parties who lived in a village between two counties had voted first in the one and then in the next riding. He had then understood the hon. the First Minister to say that this would not occur again.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not recollect it, but I am sure that it cannot be done legally.

MR. WHITE: It was done at that time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I believe the fact that this was done.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MACDONNELL said he desired to ask the hon. the Minister of Justice whether any decision had been arrived at with regard to the recount of votes, according to section 13 of this Bill. It had occurred to him, since this measure was previously under consideration, that it was impossible where there was only one County Judge for three or four counties, for this Judge to attend to the recount within the short period of three or four days in various counties. This might occupy more than one day, in fact several days. Where there were three counties grouped together, as was the case in Nova Scotia, it would be quite impossible for one Judge to make recounts in each of these—and the law would, consequently, be quite nugatory. The same remark, he believed, would apply to Charlevoix and neighbouring counties.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was very unlikely that there would be a recount after every election. A recount was a matter of very rare occurrence, and in Ontario, where this system had been in force for some time, no difficulty had been experienced. It was only in cases where an uncertainty existed as to the number who voted, or where it was thought fraud had been resorted to, or where the majority had been exceedingly small, that a recount was deemed necessary. Consequently, it was not probable that there would be any lack of Judges to carry out this measure.

MR. MACDONNELL said the Government should legislate for possibilities however remote, and the answer made by the hon. Minister that it was unlikely there could be a recount in three counties presided over by one Judge, was not satisfactory.

MR. BOWELL asked why the time allowed for having a recount should be limited to four days.

MR. LANGEVIN said the object was to avoid delay, because it was desirable that a candidate when elected should take his seat as soon as possible. He had called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the Bill the other day, and though he did not intend to repeat the arguments he made use of with reference to the working of the Bill, he would ask the Minister of Justice whether he had made up his mind to amend the Bill in the direction he had indicated?

MR. LAFLAMME said that, while he was anxious to meet the views of the hon. gentleman, what had been foreshadowed by the hon. member for Charlevoix was not, by any means, likely to happen, and there was no reason why the Government should legislate for such a remote possibility. There was a resident Judge in the county of Charlevoix, and he could be applied to, when necessary, with the view of having a recount.

MR. LANGEVIN said what he sought was not merely in the interests of his own county, but of the whole district. No doubt there was a resident Judge in Charlevoix, but his district comprised the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay besides; and if, after an election, a recount was desired, say, in Chicoutimi, ninety miles either way would have to be travelled before a recount could take place.

MR. MCCARTHY said he would ask the Minister of Justice whether he proposed to make an amendment allowing application for a recount in the Province of Ontario to be made before one of the Superior Court Judges at Toronto, as well as before a County Court Judge. He understood the hon. Minister to say that he would amend the Bill so as to allow of an application being made to a Superior Court Judge in the absence of a County Court Judge.

MR. LAFLAMME said he had no objection to make a provision by which, in the absence of a County Court Judge, an application might be made to the next County Court Judge.

MR. BLAKE said it was desirable that a recount should take place at the earliest possible moment, in order that the return should not be delayed. The Judge had to make an order for a recount within four days after notice was given, and the recount itself must take place within four days more. Now the difficulty which might arise if the amendment proposed was adopted was this, that a Superior Court Judge might not fix on a day which would suit the County Court Judge.

Mr. McCARTHY said there might be a difficulty of this kind, but there would be a greater difficulty when a County Court Judge was absent, if no such provision as he proposed was adopted.

Mr. BLAKE said a deal of time might be wanted in making an application to a Superior Court Judge. It might be a convenience to one or two counties, but it would be a decided inconvenience to some of the remote counties. He thought the better plan would be to permit an application to be made to the nearest County Court Judge.

Mr. BOWELL: You should say in the absence or illness of a County Court Judge, because he might be unable from illness to perform his duties.

Mr. McCARTHY said he could not see that there should be any objection to make the clause of the Bill read so that application might be made to a County Court Judge in an adjoining county, or to a Judge of the Superior Court at Toronto.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman move an amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY: I will not move an amendment unless the Minister of Justice is willing to receive it.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that in the absence of a County Court Judge, his assistant usually took his place.

Mr. McCARTHY said he proposed to repeal section 19 of the present Act, which provided for the deposit of $50 by each candidate nominated, and to substitute for it a clause identical with the provisions in the Quebec Election Act, to the effect that each candidate shall deposit the sum of $200, but that the money shall be returned to the successful candidate, and to the unsuccessful candidate if he polls one-half of the number of the votes polled by his opponent. In the Province of Quebec, each candidate deposited $200, and, after an election, those candidates who had obtained half as many votes as the person who was successful, received back their money. In this way candidates were deterred from being proposed, for the mere purpose of forcing a contest when there was no hope of their being returned. He did not see why a candidate should be forced to pay $50 towards election expenses.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he thought a candidate would rather pay $50 than allow a deposit of $200 to remain in the hands of a returning officer for an indefinite period. He believed the law as it stood was very simple and would give universal satisfaction. The innovation proposed would not be an improvement.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) thought the law of Quebec was a better one than that of Ontario, because bogus candidates were prevented from coming forward.

Mr. LITTLE said that a candidate might have some inducements to offer, and the electors might even get up a requisition to him; yet, at the eleventh hour, he might not be able to poll the number of votes that would entitle him to a return of his money. He was not to be blamed for this; he had been misled by those who induced him to come forward. Also there might be men of education and high intelligence, well fitted and desirous of becoming members of Parliament who would not be able to command $200, and for this reason he held that the House should not adopt the amendment as it would be trammelling the free choice of the people in their elections.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) said he thought the amendment proposed was an excellent one, and that it was quite as much in the interests of the poor man as any other class of candidates. There were many members in this House who could afford to deposit $200 for a few months, and there were plenty who could not afford to lose $50 altogether.

Mr. DESJARDINS said that he considered the best system would be one which called upon the candidate to make a deposit which should be returned after the election.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he thought this amendment would be of immense importance in preventing what were termed "bogus" candidates from coming forward. He did not think $200 too much, because if a man really wanted to get into Parliament, if he was a poor man, he could easily raise it, knowing that he was almost sure to get it back again.

Mr. BLAKE said that if any system was to be adopted he thought this was more likely than any, without interfering with the right of the people or the freedom of election, to accomplish the object in view. It was certainly an improvement over that which prevailed in the Province of Quebec. In the first place, $200 was a considerable sum; in the second place, against a man with money, who knew that he would get his deposit returned, the amendment would be imperative, whereas the loss of $50 might be some check upon him. The smallness of the amount and the simplicity of the arrangement imposed by the Bill were such as must commend the Bill over the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy.)

Mr. MITCHELL said he differed from the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake). During his (Mr. Mitchell's) own election, he was subject to the greatest annoyance by a candidate being started by a clique who said: "We will sacrifice $50, and oppose Mr. Mitchell." The candidate was started and actually canvassed the county until within a day of the poll, not with any idea of seriously contesting the constituency, but simply to cause annoyance. If they could adopt a system which would not interfere with the freedom of the people or the choice of the electors, but would check such conduct as he had alluded to, they ought to do it. He believed the amendment was a step in the right direction and that it was calculated to put a stop to the annoyance that might now be visited upon the candidate whom the majority of the people wished to elect.

Mr. CARON said the strongest reason in favour of the amendment was that it would prevent a bogus candidate being nominated merely to have a contested election and to cause annoyance to the legitimate candidate. It would also save the excitement and disturbance of a useless contest.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he denied that it followed, as a matter of course, that, because a man did not get one-half the votes of his opponent, he was not a bonâ fide candidate. The principle of having to pay any money for the purpose of being nominated was a wrong one. Instead of extending the principle, it should be abolished. The hon. member for Quebec county said those elections disturbed public opinion. Well, public opinion required to be disturbed occasionally. There were men who had remained in Parliament a long time who would not have been returned were it not for the want of some opponent who would agitate public opinion, and bring to light facts which would change the public opinion.

Mr. PLUMB said the amendment secured, in a much greater degree, the principle recognized in the Bill, by providing for a deposit. It prevented the nomination of candidates who had no chance of election, and who were brought forward merely to cause the expense and annoyance of a contested election. $200 was not a large amount to be deposited as earnest of the good faith and position of the candidate, and the money being returned to him if he obtained a respectable vote, and prevented any injustice being done in the way of preventing a contest. It was not desirable, in party interests, that candidates should be opposed who would otherwise be elected unanimously. He was not sure but that the proposition of his hon. friend might be amended by reducing the number of votes necessary to a defeated candidate to obtain back his money. He had no objection to have the whole system of deposits abolished, but if the system were continued, it ought to be made, as it had been intended to make it, a check on candidates.

Mr. SINCLAIR said he thought the amendment was not an improvement on the Bill. When the Act was passed the greatest check was considered to be the twenty-five electors who were required to sign the requisition. This amendment would act injuriously in those districts which returned two members. A man of good standing might be rejected and have less than one half the number of his opponents votes. This amendment would also have the effect of creating sympathy for an unpopular man to save him the fine, and thus he would get more votes than he would otherwise obtain.

MR. BABY said this amount of $50 was intended to be a check on bogus candidates and tax towards the election fund. It was not a check against bogus candidates because the sum was too small, and as a contribution to the election fund it did not go so far as the amendment, which by preventing to a greater extent the nomination of bogus candidates, lessened the election expenses which the forfeit of $200 would also diminish.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings), said both parties were now nominating their candidates, and this amendment, if adopted, would have the effect of preventing the introduction of a third party to spoil a fair election contest. He would agree to abolish the system altogether, but if not, the amendment should be adopted. He hoped that this amendment would be accepted.

MR. MCCARTHY said that the principle of this amendment was not now under discussion. The principle had been affirmed and was now the law of the land, being intended to prevent what were called bogus candidates from presenting themselves. This was the sole and only object of the 19th clause, requiring a deposit of $50, as he understood it. It was not a tax on candidates, as a contribution towards the election expenses. He believed, however, that in England the candidates had to pay a certain proportion of these expenses. But would any hon. gentleman pretend that any bogus candidates was ever prevented from being nominated, owing to this $50 deposit? It was totally valueless and inadequate to prevent this abuse, for this sum could be made up by a contribution of about $2 from each nominator. To make the provision practically effective, the sum ought to be increased as he proposed. This was not, of course, a party question at all.

MR. PALMER said he thought that this amendment did introduce a new principle. Under the present law the $50 was not returned. Of course, if the sole object was to prevent the nomination of bogus candidates, why should this sum not be returned? He had heard no reason why candidates should be taxed $50 when they were not bogus candidates. If candidates were to pay, they ought to pay the whole expenses of the election, but surely this was not intended. If the principle, however, was maintained with regard to the $50, by and by it could be increased, and the result would be that candidates would have to pay all these expenses. He saw no reason why the sum should not be increased to $200. He thought that, at all events, the return of the deposit should be sanctioned by the two Houses.

MR. BUNSTER said he considered that the amendment did not go far enough. The sum should be increased. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) had been greatly inconvenienced by the putting up of a bogus candidate, who, he believed, only received 20 odd votes, part of which, besides, proved also to be bogus. There was no telling how many other hon. gentlemen would be similarly annoyed, and, consequently, he considered that the sum should be increased. He was almost inclined to ask that it be made $1,000. He would move that all the words after that in the amendment be struck out, and the following substituted: "Unless the sum of $500 be paid to the returning officer, which sum shall be handed over to the successful candidate on the receipt of his certificate of election."

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

MR. MCCARTHY said that he wished to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the sub-section of clause 94, in the original Act. He had found, in regard to election cases, that this was a most dangerous clause. It ought to be amended. It provided that the giving or the causing to be given to any voter on nomination and polling day, on account of the said voters having voted or being about to vote, any drink, or refreshment, or money to enable him to procure refreshment, should be made an unlawful act, and should cause the forfeit of $10 for each offence, and the costs of suit. This particular clause was taken from the English Statute, in which the penalty was 40 shillings, and by the sub-section a breach of this section was made a corrupt practice. This was not the law in England, and he did not believe that it should be the law here. The 9th section made treating, if done corruptly, a corrupt practice, and very properly so; but the concluding part of the section declared that the giving of refreshment without any corrupt intent—for this was the effect of it—by a candidate or by his agents, on polling day or nomination day, should be a corrupt practice and vitiate the election. What was the practical result? The agent of a candidate might invite his brother, an elector, to dinner on polling day—this was not treating but the giving of refreshment within the meaning of this clause—and this would vitiate and destroy the election. He did not propose to move an amendment, but to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to this matter, with the view of having this provision changed. A heavier penalty might be imposed, but certainly such an act should not destroy the election. He conceived that no election could be conducted under the law as it now stood that could not be vitiated on petition. In a recent case in which he was concerned, a Judge of the Supreme Court had found it very difficult indeed, to put a proper construction on this clause. It stated that the giving or the causing to be given to any voter on nomination day, on account of such voter having voted—but this could not be the case. It was practically almost impossible to put a construction on it with regard to nomination day, though it was very clear respecting polling day. It was laid down by Justice Wills, in England, that the act in question was not a corrupt practice. Now, if an agent treated a friend to dinner the election might be set aside on the ground that corrupt practices had been resorted to. He thought the Minister of Justice should really give his attention to the matter, and make some amendment to the Bill.

MR. LAFLAMME said there were many anomalies in the interpretation of some of the clauses. He agreed with his hon. friend that the point in question was one which required some elucidation, but he thought, at the same time, that the Judges were best qualified to interpret the meaning of the law. An election ought not certainly, to be vitiated because a person was treated without any intention to cause corruption in voting, but the House and the people would shortly be better able to investigate thoroughly the principle of our Election Law. After it had gone through the crucible of several contested elections and being submitted to the Judges of the different Provinces and to the Supreme Court, some amendments might be introduced to meet the objections which had been raised.

MR. MCCARTHY said a construction had already been put upon the law in two English cases, so that there was no doubt whatever as to its meaning. An election should not be set aside as vitiated on the ground that an agent had acted wrongfully, when such was not the case.

MR. BLAKE: It says on account of his having voted or been allowed to vote. It would be impossible to prevent corruption unless a severe penalty was attachable to the offence. What was wanted was to prevent a system of so-called hospitality calculated to interfere with the freedom of an election, degrading to the candidate who sought votes in this way, and degrading to the electors who participated in that hospitality.

MR. PALMER said that, if he was not mistaken, the hon. member for South Bruce and the Minister of Justice, took entirely different views of the matter. The Minister of Justice seemed to say that an election would not be vitiated by an agent treating a friend, while his hon. friend from South Bruce wished to retain the penalty, because such an act would vitiate an election. He (Mr. Palmer) certainly disagreed with the Minister of Justice, when he said that the matter should be left to the Judges to decide. By adopting this course, any amount of legal expenses would be incurred, together with no end of trouble. No time should be lost in making the law plain. If he was not mistaken, the matter was decided the other day in the Supreme Court, when the opinion was expressed that, unless it was shown that there had been an improper intention, an election should not be vitiated. He had looked at the Statute since then, and he considered it extremely doubtful whether that view could be carried out or not.

MR. BLAKE said that an election was not vitiated unless hospitality was given, on account of an elector having voted or being about to vote.

MR. PALMER said, in that case, the first part of the section quoted by his hon. friend from Cardwell was entirely unnecessary; if it was allowed to remain, Judges would give different decisions. The law should be made perfectly explicit; and he hoped the Minister of Justice would give the the matter his consideration.

NATIVE TOBACCO DUTIES.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Order for Mr. Speaker to leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, read.

MR. BOLDUC said that he desired to call the attention of the hon. members of this House to the fact that the cultivation of tobacco would flourish in this country, if it were encouraged. At present, the cultivation of tobacco in Canada, owing to the heavy excise duty, was practically prohibited. The duty amounted to 20c. a pound. Indeed, if the law was made prohibitory, it would not be more severe than the law which existed. No Canadian manufacturer could now buy Canadian tobacco unless he paid a duty of 20c. a pound on it; and, owing to this state of things, the cultivation of tobacco was not encouraged, and the farmer was not able properly to acquire the experience which would enable him to raise tobacco of the first quality. This question was so much more important, in view of the fact that we imported a great quantity of tobacco yearly. Glancing over the Trade and Navigation Returns, he perceived that in 1874 we imported 6,869,000 lbs., for which were paid $786,216; in 1875 we imported 10,396,741 lbs., for which $968,613 were paid; in 1876 we imported 10,301,733 lbs., for which $1,154,049 were paid; and in 1877 we imported 8,665,879 lbs., for which were paid $901,686; in all there were about four millions of dollars which we had been obliged to pay for the purchase of this leaf alone abroad. This amount would be kept in this country if, instead of prohibiting the cultivation of this article, the Government encouraged it. The success already met with in the cultivation of the tobacco plant in this country proved that it could be raised to great advantage, if such encouragement was given. He did not ask for the abolition of the Excise duty for a long time, but merely for such period as would be advantageous to the farmers, and as would enable the farmers to become accustomed to the cultivation of this article. He did not ask the Government to abandon for ever this source of revenue, for among all dutiable objects he recognized the fact that tobacco, from its very nature, was one on which a duty could very properly be levied. But, having regard to the interest of the agricultural portion of the population, he thought that at the present juncture, the Government should encourage the cultivation of tobacco. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, delivered during the present Session, had said:—

“Those who have studied the position of this country are well aware that, however important other interests may be, now and for a long time to come the agricultural interest will necessarily continue to be the predominant interest in Canada; and, therefore, anything which strikes at the prosperity of the agricultural population strikes necessarily at all those classes, those very numerous classes, which are dependent upon them.”

He now requested the Government to consider the interest of the agricultural class, and he would urge upon the Government the necessity of adopting a true National Policy. The result of the abolition of this excise duty would be that next year Canadian farmers would largely cultivate this article, and bring the product to market for sale; and the farmer who would have a bad tobacco would perceive that it was necessary to change his system of cultivation, and contact with experienced farmers would be to him an inestimable advantage. If this was done, in a few years, instead of importing tobacco, we would export a very considerable quantity of it; and then the Government could levy an export duty on this article, and the revenue derived from this source would be greater than it was to-day. He observed, with pleasure, that during the present Session, on each occasion that the interests of the agricultural class came under consideration, the members of the House spoke strongly in favour of this section of the population. He particularly asked the support of all those members who were favourable to the protection of this interest, to the motion he submitted, in order to induce the Government to grant this request. He moved:—

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, ‘That, whereas, one million dollars worth of tobacco is imported every year, and, whereas, that plant might be cultivated to advantage in this country, this House is of the opinion that the cultivation thereof should be encouraged by the abolition of duties on tobacco grown in Canada.’”

Mr. LAURIER said, if he properly understood the motion made by the hon. gentleman, its object was to encourage the manufacture of tobacco in this country, to prohibit the importation of foreign tobacco, and to facilitate the cultivation of tobacco in this country.

Mr. BOLDUC: No; I do not wish to prohibit the importation of foreign tobacco.

Mr. LAURIER said he did not know to what point the two propositions were compatible. He could not see how the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, and the importation of foreign tobacco, could be equally encouraged. The object of the motion was to collect a revenue from the importation of tobacco, and to relieve home-grown tobacco from duty. His hon. friend had said, in the course of his argument, that they could consider the interests of the agricultural class from the farmer's point of view; but the first question that presented itself was this: Was this country adapted to the cultivation of tobacco? He observed that his hon. friend said that if this Excise duty was abolished for a certain number of years, the production of Canadian tobacco would assume such proportions as to permit tobacco to be exported instead of being imported, as was now the case. But was this possible? Was it possible to maintain seriously, that Canada could ever produce enough of this article to enable it to be exported? It was well known that, above all in the Province of Quebec, and in the Maritime Provinces, and also in Ontario, we could not produce tobacco which could enter into successful competition with the foreign-grown article. We produced an inferior quality of tobacco, which was used for local purposes. The agricultural class was frugal and economical, and it produced tobacco for its own consumption; but, on the other hand, it was equally certain that it was perfectly impossible to raise, in Canada, tobacco which could enter into successful competition with the foreign article, for the simple reason that we had not the climatic conditions necessary to its growth. The Province of Quebec, above all, and all the Provinces east of Quebec, could not raise tobacco on a considerable scale, for the simple reason that their climatic conditions were not proper to the growth of this plant, which was excessively sensible to such conditions. Again, our seasons were too short to permit its successful cultivation; Spring was too late, and Autumn came too soon; and, under the best possible climatic conditions, the tobacco which we cultivated could never attain maturity. The farmers were obliged to take it in before it arrived at perfect maturity, and then, very frequently in Lower Canada, they were visited with frosts during the warmest months of summer, even in July and August, and it was known that tobacco was extremely sensible to changes of temperature, and of the weather; and, under these circumstances, as an article of commerce, it lost much of its value, suffering in flavour and quality, and failing to command the price which it would otherwise secure. Owing to these considerations, the argument of his hon. friend lost much of its force. The object of the motion was to encourage the cultivation of tobacco in Canada, though of all the plants that Lower Canada could cultivate, the last thing which they should cultivate was tobacco, which could not become for them an article of export. They could cultivate grains such as oats and barley, and other cereals, but even wheat was not always successfully raised in the Province of Quebec. Its success was uncertain, and so much was this the case, that their farmers as a rule dare not raise wheat any more. It was not adapted to their soil. Each soil was specially adapted to the growth of certain things; climates varied. In the Province of Quebec wheat was not now generally raised, though there was a time when it was grown there to a considerable extent; but for reasons into which it was not necessary to enter, the fact was, that the Province of Quebec could not now raise enough wheat for its own consumption, and it was obliged to import grain from the Province of Ontario and the United States. The same thing was true with regard to the cultivation of tobacco. The growth of tobacco could never be successful with them, for the simple reason that the climatic conditions of this Province were not favourable to it. Tobacco came up very well, and the soil was good enough, but the plant did not reach maturity. Our seasons were too short for the growth of this article. Tobacco could not always come to maturity; some years this might be the case, no doubt, and it was also true that during certain years, wheat did very well in the Province of Quebec. Last year, for instance, wheat with them was an excellent crop, but at the same time they could not depend upon wheat as a steady crop, and in the same way tobacco could not be dependent on each year to come to maturity; and even when it came to maturity, the fact was incontestible, that it did not reach the highest state of perfection, as was also the case in parts of the American Union. But suppose that they did encourage the cultivation of tobacco in Canada, and suppose they did abolish this Excise duty, the result would be that each farmer would, perhaps, raise so much tobacco as he would use, and suppose that this tobacco would have the same value as the American tobacco, it was impossible to pretend that an inferior article would always command, in the same market, the price that was asked for the imported article. And even if the principle in question was carried into effect, the consequence would be that after a certain number of years, the cultivation of this article in this country would fall off; it would not be profitable to the farmers, and they, themselves, would abandon it. And more than this, as the hon. member for Beauce had stated, if there was an article which ought to be taxed, it was tobacco. No one could to-day, in a civilized country, pretend that tobacco ought to be exempt from taxation, and it was, above all, an article on which, by every Government, revenue ought to be raised. At the present time there was no civilized country which would venture to remove this Excise duty and make tobacco free from duty. Spirits and tobacco were always articles on which all civilized Governments raised a part of their ordinary revenue. The hon. gentleman recognized this fact, and he did not say that tobacco ought to be exempt from duty; but if he rightly understood him, the hon. gentleman held that the duty should be simply limited to the imported article. But suppose that this motion were adopted, and that the moment it was adopted, the Government should remove the Excise duty from Canadian tobacco and impose it merely on imported tobacco, what would be the consequence? Either the revenue from this source would be reduced considerably, owing to the increased use of Canadian tobacco, or this tobacco would enter into exclusive use, and thus prevent the importation of foreign tobacco, equally reducing the revenue. Such would be the consequence of this motion. If it was admitted that a duty should be imposed on tobacco—and his hon. friend admitted that this was the case—it should be levied equally on all tobacco, no matter where it was manufactured, whether in this country or abroad; and if a distinction were made, and the duty imposed on the imported article only, what would be the consequence? The Canadian farmer would sell his tobacco in the leaf to the merchant who would retail it, without paying any Excise duty, and then certainly all, or at least a great portion of the consumers, would buy the Canadian and not the manufactured tobacco, which would occasion an enormous deficit in the revenue of the country. The position of affairs was this:—We now obtained about a million of revenue from this source, and if home-grown tobacco was not subject to duty, while imported tobacco was dutiable, the latter would certainly not enter into consumption. Again the manufacturers themselves would take advantage of this state of affairs, and would mix the Canadian with the foreign tobacco, and thus the duty would not be paid save upon a very small portion of the imported article which entered into consumption. He submitted, in reply to the hon. member for Beauce, first, that even if the motion were adopted, this country could never become a country, which was adapted to the cultivation of tobacco, which could advantageously compete with the imported article. The Northern States of the American Union were, in fact, not so well adapted for the growth of this article as the southern; we were still further north, and, as a consequence, we had nothing to gain from the growth of this article. The object of our people should not be to encourage the cultivation of an inferior article, but to encourage the growth of such products as were adapted to our soil and climate. In the second place, it was impossible to levy a duty on foreign tobacco, unless the same duty was imposed on Canadian tobacco. If they removed the duty from the home-grown article, the effect of this step would be entirely to destroy the revenue from this source. He submitted that tobacco was one of those articles on which a duty should be levied, and that, in consequence of this fact, it would be a most erroneous and ruinous policy, with regard to the revenue, to remove this duty. His hon. friend did not go to the length of advocating the removal of the duty from foreign and home-grown tobacco, and he (Mr. Laurier) held that, if the duty on Canadian tobacco was removed, the effect of this step would be to destroy entirely the revenue obtained from this source; and, besides, at the present time the country was not in a condition to be able to bear the loss of revenue which the removal of the duty on this tobacco would necessitate.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue objected to the motion, on the ground that we could not profitably cultivate tobacco in this country. The hon. gentleman added that our climate was not suitable for such cultivation; that early frosts prevented it from coming to maturity; that the season was too short, and that we could not cultivate it. In reply to the hon. gentleman, he would say that, if this was the case, there was no cause to fear for the revenue; and, as a consequence, no danger could be apprehended from the adoption of this motion. The hon. gentleman gave the reason he had mentioned, evidently with the view of killing the motion of the hon. member for Beauce; but the hon. gentleman went further, and said that we did not cultivate tobacco, and that we could not succeed in cultivating it. He did not know whether the hon. gentleman had witnessed the cultivation of tobacco, where he lived, in the Province of Quebec; but it was, at all events, cultivated elsewhere in the Province. In certain counties in Quebec, considerable quantities of tobacco were raised, and oats, and barley, and wheat as well. The climate of Canada was, therefore, favourable to the cultivation of this article. It was, in fact, advantageously cultivated in the counties of Joliette, Berthier and Montcalm, and in great quantity. He would go further; the same statement applied to the county of Dorchester and to the county of Charlevoix, on the north shore below Quebec, which many considered, wrongly, to be at the other end of the world, and near the North Pole, and almost inhospitable. Tobacco was raised in Charlevoix county, but not profitably; and why? Because the farmers could not pay the duty, though they raised, however, enough tobacco for local consumption. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue should have known that tobacco was raised in Charlevoix county, as he had had seized the other day 4,000lbs. of tobacco in the parishes of the Baie de St. Paul and Les Eboulements. This was not foreign or imported tobacco, but it was raised in these parishes. If the hon. gentleman had gone down the St. Lawrence, he might remember the parish of Eboulements, which was on the top and side of the mountains, a place covered with snow during six months of the year; and, nevertheless, tobacco was cultivated to advantage in this place, as well as cereals. If this could be done on the north shore, below Quebec, it could be accomplished with greater reason and advantage on the south shore. In the county of Dorchester, which he formerly represented, tobacco was raised for domestic consumption, and not for other objects, as they did not wish to pay the duty. At Quebec, in the parish of Ste. Foye, tobacco was raised in great quantities. He remembered a gentleman who, in this locality, grew sufficient tobacco to sell and export it. The duty was raised very considerably, and this gentleman was then obliged to abandon, in great measure, the cultivation of this article. The same statement applied, with equal truth, to other portions of the Province, and these facts showed that the statement of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, to the effect that the climate of the Province of Quebec was not favourable to the cultivation of tobacco, was incorrect. The hon. gentleman had been badly informed. If this duty were removed, they would soon see whether tobacco could be raised in Canada. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman said that if the duty on home-grown tobacco was removed, the importation of tobacco would be in a great degree lessened, because tobacco would then be raised in Canada in sufficient quantity to supply the wants of the different families in the country. The gentleman here admitted that the climate of Canada was favourable to the growth of tobacco, and, as a consequence, he (Mr. Laurier) feared that the revenue would suffer if this duty were removed as was requested. The hon. member for Beauce did not demand the perpetual repeal of this duty, but merely for a few years, until our farmers became accustomed to the cultivation of this article. He was extremely sorry to hear the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue depreciate the climate of Lower Canada. The hon. gentleman said that this climate was not favourable to the growth of wheat, and that they were obliged to import a large quantity of wheat into the Province of Quebec. There was no doubt that wheat was brought into this Province, but the hon. gentleman should remember that there was a time when they not only raised enough wheat for the consumption of the population of Lower Canada, but even sufficient to export a very great quantity of it every year. Of late years, this growth of wheat in the Province had not been so extensive; but this was due to the presence of the weevil, which had committed great ravages there as well as in other countries. In consequence of this scourge, the farmers of Lower Canada had partially abandoned the raising of wheat, and devoted their attention to other grains, such as barley and oats, and to roots, in order that they might at no time lack a crop. He would ask hon. members from the Province of Quebec, on both sides of the House, whether it was not a fact that the growth of wheat was now very considerable in the Province of Quebec. He knew that in his part of the country, the raising of wheat had increased very much; and he had only yesterday received a letter from a farmer, in the county of Rimouski, who stated that owing to the fact that the present season was so propitious, the farmers had sown double the usual breadth of wheat and other grains this year, and this was done precisely because they knew that wheat came to full maturity in this Province. Happily the weevil had disappeared, and they hoped to be able to raise wheat in as considerable a quantity as had formerly been the case. If, however, the weevil returned, its culture could be suspended for some years, and the farmers could turn their attention to other matters. Tobacco, for instance, could be cultivated. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) knew very well that foreign tobacco in the leaf was subject only to an excise duty as well as home-grown tobacco; and what advantage then was afforded the Canadian farmer? The hon. gentleman held that the foreign article was worth more than Canadian tobacco, and what advantage then did the Canadian farmer possess in this respect? If this article could be advantageously cultivated in Canada, and if by this means our farmers could make a considerable profit, why should the Government not favour the motion of the hon. member for Beauce? They were here not merely to pass laws in regard to abstract principles, but it was also their bounded duty to apply the best principles possible to the circumstances of this country. The question before them was one regarding the application of a principle in the interests of this country. The agricultural class was in need of encouragement. It was known that, without this class, the people of the towns could not subsist. If the farmers did not toil every day in the cultivation of their land, where would we be? This class required encouragement in some way, and this motion was intended to effect this object. He knew that the other day, when the agents of the Government in the parishes of St. Paul and Les Eboulements went to seize from certain farmers a few pounds of tobacco, which were absolutely necessary for their needs, these farmers were justly indignant at such conduct. They could not believe that the Government would do such a thing; and they asked whether this had ever been known, to be done in years past. This had never been known to occur before; and this instance only served to show that this law ought to be amended. He would certainly vote for the motion of the hon. member for Beauce.

MR. CASGRAIN: Was not this tax, of which the hon. gentleman complains, imposed in 1867 or 1868 by the late Government?

MR. LANGEVIN said that the hon. gentleman ought to remember this, that if a duty was then imposed on tobacco, it was increased by the Government which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) supported, and even doubled, and more. The hon. gentleman had voted for this increase. The hon. gentleman would soon have occasion to explain to his electors why the duty on tobacco was doubled, why he had encouraged this policy, and why he had sustained the Government which proposed it. The position taken by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was not logical. If tobacco could not be cultivated in Canada, no danger to the revenue need be feared from the passage of this motion.

After Recess.

MR. LANGEVIN said that before the House rose for Recess, he was saying that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had stated that tobacco could not be grown to advantage in this country, that the climate was against it, that the early frosts would destroy it, therefore we could not expect that the plant would be cultivated to such an extent as to make it an article of consumption. If that was the case, then we should lose nothing by the abolition of the excise duties on tobacco. The hon. gentleman went further, and said that even the small quantity we could grow in this country was of such an inferior quality, it could not compete with the imported article. Therefore, what need was there to be alarmed at this motion. But he had shown the hon. gentleman that tobacco was grown in some countries in large quantities, and would be grown to a much larger extent if it was left untrammelled by excise duty. Since 1870 the duty on it had been increased by hon. gentlemen opposite to nearly double, the increase being much larger on Canadian grown tobacco than on that grown in foreign countries, while the latter was of much greater value than the product of Canada. Looking at the prices of the article, they found the foreign quoted at 100 per cent. more than the Canadian, while the increase on the Canadian tobacco, instead of being 5 per cent. was a little over 45 per cent. This was the way those gentlemen had protected the Canadian industry in the cultivation of tobacco. The reasons were quite evident in favour of the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, which could be done with great advantage. The motion of his hon. friend from Beauce did not say that Canadian tobacco should be free of duty for all time to come; but it should be free for a certain number of years until its cultivation and manufacture had become sufficiently developed to allow of a tax being imposed. The farmers asked to be allowed to cultivate this plant without restriction, which would give them a large return. This class deserved to be protected, if any discrimination were made, more than any other, as on that class we all depended for the necessities of life. But the Government said that their predecessors put an excise duty on tobacco. But the duty then was such that the farmers could profitably cultivate the plant, while to-day the duty was a prohibitory one. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had libelled the Province of Quebec, no doubt unwittingly, when he said its climate was not suited to tobacco cultivation. The hon. gentleman should remember the time when the Province of Quebec not only raised quite sufficient wheat for its own purposes, but exported very large quantities. He knew that the farmers now, after a number of years, during which they did not cultivate wheat to the same extent on account of the weevil, were returning to its cultivation and increasing the quantity every year. He had received a letter from the Lower St. Lawrence, stating that, owing to the fine season, the farmers were planting double the quantity of seed this year than previous years. He did not agree with the criticism of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and would vote for this amendment.

MR. BABY said this question being one in which his constituents were considerably interested, it was his duty to come forward and press their views on the attention of the House. Down to the moment when the duty on tobacco was in the same measure doubled, the raising of tobacco in the Province of Quebec was greatly extended. As all knew, for some reason or other, the wheat crop in that Province was not large; sometimes this was due to extreme warmth, at other times to the long drought or to the heavy and continuous rains, and owing to this fact, the farmers of the Province had to devote themselves to the growth of other cereals and plants; and hence, during some years, the cultivation of tobacco was very largely increased. He spoke with connaissance de cause. But when this Government raised so considerably the duty on tobacco, and enforced the law so rigorously as they did through their officers, the farmers were obliged to stop raising this article; and, as a consequence, this entailed a heavy loss on the farmers of Lower Canada. He did not say that tobacco was raised in all the counties of Lower Canada. It, as well as cereals, was raised in certain counties more than in others, according to the nature of the soil and surroundings. In the counties of Joliette and Berthier, and above all in Montcalm, an enormous quantity of tobacco was raised, and a number of the farmers had principally supported themselves by this means; but to-day they were obliged to wholly abandon this source of income. And what had followed? These farmers had necessarily lost a very large sum in the returns they obtained from their land. The culture of tobacco succeeded perfectly in Lower Canada. For some years he knew that this had been the case. He could attest that this had been the fact during his experience of the past twenty years, and he was perfectly aware that it grew there to perfection. The same statement was true with regard to wheat. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue alleged that wheat, like tobacco, could not be raised successfully in the Province of Quebec, but the hon. gentleman ought to know better; he should know, for instance, that formerly from the district of Richelieu, an enormous quantity of wheat was exported. That region was well then called the grenier of Lower Canada; but as was well known, the cultivation of this cereal was impeded by the advent and ravages of the weevil, which had now disappeared, and, at the present time, the farmers of Lower Canada were sowing a large quantity of wheat. The return was considerable, and the farmers of Quebec were not far from the day when they would be no longer obliged to import the wheat and flour which they required for the support of their families. It seemed to him, as the hon. member for Charlevoix had remarked, that the farmers of Lower Canada were in need of this protection. He did not look at this question as affecting a luxury which could be well dispensed with, but considered it in respect to the revenue the farmer derived from the cultivation of the plant. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had told them it was necessary to impose this tax to carry on the Government of the country. He understood perfectly well that it was requisite to impose certain taxes on luxuries, etc., but he did not regard the cultivation of tobacco as coming within the category of luxuries, but as an industrial pursuit, which concerned largely the agricultural interests. And this was a matter of the highest necessity to the farmers, owing to the profit that it gave them. In the report, which had been placed in the hands of hon. members, it would be seen that 9,000,000 odd lbs. of tobacco were imported in leaf; and, if the farmers were protected with regard to the cultivation of tobacco, they could take away the necessity which now existed as to the importation of this article, and thus largely benefit this country; since, nearly ten millions of pounds were imported. They could thus meet this want. Farmers were permitted, in all parts of the Province, to raise tobacco for their own use, to some extent, but there were districts where they did not cultivate tobacco, and, consequently, the protection now requested would largely benefit Canadian farmers. Why should we permit the entry of the American leaf and other foreign tobaccos into this country? The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue said that we could not raise a superior quality of tobacco, and even if it matured in this country it was always of an inferior quality. He differed in opinion with the hon. gentleman, to whom he would observe that he (Mr. Laurier) had not studied the matter, and was not aware of the facts. Probably the hon. gentleman was not a smoker, and did not know how to distinguish the quality of tobacco. He (Mr. Baby) could say that the tobacco raised in this country was of good quality. He had a perfect knowledge of the matter; and the hon. member for Montcalm could state that a considerable quantity of tobacco of very good quality was raised in the county of Joliette and in the surrounding counties, and sold at as high a price on the Montreal market as the foreign article. He did not mean to say, of course, that there were no better tobaccos imported from foreign countries than the Canadian article. There were, for instance, the highly-flavoured cigars smoked by the hon. Minister of Justice, who knew so well how to sooth thereby the anxieties of life, a tobacco which could not be had in this country certainly. But, nevertheless, tobacco of good and excellent quality was formerly raised in the Province of Quebec; and why was this not still the case? If the Government had at heart the interest of the agricultural class, which was in English called "the bone and sinew of the country," it would undoubtedly grant the request of the hon. member for Beauce. A light tax might, meanwhile be levied on home-grown tobacco, but, with the present duty, the cultivation of tobacco in Canada was rendered impossible; above all, under existing circumstances. He was consequently in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Beauce.

MR. LAFLAMME said he was surprised to hear the hon. member for Charlevoix express the opinions to which he had given utterance to-night, in relation to the motion of the hon. member for Beauce. The hon. member seemed to have forgotten that it was he and his friends who first imposed this tax. In 1868, the proposition was made by the Government, of which he was a member, to impose a tax of 17c. per lb. on Canadian manufactured tobacco, and 15c. per lb. on foreign tobacco. The proposition was discussed at length in Committee, and an hon. member (Mr. Godin) proposed in amendment that the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the whole House, with instructions to amend the same, as follows:

“1. By striking out section 3, which read as follows:

3. All tobacco grown in Canada and prepared for sale, shall, when it passes out of the possession of the occupant of the farm or premises upon which it was grown, be carried directly to and deposited either in a licensed tobacco manufactory, and entered in a licensed tobacco manufactory, and entered in the stock-book of the manufactory, or it shall be bonded in a tobacco warehouse in the same manner and under the same conditions as are herein provided with respect to raw tobacco imported from abroad.

2. By striking out sub-section 2 of section 9, which reads as follows:

And all raw or leaf tobacco grown in Canada, not bonded as herein required and removed from the farm or premises whereon it was grown, and in the possession of any person other than a licensed tobacco manufactory, except only for the purpose of carrying it directly to some licensed tobacco manufactory or to a tobacco warehouse, the proof whereof shall be upon the person having possession thereof; and also the amendment to sub-section 3:

3. By striking out of section 10 of the said Bill, the words, ‘or grown in Canada’ which occur in line 4 and 5 of the said section inserted instead thereof.

These amendments had certainly been made with a view to protect the cultivator and to enable him to bring his tobacco to the manufacturer without any restriction, yet they were negatived, and among the “nays” was the name of the hon. member for Charlevoix. A second proposition was made the same day at a latter stage of the Bill, by Mr. Godin, seconded by Mr. Pâquet:—

“That all the words after ‘the’ to the end of the question be left out, and the words ‘Bill be re-committed to the Committee of the whole House, with instructions so to amend the same as to exempt from payment of all duties, leaf tobacco grown in Canada’ inserted instead thereof.”

A division was taken on this amendment and the hon. member for Charlevoix, as the seconder for the hon. member for Beauce, the hon. member for Bellechasse, voted against it. Consequently the hon. member for Charlevoix believed it was necessary to impose this restriction on the Free-trade, and free production of Canadian tobacco of 4c. per lb. He (Mr. Laflamme) did not blame him, for the result proved that the tax on tobacco produced a revenue of $1,600,000 which went to relieve the agricultural class who did not pay this tax. It was the consumer who paid it. The agricultural class were allowed to produce the tobacco which they consumed free of tax, consequently no portion of this $1,600,000 was paid by them. What was the object of the present motion? It was to shift this tax of $1,600,000 from those who now paid it, and place it on the agricultural classes, because this tax must be raised, and if not imposed on tobacco it would have to be imposed on some of the prime necessities of life. He defied hon. members to point out the means of imposing another tax which would raise a similar amount and be as lightly felt as this tobacco tax. The hon. members for Charlevoix and Joliette had pretended that this tax was prejudicial to the production of tobacco. Any man who examined the question fairly would see that it was a tax in favour of indigenous, and against the importation of foreign tobacco. The duty was not imposed so long as the tobacco was in the possession of the cultivator, and not manufactured. The proposition of the hon. member was most illogical. At present an ad valorem duty of 12½ per cent. was imposed on foreign tobacco, and a specific duty of 24c. per lb., and an excise duty of 20c. per lb. The only duty imposed on Canadian tobacco was an excise duty on the manufactured article of 10c. per lb., so that there was a protection to it of 25c. per lb. specific duty, 12½ per cent ad valorem, and 10 cents per lb. excise. If the law were rigidly enforced, the Canadian producer would be obliged to bring his article to the licensed manufacturer, and obtain, in the end, a higher price for it than he now received through illegal traffic. If his tobacco only sold to-day for five cents per lb., it was because he sought to evade the law. The hon. member for Charlevoix argued that our climate was as favourable as others to the culture of the plant; if so, what need had the Canadian producer of greater protection than he enjoyed at present?

MR. BABY: Is not the leaf of foreign tobacco admitted free?

MR. LAFLAMME: Yes; but the moment it was manufactured it paid the duty. He contended that tobacco was not a natural, legitimate, product of Canada, and those who had entered into its cultivation on a large scale had, with rare exceptions, found it to be a ruinous production. The revenue on tobacco was indispensable to the Administration, and could not be replaced in any other manner. In fact the duty ought to be raised, as this weed was injurious to the health of those who indulged in it. A more legitimate or less onerous tax could not be raised, and were it to be removed it would have to be imposed on the prime necessities of life. The law should be put in force so as to hinder frauds on the revenue, and no exemptions from seizure should be allowed where there was a manifest infraction of the law. When a cultivator of the plant would know that the law would be rigidly enforced, he would bring it to the licensed manufacturer and obtain the highest price. The hon. member for Charlevoix endeavoured, to day, to raise prejudices, by means of this cry of taxation, in face of his own course in 1868, among a population which had not occasion to understand the real merits of the question.

MR. CARON said, evidently, the hon. the Minister of Justice was not au fait on this question. Were he to state in Quebec that the use of tobacco was injurious, he would be told that he knew nothing about it, or that he had not taken the trouble to examine it in all its details. As a representative of an agricultural county, he would state that the culture of tobacco was yearly extending. It had been said the tax originated under the Conservative Administration. He thought that when hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded to power, they would have removed all those abuses. The former Government had imposed a tax on Canadian tobacco of 7 c. per lb.; under the present Government, it had been raised 40 per cent. If the tax were abolished, a great development would be given to a national industry in the production of an article which was, in fact, a necessity. He could understand that to the people of the town, whose habits were mainly sedentary, the use of the weed might be injurious; but not to the agricultural population, whose work was done in the open air, and whose only luxury was their pipe. The hon. Minister had said this tax was an indispensable one. He would ask the hon. Minister how much this tax produced? If it were lowered, would the revenue suffer to any serious extent? It was an insignificant tax, which only brought in some hundreds of dollars, and which hindered the development of an industry which would otherwise assume considerable proportions. He was willing to leave this question to be considered by the people of the Province of Quebec, who understood it perfectly, and who would understand that the reasons given by the hon. the Minister of Justice would not weigh against those advanced in favour of the motion of his hon. friend from Beauce.

MR. DESJARDINS said he had been disappointed by the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. Knowing that in the Province of Quebec there existed great political men in close relations with the hon. members opposite who claimed to have discovered a system by which they could administer public affairs without taxes, only by means of economy and retrenchment, he would have expected that the Government would have borrowed the secret of such a system, and benefitted by the occasion offered to them by his friend for Beauce to adopt it to the Federal policy. According to the views expressed by the hon. the Minister of Justice, the removal of the tax imposed on Canadian tobacco was not, in itself, a very important question, as a matter of revenue to the Government, it was true, and the affirmation of the hon. gentleman had only confirmed this view. The report of the Minister of Inland Revenue stated as follows: "The quantity of Canadian leaf taken for consumption as such, was at its maximum in 1873-74, when it amounted to 113,797lbs. Since then there has been an annual decline until last year, when it amounted only to the nominal quantity of 8,630lbs." Thus, thanks to the increase of the duty on tobacco made in 1873-4 by this Government, they saw that the effect of the financial policy of this Government affected the cultivation of tobacco in the same manner as it did all our other industries. The result of the policy of this Government had been to kill this industry, and despite such result the Government insisted on maintaining their policy under the pretence that they could not afford to dispense with the revenue which could be obtained therefrom, when the actual revenue to be derived from the Canadian tobacco, as admitted by their own report, was taken only upon the small quantity of some 8,000 lbs. Now, the hon. the Minister of Justice affirmed it would be a loss to the revenue of the country to the extent he had mentioned. The Government was unjustifiable to paralyse this industry in the Province of Quebec, and all through the country when they saw the effect which this duty produced. He was surprised to hear the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who had shown himself so particularly in favour of the people's interests, support the maintenance of this duty, when he knew himself that the quality and price of tobacco grown in this country was suited to the wants and means of the greatest portion of our population. The hon. gentleman made this distinction: he said that tobacco was more easily raised, and in better quality, in countries south of ours, and the farther south they went the superior became the quality of the tobacco grown. If such should be the case, was it not true that putting aside the duties on Canadian tobacco would not prohibit the importation of foreign tobacco into our own market. Why should they add to the difficulties of Canadian producers by putting them, with regard to taxes, on an equal footing with the producer of the foreign article? Why should not Canadian tobacco be made duty free, when this action did not virtually increase the revenue collected by the Government? The statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) as to the condition of the cultivation of tobacco in this country, as compared with that of other countries, went against his objection that the removal of the duty from Canadian tobacco would destroy the revenue which the Government expected to obtain from the duty levied on the foreign article, because such removal would be the equivalent of prohibition. It was clear, from the reports of the hon. gentleman himself, and from the experience which had been acquired, that the law which imposed this duty did not offer any compensating result. The only effect of such duty, besides depreciating the chances of growing tobacco in this country, was to establish a system of contraband, which was operating both against the farmers and the Government itself. The hon. gentlemen opposite were perfectly well aware that the instructions which were given to the Excise officers in the different districts, relating to the Excise duties on Canadian tobacco, gave those officers the liberty to act in the most arbitrary manner. It might happen that, on the eve of an election, a seizure would be made upon some implicated man in a township or parish, so as to keep him under the good will of the Department so long as the political need of the moment would require it. He remembered that last Session this matter was brought before the House, and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue of that day was asked to explain what had been done with regard to certain seizures made on the eve of a certain election, and which had been left suspended over the heads of the individuals concerned. The matter, if he was well informed, had only been settled after the election was over. This was only one of the inconveniences of the present system. To justify the injurious duty thus imposed, the hon. the Minister of Justice now pretended that the use of tobacco was injurious to the population, and that he would be disposed to raise even higher the duties on that article. This would certainly be great news to the people of the Province of Quebec, who had never imagined that the use of tobacco, as was customary in that Province, could have such an injurious effect as to make the Government desire to raise the duty considerably, so even as to prohibit it the employment of this article. The farmers in particular would not be able to understand this pretension. It seemed to him that this statement was a little egotistical. The working population might indeed not have the means of procuring all the articles of luxury, which, for instance, a Minister could obtain—they did not have all these means of enjoyment that a man like the hon. Minister of Justice could procure. Why, then, should he be disposed to deprive them of the cheapest and least offensive luxury they could procure? Would it not be a cruelty to deprive a man, who had gone through a day of weary labour, from having his smoke whilst reposing after the fatigues of the day? He was not ready, for his own part, to deprive the working people of this comfort. When the members of this Government were in opposition, they evinced extraordinary anxiety for the well being of the people. How soft were their protestations of love and devotion for the "good people," the "good working-man," and the "good habitants". But they now seemed to have forgotten the "good people" of former times. It was true that the possession of power sometimes tended to spoil these kindly dispositions on the part of Liberals, and that things did not appear to them under the same light. True it was, that what appeared to be very easy while in opposition, seemed to be excessively difficult when once hon. gentlemen had obtained the reins of administration, and assumed the responsibilities of office. Nevertheless, he could not believe that such position would justify any party, when in power, to go so far as to turn their backs on all the things, and all the principles, and all the political questions which it advocated in Opposition. If, amongst many others, any question had been strongly agitated in the Province of Quebec, it was certainly the question which concerned the duty on tobacco. He remembered having heard himself very eloquent speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, who complained loudly of the late Government in this relation, for having gone to the length of taxing the tobacco grown by the people of Canada: and to-day, when a good occasion for carrying these declarations into effect presented itself, the heads of the party refused to act and give that relief that the farmers had the right to expect from them. They spoke of the needs of the public treasury, but were they not aware of the new system that was now inaugurated in the Province of Quebec, through their friend and ally, Mr. Joly? Let him quote a few words from the grand manifesto of that great statesman:—

"The new Cabinet proposes to meet the obligations of the Provinces, and to execute the enterprises to the accomplishment of which public faith has been engaged, by a system of economy and retrenchment which shall exempt the people from the burden of new taxation."

To adopt a system of economy and retrenchment, of which they had, no doubt, need, no person would certainly object to that. Nobody would deny moreover that this was imperatively required in the administration of Federal affairs at the present time. But he could not help remarking that, whilst in Quebec, they were boasting of being able to govern, administer public affairs, and even construct railways without taxes, but only by means of economy and retrenchment, here the same class of politicians refused to consent to any reduction of taxes, even of such taxes as that on Canadian tobacco, which operated so disastrously on a natural production, without affording any compensation virtually to the public treasury. A good occasion was now presented to the Government to show what their feelings were towards Canadian industry, and he regretted to see that this invitation to adopt a measure which would be not only extremely popular in the Province of Quebec, but would protect a very profitable branch of culture in the country, did not have the advantage of meeting with the sympathy of the hon. the Minister of Justice and the other members of the Government.

Mr. DUGAS said that the question before the House was so important and of such vital interest that he could not let it pass without remark. He congratulated the hon. member for Beauce on having made this motion, which so closely concerned the interests of the farming population, who would be benefitted by its adoption. The present duty on tobacco practically prohibited its cultivation in the Province of Quebec. As the hon. the Minister of Finance had stated in his Budget Speech, it was a matter of prime necessity to favour the agricultural class, which formed the most important part of our population. If the hon. gentleman was sincere in this expression of opinion, this was a favourable occasion for him to prove his sincerity to the country by supporting the motion of the hon. member for Beauce. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had declared that the climate of this country was not adapted to the cultivation of tobacco, and that, if they reduced the Excise duty on Canadian tobacco, it would also be necessary to reduce the duty on foreign tobacco; but this was not the object of the motion before the House. They merely asked for the protection of the home industry and they wished the duty on imported tobacco to remain as it was. The hon. gentleman also said that our tobacco was inferior to the foreign article; but if so, we could not then compete successfully with our neighbors in this particular, and, as a consequence, the duty on foreign tobacco need not be lowered. The hon. the Minister of Justice had attempted to prove, that it was absolutely requisite to take steps to cause the use of tobacco and spirituous liquors to disappear from our midst, and to impose a high duty on Canadian tobacco, which he (Mr. Dugas) considered to be a source of wealth to our farmers. It was necessary to protect the interests of the farming population, which was admitted by the hon. the Minister of Finance to be the first and most important class in the country; and it furnished to the other portions of the population the means of subsistence. He ventured to hope that hon. members would seriously consider this question, and, refusing to be guided by party feelings, would vote for the motion of the hon. member for Beauce.

MR. CASGRAIN said he regretted that this motion was made so late in the Session. It was, perhaps, the result of an after-thought on the part of the hon. member for Beauce. Nevertheless, he would take it as it came. He was surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite denounce, with so much vehemence and force, the proposition made from that side of the House for the continuance of this tax. He had asked himself, how was it that hon. gentlemen opposite made such a volte-face in their position, for these very hon. gentlemen imposed this duty in 1868. In the Votes and Proceedings of the House for the 19th of May, 1868, he saw the names of the hon. members for Charlevoix, Kingston, Bollechase, and Terrebonne; and these hon. gentlemen had then voted for the imposition of this duty. It was true that they were then in power, and had to impose certain taxes in order to raise a certain revenue. They did not fear to levy taxes or to increase the public debt; and the result was that now these hon. gentlemen wished to leave the debt, but not permit the present Government to obtain the revenue necessary to pay these very liabilities. The hon. member for Joliette praised Canadian tobacco, but he did not believe that the hon. gentleman and several of his colleagues had heads strong enough to support the force of this narcotic, though it was certainly a quality of tobacco with which the agricultural class was satisfied. Those who desired a luxury, procured the foreign article. He would say more,—the foreign tobacco which came from Belgium could be obtained for a less rate than Canadian tobacco; and the Syrian and Belgium tobacco was infinitely superior to the home grown article, besides being certainly cheaper. Canadian tobacco was the dearest, in spite of freight and duty. Cigars manufactured in Belgium could, for instance, be bought for less than those which were made here. He regarded this question as he thought it ought to be considered in this country. He was perfectly well aware that the farmers of this country ought to be protected with reference to certain articles, and to this he had no objection; but he did not see what good could be done by means of a motion which, in England, would be termed a clap-trap motion. In the present instance, he understood that the farmers could be benefitted by the remission of this duty. The farmers believed that they could secure a certain advantage by cultivating tobacco, although perhaps if the matter was examined very closely, it would be seen that these people were deceiving themselves, and that this industry was not so remunerative as they imagined. The only advantage which the farmers could obtain from raising tobacco was this: they grew a considerable quantity of it, and the whole of this was placed on the market at reduced prices, because it was inferior in quality to the foreign article. All they could say was that they could sell it. It was produced by the farmer, placed on the market and mixed with foreign tobacco, and did not have the duty paid on it. Up to the present time the duty on foreign tobacco had been high enough to protect sufficiently the Canadian tobacco. Nevertheless, the people complained of this tax. He considered that it would be a very difficult matter to remove this tax, though it contributed very little to the revenue. Perhaps the duty paid on home-grown tobacco did not even pay the cost of collection, but this did not imply that it ought to be entirely removed. He believed that the time would arrive when an equilibrium would be established between the diminution of the duty on Canadian tobacco and a slight increase on the imported article. In the county which he had the honour to represent, a very considerable quantity of tobacco was raised, and these farmers thought that the cultivation of this tobacco was advantageous to them. This was the prominent fact before him; and he had but recently placed on the table of the House a petition from a number of his constituents, praying that the duty on foreign tobacco should be increased. He did not wish to say whether his constituents were right or wrong in this particular, but this was their impression. They thought that it would be advantageous to have the home-grown article protected, as they raised it. He had his duty to perform, and he was sent here to meet the desires and views of his constituents. He was bound to secure justice for them as far as lay in his power. This tax had been imposed by the late Government; and the present Government had exempted from duty the tobacco raised by Canadians for home consumption. This was a very considerable privilege, but it did not extend to the article sold for commercial purposes. This tax on imported tobacco was legitimately levied in order to meet the requirements of the country. He believed that the hon. member for Portneuf had a large share in securing the exemption of home-grown tobacco used by the farmers themselves. The present duty on home-grown tobacco was little enough; and, inasmuch as the collection of the duty on Canadian tobacco cost nearly as much as this portion of the revenue amounted to, and as quite a number of farmers in his county desired that Canadian tobacco should be freed from duty, and as he was glad to be able to meet the wishes of this class of the population which he had the honour to represent, he proposed to vote for the motion before the House.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that before this motion was put to the vote he desired to say a few words on this very important question, as to how the revenue of the country might be affected if the motion prevailed. He doubted if it were possible to have introduced a motion of this kind at a period when the revenue was less prepared to allow any dangerous experiment of the sort to be made. Probably the House, or at least some members of it were not aware, though he believed that it was mentioned once or twice that evening, that nearly two million of dollars of the existing revenue were derived from tobacco. The actual revenue from this source during the past year, was no less than $1,625,000 from that quarter. Those acquainted with the existing state of the law, and should know the extraordinary privilege which had been conceded to persons engaged in the growth of tobacco in this country, might well be surprised that under the circumstances an attempt should be made to deprive the revenue of this country of the sum of from $500,000 to $800,000 per annum, on so extremely flimsy a pretext. As the law stood, every inhabitant of Canada and particularly every inhabitant of Lower Canada, was permitted to grow for the use of himself and his family, all the tobacco that they could possibly consume; in addition to this, he was not required, as in most other countries, to pay an excise duty at all in proportion to the amount which was levied on tobacco imported into this country. Hon. gentlemen who by voting for this motion favoured a reduction in the revenue from this source of from $500,000 to $800,000 a year, should be prepared to inform their constituents how they proposed to make good that deficiency. As matters stood at present, he did not see how the loss to the revenue could possibly be made good, unless by very considerable direct taxation—a step which he thought few of the constituencies of this country would welcome in exchange for the loss of duty on tobacco. He would say nothing as to the injury to our credit, which would inevitably ensue if we showed to the world, and particularly to individuals with whom we might have financial relations, that we were prepared to allow such perilous experiments to be made with one of the main sources of our revenue. For his own part he had always said that he would be very glad to see not only this, but other duties reduced, if the revenue permitted. There were, however, few things on which a duty could be more properly levied than on tobacco. He would also remind the House that, although the present duty on tobacco might appear considerable compared with the duty formerly levied in this country, it was utterly insignificant compared with the duties levied in other countries, particularly with the duty levied in England, which was at present in excess of 4s. sterling. He believed that, under the recent proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would amount to something like 4s. 8d. or 4s. 10d. sterling per lb., being nearly five-fold the duty levied in Canada. He need not remind hon. members of the House that the growth of tobacco in Great Britain was prohibited altogether under very severe penalties, vastly more severe than we had ever thought of adopting. He particularly desired to call the attention of hon. members whose constituents might be interested in the matter, to the simple fact that, under the scale of duties as adjusted by the present Government, those constituents were not injured thereby, but gained a very considerable advantage. Under the duties imposed by the late Government, in 1868, which were 10c. per lb. on imported tobacco, and 5c. on tobacco grown in this country, the native producer had an advantage over the foreign producer of 5c. per lb. only. Under the present scale of duties of 20c. on imported tobacco, and 10c. on that grown by the native producer, there was a clear advantage to the latter of 10c.; in other words, he had, by the duties of 1874, gained an additional advantage of 5c. over the foreign producer. Now, when it was remembered that the foreign tobacco imported into this country, amounting to nearly 10,000,000 lbs., it would be seen that the Canadian producer had at the present moment an enormous advantage, if he could produce an article which would enter into competition with the foreign product. He had called attention to these few points, because he thought it was very desirable not only that hon. members of the House, but also their constituents throughout the country, should understand distinctly what was aimed at by a motion of this kind. There could be no doubt whatever that if this rate was passed, if the duty now imposed on tobacco grown in this country was abolished or curtailed, a very considerable production of native tobacco would take place—though he was inclined to think this production would take place more largely in certain localities in Ontario than in Quebec. But, in any case, the inevitable result would be, first, an enormous reduction in the duty now obtained from that source, and, in the next place, a very heavy direct taxation would be levied in some form on the whole people of this country. He could conceive no proposition, under present circumstances, more mischievous; no proposition more likely to injure our credit, or which ought to be more unani- mously condemned by the House. No proposition, he might venture to say, should be more unanimously condemned by those hon. gentlemen who at one time or other had themselves been responsible for the providing of ways and means. He did not know what line might be pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, but he would take the opportunity of referring to the course pursued by his hon. friend beside him (Mr. Mackenzie) on similar occasions, when propositions were started by friends of his to reduce the duty on tobacco. Although the hon. member for Lambton was, doubtless, anxious to embarrass the Government of the day in a fair and honourable way, his name had always been recorded beside that of the hon. member for Kingston and his colleagues in opposing the reduction of the duty, because he felt it was essential to the proper conducting of the Government of this country, that the revenue should be maintained, and that it would be easier to forego any other duty than the duty on tobacco. He would fain express the hope that hon. gentlemen opposite, who were men of experience and ability, and who must know that it would be utterly impossible to replace this tax without a very heavy direct taxation, and knowing, also, the enormous and extraordinary indulgences which had been already conceded to parties supposed to be interested in the production of tobacco, would imitate the example set by the hon. the First Minister, and allow their votes to be recorded in support of the existing mode of collecting a revenue—a revenue which was always looked upon as one of the fairest modes of raising taxes which prevailed in any civilized country. He had no hesitation in saying that it would be a most unfortunate thing if the motion of his hon. friend from Beauce was allowed to prevail. He had no doubt whatever, if the House were ill-advised, they would entangle themselves in infinitely worse difficulties than those which they were likely to meet with if the proposal was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB said a touching appeal had just been made by the Finance Minister to hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side. He had given as a reason why the resolution should be rejected, that it would largely reduce the public revenue when the country could least afford any experimental legislation which tended to the reduction of the revenue. But the hon. Minister was not in accord with the Minister of Justice who represented, in a certain way, the interests of the Province of Quebec. That gentleman had told the House that tobacco would ripen in the Province of Quebec, and there could be no harm in making an experiment. When the hon. gentlemen in the Ministry, who were responsible for the affairs of their own Provinces, made such representations on the floor of the House, their utterances must be accepted rather than the merely financial view of the question given by the Finance Minister on this occasion. It was a very serious question, certainly, for the House to entertain, whether the public revenue should be endangered in any way at this critical moment—at a moment when the Finance Minister of the country had declined to deal with deficits which had accrued, and which were still likely to accrue, by providing a means of taxation to bring up the revenue to something like the expenditure. There would have been no necessity for such an appeal being made by the Minister of Finance, had he provided for the deficits, which were staring us in the face. He ventured to say, further, that the House would be perfectly justified in permitting agriculturists to make an experiment in the direction indicated by the resolution of the hon. member for Beauce. The resolution had been brought forward in the interest of the agricultural community. The growth of tobacco in this country had been entirely tentative. It had not been grown on a large scale, and the carrying of this resolution might have the effect of fostering what would probably prove a great industry. There was a case in point. Everyone knew what the growing of beet-root had done for France, although the proposition was not at first approved of.

Mr. STEPHENSON said that in the western portion of Canada the production of tobacco had been greater than at present. Returns showed that in 1851 no less than 313,189 lbs of tobacco were raised in the county of Kent, and 457,111 lbs in the county of Essex, making a total of 770,300 lbs.; while in 1871, the production throughout the whole province of Ontario had fallen to 399,870 lbs.; only 163,152 lbs. were produced in Kent, and 190,692 lbs in Essex, showing that under the present system of taxation, the production of tobacco was almost driven out of these two counties. The opinion in the West was that those who wished to use the imported tobacco, to the exclusion of our own, should pay an increased tariff, and that, if the duty on tobacco imported from abroad were not increased, the Government should reduce the tariff on our own, which was worth so much less, or take it off altogether. He thought that if some such alteration was made in the tariff, it would encourage the growth of our own tobaccos, and he trusted the resolution would receive a very large support.

MR. TUPPER said he rose for the purpose of noticing a very remarkable statement which had been made by the hon. the Finance Minister. In his Budget speech, the hon. gentleman said that, if he had no ready means of collecting it, he would prevent a deficit by resorting to an income tax. The hon. gentleman had again made a very damaging statement, as far as the credit of the country was concerned, namely, that the passage of this resolution would endanger the loss of some $500,000 a year of revenue, and that he knew of no means by which that could be made out, except by resorting to direct taxation. He believed that a more unfounded statement with reference to the financial condition of this country, it would be impossible to imagine. Had it come to this, that after everything the hon. gentleman told the capitalists of the world, four years ago, of the prosperity of this country, all the results of indirect taxation were exhausted, and that there were no means of repairing a loss of half a million, except by resorting to direct taxation. He thought the hon. gentleman had not considered the weight that would be attached to his words, or he would not have made a statement so reckless. It was not only calculated to damage the credit of the country, but was a direct contradiction of what the hon. gentleman said only a year ago, when he stated, while asking for the imposition of a certain amount of taxation, that we had large resources of taxation yet left untouched, upon which we could fall back and sustain the credit of the country. The remarkable contradiction that had taken place between two members of the Government on this question had already been noticed by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). He had drawn attention to the fact that the Minister of Inland Revenue, who was specially charged with the revenue of the country and the particular taxation interfered with by the resolution, had stated that this resolution would be entirely inoperative, because the climate of the country was so utterly adverse to the growth of tobacco as to render it quite impossible, if it had any encouragement, that any material quantity could be grown. The hon. Minister said the resolution would be innocuous and useless, and that no one would be tempted to grow tobacco in this country. The hon. Minister of Finance regarded the climate as eminently adapted to the growth of tobacco.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue spoke in French, but, if I understood him, he spoke of Lower Canada; I spoke of a part of Upper Canada, which is entirely different.

MR. TUPPER said that if the hon. gentleman undertook to make a proposition of this kind by reference to a particular locality, he could only say that he entirely failed in the discharge of his duty to this House. The Minister of Inland Revenue was not Minister for Lower Canada, or one Province of the Dominion, but for the Dominion of Canada. In this disparity of statement he was disposed to place confidence in that of the Minister of Inland Revenue, because the hon. Minister of Finance could not be supposed to have the same sources of information at his command. He thought the hon. Minister of Finance had altogether overstated what the effect of this resolution upon the revenue would be. The cultivation of tobacco in Canada was only an experiment, and it would be years before it would compete with the tobacco of warmer climes. He should vote for the resolution.

MR. PATERSON said that although the question was one which largely affected the Province of Quebec, it was one of very considerable importance to the people of other Provinces. The resolution was one which meant that those in the other Provinces who consumed tobacco, and who were willing to pay a fair share of the tax, should be burdened with the whole of it, while their friends in Quebec should escape clear of the duty. He was glad that the hon. member for Charlevoix had publicly called the attention of the Government to the fact that the growers of tobacco in Quebec were evading the payment of the duty. He believed the same was true of those counties in Ontario which were the only counties that raised tobacco at all, for he found by the Inland Revenue returns that these counties only accounted for four pounds as having been raised by them. The tariff of 1874, introduced by the present Financial Minister, had given a far greater amount of protection to the Canadian farmer in the growth of Canadian tobacco, than the tariff of the late Government. In 1867-8, the tariff introduced by the then Government, imposed a Customs duty of 15c. per lb. specific, and 5 per cent. ad valorem on imported tobacco. Estimating the value at 50c. per lb., that would give 2½c. per lb. on the ad valorem, which added to the Customs duty, gave a protection of 17½c. per lb. The tariff of 1874 was 25c. per lb., and 12½ per cent. ad valorem. Taking the ad valorem duty on the same value of 50c. per lb., they had 6c. which made the whole Customs duty 31c. per lb. in 1874, as against 17½c. in 1867. Then, in 1877, there was also an excise duty of 5c. per lb. on the Canadian common twist; that left a protection to the Canadian farmer of 12½c. per lb. Under the present Government the excise duty was 10c. per lb., which, deducted from the 31c. per lb., left a protection of 21c., as against 12½c. under the previous Government. Hon. gentlemen would admit that in taking 50c. as the value he was under the mark, but that gave 8½c. per lb. more protection than was given by the previous Government in 1867. When the tariff was amended in 1870, according to the same mode of calculation, the Protection was 19c. per lb., while under the present tariff, it was 21c. per lb. He held that it was desirable that a certain amount of Protection should be given to the growers of tobacco, but he believed, under the present tariff, the Protection had been increased to such an extent that if the growth of tobacco was capable of being developed it would be under this tariff. If it was not being developed it was on account of causes which the abolition of the entire Excise duties would not at all countervail. It did not follow, as the hon. member for Charlevoix seemed to imagine, that because an hon. gentleman had stated that Lower Canada had not a climate suitable to the growth of tobacco, he was therefore decrying that country. Certain products could be cultivated successfully in particular climates, and it was a geographical and established fact, that tobacco of a market value could not be grown in any part of Canada. In the counties of Essex and Kent, where they grew finer tobacco than was grown in Lower Canada, he had bought samples for 7c. per pound which had been grown from precisely the same seed as tobacco grown in the State of Connecticut, which cost 40c. per pound. They could not hope to make the growth of tobacco in this country a national industry. There was no such revenue as the hon. gentleman had mentioned derived from the growth of pure Canadian tobacco; but if the duty on one class of tobacco was repealed the revenue would be defrayed by the manufacturers declaring other leaves to be the Canadian leaf. In that way a loss would be caused to the revenue. He considered it was the duty of everyone who desired fair play, and an equitable distribution of the taxes, to vote down this resolution, which was sectional in its nature, and which could not give protection to farmers.

MR. POPE (Compton) said he did not agree with the hon. gentleman who had just sat down. The object of this resolution was to give this industry encouragement, if it was one that could be profitably carried on. Upon what principle did the Finance Minister select the article of tobacco and say that the farmers who produced it should pay this amount of duty, while others might produce what they pleased without paying anything? If that was fair, why not carry it out to its legitimate result and make the producers of maple sugar in Lower Canada pay an Excise duty on it. Why not put a tax on hops, from which beer was made, which was as much a luxury as tobacco. There were millions of pounds of tobacco produced in Lower Canada, which did not appear in the Returns. The Minister of Finance would make a nice thing by putting a tax on butter, and he might as well put an Excise duty on butter as on these other products. A large crop of tobacco per acre could be raised in the Province of Quebec. He did not know enough about it to say what the quality would be, but that was largely determined by the way in which it was cured. It must be borne in mind that a very large amount of the tobacco grown in Quebec was used by the poorer classes of the people. Why, then, should they not be allowed to raise it? He had seen very good tobacco, and he had seen very poor tobacco grown in that Province. He did not believe that the system there of curing it was what it should be, but if encouragement were given, he believed that would improve it. The Minister of Finance had said that the only result of this would be direct taxation to the extent of $500,000. Did he suppose that the poor people of Quebec felt that they ought to pay that amount, which should be distributed all over the country?

SUPPLY.

XXII.—INDIANS.

165. For General expenses of the Manitoba Superintendency ..... $18,300

167. Salaries of School Teachers and cost of School Buildings.....	5,000
168. Annuities under Treaty No. 4.....	32,300
169 do do	6..... 40,050
170. do do	7..... 33,050

171. Agricultural implements, cattle, under Treaties No. 4, 6 and 7 (in last year, Nos. 4 and 6 only.....	38,000
172. Provisions for Indians assembled to receive annuities under Treaties Nos. 4, 6 and 7, in last year, Nos. 4 and 6 only.....	37,000

MR. SCHULTZ said there was something radically wrong in the fact that it required this year $54,000 simply to feed these Indians, while they were present only a couple of days to receive their annuities.

MR. MILLS said the sum was very large; but it was one they were obliged to provide while the Indians were settled on reservations. Those Indians were scattered over an immense extent of country. They had to be provided with means of subsistence when they presented themselves to receive their annuities, which it took two or three days to pay. The actual expenditure for provisions was $38,884.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Enough to feed an army.

MR MILLS said they were an army, being nearly 20,000 Indians. The supplies had to be carried a distance of several hundred miles, and in some instances a thousand miles over an unsettled country, and it was difficult to have those supplies reach their several destinations at the exact date appointed for the payment of the Indians. It was necessary, in some cases, to obtain supplies from the Hudson Bay Company. The Indians had been told to return to their hunting grounds, and that when the hunting season was over they would receive their agricultural implements. They parted with this understanding, but some parties told them they were being wronged and induced them to return, which caused a great deal of trouble and expense.

Vote agreed to.

177. Salaries of school teachers....	7,000

Miscellaneous Expenditure.

178. To aid Indians' schools in Ontario and Quebec where most required.....	5,000
179. To bring up annuities payable under the Robinson Treaty to the Chippewas of Lakes Huron and Superior, from 96c. to $4 per head.....	14,000

XXIII. MISCELLANEOUS.

180. Canada Gazette.....	5,000
181. Miscellaneous printing.....	10,000

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he rather thought the chief expenses had occurred. He should say, speaking generally, that the expenditure on public works of late had doubled or trebled, and the necessity for elaborate reports on some of these had largely augmented the sums required for printing. The work of the Minister of the Interior had also increased very largely.

MR. BOWELL said he was under the impression that he had seen the hon. Finance Minister's Budget speech published in pamphlet form, and he was anxious to know what the speeches of the hon. gentleman annually cost the country. He thought the advisability or propriety of publishing, at the expense of the country, a party or a one-sided statement was open to objection. It was not a question whether the old Government pursued the course or not. If the party wished the speech to be printed and circulated, let them pay for it themselves; or, if the present practice was to be continued, then let the reply to the Budget speech be printed with it. Then the country would have an opportunity of forming a judgment upon the matter.

MR. DYMOND said he would like to know which speech gentlemen of the Opposition would wish to give: that of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), or that of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), or that of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), who, probably thought his speech the most important of the lot?

MR. McCALLUM said the reports of the Budget speech appeared in the newspapers and in the official Hansard. He did not think, therefore, there was any necessity for the circulation of the speech in pamphlet form at the expense of the country.

MR. McCARTHY said that 12,000 of these pamphlets were published; and, if it was to be regarded as a public document, he should like to know how they were distributed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that he was always under the impression that these pamphlets were always paid for out of the Ministers' own pockets, whether it was Sir John Rose or Sir A. T. Galt.

MR. MILLS: Never.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think even the reporting had to be paid for at that time.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had no sort of desire to have this done in opposition to the wish of a large number of the members of the House, but it appeared to him that there was a convenience in having a record in some less cumbrous form than the Hansard, and to have in a compact shape the several speeches of Finance Ministers for eight or nine years in a compact shape. It might not be advisable to print as many copies as had been done, but he had received many applications for copies this year.

Vote agreed to.

182. Unforeseen expenses: Expenditure thereof to be under Order in Council, and a detailed statement to be laid before Parliament during the first 15 days of the next Session.....$50,000

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said several of these items should have been charged to the different Departments. Every appropriation should be kept separate and for its own purpose, and this was a rule that should be strictly observed. Then, with regard to this Government map of Canada, the Government had no right to spend that $500 without authority.

MR. MACKENZIE said this was a large map published in the Board of Trade return. It was an excellent pamphlet; and, as it was proposed to distribute a very large number, the Government offered to pay this sum towards the map. He did not think the outlay could well be objected to, although it might have been taken out of the vote for emigration. He thought the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) was quite right in enforcing the rule.

Vote agreed to.

183. Commutation in lieu of remission of duties on articles imported for the use of the army and navy.....	$12,000
185. For the expenses of Government in the district of Keewatin.....	5,000
186. For construction of Barracks in the North-West Territories.....	15,000

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 24th April, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—FORT WILLIAM EXTENSION.

QUESTION.

MR. McCALLUM enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to extend the Railway to the end of the Survey at Fort William towards the mouth of the Kaministiquia River; and if so, how soon?

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no such intention.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA TERMINUS.

QUESTION.

MR. McINNES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to declare the route and terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia, before the prorogation of the House; and whether actual construction will be commenced during the coming summer?

MR. MACKENZIE: I have already stated that the Government hope to be able to state during the present Session what route they decide on adopting through Columbia. The route is already decided to the boundary of Columbia. As to the actual construction, the hon. gentleman will see, by referring to the Act, that no contract can be proceeded with unless Parliament has approved of it.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

QUESTION.

MR. McINNES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have the New Westminster, B.C. Penitentiary occupied before the 1st of July next?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is the intention to occupy it as soon as it can be completely furnished. That is, if there are occupants.

FRASER RIVER SALMON HATCHERY.

QUESTION.

MR. McINNES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a salmon hatchery on the Fraser River, British Columbia, this year.

SIR ALBERT J SMITH: We have not determined to build a hatchery in British Columbia during the present year.

PEMBINA BRANCH RAILWAY CROSSINGS.

QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to see that railway crossings are put in at once on the portion of the Pembina Branch, on which rails have been laid?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is part of the contract to do that, and I have no doubt it has been attended to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—ROUTE FROM NEPIGON TO THUNDER BAY BRANCH.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. TUPPER moved for a copy of the report of exploration made by Mr. Bell, C.E., on the proposed route of the Canada Pacific Railway, from Nepigon to the Junction with the Thunder Bay or Kaministiquia Branch of the said Railway. He said that his object was to get before the House all the information that had been obtained in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The map placed in the hands of members by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, showed the placing of a line from Nepigon to the south of Dog Lake, connecting with the line now under construction, from Thunder Bay or Kaministiquia to Red River. He was informed that no survey or exploration had ever been made; that no line had ever been laid down by any engineer; but that Mr. Bell, who was charged with that exploration, did make a survey and set out an exploratory line south of Dog Lake, and that a map was furnished by him exhibiting the character of the survey and the information that was in connection with it. He (Mr. Tupper) would be extremely glad if the map and report were laid before the House, because whether it was concurred in or not by the Government, a very large amount of money had been expended in the surveys on the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it was desirable that the House should be placed in possession of any information on the subject. He should be glad if the hon. the Minister of Public Works would furnish the House with the report and map before the question of the Pacific Railway came up for consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think that there was any map. He had no recollection of seeing one. He thought that Mr. Bell had merely marked the course which he travelled over on an ordinary map. This was his recollection of the matter, though he was not positive. This particular point, as to the maps, had not occurred to him when he looked at the notice, or he would have looked into it. He did not intend to say that this was not the case; but he would see about it, and inform the hon. gentleman at once of the facts. This could hardly be called a survey. Mr. Bell travelled over the country rather to find out whether there was a certainty, or a reasonable certainty, of obtaining a favourable line, and his recollection was, that Mr. Bell reported on this after having traversed this country, that a favourable line could be got, striking the main line, if his recollection was correct, about 25 miles from Thunder Bay. However, the map could be easily produced.

Motion agreed to.

LA BANQUE NATIONALE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ROCHESTER moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government or the Minister of Justice, or the creditors of one Oliver Latour, or any of them, or any persons on their behalf, in relation to the alleged forfeiture of its charter by La Banque Nationale, by reason of its illegally trading in lumber, and in the manufacture and sale of square timber and saw logs, and the produce thereof, and in other goods, chattels and merchandize, in violation of the Banking Act, to the prejudice of other banking institutions, the lumber trade and the said creditors. Also, for copies of all contracts, depositions and statements and writings submitted to the Government, or the Minister of Justice, evidencing said (illegal) trading, and also copies of the opinion of the ex-Minister of Justice and the present Minister of Justice thereon, and of all Orders in Council having reference to said illegal act of said bank. And also for copies of the registered timber trade mark of the said bank, as registered in the office of the Minister of Agriculture, and of all papers and documents in said office relating thereto. And also copies of all the correspondence between the said bank, or any of its officers, and the Government, or any member thereof, with reference to said alleged violation and forfeiting of its charter by said bank.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the only paper which could be produced, and that was in the Department, was an application on the part of counsel acting on behalf of certain parties for a writ of scieri facias, and the answer of the Department to this application. There was no other correspondence. No correspondence whatever, in this regard, had taken place with the late Minister of Justice. It had all occurred while he held this position.

MR. ROCHESTER said that he moved for these papers, in order to place before the House clear and indisputable evidence that La Banque Nationale had been and was trading as lumber merchants, in violation of its charter, contrary to public policy, and to the prejudice of the lumber trade. This was a Dominion Bank incorporated by Parliament, under the Dominion Banking Act which prohibited the bank from engaging directly or indirectly in any trade or business except the business of banking, and, as a member of this House, he charged La Banque Nationale with owing and working timber limits, making square timber and saw-logs, and manufacturing sawed lumber therefrom, and with selling the same in the public market. It had used a registered timber trade mark, and had been, and was actually, engaged in lumbering generally, and this had been the case for a long period. As public rights and interests were involved, and as this trading was against the public policy of the Dominion, in violation of the Banking Act, and to the prejudice of the lumber trade, he submitted that an enquiry was necessary; and if, on such enquiry being made, these facts could be established, as he asserted could be done, then he held that this bank had forfeited its charter, and that this House should so declare. He had in his possession papers which he thought would satisfy any reasonable man in this House that such was the case, and which he would read. These papers, he felt, would satisfy every member of the House, that the charge and statement which he had made, were fully borne out by the facts. The following document was a copy of one of the contracts of this bank with an individual who operated for it; this would show how brazely and deliberately this bank carried on this trade :—

“ This agreement, made the twenty-fifth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six ;

“ Between Oliver Latour, of the City of Hull, in the County of Ottawa, and Province of Quebec, Lumber Merchant, of the first part; and

“ Whereas the said parties of the second part are the owners of certain timber limits situate on the Keepana River, numbered respectively one hundred and thirty-four, one hundred and thirty-five, and one hundred and thirty-six, of the years 1875 and 1876; and the said party of the first part has contracted to cut, make, manufacture and deliver to the said parties of the second part, certain quantities of square timber and saw-logs, to be taken off and from the said limits, at and for the price or sum, and subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned.

“ Now, this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the premises, and for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, he, the said party of the first part, doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant, promise and agree to and with the said parties of the second part their successors and assigns, in manner following, that is to say :—

“ That he, the said party of the first part, his executors and administrators, shall cut, make and manufacture three hundred thousand feet of square white pine timber, during the winter of the years 1876 and 1877, the said timber to be good and merchantable, and of a size not less than fourteen inches on each side, and to be well and securely rafted after the manner adopted by lumber merchants, and to be floated to the city of Quebec, and there delivered in good order and condition to the said parties of the second part, their successors or assigns, on or before the fifteenth day of August, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, at such place as the said parties of the second part, their successors or assigns, may require.

And, also, that he, the said party of the first part, his executors or administrators, shall cut, make and manufacture fifteen thousand standards of good and merchantable deal white pine saw-logs, of not less than the following dimensions, that is to say: said logs to be thirteen and one-half and sixteen and one-half feet in length, and not to be less than fifteen inches in diameter inside the bark, and to be delivered in good order, and in condition to be floated down to Ottawa with the boom timber necessary for that purpose in the Main Ottawa River, at the place where the general drive starts, on or before the first day of September, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven.

“ And it is hereby agreed that, for the purposes of these presents, the standard log shall be thirteen feet in length, by twenty inches, inside the bark, in diameter.

“ And it is further agreed that the said party of the first part, his executors and administrators shall mark all the said square timber and saw-logs with the timber marker of the said parties of the second part as follows, O L or O L 1 up to O L 6, said timber and logs to be well marked, and in such manner that the said marks may not be effaced, obliterated or destroyed, while the said timber or saw logs shall be floated down to destination.

“ And that the said party of the first part, his executors or administrators, shall, at his and their own costs and charges, supply all materials, tools, implements, labour, wages, provisions, and all things necessary to manufacture the said square timber and saw-logs, and to draw and to drive the same, and to float the same, to the respective places where the said square timber and saw-logs are to be delivered according to the terms of this agreement.

“ And further, that the said party of the first part, his executors or administrators, shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, all Governments dues, tolls and tonnage upon the said timber and saw logs.

“ And further, that the said party of the first part his executors, or administrators, shall take and cut the said square timber and saw-logs off, and from the said timber limits of the said parties of the second part herein before described, and that the said timber and saw-logs shall, while in the process of manufacture, and at all times before as well as after delivery, be the absolute property of the said parties of the second part, and that it shall be lawful to the said parties of the second part, their successors and assigns, at any time to take possession of the said square timber and saw-logs, if they shall think proper.

“ And the said parties of the second part, covenant, promise and agree to and with the said party of the first part, his executors, administrators and assigns, to pay him the said party of the first part, for the making, manufacturing and delivery of the said square timber and saw-logs, the sum of fifty-four thousand five hundred dollars, payable as follows :—That is to say: six thousand dollars on his beginning the said work, and five thousand dollars during each of the months of October, November, December, January, February and March next ensuing the day of the date hereof, provided that work shall have been done at the time when any of the said amounts may be required by the said party of the first part to the value of the moneys previously advanced as shown by the certificate of an agent to be appointed by said parties of the second part, whose wages and expenses shall be paid by the said party of the first part, four thousand dollars during April, two thousand dollars during May, and two thousand dollars during June following, and ten thousand five hundred dollars to be paid when the said square timber is boomed in Quebec, and said logs delivered according to the terms of this agreement.

"In witness whereof, the said parties hereto of the second part have hereunto affixed their corporate seal, and cause these presents to be signed by their President, and the said party of the first part hereunto set his hand and seal, the day and year first above written.

" J. L. CURRIER,
" Dep. P. L. C."

Now, he would ask any member of the House if what was done under the contract with Oliver Latour was legitimate banking? The bank had traded in timber, which was marked in the usual way, from "O.L. 1" to "O.L. 6," and it seemed to him that by so doing its charter had been violated. Other banks were just as much interested in this matter as the commercial community, and they had remonstrated against what they considered to be a gross violation of the Act. It might be said if the bank had violated its charter, why not take proceedings in the Court to have that charter forfeited? In reply to that he would state that the question had been submitted to counsel both in Ontario and Quebec, and their opinion obtained. They held that the bank had forfeited its charter, but that the Provincial Courts had no jurisdiction; the only Court in Canada which could exercise such jurisdiction would be the Exchequer Court. For the maintenance of the old laws of the Crown in the interests of the Dominion, the Attorney-General was the proper party to take such proceedings; the Government which created that charter could alone institute proceedings to enforce its forfeitures. On these opinions being obtained, application was made to the Minister of Justice, as Attorney-General, for his fiat, and in addition to the opinions of counsel, which were submitted, authorities in support of the application were furnished. It was urged that the complaint was made against a system prejudicial to legitimate banking and legitimate trade—particularly the lumber trade. That application was supported by the Ontario Bank, the Union Forwarding Company, himself (Mr. Rochester), and others. Yet the Minister of Justice did not see his way clear to grant the fiat asked for. He doubted the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, but admitted that legislation was necessary to afford a remedy for such abuses as were complained of. Such being the facts, he submitted that lacking any judicial remedy, the Legislature could alone do justice on the public interest and maintain its own laws. He thought, therefore, the House should institute an enquiry, and if the facts he submitted were substantiated, the charter of the bank should be declared forfeited. Unless something was done to prevent it, all the banks in the Dominion might adopt this system of trading, for they had all as much right to do so as the Banque Nationale. The Banque Nationale had not confined itself to one place of operation; it had bought up rafts of timber last year on the Black River, and afterwards sold the timber at Quebec. If that was not trading, he did not know what trading was. The law laid down what the rights and privileges of banks were, and if they were beyond the prescribed limit they were amenable to the law. If this bank was allowed to encroach on the lumber trade, then lumbermen's notes should be legalised so that they might be able to compete with the Banque Nationale. He thought the Minister of Justice ought to bring down the papers asked for together with the registered trade mark adopted by the bank. The matter was urgent and should not be allowed to lie over till next Session of Parliament. Perhaps the best plan would be to refer the matter to the Banking and Commerce Committee to whom all the evidence that had been collected might be submitted. The Ontario Bank was one of the complainants, and he thought no time should be lost in making an investigation.

MR. LAFLAMME said he had no objection to communicate all the information possessed. The parties complaining, he might state, could, if the Banque Nationale had violated its charter, go before any competent tribunal and demand such remedy as the law granted. There was, he believed, at the present time, a case in Chancery arising out of some points connected with this matter. If such was the case, it would be very improper, on the part of Parliament, to interfere or do anything which might prejudice the decision to be given by the Court, which was the only competent tribunal to determine whether the law had been violated, as alleged by the hon. member for Carleton. It was alleged, on the other hand, also, that there had been no violation; that Latour was an insolvent, who transferred all his assets to the bank, which was a creditor on the estate for $75,000. In order to obtain judgment on its claim, the bank very naturally endeavoured to sell the timber referred to.

MR. ROCHESTER said the Minister of Justice seemed to point out that any stockholder in the bank, who thought it had violated its character could have a remedy by raising an action. It was not likely, however, that a stockholder in any corporation which yielded him 10 or 15 per cent., would raise an action as suggested. He understood there was no way whereby redress could be obtained except by coming to the House, because the Minister of Justice had flatly refused to grant his fiat to enable the complainant to go to the Exchequer Court. He knew, to his cost, that Latour was an insolvent, and that his assets had been seized by the bank, because $10,000 worth of property belonging to him (Mr. Rochester) had been transferred with other effects. This was done a month after Latour was made an insolvent, and then he came forward and offered one cent on the dollar. Under these circumstances he thought the House should step in and check this violation of the law. He was aware that the contract was for 1876-7, but the same works were carried on in 1877-8; and not only so, but the Banque Nationale had taken up the lumber trade on the Black River as well. Now, was this to be allowed? He wanted the hon. gentleman to give those who considered themselves aggrieved, the opportunity of showing that they had wrongs to be redressed, and if the hon. gentleman would bring down those papers, that was all they asked.

MR. PALMER said he considered this a matter of very great importance, and it surely could not be that the Minister of Justice had taken upon himself to lay down the law with regard to it. It was bad enough to have a contract with an insolvent man, but that a bank should be allowed to carry on for two or three years, issuing their notes all over the country, was one of the most alarming statements he had yet heard in Parliament. The law said banking companies should not be allowed to do certain acts which might make their currency valueless, and this company had been trading in lumber, which was clearly against the law. If the charter of the company had been violated, the charter should be withdrawn, and it was for the Attorney-General to take this or other means to prevent the carrying on of this illegal trading.

MR. BLAKE said that he saw nothing more dangerous to the interests of the public than that the remedy proposed for this case should be applied. There were, he believed, three or four remedies besides this extreme one, which was a proceeding that should not be resorted to except in the most extreme circumstances possible, after a long continuance of the violation of their charter in essential particulars, and when it was obvious that it was a less evil to abolish that charter altogether. This exercise of such a summary power had almost gone into disuetude. There was another remedy which the Attorney-General could exercise on behalf of the Crown, without the intervention of the subject: he could restrain the bank from continuing to violate its charter. A similar course might be taken, he believed, by the intervention of a stockholder; and he also believed there was a fourth remedy by which a stockholder interested in the bank could proceed without the Attorney-General at all. There were these milder remedies, which would prevent the existence of the evil while it preserved the existence of the bank, instead of the Crown exerting its prerogative, and blotting out this charter, and causing the Corporation to be wound up.

MR. ROCHESTER: Is it not the law of the land?

MR. BLAKE said the power was there, not by Statute, but by common law; but he said it was not for one Corporation to call for the extinction of a rival company. Before exercising such a prerogative, public interest must be considered; and, in his opinion, the public interest and the credit of the country would be injured by this summary proceeding.

MR. ROCHESTER: How long will you allow these proceedings to go on?

MR. PALMER: Why don't you stop them?

MR. BLAKE: I have nothing to do with stopping them.

MR. ROCHESTER: It has been going on for years.

MR. BLAKE: How long has the Crown known of it?

MR. ROCHESTER: Well, I am not prepared to say.

MR. BLAKE: Probably three or four months.

MR. ROCHESTER: I think longer.

MR. LAFLAMME: Certainly not, as far as my recollection goes it must have been in the month of November or September last.

MR. BLAKE said he did not know how long it had been going on, but he believed that the general interest required that the steps should be taken to prevent the continuance of the illegal trading, but not stop the banking corporation altogether.

MR. TASCHEREAU said there was a case now pending before the Chancery Court, and the case of Simon v. Banque Nationale, in which this was the disputed point, and he thought it out of place to discuss now the question whether the Minister of Justice was right or wrong in refusing to grant an order of scieri facias. When the papers came down they would justify the action of the Minister of Justice, and prove that he was right. The Banque Nationale was one of the best institutions in the country, and in its trading transactions had only acted in protection of its own interests. The bank had not been trading illegally, it had been only protecting its own interests in having transfers made to it and working the timber after it had been cut by the insolvent party himself.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be extremely unfortunate that any individual could, because a bank had wittingly or unwittingly acted beyond the scope of its charter, take successful steps to dissolve the Corporation, to destroy its stock, and throw it into confusion. But it was questionable whether the proper authority, the Attorney-General, could refuse a writ of scieri facias on application, however disastrous the consequences might be. This was a question which had arisen on the nonce, and on which, therefore, he was not, at the present moment, prepared to give an opinion. He would be very sorry to find that the law did not allow discretionary power to the Attorney-General in granting this writ, but they must look at the general policy of the Legislature with respect to banking institutions. There had been no point more strongly insisted upon since incorporation was granted to these institutions, than that they should not on any account be drawn from their legitimate business of banking and become trading corporations, even for the sake of securing themselves against probable loss. The temptation was very great, when they had given to the trader advances and found that by taking the business out of his hands they could secure their claim; but even that temptation must be resisted, because it struck at the very policy of the country, and the security of the public had in these institutions, by its being known that the whole policy of the country was against allowing them to become trading institutions under any circumstances. He did not know whether this bank had really become liable to the charge made against it. The fact that there had been an action taken, ought not to interfere with the discussion of the general policy of Parliament with respect to banks. He would set aside the scieri facias altogether, as an extreme measure. The hon. member for South Bruce had said there were three remedies which might be resorted to without destroying the charter. Two of them were no remedies at all to the public generally. One of them was information fyled by a stockholder. No stockholder would take any steps for the purpose of destroying his own bank.

MR. BLAKE: It is a remedy to confine the Corporation to its legitimate business.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman was right. However, the stockholders would be interested in not preventing such institutions from carrying on trading business, which had for its object the saving of the bank from loss. There then remained only the one course, suggested by the hon. member for South Bruce, namely, the information fyled by the Attorney-General, as Attorney-General in the public interest. That was a matter which must at once press upon the attention of the Government, and especially upon the Minister of Finance, who was responsible, as it were, for the whole of our monetary system. Last Fall the Minister of Justice was applied to for a writ of scieri facias, and for the reasons given by the ex-Minister of Justice, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought it would have been well had he paused before refusing to grant this specific application. He thought the necessity was then forced upon him to enquire whether any legal means were at hand to protect the public policy of the Legislature and of the country. Here was an allegation that, year after year, a banking institution had been a trading institution, so much so that it was alleged it had taken out and registered a trade mark. That had been stated to the Government, and yet no steps had been taken by the Government. They should have at once taken steps. If the country had an established policy with respect to banking institutions, it was the business of the Government to carry out that policy, and to punish any infringement of it. He did not agree with the idea that every banking institution, or other corporation, necessarily forfeited its charter by committing an act beyond the powers of its charter; but when a strong specific charge of this nature was made, as long as six or eight months ago, it ought not to have been thrown back upon the parties applying for this remedy by scieri facias. Those parties should not have been told that no scieri facias would be granted, and, at same time, that no other remedy would be granted. He hoped the Government would look into this question.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he was quite aware there was a great deal of force in the remarks of the right hon. member for Kingston, as to the extreme impolicy of allowing corporations to carry on business outside their charter. It was distinctly prohibited by law and was contrary to the general policy relating to banks. The facts mentioned by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester), had only then came to his notice. He would take an early opportunity of conferring with the hon. the Minister of Justice with a view to decide what course to adopt. It was quite true that in times gone by, a good deal of this kind of thing had prevailed, and he was not aware that any action had ever been taken. With reference to the remedies suggested by the hon. member for South Bruce, although it was technically true that persons having a large interest in a bank would not likely attempt to restrain it, still any person who chose to possess himself of a single share would have an absolute, indefeasible right, under the existing law, to apply to a court of jurisdiction to obtain an injunction to restrain the bank. He was not disposed to contravene the position taken by the right hon. member for Kingston, that when facts of this kind were brought to the knowledge of the Government, it might, and probably would, become expedient for the Government to take action in some way or other.

MR. PALMER said the last statement of law was inaccurate. An injunction was a discretionary power, and the moment it was proved the share had been purchased for the purpose of obtaining an injunction, it would be refused.

MR. ROCHESTER said he was glad the hon. the Minister of Finance had promised to look into the matter. He would only make one more remark with regard to this suit in Chancery. He wanted to tell the House distinctly that the parties who had to do with this, had nothing whatever to do with a suit in chancery. If there was such a thing, it was simply a bogus affair entered by the assignee put in possession of the property by La Banque Nationale.

Motion agreed to.

MAILS ON THE LONDON, HURON AND BRUCE RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. GREENWAY moved for copies of all correspondence or petitions with reference to transferring the mails on the London, Huron and Bruce Railway. He said he wished to draw the attention of the hon. the Postmaster-General to the deficient mail accommodation in his section of the country. The London, Huron and Bruce Railway had been opened in 1876, yet, up to the present, no mails had been carried over that line, but the old-fashioned stage-coach had been continued. From one of the stations, Exeter, which had a population of 2,000, it took three days to receive an answer to a letter. The mail left London in the morning at eight o'clock, and reached Exeter, 30 miles distant, at six o'clock the same day. He hoped this state of things would not be allowed to exist any longer. About a year ago the Great Western Railway Company, which had taken charge of this line as part of its system, had put on a mail train, expecting, he presumed, that the mails would soon pass over this line; but it appeared that, having been disappointed, the company now proposed to remove this train. He had in his hand letters which had been recently sent him, one from Exeter, signed by 90 business men of that place, and a second from another point, signed by the same number of persons, urging the necessity of at once securing the mail subsidy, in order that this train, which was of such great importance to the community, might not be removed. He thought that this matter only needed mentioning to show that this state of things ought not to be allowed to continue any longer, and the hon. the Postmaster-General should at once take this matter into consideration and have it remedied.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that this matter had been considered in the Department for some time past, but it involved an expenditure of money which it was not convenient to make last year. He hoped that Parliament would so far approve of the estimates to be submitted as to enable him shortly to tell the hon. gentleman his intention in this respect. At present he must content himself with expressing a hope that at the beginning of the next fiscal year, this service, which was undoubtedly necessary for the public convenience, would be commenced. He also trusted that the hon. gentleman, with this assurance, would not press to have the papers brought down, as he dared say that the hon. gentleman would see that this was not necessary under the circumstances.

MR. GREENWAY said he had hoped that the hon. gentleman could have seen his way clear to remedy this difficulty sooner, but having this assurance, he did not desire to press for the papers.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. PALMER, for MR. KIRKPATRICK, moved for an order of House, that the Clerk do lay on the table a statement shewing the ages, names, present salaries and length of service of each officer and permanent clerk in his Department; also, the ages, names and salaries or daily pay, with date of employment and date when pay commenced, of the sessional or extra clerks at present employed in the service of the House; also, a statement by the Sergeant-at-Arms shewing the ages, names, salaries or daily pay and length of service of messengers and others in his Department, whether employed permanently or otherwise.

WELLAND CANAL IMPROVEMENTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) moved for a Return of all railway plant, machinery, tools, implements and merchandize imported in bond for use by contractors, or others, on the Welland Canal improvements at the ports of Port Colborne, Clifton, and St. Catharines, from 1st July, 1874, to 1st January, 1878. He said he had good authority for stating that a large quantity of material, labouring plant, and a large number of steam excavators, steam pumps, horses, carts and implements of all descriptions had been brought in on the Niagara frontier for the use of contractors on the Welland Canal, on which very little duty, if any, was paid, owing to their being brought in, in hand, or allowed to come in on sufferance, owing to the laxity of the Customs officials on that frontier. The contractors on this work were principally Americans, and they liked to use their own plant, machinery and tools. The distance to the frontier was only some 10 or 12 miles; the cars were constantly passing to and fro; and they very easily got in this plant, on which very little duty, if any, was paid. This entailed very great loss, if it were true, not only on the customs revenue, but also on the manufacturers and people of this country. He knew very well that when Canadians were fortunate enough to secure contracts in the United States, they had to pay duty to the last farthing on their labouring plant horses, carts and steam pumps, etc., which they took over; and he considered that when American contractors secured any work in this country, they should be treated in the same manner. He made this motion in order to direct the attention of the Customs Department to this matter. This system prevailed not only in this portion but also in other portions of the frontier of the Dominion.

MR. BURPEE (St. John), said that, so far as he was aware, the hon. gentleman was misinformed. The system which the hon. gentleman mentioned had not been allowed to exist during the last two or three years, during which period they had collected, if he was correctly informed, duty on all this material that was brought into this country. They had collected something like $18,000 in duty on plant and material that came in at these points. He might say that two or three years ago, the system referred to was permitted, and contractors were allowed to bring in their plant and horses, carts and tools of various kinds in bond, and to use them until exported when the law was cancelled. Of course, there was a large amount of this material not yet exported which was imported during 1872 and 1873, but which was said to be exported; and they were trying to find out the exact facts of the case. During the past three years this practice had been entirely stopped, and so far as they knew, there was no material now coming in, no matter whether for a week or a day, on which duty was not paid; and this rule had been enforced not only at Clifton and Port Colborne, but also at every other point in the Dominion. The duty on all goods brought in by contractors was collected to the utmost extent, and a valuation was taken. The returns would show the exact state of affairs.

MR. NORRIS said he thought that the return should go back to, and include 1870, in order to enable a fair comparison to be made.

MR. JONES: I merely wish to draw the attention of the Department to this matter.

MR. BURPEE: Will the hon. gentleman allow the motion to be amended to go back to 1870?

MR. JONES: Certainly.

MR. CURRIER said he would like to know whether a valuation was put upon the plant which the hon. gentleman said was imported prior to three years ago, and whether this material was valued when exported. If this was done, duty should, in fairness, be paid on the difference between these valuations.

MR. BURPEE said that the valuation was made on entry in warehouse, or in bond, and this would be given in the return. but he did not know whether a valuation was made when the material was sent out of the country. He would ascertain this, if possible.

MR. PLUMB said that the return would be valueless if the old material, when taken back, was not valued. There then was no use in the valuation at all. He would like to know whether duty was paid on tugs brought over, and whether any restrictions made by which the first preference was given to Canadian tugs.

MR. BURPEE said he doubted whether the valuation at the time of export could be obtained, but, if it were possible, he would secure it. They collected duty on the bags brought into this country, and a valuation was made for the time they were used here, whether for one or two years, or any other period.

MR. PLUMB said that the greatest amount of this work had been done in the time of the hon. the Minister of Customs. Work on the Welland Canal was begun, he believed, in 1871, and what formed the basis of this complaint or resolution arose, perhaps, very much in this connection. He could not see that anything which had been previously done had any sort of application or reference to the matter in hand.

MR. BUNSTER said that this question involved a very serious consideration. When British Columbia entered the Dominion, it was stipulated that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built, and this question had precedence. It appeared that Dominion funds were being used to deepen and widen the canals of Ontario and this part of the Dominion, while the Canadian Pacific Railway was totally neglected.

MR. CURRIER.

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot see the relevancy of the hon. gentleman's remarks.

MR. BUNSTER: I bow to the decision of the Chair.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton): I thought British Columbia was always in order.

MR. BUNSTER said that British Columbia was a great deal finer country than Ontario and Quebec put together, and, even if Cape Breton was included, British Columbia could discount it. British Columbia had a right to feel aggrieved at the conduct of the Dominion. When the country was mortgaged to build canals, contrary to the contract, the people had a right to feel aggrieved. He thought the Welland Canal should be left in abeyance till the Pacific Railroad was built.

FOREIGN TRAWLS OFF THE COAST OF NOVA SCOTIA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) moved for correspondence and petitions in the hands of the Government respecting the use of trawls by foreigners off the coasts of Nova Scotia. He said he believed the House would concede that this was a matter of importance. It was alleged, and he thought with correctness, that the use of trawls on our seacoasts had a damaging effect upon our fisheries. When the House considered that our fisheries formed one of our most important industries, and that from this source were produced last year $11,147,558—considerably over one-half of which came from the fisheries of Nova Scotia—it would be seen that the protection of the fisheries was a matter of very great importance. Under the Washington

Treaty, he believed that American fishermen had the same rights as our own, and any rules which might be made by the Fishery Department must apply to them also. The use of trawls was very much condemned by practical men, and from petitions now in the hands of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, it would be seen that in many places the quantity of fish had been diminished by one-half, from this cause alone. This was a matter which seriously affected our fisheries—a field from which we reaped where we had not sown. Trawling, he might say was a mode of catching fish which was practised to a considerable extent. A line was sunk to the bottom of the sea and attached to it were a number of short baited lines. Fish, therefore, which came to our coasts in search of food or for the purpose of spawning were caught in this way, a mode which was objectionable in this respect, that the mother or seed fish, which generally kept some distance from the surface were destroyed before spawning. There trawls, too, when set near the shore, prevented fish to a very great extent from coming into our bays; and sometimes, when, for some reason the lines could not be got at for several days, the fish previously caught became decayed and drove away other fish seeking the coast. It was true, that any immediate interference with our own fishermen as well as Americans in this respect, might be rather a serious matter for a time, but when fishermen themselves were actually clamouring for some protection, he thought the Department of Marine and Fisheries ought to give its attention to the matter. He would suggest that there should be a close season during the months of May, June and July, when no trawling should be allowed on our coasts. Of course, we have no power to prevent trawling outside the three miles limit, and our fishermen would be much more advantageously situated than the American fishermen who had to come long distances from home. Whilst on this subject, he might state that in the county of Victoria, as he had been informed, farmers and others were in the habit of killing salmon in the Fall of the year. Indeed, he was credibly informed that it was no uncommon occurrence for a single individual to kill as many as 58 salmon in one day. Now, if this went on for some years our magnificent fisheries would come to be in the same state as those of the United States waters.

MR. KILLAM said he desired to remark that the question of trawls was not a new one. He believed that, since the human race began to catch fish, there had been a difference of opinion between those engaged in the business as to the propriety of adopting particular modes of fishing. He should like to know, from the hon. member from Cape Breton, some clear explanation as to the kind of fish caught by trawls, and the season of the year at which this was done, because, if a close season was adopted, it would be necessary for the House to obtain this information. He might say that nearly one-half of the fish taken in Nova Scotia were caught by trawls, and it would be a serious matter if that important fishery was injured. The practice of trawling for fish within and without the three miles limit, had been carried on for many years with great advantage. To do away with the practice would, he thought, reduce the number of fish caught by 25 per cent. Fishing by means of trawls had been carried on for years in the North Sea, near the coasts of Great Britain, for many years, and the number of fish there was as great, seemingly, as when the earlier descendants of Adam first fished in those waters. He admitted that the indiscriminate use of trawls in estuaries might be prejudicial at a certain season, but, on the whole, he thought the complaints urged regarding trawling were more imaginary than real.

MR. DAVIES said Professor Baird, the great American authority on matters connected with fishing, had expressed the opinion that the use of trawls was not very destructive of fish, for this reason, that fish coming into shallow waters to spawn were generally in a sickly condition, and did not readily take the hook. Now, with regard to the Gulf fisheries, he was aware that a general feeling prevailed among fishermen that the trawl-fishing was destructive to the mother fish. Professor Baird spoke very strongly with regard to these pounds, which projected out so freely along the shores. He said this system had destroyed the fisheries of the United States, and would destroy our fisheries. No regulation regarding trawls would be of much service, because three miles from our shores the Americans and other foreigners would still be at liberty to fish.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the position he took was this: that, during the months of May, June and July a close season should be established, so that these said fish—and he spoke particularly in reference to cod-fish—should be enabled to spawn. If the hon. member for Yarmouth would glance at the large number of petitions from the Province of Nova Scotia upon this matter, he would see that the average catch of fish there had been reduced to one-half, and the fishermen ascribed this to the use of trawls along the coasts.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said there was certainly a great difference of opinion as to the effect of trawls. Professor Baird, for instance, thought trawl-fishing did no injury whatever; on the western part of Nova Scotia the fishermen themselves thought it was no harm; but, on the eastern coast, they thought it was destructive. It would be useless to stop trawl fishing, or to adopt a close season, when they would be inoperative beyond the three-mile limit. He had copies of the correspondence on the subject, and would lay it on the table.

MR. MITCHELL said he agreed with the hon. the Minister of Fisheries, and believed that five-sixths of the fish taken was beyond the three-mile limit, and, consequently, beyond their jurisdiction.

After Recess.

STAMPS ON PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.—

[BILL No. 4.]

(Mr. Irving.)

THIRD READING.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BLAIN asked, how it was that a Bill of this kind, which affected the revenue of the country, was in the hands of a private member. It seemed to him that it was in violation of the 54th clause of the British North America Act, and of the Rules of the House.

MR. GUTHRIE said that it had been explained by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), who had introduced the Bill, that certain anomalies had been found in practice in regard to the Stamp Act, and this Bill was introduced for the purpose of removing certain doubts. He (Mr.

(Guthrie) thought that any private member might properly introduce a Bill to amend the law, and though it might possibly affect the revenue, the general effect of the Bill was to improve the law relating to stamps on bills and notes.

MR. BLAIN said he thought the well understood practice of the House was that Bills affecting the revenue should first receive the sanction of the Government. He believed there had been cases where the rule had been relaxed, but it seemed to him that this was a case where the rule should be insisted upon.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said the Bill had been carefully considered, and he saw no objection to its passing, although it would, perhaps, be better to abolish the tax altogether.

MR. PALMER said this Bill came in under the 54th section of the British North America Act, and, therefore, the condition of that section, not having been complied with, the Bill was out of order.

MR. GUTHRIE said the 54th section provided that it shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to pass any vote, resolution, address or Bill, for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost to any purpose without having been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor-General. This was not an appropriation of money to any particular purpose. It rather came under the 53rd section which provided that bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons.

MR. TUPPER said that one of the clauses, the 3rd, distinctly imposed a tax that did not now exist. On the 427th page of May, it was stated that precisely the same principle which applied to the appropriating of money applied to the imposition of a tax, May said :—

“The Houses are as stanch in proceedings for levying a tax as they are in granting money, and it is the practice, without any exception, for all Bills that distinctly impose such a charge on the people to originate in the Committee of the Whole House.”

He took it that the objection taken by the hon. member for West York, was entirely fatal to proceeding with this Bill, which should have originated by resolution in Committee of the Whole House. This Stamp Act had occasioned a great deal of difficulty in the country; and if there was any class of legislation that the Government ought to take charge of, it was that which relates to the stamp duties. If the Bill was to be proceeded with, it should be taken up by the Government, and these different measures and amendments should be amalgamated in a plain and intelligible Bill that would be comprehended by the general public.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said that this question should only be brought up while the Speaker was in the Chair. The Bill was before the Committee and should be disposed of. Besides, a question like this should have been raised before the second reading. In support of this position he would draw attention to May, page 454, where it was laid down, that in preparing Bills, care should be taken that they did not contain provisions not authorized by orders of leave; that the titles correspond with the orders of leave, and that they were prepared in proper form. If it should appear during the progress of a Bill that these rules had not been observed, the House would order it to be withdrawn. Such objections, however, should be taken before the second reading. It had not been the practice to order Bills to be withdrawn after they had been committed, on account of any irregularity which could not be cured, while the Bill was in Committee, or on recommittal. He would further remark that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) had introduced a precisely similar Bill last Session. The hon. gentleman had certainly precedent and authority for his proceeding. He took it that it was not necessary for an Act referring to bills of exchange to originate in Committee of the Whole House.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he failed to see that anything in this Bill effected the revenue. There was not the slightest intention to appropriate any tax by means of this Bill. He did not think that if it was desirable to adopt this measure on its merits, it should be thrown out on the objection taken by the hon. member for West York.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that this discussion was altogether out of order. The Committee had simply to settle the clauses of the Bill. The House only could deal with the point raised.

MR. PALMER said that he disagreed with the right hon. gentleman. It was hardly worth while to consume two or three hours in discussing this Bill, if it was perfectly clear that it would have to be thrown out. He would refer hon. gentlemen to the 86th and 88th Rules of the House in support of his position that this measure could not go any further. He would ask the hon. member for Chateaugay whether any private member could bring in a Bill to tax the people of this country?

MR. HOLTON said that he had not heard the discussion, and he was not prepared to say whether this point of order was well taken or not. He entirely agreed with the right hon. member for Kingston that this discussion in Committee was irregular and quite out of place.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said, for a precedent as to the introduction of a measure of this sort by a private member, he would refer hon. gentlemen to Hansard of last year.

MR. MCCARTHY: I rise to a point of order.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I think that the only question under discussion is the preamble of the Bill, the clauses were all passed the other night.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The clauses were adopted and the preamble held over.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Clause No. 2 certainly stood over, because a point was raised as to whether there was not a danger to the revenue in the event of its being passed, and I agreed to take it into consideration.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

MR. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said when the Bill was previously before the House, he raised the objection that if the 2nd clause was passed parties residing in Canada might, through their agents, date drafts from the United States for the purpose of evading payment of stamps. He thought this second clause should be held over till another Session.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, as having charge of the Bill in the absence of the promoter, he could not allow it to be held over on such an objection.

MR. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) suggested that these words should be inserted, "And not discounted or transferred in Canada."

MR. BLAIN said it seemed to him the House was proceeding contrary to the 56th clause of the British North America Act.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton): I rise to a point of order. It seems to me that point has already been decided.

THE CHAIRMAN: I decided that the only question before the House was the preamble. At the same time any hon. member can move that a clause be re-opened for discussion.

MR. McDOUGALL (Renfrew): I move that the 2nd clause be considered by the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that to prevent loss to the revenue these words had better be added: "Unless the same be negotiated in Canada." This would prevent any attempt to defraud the revenue.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said if it was shown that by having negotiable securities dated and made payable in a foreign country, there was a fraudulent evasion of the law, the validity of these documents would be destroyed. But if a bill or promissory note was drawn in England, France or the United States, by parties there, and made payable in these countries, its validity was recognized by the comity of nations.

MR. MACKENZIE said the question as to the right of the question and the policy were two different things. Of course, it would never do to impose the tax of a new stamp every time a note changed hands. On the other hand, a note made abroad and brought here for the purpose of negotiation might be stamped.

MR. McCARTHY said the hon. gentleman must know that a promissory note was of no value unless properly stamped; therefore, this would protect any robbery of the revenue in that respect.

MR. MACDOUGALL (South Renfrew) moved that the second clause be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MITCHELL thought it would be better to strike out the whole Bill, and bring in a comprehensive measure that would incorporate the other Stamp Acts now in operation.

MR. PLUMB suggested that it would be better to have the Bill withdrawn.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendment read the first time.

MR. GUTHRIE moved the second reading of the amendments.

MR. KILLAM objected to two stages being taken.

MR. SPEAKER: The rule prohibits Bills being read more than once on one day, except in case of urgency, but it does not prevent taking two stages.

MR. BLAIN rose to a point of order. It was not competent for the House to proceed further with this Bill. He called attention to the 54th section of the British North America Act, and to the 86th Rule of this House, and contended that, under the first section of this Bill, it was clear that such an impost was to be imposed as would bring the measure within the rules of the House and the section of the Act to which he had referred.

MR. GUTHRIE said the Bill imposed no new tax. The tax was imposed by the Stamp Act. The first section merely described what should be a sufficient standing to comply with the present law.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think the first clause was open to the objection taken. It in no way imposed any additional burden, but the 3rd section did.

MR. PALMER contended that no private member could introduce a Bill affecting the revenue. Besides, this was an interference with the trade of the country, as it allowed people to make good paper which would now be invalid.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the objection came too late, and was, therefore, out of order. According to May, all such objections should come before the second reading.

MR. SPEAKER: The whole question occurs to me at the present moment in this light. In the first place, I may say that the 54th Clause of the British North America, 1867, has no bearing whatever, in my opinion, on the case. It relates merely to appropriations. Hon. members in reading it over rather cursorily are led into a mistake, owing to its peculiar reading which is as follows:—"It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the Public Revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor-General in the Session in which each Vote, Resolution, Address or Bill is proposed." This clause does not bear on the question of the imposition of taxes at all, it merely relates to appropriations. The general law of Parliament, however, is very clear—that whenever it is proposed to impose a new tax, this should only be done by the Government. But we have, ourselves, here a Rule relating to the mode in which Bills of this kind shall be introduced. The 88th Rule is as follows:—"If any motion be made in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, before any Resolution or Vote of the House do pass thereupon." Under this Rule it is clearly necessary that any measure purporting to impose a duty on the people, should be introduced in the first place by Resolution of the Committee of the Whole House. On that point there can be no doubt whatever. Now the only question that arises is whether this Bill, if passed, would or would not impose an additional tax on the people. This question was raised soon after the Bill was introduced, possibly on the second reading, and then the hon. mover stated distinctly to the House that it would not impose any additional burden, that it required no additional stamps to be attached to any instrument whatever, and that he introduced it merely for the purpose of removing doubts which had arisen in some of the Courts as to the value to be attached to the re-stamping of foreign bills of Exchange accepted in this country. He stated—and nobody seemed to contradict him, and none of the lawyers in the House did so—that it had been the practice, and this was again stated this evening, that where parties in this country received foreign bills of exchange which had not the required stamps in the first instance, to put on double stamps; that suits had arisen on notes and bills so stamped and that some doubt existed in the Courts as to whether this putting on of the double stamp did or did not give validity to the note. If that were so, this would be merely an explanatory Act, which did not create any new burden, but simply defined what the law was. It occurred to him that the matter stands in this way; if this Bill now before the House provided that certain stamps should be attached to foreign bills of exchange in certain cases, that in other cases double stamps might be affixed, and that unless in the first instance a proper stamp were affixed, or unless in the other case double stamps were affixed, the note would be valueless, then he thought that it would impose a tax on the people; but as it stands at present, the penalty was clearly inoperative. If a foreign bill of exchange comes into the hand of an innocent holder not stamped at all or insufficiently stamped, it is valueless, absolutely valueless, and if the doubts that are entertained are well founded as to the right to put double stamps on, then he cannot possibly render that valuable, and it cannot certainly, to that individual, be a tax or burden, that he may make that which the law declares otherwise worthless, to have a fair value by a certain operation. The question was one rather for a Law Court than for a Speaker of the House of Commons to determine. It was very much to be regretted that this Bill was not, in the first instance, introduced by Resolution, and if he had then been consulted on the subject, he would have advised it; but as the matter now stands, he could not perceive that if the Bill passed it would impose any burden on anybody. The only persons who would pay the duty were the persons relieved by affixing the stamps to the bill, and who would thus be enabled to collect the face value of the instrument.

LOAN OF 1876.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy, for an Order of the House for statement respecting the loan of 1876, read.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not propose to detain the House further with the discussion of this point. I will simply say that I have no objection to the 1st, 4th, 5th, and 6th items of this loan; the 2nd and 3rd I cannot agree to, for the simple reason, in the first place, that I have not got the information required; and I doubt, indeed, whether it continues in existence at this House. The House is aware that such information was not granted in the case of previous loans.

MR. PLUMB said that after the able remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland, he would not have addressed the House had it not been for the remarks of the Finance Minister. The principal points in the discussion were, the manner in which the loan was floated, and the scale of interest that it had been alleged had been saved. The very action of the Government in requiring that all contracts should be made by tender was an argument that the loan should have been floated by tender. It was the contention of the Opposition that had the loan been made at the proper time and in the open market it would have been more favourable for Canada. The hon. member for Cumberland had already shown that the price of the Australian loan was higher than the ruling quotation for small amounts upon the open market. This great Dominion, he held, ought to have a high character and credit in the markets of the world. That credit might have been injured by the financial statements of the Finance Minister at a time when, if ever, the silver side of the shield should be shown. A great many of the difficulties of Canada in respect to the negotiations of public securities were no doubt owing to the Finance Minister's injudicious statements in his initial Budget Speech, and it was no wonder capitalists should have been alarmed by them. The loan of 1876 was negotiated under peculiarly favourable circumstances, so far as the English market was concerned, for railway securities had grown into disfavour, and a large amount of money was lying idle in the coffers at London. There was a great plethora of money in the financial centres, there was a distrust of foreign loans and securities, a low rate of interest was ruling, and capitalists were anxious to get safe investments. The Finance Minister had said that the peculiar juncture at which this loan was put on the market was the only time at which a loan could have been effected. There were certainly complications in Europe, but to-day, notwithstanding the rumours that led to the supposition that a war was inevitable, there was no great decline in the public securities. The loan should have been effected by tender and the credit of Canada tested. Had that been done the bonds would have been more scattered among the people, they would be subject to less fluctuations, and there would be less danger of any great fluctuations bringing down the prices. As it was, they had been put into the hands of those who were at once affected by any fluctuation in the market, and that being the case, if a fluctuation occurred, it would be most damaging to the credit of Canada. The Finance Minister had stated that it was impossible for those who took the loan to make anything but a small profit. He (Mr. Plumb) held that they could make a large profit. The loan netted 89, and the price quoted to-day, including accrued interest, was about 92. If any one having sufficient credit had taken a large sum at the price at which the loan was floated, he would have made not only the difference between the price at which he took the loan, and the price which it bears now, but there would have been a profit out of the interest of at least two or two and a half per cent. by holding the bonds for a year or eighteen months. He could have borrowed at the current rate of interest, and could have received four per cent. on his money by taking up portions of the Finance Minister's bonds, which would have left him a margin of two or two and a half per cent. He had not proposed to criticize the loan severely, but considering the statements of the Finance Minister there was no wonder if the credit of the country was low. In connection with the general negotiation of the loan, very misleading statements had been made. It had been stated, among other things, that a very material saving had been effected by the four per cent. loans. It had been calculated that the four per cent. loans were made at par, but it must be remembered that for every \$10,000, \$8,900 were received into the Public Treasury. Secondly, it was to be remembered that any statement which represented the four per cent. was entirely misleading, for the truth was that the loan cost really  $1\frac{3}{4}$  per cent., as he (Mr. Plumb) had shown before. Instead of calculating, therefore, at four per cent., the calculation must be made at  $4\frac{3}{4}$ . The Finance Minister, during his summer campaign, made the statement that the rate of interest had been considerably lowered by him, and that where for every \$100 we borrowed we paid \$5.87 some years ago, we were only paying \$4.64 now, or, in other words, the rate of interest had been reduced by nearly 12 per cent. Now the Public Accounts were made to show that the average rate of interest was \$4.86, but that was wrong, as the following calculation would show:—In 1873 the debt bearing six per cent. was \$46,445,571, in 1877 the debt bearing six per cent. was \$56,436,146, showing a decrease of \$10,009,225. The debt bearing interest at 4 per cent. in 1873 was \$12,182,426; that bearing the same rate of interest in 1877 was \$66,048,861, showing an increase since 1873 of \$53,866,435. Of this four cent debt about \$19,060,000 would appear to be composed of the Imperial guaranteed loan. The balance consisted of a loan of 1874, \$19,466,666, and several minor items amounting to \$1,306,435. All these loans were made at a discount of 9 to 10 per cent., including commissions. In 1874, the following sums appeared against the loan in the Public Accounts, \$2,212,796; in 1876, \$304,508; in 1877, \$1,168,803, making a total of \$3,686,107, or a little over ten per cent. on \$36,500,000. Therefore, on a comparison of the rate of interest payable on the debt of 1873, as against that of 1877, the debt \$133,208,699 must be reduced by the \$3,686,107, which made \$129,522,592. And to the interest actually paid, \$6,483,727, must be added two per cent., the difference between six and four per cent. on the sum of \$1,009,225 transferred from the six per cent. loan, \$200,185. That gave the whole interest payable on the debt as \$6,683,912. That was 5.16 per cent. on \$129,522,592, instead of 4.86 as shown in the Public Accounts, or 0.04 per cent. more than the rate of interest in 1873, when it was 5.12. Under any circumstances, there could be no doubt that the statement as to the reduction by the Finance Minister was perfectly untenable. The comparisons by the Finance Minister of these loans with those of foreign countries were also unjust, because of the fact of our connection with the Mother Country. He deplored the fact that the Finance Minister had no proposition to make to meet the deficits that were constantly occurring.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he believed the custom had been to refuse the names, though he could not see the reason for it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not, himself, attach any very great importance to the giving and withholding of the names, but the agents who contracted the loan had conducted it according to the usual London custom, which would not permit them to give the names.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS BILL.

THIRD READING.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury) said that, in accordance with the notice he had given, he begged to move that the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same, by inserting the following new clause:—“When in any Province a non-resident elector is entitled by the laws in force in the Province to notify to the proper officer his selection of a polling district for polling his vote, such notice for any election to the House of Commons may be given to the Returning Officer for not less than eight days before the nomination, and the name of such elector shall thereupon be entered on the list of voters for the selected polling district, and erased from any other list of voters for the Electoral District." He believed that this would only apply to New Brunswick, for he was informed that in Ontario and Quebec voters voted in the polling districts where their property was situated. He was not aware of the law in the other Provinces, but in New Brunswick, electors were allowed by the local law to select their own polling districts any day before the 24th day of the December preceding the election. Non-resident electors, by written notification to the Sheriff of the county, should have their names transferred from the shiretown list to any list they chose, as, under the local law in that Province, any number of agents could be appointed by the candidate, and the universal practice had been for the candidates on the day of nomination to appoint the non-resident electors who wished their names transferred from the shiretown list to any particular polling district, as their agents, in the polling districts where they wished to vote. This being the case, no transfers were taken on the 24th day of December, and this would, to a great extent, disfranchise these non-resident voters. Their number varied from 160 to 400 in each county. There were 232 in his own county. If no such provision as he proposed were made, one polling booth or two polling booths extra would be required at each shiretown for non-resident voters, who would be by this measure practically disfranchised, because, under the law establishing simultaneous polling, they could not, of course, attend in two districts on polling day, unless facilities for doing so were provided. He thought that no objection should be taken to this motion, which was intended to facilitate the recording of their votes by non-resident voters.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not see the necessity for this proposition from the reasons given by the hon. gentleman. He had heard no reason to show why this selection should be made eight days before the nomination. It was quite customary for members to be returned by acclamation, of which fact he was a living example, and why should people be troubled with this formality when they believed that their votes might not be required. He could, however, understand, that this provision might prove advantageous in a pocket-borough, like the constituency which the hon. gentleman represented, and which he (Mr. Mitchell) could canvass every morning before breakfast. He did not believe that the elections would occur before September or November, though the hon. gentleman might be better informed, and it was possible that that they would take place in June, in which event, as this law would not be then in circulation, this amendment might aid the hon. gentleman to the disadvantage of his opponent. He did not think that any change in the present law, which worked very well, was desirable.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he would not refer to the terms in which the hon. gentleman had alluded to his constituency, which was too well-known and too respectable to require any defence at his hands. He did not desire to change the law or practice in any respect. This proposition only allowed non-resident electors to select the polls at which they desired to vote, eight days before the nomination, giving the returning officer ample time to make up his lists. It was only intended for the convenience of non-resident electors.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that he did not know anything about the merits of the case; but this was a rather extraordinary interference with a Government measure. They were not aware what course the Government proposed to adopt with respect to this proposition. He understood that the hon. gentleman had previously communicated his proposition to the Government, and the hon. gentleman had been guilty of want of respect to the House in not communicating it to hon. members, as this was the third reading of the Bill.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury) said their attention was not called to this matter until on the last occasion when this measure was before the House, when he had communicated with the Government in this regard.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman asked that the Bill be not read the third time, as he had an amendment which he wished to propose. I asked to see it, and I did see it. This was only the day before yesterday, and he announced his intention at any rate of moving it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they had not been informed as to the character of the proposed amendment. The hon. gentleman ought not to have taken the House by surprise in this manner. He thought, as a matter of justice to the House, this resolution should be allowed to stand over till to-morrow, in order that it might be considered.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said, as the law stood in New Brunswick at present, a non-resident elector had to notify to the Sheriff, on some day previous to the 24th December preceding the election, that he desired to vote, not in the shiretown, but some other polling place. Now, he presumed that very few non-resident electors made a selection before the 24th December, and what the mover of the amendment proposed was that a voter should give notice to the sheriff in writing, before the nomination day, that he wished to vote at some place nearer where he resided, instead of going 90 or 100 miles off to the shiretown for the purpose of voting.

MR. KIRK said the Bill affected Nova Scotia as well as New Brunswick.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said if it was the case that the amendment affected the other Provinces, besides New Brunswick, that was an additional reason why time should be given for its consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no doubt a good deal in what the hon. gentleman opposite said, but his strictures on the Government were out of place. The principle of the present law was to accept the local lists, and the House made the division themselves. Any interference would, of course, have to be avoided, but this amendment made no change.

MR. BURPEE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for Sunbury should allow his amendment to drop, and allow the Bill to pass. It was, after all, only a disturbing element brought in at the end of the Session.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he did not wish to embarrass the House, and he would withdraw his amendment. Perhaps it might be moved and fully discussed in the Senate, after which it could be brought back, when hon. gentlemen would have an opportunity of looking at it.

MR. LANGEVIN said before the third reading was carried, he wished to record the opinion he expressed the other day to the Minister of Justice about the inconvenience that would be caused in districts where there were only one judge for three or four counties.

MR. TUPPER said he wished to take this opportunity of asking the hon. the Minister of Justice whether any consideration had been given to a point which he had previously raised. It did not come up strictly in connection with this Bill, but had reference rather to controverted elections. Practically, there was no Controverted Elections Act, and no check to bribery and corruption, or any of the questions dealt with at an election held just previous to the last Session of a Parliament. By an amendment which had been made in the Controverted Elections Act, no election could be controverted at a last sitting. But he would take the case of a first election, which was a much more important one. Suppose the writs of general election were issued and made returnable before the calling of Parliament, a new House could not practically be had, and the right of a member to sit there could not be questioned.

MR. LAFLAMME said when the amendment was introduced, it was with the consent of both sides of the House. The late Mr. Hillyard Cameron conferred with the ex-Minister of Justice and they both settled the point, which averted a great deal of inconvenience. If it had been otherwise, there was a possibility that after a general election all the members' seats might be contested, and if members attended to their summonses, as they were bound to do, there would not be a quorum, and the whole business of the House would be suspended in order that members might attend the court. There could be no doubt that the provision was a good one, and it should not be rescinded.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said every member of the House was there on the assumption that he represented the people, and if that right was questioned, it should be settled as soon as possible. The contingency pointed out by the Minister of Justice, that the seat of every member might be challenged, was an absurd one. Besides, it was not necessary even in that case that business should be suspended because a member would have only to attend the court in reference to a petition as he would with regard to a matter affecting his private business. In England, electoral trials went on without reference to whether Parliament was sitting or not. He acknowledged that his late respected friend, Mr. Hillyard Cameron, took a different view; but that view was not a wholesome one. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had stated so before the House, but could not bring it up formally because his own seat was, at the time, affected, and he was, therefore, an interested party. He had felt then, and he felt now, that the object should be, whenever a petition was presented against a member, to take every means to prevent delay in the prosecution, and decide whether the man had a right to his seat or not, rather than allow him to sit and vote when he had no right to his seat.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman had stated that the party should be proceeded against as rapidly as possible. That was quite true; but if the objection was worth anything, it would be against permitting a man to vote in the House while his seat was being contested. The case being in his favour, he should rather obey the mandate of the Crown than the mandate of the Court. The right hon. gentleman knew there was no objection taken to this measure when it was brought up by the hon. member for South Bruce and concurred in by the late hon. member for Cardwell.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was brought up by Hon. Mr. Dorion.

MR. MILLS said the point to which the then hon. member for Cardwell, the late Mr. Hillyard Cameron, called the attention of the House, was that a suit might be entered against a member for a mere vexatious purpose, without any serious intention of proceeding with it. The suit might be delayed from time to time under various pretexts, and it was to prevent this abuse that the amendment was made in the Election Law.

MR. MACKENZIE said this discussion was out of order. The point had been started by an hon. gentleman on the one side, and replied to by one on the other, and should not be allowed to go further.

THE SPEAKER declared the discussion out of order.

Bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—THE COAL INTERESTS.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved, that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, and the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton), moved

“That all the words after “that” to the end of the said motion be left out, and the following be inserted instead thereof:—“in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to impose a duty of seventy-five cents per ton, upon all coals imported into the Dominion, so as to help to meet the financial deficiency, and, at the same time, give a stimulus to a most important industry.”

He said he wished to call the attention of the House to the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia. He had endeavoured to do this before, but an hon. member claimed and had granted him precedence by the Speaker, and on several occasions during previous sittings of the House, he had also brought the matter to the notice of the House, but nothing of much practical moment had resulted from it. During last Session a Committee had been appointed, of which he had been chairman, to enquire respecting this industry, which was an important factor in a county, prosperity, power and progress; and from the data therein furnished by a number of witnesses, he was induced to bring the matter before the House this Session. It appeared that some $12,000,000 had been invested in working the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and in addition to this large amount of capital invested, a number of other industries were almost entirely dependent on the coal trade. It was well known that the shipping interest was closely allied to it. The tonnage employed in 1873 in carrying coal from Nova Scotia exceeded half a million, and the number of hands employed, directly or indirectly, amounted to about 23,000. The output of coal during that year amounted to 1,051,467 tons, and the number of vessels employed, directly or indirectly, in the trade amounted to 3,604, including 428 steamers. The output had fallen off from over a million of tons in 1873 to 757,496 tons in 1877. The main cause of this decrease was the imposition by the United States of an impost duty of 75c. per ton, which made it impossible for the Nova Scotia coal to compete with the Pennsylvania and other coals in their markets. The imposition of a tax of 10c. per ton on all coals exported, abolished a large percentage of the profits of the mines, and also materially interfered with their profitable working. The Dominion imported from the United States 933,980 tons last year, the whole of which was admitted free of duty. Of this quantity 420,000 tons was anthracite. It was true there was no anthracite in Nova Scotia, but the bituminous coal there produced was of such good quality that if it could be sent to Ontario it would be largely used in the place of the anthracite. Ontario was entirely dependent on the United States for her coal, and if any disturbances occurred, or any combination took place among the proprietors of mines in that country, the price could be raised to almost any extent. Ontario was, in this respect, owing to the want of reciprocal trade relations with Nova Scotia, entirely at the mercy of the United States. Considering the quantity of coal used, and that it is a necessity, it was of the utmost importance that it should be obtained as much as possible from amongst ourselves, and not imported from a foreign country. A duty should be imposed on foreign coal, which, it seemed to him, would be as wise and legitimate a duty as that on other articles, and it would be an easy method of strengthening our financial position; and, besides, we had precedents for it as, in addition to the United States, Cuba, Barbadoes, Trinidad, the Bahamas, and even Newfoundland, levied a duty upon coal, and yet none of the latter had any mines in operation. It might be said that coal was a raw material, but he maintained the contrary. It required to be cut, to be hewn, to be picked out, to be shovelled, blasted and riddled, and was, in fact, as much a manufactured article as lumber. The coal mine owners paid a duty on almost every article they used, and were entitled to some consideration in return. There was no industry which paid so much to the revenue as the coal trade. The system pursued in the United States was one which was liable to utterly destroy this interest. Besides their protective duty of 75c., a rebate was allowed on every ton shipped from their coal fields via Baltimore to the North-Eastern ports. Mr. Belloin, a gentleman well acquainted with the coal trade of Nova Scotia and the United States, in his evidence before the Committee, said: "I would suggest the building up of the coal trade of Nova Scotia by a duty equal to that of the United States, thus placing the Nova Scotia trade in the same position as coal shipped from Baltimore and other ports and places." He further says that, "if the imposition of a similar duty was made, the effect would be that the United States would remove their duty." Another witness said: "That a duty would help us, at all events, in exports to Quebec and Ontario to compete with the American coal there," and "to that extent it would enable us to meet the 75c. imposed there." Other testimony is to the effect that the witness "was prepared to adopt a retaliatory tariff with the United States." Yet another said:

MR. MACKAY.

“That a duty of 75c. per ton would enable them to give a higher freight, and enable them to take a less quantity of down freight”; that, “on the supposition that a 75c. duty would be imposed, that we would anticipate no difficulty in getting sufficient down trade. I believe we have reasonable grounds for demanding of the United States Government the free admission of our coal, as we now grant the same to them; and failing which, a duty equal to what is charged on ours should be imposed on theirs.” Yet another witness said: “Let the Government place us on an equal footing with the United States by charging them 75c. duty per short ton, and we will give Ontario as cheap coal as she now receives; and we will be enabled thereby to command our own market, and the $3,320,000 spent annually for coal from other countries will remain at home.” It was about time that the special legislation against our coal mining industry by the United States and the combinations of the Pennsylvania coal mining proprietors should be resented by this country. The evidence adduced before the Committee last Session proved, as he had just shown, that, if a duty was placed on American coal similar to their duty on ours, the combination of coal mining proprietors who allied themselves together for the purpose of having this duty imposed, would exert themselves for the purpose of having it taken off. The trade between Nova Scotia and Ontario was entirely one-sided. In 1865-6, Nova Scotia imported from Ontario and Quebec goods to the value of $508,935, which, in 1876, increased to $3,500,000, and the export from Nova Scotia to those Provinces in 1876 only amounted to $438,000. It was, therefore, a serious question whether Nova Scotia would not have to seek another market, where it could sell its products and purchase in exchange those articles it required, instead of buying so much from these Provinces. It had been said the distance between Ontario and Nova Scotia was too great to allow of coals being shipped from the one to the other profitably, but when it was considered that England shipped coals to Quebec and to many parts of the United States, the West Indies and

San Francisco, it would be seen that the distance could not be an objection. The manufacturing interests were well protected by a duty of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., which, with the cost of transportation, insurance and other charges, in many instances equalled 25 or 30 per cent. The agricultural interests were also benefitted and protected under the existing tariff. The only industry which was not fostered was the coal trade, and it above, all others absorbed agricultural products, and manufactured and other goods, upon which duties were levied by the Dominion. The trade was a consumer and not a producer of any of these articles. The resolution which the right hon. member for Kingston brought in two Sessions ago, left out entirely any reference to the mining interests of this Dominion, but he considered it advisable to refer to them in his resolution this Session. He (Mr. MacKay) would like to know whether the policy of the Opposition was to give to that industry a fair share of incidental protection? Two classes of coal were imported, bituminous and anthracite. If a duty were placed on bituminous coal only, it would be of little value to the coal mine proprietors of Nova Scotia; its principal effect would be to increase the consumption of anthracite, as was clearly shown by the witnesses before the Committee. Were a duty charged it would be beneficial to Ontario as well as Nova Scotia, because if the latter sent coal to Ontario it would be necessary to obtain return cargoes, thus opening a large reciprocal trade between the two Provinces. It was established before the Committee already referred to, last Session, by several gentlemen who were very well informed on the subject, that coal could be shipped as far west as Toronto, and be delivered as cheaply as United States coals, provided the canal tolls were removed, a duty imposed, and return cargoes had. The only serious obstacle was the import of coal from the United States, upon which, if a duty were imposed equal to that imposed by them on Canadian coal, Nova Scotia would be enabled to supply the whole Province of Ontario, and take, as return freight, the products of that Province. He desired to have the opinion of this House on that important matter. He was desirous of having the opinion of the right hon. member for Kingston, and of all the gentlemen who followed him in the House. He desired that they should affirm their position before this House, and the country, on this important question. He had heard their opinion with respect to agricultural interests and manufacturing interests, and it was about time they should declare their policy with respect to the coal mining interests of the Dominion.

MR. MITCHELL said that hon. gentlemen should express an opinion on this question, as initiating a principle upon which the interests of the country would in the future depend. He would vote against this amendment for this reason: He was not a Protectionist in the true sense of the word; but he was this much of a Protectionist. He thought that the interests of this country called for the consideration of readjustment of the tariff with regard to our position towards the United States. While he was prepared to take up the whole question of considering how they should readjust the tariff, which was necessary to maintain the expenditures required for the carrying on of the business of the country, he was not prepared to take up, piecemeal, items and individual interests and protect them against every other interest in Canada. He wished to be clearly understood in this matter. He came from a county which had every interest in securing free trade, manufacturing nothing save lumber, which was sold, not on this continent, but in Europe; and no system of protection that this House could devise would tend to promote the interests of the people he had the honour to represent. He considered the question from higher and nobler grounds than of interest. He was not going to deal with the interests of this country and he cared not how this might effect him in the coming contest next summer, for he was bound to look at what the interests of Canada were as a whole, and this was what he was going to do. He proclaimed his intention in order that there might be no misunderstanding regarding his views on the great issue which lay between the hon. gentlemen who advocated Protection on the one hand and those who advocated Free-trade at any cost on the other hand,—the gentlemen who occupied the Treasury Benches and who advocated Free-trade and the sacrifice of Canada's interests to any extent, and the hon. gentlemen, on the other side of the House, who advocated Protection. He was not answerable for the course taken by the regular Opposition. He was propounding the views which he himself entertained on the question, on which he was at all events going to appeal to his constituents, and while their interests lay in the direction of having as few taxes as possible on imports, being not manufacturers, yet looking to the necessities of the revenue, he prepared to represent their wishes and views, and say that, "The interests of Canada called for a readjustment of the tariff, so that the 22 or 24 millions required were raised." He was sure they would be willing to endorse the sentiments he uttered and to have their representative place upon record his opinion in respect of what might or might not be for the interest of Canada in the readjustment of those imports which were necessary for the maintenance of the Government and the public works of the country. The views that he entertained on this matter were these: He was not a Protectionist, he was a Free-trader in the abstract, but they had to put on a certain amount of duties to raise the 22 or 24 millions required to maintain our public works, to meet the indebtedness created, and to provide for the necessary legislation and the other public service, requisite to carry on the business of Canada; and he was prepared to support—no matter from which side of the House it came—the principle of so readjusting the imports and taxes necessary to raise this revenue as to encourage and promote, within our own borders, the manufactures which would keep within our own borders our own people, and create a home market for the products of our farmers, and give employment to the sons and daughters of the people of this country. This was the doctrine which he laid down. Hon. gentlemen opposite might call him a protectionist, or free-trader, but he was in favor of adopting a policy which would secure the revenue required, while it aided our industries, and, at the same time, did not increase the burdens of the people. Such a policy would encourage our own manufactures, and keep within our borders our young men and our young women, who, for the last 15 years, had been going to the United States to find employment, and make homes for themselves there. He desired to see this system changed.

MR. YOUNG: That is the present system.

MR. MITCHELL said that this was not the present system. This was a system which the hon. gentleman repudiated, and did not recognise. It would keep our own people in our own borders, and give them employment. The Government which the hon. gentleman supported, and blindly followed and gave his adhesion to, did not adopt the system or policy which he (Mr. Mitchell) now indicated, and which he thought Canada ought to pursue. He was bound to vote against the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton, because it was politically dishonest with regard to the people of this country. The hon. gentleman desired that he (Mr. Mitchell) should impose a tax of 25 or 50 cents a ton on coal consumed in this country; and why? In order to build up the coal mines of Nova Scotia. Doubtless, the members for Nova Scotia would support this motion; but the people of New Brunswick would not do so, and why? They did not think that it was necessary to put 8 or 5 cents a ton on the coal of Nova Scotia, and do nothing more in this direction. He was prepared to advocate such a duty, if it was adopted as a general principle, and if it was proposed to consider every interest in Canada in this relation—our manufactures, the shoe and iron manufacturing interests, and a host of other industries which he need not mention, he was prepared to consider these interests a whole, although his county was interested in having the least possible amount of taxation imposed, as it imported and did not manufacture. Nevertheless, he was prepared to consider, in a general system of Protection, these interests as a whole, but he would not take them up as individual interests, and do as his hon. friend would do. He would not ask for Protection on coal. When the question of general policy came up hon. gentlemen opposite might be placed in an awkward position, and come out and condemn the very principle which the hon. gentleman now asked them to support, because he was specially interested in it. He wished to place his views on this point on record. He desired the tariff to be so readjusted that, while no more revenue was raised than was now obtained, our manufacturing and agricultural interests should be encouraged, and the people across the line be prevented from sending over their surplus articles and destroying the manufactures of the people of our own country. These were the views which he entertained, and he took this early opportunity of putting them on record. While prepared to vote for a duty of 15c. a ton on coal, if adopted in connection with the other interests of Canada, he was not prepared to do so as an isolated measure; consequently he would record his vote against the amendment.

MR. FLYNN said that he would vote for this amendment. On a former occasion he had voted against the amendment moved by the right hon. member for Kingston, which included Protection to the mining, manufacturing and agricultural interests of the Dominion; and he now wished to set himself right, and show that he was not open to the charge of inconsistency, or of desiring to vote for a sectional tax. The agricultural and manufacturing interests were now protected,—the latter by a duty of 17½ per cent., which, with incidental charges connected with importation, was equal at least to 25 per cent. Three industries were embodied in the right hon. gentleman's motion, and two of these were already protected, while the important coal industry of Nova Scotia was unprotected, and not only unprotected but also compelled to pay a large duty on the articles required to open and develop the mines. The hon. mover of the amendment had given statistics showing the large amount of money invested in this interest; the large amount of shipping engaged in the transportation of coal, and the large number of people employed in connection with this industry. In addition, it was burdened by an export royalty, imposed by the Provincial Government, of ten cents a ton. For these reasons he was quite consistent in voting against the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, and in voting for this amendment.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton.) said it was quite evident that the motion which was moved on a former occasion by the right hon. member for Kingston, was producing its effect. This, he believed, was the third motion of the kind moved by hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, in support of the principle contained in the right hon. member's resolution. This showed clearly that public opinion was forming on this question, and that fear as to the result of the approaching elections was compelling some of those hon. gentlemen who voted against the resolution, to regret their votes. They had first the motion moved by the hon. member for Durham, and then the motion proposed by the hon. member for Iberville, and now they had this motion. The object of the hon. member from Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay) was stated in his closing remarks, from which it appeared that the hon. gentleman did not believe that this motion would be carried, or that it would benefit the coal interests, but he simply made this proposition with the view of injuring the Opposition. The hon. gentleman said that he wanted to test the opinion of the right hon. member for Kingston and his supporters, on this question; but he did not refer to the Government which he supported, and the opinions of the hon. leader, which, in this connection, were well known. The opposition of this hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) to the coal interests of Nova Scotia was particularly well known, as also the hostile opinions of his supporters in the House in this respect; while, on the other hand, the opinion of the hon. member for Kingston was known to be favourable to this industry, as a part of the policy intended to benefit the general interests of this country. He was not surprised that the hon. gentleman had now made this motion, because he believed that the hon. gentleman had, by this time, ascertained the feeling of the county, which they both represented, on this point. The hon. gentleman was perfectly well aware that any member of this House who voted against the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston would have no chance of being elected in that county, and he believed that this was the prevailing sentiment in the Island of Cape Breton. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) as well as the hon. seconder who had spoken on this question, knew perfectly well that the people of the Island of Cape Breton would not consider that this resolution was either honest or sincere, and their constituents would think that it would have been more honourable and more upright if these hon. gentlemen had supported the main resolution which would have secured the protection of this industry. The hon. gentleman (Mr. MacKay) had stated that there was nothing in the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston. He would read this motion to show that it would benefit this particular industry:

“This House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion.”

The hon. gentleman had stated that Ontario sent to the Lower Provinces a large quantity of agricultural products, in payment of which it received only coal, and that if a duty was imposed on American coal, this would be the means of enabling the Lower Provinces to pay for these products in coal. The hon. gentleman, in voting against the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston, had voted against the very thing which he now advocated, and against the policy which would secure interprovincial trade. The hon. gentleman had by this time discovered the mistake which he made on that occasion, and he (Mr. McDonald) believed that the electors of the county, as well as of the whole island of Cape Breton, would not forget this when the elections came on. His hon. friend during the past four years had supported a party whose sentiments were well known to be opposed to the coal interest of Nova Scotia, and the hon. leader of the Government in 1875, he believed, had stated, in his place in the House, that it would take nothing less than $2 a ton of duty to be of any benefit to this coal interest, although the House was well aware that the gentlemen interested in these mines only wanted to have a duty of 50c. a ton imposed. He endorsed to a large extent all that his hon. friend had stated in advocacy of this proposition. He believed that such a policy would very largely benefit this industry, which otherwise was threatened with complete ruin, and this was only a question of time, if no protection was given to it. Without such aid he considered that this question would be completely ruined in a very short time. He would, therefore, vote for the amendment.

MR. MACDONNELL said that he could not allow one remark of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDonald) to pass unnoticed. That hon. gentleman had been pleased to say that it would have been much preferable for the people of Nova Scotia if the hon. mover of this amendment had voted for the general amendment proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston, instead of making this motion. He quite differed with the hon. gentleman in this regard. He thought that any further protection than what we now had would tend further to destroy the coal interest of Nova Scotia. There were two causes to which they could attribute the decadence of this interest. In the first place, this was due to the hostile American duty of 75c. a ton, placed on imported coal; and in the next place, this was due to the protective duties which we had imposed against the manufactures and other commodities of the United States. During reciprocity, the Nova Scotia coal interest had flourished; and the moment they lost reciprocity, their trade with the United States was lost, and thus trade was further crippled by the giving of further protection to our manufactures and other industries. Any further protection must be directed against American products, which step would cripple their present trade with the United States, and thus inflict a further loss on the coal interest of Nova Scotia. The United States was their great market for coal, and the greater the trade and commerce that they had with that country, the more flourishing would the coal industry be. He, therefore, quite differed in opinion from the hon. gentleman, who himself knew other than what he had stated. He believed that the hon. gentleman knew better. Any further protection would go to further ruin their coal interest. He felt that an invidious distinction had always been made in this House against this interest. The moment that they asked for a duty on coal they were met with the request that the agricultural and manufacturing interests, and every other interest of Canada, ought to be protected.

MR. BOWELL: Why not?

MR. MACDONNELL said that they wanted protection for one industry.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of course.

MR. MACDONNELL said that this was the coal industry. The people of Ontario thought that their various interests ought to be protected, but what did Ontario take from the Lower Province in exchange for the thousands and thousands of dollars worth that they imported from Ontario? This was not the prognostication which had been held out to them at Confederation; and as one who took an active part in promoting this policy, he was sorry to say so. They had expected an interchange of trade and commodities, and a reciprocity of policy.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Why do you not ask it from the Government on this occasion?

MR. MACDONNELL said that this reminded him of the resolution of the hon. gentleman. If they went back to the proceedings of the House last year, they would find a resolution moved by the right hon. gentleman recorded, in which several industries of Canada, but not the coal industry, were referred to as requiring protection.

AN HON. MEMBER: The mining interest was mentioned in it.

MR. MACDONNELL said that mining might mean anything, as might also the motion which the right hon. gentleman had proposed this Session in connection with the readjustment of the Tariff. The protection of various industries was demanded, but what did this mean—75 or 50c., or one cent a ton on coal; or did it mean anything?

MR. YOUNG said he desired to point out the very dangerous character of the motion to the manufacturing interests of the Dominion, and especially to those of Western Canada. Before doing so he might notice briefly the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland. That hon. gentleman stated he desired to have a readjustment of the tariff which would give encouragement to our manufactures. He (Mr. Young) had ventured at the time to say that such was the present policy. Such, indeed, had been the policy pursued in Canada for twenty years, with this difference, that under the existing Government there was  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. more protection than there had been under the late Administration, with the additional fact that in consequence of the change in the price of gold in the United States, the amount of encouragement given was, so far as American manufacturers were concerned, more than 10 per cent. greater than under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power. The hon. gentleman said he wished to see a system adopted which would keep the people of this country in Canada. Well, it appeared from a return drawn up by hon. gentlemen opposite, that under their rule some 500,000 or 600,000 Canadians had gone from this country to the United States; whereas, he ventured to say, that not one in ten emigrated at the present time who formerly did. The hon. gentleman who brought forward the fallacy which had been so often heard this Session—a fallacy, the absurdity of which made him surprised that it should be repeated so often—that the Opposition should at once decrease the taxes of the people and give a large amount of Protection. He would not insult the intelligence of the House by attempting to expiude such a transparent fallacy, but only say that hon. gentlemen opposite would be quite as able to lift themselves over the House by their boot-straps as to carry out both ends of that proposition. Our manufactures were becoming more and more dependent on coal, particularly in the older sections of the country, where wood was becoming scarce and expensive. He found, on looking over the returns, that last year we imported \$1,792,000 worth of bituminous coal into the Dominion, all of which was imported into the Province of Ontario, with the exception of about \$16,000 worth. Now, he ventured to affirm that, though a duty of 75c. was placed on coal, as proposed, it would not lead to 100 tons of Nova Scotia coal being used in the Province of Ontario; it would take, at least, \$1.50 to \$2 a ton to force it into use in that Province. Evidence which was brought before the House two years ago conclusively proved, to his mind, that at least one and a-half dollars would be required to force Ontario manufacturers to use Nova Scotia coal; this duty of 75c. per ton, then, would be a direct duty upon our manufacturers. This motion did not refer only to bituminous coal, it proposed that a duty should be put on anthracite coal as well; the idea probably being that, unless this was done, the effect of a duty on bituminous would only lead to a larger quantity of anthracite being used. This proposition made the motion still more dangerous. He found that, last year, we imported \$1,706,000 worth of anthracite coal of which \$1,304,000 worth was imported into Ontario. The proposed duty of 75c., therefore, would be a direct tax on the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec. While certain temporary advantages might be gained by this class by putting duties on certain imported articles, the placing of a tax on coal and other raw material would do them more harm than a slight advance on imports would do them good. The proposed policy would strike a fatal blow at our rising manufacturing industries, which, he was glad to say, were progressing as fast as other interests, and he called on the House to vote down the amendment.

MR. WOOD said he simply, in the interest of the railroads of Western Canada, rose to protest against any duty being placed on bituminous coal. It was well known that wood was getting very scarce throughout Western Canada.

MR. PLUMB: It will be scarce next year.

MR. WOOD said the hon. member for Niagara would, perhaps, be scarce next Session. The Great Western Railway Company used hundreds of thousands of tons of coal every year. Would it be fair to compel them to pay 75c. a ton duty on coal, when, perhaps, they did not obtain a single ton from Nova Scotia. It was utterly impossible that a duty of 75c. a ton on Nova Scotia coal could push a single ton of of American coal out of the market. The imposition of such a duty would be a great hardship to the people of Hamilton, who, at present, had the markets of this country in their hands. While called upon to pay a higher price for their coal, the manufacturers of Hamilton could not get more for their sewing machines or other manufactured goods.

MR. ROBINSON said he would have great pleasure in voting for the amendment, because he, like the hon. member for Hamilton, believed it to be a step in the right direction, and as tending to promote inter-provincial trade between Ontario and Nova Scotia.

MR. BUNSTER said the question was one of importance to the Pacific Province, where excellent coal was produced in abundance. American speculators were in the habit of bringing up their good native coal mixing it with coal of inferior quality, and then reselling it. The Hon. Mr. Richardson reported very favourably as to the coal in that Province, and he (Mr. Bunster) was in a position to state further, that there was anthracite coal in Queen Charlotte Island. He thought every industry in this Dominion ought to be protected. To the system of protection which they had adopted was entirely due the greater prosperity of the United States.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. TUPPER said after the exhaustive discussions which had taken place during the present Session on the fiscal policy of the country, it was not his intention to take up much of the time of the House at this advanced period of the Session, although the motion was one of very great importance. It would be a poor compliment to the intelligence of the hon. mover of the resolution to suppose that he intended by it to promote the interests of the coal owners of Nova Scotia, or the interests of the Province of Nova Scotia, which was so deeply interested in everything connected with the development of the great coal mining industry. The hon. gentleman was perfectly well aware that the Government, of which he was so ardent a supporter, had declared its hostility to any measure calculated to promote the coal mining industry of this country. The hon. gentleman was perfectly aware that in this House and out of it, not only the gentlemen on the Ministerial benches but their leading supporters, took every opportunity of pointing out the injustice of any measure that would be calculated to foster that great industry of Canada. But he was also perfectly well aware that the efforts of the Opposition in favour of measures which would promote the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia had failed, and that the efforts made by the late Government had also failed in consequence of a want of combination on the part of the various industries and interests in this country requiring and desiring, each for itself, a certain amount of protection. The hon. gentleman was perfectly well aware, from the past history of this Parliament in relation to this question, that the only means by which the coal mining industry could be fostered and promoted was by the policy adopted by the right hon. gentleman who led the Liberal Conservative Party, as expressed in the resolution which he had offered to this House, and on which he, and the party serving under him, were prepared to take their stand before the people of this country. That was not a policy of selecting any one individual industry, but a national policy, combining all the interests of this country that required and deserved the fostering aid of Parliament. It was perfectly obvious that by that combination, and by that combination alone, the object could be attained. When the hon. member for Cape Breton, therefore, had an opportunity of doing something really effective in relation to this important question, he did not avail himself of it. He united with the Government and the party who had declared their unmitigated hostility to any measure by which the great depression in the coal-mining industry might be removed. The hon. gentleman voted down the resolution moved by the right hon. member for Kingston, which declared that it was the interest of this country that a fostering Protection should be given to the great agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of Canada, and by a general policy, by an even-handed policy, one that would deal at the same time, and in the same just spirit, with all the great interests that required the aid of Protection, accomplish, in the only way in which it could be accomplished, the measure which the hon. member for Cape Breton appeared to support, by the resolution he had moved. He (Mr. Tupper) had said before, it would be paying a poor compliment to the hon. member to suppose that, by the resolution he had offered, he intended doing anything whatever in the interests of the coal owners of Nova Scotia, or of those directly interested in the prosecution of that great industry. The resolution was calculated to raise all the hostility, all the opposition that could be raised to that proposition in this House. Not content with asking that which the coal owners of Nova Scotia themselves asked, when they approached this House by a petition, he had gone further, and apparently afraid that a large portion of the members of the Opposition would have voted for the resolution, if proposed in the terms of the petition, namely 50c. per ton, the hon. member had asked for the extreme measure of imposing a duty of 75c. per ton. He (Mr. Tupper) was not drawing upon his imagination. The hon. gentleman, with a frankness which did him credit, did not disguise from the House that his object was not to promote the interests of the coal owners, but to endeavour to embarrass the position of gentlemen on the Opposition benches. He seemed to doubt the right hon. member for Kingston; he wanted to know where he would be found, and where the other gentlemen on this side of the House would be found, but he did not want to test the position of the Government and their supporters. No, because the hon. gentleman knew the position of the Government, and only wanted to damage the members of the Opposition who were in favour of a duty on coal. He (Mr. Tupper) could only say that he was prepared to vote for this resolution, to vote for a duty of 75c. per ton on all the coal imported into this country; he was willing to go the entire length of this resolution. He believed it would be sound policy for the members on both sides to unite in support of this resolution. The important effect of adopting this policy would be to say to the great coal monopolists of the United States, that their coal coming into Canada would be met by a similar duty as that imposed on coal going into the United States, and the result would be like free admission of Canadian coal into the United States, and the free admission of United States coal into Canada. On its own merits he was prepared to support this resolution as a matter of sound policy, and as the only means by which this country could hope to have that free trade with the great republic lying alongside us, which was the only free trade that any country could long consent to have, namely, free trade on both sides. The only way to obtain reciprocity with the United States was by adopting a policy similar to theirs, by being able to negotiate with them, and say if they want to have Canada open as a market to the United States they must open their markets to us. He had in his hand a speech made upon this question by a gentleman of great experience, who had been for a considerable time in Parliament, who, certainly, could not be charged, as he (Mr. Tupper) would be charged on the present occasion, with having had sectional interests in view rather than a liberal general policy which would commend itself to the country. He need not ask the attention of the House to the short but able speech delivered in this House by the hon. member for North Oxford, (Mr. Oliver) and which gave in a small compass the whole argument covering the case. It was made as long ago as 1870, after the hon. gentleman had been several years in Parliament, and when he was in a more independent position than he occupied at present, because he was then in a position to advocate and to press upon the Finance Minister of another Government a policy which he felt was in the interests of the country, and which he could urge without embarrassing the friends with whom he was politically associated. That gentleman in moving for an Address to His Excellency, praying for the imposition of an import duty on wheat, flour, Indian corn, hops, coarse and fine salt and coal, was reported to have said:

"For instance, immense quantities of flour were being imported into the Maritime Provinces which, if a proper duty were imposed, would be supplied by the Upper Provinces.

Whenever there was any excitement or uneasiness in any of our local markets, the facilities afforded to the United States manufacturers were such as to enable them to step in and offer their products on better terms than Canadians. For instance, he stated, that last year we imported into Canada 1,655,000 bushels of Indian corn, which comes into direct competition with our own coarser grains. The larger distillers in the country did not pretend to buy Canadian grain and had no interest in the local market, which, in consequence, suffered great loss. In coal we imported $951,000 worth, and exported in the face of a restrictive tariff $630,000 worth. There was no doubt, he said, but that if a proper duty were placed on the article, there would be brought about the free trade which was predicted in the Confederation debates, an interprovincial tariff that would be beneficial to the whole Dominion. * * * He believed it was the interest of the Province to secure to our own people the markets of the country. If American products came into the country, they should under present circumstances, do so under a tax which would add to the revenue of the country, and which we will require for our large public works."

There was very little to be added to this. Little could be added to it. The hon. gentleman in succinct terms, had, he might say, almost stated the whole case; but he did not overrate either the importance of an inter-provincial trade, or the extent to which it could be promoted by such a policy as he on that occasion advocated. He would detain the House for a very few minutes while he showed the effect in producing inter-provincial trade, that the imposition of a very small and insignificant duty would have. As he had before stated, in 1866 when the Reciprocity treaty was abolished, he had proposed to the Legislature of Nova Scotia, that they should meet it by the re-imposition of the duties as they existed at the time when this treaty went into force; and they imposed a duty of 25c. a barrel on flour, and a small duty on butter and lard, cheese, beef and pork, and he would only detain the House to show the result of the imposition of these duties for a single year. Mark that Confederation had not then taken place; the means of communication and the intercourse between Canada and Nova Scotia were then altogether different from what they were to-day; we had no inter-provincial railway, making easy and rapid and inexpensive transit for the products of Ontario and Quebec down to Nova Scotia, and he thought that the House would be astonished when he gave it the result of the imposition of these slight duties for a single year. In 1866, they imported of beef and pork 6,155 barrels from the United States, and 50 barrels from Canada—that was from Ontario and Quebec—and in 1867, under the imposition of this small impost, they only imported 572 lbs. of beef and pork from the United States, while the import from Canada, notwithstanding the great want of means of communication at the time, rose from 50 to 871 lbs. of butter and lard. They imported from the United States in 1866 90,950 lbs., and 3,840 lbs. from Canada. There was a large increase in that year in the import of butter and lard into the Province, and they imported from the United States in 1867, 106,221 lbs., a little more than the year before. But mark the result of the effect of this slight import with relation to the trade of Nova Scotia and the trade of Canada. In that one year the trade went up from 38,401 lbs. to 448,303 lbs. from Canada; of cheese, they imported 56,965 lbs., in 1866, from the United States, and 28,078 lbs. from Canada. In 1867 they imported only 23,850 lbs. from the United States, and 30,814 lbs. from Canada. Mark the effect of the duty of 25c. a barrel on flour; and this was when Confederation had not taken place, and when there was no Intercolonial Railway by which they might have the cheap and rapid transit and communication which now existed. In 1866 they imported 278,923 barrels of flour from the United States, and 61,114 barrels from Canada; and in 1867 they imported, instead of 278,000 barrels, 72,860 barrels from the United States, while the import from Canada, under the 25c. a barrel duty, rose in one year from 61,164 barrels to 227,616 barrels from Canada. He drew the attention of the House to these figures to show how thoroughly the sound views that the hon. gentleman from North Oxford held to the House, in the speech he had read, were verified by the result, and to show how small an impost would turn the whole current of trade from one channel into another. If this was the case, what might they not expect in the way of inter-provincial trade when they had provided the means of rapid, easy, and cheap inter-communication between the older Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces. He believed that it would be impossible to overrate the effect of such a policy as that which was contained in the resolution before the House, with reference to this one article, or of such a general policy as they found embraced in the resolution which was submitted to the House by his right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. It would be impossible to overrate its importance in regard to the amount of inter-provincial trade which would grow, and it would be impossible to overrate the importance of this inter-provincial trade. Why, unless they could knit together the component parts of this Confederation in commercial bonds; and, unless they could produce this inter-provincial trade, which would make one Province feel that its interest was being promoted by inter-communication and commercial inter-communication with another Province, they would largely fail in securing the objects which were aimed at, and which he believed were perfectly susceptible of being realized by this great Confederation of the Provinces. He believed that if we had got to take up this question in a national spirit, in its bearings not upon one section or another section of the country, but on the prosperity of the whole country; and, if it was taken up in a broad and national spirit, and not confined to one or another industry, but broadly made applicable to the general industrial resources of the country, results would flow from this policy of a character and description that would not only be most gratifying, but also most beneficial to the whole of this country. He might say that attention had been drawn to the fact again and again, of the protective policy of the United States of America, and the same question had been raised here as to what the effect of it had been in relation to that country. He would just read a short extract from a London newspaper, showing the enormous results that had flown with regard to the trade and the balance of trade between the United States and Great Britain, in consequence of the introduction of this protective policy, under which that country had manufactured for itself, by the industry and employment of its own people, the products that previously they depended upon another country to obtain. He would read an extract from the Trade Journal of London (England), as follows:—

“AN AMAZING CHANGE.—The British Trade Journal of London says:

“The revolution that has occurred in our commerce with the United States is expressed in a few figures. In 1865 the value of British exports to the Union amounted to $122,000,000, against $847,000,000 imported by us from that country during the same period. In 1876, however, the tables were turned; for, while our exports had dwindled to $98,000,000, the value of the goods imported reached the large sum of $367,352,000, showing a balance in favour of America, in twelve months, of $269,352,000."

In 1876 the United States, under a protective policy, had become one of the great manufacturing countries of the world, and had rendered itself not only independent but prepared to go into foreign markets and compete with its manufactures against the world. That was the result. It was impossible with a statement showing that the result of the country adopting a policy of manufacturing for itself and giving employment to its own people and rendering itself independent to a large extent of other countries in the way of importing manufactured goods, and evidence of this kind, to doubt the wisdom of the policy that would place this country relatively in a somewhat similar position, and give the means of furnishing profitable and lucrative employment to our own population, largely attracting people into this country, giving profitable employment to those who were now here and rendering us comparatively independent of our neighbours across the border; and at the same time building up such an inter-provincial commerce among ourselves as would knit together this country from end to end, and also promote the prosperity of the whole country. He was sorry that the hon. member from Cape Breton, in moving this resolution, seemed to have drafted it in such a way as to obtain the smallest possible amount of support, and indeed he knew very well, that there was no form in which this resolution could be submitted, that would obtain the support of a majority of the House as it was at present constituted. And he would further say that he despaired of ever seeing the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia, or the agricultural interest of Ontario, or the great manufacturing industry of the whole of this country, ever fostered, or ever protected, or ever placed in a position such as every patriotic man in Canada must desire to see it in, except by such a combination of all those interests as would bring them all into operation, not for isolated sectional interests, but in such a way as would give support to the whole of them. He had at the outset stated that he did not intend to occupy much of the time of the House, as he had had opportunity on a former occasion to discuss the fiscal policy at some length, and he would resume his seat expressing the hope that, although this resolution would be defeated to-night, and although standing by itself, he believed that it would at any time be defeated in this Parliament, he still looked forward to the time, and that at a very early day, when a different spirit would animate the Legislature of this country, and when all these industries would unite and combine together not only for the purpose of protection, but also for the necessary purpose of self-defence, and be enabled to obtain such a fostering aid from the Parliament of Canada as would be not only of essential benefit to one and all of them, but would promote the common interests of our common country.

MR. OLIVER said that it was not his intention on the present occasion to take any part in this discussion, but as direct reference had been made to him it became his duty to do so. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had done him the honour to read a speech which he delivered here in 1870 on this particular subject, and in doing so, it would be clearly seen that the object he had had in view was this: the Protection of the whole of the interests and industries of this country, so as to secure reciprocity with the United States. He held that we did now stand in the same position as in 1870. We then had full control of our fisheries, to which he referred in that speech; and full control over the navigation of our rivers; but now we had no control over our own fisheries, which had been conceded to the United States for twelve years, with the navigation of the St. Lawrence for all time to come, so that we did now stand in the same position as them. But he was free to acknowledge—and he believed that if the hon. gentleman were as free to acknowledge all the mistakes that he had made in his life, it would be just as well for him—that this was the only speech that he had ever made on the floor of Parliament which he regretted having made.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. OLIVER said that he could give the reason why he had then made this speech. It was now eight years ago, and in the course of this period any person ought to gain experience, and by strictly studying the trade of this country he ought to know more about it in 1878 than in 1870. It was well known that at that time there was a meeting of Canadian manufacturers, who then, as now, wanted heavier protective duties placed on manufactured good; and they published a large number of copies of the headings of a petition which was circulated throughout the length and breadth of the country. These petitions were sent to every municipal Council in the country, and to every particular locality to get signatures attached and to be presented to this House. The municipal Councils, without discussing them much, signed them and sent them down to Parliament, and he had then the honour of presenting to the House a very large number of petitions asking for the policy which he at that time advocated; and he must admit that without taking the matter so fully into consideration as he ought to have done, he had pursued the course mentioned by the hon. gentleman. But what was the experience of the twelve months during which that duty was levied on these goods? Was it an experience which confirmed him in the opinion that this policy was the correct one? He held that the experience which he and the people which he represented had during that period, was anything but one which gave satisfaction to the promoters of that policy. There was not a single manufacturer in his county that used coal as a raw material, but what found fault with the duty on coal; not a single individual in his county but that found fault with the extra duty on salt, and he had not met a single individual, throughout the length and breadth of the country, who did not similarly condemn this policy which was pursued in this regard by the Government of the day in 1870; and if he had the journals of the House before him, he thought he could show that the hon. member for Cumberland was just as inconsistent as he was, and not so honest in confessing his inconsistency. The hon. gentleman voted for that policy, and he did all he could, not being a member of the Government at the time, to compel the Government to bring in this policy. They all remembered the change of policy that was made within a very few hours, and they knew very well that the pressure which the hon. gentleman brought to bear on the Government caused it; also, that 10 or 11 months afterwards, this hon. gentleman voted for the repeal of this policy, and of the act which imposed this duty. And yet the hon. gentleman had the assurance to accuse, in this House, any hon. gentleman of inconsistency, though he was as inconsistent in this regard as any gentleman on the floor of Parliament. And were they to trace the political career of the hon. gentleman from the time he entered public life, he did not doubt that hon. gentleman's inconsistency could be shown in a great many other cases. The hon. gentleman was inconsistent with reference to this very motion; he and the right hon. member for Kingston declared in the House a few days ago that the policy of the Opposition was to allow raw material to come into this country free of duty. Was coal raw material for manufacturing purposes? It was either this or manufactured goods, and no manufacturing institution in this country could be carried on without coal. Then it was a raw material; and yet the hon. gentleman advocated the imposition of a duty on it, and would thereby impose a duty on the raw material which he had said should enter the country free of duty. This was inconsistent. The hon. gentleman also said that the imposition of a small duty had caused a very great quantity of goods to be sent from Canada to the Maritime Provinces. The flour consumed in the Lower Provinces was the product of the Canadian farmer, and was it the levying of a duty that caused it to be sent there? There was no duty on flour now, and this had not been the case for the last seven years; but, nevertheless, the flour consumed in the Maritime Provinces principally came from Canada, which afforded proof positive that it was not the imposition of a duty which caused articles of trade to flow into Nova Scotia and the other Provinces on the Atlantic seaboard. A remarkable statement had been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, to the effect that by placing a duty of 75c. a ton on coal and 50c. a barrel on flour coming into the Maritime Provinces from the United States, it would cause the Americans to give us reciprocity. He wondered how any intelligent man could believe that four millions of people would be able to change the fiscal policy of a nation containing forty millions, by putting a duty on coal and flour, and a small duty on malt. A short time ago the Canadian Government put a duty on malt coming into this country; but did the Americans take all duty off malt and allow the Canadian article to go into the United States markets free? No; they doubled the duty on malt going into the United States. The hon. member for West Toronto seemed to say that the imposition of this duty would not increase the price of coal. Now, if the report of the examination before the Coal Committee last Session, in connection with the depression of trade, was consulted, it would be found no attempt was made to deny that the imposition of a duty on coal would increase the price in the west.

MR. TUPPER: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that a meeting of manufacturers held at Toronto agreed to the proposal to put a tax on coal?

MR. OLIVER said that he was informed that a person named Fraser, in the employment of hon. gentlemen opposite, went through the country and convened a meeting at Toronto, composed of individuals who supported the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite. He might state that the Board of Trade, which was an independent body representing the commercial men of this country, also had a meeting, but did they adopt a resolution to put a duty on coal?

MR. TUPPER: It was lost by a majority of three.

MR. OLIVER: And how many persons attended the meeting at Toronto? Not over 40.

MR. TUPPER: I understood from the statement of the Chairman, Mr.

Howland, that 50 of the leading manufacturers of Ontario were present.

MR. OLIVER said that not one of these individuals represented a majority of the manufacturers in their various localities. There could be no doubt that the consumer of an article paid the duty upon it, and yet this was the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite. It would be just as wise to put a duty on salt coming into this country, and force the salt of Goderich down to the Maritime Provinces. If hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded at any time in putting a duty of 75c. per ton on coal, the people would rise against them, and put other men in their places. He would not deny the speech which he had been taunted with having made. On that occasion he tried to do what he believed was for the benefit of the people; but, after considering the matter fully, he must admit that he was mistaken in what he previously said.

MR. McCALLUM said it was just as likely that the hon. member for North Oxford had taken a mistaken view of the case now, as at the time to which he referred. The Government deemed it desirable to raise revenue by means of a revenue on tea, but he would point out that, by adopting this proposed duty on coal, a still greater amount of revenue would be derived, while the coal owners of Nova Scotia would be encouraged. The most selfish people of all were the mover and seconder of this resolution, because they had been supporting a Free-trade Government for five years, and at the eleventh hour they brought down a resolution of this kind, which they knew would not carry. If they thought it would carry would those gentlemen vote for it? He (Mr. McCallum) intended to vote for it, because it was part of the policy he advocated. He hoped it would carry; and if so, being a vote of non-confidence in the Government, it would remove hon. gentlemen opposite from their places, and put other men on the Government benches who would so arrange the policy of the country as to protect its industries and give men a good day's wages for a fair day's work.

MR. COCKBURN said he had hitherto maintained silence during the discussion of the proposed trade policy brought before the House during the last few years. It was needless for him to explain the difficulties which he saw in the way of carrying out a policy to suit different interests and different sections of the country. The hon. member for Cumberland had already admitted that it was impossible to combine these interests in order to carry this out, but he went further and hoped to secure a majority at the general election to enable him and his friends to bring about the so-called National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite had had a majority in two Parliaments. In the first they passed this National Policy, and during the same Parliament abolished it, and never made another move in that direction. He should be very happy to see steps taken by which inter-provincial trade could be brought about. He did not take any particular interest in any section or in any particular branch of industry, and he had the most fraternal feelings towards members from the different Provinces, but, observing, as he had, the signs of the times and the teachings of experience, it did not require very much perception to see at once that the whole scheme that had been proposed was impracticable. Members representing wheat and flour producing districts had their own selfish policy. They desired to see duties imposed on bread stuffs, which members from mining districts voted against, while, at the same, they wanted duties upon coal. These different interests were conflicting. There were interests also besides the manufacturing, mining and milling interests—interests that could not be assisted by any imposition of duties—such as the lumber and fishing interests. In regard to those and also in the nearer sections of the country, the effect of these imports would be to increase the cost of developing the country and of carrying on the lumbering and fishing business of the country. It might not, perhaps, be quite in order to say that it appeared very much as if some of these policies which were proposed were put forward at this time more for the purpose of embarrassing the Government than for any other purposes, inasmuch that the very men who now proposed them had formerly voted to abolish what they now advocated. It was clear that the different sections of the country would not unite on this policy; therefore, it remained for Parliament and the Government to adopt a policy which would confer the greatest benefit on the greatest number, and that was the policy which this Government had been pursuing. He (Mr. Cockburn) had been perfectly unprejudiced in this matter. He was free to admit that the proposal of Protection was very fascinating to superficial thinkers who did not go thoroughly into the question, and was supposed to be a good stroke of party tactics designed with a view to catch stray voters; but he was sure, taking it all in all, that the present Government had had no other object in the policy which they had adopted than the general good of the country. Their predecessors had had an opportunity of introducing a different policy. They did so and then abolished it, and now brought it forward with a view of embarrassing the Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite had not now the same facilities for arranging for the coming struggle which they had in 1872. After abolishing the National Policy, they had the opportunity to jerrymander the constituencies, to arrange with a wealthy gentleman in Montreal, and select what returning officers they chose—one of the latter had to be brought to the bar of the House. He came down at a cost of $40, and left with $200 in his pocket from the contingent fund, and got an appointment in the Excise office besides.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question.

MR. COCKBURN said of course he bowed to the decision of Mr. Speaker. He did not think the industrial classes would appreciate the taxation of bread or fuel. They heard a good deal about slaughter markets. In regard to the iron interests, the foundry business, he thought it was easy to trace the depression to its real cause.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman has the right to show how a duty on coal will affect other interests.

MR. COCKBURN said the demand for machinery had increased very much. The trouble had been too much home competition, not the slaughter markets, or any policy of the Government. Manufacturing establishments had been multiplied throughout the country, and the consequence was over-production. They did not require to stimulate manufacturers to produce more than the country needed. He hoped that after a while circumstances might change so that their friends from the Maritime Provinces might be able to compete with American coal in consequence of the reduction of the cost of freight, better carrying facilities, and other causes which they could not exactly name just now; so that they might have a larger inter-provincial trade than at present. It was quite obvious that this so-called National Policy was being fairly exposed throughout the country. People were beginning to have their eyes opened. The other day he had heard of an old Tory campaigner saying "What is the use of this Protection cry? Let us have scandals, they are the things."

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. BOWELL: You know that by experience.

MR. COCKBURN said he was free to admit that hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House had adopted the same tactics in past times, but none of them had gone to the extreme length of taking trips thousands of miles long in order to scent out some proposed job. He considered the present motion quite impracticable, and should vote against it. References had been made to the tea duties. He assented that the people throughout the country were quite satisfied with the tea duties. They had never had better or cheaper tea than at present. Some hon. gentlemen had argued against free trade, but there was no proposition before the House in favour of free trade. We had an incidental protection, which, taking it all and all, was the best for our circumstances.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said he could quite sympathize with the hon. members for Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay) and Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) to have a question of this kind affecting an industry in which the people of Cape Breton were so largely interested, discussed before the Parliament of Canada. But they must see the difficulties involved in the consideration of a motion of this kind. They must see from the discussions which had taken place in this Parliament, that if a motion of this kind were entertained it must extend over the whole fiscal policy of this country. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had seemed anxious to make a point against the Government for the unswerving hostility, as he was pleased to call it, which they had shown to the coal interest of Cape Breton. He thought the hon. gentleman was more anxious to make a point against the Government than he was to forward the measure which he was professedly advocating. He thought the hon. gentleman could hardly point to any act of hostility on the part of this Government against the coal interests of Nova Scotia. They had dealt with that question on a broad basis, as they had dealt with all other questions. They had been obliged to consider it in a broad and national aspect, and to see how it was going to affect the greatest number of the people of this Dominion. They could not entertain a proposition to put a duty on coal alone or on flour alone, because those were sectional interests which were proposed to be fostered at the expense of the great body of the consumers of this country. The hon. member for Cumberland would remember, no doubt, when the present Government, in 1874, proposed a duty on ships' materials, no one was louder than he in denunciation of that policy, because he pointed out, and with some force, that it was a sectional tax applying to the people of the Maritime Provinces, who would have to pay it, while the people of Ontario and Quebec would not be called upon to contribute anything to it. The Government reconsidered the matter, though not particularly in view of the objections of the hon. gentleman, and concessions were made which removed the cause of the objections which had been raised. The hon. gentleman was advocating to-day a precisely similar sectional tax. He was asking the House to affirm that it would be wise to put a duty on coal which the people of Ontario would be called upon to pay for the benefit of only a section of the Province of Nova Scotia. He (Mr. Jones) did not desire to underrate the importance of the Island of Cape Breton or of the mineral resources of the Province of Nova Scotia. They admitted that they were of very great value, but his hon. friend must know that a large section of Nova Scotia was not interested in the coal question.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton): What about the capitalists of Halifax.

MR. JONES said if they invested their money in that interest, they must take the same chance as if they invested it in other enterprises, and there were a great many enterprises which yielded them no better returns than the mines of Cape Breton. He regretted that these were not in a more flourishing condition. But if, gentlemen invested their capital in these industries they did so from other than patriotic ideas. They did so with a view of getting a good return, and if, unfortunately, they could not get a return it was to be regretted. The hon. gentleman said that, of course, the member from Nova Scotia, would vote for a proposition of this kind. He (Mr. Jones) very much doubted if they would. A large section of Nova Scotia was opposed to this tax. How, for instance, were Kings, Hants, Annapolis, Digby, Lunenburg, Antigonish and Guysborough interested, except in the way in which any county was indirectly interested in the prosperity of the whole Dominion? The hon. gentleman would lead the people to believe that the majority of people in Nova Scotia, were interested in the coal mines. So far from that being the case, the coal interest, though an important one, was not to be compared to the fishing or lumber interests of that Province.

MR. MacDONNELL: Are not all the people of Nova Scotia interested in coal mining, inasmuch as there is a royalty on coal which goes to swell the Exchequer of the Province?

MR. JONES asked what this House had to do with that question. It was true that the more tons of coal that were raised in Nova Scotia the more money was paid into the exchequer of Nova Scotia. But there was more money invested in, and more profit derived from fishing pursuits than from mining pursuits. These gentlemen knew perfectly well that they never could get a duty on coal unless it was accompanied by an increase of the tariff all round. Reference had been made to a resolution passed by the manufacturers in Toronto. What was the meaning of that? Those gentlemen had been endeavouring for the last three or four years to bring a pressure upon this Parliament to increase the percentage upon manufactured goods. They passed a resolution the meaning of which was that they were willing to admit, a duty on coal, but they knew that that meant the increase of the tariff on goods in which they were interested, which would be more than an equivalent. These people who were promoting a tariff on coal would have more taken out of their pockets in the duties they would be called upon to contribute on other articles than the benefit which they expected to derive, though he did not admit they would derive it from the increased protection to the mines. There was nothing this Parliament could do in that direction which would not actually hamper such an industry as the large fishing industry of Nova Scotia. It was argued by hon. gentlemen opposite that in case of an increase in the tariff they would have a larger number of people to consume the goods; but he challenged the hon. gentlemen opposite to point out any way, directly or indirectly, in which the Government could benefit the fishermen at all. The catch they took from the sea was not consumed in this country, but had to go abroad, and yet these gentlemen representing a large body, asked Parliament to impose a large additional obligation upon the fishermen for the sake of a few people interested in coal. Then, in the case of lumber, they could not increase the value of 1,000 feet of lumber by any duty imposed upon imported goods. Thus, so much as they increased the burdens on the producers of lumber and fish, they took from the hard earnings of those people and put into the pockets of others. Placed now in a position of greater responsibility than before, he (Mr. Jones) felt bound to exercise the greatest judgment and discretion in a matter of so much importance to the people of Nova Scotia; and looking at all the interests involved, looking at the different classes this would affect, he considered that it would not be for the interest of the people of Nova Scotia, as a whole, to impose this duty on coal, if it were accompanied as it must be accompanied, as hon. gentlemen opposite admitted it must be accompanied, by increased duties on other articles which these people were obliged to consume. The hon. gentlemen opposite had shifted their ground within the last few years. A short time ago there was a discussion in this House, and throughout the country, with regard to the question of Protection and Free-trade. The right hon. gentleman laid down a broad proposition in favour of Protection, and was ably sustained by many hon. gentlemen opposite. There had never been such an utter breakdown as had been exhibited by those hon. gentlemen last year in the discussion of that measure. They commenced with a policy of Protection, thinking they could persuade the people of this country that it would be in their interest to go for a protective policy; they believed there was something captivating in the idea of Protection, and, to a certain extent, that idea did obtain a lodging in the minds of the people. But they had commenced their game too soon. As soon as the people had time to reflect, after they had been instructed by members of Parliament and the Press, and had studied the speeches delivered throughout the country during these last two years, they realized the position in which hon. gentlemen opposite would have placed them. When these hon. gentlemen came back to Parliament they abandoned their policy, and asked only for a re-adjustment of the tariff. They abandoned the ground they had taken when they first brought forward this measure, and merely asked now for a re distribution of the tariff. They knew very well they could not touch the question of Protection unless they advanced the cost to the consumer. If it did not, the man who had goods to sell would not get more value for them, and would be just as well off without legislation at all. When their policy had been subject to the criticism of the country, they found they had to change their ground, and they now proposed merely a readjustment of the tariff, and were not going to raise the price at all. The right hon. gentleman knew that a tariff was a system of compromise between different interests, that when he came to discuss the fiscal policy of the country, when he summoned all the gentlemen around him who had the responsibilities of recommending that policy to Parliament, they could not legislate with regard to small or sectional interests, but with regard to the general interests. The hon. gentleman had said we must adopt a retaliatory policy, that we could not get reciprocity with the United States unless we had something to offer. It was rather late in the day to lay down that policy. When this country had something to offer in return for free admission of coal into the United States, the right hon. gentleman neglected that interest, and he and his policy were responsible to-day to the people of Nova Scotia for the unfortunate position in which that interest was placed at present. When the right hon. gentleman was at Washington and that treaty was under consideration, it was on record that he was offered the free admission of coal, lumber and salt into the United States. And it was on record also that when the right hon. gentleman refused that arrangement, he had not the courage to hold out, when the Americans ultimately withdrew it, but was yielding enough, to use a mild expression, to give up the only inducements we had in our possession, namely our fisheries. The right hon. gentleman knew that when he parted with our fisheries, he parted at once and for ever, as long as the treaty remained in force, with the only hope this country had of securing reciprocal relations with the United States. He did not wonder that the right hon. gentleman and his friends desired to divert public attention from the real merits of the question. It was natural that these gentlemen, feeling the false position in which they stood with regard to a measure of this importance, feeling that this country held them responsible for the position in which the lumber and coal interests and the interests of the country generally were placed, should seek by some side issue to divert public attention from their responsibility. All the speeches and motions of the right hon. gentleman would never take away the responsibility which attached to himself, his Government and his party, for having placed those great interests in their present unfavourable position. The hon. member for Cumberland had led the House to understand this evening, that the American policy of Protection had been so successful, that it was increasing their exports and driving all other countries out of the markets of the world. The hon. member was not always such a Protectionist. He took the hon. member for North Oxford to task for having changed his views during the past four or five years on this question. He (Mr. Jones) thought the House would admire the frankness with which the hon. member for North Oxford admitted he had changed his views on that question. The hon. member for Cumberland delivered a speech at Wellington in 1872, reported in the Mail of November, 1872, in which he contrasted the position occupied by the Dominion at that time, with the embarrassing position which they occupied previous to the entrance of the Maritime Provinces into Confederation. The hon. gentleman was reported to have said:

“He would now ask the electors, as he had a right to ask them, standing there as a representative of Nova Scotia, to look at the position the old Province of Canada occupied previous to the Union, with a high tariff of 25 per cent., with a rate of taxation which proved a most oppressive burden upon the people, unable, notwithstanding this high tariff, to pay its way, with the credit of the country impaired, with its finances embarrassed and the treasury nearly bankrupt, and to contrast that with the present condition of affairs when the whole country was prosperous.”

MR. JONES.

At this time, remember, the tariff had been reduced from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent. When these hon. gentlemen first entertained the proposition of the Union, they knew that the tariff of the old Province of Canada was so high that they never could induce the people of the Maritime Provinces to join them unless they reduced the tariff. The tariff was reduced from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues went to London to negotiate the question of the Union, and were there met by the delegates of Nova Scotia, of which the hon. member for Cumberland was one. They were also met there by a deputation from the anti-confederates of Nova Scotia, who were opposed to the groundwork upon which the Union was proposed to be consummated. Mr. Adams, who was on the anti-Union delegation, wrote a pamphlet in London, taking the ground that the people of the Maritime Provinces were opposed to the Union with Canada because they had undertaken a protective policy; because, at that time the Maritime Provinces had a low tariff of 10 per cent., and the moment they joined the Union it would be raised to 15, and probably 25 per cent., as it was understood that it had been reduced to 15 per cent. only for political purposes and to carry Confederation. The hon. member for Cumberland was on the delegation, and had, as one of his associates, Judge McCulloch, who wrote a pamphlet in reply to Mr. Adams. That was the view taken by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, because the right hon. gentleman was there, guiding, no doubt, the discussion, and influencing, no doubt, the very document written in reply to Mr. Adams. When he bated his Confederation mouse-trap he had to use the best bait he could get.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think my hon. friend is one of the biggest rats caught in the trap.

MR. JONES: Every argument possible had to be brought forward against Mr. Adam, and the principal argument used was that Canada having once gone back on its protective policy and on the protective traditions of the country, would never return to them. What position did the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues occupy to-day? The hon. member for Cumberland had said, in his speech already quoted, that the 25 per cent. tariff, under which the people of Canada were suffering, until reduced to induce the Maritime Provinces to enter the Union, was a burden which the people could not sustain; and to night the hon. gentleman took the opposite opinion, and with the view of influencing public opinion and of displacing the present Government, endeavouring to raise the question of protection and sail into power under that policy. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) said he was going to vote for this resolution, because it was a vote of want of confidence in the Government. He did not care what the duty, nor what was the principle involved; the only thing he considered was the object of displacing the Government, and that seemed to be the main object of the motion. The hon. member for Cumberland found fault with the hon. member for Cape Breton, because he said, frankly, and he was right in saying so, that he wanted to test the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Cumberland said he should have tested the views of hon. gentlemen on this side. Why, the hon. member for Cape Breton knew the views of the Government. They had dealt with this question as one which had been considered in the light of public policy as affecting advantageously the greatest number of the people of this country. In Nova Scotia, as the hon. member for Cumberland knew, they had a coal organization of which Mr. Lithgow a very industrious young gentleman of Halifax was secretary. Mr. Lithgow had written and published, and said a great deal in favour of the imposition of a duty on coal; but the hon. gentleman, he thought, would admit that in his published statements Mr. Lithgow laid down the proposition that if a duty on coal was accompanied with an increased duty on other articles, he did not want to have a duty on coal at all. This proposition was laid down most distinctly and authoritatively as the exposition of the views of the coal owners of Nova Scotia; therefore, they would see that these were the views which those gentlemen took, and which were national from their point of view. They held that there should be simply a revenue tariff with respect to coal, the same as was done with regard to any other article of the kind. To show how inconsistent hon. gentlemen opposite were touching this matter, when they said that they favoured a duty on coal as a means of securing duties on other articles, he would mention the fact that the whole contention of these hon. gentlemen during those last two years had been that they must promote the manufacturing interests of this country. When the right hon. member for Kingston moved his first resolution the coal or mining interest was not mentioned in it all, and their whole contention had been that our manufacturing interests should be encouraged directly and indirectly by every possible means. But what would be the effect of the passage of this motion? It would be of no benefit to the people of Cape Breton, when, at the moderate estimate of 75c. a ton, and, at the same time, it would take three quarters of a million of dollars out of the pockets of the people of the Upper Provinces, a very large portion of which would be contributed by the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec. This showed in what an illogical position these hon. gentlemen placed themselves in so arguing on a question of this kind; and how it struck at the interest which they were endeavouring to protect. One day they held that our manufacturers should be supported and the next day they favoured the imposition of a duty on an article which was necessary, in order to keep these manufactures in operation, and which policy must take money out of the manufacturers' pockets. There never was a greater contradiction in the terms, in the effect that such legislation would have upon an industry, if it would have any effect at all, than the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite advocated. Again, the question was whether this policy would send coal beyond Quebec or Montreal. At the present prices of coal in the United States, it would take more than a dollar a ton to send coal past these places, and the people of Quebec and Montreal now got their coal from Cape Breton. These hon. gentlemen spoke at times, a great deal about the desirability and necessity of sustaining intimate trade relations, and preserving, intact, our relations with Great Britain; but they were now asking that a duty should be placed on coal coming from Great Britain for the benefit of our people, though we were indebted to the people of Great Britain for defending us and sending out their soldiers —

MR. MITCHELL: Oh, nonsense; don't talk about that.

MR. JONES said he begged the hon. gentleman's pardon. The hon. gentleman might not attach any value to this matter, but he must know that Great Britain protected us with her army and navy.

MR. MITCHELL: Pull down the flag.

MR. JONES said he did not wonder that the hon. gentleman was restive under these allusions, as he was asking the House to impose a duty against the very country which protected us, and of which we now formed a part.

MR. MITCHELL: The hon. gentleman says I am asking for the imposition of a duty against the productions of Great Britain. I have declared that I will vote against the motion of my hon. friend and I oppose it.

MR. JONES said the hon. gentleman stated that he would vote for it.

MR. MITCHELL: On the contrary, I stated distinctly that I was going to vote against it.

MR. JONES: Against it?

MR. MITCHELL: Yes; against it.

MR. JONES said he understood the hon. gentleman to say that he would vote for it as part of a general policy.

MR. MITCHELL: Not at all, I stated distinctly that I was going to vote against it.

MR. JONES said that his remarks then applied to the hon. member for Cumberland. The hon. gentleman must know that, no matter what duty was imposed on coal, a certain amount of it would come out from England. Ships brought it out as ballast; they got it for a small amount and they sold it at Montreal for about what it had cost. Even if $1 a ton duty was levied, this coal would not be kept out; ships must have a certain amount of ballast, and therefore, they would bring it out no matter what the duty was. The hon. member for Cumberland had read an extract from the British Trade Journal, to which he attached very great importance; but here was an article in this publication which bore directly on the subject under consideration. This article appeared last month, and was headed "Does Protection protect." After quoting from the article, the hon. gentleman said that if the ship-owners sent their vessels to Montreal to carry away the products of the west, and had not something to bring out as ballast, or that would in some way compensate them, and pay part of the expenses of the voyage, then he laid down this proposition, that the shippers or the owners of the produce must pay the whole expense of the round voyage; and, therefore, it came to this, that the producers of the agricultural products of this country, the farmers and every man who raised anything to send abroad, by these steamers and sailing vessels, would then have to contribute so much more in increased freight under the system which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) would have introduced here. They must see that if these vessels could bring out a certain amount of coal or any other cargo, this would pay a certain proportion of the expenses of the round voyage, and just as certain as effect flowed from cause, so would natural competition give a lower rate of freight for the products of this country which were carried abroad; and there was no way in which the products in this country could be more directly interested to advantage than by having their products carried forward at a low rate from our shipping ports in this country; and, therefore, the hon. gentleman would see that on equally high authority as that which he had quoted few moments ago, a doctrine was laid down entirely opposite to the one which the hon. gentleman had quoted with reference to this subject. He might go a little farther and quote from the same number an article on American exports which was far from corroborating the views which the hon. gentleman had read to the House a short time since. The hon. gentleman had read a quotation to show that the United States had largely increased their exports, and this article, published only last month, declared that the exports of the United States last year fell off 14 millions. It had been the fashion in the discussion of this question to point to the United States and their extraordinary prosperity. If such were the fact, why were people now trying to come back from the United States to Canada. These people had left this country while the right hon. gentleman was in power, in very large numbers; and they were said to be now in a starving condition, and seeking to return to this miserable country. He would like very much to know why it was, if that country was so highly benefitted by this system of Protection, and if it was such an Eldorado to live in, and if every man could get employment there, and plenty of it, at high wages, that these people desired to return? They were even urged by hon. gentlemen opposite to spend the public money, not only to induce these people to come here, but also to bring them back, because they were starving and could not live there, and to send them to the North-West, whither they were going at the rate of 1,000 to 1,500 a week.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: From Ontario and Quebec.

MR. JONES said: Yes, and from the United States. A great many went from the United States to the North-West. A large proportion of those who proceeded to the North-West came from that country. The hon. gentleman would not deny it, he presumed, because they had it on the authority of the hon. member for Terrebonne only last year, that thousands of his countrymen in the United States were anxious to get back to the Dominion if they had the means of doing so. The hon. member for Terrebonne and his compatriots opposite held that the Government should expend the public money in order to bring these people back, and stated that they were not making a living in that land so highly favoured by Protection across the line. If there ever was an argument in favour of the present fiscal policy, it was the argument supplied by these facts, and by the fact that these persons left the country when everything was inflated across the border, that country having gone through a long war, and issued a large amount of paper currency, and when wages were increased beyond what was natural and probable to continue, allured by the apparently high wages, but when the whole thing had exploded, and manufacturers multiplied under the protective system, and more goods were manufactured than they could sell, and they had protected themselves out of the markets of the world, then we saw the extraordinary exhibition of all these manufactories being closed, and these people who left Canada a few years ago, being thrown out of employment, were anxious to return. This was the position in which these two countries stood to-day; and there could be no more striking illustration of the advantage of the policy which this Government had pursued, during the time they had been in power, of making this a cheap country to live in so that we might attract immigrants to our shores. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew that when emigrants left the Old World, they naturally selected the cheapest country to live in, all other things being equal.

MR. PLUMB: The best country is where they get the best wages.

MR. JONES: But what was $2.00 a day if it cost $1.75 a day to live. It was the purchasing power of labour that was important, and the hon. gentleman knew that if the views which he (Mr. Tupper) and his friends had taken of our great resources in the North-West were correct, and he was bound to admit that there was a great deal in them, and he hoped that this venture would be crowned with success. We had fertile prairies and fields there for the settlement of an immense population, and the best inducement to immigration that could be held out to the people of the old country to come to this country, was not only to show that we had a good track of country for settlement under a favourable climate, but also that the necessaries of life were not too high in price. In England, at the present time, expenses were being reduced as much as possible; and we knew that living alongside of the United States, it must be the policy of this country to show some illustrations of the advantage which people could obtain by coming across the border and settling in this country; and they were doing so, he was happy to say. Hon. gentlemen opposite might endeavour to mislead the people of this country with regard to the fiscal policy which the present Government had pursued and the policy of the United States. He was in a position to state that hundreds of people who had gone from Nova Scotia into the United States would be very glad to get back to this miserable Free-trade country if they had the means. No impartial man could, he thought, doubt that the arguments advanced in the various discussions with regard to the subject of Protection this Session, by gentlemen on the Government side, were unanswerable. Hon. gentlemen opposite had been compelled to come down from their Protection platform and seek a re-adjustment of the tariff. When the people of this country came to understand the question thoroughly—as, indeed, he believed, they now did—they would see that these hon. gentlemen had turned the matter into a party cry, and would not again put them in a position to interfere with the tariff for many years to come.

MR. MCGREGOR said that having heard the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton, he wished to give some particulars as to the cost of coal used in Ontario. In the State of Ohio, or at least the centre portion of it, coal was sold for 50 cents a ton, and for $1.50 more it could be placed on Lake Erie to the shore of Lake Huron. This very excellent quality of coal, which compared favourably with that of Nova Scotia, could be bought in Toronto for $3 a ton. The lowest tender made by parties in Nova Scotia to supply the Grand Trunk Railway with coal was $3.87 in the yard at Montreal, including 27c. for cartage, while the same quality of American coal could have been got for $3.50. He had often seen coal tested, and his opinion was that there was no better soft coal than that of Centre Ohio. It would not, he thought, be judicious to place the proposed duty on coal.

MR. WALLACE said the coal referred to was the most inferior that could be found on the American continent. He (Mr. Wallace) believed the fishermen would be affected, because, if a duty were placed upon coal, an equal amount would be taken off some other articles. It could be taken off tea and sugar, and they would be able to get their teas and their sugars for less ratio similar to the amount taken off coal; and he apprehended that no one would say the fisherman paid a duty on coal, so it would not affect him. The fishermen and the people of the whole Dominion would obtain a benefit in this way. When they sent products to the sea, the difficulty was to get return freights. The Dominion owned the Intercolonial Railway, and, if they sent their products by the Intercolonial Railway, and had coal to bring back, the cost of running the Intercolonial would be lessened to the people of the whole Dominion. Again, they had millions of tons of coal in Cape Breton which were useless now; but, if they brought them to Toronto, and sold them for $3 or $4 a ton, they added that to the wealth of the Dominion, which would give employment to more people, and thus the people of the whole Dominion would be benefitted by the expansion of this coal industry in Nova Scotia. It was clear, therefore, that the hon. gentleman who said that only the owners of these coal pits would be benefitted, took a narrow and sectional view of the thing.

MR. CHARLTON said he desired to call attention to some statistics which had been offered by the hon. member for Cumberland, with reference to the effect that Protection had produced in the United States. The hon. gentleman had informed them that the exports from Great Britain to the United States, in the year 1876, were $122,000,000, while in 1876 they were

$98,000,000; and that the imports from the United States into Great Britain, in 1865, were $84,700,000, and that in 1876 those imports had swelled to the enormous sum of $367,000,000. These statistics required a little scrutiny, and upon subjecting them to that scrutiny, they would find that the deductions were not what they would appear to be on the surface. They were like some statistics which had been offered by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), where a comparison was drawn between the prices of produce, before 1860, in gold, and the prices, subsequent to 1862, in depreciated currency, which was often worth only 40c. on the dollar, gold. Imports into the United States, to the value of $122,000,000, in 1865 would not represent $98,000,000 worth of goods in 1876. If the United States imported $98,000,000 worth in 1876, they imported a larger amount of goods than in 1865, when the value was $122,000,000. It must be borne in mind that, in the period from 1865 to 1876, there had been a great shrinkage of prices. Then, in regard to exports from the United States to Great Britain in 1865, when the hon. gentleman informed them that the United States exported only $84,000,000 worth to Great Britain, they must remember that that was at the expiration of a great and exhausting civil war. Fire and sword had swept over the portion of that country from which their exports of raw cotton were derived, and they had very little breadstuffs to export, because they had just disbanded a million men who had mostly been engaged in raising breadstuffs before the war. The exports of breadstuffs had, therefore, sunk to a very low figure. In 1876, they exported $793,000,000 worth of raw cotton, while in 1865 they exported almost nothing. In 1876, they exported an unusually large amount of breadstuffs, food and petroleum. In 1865, owing to the fact that they were just emerging from the civil war, they exported almost nothing of those articles. This showed how utterly unreliable those statistics were, if the aim were to prove what the hon. member for Cumberland never could prove, that Protection had benefitted the United States. He would give the

House some statistics as to the imports and exports of grain in this country, which would show whether or not the farmer needed Protection. But before referring to that question he might be permitted to say that the resolution offered to-night by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay) illustrated as forcibly as anything could illustrate, the utter absurdity of the Protection policy. Here was a resolution which standing upon its own naked merits was condemned by Protectionists upon the floor of this House, and which no Protectionist in this House, except those immediately interested in coal, would venture to justify; and yet this resolution, this policy standing upon its own naked merits, was no more absurd or unjustifiable than every single item of this Protectionist policy viewed one by one. The policy of a duty on manufactures was calculated to impose heavy burdens on the country for the benefit of a small class. The grain duty would tax the great people of this country for the benefit of a comparatively small class. He (Mr. Charlton) had been tempted at one time to introduce a motion similar to that of the hon. member for Cape Breton. There was a struggling industry in his riding. They raised corn there, and would not object to a duty of ten cents a bushel on corn; but they would not consent to it if it were coupled with a duty on other grains and on manufactures, because they would lose by such a duty, even if only two and a-half per cent. additional was levied on goods. Four years ago the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) who was now very much exercised as to the depression which existed as to the agricultural industry of the country, had entertained different opinions. Four years ago he spoke as follows:—

“The only interest which the Finance Minister pretended was suffering the slightest depression was the agricultural interest, and he (Mr. Tupper) would ask the great consuming population of this country whether they thought the agricultural interest was suffering? He thought they would give a decided response, without any hesitation, that the agricultural interest at this moment was enjoying a condition of prosperity second to none in the world.”

These were the opinions of the hon. member for Cumberland in 1874. How was it that the opinions of the hon. gentleman had undergone such a change during the subsequent four years? Were the agriculturists to-day in a worse position than they were in 1874? Were they requiring a measure of protection to-day which they did not require in 1874? No; they were not; and he proposed to show very briefly the utter absurdity of the imposition of a duty on grain for the purpose of enhancing the prices. Our imports of wheat, reducing flour to wheat at the rate of four and a-half bushels to the barrel, from June 30th, 1873, to December 31st, 1877, had been 44,807,027 bushels, valued at $52,755,656. Our export during the same period has been 55,004,005 bushels, valued at $69,290,06. During that period the balance of our exports of wheat over our imports had been 10,197,878 bushels in quantity, and $16,544,369 in value. If we exported that vast surplus of wheat during those four years and a-half, what in the name of common sense, would have been the effect of a duty on wheat. It would not have been to raise the price here. We were regularly exporting a large surplus to England, and the price obtained in that country fixed the price not only in Montreal, but in New York, in Odessa, and in every wheat market in the world. Thus the only effect a duty on wheat could have produced in those years would have been to deprive the shippers, the commission men, the millers, and the labouring men of Canada of the employment and the gains arising from the handling of forty-four millions of bushels of wheat.

MR. MACDONNELL: The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question.

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot myself see the connection.

MR. CHARLTON: I am bound to show the connection.

MR. JONES (South Leeds): Could not that wheat be just as well exported in bond through this country.

MR. CHARLTON said there existed between the transportation routes of Canada and the United States the keenest competition. We had been engaged in enlarging our canals in order to give us a through transportation. Were we to impose a duty on grain, we could by no possibility devise a bonding scheme which would result satisfactorily, and the only result of such a duty would be to place such vexatious restrictions on our carrying trade as to seriously interfere with it. As to this duty on grain—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Coal.

MR. CHARLTON said that, for the last eleven years, the American farmers had been protected by heavy duties on grain. Why was it that, under those circumstances, after having enjoyed Protection for eleven years, those farmers were selling us their grain, and hon. gentlemen opposite were calling for Protection against them? If Protection could produce any such result as was anticipated, why had it not done so in the United States? That fact, itself, exploded that policy, showed it was an utter fallacy, and that a duty on grain could not have any effect at all. It was held, he believed, that the imposition of those duties would coerce the United States into granting more liberal trade relations, and he was coming to the consideration of the utter absurdity of this belief. A reciprocity of tariff would produce no effect, so far as the United States tariff was concerned, and would be most disastrous to ourselves. What did hon. gentlemen mean by reciprocity of tariff? The right hon. member for Kingston said it would secure reciprocity of trade. Hon. members would take, he supposed, the average rate of duties on our goods imposed by the United States, and apply it to goods imported by us. The average rate of duties which we imposed on the entire list of imports was 13 per cent., while the average rate of duty in the United States, on the entire list, was 26 per cent.; that was including all free as well as dutiable goods. Hon. gentlemen, therefore, meant that the burthens of the consumers in Canada should be exactly doubled; that we should increase the average rate of duties on the entire list free, and all from 13 to 26 per cent. If there were any meaning in reciprocity of tariffs, it had that meaning. Was it supposed that that policy could produce any effect in securing a modification of American trade regulations. On the contrary, common sense would lead them to suppose that it would lead to reprisals.

MR. MACDONNELL: I do not think the question of Reciprocity is in any way connected with the coal interest.

MR. SPEAKER: The present proposal is one for reciprocity of tariff, as far as it goes. The hon. gentleman is generalizing very much, and in my opinion, is going too far from the question before the House; but it is very hard to restrain the discussion.

MR. CHARLTON said that with respect to this question of coal, he desired to point out the absurdity of the expectation that a duty of 75c. per ton on Nova Scotia coal would lead to any large consumption of that article in Canada. The best Blossburgh could be laid down in Belleville at $3.75 per ton. Nova Scotia coal could be laid down in Montreal at $3.78. Bituminous coal from Ohio could be laid down in Toronto at $3; and the best Pennsylvania coal could be laid down in Chicago at $3.85.

MR. MACDONNELL: What is your authority?

MR. CHARLTON said the hon. gentleman could refute his statement if he pleased. He protested against the interruption of the hon. member. If this statement was true, how utterly absurd it was to believe that a duty of 75c. per ton would lead to the transportation of Nova Scotia coal from Belleville, west, in competition with those kinds of American coal. It would be imposing a tax on the country; and while it would be giving a very small advantage to Nova Scotia, it would add from 5 to 7½ per cent. on an average, according to the representatives of manufacturers, to the cost of goods manufactured in Western Canada; it would be a most unjust, injurious, and absurd tax. He would attempt to show that the duty on grain exported from Canada to the United States, was, in all cases, paid by the consumer, and he would take, as an illustration, the article of barley, because, if there was one description of grain more than another on which a plausible argument could be constructed, that our farmers were not repaid the American duty, it was that article. In the last four years and a-half we had exported 37,215,000 bushels of barley, and received therefor $28,732,600, while we had imported only 767,000 bushels, paying therefor $376,000. In other words, we had exported 48 times more than we imported, and had received 76 times as much from what we exported as we had paid for what we imported. During the period of reciprocity we had received, on an average, 75½c. per bushel for barley.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member is discussing a question not at all relevant. He is opening up the whole question of Protection. If the House chooses to have that question reopened it could do so; but if the hon. member speaks on this question, I must permit every hon. gentleman to speak to every conceivable point involved.

MR. CHARLTON said his object was to answer some statements made by the hon. member for Cumberland concerning the effect of reciprocity during the period of Free-trade. The country received 75½c. per bushel for barley, and, since that period, it had received 78 and eight tenths cents per bushel, or 3¼c. more during the period when a duty of 15c. per bushel was imported on barley by the American Government than when barley was free. That exploded the idea that the producer paid the duty. He would close his remarks by again referring to the fact that this duty on coal, absurd as it unquestionably was, was not a particle more absurd than a duty on any single interest,—on manufactured goods, on grain, or in favour of the interests clamouring for Protection; and it was only when all those interests were combined in one resolution, that they had the slightest appearance of respectability or of plausibility. He would vote against this duty like the hon. member for Northumberland, but for different reasons from those he had stated. That hon. gentleman said his reason was that this was not part of a general plan. He (Mr. Charlton) would vote against it because it was part of a general plan of which he did not approve—a general plan—every item and every feature of which was as objectionable as this duty upon coal.

MR. PLUMB said he was surprised to hear such a speech as that which had been made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He had challenged the consistency of his hon. friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). In reference to that tu quoque argument he should only say that his own course hardly entitled him to raise any question of consistency. He (Mr. Plumb) had seldom heard a more ingenious argument than was used by that hon. gentleman in a certain speech he made on Protection, which was so conclusive that the hon. gentleman had never yet been able to answer it himself, though he had attempted to do so. The hon. gentleman had just stated that the consumer always paid the duty. He thought that fallacy had been exploded often enough. There was no doubt that the consumer paid the duty on imported articles which the country did not produce. But to tell him (Mr. Plumb) that the barley which was raised in Amherstburg or Windsor, and was sold in competition with the barley raised on the other side of the Detroit River, did not pay the 15c. per buchel duty, and the expense of carrying it across, was to tell him what no Amherstburgh farmer believed, and he gave the hon. gentleman credit for too much intelligence than to think he believed it himself. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) had given a schedule of prices at which coal could be delivered in Canada. An hon. gentleman who was perfectly acquainted with the prices of coal in the States, had informed him that this schedule was not entirely correct. He did not accuse the hon. member for Essex of having made an incorrect statement, but he placed against it that of an equal authority. Coal of the best quality could not be delivered in Toronto at less than $5 to $6 per ton. It was no argument to quote the price of coal entirely inferior to that under discussion. The speech of the hon. the Minister of Militia was entirely deficient in argument. It was the oft-repeated speech of Nova Scotia's wrongs and difficulties, and was marked only by its utter irrelevancy to the matter in hand, and its utter want of logical connection. He wanted to make Canada a cheap country; but, was that a cheap country where there was scarcity of employment? A cheap country was where a man got a good day's wage for a proper day's labour. It was mockery to talk to a starving man about low prices, and there was no policy which could tend more to reduce the people to that state than that pursued by the Government. Then there was the spectacle, certainly an amusing one, of the hon. member for North Oxford, stating that a few years ago, when he was an ingenious youth of fifty summers, he had brought in a tariff resolution, but that he had then had no experience and did not know the mischief he was doing. But he was no tyro then, and his attempt now to excuse his course then, on the ground of inexperience, must afford amusement to every one who has listened to the arguments brought forward. He said the manufacturers brought such a pressure that they actually misled him, and that, after the experience of twelve months, the measure gave great dissatisfaction. The circumstances when the hon. member for North Oxford brought in his resolution, and the circumstances to-day, were so widely different that no comparison could be made between the two periods. Up to the Fall of 1873, the great question which had been agitated since then, the question of Protection, had not been pressed upon the country. For years Canadians had been selling the Americans everything, owing to their system of inflation, and they could sell nothing in return. Everyone who knew anything of the condition of the country knew that this was an utter fallacy, and no gentleman should make the argument which was made by the hon. members for South Waterloo and North Oxford and a host of other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; though he gave them the credit of supposing that they did not use this argument with any sincerity, for it was perfectly apparent that the condition of things in 1873-4 and now was entirely different, as, at the present time, this country was made a slaughter market for American goods. No comparison could be made between these periods. This resolution was introduced by a faithful, and he might almost say a servile follower of the Government, and his whole career in Parliament.—

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton): If the hon. gentleman refers to me, I hurl the statement back as ungentlemanly, and improper, and out of place.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order, and the hon. member for Niagara used an unparliamentary expression when he spoke of the hon. gentleman as being a servile follower.

MR. PLUMB said the hon. gentleman had supported the Government with such great faithfulness, and in such an unreasoning manner, that, with full knowledge of the great interests of the country he represented that were at stake, he (Mr. MacKay) had uniformly voted down every proposition which had been brought up by the Opposition touching the questions which most vitally concerned the hon. gentlemen and his constituents. The hon. gentleman had afforded one of the most remarkable spectacles of subserviency to the party in power by the course he had pursued in this House since he (Mr. Plumb) became a member of it, and this hon. gentleman now, at the eleventh hour, and in a moribund Parliament, about the time when he had to render account to his constituents, brought forward this resolution as a sort of death-bed confession, which he trusted might be acceptable to his constituents. Members of the Opposition, consistent with their professions, would support this resolution as they knew that it was only the part of a great scheme. But it would not find favour on the other side of the House, and members of the Opposition would affirm a principle in which they all believed, by supporting this resolution, perhaps a great deal to the hon. gentleman's astonishment. The hon.

gentleman had brought it forward for purposes best known to himself. Did he suppose for one moment that it could find favour at the hands of the Government, which he (Mr. MacKay) had supported so sedulously. The hon. gentleman's course was apparent to everybody; he had never dreamed of such a thing as the success of this motion, he had offered it for an entirely different purpose which he (Mr. Plumb) would not characterize. Members of the Opposition wished it to be understood distinctly that this motion did not all meet the question which they advocated, it was only part of a great scheme, and it could not stand by itself. No doubt every hon. gentleman who entertained the same views with himself would support the resolution though they were not guided and could not be guided by any particular party necessities or party affiliations, while so acting.

MR. CAMPBELL said that when he read this resolution he had concluded that it was only a farce. When he entered the House, three years ago, he was inclined to support the party in power; they had professed such purity and reform principles that he was really led to believe that they were in some degree sincere, but he was not here many weeks before he came to the conclusion that the Government was incapable of properly steering the ship of State, though they might do very well in a small boat. This ship was too big for these hon. gentlemen. He was not long in the House before he applied to the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay), to bring up this coal question; but the hon. gentleman backed down, and would give him no help. He had concluded that the Government had no policy but that of expediency. They had no direct course or compass; they only drifted, the ship was too large for these hon. gentlemen. They might do well enough in a barge on the lakes, but at sea they were utterly at a loss. The hon. gentleman opposite had opened up a large field for discussion.

SIR. JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is much larger than a coal field.

MR. CAMPBELL said that the Government were willing to annoy the country with the Stamp Tax, which was most annoying to business men, and other imposts, but they were not inclined to assist in encouraging and developing the industries of the country. They refused to put a duty on coal, and to protect the country's interests, but they were willing to raise a revenue in the most obnoxious and disagreeable manner possible. The Government that would allow American coal to come in free of duty, and that would kill our own industries, ought not to be permitted to remain a day longer in power. Besides, they brought in Russians and Mennonites who refused to defend the country in which they lived. No country had attained eminence unless it possessed coal. This was a most important interest and it should be encouraged. He had voted for the protection of breadstuffs; he was one of 29 in 280 gentlemen, and this was the proudest vote that he had ever given in his life. The Government should pass laws and regulations for the benefit of the whole population; sectional interests should not prevail. They should remember that they were founding a country for posterity, and they should sacrifice their private interests for the common and public good. One section said "We will not use your coal if we can get it cheaper elsewhere." Was that an argument that should be used in this House? No. He was anxious to protect his neighbour's flour, oats, barley, cheese, tobacco or any other production from the encroachments of foreigners. He must say, then, that the Premier had done wrong to surround himself with men who were unable to form a proper opinion with regard to this subject. These men had no brains, they did not possess one inch of human nature, and the Minister of the Interior in particular, was unfit for his position. What had been the result of the policy adopted by these gentlemen during the last four years? The country had almost become insolvent. The Province which he came from was bankrupt now. These gentlemen paid no attention to the wants of the country. They said "We don't require to listen to these people, we can buy constituenties and we can tax you; we can give so many thousand to this or that man." But that policy must come to an end. These gentlemen were antagonistic to the interests of the country, but they must be brought to a sense of their duty.

MR. BLAIN: I rise to order. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question, and this sort of language ought not to be tolerated.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Victoria has asserted, as I understand him, that it is essential for the prosperity of this country that a protective duty should be placed on coal. It is true he has repeated things a great many times, but still his arguments are as relevant at one time as at another. He has certainly used expressions towards a member of this House which may be rather unparliamentary, but I thought it as well to let him go on.

MR. CAMPBELL said he only wished to point out that the fact of the hon. member for Cape Breton, having voted against similar resolutions to his own, proposed by the Opposition, showed that the policy of the Government was one of expediency

MR. DYMOND said that having, at an earlier period of this Session, discussed this question at some length, he simply rose to make a reply to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. member for Essex, and other speakers. It was, he admitted, a matter of considerable difficulty to ascertain the comparative prices of Nova Scotia and American coal. In speaking of the price of coal, it must be borne in mind, too, that the ton of Nova Scotia coal was what was called the long ton of 2,240 lbs., while the American ton was equal only to 2,000 lbs. It, therefore, became of importance to ascertain the precise value of the same quality of coal delivered at two different points by Nova Scotia and American coal mines respectively. While discussing, too, the value of Nova Scotia coal at such points as Toronto and Hamilton, the large area of country to the west where the consumption of coal was largely increasing, and where, geographically, the supply was much more easily obtained from American than Nova Scotian sources, must be borne in mind. Last year a contract was made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company for a supply of coal at various places, notably Montreal and Toronto, and the results were set forth in a speech which he held in his hand. Tenders for Nova Scotia coal were accepted by the Railway Company for Montreal, at $3.96 per long ton on the wharf, or, adding 27 cents for cartage, to $4.23 in the yard. In Toronto a tender for American coal was accepted at $3.40 per short ton in the yard, or $3.78 per long ton, being a difference, in favour of the United States coal, of 45 cents. Then, the cost of conveying coal from Montreal to Toronto would not, he thought, cost less than $1.50 per ton, which, of course, must also be taken into account. Under ordinary circumstances it would be $2. That applied to coal delivered at Montreal, Toronto, or Hamilton only. It did not apply to the large quantity of coal which would be consumed if Nova Scotia coal could be obtained west or north-west of those cities. That seemed to be conclusive as to the fact that 75c. a ton would not allow Nova Scotia coal to be laid down in the west, and if that would fail to bring Nova Scotia coal to Toronto or Hamilton, 50c. a ton would be less efficient.

Mr. PLATT said his constituents were much interested in the coal question. A large quantity of coal was consumed in Toronto. The depression in the United States had reduced the price of coal a great deal. In previous years the price of coal had been $5 or $6 a ton, and sometimes $7 a ton. The usual price, last year, in Toronto had been $5 and $5.25, and this year it was much lower. These gentlemen from Nova Scotia wanted protection to coal, though they claimed to be Free-traders. This was very selfish. He (Mr. Platt) was willing to place a duty on coal when they got a reconstruction of the Tariff, such as was proposed by his hon. friend from Kingston, but he should vote against this selfish proposition. These gentlemen were looking to get the votes of their constituents, and wanted to be able to say that they had brought forward a proposition to put a duty on coal. They ought to be ashamed of themselves. The people of Ontario were willing to put a duty on coal if they could get a readjustment of the Tariff.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he took the opportunity a day or two ago to say to the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government that he was ready to assist him in getting as much business through the House as rapidly as possible, but he might have made no such promise, as the majority, at least, did not seem wearied, and were apparently anxious to keep Parliament for some time longer. The Minister of Militia reopened the question of Protection that had been discussed for a week or more on the speech from the Throne, and also on his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) motion, and certainly he had not added anything to the stock of information on the subject. However, if hon. gentlemen opposite were determined to have the question discussed again they could have it discussed. The Minister of Militia had also tried to lead away the House from the discussion immediately before it. The reason of that was that he was in a difficult position. In the first place he was a Nova Scotia member, in the next place he was a member of the Government, and in the last place he was a member of Halifax; and, therefore, he had thought it well to fly away from the subject before the House and to open up the whole question. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would not follow him into his discussion of the Washington Treaty, a matter which was settled, but would just refer to his statement that the policy of the United States was injurious to its trade, indeed, that it was so injurious that hundreds of thousands of people were leaving the country and flocking to Canada. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought the hon. gentleman, and he was not then so much fettered as he was now, in a communication to Sir Francis Hincks used these words:—

“Again, you are no doubt aware that the American Government, always alive to the interests of their people and all that relates to the prosperity of their country, have recently passed a Treasury order increasing considerably the drawback on white refined sugar, the result of which has been that the great bulk of that quality of sugar now in use in Canada comes from that quarter, etc. Hence it follows that if our trade is to be encouraged or sustained, such exceptional legislation must be met by corresponding legislation on our part."

MR. JONES (Halifax): Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And this is the retaliatory policy the hon. gentleman speaks of.

MR. JONES: Exceptional.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Exactly, that is exactly the policy of this side of the House. So long as there was such a policy obtaining in the United States the people of this country must take means to meet it. Canada must be, in the words of the Minister of Militia, "always alive to the interests of our people," and take steps to protect the people against a policy which was injurious to their interests.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Hear, hear; I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: However, he wished to say a few words with reference to the motion before the House. The hon. gentleman who moved it, did not pretend to assume that he moved it in the interests of Nova Scotia. He did not pretend to say that it was in the interest of the coal owners. On the contrary, it was moved, as the hon. gentleman admitted, for the purpose of trying what metal the leader of the Opposition was made of, with a view to testing his sincerity; and in order to put him, as the hon. gentleman thought, in a false position, he was willing to make a motion at the wrong time, in the wrong way, and with the knowledge that he was going to accumulate against the interest which he professed to represent, probably the largest vote which would be given in this House on this question. He, a very obsequious, a very continuous, and a very humble follower of the Government, was to make himself the means of accumulating against the coal interest the vote of the whole Liberal party, the whole of the Ministry, and to bring down upon himself by his motion the statement by a Nova Scotia member, and a member of the Ministry, that his motion was absurd, and the consequences would be disastrous to the country. He (Mr. MacKay) would go down to his constituents, and they would know that he brought the motion up for party purposes, and for the purpose of destroying or prejudicing the chances of the coal owners to get the relief they wanted. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would like to be near when they met him.

MR. MacKAY: You would receive a very warm reception.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had no doubt he would receive a good reception if he went down. The hon. gentleman had studiously set every other interest against the coal interest. In voting against his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) resolution, which supported the protection of all interests, he had voted to set every interest against him. He had voted to set the whole of Western Canada against it by voting against a duty on wheat and flour, and to set all the rest of Canada against it by voting against a duty on corn and oats, and no doubt his constituents knew it. He prepared his motion with a view to preventing as many as possible from voting for it. The coal owners only asked a duty of 50c. a ton, but he asked 75c., in order to shock the Western people, who were consumers of American coal. Then he made it a duty on all kinds of coal, although there was no anthracite coal in Cape Breton, and the coal owners were quite willing to accept a duty of 50c. a ton on bituminous coal.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said of course they would be glad to have a duty on anthracite coal as well, but they would be quite satisfied with the minor duty. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would be quite justified in voting against his resolution, but he was going to vote for it.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is against your argument.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had two reasons for voting for it—a trade reason and a political reason. The trade reason was, that it was a step in the right direction of the policy the Opposition had been urging. He would vote for it because it was a part of that policy which was being brought up piecemeal by the supporters of the Government. Suppose they should carry a duty on coal, then when Protection to manufacturers was proposed, the representatives of the coal interest would be compelled to vote for it, because if they did not the Protection they had would be repealed. The political reason was, that the Premier had declared all the votes on motions of this kind to be votes of want of confidence. When he (Sir John A. Macdonald) introduced his resolution, he (Mr. Mackenzie) called it a want of confidence motion, and, as a consequence, the Ministerialists were whipped in, the whip sounded through the House, the studs sprang to the collar, and many were converted, including the hon. members for North Norfolk and North Oxford. Notwithstanding that, four, who ordinarily supported the Government, were not converted, and they voted want of confidence—Messrs. Brown, Coupal, Macdonald (Cornwall), and Robillard—and it was only right to say that any one who voted want of confidence had not regained his confidence in the Government until he was converted. So that these gentlemen, in justice to them, it should be said, still had no confidence in the Government. Then there came afterwards a motion for the member for West Hastings and the member for East Durham, who also proposed a vote of want of confidence in the Government because the Premier would not put a duty on wheat. There were six Ministerialists who voted want of confidence in the Government on the resolution proposed by the member for Iberville (Mr. Bechard) to protect coarse grains. The House did not know how many Ministerialists would vote for the present resolution, but it was certain the mover and seconder and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) would. There were three. Altogether there were ten who had voted against the Government. The Government had a majority in the first Session of eighty-six votes. On the question of policy raised under his resolution, they had a majority of thirty-seven, and all remembered what an active whip had been used to get that majority. Of those thirty-seven there were now ten who reversed their views and were about to declare, at this moment, a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and those ten would count twenty on a division; therefore, the Government had a majority, on this individual vote, of seventeen. So that on the trade of policy, the tariff policy of the Government, the strong majority of eighty-six would stand, after this vote, only seventeen. That was a triumph for the Opposition, and foreshadowed the result at the approaching elections. Why did these gentlemen, who ordinarily supported the Premier, now vote against his policy? Because the pressure of their constituents demanded this vote from them. Anxious as they were to support him, they felt constrained to vote either for his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) motion, or for the motion on wheat and flour, or the motion on coarse grains, or the motion on coal.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) said the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) had stated that Mr. Fraser, the Secretary of the Manufacturers' Association, who was a Reformer, was a body-servant of the right hon. member for Kingston, and that the meeting of that Association, held in Toronto, had been called together by Mr. Fraser going around to different towns and nominating gentlemen to attend it. Both of those statements were totally unfounded and incorrect. With regard to the meeting itself, the hon. gentleman said it consisted of a miserable few of fifty. That meeting was attended by delegates who had been elected by the different Associations throughout Canada, from Montreal to Sarnia, and who represented every shade of politics; and the resolutions were passed unanimously. He, as an Ontario manufacturer, was ready to place the duty on coal which a readjustment of the tariff would require, but could not give his support to this specific motion for a duty of 75c. per ton.

MR. KERR said, as a representative of Ontario, he entered his solemn protest against this resolution. He did not see why the people should be taxed 50c., 75c., or $1 per ton for the benefit of a few people interested in coal mines in Nova Scotia. The right hon. gentleman said he would vote for this amendment, because it was a vote of want of confidence in this Government. Did the hon. gentleman mean to tell the House and country that this was to entitle them to the confidence of the country, for this was a tax which the people did not want, and would not have; and this policy did not entitle the Opposition to the confidence of the country. He would have very great pleasure in aiding, by his vote, the Speaker to announce that this amendment had been carried in the negative. If they had time they would see the whole circle of the trade relations comprised in this wretched National Policy taken up one by one, and shown to be a complete circle of absurdities. There were a great many manufacturers in his part of the country and in Ontario, who were beginning to find out the meaning of this tax on coal; and the right hon. gentleman would find that this tax had done very much, even in the minds of manufacturers, to shake the confidence that they were disposed to have in the right hon. gentleman's so-called National Policy. The right hon. gentleman and his followers knew and felt that they had an elephant on their hands, and he wished them luck with it. As a representative of an Ontario constituency, he wished to enter his solemn protest against the result sought to be fastened on the people of this country by this amendment. He did not care who moved it; to pass it would be unwise and unjust, and he had no doubt that it would share the fate of what the right hon. gentleman had called the first step in his National Policy. They would now take another step in this relation.

MR. MACKAY: Mr. Speaker —

HON. MEMBERS: Question, order.

MR. MACKAY: I crave the indulgence —

MR. SPEAKER: The mover of the amendment has no right to address the House a second time, unless the House chooses to indulge him.

MR. KERR.

MR. MACKAY: Mr. Speaker —

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: As the House is so very strongly disposed not to hear the hon. gentleman, I cannot permit him to speak. Call in the members.

MR. MACKAY: Mr. Speaker —

MR. SPEAKER: The members are called in and no hon. member has a right to address the Chair.

XI. MILITIA.

78. Mounted Police N.W.T..... $306,000

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Considering the enormous reduction made by the Government in this vote, seeing that it was last year $306,356.50, and is now $306,000, showing a saving of no less a sum than $305.50, I think that we cannot press an amendment; and so we will allow the vote to pass.

MR. TUPPER said he, last year, had brought to the attention of the Government the case of a mounted policeman who was killed in the discharge of his duty, and the Government had undertaken to see that the land to which this man would have become entitled had he lived a very short time longer, or its equivalent, would be conveyed to his relations.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am informed that compensation to his mother is about to be recommended by the Secretary of State.

MR. MITCHELL said he desired to have some explanations about this item. This force was composed of 320 men, who each cost about $1,000 per annum. The thing was outrageous. The general impression was that a great deal of extravagance was shown in connection with this service.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, no doubt the hon. gentleman was perfectly correct in saying that the cost was very great. The cost of such a force sustained, as it was, over a country about 1,200 by 400 miles, at eight or nine separate points, and supplied at a great distance from the base of operations or supplies, was necessarily very great. The hon. gentleman would also note that this being a mounted force, the expenditure was necessarily very nearly the double of what would be required if it was composed of infantry; and also that they could not get suitable men to enter this force, to go into that country where the service was laborious, and might be attended with some danger, without paying them tolerably handsomely. Their equipment was also, necessarily, somewhat expensive. The other items to which exception might be most reasonably taken, appeared to be those of rations and forage, which amounted to nearly $100,000. They had hoped to reduce these items; but at present owing particularly to the very high rate at which forage was supplied, they could not expect, during 1878-9, at any rate, to look for much reduction. Round several ports at which these men were stationed, land was being gradually brought into cultivation both by troopers and settlers, and in the course of two or three years, they trusted that sufficient land would be under cultivation at these spots to supply the wants, at any rate, of the cattle. They were gradually reducing the price of the rations. The hon. gentleman was probably aware that the expense of transport in that country was very great. Oats for instance, cost five cents a pound, equal to $1.50 or $1.60 a bushel, and expenditure of this kind would, of course, swell the keep of every individual horseman to a very considerable extent. So far as they were able to ascertain, the expense per head of this force, large as it appeared, was very nearly one-third per man less than that of the American troopers stationed at similar posts on the opposite side of the frontier, not taking into account any special expenditure on account of the Indian disturbances. The head-quarters of this force was at Fort McLeod; the next most important station was Fort Walsh, in the vicinity of the place where Sitting Bull and his band were stopping; attached to Fort Walsh were two or three out posts, and there was, besides, a part of the force at Battleford, Swan River and Shoal Lake, and a small force at Qu'Appelle, and at Fort Saskatchewan. In all there were eight or ten such posts. It was probable that during the next summer it would be necessary to mass a considerable force at Fort Walsh station, in consequence of a number of Indians who had settled in that vicinity, or were crossing the line.

MR. SCHULTZ: I would like to ask the total number of Mounted Police.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: There are 330 men with, of course, the same number of horses. A small number of women and children are also attached to the posts, but the policy of the Government is to have as many unmarried men as possible.

MR. MITCHELL said the expense incurred in connection with this service was extraordinary. On turning to page 115 of the Public Accounts, he found that the clothing of the men cost $100 per head. Then at page 117, he found an enormous amount charged for transport of stores; one item alone amounting to $25,965. He noticed that 20 loads of hay were charged $20. Now, he would like to know how many loads were represented in the $62,425 set down for oats and hay.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the charges were necessarily large, when it was considered that oats cost as much as 5 to 7c. a pound in the North-West. The expenditure for hay hitherto had amounted to about $15 per ton. Hon. gentlemen were mistaken when they supposed that hay could be grown in unlimited quantities on the prairies, near the point where the force were stationed. A considerable area of land round two or three of the forts was being put under cultivation.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. MACMILLAN said that the men could cultivate as much as should supply forage for the whole of the horses, and food for the men during one year, unless some unforeseen circumstance, such as the appearance of grasshoppers, occurred. In fact the expenditure for this department should consist of nothing more than the pay of officers and men.

MR. CARTWRIGHT feared that was taking too sanguine a view of the case. It was desirable that a reasonable amount of land should be cultivated, but it must be remembered that the forces sent to the North-West had very responsible duties to perform, having 1,500 or 2,000 Indians under their special charge, and they could not be expected, therefore, to do much farming.

MR. BOWELL asked if any farming land had been sowed by these men hitherto and had proved a success?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the produce for two years was completely destroyed, but during the current year some crop was obtained.

MR. BOWELL said he understood the difficulty of this question. There could be no doubt that, with the very onerous duties which they had to discharge, the Mounted Police could not devote much time to farming. The only point seemed to be, whether farming should not be carried on in the neighbourhood of the posts by men exclusively employed for that purpose.

MR. MACKENZIE said last year the Mounted Police in the neighbourhood of Swan River were supplied from a farm there with oats at a dollar a bushel, and hay at seven dollars a ton.

MR. BUNSTER said that the sooner the Canadian Pacific Railway was built the sooner would this expenditure be done away with. He was surprised to find so large an amount asked for this service. After an experience of three years, the Government ought to be able to raise oats at the mere cost of raising them, three-fourths of a cent. per lb., which would pay any farmer. It was said that the officers had onerous and dangerous duties to perform. They had no more onerous duties than to raise their own vegetables and provide for their cattle and themselves; but the great duty which the Government had to perform was to build the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he was rather surprised to hear some of the remarks of hon. gentlemen who ought to be better informed as to the cost of keeping men and horses in countries like the North-West. He had had some experience in this matter, and he considered that to keep 330 men with their horses for $306,000 a year was very cheap. It was only $450 a head for a man and a horse. He thought the force was underpaid rather than overpaid. He hoped the day was not far distant when the railway would be built, and there would be no occasion for that force; but, in the meantime, while they had thousands of Indians to deal with, who might, perhaps, be friendly, it was absolutely necessary that they should have some force to preserve good government in their territory. In case of an Indian war, the amount of $306,000 might have to be multiplied ten times. There might be items in connection with which extravagance took place. It was very likely that there would be speculations and rings formed for furnishing fodder and other things, but while hay was only costing them $15 per ton, he was accustomed to pay $100 per ton for a good quality of hay. On the whole, he thought it was absolutely necessary that this force should be kept in proper order, and should be well paid to do their work. If a policeman had to ride many miles to put down an Indian raid, his horse must be well fed. These gentlemen, like the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who lived down by the sea, knew nothing except what related to fish and coal. He thought the item should be passed unanimously.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. gentleman had based his argument on the idea that they were dealing with expenditure in the mountains of Cariboo, instead of the plains of the North-West, where horses could feed all the year. He did not object to any reasonable expenditure to maintain a force on a proper system, but he objected to the enormous expenditure which the Public Accounts showed to have been made. There was an amount of $3,679 charged for postages, telegrams and stationery. He should like to know who was paid for these telegrams, and if there was any telegraph line there except the line under the control of the Government?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the telegrams were usually sent by way of the United States, and there had been a great deal of telegraphing from Fort Benton.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought the charge of $1,275 for stationery was enormous.

MR. SCHULTZ said that, as the Government would not probably force the vote to-night, an opportunity would be given for further discussion of this important matter, and he would confine his remarks to endeavour to elicit information from the Minister of Finance. It would be remembered that the amount expended, or rather paid, to R. G. Baker & Co. for forage last year was $38,000, while the amount paid to the same firm this year was over $62,000, while other amounts were paid to A. G. B. Bannatyne, and others, for forage, as shown by the Public Accounts. Now, when this item came up in Committee last year, he (Mr. Schultz) had demurred at the amount of $38,000 having been paid, and the Minister of Justice then expressed his own surprise at the large amount, and said that he was in correspondence with the officers of the force with a view to its reduction in future. Now, instead of being reduced, it was largely increased; and, before consenting to the item passing, he desired to know what portion of this amount was for hay alone, and in what manner tenders had been asked for the supplying of it. If the tenders called for the furnishing of the whole amount required, then it was easy to see that, as this firm of R. G. Baker & Co. was the only one large enough to undertake it, that they could have it at their own price. Now, while it was a fact that settlements of our own people—discharged policemen, Métis and Canadian--were springing up around the different posts, the tenders should be asked at the post where required, and only for the quantity there needed. He had occasion to call attention to the enormous amount--nearly $130,000--paid to this firm, for the current year before the last, and he trusted that, while this force was costing the very large amount of nearly $1,000 per man, that every opportunity would be given to our own people to furnish supplies.

MR. CAMPBELL said he had seen in the papers a statement that the commanders of this, and the United States forces, had agreed to combine to put down Sitting Bull. This appeared to be a very extraordinary negotiation. Besides, a member of the Government had gone to Washington last summer to negotiate with a foreign power about Sitting Bull, and he thought that this was also an extraordinary proceeding. He had never heard of such a thing before.

MR. McCARTHY said that in the absence of the hon. member for North Simcoe he wished to draw the attention of the hon. the Premier to a matter in which both the hon. member for North Simcoe and himself had taken a little interest last Session. This related to the route by which the Mounted Police had been sent out to the North-West. Last Session this question had been brought up on two occasions, and the hon. the First Minister had stated that, as far as he knew, the Collingwood line was receiving a larger portion of the public patronage in that direction than the Sarnia line, and he had promised them that in future these two lines should be placed on a footing of equality. It appeared that up to that time some $9,000--if he remembered right--had been paid to the Sarnia line by the Government, $3,348 in one and $6,452 in another year, against $1,228 to the Collingwood line. He found in the Public Accounts since brought down, that J. H. Beattie & Co. received for transporting men, horses and stores $1,752, and that the Windsor and Lake Superior Line, which he understood represented the old line of J. H. Beattie & Co., $1,043.37, making all together $2,795.46, while so far as he could observe not a solitary dollar had been paid to the Collingwood Line. He had understood the hon. the First Minister to say last year, that he had already given instructions to have this matter corrected, but the policy of the Government seemed to be unchanged in this direction. Certainly it seemed to be exceedingly unjust that the shortest route--he did not find that it was any cheaper, though certainly it was not more expensive--should be so completely ignored as had been the case by the present Administration.

MR. MACKENZIE said he really did not know anything about the transport of any portion of the Force. He was not aware that any men were sent up, but he would make enquiry of the Minister who had charge of this matter. If notice had been given of this question, he would have obtained the information.

MR. McCARTHY: The items are contained in the Public Accounts, page 117.

MR. MACKENZIE said that he would enquire into the matter. There was no truth in the alleged agreement of Col. McLeod with the United States commanders about joint action with regard to Sitting Bull. Nothing of the kind had been done. This was, of course, a mere newspaper rumour.

MR. CURRIER said it was desirable that these men should be well equipped, as they might be called upon at any moment to act with reference to Indians, who, he believed, would yet give a great deal of trouble. He did not think the sum set down in the estimates was excessive, if the horses were fed as they ought to be. It seemed to him, however, that oats might be raised in the vicinity of the stations to feed the horses, instead of bringing oats such long distances.

MR. TROW said that, in the course of a year or two, provender for horses would be raised in the vicinity of the posts, and steps had already been taken by Captain French to raise oats.

MR. MITCHELL said the discussion which this item had elicited, showed the futility of bringing up a matter of this kind at such a late hour. He should ask, on Concurrence, to have the item reduced by $100,000.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE— PETER SUTHERLAND.

REPORT PRESENTED.

MR. YOUNG presented the second report of the Public Accounts Committee, and said the object was to bring before the House the case of Peter Sutherland, of Winnipeg, who had neglected to pay attention to the summons of the Committee, to appear and give evidence in the matter of the Nixon accounts. This was the first case of the kind which had occurred since Confederation, and he would read a few extracts from May on the subject.

MR. LANGEVIN said it would be better to read the extracts and discuss the case after the report had been printed in the Votes and Proceedings. This should be done in justice to Mr. Sutherland.

MR. SPEAKER said it was unusual to discuss a report except on a motion to adopt it.

MR. YOUNG said he did not wish to discuss the matter; he simply wished to give a statement of the case.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had better proceed regularly.

MR. HOLTON said there could be no doubt that Sutherland had been guilty of a flagrant contempt of this House, but at this period of the Session it was impossible to vindicate the privileges of Parliament before prorogation. The question now was whether Parliament should vindicate its privileges or avert future events. The only object of the Chairman of the Public Accounts was to lay the case before the House, and he saw no objection to that.

MR. SPEAKER said it was not the practice to supplement the report of a Committee by a statement from the chairman, and he must say that he regarded it as an objectionable mode of proceeding, especially as objection had been made to it.

MR. YOUNG said he bowed to the ruling of the Speaker.

PRINTING COMMITTEE—DISTRIBUTION OFFICE.

MOTION TO ADOPT REPORTS.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved the adoption of the fourth and fifth Reports of the Printing Committee. He stated that one of these Reports referred to a matter in connection with the Distribution office. The Committee had found that the work could not be attended to by the present staff during the recess, and Mr. Botterell had requested that one of the Sessional messengers should be transformed into a permanent messenger. The Committee had recommended that this request should be complied with, and that an additional allowance of $300 should be allowed for this messenger.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this might be all perfectly right, but it was an interference with the law which governed the House. This matter ought to be left with the Speaker and the Commissioners of Internal Economy. If the Committees of the House undertook to make these changes practically in the salaries of officials, it would be very awkward.

MR. ROSS said that the Printing Committee was not a Committee having the ordinary privileges of a Committee of the House. It was an extraordinary Committee. A few years ago they had appointed an additional messenger as Sessional messenger in that Department, and this report was adopted in precisely the same form as he had moved the adoption of this report. This was merely the exercise of the same privilege on a somewhat more extended scale, for the allowance in this case was $300, while in the other case it was $200.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this was not a Committee of this House at all. He believed that the same motion would be made in the Senate.

MR. ROSS: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE said: Imagine the Senate adopting a report imposing duties on this House. It would never do, and it would be quite irregular.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was quite irregular. The Speaker and the Committee on Internal Economy were responsible for all these arrangements, and they should not be relieved of this responsibility in any way. If a similar transaction took place last year, that was irregular as well.

MR. SPEAKER: I have not the slightest recollection of what was done on a former occasion. The report, or the purport of it, and the effect of the resolution, I think, entirely escaped my notice or I would have objected to it at the time. I would have objected to this if the Premier had not raised the objection. I think that Committees, in these cases, should confine themselves to recommendation.

MR. HOLTON said that he doubted whether it was competent for these Committees to even make recommendations. The law of Parliament was quite clear that Committees, whether Standing or Special, should only report on subjects referred to them by the House. This was the plain law.

MR. BOWELL said that the position taken by the Premier, the right hon. member for Kingston, and the hon. member for Chateauguay, might be quite correct; but the practice, so far as the Printing Committee was concerned, had been, for the last ten years, that which had been pursued on the present occasion. He remembered distinctly that when the Premier was the Chairman of the Printing Committee—

MR. MACKENZIE: That was before the Committee was established.

MR. BOWELL said he thought not. He recommended to the House an increase of salary to the Clerk, and this was, he might also remark, defeated. He knew that, a year or two ago, a recommendation was also made to increase the salary of Mr. Boterell, the Distribution Clerk, and an additional assistant was given this official by this Committee. The report was made to the House—the recommendation was similar to this one—and was approved, whether it was approved by the Senate or not, he was not prepared to say. If the Committee had overstepped its duty on this occasion, certainly this was not the first time. This was only pursuing the practice which had been in vogue for a number of years past.

MR. BLAKE said he was glad, if this practice had been pursued for a number of years past, that it was now stopped. He had great objection to even recommendations from these Committees. It was quite right to communicate such matters in an informal manner having special sources of information, to those responsible for the internal economy of the House; but nothing could be more calculated to withdraw an efficient sense of responsibility, and an efficient control from the three or four persons entrusted with this duty, than to have these recommendations made by a Committee which was not responsible for the economy of the House; and if a Committee of the House concurred in recommending an increase, it would be made and nobody would be responsible. He conceived that this was contrary to law, certainly it was so unless these officials stood upon a different footing, and were appointed in a different way to other officials of the House. He had never before heard of this being done.

MR. TUPPER said that no doubt an informal recommendation through this Committee would receive all desirable attention; and this would avoid the creation of an irresponsible body.

MR. ROSS.

MR. SPEAKER: I think that, under the circumstances, the hon. member ought to withdraw the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

INGONISH HARBOUR.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Order for Mr. Speaker to leave the Chair, for the House to go again in Committee of Supply, read.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he wished to move an amendment and would not detain the House at any length. It was in reference to one of those contracts of which they had heard so much of late in this House. The facts he was going to state would show how the Government could award contracts to the lowest tenderers, and, at the same time, compensate them if they were friends of the Government. The motion was as follows:—

“That by a return of the House of the 16th February, 1877, dated 1st March, 1877, —and also by a Return to an Order of the House of the 19th March, 1877, and dated 20th March, 1877, for copies of all tenders and contracts, plans and other correspondence, relating to the Ingonish Harbour contract, in Nova Scotia, it appears:—

“That on the 10th May, 1873, the contract for building Ingonish Harbour was awarded to F. W. McKenrie, for the sum of $78,208.60; that in pursuance thereof an agreement was entered into, on the 22nd July, 1873, between F. W. McKenrie and the Minister of Public Works; that under the terms of the agreement, afterwards renewed between Ross & McKay, to whom the contract was transferred by the said F. W. McKenrie and the present Government on the 5th February, 1874, it was stipulated, that any change which the Government Engineer deemed necessary to be made in the original plans, should be so made by the contractor, and if extra expenses were entailed by such changes, the contractor should be paid extra for them; but should the change lessen the original expense, then such should be deducted from the amount of the contract;

“That by the said contract, the said Ross & McKay were bound to build a Breakwater 700 feet long, and were to make good all damages it might sustain during its construction; that they were to dredge a channel into the Harbour 200 feet wide, and 15 feet deep; the contract was to be finished on or before the 31st December, 1874; that the contractor was liable for any salary or wage due the person superintending the work in behalf of the Government for any time he might serve in so superintending beyond the 31st December, 1874;

That on the 31st September, 1876, Mr. Perley, Government Engineer, six months after the work should have been finished, recommended extra work, estimated to cost $2,000;

That it appears the said Breakwater was not taken off the hands of the contractor before the 17th February, 1877; that at that time there were but 535 feet, less than provided by the terms of the contract;

That it does not appear that the channel has been dredged 200 feet wide, and 15 feet deep, as per terms of contract, and as recommended on the 26th January, 1876, both by Mr. Perley and Mr. Baillargé; but, on the contrary the papers go to show that it has been dredged only 60 feet wide, and 12 feet deep;

That it appears the sum of $1,975 was paid one Angus McLeod, Superintendent on this work, in behalf of the Government for attendance subsequent to the 31st December, 1874, the terms on which the work should have been completed;

That, notwithstanding the reduction in the length of the Breakwater, and that the dredging was not done to the width of 200 feet, and to the depth of 15 feet, but only to 60 feet wide, and 12 feet deep, and the extension of the time for building it to over two years, the Government paid the full amount of contract $78,208.60 cents; and also extras to the amount of $3,643, without deducting therefrom the allowance for the Breakwater being less in length, and the dredging less in width and depth as aforesaid, and without deducting the $1,975, paid for the services of Superintendent after the time allowed for the completion of the contract;

That in the opinion of this House, there was paid to the contractors a great deal more than ought to have been paid, causing serious loss to the country.”

He proposed to prove from the papers brought down, all these facts. The first statement was, that the contract was awarded to F. W. McKenrie, on the 10th May, 1873. The minute of Council passed on the 10th May, 1873, showed the contract was awarded to F. W. McKenrie. The specifications and plans of work annexed shows the dredging required at 200 feet wide, and 15 feet deep below low water mark, and also the length of the breakwater at 700 feet. Another clause in the specifications was as follows:

“The bulk sum mentioned in the tender must cover the entire cost of furnishing all dredging machines or vessels, screws, steam tugs, materials, labour, tools, tackle and machinery, service ground and right of way, and every contingency connected directly or indirectly with the work; and the contractor shall assume, and make good at his own expense, any damage that may be incurred from loss of materials, vessels, machinery or otherwise, by storms or from any cause whatever, during the progress of the work, and up to its final and satisfactory completion; and if during the progress of the work it should appear that anything has been omitted, either from the plan or this specification, which should have been shown or specified, the contractors shall furnish and perform the same as if said plan and specification were full and complete."

The last clause in the specification was as follows:

"The whole of the work to be completed on or before the 31st day of December, 1874."

The second clause in the agreement attached provided for the transfer of the contract from the contractor by the Government:

"When it shall appear that the establishment and rate of progress at and in the said works are not such as to ensure the completion of the same within the time herein prescribed."

The seventh clause provided:

"That if any change or alteration, either in the position or details of any part of the work shall be required by the said Minister during the progress thereof, the party of the first part is hereby bound to make such alteration or change; and if such alteration or change shall entail extra expense on the said party of the first part, either in labour or materials, the same shall be added to the amount of this contract; in either case the amount is to be determined by the Estimate made by the Minister, his Engineer or officer in charge."

The eleventh clause was as follows:—

"That should the party of the first part not complete the work herein contracted for at the period agreed upon as above mentioned, the said party of the first part shall be liable for, and shall cause to be paid to the party of the second part all salaries or wages which shall become due to the person or persons superintending the work on behalf of the said Minister, from the above-named period for completion, until the same shall be actually completed and received."

By letter dated at Barney River, N.S., February 5, 1874, F. W. McKenrie transferred his contract to John Ross, of Little Bras D'Or, Cape Breton, and James McKay, of Stellarton, Pictou, N.S. A telegram from Ross & McKay on March 1st, 1875, showed that the contract was not then completed. It was as follows, and was addressed to the Minister of Public Works:—

"Whole contract finished in August, the whole amount for contracts required within that time.

"Ross & McKay,
"Contractors."

On April 11th, 1876, he found by a letter from Mr. Braun that the Minister of Public Works assented to a reduction in the length of the breakwater to 600 feet. On September 1st, 1876, he found John Ross resigned his interest in the contract by telegraphing to Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, Minister of Public Works. This was done to enable him to contest an election in Victoria about that time, as he could not be a candidate and contractor at the same time. It showed also that the contract was not completed. He ran the election and was defeated. The Engineer reported on September 18th, 1876, as follows:—

"Nearly complete, a quantity of dredging still remains to be done to finish the channel, and it is somewhat doubtful if it will be accomplished this year."

On October 14th, after John Ross was defeated at the election, he wrote to the Secretary of the Public Works Department withdrawing his resignation and resuming charge of the contract, which he was allowed to do. A letter from Mr. Perley, dated September 30th, 1875, showed that a channel averaging 60 feet wide, with 14 feet water at low tide, had been dredged at that time, and calling the attention of the Minister to the fact that it had yet to be widened to the full width of 200 feet. On Jan. 3rd, 1876, he found a long letter from Ross & McKay asking for modifications in the work which would lessen the expenses, all of which was granted them. Then he found a letter from Mr. Baillairgé, as follows:—

"The contractors have twice endeavoured and twice failed to construct the pier to its full length of 700 feet, on account of the storms of 17th September and 11th November, 1875. They now request permission to limit the length to 600 feet, to remove the remains of the pier destroyed by the storm, and to place a triangular crib in its stead near the seaward end of the structure. Mr. Perley, in No. 56,874 of January 26th, states that to shorten the pier as above will be no disadvantage to the new channel, and that the structure will be so much the less liable to damage by storms. He, therefore, recommends that the permission asked for be granted.

“By a schedule attached to the papers, I find that payments were made as follows on this work:—

Cost of Superintendence of works up to 17th Feb., 1877.	Angus McLeod, Clerk of Works, 1873-4.	185 days at $3.00	.....$555 00
In 1874-5, 313 days at $3.00			..... 939 00
In 1875-6, 202 “ “			..... 606 00
6 months to 31st Dec., 1876, 140 days			420 00

$2,520 00

“I find by letter from Ross & McKay, dated Dec. 30, 1876, a claim for extras, to the amount of $13,773.96.”

This was after the election, and when Ross was, no doubt, able to ask for this in consideration of his services in endeavouring to defeat Mr. Campbell a few weeks previously. The whole thing looked extremely bad.

“Under the circumstances this recommendation may probably be agreed to without detriment to the public interest. As regards the dredging, the contractors should be compelled to dredge the channel to the full width contemplated by contract No.4,319, viz:—200 feet.

On January 26th, 1876, Mr. Perley recommended that Ross & McKay be compelled to dredge the full width, as per terms of contract. Again, a schedule showed that the full amount of contract was paid Ross & McKay, viz:—$78,208.60. He was, therefore, of opinion, from the above facts, taken from the official papers brought down from the Public Works Department, that he was justified in asking this House to vote for his amendment. He might also say that the Government had not brought down papers, asked for in this matter, namely, the Engineers' certificate of works done and payments made thereon at different dates.

MR. MACKENZIE said this was one of the most extraordinary motions he had ever known presented to Parliament. Without a moment's notice the hon. gentleman moved a motion reciting what he was pleased to call facts, and charging the Government with having paid moneys to certain contractors improperly. It was utterly impossible for him (Mr. Mackenzie) at a moment's notice to recall circumstances which occurred years ago. The hon. gentleman knew that Mr. Perley, Chief Engineer of the Government, had been in attendance until eight or ten days ago for the express purpose of being ready to give information regarding this or other works, but he (Mr. McDonald) gave no notice of any sort of his intention to introduce this extraordinary motion, and came down and made a set of sweeping assertions with which it was impossible for him (Mr. Mackenzie) to deal, even if he were possessed of the best memory man ever had. His impression was that the works were overtaken when pretty well on by a severe storm, that a great portion was destroyed, and that the Engineer found it desirable to change the plans. To these changes, which were accepted by the Chief Engineer of the Government, he would, as a matter of course, give his consent. What those changes were he was unable at the moment to say. All he knew was that the contractors claimed that the Government were indebted to them to the amount of $16,000 or thereabouts. Mr. Perley, whom he believed was one of the most upright officers that had ever served a Government, had reported against that claim. He had no reason to believe that Mr. Perley had ever given his certificate for the payment of money that was not justly due, and no payment had been made except upon that gentleman's certificate. No one could expect him to inform himself on matters of this kind without notice, and he had merely to say that he did not believe Mr. Perley ever gave improper certificates, or that the assertion that too much money was paid to the contractors was a fact. He asked the House to dispose of the motion by refusing assent to the one-sided statement the hon. gentleman had made.

MR. MACDONNELL said every hon. member required to know whether the facts contained in the recital of this resolution were correct. How was he to know? Was he to take the ipse dixit of the hon. gentleman as a fact? The onus probandi lay on the hon. gentleman, and it was quite unnecessary for the Government to say anything in defence until the hon. gentleman made out, at least, a prima facie case against them.

MR. CAMPBELL said this resolution had brought up a more serious charge than he had anticipated. The papers in connection with the Ingonish Harbour were last year sent to the Printing Committee, and they refused to print them. If they had printed them he would not have said a word, as the papers would have explained themselves. There was no certificate of the Engineer among the papers, although it was ordered to be produced two or three times. He (Mr. Campbell) exonerated the Engineer from blame, because he had not certified to any such payments. This was a serious question, that $40,000 or $50,000 of the public money should have been paid away corruptly. If the Government were guilty, as he was prepared to say they were, the House should consider the matter fairly and dispassionately. It appeared that in 1873 the Government of the day advertised for tenders to build the harbour of Ingonish. Four tenders were sent in: one by Mr. Evans, one by Mr. McKenrie, one by Mr. Ross, and one by Mr. Devlin. It appeared that, after these tenders were in, Mr. Ross, who was then a member of this House, had communication with the Minister of Public Works at that day, and begged him to postpone any action on the tenders. That was granted; and the result of that interview appeared to be that the lowest tenderer did not get the contract; but McKenrie, who was next, and in partnership with the two Rosses, got the contract. It appeared that Mr. Ross was entrusted with the task of getting the contract executed, and he was witness to the contract himself. He changed the sureties with the consent of the Government of the day, and got two farmers without means to become sureties in a matter involving an expenditure of from $70,000 to $80,000. The work was proceeded with, and a few months afterwards the Government changed hands, and Mr. William Ross became a member of the Government. It was then managed that McKenrie should withdraw from the contract, and that it should be handed to John Ross and Mr. McKay. The contract went on. There appeared to have been a long correspondence between Mr. Ross and the Premier about altering the plan of the work; and it appeared that Mr. Ross commenced building the pier at his own expense, and without the sanction of the engineer. But after a little correspondence the Minister of Public Works consented that the diagonal piece should be put on. In January, 1876, the contractors requested the Minister of Public Works to allow them to reduce the length of the pier to 600 feet instead of 700 feet, and to build the last block with a sharp angle instead of a square angle as was shown in the plans. It appeared that in June 1876, eighteen months after the time the contract was to be finished, the Government consented to this, and also that the engineer in May, 1876, reported that the contractors could not finish the contract. They failed owing to the want of means and material. It was not the engineer who suggested reducing the work, the Minister of Public Works sent him the contractors, letter to ask his opinion, and that opinion was, that they had wholly failed and could not complete the work according to the tender. But the engineer never suggested that the contractors should be paid for what they had not built. Further, he had applied for the certificate of the engineer to which the Minister of Public Works had referred three or four times and there was not the scrape of a pen of the engineer to show that this large amount was to be paid. These certificates were not in existence or they would have been forthcoming. It further appeared that this pier was only 565 feet long, including this three angled block leaving 200 feet short of what the contract required. The contract set forth that if the work was reduced there should be a reduction of prices in proportion

but it seemed that a great deal more than the amount of the contract price had been paid. The depth of water was to have been 15 feet and the width of the channel 200 feet, whereas the depth of water, at low tide, was only 12 feet, and the width was 60 feet instead of 200 feet, besides the pier being 135 feet shorter than was provided for by the contract. The original price of the contract was $57,000, and taking the rates for the reduction it would have been brought down to about $51,000 which they should have received for the whole job. Last session a few days before the House closed, after these payments were made, and the returns were in, the hon. the Premier had passed this item of $1,600 in the Supplementary Estimates at two o'clock in the morning, when everybody was falling asleep. This was the way in which the people's money went. He had protested against it then, and to this day he could not tell what had become of this $1,600. The hon. the Minister of Public works had failed to explain the matter in any shape or form. The hon. gentleman would not even condescend to answer. He wished to know where this money had gone to. He had had the figures in his possession long before the Supplementary Estimates were passed. Deducting these $1,600, $88,451 were left as having been paid up to that time last year. Without making the allowance that should be made for the two year's interest, for the time during which this man had his money before the work was done, and for the difference between dredging in fifteen and two feet of water—it took twice as much a foot in deep water as it did on the beach—he figured that this man got $32,450 more than his contract justified the Government in giving him—independent of these extra charges which brought the amount up to $40,000. This arrangement was made with the late Minister of Militia (Mr. Vail), in Truro, before the last election in Truro. He maintained—and he challenged the Government to refute these figures—that this man, according to these papers, obtained $32,000 for which no certificate from any engineer was shown, though such certificates had been repeatedly asked for. It might be naturally asked, why should the Premier of this Dominion pay away money in this manner without any real reason; but when they remembered the circumstances that had taken place, that this contractor was in difficulty, that he had written a long letter to the Minister of Public Works, at the time, begging as a favour to be let off and to have the work reduced, though he never hinted that he should not be paid for what he did not do, and that the engineer consented to this being done, the matter took a serious aspect. This man was in difficulties, and the Government were in difficulty as to getting a member from Cape Breton, and the late Minister of Militia had admitted on the floor of Parliament that he had consulted with the hon. the Minister of Public Works in this relation, and that he had gone down to Cape Breton with the consent and knowledge of the hon. the Premier to make this arrangement—that the work should be taken hurriedly off this man's hands in any shape. These were the facts of the case. What a position it was for a member of the Government, the Premier knowing the facts and difficulties of the case, to go down and negotiate with this contractor. The moment the election was lost the Government paid this man the people's money, and let him finish the work in any shape or form. He (Mr. Campbell) had applied for these papers repeatedly, but he could not obtain them. He wished to know how this money was paid; in one lump or how. His object was to show that this money had been paid when it should not have been paid; and to this evidence he and the House and the country were entitled. He wanted the day and date for each payment, and the engineer's certificate for each payment; and, after bringing these charges before the House last year, what answer did he receive? The hon. the Premier would not reply to him at all, but the hon. member for Cumberland, having put the matter pretty strongly, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) said:

“The foundation of the pier of the full length was laid, but it appeared that it was destroyed to a considerable extent by a storm. The evidence of the engineer went to show that it was destroyed because it had a square end.

He contradicted this statement flatly. The engineer said quite the reverse: that it was not because it was a square end, but because it was not built properly and not according to his instructions, and the directions contained in the plans and specification. This pier was built without the consent of the engineer, and application was then made to the Government to have this stuck on the pier. The evidence of the engineer was that the pier was not destroyed because it had a square end. The hon. gentleman further stated:

“The engineer recommended that the pier for the last 150 feet should present an acute angle.”

The engineer did no such thing, but explained in these papers that they built this pier without his consent and knowledge, and that as it was built, it might as well be put there. The hon. gentleman also said:—

“This was partially done, when the work was destroyed by a second storm. These were accidents beyond, he presumed, the control of human power.”

This was the way in which the hon. gentleman treated this subject. They should have known these things before they commenced the work, and the contractors also. Besides, if works were destroyed by any means before they were taken off the contractors hands, the contractor was responsible for it, and not the people of this country. The hon. gentleman also stated that he had not the details of the Engineer with him, and he spoke entirely from memory. But the hon. gentleman should not speak from memory. This matter had been before the House all winter. He had repeatedly kept the hon. gentleman in mind of it, because he was continually asking for these papers; and it was not for a man in the hon. gentleman's position to get up and say that he was not prepared to give an answer to a question of this importance and that he was only speaking from memory. This was not satisfactory, when he had charged the hon.

MR. CAMPBELL.

gentleman with paying away public money improperly and under suspicious circumstances, when he had no right to pay it away. The hon. gentleman continued:—

“Not expecting this item would be discussed to-night.”

At this moment he could not find out what had become of this money or who had got it.

“However, the calculations of the Engineer were based upon what he conceived to be the proper interpretation of the contract and of the work performed. The contractors, as could be seen by papers laid before the House, had presented claims amounting to $13,000. He had no means of knowing what the Engineer would report, as that gentleman had taken the papers in the case with him, but he would report as soon as possible. As to the dredging, his (Mr. Mackenzie's) opinion was that the contractors had no claim upon the Government.”

He held that this dredging was not half done. He could show from the papers that 140 feet of the contract was not dredged to three feet in depth.

“In the meantime, the Engineer had sent the Government his certificate for the amount now asked for.”

Where were these certificates. Why did not the hon. the Premier produce them? He wished to obtain these certificates. He felt confident that the engineer would not make out such certificates improperly; if so, he should not be employed by the Government another moment. But it did not appear that the engineer had sent in these certificates, or else the Government would produce them. If the Government could do so, they should show these papers. This matter had been before the country for a very long time, and how much had been paid? Was the money of the country to be given out in this manner? Was there no check at all on this expenditure? Were the public funds entirely at the mercy and in the power of the Premier? He would read the following extract from a letter written by Mr. John Ross on the 27th of September, after the election took place, in 1876, he believed:—

“ Unfortunately for them and for me, that contract is not yet finished, and from my experience in public contracts in Australia, extras would not be even asked till original contract was finished. The experience from Nova Scotia, as often detailed in the Herald, would not make me expect anything from the Dominion Government, except what I would be entitled to under the contract. Those who know me are already satisfied that this is all I expect to recover. No money except what I was honourably entitled to was ever received by me, and so far not one cent received or promised except what was certified by the engineer for work done. A large portion of the contract was carried away last fall, which was this year rebuilt, and completed to the satisfaction of the engineer in charge, and I did ask that the wood work being so finished would be taken off my hands, but this was refused till the whole contract would be finished. Such are the favours that I have received from the Dominion Government. Mr. Campbell and any men who choose may examine the public records and they will find no claims of this kind or any demand for extras made by me, I always understood that even extras had to be voted by Parliament before they could be promised or paid.”

How did the Minister of Public Works reconcile this statement with the one he had made to the House? Why were extras put down here and paid for to the extent of $4,000 or $5,000? It was ridiculous that the public money should be paid out in this manner. He thought that he had placed the case, as far as was in his power, sufficiently plainly before the House, and he would say no more on the subject.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. TUPPER said he was very much astonished to hear hon. gentlemen opposite, in reply to so gross a statement of the case as this, express their readiness to have the members called in and a vote taken to dispose of the question, without any explanation, and without any vindication being offered on the part of the Government. The hon. member for Inverness must have spoken, he thought, under a misapprehension of the facts, when he made the appeal to the House that he did, and thought it possible that members could deal with a matter of this kind without any opportunity being offered them to possess themselves of an accurate knowledge of the case. Why the hon. member could not have known that this case, which the hon.

the Minister of Public Works treated as a surprise, was a question which the hon. gentleman certainly ought not to have been in a position to treat as a surprise. The fact that this was a matter of frequent discussion during last Session, that there had been a very full and strong controversy in relation to it, that these papers had been moved for again and again by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell), that they had been finally brought down by the hon. the First Minister himself, and laid upon the table of this House, precluded at once the possibility of the hon. gentleman urging that he was taken by surprise, or that he was not in a position to have all these facts and everything in relation to the case under his command. Why was it that every member of this House had not the same means of judging this case, the same full knowledge of it as the hon. the First Minister? Simply because the Government, having a majority on the Printing Committee, refused to have these papers printed and placed in the hands of hon. members. This case, instead of being an unimportant case, was a very important one, as detailed in the motion of his hon. friend, a motion which must carry conviction to the mind of every hon. member, provided the facts were accurately stated, and those facts were taken simply from papers laid by the Government on the table of this House, and which had been in their possession for about twelve months. If there was any case which could not be treated as a surprise, with which the Government should be thoroughly prepared to deal, it was this one. Why had the Printing Committee, upon which the Government had a majority, refused to give to hon. members the information to which they were entitled? Because the facts, as detailed in the motion of his hon. friends, were so strong; because they carried on their face evidence of improper conduct on the part of the Administration, in respect to expenditure of public money, that they dared not produce those documents. The Printing Committee deserved condemnation for not having produced, when required, documents containing charges of so grave a character against the Government, and which they were bound, in the discharge of their duty, to give to every hon member of this House. The fact was proved by these documents which had been laid upon the table by the hon. the First Minister himself, that a contract had been given out, by the late Government, for $78,000 which required the construction of a breakwater 700 feet in length, with a channel dredge 200 feet wide and 15 feet deep. A contract which bound the contractor to take all the risks of damage to that work, which might arise during its construction, and to pay for any extras which might be caused if it was not completed within the term mentioned. No sooner had the Government changed hands than that contract was broken. One of the Cabinet Ministers, a colleague of the hon. the First Minister transferred it from the contractor to whom it had been given to his own brother, and the result was what might be expected from a Government which would use its power to give to relatives of its members the charge of public works of this kind, the whole contract was made waste paper of. Instead of 700 feet they curtailed this work to 500 feet, and, as his hon. friend had remarked, any one who knew anything about the construction of public works, knew that that meant an immense disproportionate curtailment in the work, because every foot of this increase length cost double the trouble and work of that near the shore, so that this contract of $78,000 was, probably, in point of work, one-half that which the contract required. According to the original contract, the contractor was obliged to improve the channel, to dredge 200 feet wide and 15 feet deep; and, upon the evidence of the Government, all that was done was a channel of 60 feet wide and 12 feet deep, and yet the fact remained that this gentleman, the brother of a Cabinet Minister, whose work had been curtailed one-half, not only received the full amount of $78,000 of public money, but had a claim for a large amount of extras over and above that sum. Besides this startling charge, there was another charge brought against another member of the Government, and against the whole Government, with relation to this contractor: that this gentleman, who was known to be an outspoken friend of the Government, was suddenly transformed by the Minister of Militia, who had been called down to meet him at Truro previous to an election, into a Government candidate, and a telegram was sent him relieving him from his contract, to enable him to run as candidate.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman must know he was not relieved of his contract.

MR. TUPPER: He was relieved.

MR. MACKENZIE: He was not relieved.

MR. TUPPER: He ran as a Government candidate after communication with the hon. the Minister of Militia.

MR. MACKENZIE: Read the communication.

MR. TUPPER said he had not the communication, but if his recollection was not altogether at fault, the hon. gentleman had himself detailed the fact that he was communicated with by Mr. Ross in reference to being relieved of his contract in order to run his election, and he ran his election as Government candidate and was defeated by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell). Then the Government which had previously relieved him of his contract, allowed him to resume it and remain the public contractor as before. He (Mr. Tupper) would undertake to say that had he obtained a majority, it would be found he was not a contractor. There was not a member of this House who could doubt that. The result of the whole affair was that this gentleman who became transferred into a contractor through the influence of his brother, a Cabinet Minister, and who ran as a Government candidate, after a communication with another Cabinet Minister, was paid the full contract amount $78,000 for doing half the work and a large amount in addition under the head of extras. The hon. the First Minister had stated he still had a claim for $16,000. The hon. the First Minister assumed to-day the position of being taken entirely by surprise, and of not being expected to know anything about it. Had Mr. Ross been elected, there would have been no trouble about that being a resignation of his contract. There was the letter of the hon. the Premier, informing Mr. Ross that the Department had no objection to it; and yet the hon. gentleman endeavoured to interrupt, for the purpose of representing that no communication had taken place. Mr. Ross ran his election, and was defeated, and mark what followed. Like the dog in the fable, having lost the substance in the attempt to grasp the shadow, he determined to make one last attempt to retain the contract. The hon. member for South Bruce, no doubt, did not forget that, when he met with this case, he was ashamed to undertake to deal with it, and said he would leave it to the hon. the Minister of Militia to defend his own conduct in having this interview with the contractor, and transferring him into a Government candidate. He (Mr. Tupper) did not forget that, when the hon. the Minister of Militia rose, he said he would take some other time to make an explanation, which time had not yet arrived. But, no doubt, all that was satisfactory to the hon. member for South Bruce, who seemed to have such a lively recollection of that which the hon. the First Minister had forgotten. He thought he had shown to the satisfaction of the hon. member for South Bruce that the contractor who failed to perform his contract, and to whom was improperly handed over a large sum of public money was, during an election in Victoria transferred into a Government candidate, though he had previously been an opponent of theirs. He would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, he would ask the hon. member for South Bruce, whose high character for purity in relation to contracts, if this proceeding was a fair or a just one? If the transformation which was effected in this way surprised the hon. the First Minister, it certainly did not surprise the people of this country who watched the discussion in this House. Anyone who calmly and dispassionately watched the course of public events, must be convinced that this was one of the gravest cases of misconduct and maladministration on the part of the Government, and he could hardly suppose that the Session would be allowed to pass without the matter being brought under the notice of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said he wished here to put in certain documents. It was asserted, among other things, that no engineer's certificate had been obtained for some of the items charged, and he would now hand over certificates for every farthing of the expenditure.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he must confess he did not know a great deal about this matter, but he had paid some little attention to the discussion of last Session. He believed the speech delivered by the hon. member for Cumberland to-day, had been given on a previous occasion. The principal charge made by the hon. gentleman was that Mr. Ross, the candidate at the last general election, who opposed the member for Victoria, was induced to become a supporter of the Government after certain arrangements had been made with him by the Minister of Militia. Now, he (Mr. MacKay) knew that was not correct. He knew that on the nomination day, and, indeed during his canvass, Mr. Ross did not come out as a supporter of the present Ministry; on the contrary, he was to a certain extent opposed to the Government then in power. The Opposition papers of Nova Scotia claimed him in the first instance as being in opposition to the present Government, and it was only after he was defeated by the member for Victoria, that he was alleged to be a Government candidate. The hon. member for Cumberland would fain induce the House to believe that monies had been paid to the contractor improperly, the work which he undertook to perform not having been completed. Now he believed that the work was completed in accordance with the terms of the contract, but that in consequence of a storm, or some other casualty, a large portion of the work had to be commenced over again. This, he believed was also repaired, but the Government finding that owing to the exposed nature of the coast the work could not be made durable as it was at first planned by the engineer, reduced the dimensions from 700 to 500 or 600 feet. The hon. member for Cumberland alluded to the Government having been taken by surprise on this occasion. He (Mr. MacKay) ventured to say that not only the Government, but everybody there was surprised at a motion of this kind being brought before the House. He felt satisfied, from his knowledge of the circumstances, that there was no foundation whatever for the charges made.

Question put, and motion in amendment (Mr. McDonald, Cape Breton) negatived on the following division:—

Mr. TUPPER asked why the Postmaster-General had refused to allow anyone except the postmaster to sell postage stamps in the town of Amherst.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had heard this question for the first time.

Mr. TUPPER said he had personally spoken to the Postmaster-General on the subject.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had no desire to withhold from any one the privilege of selling stamps, but he must consult the officers of the Department.

Mr. TUPPER said an answer had been given the application of the people refusing the grant.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had no recollection of the reply being sent, and many letters were sent from his Department which he did not write or consider.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said he had received some very curt answers from the Department.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said if any officer had sent the hon. gentleman a reply which was curt or improper, he would be dealt with if the letter was produced.

In answer to Mr. McKAY (Colchester),

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was no change in the position in connection with the Truro post-office since he had last communicated with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL said he again wished to call attention to the necessity of establishing way offices at Alwicks, in the east end of his county, and in the Parish of Ludlow, in the west end of his county. In the former instance, the people had to go four miles to get their letters; and this could be done without extra expense, as the mail passes these places already. A post-office should also be placed at a settlement near Main River. This would be a great convenience, and would be attended with some expense. A building was purchased at Chatham, in which a custom-house and post-office were to have been established.

The late Government had, unfortunately, gone out of power at the time, and this matter had been used to attack him about. Whether they had paid too much for this building or not, this change should be made. The custom-house was now kept in a building belonging to Mr. Snowball, who had opposed him at the last general election. The other building had been fitted up for the last four years, and should be occupied. The post-office in Chatham was now kept in a little bit of a shanty of the meanest kind; and it was a matter of very grave remark why the other building was kept vacant, for in his knowledge, it was properly fitted up, and was a very fine building. Politics had a great deal to do with these proceedings.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that last year, his attention was called to the state of things which existed in this regard in Chatham. His officers had reported on it and he undertook to see the post-office removed, but for reasons which he need not explain, objection was taken and they were waiting the final decision. If there were no obstructions, he dare say that it would be removed.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say there were no obstructions, there are such and they are political, but none other that I know of.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: I know nothing about them.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had received a letter from a person in South Wellington who complained that no answer had been sent to a petition sent to the Postmaster-General some time in December last, with the object of having a branch office opened in the village of Hillsboro'. Many abuses in connection with this office were complained of. It was said that the Postmaster was 88 years of age, and not fit to keep it; and that a great deal of inconvenience was suffered from not having a branch office at the other end of the village.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the inspectors in the west were all intelligent; and they reported to the Department that they would not advise any change in this office. It was not advisable to have two offices in towns or villages. This was not the case in all cities.

MR. SINCLAIR said it was felt that they should have a provincial inspector in Prince Edward Island. In winter a great deal of difficulty was experienced in changing the mails back and forward on account of the route across the Straits, and they ought to have a provincial deputy, who would have full power to use his own judgment without referring to the Department for instructions with regard to every small matter. He had already spoken to the hon. the Postmaster-General on the subject. He thought that Prince Edward Island was the only Province without such an office. Their assistant deputy was a very efficient officer, and he hoped that this official would be appointed provincial deputy with an increased salary.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said that two post-offices had been established in the village of Little Glace Bay, and the distance between the two was only between half and three-quarters of a mile. This was done a year and a half ago.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that he did not remember the facts of this case. He agreed with the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Sinclair) that the officer in charge of post-office affairs in Prince Edward Island was an excellent officer, and his case would be considered. The matter referred to would receive consideration.

MR. McDONALD said that the late post-master at Little Glace Bay had been succeeded by a gentleman who did not appear to give entire satisfaction. Fault was found with him,—and hence the establishment of a second office.

MR. CAMPBELL said that Little Campbellton had been made a way office some time since, when the salary of the Postmaster was reduced from $40 to $20. It had been since restored to the position of a post-office, but the salary remained unchanged, though the receipts were, with one exception, the largest in the county. Forty per cent. of the collections of the office amounted to $52 a year. At St. Ann's, however, two miles away, a Government settlement, the post-master collected $80 and received $87.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the post-master whom he appointed was recommended to him by persons in whom he had confidence. He did not think the people had suffered any inconvenience by the change.

MR. LANGEVIN did not think the convenience of the parish had been studied either with regard to the person whom they proposed or the site for the new office. There was another matter, however, to which he would take this opportunity of referring. The other day he asked for two returns which had now been placed before the House. One of these was with regard to the carrying of the mails from Quebec to Murray Bay by land, which service was performed up to the summer of 1877 for the sum of $2,250. On the expiration of the contract, tenders were asked for, and a recommendation was made to the Postmaster-General by the Inspector of Post Offices in Quebec, in a letter dated 19th April, to the effect that the time allowed for the journey either way should be reduced. Nine tenders were received, the lowest being for $2,547, the next for $2,800 and the third by Mr. James Shaw for $2,900. Now it appeared that the two lowest tenders were withdrawn, and that Mr. Shaw's was accepted. In his motion he (Mr. Langevin) asked for Orders in Council, showing the reason why this special tender was accepted, but he could not find any Order in Council.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the lowest tender was accepted, the two others having withdrawn.

MR. LANGEVIN thought that, according to law, when the lowest tenders were not accepted, an Order in Council was required before any other could be fixed upon.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that was the rule in the Public Works Department, but not in the Post Office Department.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was in a position to say why the lowest tenders had been withdrawn. The whole affair was manipulated in the county of Charlevoix, not, perhaps, with the knowledge of the Minister, but of another hon. gentleman. The people who sent in their tenders were called upon and threatened with certain consequences, with the result that they were induced to withdraw. By this $500 had been lost, and the contract given to a partizan. There was still another matter to which he would refer. Formerly the mails from Quebec to the county of Charlevoix went by water, being carried by the St. Lawrence Steam Navigation Company for $1,500. The service was carried on very regularly during the whole season, and the trips were very numerous. On the 7th May last, the contractors offered to continue the service on the same terms as formerly; but, on the 4th of June,—nearly a month afterwards—the Department replied that they had decided that other arrangements should be made, by sending the mails across from St. Denis to Murray Bay by the Grand Trunk Railway, and Chicoutimi would be served, therefore, by land. This proposal had been effected, and arrangements made for carrying the mails three times a week from Murray Bay to Chicoutimi at the rate of $12 per round trip. Arrangements had also been made for the carriage of the mails between Murray Bay and the post-office at the rate of 50c. a trip. A special tri-weekly service between Murray Bay and St. Paul's Bay had been undertaken by Mr. Blackburn for $4 per round trip. Hitherto the service had been very satisfactory to the counties of Charlevoix and Chicoutimi. Why, then, had the changes been made without all who chose being allowed to compete? It was done for the purpose of favouring political partizans. When the Governor-General was there, a special train was chartered to take him his despatches, but, if the steamers had been employed as usual, that would not have been necessary. The whole amount paid for that service in 1876, was $1,971; in 1877 there was nothing about Chicoutimi wharf, and yet it cost, to bring the mails down to Malbaie by the Grand Trunk, $2,000—a larger sum than the whole service of the previous year. At Tadousac the same complaint was made. He did not suppose the Postmaster-General knew the places, or this course would not have been taken. There was a post-office in Quebec East, the revenue of which was $1,632; the salary was $742, besides $200 paid towards rent, fuel and light, making a total of $942 for that post-office. He complained that that postmaster, instead of being at his business and attending to his work, was allowed to go down to the county of Rimouski, and there make speeches as an election agent. Whilst he was on this subject, he desired to call the attention of the Committee to other names, as well as that of Mr. Gillotte, the postmaster in St. Roch. He did not know if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had taken action in connection with the complaint he had made about Commander Lavoie.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I have taken action about it.

MR. LANGEVIN said Mr. Labelle, a lighthouse-keeper at Bic, had also been canvassing in Rimouski county. The county was full of those lighthouse-keepers canvassing.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I have information that there are a good many of our lighthouse-keepers actively canvassing on the other side.

MR. LANGEVIN said if the hon. gentleman had the information, he knew what to do. A number of officers of this House were now out of their offices, and had gone down to take part in the Local Elections in the Province of Quebec. Mr. Bienvenu, one of the translators, had left his office for this purpose, and he had been replaced by a young man just out of college, because he bore the same name. Mr. Pitan had been also allowed to leave his office in this House and go down there, and this country was paying him to canvass in Lower Canada, against one political party.

MR. DYMOND rose to a question of order.

MR. HUNTINGTON asked the hon. gentleman to discuss the Post-Office Estimates first, and to go into these other matters afterwards.

MR. LANGEVIN said he had called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that one of his officers was canvassing in Rimouski.

MR. HUNTINGTON said Mr. Phileas Gillotte was merely paid a percentage, like any other postmaster. Did the hon. gentleman want to lay down the rule that a postmaster had no right to express his opinion?

MR. LANGEVIN said this was a salary. It was not like the case of a country postmaster. Why should the country be paying this man to canvass in Rimouski? It was the same thing with Commander Lavoie. If they could do this, why should not also Mr. Pitan or Mr. Doyon, or Mr. Kierskowski, translators of this House? Hon. gentlemen said they desired to separate the affairs of the Dominion from the affairs of the Local Governments, but they allowed their officers to canvass for their friends.

MR. SPEAKER said a very serious charge had been made against the management of the House of Commons. Mr. Bienvenu had, three or four weeks ago, applied to him to have his brother accepted in his stead, on the staff of the French translators, stating that he had urgent business requiring him to be away. He (Mr. Speaker) insisted upon having from Mr. Courselles indirectly, a statement that the young gentleman was competent to do the work, and he believed he was now on the staff. Mr. Pitan applied for leave of absence on the ground of illness in his family and got it on that ground only. If Mr. Kierskowski had left; he had done so without his leave or knowledge. Mr. Doyon had given up his position.

MR. LANGEVIN said Mr. Kierskowski had gone into the county of Ottawa and made speeches at the church doors.

MR. SPEAKER said he was not aware of it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this was a very grave charge as the Speaker had said. One man, under the pretext of private business, had gone off and got his younger brother appointed. Mr. Pitan had told a falsehood, and had gone electioneering; he ought to be discharged.

MR. MACKENZIE: Did the hon. gentleman always dismiss every official who took part in an election. If my memory does not fail me, one of the principal officers in this Department was on a platform with the hon. gentleman denouncing his political opponents.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What officer?

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Moylan.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said Mr. Moylan was at a public dinner given to him at Peterborough at a time when he was there on duty. That was the only time he remembered Mr. Moylan's being with him. But here were three officers who got leave of absence at a time when the Premier said they could not get the returns down with sufficient rapidity.

MR. MACKENZIE said they did not make out the Returns. He recollected one of the hon. gentleman's deputy adjutants-general appearing in New Brunswick in an election.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Inches.

MR. MITCHELL said he had never heard of it. He might have been in his own country, and, if so, he should have been turned out; but he was never in the northern part of the Province.

MR. BLAKE said Mr. Moylan was connected with the Penitentiaries Service, and he was not aware that there was a penitentiary at Peterborough.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He was travelling all over.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no penitentiary west of Kingston.

MR. LANDERKIN said that but for the indignant appeals of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) he would not have mentioned certain incidents which had occurred in his own riding a few years ago. Although a postmaster there, an appointee of the late Government, had actively and earnestly canvassed against him, he would have thought it beneath him to have taken steps towards his dismissal, or to have publicly noticed his conduct in any way, but for the remarks which had been made to-night. A gentleman in the township of Osprey, named Archibald McIntyre, had written a letter to Hon. Archibald McKellar in regard to the elections. That gentleman had sent a reply which, as it afterwards transpired, was one of which no gentleman need be ashamed. This reply, marked "private," had arrived at the post-office when the gentleman to whom it was addressed was from home, but a friend of his, Mr. McKay, had called and obtained the letter and had left it in his own box until he was ready to return home. In the meantime, the postmaster, the gentleman to whom he had before referred, had given out the letter to an Alex. McIntyre.

AN HON. MEMBER: Did he belong to the party of letter-stealers?

MR. LANDERKIN: Yes; he was opposed to him (Mr. Landerkin). Mr. Alex. McIntyre, he was informed, handed the letter to another party who gave it to Mr. Jackson, the candidate of the Conservative party, and, notwithstanding the fact that the letter was "private," that McIntyre, the "Conservative candidate" did not hesitate to violate the sanctity of private correspondence to gain a political party advantage. The illegal and disreputable means used to obtain this letter were connived at by the whole of the Opposition press who endeavoured to convey the idea that the Hon. Mr. McKellar (who was a member of the Ontario Government) was endeavouring to use improperly the influence of the Crown to carry the election, when such was not the case at all, as the letter was not intended, nor did it indicate the least impropriety on the part of that gentleman. Cases of this kind were not rare under the old Government; and when the hon. member for Charlevoix must be so well aware of the interference of officials under the old regime, it was a matter of surprise that he should endeavour to prejudice public opinion by such specious declamation.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he would like to ask the hon. member for Charlevoix whether he would join with him (Mr. Huntington) in making it an offence punishable by dismissal for civil servants to interfere in elections. This was the proper way to look at the business. Speaking as an individual and not as a Minister, he would say he had no doubt that civil servants should serve the country and not a party. Would the hon. gentleman apply the principle he had mentioned to political enemies and friends alike. If this rule were adopted, the hon. gentleman would be obliged to go to more political funerals in a short time than he dared say the hon. gentleman had time to attend. The hon. gentleman knew how it was himself, and for the hon. members for Charlevoix and Kingston to rise, he would not say with simulated indignation, and complain that civil servants were interfering in politics, after their history, was a piece of sweet declamation, the like of which he had rarely seen. If postmasters were salaried they came within the limit, while, if paid a percentage, this was not always the case, some received $10, and some more. The line had never been drawn. The hon. member for Kingston seemed to see in this a very grave case, when a young man went home to see a sick mother, and another to see a sick wife, and said solemnly that he did not believe the story. It was possible that both these young men had gone down to canvass in the election, and it might have been very improper that they should have gone. The hon. gentleman had heard the Speaker's statement in this relation, and had accepted it. He wished an answer to his question.

MR. LANGEVIN said that civil servants, no matter to which party they belonged, should not interfere in elections. They were paid to attend to public duties, and they should not leave their offices to canvass for either party, whether they were under the direct control of the Government or under the control of the House. To do so was highly improper.

MR. Fiset said that if the theory laid down by the hon. member for Charlevoix was accepted, the Government would be justified in making a rasade, and in dismissing any number of employes appointed by the late Administration. This Government had acted with great moderation in this respect. A large number of employes appointed by the late Government were well known to be working directly against the Liberal party, and yet they were not dismissed. The names of these persons could be given. A civil servant should be permitted to express his political opinions; and the hon. member for Charlevoix should be the last man to take the position which he had assumed on this question.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the rule which, as far as he knew, had always been adopted in their time, and which he believed, was according to law, was that postmasters in towns and cities that drew salaries, were specially deprived of their votes by law, he believed. He knew that the postmaster at Kingston had, in ignorance of the law, voted for him, though he did not interfere in the election, and that an action had been brought against this official to recover the penalty. But postmasters paid by percentage were in very many cases always understood to hold the offices for the convenience of the public, more than for their own emolument and advantage; and they were always considered at liberty to vote, and not to be civil servants in the strict sense of the word. As regarded civil servants generally, he thought that the rule was proper that, while allowed to vote, they should in no other way interfere in elections. This was the correct principle, and the principle which was in their day carried out, and he dare say that with same occasional infringements by hon. gentlemen opposite, it had been also observed by them. Then he spoke of a greater matter, he did not refer to voting or political predictions, but to the absence of employes at the end of a Session in the utmost press of business. These were sessional officers, and it was alleged that they obtained leave of absence on false pretences, deceiving the Speaker. If this had been done in order that they might act as electioneering agents, he thought that everybody on both sides would agree that a very grave offence had

MR. LAURIER said that he knew for certain that there was illness in Mr. Pitan's family; and this was why he had gone down.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says so, and that is the end of it.

MR. MITCHELL said he wished to complain of the fact that Mr. Ellis, who held the leading postmastership in the Province of New Brunswick, being postmaster at St. John, was nevertheless connected with the St. John Globe, for which he wrote editorial articles, and in which he had an interest. These articles were not only most violent, but of the most virulent character, directed against the opponents of the present Government. This was highly improper. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Armstrong, who was now dead, had dissolved partnership, and the former had since taken in two young men from the office with him to manage this paper.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said he was assured by Mr. Ellis himself and other parties in St. John, that Mr. Ellis had had no control over and no interest in the Globe newspaper since his appointment as postmaster. This was the understanding at the time, and he believed this had been done. Mr. Ellis' salary was $2,400, which was also given in Halifax and other towns of the same size.

MR. MITCHELL said that the public announcements he had seen contradicted the correctness of the statement that Mr. Ellis had severed his connection with the Globe. He was satisfied that Mr. Ellis still had an interest in that paper, and controlled the sentiments uttered in its columns.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said that Mr. Ellis was a very efficient officer. It was distinctly understood when the appointment was made that he was to cease to have any connection with the Globe newspaper. He could not say positively that this had been done; but this was the understanding at the time.

MR. MITCHELL said that Mr. Ellis was postmaster when he dissolved partnership with Mr. Armstrong. And he was informed, on very credible authority, that Mr. Ellis was now carrying on this business with the aid of two assistants taken from the office of the paper.

MR. HUNTINGTON said with regard to two returns mentioned by the hon. member for Charlevoix, that if collusion had existed which resulted in the withdrawal of tenders, this was very improper. In any case, where this was known to have occurred, it had been seriously dealt with by the Department. But it might be that the hon. gentleman, unless he had heard the details by means of a telegram, had been misinformed, as party feeling was very high in Charlevoix County. The Department, however, had no knowledge of it. If the facts were as mentioned, $500 had been lost to the Department. As to the St. Lawrence service, the experiment had been made of sending the mails over the Grand Trunk, and of ferrying them over to Murray Bay. This was believed to be a very great convenience. The sum of $2,000 was paid to the Grand Trunk Company in this relation, and this source appeared to be a very great advantage. The land service did occasion some inconveniences; but the hon. gentleman had made the case out a deal worse than it was. They would have had to send the despatches to the Governor General at Tadousac all the same if the steamers had been running, but this special service only occurred once, and it was a matter of no consequence. The hon. gentleman said that according to the report of the Inspector they had made a bargain with Martin to pay $12 for the round trip and to give another man $4 for the round trip to be continued for thirty-three months, and had not advertised for tenders. The period was short, and if they had so advertised, the hon. gentleman would have complained that no work had been performed. The thing was quite impossible, and this complaint fell to the ground. The hon. gentleman's statement showed that the service performed below by steamer was not a daily service; and they were now seeking to supply a daily service as far as Murray Bay. The Department was compelled to admit that the service to Murray Bay was not satisfactory. It was an experiment. They thought that the steamers might take the mail for a reasonable price as far as Murray Bay, but the steamers would not do it. They charged at the same rate for carrying mails from Murray Bay as from Quebec. Therefore he could not make any arrangement with regard to the postmaster at Quebec East.

MR. CARON asked whether arrangements had been made with the Montreal, Ottawa, and Occidental Railway to carry the mails over that line.

MR. HUNTINGTON said no arrangement had been made nor any negotiations entered into.

MR. DECOSMOS asked why there was a decrease of $10,000 in the Estimates for postal service in the Province of British Columbia; why the contractor for the mail service between Victoria and Nanaimo had been allowed to throw up his contract, and whether that contract had been given out without calling for tenders; whether it was intended to fulfil the treaty with British Columbia as to steam service between San Francisco and Victoria; and whether the Government proposed continuing Mr. Bernard as mail-carrier between Yale and Cariboo, without calling for tenders.

MR. HUNTINGTON said, with regard to the $10,000, the Government had estimated for $10,000 last year, more than they expended. With regard to the second enquiry, the contractor could not fulfil his contract, and the inspector recommended the Government to give it to another steamer which was done. As for Bernard, he did not exactly know what to do with him, and would consult with the hon. gentleman about it. The treaty with British Columbia for mail service was not a matter connected with his Department, but there was no change in the policy that he knew of. The correspondence between Victoria and Puget Sound was not completed, but he hoped it would be in a few days.

84. Lachine Canal..... $2,000,000

MR. MACKENZIE said this was for the payment of existing contracts, amounting altogether to $4,470,873, of which, up to 31st December, last, there had been paid $2,992,711. The estimate for the current year had been somewhat exceeded, and it would be necessary to take a supplementary estimate.

Vote agreed to.

85. Cornwall Canal..... $250,000

MR. LANGEVIN asked when that contract was given out.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was given on the 23rd August, 1876, and to be finished on 25th April, 1879.

MR. LANGEVIN: Is it likely to be completed then?

MR. MACKENZIE: I think so.

Vote agreed to.

86. St. Lawrence Canals.....$46,000

MR. MACKENZIE said that item was for the Galoose Rapids. The canal had yet to be deepened.

Vote agreed to.

87. Welland Canal .....$2,500,000

MR. MACKENZIE said there were 36 contracts in all, the aggregate amount of which was $9,514,207. To this must be added the cost of clearing the land, engineering expenses and exceptional expenses of various kinds.

In answer to Mr. PLUMB,

MR. MACKENZIE said he believed the contracts were all let.

In answer to Mr. KIRKPATRICK,

MR. MACKENZIE said the last contract let was to be finished in April, 1879. He did not include the aqueduct, which was to be finished in 1881, and, in the meantime, the old aqueduct would be improved so that vessels drawing 12 feet of water could pass.

MR. McCALLUM said he had been very glad to hear the hon. the Minister of Public Works say that the policy of the Government was to get fourteen feet of water from

MR. HUNTINGTON.

Fort Erie to Montreal, and he should be glad if that were brought about as soon as possible. We were losing money by not having that arrangement. The trade of the West was going by Buffalo and the Erie Canal. The hon. gentleman had not stated the amount it would take to raise the locks from the Summit down to Port Dalhousie. He wished they would do that at once, because the policy of the American Government was to divert the trade through the Erie Canal. There had been an increase of 55 per cent. of vegetable food cleared through the Erie Canal, while there had been a decrease through the Welland Canal of 19 per cent. On the other hand, there had been a decrease of heavy goods sent through the Erie Canal, and an increase on the Welland Canal. The Americans had made a reduction of the tolls last year, as he had predicted. As long as they had the advantage of two feet of water in the Buffalo harbour, the trade of the West would go that way; but if we had 14 feet of water in the Welland Canal, the trade of the West would come through our own territory. It was breadstuffs which paid the tolls, not coarse freight. He would like the Minister of Public Works to state if the Government intended to lower the culverts on the feeder, because, when the water was high, it flowed on to the land of that section. He trusted the Government would, as soon as possible, deepen the canal so as to give 14 feet of water.

MR. PLUMB said he desired to supplement the appeal of the hon. gentleman for a 14 feet depth. He showed the enormous amount of freight which was being carried on American railways, and cited a leading in a newspaper published in Albany in which it was urged that the tolls on the Erie Canal should be completely removed. The policy of the State of New York had been to reduce the tolls year by year, and every effort would be made to retain the carrying trade on that Canal. This was a matter of most vital interest for us. Buffalo controlled the great trade of the West, and was the most serious rival our Canadian cities had to contend with. The Welland Canal was one of the competitors with the Erie Canal, and the railways of New York, and, perhaps, those of Pennsylvania, and he regretted that the period of the completion of the enlargement of this canal was to be delayed. An enormous sum had been spent on this work, and this would lie idle for some time, returning no interest. One of the most important sections seemed to be that between the Mountain at Thorold and Port Dalhousie, and he was informed by an engineer of the very highest standing, that there was great danger of the outlay between Port Dalhousie and the top of the mountain at Thorold being lost, owing to the washing of the banks, to the constant action of the water and the peculiar nature of the clay and soil, and the action of the frosts. These influences would do exceedingly great damage to the locks, bridges, and other parts of the basin. He was also told that the lock at Port Dalhousie had been found not to have been properly based, and that there was evidence that this work had sunk. He was sure that the tardy letting of the aqueduct, was a most serious thing in connection with the enlargement of this canal. This had been done some time in August or September, and he was informed that the old aqueduct could be made to answer a purpose, though not the purpose for which the enlargement was intended. He regretted exceedingly, in the interests of the country generally, and of those engaged in trade, that, when this matter was brought up in the House some six or eight weeks ago, and the statement was made that these works would be completed in a year or eighteen months, the hon. member for Lincoln, who was a practical business man, had corroborated the statement that this work would be done in a very short time, and also endorsed the action of the Government in this respect. In these days of rapid transit, when the most constant vigilance was necessary to prevent the loss of a little portion of the carrying trade, it was unfortunate that the most important of all public works—and he did not except the Intercolonial Railway—the key of the whole system of navigation upon which such an enormous sum had been expended, should have been so far delayed as to threaten the loss of this trade, which they had been seeking and were willing to make such great sacrifices for. The policy of the late Government in this regard had been wise; and this Government would have been wise had they pushed forward this work as rapidly as possible to successful completion. The period of great depression in trade and of stoppage in railway construction, when labour has been begging for employment, was peculiarly favourable for carrying on this work. Under the circumstances, they had reason to complain of so much tardiness, and of the condition of the Welland canal, which was very much like that of the man who built the roof of his house without having built the lower stories or laid the foundations at this canal was very nearly completed at each end. Large outlays had been made upon it, and he believed that the greater part of the most expensive masonry between the top of the mountain at Thorold and Port Dalhousie was now finished. The money was no doubt paid over; and these works were earning nothing, while they were exposed to damage. The public interests had suffered seriously in this connection. There were reasons for supposing that these works had been unnecessarily delayed. He was surprised to have his hon. friend (Mr. Norris) approve of the statement that this canal could be completed in a year or 18 months, when he must have known that this statement was misleading. It had been pretended that it was possible to get navigation by way of the Lake Champlain and the Champlain Canal to New York; but this was utterly impossible. The Champlain was a small canal belonging to the State of New York; the larger proportion of the population of this State was interested in maintaining the navigation of the Erie Canal. The Commissioner who had gone to Washington prepared to sacrifice Canada's interests to obtain reciprocity, had wished to stipulate for the use of the influence of the United States Government, in order to secure the enlargement of this canal by that State; but all who knew any thing about the matter laughed at this statement because the Federal Government had no influence whatever over the Legislature of the State. The scheme was a foolish one, and impracticable. He trusted that every effort would be made to push forward this work on the Welland Canal to completion. He was disappointed in the progress which had been made on this most important work, which was the key stone of the whole arch of our system of navigation. He wished to ask the hon. the First Minister whether the contract No. 1 which was in the hands of Mr. Larking of St. Catherines, was transferred by Denison, Belden and Co., or whether the Government had made a new contract, and whether the other contracts standing in the name of Denison, Belden and Co., were still being carried on by these gentlemen.

MR. MACKENZIE: So far as I know they are carried on by these gentlemen. Mr. Larkin got the contract himself. It was not assigned to him by any one.

MR. PLUMB: Was it obtained by tender?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. PLUMB: Was it the lowest tender?

MR. MACKENZIE: It was the lowest tender in this way. Denison, Belden & Co. were the lowest tenderers, but they had been accused by the authorities of the State of New York of having been concerned in frauds in connection with the Erie Canal, and the Government thought it desirable not to give them the contract, and it was given to Mr. Larkin, the next lowest tenderer, at their prices.

MR. NORRIS said he was glad the Government intended taking up the work of deepening the canal to 14 feet at an early day. The extra cost required, $900,000, would yield a better return than any money yet spent on the canal. He did not see why the banks from Thorold downwards should suffer damage even if the water were not let in for a year or two. In fact, it was necessary that these banks should lay for some time before letting in any water, in order to strengthen them. The work could not be pushed on at once. The aqueduct itself would take a longer time to make than any other section of the canal. It was necessary that time should be taken to complete such works.

MR. McCARTHY said he was glad the Government saw the necessity of deepening the canal to 14 feet of water. He thought the hon. the First Minister was in error in stating the work would be completed in June, 1879. He did not think the work would be completed for two years, even with twelve feet of water.

MR. MACKENZIE said the income from the Welland Canal last year gave a surplus of $114,000 and the surplus on the Ottawa Canals was $16,847. On the St. Lawrence Canals there had been a loss of $37,821, on the Rideau Canal $35,227, and the total net revenue from these Canals amounted to $53,000. The net revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1875, was somewhat large; it amounted to $68,000.

MR. MITCHELL: Is that the net profit earnings of the Welland Canal over and above working expenses?

MR. MACKENZIE said it was; but it did not include the interest on capital.

In answer to Mr. McCALLUM,

MR. MACKENZIE said his impression was that the Canal Commission reported in favour of twelve feet instead of fourteen feet.

MR. LANGEVIN said he believed it was twelve feet on the St. Lawrence Canals, and fourteen feet on the Welland Canal.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was very difficult to get a depth of twelve feet in the harbours on the lakes. The depth of water at Chicago and Milwaukee was not more than twelve feet. The Public Department at Washington estimated the cost of making a depth of fourteen feet from the bed of Lake Superior and Lake Erie at $3,000,000, with the clearing out of the Detroit, St. Clair and St. Mary Rivers, and that did not include the work properly within Canadian boundaries. An application had been made to the Canadian Government to join them in some of this work, and they had agreed to pay in proportion to the tonnage and trade of Canada. That had led to some hesitation. It had been the policy of the United States, however, to dredge out harbours more than had formerly been done, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) had felt it necessary to adopt the policy to reach the same depth in the space of time, and to make our permanent structures such as to give the depth of 14 feet. The Government would consider the statements of hon. gentlemen, but he could not pledge himself to anything, because they had to consider the financial position of the country and other matters. He had not yet been able to take the feeder matter into consideration, but they hoped soon to be able to reach that and remove any grievance that might exist.

MR. MCGREGOR said that a vessel at Chicago could come out drawing 15 feet of water, and at Milwaukee from 14½ feet to 15 feet. At present the American shipping were actually drawing 14 feet of water between Buffalo and Chicago. It was necessary for us to have 14 feet as soon as possible.

MR. MCCALLUM said his hon. friend from Northumberland thought the canal ought to pay a percentage. He had in his hand a statement of the income of the canal for the last ten years, and the expenditure for staff and repairs, which was as follows :

Years.	Expenditure for Staff and Repairs.	Income.
1869.....	$76,393.00	$236,876.00
1870.....	81,793.00	246,190.00
1871.....	101,649.00	254,961.00
1872.....	92,164.00	299,740.00
1873.....	92,013.00	275,979.00
1874.....	110,932.00	271,597.00
1875.....	154,632.00	313,711.00
1876.....	141,134.00	251,663.00
1877.....	109,742.00	220,570.00

Thus, in 10 years, the gross amount received was $1,601,846, and the amount expended for the staff and repairs was $1,074,795, showing a net profit of $1,527,051. The net increase was $1,527,051; so, after all, this was not a very bad statement for the Welland Canal. There was a large increase, particularly with regard to the staff and repairs on the St. Lawrence Canals; but the figures for the staff and repairs were all mixed. They knew, of course, that the depth of 14 feet for the Welland Canal was an after-consideration. There might have been some mistakes committed in letting out the contracts. Some works that took the longest to do, had been let out last, but he did not know that he blamed the Government very severely for this; but still some mistakes had been committed. The Welland Canal was a great work; it was not being enlarged as far as he would like to see it, but it would be a credit to all parties concerned when it was done. The deep cut was not, and could not be, walled up, as hon. gentlemen said; and so there was nothing sure about it. This cut was sodd, the bank was being removed from it, and, when the water was taken out of the canal, he looked for a slide in it, though it would not be anything serious. No other public work in the Dominion paid as well as the Welland Canal, which was an accommodation to the people of this country, while otherwise it yielded considerable revenue.

Vote agreed to.

88. St. Anne's Lock and Canal....$50,000.

In answer to Mr. LANGEVIN,

MR. MACKENZIE said that it was part of the scheme to build a new lock entirely, with a new entrance behind the present pier, between the present lock and the village; and it would also be necessary to excavate the lock at the head of the canal for some distance. The depth on the present mitre sill was from 6 to 7 feet, and the scale of navigation for the river had been, he thought, 9 feet. The work, which had been progressing, had been on the shoal immediately below the lock. The bottom of this lake was composed of a series of ridges like waves of earth running generally in a north-east direction; and a cut had to be made through one of these ridges at that place. The contract was let some years ago, and it should have been finished long ago. It was progressing somewhat slowly but surely, and was, he thought, nearly completed. It was with a view to finish it, and, perhaps, to make a beginning on the larger work that this small vote was at present asked. The entire work would require, Mr. Page estimated, an expenditure of nearly half a million, from first to last, in order to complete it. It was not at present considered necessary to commence the new lock, but it was merely now intended to complete the other works. He could not say that the lock was absolutely finished yet, but it was either finished or very near it. $118,000 had been spent on it.

MR. ROCHESTER said he had understood last year that this work was then finished; he had passed through it. The work below St. Anne's was completed.

MR. MACKENZIE: Some piers are to be built yet.

MR. ROCHESTER: Not below; but there may be above.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; I think below.

MR. ROCHESTER said that the channel at St. Anne's at low water was fearfully crooked.

MR. MACKENZIE said a sum of money would be spent in providing piers.

Vote agreed to.

89. Carillon Lock and Canal.....$240,000

In answer to Mr. ROCHESTER,

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be a long story to give information under this head. This work had been entirely suspended since last May or June, and no arrangement had as yet been come to with the contractors, and this was a matter on which Mr. Page was now engaged. The contractors were R. B. Cook & Jones. The contractors would prefer to give up the dam across the river altogether, and prosecute the other parts of the work, but the engineer objected to any division of the contract. This matter had given a great deal of trouble and anxiety to himself, and he had endeavoured to come to some arrangement which would be in the public interest, and, at the same time, reasonably satisfactory to the contractors themselves. It was precisely in such a position at present that he preferred not to discuss the question, as it would be a matter of public inconvenience to be obliged to do so. This question was in dispute and it had given them a great deal of trouble. The Committee should be satisfied with knowing that it was the purpose of the Government to have the matter in such a state that when the water came to the lowest stage they would be in a position to prosecute it with the utmost possible vigour.

MR. ROCHESTER said that the river trade naturally demanded that something should immediately be done in this regard. The Chute à Blondeau Lock was in a most dilapidated condition, being propped up with planks and iron bolts. This dam and slides, if built, would do away altogether with this lock.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am quite aware of that.

MR. ROCHESTER said that the foreman had told him last Fall that he did not believe these locks would stand this year. They were paying from 25 to 40 per cent. for carriage between Ottawa and Montreal more than they ought to pay, simply because this work was not completed. He hoped that some arrangement would be made by which these locks would be put into such a position that they would answer the purpose of trade during this season at all events.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that the trade of Ottawa was suffering severely owing to the non-completion of these works. No work had what-ever been executed, despite the assertion to the contrary in the report of the Minister of Public Works—if he was correctly informed—upon the Carillon Canal since May 1877.

MR. MACKENZIE: I stated that myself.

MR. WHITE said yes; but no preparation so far as they could see had been made for recommencing work on this canal for the present season or up to the present time.

MR. LANGEVIN said it was to be regretted this work had not been proceeded with. When the question of constructing Carillon Canal came up in 1873, a meeting was held of all the interests concerned, not only of Ottawa but of the Upper Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec. It was, after grave deliberation, decided that this work should be completed. Plans were drawn and the contract was awarded to the present contractors. No reason had been given why, after five years had passed, this work was not completed. He had been told there was a difference of opinion between the Department and the contractors about a certain portion of it under water, which the contracts claimed should be considered as extra work. If there was any doubt about this difficulty it could be submitted to arbitrators, and if decided in favour of the contractors, the Government should ask for a vote for the money required.

Vote agreed to.

90. Grenville Canal..... $250,000

MR. MITCHELL asked who was the contractor for this work.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. James Goodwin. A change was made in 1871 and again in 1873. In 1873 the matter was referred to Mr. Page, and he made a report, upon which Mr. Goodwin executed the work done.

MR. MITCHELL said that the present Secretary of State, in order to carry the elections of 1874, and in the absence of the Premier, had promised Mr. Goodwin a very large increase in the rock work, which had enabled Mr. Goodwin to make a fortune out of the contract instead of losing one.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is not true.

MR. MITCHELL said he was referring to rumours and reports, some of which he believed to be true. He did not know whether there was a particle of truth in that statement.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is not a particle.

MR. MITCHELL said he believed Mr. Goodwin changed his politics about that time, and he believed the increase was part of his condition in doing so.

MR. MACKENZIE: I repudiate the insinuation of the hon. gentleman as one of the grossest falsehoods ever invented. Whoever invented it, I care not who he is, is a base scoundrel at heart.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): And whoever repeats it.

MR. MITCHELL said he believed there was some foundation for the rumour. He had not imputed it to the hon. gentleman, because the story, as he had heard it, was that the transaction either took place through the Secretary of State or another member of the Cabinet, whom he had heard named in connection with it.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was afraid the Minister of Public Works had not seen the papers, or, probably, he had forgotten them. Mr. Goodwin had laid his claims before the Government, and when the works were proceeding in 1873, the Chief Engineer made a report in reference to them. This additional work had been given to Mr. Goodwin, because he could do it cheaper than anyone else, having the plans already on the ground. This was on the 1st October, 1873. He had recommended Mr. Goodwin's case, which was laid before the Government, but he found some difficulty in coming to a decision about it. The matter was referred to Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer, for information to learn as to how much Mr. Goodwin was entitled, but this did not at all bind the action of the Government. This was done on the 30th October, 1873, and the Order-in-Council was dated the day following, so any action taken on Mr. Page's report, the hon. gentlemen opposite were responsible.

MR. MACKENZIE: I stated that.

MR. MITCHELL: You did not.

MR. MACKENZIE said that he had stated precisely what the hon. gentleman had detailed.

MR. MITCHELL: Not at all.

MR. MACKENZIE said that he gave an extract from the minute of Council dated Oct. 31, 1873; that the matter was referred to Mr. Page, to say what Mr. Goodwin should have; that many months afterwards—he could not recollect the date—Mr. Page had reported, and that the Government accepted and acted upon this report. He could not give the exact date of Mr. Page's report, but the Government had accepted his report. As to the previous rise in prices, it was accomplished wholly by the hon. gentlemen opposite, who said it was for a different class of work. That might be the case, but, according to his recollection, it was the same class of work, merely deepening the canal. It was as easy to quarry rock six feet down as four feet down. He was not competent to say whether $1.50 was too high a price or not. If the work was of an entirely different character, why did not the hon. gentleman ask for new tenders?

MR. LANGEVIN: Because the contractor was there, and it was more economical to give him the contract.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not say that money was not saved by giving it to the former contractor. He merely argued from the hon. gentleman's premises. He stated the simple fact that the work had been done before at $1.30 and it had been paid for at $1.50. The Government accepted the hon. gentleman's recommendations and referred the matter to Mr. Page, whose report was accepted and acted upon, and constituted practically the contract under which Mr. Goodwin was carrying on his operation.

MR. CURRIER said when the works were given out by the late Government the locks were neither to be so large nor was the canal to be sunk so deep as afterwards. The policy was changed afterwards to give nine feet of water instead of six; therefore it was more expensive to sink the timber of that lock three feet deeper, because the water had to be pumped out, and a cellar had to be sunk to put the lock in. Mr. Page was instructed to see whether the schedule of prices should be changed for this work.

MR. LANGEVIN said he did not recollect exactly what the plans of Goodwin were, but he was under the impression that he was dissatisfied with the measurements, and claimed he was not paid properly. The matter was referred to the Chief Engineer, Mr. Page, to ascertain what amount of money Mr. Goodwin was entitled to, not what increased rate he was to receive.

MR. McCALLUM said any one could see that it cost more to quarry out a foot of rock at the bottom than a foot at the top.

QUEBEC BUILDING SOCIETIES ACT.

BILL IN AMENDMENT PROPOSED.

MR. HOLTON asked the unanimous consent of the House to the introduction of a Bill. Last Session a Bill was passed respecting Building Societies in the Province of Quebec, the provisions of which in incorporated towns were to come in force on 1st July, 1878, and in all other parts of the Province on 1st July, 1879. It had been represented to him that bringing the Act into operation in respect to incorporated towns would result in great inconvenience, and would be injurious. The object of the Bill he wished to introduce was to extend the time for the Act coming into force in incorporated towns to 1st July, 1879.

MR. LANGEVIN said there had not been a petition to the House representing the state of things referred to by the hon. member for Chateaugay, and he did not think it would be right to change all the rules of the House when no complaint had been made.

MR. HOLTON: Of course that is final.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS IN ELECTIONS.

REMARKS.

MR. LANGEVIN said he had to bring a matter of importance before the House, and in order that he might do so in the proper manner, he would move the adjournment of the House. It was well known to the House, and it was known in the country, that certain officials of the House, and certain servants of the Government, were now employing their time in electioneering in the Province of Quebec, instead of doing the business for which they were paid by the country. Among these officials were four of the official translators. One named Bienvenu, had applied to be replaced by his brother while he went canvassing; another named Pitan, who got leave of absence on the plea of illness in his family, had been able to appear on the hustings in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, and speak in the interests of the present Government of Quebec. The Postmaster at Quebec East was engaged electioneering at Rimouski. Damase Labelle, a lighthouse keeper, was also engaged in the same way. Kierkoskowski, another translator, had been working in the county of Pontiac; and Auguste Leduc, a temporary clerk in the Department of Agriculture; Aumont, another translator, who went away on the plea of sickness, and Tobin, a messenger in the House, were also away canvassing. Lusignan, a clerk in the Inland Revenue Department; Loucks, postmaster at Hull; and Goudin, President of the Ottawa Ward Reform Association in this city, all Government officials, had been busy in the interests of the Quebec Government in the county of Ottawa. Several sessional clerks were also engaged electioneering. To allow officers to go away in that manner, and for that purpose, was at once unfair and unjust. They were paid officers of the county, and it was their duty to devote their time to the service of the country, and not in the interest of a party. This was his justification for bringing the matter before the House.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said it must be a matter of congratulation to the House that the hon. member for Charlevoix had at last been converted to views so long advocated by the Reform party while they were in Opposition, and practiced by them since they had come into power. It seemed to make a very considerable difference in the opinion of the hon. gentleman that the actions which he alleged had taken place on the part of some of the officials of the Dominion Government were directed against the hon. member's own friends. He (Mr. Jones) was not aware of what had been the practice in the old Provinces of Canada since the Union, but speaking of his own Province, from the date of Union, while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they had never lost an opportunity of influencing every officer of the Government under their control, not merely to vote against the Opposition candidates, but to work, to canvass, and to use their official positions against the Local Government of Nova Scotia. In 1867, when the hon. member for Charlevoix was a member of the Government, one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, the Minister of Customs of that day, had sent a despatch to his officials at Halifax directing them to vote against his (Mr. Jones') colleague and himself, and in favour of the gentlemen who were supporting the Government of that day.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): Was that wrong?

MR. JONES: Certainly it was wrong.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): Then why are you doing it now?

MR. JONES: We are not doing it now. When the despatch he had referred to was shown to these officials some of them had come to him expressing their regret that under the changed state of affairs since the Union, and in the face of express orders they had received from the head of their Department in Ottawa, they did not feel at liberty to vote for his colleague and himself. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) was then at the head of the Department having control of the railways of Nova Scotia and similar orders had come from him to every man belonging to the railway department, and every official and workman on the road was marched up to the polls under the leadership of the superior officers of the Department and voted against his colleague and himself. As the hon. gentleman knew, his conduct in that respect was the cause of the change made in the franchise by the Local Government of Nova Scotia, by which officers of the Federal Administration in Nova Scotia were placed in a position beyond the dictation of any man or any Government, a position in which he (Mr. Jones) believed the public opinion of the country would say every official of the Government should be placed throughout the whole Dominion. Those men were servants of the country, and not of the party, and many of the officials in Nova Scotia who had been disfranchised by the Provincial law were grateful that they had been placed in such an independent position—a position above the control, the dictation, or the command of any Government. The hon. gentleman knew very well, for he had been made aware of it at the time, that when he was in the Government the railways of Nova Scotia had been prostituted for the service of his party during the elections, that it only required a man to say he was going anywhere in that Province to vote for a Government candidate in order to have railway accommodation furnished him free of cost. When the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had done him the honour of visiting Halifax, not long ago, the first man he had applied to for the purpose of arranging for a political meeting between him (Mr. Tupper) and himself (Mr. Jones) was an officer of this Government drawing $1,100 or $1,200 a year from the country. The hon. member for Cumberland had, over his own signature, referred him (Mr. Jones) to this gentleman as one who would act in his behalf.

MR. TUPPER: You mean the last contest?

MR. JONES.

MR. JONES: Yes.

MR. TUPPER: Who was the man?

MR. JONES: Mr. Allison.

MR. TUPPER: All I can say is that I did not know he was receiving any salary from the Government.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman surely knew that he was in the employ of the Meteorological branch of the Marine and Fisheries Department?

MR. MITCHELL: I thought he gave that up.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman thinks a good many things that do not happen. The official to whom he had alluded had not only arranged political meetings on behalf of the member for Cumberland, but had appeared on a platform and denounced the Government in whose service he was. It was a matter of notoriety that the Government offices in this city were crammed by the political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and before he (Mr. Jones) joined the Cabinet he had found fault with the Premier that he did not exercise his authority, and tell those gentlemen that if they were to be the servants of the country, they must be faithful to the Government of the day, instead of, as in many cases, as was known, being in the service of hon. gentlemen opposite. These men must be placed in a position where neither one nor the other could dictate to them, and where they could be independent. If they chose to take these positions, these men must abandon interference in political affairs and in the interest of the country, the public should have full confidence in them while they occupied such positions. He begged to congratulate the hon. member for Charlevoix on the change in his views, and on the view he now took diametrically opposed to the practice of the hon. gentleman and his friends during the time that they had the opportunity of exercising it; also because he believed that the hon. gentleman had now seen the false position in which he placed himself while in power. The hon. gentleman now felt that everything was changed; his own bull was gored, so to say; and, consequently, the hon. gentleman assumed an air of intense indignation, and, whether right or wrong, he brought a certain charge with reference to employés of the House and Civil servants of the country. He at least congratulated the hon. gentleman on arriving at the conclusion which they had endeavoured to impress upon the late Government while they themselves were in Opposition.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, in the first place, he denied altogether the statement of the hon. gentleman that Mr. Tilley had acted as was represented.

MR. JONES: Mr. Tilley admitted it in this House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not believe that Mr. Tilley had admitted it.

MR. JONES: I say he did.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he ventured to say that Mr. Tilley had never sent a communication directing and commanding, or in any way ordering these men to vote.

MR. JONES. Mr. Tilley admitted it in this House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that they would look this matter up. As to the action of the late Government respecting railway employés in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, his hon. friend from Charlevoix could speak. This was the old cry—"tu quoque, the late corrupt Government did so and so, and all kind of monstrosities, offended against Constitutional law and against the Independence of Parliament, and used the Civil Service machinery for the purpose of keeping their corrupt and effete Government still longer in power against the wishes of the people. But this was to be all cured and to be done away with when this Government took office. The Golden Age was to return. The country was to have purity, and the Golden Age was to be restored. No more were civil servants to work at elections. No more was the independent elector to be approached by Government influence or Civil Service influence. This country was to be restored to the age of Adam and

Eve before she ate the apple. This was the promise made to the country by hon. gentlemen opposite, but the Minister of Militia did not deny the statement made by the hon. member for Charlevoix. He did not attempt to do so; he said: "It does not rest in your mouth to bring up this kind of thing"; and yet the hon. gentleman wound up by congratulating his hon. friend from Charlevoix on his change of opinion, and on coming to the principles so long advocated by the Liberals of Canada. Yes; it was a long time advocated. Ever since he had been in Parliament they had heard charges brought that the corrupt Conservatives were corrupting the population, and that the time-honoured principles laid down by the Liberal party could only be carried out by, and would never be carried out until, the Liberal party came into power, and then all this was to be changed. But, had they made this change? The only retort that the hon. gentleman could make—he did not deny the charge, he could not deny it, he could not refute or palliate the charge—was: "You are another." This was the course taken by the hon. gentleman. And what did he say? The only fault he found in the present Government before he went into it—and this was not a fault now, of course, since the hon. gentleman had gone into it—was that the late Government had crammed the Civil Service with political friends. But, was this Government cramming the offices with political foes? Every Government selected for the Civil Service their own friends, and no one could object to it. This was done everywhere except in England, where competitive examinations had carried sway over both the Government and Opposition, and where the idea of patronage was gone altogether, save in exceptional cases; but it was always the case in that country before the era of competitive examination, and it had always been the practice in Canada. The hon. gentleman would not say that since they had come into power, any appointments they had made had not been from among their political friends. No; their political friends and supporters would not allow them to appoint political foes; and nobody would expect it. There was no doubt about it. The hon. gentleman said he advised the Government to remove, and remonstrated against the Government because they did not remove, men who were political agents, and who were acting politically among the Civil Service. Why did the hon. gentleman not ask Mr. Speaker to remove these men now, when it was stated, and was not, and could not be denied, that these men had been allowed to go and work at elections. They knew what the Premier had said more than once, that a man or party, who did not carry out, when in the Government, the principles advocated when in Opposition, was no better than a demagogue. He held the hon. gentleman to his words. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), said that the time-honoured principle of his party advocated for years, was that the Civil servants should not interfere in elections. Let the hon. gentleman carry out this principle now. This charge was not only that these men voted. He was not in favour of the principle laid down by the hon. the Minister of Militia, that because these men had the confidence of the Crown, they should be deprived of their franchise; and hon. members would all remember that when Mr. Dorion introduced the ballot system as a member of the Government, and Minister of Justice, he said that one of the reasons for introducing the ballot was to enable all the Civil servants to vote freely and independently. This was one argument, and he would be very sorry to see the Civil servants deprived of their votes because the Civil servants should stand on an equality in this respect with their fellow subjects. He now contended, and had always contended, that the Civil servants should not be political agents. They should have the right to vote, and the Government of the day and heads of the Departments should give them fair opportunity to do so—he would not say, as non-residents, for that would be sending them away from their offices; but the Government should sternly put down their foot against the Civil servants becoming political agents; and it was no answer to bring up vague charges like tu quoque arguments, until they went into this discussion, and had name by name and person by person mentioned. If an opportunity for doing so was presented, he did not say that the late Government could defend and justify themselves. Here they found a postmaster gone away—not a mere way-side or percentage postmaster, but a salaried officer, for he believed that the postmaster of Hull was salaried.

MR. HUNTINGTON: No; if he was he would not be postmaster long.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would be liable to action, though an action would not lie. The decision was given that although there was prohibition to vote, still, owing to the repeal or amendment of the Post Office Act, actions had dropped out and such voting was not punishable in that direction. This was a stronger case than even one connected with Government services. Mr. Speaker belonged to no party; he should not be supposed to be so; and here it was stated that Mr. Speaker had given leave of absence to his officers—officers of the House, though they were now at the end of a busy Session. Mr. Speaker sat there as a Judge, and yet he had been granting leave of absence, and no person who knew Mr. Speaker's ability and personal sagacity, and political impartiality could not but be aware that Mr. Speaker knew perfectly well why these men applied for leave of absence.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order, Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that he was not out of order. Mr. Speaker would not say that he was out of order. If Mr. Speaker committed any negligence or error, then it was their bounden duty to tell him so; and no man could say that he was out of order. He was acting within the strict line of his duty; and, unless this was denied authoritatively, they must hold Mr. Speaker responsible for having, in the middle of the Session, when every officer for the convenience of the House, should be at his post, and when the members themselves were sitting until 3 o'clock in the morning, allowed these men to go away, one on the pretext that his family was ill; and his family, indeed, was so ill that this man had to go and make a political speech on the hustings on nomination day. A Messenger of the House had been permitted to go away; and this man should be here to run messages. This was intolerable. If the House did not resent it, the country would; and he was very glad that the matter had been brought up by his hon. friend.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he dared say the hon. gentleman was quite sincere in deprecating the tu quoque arguments; and, as he had occasion already to remark, the Government would have very little standing room if they had no justification for their course other than to state that the right hon. member had, himself, done the same thing. The hon. gentleman indulged in very free criticism regarding the acts of Mr. Speaker on a statement which, up to this time at all events, had not been proved; and he set the example to his followers, which they seemed not to be slow in following, of making remarks about the rulings of Mr. Speaker, which he had never witnessed in this House until the hon. gentleman had led the Opposition. The hon. gentleman's object was to reach the country; he did not seem to have much hope and expectation from the action of the House, and in order to reach the country, he had made a very fervid speech. What were the facts? Did the hon. member from Charlevoix complain that because these servants of the House were absent, their duties were not properly fulfilled.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that the hon. gentleman and the right hon. gentleman spoke as if it was a serious crime for servants of the House to engage into a political discussion, notwithstanding their own course for 20 years in this country. And supposing that all that had been said was granted, where were these employés of the House? If the hon. gentleman's insinuations were to be believed, these men were fighting the battle of friends in the Local Government of Quebec, and yet the right hon. gentleman expected a condemnation, and claimed that the impropriety was as great as if they had interfered in Dominion elections. The case of the postmaster at Quebec had been discussed, but this official was engaged in local elections, over which the authority here had no jurisdiction.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the hon. gentleman, the previous evening, when less excited, had declared that postmasters, whose salary and emoluments came from commissions, were entitled to have political views and to express them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say so yet.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that this was the case of this postmaster, about which the hon. member for Charlevoix had lamented so much. He maintained that the position taken, that the Dominion Government was to undertake to interfere with regard to local interests in the Province of Quebec, was absurd; and the only complaint that hon. gentlemen opposite could make would be because the business of the House was suffering from such absence. They had no jurisdiction over these matters. Hon. gentlemen opposite talked about these men being paid by the public, but they were not paid when away; they were made Sessional clerks and the country was safe in this respect. So far as he could see the business of the House did not suffer.

MR. McCALLUM: They will be paid no doubt.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he did not blame the hon. gentleman for expressing his opinion, because his knowledge of these things was derived from past experience. But he could tell the hon. gentleman that a new rôle was being played in this country; and that men were now only paid for duties they performed. Hon. gentlemen opposite lamented not the interference of Government officials in the Dominion, but in local elections over which this Government had no jurisdiction, and with which they had nothing to do. The only ground on which complaint could be made was that the public service suffered; and he defied any man in the House to show that this service suffered at all. The hon. gentleman drew a very philosophical distinction between Civil servants voting and exercising an influence; but if they had a right to vote by law—and this was the case—it was illogical to urge and persuade the Government to give them the right to vote, but to prevent them disseminating their views.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is that the new principle?

MR. HUNTINGTON said that this was not his principle; he believed that Civil servants should be entirely dissociated from the politics of the country. He regretted to say that this was not the right. It was illogical to say that these persons had the right to vote, but not to express their views on political matters; the only consequence of the doctrine which the right hon. gentlemen preached was, that the Civil servants of the country should be relieved, as his hon. friend from Halifax stated, from the incubus which hung over them, and from being pressed in this connection perhaps by the responsible and temporary heads of departments. He had the evening previous tried to get the hon. member for Charlevoix to say that he condemned this system, but the hon. gentleman talked all round this question. The ultimate result of this would be a much worse system; and perhaps they would yet see here, the evils which this system had attained in the United States. How long would the right hon. gentleman preside over departments there? He knew that conspiracies were going on against him, under his very eye, among his political adversaries in these Departments; that information had been furnished his opponents, and that it was in the power, more or less, of the officers around him to strengthen the hands of his antagonists. How long would elapse before the hon. gentleman would, under these circumstances, initiate the system, that to the victors belong the spoils. He made the right hon. gentleman the prediction, that if the state of things which existed to-day continued, and if Civil servants were permitted and encouraged to mix with politics, and if the Tory party returned to power, the man who led this party in this country would initiate the doctrine of turning out political opponents, and would introduce the American system. The hon. gentleman shook his head; but what had ever stood in the way of the hon. gentleman and his friends, in regard to inflicting their vengeance or punishment on those who oppose them, and strengthening themselves as they might. The whole subject lay in this: the complaint might be well or ill-founded.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that if it was well founded, the only question that arose was, whether the business of the House suffered; and if there was a secondary question it was this: "Have you a right to insist that we shall interfere in the local elections in the Province of Quebec?" Speaking for himself, he thought that it was improper for Civil servants to be mixing up in the politics of the country. He spoke for himself and not for his party in this respect. He presumed that different views might prevail, as was the case opposite, behind the right hon. gentleman; but this was the only question, and so far as he knew, there had been no such inconvenience suffered as to warrant hon. gentlemen in making a complaint.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman could scarcely charge the right hon. member for Kingston with being illogical, after the very extraordinary speech he had just made. The hon. gentleman deprecated in the strongest terms the possibility of such a state of things occurring in this country as that which existed in the United States, where, on a change of Government, officials were dismissed from office on account of their political proclivities. In enunciating a doctrine of this kind, the hon. gentleman carried the feelings of both sides of the House with him, but at the same time he defended a course of action which inevitably tended to involve the state of things referred to. If, in a political struggle, members of the Civil Service were allowed to go out and take an active, energetic part in such a struggle, a state of things such as the hon. gentleman said would be a great misfortune to the country, would be brought about. He thought the hon. gentleman was still more illogical when he said that, because this struggle was a Quebec and not a Dominion one, office-holders of the Dominion were free to take part in that struggle. One of the cardinal principles put forward by the leader of the party to which the hon. gentleman belonged, had been the entire severance of Dominion from local politics, and it would be exceedingly improper for the Dominion Government to interfere with local matters. It would be doubly culpable to give leave of absence to Government officials to engage in the local struggle in the Province of Quebec. Another fallacy which the hon. gentleman had propounded was, that before there could be any impropriety in giving leave of absence to Government officials, it must be shown that they neglected their duties. Now, the very fact of their absence showed that their duties were neglected. If they could be absent from their office without neglect of duty, they ought not to be in these offices at all, the public service did not require them. It was a fraud on the interests of the country that parties should be employed to hold offices who, even at the most laborious part of the Session, could leave their duties without their absence being felt. He would not deny office-holders the right of franchise under the ballot, but it was contrary to the spirit of the ballot for office-holders to go to the polls for the purpose of helping the Government of the day. When he went home to his own county at the last election, and officers of the Government, who were warm supporters of his, asked him what he expected of them, he said: "Attend to the duties of your office." He did not think it right that Government officials should go about for the purpose of supporting him by the energetic exercise of their influence. He would undertake to say that the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax to the effect that Mr. Tilley, when Minister of Customs, sent a note to the officers of the Custom-house at Halifax, was not well founded in fact.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Mr. Tilley sent a telegram through the head, or some other official at Halifax, saying it was the request of the Government that the officers should vote for the gentleman opposing my colleague, myself, and the members of the Local Government.

MR. TUPPER said he was glad to find that he had obtained a retractive statement from the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman said before, that the words "directed and commanded" were used, and he (Mr. Tupper) was glad that the expression had been toned down to the modest word "requested." He believed the hon. gentleman was right in saying that a message was sent by Mr. Tilley who, while he might express the hope that the officers of a Department might be prepared to support the Government, certainly never directed or commanded them to do so. If his hon. friend the member for Charlevoix had, as Minister of Public Works, commanded the railway officials to take a certain course—he (Mr. Tupper) never heard of it. Nor did he know that railway tickets had been issued by the Department to persons for the purpose of getting them to vote in a certain way. He did not believe that had ever been done, and an investigation would, he doubted not, prove this to be the case. Now he came to the case of Mr. Allison, and here he might state that he did not place himself in communication with Mr. Allison. He received a telegram from that gentleman asking him to hold a public meeting at Halifax on as early a date as possible. He (Mr. Tupper) telegraphed back, saying that if Mr. Allison could arrange with hon. gentlemen opposite for a meeting on any convenient night he would have no objection to go. On his return to Halifax, he (Mr. Tupper) addressed a note to the hon. Minister of Militia, saying he would be glad to have a meeting, and named Mr. Allison as a person with whom arrangements could be made. Mr. Allison, he might remark, was not a servant of the Government.

in the usual sense. Being a gentleman of high scientific attainments, his services were partly obtained by the Government on the Meteorological staff at a salary of $400 a year, but he obtained his livelihood from a business of his own to which he devoted most of his attention. On reference to the Public Accounts it would be found he was correct in stating that this was all Mr. Allison was paid by the Government, with the exception of $300 for assistance.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Take the next item.

MR. JONES: That is $1,000 altogether.

MR. TUPPER said the $200 was for telegraph stations. He did not think the case put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite was quite made out. He thought the ballot—whatever might be said about it—had this merit, that it enable Civil Service employés to exercise the franchise. He did not think, therefore, that it would be right to prevent Civil servants from exercising that privilege.

MR. BLAKE said it was amusing to contrast the tone of the debate on this subject as it had now been presented by hon. gentlemen opposite, with the debate which took place during the first Session of the present Parliament on the motion for papers in reference to the alleged removal of Doctor Strange for having actively interfered in the election of the hon. member for Kingston. On that occasion the hon. member for Kingston brought forward the doctrine that public officers had a right to interfere in election contests. He insisted that Dr. Strange had, by reason of his conduct, done nothing to disentitle him from continuing in his position. The hon. member for Kingston affirmed on that occasion that it was the right of public officers to interfere actively in election contests. If he remembered well, the right hon. member had stated that they might interfere one way, but not the other way. And the right hon. member was rather driven to that position because there had been cited to him a case or two of his own, in which some postmasters had been removed for having actively interfered in an election contest against a Postmaster-General of his. He (Mr. Blake) had been obliged, on that occasion, to state his dissent from the hon. gentleman's proposal. He had stated then, what he believed now, that he differed in toto from the right hon. member for Kingston, and that he did not think it followed that, because Civil servants were allowed, under law, to vote, they should be allowed to take an active part in an election; that if a public officer had any influence and was allowed to interfere, he would be expected and obliged to interfere. He had then quoted the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle in Mr. Hamilton's case. The whole of that discussion was in answer to the speech of the right hon. member for Kingston who then held views diametrically opposed to those stated to-day. He maintained that those views which he (Mr. Blake) had then expressed, and which were, to a considerable extent, those which the right hon. member for Kingston now held, after four years experience, were sound views. Previous to this, before the ballot was introduced, and when the Liberal party was in Opposition, he (Mr. Blake) had the honour of proposing a motion in amendment to the Election Law, disfranchising Civil servants from voting. He believed that that class of our fellow-countrymen could be safely entrusted with due regard to the efficiency of the public service, with the franchise under the ballot system; but the ballot had not then been introduced, and, under the rule of hon. gentleman opposite, there was no expectation of getting it.

MR. TUPPER: We carried it.

MR. BLAKE: No.

MR. TUPPER: The question came up on the Election Law, introduced by the right hon. member for Kingston, who stated that the ballot was an open question and the majority of the House, including a large number of members of the Government, voted in its favour; and the Election Bill was withdrawn in order to bring in the ballot.

MR. BLAKE said he was speaking of the time before the election of 1872. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues were taught many lessons by the elections of 1872. Before them, they had refused election trial by judges; after them, they brought in a Bill to grant trials of elections by judges. Before 1872, they refused the ballot, they unanimously voted against it. Every member of the Government voted against it.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. leader of the present Government announced that he was opposed to the ballot, and is opposed to it now, and announced that within the last year.

MR. BLAKE said he did not know what that had to do with the discussion. He had been pointing out the attitude of the late Government. After the election of 1872, the late member for Charlevoix (Mr. Tremblay) proposed a Ballot Law. Upon that occasion a vote was taken, and the Government bowed to the decision of the House, and withdrew their Election Bill, but that decision was one to which the leader of the Government and the bulk of its members were adverse. He had been referring to the attitude of the late Opposition with reference to the disfranchisement of the public service. He had entertained the hope that the protection of the ballot would have been sufficient to permit the public service of this country to retain the franchise, as under the existing system. He had changed that opinion, and his opinion now was that as long as the system of appointments by patronage existed, in order to produce a fair degree of efficiency and zeal on the part of the subordinate servants of the Government, who had been appointed, perhaps by the opponents of the party in power, who entertained strong aspirations for the return to power of these opponents, and who were animated with the bitterness, which unfortunately, pervaded party contests in this country, they must be disassociated altogether from party politics. Untold difficulties had beset the Government now in power from the strong, active partizan feeling of the servants who were nominally under its power, out of whom, in all cases, it had not the benefit of their full service. To retain the system of allowing them to vote, with some undefined limit as to how far they might interfere and canvass, and use their influence, would not lead to such an active degree of efficiency as ought to prevail; hon. members would, when this interference benefited their party, declare that public servants should be allowed to actively interfere and not be dismissed on that account, and when the interference was in favour of their opponents, arrive at an opposite conclusion. If an attempt were made to lay down by resolution, that permanent Civil servants should not actively interfere in political contests, the difficulty would arise of defining where the line should be drawn. What extent of interference should be permitted? So long as nomination by patronage continued, resulting generally, in the appointment of warm friends of the party in power, it must be agreed in the course of time that public officers must disassociate themselves altogether from the field of politics. He read a despatch from the Duke of Newcastle, with reference to the case of a Civil servants's interference in politics, and said that the weakness of the Duke's position was that it was open to the suggestion that a man might interfere actively on one side and not on the other. It was utterly unreasonable and inconsistent with any true freedom of action that a man might be permitted to interfere on behalf of the Government of the day and not against it. Everything pointed to the position that a public servant should be neutral—that he should have nothing to do with politics, that he should not consider himself the servant of the majority or the minority, but the servant of the whole people; that he should have such relations to the members of this House that the most active partisan on either side might have free, frank, and friendly communication with him on public matters, and have the right to expect perfectly fair play. His slight experience on both sides of the House led him to the conclusion that the public service of this country would never want able and efficient men, even if they passed a resolution that they should not interfere in politics, and if that were done he believed we should have a better public service than we had now. Notwithstanding the lateness of the Session, he hoped some fruit would result from this discussion. While the present law was on the Statute-book giving the members of the Civil Service the franchise, they could not prevent them from exercising it, and he should not object to any one or every one of them recording their votes. But there was a concurrence of opinion among both parties that their right ought to be simply the right of voting, and that any public servant who went farther than that went beyond the line of his duty, and deserve censure, if not dismissal. He said dismissal. Now he had one word to say with reference to Mr. Speaker. He congratulated him on the degree of fairness which had been observed in the attack made upon him. It was true it was made at a time when he could not answer it, but he had yesterday in Committee been enabled to disprove the accusation before it was repeated. It was unfortunate for him, after those two leaves of absence had been explained by him, after he had said that Mr. Bienvenu had applied for leave to attend to private business, and Mr. Pitau on account of illness in his family—it was unfortunate, it was to be regretted, it was to be deplored, that the leader of the Opposition had denied Mr. Speaker's statements, had imputed motives to him, knowing that the statement of the hon. member for Charlevoix involved a very grave charge against him. He understood the hon. member for Charlevoix had accepted the explanation of Mr. Speaker yesterday. He was sorry the statement should have been renewed, and renewed in the fervid, not to say violent, terms which had been used by the leader of the Opposition. He doubted not that the country would appreciate the circumstances justly.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said there were in this House about forty sessional clerks employed, fifteen or twenty of whom were employed in the public works, the remainder were employed in sending communications favourable to the Government to those Government newspapers which could not afford to keep correspondents at Ottawa. Why did not the hon. member for South Bruce stop this abuse. The hon. gentleman knew well that if he and the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) were to use their influence, the hon. the Minister of Public Works would not dare accord to these men the position they now occupied. So long as this Government, or any other Government, used public servants to work in their behalf, so long the Opposition had an equal right; but, in any case, this country could not afford to pay Civil servants and allow them to use their time in taking part in elections. He admired the determination and honesty of the gentleman; and were he leader of this Government, he (Mr. White) would consider himself bound to support him. The hon. the First Minister knew those officers had left their offices and had gone canvassing, and, if the Government were sincere, they would dismiss those officers from the public service. He charged the Government with having sessional clerks in their employment who never filled one sheet of foolscap for public service, but simply wrote letters to newspapers in opposition to members in this House. And yet the hon. gentleman supported a Government that employed men to vilify public men in this country who were known to be of the most upright character. The public mind was poisoned by these sessional sneaks. So long as men of this character were employed, so long would they have bitterness, hatred, malice and envy in this House. The head of the Government had found fault, when he was in Opposition, with the employment of too many Civil servants; but, as a matter of fact, more Civil servants were employed under the present Government than under their predecessors, and there were more idlers now than then. The Minister of Finance knew it well. He (Mr. White) wished he would come to East Hastings, and explain this matter. When he was there before, he promised the people a duty on grain. He promised to do this and that.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say I ever promised to put a duty on grain? Because, if he does, I must give him the most unqualified contradiction.

MR. WHITE: When the hon. gentleman was in Belleville, he was a visitor in a certain house; and in Thurlow, Mr. Wallbridge stated publicly that, at tea the previous night, the hon. gentleman had said that, as soon as the Government got established, they would put a duty on grain.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: My hon. friend ought not to quote such a statement four or five years after, and at second-hand, a statement which was made utterly and entirely without the slightest particle of authority, if ever such a statement was made.

MR. WHITE said he was glad the hon. gentleman said so. The people of East Hastings would judge whether he was to be considered worthy of belief. He alleged that the Government were paying clerks to send news to Reform papers, intended to damage their opponents. The money voted for this purpose had better be expended on public works; and it would be better for these young men, to whom he had referred, to have an axe in their hands than to do this with which they were charged.

MR. LANGEVIN said the Minister of Militia had stated that, while he was Minister of Public Works, he (Mr. Langevin) had directed that the officers under him in the Maritime Provinces should be compelled to vote for the Government candidate.

MR. JONES (Halifax): That you directed them to vote.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman was misinformed. He had never directed that any officer should be directed to vote.

MR. MACKENZIE: Did you request them to vote?

MR. LANGEVIN said it had always been against his policy, and that of the Government to which he belonged. Even here in Ottawa, when an election was taking place, he would not tell the Civil servants to vote one way or the other, or that he wished them to vote. But if an officer came and asked his leave during office hours, to go and vote, he had told him to arrange it with his comrades. He never knew from the beginning how any of the men were going to vote. It was stated that the railways were used for the free conveyance of voters for the Government candidate. He could say if the voters did not pay their fares, it was not with his cognisance, connivance, or by his orders. He was very much pleased to hear the hon. member for South Bruce use the words he did, for he expressed the opinion that the Civil officers should not be permitted to take part in elections, except so far as recording their votes. There were many more things in which he and the hon. member for South Bruce agreed; in fact, their minds seemed to be a great deal in accord. The fact that the officers to whom he had alluded were not in their offices, proved that, either the public service suffered by the absence of the officers, or they were not required.* There were seven of them belonging to this House already away. They were paid while they were away, and the House had to face the question, whether they were wanted or not. It was a fact that one of them would speak in Pontiac at a church door to-morrow, and would not be back before the end of the election. They were paid by the Government, and it was only right they should be in attendance upon the House, and not engaged in electioneering. He had thought it his duty to bring the matter up, and his justification was the Government allowing officers to go electioneering. These public servants, should not be deprived of their votes, but they should not mix up in politics or canvass; they should attend to their business, and simply vote. Last summer, when the election took place in the County of Drummond and Arthabaska were in progress, this same Mr. Pitan, who was now canvassing in that county, was on the hustings alongside of Mr. Bourbeau and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue; and he had met this man at church doors canvassing and speaking in favour of the Government candidate.

MR. LAURIER: Mr. Piteau is simply a sessional clerk, and not a permanent officer of the House.

MR. LANGEVIN said that this practice was very unfair, and should not be allowed. As the hon. member for South Bruce had stated, these men were the officers, not of one party, but of the whole of the people of Canada; and, therefore, they should not be allowed to leave their duty and canvass.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the Government had not allowed this to be done. He had never heard it whispered till last night that any person in the service of the Government was going on any electioneering mission. He was not aware of it at this moment, except from what the hon. gentleman said. He did not approve of it, and he would not permit the thing to be done. This was the ground he took. But, did he understand the hon. member for Charlevoix to say that he never intimated to employes of the Public Works Department how they were to vote?

MR. LANGEVIN: I do not remember having ever said so.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he never made any arrangement such as the Speaker was charged with making, allowing one person to go away and putting another in his place?

MR. LANGEVIN: I do not remember it.

MR. MACKENZIE: You have no remembrance of that?

MR. LANGEVIN: No; none.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well; on the 13th of August, 1872, he found the following telegram, sent from Hector L. Langevin, dated at Ottawa, to Mr. Prefontaine, the Superintendent of the Chambly Canal:

"I learn that several of the employes of the Government on the Chambly Canal are working against the Ministerial candidate. The Government does not force any one to vote, but it expects that its employes will not act against the Ministerial candidate."

MR. LANGEVIN: That is right.

MR. MACKENZIE said that there must have been an answer to this, because on the same day another telegram was sent to the same party as follows:—

MR. LAURIER.

"A. Lacoste will give you the names of the men who wish leave of absence to-morrow, and you will replace them, if necessary, by good men. I want that leave.

HECTOR LANGEVIN.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the hon. gentleman was most industrious in taking care that all the workmen on the canals should be apprised that he could not approve of their working against the Ministerial candidate. Oh, certainly not. They would have the liberty to vote, but they were not to open their mouths and express an opinion; but if they wished leave to go and vote for the Ministerial candidate they were to get it, and men were to be put in their place; but it was a shocking thing for the Speaker to allow a man to go down to an election and another person to take his place; and Mr. Speaker must be abused by a prominent gentleman opposite, at the time when Mr. Speaker had no power to say a word in reply, because he was charged with doing the same thing which the hon. member for Charlevoix had defended vigorously in this same official style. The hon. gentleman desired, no doubt, that all the employes in the public works should vote for the Ministerial candidate; and when the superintendents of canals were informed that while they might they would not be forced to vote; but that they did expect that they would not work against the Ministerial candidate, it was a pretty plain intimation of what was to follow, if they did work against the Ministerial candidate. Anything more suggestive of a threat could not well be put in writing; and he had, no doubt, the hon. gentleman sent similar messages to the Intercolonial Railway to intimate what he desired should be done there also. He did not think that the time of the House should have been taken up in discussing this matter at such length. He had no fault to find with the hon. gentleman for calling the attention of the House to the fact he said he had ascertained; but he (Mr. Mackenzie) did say that hon. gentlemen opposite could not complain if the tu quoque argument was used against them. They had no right to complain. He had showed last night, and the hon. leader of the Opposition had admitted, that this hon. gentleman had a prominent official with him on a regular electioneering tour appearing on the platform. The hon. gentleman then said that this official was on Penitentiary business, though 150 miles from the nearest penitentiary. He had always taken the ground that minor officials should not be precluded from either voting or canvassing; those who held nominal positions should have this liberty. He had put his views on record in the House, and he had no desire to change these views now.

MR. BOWELL: These are not the views of your colleagues.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; they are.

MR. BOWELL: Not of your past ones.

MR. MACKENZIE said that these were the views of his colleagues as well. The view that the Government took was, that the Civil servants should not engage in active electioneering. He happened to know some prominent officials who, during the last election in this city, were very active electioneering agents. He did not choose to interfere at the time, but he did state in his place in the House, at the close of last Session, that anything like what they had to suffer in consequence of this prevalence of political feelings in the Departments, would not be overlooked if it was continued. It was quite enough that they should have the right to vote under the law; but it was altogether intolerable that Civil servants should actively engage as electioneering agents; and, so far as the Government was concerned, it entirely discountenanced the practice.

MR. BOWELL said there were one or two points connected with this discussion to which he thought that the attention of the House should be more particularly called, and which Mr. Speaker and the officers of the House who had charge of the appointment of sessional clerks should bear in mind and not forget. They had the important statement made by the hon. member for East Hastings, that he was aware—he presumed that the hon.

gentleman must have known it, or else he would not have made the statement—that sessional clerks on the staff had not done any work at all for the House or Government since their appointment, but had been occupied, since they were placed on the staff, as correspondents of Ministerial newspapers, to abuse the members of the Opposition. Whether this was the case or not he did not know, but he thought that, it having been stated in the House, it was the duty of those who made these appointments to ascertain whether such was the fact. When he looked at the return laid before the House two days ago, he found that there were forty-one sessional clerks. He could easily understand that some of these gentlemen, in order to find some employment, probably, occupied their time in such an occupation as that to which the hon. member for East Hastings had referred. When the hon. member for Monck interjected an expression in the remarks of the hon. the Postmaster-General, to the effect that the probabilities were that these gentlemen having received leave of absence would receive their pay during their absence, the reply made was that the hon. gentleman was judging, in all probability, from his own experience, intimating that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCallum) must have some knowledge of this kind of procedure during the existence of the late Government. If a sessional clerk was appointed, and his pay began fourteen days in one, and eleven days in another case, before the date of the appointment, he thought they had a right to conclude that if given leave of absence, their pay would still go on. In this return it was stated that James McKinley, who received $5 or $4—both figures were given—per day, was appointed on the 18th of February, last and, under the heading as to date when pay commenced, he found the 7th February; this gentleman was, therefore, paid for eleven days before he was placed on the staff at all. Another gentleman, W. E. Soare, received $4 a day, and his employment began on the 5th March, and his pay on the 19th February. Why was this? He did not know in how many other cases this practice had been followed, either now or in the past. Why should sessional clerks, who had little or nothing to do, be put on the pay-list, 14 days in one case and 11 days in another, before they were engaged at all. He thought that the hon. member for Monck was quite right, and that they had a right to presume the pay would continue during leave of absence, more particularly when they knew that any Government or private employé, when given a holiday for a fortnight or three weeks, received their salaries during this period. This was the practice with employers, and if they did so in dealing with their own money, it was not at all likely that the Government, or those who managed its funds, would be so very punctilious as to deduct a few days' pay when these persons were away—particularly when the latter, perhaps, were doing the bidding of their employers, and if not their bidding, were at least working in their interest. The very objection which he understood was taken by the hon. member for Charlevoix, although the debate had widened in its character, was, to permission being given to servants of the House to leave their employment, if indeed they had anything to do—and, if not, they had no right to receive pay and should be dismissed—and work in the interest of local candidates who were in the interest of the Dominion Government. This he took to be the hon. gentleman's principal objection. The question was widened into whether officials should vote at all or not, and whether Dominion officials should interfere with local elections. He was not prepared to go so far as some of the gentlemen who had spoken with reference to this matter. He believed in giving the widest possible limit to the subject for the use of his franchise; but hon. gentlemen opposite, while in Opposition, had condemned in the most earnest and vigorous manner the interference, either directly or indirectly, of Civil servants with elections; and, then, the moment they got on the Treasury benches, sent them out by seven or eight to interfere in local elections while under the pay of this House or the Government. The latter were not justified nor could they be justified by saying: "You did the same thing when you were in power." The Government had to be congratulated, and, if not the Government, certainly the House, for the condemnation they received, and which the officials of the House had received, from the hon. member for South Bruce. This was not only an indirect, but a direct condemnation of all that he done, by those who had anything whatever to do with this matter; but he must confess that it was a little amusing—it must be so to those who had watched events in the past—to hear the gentlemen on the Treasury benches condemn in such strong and vigorous language, such a telegram as was said to have been sent by the hon. member for Charlevoix, when Minister of Public Works, when he said to the Premier that if this was not his opinion it certainly was that of his colleagues. The right hon. gentlemen said that they held similar views; and, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would be surprised if he could read him a telegram of an almost similar character, which had been sent by one of his late colleagues to a country postmaster, whose income scarcely reached $100 per annum, intimating that this official could not interfere in matters of this kind; and yet, the hon. gentlemen told them that his opinion was in favour of freedom of action on the part of the people, so far as votes were concerned. This telegram was sent by the late Postmaster-General from Alexandria, to the postmaster of Carillon, and it ran as follows:—

"You are reported to me as taking a very active part against the Government candidates for Argenteuil County. I will only add I think you are making a mistake. Government officials should not oppose Government candidates."

(Signed) D. A. MACDONALD.

MR. MITCHELL: This is the party of purity.

MR. BOWELL said that the hon. gentleman would do well, and he thought that he and his party would do well, to try and carry out in Government—and not become demagogues as designated by the hon. the Premier himself, for not carrying out in power—all they advocated when out of power. Ever since this Government was in power there had not been an opportunity allowed to pass, whether direct or indirect, that the Ministers had not themselves assisted in interfering with local elections. He might occupy the House for a full hour reading extracts from letters, telegrams and speeches, to show that hon. gentlemen opposite had, since they got into office, violated the very principle which they now laid down. No sooner were the elections announced than translators and postmasters were sent broadcast over the country to aid and assist them. He had, of course, no right to advert to a past debate, but he would say it had been laid down as a principle of this House that where a postmaster's salary, paid by commission, was equal to a fixed salary, he should not be permitted to interfere with the elections. But the Postmaster-General found it convenient to alter matters, under the excuse that the postmaster for Hull had a right to go into the country and electioneer, because, as he was paid by commission and not by salary, he had a right to electioneer. Yet this postmaster's income was as large as many of those in the larger towns of the Dominion. The reference made by the hon. member for South Bruce to the debate of 1874, regarding the dismissal of Dr. Strange, was not pertinent to this discussion. The defence set up on that occasion was that Dr. Strange was not an employé of the Government. But he held that Dr. Strange, as surgeon of a battery, held a military commission, and should, therefore, be entitled to all the privileges of a member of the community. He pointed out, also, that gentlemen holding commissions in the army held seats in the Imperial Parliament, though perhaps opposed to the Government of the day. But because Dr. Strange, who was assistant surgeon of the "A" Battery, exercised his rights as a freeman and electioneered on behalf of the hon. member for Kingston, he was dismissed. He did not mean to deny the right of the Government to cancel any officer's commission, but when they overrode a principle recognized in England, they stretched their authority too far. It was not right, however, that sessional or other clerks should be employed to do political work which other men would perhaps hesitate to do. He knew for a fact, two or three years ago, a gentleman who occupied a position in the gallery, where he was constantly reporting for the Maritime newspapers, was paid $4 a day, though he never wrote ten words for the Parliament. He thought those who were responsible for the internal economy of the House should take this into consideration in order that such practices might not be continued. He thought it would puzzle any one to understand what forty-one sessional clerks got to do during the three months the House was sitting. Last year there were only thirty-one. He would suggest as a little recreation for the Minister of War, who was an old volunteer officer, to muster these men every morning at a certain hour and give them some drill. It would be some exercise for him, and it would do these clerks an immense amount of good.

MR. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he wished to remind the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries what was done by his Department during the election of 1872. A deputy was sent to the county of Prince Edward for the purpose of influencing the electors there, and that gentleman admitted that he was sent there by two Ministers of the Crown. He (Mr. Ross) challenged the right hon. member for Kingston and the late Postmaster-General to say that they did not give these instructions. It came to his knowledge that there was a "Smith from below" who went about canvassing, and he found that was the Deputy Minister.

MR. MITCHELL said this was the second or third time the same charge had been brought against the Department which he formerly managed. Now he challenged any one to say that up to the time he quitted the Department any officer of his had, with his knowledge, gone about canvassing. He never gave any authority to "Smith from below" to canvass. Mr. Whitcher was the gentleman in charge of the Department, and "Smith from below" had nothing to do with it. With regard to Civil servants enjoying the right to vote, he might say this, they were as much entitled to do so as any other men who paid taxes. He would therefore oppose any suggestion to disfranchise them. The hon. member for South Bruce had stated that the Government had experienced great difficulties in dealing with the civil servants, that, in a great many instances, they were hostile to the present Administration, and that the Government found people serving them whose confidence they did not possess, and whose sympathies they did not control. This was a very serious charge to bring against that body, but it was not the first time such slurs had been cast against it by hon. gentlemen opposite. When local or general elections were on the tapis, they threw out these insinuations to influence the Civil servants to let them know that, if they did not vote for the Administration, they would get their deserts in a way they might not expect. He (Mr. Mitchell) would exclude no man, whether a public officer or not, who contributed to the institutions of the country from the right to vote. He would exempt no man from taxation, and every man who contributed to the public treasury should have a right to exercise his franchise. He would further lay down the principle that while public officers should have a right to vote, their influence on the elections of the country should terminate there. He would not countenance their going to church doors to address meetings, and use the influence of their office for the purpose of controlling other people.

Mr. McCALLUM said it was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition to oppose any interference on the part of the Crown or the Government with the officials or electors, but when they got into power they forgot their professions and adopted a different policy. He remembered the midnight appointment at the American Hotel, in Toronto, by a Minister of the Crown of the Province of Ontario, then a colleague of the hon. member for South Bruce, and of the now Premier of the Dominion, when he was supplied with funds by the business partner of a certain individual, a relative of the same gentleman, to influence the electors of Proton. As far as the Civil Service was concerned, he (Mr. McCallum) did not want to deprive the officials of their right to vote according to their principles, one of the objects of the ballot being to destroy the undue influence of the Government. Another policy of this Government, when in Opposition, was, that the Local Governments should be independent of the Federal Government. How was that policy carried out? How did this egg which had been laid in Ottawa, and was being hatched in Quebec, agree with that policy? Perhaps that egg would not hatch as had been expected. They knew that the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, when Postmaster General of this Dominion, sent a telegram to Mr. Mowat, Premier of Ontario, saying: "The river counties will go for you. We are doing all we can for you at Ottawa." They had the avowal of the Postmaster General, saying it was right that the servants of this House should go out through the country to use their influence on the electors, and he admired the Postmaster General for his candour, but the hon. Premier did not agree with him on this point. These hon. gentlemen professed certain principles in opposition, but when they got into power they scattered them to the four winds of heaven. This he could prove by many other instances, but he would not further occupy the time of the House.

Mr. CURRIER said he had the felicity of running two or three elections since this Government came into power. During the last general elections he found several members of the Civil Service taking an active part against him. On the other hand, during the time of the late Government, he had never been actively supported by any of the Civil Service employes, never had any of them canvassing for him nor on any of his committees. He had in 1857, applied to the Government to see what they could do for him, and had received an answer that the Government could not interfere; that it would never do for the head of a Department to interfere in this matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for South Bruce had charged him with having disbelieved Mr. Speaker's statement of last night with reference to the leave of absence granted to sessional employés. He was not liable to that charge. The names mentioned were Bienvenue, Pitau and Voyer. The Speaker explained that Mr. Bienvenu obtained leave to go away on private business, and to visit his brother; Mr. Pitau, on account of illness in his family, and that Mr. Voyer had resigned. The hon. member for Charlevoix did not limit his statement to those three, but gave the names of four others, and stated also that Pitau had deceived the Speaker, because instead of attending to his sick relations, he had made speeches at Drummond and Arthabaska. When seven employés had gone down to the Province of Quebec, when elections were going on, it was difficult to suppose that the Speakers did not suspect their motives.

MR. BLAKE said he had given the right hon. gentleman a character for fair play, which now he was compelled to retract.

MR. MILLS said the argument used invariably by the hon. the First Minister was that, upon previous occasions, the former Government had adopted, a similar course. But this Administration should be responsible for its own acts and take precedents from no other Administration, unless the precedents were right. It had transpired that several clerks of the House, at a time when elections were going on in the Province of Quebec, had obtained leave of absence, and had gone to that Province for a different purpose from that for which they had obtained leave of absence. No employé of this House had a right, except for very grave reasons, to leave while his services were required. If any had obtained leave under misrepresentation, they should be dismissed the service.

After Recess.

MR. MACMILLAN said he felt that every person in this country, who complied with the law, should have the right to vote. He objected, however, to Civil Servants having greater rights than other individuals in that matter. Within the last few months an appeal had been made by the Civil Servants against the imposition of an income tax upon them, and so far they appeared to have succeeded. If so, he thought they were clearly out of the pale of the franchise, and were not entitled to exercise it in their own right. If, however, anyone of them saw fit, within the required time, to pay a sufficient amount of income tax, to entitle him to exercise his franchise, he thought he had a perfect right to do it. The Postmaster General said he was prepared to disfranchise the Civil Servants absolutely. If he (Mr. Macmillan) felt that so strongly and had such support, he would bring in a measure to that effect. It was not desirable that the officers of the Civil Service should be placed in a position in which they could be controlled by the Government. But he desired to extend the franchise as far as possible to all who had interests at stake in the country. He did not for a moment suppose that any member of the Government was cognisant of the fact of the gentlemen to whom reference had been made, having left their duties in this House, and gone to the Province of Quebec to exercise their influence on the voters, though they all remembered when a whole body of men from the Central Prison were driven down to the polls to vote against the member for West Toronto. No doubt the Premier would say he knew nothing of that. Possibly he did not; but when he did not deny it, the inference might be drawn he had something to do with it.

MR. MACKENZIE: What have I to do with the Central Prison? I have no more to do with it than the hon. member for East Middlesex.

MR. MACMILLAN said it was not desirable that the Dominion and Local Governments should interfere with one another. He did not think the present Ministry should endeavour to justify a wrong on the ground that their predecessors had done wrong.

MR. McCARTHY said it appeared that out of 41 officers or servants of this House, 7, or 6 at all events, had, within the last week or so, obtained leave of absence, and one had resigned. About the last, nothing could be said, as he was no longer receiving the pay of the public, but the other 6, he understood, were still drawing pay from this House. Though they were the servants of this House, they were now actively engaged in a political contest. He understood that the First Minister and two of his colleagues were associated with the Speaker in the Commission on the Internal Economy of the House, and the House had a right to hold the Government responsible for the leave of absence which had been given at this time. He hoped these officers would be punished by dismissal. In regard to the question of Civil servants generally, he was not prepared to say what his view on that would be. It was an exceedingly difficult problem. It was difficult to say that all the members of the Civil servants ought to be disfranchised, and yet if they were permitted to vote, it was difficult to draw the line, and to say where there influence was to stop. He thought the next Parliament should place the Dominion franchise on an equal basis. He regretted that the hon. member for South Bruce, while condemning this proposition, had not done so in more direct terms. When the hon. gentleman was on the Treasury Benches, he agreed with, endorsed and adopted the conduct of his colleagues, but, when out of office, he constantly stood on higher principles, and proclaimed himself superior in his political principles to his former colleagues, and the party with which he still acted. This matter was so grave in the opinion of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that when in Opposition frequent motions were made in the House about it, and when in power they dismissed Dr. Strange, of Kingston, who had a perfect right to do what he did, there was no law forbidding him to exercise his franchise, and promote his political opinions; but because this gentleman endorsed and supported the candidate of his choice, he was dismissed in a summary manner, and this dismissal was adopted and endorsed, he understood, on the floor of this House. This was the way in which hon. gentlemen opposite said they would punish any interference in this relation. But now what were they to do? The great majority of the Civil Servants were in accord with the Opposition, as regard their political opinions, and yet did they find these officials interfering on the part of the Opposition in this election? He supposed that nine-tenths of the Civil Servants were Conservatives, but they did not interfere in this election, though the remaining tenth was allowed and permitted to do so openly, and to transgress, in the most flagrant manner, the doctrine which had been laid down by hon. gentleman opposite; and no Minister had yet stated that such conduct deserved punishment. He regretted very much that the lateness of the Session prevented them from expressing by resolution that it was improper for Government officials to interfere in elections, and that interference, on either side, should be punished by dismissal. He recognised, distinctly, the doctrine laid down regarding country postmasters, who frequently held office as much for the convenience of the neighbourhood as for their own emolument, and they ought not to be disfranchised, though city and town postmasters were, as a matter of fact, disfranchised. The hon. the Postmaster-General seemed not to be aware of the fact that the Postmaster of Hull had no right under the law to vote; and yet this man was exercising, in a most open and flagrant manner, his influence in this political contest in favour of the Liberal Party. The hon. the Postmaster-General stated that, if this were the case, he would certainly meet with a summary dismissal. He hoped the hon gentleman would be as good as his word. Country postmasters should, however, be permitted to vote and to exercise their political influence. Regarding other officials, it was a scandal, to say the least of it, that men in the payment of the country, who lived on the public money, and who were as much the servants of one as of the other party, should be permitted to interfere in elections on either side. If one doctrine, perhaps, more dangerous than another had been announced that day in the House, it was by the hon. the Postmaster-General when he said that, because this was a local election they had no right to interfere. What did this mean? That the Civil servants of the Dominion had a perfect right, in the acquiescence of the Government of the day, to interfere in Local elections in favour of the friends of the Government. They knew perfectly that any attempt on the part of Conservative Civil servants to support the Opposition in the Province of Quebec would be very quickly stamped out; but, as long as they supported the present Government in Quebec, the House was told in effect that these men had a right and were permitted to vote. He considered this an exceedingly dangerous doctrine, and one which ought not to find countenance on the floor of the House; and he was sorry to hear it announced by so influential a member of the Cabinet as the Postmaster-General. It was well, on the eve of the Dominion elections, that they should perfectly well understand what the rights of civil servants were. In the constituency for which he was nominated, and which he intended to contest, the most active partisans now supporting the Government candidate were all officials, some of this and some of the Local Government. The Collector of Customs at Collingwood was the most active and zealous official in the country, and a political hack; the License Commissioners for the East and West Riding were also actively engaged in promoting the interests of his opponent, and so with the Inspector of Weights and Measures. These men were living on the public money, and yet they were exercising their influence and lending their time to the support of the Government candidate. He mentioned these persons, because he thought it well that the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite should be attracted to the matter. He understood the hon. the First Minister to say that all civil servants ought not to interfere in the elections, but that some could do so, and exercise their influence on them. He regretted very much that they did not have this question defined as it had been defined by the hon. member for South Bruce, so limited, there could be no possible objection to it; but the hon. the First Minister's statement left a very wide door open to misconstruction on the part of officials, and to the danger of having the principles which hon. gentlemen opposite had so long and loudly professed transgressed by their servants. He regretted exceedingly their being unable to affirm anything on this subject, not merely with reference to the coming, but to all elections, as to the position which civil servants should occupy with regard to political parties.

MR. COOK said he was very much pleased to hear the hon. member for Cardwell declare his intention or wish that hereafter the servants of the Government should not interfere in election contests. A very few years ago, in 1872, the Government of the day, led by the right hon. member for Kingston, had selected, as the Returning Officer in his riding, a Collector of Customs, Mr. Rutledge, who was then actively engaged, though Collector of Customs, in a personal and public canvass for his hon. friend, the member for Cardwell. His opponent at the time, immediately after receiving that appointment; and if this collector had been discreet and honest, and if he had respect for his oath and character, he would have at once abstained from meddling any more in politics. After this, this man went to political meetings and assisted his opponent in organising the constituency, using every influence in his power to aid his opponent; and when he (Mr. Cook) was elected by a majority of 56, he made a public declaration in a bar-room in Barrie, that he would not return him (Mr. Cook), carrying out, probably, the same instructions that were given to other returning officers of that time in the Muskoka District and in other districts.

MR. MCCARTHY: I think that I ought to give a denial to that statement. I can assert positively, that it is not correct.

MR. COOK said that immediately after this campaign was over, at the last General Election, the hon. gentleman who now said that this Government should not mix Local with Dominion politics, enlisted in the service of the Conservative party in North Simcoe, some servants of the Government, who went on the platform alongside of himself, and canvassed for the Local Conservative candidate; and not only canvassed, but travelled over the constituency, working against Mr. Sutherland, the candidate in the Ontario Government interest, and advised the people on public platforms to vote for the Opposition candidate, Mr. Kean. All the time that the hon. gentleman was doing this, and was engaged in this nefarious transaction, he (Mr. McCarthy) must, at the same time, have known that Mr. Rutledge was canvassing and openly declaring himself in favour of the Conservative party. What virtuous indignation played over the countenance of the hon. gentleman when he said it was a shame and disgrace, and dishonour for Government officials, and servants of the House, to ask for leave to go home to see their sick friends. He was somewhat amused, he was sure, for he did not think for a moment that the hon. gentleman would have the assurance to make a declaration of the kind in this House, aware that he (Mr. Cook) was in the House at the time, and knew what the hon. gentleman had done in times past. He would like to know if the hon. gentleman thought for a moment, that he would let a matter of this kind go unchallenged? He might go further in reference to the Government officials taking part in elections in that county. The hon. gentleman had referred to a Collector of Customs; but he (Mr. Cook), had never reported the conduct of Mr. Rutledge to the Minister of Customs, because he knew that if the instructions given to these officials were carried out, the only result would have been that this man must have been dismissed; and though Mr. Rutledge had been so injudicious, he did not wish to punish him because he was his political opponent. When the preliminary meeting was held in Barrie, with reference to the Conservative picnic that took place last summer in the county of

MR. MCCARTHY.

Simcoe, this very Collector of Customs, Mr. Rutledge, was the first man at the helm, and with the hon. member for Cardwell, did every thing in his power to aid in getting up a crowd to attend, by giving away complimentary tickets. He knew that the name of the hon. member for Cardwell was written on the back of these tickets, with the words "complimentary free pass to Barrie," and this was probably the way in which large numbers of people were attracted to these different picnics. The hon. gentleman talked about Government officials in the county of Simcoe. Let him look at the persons who were nominated and appointed by the County Judges, and at the bailiff's who shook writs in the faces of electors, and declared that these persons would be punished if they did not vote so and so, and yet this hon. gentleman complained of the influence brought to bear on electors by Government officials. He quite understood that officials of the county were not Government officials, but at the same time they were most assiduous in their support of the hon. gentleman when a candidate for Parliamentary honors. The hon. gentleman had chosen to attack the Collector of Customs for Collingwood, but he would challenge the hon. gentleman or any of his political friends to put their finger on, or make the assertion against Mr. Watson, as having ever attended a political meeting, save when he was called upon so to act as the Mayor of the town. This was not in 1873, but when a local contest was going on, when he was a candidate, and at that time Mr. Watson's sympathies were not with him. He had had nothing to say to the Inspector of Weights and Measures with regard to political matters in the county over which he had jurisdiction; and he did not know a single instance where Mr. Laird has ever interfered with political matters in the county. The same thing was true with respect to the license Commissioners. Mr. Morrow had been a politician in the past; and this gentleman had informed him a few days ago, that when the election campaign came on, he would resign his position as License Commissioner, in order that he might advocate the interests of his candidate, and the party in which he was allied. He knew that this was that gentleman's intention, and it came with very ill grace from the hon. gentleman to make such an assertion against this gentleman who, he believed, was honorable and just.

MR. COCKBURN said he had merely to say that the post office at Hull did not amount to much more than a village office. The salary of the postmaster was only a few hundred dollars, perhaps less than $500 or $600; and the whole business of the office was about $1,400. He thought that this officer should be considered as a country postmaster and no fault whatever should be found with him.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

MR. SPEAKER said that before the House proceeded with its business, hon. members would perhaps be kind enough to permit him to occupy their attention for a moment. Owing to what had been said that afternoon, he ought to make a brief statement. He had thought that last evening on this subject he had made himself sufficiently understood, but he must have been mistaken. Three of the sessional clerks had absented themselves, Messrs. Pitan, Bieuvvenu and Doyon. He did not regard them in their absence as any longer employés of the House. Some weeks ago Mr. Bienvenu had asked permission to go away, and on finding that his brother was competent, the latter was appointed in his stead. This took place on the 21st of March last. Mr. Doyon had absolutely withdrawn from the employment of the House of his own motion, he had asked to be and was paid up; he returned to Ottawa some time afterwards and asked to be put on again, and again went away; but he was not now drawing any public money nor was any pay accruing to him as an employé of the House. Mr. Pitan was the only one of the sessional clerks who during the Session had asked for leave of absence. Members had chosen, however, to assume that seven employés of the House were absent by permission from their posts to take part in the Quebec election. Mr. Pitan had got leave of absence for a few days on the ground that some members of his family were ill. He knew nothing whatever of Dr. Godin. He did not know some of the other names mentioned; indeed he had forgotten that they were on the list of employés of the House at all, and these persons certainly had never either directly or indirectly applied to him for leave of absence. They had no leave of absence, and, if absent, were so without permission; and were not entitled to any pay while absent. He had forgotten, the evening previous, to say that one of the messengers applied for leave of absence, and obtained it on the professed reason that he had some urgent private business to attend to for a few days. Mr. Jodoin had obtained leave of absence on the same ground once or twice before; and he had hesitated, for this reason to renew it; but he had no suspicion whatever that it was this official's intention to take any part in any political contest. It would have been almost impossible for seven employés to apply even for a few days leave of absence just on the eve of an election, without suspecting that they had some political purpose in view. He thought that this was the ground taken by the right hon. member for Kingston. He would again state that the only sessional clerk who had leave of absence was Mr. Pitan. He thought that if the facts had been known, a great deal of what had been said would have been found to have been quite unnecessary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I accept the statement of Mr. Speaker without any reserve. The statement is made distinctly, and I accept it without reserve. I would add that enquiry should be made into the conduct of these men who have thus gone away without leave of absence, and are still away from their work busy in the elections.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman forgives Mr. Speaker.

94. Public Buildings in Ottawa, $53,100.

MR. LANGEVIN asked the Minister of Public Works whether the sum of $135,500 voted last year for the extension of the Western block had been expended, also how much remained of the $35,000 voted for the grounds?

MR. MACKENZIE said the total amount expended up to the 31st December of the $35,000 was $24,408, while $79,410 of the $135,000 had also been expended.

MR. LANGEVIN said the fountain, which had been placed in the grounds, was not admired by the public. It was not in harmony with the grounds; in fact, it was looked upon as an eyesore.

MR. MACKENZIE said the fountain was set up in order to obtain a sort of idea what would suit best. It was erected as a mere experiment.

MR. LANGEVIN said it would have been better to have two fountains to be placed in the sidewalks. If it was not so late he thought this suggestion should be taken into consideration. He did not approve of the style adopted in the extension of the western block, because it was not in uniformity with the other buildings. The tower, particularly, in course of erection, detracted from the appearance of the tower in the block which ought to be the principal feature of the whole buildings. Many strangers visiting the city had pointed out this defect to him.

MR. MACKENZIE said that strangers had expressed a very different opinion to him. By the architectural changes introduced, the western block had become well lighted and airy, which was more than could be said of the offices in the eastern block. In a long block of building such as that a tower was certainly needed and he approved of the architect's ideas. The entire expenditure up to the end of the year, for the western block, was $280,928.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD agreed with the hon. member for Charlevoix in thinking the sooner the fountain disappeared the better for the symmetry of the grounds and the uniqueness of the building. He did not think the Western Block had been carried out in accordance with the original plan, and the tower which had been placed there destroyed the appearance of the central one.

95. Improvements of Navigable Rivers..$34,000

MR. LANGEVIN asked what was done with the $10,000 voted last year?

MR. MACKENZIE said only a small portion of that had been expended. A certain sum had been expended in maintaining a tug steamer in order to effect the improvement of the Neebish Rapids, a statement of which would be found at page 240 of the Public Accounts. In the current year, there was only expended, to the 31st December, $424 of last years' vote. The year before, namely, the last financial year, there was expended $9,601.82. The Quebec Harbour Commissioners had been given the charge of clearing the river of the anchors and chains which, at one time, threatened to destroy the harbour. The result of the labour for three years had that 162 anchors had been raised and about 5,000 fathoms of chain. The Commissioners had sold 47 anchors and 102,000lb. of chain at various prices, realizing $62,014, and there remained yet to be sold 91 anchors and something over 3,000 fathoms of chain.

MR. STEPHENSON said that the Government had conveyed military lands in Toronto to the city, and he wished to know whether the Government would be willing to act similarly to the town of Chatham with reierence to the piece of ground in about the centre of the town, which was now used for both military and agricultural purposes. Of course, the Agricultural Society would be getting grounds of its own soon, and he wished to know, if the town secured other grounds for military purposes the Government would be disposed to transfer the present military grounds to the town.

MR. MACKENZIE said the ground at Toronto was transferred for exhibition purposes, with the understanding that it must be returned if required. It was not given for a park, and the Government would not have given it for that purpose. The only other instance of property being transferred was at Montreal and Quebec, but at a valuation. In the town of Chatham the piece of ground alluded to was of no service to the Government as a military ground. In other places where the Government held ground similarly situated, they had sold it by auction. If the town of Chatham made a representation to the Government in reference to the matter, it would be considered, but the Government could not give the land away.

MR. STEPHENSON submitted that if the town of Chatham procured another piece of land, that would suit the Government as well as this piece of land; it would be to the advantage of the town and would be no loss to the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said if a proposal was made to the Government, the matter would be considered on its merits.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if any steps were to be taken to protect the entrances to the St. Lawrence and Esquimault in case of trouble.

MR. JONES said steps were being taken for the protection of Esquimault by the erection of earth-works, etc., at MacAulay's Point. Several guns were to be placed there, but he had not quite decided with reference to the location of the gun presented by Sir W. Pallister.

In answer to Mr. LANGEVIN,

MR. MACKENZIE said they were proceeding with the foundations of the Custom-house, at St. John. This building would be about the same size as the old building, and be on the same site. The foundations were up to the level of the street. The three buildings would cost certainly over half a million, but no close estimate in this regard had been made.

ing at Dorchester was in a more forward state, they proposed to put Mr. Boyes also in charge of this place. They would adopt this policy instead of having an architect at each place. One officer would be quite able to attend to these buildings with ordinary assistants under him. A workroom was to be provided at the Manitoba Penitentiary.

103. Rents, repairs, &c..... $234,800

Mr. LANGEVIN said he observed there was an increase in the amount charged for gas.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this was caused by the unusually late sittings of the House.

Mr. LANGEVIN: I should think there was plenty of gas here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Some of it is of very bad quality.

Mr. LANGEVIN hoped some means might be devised whereby the Chamber might be properly ventilated. Two years ago a number of the members became sick and some of them died, and he considered this was caused by the foul air which generated in the Chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think that was the case. The vote given last year was found to be insufficient, and a Supplementary Estimate had to be taken. The increased cost was in a measure accounted for by the addition of the library to the area requiring to be lighted. At the same time a reduction had been made in the price of gas. Formerly they paid $4 per 1,000 feet, but feeling that the price was excessive, he called upon the gas companies, and arranged that the price should be reduced to $3.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that in the Public Accounts an item of $2,115, as payment to the Electric Light Company. Was not that, he asked, a new charge?

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was for lighting the building instantaneously. By the adoption of this system a great deal of gas had been saved and the atmosphere of the Chamber was rendered more pure.

Vote agreed to.

105. Harbours and Breakwaters..... 34,500

Mr. McCALLUM asked if the $7,500 asked for Lake Erie was a re-vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this sum had not been expended. The vote was contingent on the local authorities paying $10,000. A by-law had been passed to this effect, but the Government had not yet received the money.

Mr. McCALLUM did not consider it right that so much money should be spent upon this particular part of Lake Erie shore. There was no real harbour there; it was merely a plan for the convenience of a few residents in the locality. He did not think this work would be in the interests of the people at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE said if the municipality of the town not only petitioned for it, but voted $10,000, the people evidently wished it.

Mr. McARTHUR said it was about time the work, now undertaken by the Government in connection with Collingwood harbour, should be completed. He would draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the arrangement made with the town of Collingwood, that, if it would contribute $35,000, the Government would contribute another $35,000 towards the construction of a breakwater and towards dredging the harbour. In pursuance of that agreement the work was commenced, and the breakwater was built during the year 1874, but the whole amount estimated, $35,000, was not expended. In the general election of 1874, the hon. member for North Simcoe represent to the people of Collingwood that, instead of getting the $7,000 or $8,000, the balance due on the $35,000 revoted, they were entitled to $100,000 for the proper construction of their harbour, and that he had the promise of the First Minister that that would be granted. He was unseated, and in September again presented himself to his constituents, who asked him how it was the $100,000 had not been voted, and that no sum had been placed in the Estimates for the construction of this work. The hon. member was then ready with the reply. He said the breakwater was not completed, and the Government did not think it right and proper to commence dredging the harbour until the breakwater was completed. In the summer of 1875, the hon. member for North Simcoe appeared to be in earnest, and communicated with the Mayor of the town, asking how much it would cost to do this work. The Mayor replied it would cost $108,974. During that year nothing was done, no vote was obtained, nor during the succeeding years; and now on the eve of a general election, the tenth of that amount, $10,000, was placed in the Estimates only to be expended during the time that the hon. gentleman was undergoing the ordeal of seeking re-election. He wanted to know whether an estimate and plans had been obtained in 1874.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not remember.

MR. MCCARTHY said he understood it had been announced by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that those plans had been prepared, and that tenders would have been issued in 1874, but for the fact that the breakwater was not finished. The Receiver-General now had the debentures of Collingwood to which the Government were entitled in pursuance of the bargain made as to the construction of this harbour work. Why, when the plans were made in 1874, this work was not yet done, was a question to which the people had the right to obtain a reply.

MR. BLAKE said it was hardly the place, on the floor of this House, to begin the canvassing of North Simcoe.

MR. COOK said he denied most emphatically that he had ever made a statement that he had obtained the grant of a sum of money for the Collingwood harbour. He had stated to the electors that he would use his influence to obtain a sufficient amount of money to dredge the harbour so that vessels of heavy draught could get in. It would have been folly for him to attempt to name a sum for a certain work, of which he had no knowledge. He had written a letter, immediately after the election, to the Mayor of Collingwood, who was a very strong partizan of the Conservative party, asking him the amount necessary for that purpose, and received a reply that $108,000 would be required. He (Mr. Cook) at once saw the object of the letter; because it was impossible for him, or anybody else representing the constituency, to obtain the sum of $108,000 for such a work at a time of much depression. He never stated he had a promise from the Premier. The hon. member for Cardwell was incorrect in stating the amount of Collingwood debentures in the hands of the Government at present. The amount was only $2,000. The Government had paid some $600 more than they should, as their share of the cost of the breakwater, and, at the same time, if the corporation of Collingwood required their debentures, they could instruct the Government to sell an amount sufficient to cover their share, and return the balance. He had always strongly urged the importance of that harbour from its large and increasing trade.

MR. MCCARTHY said the hon. member for South Bruce knowing, as he did, the large expenditure of the hon. member for North Simcoe in the elections of 1872 and 1874, still hoped to silence him (Mr. McCarthy) by his sarcasm and his sneers, but he would find himself mistaken. The hon. member for North Simcoe had stated that if he said $100,000 was the amount to be expended, he had made a statement which was all moonshine.

MR. COOK: I said that if I had made such a statement, the people of Collingwood would have said I knew nothing of what I was saying; but I never said anything of that kind.

MR. MCCARTHY asked if he understood the hon. gentleman to say that he did not promise that $100,000 should be spent on that harbour. He had a letter which he would read:

"Before the breakwater was finished the present Government came in, and when Mr. Cook came forward in 1874, he distinctly promised to get us $100,000 for our harbour. He did not say that he would try, but that he would get it positively."

The statement proceeded to say that the writer got petitions signed by a number of shippers and others, showing the necessity for the work, and continued as follows:—

"When he came forward in 1874, he made fresh promises, this time saying that he would try to get it, and asked for something to show what was wanted. I then sent him a plan of the harbour, with estimates of the amount of the dredging, carefully prepared from a detailed survey of the depths made in the harbour."

This was the letter which the hon. gentlemen acknowledged that he wrote to the Mayor of the town and got back, and that he now told them he had put away in his desk. He (Mr. McCarthy) had two complaints to make, and he understood from the silence of the First Minister and from the statement of the hon. member for North Simcoe, that if he (Mr. Cook) was understood to say he would get $100,000, or that $100,000 was promised to him for that harbour, it was not correct. The hon. gentleman now said it was not promised to him; that he had no promise from the Government of the expenditure of that or any other sum. He (Mr. McCarthy) wanted to know why the improvement was not made in 1875, when the necessity for it was as great as it was now.

MR. COOK: No; the water is two feet lower than it was last year.

MR. MCCARTHY said he wanted to know why the matter was put off from year to year until the general election was coming round.

In answer to Mr. BOWELL,

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be seen when they came to the item of dredging that a pretty large sum was asked for the Bay of Quinté.

In answer to Mr. WOOD,

MR. MACKENZIE said he had not been aware of the existence of a bar at the mouth of the Burlington Bay Canal until a few weeks ago, and he had given instructions to Mr. Kingsford to have it examined. If it was of no great extent they would be able to remove it, he expected, out of the general vote.

In answer to Mr. CASEY,

MR. MACKENZIE said the examination had been made at Eagle Harbour. It was impossible, at present, for the Government to take a vote for that particular place. They would be in a better position to consider it after the local authorities had shown a disposition to do something in the matter.

MR. CASEY said that complaints were being made that the Great Western Railway did not properly dredge the Port Stanley Harbour as they were bound to do by the term of their lease. He asked the Premier to look into the matter.

MR. FARROW urged that an additional small amount should be voted for the Port Albert Harbour on Lake Huron.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had not been aware of any immediate necessity for an appropriation there. The tolls on the Burlington Canal yielded now about $4,000 a year, and, as the expenses were light, it yielded more revenue in proportion than any work of the kind. If only repairs were required they could be accomplished, but nothing more extensive at the present time.

MR. MCCALLUM said that the piers of this canal were in tolerable repair. In ten years its revenue had amounted to $31,502, and expenses deducted, the net yield was $24,652. He would like to have an explanation with regard to Toronto Harbour.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was a very great difference of opinion with regard to the eastern passage. Some held that this opening would yet be the means, to a greater extent than had yet been the case, of destroying the harbour; and others said there was really very little change in the harbour. The shifting sands in the gap merely shifted their position, and very little drifted into the harbour. Sometimes these sands were at one spot, and, after a heavy gale, they moved a considerable distance in the other direction, and they were hardly ever carried far into the real anchorage of the harbour. The opinion of the Engineers of the Department was that, so far, no serious injury had been done to the harbour. The only question was what would be the consequences if much more of the beach was carried on the west side. As a layman in these matters, he thought that perhaps the best thing to be done would be to protect what remained of the beach near the gap, and prevent any further washing away, rather than attempt excessively costly works, which were projected by some engineers, and which would cost nearly half a million, for the construction of enormous piers on both sides, with wings extended on each side to close up the gap, the entrance excepted. They did not at present think there was any necessity for doing more than he had indicated. In the meantime, they intended to confine themselves to the deepening of the western entrance, so that vessels drawing fourteen feet of water could enter without difficulty.

Mr. WOOD said that the piles on Burlington Canal had, in some places, gone apart; this work was in bad condition, and a new superstructure was required. The tolls here had been out of all reasonable proportion, but they were now reduced. A cent a ton was collected on the tonnage of vessels, and no toll on goods; but, as this was the only harbour of refuge at the west end of the lake, the tolls should be altogether removed.

Mr. McCALLUM said that there were not two dozen piles in the whole work. He agreed with the hon. the Minister of Public Works in respect to Toronto harbour. The washing away of the bar would be a serious matter, and the lake was encroaching steadily on the harbour. This should be preserved. There were, no doubt, persons now living who would see Toronto facing the open lake, unless some precautions were taken in this relation. The city of Toronto ought to do something towards it. He was satisfied that the city would never allow the eastern passage to be closed altogether. This passage, by admitting a current, improved the health of the city.

Mr. STEPHENSON said that he had moved for correspondence which had taken place, with respect to Morpeth harbour; but he found nothing new in the return. It was calculated by Mr. Kingsford that, in order to give ten feet in this harbour, would cost $39,000, and for 13 feet the cost was estimated at $55,000; and yet a vote of only $7,500 was proposed, leaving the larger balance to be provided by the local authorities. This was unjust. It was understood in the vicinity that the Government would contribute two thirds of the amount necessary; and, certainly, $7,500 would go but a very short way towards the construction of this work, the lowest estimate being $39,100.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

REPORTS CONSIDERED IN.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved the adoption of the 4th and 5th reports of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament. He said the question in dispute was whether the Committee had the right to recommend an increase of salary as they had by their report. The Printing Committee seemed to have a recognized standing different from any of the other Committees of either House, and, from its organization, was distinct from other committees. In 1875, the Committee recommended that the Chief Distributor should receive an addition to his salary of $200, and his Chief Messenger $150 more than he had previously received. By general understanding, the motion he made the other day was one which the Printing Committee had always recognized under the Statute as its own peculiar privilege, and he thought it undesirable that the Joint Committee of both Houses on Printing should be deprived of the privilege of superintending its own expenditure. If this point was conceded, it would be for the House to say whether the Committee's recommendations should be adopted.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought the hon. gentleman had made his point good. He was previously under the impression that the salaries of these officers appeared in the list of the officers of the House of Commons.

MR. SPEAKER: This is not so, I find.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not intend to object to it.

MR. LANGEVIN wished to know if the First Minister assented to the appointment of new officers.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not. The Committee must report to the two Houses before they could do that. He was of opinion the other day when the matter came up, that the Speaker, and not the Committee, appointed these officers. The Chairman of the Committee had now shown that the two Houses relegated this to the charge of the Committee, and that the salaries were charged in the general printing account. These salaries were, of course, subject to the revision of both Houses, and the staff were directly responsible to the Committee and their clerk. He had some recollection now of the reasons why that was done, and he was not disposed to object to it.

MR. HOLTON said this, as he understood it, was a money vote, and there was a form prescribed in which money votes must be initiated. He wished to know, therefore, whether this Committee of both Houses had the right vested in them by the Statutes of initiating a money vote. If not, then this motion would be manifestly out of order.

MR. SPEAKER said the Statute provided that a certain amount should be placed at the disposal of the Committee for the printing of Parliament to distribute.

MR. ROSS said the whole expenditure for printing was initiated in the Committee of Supply, and the vote was then transferred to the Printing Committee.

Motion agreed to.

SYSTEM OF LETTING CONTRACTS.

REMARKS.

Order for House to again resolve itself into Committee of Supply, read.

MR. LANGEVIN said before the House went into Committee of Supply he would like to call the attention of the House to a certain statement which had been made regarding the contract system of the past and present Governments. That question had occupied the attention of the country during the past year, especially when hon. gentlemen opposite were delivering their picnic speeches, and he thought their statements should be considered by the House. The hon. the First Minister condemned the mode adopted by the late Government of calling for and opening tenders and granting contracts. He would quote some extracts from the hon. gentleman's speeches. The first he intended to quote would be found on page 9 of the "Premier speeches." It was headed:—

"THE CONTRACT SYSTEM PROPOSED UNDER TORY AND LIBERAL RULE.—We have endeavoured to the utmost of our power to place the contract system on a sounder and better footing than ever it was before; and when I mention the simple fact that out of nineteen millions tendered for, some sixteen millions worth of contracts were awarded by us to the lowest tenderer, while the late Government awarded less than one-third to the lowest, you will be able to judge of the practical results of our efforts to reform the system of awarding contracts. I do not say that the late Government gave out contracts corruptly, because I do not know they did so; I merely give these facts; which, if they had just been reversed and tested by their suspicious minds, would have formed the ground-work for innumerable charges or insinuations of corruption."

Mr. Ross.

Then at page 30, we find this:—

“OLD AND NEW METHOD OF RECEIVING TENDERS.—What was the custom when we went into office? Tenders were advertised for. Five or six were banded together; Smith would make his tender $10,000 above Jones, and Robinson would make his $20,000 higher than Smith, and Brown his $30,000 higher than Robinson, and so on. When the tenders came to be known, the two or three who were lowest would retire in succession, and they would divide among them the one which was accepted.”

“This condition is exacted before the contractor is allowed to proceed with his work. The result of these reforms is that we have now the most complete contract system in the world, and it is one which, as you can see, operates to the advantage of the public, instead of being a mere means of fattening contractors of a particular class, or a political instrument in the hands of the Administration.”

The hon. gentleman had accused the late Government of having advertised for tenders without requiring proper security. He had accused the late Government, and especially him (Mr. Langevin), because he was Minister of Public Works during the last three years, of pursuing the system of having tenders opened by the Ministers. He said that should not have been done, it was wrong—

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not say it was wrong.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman did not say it was wrong, but that was the inference to be drawn from his words.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; I simply considered it was better the Minister should not open the tenders. I did not say there was anything wrong in it.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman considered his system better than that of the late Government. He (Mr. Langevin) claimed that his system was a good one. The tenders were called for and received by the Department, and were opened by the Minister in certain cases when he had time to look over them, assisted by the Deputy Minister of the Department; or, when the Minister was away, or had not time, that work was done by the Deputy Minister or by the Secretary of the Department. The rule adopted was this: Each tender was opened, one after another; then the name of the contractor was endorsed on the envelope, with the signatures of the Minister and his Deputy, or of the two officers. The same endorsement was made on the back of the tender. Then the tenders were numbered, the same number being placed on the tender and envelope, with the prices at the end, if for a bulk sum; if not, of course no price was endorsed, but only the signatures of the Minister and his Deputy, or the Deputy and the Secretary. So that there could be no collusion and no change, because all these tenders were signed by both parties, which gave every guarantee to the public, to the contractor, and to the Government, that matters were done in an honest and straightforward way. The system adopted by the late Government in calling for tenders was that two good sureties were required, whose names were to be given when the tender was sent in. The hon. gentleman had stated that, under that system, the result was that the Government had to pass over a number of tenders. The hon. gentleman had been good enough to say that he did not accuse the late Government of having given out contracts corruptly, because he did not know that they had done so. No doubt the hon. gentleman did not know it, because it had never been done. When a tender was passed over the reason was always given, and in every case in which he (Mr. Langevin) had to consider a tender, he consulted the Chief Engineer, or, if absent, another engineer, to judge whether the matter was proper or not, whether the price was a sufficient one for the work; or, in other words, he enquired about the position of the tenderer, whether he was really a contractor and able to do the work, or whether he was a bogus contractor who wished to obtain the contract only to see it, and made any other inquiries necessary. The invariable practice of the Department was to give it to the lowest tenderer, after obtaining an Order-in-Council authorizing the lowest tender to be accepted. By this means the work was done, and done cheaply. Sometimes, however, despite all precautions, the contract would be given to a contractor who would fail to complete his agreement, who had made his calculation without proper reflection or upon wrong data, as, for example, in the case of the post-office at Ottawa. The contractor for that building began his work, and continued it until it had reached a certain height, a little above the foundation, when he found he was running into debt to such an extent that he could not account for it, nor continue the work. He found he had omitted an item in his calculations, and, although he proved clearly to the Department that he had made this mistake, the Department refused to add this item to his contract, and the work was finished afterwards under the hon. the Minister of Public Works. The same difficulty might occur under the present Administration as under the former one, namely, that a contractor would fail to go on with his work. That would occur under any Government, and could not be attributed to the system. But the hon. the First Minister said his system was the best. What was his system? The hon. gentleman said, in one of his speeches, that he required a deposit of say $1,000, or more, as a guarantee that the tenderer was a bonâ fide one, and that if he was not, and when offered the contract, refused it, he forfeited that amount. He said another condition under his new system, was that he exacted five per cent. of the amount of the contract as a deposit. By comparing the results of this system with the previous one, it may be better understood. In October or September, 1873, the previous Government called for tenders for a certain number of sections of the Welland Canal. These tenders were received, but not in sufficient time to be considered and examined by the late Government. It was left to their successors, the hon. gentlemen opposite, to decide who should have the contracts. It appeared from statements known to hon. gentlemen that when the hon. the Minister of Public Works came into office, he took advice from the Chief Engineer of the Department, and put aside all these tenders which had been received, and called for new ones. If the hon. the Minister of Public Works had given to the House the return in answer to the address which had been voted some time ago, and which had been on the notice paper for weeks and weeks, he (Mr. Langevin), might make comparisons which would, perhaps, better illustrate his point, but he must now be content with what he had. A portion of these documents had been laid before a committee of this House and were known especially to the hon. the Minister of Public Works as well as to a large number of hon. members. According to those documents, the three sections 5, 7 and 14, the only sections for which returns had been furnished under this second letting, gave the following results, comparing the lowest tender for each section under the new system with that under the system of the late Government:—

Lowest tender	Under late Gov't.	Under present Gov't.	Increase.
Section 5,	$266,000	$312,000	$46,000
" 7,	251,000	283,000	32,000
" 14,	271,000	292,000	21,000
	$790,000	$888,000	$99,000

Thus the increased cost under this improved system of the hon. gentlemen opposite, amounted to $99,000 over the system used by the late Government, which the hon. the First Minister said was not as good a system as his. By the return also it appeared the tenders accepted by the Public Works Department were: for No. 5, $352,000; for No. 7, $329,000; for No. 14, $321,000. The differences between the lowest tenders, under the improved system of the hon. gentleman and the tenders accepted, were as follows:—

	Lowest tender.	Accepted tender.	Difference.
Section 5,	$312,000	$352,000	$ 40,000
" 7,	283,000	327,000	144,000
" 14,	292,000	321,000	29,000

The three tenders accepted amounted to $1,052,000, and the lowest tenders under the late Administration amounted to $790,000, which gave a difference of $211,000 in favour of the latter, or 20 per cent.; and the difference between the lowest tenders under hon. gentlemen opposite and the tenders accepted by them, was $112,757, or over 11 per cent. He had no doubt the hon. gentleman did his best, and considered he was acting in the interests of the country; but the result showed that though he might call his system an important system, when it came to be examined, it would be found that instead of reducing, it increased the cost of these works. He (Mr. Langevin) would now refer to the statement made at the Public Accounts Committee by the Clerk, on the tenders and papers connected with sections 5, 7, and 14. Under the late Government the last tenders were for the six sections 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16. Under these tenders, and under these new tenders for 5, 7 and 14, what difference was found in the cost of the work? Under the former contracts the earth and clay excavation cost, on an average 29·16c., and under the latter made by the hon. gentleman opposite, the average cost was 33½c. In the former, the earth excavation in lock and weir pits cost 34¾c.; in the latter, 40·66c. In pine timber for the foundation of lock, the former cost 42·33c.; the latter, 46·66c. The oak timber 66c. under the former; under the latter, 77·33c. These were taken from the schedule of prices laid before the Committee. The spikes, under the system of the late Government, averaged 8c., under the present improved system, 8·33c. Rock iron, under the former, averaged 12·40c.; under the latter, 13·66c. Masonry, under the former, 10·77c.; under the latter, 11·68c. The coarse masonry under the former, averaged 7·50c.; under the latter, 8·66c. Coarse masonry laid dry, averaged, under the former, 5·30c.; under the latter, 6c. Rubble masonry, under the former, 7·21c.; under the latter, 7·50c. Rubble masonry laid dry averaged 3·90c. under the former; under the latter, 5c. Ivory cement, under the former, 3·90c.; under the latter, 4·30c. This new system, therefore, though it might be better, in some respects, than the old one—and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, after four or five years experience, had said it was—yet, so far as the money was concerned, it was inferior to the old system, as the prices under it had increased instead of having decreased. It stood to reason that the prices should have increased. A contractor might have means enough to do the work, but not means enough to make a deposit as security. If that deposit be insisted on, he must borrow the money and pay interest on it; therefore, so much of his credit was gone. The credit he would require to carry on his work was gone so far as that amount was concerned, and he was, therefore, obliged to name a higher price than if the deposit were not insisted on. He (Mr. Langevin) said that the deposit itself was a bad thing, and, instead of reducing the cost of the works, it increased it. He (Mr. Langevin) did not intend insisting at all on the question of the absolute necessity of Orders-in-Council when the lowest tenders were passed over. The question had been discussed in Committee, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, himself, admitted that an Order-in-Council should be had, and that in the case referred to it was an omission, an oversight, a neglect on the part of the officer that an Order-in-Council had not been obtained, and that the Minister thought there had been one. He (Mr. Langevin) would, therefore, not insist on that, but would only say it was a safe and proper rule, a safeguard to everyone. It was a safeguard to the Minister and his officer, and an answer to the contractor. It was an answer to the contractor, because the contractor could not say: It was Mr. So and So in the Department who did it, or the Minister had something against me and refuses me the contract. No; the Order in Council showed an action of the whole Council, and therefore was an answer. It showed the whole thing had been laid before the Minister in Council, before His Excellency the Governor General, and the Order-in-Council had been passed approving of the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works. He was pleased to see that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had admitted the necessity of these Orders-in-Council. He (Mr. Langevin) had shown the theory of the Minister of Public Works with regard to these contracts, the mode of calling for tenders, the conditions of those tenders, the opening and the allotting of them. Now, tenders for railway ties had been called for in the North-West, —for 165,000 ties. These tenders had been called for by the Minister of Public Works through his officer at Winnipeg, Mr. Nixon. Mr. Nixon was asked by the Committee what were the conditions of those tenders, whether the tenderers were bound to deposit a sum of money of $1,000 or $4,000, and whether they had been called on to pay five per cent, on the amount of the contract on signing it. The answer was, "No." Nevertheless, the hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated in his speeches that those were the conditions imposed on tenderers. The 165,000 ties were advertized for, and the only guarantee required was the security of two persons that the work would be executed. But that, strange to say, was reverting to the system of the previous Government, which the Minister of Public Works had so strongly condemned in his picnic speeches. At page 30:

"Tenders were advertized for. Five or six were banded together; Smith would make his tender $10,000 above Jones, and Robinson would make his $20,000 higher than Smith, and Brown his $30,000 higher than Robinson, and so on. When the tenders came to be known, the two or three who were lowest would retire in succession, and they would divide among them the one which was accepted."

This was a system which the hon. the Minister of Public Works said was a system which was to be condemned and never to be resorted to; and which the Reform Government had swept away, adopting a better system, and exacting deposits of $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 as guarantees that tenders were bonâ fide; five per cent. of the whole contract being deposited as surety when tenders were accepted. But this was not done. Let them see the result of this system of the hon. gentleman. The number of tenderers in this case was thirty-six. The first was that of J. Martin; the second that of Charles Nolin; third, Augustus Nolin; fourth, Mr. Quigley, fifth, W. S. Lewis; sixth, A. Bissonette & Co.; seventh, & McKinnon McDermid; eighth, Alexander McNabb; ninth, John Nesbitt; tenth, Jos. Pilan & Co.; eleventh, George Taylor, and twelfth Wm. Robinson. It appeared that the first tenderer withdrew, and would not go on with the contract, not wanting to give security. He had been asked for security, and, therefore, would not take the contract. Also that even in the advertisement, sureties were not required. No notice was given that security would be exacted. This man said: "I am ready to do the work, but you ask for sureties, and I won't do it. I can't furnish them." The two Nolins came next, and they also would not do the work. Mr. Quigley was fourth, and he would not do the work for some reason or other given by Mr. Nixon. Then came McDonald & McDermid, and Alexander McNabb. These two firms offered to furnish the ties they had tendered for, but they were not taken, and they could not go on for some reason or other. Two others were John Nisbet and Joseph Pilan & Co.; but instead of going to these two and following the list, Mr. Nixon at once went to Mr. Wm. Robinson, because the former two had only tendered for a portion of the work. It would be observed that the advertisement did not call for tenders for the whole 165,000 ties en bloc, but for 5,000, 10,000 or 15,000 at a time. These tenderers had complied with this notice, and tendered for a part of the number. Nevertheless, Mr. Nixon passed these men by, and said he went to Mr. Robinson and asked him: "Will you furnish the ties and comply with your tender if we give you the contract for the balance, deducting the amount these two men had tendered for." Mr. Robinson refused, and said he would furnish the whole quantity or none. The result was that, without applying to these two men, their tenders were passed over, and the 10th or 11th tender on the list was accepted.

MR. DYMOND: Will the hon gentleman mention the total quantity supplied by Mr. Robinson, or tendered for by Mr. Robinson, and the total quantity affected by the two previous tenders.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon gentleman would have an opportunity to speak on this question. The facts were these:—tenders were called for, not for 165,000 ties in a lump, but for 5,000 at a time, if offers were so made. These two men with others tendered for a quantity they could furnish at a lower rate than Robinson; but Mr. Nixon selected the latter, because he offered to furnish the whole quantity. This was not a proper reason to give for such a step. The two others might have gone to trouble and expense in the matter, and they should have been considered; but they were not even told that their tenders were passed over. Instead of going to Martin, and Charles and Augustus Nolin, who offered to sell 10,000 each, they were passed over; but when asked why he (Mr. Nixon) passed them over and went at once to Quigley, who offered to furnish the whole, he answered: "My instructions from Ottawa were to give it to this man, if he were the lowest." What was behind the scenes? Mr. Nixon passed over the others and went to Robinson, and this was the improved system. He did not for a moment say, to use the words of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that this Government had given out contracts corruptly, because he did not know that this was the case, but he did say that this was the improved system of hon. gentlemen opposite. And how could they in the face of these facts—which represented the system approved by these hon. gentlemen, and what was done by order of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, because this advertisement was telegraphed from the office at Ottawa to Winnipeg and Mr. Nixon—say anything about the system of their predecessors. The whole thing was so done, and how could hon. gentlemen find fault with the late Government because they sometimes had to go to the 3rd, 4th, 5th, or 6th tenderer. Here was an example. Here was a large contract for 165,000 ties given to Mr. Robinson at 45c. a tie, representing a very large sum of money. How was it that this contract was awarded by order of the hon. the Minister of Public Works without a deposit being required, and without asking for a deposit of $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000, without the 5 per cent deposit when the contract was signed, and without even calling for security in the advertisement. The security given was an after-thought. It appeared that Mr. Nixon himself thought of it, and telegraphed and obtained the authorization or offer from Ottawa; and if he had not done so, the whole thing would have been concluded according to the advertisement. The supply of 165,000 ties was merely called for, and the lowest tenderer was to have it; and they saw how the lowest obtained it. The ten parties who tendered at lower rates than Mr. Robinson were passed over, and the 11th accepted. It certainly, after this, would not remain for the hon. gentlemen opposite to say that the late Government followed a vicious system. These hon. gentlemen had the benefit of the experience of the working of the old system, they found that it was defective; but what was their practice? This was the last example of how they called for tenders, and of how tenders were accepted, of how contracts were awarded. He had other examples to give in this relation from papers laid before the House; but he did not wish to take up the time of the House any longer. He had made out his case, and he left it under the consideration of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was sorry that the hon. gentleman had not pursued the usual courtesy in letting him know of his intention to bring this matter up. In the first place, he was not present when Mr. Nixon was examined, and he was utterly unable to say a word as to the facts of the case because he did not have the information before him. All he knew was that these tenders were asked for some time after Parliament met, at a time when they had reason to believe that the Pembina Branch could be brought into operation by means of the St. Paul and Pacific road which was to be finished; and the conclusion was arrived at, after brief discussion with the engineers, that it would be desirable to ask for tenders for the ties, because the winter was rapidly passing away. No time was to be lost in getting these tenders in. This accounted for the haste in telegraphing to Mr. Nixon to receive tenders, and no doubt accounted for all the rest. The hon. gentleman gave this as an example of the system of the Government in letting contracts. Why, if he (Mr. Langevin) was logical in his argument, he would see that the system was neglected in this particular instance, as it used to be, in olden times. It was because the system was not observed that the difficulties the hon. gentleman had alluded to, but of which he was not aware until he mentioned them now, had arisen. With regard to the general object of the attack, the hon. gentleman had forgotten to mention that he (Mr. Mackenzie) was compelled to speak on this subject in consequence of a very unfair attack made on himself and the Government by his (Mr. Lanvegin's) late colleague. He was replying to this statement. Sir John A. Macdonald said :

“ When there is money to be expended and public works to be erected, it is the duty of the Government to see that the most efficient contractor should be got at the lowest price ; but they would see, if they looked at the record of the contracts given out for the last three years, that the principle—it was not only a principle of honour and economy, but the law of the land—that contracts should be given to the lowest tenders, giving the best possible security, had been broken systematically and continuously.”

He wished hon. gentlemen to observe particularly the emphatic and almost hyperbolical language in which the hon. gentleman indulged :—

“ The practice of the present Government is to ask the first question concerning a contractor, ‘ How did he vote at the last election ? ’ A man might offer to build a line of railway or a portion of a canal at half price, but if, by some hocus pocus, he was found to be a Conservative, although he was the lowest tenderer, Mr. Mackenzie, the head of the Government, would tell Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of Public Works, the contract must not be given to that man, but to another who is true to the cause.”

This was the offensive accusation he was replying to, and he had gone with some detail into the matter. He had stated, not merely in his pic-nic speeches, but in the House last Session, and had then given a statement to show that the system the present Government had inaugurated had resulted in a much larger number of the lowest tenders receiving contracts than under the old system previously in operation. He might have gone further to show that instead of the Government giving contracts to their own political friends, it resulted in their political opponents getting them. Take the last six contracts on the Welland Canal. Every one of them, but one, were given to his political opponents ; and he was informed that even in that one case, one of the firm was a political opponent. He had endeavoured to show that it was impossible that they could have acted from such a consideration. So much for that. Then with regard to the table which the hon. gentleman had read, to show that under the new system the prices had increased, instead of decreased. The hon. gentleman must remember that he had been taking the lowest tender under the late Government, while under the present Government he had been taking the lowest accepted tenders and contract, and put it into opposition to the lowest tender. A contractor might be very low, but quite insufficient. One of the lowest tenders, for instance, in letting a contract in 1873, was Cross & Co., a firm he was quite sure the hon. gentleman would not himself have given a contract to, but they were very much lower than anyone else ; and so the hon. gentleman would find in all lettings of contracts, that some of the parties would tender, especially under the old system where no deposit was required, were utterly unable to undertake the work. Supposing the work to be let to those parties tendering under such circumstances, the result would be that the work would proceed for a time and then be practically abandoned. There was an instance of this kind not very far from this city, where he was compelled to devote the small remaining portion of the 10 per cent. in his hands to pay the workmen, and a great portion, if not all, of the work would have to be re-let. Under the old system the work cost more than it did when parties provided ample security at the beginning, and the result of the system which forfeited no security could thus be seen, as this contract would cost, no doubt, a very much larger sum now than if it had been let to parties who would have given ample security at the beginning. This was a fair sample of the old system. There were quite a number of contracts on the Intercolonial Railway for which hon. gentlemen opposite came down and asked sums varying from $40,000 to $60,000 to supplement the contracts, and yet the prices upon which they gave these tenders would be cited as evidence that these were lower than those which were at present accepted, which would be manifestly incorrect. Some contracts given on the Intercolonial Railway cost from $120,000 to $350,000 more than what they were let for, before they could be finished by the Government. Then the hon. gentleman contrasted the prices under certain contracts on the Welland Canal, formerly and at present. This was manifestly unfair, unless the circumstances were precisely the same. Some of the latter contracts, for instance, were at points where the water and the land on the new cut joined, and much of this excavation would be made under difficult circumstances where the prices could not possibly be reduced so low as they otherwise would be; as, for instance, on the face of the hill between St. Catherines and Thorold, where difficulty was experienced on account of the water, owing to the long dry ridge at this point. Certainly it would be very much easier to make the excavations there than at the other places. All these matters must be taken into consideration in contracting prices, and he was unable, not having the papers before him, to institute a comparison in any way. If even one day's notice had been given he would have thought that this was no more than ought to have been done, and then he would have been in a position to refer to the instances given. He did not say that the hon. gentleman misquoted any of these instances at all, but he might have quoted merely the figures and particulars which suited him. On a former occasion an hon. gentleman opposite had stated that very good care would be taken that none of the sums paid by political friends would be forfeited—he thought that the hon. member for Kingston had said this—and that some excuse would be found to pay back these amounts. The hon. gentleman would find that where parties refused to proceed with contracts where they were the lowest tenderers, that they were dealt with without reference to their political proclivities. Three parties, indeed, had to forfeit each $1,000 deposit. One of these was the firm of Brown & Co., of Ingersol who were well known in that district, he believed, as Reformers. They refused to proceed with the contract after it was awarded to them, they being the lowest tenderers, and their $1,000 was forfeited. Another case was that of Adam Oliver & Co., also well-known political friends. They refused to proceed with the contract, and forfeited their $1,000. Another instance was that of Macdonald & Kane, where the $1,000 was forfeited for their refusing to proceed with the contract for section 15, Pacific Railway, which had been under discussion that morning in another place. The only instance where any one escaped, that he was aware of, was in the case of a contract on the Lachine Canal, where the Secretary of the Department paid the money back under a mistake, and but for this, it certainly would have been forfeited also. It would be seen, therefore, that he had always acted with the utmost possible impartiality in giving out these contracts. Supposing the hon gentleman should be right—he did not say whether he was right or wrong, as he had not had an opportunity of comparing the figures—in his assertion that the system of requiring money or landed security had operated so as to raise the price somewhat; even if that were so, it operated in securing to them the completion of the works without further cost. There was a case the other day. The mason (Mr. Lyons) who had one of the contracts on the Lachine Canal failed. They had been pursuing the habit, unknown to the Government, of sub-letting their work, and one of the sub-contractors, who had the greatest portion of the work, absconded with the greater portion of the last estimate paid to Lyons & Co. Under the law of Lower Canada, the proprietors of works to be executed under contract had a right to pay the workmen. No such right existed in any other Province that he was aware of. Under the operation of the Local law, as advised by the Minister of Justice, he was authorised to use the money due to the contractors for this purpose, and the sum of $8,000 or $9,000 was paid to the workmen under that arrangement. They found out, on enquiry, that somewhere between $15,000 and $20,000 were due to the workmen on Messrs. Lyons & Co.'s contract. They had about $16,000 of the money of the Company in their hands, and, in addition available security for $14,500, and they would be able, in consequence of having exacted that kind of security, to pay the whole amount due to the workingmen, and have several thousands of dollars over, which would enable them to meet any possible loss in reletting the work. This was an instance where the system had operated most beneficially, both in the interests of the public and the interests of the workingmen. He had given last year in the House, in reply to a statement made by the hon. member for Kingston in one of his picnic speeches during the previous summer, the results of a tabulated statement, prepared in the department, to show that under their system what the hon. gentleman deprecated most was not correct, and that the contracts had reached the lowest tenderers to an amount immensely preponderating what took place under the hon. gentleman's Administration. He had given that as a triumphant proof of the superiority of the system, as well as of the strict impartiality of the Department. He might have occasion, before the House rose, to refer to the matter again, as he was not able now to refer to the documents in question, which he wished to see in the first place.

Mr. DYMOND said he had taken the liberty to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) because he desired to avoid trespassing on the time of the House, or in the slightest degree protracting a debate which had been sprung upon them in a manner not consistent with fairness to the Government or the members generally. This evidence was taken before the Public Accounts Committee, and was heard by hon. gentlemen who had the privilege of being members of that Committee; but it occupied 34 galleys, and he did not believe that any one member had yet had time to read it carefully, much less to read it with the care necessary to anything like a discussion or mere matters of detail. He only rose to supply the omission made in the hon. gentleman's speech to which he had called attention. It was quite true that Mr. Nixon, who appeared to him, as he listened to his evidence carefully, to have exercised the greatest possible prudence and caution with regard to these contracts, had done nothing of an important nature without reference to his chiefs, and that he gave the contract to Mr. Robinson at 44c. per tie without first offering it to two persons who had tendered previous to Robinson, and whose tenders were lower than Robinson's. The whole contract was for 165,000 ties; and the total amount represented by the tenders of these two persons who were passed over, was 15,000 ties, an amount insignificant in itself. The result, however, of a contrary course would have been this, assuming that Mr. Robinson, as was distinctly stated by Mr. Nixon, would have refused to have taken the tender if it were divided, there would have been a considerable loss to the country owing to the necessity that would then have been imposed on Mr. Nixon of passing to the next higher tenders. Had Nixon taken these ties from Nesbet and Pilan, he would have saved $700; but had he thereby lost the offer of Mr. Robinson, he would have had to pay higher prices aggregating $3,800. By refusing therefore to break upon the contract, by passing over these persons, and by accepting Mr. Robinson's tender, he actually saved to the Government and country, $3,100. This would be found, on reference to the statement laid before the Committee by Mr. Nixon, of all the tenders, to be the actual result of such an operation, as the hon. member for Charlevoix would he supposed have advised. He did not think that it was fair or generous on the part of the hon. gentleman to conceal from the House the fact that such was the evidence given before the Committee. The evidence, he thought, was unfairly made—he said so with all respect and courtesy to the hon. gentleman—to convey an impression to the House that for some reason or other not disclosed Mr. Nixon had passed over certain lower tenders in order to favour Mr. Robinson. He had given the exact result of what would have been the case if Mr. Nixon had accepted these two tenders and lost the opportunity of purchasing the ties from Mr. Robinson. He would just quote a very few passages from the evidence itself in confirmation of what he said. The hon. gentleman, in examining this witness, put the following question:—

“1534. You say that Mr. Robinson would not have accepted the contract if those two tenders for the 5,000 each had been left out?

One was for 5,000 and the other for 10,000; and Mr. Nixon, who was under oath, averred:—

—That is correct.

“1535. And then you would have been forced to go on to the next man?—Yes; he was still higher than Robinson.

“1536. In the interest of the Government you thought it better to accept at the 44c. tender than taking the risk of paying for 5,000 some five or ten cents more?—Certainly.

“1537. In giving the contract for 165,000 at 44c., though you passed over these two men, you saved the Government a considerable amount of money?—Yes.”

The hon. gentleman had alluded to the course taken by Mr. Nixon with reference to the tender of Mr. Quigley, who tendered for the whole quantity, but in whose case the same sort of complaint, as the hon. gentleman put it, did not apply. The hon. gentleman asked whether, until he reached Quigley's tender, he had offered the contract to all the other persons who were on the list until Quigley was reached, and the answer was, “Yes.” This was so in the case of Quigley. Mr. Nixon had not done what he afterwards did in the case of Robinson—pass over any smaller tenders in order that he might give the contract to one person; but that was explained in this way. The hon. the Minister of the Interior put this question:—

“1538. Was Quigley's tender for the whole amount?—Yes.

“1539. You consulted the parties between Martin and Quigley, that were tenderers?—Yes.

“1540. Did you obtain Quigley's assent to your doing that?—Yes.

“1541. So that Quigley was willing to take the balance of the ties, deducting this amount, at the rate at which he had tendered for the whole?—Yes.”

The difference between the two cases was this: Quigley was willing to take his contract although his tender was for the whole, allowing one or two small tenders to have the benefit of their offers, while Robinson was not willing to do so; and, therefore, in order that he might not lose the benefit of Robinson's tender, and be compelled to give a higher price to those who came after Robinson, Mr. Nixon declined to give an order to the two parties in question; this was the whole story on which the fabric of suggestion, or suspicion, was founded by the hon. member. He did not think it would be possible for any public official, placed in the position of Mr. Nixon, sent into a new country, surrounded by a large number of persons of the class of adventurers, himself ignorant of the character of a large number of those persons, and subject to all the tricks, traps and arts that might be brought to bear upon him, to come out more creditably than Mr. Nixon had come out in the Committee. He (Mr. Dymond) did not believe that anything had been shown to have been done by Mr. Nixon which could be called in the slightest degree criminal. He did not think that more than one or two things had been shown to have been done which might have been indiscreet, and he considered that from first to last Mr. Nixon had shown himself an honest man in the position in which he had been placed.

MR. PLUMB said that the member for North York, with characteristic obtrusiveness and desire to thrust himself forward in all discussions, had challenged a discussion in the case of Mr. Nixon, the purveyor, and the evidence adduced in that case before the Committee of Public Accounts. It was utterly irrelevant to the matter now under consideration, and but for the untimely and irrelevant remarks of the member for North York, it would have been left to come up in the proper course. It was, however, necessary to answer the member for North York, and Mr. Nixon would doubtless pray to be saved from his officious friends when he found himself in the position in which they had placed him. In respect to the important contract for 165,000 railway ties for the Pacific Railway, between Red River and Rat Portage, Mr. Nixon advertised for tenders to be opened on the 4th February, 1873, the ties to be delivered in lots of not less than 5,000, as follows: 74,000 at St. Boniface; 90,000 at Rat River, and 30,000 at River Rousseau, and a limited portion at intermediate points. The advertisement did not state that the tenderers would be required to give security for the fulfilment of their contracts, nor were they required to deposit a sum as earnest-money before their tenders could be considered; and yet this practice had been adopted by the Government and made a matter of boasting in all the pic-nic orations of last summer by the First Minister and others of his company, and it was a course which it was eminently desirable for Mr. Nixon to adopt in this case, if it was in any case. But he did not ask for the deposit, nor did he notify the tenderers by his advertisement that he would require them to give security for the performance of their contract in case their tenders were accepted. Thirty-four tenders were received, at prices ranging from 25c. up to 75c. for each tie. Upon opening the tenders, he notified Mr. Martin, who had tendered for the whole at 25c. each, that his tender was accepted. But Mr. Martin had meanwhile received an appointment from the Department of the Interior as land surveyor, and his letter coolly states that, not being able to attend to both, that is, to delivering the ties and surveying Government lands, he begs to decline Mr. Nixon's offer. He would have supposed that it was his own offer, and that, at least, a reason should have been given that did not implicate the Government, or that Mr. Martin's appointment should have been very promptly cancelled. Other parties, whose tenders ranged from 25c. to 38c., declined to give security, except Mr. Quigley, who tendered at 27c. for the whole, and was prepared to give security; but he wanted pay at the rate of 90 per cent. on delivery of ties on the line, and a proportionate amount for those delivered on the bank of the river, meaning, doubtless, Rat River and Rousseau River. The Department at Ottawa telegraphed, in reply to Mr.

MR. PLUMB.

Nixon: "No advance on ties in woods or on rivers away from line." Now, there is no evidence that Quigley wanted advances on ties delivered on rivers away from the line, but his letter in respect to the refusal of Nixon to give him the contract expressly states: "As you now officially inform me that no percentage whatever will be paid for ties on banks of river, I must respectfully decline to sign any contract wanting that clause." It will be seen that Quigley in this case, as he did in all others, speaks of a river, and not of rivers. In his evidence Nixon covered up this very questionable transaction. Two of the tenders below the price at which the contract was finally awarded, 44c., were entirely overlooked, and the contract was given to Mr. Robinson, with the result of a difference of nearly $33,000 in the whole amount. Mr. Nixon had stated that he proposed to reserve for two lower tenderers 10,000 and 5,000 ties, and to give Mr. Robinson the rest. Mr. Robinson very naturally said he would not permit that. Mr. Nixon, as he (Mr. Plumb) thought, without doing his duty, permitted Mr. Robinson to dictate to him, and gave him the whole contract at 44c. It might be said that Mr. Robinson insisted on delivering the whole, and that if the contract had not been given to him, it must have been given to some higher tenderer. The hon. gentleman who had advanced an argument of that kind had very little experience, or he would not have presumed to suggest it to the House. The duty of Mr. Nixon, when he found that eleven of the tenderers had withdrawn, was to assume that there was some collusion, and that the Government was not getting fair-play, and he should have advertised for other tenders. It was not sound policy for the Government to give so large a contract to one person. They should have distributed the awards, if possible, among those who had offered to furnish 5,000 or 10,000 ties each. It was evident that it was safer and better to contract for 5,000 or 10,000 ties each, with many persons, than with one for the whole. It would have given employment and aid to many persons who were entitled to consideration—poor men who could not afford to monopolize the whole contract—and he (Mr. Plumb) undertook to say that no contractor, looking after his own interest, would have accepted Robinson's tender. The House had been, just now, told that this ingenious gentleman, Mr. Nixon, was inexperienced and ignorant, that tricks and traps and arts were used by the sharp-dealers in the North-West to beguile his youthful innocence. Unless Mr. Nixon was well prepared to meet any trick, or trap, or art, he (Mr. Plumb) was very much deceived. In fact, he had shown a cheerful readiness to go out of his way to fall into the traps. In his examination, he had been aided by the interposition of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond), the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Macdougall) and the hon. the Minister of Finance.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: When did I interpose?

MR. PLUMB said the hon. gentleman interposed to help Mr. Nixon out of a very embarrassing position. Mr. Nixon was asked by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) whether he owned any property, or had bought any land in Winnipeg. Mr. Nixon, after much hesitation, was able to remember that he had purchased a lot in Winnipeg, and he was asked what it was used for. He said for a Temperance Hall. Then he was asked if he had any other lands there. He hesitated again, and then said: "Yes; I have bought some Half-Breed script from Mr. Bannatyne." Dead silence. Again his (Mr. Plumb's) friend asked him: "Have you any other property?" He said: "Yes; I remember now, I bought a house and lot from Mr. Bannatyne." "What did you pay him?" "Fifteen hundred dollars; but I laid out $400 in repairs." He was very anxious to get that in. "How did you pay him?" "I gave $500 in cash, and gave him a mortgage for the remainder, $1900." "What has been done with the building?" "It is rented to the Government." "Your name does not figure in the Public Accounts?" "No." "Whose name does the transaction appear in?" "Mr. Strang's." "Who is he?" "Mr. Bannatyne's head clerk." "What rent is paid for it?" "$430 a year;" so that $430 a year is paid as rental for a property which cost $1,500. That was rather embarrassing. Even Mr. Nixon, though he had a cast-iron countenance, looked a little embarrassed. Then, the Finance Minister said: "What is the rate of interest in Manitoba?" Nixon's face brightened up, like an old hat in a shower of rain, and he said that the rate of interest in Manitoba was from 15½ to 17 per cent. on gilt-edged paper; so that the amount paid was only 7 or 8 per cent. too high, according to that. However, his (Mr. Plumb's) cruel friend, the member for Frontenac, asked: "What rate of interest do you pay Mr. Bannatyne on that mortgage?" And Mr. Nixon said: "Only 6 per cent., Sir. I refused to buy on any other terms." So that destroyed the pretty little theory of the Finance Minister. He contradicted the statement of his hon. friend as to the straightforward and honest testimony of the purveyor; and the First Minister himself had indicated to the Committee that he was not satisfied with the system pursued in the North-West. If, as the hon. gentleman had said, Mr. Nixon was so innocent, and had to meet these tricks and traps which were spread for him, he (Mr. Plumb) repeated that the purveyor certainly had the most fatal faculty for falling into those traps. On his very first appearance at Winnipeg, he was found cheek by jowl with one of the contractors, with whom he afterwards dealt largely for supplies. He went to his house and lived there, free of charge, for about five months, or thereabouts, and, in the course of the long winter evenings, the worthy trader must have found out from the innocent gentleman what he was going to do; and he could very well afford to give Mr. Nixon his board for five months, for which long afterwards he claims to have paid by a present of a lot of Brummagen knives and forks. The astute trader also gave Mr. Nixon a cutter. "But," said Mr. Nixon, "I paid him a cheque for $125 for it." Then he was asked whether that cheque had been cashed at the bank. "No," he said, "Mr. Sutherland gave it back to my wife," and he was so indignant with Mr. Sutherland that he let his wife keep it—pocketed the insult in fact. He afterwards tumbled neck and heels into the trap of Mr. Bannatyne, a member of Parliament, with whom he had Government dealings to the extent of thousands of dollars, who was known to be so dealing with the Government by the authorities at Ottawa. Still they did not lift up their voices to prevent Mr. Nixon from dealing with him. Mr. Bannatyne was sitting and voting in Parliament two years while his large dealings with Mr. Nixon were going on, and is now absent because he is afraid of being prosecuted and dares not take his seat. When Mr. Sutherland, the hospitable gentleman who boarded Mr. Nixon without charge for five months, gave the Government an inferior kind of coffee, how could Nixon interfere, he had Sutherland's food in his stomach. He had stated that he did not know that the coffee delivered was not worth the price paid; but we asked him whether he had inspected the coffee or not. Mr. Nixon was an orator and he made a speech, and then he made another speech, at the end of which he said he could not remember, but he could not say he did not, and we rested there because he was rather a slippery witness. He (Mr. Plumb) asked him if he knew one O'Donnell who was employed by Sutherland to deliver goods. Nixon said, "Yes." He (Mr. Plumb) asked him if Mr. O'Donnell had told him the coffee was bad. Nixon could not remember, but he could not say he had not been so told, and that was pretty good evidence against him, because if he could have denied it he would have done so. He was very glib of tongue and very ready of speech on his own defence. Another case more glaring than this was that of a beef contract by which there appears to have been a loss of $4,000. The purveyor was advised that Mr. DeMers, a large cattle trader who lived in Montana had gone to Ottawa in October, 1876, and offered to supply beef to the Government at certain prices. He stipulated that this offer should be open till the first of March. For some reason or other the purveyor at Winnipeg seemed not to have been notified of this till the first of May, 1877. Then he advertised for tenders for beef to be delivered at certain periods in the North-West. Mr. DeMers referred to two gentlemen at Winnipeg, with whom he requested the Government to communicate on his behalf, Mr. Royal and Mr. Gouin. Mr. Nixon advertised on May 1st, 1877, for tenders to be awarded at the end of ten days; and when these tenders were advertised for, Mr. Gouin said he had no doubt Mr. DeMers would furnish the beef upon the terms stated in his previous tender, that he did not like to bind him but that he would communicate with him; he supposed his residence to be within 25 miles of a telegraph station in Montana, to which he sent a despatch. Mr. Nixon said he would give him two days to get an answer. The two days expired and two days more were given, altogether twelve days time was given him.

MR. DYMOND: Fourteen days.

MR. PLUMB: Very well, fourteen days; take any time you like. No tidings came back from Mr. DeMers; no attempt seems to have been made by Mr. Nixon to ascertain the cause, and the contract was then awarded to Mr. McKay, at 12½c. a pound, on the 24th of May, and next day a telegram was received from DeMers renewing his offer of eight cents a pound. He lived 125 miles from the telegraph station instead of twenty-five miles. Nixon could have ascertained this at Winnipeg, and, doubtless, would have done so, if he had been interested in saving the Government money. But he dodged our questions in the most artful way, and actually said he had saved the Government $3,000 or $4,000 by awarding the contract to Mr. McKay. Mr. DeMers, he stated, only intended to deliver slaughtered beef at Edmonton and points south of Edmonton, and for other points, the offer was for beef on the hoof, at double the price. He was asked why he did not wait, and he said he was told that Mr. DeMers' place of residence was only twenty-five miles away from a telegraph station, and that he had given him time enough. It turned out, as I have stated that it was 125 miles from a telegraph station. That a carrier was sent to him, and that he replied immediately that he would accept the contract at eight cents per pound; but in the meantime the contract was awarded. Mr. Nixon made a very lame story about Mr. DeMers having offered only to deliver slaughtered beef at a certain point. It could make very little difference to him whether he drove cattle 150 miles or more, one way or the other. A good many of the points were south-east of that specified, and the delivery from Montana could not have been more expensive there than at Edmonton; besides Mr. DeMers stated that he was willing to deliver the slaughtered beef at the points required. Mr. Nixon very artfully stated that he had "no tender from Mr. DeMers for a supply of slaughtered beef, good, bad or indifferent, for any point east of Edmonton, and he wanted it nowhere else," "that the price of slaughtered beef is mentioned, at only live weight." Mr. DeMers, himself, has contradicted the first position. Now for the other. Will it be believed that the following statement was made by Mr. Nixon, and is recorded in his evidence, answer 1136; he is reading from DeMers letter to the Department. "I will undertake to deliver in the course of the summer first class stock cattle, durham breed, such as milch cows, bulls and working oxen, at the following places, for the figure opposite each respective place,

"Edmonton.....	4	cents	live	weight.
"Battle River...	4½	"	"	"
"Pitt.....	5½	"	"	"
"McLeod.....	3½	"	"	"
"Qu'Appelle....	7	"	"	"
"Winnipeg....	8	"	"	"

Mr. Nixon then stated that these prices must be more than doubled to give the price of dressed beef, and, therefore, he wished the Commissioners to believe that he had saved money by awarding the contract to McKay. Now, what will be thought of the innocence of the worthy purveyor, when the fact is stated that this offer was not for beef for slaughter, and that Mr. Nixon omitted to state that it was an entirely distinct offer from that for dressed beef, and that it was for cattle for an entirely different purpose, namely, for farm stock, and that accidentally, of course, he omitted to read the next sentence in Mr. DeMers letter, which is as follows:—

"I beg respectfully to call your attention to the fact that, in most cases, cattle shipped for butchers' shops can be sold at a figure below the price obtained for cattle selected for stocking a farm, in which case the breed, age, soundness, and working quality are exclusively taken into consideration. The above schedule is made in that view."

Throughout a searching examination, Mr. Nixon pertinaciously insisted upon bringing forward this last offer of DeMers as one with which to compare and justify his very questionable, and, to his (Mr. Plumb's) mind, his wholly unjustifiable course in giving out the beef contract at 12½c. to McKay, when it was probable, and afterwards became certain, that DeMers would furnish it at 8c. a pound, at the points and at the periods required. He must have known that the beef could be furnished as cheap in summer as in winter—cheaper, in fact. But he was sustained and protected and defended by the ready interference of many members of the Committee; but at last he was effectually cornered, and being asked if the offer in question, upon which all his defence had been made, was an offer for cattle for slaughter purposes, he answered: "No, it is not," and with this answer on record and its context, Mr. Nixon's virtue as a faithful public agent may be left to the public judgment. This innocent, intelligent and careful purveyor had tried to hoodwink the Committee in regard to this matter; and the hon. member for North York had, at the last moment, endeavoured to stifle the discussion.

MR. DYMOND: That statement is wholly untrue.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is out of order when he charges any hon. member with endeavouring to stifle discussion.

MR. PLUMB: Then, of course, I take that back, but the hon. gentleman's interruptions had the effect of doing so.

MR. DYMOND: I submit that while it may be in order to discuss evidence laid before this House, it is not in order to discuss the conduct, actions or bearing of any member of this House before a committee, unless that is formally submitted by the committee.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is quite true, but it is quite in order to state that the effect of the mode in which an examination was conducted was to stifle the discussion, no matter how it was done.

MR. BLAKE said it was in order to state the effect of interruptions, but it was entirely out of order to state what members of the Committee did, and would evoke an interminable discussion. The hon. gentleman could argue from the "galley" and not beyond it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the interruptions and the mode of putting the questions and the mode of objecting all appeared on the record.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman can depart from the record itself. He cannot supplement it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had taken no part in that examination. He had not been aware of anything wrong in the conduct of Mr. Nixon, but he had felt bound to read all the evidence and judge Mr. Nixon fairly upon the evidence, with such further investigation as the Government thought proper to institute; and he doubted extremely the propriety of discussing in this way, almost as a party matter, the question whether Mr. Nixon had or had not performed his duty properly. It was not conducive to the ends of justice or fair to the person accused.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I understand from the Prime Minister that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) was not stating the sentiments of the Government in his laboured panegyric of Mr. Nixon.

MR. MACKENZIE: No man acts as the amanuensis of the Government as far as I am concerned. He had passed no opinion whatever, nor could he have done so. The hon. member for North York had a right to express his own opinions. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was not in a position to express an opinion, as he had not heard out this investigation, knowing that it would be taken down in shorthand.

MR. PLUMB said the First Minister having, as usual, interpolated a speech by way of interrupting his (Mr. Plumb's) argument. He must again state to the House that the hon. member for North York had chosen, by his eulogium upon Mr. Nixon, to place those who took an active part in the Committee of Public Accounts, upon the enquiry into the expenditure of the purveyor, in a position which had compelled him (Mr. Plumb) reluctantly to say what he should not otherwise have thought it timely to say. Mr. Nixon might thank the zealous member for North York for having stirred up the affair which otherwise might have been let alone. He (Mr. Plumb) had not sought this discussion, was not prepared for it, and had not the slightest idea that it would have been brought up now, or of entering into it, until the hon. member for North York rose in his place and uttered a panegyric on Mr. Nixon, which would be scarcely justified by the very questionable position in which that officer was placed by the evidence before the House. He (Mr. Plumb) did not desire to discourage Mr. Nixon. If he was in fault, the Government had been gravely in fault also in permitting him to carry on so loose a system, as upon his own showing he had carried on in their behalf and with their concurrence. Almost every transaction entered into was not such a one as any man would have entered into, who had his own money at stake. He was dealing, without contracts or tenders, everywhere. He did not call for tenders or security in his dealings with responsible merchants. Yet he gave Bannatyne's clerk, Mr. Strang, large contracts without reflecting, as he states, whether the goods belonged to him or not. He gave contracts to Bannatyne's father-in-law, an old gentleman of over eighty years of age, long past active life. The supplies came from Bannatyne's store, and innocent Mr. Nixon could not say that there was any connection between Bannatyne and that venerable contractor. He bought goods in absurdly small quantities for the supplies of the Mounted Police. The reason he gave was that he could not get the specifications before the goods were wanted. That was in 1875, when he first went up. But the same system was continued in 1876 to 1877. No doubt, when the Minister of the Interior visited Manitoba, he saw it was not a proper way of doing business, and had it changed. So much for the daub of whitewash with which the member for North York has made his client rather painfully conspicuous. With regard to the general question of contracts, he (Mr. Plumb) would say that there had been as yet no evidence to prove that any benefit was derived from demanding a thousand dollars security from the tenderer before his tender could be considered by the Department of Public Works. The hon. member for Charlevoix had shown conclusively that the claim made by the hon. the First Minister with respect to the reforms of the present Government in the system of letting contracts, and their advantageous results, were not supported by facts; and that the laboured comparisons which had been adduced by the First Minister between his system and that of the late Government, had been conclusively shown by the hon. member for Charlevoix, who spoke by authority, as the First Minister's predecessor, to have been unfair and unwarranted.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he did not intend to discuss the lengthy evidence adduced before the Committee; as had already been stated, this was not an opportune time to do so. The hon. member for Niagara, with the courtesy which usually characterized him, had seen fit to accuse him (Mr. Macdougall) of having aided in stifling enquiry before said Committee; and the right hon. gentleman who led the Opposition, assumed that the statement was correct. He (Mr. Macdougall) begged to differ from both hon. gentlemen; he begged to submit that this was a statement which required evidence to sustain it, and if this were the proper time and place for discussing that question, he thought the proposition he was about to enunciate would be ably sustained. The Nixon investigation lasted several days, during which the fullest opportunity had been given for a thorough examination of the subject. Mr. Nixon was examined at considerable length, and every facility was given to obtain the fullest explanations. He (Mr. Macdougall) could not understand why the hon. member for Niagara had accused him and the hon. member for North York of having aided in stifling enquiry. The only interruption to the hon. member for Niagara which he (Mr. Macdougall) could remember was, when the hon gentlemen proposed a question so long, and involved and indirect, that he (Mr. Macdougall) and the hon member for North York felt bound to come to his assistance and help him to formulate his question in an intelligible state, in order to obtain an intelligible reply. The thanks which they now received for their labour, in that case a labour of love, was the accusation that it was done to stifle enquiry. He believed the members of the Committee would agree with him that there was no desire to interrupt nor to stifle enquiry; in fact, there was no occasion to do so. The only desire was to ascertain whether there was any ground for the accusation that there were irregularities on the management of public affairs in the North-West, and that Mr. Nixon had contributed to those irregularities. At the same time, he (Mr. Macdougall) felt it his duty, as others felt it theirs, to see that no unfair advantage was taken of the witness, to see that he received the protection to which he was entitled, from the members of the Committee, in the position he occupied, which could be done without the slightest detriment to the fullest investigation. He was quite sure the hon gentleman would see on reflection, that his statement was uncalled for. With regard to Mr. DeMers' contract, of which hon. gentlemen had spoken, it appeared from Mr. Bowen's letter, which was read by the witness and placed on record, that the witness, Mr. Nixon, had no other information than that given by Bowen that DeMers lived some twenty-five miles away. It would have been but fair for the hon. gentleman to have stated that the tenders asked for dressed beef and not live beef; and that Mr. DeMers had not sent any tender, but had made an offer to supply live beef. The difference between the two was that dressed beef cost twice as much as live beef. Further, the evidence showed there was a small difference in favour of the McKay contract, as compared with the DeMers offer, in case purchases had been made of these cattle; and, again, these cattle, even if Mr. Nixon had purchased them, would have had to be fed before being slaughtered. What was required at that time was dressed beef; and several of the places mentioned by DeMers were not those where it was required the beef should be delivered. On referring to Mr. DeMers letter, it would be found that he stated there was no use in waiting any longer. In the evidence, with respect to this contract, it led to the conclusion that Mr. Nixon had done all he possibly could to get the beef at as low a price as possible, under the circumstances, and had made as good a bargain as could have been made. He (Mr. Macdougall) had endeavoured throughout, to act impartially in the matter, neither to unduly favour Mr. Nixon nor to do him any injustice, but to see that he had an opportunity of answering the questions fairly, and that the questions were put to him in a proper state, so that a definite conclusion could be arrived at by the Committee.

MR. ORTON said he wished to make a few remarks concerning the ties contract, which had excited a great deal of discussion in the riding which he had the honour to represent. This contract had been let to Mr. Robinson, a brother of the gentleman who, after a great deal of persuasion, had taken the lead, in the forlorn hope in that Riding, on behalf of the Government. Public rumour, which, of course, was not always correct, had it that Government contractors were in the habit of contributing largely to election funds on behalf of the Government; that large sums of money had been expended during the recent elections for this House, supplied by those contractors, and that they had also subscribed very largely towards the elections now coming on in Quebec. Whether those rumours had any foundation or not, it was highly important in the interests of the public that a close investigation should be held with regard to the mode of allotting public contracts. There certainly seemed to be grave reason for suspicion when a contract was given out for 165,000 ties, the difference between the contract price and the lowest tender being $31,000, and that this lowest tenderer had been given a Government position to get him out of the way; and, when it was further found that the next tenderer, Mr. Quigley, had tendered at 27c., his tender and the one accepted being $27,500. The total amount to be received by Mr. Robinson for this contract was something over $72,000. The contract was let to Mr. Robinson without any adequate reason, at $27,500 higher than Mr. Quigley's tender, although Mr. Quigley was prepared to give the necessary security, the only reason for his non-acceptance of the contract being that Mr. Nixon refused to make monthly payments so as to enable him to fulfil his contract with less financial difficulty.

MR. MACKENZIE: That cannot be so. I would like the hon. gentleman to read the part which said he was refused monthly payments.

MR. ORTON said he took his information from an extract from a paper in the interests of the Government. Not being a member of the Public Accounts Committee, he had not an opportunity of looking carefully over the report.

MR. MACKENZIE: The statement is not correct.

MR. ORTON said he would quote from the Fergus News Record, which supported the Government in his Riding. A report of the evidence before the Public Accounts Committee with regard to this contract, in that paper, stated that Mr. Quigley refused to accept unless on the basis of monthly payments for the ties delivered on the banks of the river. He was informed this could not be done, and declined to accept the contract. There did not seem to be any adequate reason given why Mr. Quigley was not given that contract on the basis he desired. When such a large amount, no less than $27,508, of public money was at stake; when such carelessness and recklessness, if no more, were seen in the letting of contracts, there was grave reason for the public rumours to which he had referred.

MR. MACDOUGALL said that the evidence proved that the reason that Mr. Quigley refused was because he would not be paid for the ties in the woods, but only when delivered at the proper places.

MR. ORTON said he thought he had, at any rate, shown there had been great carelessness and a great wrong done with regard to the letting of this contract. It had been charged by newspapers in his county that it had been done for the purpose of giving courage to his opponent. Of course these rumours might be without foundation, but when so large a sum of money was given to Mr. Robinson over and above the other tenders, one could not help thinking, to use a vulgar expression, that "there must be a nigger in the fence somewhere." When the position which Mr. Nixon took on another very memorable occasion was recollected, when it was the interest of the Reform Government in Ontario to succeed at their elections, when his conduct in the township of Proton was also recollected, and when it was remembered that he was rewarded for his signal services on that occasion, by a lucrative appointment in Manitoba, the suspicion could not help arising that Mr. Nixon might again deem it his duty to step out of the path of honesty and uprightness, in order to favour a friend of the Government. He (Mr. Orton) did not say that the gentleman who now opposed him had any interest in his brother's (Mr. Robinson's) contract. In fact, he stated he had not, and he (Mr. Orton) believed the statement, because he considered him an honourable man.

MR. YOUNG said he thought the hon. gentleman had gone a long way to make a round-about attack on a gentleman who had been brought out against him in Centre Wellington. Matters of that kind could very well be left to the elections and not trouble this House with them, particularly when the hon. gentleman had proven that he knew nothing whatever of the subject which he had attempted to discuss. He had never seen a more gross exposure of ignorance than had been made by the hon. gentleman.

The evidence taken before the Committee had been before the House for several days.

MR. ORTON said he had not seen a copy of it yet.

MR. YOUNG said if the evidence had not been yet sent to the hon. gentleman, it had, at any rate, appeared in the public newspapers two or three weeks ago, and the hon. gentleman had had ample opportunity to become acquainted with the facts of the case had he any desire to do so. He (Mr. Young) did not intend to discuss this matter at any particular length. It was only fair to purveyor Nixon, however, to say that he had been most unfairly attacked on several points by hon. gentlemen opposite; that, so far as his contracts in connection with ties and beef were concerned, the evidence brought out before the Committee proved that he had exercised the greatest care to make the best bargain possible for the Government, and that in not one single particular had he been guilty of the slightest infraction of duty in letting out these contracts. With regard to the contract for ties, he advertised for contracts in the usual way. Thirty-three persons tendered for the supply of those ties. Mr. Nixon offered the contract to one after another of the lowest tenderers, and, in every case, they refused to accept it at the prices at which they had tendered, for the simple reason that in nearly all those cases they had tendered at from 33½ to 50 per cent. below what it was possible to supply the ties for at the points where they were required. He then came down to the three tenders already referred to by other speakers, after passing over eight. The first of these three tenders was John Nesbitt, who tendered for 10,000 ties at 39c.; the next was Joseph Pilan and Pierre St. Germain for 5,000 ties at 40c. These gentlemen had tendered for 15,000 out of the 165,000 ties. Mr. Nixon did not know exactly where their residences were. He went to the next tenderer, Mr. Robinson, who had offered to supply the whole 165,000 tons, and offered him the contract, less these 15,000 ties which he intended to give to those who had tendered for them at a slightly lower rate. Mr. Robinson replied that if he did not get the whole contract, he would withdraw his tender. He (Mr. Young) claimed that Mr. Nixon acted like a man possessed of common sense, when he agreed to accept the tender for the whole amount, the difference being so slight on the smaller tenders. Had he accepted the tenders of those gentlemen for the 15,000 ties, and they had been willing to carry them out, of which there was no evidence, he might have failed in letting the contract for the balance, at as low a price as Mr. Robinson had tendered at, and have caused the country to lose, instead of several hundred, several thousand dollars. The hon. gentleman, in his desire to help himself in his constituency and to make a round-about attack on his opponent, had undertaken to represent that a Mr. Quigley had been passed over in order to favour Mr. Robinson, who had obtained the contract, and was a brother of his political opponent. If the hon. gentleman had studied the matter thoroughly and had looked into the evidence, he would have found that Mr. Nixon had given the reason why Mr. Quigley did not get the contract, and had produced a letter from that gentleman, in which he refused to take it. The following was a letter written by Mr. Quigley:—

“WINNIPEG, MANITOBA, }

“DEAR SIR,—I beg respectfully to inform you that I am prepared to fulfil all the conditions demanded for the due fulfilment of the contract for supplying 165,000 railway ties as tendered for by me.

“I would now respectfully ask, on my part, that a clause be inserted in the contract, in accordance with your verbal expressions, and as understood by me, viz: that payments be made monthly at the rate of 90 per cent. on all delivered on the line, and a proportionate percentage on all delivered on banks of river.

“I have the honour to be,
“Your obedient servant,

“ (Signed) T. M. QUIGLEY, “Contractor,

“P. O. Box 230, Winnipeg.”

“THOS. NIXON, Esq.,
“Paymaster, C. P. R.,
“Winnipeg.”

MR. YOUNG.

Now. Mr. Nixon clearly explained that the contract called for would be delivered on the railway, and, to undertake to pay for them while lying in the woods, and on the banks of the river was some thing which it was quite impossible for the Department to agree to. This made the thing an entirely different matter altogether. How was he to bring the ties from the banks of the river and from all over the country where they were located to the line of railway, and this made it impossible for Mr. Nixon to accept a tender with this condition which Mr. Quigley, after he tendered, desired should be placed in it. The fact was that in the very steps taken by Mr. Nixon, it was clear that he endeavoured to obtain the contract at the lowest price, that he offered it to every one who tendered at a low rate, and that every one refused up to the time when he came to the tender of the two persons he had mentioned; and when he found that Mr. Robinson was not prepared to go on with the contract unless he received the whole of it, he acted in the interests of the Government and of common sense when he gave to Mr. Robinson the whole contract with regard to the contract which was let for the supply of beef in the North-West. Mr. Nixon's contract was quite clearly correct, as it was in the case of the ties. The hon. member for Niagara had referred to what he called the tender sent in by Mr. Demers, for the supply of beef at a lower rate, as the hon. gentleman alleged, than Mr. MacKay's tender, to whom the contract was awarded. As a matter of fact, Demers never put in any tender at all. No such tender at all was before Mr. Nixon. Demers, it appeared, was in Ottawa in the Fall of 1876, and he (Mr. Demers) wrote a letter to the Department that he was prepared to supply beef for the use of Government officers and men in the North-West at a certain rate; but Mr. Nixon never heard of this letter until after he had asked for tenders in the North-West. Mr. Nixon called for tenders, as would be seen in the evidence before them, to be sent in for the supply of this beef some time in the month of May last. On the 12th of October previous, the Department here had sent up this informal letter of Mr. Demers to Mr. Provencher, the Indian agent in the North-West, for his consideration. Mr. Nixon never heard or knew anything about it until the 2nd of May, a few days before the tenders for the supply of beef were sent in. What did Mr. Nixon do? This letter was really not a tender. It did not comply with the conditions of the contract as specified in the advertisement; but so anxious was he to get the beef cheaper for the Government if he could possibly do it, that he went to see two friends of Demers in Winnipeg, by whose assistance he expected that he might be put in communication with Demers. The result was that he telegraphed to Demers to know whether he was prepared to supply dressed beef at 8cts. a pound, at the places at which the Government wanted it; these friends informed Mr. Nixon that Demers only lived twenty-five miles from a telegraph office. Nixon at first said he would give them two days to get a reply, his reason being that he wished to hurry them up. The time for supplying the beef was fast coming on, and there was no time to be lost. No answer came in two days and the time was then extended to fourteen days; and during this time Mr. Nixon received no word whatsoever from Demers with regard to the matter. The result was that, as a matter of course, he was bound to go on and let the contract. Plenty of time was given in order to hear from Demers. Mr. Nixon took every possible precaution, he had no tender before him that called him to look into this matter—but simply his zeal in the Government service, to get the beef at the lowest rate, induced him to take these means to see if Mr. Demers was prepared to supply the beef at such a rate. No tender or word having been received from Demers, Mr. Nixon was quite right in going on and letting the contract to the tenderers which he had before him. And to show the utter absurdity of the statement that Nixon had overlooked Demers' tender, and that loss had thus accrued to the country, he would mention the fact that Demers' letter, taken as it was, showed that it would have been not cheaper, but dearer for the Government, if Mr. Nixon had acted on the letter as it appeared before him.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Why did Mr. Nixon accept that tender?

MR. YOUNG: He never did.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Yes; a telegram was sent and he accepted it.

MR. YOUNG: No; but he telegraphed to Mr. Demers to see if he would supply dressed beef at 8cts. a pound, not that he would accept the tender. He wanted to know if Demers was prepared to carry out his offer.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Here is the telegram.

“WINNIPEG, 12th May, 1877.

“Your tender for dressed beef, made October last, Ottawa, accepted to-day.”

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Signed by whom?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Gouin; who says that this tender was then accepted.

MR. YOUNG said that Mr. Nixon, on oath before the Committee, swore, and repeated the statement again and again, that he did not telegraph accepting Demers' offer, but that he was desirous of knowing whether Demers would supply dressed beef at 8c. a pound, which his friends in the city said he would do. Mr. Nixon had no tender to that effect; he had nothing that he could hold Demers to; and, therefore, he wished to know whether Demers would confirm the statement which his friends in Winnipeg made; but no answer, as they know, was received to his application. Taking Demers' letter here, as a matter of fact, if Nixon had accepted the offer it contained, and if Demers had acted up to it, this would have cost the Government more than even the tender which was actually accepted. If they read this letter carefully, they would find that it did not undertake to supply dressed beef at any point except Edmonton and places south of it, whereas all the beef required there was some 3,000lbs., while the great bulk of the meat was required at points, in some cases, about 1,000 miles further west.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : This is Demers' statement :—

“WINNIPEG, MANITOBA, 31st Aug., 1877.

“I went to Ottawa in October last, and while there wrote the Minister of the Interior, offering to furnish beef at such places and in such quantity in the North-West Territory as the Government would require during the summer of 1877, at the price of eight cents per pound.”

And this was the tender which the telegram stated was accepted; and if, as you state, this would have cost the Government more, why did Mr. Nixon accept it?

MR. YOUNG said he had already explained to the hon. gentleman that Mr. Nixon had again and again sworn that the statement that he accepted this offer was the statement made by another gentleman, and not by himself, in the city of Winnipeg.

MR. HOLTON : Who was Gouin?

MR. YOUNG : A friend of Demers. Under this letter there was no means on the part of Mr. Nixon whereby Demers could have been held to supply the beef at the price stated at points further east than Edmonton, which, of course, might have made the cost of the beef very much greater than the price at which it was supplied by MacKay. He (Mr. Young) had watched the proceedings of this Committee very closely. He was desirous of ascertaining the truth with regard to the action of Nixon in this case, and after the investigation was over, he came to the conclusion, which he here stated, that so far as these two contracts were concerned, Mr. Nixon had acted in a highly proper manner in every respect, and in a way to promote the best interests of the country, whose agent he was in the North-West. It was not his place to defend Mr. Nixon on the floor of this House, or to answer for his actions. He thought, however, that it was unfair for the hon. member for Niagara to say that in going to the North-West, Nixon did so to board with a contractor. This man was not then a contractor. Nixon swore that he expected to pay for his board to Sutherland when he went there. He considered, nevertheless, that it would have been wiser for

MR. YOUNG.

Nixon when he found out that he was likely to be a contractor to have removed promptly, as he did five months afterwards. Although it was true that Nixon paid for the cutter he received from Sutherland and gave a cheque for it, this cheque was returned. He thought that Nixon would have acted wisely if he had upon no consideration whatever received any such present from Sutherland's hands; but he was bound to say that in the close investigation that was made looking into every fact and point, it was not shown that in any single particular Nixon ever favoured Sutherland or that a single dollar was lost to the Government by his action in the matters that came before him. Mr. Sutherland evidently sought to placate Nixon and endeavour to bestow some favours upon him; but there was no evidence before them that Nixon ever favoured Sutherland or any other person else to the disadvantage of the Government. In nearly all the cases, if not in all, Nixon accepted the lowest tenders for the articles tendered. Regarding the lease of the workhouse for Government stores, he thought it only justice to Nixon to say, what was not brought out by the member for Niagara, that in his own warehouse, which he bought to be leased to the Government, he referred the matter to the Department before the lease was effected.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : No; he said he did not do it.

MR. YOUNG : Oh, he did.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : I beg your pardon.

MR. YOUNG said he so understood Nixon; and further, he swore there was only one other available warehouse in the city. The one they had formerly occupied was in such a dilapidated condition, it was necessary to remove from it, while it necessitated the employment of two or three storemen in different parts of the city. In making the change, therefore, there were only two places available; the place besides the one which Nixon leased to the Government. The person owning it had refused to let it for less than $720 per annum, whereas the rent of the warehouse now occupied was only $430. He had no hesitation in saying he thought that whatever the circumstances were, it was not discreet on the part of Nixon to use a building in which he himself had an interest. No wrong was possibly done to the Government or country, but a gentleman occupying such a position should keep as far away from any position that might be misinterpreted as he possibly could. However, these were minor points, and so far as the contracts that passed through Nixon's hands in the North-West were concerned, he believed that the general feeling of the committee, or at least of the majority, was, that Nixon acted wisely and discreetly, and in the interests of the Government, and had shown due care in awarding these contracts, letting them, in almost every case, to the lowest tenderer; and in all cases, as far as they could judge, in the best interests of the people at large.

MR. McCALLUM said that the hon. member for South Waterloo accused his hon. friend from Centre Wellington of wanting in knowledge on this question. The hon. gentleman said that the report of the Committee had been before the House for a few days. He could say, as a member, that he had not seen the report yet, though the members of the committee might have had it before them. The hon. member for South Waterloo and North York, asserted that Nixon was an able officer, and that he had always acted in the interests of the country; of course, this was to be taken for granted. But what were the facts. Of course, they knew that this officer had graduated on a former occasion in the interests of the party in the township of Proton, Ontario; and what were the facts, now. They found from the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee that this country had lost $31,000, by his actions. This was the fact.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. McCALLUM: Yes, yes; \$31,000 was the difference between the lowest and the accepted tender as he understood, and this matter could not be cleared up. He heard a good deal said about deposits being forfeited. As a member of the House he had always been opposed to the Government compelling contractors to make deposits at all, because he thought that this policy on the part of the Government had a tendency to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Many a man was honest and able and willing to carry out a contract, but not able to make a deposit; and as long as a man gave two solvent securities and the Government kept back 15 per cent of the contract price, this ought to be sufficient, because under these circumstances the Government had the power of discriminating in favour of their friends. No doubt, this was the case. As he understood it, the lowest tenderer was got out of the way; he got an appointment, and there was something in this. It might be all right, but it looked a little smoky at least. As to the facts, the hon. the First Minister told them about these parties who forfeited their deposits. They knew one instance where the deposit was not forfeited in the case of the Georgian Bay Branch. Mr. Foster got back a deposit which was a large one; and therefore there was no object in making a deposit. That was the fact with respect to this beef contract, that there was a difference of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound in the prices that one man offered to furnish the beef for a less price than it was now furnished for, and that there was  $4\frac{1}{2}$  c., or at least 50 per cent. difference. Was this fulfilling the duty which Nixon owed to the country? The hon. member for North York and South Waterloo said so; but the hon. the Premier did not say so. This hon. gentleman could not go so far as to approve of Nixon's conduct, but his followers did so; the hon. gentleman could not do it himself, and he gave him credit for not defending the actions of this man. The hon. member for South Waterloo said that Nixon consulted the Government, but he would like to know from the hon. the Minister of Public Works whether this was the case. Nixon bought this warehouse property, and gave a mortgage, and said that money was worth in Winnipeg 18 per cent., and that he was only paying six. If money was worth there 18 per cent., he thought that the hon. the Minister of Finance should transfer some of his funds in that direction.

MR. BOWELL said he should not have occupied the time of the House in this regard but for, to his mind, the most extraordinary course which had been pursued by the hon. member for Waterloo and the member for one of the Elgins in reference to this matter. Anyone who had paid attention to these investigations must have come to this conclusion, that the gravest irregularities had taken place in connection with the office of purveyor to the North-West. How anyone could read this evidence, or how anyone who listened to the manner in which this evidence, could get up calmly and coolly and deliberately and defend the actions of Nixon, was beyond the comprehension of any ordinary mortal. He was not a little surprised also at the statement made by the hon. member for South Waterloo in taking the hon. member for Centre Wellington to task for having referred to this matter, and, in being ignorant of the facts. He should have stated that this evidence had been before the House for a week or ten days. The hon. gentleman's own report was only presented on Saturday last, and this was Monday.

MR. YOUNG: It is in the newspapers.

MR. BOWELL said it was true that the newspapers had published certain portions of the evidence, and equally true that his hon. friend had quoted from a Ministerial newspaper part of the evidence upon which he based his statement, and he was then coolly told that he was totally ignorant of what he was speaking about.

MR. YOUNG: These sheets were published too.

MR. BOWELL said that this showed the newspaper reports were not correct, though contained in Ministerial journals. It was true that the evidence had been printed; but its circulation had been confined exclusively to members of the Committee; and it was a matter that could not be discussed in the House until formally laid before the House. It might be the opinion of the hon. member for South Waterloo, that the hon. member for Wellington went a round-about way in order to arrive at the conclusion that his present opponent might possibly be interested in this tri-contract by which the country lost some $32,000, the difference between the lowest tender and that which was accepted. There was this extraordinary fact, that the gentleman who was about to contest the riding of the hon. member for Centre Wellington, was the brother of the gentleman who got this contract. There might be no connection between these two circumstances. He did not say that there was, for he did not know; but the hon. gentleman had a right to infer that there might possibly be a little collusion, particularly when it was known that this man had some objection to becoming a candidate at all. The ordinary way he thought of doing this business, if there had been anything like common sense exercised by Nixon in connection with these contracts, would have been to have done what, he believed, every man did under such circumstances in his own business; and that was where there were 10 or 12 persons whose tenders were withdrawn or who refused to accept, instead of giving the tender at 44c., when some persons had tendered as low as 25c., to have readvertised for tenders for the supply of these ties; that was the common sense of transacting business of this kind. It was not a matter of urgent necessity that these ties should be immediately delivered, and it did not look like favouring these persons who obtained the contract at a rate which cost the country $32,000 more than a portion of the ties were tendered for. This was made up of the difference between 25c. and 44c. a tie. In regard to the beef contract, Mr. Nixon, in his evidence, stated that he based his calculation upon the price for the beef given in the letter of Demers, which was sent him at the late period to which the hon. gentleman had referred, and basing his calculations upon this price, he came to the conclusion that McKay's tender at 12½c. a pound would be cheaper than Demers, offer at 8c. a pound; and he left the impression upon the minds of a portion of the Committee who had not read the letter of Demers, that it was for the furnishing of the same class of beef. But when the letter was read, and after Nixon had been closely questioned on the point, it turned out that this price was for cattle to be put as stock on North-West farms which were to be of a certain kind and of a certain breed. Then Demers immediately afterwards said :—

“I beg respectfully to call your attention to the fact that in most cases cattle shipped for the butcher shops can be sold at a figure below the price obtained for cattle selected for stocking a farm.”

What the hon. member for Niagara complained of, and what the members of the Committee complained of—at least that portion who desired to arrive at the facts and the truth, and who did not desire to cover up what looked at least like a colorable transaction on the part of Nixon—was that he deliberately attempted to mislead the Committee by telling them that he based his calculation upon these figures which were for the supply of a better class of beef for the stocking of farms, instead of that class of beef which, as he himself said, could have been supplied at a much lower rate for the butcher stalls. This was the point of which he (Mr. Bowell) thought that the Committee had a right to complain; and this was the point to which the hon. member for Niagara desired to call the attention of the House, as well as to the mode and manner in which this evidence was given; and it was with a great deal of difficulty that even they could get Nixon to admit this fact. It was only through questioning and cross-questioning for some time that Nixon was made to admit the fact that he had based his calculation upon these figures which were no basis at all upon which to make a correct and proper calculation. He (Mr. Bowell) had intended only to refer to a very few points in order to show the hon. gentlemen who had spoken in defence of Nixon were wrong, and one would really think that these were attorneys defending their clients instead of members of a public and deliberative body, who desired to arrive at a correct conclusion in connection with these matters; and he must take exception now to the position taken by the hon.

the First Minister, because he, as the head of the Government, had paid no attention to this matter, it was improper and indelicate to discuss it. They knew that one or two members of the Cabinet were present watching the case; and that the hon. the Minister of the Interior, under whose special supervision Nixon conducted his business, was also present, and took part in the examination. The hon. gentleman ought, at least, to be able to state to the House what the opinions the Government had formed on this point. The hon. member for South Waterloo told the House that there was not a particle of evidence to show that Nixon had ever favoured Thornton and Sutherland in any way in connection with these contracts. He (Mr. Bowell) must premise by saying that there was a direct conflict of testimony as between Scott & Sutherland's clerk and Nixon himself; and he wanted to point out this fact to the House, that Sutherland himself telegraphed to the Committee, as would be found on the Votes and Proceedings, that Scott could give all the information Sutherland could give; and that it was not convenient for him to attend the Committee. As soon as Scott was summoned by telegraph Sutherland refused to allow him to leave his employment, and told him—this was in evidence—that if he did leave, he need never come back again. Of course, Mr. Scott replied that he was bound to obey the summons of Parliament, and he did leave, and they all knew that Mr. Sutherland had distinctly and positively refused to come down upon a peremptory summons. Mr. Scott had sworn that Mr. Nixon brought certain tenders to the office of Messrs. Thornton & Sutherland; that Strang, Mr. Bannatyne's clerk, asked him if he could not do better. He said “yes,” and they deliberately went over the tenders, and made Mr. Sutherland's tender lower, than the other, and the original tender sent in to Mr. Nixon was destroyed, and a new one made out, under which Mr. Sutherland obtained the contract. Mr. Nixon denied this, but Mr. Scott could have no possible object in coming here to swear to a deliberate falsehood against Mr. Nixon. Mr. Nixon admitted that Mr. Scott was a man of respectable character. Mr. Nixon, however, had a direct interest in showing that he was not guilty of what he was accused. He quoted from the evidence in reference to the account of Sutherland against Nixon, and the manner in which it was settled. In the Committee Mr. Nixon evidently intended to mislead, because, in answer to the member for East Elgin, he stated he had given Mr. Sutherland a cheque to pay for the cutter, but he had afterwards to admit that the cheque was handed back to Mr. Nixon, and had not been paid since. The whole thing led but to one conclusion, which was that he had been receiving these considerations for favours he had given to Messrs. Thornton & Sutherland in connection with the contracts. Anyone who read the mass of evidence must come to the conclusion that, if there were no direct and intentional wrong on the part of Mr. Nixon in the giving out of these contracts for the Government, there had been the gravest irregularities, by which the Government had lost money. How far the same system had been carried on in the case of Mr. Bannatyne, he could not say. Mr. Nixon had gone to Winnipeg, and had become the guest, as he said, of one of the wholesale dealers supplying the Government. He had lived there five and a-half months for nothing, in a dear country, and they found him balancing his account by nearly $600 profit and loss, and receiving presents of different kinds from this man. The explanation was that he subsequently tried to get these accounts. But when? When it became public in Winnipeg that this favouritism was being carried on. Then, finding that he was getting into difficulty, he said: "This must be settled;" and to cover up the five and a half months' board, he made a present of $30 or $25 to some of the family. If the Government did not take this matter in hand and dismiss a man like Mr. Nixon, whose admissions were recorded in this evidence, they would not do their duty to this House or the country. As to the property which had been alluded to, Mr. Nixon found that a property could be bought for $1,500. He paid $500 cash; spent $400 in repairs; gave a note to Mr. Bannatyne at six per cent., and leased it to the Government at $432 per annum, which was to be paid to Mr. Bannatyne until the balance of the purchase money had been wiped out. The member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) asked why he went to Mr. Strang, and Mr. Nixon replied that "he did not want to be known in that matter himself." He admitted that the Government knew he had another property, and no doubt he represented that the Government stores would be better kept there than in the old place. But he studiously kept from the Government the fact that he was the owner; that the rent was to pay the purchase money, and that the money would go into his pocket while he was a servant of the Government. If the Government wanted a property, why did they not buy it, or enter into a contract with Mr. Bannatyne, and in three or four years the rent they were paying Mr. Nixon, through Mr. Bannatyne's clerk, would have paid for the property? In five years Mr. Nixon would have the whole of the principal, interest, insurance and repairs paid back to him, and he would have a reliable property in Winnipeg, at the expense of the Government; and yet the member for South Waterloo saw nothing wrong in the transaction, and considered Mr. Nixon's whole conduct irreproachable.

MR. YOUNG: I said he ought to keep as far away as possible from a transaction of that kind, but there was nothing to show that the Government had lost anything by the action of Mr. Nixon.

MR. BOWELL said some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House had attempted to defend Mr. Nixon.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): North York.

MR. BOWELL: He is an exception to others.

MR. DYMOND said he had stated that Mr. Nixon had been guilty of indiscretion, but nothing criminal or actually wrong. He deprecated the action in connection with the lease, but he thought the Government had saved money by the transaction.

MR. BOWELL said there was nothing to show that the Government could not have got the same bargain with Mr. Bannantyne as Mr. Nixon had made. Mr. Scott had stated that the evidence in the bill books and letter books had been torn out and destroyed, and that Mr. Sutherland had refused to come here and testify. That was very good evidence that Mr. Scott was telling the truth. Mr. Sutherland had also refused to allow him to look at the ledger, to enable him to give more minute testimony to the Committee, and he had therefore been obliged, to a large extent, to speak from his recollection. He thought the whole matter was enough to lead the Government to remodel their Purveyor's office in the city of Winnipeg.

MR. TUPPER said he thought the Premier was entirely mistaken as to the practice in this House, when he complained, on a former occasion, that the Government had been taken by surprise, and that the Opposition were not exhibiting the usual courtesy in bringing up a question of this kind without notice. It had been the almost uniform practice on going into Committee of Supply to bring up any matter of grievance or any question on which any hon. member desired to have an expression of opinion from the House without notice. The hon. gentleman had followed that course himself on similar occasions, and he would see by referring to the journals of 1873, page 252, that he had moved a motion of that kind. He (Mr. Tupper) desired to take the opportunity of this motion to go into Supply, to explain the reason why he had not availed himself of any opportunity of moving a motion of which he had given notice, in reference to the sugar duties, inasmuch as the object of that motion had been entirely misapprehended out of the House, if not in it. That question had been discussed very fully on the first motion to go into Supply, and he thought hon. gentlemen opposite would admit that he had endeavoured, as far as possible, to pursue such a course in relation to these questions as not to necessarily involve going over the same subject which had already been considered. The motion of which he had given notice was one which would not be considered as one of want of confidence in the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was a motion of confidence.

MR. TUPPER said it was rather a motion of confidence, and so far from moving it hostile to the Government, he had considered that the peculiar circumstances of the case were such as justified him in giving information to the Government on the subject. The notice which he had given had relation to the motion made in Congress by the Hon. Fernando Wood. He believed hon. gentlemen opposite would agree with him that it was not desirable to decrease any protection now afforded Canadian industries, and he had considered that the proposal contained in Mr. Wood's amendment to the tariff was one which would be fatal to many of the struggling industries now carried on in this country. The present law in the United States provided that where articles were wholly manufactured from materials that had paid duties, a drawback should be allowed on their being exported to a foreign country, subject to a reduction of 15 per cent. by the Government. Mr. Wood's proposal altered that in a very material way. He proposed to extend the provision to the class of goods which were, in part, manufactured from material which had paid duty. This would embrace almost everything, and would reach almost all the industries existing in this country at this moment; and he also proposed to abandon the amount of duty which, under the present law, the Government retained. It was in view of that he had put the notice on the paper, in order that hon. gentlemen opposite might have their attention drawn to it, and might, if they thought proper, take some step to prevent such a serious increased advantage being given to competitors with Canadian industries. The subsequent proceedings in Congress had led him to doubt very much whether that was likely to take place. He believed the notice on the paper was an indication of the views held on the subject. He trusted the hon. the Finance Minister would consider closely the legislation taking place in that connection, and, if our industries were to be placed at a greater disadvantage than at present, he would draw the attention of Parliament to it before the close of the Session.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that his hon. friend knew that the proposition was to bring that tariff, if brought at all into operation, into effect on the 1st January, 1879.

Mr. TUPPER said, notwithstanding that, there was this advantage in dealing with the question. It would show that there was not the advantage to be gained by the alteration of the law in the United States that might be assumed, if it were not, for instance, met by some corresponding action here. If the change in tariff were likely to become law, it would seriously affect the credit of people in this country who were engaged in the interests which would be affected by it. He took this opportunity of briefly stating the object he had in view in putting the notice on the paper, expressing his intention not to press the motion unless there was a change in the existing state of things.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

105. Lower St. Lawrence, repairing various Breakwaters..... $20,000

In reply to Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not tell what was done with the whole vote of last year. There was about $20,000 spent altogether on several piers on the South side of the St. Lawrence. This year, according to Mr. Kingford's estimates, there would be required about $5,000 for L'Islet pier, $3,000 for the pier at Rivière Ouelle,

MR. TUPPER.

$3,200 for planking the pier at Rivière du Loup, and for stone-filling said pier $1,800; total, $5,000 for Rivière du Loup. Repairs and changes to be effected at Chicoutimi would require $4,000 to $5,000. As far as he understood, some work which had been done at Chicoutimi pier had had the effect of making the current too strong, and which error had to be remedied. There was a balance of $2,800 put down for general repairs. In addition to all this, he had received information which led him to believe that a sum of $4,000 was due to a steamship company for which he proposed to take a vote in the Supplementary Estimates, in which he also proposed to put a sum to commence work at Matane harbour, which was likely to prove somewhat expensive before it could be made a real harbour of refuge. If the papers connected with this harbour were not down he would have them brought down.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he was sorry the Minister of Public Works could not give him the details of the expenditure of these $22,000 last year. The major portion of it, $20,000, was expended on that same pier at L'Islet, and it was then understood that amount would cover the whole cost of the improvement. He was surprised that $5,000 more were asked for this pier.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that $22,000 were required to complete the work. In page 53 of the appendix, its length was stated to be 1,200 ft., and that the work would have to be continued two seasons before it could be completed. The pier had sunk, and a portion of it was rotten, and it had also to be replanked. There was a general complaint that the piers in the St. Lawrence were all too low. This was particularly the case at Rivière du Loup, where the pier had sunk to such an extent that, at high tide, the water actually covered it, and it was questionable whether a pier or two piers of timber would not have to be put on it besides planking. The pier at Rimouski would also require to be thoroughly repaired and extended.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. the Minister of Public Works was perfectly right in stating that these piers were generally too narrow and too low. He knew that a schooner had, in a storm, passed clear over the pier at L'Islet which was very narrow and low. Of course if the money was required for those piers it should be voted. With respect to Chicoutimi pier, it was since the 1st June, 1874, that the work had been done which was complained of. There were openings in the wharf to allow the water to pass through. These were closed in 1874-5, and since then the current, whose strength had been broken by passing through those openings, became so strong that vessels could not moor there.

103	{	St. John Harbour.....	$16,000
		Black River, St. John Co....	4,500
		Grand Anse, Gloucester Co..	2,000
		Shippegan Breakwater, Gloucester Co.....	6,000
			$23,500

MR. MACKENZIE said the $16,000 was to pay the balance on the contract for the breakwater outside the harbour of St. John, which was now complete and was exceedingly fine work. $2,000 of this amount were required to give some additional strength to the extreme end of the pier. The work would then be a work for all time, and the most efficient protection that could be conceived to St. John harbour. The entire estimated cost was $240,000, but the additional work and the services of superintendents raised the amount to probably $248,000. The $4,500 was for a breakwater at the mouth of the Black River. It was an entirely new vote. The $2,000 at Grand Anse was to finish a small work there, intended for fishermen, towards which the locality had contributed $2,000 last year. The $6,000 for the Shippegan breakwater was to complete the work which the former contractor had failed to proceed with.

MR. MITCHELL said that Point Escuminac formed the south-eastern point at the entrance of the River Miramichi, and afforded little shelter to the south-eastward. If the wind veered, it was impossible to escape danger. Very frequently there were terrific storms here; and he had seen as many as from 400 to 500 vessels under the lee of this point at one time; and if the wind veered a few points to the north or eastward, it was almost impossible to obtain shelter. He had called attention to this matter previously; this work was expressly required, and it would be to the advantage rather of persons belonging to Kent than his own county. He would like to know whether the Government would give this matter serious consideration; whether it would be included in the Supplementary Estimates, and whether a survey of the locality would be ordered. He had no hesitation in saying that Mr. Speaker would agree that the erection of such a breakwater would be very desirable in the interest of the fishermen there. This locality was on the borders of Kent and mostly in Kent county. He had written to the Government about it, and enclosed a petition from the fishermen.

MR. MACKENZIE said that Mr. Perley had verbally reported to him that this place was so near the Miramichi River, a first-class harbour, that there did not seem to be any eminent necessity for such a work at the time. The very fact that the hon. gentleman, though in office for seven or eight years, had not built this breakwater, showed that he did not think that it was of the first importance at all events. He supposed that it was rather desirable for fishing boats rather than for anything else.

MR. MITCHELL: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had requested Mr. Perley to give further information on this point during this Session.

MR. MITCHELL said he was sure that Mr. Perley had never been on the spot, and knew nothing at all about the matter. He admitted that while in office he had neglected this work; but, nevertheless, it was one of the first importance. He had had to create the Minister of Marine and Fisheries Department; and he had sought to regard the interests of the whole Dominion impartially.

MR. SPEAKER said he thought that this work was very much required. He was familiar with the locality; such shelter for the fishermen was unquestionably needed.

MR. MITCHELL said that it was not uncommon to see from 800 to 1,000 fishing boats off on the neighbouring banks; and for one fisherman interested in this matter from his own county, there were twenty from the county of Mr. Speaker.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works if the Government had arrived at any conclusion with reference to a work of considerable importance in Nova Scotia, which had been under the consideration of the late Government, and which had been brought to the notice of this Government from time to time. He referred to the closing of the Port Hood harbour, Cape Breton.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was fully aware of the importance of the work in question. At present there was great danger of this harbour being still more seriously injured owing to the action of the sea. Mr. Pailey's lowest estimate for a substantial work, however, $360,000, and owing to the state of the finances, this amount could not at present be spared. If $10,000 or $12,600 would be of any utility, however, this might be voted. This work was rather required for general than for local convenience.

MR. MACDONNELL said that this improvement was urgently needed in the interests of the shipping, Provincial and American, that frequented the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This was a most important harbour. About forty years ago the beach which connected Justan Crops Island with the mainland was carried away, and since then the sea had been washing large quantities of sand annually into the harbour. He had seen over 300 vessels in this harbour at one time during a storm. The only harbour of refuge on the North-West side of Cape Breton, on the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and Bay St. George, which formed an almost direct coast line was that of Port Hood, and for ships blown by storms from any of the ports to the west of it, and other ports on Prince Edward Island, and along the northern shores of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Many vessels were annually wrecked along this coast. Only last Fall, in one day, 103 vessels had taken refuge in this harbour, and on the following morning 13 others were stranded on the shore. Not a single one of them belonged to the county of Inverness. In 1847, the charts showed here 27 or 28 feet of water, where, in 1873, only 7 or 8 feet were shown. This showed how rapidly this harbour was becoming useless; and, in a few years more, it would be entirely useless. This work should be immediately undertaken. The sum mentioned was not much when they considered the importance of this harbour. The fact that the expenditure was required for the general good, and that, if utterly destroyed, this whole coast line of 110 miles would be forever without a harbour, unless an artificial harbour was constructed. He claimed that that portion of the Dominion had a fair claim to a large expenditure. The members for the Maritime Provinces had voted that the Baie Verte Canal, which would cost about $10,000,000, was not essential to the public interest, and that work had been condemned and indefinitely postponed. On that occasion the member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) threw out a hint that in justice to the Maritime Provinces, other works of a kindred character ought to receive the consideration of the Government. He had expected that immediate attention would be paid to the improvement of this harbour, but up to this moment he had been disappointed. He did not believe in a policy which omitted to proceed with the public works of the Dominion, because there was a deficit in the revenue. He cordially sympathized with the opinion of the right hon. member for Kingston, that when there was distress in the country the Government should proceed with public works for the twofold reason, that relief would be afforded to the distressed labourers, and at the same time labour was cheap. He hoped the Government would turn attention to this work at once. It was one that could not be constructed piecemeal; but he thought a small grant of $20,000 or so, would be sufficient this season in order that the work would be initiated before another year elapsed. Although the contract might not be entered into till late in the season, it was desirable to procure such material as was necessary.

MR. MACKENZIE said the Government would have no hesitation at all about a grant such as the hon. gentleman had named; but he feared it would be utterly impossible to do anything with so small a sum. What he proposed was to have the plans, which were almost complete, and advertise to get tenders and see the minimum sum for which it could be built, then they would know exactly where they stood at the next Session of Parliament. He feared that a grant of $10,000 or $20,000 would be practically useless because it would be impossible to expend that amount with advantage unless that work were continued. Any attempt to build this by sections would be a failure. It would require to be carried on extensively at once, in order to avoid the damage from a winter in an exposed position of that kind. However, he would consult the Engineers of the Department before the Supplementary Estimates were brought down.

MR. MACDONNELL said that before undertaking the work of construction it would be necessary to obtain a great deal of plank and material, and any amount, however small, would be profitable and well expended in that respect.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, unless it was resolved to go on with this work, the expenditure of a small amount of money would be unwise. He understood that Mr. Perley's estimate was $200,000, and the House should consider the matter very seriously before spending such a large amount of money, unless the matter was of great national importance. He objected to the idea propounded by the First Minister, that tenders should be asked for before Parliament had sanctioned the construction of the work; that people should be put to the expense of obtaining data on which to base tenders, and should run the risk of forfeiting $1,000 before the Government had made up their minds to go on with it.

MR. MITCHELL said the work was of great importance; he had seen over 100 vessels in that harbour.

In answer to Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton),

MR. MACKENZIE said that, last year, $7,363 had been expended on Cow Bay breakwater, but they did not expect that more than $1,000 would be required to keep up the ordinary repairs this year. This work yielded a considerable revenue—last year over $4,000. Mr. Archibald and others had spent some money on it the year before without any authority. The Government had not thought it right to pay that, because it was spent without their authority, and on works which they had not intended to touch.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said that at Main-à-Dieu, C.B., the inhabitants had been asking for a breakwater for some years. Frequently fishing vessels from different parts took refuge there. The late Government had a survey made of this harbour, and he thought the engineer recommended that a breakwater should be built at a cost of $35,000. He was sorry the Government could not see their way clear to build it. At Cow Bay a general complaint prevailed as to the way in which the money was expended there last year. The man who had charge of the work only employed people of a certain political stripe, and bought timber from parties of the same class. He hoped this year the hon. the Minister of Public Works would prevent the man in charge from using the public money in that way.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he believed it was true that the expenditure on the breakwater by the Messrs Archibald was unauthorised by the Government, but the Government properly got the benefit of their expenditure, and he thought the Government were in honour bound to reimburse them, because, if that expenditure had not been made, there would be very little of the breakwater existing at the present day. He agreed with his colleague from Cape Breton, as to the necessities of the harbour of Main-a-Dieu. It was a large fishing port which was often used as a harbour of refuge, but, without a breakwater, it was of very little assistance to the people who went there when certain winds prevailed. It was news to him that any complaint existed as to the expenditure of money at Cow Bay.

MR. BUNSTER expressed his regret that not a dollar was to be expended this year in British Columbia, notwithstanding the liberal assistance that was expected towards the construction of a dry dock. The harbours of British Columbia required more attention and the Minister of Marine should remember the ports. He certainly had a right to feel aggrieved at not having these amounts expended.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were twelve votes here for the first time for ports in Nova Scotia and not the slightest explanation given.

MR. MACKENZIE said the first item was for the removal of some boulders in the river near the landing. The $1,000 for Mordon pier was to complete repairs begun last year, with a part of the $10,000 for general vote. Ragged Pond was a harbour on the Atlantic coast, in Guysboro; the amount was for the purpose of deepening the channel. The amount at Cow Bay was simply for repairs.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he had asked for papers connected with the expenditure of Cow Bay Breakwater, about a month ago, and had not yet received them. The statement he made was simply the complaints in that district. He might also tell the hon. the Premier that the gentlemen who had charge of the expenditure of that money last year was now canvassing the district telling the people he had to spend the amount of $7,000 or more; and that the money would give employment to young men in that district during the summer season. He was quite satisfied that this reason should go down to his constituents in Cow Bay, who would be able to judge of its correctness. With respect to the money spent by the people on that breakwater, he trusted the Government would take that matter into consideration, and if they were entitled to any money, it would be only right the Government should pay them. With regard to the breakwater at Manitou the hon. Premier had stated in reply to his (Mr. McDonald's) colleague that he intended doing something for this harbour; that he was consulting the engineer to see whether it was necessary to make a survey of the harbor. The question and the answer would not lead anyone to suppose that any survey had previously been made. The answer led him to suppose that the Government would consider the matter and make enquiries of the engineer this year, and if the engineer recommended the breakwater, something would be done.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was not what he said. He said the Engineer did not consider the expenditure which the works at Manito would require to be justified by the surveys which would be rendered, and the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay) seemed to say that a much less sum would do effective work there, more than what was expected. His (Mr. Mackenzie's) reply was that he had no objections whatever to enquire of Mr. Perley whether a smaller sum would not be sufficient. Mr. Perley's estimates were for $25,000 or $30,000 for the contemplated work to be of any use. As there were other harbours at a great distance on either side, the Department did not think so large a sum should be expended there. If any service could be done by the expenditure of a smaller sum there would not be so much objection. With respect to Cow Bay he was not responsible for what the agent there said. If the agent had said anything improper he (Mr. Mackenzie) would attend to it, but the Government should not be charged with the responsibility of such rubbish as that.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he did not imagine the Premier had enabled that agent to circulate such statements in that district, but he might have received his information from other quarters.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was quite impossible that the agent could have had information officially. He did not communicate with any person about the expenditure of money anywhere throughout the whole country good, bad or indifferent. He knew nothing about him. He left the engagement of such to the Superintendent, Mr. Perley, and if he had employed any improper person, or if any improper allegations had been made by him, he (Mr. Mackenzie) would deal with them in a proper manner.

MR. MacKAY said the last remark of the hon. member for Cape Breton would almost appear to insinuate that if this gentleman had not the authority of the Government to say there was to be certain expenditure on Cow Bay breakwater during the coming year, that he (Mr. MacKay) must have given him some hint to that effect. That insinuation had not the slightest foundation.

MR. McDONALD said he was glad to hear the statement of the hon. member, but he hoped, so far as the works were concerned, they would go on, and that the statements alleged to be made to this man, would not turn out correct before the elections came off.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were twelve new votes for ports in Nova Scotia, not for works or continuation, but new, distinct votes. It looked very like a political barometer. These twelve votes were divided among seven counties; of these seven counties, six had the advantage of having Ministerial supporters in this House; the seventh was represented by a Minister-ialist, and a gentleman in Opposition; therefore it had the smallest vote, viz.: the $1,000 for Cow Bay. He could not congratulate his hon. friend from Queen's. He must be expected to be very hard run in his county, because he has got $11,000 out of the $38,000 for two different ports in his county, in order to secure his election. That was a pretty good allowance. $11,000 would not go very far in an election. The next was his hon. friend from Kings (Mr. Borden) who must also be hard run since he gets $7,000; he gets three votes for three distinct ports in his county, in order to save him.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: He must be very popular if that will get him in.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Did it cost his hon. friend more than that? He appeared to understand the subject. The next was the hon. member for Richmond. He had only one port, but that was a considerable one. He got $6,000. The hon. member for Antigonish had only one port, and he got $5,000. The hon. member for Guysborough was pretty safe; he only wanted $2,000. The last vote was $1,000, which was divided between the two members for Cape Breton. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) really believed the Ministerial member for Cape Breton would have had a bigger vote, only the Premier thought it would also have helped the enemy. So he thought he would be economical as far as Cow Bay was concerned. It was rather odd that, just before an election, that a vote of $38,500, not for the continuation of works going on or voted last year, but for new works altogether, should be given just at the right time.

MR. TUPPER said it was not often he was obliged to differ with his right hon. friend. He was satisfied that, if his hon. friend who led the Opposition were as well acquainted as the hon. members for Nova Scotia, with the character of the country, and the necessity that existed for adequate provision along the coasts and shores for the protection of shipping and the facilities for trading, he would understand that no money placed in there estimates was calculated to be of greater service to the whole country than these sums which he had criticised.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Kingston forgets. He says it takes $11,000 to secure the election of the friends around me; but it takes $30,000 to secure the election of the hon. member for Kingston, and, perhaps, that will not do it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. member tried very hard to elect me by that kind of expenditure in 1874.

MR. MACKENZIE: I see that there is $30,000 for that interesting place.

MR. MITCHELL: Will a survey for Point Escuminac break-water be ordered?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. MITCHELL said that boulders which were in the way of steamers should be removed from the entrance of Miramichi River. A portion of the bar had been removed three years ago, and this had been of great service, but much remained to be done.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not able to say whether they could now do anything in this direction. It seemed absolutely necessary to remove obstructions in Assiniboine and Red Rivers, in order to enable them to be used at all; and he could not at present tell how much this would take. He understood that the improvement of this river, which was mostly needed and really necessitous, was done.

MR. MITCHELL said that this was probably Mr. Perley's opinion, which was most unreliable. Boulders lay in the bed of the river, and they ought to be taken out. His constituents thought that their interests did not get fair play under this Administration.

MR. McCALLUM: Are these all new votes?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

MR. McCALLUM: I understood that, owing to the bad state of the finances, no new works were to be attempted. To vote $38,000 may be fun for the House, but it is not fun for the country.

MR. MACKENZIE: Four or five of them are not new works.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: In the Estimates of 1872, under similar circumstances, the main or original estimate for this purpose amounted to $1,193,000.

MR. MITCHELL: We were flourishing then.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: As against $963,000, which we are asking for now.

MR. MITCHELL: But there were no deficits then.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not know that any great complaint can be made when the item for public works is placed at under a million. I never held out the hope that we could get along with less than a million for public works, particularly when you bear in mind that nearly one-half of this goes for what may be called regular annual expenditure for rent, repairs and necessary dredging, and wharves and matters of that kind.

MR. MITCHELL said that we had had three successive deficits under this Government, while under the late Government they had three surpluses. They had had a surplus of $1,700,000 when the estimate the hon. gentleman mentioned was made. He did not have the same implicit confidence in Mr. Perley that the hon. the First Minister had. He found that, according to the public accounts, this official controlled the expenditure of $108,031 in various harbours in Antigonish, Shippegan and others. He did not think that this was proper. It was most extraordinary.

MR. MACKENZIE said that a mistake was evidently made in the entry. He would see about it. Mr. Perley had no authority in any case except with regard to small sums. The only case in question was Ingonish harbour.

MR. SPEAKER said that nothing was paid in Shippegan harbour, except through Mr. Perley, to the contractors.

		<hr/> $25,000 00

MR. MACKENZIE said that the $20,000 was for repairing the new pier which was partially destroyed in Souris harbour in a storm late last autumn. The $3,500 was for finishing the contract for Malpeque harbour breakwater. The estimate taken last year was insufficient. No contractor could be found to take it at the estimate. The item for New London was simply for repairs to existing works. He had been accused by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Pope), now absent, of having neglected to put stone around the foot of the pier; but this was not the case; the foundation was as good as ever. If any fault was to be found with the structure it was because it was not sufficiently strong to resist the sea, which had rolled in at this point, and which had not been contemplated.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) asked why the item for slides and booms was again dropped out.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the Department did not contemplate any necessity for this item this year; in case repairs were required they would be made out of the item for miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, $10,000.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that he was sorry to hear that the Government did not intend to carry out the prayer of the petitioners which had been presented to the Department of Public Works, for the construction of a dam at Des Joachims, and which was considered by the hon. the leader of the Government at one time to be a work of some importance. He (Mr. White) observed that a sum of $5,000 was inserted in the Supplementary Estimates of 1875-6 for this particular work, and as it was of as much consequence to the trade now as in 1875, he hoped that the Government would give it their favourable consideration. Petitions had also been presented praying for the improvement of the works at Rocher Capitaine Rapids. At this point lives were lost annually in consequence of the works. And he (Mr. White) believed that these facts justified him in urging the Government to put those works in an efficient state.

MR. SINCLAIR said that provision was made for dredging Victoria harbour, and a breakwater, which would not cost much, should be erected there. He believed that Mr. Perley's estimate for this purpose was $5,000, at the outside; and he thought it would cost less. He hoped provision would be made for a breakwater in the Supplementary Estimates.

110. Miscellaneous Works not otherwise provided for.....	$10,000

MR. TUPPER said that Wallace Harbour, Cumberland county, required dredging. He had applied for it four years ago, but he supposed that the interests of hon. members who had stronger claims on the Government had been preferred. He had been trying to obtain this improvement now for nearly five years.

MR. MACKENZIE said that one source of difficulty connected with the Maritime Provinces, in this relation, was the want of another small dredge, and he proposed, during the present season, to buy or rent one. The two large dredges the Government owned, could not be used in nineteen-twentieths of the harbours of the Lower Provinces. There was much more for the large dredges to do than to finish the dredging of St. John Harbour, and the mouth of Miramichi River, and they could do very well with the largest of these dredges alone for the future. He neglected no public work on account of the representation of any constituency. He presumed that Wallace Harbour would be the better for dredging, though not represented by the engineers to be an important place; and he would see what could possibly be done in this regard.

MR. MacKAY (Cape Breton) said that Lingan harbour in his county badly needed dredging. A small dredge owned by the General Mining Association was used there; but it was not equal to the requirements of the place.

MR. MITCHELL said that the remainder of the bar should be removed from Miramichi River. This was a very important work. The most part had been taken away but a great deal remained to be done. 160,000 million feet of lumber were sent from this port yearly; and it was frequently by a great deal of shipping. Its exports were immense.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said there was a dredge lying idle in the harbour of Victoria, which was rotting for the want of work, though dredging was required, and an expense of $566 was incurred to keep a man there in charge of that dredge, which he believed had cost the Colony of British Columbia $100,000.

MR. MACKENZIE said the vessel would be put in repair and some work would be done this year, but the filling up of that harbour was to a large extent the fault of the people who put the refuse of the town into it. The Government proposed to remove some rocks in the harbour of Victoria this year.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton), said there was a place in his county, the harbour of Lingan, for which the Premier had promised to do something some time ago.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had not promised. The harbour required to be dredged for about half a mile, he believed. This was an attempt to make deep water where nature never intended to have deep water. They could hardly work a whole season on a place like that, while other places required the services of the dredge. That was in fact a Canal. He did not see how it was possible to dredge out the entrance to Lingan, to the extent asked by the hon. gentleman last year. The large dredges could not go there because they required deep water, and it was impossible to let the small dredge go there.

MR. McDONALD said he had asked for this in 1875. The Premier then said, in answer to himself "that this would be attended to as soon as possible," and his (Mr. McDonald's), colleague had received an official answer already to this question. This was in 1875.

MR. MACKAY.

The Premier had not fulfilled his promise; this and other papers he had asked for in relation to this harbour, did not show the "official answer" referred to. He called upon his colleague to compel the fulfillment of the promise made him in the official answer referred to, and he would again ask the Premier to bring down with the other papers the "official answer" which he said was given by his Department. He had interpreted this to mean that, as soon as possible, he would send a dredge to deepen that harbour. He had asked for the correspondence but had not found what he wanted in that correspondence. And it rested between the hon. Premier and his colleague to reconsider this matter. Particularly the "official answer." This answer must be in the Department if it was ever given.

MR. MACKENZIE said that at that time it was supposed the larger dredges could work there, but they found afterwards that they could not.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) expressed a hope that the Premier would not overlook the harbour of Lingan. It was a very important point.

In answer to Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton),

MR. MACKENZIE said he had not at present any dredge in view to purchase; but Mr. Perley was in communication with Mr. John Ross with a view of renting his dredge.

In answer to Mr. McCALLUM.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was only one Government dredge on the island waters—a spoon dredge.

In answer to Mr. LANGEVIN.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could hardly tell where the dredging would be done.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was hardly satisfactory to vote this large amount without having the harbours specified.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was quite impossible to specify it.

XIV. LIGHTHOUSE AND COAST SERVICE

129. For completion and construction of Lighthouses and Fog Alarms. $60,000

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that, while $59,350, with $650 for incidental expenses, were proposed for the other Provinces, British Columbia's interests were not considered. A fog whistle was urgently required on Race Rocks on the Straits of Fuca. A captain of a steamer running between Victoria and San Francisco had told him that he had run from the heads at San Francisco to the entrance of the Straits of Fuca, a distance of about 700 miles, without seeing land or being able to take an observation, owing to the thick fogs which were prevalent along the coast during about two or three months in the summer. After passing Cape Flattery, where there was a fog whistle, the vessel was obliged to go 60 miles further through the straits, and turn round this dangerous reef, Race Rocks, in the fog. He did it safely and entered the harbour, but was in great danger. This officer had informed him that the placing of a fog whistle on these rocks was a matter of paramount importance to all vessels that entered the Straits of Fuca.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Are the fogs very frequent there ?

Mr. THOMPSON : Yes ; during the summer.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH : I was certainly misinformed if that is the case. I was informed that there was very little fog in those waters. I do not think that we will be able to provide for a fog alarm there this year ; I suppose that there are more than 100 applications for fog whistles and light-houses in various parts in the Dominion in the Department, and we have selected those that we considered most the important. Perhaps next Session, if I get back, and I have no doubt I will—

Mr. MITCHELL : Doubtful.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH : Something will be done.

Mr. MITCHELL : Are the fog-whistles provided for steam or automatic ; and if the latter, of whose patent are they ?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH : We have not determined yet. I think that only one among the number will be a steam whistle.

Mr. MITCHELL : How do the automatic whistles work ?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH : Very well, and they are much cheaper than steam. We are adopting them.

 115 Steam Communication on Lake Huron and Superior..... 12,500

Mr. KIRPATRICK : Has the Collingwood line a chance.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT : I think that the service is tendered for.

SIR JOHN MACDONALD : You ought to know, surely.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT : There were two lines in former times, one for Collingwood and the other for Sarnia.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not know why the Collingwood line was broken up, and the Sarnia line taken instead. This policy occasions great inconvenience to a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: We have reduced the vote very much.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Here is a question of mail subsidies up, and the Postmaster-General is away electioneering, instead of attending to his business. Is that right? He is electioneering in the county of Shefford; and here is the Minister of Finance absolutely unable to answer the questions about votes, amounting, in all, to $217,200. Nobody is here to answer, and this is the way in which this country is governed.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Is this service open to competition every year?

MR. MACKENZIE: There were tenders taken.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Every year?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Will it be so open this year?

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly. I am not sure whether tenders were taken last year or not; but I know that they were obtained, and this line was the lowest. Afterwards a service was arranged from Collingwood, so much being paid per trip; and this amounts to the same thing.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Is that continued now?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No subsidy is paid for carrying the mails from Collingwood?

MR. MACKENZIE: I think that three tenders were received—from the Collingwood, Sarnia, and Windsor lines. The Windsor and Sarnia lines have since amalgamated, and formed, I think, the Northern Transportation Company. The Collingwood line was partly broken up by the withdrawal of one of the vessels; and afterwards arrangements were made for two mails a week.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is the arrangement with the Sarnia line annual or for a number of years?

MR. MACKENZIE: I think that it is annual.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: It must be, or the terms would be laid on the table. I think that it is annual.

116. Steam Service between San Francisco and Victoria, British Columbia..... $54,000

MR. BUNSTER said that the Steamship service for British Columbia was most wretched. His Excellency the Governor General made his passage by sea to British Columbia on H. M. man-of-war, the "Amethyst," which, with one of these steamers left Victoria at the same time. One made the run in six and the other in three days.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Which beat?

MR. BUNSTER: I was just coming to that point. Her Majesty's ship, as is always the case, beat. The Government should buy a ship for this $54,000 or $60,000, and run it, instead of paying this large sum to these rattle-trap American steamers, which were condemned by American Inspectors, and not allowed to run on the American coast. These miserable boats were palmed off on British Columbia by bogus Companies. His Province had lost 500 citizens in one moment, owing to the use of these steamers; and the present state of things was unbearable. This line, unless compelled to do so, would not use British Columbian coal, and if the Government run its own steamer, the officer, crew and outfit would contribute to the revenue of the country.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he could not allow the very extraordinary speech of the hon. member for Vancouver to pass. There were not two better boats on the Pacific Ocean today than the City of Panama which was 3 years old, though she had a propensity for rolling. He had been 16 times up and down that coast, and the passage had averaged 27½ days, and many times it had been under 30 days. The hon. gentleman had talked about buying a boat for $34,000 when he should know that one could not be bought for $250,000. It might be better if they had two British boats owned in Victoria performing this service, but they must take the next best thing, and not cut their noses off to spite their faces. He believed one of the boats took her coal on the American side, and one at Nanaimo, and he thought that in future contracts they should be both made to take their coal at Nanaimo.

MR. BUNSTER said it had taken five days coming down the last trip, and when the Governor-General went up it took six days. He could discount the hon. member for Cariboo in judging of a boat or in boxing a compass. The Government were trying to wipe out British Columbia and induce its inhabitants to go in for annexation, but British Columbia was true and loyal to the old flag, but they wanted the Government to run their own boats.

MR. McINNES said he wished to call the attention of the Government to the necessity of having one of these steamers go direct to the mainland at least once a month. Very often the mails arrived at Victoria, and remained there 2, 3 and 4 days at a time, and more than double was paid for freight from Victoria to the mainland than from San Francisco to Victoria. He urged that the Government should expend $4,000 or $5,000 on a steamer to run between Victoria and New Westminster.

MR. ROSCOE said the steamers on the Pacific were really as good as could possibly be expected.

In answer to MR. LANGEVIN,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he believed the contract would lapse in 1879.

MR. LANGEVIN said it would be very important, if possible, to make Victoria the terminus. He did not know if there were sufficient people to justify the extension of the line to the North-West.

MR. McCALLUM said an increase of $500 appeared in the items for the port of Chatham. In 1874 the salaries were $2,260, and last year they were $3,060.

MR. BURPEE said that no additional officer had been appointed, but the salary of an officer at London had been increased $200 since 1874. This was provided for before they came into office, and he thought, on the very day of the resignation of the late Government. It was afterwards with some others allowed.

MR. McCALLUM said that he thought the Custom House officer and not the light-house keeper should be appointed Harbour Master, and he should live at London, not 12 miles from it. This occasioned great inconvenience.

MR. BURPEE said he was not aware until the question arose the other night, that this officer lived at a distance from Rondeau. He was the next morning told that this man was looked upon as a detective officer along the lake shore. It was a special appointment. He would see whether his services were required, and more important at Rondeau than along the coast. If so, he ought to be stationed there.

MR. LAURIER said that the salaries had been reduced $9,960, and travelling expenses $3,000. A great deal of assistance that had been required in former years was dispensed with this year.

MR. MACMILLAN said that when the duty was taken off coal oil it was thought desirable to decrease the number of officers in the City of London; and a proposition was made to a very efficient officer, named Wilson, that if he would resign his position he would get a year's salary ($600) as a gratuity. He waited a considerable time, until this amount was actually granted him, and brought down in a statement and placed on the floor of the House; and then, in pursuance of the agreement, he sent in his resignation, and had not received his gratuity. He (Mr. Macmillan) was informed by the Department that this officer had resigned unconditionally, although this was done after the amount had been granted. He was told that the Order in Council making the grant was still in existence, and that this Order must either be cancelled or the amount passed. He thought that this agreement should be carried out on the part of the Government after the officer had kept his part of the contract. He could readily understand a private individual being a party to such a trick, but he could scarcely understand how the members of the Government could be a party to it. The promise was undoubtedly made, and it should be kept.

MR. LAURIER said that the facts were these: Last year a certain number of officers were removed, amongst others Wilson, of the excise at London, on condition that he was allowed a gratuity of $600, a year's salary. This amount was voted by the Treasury Board, and the Order was passed in Council, sometime during June, last. It was then sent from this Department to the Auditor's Office, but through some clerical error in the Auditor's Office, the cheque was never sent, and Wilson continued to act, not exactly in the capacity of an excise officer, but as inspector of oil. The matter so rested until February last. Sometime in January, complaint was made to the Department that Wilson, in violation of the law, was acting as inspector of oil while interested in the oil trade; and, thereupon, he believed, without any communication from the Department, Wilson sent in his resignation unconditionally. The matter rested there. It had not been before the Department since.

MR. MACMILLAN said that the reason why Wilson pursued the course he did was, because, he was informed by one of the officers of the Inspector's Department in the district, that this amount, $600, had been granted him; and he waited, day after day, expecting to receive official advice of the fact from the Department. In the meantime, he knew that his services might be dispensed with at any moment, and he was prepared for this emergency; he was acquainted with the oil business; and, unquestionably, he had some interest in it; but he only did so preparatory to earning his livelihood when he left this position. It was most singular that this Order-in-Council should have been passed months ago, and sent to the Auditor's Office, and never have gone any further. The resignation was sent in on a Saturday, and the statement containing this grant was placed on the table of the House some five days before. All the publicity possible was given the matter, official notice direct to Wilson excepted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After this conversation, no doubt, the hon. gentleman at the head of the Department will see that this is a case of very great hardship which savours a little of sharp practice; and also that this man gets the $600.

MR. CURRIER: It is a peculiar case, and I am not now prepared to say whether this is or is not entitled to it.

MR. BOWELL: Why is the increase of $100 made at Belleville?

MR. LAURIER said it was made to the salary of one of the Excise officers, who had passed his examination from 3rd to 2nd class. Under regulations in force for several years, they had four classes of Excise officers, 3rd, 2nd, 1st, and special class; the salary for the last named being $1,000, whenever an officer passed an examination it entitled him to an increase of $100.

MR. BOWELL: How many officers are employed there?

MR. LAURIER: Four.

MR. BOWELL: Who is the Collector?

MR. LAURIER: Wm. Halkin.

MR. BOWELL: He has been Collector there for three or four years; and his name is left out in this return.

MR. LAURIER: I cannot say why his name is not in the report.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS IN ELECTIONS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he wished to say a word in regard to a conversation that had taken place in the House respecting the position of Mr. Moylan, in consequence of his alleged presence at a banquet given to him (Sir John A. Macdonald) in Peterborough. At the time, the hon. the Premier mentioned that a man in the employment of the Government had been with him on an electioneering tour, he had forgotten all about the circumstance, and he asked who it was. The hon. gentleman replied Mr. Moylan. He had, then, forgotten the fact that since 1867 Mr. Moylan was not inspector of prisons, as well as of Penitentiaries. He had really forgotten almost everything connected with the circumstance; but he had since ascertained that Mr. Moylan was not in the employment of the Government in any sense at the time, but was there present as a journalist. He believed that it was in June, 1872, that such employment ceased; he returned from Ireland and ceased to be an immigrant agent, and was not appointed to his present office until September, 1872, on the death of Mr. J. O'Neil.

SUPPLY.

XXVI. CULLING TIMBER.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

189.	{ Quebec Office.....	$72,900
	{ Montreal Office.....	4,855

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that excessive charges for the culling of timber had been imposed by an Order-in-Council passed on the 18th of June, last. It was provided by an Act passed last Session, that the Governor in Council could impose such charges for the measurement of timber as would meet the salaries of the cullers, at an average of $700 each, and the expenses of the office; but he found that the dues that would accrue from the measurement of the timber last year, at the rates established by this Order-in-Council, amounted to $36,510.64. Eighteen cullers, at $700 each, cost $12,600, and as the proportion of the office expenses, which he took was properly chargeable against the timber Department, would be about $8,500, amounting in all to $21,000, leaving a surplus of $15,410. The tariff, however, should be based on the average of the five years preceding, and this for the years from 1872 to 1876, including 1876, at the rates imposed by this Order-in-Council, would be $30,266.33, whilst the charges were $21,100, leaving a surplus of $9,166.63. The hon. the Minister of Finance had laid down the principle that any tax levied on the public, in excess of the public requirements, was nothing more nor less than legalized robbery; but, if he should use the term, this was not even legalized robbery, as the Act stated that such charges should only be imposed as would meet the requirements of the office. He would urge upon the hon. the Minister of Finance, the desirability of so reducing these charges, and of not imposing a special tax on this particular industry.

MR LAURIER said that the revenue accruing from this source last year, in the Port of Quebec, did not exactly meet the expenses. The revenue was only $67,127.93, while the expenses were $67,911.92; and, if the dues on square timber were reduced, the fees on other specifications of lumber would have to be increased, otherwise there would be a deficit in the total earnings of the Department. The rates imposed last June were merely tentative. The Department was prepared to consider a new tariff.

MR. WHITE said that if any change at all were made it should be made before the season for measuring timber began. Up to the 18th of last month, the tariff was very much less than it was subsequently. He thought that the expenses of the Department had been more than met by the proceeds. The amount accruing for the culling of timber up to the 30th of June, 1877, according to the Public Accounts was $65,984.31, for the Quebec office only, and the amount paid was $63,237, leaving a surplus for the last fiscal year of $2,600, instead of a deficit.

MR. LAURIER: There is the Montreal office besides.

MR. WHITE said that there was a special tariff for measuring hemlock, which was very much below that for pine, and this tariff more particularly applied to the Montreal office, because very little hemlock was measured in the Quebec office. He contended that the expense of the Quebec office should be made chargeable on it alone, and it should not be charged with the expenses of other offices throughout the country. A very much less rate for measuring square timber would meet the necessary expenses. A large surplus had constantly existed in this regard during past years at the Quebec office.

In answer to MR. LANGEVIN,

MR. LAURIER said that under the Act passed last year 26 cullers had been pensioned receiving $200 each; there were now, square timber cullers; 19 deal cullers and 9 stave cullers.

MR. MITCHELL: How many have been appointed during the same period?

MR. LAURIER: Not one to my knowledge.

MR. BERTRAM said he had last year directed the attention of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue to the fact that when lumbermen had a culler sent to their mills to cull deals and sent it to Quebec, the culling was sometimes not received by the purchaser, and a survey was made; in this manner the seller was made to pay twice for the same service. The culling of deals at any one place in the Dominion should be made final. The present system was unjust.

MR. LAURIER said that according to the Act, if a party was dissatisfied with the culling and asked for a survey, the culler had to bear the expenses if his culling proved to be wrong; otherwise, the party complaining.

MR. BERTRAM said he spoke of a matter-of-fact, which was within his own knowledge. He had asked last year in one case that the second payment should be refunded; but he had got no satisfaction from the Minister of Inland Revenue.

MR. HAGGART said the trouble was that purchasers would not accept the culling of certain cullers, and to make sales sellers were obliged to obtain a second culling and pay for it. These men were paid from $15 to $20 a day.

MR. LAURIER said that whenever a culler was engaged outside of the port where the timber was shipped, to a certain extent he was beyond the jurisdiction of the Department, and his savings belonged to him and not to the office. Culling at the port of shipment, on all exported lumber, was compulsory, and this culling was done under the supervision of the Department which was responsible for it. He so understood the law.

MR. BERTRAM said it was only just that the culling of an official culler should be binding whether done at the mill or in Quebec. The payment of double fees was unjust. This grievance existed as a matter-of-fact.

MR. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) said there was no room for difference of opinion as to the measurement of lumber; but there was with regard to the quality. The latter work was a mere matter of judgment; and opinions often differed respecting it. Some cullers, though all were sworn, were known to be easier in their judgments than others, and objection was sometimes taken to the culling of the former class by purchasers.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that the culler could be chosen by the parties concerned, otherwise one official culling should be binding.

MR. WHITE said it would not be right or proper that because a culler was licensed, his dictum should be final. This would destroy the remedy of submitting a culler's decision to the arbitrament of three cullers which was provided for in the Act. Of the revenue accruing last year, $2,425 had been paid as retiring allowances to cullers; but it was provided by the Act passed last year, that the amount already paid in to the Consolidated Fund by the cullers, over and above the expenses of the office up to that time, could be used to pay these allowances; and he thought that this should be done until this fund was exhausted. These allowances should not previously be made a charge on the lumber trade. It was decided last year that 3c. on square white and red pine would be sufficient, with the other charges, to meet the expenses of the office. This might be right or wrong, but certainly the amount charged last year, under the Order-in-Council mentioned, was much in excess of what was necessary to perform the service. In simple justice these charges should be reduced; and if such action as were taken it ought to be done before the season began.

MR. CURRIER said that the cost of measuring timber which came down the St. Lawrence, and from Michigan, was about three times as much as the cost of measuring the timber which was brought down the Ottawa. All the timber which came down the St. Lawrence had to be canted from the moulINETTE into the water, and, as it was canted off, the culler measured it; whereas in a raft the culler measured the timber without moving or canting a stick. The charges for measuring moulINETTED timber ought to be three times as much as for raft timber. This did not require any legislation to change, but simply an Order-in-Council, or instructions to the Supervisor of Cullers. The law also worked badly in this respect: that, as soon as the culler earned $700, he could do no more work that season. Some of the cullers earned this amount by the middle of August, while others had to work out the whole season. This was not right. To remedy that the list should be left open or the Supervisor have power to send out the cullers as he choose, and not take them in rotation. The office should be under the control of the Supervisor.

MR. LAURIER said he heard a great many complaints, not only from lumbermen, but from the cullers themselves. One of the chief complaints was that, under the present system, the square timber cullers were not sufficiently paid, while the complaint of the merchants was that there should be an open list, and that they should have the liberty to choose the culler they wished to employ. The last Act provided that the Supervisor should give employment to cullers by rotation. The Act should be further tested before proceeding to change it.

MR. MITCHELL said he was surprised that lumbermen should tolerate this system. In the deal business, the system of culling in New Brunswick was very simple. A surveyor was employed at the mill, who received his $2 per day, and who culled and measured the deals; and, although large shipments were made to Europe, their culling was very seldom disputed. He would advise the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to wipe out this whole system at Quebec and adopt the one at New Brunswick.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said the views of the hon. member were not held by those in the lumber trade on the Ottawa. It was necessary, in the interests of the square timber trade at all events, that this office should be maintained, for the purpose of ascertaining the exact number of feet in the rafts which went to Quebec.

MR. COOK said before the hon. member for Northumberland appeared as the champion of lumbermen upon the floor of this House, he should first attempt to ascertain their views. The lumbermen did not wish to abolish the office of Supervisor of Cullers at Quebec.

MR. MITCHELL said he had never pretended to make himself the champion of the lumbermen, but simply endeavoured to give the benefit of his experience which was worth something.

MR. CURRIER.

MR. GILLMOR said he thought lumbermen should take charge of slides and booms rather than the Government.

MR. LAURIER said it was difficult for a young Minister to frame a tariff when the lumbermen disagreed among themselves. He would consider the suggestions which had been made.

MR. BOWELL said he would like to know why twenty-six cullers had been pensioned.

MR. LAURIER said that this was done under an Act last Session, which provided for the reduction of the number of square timber cullers to not more than eighteen, all others to be superannuated.

MR. BLAKE: They are paid out of the cullers' fund.

Vote agreed to.

XXVII. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES AND GAS.

190. Salaries of 96 Deputy Inspectors of Weights and Measures..... $54,300

MR. LANGEVIN said that these men were paid so much a year and travelling expenses. The present system did not seem to work well. These officers had very little to do, and the people in many parts of the Province of Quebec were not satisfied with them. They fulfilled their duties very carelessly; and, in a number of places, instead of attending to their duties, they did something else. They were merely electioneering agents, in many cases, for which work they were paid out of the taxes of the people. Some measures must certainly be taken to prevent this. He could give instances in this relation. This evil should be remedied. These men worked in the interest of Government candidates.

MR. ROCHESTER said the carrying out of this law caused very great dissatisfaction. Nothing had been done with regard to the complaints made some time since. Scales, and weights and measures worth from $200 to $300, were to be seen in the Inspector's office; and they were taken away without any right from merchants. Some of the names of these persons were Leon David, McCarthy, Franklin and Kavanagh, of Upper Town.

The last mentioned merchant had informed him that the Inspector had walked in the middle of the afternoon into his shop, when it was filled with customers, and carried off his scales, leaving nothing in the place to weigh with. This occurred a few months ago, and was calculated to do Mr. Kavanagh great damage in his business. There was no redress against the high-handed acts of these officials possessed of a little brief authority. Scales seized were sold on the market by auction; and it was no use to appeal to the Inland Revenue Department for redress, though if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) heard the complaints, he was sure that the whole community would get justice.

MR. MITCHELL: No soft solder.

MR. ROCHESTER said he was not soft soldering the hon. gentleman. He complained of the man who was behind the throne, the deputy in the Department. A number of gentlemen in this city had imported sets of brass imperial weights, costing $28 each; and these were confiscated, though just as good weights as those proposed by the Government. This was a great hardship, which did the people no good. Weights should be sufficient for the purpose as long as they were correct. The City Inspector had regularly inspected these same weights and measures and branded them for years, and still they were taken away and no recompense was allowed. This was an oppressive Act which should never have been put in force in this country. Another abuse related to the sending of scales, etc., to a particular man in the city who was cousin, uncle or brother, or political cousin of the Inspector or something of the kind. The Inspector obliged merchants to do so; and $7 was charged in one case for the mere verification. The charge varied from $5 and $6 to $16 per scale. These abuses should be looked into.

MR. MITCHELL said that Robert C. Cutler had been appointed as Inspector for the county of Cumberland: salary $493.68, contingencies $28.22. This man had drawn his salary for two or three years, and had not done anything for it. He had never heard of him until sometime in November last.

MR. LAURIER said that if these officers were paid by fees in lieu of salary, it would be still more conducive to abuses, as they would then have an inducement to intermeddle and make themselves officious. In time this law, which was absolutely necessary and good in itself, would give universal satisfaction. No civilized nation would dispense with such a measure, though the hon. member for Northumberland called it an incubus.

MR. MITCHELL: I do.

MR. LAURIER said the hon. gentleman, however, was responsible as one of the promoters of the law. An Inspector of Weights and Measures, under the present circumstances—as these men were rather unpopular—would be the last man he would choose to canvass in his interest. It was, however, quite possible that the men in their private capacity had canvassed, they were like other men, and he knew Civil servants who meddled in elections, not only in the Liberal, but also on the Conservative, side in the Province of Quebec.

MR. MITCHELL: Where is Johnson, and what is he doing? Is he not canvassing in Lower Canada for the friends of the Government.

MR. LAURIER said that Mr. Johnson was not canvassing anywhere, but on the contrary making a very necessary tour of inspection.

MR. MITCHELL: He does a little canvassing I guess.

MR. LAURIER said that the hon. gentleman mentioned an officer who had drawn his salary for two years, and who had done nothing, and it was absolutely necessary that all these officers, in every part of the Dominion, should be under the close superintendence of the Department. It was hard to give an officer power to confiscate scales but this had to be done; and it could not be avoided. He was certain that as long as this system existed there would be cases where officers would make themselves somewhat overbearing and tyrannical. But the law had to be complied with, and if a man refused to comply with the law it was the officer's duty to confiscate his scales; but at the same time as long as he was at the head of the Department he would not tolerate any overbearing or uncivil conduct on the part of these officials. A remedy existed for these complaints. They should be brought, as was provided for by law, before the Minister of Inland Revenue. It was not to his knowledge that any complaint in this relation had as yet been made, except in one or two cases; and he believed that in these instances justice had been at once done. When the complaint was made about the officer in Cumberland county drawing his salary without giving any consideration for it, they had written him, and directed him at once to comply with his duties, and he was quite satisfied, from the answer they had received, that the hon. gentleman would not have to complain in this respect in the future.

MR. MITCHELL said he was not going to be satisfied with such an answer. Was this justification for the Government having appointed a man to this position for political purposes—a man who sold himself to the hon. gentlemen opposite in order to turn the late Government out of office, and who was awarded for his treachery by this very appointment for which he had drawn his salary without doing any work for it. The late Government was responsible for passing the law, to come into operation when necessity called for it. The necessity never existed, and this Government was responsible for having brought the law into operation when uncalled for. An Order-in-Council should be issued to abolish the law.

MR. ROCHESTER said where a manufacturer adjusted his own scales the Inspector should certify to their correctness, if they were rightly adjusted, and not send them to a friend of his to be readjusted.

MR. LAURIER said instructions were sent last February to the different Inspectors to give notice in advance so that people could choose a registrar for themselves. This order was given because some of the Inspectors had been in the habit of taking adjusters with them, compelling the people to use these adjusters and none others.

MR. LAURIER.

MR. PLUMB denied that the present Government was bound, as stated by the Finance Minister in his picnic utterances, to put the Weights and Measures Act into operation. For whatever odium was attached to it gentlemen opposite were blameable. The charge that the late Government was in any way responsible for the expenditure of $100,000 a year, which had been entered into, was unfounded; and, although the Act had been passed, it was not to be put into operation until necessary.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the late Government had a sum in the Estimates for the carrying out of the Act during their last year of office.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said the hon. member for Cumberland was responsible for the introduction of the Act, an act for which he (Mr. Jones) could see no necessity, as he pointed out at the time.

MR. TUPPER said the Act was brought forward at a time when it would have been simply criminal, considering the frauds and mistakes which had occurred prior to its passage, to have neglected to introduce it. The Act was introduced none too soon, and he (Mr. Tupper) assumed the responsibility of it. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Militia, in holding up the Act to execration and contempt at public meetings, were very inconsistent in continuing the Act in operation. The hon. member for Niagara was quite right in his statement as to the Act. Hon. gentlemen opposite came into office when the Act was not law, and as soon as they issued the Order-in-Council enforcing it, they assumed the responsibility for it. Mr. Johnson was now away on an electioneering tour. The Minister had said that he was away on an inspection tour, but he was not an Inspector. His duties were at Ottawa beside the Minister. The bad way in which the law had been enforced had made it unpopular, and the continuance of the law by the Government laid the responsibility upon them. If they thought it should not be continued they should repeal it.

MR. MACKENZIE: We cannot recall it.

MR. TUPPER said if they had come to the conclusion in Council that this was not a wise or necessary law, it was their duty to refuse to bring it into operation, and then, when Parliament met, to bring forward a measure for its repeal. They had no option between that course and taking the entire responsibility of the measure. He did not desire to divest himself of any responsibility in regard to it. He believed it was not passed before it was necessary, and that it was right to bring it into operation as soon as possible, and then in working it to divest it of anything calculated to create hostility in the public mind. He believed the Government were doing right in keeping it on the Statute book, and he objected to their keeping up a feeling of hostility to a measure they were carrying out. He did not believe it would entail a large expense. The reports showed that, wherever the law was most efficiently carried out, there was the least expense, because a return was made to the expenditure. The law should be enforced, not in the interest of any party, but in the interests of honest dealing between buyer and seller.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman had, as frequently happened, confounded two totally different points. The point he (Mr. Cartwright) had been making was, that the present Government were not responsible, fairly, for the addition to the public expenditure caused by putting in force an Act which they had not placed on the Statute-book.

"The present Government had provided in the Statute-book for, and had expended, a considerable sum of money in preliminary steps for organizing a system of weights and measures which the present Government found themselves bound to carry out at an annual cost of $100,000."

Now, the House could judge of the charge, that he never lost an opportunity of villifying the late Government on account of this measure. If that was villification and abuse, the hon. gentleman's vocabulary had better be revised. The whole of the hon. gentleman's press, from one end of the country to the other, had been denouncing the present Government as the authors of that measure, and it was in reply that they pointed out whether the measure was good or bad, in regard to which he (Mr. Cartwright) expressed no opinion. It was a measure passed by the late Government and introduced by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) himself, who was at that time, if he remembered right, either the Minister of Inland Revenue, or the Minister of Customs. He (Mr. Cartwright) had pointed out that the present Government were simply putting in force an Act already on the Statute-book.

MR. TUPPER said if the speech read by the hon. gentleman had not been revised, it would put him (Mr. Tupper) considerably in fault. But what the hon. gentleman had read was not what principally left that impression on his (Mr. Tupper's) mind. It was a sentence in which the hon. gentleman spoke of "This precious Weights and Measures Act." Those were the words, and he thought if the hon. gentleman would go to the paper in which his speech was first reported he would find that what he had just read was a revised report. It was not the hon. gentleman, however, to whom he referred as villifying the Act, it was the Minister of Militia.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: He referred to me and the Minister of Militia in the same paragraph, and in the same terms.

MR. TUPPER said he had spoken of the Finance Minister's language as being calculated to excite the hostility of the country against the Act, and then he referred to the denunciation of the Minister of Militia.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am sure that speech at Newmarket was correctly reported. My speeches were reported almost verbatim et literatim. There was very little revision.

MR. MITCHELL asked what amount was required to put the Act in force?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it was an amount which occurred in the estimates of 1873-74 for that purpose,— "Expenses in connection with Weights and Measures, $10,000"—and it was on that that Mr. Brunel went to England, and as he was informed made large orders.

MR. MITCHELL said that was the excuse which the hon. gentleman gave for charging upon the late Government the enormous expenditures under this Act.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the result of that vote was Mr. Brunel's visit to England, where he made orders, he believed, to the amount of something like $100,000.

MR. MITCHELL said he could find no authority under the late Government for any expenditure except that $10,000. Did the hon. gentleman mean to say that the late Government were responsible for standards which were not delivered for 3 years afterwards. Did he mean to say that because an expenditure of $10,000 was authorized in 1873, the late Government was responsible for an expenditure of $120,000 which these gentlemen had squandered in this manner. He was not going to free himself from the responsibility of the Act, but while it might be necessary at a future day it might not have been desirable at the moment it was called into existence. In his county the Inspector had been drawing his salary for 3 years without doing any work.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the Act did not cost $120,000. Credit must be given for the receipts.

MR. MITCHELL said that the hon. gentleman could state what the receipts were, he stated the liabilities. From his county the receipts were nil. The Act for the registration of Shipping was to have been brought into operation by an Order-in-Council, in the same measure as this Act, but the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries had taken no steps to bring that Act into operation. Why was the rule applied in the one case and not in the other?

MR. TUPPER said he did not desire to divest himself of the responsibility attaching to the introduction of the Act. The report laid upon the table of the House this Session showed the current expenditure to be $70,140.74, and the revenue collected to be $50,375.45. He thought the Government were right in reducing the fees, because it was desirable not to make the Act more objectionable than was necessary. There was only a difference of about $20,000 between the expenditure and the receipts.

MR. BROUSE said he knew that in this part of the Dominion the officers selected were the best that could be selected. In the county of Leeds and Grenville the officer had administered the Act almost to the satisfaction of the people. It was a very unpopular law, but he had carried it out well. The receipts from Leeds and Grenville were more than double the expenditure. He was very happy to hear from the Minister that the wishes of the people would be met, so far as to take the adjuster along with the inspector. When this measure was brought forward in 1873, he had opposed it, as far as he could, and had stated that it would be an unpopular measure. But it was forced upon the country by the late Government; and, if the present Government had not carried it out, there would have been a howl in the picnic speeches of hon. gentlemen from one end of the country to the other. The Government were bound to carry out that measure. It was on the Statute-book. A large expenditure had been incurred.

MR. MITCHELL: None at all.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): $10,000.

MR. BROUSE said there was a large expenditure, and was there not a certain responsibility in regard to that, and also in regard to an individual who was sent abroad to secure standard weights and measures.

MR. MITCHELL: Not till the other Government came in.

MR. BROUSE: The member for Cumberland stated he took the responsibility for this measure.

MR. MITCHELL: That is another thing.

MR. BROUSE said he thought if the other members of the Government had taken the responsibility in the same manly way as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), they would deserve more credit from the House and the country.

MR. ROCHESTER said he had several letters in his possession from merchants in this city, who had written to him respecting the abuses some of them had suffered in connection with this Act. They had given him these letters on the condition that he should not name the writers. He would, with their permission, give the names to the Minister of Inland Revenue, but they were afraid to give their names, because of the injury they would sustain from the deputy of that Department. Some of them had imperial weights taken from them, and they wished to know if they could not have them returned. They had been bought in London, England, and stamped; some of these weights had cost $70. This was a great hardship.

MR. LAURIER: I am really surprised that these outrages should take place and no complaint be made.

MR. ROCHESTER: The people are afraid to do it.

MR. LAURIER: Afraid?

MR. ROCHESTER: I will undertake to prove it to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman.

MR. LAURIER: I would advise the people to have courage.

Vote agreed to.

191. Salaries of Gas Inspectors. . . . $11,000

MR. BOWELL: Have they been appointed?

MR. LAURIER said that several were appointed. Many of these officers were not paid regular salaries; but those who received such salaries were the following: the Inspector at Hamilton, salary $700; Inspector at Montreal, salary $2,000; Inspectors at Toronto, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, $1,000 each; and Inspector at Pictou $300.

MR. MITCHELL said that A. Rowan, St. John, N.B., was credited with $1,800 and with $354 for contingencies, making $2,154; and the Inspector at Halifax with $1,563.50.

MR. LAURIER said that this related to the period before these appointments were made. If he was correctly informed, the officers named had been appointed since the commencement of the present financial year. This $1,800 to the Inspector at St. John was not given as salary, but for services rendered.

MR. MITCHELL: What is the difference?

MR. LAURIER said that this was for services for more than one year.

MR. BOWELL said that when the law was under consideration, it was distinctly understood that the Inspectors of Weights and Measures would also act as Gas Inspectors.

MR. WOOD: They could not do the work which requires scientific training.

MR. BOWELL said that this was not desirable, because the Government patronage would not then be so extensive. This was done to multiply the number of officers. It required special knowledge and training to perform any duty. If the salaries were made commensurate with the duties in question, men could easily be obtained with sufficient intelligence to perform both services. He did not know on what principle these inspectors were appointed. In the city of Ottawa, certainly, a large amount of gas was consumed.

MR. LAURIER: No inspector is appointed here. The work is done by the Department directly, so far.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is some gas here that cannot be inspected.

MR. BOWELL said that if hon. members inspected each other's gas, the opinions given to the world would, perhaps, not be worth much. He was afraid that if the hon. the Premier inspected the gas of his opponents, he would find it not worth much; and vice versa. If the intention of the law was carried out, as was distinctly understood would be the case, a very great saving would be affected. In Toronto the total amount of the return for the year ending 30th June, 1877, was $792.22, while the salary was $1,000; and this he supposed did not include office rent and etceteras. These returns should be made intelligible; the amounts mentioned were apparently for the year ending 30th June, 1877. They were delusive if the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Laurier) was correct. He ventured to say that in a very short period a person of ordinary intelligence could learn to perform this duty properly. Professional knowledge was not required. Men should be selected who were qualified for both offices. But as long as the Government could multiply offices and have plenty of posts to fill, he supposed that just so long would they exercise the patronage in this way. Economical questions had little weight when there was occasion to fill offices which, to use a newspaper phrase, were too numerous to mention. This matter should be taken into serious consideration by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue; and both duties should be combined. There were a large number of places in Ontario, and he presumed in the other Provinces as well, which should have inspectors of gas as well as the cities mentioned and where these officers were just as necessary. He was afraid that there was very little hope for any improvement or reform in this relation, because the love of patronage and the desire to provide for friends were too great in the political world to suffer it to be accomplished.

MR. CURRIER: What are the duties of these officers?

MR. LAURIER: They have to test the quality of the gas, when required by the consumer or manufacturer; test the apparatus, and to go as often as he has reason to believe that the gas is inferior or the apparatus not accurate, and test them.

MR. WOOD said that the Inspector of Weights and Measures in a place like Hamilton, could not undertake the duties of the Gas Inspector, as two inspectors of weights and measures could scarcely do the work required of them. The duties of the Gas Inspector were beyond the powers of weights and measures inspectors. The former had to test meters, and the quality of the gas sometimes three or four times a day, having to be in constant attendance at his office. As far as Hamilton was concerned the inspectors of weights and measures could not more than discharge the duties which were incumbent on them.

MR. STEPHENSON: Are other inspectors to be appointed in towns where gas is used?

MR. LAURIER said that the system would be extended, but he could not now say to what extent.

MR. CURRIER said that he opposed the Bill when it was introduced by the late Government, as he believed that it imposed an unnecessary tax on the people. The services of these inspectors were rarely required. In these days of cheap coal oil, if the companies did not manufacture good gas, the people would not use it.

MR. BLAKE said that the gas manufactured in Ottawa was most villainous, especially in many quarters of the city. For nearly two months, in the winter before last, he had had to abandon the use of gas in his house here, and use coal oil, which was very inconvenient. These officers were necessary.

MR. CURRIER: No complaint can be made about the gas in this House.

MR. BLAKE: There is gas above and gas below, but the gas below, which we make ourselves, is so much the worse that we are ashamed to complain.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is gas escaping over there.

MR. CURRIER said that the gas was bad in some quarters of the city, but it, nevertheless, was good when it left the works.

MR. WOOD said that the gas companies had not objected, but had wished the appointment of these inspectors. The Inspector of Hamilton also visited St. Catharines, Woodstock, and several other towns in the discharge of his duties.

MR. BOWELL said that then there was no such a great amount of work to do, and hence this office might be combined with some other; Excise officers for instance might perform the duty. The gas was bad at certain periods of the year. He would ask whether a special officer, or one of the clerks of the Department, did the work here ?

MR. LAURIER said that it was in contemplation to appoint an Inspector for Ottawa ; but the duty, so far, had been done by one of the officers of the Department. Technical knowledge, he understood, was required. Inspectors of Weights and Measures might have sufficient leisure to act as Gas Inspectors in country places ; but this was not the case in large cities. It was unfair, under the circumstances, to say that these officers were not wanted, because additional patronage was desired.

MR. BOWELL said that Inspectors of Weights and Measures could be given an extra clerk, and men qualified for both positions should be appointed.

MR. LAURIER said that in regard to smaller cities, it was proposed to give these inspectors districts. Ottawa district, for instance, would include Brockville and Prescott, as St. John (N.B.) included Fredericton.

Vote agreed to.

192. Rent, furniture and heating Gas offices ..... $3,500

MR. MITCHELL said that the Weights and Measures Department cost the country $176,545 last year ; balances cost $78,408 ; equipment $22,000 ; standards, (originally) $20,000 and rent, furniture and heating $15,190.

MR. LAURIER said that the details of expenditure were given on the 229th and 241st pages of the report for the Inland Revenue Department. The expenditure last year was $99,545.98.

197. Salaries and contingencies of Canal offices ..... 32,020

MR. McCALLUM said two years ago he brought to the notice of the Government the advisability of removing one of the officers of the Canal, at Dunville, and combining the Canal office with the Customs, and was supported on that occasion by the hon. member for Haldimand, and the answer of the hon. the First Minister was that he would take the matter into consideration. He (Mr. McCallum) wished to know if the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity of removing that officer. He did not want to find fault with the officer ; he considered he was a good officer, able to fill any position, but, at the same time, he knew that a saving could be effected at that port by combining Canals with the Customs. He wished to know why that officer had not been removed ?

MR. LAURIER said under this item of Canal officers, there was a saving this year of $3,150. He was not aware of the discussion which took place two years ago, and to which the hon. gentleman now alluded. It would be impossible to remove that officer unless by superannuating him. His salary was moreover $600.

MR. McCALLUM : $750, I believe.

MR. LAURIER: Yes. The amount collected is over $1,200.

MR. McCALLUM: $449.

MR. LAURIER said the amount collected this year on the Canal at Dunnville was $547.92 for toll, and $693 for rents, etc.; total collected, $1,241.34. There might be good reason for superannuating that officer, and the first occasion the question came up it would receive his consideration.

MR. McCALLUM said he got the same answer two years ago. He did not want the officer to be super-annuated because he was a young man and an able officer. The Government assured him (Mr. McCallum) two years ago, that on the first opportunity he would be removed to another place and save his wages. There had since been two or three occasions on which this could have been carried out. Mr. Clerk, the collector of canal tolls at Port Dalhousie, died some time ago, and he (Mr. Tipton) could have been removed to fill that position. But he (Mr. McCallum) supposed the hon. member for Lincoln and his friends found it necessary that the new appointment should be made from his county. The appointment was made accordingly, and this officer did not get the justice due him, and the Government did not economize the people's money. The collector at Port Colborne died likewise, and this officer applied for his place. The Minister of Inland Revenue must know something about this. He was applied to by this officer for the place, but the political friends of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Thomson) wanted to have another officer, and the Government removed the officer at Port Robinson to Port Colborne, although his appointment was much later than this officer at Dunnville, in order to make room for another officer at Welland. In this way the money of the people was squandered. He hoped the Government would attend to this matter and save money; not to dismiss the officer, for he was young and capable, but to appoint him to another position. However, he supposed the 101 Grit families stood between him and promotion.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said there was a great deal of truth in what had fallen from the hon. member for Monck.

MR. McCALLUM: Is it not all true?

MR. THOMPSON said he was aware that three officers were more than were required at the port of Dunnville. There was one acting as collector of Welland Canal tolls, and two as Custom-house officers, which two could easily perform the duties of collecting tolls without interfering with the duties of their own office. As he (Mr. Thompson) had brought this matter under the attention of the Government some time ago, and as the hon. member for Monck had again brought it forward, he could not but endorse the remarks of the hon. member. He trusted the Government would, before long, see the necessity of providing for this officer, not by superannuating him, but by promotion. It must be a source of satisfaction to the hon. member for Monck to have a something about which to attack the Government.

MR. McCALLUM said the hon. member for Haldimand might have considered, when in Opposition, that the only duty of members of the Opposition was to oppose the Government of the day. As a representative of the county of Monck, he was ready to approve all that was good in the legislation of the country; but, at the same time, he would lack in his duty to the people if he did not expose on every occasion the wasteful extravagance of the Government. This was a small matter, but, before he got through with this canal question, he would be able to prove how the money of the people had been squandered. He regretted the hon. member for Haldimand was such a servile follower of the Government.

MR. THOMPSON: I only rise to say, in reply to the hon. member for Monck, that I am not more of a servile follower of the Government than he is of a party that were driven from power into Opposition, in 1873, where they are likely to remain for many years to come. I am a good supporter of a good Government, and, should I seek re-election, I am satisfied my constituents will fully sustain me in the course I have pursued.

MR. LAURIER said as the hon. gentleman was so anxious to see economy practiced, no doubt he would be gratified to learn that the Government had reduced the estimate to $3,150. The appointment was made by the late Administration; there had been a collector at this port for over fifteen years. He would take the matter into consideration.

MR. McCALLUM said he did not want the officer superannuated. He charged the Minister with pretending to be innocent of this matter when he had been applied to on behalf of this gentleman. He did not know whether the Government were entitled to credit for the slight reduction they claimed to have made; they were setting their house in order. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could not effect this saving, because the political interests of the party interfered to prevent it.

MR. NORRIS said he never used his influence. He did not understand why the hon. member for Monck did not use his influence to have this man removed when he was on the Ministerial benches. He believed this gentleman had been there for fifteen or sixteen years. He (Mr. Norris) did not deny that if a vacancy occurred in his county, he would like to see a competent man appointed from that county.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said it was time the Government should begin to be more economical. They had increased the cost of collecting revenue in all the departments, and how were they beginning to reduce them? How was this saving of $3,150 effected in the salaries of those poor lock-keepers and lock tenders? They were cutting down these salaries previous to the elections, and, no doubt, they were getting so patriotic that before the House adjourned they would introduce a Bill to reduce their own salaries and the members indemnity besides. In the Rideau canals, the officer at Kingston Mills was reduced from $500 to $200. Was that an actual reduction or was the balance charged to another Department?

MR. LAURIER: It is not reduced. The estimate was for $500 but the salary was $200. We had power to expend $3,517; this year we take forward to expenditure $3,200.

MR. McCALLUM said the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Norris) had stated this was the first time he had brought this matter up, but if the hon. gentleman had watched the proceedings of this House he would have known that the matter had been brought up before.

MR. NORRIS said the hon. member did not bring the matter up when his own friends were in power.

MR. McCALLUM said the hon. member might take all the satisfaction he wanted out of that. It was then not necessary. This officer was collecting revenue, and had work to do then which is not necessary to be done now.

MR. LANGEVIN asked from what Department the officer at Kingston Mills was paid?

MR. LAURIER said he could not say. His salary was not being cut down. In the Inland Revenue report his salary was placed last year at $200. If he received a salary from another Department, he (Mr. Laurier) was not aware of it.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Does he not receive a salary from the Public Works Department?

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not aware that he did. In some places the one officer did the work of Inland Revenue, Customs, and sometimes Public Works Department.

MR. McCALLUM: Do I understand the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to say he will take this matter into consideration?

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Monck knew there was always great dissatisfaction in counties at taking an officer from another county to fill a vacancy. If a vacancy occurred at Danville it would not be filled up. It was extremely hard to dismiss officers who had been a long time in the public service if it could be avoided. There was one officer less in that place than during the year the hon. gentlemen exercised the patronage of that county. In 1871-2, there were ten officers between Ports Colborne and Dalhousie engaged in the collection of revenue.

MR. McCALLUM said this man was living in the county of Monck, which was a part of the county of Welland judicially. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had said, a couple of years ago, that that officer would be removed. Now, the Minister of Inland Revenue said he was new to the Department and would take the matter into consideration. Ministers had always been new to that Department, and if the present Minister acted like his predecessors he would not be there a year and a-half. The hon. gentlemen opposite were like birds of passage. They promised one thing to day, and their successors gave as excuse for not carrying that out, that they were new to the office and knew nothing about it.

198. Collection of Slide and Boom Dues.....	$20,245
199. Repairs and working expenses of above.....	366,500

MR. LANGEVIN said that he had called attention to this item last year, and he thought it was understood that details would have been given.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would find the salaries of the principal officers in the Public Works Report.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would like to have a statement of the permanent staff, and also a statement of those who were employed temporarily.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would give instructions to have such a statement prepared for the future.

MR. McCALLUM said he saw there was quite an increase in the amount for the maintenance of the St. Lawrence Canals. He would like to know if there had been any more renewals lately. He would like to know whether the increase was in the staff or in the maintenance.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think there is no increase in the maintenance.

MR. McCALLUM said he saw that the maintenance and revenue of the St. Lawrence Canals, namely, the Beauharnois, Cornwall, Edwardsburg, Montreal and Lachine Canals, had been as follows:—

Years	Maintenance.	Revenue.
1871.....	$ 87,487.00.....	$86,292.00
1872.....	95,935.00 .....	97,410.00
1873.....	104,742.00.....	113,893.00
1874.....	131,105.00 .....	115,654.00
1875.....	122,271.00 .....	116,181.00
1876.....	128,660.00 .....	108,666.00
1877.....	145,822.00 .....	103,369.00
1878.....	133,125.00.....	96,305.00

In each case he was taking the Public Accounts laid before the House at the time specified. This showed that, for eight years, we had expended on these canals $949,187.00, and had collected $837,770.00, or, in other words, we lost by the transaction $111,417.00. If this were explained to be caused by renewals, it would be all right; but, if it were for the staff, it would be all wrong. Comparing the increase with 1873, they found that, in 1874, it amounted to $27,563; in 1875, to $17,527; in 1876, to $23,918; in 1877, to $41,120; and in 1878, to $28,383. The increase might be perfectly legitimate, but, he thought, it required an explanation.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had not the St. Lawrence Canal separate from the Welland Canal, but the total cost of maintenance and repairs, that was wages and incidentals connected with maintaining the works, was, in 1870-71, $360,396; in 1871-2, $367,500; in 1872-3, $406,839; in 1873-4, $460,962; in 1874-5, $489,986; in 1875-6, $477,116. In these last three years, very extensive repairs were made, especially at Port Maitland, and these were included. In 1876-7, the cost had been $396,842, and in the last half year $180,848. He believed there was no appreciable increase to the staff, except, as he had mentioned to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), that at some parts of the work an increase of men had been necessary in consequence of the increased traffic at night. The hon. gentleman was aware that the amount of the revenue bore no relation at all to the matter, because the Government must maintain the same number of men and officers whether the traffic was large or small.

MR. McCALLUM said he did not find any fault at all, because there might be large renewals. The hon. gentleman had told them that there was no increase in the staff on the Welland Canal.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said there was an increase.

MR. McCALLUM said there had been an increase since 1873 in the payment of the staff on the Welland Canal of $76,458. The increase last year, as compared with 1873, had been $22,931. He had before shown that the present Government had set three men to do two men's work. The political friends of the Government had petitioned to have Mr. Carter appointed harbour master at Port Colborne contrary to the report of the Superintendent of the Welland Canal, who said that Mr. Hamilton, who had charge of seven miles of the Canal, was able to discharge the duties of harbour master as well; still, to please political supporters, Mr. Hamilton was relieved of his duties and Mr. Carter appointed in his place. At the village of Dunnville they had created another lock-master's position in order to appoint a man and spend $300 or $400 a year of the public money to keep up a newspaper in the interest of the party. He hoped that as the hon. gentleman was so liberal in appointing officials on the Welland Canal, he would be kind enough to direct the Superintendent to open the back ditches along that Canal to remove the grievances of some people there, which might be done at a cost of $2,000 or $3,000.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he found $10,000 put down for repairs in the Ottawa district. In the Public Accounts he found that $20,000 had been expended for the same service last year. Were those works in such a state of repair as to justify the assumption that this small sum would be sufficient?

MR. MACKENZIE: So my officers inform me.

Vote agreed to.

200. Intercolonial Railway.....$1,600,000

MR. MITCHELL enquired why the item of $580,000 was charged to maintenance and not to capital?

MR. MACKENZIE said it was for maintenance and renewals both. The charge for renewals was spread over a number of years. They had been charging at the rate of $200,000 a year until the road was all relaid. That had been going on for five years.

MR. MITCHELL objected to the old roads being taken into this account, and the relaying of those old roads charged to the working expenses of the Intercolonial. The proper way would be to charge the new steel rails to capital.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be very convenient when the revenue was deficient to charge these expenditures to capital; but he had taken the ground that when once a road was equipped these amounts should be charged to revenue. In order to remedy this and have control over the cars themselves, they built 700 cars last year. These were all charged to capital account.

MR. TUPPER said that he supposed that the hon. the First Minister, on a question of such very great importance as the management of the Intercolonial Railway, would have been desirous to offer to the House some explanation as to the present position of this very interesting subject. He had deferred bringing about several matters of very great importance in connection with this railway because he thought that it would save the time of the House if he dealt with them at one period when this item in the Estimates came up; and therefore, with the indulgence of the Committee as briefly as he could, he would call attention to these matters connected with the Intercolonial Railway, which he thought demanded their very serious consideration. It will be recollected that when the change of Government occurred the hon. the first Minister charged Mr. Brydges with the important duty of making an examination, and report as to the then existing conditions of this railway. This gentleman in the discharge of that duty made a report which was accepted by the House and the country generally, as a very severe censure on the management of the road under the late Government and Mr. Carvell, who was then the superintendent. He took occasion to refute this report in the House, and as the statement which he then made, had, he believed, never been substantially challenged, it would not be necessary for him then to say that by a careful examination of the statement furnished by Mr. Brydges's report, he was enabled to show that the general impression conveyed by its tenor—that the road and rolling stock were in bad condition and that the management was bad—that the road-way, the permanent way and the rolling stock would compare favourably with that of any road on this continent, but he was unable to challenge so strongly the statement of the gentleman, who was sent by the Government to examine the road, as to the question of management, because this was a question on which he had not the means of forming an accurate judgment. He felt, however, that Mr. Carvell's management of the road laboured under a disadvantage,—in fact that at that moment he laboured under every possible disadvantage. They were just amalgamating two systems in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which had been united by a piece of road connecting the two, and he (Mr. Carvell) had to amalgamate these systems of railway, both of which had been previously under independent management; and this involved, of course, the disposal of the staff, a very serious matter in connection with this change. It was also well known, and would be admitted by every person at all acquainted with the subject, that during that year Mr. Carvell had been exposed to one of the most inclement seasons which had existed for a long time in this country, and which certainly had had no parallel since. The severity of the winter, the immense depth of the snow, the amount of storms and ice that had to be contended with were unusual, and, in fact, exceptionally great; and, therefore, the inspection of the condition of the road, the expenditure that was required to be made, and everything connected with it, from these causes placed Mr. Carvell at a very great disadvantage. He was thoroughly satisfied, from the report made by Mr. Brydges himself, though it conveyed a very different impression to the House and country, that there was not room for any serious complaint; that as far as the general management of the road went, the very fact that Mr. Brydges was enabled to report that everything was in an efficient condition at an early period afterwards, and had an efficient and vigorous staff organised, and had been able to perform that duty without going outside of the then existing officers whom he found on the road, was a pretty satisfactory tribute to the fact that, although political influences might have then, as since, influenced the selection of officers for the management of the road, able and efficient officers had been selected for the purpose. The ground taken on that occasion by Mr. Brydges was that there was unnecessary expenditure in the management of the staff and in the number of officers employed in connection with the operation of the road, and that a very large reduction might be made. Mr. Brydges was appointed General Superintendent and authorized by the Government to make such changes in the organization as he had recommended; and, in fact, to carry out the recommendations which he had made. He (Mr. Tupper) might here say, in connection with this matter, that Mr. Brydges went into an elaborate examination of the receipts and expenditure of the road for the previous five years, and those who turned to the report made by Mr. Brydges on that occasion, would find that he arrived at the conclusion that, upon a careful examination of the receipts and expenditure of the roads, both in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, then united together, one about balanced the other, that the receipts had been about equal to the expenditure. It was claimed that there had been some receipts in addition, but, taking into consideration the deterioration of the road, Mr. Brydges thought that they would about balance each other; and that they might look forward to this result in the future, especially if the recommendations which he had made were adopted by the Government, and he was authorized to carry them out. - Mr. Brydges stated, on page 56 :

“ And taking the traffic for the year 1874 as reaching $850,000, I am of opinion that * * * such a traffic should be worked without loss.”

Which, as he had said, had just taken place at that time. Mr. Brydges said, on page 58 :

“ And no doubt one cause of the present large outlay is the providing for the deficiency which existed when the roads were brought together, and the real fact, I suppose, is that during the five years which I have been considering, the earnings and expenses of the two lines, as a whole, were really on the balance.” * * *

He might say that with relation to this, that in 1875-6 the receipts were $878,077, and the expenditure $1,159,142, showing a deficiency of $281,065. Mr. Brydges received instructions from the Government to carry out the recommendations he had made as presented by reference to his supplementary report in which he stated that he had carried them out, and made the reductions, reducing largely the number of officials; and, in fact, that he had carried out all his recommendations as he was authorized by the Government to do. Upon reference to the reports which had been before the House, it would be found that at the end of the year he (Mr. Brydges) reported a considerable saving in the ordinary expenses, although as he stated, and he would quote Mr. Brydges's words— "The year was considerably advanced before the question could be vigorously dealt with." And with a great flourish of trumpets, it was, announced that in 1874 the working expenses were 114½ per cent. of the earnings, while, in 1874, under his management, they were only 95 per cent. He (Mr. Tupper) referred to this matter now because it was very desirable that they should look at this question, this very serious question of the working of the Intercolonial Railway, fairly in the face, because the hon. the First Minister was led away by the reports placed in his hands, not only there, but elsewhere, and had vaunted in somewhat loud terms the advantage which had occurred to the management of the Intercolonial Railway from the transfer of it to his hands from those of the late Government. The reduction in the percentage of the working expenses could be easily accounted for without giving any credit to the change of management. Every person knew—that knew anything in connection with this subject—that there was an enormous fall in prices, that material and that all the stores required by the Intercolonial Railway could be purchased at a much smaller sum at that time; and every person knew that owing to the depreciation in the coal trade, there was an enormous fall in the price of coal, and that this very large item in the expenditure of the road was also reduced, so as to account, without giving any credit whatever to the change of management or to the reduction of salaries, for a very large reduction in the working expenses. Now, in this year's report, it would be found—and those who were acquainted with the wonderful mastery that Mr. Bydges had of the English language, and the facility with which he was enabled to state a case in the most favourable possible way from his own point of view, those who read the report of this year would be a great deal surprised at the altered tone it presented, as compared with former reports, and why? Because they had advanced another stage, because those great advantages which Mr. Brydges had at the outset, he had not had to the same extent this year. He would take, for instance, the change of gauge; under that change, a large portion of which was placed to capital expenditure, and every person acquainted with the operation of railways knew that they could, under the item of change of gauge, and in connection with this restoring of the road-bed, improve the permanent way, and, in fact, supply a very large amount of expenditure which otherwise, if that change had not taken place, and a capital account opened in connection with it, it would necessarily have fallen on the business of the track. In connection with this change of gauge the Government were enabled to make new the rolling stock and to send these broken down locomotives that were worn and required extensive repairs into the machine shop and bring them out comparatively new, and have a capital account for that purpose, and owing to the enormous fall in the price of materials it was very easy naturally to show a large reduction in that direction. The Intercolonial Railway was opened throughout its entire extent and, of course, the Superintendent had the advantage of having a new road at his hands, not two old roads as they were in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, long in operation, requiring a great deal of expenditure, as Mr. Carvell had to keep them up from year to year, but an entirely new road and entirely new rolling stock, and even he additional cars required this year, as the hon. the First Minister had just explained, furnished and not charged to the working expenses of the road, but to capital account. With all these advantages and with the advantage of a new road, with the capital account still opened, to which nearly one million was charged on the new portion of the railway in this year's accounts, and with the advantage of a new road and new rolling stock, and a depreciation in prices, we might naturally look for very favourable results, and a very favourable comparison at the present time; but the Superintendent as he thought with his usual acumen and wisdom in dealing with such matters, states that he would not make any comparison this year. He thought that Mr. Brydges had exercised a good deal of wisdom in this, because he had no hesitation in saying that notwithstanding that this gentleman had almost adopted Talleyrand's maxim of using language to conceal his thoughts, and notwithstanding the fact that a great deal of the information which ought to be contained on the face of the Superintendent's report and that of the officers under him, that had been put before the House, and which was not to be found there, there was nothing in these reports which were now submitted by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and in the supplement which he (Mr. Tupper) would furnish from the Public Accounts to that, to show that all the odium which was thrown upon the management of the Intercolonial Railway under Mr. Carvell had been renewed; and to show that the comparison of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway under the present Government would not only not compare favourably with the management under the previous Administration, that a condition of things was presented of the most serious character, and sufficiently so to attract the careful attention of every public man in this country, and of every person who knew what it was to have a great public work, which had involved a great annual expenditure upon the country. Mr. Carvell was removed from his office because he consumed 114½ per cent. of the earnings of the road in operating it. Mr. Carvell's management was considered bad, and yet, with all these advantages in Mr. Brydges favour, what did they now find? That with all this fall in prices of stores the working expenses of the road had gone up, not to 114½ per cent. of the earnings of the road, as they were under Mr. Carvell's management, but they had reached the figure of 143 per cent. of the earnings. He had had a great deal of occasion to find fault with the mode in which these Public Accounts were made up; and unless an uniform system was adopted in submitting these accounts to the House, all confidence would be destroyed in them, and no proper comparisons could be made; and the people would come to look at these reports as calculated not to give accurate and just information, but to mislead. He had said that the expenses of the road, according to Mr. Brydges' report, were 127 per cent. of the earnings; and according to Mr. Cartwright's account, 143½ per cent. According to this statement of the account, $200,000 was allowed for renewals, and this fell far short of the fact. Had any question ever arisen in the House as to the propriety of charging the renewals of the railway to the current expenses? He thought that hon. gentlemen opposite would be obliged to say no. He thought they would be obliged to say that one question which they had all agreed was that every dollar's expenditure on these railways should be charged to the working expenses of the road for the year in which those renewals were made.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman said "no;" but he would give the hon. gentleman his own authority. He might state from the outset, that every dollar of the renewals under the late Government were charged to the working expenses of the year in which those renewals took place; but in order to set at rest all questions on this point, and to show that one of the charges that they had all agreed, and which the late Government, by its practice, by its declaration to the House, and by its rates for this service and expenditure showed was that this should be charged to that service; and not only so, but he would give the Committee the declarations of the hon. the First Minister himself and of the hon. the Minister of Finance on that point, and this he thought quite conclusively. He held in his hand an extract from Hansard of the 25th of April, 1877, and by referring to page 1831 it would be found that on a vote for 700 new cars, sheds, etc., to be charged to capital, the hon. the Minister of Public Works said:—

“This expenditure was wholly made on capital account. The renewals on the road were paid out of its revenue and charged to income. When roads were once completed, it was assumed that the capital account was closed. A portion of the cost attending change of guage had been charged to income, and a portion to capital. The relaying of the steel rails was charged to income and taken out of the annual vote.”

He thought this would satisfy the hon. the First Minister not only as to the practice of the late Government to charge every dollar of that service, to the extent of something like $300,000 in a single year, or a little short of it, to that service, but that his own authority in the most authoritative form was given to the House as to the proper practice in relation to this matter. He would give, in addition, the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance on the same point; and a very important one it was. What did it show? In his Budget Speech of 1876, page 243 of Hansard, the hon gentleman said:—

“With respect to the operation going on of substituting steel for iron rails, that is, I think, an item properly chargeable to income, and is intended to be. I am somewhat particular in making this statement, because, as the House knows, we feel it incumbent upon us, as we are compelled to keep both a capital and ordinary account, that we should be very scrupulous as to what we allowed to go to that capital account.”

If he quoted to the House, not only the authority of the hon. the Minister of Finance, to show that in a proper account they must charge the increase with all the money spent in renewing with steel rails, but the authority of the hon. the Minister of Public Works himself, in whose Department it was,

who made the declaration and gave the assurance to the House that this should come out of the annual vote, it could be found by reference to this account that this had not been done, and instead of the practice of the late Government having been followed by charging the renewal with steel rails to this account,—in the first place it was almost impossible from Mr. Brydges' report to find out what was expended for that purpose, at all, during the year, but, when they supplemented his statement with the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance, that $200,000 in addition to the amount stated to have been expended in this report, on the working expenses of the road, charged to the working expenses, must be added, for the portion of the steel rails charged for that year, and found, in addition to that, that a suspense account, for the steel rails to be charged over two successive years had to come, it would be found that the practice followed by the late Government, and laid down by the hon. the Finance Minister, as the same practice, and declared by the hon. the First Minister to be the practice which this Government would pursue, had been changed; and that, instead of this account showing the money that was expended in maintaining the railway, and in the maintenance of it in the same way as the past Government showed it, $200,000 had to be added to the ordinary expenditure, in the first instance, and $343,000 had to be added to that. The account, therefore, would stand, when made out according to the way in which the late Government made it out, and in which it was necessary to make it out in order to institute any comparison by referring to Part 1st of the Public Accounts of this year, page 23, thus: that the Intercolonial Railway expenditure for this year was $1,161,673.55, and that their receipts were $1,154,455.35. Before he came to this he must deal for a single moment with the mode in which this expenditure was made. He would show the Committee that, instead of Mr. Brydges having carried out the system of retrenchment, in regard to salaries paid to the officials, and instead of—as he (Mr. Brydges) had led them to suppose—a saving of $17,000 having been affected by allowing him to dismiss officials and to reduce the expenditure, the contrary was the case. Although as he (Mr. Tupper) had stated, Mr. Carvell was labouring under this difficulty: he had just been called upon to amalgamate two independent systems of railway in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Mr. Brydges undertook to state that he could make a reduction of $17,000 in the annual expenditure; but what were the facts as detailed by these accounts? These showed that this reduction of expenditure meant the getting rid of officials appointed by the late Government and the appointment of new officials in their places by the present Government. These documents proved that instead of their being any reduction, not only were all the places filled that were filled under the late Government in connection with the management of the railway, but that a large number of additional officers had been charged upon the public revenue of the country in addition to those who were required before. He might be told that a large portion of the new road had been opened, but he would deduct this and take it out of the account, and account for all the officers required in addition to those that were then engaged. He would take out of the account all that were required for the new stations opened on the railway, and he would still show that, not only had the pledge to retrench the expenditure in this matter entirely failed of accomplishment, but that Mr. Brydges had found it necessary largely to increase the expenditure in salaries, and for officials, over what he found it under Mr. Carvell's management. It would be found that in three years all these officials had been replaced, and more added, making an increase in salaries in the Superintendent's and in Assistant's Department, of $10,000, and an increase in the Engineer's Department of $4,060. He would draw the attention of the committee for a single moment to a paragraph in the report of Mr. Brydges, recommending, in 1874, a reduction in the Engineer's Department. He said, at page 59:—

MR. TUPPER.

“The Engineering Department to be under Mr. McNab * * * His staff to be a draughtsman and one clerk.”

It would be found that instead of this being the case, two assistants that were then in the office were removed. One of them was a gentleman whose services the city of Montreal was glad to obtain in an important engineering capacity. These gentlemen were Messrs. St. George and Gray; they were assistants in the Engineer's Department; and they were both cashiered and sent about their business on the plea that there was to be a reduction in the expenditure; and yet, on looking into the system of the department, a large increase was found of $4,060 over what it was when Messrs. St. George and Gray were there. The cost of the service which these gentlemen had been called on to perform, and which they would have performed, had not only been extended—the expenditure had not only been incurred which would have been incurred by their employment—but at this moment there was in the Engineer's Department an increase of $4,060; in the Cashier's $300; in the Paymaster's $1,200; in the Mechanical Department, of $2,040; in the Stores Department, $1,918; in the Accountant's and Audit Department, $6,000—an increase in these offices, to which Mr. Brydges had called the attention of the Minister of Public Works, of $28,000 over the amount expended previous to the time when Mr. Brydges had been called to take charge of the Department.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: There is twice as much work.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken. The opening of a new line of railway for which the capital account was not yet closed, on which a million was expended on capital account last year, involved, comparatively, no additional expenditure for the past year, because it had the staff—and nearly the same staff was required in reference to these accounts—and everything of that kind that was required for the expenditure of the opening of the additional new piece of road. The salaries and travelling expenses in 1877 were put down at

$211,625; the sum expended in 1874 was $142,600, or an increase of $69,025. He deducted all the salaries required by the opening of the additional road, which amounted to $31,156, and, therefore, instead of the reduction of $17,000 which Mr. Brydges had promised, there was an increase—not only had the $17,000 promised reduction been swallowed up, but there was also $37,867 of increased expenditure. The hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Public Works would not find, in connection with the opening of a portion of the new road, any sufficient justification for this increase. No railway expert in the world who could be brought to give testimony in reference to the matter would consider that any ground whatever. He (Mr. Tupper) did not say that the salaries paid were too high, but that the gentleman called upon to make a report on the road had made a great mistake, according to his (Mr. Tupper's) judgment; and he was compelled, from a sense of justice to the late manager and to his colleagues who had been deeply injured at the time by the report then made, to draw the attention of the House to the fact that at this moment, after four years' experience, all the claims of reduced expenditure which Mr. Brydges led the Government to believe he would be able to make, had he charge of the road, had proved a delusion, and the relative expenditure had, on the contrary, been very much increased. The same thing would be found, on going into an investigation of the expenditure on the operation of the road. The fact was proved by Mr. Brydges' report that the stores had cost, during the past year, on an average only one-half the amount paid in 1874. Taking that fact into account, and doubting, therefore, the amount of expenditure for stores during the past year, and making the expenditure for renewals in the same way as it had been made by the late Government, the expenditure per mile was largely in excess of what it had been since the road was opened. What was the result of all this? It was a very serious one. He did not bring this matter up as involving a charge against the Superintendent. All that he blamed him for was that he was mistaken when he was called on to investigate the position the road was in under the late Government, and the misapprehension he had placed the Minister of Public Works under in relation to this matter. The House would remember that a year ago, when the hon. the Minister of Public Works was dealing with this question, he made to the House the most gratifying statement, that after having opened the whole length of the Intercolonial Railway the result of the entire operation, including the old and the new portion at the close of the six months, showed that the expenditure had only exceeded the income by $13,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That only referred to ordinary expenses.

MR. TUPPER: That had reference to everything.

MR. MACKENZIE: I stated explicitly, not only that, but that these were the six months which were the most profitable. That the six months to come would show a very different result. That was only as against ordinary working expenses—not including other items at all.

MR. TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman meant to make a statement to the House other than that embracing the whole expense of the railway, he made a most unjustifiable one. If the statement that the result of the operations on the whole of the Intercolonial road, after its completion at the end of the first six months showed only a deficit of $13,000, did not cover all the expenses chargeable to income, the House was misled; a more delusive statement could not possibly be made. What expenses did he mean to include? By income and expenses were generally meant all the income and all the expenses chargeable to income. Would the hon. gentleman explain what he was keeping back? He (Mr. Tupper) had risen in his place and had congratulated the hon. the First Minister on that very gratifying statement, as recorded in the Hansard of last year, that the excess of expenditure at the end of six months was about $13,000. On page 1592 he stated that the low cost of working the Intercolonial was no doubt due to its excellent construction.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to call his attention to statements made by himself in the Budget of last year, page 139 of the Hansard. The hon. gentleman asked me: "What do you estimate the cost of working the railways above receipts." I replied: "The dead loss to us was, in all, $550,000, including the cost of running the Prince Edward Island Railway, which would amount to above $100,000." My hon. friend will understand we anticipated a loss of half a million dollars on the Intercolonial.

MR. TUPPER said he had not been misled by the statement. He knew enough of the working of the Intercolonial Railway to know that it was simply impossible that that would be the result. He (Mr. Cartwright) was then speaking as Minister of Finance with reference to general public accounts. But when, at the close of the Session, the Finance Minister was asked what the result was up to the end of the first half year, he gave the answer already quoted. It was quite true the hon. gentleman qualified the statement by saying, what all knew, that it was the best half of the year up to the end of December; but the statement remained that at the end of the first six months the expenditure of operating the railway was only $13,000 over receipts. He (Mr. Tupper) congratulated the hon. gentleman on that result, because, as he (Mr. Tupper) had said, and the Superintendent was in the House with-in hearing of his voice at the time, if at the close of the six months following the opening of the new road, there was only a deficit of $13,000, it was perfectly obvious to every one that as soon as the traffic along the road began to develop, as soon as the advantage of the road became known, there would be a considerable surplus. In Hansard of 1877, page 1,590, it was stated by the hon. the Minister of Public Works:

"The total earnings in 1874-5 were $861,513.93, and in 1875-6, $848,861, being a decrease of about $13,000. In 1874-5 the expenditure was $850,775, and in 1875-6,

MR. TUPPER.

$877,485. In computing the revenue he left out Quebec. For the first half of the current year, the excess of expenditure over revenue was about $13,000.

If that, taken in connection with the statements in relation to it, meant anything else than the whole expenditure of operating the road, the House was misled. He believed the hon. gentleman was mistaken; it was utterly impossible; but he confessed he was not prepared for the startling evidence that the close of the year—the remaining six months—would bring about. It might be true that the most expensive portion of the year was still to run, but taking into consideration that the months of April, May and June, were included in the last half year, and that December and November went into the first half-year, there ought not to be a great deal of difference. But admitting that we had been prepared for a much less favourable result at the close of the year, who would have supposed that the Government would have had to ask this committee to-night to meet a deficiency much nearer a million than $13,000? What was the exhibit? Those who looked at the Public Accounts would find that the expenditure, put down on page 23 of the Intercolonial Railway, was $1,161,673.55; that the receipts for the same period were $1,154,445.35, showing a deficit of $507,228.20, and to that would have to be added, to make this account, as rendered by Mr. Brydges and presented by the First Minister to this House four years ago, correspond with the account as kept by the late Government, in order to obtain the whole expenditure, $343,591 put away in the Suspense Account but chargeable to these renewals which the hon. the Finance Minister declared must be charged to income, and which the hon. the Minister of Public Works declared must come out of the annual vote. The hon. the Finance Minister remembered well that when he (Mr. Tupper) had said, the other night, to the hon. the First Minister that he supposed they had put down a larger quantity of steel rails last year, because they had them on hand, he indignantly repudiated the insinuation, and stated that the policy of the old Government in relaying the track with steel rails had been followed, and that not a single rail had been put down beyond what was required to uphold the road. He (Mr. Tupper) found this deficit, instead of $26,000, which it would have been according to the boastful statement of a year ago, amounted to $850,719.20 on the working of the Intercolonial for the year ending 1st July last. Add to that $97,930.33 for the Island Railway, and what was the result? There was a new road, only fairly completed, of which the capital account was still open, and of the expenditure of which $200,000 had been last year charged to capital account, and yet, during the past year, on this new road, the Island Railway, a road a little longer than 200 miles, running through a level cultivated country, there was a deficit of $97,930, making a deficit on the two lines of railway, under the management of the present Superintendent of Railways, to be met and provided for, of $948,649 for the year ending the 1st July last, or, practically, a million dollars. They had reason to look for a better result, and he (Mr. Tupper) would be doing an injustice to himself and his colleagues, and an injustice to the late manager of the Intercolonial Railway, if he did not take this opportunity of showing that in the light of subsequent events—and, mark, all this had taken place, all this enormous deficit on these railways, during the past year, notwithstanding that Mr. Brydges had declared in his report that the supplies and stores which were the principal item in this heavy expense, the coal and iron and every thing connected with the supplies of this railway, had cost fifty per cent. less, during the past year, than during 1874. Well, that would seem at first sight a very startling discrepancy in the cost of stores, but those who remembered the statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister the other night, would, at once see that startling as it was, it might be quite explicable. He (Mr. Tupper) had called the attention of the Government to the fact that American goods were being allowed to come into competition with our manufactures, invoiced at too low a rate, which was met by the hon. the Finance Minister with the statement that an enormous shrinkage of value had occurred in most goods, that in a branch of the iron trade to which his attention had been drawn, there had been a fall from 137 to 55, making a very much greater change than what Mr. Brydges had shown in his report, namely, that there had been a fall of fifty per cent. Mr. Brydges had shown by a tabular statement that the average cost of the stores in 1877, was one half the amount paid by Mr. Carvell in 1874. That being the case, his expenditure for stores last year, instead of being $1,171,000 would have been doubled, say $2,200,000, had this depression of trade not taken place, and had he been obliged to pay the same prices as Mr. Carvell had paid in 1874. And, yet, notwithstanding that enormous advantage, and notwithstanding the advantage of having a capital account from which to obtain a large portion of the rolling stock required, and everything of the kind, there remained the startling fact that on the Intercolonial Railway and the Island Railway, there was a deficit of within nearly one million dollars. He would not take up the time of the Committee longer in dealing with that question. He had not had any other desire than to do justice to the late Superintendent who had been unjustly treated in the report made of his management, and who was not here to defend himself, and also, not unnaturally, to show that the hon. gentlemen opposite could not plume themselves on having better managed the Intercolonial Railway under their administration of public affairs, than their predecessors. He would not continue further than to express the hope that the trade would largely increase, which would, no doubt, occur now that these roads were connected with the great railways of the West, and that every possible economy would be used. He had not charged any recklessness or extravagance in the management. He wished the hon. gentleman to understand that. But it behoved them to look the question fairly in the face, considering the position in which they were placed, according to this report, and to endeavour by every means to increase the traffic and produce better results.

One of the complaints which Mr. Brydges had made against the late Government was, that they were carrying our people down in the Maritime Provinces, under their system, for almost nothing. He undertook to remedy all that. He (Mr. Tupper) ventured, at that time, in the House to show that Mr. Brydges was under a false impression when he stated a larger revenue could be obtained by increasing the tariff, and that, on the contrary, there would be a decrease. That had been tried in Nova Scotia again and again. He (Mr. Tupper), as the hon member for Halifax knew, had tested the question thoroughly, and knew that Mr. Brydges would find out he was wrong. When Mr. Brydges found out he was wrong, he did that which was creditable to him; he changed the system, and came back to the tariff prepared by Mr. Carvell, as the one calculated to give the best revenue. But, in the meantime, the trade of the country had been convulsed, the traffic had been diverted from the road, and the people had gone back to the old system of travel, and had purchased horses and waggons to carry their produce to market; and, though the tariff had been wisely put back to the position in which Mr. Brydges found it, after he found he was losing at the rate of $100,000 per year under his new arrangement, the former traffic had not yet returned. There were people now travelling with horses and waggons who would not have purchased them had it not been for that increase in tariff. A great injury had been inflicted on the people, both of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and a large amount of revenue was lost to the country through this change of tariff, which had not yet been repaired. He trusted that every means of attracting traffic to the road would be adopted. A great deal of attention had been drawn all over this country to the importance of making Halifax a winter grain port. He (Mr. Tupper) might as well proceed to say what he had to say about all these questions connected with the Intercolonial, so as not to prolong the discussion at a later period. He could not, at this period of the Session, do justice, with a due regard to the anxiety of hon. members on both sides to get through with the work, to these very important questions. The people of Canada had been looking forward to having a great Atlantic winter port, not only for passengers and mails, but also for freight, when this Intercolonial Railway should be constructed. And he was sure that they must all desire to see the mode and business of Canada utilized in building up a great Canadian port instead of an American port, as, unfortunately, hitherto had been the case. He could not say whether that could be done or not, but every means that could be adopted to bring about so important a result should be adopted. He was informed that the Government and Mr. Brydges asked the merchants of Halifax why they did not bestir themselves and build elevators and so prepare to build up their business. That, however, he believed was not the way in which American ports had been generally built up, but that it was the railway companies who had chartered the steamers and made the arrangements to take the freight in Chicago and send it forward. When the late Government went out of power they were making arrangements to bring the Intercolonial Railway into the city of Halifax. They had hoped to be able to go through the dockyard. The station at Richmond was left unrepai red, because they hoped to get into the city. Having, however, failed to obtain the right to take the road through the dockyard to West's wharf, in the business part of the city, every effort having failed in that direction, the late Government determined to have the road brought through Water street to West's wharf. Unfortunately for the country they went out of power rather unexpectedly; a new regime came in, and Mr. Brydges went down there, and with that plausibility which scarcely another man in this country possessed induced the Chamber of Commerce to agree to a change in the scheme of the late Government under which they had arranged to appropriate the houses on one side of Water street.

MR. MACKENZIE; Where can that scheme be seen?

MR. TUPPER: In the report of Mr. Fleming approved by us and approved by the City Council of Halifax.

MR. MACKENZIE: Was it approved by the Privy Council?

MR. TUPPER: It was, and speaking from memory I think an item was put in the Estimates for a sufficient amount to carry it out. I know it was the settled policy of the Government at that time, and that we were engaged in the expropriation of the property on Water street with that end in view.

MR. MACKENZIE: How much was expropriated? If we have any land there I would like to know it.

MR. TUPPER said the late Government were engaged in arranging that when they went out of power. Mr. Brydges induced the Chamber of Commerce to consent to a change in the scheme on a declaration that if they consented to have the terminus not at the water side where it was to have been brought, but at some distance from it, the Government would at their own expense provide steam communication to carry freight to the city—which had never been carried out. That scheme was unfortunately adopted, and what was the result. What had been expended in carrying the railway into Halifax? About three quarters of a million, he believed.

MR. MACKENZIE: About $700,000.

MR. TUPPER said that $700,000 had been practically thrown away. It had been expended in bringing the railway about a mile further into the city, and in the construction of a station and a freight shed. In the enormous expenditure thus made there was no provision made for the freight being brought further than Richmond. From all the western portion of Nova Scotia, all the freight which came by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway had to stop at Richmond, and the merchants had to send up for it, as the new station was only sufficient for the traffic of the Intercolonial itself. When the question of a winter port became a living question, a meeting was held, which was attended by Sir Hugh Allan, who stated on what terms his company would take the freight from Halifax; and the first condition required was that the railway must be brought down to the water. After an expenditure of $700,000 they were unable to deal with this question of a winter freight port, because they had no communication with the water at the city, and one of the first duties that would devolve upon the incoming Administration would be to remedy that difficulty. In supporting that, he was sure he would have the assistance of the hon. the Minister of Militia. This, however, was not the only complaint which he had to make against the Government in relation to the management of the Intercolonial Railway and its adjuncts. Let them take, for instance, the position in which the western portion of Nova Scotia stood to-day. Nova Scotia obtained the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, 85 miles in length, by granting a large subsidy out of the public money, and by providing by law that that railway company should have running powers over the Windsor Branch and main line of the Intercolonial into Halifax, some 45 miles. The late Government gave the Windsor and Annapolis Railway a 21 years' lease of the Windsor Branch, on the condition that they paid one-third of the earnings to the Government. They failed, however, to pay that third of the earnings, and the late Government having given them notice that they would cancel the lease if they did not comply with the terms, passed an Order-in-Council just before going out of power, cancelling the lease to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, and agreeing to transfer the line to the Western Counties Railway upon evidence being furnished that they could complete the railway from Annapolis to Yarmouth. The late Government had never contemplated giving to the Western Counties Railway what they did not possess. They had no power to take away the running powers of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway over the Government Railways in Halifax. This right was guaranteed by an Act of Parliament, without which the money could not have been obtained to build the road. If the hon. the First Min ister desired to hand over the fee simple of the road, he must do it subject to the law of the land, as by an Act of the Legislature of Nova Scotia the right to run had been previously transferred. In 1875, the Minister of Public Works renewed the lease with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company. He had passed an Act giving him power to transfer it to the Western Counties Railway Company; but, with that on the Statute-book he renewed the lease, making an engagement with them to change their gauge, involving an expenditure of $50,000 or $60,000, and making a binding contract with them renewing their lease. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Brydges was authorized to go by force of arms and wrest that line out of the hands of the Company which had it under lease from the present Government, and on the faith of which they were induced to change their gauge, and hand it over to the Western Counties Railway. In England the Government of Canada had been held up to public obloquy, for having induced men to come into this country and spend money on the faith of an Act of Parliament which had been disregarded. The best English advice had been obtained, and the Windsor and Annapolis Railway had taken this case into the Court of Chancery, in Nova Scotia, and the Judge in Equity had given judgment that the Government had violated their lease and exceeded their powers, and that the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company had, at present, the right to running powers over the road, which was given to it by Act of Parliament. He had, in his possession, extracts from the London Times in reference to the bad faith shown to capitalists by the Government of Canada—a most damaging thing to be going about in the journals of Great Britain. The Western Counties Railway Company had failed to build the road from Yarmouth to Annapolis. They had, however, possession of the link between the Windsor and Annapolis road and Halifax, and the result was that the whole business of the western portion of Nova Scotia was paralyzed; as any man sending cattle, for instance, or freight of any kind, from Annapolis to Halifax, found that he had to deal with two companies, hostile to one another, and the whole country was, therefore, suffering from this unfortunate and illegal transaction on the part of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said he supposed they must make up their minds for this annual tirade against the management of the Intercolonial Railway.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. the First Minister could hardly say that, since he had complimented him a year ago in the highest terms.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member had to make his annual speech on this subject, and of course he felt a little sore over the events of 1873, which still rankled in his mind and compelled him to give his feelings vent occasionally. He was glad to find, however, severe as had been the hon. gentleman's criticism, that he had admitted that the railroad was admirably managed. The hon. gentleman had no fault to find, no extravagance to charge, but he simply asserted that the hopes held out in 1873-4 had not been fulfilled. He (Mr. Tupper) had shown a remarkable degree of disingenuousness in his treatment of the subject. The hon. gentleman said that he (Mr. Mackenzie) assured the Committee last year that there was only a deficiency of \$13,000 upon the entire half-year's operations. If the hon. gentleman had read carefully that passage, a portion of which he had read, he would have shown to the Committee that he (Mr. Mackenzie) did not mean and could not mean anything but the working ordinary expenditure. He pointed out then that the total earnings of the year 1874-5 were \$861,593, and of 1875-6, \$848,861, being a decrease of about \$13,000. In 1874-5 the expenditure was \$850,775; and in 1875-6, \$877,485; which figures did not comprise the expenditure for renewals. He recollected entering upon the points as to the life of steel rails as compared with iron rails, and giving that as a reason why the Government were justified in extending the period by creating a Suspense Account, for charging the rails against the revenue of the road; and he pointed out, as he would now point out, that it would be a manifest injustice to charge against the ordinary expenditure of one year, the whole expense of the steel rails which were laid, because that would bring the expenditure for rails within two or three years, while the life of steel rails was expected to be fifteen years at least. The entire expenditure for steel rails on the line was as follows:—In 1871-2, when only half a mile was laid, \$3,825; 1872-3, 10 $\frac{1}{4}$  miles laid, \$82,510; 1873-4, 37.13 miles, \$284,985. This was the year before the present Government acceded to office; in 1874-5, 40 $\frac{1}{4}$  miles, \$275,000; 1875-6, 35 $\frac{1}{2}$  miles, \$191,700; and in 1876-7, when the entire quantity of rails was procured with which to renew nearly the whole line, 111 miles, \$549,450. The hon. gentleman said that the deficit for the year was nearly \$1,000,000. How did the hon. gentleman reach that? By adding in the entire amount of the Suspense Account, which the Government had created in order that it might be distributed over a number of years. The hon. gentleman had no right to do that. The hon. gentleman had gone on to show that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had stated that all renewals, after the road was completed, should be charged to revenue; and he had endeavoured to deduce from that an unfair conclusion, namely, that everything bought in one year should be charged to one year's revenue. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had given reason, three years ago, and also last year, for the course the Government proposed to pursue, and the House accepted those reasons. It was the accepted policy of the Government and the House that they should extend the period of payment and of charging the ordinary revenue over a number of years. Whether that policy was right or wrong, it was the policy the House had deliberately adopted, and which the Government had sustained all through. With regard to the working of the road, the hon. member maintained that a road 750 miles long, could be worked at the same expense as one 332 miles long.

MR. TUPPER: No.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman said "no;" but he appealed to every hon. member present who heard him, to say if that statement was not true.

MR. TUPPER: I did not say the expense of working a road 700 miles long was the same as one 300 miles long. I said the expense of the staff would not materially differ.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was a distinction without a difference. The Engineer's staff was part of the working expenses of the road. He appealed to any practical man to say if the mileage of the road was not the criterion for the Engineer's expenditure. The Engineer or his assistant must travel over the road and see every portion of it. Besides, the Government had undertaken, rightly or wrongly, to do an immense amount of their own work on the line, rebuilding engines, building cars, making their own sidings, etc., and a great amount of work was involved in this. He maintained that instead of the expenditure having been excessive it was unusually less in proportion now than it was four years ago. So true was this that he was amazed that the hon. gentleman had ventured to institute a comparison which must redound so much against himself. The hon. gentleman had shown that though the mileage had been doubled, the increase in the Departments had been very slight indeed. But the best evidence that the management was more successful than it had been before was the fact that the traffic was carried more cheaply per mile than it had been in 1873-4. When the present Government took charge of the road the cost of working per mile was $3,839.38, while last year the entire cost was $2,327.27 a decrease of $1,500 per mile. But he would apply another criterion. There were a certain number of trains passed over the road daily and yearly, and an exact account was kept of the expenditure involved in working those trains. The cost per train per mile, in the year, before he (Mr. Mackenzie) had taken charge of the department was $1.02. Last year the cost was 82c, or a decrease 20 per cent. Not only so, but in consequence of the track being better attended to, in consequence of better management, they were now able to take a larger number of cars per train than before, so that if they attached only the same number of cars to each engine, the train mileage would, perhaps, be as low as 75c, or a decrease of over 25 per cent. In 1873-4 three track-masters were sufficient for the road; now seven are required, the mileage was so large. At Rimouski pier there had been a great expense in order to meet the convenience of the public by a prompt delivery of the English mail east and west. There had been every effort made to meet the public convenience, and he ventured to say that there was no railroad upon the continent of America at this moment more thoroughly equipped and better worked than the Intercolonial Railway. There was one very amusing error in the hon. gentleman's calculations as to the cost. He would not say anything about the hon. gentleman's percentage as his hon. friend beside him had taken that yoke from him, but he would say that in his estimate of expenditures the hon. gentleman had included the wages with the stores. There had been no decrease in the wages. The hon. gentleman had taken the gross sum and pointed out that they cost 100 per cent. more in 1873-4 than last year, but he embraced wages in this statement, and the hon. gentleman knew that wages had not decreased. On the contrary they had somewhat increased.

MR. TUPPER: Wages?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. TUPPER: I will undertake to say that the Superintendent will tell the hon. gentleman that he cut down the pay of the labourers.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the wages of the labourers had remained precisely the same as they were, and this was also the case with the mechanics he presumed. He thought so, but there was an increase in the wages of the staff. For instance, Mr. Luttrell had now a considerably larger salary; Mr. Whitney had a larger salary; and also Mr. McNab. He was receiving for the first two years that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had had control over the road, $1,000 a year from the Nova Scotia Government, as their consulting engineer. He declined to allow this arrangement to continue after they had an additional roadway ready for opening, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) gave him notice that it should terminate, and his wages was increased in their service by the amount received from the Nova Scotia Government under the arrangement made some years before. The wages he believed of many of the station-masters were more or less increased, and those of the telegraph operators and train-despatchers were increased, so that there was in the expenditure for salaries and wages a very considerable increase, though he dared say that the percentage distributed over the whole of the work would not be large; but there was an increase to a greater or less extent; and yet the hon. gentleman classed this item with the stores, and pointed out a decrease of 100 per cent., or rather, that there had been a decrease since 1874, and that it was, in 1874, higher by 100 per cent. than in 1876. The hon. gentleman had made this evening a speech, partly in revenge for former alleged injuries; a speech partly of a political cast; a speech that looked to another contest in Halifax; and a speech that looked to a political contest in the western counties of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman had endeavoured, as far as he could do by his speech, to influence the feelings which were excited in that quarter at the present moment, in consequence of the derangement of the railway traffic. In going into this matter, he accused this Government of not having paid sufficient attention to the extension of the road into Halifax; he went on to show that the late Government had made arrangements for such extension along Water-street to West Wharf. How far this was beyond the present station he (Mr. Mackenzie) did not know.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. TUPPER: It is very near the station.

MR. MACKENZIE said that his hon. friend (Mr. Jones) told him that the distance was less than a quarter of a mile. The hon. gentleman told them—and he confessed that he heard it with amazement—that the late Government had taken a large vote for the purpose of carrying the road to this point, and that they had commenced to expropriate the property on the left or water side of Water-street. He interrupted the hon. gentleman to ask what property was so expropriated, because it was the first time that he knew that they owned any property near the dockyard on that side of the road; and he thought it was high time to look after it. The hon. gentleman then said that, perhaps, it was not wholly expropriated, but they had taken steps towards it and got a report; that a report was submitted to Council, and an Order-in-Council passed, providing for this expropriation. This was all news to him. If there was an Order-in-Council, it had never been brought to his notice by any one. If there was such an intention as to purchase to West's Wharf, it was never declared in this House; and if the late Government obtained a vote—which they did—of $250,000 in the Session of 1873, to purchase this property, he was tolerably certain that no indication was given to Parliament of the purpose for which this was to be expended.

Mr. TUPPER: It was for the purpose of carrying the road into Halifax.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course that was the whole statement; but would the hon. gentleman say that any statement was made in Parliament that this was for the purpose of going beyond the dockyard as far as West's Wharf? Will he say that they were then taking steps to expropriate this property? In the spring of 1873, when the Estimates were being pushed through the House, the hon. gentleman must have been in a position, if at all, to make this statement. Was the statement made? Was Parliament informed of this intention?

Mr. TUPPER: Yes; I will tell the hon. the First Minister that the hon. member for Halifax, on the floor of the House brought the question up, and I stated then, as to night, that it was decided after communication with the citizens of Halifax, to go into Halifax and provide that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who was the member for Halifax?

Mr. TUPPER: Mr. Jones.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was not here.

Mr. TUPPER: It was then at a previous date. I explained it to the present Minister of Militia. I remember distinctly that this hon. gentleman brought up the question, and my having stated that I would not say exactly the time; and I will undertake to show, from the record, that I made the explanation that having failed to get to the dockyard outside we would go to West's Wharf; and I think that he will recollect the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman remember having applied to the Imperial Government for the dockyard?

Mr. TUPPER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And being refused?

Mr. TUPPER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. gentleman quite sure of that?

Mr. TUPPER: We not only applied to the Imperial Government, but delegated Mr. Archibald, when in England, to make a personal application to the Lords of the Admiralty, which he did. We took every means to accomplish the design.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this Government had gone through that process; and he was not aware, until this moment, that the hon. gentleman and his friends announced their intention of securing the property beyond the dockyard for the purpose of the railway; or that they had taken any steps with the corporation to secure the right to carry the road along Water street, and the hon. gentleman knew that he could not do this without the consent of the corporation. No step that he was aware of had been taken in this regard. The hon. gentleman now, after the Government had expended a large sum of money in carrying the road into Halifax, on a plan which he (Mr. Mackenzie) ventured to say, was entirely satisfactory to the business men of the city, as many of them told him, and as they put it in formal shape, in fact, by requesting that this should be done. He was surprised now to hear the hon. gentleman, for the sake of making the little political capital which the hon. gentleman thought it would make, endeavour to influence the minds of the people there.

MR. TUPPER: No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE: "No, no," the hon. gentleman said. Why, the hon. gentleman said it would be one of the first tasks of the incoming Administration to carry the road to this point.

MR. JONES: And bring back the workshops.

MR. MACKENZIE: And this was held out as a boon to the people of Halifax, just as the hon. gentleman had told them of his great bravery in daring Mr. Carvell to move the men or engineers out of the shop at his peril.

MR. TUPPER: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman went down there as a sort of king, and as it suited his purpose at the last election to make a demonstration of his powers when Minister before the whole people of Halifax, the hon. gentleman declared his determination that not a man or shovel would leave these shops because he had resolved that they should remain at Halifax.

MR. TUPPER: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: And now the hon. gentleman told them and the whole country, after an enormous expenditure had been made by the Government at Halifax to obtain a suitable terminus—and it was a suitable terminus—and after the enormous expenditure made at Richmond, where there was a splendid wharf fitted for the largest steamers that navigated the Atlantic Ocean, that they must and that he would purchase, if he had the power, all the warehouses and shops and streets that lay between the present terminus and this place called West's wharf, in order that Mr. Ritchie might secure more votes against his hon. friend the Minister of Militia. Why, if it were Parliamentary, he should say that this was one of the last acts of the demagogue. The hon. gentleman would venture in this way to endeavour to make a little political capital out of an ordinary discussion upon an ordinary item in the Estimates; but the hon.

MR. MACKENZIE.

gentleman did not stop here. He said that the Government, by their mismanagement in connection with the Windsor Branch Railway, had thrown disorder and confusion into the whole of the railway traffic; that they had undertaken to do what was illegal; that they had been checkmated by the Court of Chancery, and that they had been held up by the English journals to derision because they had violated some of the vested rights held by English gentlemen or capitalists in Nova Scotia. Was it this Government who really did this? Was it this Government who in the first place cancelled the agreement? Why was the report made at an exceedingly ominous period? There was a memorandum dated the 21st of October, 1873, from the Minister of Public Works, submitting the accompanying proposal, made by the Western Counties Railway Company, of Nova Scotia, and recommended its adoption; and the Committee of Council advised that the accompanying proposal be adopted as recommended, subject to the approval of Parliament. This resolution was as follows:—

"Whereas, by resolution of the House of Commons, passed on the 23rd day of May, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three, it was resolved: That the Government be authorized to enter into negotiations during the Parliamentary recess with some reliable Association or Company, for the transfer of the railway from Windsor to the trunk line from Halifax to Truro, upon condition that such Association or Company extend the railway from Annapolis to Yarmouth, subject to the approval of Parliament at the next Session."

The late Government were to transfer the railway in this manner. Then there was an Order-in-Council of the 22nd of October, the next day, on the report dated the 21st of October, from the Minister of Public Works, stating that the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company failed to operate the railway known as the Windsor Branch, contained in the Order-in-Council of the 22nd September, 1871, and to comply with the other terms and conditions of the Order in Council; that it owed now $30,000 to the Government of Canada, and that though repeatedly called upon to pay, had failed to do so; and recommending that, inasmuch as the said Company have failed to operate one of the railways between Halifax and Annapolis, the Government of Canada, known as the authorities by the said Order-in-Council, do proceed immediately to operate the railway between Halifax and Windsor. The Committee submitted the above, recommended by His Excellency the Governor-General. Then it was provided as follows: In the agreement made on the 20th of October,—the proposal was made by the Western Counties Railway, on the 20th October,—on the 21st it was formally accepted, because the Minister of Public Works took the necessary steps by making a recommendation to Council to have an Order-in-Council passed thereupon; and this agreement or proposal from the Western Counties Railway was as follows,—the proposal was embodied in it:—

“And whereas the Western Counties Railway Company have undertaken to build a railway from Annapolis to Yarmouth; and

“Whereas the said work has been undertaken and commenced in view of the provisions of the above resolution; and

“Whereas the said Company are desirous of having the said railway, in the said Resolution mentioned, transferred to them;

“The said Company therefore propose, for the acceptance of His Excellency the Governor-General in Council, the following terms of transfer, viz:—

“1st. The said Company will undertake to receive the said railway and appurtenances on the first day of December, Anno Domini, eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and from that date to work it efficiently, and keep the same in repair at their own proper costs and charges, collecting, receiving and appropriating to their own use all the tolls and earnings of the same;

“2nd. That on the completion of the Western Counties Railway from Yarmouth to Annapolis (now in progress of construction), the said railway and appurtenances from Windsor to the trunk line, shall be and become absolutely the property of the said Western Counties Railway Company;

“3rd. That in consideration of the premises, the said Company hereby engage to prosecute the work of building the railway from Yarmouth to Annapolis, and complete the same with all reasonable despatch.

“Dated at Ottawa, D.C., this twentieth day of October, Anno Domini, eighteen hundred and seventy-three.”

Then on the 30th October, there was a memorandum from the Minister of Public Works, dated on the 29th October, 1875, as follows:—

“1st. That the Western Counties Railway Company shall carry free of charge, all passengers holding Government tickets, on all their passenger trains running between Halifax and Windsor Junction.

“2nd. That the said Company or their agents or assigns, shall have running powers over the Intercolonial Railway, between Halifax and Windsor Junction, with such privileges as have been hitherto granted in the agreement with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway.

“The Committee on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, respectfully advise that the terms of the above proposal be approved.”

The whole of the steps, except the final Act of Parliament which gave legislative effect to this agreement, were carried through by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues who undertook to criticise unfavourably this transaction. The agreement was this. Every word of it was truth; and yet the hon. gentleman ventured to attack this Government, and to appeal to the Western Counties of Nova Scotia, to operate against this Government politically, because he endeavoured to fasten upon this Government the weight of his transgressions, if it were a transgression; and more, the hon. gentleman he thought, if he would have perused the judgment of Judge Richie as he (Mr. Tupper) said he had, would find that this agreement which was cancelled by the late Government, on the 22nd of October, was held by the court not to be cancelled legally, and that it was on this fact that the entire judgment was based. They said it was not true that they ceased to operate the railway, and they appeared to have satisfied the Judge that this was the case; and although by a clerical error, or an error of the late Deputy Minister of Public Works, properly speaking, although in 1875 a temporary arrangement that he (Mr. Mackenzie) signed as Minister of Public Works was made to renew this lease, still such renewal in the face of the Act of Parliament was in itself ultra vires and could have no possible effect if the lease had been properly cancelled before; but it was because the lease was held by the Court never to have been properly cancelled, and that the rights of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company existed still, as under the lease, that this judgment was given. This was the basis of the decision which the hon. gentleman tried to lay at their door, and this was a specimen of his fairness in debate. He had to say, in the first place, with regard to the extension into Halifax, that the expenditure of $70,000 was not incurred in the purchase of the block of land to extend the buildings between Montreal and Richmond. It was spent to a great extent to build or rebuild between the wharves commenced at Richmond where the largest steamers could unload their freight if they pleased. Here it was that they proposed, if the Allan steamers could get winter freight over the railway, to have this freight transferred. It was not necessary at all for the through traffic that the steamers should go to West street or any place in that neighbourhood. Indeed, it would be extremely inconvenient that they should do so. It was much more convenient to load grain and flour and produce of that kind at Richmond, where the accommodation was ample. Indeed, the wharfage might be extended from Richmond all the way to Bedford Basin. It was one immense harbour for miles and miles, and the water side could be utilized for any number of elevators, freight sheds or wharves, such as that which they had erected; and when the hon. gentleman endeavoured to make capital against the Government for not having sufficiently studied the interests of the trade of the Intercolonial, and more particularly, as the hon. gentleman tried to make out, the trade of Halifax, he was acting, he (Mr. Mackenzie) thought, a very unworthy part as a citizen of Halifax, for he had met with the utmost expressions of good will from all the Halifax people for the efforts this Government had made—efforts which were neglected for many years by the late Administration to carry the trade of the country into the city, and to afford that accommodation which a rich and populous city required, and he ventured to say that at this moment there was no handsomer station or better accommodation at any terminus on this continental than at Halifax station. So much with regard to several points made by the hon. gentleman—some from a matter of mere defence and attack. He would refer for a moment to the present condition of the road. They had now nearly completed the steeling of the line. The steel rails were laid on the entire road, with the exception of 11 or 12 miles. The old bed had been renewed in the sleepers, some iron bridges and some filling up, and they had ballasted the St. John and Shediac road so as to bring it into first-class condition, and at no previous period had the old portion been in as good condition as now. During last winter, from the last of November to April 3rd, there had been, altogether, twenty-two steamers unladen, partially, at Halifax. These steamers unloaded, altogether, 1,218 cart-loads, from which a revenue of $25,662 was derived. This would not, perhaps, be looked upon, even for these few months, as a very large trade; but it was large, since it commenced in the first place at so very late a period, and they might reasonably look for a vast increase of this trade in a few years. During the first winter, there were apprehensions that the arrangements which the Government had made, were not such as would ensure a steady stream of traffic passing over the road. The merchants and others who had freight to come to Montreal and western places, were naturally timid about trusting their goods on a road which had to pass through so large a tract of country, usually covered pretty deeply with snow; and when they knew that during the last two years the steamers running from Liverpool, and other English ports, to New York, had carried goods for western Ontario as low as 12s. 6d. and 15s. sterling, per ton, this passage being at once rapid and sure, they could scarcely wonder that they had carried so little over the Intercolonial Railroad; still it was an admirable beginning, and when the first winter was carried out triumphantly as to the passage of traffic of all kinds, the second, this last winter, was very much more successful, as the returns they now had showed; and they were able now to point, with some pride, to the result of the current year's transactions. For the six months ending December, of the last three years, they had been as follows: in 1875-6, $471,042; 1876, $613,384; and 1877, $715,186, an increase over the previous corresponding six months of nearly $100,000; and during the last four months there had been an increase again of another $100,000 over the corresponding four months of the previous year, so that they had every reason to feel hopeful as to the traffic which might pass over this road. He was not hopeful that he should succeed for years to come in making the traffic entirely a paying one, but the road would yield a return in many other ways than dollars and cents, by opening up a vast portion of the country which had previously been almost inaccessible. It would pay in another way. It would afford a highway of our own to the ocean, to our two great cities on the sea coast, thus promoting that intercourse which was essential to the growth of national feeling amongst us, which was much more valuable than money—that independent national feeling, without which no people could be prosperous or great. He would not occupy more time in referring to those matters with which the hon. member for Cumberland had dealt. He thought he had tolerably well answered the points which the hon. gentleman had endeavoured to make against the Government. He would be very glad to answer any questions which his information would enable him to answer, respecting anything connected with its management. He could only say that he had, as far as possible, given his closest attention to making the road a success. Surely the economy which had been practised alike in the purchasing of supplies and the general management of the road was such as would fairly entitle the Government to some credit at the hands of the Committee. The hon. gentleman opposite had endeavored to show that a great deal of what the Government was assuming as a credit to itself was due really to the shrinkage in value of the goods purchased in the shape of stores. No doubt there was something in this, when he (Mr. Mackenzie) had pointed out that the average cost of bar iron in 1873-4 was $4.31 per 100lbs., of casting iron $4.25 per 100lbs.; while this Government purchased the same material, bar iron at $1.90 per 100 lbs., and cast iron at $2.28 per 100lbs. Iron had no doubt suffered great shrinkage in value, but he did not believe it had shrunk to the extent those prices indicated. Any one who looked at the Public Accounts which were presented to Parliament some years ago would find that similar iron, ordinary English iron, was paid for as high as $6.25, and would find also that this Government purchased spring steel at 6c., whereas, before they came into office it was charged at 18c. He did not believe spring steel was three times as high in 1873-4 as in 1876-7. He was sure it was not. He recollected well taking in tenders for this particular article after he had come into office, and instead of paying 18c. for it, he obtained it at 7½c. He thought the Government might, therefore, fairly take some credit to itself, if they had—and he thought they had—succeeded by their system in purchasing at a very much lower price than the former Administration, besides the shrinkage which, he admitted, was very great. Over and beyond the shrinkage, he ventured to say they had purchased, not simply those supplies mentioned in this report, but other articles at prices less by three or four times the total value than what was paid in 1873-4. Had he known there was going to be a critical examination into prices, he would have brought with him a tabular statement he had of many articles which would have been of interest to the Committee. He did not desire to enter into any discussion to-night, because he had not expected that the hon. gentleman would have taken the precise line which he had adopted. He ventured to say that in no railroad on the Continent of America had stores been purchased with greater judgment, or dealt out with greater care and precision than on the Intercolonial. No one who examined the main department and went over the railway and examined the works, would fail to appreciate the efforts of the Government to make this road a successful one.

Mr. JONES said the explanations of the hon. the Premier, in reply to the observations of the hon. member for Cumberland, perhaps, left very little for him to say on these points, except to refer to one of the hon. gentleman's remarks, which applied more particularly to Halifax. During the previous Administration, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, an amount was annually placed in the Estimates for the purpose of carrying the railway into Halifax. That amount was kept there, year after year, but nothing was done. Year after year, as a Dominion or local election came round in Halifax, engineers were sent round with their instruments, to lead the people to suppose the Government were at last in earnest and were going to prosecute the work, but, invariably, nothing further was done. The only thing done was to make an application to a member of the Government for a dockyard through which the railway might pass to West Wharf. The Admiral on the station gave an unfavourable report, and the whole matter dropped there. The Government had never moved further than to obtain possession of the land. They had a survey made and advertised at a critical time, and said they were going to give this tender to Mr. O'Brien to take the railway down to the north end of the dockyard wall, knowing, at the same time, they could not move one step in advance without the permission of the city. The whole thing was a political dodge, got up at the time for a political purpose, very well understood. When this Government came into power, their engineers were sent to Halifax and the Superintendent went down and consulted with the city with reference to bringing the line into it. He met the Department of Commerce, and detailed the plan which, after mature deliberation, he thought was the best to be obtained under the circumstances. The Department of Commerce approved of the plan. At that time the arrangement was made adopting North street as a station, with the view of obtaining Queen's Wharf for the city terminus. The Government applied for the wharf and were refused, and, therefore, their proposal to establish a steam ferry between the city and Richmond could not be carried into effect. The Government then negotiated with respect to private wharves, but found there were no private wharves unless they purchased a very large slice of deep water property to give the accommodation. The objection to West Wharf was this: When the railway authorities came to investigate the subject, they found there was not room enough at West Wharf for freight and passenger accommodation, though there might have been accommodation for a freight station. The Government then built the North street station, where there was ample accommodation for passengers and freight. He did not say but that the Government might have to carry the line further into Halifax. That was under consideration at present. It would have to go by a different route, along Water street itself, which would be a mode much less expensive than that pointed out by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman had also referred to the Windsor and Annapolis Railroad. The late Government had leased this road to that Company then, under peculiar circumstances; had passed an Order-in-Council revoking the lease on the ground that the Company had ceased to operate the road, which was not true, as had been proved in another case submitted to Judge Richie, on which he founded his argument, therefore the Order-in-Council cancelling the lease was beyond their powers. That Order-in-Council was made a special legislation in the following year, and embraced in an Act of Parliament. On that occasion the hon. gentleman was present, and the representatives of the Western Counties Railway Company were present; and he was not aware that either had drawn the attention of the House to the fact that they were about to pass an Act beyond their powers, under the circumstances. Had the hon. gentleman taken then the view which he seemed to have lately taken in the interests of the western counties of Nova Scotia, it was his duty to have drawn the attention of the House to this fact, and to have pointed out that the Government were asking the passage of an Act conferring powers to the Western Counties Railway Company beyond their powers. He (Mr. Jones) regretted extremely the position in which those railways were placed. He did not wish to express an opinion in favour of one company or the other. He was afraid they had been working in no friendly spirit towards each other. As these roads had been built by public money, the Government would have to take some course in order that public interests might not suffer beyond a certain point. The hon. member for Cumberland had endeavoured to make political capital out of these questions, but the people of Halifax knew the hon. gentleman's course and would not be guided by his opinions.

MR. TUPPER said he felt that the case as stated by him was practically untouched, and therefore he would detain the Committee but a short time longer. The hon. the First Minister had drawn a distinction between renewals and ordinary expenses. He (Mr. Tupper) failed to see, if maintenance of way was an ordinary expense—and he thought the hon. the First Minister would admit that it was an ordinary expense—how any distinction could be drawn between renewals which were an essential part of maintenance of way, and ordinary expenses. He thought he need not labour further at that point, he had shown that the hon. gentleman had said not only that renewals must be charged to income, but that they must be taken at one vote. That disposed of the question as to whether he (Mr. Tupper) had the right to charge him with the renewals he had made during the past year. It was grossly unfair for the hon. gentleman to charge Suspense Account $300,000 or $400,000 for the expenses in carrying on the working of the Intercolonial Railway. If he could put nearly $400,000 on the two following years, why could he not put a million, so that the working would cost nothing, by putting everything into Suspense Account. If that was not an essential part of the maintenance of the road he did not know what was. All parties agreed that renewals had been charged to the year in which they had been made both by the late Government and the present Government. He (Mr. Tupper) had not said before, nor did he say now, that the expense of operating the road was the same for three hundred miles as for six hundred miles, but there was no such relation between the staff and the length of the road required for the operation of the road. There was only one superintendent required whether for 100 or 1,000 miles. Take for instance the question of engineering. He wanted to know why Mr. Brydges, knowing the great injustice of turning public officers of standing out of their positions, recommended to the hon. the First Minister, to discharge two assistant engineers, knowing as he did, he was going almost immediately to have the road open for the 700 miles, and when he had them replaced. It was making it—

MR. MACKENZIE: What was?

MR. TUPPER: There had been more money expended in engineers by a thousand pounds at the present moment than before they were discharged. Mr. Brydges knew that immediately on the opening of the new road they would be required, and his ingenuity might have found some employment for them until the road was opened. The working of the road per mile had been brought up as a material point. He (Mr. Tupper) had drawn the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the fact that in that comparison they had the advantage of the difference between the cost of stores in 1874 and 1877. Assuming that the charges were extravagant in 1874, although it was admitted there was a great shrinkage in value, they had that difference between mileage of 1874 and 1877. If it had depended entirely on good management, why was it that the cost per mile of working the road, 429 miles in 1875, was $2,542 under the present management, as shown by Mr. Brydges' own accounts, and that in the next year the charge for operating 545 miles was only $2,126. This showed a large disparity between the cost per mile of working the road under the same management in 1875 and 1876. Then, in 1877, there was again a large increase of over $100 per mile in the cost of working it, notwithstanding a large portion of this road was new, and the capital account still open. He would now allude to one or two points raised by the hon. the First Minister. The hon. the First Minister said that he (Mr. Tupper) had made a political speech. He could not help it if, in drawing these contrasts between the management of the Intercolonial under the old Government and the present Government, the results were favourable to the late Government. He was not responsible for that. It might have political effect, but the hon. the First Minister could not, on that account, claim that he (Mr. Tupper) should not make these statements. His object was to make a comparison between the two parties, one which he was entitled to make, as the late Government had been unfairly judged in relation to this matter. Taking Mr. Brydges' own statement in regard to the cost of stores, he said their prices had been greatly lessened during the last three years, partly by general new prices, partly by asking for tenders for the additional articles required. An arrangement was made for over $100,000 for rolling stock in the United States, by the Superintendent, without tenders or competition being called for. The arrangement was made with the Portland Car Company.

MR. MACKENZIE: There was a circular sent to all the leading firms.

MR. TUPPER said when a public department wanted a $100,000 worth of engines, he did not call sending circulars to a few people a good system.

MR. MACKENZIE: The circular was sent to all the leading firms of engine manufacturers. There could be no better mode of tendering adopted than that. The hon. gentleman was aware that that was the method pursued by almost all railway companies and by the British Government.

MR. TUPPER said he was warranted in saying there were no public tenders called for. The Minister of Militia seemed to question the rights of anyone, but himself, to say anything about Halifax. This, however, was not a matter in which Halifax was alone interested. Every Canadian was interested in the question of the situation of the Intercolonial at Halifax. The hon. gentlemen had said that his (Mr. Tupper's) statements would not go for much in Halifax; but, on a recent occasion, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) a direct personal issue, between him (Mr. Jones) and himself, almost ignoring the candidate who was running against him (Mr. Jones), the majority of the electors of the city of Halifax voted against the hon. gentleman being returned to this House. He (Mr. Tupper) could claim the credit of having been instrumental, of having been concerned, of having been an active agent in everything which had had the effect of advancing the position of the city of Halifax for the last 20 years; and he defied the hon. gentleman to point to a single public matter there which he had not promoted.

MR. JONES (Halifax): What are they?

MR. TUPPER said that in visiting Halifax, he could say Si monumentum requiris circumspice. When the Intercolonial Railway was under discussion, the late Government took up the question of the Halifax terminus which was then a mere shanty at Richmond. Mr. McNab was charged by the Government to survey a line into the city in order to have the terminus there. He made his report to the Government on that subject, but the leading citizens of Halifax objected to that report because they wanted a water communication, and the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) participated in the objection. He (Mr. Tupper) returned from a visit to Halifax, and asked his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Langevin) to stay his hand, because the scheme was objected to by the public men of Halifax. Mr. Fleming was then appointed to go down and see the commercial men of that city, and see what would carry out their views and submit a plan to the Government. He submitted an elaborate plan providing for carrying the road through the dockyard and terminating it at West's Wharf. There was a large space between West's Wharf and the dockyard, which was owned by the city, and the Government knew that they could get that.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman knows they could not get through the dockyard.

MR. TUPPER said they then applied to the Imperial Government and took every possible means to get permission to go through the dockyard and reach the point which the citizens of Halifax, including the present Minister of Militia, approved of. That having failed, they took advantage of Mr. Archibald's presence in London to get him to go to the Lords of the Admiralty, and every argument was exhausted by them to endeavour to get permission to go through the dockyard. That having been refused, they decided to go through Water street, and go to West's Wharf, and with that view they changed their estimates from $150,000 to $250,000, in order to meet the cost of expropriating one side of Water street. An Order-in-Council was passed adopting that policy, and it was in course of arrangement at the time the late Government went out of office. The Government had now under consideration the means of meeting the statements of Sir Hugh Allan, that for practical purposes the present arrangement would not do. He (Mr. Tupper) should be happy to support and assist the Minister of Militia in accomplishing what every member of this House should desire—the establishment of the Atlantic terminus of the Intercolonial Railway. In regard to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, the late Government had not legislated at all. They only passed a Minute-of-Council. They passed an Order-in-Council, and the present First Minister adopted it, though he cancelled Orders-in-Council relating to a number of appointments. Why did he not cancel this Order-in-Council, seeing, as he said, that the Government were then incompetent to do anything?

MR. MACKENZIE said this Order-in-Council was passed before the meeting of Parliament, and, therefore, before he (Mr. Mackenzie) placed his motion of Want of Confidence in the Speaker's hands.

MR. TUPPER: Then my memory failed me. What was the date?

MR. MILLS: 22nd October, 1873: Parliament met on the 23rd.

MR. TUPPER said no action had been taken in the matter, except the passage of the Orders-in-Council, and, therefore, it was quite competent for hon. gentlemen to cancel them. The late Government did not propose to part with anything but the fee simple of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, which was all they had, and which was subject to right acquired by Act of Parliament.

MR. LANGEVIN said the member for Cumberland had stated the case very fully and correctly, and he endorsed his statements. In regard to the cost of working the railway, everyone knew that a short railway would cost a great deal more per mile than a long railway. When the Intercolonial came under the control of the hon. gentlemen opposite there were Division Superintendents, who were discharged when hon. gentlemen came into office. It was not shown that the expenditure in 1873 was extravagant. He had no doubt that the Minister of Public Works was doing his best to manage that railway in the interests of the country. But the railway had been about doubled, and, per mile, of course, the cost must be smaller now than it was when the railway was only 350 or 400 miles in length. The comparison made by the hon. member was not a proper one, and did not bear against the late Government. The hon. gentleman had stated that there was not on this continent, and, perhaps, nowhere else, a railway better equipped than this. He did not doubt it; and this was a great credit to the country. He hoped that the Pacific Railway, when completed, would be as well equipped. It was an honour to the country that this should be so, and in view of the great sacrifices we had made to build the Intercolonial, and which we were now making to build the Pacific Railway, it would be a thousand pities if we did not have a first class railway, and the best, perhaps, on this continent. He would ask the especial attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works regarding the extension of the railway towards Quebec, the purchase or lease of the Rivière du Loup branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, which came as far as Quebec. Some arrangements, at all events, should be made in this regard. This portion of the Grand Trunk was now in very bad condition. The trains could not pass over it at a rapid rate of speed, owing to this fact. Future winters could not be expected to be as mild as the past one, and if something was not done very serious inconvenience would result. This portion of the line did not pay the company, and consequently it was not inclined to spend money on it. It was not in the interest of that company to send goods by this route, while this country had a great interest in this branch, which really was, and must become, a portion of the Intercolonial. Arrangements, at all events, should be made to have this branch placed in proper order. If the Government purchased or leased or made some arrangements respecting this road it would be of the greatest advantage and necessity to build a short branch from the St. Charles station to Point Levis. This was required, and he had no doubt that Mr. Brydges would, if asked, tell the hon. the Minister of Public Works how necessary and important this branch was as regarded traffic over the Intercolonial, because, instead of having to come by the Chaudière and back to Point Levis, probably 8 or 9 miles of railway would be thus avoided. He was aware that the hon. gentleman had given attention to this matter.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would be very much obliged to the hon. gentleman if he would tell me how to do it, other than to give me advice on the subject.

MR. LANGEVIN said he left this entirely in the hands of the hon. gentleman who was responsible for the undertaking, and he had no doubt the hon. gentleman had the means for effecting this purpose. If something was not done in the direction indicated, the mails over the Intercolonial might be altogether stopped next winter. He did not think that the road was blocked one day with snow this last winter.

MR. MACKENZIE: We did not allow any snow to fall last year.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. LANGEVIN said this showed how strong the hon. gentleman was. The hon. gentleman knew that he (Mr. Langevin) had no personal interest whatever in this matter. It would not affect his county, but it did concern the interests of the whole country. Ontario was, perhaps, more than any other Province, interested in having this road properly kept up and in the hands of the Government.

MR. McCARTHY said that one or two of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to be incorrect and called for observation. The test of the hon. the First Minister as to the working of the road, which would appear fair at first sight, would not, he thought, bear out that conclusion when examined. Mr. Brydges, in his report, showed that the expenditure for the working of the road included the renewals per mile, and this was contrasted by Mr. Brydges, in his report, with the working expenses of the road during 1875-6, which is stated as being $3,839.38 per mile. He thought that the working expenses of 1873-4 were $3,535, and they seemed to be over-stated by $331 per mile. In addition, these working expenses included the very large sum of $275,719 for renewals, which spread over 371 miles of road, of course gave a much larger amount per mile for renewals, than did $200,000 spread over 714 miles.

MR. MACKENZIE: It does not include that at all.

MR. McCARTHY said that he (Mr. McCarthy, was right. He had the statement which showed it before him. The ordinary expenses in 1873-4 were $1,025,830, and renewals $275,719, making a total of $1,301,000; and this was the basis on which Mr. Brydges must have taken and divided by the number of miles.

MR. MACKENZIE: Have you the division?

MR. McCARTHY said that he had the statement of the working expenses for 1873-4; the number of miles was 371, and it was simply a matter of division. He contended in the first place that a mistake was made in the report, which he thought showed that the working expenses were $3,535 instead of $3,839 per mile. The road was then 371 miles in length; the renewals cost $275,719; and the rate was $331 less per mile than Mr. Brydges stated in his report, and this concerned the comparatively small mileage (371 miles) against the expenditure of $200,000 on renewals over 745 miles of roadway. This was the case, however the matter might be reviewed. Another matter which might be taken into account in a comparative statement of this kind, was the cost of supplies or the general store account. This item last year amounted to $1,171,802. They knew that according to the statement of Mr. Brydges, owing to the shrinkage in value, that the store account would have cost twice that sum had these stores been purchased in 1873-4, so that they had a right to double this sum in making a comparative mileage statement between 1873-4 and last year; and he thought that the hon. gentleman in this way would find the result very different from what Mr. Brydges made it in his report, and which the hon. gentleman reaffirmed here in argument. The result which he made was as follows: Leaving both accounts for the renewals, they had, for the last year, $2,505 per mile, and adding the difference in the cost of stores $1,241 per mile, they would have $4,000 per mile against $3,508 for 1873-4.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is counting the whole expenses of the cars, which is charged to capital account.

MR. McCARTHY said that the hon. gentleman would see this in Statement No. 9, attached to the Intercolonial Railway in Public Works report, page 163. This gave the general statement of the store account and showed as follows:—

June 30.
By Issues during year.....	$1,171,802	41
Material, &c. sold :—
Old Rails, 3,824 tons, 16 cwt.
2 qrs. 17 lbs. ....	75,382	05
“ Cast Scrap, 599,637 lbs.....	3,839	94
“ Cast Iron Chairs, 359,605 lbs.....	3,148	43
“ Scrap, Axles, 860 lbs...	12	90
“ Steel, 121,834 lbs.....	1,311	99

Old Spikes, 58,900 lbs.....	957	00
“ Scrap Wheels, 3,100 lbs.	27	90
“ Wrought Scrap, 830 lbs.	5	70
“ Frogs, 1.....	30	00
New Spikes, 150 lbs.....	4	50
“ Frogs, 3.....	285	00

He presumed that the issues, on account of the working of the road, extended over the different departments. If not they had no means of judging. This was all he proposed to say with regard to the figures.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is mistaken in taking these figures. The purchase through all the year does not mean the expenditure during the year.

MR. McCARTHY said that the account started with a balance in hand of $153,788 worth of goods and left with $367,000 worth; credit was given for stores during the year of $1,171,802.41, and old material sold had realized $85,005.41.

MR. MACKENZIE: The issues embrace, of course, the entire material which went into 450 cars built, as well as other stock, first-class cars, locomotives, and other things. There is not, perhaps, one-half of these issues that belong to the current year. The hon. gentleman cannot take these figures. They are entirely astray. They should only include stores consumed during the year and ordinary working expenses. These figures embrace necessarily everything that we have in the shop, and stock which may be used for years; and this in part was used very extensively this year on capital account for the construction of 400 cars, and each car cost $530.

MR. McCARTHY said he wished to ask if he was to understand that in the store account, they made issues for revenue purposes and for capital purposes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Undoubtedly.

MR. McCARTHY: I see.

MR. MACKENZIE: We purchase the lumber by tender, and have it all stored there, and we obtained tenders for 300 cars. We received tenders, some for $520 and others $530, and we built another 400, which we succeeded in building for a slight figure under that of the contract price.

MR. McCARTHY said that then his statement did not hold to the full extent, but it did as to the cost of stores chargeable to revenue, and, therefore, the comparison drawn by Mr. Brydges in his report was not fair, but misleading, though, perhaps, not intentionally so. As to the expenditure of $339,000 entered subsequently, they knew that the country had paid, last year, $539,000 for renewals; whether it was spread over three or four years or not, as a matter of fact, this money had gone into the construction of the road, and it was quite apparent that it had never been placed before this year in the Suspense Accounts. In 1873-4, $275,000 more were sent on renewals than last year, according to this way of arranging it, although the road was then only 371 miles in length. In 1874 this expenditure was $292,382, and he contended that in renewals $92,000 more than appeared was chargeable against this particular year. It was manifest and quite plain that no comparative statement could be properly drawn, and no fair and reasonable statement be made out between this account of 1873-4 and the present account, unless the whole amount of renewals was put in. In fact, the renewals of this year in comparison with the number of miles operated, were not more than the renewals for 1873-4, and in fact not as much. He merely rose to draw attention to the position of the Windsor and Annapolis branch line. The facts were these; and when they had the facts, it was not very difficult to arrive at a proper conclusion, as to the rights of these parties. This railroad was built under a statute of the Nova Scotia Legislature before Confederation, which empowered the Governor in Council to enter into an agreement for the construction of the branch road, and to grant subsidies to it. This agreement was made upon the 22nd of November, 1866; and on this agreement the Hon. Justice Richie, whose judgment he has before him, determined that absolute running powers were given over this Windsor and Annapolis road by the Government of Nova Scotia for all time to come; subsequent to this an arrangement was made by the Government of Nova Scotia, for a term of twenty-one years, giving the line, in addition to running powers over the road, a matter of right, a vested interest in the corporation as lessee on certain terms and certain conditions, but only for twenty-one years. This did not profess to do away with the rights which the railway had for all time as to running powers over the Windsor branch, connected with the main trunk; but it granted for twenty-one years, under a specific contract, these running powers over the trunk line as well for a certain proportion of the earnings. This it was stated was cancelled by the late Government; and apparently an Order-in-Council was passed subject to the approval of Parliament, to put an end to the lease, and to enter into another arrangement with the Western Counties Railway. Of course, the Order-in-Council had no effect. It professed to be made subject to the approval of Parliament, and it was in no wise binding on the Government that succeeded the late Administration or Parliament until approved by Parliament, and the hon. gentleman ought not now to pretend that all the blame attachable to the unfortunate position in which these roads now were should be shouldered by the late Administration. The Government, of which the hon. gentleman was the leading member, adopted this Order-in-Council, and not only adopted it, but brought down an Act of Parliament and passed it through the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: What does the hon. gentleman mean by adopting the Order-in-Council?

MR. McCARTHY said the hon. gentleman acted on this Order-in Council.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says we not only adopted it, but brought down an Act.

MR. McCARTHY: So you did.

MR. MACKENZIE: We simply brought down an Act to confirm an agreement, solemnly and formally made by the late Government. We were bound to do that in good faith.

MR. McCARTHY: The hon. gentleman, as I understand it, was not bound to do that, because this agreement was subject to the approval of Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will see this: An agreement was made by the late Government, subject, no doubt, to the approval of Parliament, but this Government, in the abstract, was bound to see that this agreement was carried out, if they could; and it was our duty to submit it to Parliament for approval, in accordance with the agreement made by the Government of Canada.

MR. McCARTHY said he then understood the hon. gentleman to say that, whether this was right or wrong, or illegal—and beyond all question it was illegal, according to the decision of the Nova Scotia Judge—this Government was bound to adopt and submit it to Parliament, and have it ratified by Parliament. He did not understand this at all. Surely if the hon. gentleman did not approve of this policy, he would not have brought the Order-in-Council down to Parliament. If the hon. gentleman had found it illegal, he would not have brought it down to Parliament and carried it into effect.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is an open question whether it is illegal or not.

MR. McCARTHY: I understand that it is not an open question. I have the judgment before me.

MR. MACKENZIE: But there may be another judgment rendered. The ordinary heading of the Nova Scotia Act does not seem to me to concur with that judgment. Of course this is a layman's opinion, and worth very little, but it does not say that it gives running powers only, but "running powers or other arrangements."

MR. McCARTHY said he did not propose to argue the matter with the hon. the First Minister. He would assume that the judgment of the Nova Scotia Judge, until reversed, at all events, was sound and good law. The hon. the First Minister forgot that after all this was done—the most important point was not to be lost sight of—that this agreement was made on the 22nd June, 1875, signed by the hon. gentleman himself, after the Act of Parliament was passed, ratified and confirmed it.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is a great mistake.

MR. McCARTHY said he did not understand it if it was a mistake. Some arrangement was made with the railroad.

MR. MACKENZIE: I thought that I explained that in my remarks.

MR. McCARTHY said it was surely an extraordinary thing to say that when a solemn agreement was entered into by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, under which this company bound itself to change their gauge and go to expense, it was merely a mistake, and it was surely not a sufficient answer to say that it was a mistake.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am afraid that it was we that went to the expense and not they.

MR. McCARTHY said that he only knew what he saw there. He understood from the judgment that all this was done; that the gauge was changed; that the cars were delivered over to the Government and to the hon. the Minister of Public Works; and after all this was done the road was violently taken possession of without right and in defiance of the law as it was established by a Judge of Nova Scotia. There seemed to be no doubt at all about the legal position of the case, assuming that this judgment which he did assume, and did not at all differ in any way from, to be perfectly correct. He mainly rose to point this out as an answer to the observations of the hon. the Minister of Public Works on this point.

MR. TUPPER said that he wanted to draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the case of Mr. Boggs, which he had brought before the House on a recent occasion. He did not find the discrepancy between the statements so great as the hon. gentleman had seemed to imagine, yet he felt the full force of the statement made by the General Superintendent of Railways, as to the difficulty connected with any interposition in the administration of the road where a serious accident had occurred; and if the restoration of Mr. Boggs to the position he held before, was asked, he would hold that this objection was insuperable, and was inclined to think that the Superintendent would agree with him that Mr. Boggs having been a faithful and efficient officer for many years, and one who enjoyed good standing, as this accident had occurred after very severe and prolonged labour on his part, his claim should be considered, because it was a most disastrous thing for any person in his position to lose the means of living—and he should be chosen to fill some other position to which such responsibility would not attach. A very large petition, sent by a number of the inhabitants of the place, asked that he should be appointed station-master at Brockville, where, he believed, there was a vacancy. He (Mr. Tupper) hoped that this claim would be considered. He also desired to refer to the case of Mr. O'Brien. He had introduced a Bill to restore to Mr. O'Brien the rights which he enjoyed before the Intercolonial Railway Act was passed. What he wanted to ask the hon. Minister was, whether, in case they were not disposed to so alter the law as to place Mr. O'Brien in the same position as he was under the law, he would like the case to go before the arbitrators?

MR. MACKENZIE said he had no word to say in answer to that. The Government had not been able to recognize that claim. It must be assumed the Government had a right to complete the railroad to Halifax. The mere fact of Mr. O'Brien having a railway track on the street could not debar the Government from building a road alongside it if they liked. Submitting the matter to arbitration would imply that the Government doubted their position. There could be no possible ground for submitting the matter to arbitration.

MR. TUPPER: I understand that in the case tried in the Supreme Court you expressed the opinion that Mr. O'Brien offered the arbitration.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is a mistake. What I offered was this: I said we are quite willing to pay you any interruption we caused you by breaking up the street and crossing the track, from the time we took up your rails until we laid them down again; whatever damage was thereby caused will be paid for. If that cannot be decided on between us, we will leave it to arbitration. That was different from leaving the right of the Government to build the road to arbitration. I consulted the law officers of the Crown respecting that.

MR. TUPPER said he would like the hon. gentleman to consider the question of submitting to the official arbitrators any damage. Under the law Mr. O'Brien might be in a position to claim arbitration on the statement when the law passed that no private rights would be interfered with.

MR. BORDEN said the hon. member for Cumberland had appeared to night in a new rôle in relation to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway. During the past four Sessions, the subject of transferring branches of the Intercolonial for the purpose of aiding the construction of other lines in the Lower Provinces had been before this House, and on every occasion the hon. member had claimed paternity for that policy and had defended it. The hon. gentleman had never before taken objection to the Act for the transfer of the Windsor Branch, introduced by the present Government in 1874, nor had he ever claimed any rights for the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company. To night, for reasons obvious to the people of the Western counties, he had advocated the rights of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, which, when the railway was first built, had great difficulty in getting their rights acknowledged by the late Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. In the statement put forth by the Company the following statement occurred:—

“Whilst the railway between Windsor and Annapolis was under construction, the British North America Act came into operation, and Nova Scotia became a part of the Confederated Dominion of Canada, the Government of which, in terms of the provisions of said Act, became owners of the railway from Halifax to Windsor, and consequently the successors of the Provincial Government in the before-mentioned agreements and acts. However, in direct opposition to the provisions of the section above quoted, the traffic arrangements and running powers were refused to the company, and upon the completion of their works they were compelled to commence operations under a provisional agreement for the mere interchange of traffic, which was entered into, under protest, between the then manager of the Company's railway and the Superintendent of Government Railways, on 13th December, 1869."

Further, the Company were obliged, in 1871, to send out a special agent, Mr. J. A. Mann, from England, to negotiate with the Government, and he immediately petitioned the Government for running powers. On the 21st June, 1871, the Minister of Justice reported favourably to the application of the Company, and an agreement was entered into, to take effect from the 1st January, 1872. Nothing further was heard of the matter until May, 1873, when a resolution was adopted by this House, introduced by the right hon. member for Kingston, declaring it expedient to give powers to the Government to enter into negotiations during recess for the transfer of the branch railway. Not a word was stated in that resolution as to any right the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company possessed in the branch proposed to be transferred. The next act which would indicate the personal feeling of the hon. member for Cumberland was the cancellation of the lease on 22nd October, 1873, after, as alleged by the company, a promise had been given of an extension of time until November 1st for the payment of arrears. The responsibility of this Order-in-Council has been to-night accepted by the hon. member for Cumberland, after which, and in view of the manner in which this Order-in-Council is regarded, in the recent judgment of Justice Ritchie, it was very evident that this championship of the rights of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company by that hon. member, was of very recent date. As to the hon. gentleman's special interests in the people of the Western counties, that was also exhibited by an Order-in-Council passed on 22nd October, 1873, authorizing the company to increase their tariff, perhaps to compensate the company in some measure for the cancellation of the lease on the same day. He had shown enough of these facts to enable the people to appreciate what the hon. member had said to-night on their behalf, and in the interests of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company. It was intolerable that the present unfortunate state of things, which seriously interfered with the trade of the Western counties and of Halifax, should continue. He had received a letter from a prominent merchant in his (Mr. Borden's) county, from which he would read an extract, and to which he would call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works:—

"Last week I had a car load of English goods brought by rail from Halifax to Kentville. For carriage the Western Counties Company made a charge of $30.30 to Windsor, and the Windsor and Annapolis Co. of $21.78 to Kentville; altogether $52.18. Before the Windsor Counties Co. got the Windsor branch, the whole charge from Halifax to Kentville on a car load of freight was $25."

He had also a letter from a gentleman engaged in sending large quantities of hay to Halifax, in which he made this statement:—

"Under the present arrangement the cost of getting hay down to Halifax is from $2 to $3, whereas the people of Sackville get their hay over 150 miles of road to Halifax at about half that price."

Thus it appears that the people of Horton were paying nearly four times the rate of the people of Sackville, to get their hay into the city of Halifax, according to the number miles they were distant from that city. He (Mr. Borden) did not intend to enter into the quarrel between the companies, and between one of the companies and the Government. He simply desired to call the attention of the Government to this unfortunate state of things and to ask that steps be taken to remedy it.

MR. MITCHELL said it was of great importance that the Rivière du Loup Branch should be acquired by the Government.

MR. POPE (Compton) said he considered that this branch was the key to the Intercolonial Railway, and the Government should not allow another winter to pass over without making an effort to get the road.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE PREVENTION BILL.

(Mr. Blake.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BLAKE said he rose with a good deal of diffidence at this late period of the Session to make a few observations which he proposed to conclude with a motion. We had a very peaceable and law-abiding community in Canada, but there was no doubt, that a larger number of crimes of violence were committed than formerly. It was immaterial to enter into a general discussion of that topic. He believed that, as a rule, these unhappy changes were due to casual and accidental circumstances which would disappear. But, with reference to one part of the Dominion—a part of which they were all proud—the circumstances were widely different. From what ever part of Canada they might hail they were all proud of the city of Montreal. They were proud of its situation, placed, as it was, in a commanding position at the junction of an unrivalled system of ocean and inland navigation. They were proud of the zeal, the enterprise, the public spirit of its citizens and the beautiful city they had made for themselves. They had been proud of the cosmopolitan character of its population, in which different nations and creeds have mingled together, co-operating for the general good, and each vying in the race of advancement. They believed in those sentiments, but they would be untrue to their position as legislators if, in view of the events which had been occurring during the last few months, and which culminated in a crime the other evening, they were to separate without some effort to restore the fair fame of the city and avert the disturbances which, if not looked after, would lead to more serious things in the future. For nearly a year past the city had been the scene of frequent violent attacks in the streets by different parties, in which firearms had been used with the utmost recklessness. Excepting the other night, little loss of life had resulted from those difficulties, but there might have been serious loss of life. But the events of the other evening were premonitory of far more serious events in the future unless some steps were taken to repress those circumstances. He was not called on at this time and under these circumstances—perhaps he would not be called upon at any time or under any circumstances—to weigh the merits of the contending parties. All the disorder, all the violence and use of firearms were not to be attributed to those classes, since it was obvious there existed a degree of lawless use of firearms in that city entirely irrespective of the circumstances to which he had alluded. It was natural to expect that that lawless habit would spread, and that the rougher and more lawless and criminal population would very readily avail themselves of a practice which the more respectable, orderly and law-abiding classes had not scrupled in some instances to resort to. As a Canadian of Irish descent it gave him an additional pang of humiliation that his own fellow-countrymen of both creeds should be prominently concerned in those troubles. He would only say that if his feeble voice could reach beyond the limits of this hall, and he could hope that it would have any weight, he would ask them to remember that, although belonging to different forms of Christianity, the cardinal principle of that religion is love and charity, forbearance and self-sacrifice. That yielding to one another is the signal mark of our creed, whether Catholics or Protestants, and that we daily asked to be forgiven our trespasses as we forgive those which others did to us. There was but little charity in that religion if they could look calmly on the events which were transpiring in Montreal without horror and without a desire to use every means in their power to prevent their recurrence and reiteration. He would appeal to those two parties of his fellow countrymen, if his voice could be heard. He would appeal to one side to be regardful of the rights under the law of the other side, to be regardful of the prejudices and feelings and the temperament of the side which objected to some of their proceedings. It appeared to him that both sides were terribly to blame. There must be some restoration of the good feeling which formerly existed, and some understanding must be arrived at by which they could preserve their reputation. But so it was that a reign of terror might be said to prevail at this moment in Montreal owing to the mode in which those fights were organized, owing to the mode in which those weapons were secured. It was not only those who hazarded their lives in those encounters who were exposed to danger. The peaceful citizen was exposed to almost equal risk if he was in the vicinity of those encounters, to that which beset the actual combatants, and they found that those who had no concern whatever in the riots had been, in some cases, the actual sufferers, and in other cases had accidentally escaped with their lives. The question was whether there was any remedy by legislation, and that subject, as it occurred to him, divided itself into three considerations—first, the question of public processions, which he would pass by with one observation. The question generally was a complicated and difficult one, but he was satisfied that, although he would not say there were no circumstances in this country in which their jurisdiction and power with reference to crime and criminals might entitle them to interfere to some extent in that subject, yet the circumstances were too rare, the interference would be but partial, and if any remedy of that kind would be fit to apply, that remedy was to be applied by the Local Legislatures of the Provinces. The second question was that which had attracted attention some time previous to this. It was that of possible interference by this Parliament, the formation of a police force by Canada. To that to-day, as in times past, he would decidedly object. The preservation of the peace rested under the one reading and practice of the Constitution with the local authorities. It would be utterly impossible for Canada to undertake to organize a police force such as would be required in the considerable cities and in the rural places. There was no doubt, that any city which, owing to exceptional circumstances, had to charge itself with the establishment of an exceptionally large police force, would be glad to see a local burden discharged even by the Dominion of Canada. His opinion was that it devolved upon the Local Governments and Legislatures to provide an adequate local force for the maintenance of the peace. There remained but one consideration on which they could profitably hope to act, viz., whether under existing circumstances any change could be made in the law for the purpose of repressing or preventing crime which came properly within their jurisdiction. He desired to call attention to the fact that there were already on the Statute two general and one special law having more or less relevancy to the consideration of the question whether further legislation should be had. So long ago as 1869, when the code of criminal law was passed which provided for offences against the person, the 20th chap. of the Act of that year made it an offence to carry on the person pistols or other offensive weapons. The penalty, however, for the breach of this provision, although it was made a crime, was but a fine of from $10 to $40, and no imprisonment was awarded except in default of payment of the fine. The same law prevailed in seaport towns with reference to the wearing of sheath knives by sailors when off duty. The next general law was that of last Session, the passage of which was attended by many difficulties. It was important that the law should not be inefficacious, and, on the other hand, it was to be remembered that without the right to search, an advantage was given to the lawless portion of the community over the law-abiding portion—an important practical bearing supposing the penalty of carrying a revolver without a cause, to be a serious penalty, because, while free from the danger of being searched, the lawless character might without apprehension carry his revolver, he might fairly presume that the law-abiding citizen, knowing it was a crime to carry a weapon, would not carry one, so that immunity and license to the lawless individual might result. It was for that reason the Government proposed but very moderate measures. The hon. gentleman then detailed the provisions of the Act of last Session, and stated that there had been a special law on the Statute-book since 1869 with reference to certain districts in which it was thought possible that owing to the congregation of fluctuating bodies of labourers there might be increased danger to the public peace, and consequently the necessity of increased precautions, increased rigour, and diminution of the ordinary liberties of the subjects of this country. He referred to the Act for the Preservation of the Peace in the Vicinity of Public Works. Under that Act whenever the Governor in Council was of opinion that there was any danger to the public peace at a place, not being a city, which was exempted from the operation of the Act, in the vicinity where public works were being constructed, he was entitled to proclaim that the Act should be in force, and from that time no one in the district was to have in his possession any weapon either in his house or on his person. The penalty, however, was so trifling that it might almost be called nugatory. It was a fine of from $2 to $4, with forfeiture of the weapon. The Act also provided that at a time and place to be named all dangerous weapons should be delivered up to certain commissioners, and that persons afterwards concealing weapons, in order to evade the Act, should be liable to a penalty of from $40 to $100. It was also provided that any person employed on the work who should be found carrying a weapon might be arrested if there were good grounds to believe he was carrying it for a dangerous and improper purpose. It was obvious, as it appeared to him, that the exceptional condition of things to which he had referred did not demand, and therefore did not justify, a general prohibitory statute. He felt, himself, the utmost reluctance in proposing, even as a temporary measure and under the exceptional circumstances, the application of a measure of comparative rigor and stringency with a view to mitigate the dangers to which he had referred. And this reluctance would be insuperable if he felt that they were called upon by any ground or reason to involve the whole country in the provisions of an exceptional law, because of exceptional circumstances involved only in one locality, however important that locality might be. But the precedent which he had referred to on our own Statute-book, and the precedent set by the Imperial Parliament, in the Act passed to meet the difficulties in Ireland, were both furnished to show that a general law was not essential to meet a special difficulty applicable to only one, though it might become applicable to more than one locality. After such consideration, brief as it might be, that he had been able to give the question with reference to the affair of the other night, he had come to the conclusion that it was their positive duty to legislate in regard thereto. He had come to the conclusion that a Bill passed somewhat on the model of the Public Works Act, to which he had referred, or somewhat on the model of the Irish Act, to which he had also referred, would be the most reasonable way of meeting the difficulty. Owing to the late period of the session and the difficulty now of having a full discussion of such a measure, it should, he thought, only be temporary, and therefore his proposal would be, that any measure they might pass, should be in force only till the end of the next session of Parliament. He would propose that it should be in the power of the Governor in Council, whenever in his judgment it was necessary for the better prevention of crimes of violence in any county, city or town or municipality, in any Province or territory, by proclamation in the Canada Gazette, to declare that this Act should apply to the district defined in the proclamation. He proposed also that it should be in the power of the Governor in Council at any time by proclamation similarly published to revoke the former proclamation, and so discontinue the operation of the Act in the district. It was also provided that the proclamation carrying the Act into operation should be posted on the doors of the places of public worship, court-houses, and police stations, with a printed abstract of the provisions of the measure for the information of persons affected thereby. So far those provisions were printed chiefly from the Irish Act. He proposed further, that after a time named in the proclamation it should not be lawful for any person, not being an officer of the peace, or a soldier or sailor in Her Majesty's service, to have elsewhere than in his own house any arms. He had hesitated some time as to the definition of arms, but on the whole he thought it would be fitting to suggest to the House to embrace therein not only the smaller descriptions of firearms, but also others which were described in part in the Act relating to offences against the person, and some other firearms described in the Irish Act—in a word, all dangerous and deadly weapons. He would propose that any person carrying any weapon in contravention of the statute should be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a term of imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, and that it should be lawful for any person to seize and apprehend any one carrying weapons after the Act went into force, and to deliver the offender over to an officer of the peace with a view to his being brought before the proper judicial functionary to be dealt with according to law. He also proposed that it should be lawful for a constable or officer of the peace to search any person suspected of carrying weapons, which, if found upon him, should be retained and handed over to the magistrates. Another provision was, that power should be given to the Governor in Council to appoint commissioners, who might grant licenses to such persons as they thought proper to carry arms, specifying the description of weapons, these licenses being revocable at will. He would propose further the application of the second clause of the Act respecting offences against the person, also with reference to the procedure for trial to this measure, and also that nothing therein should free any person from any other penalty to which he might be exposed; provided, however, that he should not be punished twice for the same offence. He had omitted any proposal with reference to the delivery up of offensive weapons in the houses of persons. This was, of course, a question of considerably difficulty. He had a reluctance to go a step further, in any proposal he might submit to the House, than the absolute exigency of the case demanded. It was obvious that any provision such as was contained in the other Acts for the delivery up of all weapons at a time to be named, and making it a crime to have weapons in the house, was a provision which, in the first place, involved the exercise of the arbitrary right of searching, which was very liable to be abused. It infringed to a certain extent upon the well-worn opinion that a man's house is his castle, and he was indisposed to take the responsibility on himself—although he did not pronounce against it—of inviting the House to adopt such a proposition. It was obvious also that for the efficacious carrying out of such a provision a considerable staff of officers would be required, and that it would be necessary to have a systematic search. Then, again, it would work to the disadvantage of the law-abiding citizens if having weapons in the house were made a crime punishable by imprisonment. The law-abiding citizen would be more likely to give up his weapons while the lawless man would probably trust to his powers of concealment and run the risk of a search. It was also obvious that the protection of the law-abiding citizen against burglary and crimes of that character would or might be seriously impaired by a law of this kind, since burglars and such lawless persons frequently carried arms, and they would have the presumption or assurance derived from the existence of such law that there was a considerable chance that honest, peaceable citizens would not possess weapons. It was right, on the other hand, to say with reference to the several disturbances which had given rise to the necessity, if necessity there were, for legislation of the character proposed, that unless arms were got rid of in some way, there was a possibility of the legislation being to a large extent abortive. Upon the whole, however, he thought it would be better for him to submit the consideration which had occurred to him on this topic to the House. He had now stated at greater length than he intended, but, perhaps, not at greater length than he was bound to do, why he had taken the responsibility of pursuing the main features of such a measure, as he thought that they ought, at any rate, to consider during this Session. He was aware that, without the unanimous assent of the House, the motion he proposed to place in Mr. Speaker's hands could not be adopted, but, inasmuch as the giving of notice was a form, and as the days of the Session were now very short, and as what was practically of consequence was, that they should come to the discussion of the subject, if it was to be at all discussed, at as early a period, and have as long a time for its consideration as possible, he had thought he was not infringing on the spirit of the rules, even though he might be violating their letter, by asking the House, as he now did, to permit the motion to carry for leave to introduce this Bill. He need hardly say that he had no expectation of being able to mature this Bill into law of himself, but he should only ask the House and Government to consider it, and, if it were thought fit to take any steps in this direction, his Bill would be readily handed over to the leaders of the House, with whom must rest hereafter this responsibility, and who alone had power at this stage of maturing this measure. He moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 77) for the better prevention of certain crimes of violence in certain parts of Canada, until the end of the next Session of Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE said no one could help sympathizing with the eloquent and touching remarks of his hon. friend when he referred to the duties of Christian teachers and Christian professors, and no one could help admitting the truth of the remarks the hon. gentleman made respecting the duties which devolved upon Protestants and Catholics alike when times of trouble like these seemed to be impending in Montreal. The Government have looked with extreme anxiety on the state of matters in that city for many months past, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) feared, when an occasion of public excitement arose during last season, that it would have resulted even more disastrously than it did. On that occasion the Government went as far as it was possible to go under the existing laws which governed alike the people and the Government, by tendering to the Chief Magistrate of that city the troops which the Dominion maintained, and placed them at his command free of all charge except that which was unavoidable under the operation of the law. In other words, they were sent to the city for the purpose of maintaining order, but the authorities did not see fit to accept the proposition. It was now tolerably evident that a state of feeling—a state of exasperation—existed on both sides, the one apparently smarting under a sense of injury for something that had passed, the other anticipating some kind of injury in the future. And it was also tolerably clear, from the spirit that had been manifested on both sides, especially by those who seemed somewhat careless of the consequences, that very great danger existed, that the public peace would be broken and many lives endangered, unless something was done to prevent it. What that something should be, he (Mr. Mackenzie) had been greatly at a loss to know. It was a question which had given the Government some anxiety for some time. It seemed impossible, under a new enactment, to anticipate the action of, or act for the local authorities, as the administration of justice and the enforcement of the laws respecting personal rights were entrusted, and properly entrusted, to the Local Government of the respective Provinces. At the same time, there could not be any doubt as to the wisdom of the remarks made by his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) when he proposed to anticipate those dangers, so far as it was possible for this Parliament to anticipate them, and to make some temporary provision which would help to meet, if it did not fully meet, the difficulties which were anticipated. With regard to the measure which his hon. friend had proposed, there might be a difference of opinion, and there would, no doubt, be great difficulty in executing such a law. It would require a strong force and a very large number of individuals, and then it would be very imperfectly executed; because even now it is impossible, without the active sympathy of the vast majority of the population, to enforce the law which is on the Statute-book with reference to the protection of life and property where extensive public works are carried on.

MR. HOLTON: Which sympathy you have.

MR. MACKENZIE: His hon. friend from Chateauguay said, "Which sympathy the Government had." No doubt the Government would have the active sympathy of the greater portion of the population who were interested in preserving property at all events, as well as concerning the character of the city of Montreal or any other place. But where there were vast masses of workmen assembled, who were not, perhaps, as well informed as the other classes of the community, and not perhaps so much above the reach of excitement which might be brought on in a moment by imprudent acts committed by a few persons, it was not easy to obtain that sympathy which was necessary for the observance of the law. But with or without the sympathy of that class, whether large or small, it was evidently the duty of this Parliament and this Government to go as far as possible in anticipating such dangers as he (Mr. Mackenzie) believed might be fairly anticipated by all from the incidents which now, he regretted to say, were of daily occurrence, showing a spreading of lawlessness which was exceedingly to be regretted, and which it is exceedingly desirable should be repressed at the earliest possible moment and in the best possible manner. He entirely concurred in the necessity for some measure, and he saw no measure better calculated to secure the object than that which his hon. friend had proposed. It would be desirable, if the House looked favourably upon the proposition which the hon. member for South Bruce had made, that it should be considered as speedily as possible by a Select Special Committee, composed of those who have had some experience in governing the country and in the execution of its laws, and that the second reading should be had at as early a period as possible, in order that the Bill should be made as perfect as could be in order to carry out the intentions of the promoter. To that end the Government would not only gladly take charge of the measure which his hon. friend had prepared, but would in every way facilitate, as far as it was possible, its reaching that stage when the Government could take charge of it.

MR. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HOLTON said he hoped that this would take place at once. The position was a very grave one. He was a citizen of Montreal himself and the indications of the last few days were of the most urgent character as to the necessity of something being done to prevent even graver evils than had yet arisen. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no objection on a point of form, for there could be no surprise taken. If this Bill went on the Order Paper in the ordinary way for the second reading to-morrow, it could only be taken up by common consent on Wednesday next, and, therefore, he hoped that the House would consent to the second reading to-day, with the understanding that it was to be referred to a Select Committee composed of members competent to deal with subjects of this importance, from both sides of the House.

MR. LANGEVIN said that if the Bill was to be taken charge of by the Government it might come up to-morrow or on any other day when the Government brought up its measures. The reason why he thought that the Bill should be postponed until to-morrow was this: none of the members for the City of Montreal, to which the hon. member for South Bruce wished to apply this law, were here, and besides, the hon. the Minister of Justice was also absent, and this measure should certainly not be passed beyond its first reading in the absence of these hon. gentlemen. He did not ask for this delay because he did not desire to throw any obstacle in the way of the Bill.

MR. HOLTON: Of course not. Cà se comprit.

MR. LANGEVIN said it was very well for the hon. gentleman to say this. The hon. gentleman had always a certain way to interpret matters, but if he had the charity which his hon. friend the member for South Bruce had suggested others should have, perhaps the hon. gentleman would be a little more charitable. But his request was only reasonable. The Bill could be deferred until to-morrow. The reasons which he gave for postponing it were good, and he had no doubt that the hon. member for South Bruce would himself see that there was no reason why they should not postpone the second reading until to-morrow, especially as the Government had taken charge of it.

MR. BLAKE said that, of course, any suggestion of this description ended the question. It was only by unanimous consent that the second reading could now be moved. He had only done so because he felt that it would be unfair to ask the Government to take the responsibility, at a moment's notice, of assuming charge of a Bill which no member of the Government had had an opportunity of seeing or of knowing anything about until he spoke; otherwise, he would have asked the Government at once to take charge of it. Unless a special order was made, this measure would not go on the Government Orders to-morrow. If an adjustment could be arrived at, although it would remain in his name at this stage, his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) might to-morrow move, at the opening of the House, to take charge of it, and place it on the Government Orders, and then they would reach a satisfactory result. In the meantime, the printing of the measure might be expedited.

MR. MACKENZIE: It will stand for second reading until to-morrow, and I will then ask the House to put it on the Government Orders. It will stand on the notice paper as a Government Order.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

MOTION TO ADOPT REPORTS.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved the adoption of the 6th and 7th reports of both Houses on the printing of Parliament. He said that a considerable reduction in the number of documents distributed among members of the House was provided for. They had, however, provided for a pretty good reserve to be kept in the distribution office, which could be obtained in case of necessity. The printing expenditure was growing rapidly; but it was calculated that the changes proposed would effect a saving of 20 per cent., amounting to about $12,000. While they had reduced the number of documents distributed among members and sent to the Local Legislatures, they had made no reduction regarding the newspapers, which would receive copies as before. They had also added to the list all the public libraries known to the Committee, as well as the libraries of the Mechanics' Institutes in the various cities of the Dominion. He trusted that the House would see that they desired to practice in this respect a reasonable economy, and, at the same time, not at all impair the benefits which were supposed to accrue from the very general and liberal distribution of public documents.

MR. LANGEVIN said he objected to the supply of the Votes and Proceedings being confined to one for each member, as it was important that they should have a copy to send to their constituents. They could not find out the feelings of their constituents unless they could send them copies of the measures which were to be brought before the House. It was carrying the thing too far to deprive them of copies to send to their friends. As regarded the Journals of the House, they ought to have their two copies as before.

MR. YOUNG said he had observed of late that the printing of the House had largely increased. During the first years of Confederation the cost was $30,000, or thereabouts, and now it was $70,000. He thought the reduction should be made in not printing so many useless returns, and not in the documents which were necessary for the members to form a correct opinion of what was going on in the House. They had, at first, five copies of the Votes and Proceedings, but it was now proposed to reduce them to one. He did not consider it a proper economy either to decrease the number of departmental reports supplied to members.

MR. BOWELL asked who should be the judge as to what constituted useless returns.

MR. YOUNG said the Committee were, as a whole, the best judges as to what should be printed, and not the gentleman who moved for the returns.

MR. APPLEBY said it was false economy, and he thought more, instead of less, of the public documents should be printed.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the Committee had exercised the greatest prudence in printing the returns. Last year some 200 returns had been moved for, and the Committee had the greatest difficulty in deciding which documents should be printed. If they were to attempt to reach their constituents with the departmental reports, four copies would go a very small distance in meeting the wants of a constituency. They must depend as a rule for the circulation of their reports upon the newspapers, which presented them to the public. They were now doing the printing of the Dominion of Canada, which included seven Provinces, for one-third of the cost incurred for printing by the Parliament of the old Province of Canada.

MR. TUPPER said he agreed that it was not desirable to practice undue economy in this relation. He found an increasing desire all over the country to obtain copies of public documents. He proposed that the report should be referred back to the Committee with the view of their reconsidering it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought it would be scarcely a courteous course, for he knew the vast amount of labour which had been given by the Committee to the report. The printing expenses had gone on increasing, and he thought the more courteous method would be to allow the report to be adopted, and the Committee, after what had been said in the House, might bring in a supplementary report.

MR. SPEAKER suggested that if the report were adopted, it would not be in the power of the House to adopt a supplementary report, materially altering the facts of the original report.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that the amendment should be withdrawn, and that the Chairman of the Printing Committee should not press his report to-day. It would give an opportunity, after what had been said, to amend the report.

MR. ROSS said the Senate had adopted the report, but he left the matter in the hands of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said if the Committee stood to their report, he should feel bound to support them. The course, however, suggested by the hon. member for Kingston seemed to him advisable, supposing the Committee were agreeable to it.

MR. MITCHELL said he would support the Committee, especially as their report was in the direction of economy.

MR. DeCOSMOS said he thought the Committee were very successful in carrying economy to meanness. He considered that the distribution of public documents was the diffusion of intelligence, and he thought the House should put its foot down on such parsimony.

MR. WALLACE said that, as a matter of principle, no one man had a right to get public information at public expense which was denied to his fellow-men. If documents were distributed to one, they should be distributed to all throughout the Dominion, which would be an enormous expense. The Committee had acted wisely. Many members sent these documents to their constituents, not for the purpose of giving information, but to let the latter know they were in existence.

MR. COOK said he was very anxious to get public documents distributed among his own constituents, who were very much interested in them. He had had those documents printed at his own expense.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

MOTION TO ADOPT REPORT.

MR. ROSS moved the adoption of the report of the Select Committee on the official reports of the debates of this House, which read as follows:—

“The Committee finding that at this late period of the Session, difficulties have presented themselves in maturing any plan for the official reporting of the Debates for the next Session of Parliament, respectfully recommend that His Honour the Speaker be empowered to make such arrangements during the recess as will ensure the official notes of the Debates of next Session, till such time as the House may take action in the matter.”

The Committee was not prepared to make any specific recommendation for the continuance of the present system. The arrangement recommended would enable the next Parliament to have an official report of the first week's debates, and thus prevent any break in the reporting if the system were desired to be continued.

MR. BLAKE said it would be better to leave the whole arrangements in the hands of the next Parliament. In any case, under this arrangement, there would be no efficient report of the first fortnight's debate.

MR. TUPPER said the House had decided, after a great deal of discussion in various Sessions, that it was desirable to have a Hansard. The present plan provided to have notes taken for the early period of next Session, until Parliament could decide whether to continue the Hansard or not. If Parliament decided not to continue it, the expense of taking these notes would be trifling, and if the Hansard were continued, it would be an advantage to have a report of the debates at the opening of the Session, and not allow any break in the report. It was very desirable the Hansard should be kept up.

MR. BUNSTER said the only safeguard the people had for accurate information was the Hansard, and he would regret very much to see it done away with. The only thing to be regretted was that it was not brought out earlier, but that was not the fault of the reporters. He had made a speech on the floor of this House, and the very same evening had received it from them; but it was a month before he received it in print. The Printing Committee, therefore, should see that the printing was done more expeditiously.

MR. MACDONNELL said he did not look on the Hansard as an authentic record. He believed it was a useless expenditure and ought to be abolished.

MR. DYMOND said he had never been favourable to the publication of the Hansard in the form adopted by the House, although he had always regarded it as expedient that there should be an authoritative report of the proceedings of Parliament. The present plan had practically broken down, and the House had derived little or no advantage from an attempt at a daily issue. The Committee had chosen not to take any steps to pledge the next Parliament to the publication of the Hansard, but desired that the Speaker be empowered to engage reporters to take notes pending the decision of the House.

MR. HOLTON thought there could be no doubt that the House was tired of the Hansard. Two years ago he had taken the responsibility of stopping the Hansard, and he felt persuaded at the time the majority of the House was in sympathy with him, and he was sure that at this moment a vast majority of members were opposed to the Hansard. The work had been badly done, in primis, and the system had led to the prolongation of debates, and the making of long speeches by members who had nothing to say, to an extent that was utterly wearisome to members who only addressed the House when they had something serious to say; and therefore he thought it was inexpedient to adopt the report. Though not inclined to press the point of order, he thought it was very undesirable that this report should be adopted.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was a difference of opinion in the House as to this report. If it could be got in something of the style of the English reports it would be desirable; but these reports were not prepared in that style. An attempt, in fact, at an almost verbatim report was made occasionally; but at the same time when these reports were condensed, they were sometimes so very inaccurate, whatever the reason for it might be, as to make them practically valueless as accurate statements of what the members said. He himself was, as a general rule, in favour of an official report; but the reports were not of the kind which made the continuation of the present system desirable. He did not know whether he had reason to complain personally of these reports, as he had not time to read them; but complaints coming from other members were very general, and the hon. member for Chateauguay had given other reasons why the report should not be adopted. He Mr. (MacKenzie) did not feel called upon, as a member of the Government, to take any particular line of conduct with regard to these reports that other members of this House might think it necessary to follow; but if there should be a vote against the continuation of the Hansard, with his present opinions, he should be obliged to support that view of the case.

MR. MITCHELL said he was strongly in favour of the Hansard, which was a necessity to keep an accurate record of the views expressed by hon. members. His experience of the party press was that it only gave a full report of the utterances of hon. gentlemen in sympathy with its side of politics, and even this was not as accurate and as correct as was desirable. He believed that Hansard was the only just and fair representation of the utterances of hon. members that was published. The hon. the First Minister said that it was not accurate; but then the hon. gentleman added that he never read it, and how he could form a very accurate opinion in this respect, when he admitted that he never read it, was beyond his (Mr. Mitchell's) ken. He had, occasionally, looked over Hansard, and he found that the utterances of hon. gentlemen were wonderfully well given. The reporters had an immense deal of labour to perform, especially when hon. gentlemen opposite forced them to sit until 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, and sometimes all the next day. They had tried it the first Session or two after Confederation, and then done without it; and the conclusion he had arrived at was that, whatever the defects of Hansard were, it had been of real benefit, as a work of reference, to hon. members on both sides of the House, and would be to those who came after them. He would, therefore, vote to sustain the Hansard.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the proposition of the Committee was so reasonable, as provision was simply made for note-taking until it was decided by the next Parliament whether Hansard would be continued or not, that he was surprised that any hon. member, whatever his ideas might be as to the usefulness of the Hansard, should object to it, and favour a course by which the next Parliament would be prevented from doing as it pleased.

The debate on the Address was generally important, and this was always the case at the beginning of a new Parliament, and it was desirable that an authentic record of it should be kept. He thought it was but right that this should be done, and the expense would be so small that no objection should be made to it. The action of hon. gentlemen opposite against Hansard was a great compliment from the majority to the minority. The majority was afraid of the effect of the Hansard, and they tried to stifle public opinion in this way and to deprive the public of the means of reading, in authentic form, what was stated on both sides of the House, in the arguments used in Parliament. This was a great compliment to the Opposition.

MR. HOLTON: Accept the compliment, and give us the benefit.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of silence.

MR. HOLTON: Not of silence, but of reasonable discussion.
