their organizations, submitted universally to the situation, and were carrying out in good faith their part of the agreement, and every consideration of both honor and expediency demanded equal good faith on the part of the government. The other course would have led to an endless guerilla warfare, conducted in a country admirably adapted for it, by desperate and hopeless men. Johnson obstinately adhered to his view, and assumed the authority of commander, when Grant flatly told him that, if there were to be any courts-martial, one must be called to try General Grant first; that he would, by every means in his power, protect his parole and appeal to Congress and the country. In the halt called by this attitude of Gen. Grant a very remarkable change occurred in the views and policy of the President. President Johnson's loyalty was subordinate, if not entirely dependent upon his intense hatred of the slave-holding oligarchy. He was a poor white, had been a journeyman tailor, and, notwithstanding the distinguished public positions he had held, he could not break through the class barrier and was treated scially with contempt by this proud aristocracy. When they plunged into rebellion he saw his opportunity. He believed in the power of the government, and thought that the time had come when he could defeat his enemies, confiscate their property, humiliate their pride and possibly destroy them. The absorbing

The General knew that this was to get him out of the way and put it in the reverse of the knew that this was to get him out of the way, and put it in the power of the pressure to some officer upon whom he could rely. He replied that if the appointment was a diplomatic one, he declined it; if it was a military one, he refused it; because the general of the army could not be ordered to a foreign country with which we are at peace. The interview was astormy one, but the subject was dropped. One day the General was sent west on a tour of inspection, He knew that Gen. ONLY A BOY.

Havre.

BY C. L. VAN LANDON. "Has your fair-haired Saxon been with you to-day? I have been watching for his appearance as the signal for my departure, and it is the first time my departure, and it is the first time I have ever been so agreeably disappointed in him. Perhaps he has come and gone. What a persistent little wretch he is! But then, who wouldn't be, with the encouragement you give him? Leola, why will you?"

The speaker, a lady of twenty-five or thirty. with a rather plain but not at all on account of her solemn warning.

season will open a week later than was expected, and that they are going to turn the Vandeville inside out for the season? I would like to know so as to arrange my summer vacation according-but you have no idea how hard I must work."

"Not must! Listen to me."

"Hush1 I know just what you are going to say, and I don't want to hear it. Not now, at least. A year from the present it wan to thought to tell me when my triumphs begin to grow stale. No, I adore my freedom; why should igive it up if make more than a living, I enjoy life thoroughly. I can have the best of friends, and for the manager, who intended to bring suit against her the best of friends, and for the present I wan nothing more."

"These I must be content with what little I have."

"The II must be content with what little I have."

"And now, my own dear Cleo, prepare youngrateful to talk to me that way when a little I have."

"It was morth or six weeks after this that Mrs. Lyone, in the thick of the existence of the season at the vandeville, received a letter from the absconded actress.

There were loving messages for britished to bring suit against her the best of friends, and for the manager, who intended to bring suit against her the best of friends, and no blest, and the best, and no blest, and trust I ever knew."

"Indeed, you must, and you are very ungrateful to talk to me that way when a slight change in her voice a moment later as she continued:—

"And now, whether you are perfection at the proper of the result of the season at the proper it and the best, and the best, and no blest, and the proper it and the best, and not be elected what I am to wear in a dozen different seed for the surprise of the season, and the proper it and the season are supplying the proper it and the p

Come, shall we talk it over?'

'Thank you. I can't afford Worth; and I accept presents from no one; not even from you. I am my own artist, sir; abundantly able to do justice to the occasion. It has given me half of my success. Two days I must have, so say good-by, and go a fishing.'

didn't care for that, but he is magnificently handsome, and a terrible despende, besides being everything else that I could desire. He fascinated me, and I must have thrown a spell on him.

So when he asked me to say yes, what could I do? I started for Havre, but we halted at Glasgow. Since them we have come to Paris, and are cutting no condition by a prompt resort to the purify-

'By the way, who do you think I saw on the street yesterday? Nobody else than your pet diversion, Eugene Estey, and I was very glad that I went away before I entirely broke his heart. What is he doing here? Ask Creston.

'So, with love to all, 'Your affectionate friend' 'Your affectionate friend tter, and went tishing. When he came back Miss Leola's rooms were vacant. She and Martha had gathered up their appurtenances in haste and sailed the day before for his mustache, and declined to make any statement. Probably he had his opinion, and so had Mrs. Lynne.

It was not a retreat on the part of Miss Divine. She had grown tired of Eugene Estey—as she grew tired of Edgar South, though he was known everything else—but she was not running away from him.

Go by all means—and keep your 'boy' at a distance. There he is now. I don't want to meet him. Good-day."

The two kissed each other, and Mrs. Lynne went away. She had a horror of Eugene Estey; and it was possible that he had a suspicion of her.

Miss Leola Divine was beautiful as dream, scarcely twenty, a queen of the stage, and a widow; though this last was not generally known. To the world at large she was a miss.

Mr. Eugene Estey was not over twenty-three, and looked as though he might be several years younger. He was rey well off, had no one to look after him, or demand his attention; and had fallen desperately in love with Leola Divine the very first evening shappeared at the Vandeville.

He worshiped at a distance for a month or two; but in an evil day Colonel Creston, a semi-bohemian with whom he was slightly acquainted, had introduced him, at a chance meeting on the elevated railroad.

Since then Eugene had gone straight shead, managing to put himself on a long to find the managing to put himself on a long to find the ment of the players, and the half a charge more time to bring due to five rest of the players, and the alid ad-dozen spectators.

He looked up with mock sadness, after having drawn in vain to three samplivine in just the vein to surprise.
