How I Love Her.

Oh, laughing, laughing, rousing ill—
On whom my love is sleeping.
And in the woods, when you are still,
Then let me what she's saying.

Tribute to my Island Home.

The glimmer of the waters, the glow of sunset skies,
All bear me swiftly back again, to home—
The land I love, the land I love,
A little spot, although it be, how precious in its worth.

MOY O'BRIEN.

A TALE OF IRISH LIFE

By MISS SKERFFORD. ("MELISSA.")

'And we'll have the people all gathered in tents on the slope of this hill,' said Moy, with animation, 'and unfurl the old "Sunburst" banner on the castle. Don't you think that would be nice, Daisy?'
'Why, Miss Moy, of course, Kitty, I know that. It's a little good any of us have that we can't trace up to her bless her!'

'True for you, Tim; but who have we to thank, first of all?'
'Why, Miss Moy, of course, Kitty, I know that. It's a little good any of us have that we can't trace up to her bless her!'

'We can't get all we ask at once; it's madness to expect it,' Mr. Davoren was saying. 'We must put up with compromise, as long as no principle is involved. We must work for Home Rule in Ireland with the conservative, moderate, and liberal elements in France. I am not a Republican, but I think we may learn a good deal from the conduct of men who hold such views in France.'

'Undoubtedly,' said Mr. Gilmarin. 'But what we really love Ireland should try and reunite the Irish people. The ruin of us is that the Conservatives and Liberals in England know that there are two parties here whom they can play off against the other when it suits them to do so.'

'It's terrible,' said Mr. Davoren. 'And if those Irish people who are rather given to look down on their own country and make much of the English connection could only realize the falseness of their position—how they are sneered at by many an English noble, who yet trembles at the idea of losing his hold over this country. How, if a Tory Englishman is praising the Americans for their common sense and love of freedom, he will say, "Ah, they are a grand offshoot from the great Anglo-Saxon race"; but if the same man's dividends are not paid in America, he will abuse the whole nation as if they were a set of pickpockets, and add, "There are, unfortunately, three and a half millions of Irish there. Surely, if the Tory is this country realized the true state of the case, he would see that it would be a wiser policy more manly part to take this country as it is and work for it, and make much of it, to cast in his lot with it, and not to be content to be merely a well-treated slave and hanger-on of England; and, indeed, as the Tories are themselves not always a well-treated slave.'

'There is a love of country even in the most desperate Tory Irishman,' said Mr. Gilmarin. 'There is the spark that may be kindled some day into a useful glow. You see it crop up now and then in a burst of pride in the genius of some countryman of different politics and religion (of course there are hardened exceptions to this rule); but even the Tory papers, that are sometimes so servile in their worship of England, have occasionally a patriotic sentiment in them; and I believe that gradually, as there is less of bigotry, this transient love of country will crystallize into devoted attachment.'

'I think you are right,' said Mr. Davoren; 'and though when we get Home Rule we may fight over our differences a little, it will be only what they had to go through in England over every Reform Bill. The two parties in Ireland will keep up a healthy activity of thought. Who would wish to see either the Conservative or Liberal party die out in England? If such a thing were possible the nation would utterly stagnate.'

The two men were silent for a minute or two. At last Mr. Davoren began. 'Goldwin Smith says, "That to specify the time at which a political event will take place is hardly ever possible, however, assumed the event may be." So, something may occur to bring about the realization of our Home Rule scheme some time in our wildest dreams; we have ever dared to hope. I believe that English and Scotch Liberals would not wish us to go to-morrow, but the "No Home Rule" party argue as if the Catholics of Ireland, if they had the power, would behave almost as badly as the Protestants did when they were in the ascendancy; but the true Celt, whether Protestant or Catholic, who is not too strong a sense of justice.'

'You are right,' said Mr. Gilmarin. 'And they are not bigoted (of course there are exceptions). Where else in the three kingdoms do you find a Protestant member returned by a Catholic constituency, as often occurs here?'
'No, we are not bigoted,' said Mr. Davoren, thoughtfully; 'and I think the English people will at last acquire knowledge that, for the real state of the case must be known some day from us. I feel so certain of it that I would stake my life upon it; for if the Catholic Celts of Ireland ever become persecutors, they will be the degenerate sons of a liberal and generous race.'

'God prosper the cause! Oh, it cannot but thrive. While the pulse of one patriot heart is alive its devotion to the rights of manhood.'
—MOON.—

Meanwhile the two ladies were having their chat.
'Carinna McDonnell only left us yesterday,' said Moy. 'She has been spending a few days with us.'

'What a lovely and charming child she is!' said Lady Catherine. 'My brother was over at Glenrover the other day, and he talked so much about Carinna when he came home that papa told him he had better wait for her; and he says he will, and that she shall be his wife.'

Moy smiled as she said: 'The McDonnells are made a great deal of already. The county people have been most kind and attentive to them.'

she opened a lock on her watch-chain and put it in. 'I shall never part with that,' she said reproachfully. 'It is consecrated by your voice and the poet's words.'

'So the two passed on through the sunny fields, chatting as only lovers can, in a way very delightful to themselves; but perhaps not very equally edifying to the rest of the world.'

CHAPTER L.

'A type that blends
Three God-like friends—
Love, valor, wit, forever!
Oh, the shamrock! the green, immortal shamrock!'

Tim O'Leary's cottage deserved its name. From the neat gate, with its round tower style of pillars, up the shining door-step, the path was bordered on each side with shamrock in beautiful order, and no worm for they were lovingly watched and tended. The whole garden was a garden of neatness, and the little farm lay round it, with a few fields of some picturesque old buildings, which in due time would be stocked with the produce of the farm.

Inside the cottage was as pretty as Kitty herself, dainty and cozy; and Tim evidently found it a very congenial spot, for he had hurried from his work to have half an hour's chat before the men came to dinner.

'Sure, it's just wonderful,' he was saying, the change that Mr. Gilmarin and Mr. McDonnell—God bless them!—have made in Ballyvonna reading-room for the men, where the likes of me can go and have all kinds of diversion (if we don't want to look at books or papers); and a gymnastic place, I think they call it; and all the shops doing a thriving business, and the town going to be drained this year, and many of the old houses put in order. Aye, Kitty darling, but it's a changed place!'

'True for you, Tim; but who have we to thank, first of all?'
'Why, Miss Moy, of course, Kitty, I know that. It's a little good any of us have that we can't trace up to her bless her!'

'By the powers, so it is!' cried Tim, throwing his hat in the air and catching it again, as he ran out into the garden to meet them.

It was past five o'clock in the afternoon, and some of the wicker chairs on the lawn at Gilmarin Castle were occupied. Lady Catherine, looking bright and as charming as ever, in one, Moy in another (which had been drawn up close to her dainty seat), and Mr. Davoren and Mr. Gilmarin had left theirs, and were walking up and down the lawn engaged in earnest conversation.

'We can't get all we ask at once; it's madness to expect it,' Mr. Davoren was saying. 'We must put up with compromise, as long as no principle is involved. We must work for Home Rule in Ireland with the conservative, moderate, and liberal elements in France. I am not a Republican, but I think we may learn a good deal from the conduct of men who hold such views in France.'

Meanwhile the two ladies were having their chat.

'I am almost selfish enough to wish it was to be Dublin,' said Moy. 'For Denis has a nice old house there, where he was born, and I want to have it done up, so that we can have a home in Dublin as well as here. We might gather round us all the bright, clever, charming people in the three kingdoms. You are quite a talent in the country; I find that in our house they had a home, and see among our guests those whom it would be an advantage to them to meet.'

'That will be delightful,' said Lady Catherine. 'I say "will," for you can do it, Moy. I hate the idea of all the genius and talent in the country going to London; and nothing would stop emigrating like finding itself properly treated at home. You are quiet enough here. I suppose you always have your evenings to yourself?'

'No,' said Moy. 'Gandappa and Mrs. Fitzgerald (who has come, as you know, to keep house for him) often drive out and dine with us, and sometimes stay from Saturday to Monday. Then, one evening lately, we had the Gairards, and the rector and his wife, and Pat and Fitzgerald to dine with us; but Denis and I spend many an evening, alone sitting here, our wicker chair drawn close together. Sometimes we talk, but generally we just sit looking away over this lovely country, watching the shadows lengthening and the stars coming out.'

'Love is enough,' said Lady Catherine, with a smile. 'But I wonder when ever M. Davoren and I will have to sit hand-in-hand? On 7 when I call at the House of Commons for him in the small hours of the night, on my way home from some party for you, I must go a good deal into society. I have some work to do there; and her eyes flashed with a mixture of fun and earnestness.'

'I like Mr. McDonnell very much,' said Lady Catherine, 'particularly when he begins to talk about art, I think, too, that the romance of his returning to his old home, and then the finding of the brooch, all made people take an unusual amount of interest in him. By the by, Mr. Gilmarin was right about the brooch, was he not?'

'Oh, yes,' said Moy. 'The greatest authority on Oghams has found that one of the names in Ogham is that of a chieftain of the clan who lived in the fifth century; and yet cannot think how glad I am, as he has had a wonderful effect on the people. You know we Irish prize a long pedigree, just as much as the Laird o' Cockpen did; and though the tenants were very ready to be civil to Mr. McDonnell and Carinna, they were not enthusiastic about them. Even when they found that several generations of the family had lived at "Moneydonn," I overheard one of the tenants speaking of his landlord as "that man from America," but since the brooch has been found, and his great antiquity proved, the people are wild with delight. If Mr. McDonnell had been suddenly raised to the peerage they would not look up to him half as much as they do now; but when he takes his price and delight in the old family coming to their own again, we have all the kind thoughts which it is in the power of a landlord to show toward his tenants, I think you will not wonder that the people think themselves the most fortunate in Ireland.'

'Ah! Mr. McDonnell has not only the will but the power,' said Lady Catherine, with one of her rare sighs. 'There are dear good Irish landlords who cannot do better than they would, because they have not the means.'

'That is most true, dear,' said Moy, pressing her friend's hand. 'She knew that Lady Catherine alluded to Lord Arthur. "But," Moy went on, "when they live among the people they are loved and respected, and the will is often taken for the deed."

'It is, it is,' returned Lady Catherine. 'Papa feels that, and it comforts him (of course, you know who was in my thoughts), but sometimes he says to me, "Carinna, what have I given these people in return for their devotion?'

'I wish he would say that to me,' said Moy, with such animation. 'I would answer, "You have given a priceless gift to Ireland—your noble daughter to work for the good cause." 'Flatterer!' said Lady Catherine; but she caught Moy's hand and pressed it lovingly, as she said, 'Let me see—what were we talking about? Oh, yes—Mr. McDonnell.'

'Yes, and his tenants,' said Moy. 'Fancy Dan Riley a respectable member of society. He is a reformed man. He does not boast, as he used to, that "Dan never breaks his word," but his conduct proves the truth of the old saying; "when Mr. Gilmarin went to see him in prison, Dan made him a solemn promise that if he lived he would be a changed man. Denis would have given him a farm, but Mr. McDonnell offered him the old place where Dan was born, and there he lives with his wife's father, a dear old man, and they work early and late, and that brings contentment at last."

'It does, indeed,' said Lady Catherine. 'But this reminds me, Moy, of one who has found hard work the greatest blessing, and that is Alice Wentworth. Do you know that she is coming to stay with us the day after to-morrow?'

The color deepened in Moy's face as she gazed at Lady Catherine for a few moments without speaking. Then she said, 'She told me she would come back again some day and see us all, and show me that she was happy. And I—who felt just then as if it would be almost better to die than take the place of one who would have been such a blessing to the whole neighborhood—'

'Never such a blessing as you have been and will be, my dear child,' said Lady Catherine, interrupting her affectionately. 'So I will hear no more in that strain. Alice is coming to us for a rest. She has not only been working too hard among the poor in London, but now, in the height of the season, she does not like being in town; all her gay friends are coming to see her, and trying to make her go out. So she wrote to ask if we would have her for a few weeks, and we are only too delighted. Poor Alice, she is so rejoiced that there is no longer any opposition to her coming to us for a rest. She has not a word of selfishness in her satisfaction, for she will have us so much in London next year.'

'Check your indignation with K. D. C. The Great Checker, April 9—1892.'

'Ah, how much I have missed this year I sighed Lady Catherine, though she laughed at Mr. Gilmarin's smile.

Lady Arthur and her laughter had been in the south of France for many months, and was not in Ireland when Moy was married.

'To think,' Lady Catherine exclaimed, of missing Lady Anne and her remarks! It is really true, Moy, that she had her picture at her pillow, to keep off the natives?'

'Something very like it,' returned Moy, laughing. 'Sir Ralph declared that she nearly shot him by mistake. I was thankful, on the servants' account, when she left Ireland. I was always in terror lest some accident should happen to her.'

'Shorter' Pastry and 'Shorter' Bills.

We are talking about a "shortening" which will not come in the way of your cooking. These who "know a thing or two" about Cooking (Marian Harland among a host of others) are using COTTOLINE instead of lard. None but the purest, healthiest and cleanest ingredients go to make up Cottoline. Lard isn't healthy, and is not always clean. Those who use Cottoline will be healthier and wealthier than those who use lard. Healthier because they will get "shorter" bread; wealthier because they will get "shorter" grocery bills—for Cottoline costs no more than lard and goes twice as far—so is just half as expensive.

CHAPTER LII.

'When safe built on bosom's trust, The throne was but the centre Round the which the circle spun. That treason darts not circle spun. Were all the tempters round and them.'

Before Lady Catherine and Mr. Davoren drove away from the castle they all went into the house to look at some beautiful birds from Arabia, India and Japan, shot by Mr. Gilmarin, and now looking; very perfect in handsome cases placed along the sides of the wide hall.

'Here are an interesting couple,' said Mr. Gilmarin, pointing to two aquatic birds something like wild ducks, but with round instead of flat bills. 'I must say I did not shoot them; I bought them. I think if after telling Moy my air history, I had owned to having bought them, she would have broken off our engagement.'

'They all laughed, and Lady Catherine asked for some particulars about the birds.

'Well, the pair are never happy away from one another. I have seen them often skimming side by side over the surface of pond. Their cry is very like a clear, prolonged sigh. If one bird flies away the other immediately follows; and if one is killed, the other soon dies of sorrow. "Youen" is the name of the male, and "Yang" that of the female; so they are generally called "Youen Yang." This particular pair were shot in Tartary. Mr. Gilmarin passed on to another case, and, as the other followed, Mr. Davoren said, in a low voice:

'Catherine, will you call me "Youen" if I call you "Yang"?' 'Yes,' she replied, smiling; and, after her marriage, people in England were often surprised to hear Mr. or Lady Catherine Davoren address one another by some foreign word. They never could quite make it out, but generally decided that "Youen" and "Yang" were terms of endearment in the Irish language.

'And here is the only other bird in the collection that Denis did not shoot,' said Moy, pointing to an American canvas-back. 'This was a present from Mr. McDonnell. By the way, Catherine, he is going to give an afternoon party (a very grand affair) in return for all the kindness he and Carinna and Mr. Cormac have received.'

'How I wish that Mr. Cormac had stayed here till we returned!' said Lady Catherine. 'I have already heard so much of him from Carinna and all of you that I must say I long to see him.'

'I hope you will,' said Moy, 'for he has promised to leave his beloved sea-mill, and spend three months in Ireland next year. I assure you we all had tears in our eyes when we said good-bye to him.'

'And he said he felt as spiritless as a turnip at the idea of parting from us,' added Mr. Gilmarin, his eyes sparkling with suppressed mirth.
