sent, and the question for the Government to determine is as to the extent of the order which should be given to the Ross Rifle Company for the improved rifle, or as to what other course, if any, the Government ought to take in the premises. On the one hand, we are confronted with the fact that after the conclusion of the war, we shall have, unless we dispose of them in the meantime, a very considerable number of Ross rifles, Mark III. I have spoken of some negotiations still pending with regard to disposing of some of these rifles. For the purpose of training under ordinary conditions of peace they would be useful to our troops, and it is quite possible that, under conditions of warfare different from those which have been encountered during the past two years, the Ross rifle might give perfect satisfaction. I am not prepared to pronounce an opinion upon that, because there has been so much difference of opinion, so much controversy amongst experts, that it would be idle for me to venture on a subject which depends upon technical considerations as well as upon actual experience in the field.

The question, therefore, is under the consideration of the Government at the present time, and we shall give our best attention to it. I should be very glad indeed if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have taken an interest in this subject, and who are now fully seized of the situation as it presents itself to the Government, would be good enough to give us the benefit of their views, which, of course, will be most carefully and attentively considered. The situation is as I have described it. We have made provision, by arrangement with the British Government, that our troops shall be armed at the front during the continuance of the war with a rifle to which no exception has been taken. We have the question as to whether anything can be done with the supply of Ross rifles which are not in use at the front; and, lastly, there is the question as to the extent upon which we shall enter upon the production of rifles of a new type. Hon. gentlemen who heard me read the telegram of the British Government dated 19th September will remember that they expressed a great doubt as to whether or not any rifle other than the improved Lee-Enfield rifle would be adopted as the standard service rifle in the immediate future, putting forward, as the reason for that view, the reasonable consideration that they would be in possession of so enormous a supply of rifles after the war that they would not care to embark upon the production of a new rifle upon the scale that would be necessary. The condition which confronts them confronts us in a smaller degree, because we shall have on hand, unless we dispose of them in the meantime, a very large number of Ross rifles, Mark III, at the conclusion of the war, more than will be ordinarily required by this country for several years to come under conditions of peace. In the meantime, the order which was given in February last to the Ross Rifle Company is being carried out, and the order which the British Government gave to the Ross Rifle Company in the autumn of 1914 is also being carried out. Altogether the company has still to produce and deliver about 150,000 rifles, about 97,000 for us, I think, and about 57,000 for the British Government.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

ROSS RIFLE—DISCUSSION IN COMMITTEE.

House again in Committee, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) asked me a question in respect to the test which had been made in France, and which is referred to in Sir John French's report. I do not think I had seen the report of that test. It was not on my file, but I procured what I understand to be a copy from the Department of Militia and Defence. It may have been brought to my attention at the time—I am not quite sure—but I did not happen to have it on my file this afternoon when my hon. friend addressed the question to me. I find attached to the copy of Sir John French's report, which has been procured from the Department of Militia, the following document which purports to be a copy of the report of the committee that was assembled at the rifle range at St. Omer, France. As Sir John French refers to a test carried out at headquarters, and as the headquarters of Sir John French were at St. Omer at that time, I assume that this is the report of that test. Perhaps it would be both convenient and desirable that this report should be placed upon the records of the House so that hon. members may know just what the result of the test was. It is as follows:

The following committee assembled at the rifle range, St. Omer, at 2.30 p.m., on June 5th, 1915: Colonel Mathew, Director-General Ordnance Service, General Headquarters; Colonel Wood, Assistant Quartermaster General, Canadian Division; Lt.-Col. C. R. Woodroffe, Acting Quartermaster General, General Headquarters; Capt. Campbell, Assistant Ordnance Director; Lt.-Col. Murray, Ordnance Officer, Canadian Division; Major Baker Carr, Commandant Machine Gun School; Major Guest, General Staff, General Headquarters.

The following tests were carried out:

Test No.

1. 15 rounds Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914 Mk. VII ammunition fired from Ross rifle—No jambs.
2. 5 rounds British ammunition B. 1915 Mk. VII fired from Ross rifle quite cold. 3 last rounds partly jammed. Ejection very stiff.
3. 45 rounds of British ammunition K. 1914 Mk. VII fired from Ross rifle. No jambs.
4. 5 rounds British B. 1915 Mk. VII ammunition fired from Ross rifle heated from test No. 3. First round partly jammed, second round completely jammed.
5. 65 rounds continuous rapid fire British K. 1914 Mk. VII fired from Ross rifle. After 40 rounds all remainder jammed slightly.
6. 65 rounds British K. 1914 Mk. VII ammunition fired from Lee Enfield British rifle. No jambs.
7. 100 rounds Canadian manufactured ammunition D.A.C. 1914 Mk. VII fired from Ross rifle, continuous rapid fire. No jambs.
8. 5 rounds British ammunition B. 1915 Mk. VII fired from Ross rifle (cold) all jammed slightly.
9. 100 rounds Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914 Mk. VII in another Ross rifle. 55th, 56th, 60th, 72nd, 73rd, 84th, 91st, 94th and 99th rounds jammed very slightly.
10. 100 rounds Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914 Mk. VII ammunition fired from British Lee Enfield Short rifle—no jambs.
11. 50 rounds British ammunition B. 1915 Mk. VII fired from Lee Enfield short rifle. All rounds fired jammed sightly.

OPINION OF COMMITTEE.

A unanimous opinion was expressed that the Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914 Mk. VII ammunition only, of those tried, was suitable for rapid fire with the Ross rifle, that provided a sufficient supply of Canadian manufactured ammunition of this type could be supplied, the other defects apparent were not sufficient to condemn the Ross rifle in view of the present shortage of rifles generally, and that those types of British made ammunition which were tried should not be issued to troops armed with the Ross rifle.

The committee were practically unanimous in advising that the Ross rifle should be employed on the lines of communication, and that if possible, the Canadian troops should be armed with the British rifle.

With regard to the following specific points which the committee were asked to answer, the questions and answers as stated below:

1. There are frequent reports that the bolt action jambs after about 5 rounds.	1. Yes, but with British B. 1915 Mk. VII ammunition only.
2. Full value of rapid fire cannot be developed unless:	2. (a) Full value of rapid fire can be developed with ammunition of Canadian manufacture only.
(a) Ammunition of Canadian manufacture is used.
(b) Rifle is perfectly clean.	(b) This point was not tested.
3. That English made ammunition is slightly larger than Canadian so that immediately the cartridge exploded the cartridge case fills the chamber so tightly as to cause a jamb.	3. The British made cartridge case appears to be of a slightly thicker gauge than that of Canadian manufacture and the diameter of the cartridge immediately under the rim appears to be slightly greater than that of Canadian manufactured ammunition. This may be the cause of jamming.
4. (a) That orders exist that on no account are troops to take out their magazine as it necessitates stripping the rifle.	4. (a) Yes.
(b) Unless the magazine is unloaded every 24 hours and the spring action eased, the magazine fails to respond.	(b) This possibly is the case but the committee were unable to test this point.
5. That dirt accumulates easily in the bolt head and also in the receptive thread in the breech of the rifle. Owing to difficulty of cleaning jambs are caused.	5. This may be so, but the rifles were not tried under dirty condition.
6. The screw of the bolt head expands under heat and renders it difficult to open the breech (presumably due to the number of bearing surfaces affected).	6. The expansion of the bolthead was not apparent when firing 100 rounds of Canadian manufactured ammunition.
7. The Ross rifle sight is defective because of its delicacy and the smallness of the figures which make it difficult to adjust the sight easily.	7. Admittedly the figuring of the sighting is small and difficult to read as compared to the British Lee-Enfield rifle.
8. The magazine case is too thin and is dented easily. This causes a jamb as the spring cannot work.	8. The magazine case is flat and any dent therein would seriously affect the spring therein.
9. The foresight is not good for service work. The circular cover easily gets filled with mud and is difficult to clean.	9. The committee did not consider that any great amount of difference existed in this respect in comparison with the British rifle.
10. A hole has recently been bored in the base of the magazine to enable the cleaning of the magazine to be carried out with stripping the rifle.	10. This hole should be covered by a small revolving plate, adjusted by a screw.
11. It is far easier to load the Lee-Enfield rifle than the Ross rifle with a clip of ammunition. A Lee-Enfield rifle takes 10 rounds a Ross 5 rounds.	11. Undoubtedly the loading of the Lee-Enfield can be carried out in half the time, mainly owing to the fact that the guide for the clip on the British rifle is directly over the magazine chamber.
12. That the shape of the fore part of the chamber of the Ross rifle is different to that of the Lee-Enfield. That this does not allow of the same expansion and is the cause of the jamb.	12. Undoubtedly there is a difference of the shape of the fore part of the chamber, but the committee was not able to decide that this was the cause of the jamb.

It should be noted that twenty-six Ross rifles per battalion are used in the Canadian forces at the front at present for sniping purposes, there being no question at all that for that purpose the Ross is superior to any other rifle known.

I do not know that I have emphasised sufficiently one point that ought to be borne in mind by every hon. member of the House, and by every one in this country who is disposed to consider in a reasonable way the situation that confronted this Government in the summer of 1915, after Sir John French's report had been received. I know, in a very intimate and confidential way, what the situation in regard to rifles was both for the British Government and certain others of the Allied Governments. The situation with regard to rifles, machine guns, 18-pounder field guns, howitzers and guns of larger calibre, such as were being increasingly used in the field—the situation with regard to all these matters was detailed to me in a very frank way by the present Prime Minister of Great Britain two days before I left England in 1915. I cannot even at this date go into the particulars of the information which he then afforded to me. But I do desire to emphasize to hon. gentlemen in this House that there was the most desperate and urgent need of rifles of any description in 1915. I could give the House, if it were permissible, information with regard to certain negotiations that were carried on in that year, in which our co-operation was asked for securing rifles of a somewhat antiquated type. The situation was not such as would justify the Government in considering a selection of rifles. The situation was one which demanded every possible effort that could be made in every direction to procure rifles of almost any description. Men were undergoing training not only in this country but also in Great Britain, some without rifles at all and others with dummy rifles. The need was most intense, insistent and urgent. The Government could have the chamber of the Ross rifle enlarged, as the chamber of the Lee-Enfield had been enlarged, so that jamming would be prevented. What else could it do? I again point out that under the contract the Ross Rifle Company was entitled to one year before it could be called upon to produce rifles of a different type and that the British Government thought it could not be done in less than two years.

On the 21st of July, 1916, we requested the British Government to furnish the Ross Rifle Company as soon as possible with all technical information including drawings, specifications and samples of the new standard rifle to which I have alluded. We also inquired on that occasion as to whether or not the British Government proposed to continue their contract with the Ross Rifle Company for the Ross rifle, Mark III, or whether they would require Ross to produce the new pattern of Lee-Enfield rifle under that contract. Various reminders were sent requesting a reply to that telegram, but none was received until the 28th of August, 1916, when the following reply was made:

With reference to your telegram of July 21, Army Council state that the improved pattern of Lee-Enfield rifle is not at present manufactured at Enfield, as considerable time would have been taken up in turning arms to new pattern. At present the new pattern is only made in America, and under the circumstances, the Army Council consider that there is no necessity for the Ross Company to communicate with Enfield.

There had been a suggestion in the previous telegram that the Ross Rifle Company should be put into direct communication with Enfield for this purpose. The telegram continues:

It is not considered possible by the Minister of Munitions to obtain delivery from the Ross rifle factory of the new pattern rifle in quantities under two years, but I am asking him to advise as to the best manner for the company to obtain the necessary specifications and drawings. I will telegraph as soon as possible as to the company's contract with His Majesty's Government

They supplemented that telegram on the 5th day of September, 1916, with this message:

With reference to my telegram August 28, position as regards contract for supply of 100,000 Ross rifles to His Majesty's Government is as follows: Ross rifles now being delivered though not authorized for service in the field are still of value for many purposes, training, arming home defence units, and arming marines. Therefore, immediate supply of these rifles of service. On the other hand it is not considered possible to obtain deliveries in large quantities of new pattern rifle from Ross factory in less than two years. At a certain date the supply of Enfield rifles will be more than sufficient for needs of British troops and all requirements of Allies will have been met. Minister of Munitions in these circumstances does not propose to modify contracts and so far as this contract is concerned could not agree to change of pattern. Minister of Munitions further suggests that if it is decided to change over factory to new pattern for manufacture for Canadian Government it will be very desirable from company's point of view, both as regards finance and shop organization to carry out contract with His Majesty's Government while plant is being changed over. On learning that it has been decided that company should take up manufacture of new pattern rifle for Canadian Government, Minister of Munitions will render every assistance in his power; he will give instructions that specifications and drawings be prepared in United States and will place representative of Ross company into communication with British experts who are watching manufacture in United States; further there is a certain amount of equipment (jigs and tools) accumulated rifle plant here and not now required; if this can be adapted to Ross company's plant, Minister of Munitions will be glad to supply it to Canada. Suggested that representative of Ross company should examine this equipment with view of transfer.

Then there is a passage which I shall omit.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the Prime Minister state the date when the British Government will be able to take care of all their requirements?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is precisely what I think it is not desirable to state.

Further on there is a telegram of the 11th of September which relates to the efforts of this Government to obtain a standard rifle of the type which the British Government advised us to manufacture. The members of the committee will bear in mind that we had already been informed that this rifle was not being manufactured in Great Britain and that it was being manufactured in the United States. Therefore, being desirous of obtaining it as soon as possible, if we were going to adopt it as a standard, we started out on our own account to get necessary specimens of the rifle in order that we might take proceedings under the contract. But on the 11th day of September, 1916, we received this telegram:—

Stated by Minister of Munitions that Master General of Ordnance, Canada, has applied to Ministry Organizations of New York for a few serviceable rifles of new pattern. It is considered undesirable by minister to send any rifles not critically examined by Chief Inspector of Small Arms in this country, and he will therefore select five rifles of pattern mentioned and despatch from here.

We did not receive those rifles until about the 20th day of January, 1917. I suppose they had to be sent from the United States to Great Britain, where they had to be critically examined by the Chief Inspector of Small Arms, and thereafter they were despatched to this country, sealed and in the form which was necessary under the contract.

It was necessary for us, if we proposed to give an order for rifles of that type, not only to have the rifle itself, but to have the specifications and drawings; so we proceeded to take steps for the purpose of acquiring them. On the 19th day of November, 1916, not having received the drawings and specifications, this Government despatched to the Colonial Secretary a telegram in these terms:

Ottawa, November 19, 1916.

Your telegram September 5. Rifles. Specifications and drawings of Enfield rifle, 1914 pattern, urgently required before 1st December. Please telegraph probable date of arrival and also of shipment.

Devonshire.

And on the 19th November we sent this despatch:

Ottawa, November 19, 1916.

Your cypher telegram of 11th September last. Rifles. Urgently required for use as sealed patterns five Enfield rifles 1914 pattern. Hope this can be arranged and should be grateful to know by telegram date of shipment.

Devonshire.

On 12th December we received from the Colonial Secretary the following telegram addressed to the Governor General:

London, December 12, 1916.

With reference to your cypher telegram November 19, it is regretted by Minister of Munitions that he is not at present in a position to supply specifications and drawings of 1914 pattern Enfield rifle. No standard pattern of this rifle has yet been definitely settled upon, as it has been found necessary for manufacturers to alter certain points in original design. With reference to the taking up of the manufacture of rifle Minister of Munitions wishes to give every assistance to your Government, and will give instructions that specifications and drawings should be prepared in America or this country as soon as all details of pattern are definitely settled, and as promised in my telegram of September 5, will place representatives of Ross Company in communication with British experts who are in United States watching manufacture of rifle.

Up to the present time the necessary specifications and drawings alluded to in these several telegrams have not been received. As I stated, we have received the pattern of the rifle itself, and, having that pattern, we have given notice to the Ross Rifle Company in accordance with the contract as already mentioned. But, as I am advised by the Department of Justice—by the Solicitor General who looked into the matter—that for an order under the contract it is necessary not only that we should have the rifle itself but that we should have the specifications and drawings which, as I have said, although asked for some months ago, have been delayed owing to the fact that the exact nature of these specifications and drawings had not been fully settled.

It may be that in these remarks, which have been somewhat extended owing to the necessity of reading so many documents, I have overlooked some point suggested by hon. members on the other side, or it may be that some new point may be raised on which it would be proper to give information. I can only say in concluding my remarks, that if any further information is desired in any respect I shall be very happy to give it to the best of my ability. The Government has absolutely nothing which it desires to conceal in connection with this matter, except so far as considerations of the public interest may make it undesirable to place certain communications or portions of communications before the House in such a way that the information will reach the enemy.

I submit to the House and to the country this correspondence, and this account of the conditions with which we have to deal, with a good deal of confidence that our course will be appreciated, as it must be if it is understood. Throughout we have been animated by one purpose alone, namely, that the gallant men overseas fighting in the Canadian forces should be equipped with an efficient rifle, and, more than that, a rifle in which they could have absolute confidence. That has been the purpose, the desire, and the intention of the Government, and I think it is manifest from the correspondence I have read and the incidents I have described that the intention has been well carried out.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the House accepts the statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister in the spirit in which it is offered. We all realize that in a subject of such a confidential nature as this there is some correspondence which the right hon. gentleman could not produce to the House. It is very evident from the manner in which his statement has been made that some correspondence is withheld. For that reason it is not as easy to discuss the subject as if it were an ordinary business affair. Personally, I feel very grateful to the Prime Minister for the information he has given. If I can get just a few more questions answered along the same lines I shall be perfectly satisfied, or, at any rate, I shall not have much further to say. I should like to know whether, at any time after July 15, when it became evident that there was something wrong with the Ross rifle, any person in authority went to Sir Charles Ross, officially or unofficially, and asked him if he would manufacture a different type of rifle from the Ross rifle, and if so whether he demanded a year's notice provided for in the contract, or whether he agreed to manufacture whatever kind of rifle the Government wanted. My reason for asking is found in the newspaper correspondence which took place last month. I have not it before me, but I read it as, I presume, the right hon. the Prime Minister did. We all know what that correspondence was. I think it began because of a statement made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in Montreal. Sir Charles Ross, in his letter, stated in very plain language that he had always been willing to do whatever the Government wished him to do, that he had not stood on the letter of the contract but wished to carry it out in spirit, and had always been ready to make whatever changes and modifications the Government wanted to have made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no knowledge of any person having called upon Sir Charles Ross to make such a proposal. I understand that he is under the impression that he spoke to me in 1915 with regard to approaching the British Government with a view to having all the contracts changed into a contract for the Lee-Enfield rifle, possibly to procure a larger contract from the British Government.

I have a good deal of confidential correspondence about some negotiations that he had concerning a proposed large contract with the Russian Government, in which he requested the assistance of the Canadian Government. I have no recollection of his having made that suggestion to me in 1915. If he made any such suggestion to me as he thinks he did, it must have been of a casual character, because I have no recollection whatever of it. Further than that, I have had the correspondence examined and I find no reference in it to any such proposals. I am perfectly satisfied that the proposal is one which would not have been entertained by the British Government, for the reason that they have always adhered to the theory that it would be impossible for him to change his factory so as to produce a new rifle in quantities inside of about two years. I have read two telegrams which indicate that. Sir Charles Ross himself thinks that he would do it in a year, possibly in less than a year. We have to take into account, of course, the views of those whose experience in such matters would make their opinions valuable.

Mr. CARVELL: The Prime Minister says that he will take the opinion of some official in England in preference to the opinion of Sir Charles Ross.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that. I said that in dealing with such a question we would have to take into account the view of experts, whether in Great Britain or in our own department at home. We could not be absolutely sure that the view of the experts of the Ross Rifle Company would be borne out in the end.

Mr. CARVELL: The Prime Minister has a great advantage in discussing this matter, because he has had an opportunity of taking it up, not only with the experts in Great Britain and in the department here, but also with Sir Charles Ross; whereas we on this side of the House have had no opportunity of discussing it with anybody. But it would seem to the ordinary observer that the man who has the most up-to-date rifle factory in America, and who has been able to turn out rifles at the rate of 1,000 a day, ought to have some idea as to how long it would take him to equip his factory. However, I have no knowledge of the matter; I simply accept the statement made by the Prime Minister. Has the Ross rifle factory during the last two years and a half been asked to make any changes in the rifle which they are manufacturing? If so, how many; and have they required a year's time within which to make the change, or have they done it in a much shorter time? If they have done it in a shorter time, how long has it taken to effect the changes?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not want my hon. friend, or the members of the committee, or any one else to misunderstand me. I was not disparaging the ability or experience of Sir Charles Ross, for, as far as the mechanical details of the rifle are concerned, it is universally acknowledged that he is an exceedingly capable man. I only intended to suggest that a government, in the midst of a war, when the question of time is vital, must, in considering such a change, take into consideration the view which is entertained not only by the contractor, but also by their own experts and by the experts of Great Britain, whose experience and knowledge in such matters certainly should command respect. When the question of time is vital, one could not make a plunge into a proposal of that kind without taking the opinion of both sides into pretty careful account. My hon. friend asks me what changes have been made. I have spent a good deal of time in endeavouring to get at the bottom of all these matters from first to last, and to see that the direction of events was in accordance with the best interests of our men at the front, but I certainly am not in a position to-night to give my hon. friend the information he asks, I should imagine that any changes, if any have been made, are of a very minor and trivial character, but I do not desire to commit myself to any statement on the subject unless I am absolutely sure that it is correct. I will get the information in written form from the Master-General of the Ordnance and give it to the committee to-morrow, or whenever the question is next taken up.

Mr. CARVELL: That is entirely satisfactory. I quite understand that the Prime Minister has had many things to take up his attention besides the matter of following up the changes that may have taken place in the Ross rifle. Still, as he seems to have a very complete brief on the case, I thought he might possibly be able to tell us what changes, if any, have been made. There has been an enormous amount of talk throughout Canada during the last year in regard to the Ross rifle. We hear it stated in one place that the company must be allowed a year in which to make any change. I have been told by a member of the House since coming here that changes have been made inside of one or two months. I suppose they would be minor changes, but they would be changes just the same, and some alteration of the machinery would be necessary. I do not forget the fact that this country is at war, nor do I forget that up to a comparatively recent period the question of getting rifles of any kind was a very serious problem for Great Britain and her Allies. But in the light of the report, which the right hon. gentleman has read to-night, of a committee appointed by General French away back in June, 1915, positively recommending that the Canadian troops at the front be not armed with the Ross rifle, it is most remarkable that the matter was allowed to drift along as it did. It could be justified only by the reason given by the Prime Minister to-night: that a rifle of almost any kind was better than no rifle at all. I do not think that the same charitable construction could be placed upon the actions of the Government after the lamentable affairs of May, 1916, as could be placed upon their actions after the occurrences of 1915, because in 1916 the rifle situation must have been very materially improved. I quite appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister does not wish to state the date when the British Government expect to be entirely independent in the matter of the supply of rifles. He quite properly refused to give that information to-night, and I would suggest that he go over the remarks which he made this afternoon, because it is my impression that he gave that information, perhaps without realizing what he was doing. That was my reason for asking the question. However, in the months of June and July, 1916, the Government must have had some idea that the British Government were not in the straits that they had been in the matter of rifles. The best evidence of that is that on July 11, 1916, this Government was notified by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to send no more Ross rifles to England; that in future the British authorities would provide the Canadian army with Lee-Enfields.

That is a fact which is plainly stated in the correspondence; therefore, there is no reason why we should not discuss it. We start out from the 11th day of July, 1916, with the fact that the British Government were able to furnish the Canadian Army with Lee-Enfield rifles and that they did not want any more Ross rifles brought to Great Britain. The question that occurs to the average business man is, why, if that condition of affairs existed, the Government have gone on manufacturing Ross rifles from the 11th of July to the present time, are asking this Parliament to vote $2,660,000 for the purpose of purchasing more Ross rifles, and are producing 80,000 more rifles which the British Government will not allow upon the firing line and do not want in England at all. I appreciate the fact that these Ross rifles would be useful for instructional purposes, and for drilling purposes; and, as the Prime Minister stated they might be used on the lines of communication, although I think not in France, for I cannot conceive that under present conditions they would be allowed there. But we must remember that at the lowest calculation there must be 100,000 more Ross rifles owned or controlled by the Government of Great Britain than possibly can be required for the troops now in Great Britain for instructional purposes, and it would seem to me that these 100,000 rifles could be brought to Canada. They would more than supply any troops that are in Canada or that are likely to be, for instructional purposes. Therefore, it would seem that if the British Government are furnishing and have been furnishing since July last, all the rifles that are used at the front, the supply of nearly 300,000 Ross rifles—it must be pretty near that number since we started, as 218,000 have been purchased—a supply of that kind, one would think, would be quite sufficient.

The first question I asked this afternoon I repeat now. Why, in view of this state of affairs, have the Government continued manufacturing the Ross rifle and why are they spending so much money for an article which, according to all the evidence, is of no great practical use to Canada in winning this war. I know that the Prime Minister takes the ground that the Ross rifle factory could not be converted into a Lee-Enfield factory within two years. We have not any evidence upon that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not give any opinion of my own upon it.

Mr. CARVELL: The Prime Minister gave the opinion of some one else, and I have no opinion upon it at all; therefore my opinion would not be as good as the Prime Minister's. But we must remember that we would not have to close down the Ross factory entirely in order to convert it into a factory for making another kind of rifle, for there is an enormous amount of machinery in a rifle factory that would apply to any kind of rifle. After all, about the only difference between the Ross rifle and the Lee-Enfield rifle is in the bolt chamber. All the machinery which would make the stocks, barrels, and bands, and the dozen odd parts of the rifle, would be applicable to another type. We have the evidence given by the Prime Minister himself that it would take only about $500,000 to build over the Ross rifle factory into a Lee-Enfield factory, and that the British Government would agree to furnish the machinery, or a large part of it. That is stated in the communication which the Prime Minister has just read. With these facts in our minds, the thing which I cannot understand, and which, I think, will bother the people of this country, is why the Government have gone on since July, 1916, manufacturing this rifle, and why they are still making it and purchasing 80,000 more when the Prime Minister himself stated this afternoon that after the month of July, 1916, the production of rifles was not a very serious matter. I think I am using almost the exact words which the Prime Minister used. I think his first idea was that it was hardly worth while bothering their heads about a rifle until the war had ended, or at least until the Empire had decided upon the make of a rifle that would be Empire-wide. There was a communication addressed to the War Office, I think in the month of September, 1916—I have forgotten the exact date, but I think it was in September—asking them if, in their opinion, it was worth while for the Canadian Government to enter into the manufacture of any kind of rifle until the matter had been decided by the Empire at large. The same answer came back that had been coming for four or five months; if you want to manufacture a rifle, take the American ·276. That seemed to be the answer every time. I appreciate the fact that my hon. friend has had some difficulty in getting the specifications and drawings, and, to some extent, in getting a pattern rifle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: When my hon. friend refers to the American ·276 rifle, I suppose he means the British ·276 made in the United States?

Mr. CARVELL: The Prime Minister has been speaking about that this afternoon, and I am only quoting his words. I mean the 1914 Enfield rifle manufactured in the United States. The same answer always came back, and it came back in this case: if you want to make a rifle, make the ·276 according to the American pattern. It seems most remarkable that this thing was allowed to dangle along for months, and that nothing had been done. Now we are down to the point that after the 1st day of February, 1918, the rifles supplied shall be according to this ·276 or American Enfield. I do not know, but I would feel pretty badly to-night if I could bring myself to believe that we would require rifles in any quantity after February, 1918. It may be possible that we will require them, but I sincerely hope not. It seems to me that, in that view of the case, it would be almost a useless expenditure of time and energy, let alone money.

I wish to call my right hon. friend's attention to just one other matter, and it is one which I cannot view in the same light as I have viewed the remainder of the statements which he made this afternoon and evening. It seemed to me that the principal reason given by the Prime Minister for continuing to manufacture the Ross rifle, and for the expenditure of $2,500,000 in the future on a weapon which he himself must admit can be of no very great practical use as a military weapon, is that we are bound by the contract, and that we must carry out that contract. Why, Mr. Chairman, has the right hon. gentleman forgotten that this country is at war? Has he forgotten that you can break a contract, if it is necessary, under the War Measures Act? I do not care if there was no War Measures Act; surely if this nation has agreed with some one to purchase a rifle which is not of any good, we are not going to carry out the contract. I do not believe that we have reached that point. I do not believe that Sir Charles Ross would try to hold the Government for a moment to a contract of that kind. I believe that if the Government asked Sir Charles Ross to-morrow, or put him in the box before a committee of this House, he would tell them that not only is he willing now, but that he has been willing from the beginning to change that rifle to any pattern that the Government wanted. I believe that the Government could cancel that contract if they want to cancel it. I cannot for a moment conceive that any hon. man, with the nation at war, would try to hold the Government to the mere letter of a contract and say: because you have given me a contract to manufacture a certain article, therefore, I am going to have my pound of flesh, and I am going to demand that you carry out that contract to the letter. I would want some further evidence than that which has been produced to make me believe that. There is another thing which I cannot accept; nor do I believe that the Prime Minister himself can accept it or believe it possible, and that is that the Ross rifle factory would demand a full year's time in which to make a change in the class of a rifle.

As far as Sir Charles Ross is personally concerned, I have never seen him more than once or twice in my life, and I do not know anything about him at all, but I cannot conceive of any loyal, British subject standing on a condition of that kind, when the nation is at war, and saying: although I own the only rifle factory which we have in Canada, and notwithstanding the fact that you want these rifles changed in order that they may be of some benefit to this country in the prosecution of the war, I stand on my legal rights and I will not make that change within twelve months. If I were the Prime Minister and a contractor should take that ground, it would not take me very long to put another man into that factory who would carry out any changes that the nation wanted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What does my hon. friend mean by that? How could we put another man in charge?

Mr. CARVELL: Do you mean to say that if there is a rifle factory in charge of a man who says that he will not make such a change within a year simply because the contract says he does not have to, that you could not take that factory over and put somebody else in charge?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Do you mean to expropriate it?

Mr. CARVELL: Take it; I do not care what you call it. I would take it and so quickly that he would never know what had happened to him. I do not think that I have to argue that before the Prime Minister. I do not believe that condition of affairs exists at all, and I think the Prime Minister would be much happier arguing that possibly it could not be done than that as he says because of the contract he could not do as he wished to do. However we have the explanation from the Prime Minister. I am very glad that the country has it and I think it would have been more fitting if we had had the facts laid before the public long ago. I realize that much of what has come out to-day has transpired since Parliament adjourned in May last, but there was a good deal which could have been given to the country a year ago. However, the country now has the information. I, for one, still hope that the Government will reconsider the matter and attempt to bring about the manufacture of rifles in Canada. As I said this afternoon, I agreed with that principle in 1904 and I agree with that principle to-day. I do not see any reason why rifles cannot be manufactured in Canada as well as in any other place in the world. I know they can be manufactured because they are being manufactured. A rifle which for sniping purposes, as the Prime Minister admits, is the best rifle in the world, is being made to-day. As he says, this is the best equipped factory on the continent and therefore there is no reason why this factory could not be kept in existence and why they cannot accept the offer of the British Government and convert it into a Lee-Enfield factory. Notwithstanding the opinion of the Prime Minister, I do not think there is any reason why this factory could not, within a reasonably short time, be turning out Lee-Enfield rifles, which we know would be of some benefit in winning this war, instead of spending a year's time and $2,500,000 in turning out a rifle which, I am afraid, will not be of very much value to the Empire and which the British Government do not want at all. I place this view before the Prime Minister, but I do not do so in a controversial spirit. I have tried to discuss the facts, and I do think that even at this late date there is time for the Government to do better than they have done and get much better results for the country than this proposal which they put forward would give.

Just another word and that is to the contractual part of the matter. The Prime Minister tries to make it appear that because this contract was in a sense perpetual they were compelled to go on and manufacture Ross rifles or rifles of some kind. The argument I used a few moments ago applies to this as well. If this country is at war and wants rifles or munitions or materials of any kind, all it has to do is to say so. It may be a question of adjustment later on, there may be some damages to pay, but that is a pretty lame excuse for manufacturing something that this country does not require, that is of no benefit to the country and which does not make for munitions necessary to the winning of the war. There is not much use in notifying the Ross Rifle Company that all rifles to be furnished by them after the first of February, 1918, must be of a certain pattern. Unless the Government makes with the company a contract sufficiently large to make it of some value, there is no object in going on and manufacturing. If you take, say, 12,000 rifles for this year, which, as I understand, is the minimum amount which the Government must take, at $30 apiece, and I believe that is the price for the rifle and the bayonet, that is only $360,000. That is the total cost of the 12,000 rifles. According to the information received this afternoon, it will cost $500,000 to equip the factory so that unless the Government go into this——

Sir SAM HUGHES: How much did the hon. gentleman say it would cost to equip the factory?

Mr. CARVELL: About half a million.

Sir SAM HUGHES: For what?

Mr. CARVELL: For re-equipping the factory.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is only for the change in the gauges.

Mr. CARVELL: That is all. The major portion of the factory would be equally suited to the manufacturing of the Lee-Enfields as the Ross. But there was the statement made this afternoon by the Prime Minister that the factory could be converted into a Lee-Enfield factory for about half a million dollars. If you stand by the letter of the old contract, which means that the company must manufacture, say, 12,000 rifles, which the Government take at $30 apiece, that amounts only to $360,000 while it would cost half a million dollars to change the factory over. That means that the contractor will not carry out the work and you will be doing nothing. If you follow out that contract to its logical conclusion, it means that the factory is closed down. I do not believe that it is in the best interests of Canada, of the militia of Canada, or of the British Empire, that the Ross rifle factory, or any other factory, that can manufacture rifles or anything else that is required for the conduct of the war should be closed down. I can only conclude by expressing the hope that the Government will reconsider this matter and put all the energy which they can into it, accept the offer of the British Government for these jigs and tools, equip the Ross rifle factory and manufacture something which will be of assistance to Canada and the Empire in the winning of the war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is exactly what we have asked them to do in this order in council which I have read. The hon. gentleman seems to regard the Ross rifle as a particularly fragile article. I do not so regard it at all. The Ross rifle has a more delicate mechanism, it is admittedly a better target rifle, but when it was subjected to the test under conditions of war which prevailed during the past year or two——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did my right hon. friend say it had a more delicate mechanism?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought so.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I bow to the superior knowledge of my hon. friend but I have so understood it from certain authorities which may not be so convincing on the subject as my hon. friend's opinion. But, I think I could give him some testimony to that effect. The despatch from the British Government to which I have alluded states that for certain purposes, although not for service in the field, the Ross rifle is valuable, such as the training of the army, and so on. After grave consideration of the matter we gave this order in February last just as the British Government had given their order in the autumn of 1914. They are continuing their order. They are bound by the contract to have it fulfilled and pay for the rifles on delivery. We gave an order in February 1916, and we are bound by the terms of the contract. We must fulfil the contract and we must pay for the rifles. Sir Charles Ross has accomplished very great things in equipping his rifle factory for war purposes. I would not be disposed to treat him in any harsh or unfair way, and I think when my hon. friend suggests that we should take him by the coat collar and put him out of the factory if he did not do this, that, or the other thing which he was not obliged to do under the contract, he is asking us to adopt a course which would hardly be consistent with fair play. I think it would be unfair not to have regard to the very large expenditure which Sir Charles Ross has made for the purpose of turning out rifles which were of a type approved by the late Administration, and approved also by the present Administration. My hon. friend might realize also that the 1914 Enfield rifle, according to the view of the British Government expressed in the telegrams which I have read, is a better rifle than that which is at present being manufactured in Great Britain. Nevertheless they have not attempted to manufacture that model in Great Britain up to the present time, and that obviously for the reason I have already suggested.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Have they accepted any from the United States?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know.

Sir SAM HUGHES: None whatever.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know that they have accepted any; I do not know that they have not. I would suppose that the reason they have carried on the manufacture in the United States, and not in Great Britain, is that in the United States it was necessary to build up a new organization, and therefore that new organization could be built up for the purpose of producing a new rifle, whereas in Great Britain they had their plants and factories all ready for the manufacture of the previous type of Lee-Enfield, and they carried on with that, because to have attempted to make a change in Great Britain would have involved an unfortunate and unjustifiable delay.

My hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) says that rifles produced after the 1st of February, 1918, may be of no use in this war. That is perfectly true. The war may have ended by that time, and in the way we all hope it will end. But it might also have been in my hon. friend's mind, or in the mind of any reasonable person, in July or August of 1916, that rifles produced after the 1st of September, 1917, would not be of any use in this war; and the outcome of the war may still be such as would justify that anticipation. So it is perfectly idle to suggest that the Government could have taken any other course than that which they did take under the circumstances. My hon. friend has referred to the condition of the Ross rifle in Great Britain, and suggested that the rifles might be brought back, and the present contract cancelled. As I have already explained, there are some negotiations on foot in regard to the Ross rifle in Great Britain, and possibly some announcement may be made to the House later in the session as to the outcome of these negotiations.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the right hon. gentleman let me know whether he found out during the dinner hour who it was that ordered or was responsible for the reduction of the chamber of the Ross rifle from .462 to .457 in 1910?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I stated at the time that my information did not come from the Department of Militia and Defence, but that it was reliable. I have asked the deputy minister to procure absolutely accurate information on that point, which I shall give to the committee.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that it was on the recommendation of Colonel Harkom, the expert adviser to the Militia Department under Sir Frederick Borden. The Standing Committee on Small Arms was never consulted. A mistake arose in this way. The Lee-Enfield rifle for the proof charge had exactly the same chamber as the Ross rifle for the finished charge. I forget the figures, but they are all on Hansard. The proof charge of the Lee-Enfield was, I think, about twenty some odd tons. Then the rifle was fired in proof, the expansion being greater than the tensile strength of the steel, the chamber of the Lee-Enfield rifle was expanded about two-thousandths of an inch. The tensile strength was from forty-eight to fifty-two thousand—fifty-two thousand being the proof charge. The steel after expanding did not contract back to the primary size of the chamber. With the Ross rifle, the proof charge was the same: fifty-two thousand or thereabouts, but the tensile strength of the Ross was from eighty to one hundred thousand pounds to the square inch, and accordingly there was no expansion in the chamber of the Ross; it remained exactly as it was. The chamber of the Ross rifle was therefore the size of the proof charge, two thousandths of an inch less than the chamber of the Lee-Enfield. That was remedied in England and France. I do not want to take any part in this discussion, as I understand it is all about the contract.

The chamber of the Ross rifle was, of course, changed a couple of years ago, but let us take the Ross rifle with the small chamber. I did not hear the reports that were read this afternoon, nor have I seen them, but I challenge the world to produce a report showing a test between the Ross rifle with the small chamber, and the Lee-Enfield, with good ammunition for both rifles, where the Ross has not beaten the Lee Enfield. I go further and take dirt mud, and sand tests, of which we have had scores officially and otherwise, and I challenge any man to produce a report of what we call these official tests, even with the small chamber in the Ross, where the Ross rifle has not beaten the Lee-Enfield. I go further and say that even with defective ammunition, which has been the cause of all this trouble—it was not the rifles at all but the defective ammunition with the soft cartridge case—I will not say that the Lee-Enfield has not stood the fire as well as the small chambered Ross, but I say they are about even. But since we enlarged the chamber of the Ross rifle, I challenge any one to show a report of any tests here or in the British Army, where the Ross rifle, even firing bad ammunition, has not done infinitely better than the Lee-Enfield.

Mr. CARVELL: Was the hon. gentleman present after eight o'clock when the Premier read a report of the committee appointed by Sir John French in the month of June, 1915?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Ross chamber was not enlarged then. I care not what the report is. There is no such test report in existence that has been made as between the two rifles where the Ross did not beat the Lee-Enfield. I know what has been done.

Mr. CARVELL: The Premier read it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He did not read a comparative test between the two rifles.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, he did.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I should like to see it. I say that such a test was never made by Sir John French. A hearsay report was made by one of his officers, but no comparative test.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the report is produced, what will the hon. gentleman say?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It cannot be produced for no comparative tests were made there by any authority whatsoever. I saw one report in a Canadian paper of a test between the two rifles that never occurred. One day they were illustrating to General Carson and Sir Max Aitken the defective cartridges. They took a boy, who was an engine driver and who had never fired more than twenty shots out of a Ross rifle in his life, to handle the Ross rifle, putting him in competition with an expert artillery man who was using the other rifle. As soon as a competent man was put on to handle the Ross rifle, with the defective cartridges it was found that the Lee-Enfield jammed more quickly than the Ross.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not the comparative test referred to by the Prime Minister this evening.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know to what the right hon. gentleman referred.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was some test referred to in Sir John French's report made on the 5th of June, 1915.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There was no such test for mud and dirt and all that sort of thing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say it was for mud or dirt; it was for defect in jamming.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the point I am making. The jamming was due to defective ammunition. I had the reports and I presume they should be in the department. I do not know whether they have been read here tonight or not. There was a report of the 28th Regiment of Regina having a mine exploded in front of them and in their attempt to take the trench, twelve of the rifles jammed. The cry immediately went up "Ross rifles jamming." Col. Embury knew from experience that it was the ammunition that was bad because they had been trained in England not to use certain brands of ammunition; but in spite of all the orders that this ammunition was not to be served out to the Canadian troops, it was found bad mixed with good in every regiment that had the Ross rifle and it was not found in a solitary regiment that had the Lee-Enfield rifle. Five thousand rounds of defective ammunition were found in the pouches of one particular regiment after the fighting was over.

Mr. CARVELL: Was it a German conspiracy ?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know; I was not there. The men were disgusted with the rifle, the consequence being that Colonel Embury took the twelve men with the Lee-Enfield rifle and twelve men with the Ross rifle and made them test their rifles with the defective ammunition, and every man was convinced that defective ammunition jammed in the Lee-Enfield rifle after fifteen or twenty rounds had been fired, and in the Ross rifle only after fifty or sixty rounds had been fired. The Lee-Enfield rifle was put out of action after seventy-five or ninety rounds had been fired, and the Ross rifle only after a hundred to a hundred and twenty-five rounds had been fired. In every instance the Ross rifle proved better than the Lee-Enfield with defective ammunition, but with good ammunition neither rifle jammed, and they could not possibly jam. I could produce officers who are in the city to-night who fought with the Princess Patricias, with the Munster Fusiliers, with the Guards, with practically every British regiment—there are none in the city who fought with the Gordons—and they know that it was the defective ammunition that caused the jamming. There were three brands of it. Soft shells or soft cartridge cases would glue to the sides of the chamber and could not readily be extracted; but the tests are in the department and can be produced, if that has not already been done, showing where in England, France and Belgium these tests were made, and in every solitary instance with good ammunition there was no trouble with either rifle. With the defective ammunition, the Ross rifle would sometimes jam, but always later than the Lee-Enfield, the fault being entirely due to the ammunition. Although the British forces did not seem to be aware of it early in the war, they are aware of it now. The Canadian forces were not aware of it. At the battle of St. Julien and the second battle of Ypres, a great deal of the ammunition the boys carried was Canadian ammunition that was absolutely perfect, and there was not one case of jamming except where defective ammunition was served out to one of the brigades.

Mr. CARVELL: The Third Brigade?

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, I think it was the brigade under General Currie. The only thing the Canadians had to defend themselves with, with the exception of a few machine guns, was the Ross rifle, whereas the Germans had rifles, machine guns by the hundred and also their artillery and aeroplanes flying over our troops, and yet the Ross rifle firing the good Canadian ammunition carried our soldiers right through. The next day or two after the first three days of the fighting the Durhams and the Yorks were brought up to fill up the gaps on the right of the Third Brigade. When they began to fire with the defective ammunition, they found they could not fire their rifles and many of them were shot down. They threw away their rifles and did the only thing they could do—fell back; they had no other recourse than to retire. Some of our rifles firing the bad English ammunition also jammed and there was considerable trouble, all due to the ammunition. Neither the Lee-Enfield nor the Ross rifle has jammed with good ammunition. Those who are familiar with rifles know the sand and mud test, of getting the rifles and ammunition all dirty and testing them out. Where such tests have been made, with good ammunition or bad ammunition, the Ross rifle with the large chamber has beaten the Lee-Enfield.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Then why was the Ross rifle condemned?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not condemn it. You had better ask those who did. It has been pointed out that the Ross rifle is longer than the Lee-Enfield. The Ross rifle is practically the same length as the Mauser rifle and it is the standard length. For trench warfare, of course, it is handier to have a short rifle. The only objection General Turner told me he could find to the Ross rifle was its length. When I pointed out that it was the same length as the Mauser rifle, he said that the soldiers had got the idea that the Lee-Enfield rifle was handier for running through a trench at night. That may have been true, but all that is done away with. Those who make raids on the trenches use bombs and revolvers; only the men who stand out on top of the trenches use rifles. General Turner told me last summer and also previously that the Ross rifle was a little long for work in the trenches. When the decision came this year to change the rifle, I spoke to General Byng about it. The Prime Minister offered to have a competitive test, if I remember aright. I presume it has been produced to-day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why was that test not held, may I ask? It was because everyone on either side knew that there would be only one result. We had scores of tests in England and in France, and they knew that if a comparative test was made with good ammunition, the Ross rifle would come out on top for mud tests, and they knew that if there was a comparative test for bad ammunition—and we have had them again and again for each rifle in such a way that no favouritism was shown—the Ross rifle would always stand up a little better than the Lee-Enfield. I have made no fuss about it, because the rifle was gone, and I felt that many of the boys were honestly uncertain about the rifle from the attacks made upon it, and many others were made uncertain. I would say: Don't carry a rifle that you have not confidence in, but if you feel that way about it, change it. It was on that ground that General Byng advocated the change. He said he did not know the merits or demerits of the rifle, but the story was abroad that the Ross rifle jammed. A number of the English soldiers got the idea that our rifles were not what they ought to be, and a lot of Canadians got the idea that maybe our rifle was not as good as the English rifle. Another point. I have reports here, but I do not wish to bother the House with them—for the thing is past—showing the action of some of the regiments when they were ordered to give up the Ross rifle and take the Lee-Enfield. I might mention one case. Colonel Rose, of the Welland regiment, as well as others, entered a most determined protest. He said that he had tried again and again to make scores with the Lee-Enfield without success, but with the Ross rifle the score was 75 per cent for the entire regiment at 600 yards down to 100 yards rapid fire. And that is the sort of shooting that made the Germans hesitate at St. Julien, and caused them to believe that the Canadians were armed with machine guns. With the Lee-Enfield tried over and over again, Col. Rose's regiment had only been able to make a score of 29 per cent for the whole regiment. He declared that it meant murder to change the rifles; one man with a Ross rifle was equal to two men with the Lee-Enfield, the shooting was so rapid and so accurate, and the sighting so easy. I say I have reports to this effect, but I have not bothered to give them, for the thing has gone by, so let it go.

Mr. CARVELL: While we are cleaning up things and getting information, would the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) tell us what took place about the bolt of the Ross rifle? I have seen reference to the fact that enormous sums of money were spent——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not much money. Well, there was a good deal of it, too. The cam action of the bolt depends upon the lugs, as they are called. These lugs were made soft so that they would stand the recoil without breaking. They were tempered to just the proper consistency. Somebody conceived the idea that these should be hardened, and this was done in the case of a number of the rifles. By whose authority this was done, I do not know, but I believe it was that of some officers at the camp in Kent. We sent over three thousand bolts properly tempered. But these people hardened them again, as we found out afterwards.

Mr. CARVELL: What was the result?

Sir SAM HUGHES: They were made as brittle as a piece of glass, almost; the bolts were practically ruined. It was a piece of meddling on the part of somebody—on whose part I never found out.

Mr. CARVELL: Was this hardening process carried out under instructions of the Canadian Government?

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, we gave no instructions on the subject. I asked half a dozen times, but did not find out definitely on whose authority the thing was done. I heard a variety of stories about it, but I do not wish to mention any names when I am not sure of the facts. It was not done by authority of General Carson. He heard of it and was informed that it was necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it true that over 100,000 rifles were so treated?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never heard it said that there were that many.

Mr. CARVELL: I have heard all sorts of stories about it—that there were from 75,000 to 150,000 rifles so treated.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never heard that there were as many as that. The number, as I was informed, was several thousands.

Mr. MURPHY: If the committee and the people of this country could reconcile, in the first place, the opposing positions taken with reference to making a change in the Ross rifle by two members of the Government, and, in the second place, the opposing positions taken by Sir Charles Ross, the contractor, as against both of these gentlemen, the explanation which was given here as to the change would be the more readily accepted. As I understand the right hon. Prime Minister—and his explanation seemed reasonable—the chief objection to making the change was the time that would be consumed in carrying it out. But, speaking in Montreal in December last, the hon. the Solicitor General explained that the difficulty which confronted the Government in this regard was that the Government was bound by the contract made with the former Administration, and being so bound could not make a change. Here are two different positions taken by these two distinguished gentlemen. As against both of them, Sir Charles Ross, in his letter to the Ottawa Citizen of 12th January, 1917, takes an entirely different position. In the first place, he does not seem to regard time as an element containing any difficulty whatever in making the change, and in the second place he makes it quite plain that if at any time the Government desired to make a change his company would not seek to hold them to the terms of the original contract. So that there may be no doubt on this point, let me refer the committee to that letter:—

> You ask whether I made it clear to the Government at any time after the outbreak of war that the Ross Rifle Company would be willing not to stand on the letter of the contract or if Mr. Meighen was right in affirming at Montreal that the Government was "bound" by the contract made by the late Administration.
> I am quite willing to reply to your question but to enable me to select the most appropriate extracts from official documents to back up my statement, I should like to know authoritatively, first, just what Mr. Meighen means by the word "bound."
> Does he mean to repeat the historical platitude that Governments of Canada keep faith and are as a result bound by agreements made by themselves or their predecessors? Or does he allege that the Government because it was "bound" was, as a result, hampered and prevented from taking the best course in the general interest of Canada which was and is fighting for its very existence?

If he does allege that the Government was in some way hampered, will he take us into his confidence and tell us exactly what it was the contract of 1902 prevented the Government from doing?

Meanwhile, I can only repeat that I have always endeavoured to assist the Government to turn out a rifle satisfactory in every respect, not standing upon the letter of the contract, but acting upon the spirit of it.

While I am entirely in accord with what my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) says, that the committee and the country are indebted to the right hon. the Prime Minister for the explanation he has given—it will be obvious to the right hon. gentleman and to the committee that, in view of the specific statements made, the matter is far from being cleared up by the explanations that have been given. I do not know whether anything further can be said in explanation, but I considered it my duty to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister and the committee this position taken by Sir Charles Ross.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have placed the contract in the pages of Hansard to speak for itself. It is obvious that the terms of the contract cannot be modified by a letter written to a newspaper. Sir Charles Ross since the outbreak of the war has used every effort to turn out in the greatest possible numbers and with the least possible delay the rifles which have been ordered by the Government. I have already given him credit for the enterprise, promptness and vigour with which he undertook to discharge that very important task. I am not aware that the terms of the contract have otherwise been modified in any way. However, I will make inquiry and see whether there is any document on record indicating that it was the intention to depart from the terms of the contract as I have placed it before the committee and as it is now in Hansard.

Mr. CARVELL: A few minutes ago the ex-Minister of Militia made a somewhat remarkable statement. He said that the bolts of thousands of rifles had been hardened, so that the lug holding the bolt in position became as brittle as a piece of glass, broke off and in many cases flew out in the men's faces. Certainly there is something about the treatment of these bolts which the country does not know. I know the ex-Minister fairly well; when he skates over a thing like he did over this matter to-night, I always get suspicious. I wish that the Prime Minister, who does not skate, would investigate this matter and give the committee some information when the subject comes up again for discussion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Probably some information can be obtained on the subject. As I have already said, we have nothing to conceal about this matter; if a mistake has been made in dealing with the bolts it is proper that the committee should be informed of it. I shall be very glad when this matter is taken up in committee again, to give any information that may be available on the subject.

Mr. MARCIL: On the 9th of December the new Minister of Inland Revenue, on his arrival at Quebec the day after he had been sworn in, declared in the presence of a large number of the workmen employed by the Ross rifle factory that he was authorized by his colleagues to state that the removal of the factory from Quebec had never been contemplated and that the factory would remain where it was. Probably the rumour to that effect had been started by the announcement that the construction of a new Dominion arsenal in Lindsay, Ontario, had been commenced. What is the policy of the Government regarding the manufacture of munitions and the manufacture of rifles in Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Inland Revenue asked me before he went to Quebec whether it was the intention of the Government to remove the Dominion Arsenal from Quebec. I told him that that had not been contemplated, and that it was not the intention of the Government to remove the Dominion Arsenal from Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the Ross rifle factory?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He asked me whether there was any intention of doing away with the Ross rifle factory or of removing it from Quebec. I told him that that had not been in contemplation, and that it was not the intention of the Government to remove it. I understand that the declaration which the Minister of Inland Revenue made is in accordance with that.

Mr. MARCIL: What is in contemplation with respect to the arsenal at Lindsay? If my memory serves me correctly, the late Minister of Militia said that Quebec was not a very safe place in which to manufacture munitions—that it was deemed advisable to manufacture munitions on a larger scale at a point more inland.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN. I do not understand how my hon. friend can find anything inconsistent in the two statements. An arsenal has been established at Lindsay, from which ammunition is now being turned out. It is quite consistent with that that the Dominion Arsenal at Quebec, which has produced ammunition in small quantities in the past, should be continued.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there any provision in this contract with the Ross Rifle Company which gives the company the exclusive right to manufacture rifles for or supply rifles to the Government of Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, the Government are bound to purchase from that company all the rifles that they require, and they are bound also to purchase from them not less than 10,000 rifles every year. I have not the contract before me—it has been sent to Hansard—but, as I recall it, the only qualification is that if the Government, in case of war or emergency, calls upon the company to produce rifles in very large numbers and the company in reply notify the Government that they can produce only a certain smaller number, then the Government would be at liberty to obtain the additional number wherever they might be available.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Prime Minister any information as to what the cost of the Ross rifle establishment was at the outbreak of war?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I could not tell my hon. friend just what it was at that time, or, indeed, what it is at present. I know that the factory has been very considerably enlarged by the addition of units, as they call them, since the outbreak of war. It is only in that way that the company has been enabled to produce a greatly increased quantity of rifles during the past two and a half years.

Mr. OLIVER: There is, then, a provision that in case of war, such as did take place, if the company was not able to meet any demand made by the Government, the Government could take other means to meet that demand?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, if it could get the rifles anywhere else. The situation that presented itself to the Government was that we could not get them anywhere else; therefore, we simply had to ask the Ross Rifle Company to do the best that they could. Their best was really beyond the anticipation of any person who knew what their resources were when war broke out.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the capacity of their factory in 1914?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Deputy Minister of Militia informs me that at the outbreak of war their maximum output was 20,000 a year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand the Prime Minister to say that under the contract the Ross Company would be obliged to manufacture any pattern of rifle which the Government would require, the Government being bound to purchase at least 10,000 per year. If the Ross Company were required by the Government to make the necessary changes in plant in order to manufacture the Lee-Enfield instead of the Ross, which would entail a large initial capital expenditure, is the Government supposed to repay to the company part of that capital investment? Would it be fair to expect the Ross Rifle Company to make the necessary changes upon a small order of say 10,000 per year? It seems to me that that would hardly be a fair way of dealing with the company.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I appreciate what my hon. friend says. Of course, we do not intend to take any course which might be regarded as unfair to the company, especially having regard to the great vigour and resourcefulness which the company displayed in increasing its output. I agree entirely with my hon. friend that, possibly, if the contract was strictly enforced in that respect, a result that would not be regarded as quite fair to the company might follow. That is one of the difficulties of the situation which confronts the Government at the present time. We must take into account, on the one hand, the fact that we may have a very large number of Ross rifles, already manufactured, which would be sufficient and well adapted for the training of our troops in time of peace, a larger number probably than would be required in time of peace for that purpose. On the other hand, we have to take into account the fact that it is not advisable, as has been urged by the hon. member for Carleton, to continue the production of the Ross rifle Mark III. Therefore, we have directed the company, by notice under the terms of the contract, to manufacture the Enfield rifle of 1914, adapted for .303 ammunition. So that on the one hand, there is the fact, which faces the Government of the United Kingdom as well, that there will be this large surplus of rifles. On the other hand, there is the consideration pointed out by my colleague from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that if we followed out the strict terms of the contract, and simply ordered 10,000 rifles of the new type, the company might be put to an expense for the change of gauges, and for different plant and machinery, which would be greatly in excess of the order for the first year, and might probably equal the price to be paid for two years' orders if they should be restricted to the minimum fixed in the contract. I can only say that we must take all these considerations into account, and that we have no disposition to act in a manner that might be regarded as unfair or harsh towards the Ross Rifle Company. I say that for the reason that I think they have done remarkably well in increasing the output as they have done since the war began.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the contractors are obliged to make the change in August, 1918, any arrangements to be made between the Government and the contractors should not be left until too late a period. Of course that is quite obvious.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I appreciate that.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot understand the pessimism of my right hon. friend over the possibilities of making rifles in Canada. It seems to me that we have had an object lesson in Canada during the last two and a half years that ought to lessen all the pessimism—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the pessimism alluded to?

Mr. CARVELL: About the possibility of converting the Ross factory inside of two years in order to make rifles of a new type. He has given us a statement by some official in England who has some doubts about our ability to convert this factory in two years. I would like to carry him back to the time, a little over two years ago, when the same authorities in England cabled over here to know if it would be possible to get 200,000 rounds of shrapnel in America, not in Canada, but in America, and when the ex-Minister of Militia cabled back that he thought they could fill the order in Canada, and they went to work upon it. The ex-Minister of Militia himself stated the other day that $700,000,000 had been expended in Canada by the British Government in the manufacture of munitions during the past two years. The same people who did not believe that shrapnel shells could be made in America two years ago, who wondered if 200,000 rounds could be made in America, possibly honestly believe that you cannot change this rifle factory to enable it to manufacture Lee-Enfields within two years; but if our experience of munition work in the past two years is any criterion as to our abilities, I think that that man, whoever he may be, is incompetent, and that my right hon. friend is deserving of the severest castigation for listening to his opinion. I think he ought to have more faith and more optimism in this country than he has. If he had one-quarter or one-half of the optimism he ought to have, he would not see any lions in his path; he would go on and ask the manufacturers to make these rifles in the way they ought to be made to enable us to do our duty.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am glad to find that my hon. friend is converted to an entirely new view as to the possibilities of manufacturing in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no, I have not changed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He is now paying a remarkable tribute to the work of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, and to the work of the committee which he organized. It shows a comprehension long delayed on the part of my hon. friend which, I am sure, is an earnest of still better things to come. I should like to point out, however, that the manufacturers of Canada themselves were not very sure about their ability to do anything like what they have done when the proposal was first put before them. We have the testimony of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence that he found a great deal of difficulty in inducing manufacturers in Canada to undertake the work at first, and that it was only some of them who were willing to undertake it. I am not at all disposed to minimize the resourcefulness and ability of the Canadian people. I do know, however, that there has been, and still is, under present conditions, a good deal of difficulty about getting the plant and machinery of the type alluded to. At least, I have been told that by those who ought to know. But when my hon. friend suggests that he is a better authority as to the time requisite for this purpose than the men who have been devoting their lives to work of this kind—

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say that I knew; I said I would take the opinion of the man who was doing the manufacturing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is where I would differ from my hon. friend. I would not necessarily take the opinion of either of two persons where opinions were conflicting, and who possessed anything like the same skill and experience. If there was an opinion, on the one hand, that two years were requisite, and an opinion on the other hand that one year would be sufficient, I would be rather inclined to think that perhaps the truth might be found to lie between; but I would not think there was any reason why I should absolutely accept the one as against the other when presumably each party had sufficient knowledge and experience to form a judgment.

Mr. CARVELL: Just one word as to my right hon. friend's reference to my conversion in regard to the possibilities of Canadian manufacture. There has been no conversion on my part. I stated in this House on a great many occasions during last session that I had absolute faith in the manufacturers of Canada to turn out munitions, and I am sure that my right hon. friend, if he will con over the pages of Hansard, will have great difficulty in finding any other opinion expressed by me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that I should take the trouble.

Mr. CARVELL: No, I think you had better not try. As to the tribute which he says I paid to the ex-Minister of Militia and to the work of the committee which he formed, I have heard the ex-Minister of Militia make the same statement in this House as to the wonderful difficulties he experienced in getting manufacturers to go into the manufacture of munitions. I had an opportunity of hearing all those gentlemen in the box under oath within the last eight or nine months.

You can read every statement made by them and you will find no word to show that any man of them had any doubts whatever but, to use an expression which has been used in this House before—and I do not wish to descend to slang—all I could find was that they fought like blazes among themselves to see who would get the most contracts. There was no difference between them as to their ability to manufacture and to such an extent did they carry out that idea that— and I am not now going into that controversy—it will come up later—when the Shell Committee was put out of office and a new, I believe, better order of things was put in its stead, one of these manufacturers whom the ex-minister calls pessimists not only had manufactured some millions of dollars worth of shells for the Shell Committee but he had contracts in his pockets for 100,000 shells which he knew he could not manufacture for a year to come. The first act of the new powers which were placed in control was to cancel that contract.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Who had the contract?

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say. I said one firm. You will find it in the evidence taken by the Royal Commission. I will not go into a discussion of that now, but I want to point out that there has been no change of heart on my part. The fact is that instead of each manufacturer being obliged to go into it, every one of them was simply rushing to get in from the beginning and if there was any difference amongst them it was only to see who would get the biggest contract.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have listened with a great deal of interest and I have admired the good nature of the Prime Minister and the way he has endeavoured to answer the questions which have come from this side. But, there is one phase of the matter that I have not been able to understand thoroughly. We all understand that the Ross rifle has been condemned and that the Lee-Enfield has been adopted. The vital question is to get the Lee-Enfield and I have not been able to understand why the matter has not been brought to a head by the Government offering Sir Charles Ross an order to make the Lee-Enfield for quick delivery. There should be no mystery about it. He has indicated in his letter that he is able to do it. We want the rifle and instead of speculating and asking people across the water whether it can be done, why not bring it to a head at once by giving an order if he will accept it. Then, we will find out how long it will take him to equip his factory and furnish the Lee-Enfield rifle.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are obliged under the terms of the contract, to give a year's notice. Of course, if Sir Charles Ross should be prepared to execute an order within a year it might be done. But my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) will remember that we have to get the actual rifle itself. We were instructed by the British Government that it would not do to go to the United States and take five or six of the rifles in process of being manufactured there. They advised, and, indeed, instructed us, that if we proposed to adopt the new British rifle as a standard, the rifles must first be inspected and passed by the chief inspector of small arms in Great Britain. When we attempted, in September last, to expedite the matter by procuring half a dozen of these rifles in the United States at one of the factories where they are being produced, we received the telegram which I read this afternoon directing us that these rifles must be first inspected and passed by their chief inspector of small arms, or they could not be recognized as being of the necessary type. The rifles so inspected arrived towards the end of January. That was sufficient for the purpose of directing the Ross Rifle Company to produce a rifle of that type, but it was not sufficient for the purpose of giving an order to the Ross Rifle Company. For that purpose we required the drawings and specifications as well. We asked for these drawings and specifications in September last. We asked for them repeatedly, I think last on the 12th December, but up to the present we have not received them. We cannot give any order in the terms of the contract to the Ross Rifle Company until we do obtain those drawings and specifications; at least I am so advised by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), who has examined the contract with care.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: After hearing the opinion of the late Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) this evening as to the great merits of the Ross rifle over the Lee-Enfield, or any other rifle that the world ever heard of, I would think that it would be only frankness on the part of the Prime Minister to say that the ex-Minister of Militia did not encourage haste on the part of the Government in making a change from the Ross rifle to the Lee-Enfield. Apparently it was very difficult for the Government to give a contract for the Lee-Enfield in Canada while the ex-minister was a member of my right hon. friend's Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken about that and this ought to be said in justice to the late Minister of Militia. There is absolutely no doubt about it.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. MACLEAN: I am not saying that it was wrong.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like to make this clear: There is absolutely no doubt about it that he was very confident about the superiority of the Ross rifle over the Lee-Enfield, and I believe he is to-day.

Mr. CARVELL: Nobody doubts that; that is the trouble.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: While that may be, I desire to say that when he and I discussed the matter in the spring and early summer of 1915 and when we discussed the matter again—because naturally it was a subject in which I took the greatest possible interest—in the spring and early summer of 1916, the ex-Minister of Militia interposed no objection to the course we took. That course was to refer the question to the military authorities at the front. He assumed an entirely reasonable attitude on the matter from first to last, although he was profoundly convinced all the time that the Ross rifle was all right if properly handled and properly used. He based his course, as I understand it, upon the consideration that if the troops, or any large number of them, had lost confidence in the rifle, from the various attacks which had been made upon it, or for any other reason, it would not be proper for him to interpose any opposition to the objection which was raised by the authorities on the other side.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood the right hon. gentleman, earlier in the discussion, before dinner, to have mentioned that the notice terminating the contract had been given and the time limited by the notice would expire a year hence?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On the first of February, 1918.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I inquire whether between now and that time the Ross Company will manufacture solely for the Canadian Government or partly for the Canadian Government and partly for the British Government and if the rifle manufactured will be the Ross rifle?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, they are manufacturing for both Governments; something over 90,000 for the Canadian Government and nearly 60,000 for the British Government are still undelivered. As I pointed out before recess, we suggested to the British Government—I think in July, 1916, I cannot be sure but the documents will show—that it might be a wise thing for the two Governments to get into negotiation with the Ross Rifle Company, stop the manufacture of Ross rifles altogether, let the factory be equipped as speedily as possible with the plant necessary to turn out the new type of Lee-Enfield and convert the orders still unfilled of both Governments into orders for the new type of Lee-Enfields.

The British Government made reply, in two different telegrams which I have read to the committee, pointing out that from their standpoint they did not think this advisable; that the Ross rifle was of considerable use to them for certain purposes, and that there would be no difficulty if we saw fit to try to make the change, for the Ross Rifle Company to continue during the process of reorganization to supply the Ross rifle Mark III to the British Government under the contract which had been made in December, 1914.

Mr. OLIVER: If I gathered what the Prime Minister said in answer to a question a few minutes ago, the terms of the contract between the Government and the Ross Rifle Company, drawn with a view to the contingency of war arising, did as a matter of fact place the control of the contract in the hands of the Government, and not in the hands of the contractor.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not sure that I caught my hon. friend's point.

Mr. OLIVER: The Ross rifle contract, drawn up with a view to the contingency of war arising, which actually did arise, contained such terms as placed control of the situation in regard to the manufacture of Ross rifles in the hands of the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would not quite agree in that view. I have not the contract before me, and I am speaking subject to correction upon an examination of its terms, but my recollection is that the contract contains the provision that if the Government by reason of war or emergency require a very largely increased output of rifles in any year, then it shall be the duty of the Government to give notice to the Ross Rifle Company of the number of rifles required, and it shall be the right of the Ross Rifle Company to give notice to the Government that it can not produce more than a certain number of rifles within that period, and then, as to the excess of rifles required, the Government would be at liberty to obtain them elsewhere. Whether that gives control of the situation or not, that is the fact.

Mr. OLIVER: I would certainly say that in effect, if not in letter, it did give the Government control of the situation. In fact, I would say absolute control. In any case it gave the Government absolute control as regards the number of rifles over and above the amount that the Ross Rifle Company could turn out within that period.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If they gave us notice.

Mr. OLIVER: They would have to give notice, if the Government gave them notice.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They would have to give us notice if they were unable to do what we required.

Mr. OLIVER: Therefore the Government was absolutely free of this contract so far as the number of rifles required by the Government was concerned over and above what the Ross Rifle Company could turn out. Now I do not assume for a moment that it was likely that there need be any friction in the matter at all. I assume that the Ross Rifle Company, being a business organization, would be willing to meet the Government, just as the Government would be willing to meet them, with a view to making arrangements for meeting the requirements of the country, if the pressure had been exerted in that way. But the evidence we have from the attitude of the ex-Minister of Militia is that so far from pressure being exerted by the Government upon the Ross Rifle Company, the pressure was from the Ross Rifle Company upon the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In what way?

Mr. OLIVER: In the way that it was the company that dictated the situation, and not the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: How?

Mr. OLIVER: The Government accepted the limitations of the Ross Rifle Company, instead of dictating the limitations. Therefore, my contention is that the plea set up in the first place by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and later, though not in such definite terms, by the Prime Minister, as the reason why more energetic and effective action was not taken to equip our troops with an efficient rifle, does not hold good; leaving out of consideration altogether the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), that the Government should have exercised dominant rights, which, after all, is not such an extraordinary exercise of power on the part of the Government in case of war. On several occasions, indeed, notably in the commandeering of wheat a year ago, this right has been exercised by the Canadian Government, and also by the British Government, which went to the extent in one case of taking control of the railway transportation of the United Kingdom. So that there is in fact, as well as in law, no ground for the Government's contention that they were under the dictation of the Ross Rifle Company, instead of the Ross Rifle Company being under their dictation.

I am going to assume that I am one of the plain people, not interested in the Ross Rifle Company, or in the administration of the Government, except in so far as it affects the people of Canada and the winning of the war. It is from that standpoint that I do view, and wish to view this question, and with that view I am not able to begin the criticism that I desire to make, at the point where my hon. friend from Carleton started, namely, the summer of 1916, after it had been demonstrated by all the means that could be brought to bear that the Ross rifle was inefficient for the purpose for which it was required. I begin with August 4, 1914. This Government of Canada is equipped, as other governments are for carrying on the responsibilities of government, and among this equipment there is a Department of Militia and Defence, with a minister at its head. It was not a secret that has now developed after two or three years of war, that the rifle is the chief weapon of modern warfare, and that upon its efficiency and the efficiency in its use of the man who uses it rests success or failure. It was the business of the Government of Canada, and it was the first business that should have concerned them once war broke out, to see that the rifle in the hands of our troops was efficient. They knew that our men were going up against the most thoroughly trained soldiers in the world, possessing the most efficient equipment that the most scientific nation could provide for the men upon whom it depended in its campaign for world-domination. Under these circumstances, even if there had never been any doubts about the rifle, it was the business of the Government of Canada to take stock of the rifle, at any rate from August 4, and not depend upon Sir John French or Sir Douglas Haig or any one else across the water to see that our men had an efficient weapon in their hands. It was the responsibility of Canada to see that that weapon was efficient. As a matter of fact, there had been suspicions in former years against the efficiency of the Ross rifle by the very men who sit on the Government side of the House, so that it cannot be suggested that there was any surprise at the findings of Sir John French or Sir Douglas Haig when those findings at last were made.

If there was one duty that rested upon this Government and upon its Department of Militia more than another it was to follow the troops in the training camp and in the field and be sure that the rifle in their hands was an efficient one. The misfortune of the case appears to be that we had a Minister of Militia who would not and will not believe anything from anybody except that this Ross rifle is the most efficient rifle in the world. The ex-Minister of Militia held that belief and holds it yet, as we have heard here to-night, and the right hon. Premier and his colleagues retained the minister in that responsible position from the beginning until a short time ago. Therefore, the responsibility for the consequences of the failure of the Ross rifle to stand up to the requirements of field service rests absolutely on the heads of the men who lead the Government of to-day. We had no right to wait until Sir John French, on his own responsibility, without the knowledge or consent of this Government, found it necessary, as the result of the terrible experience of the battle of St. Julien, to disarm the Canadian Division taking part in that battle of Ross rifles and place Lee-Enfield rifles in their hands; and, as he says in words that are graphic, he did so, because he was about to send them into action again. The logic is that his conscience did not permit him to send them again into action armed with the rifles that they had when they went through the battle of St. Julien.

The ex-Minister of Militia spoke to-night of fair tests or of unfair tests of the Ross rifle. Could there be any test more definite or more final than the fact stated by General French that when he gave the order to rearm the First Division he found three thousand men of that division who had, as he says, without any authority, armed themselves with Lee-Enfield in the place of the Ross rifles. Surely the man on the firing line, the man in the trench, the man whose life depends upon the efficiency of the weapon in his hands, is a safe judge as to the respective merits of the rifle that his Government has placed in his hands. His natural loyalty to his country would tend to make him keep it if he could have faith in it. Surely, when he throws that rifle away and picks up the rifle of a dead man lying on the field of battle, there is no further argument or comparison necessary. We do not need to hear from Sir John French or Sir Douglas Haig or any one else: the actions of our own men under stress of circumstance are enough, or should be enough, to settle the question of field efficiency of the Ross rifle. I am at a loss to understand how any set of men charged with the terrible responsibility resting upon the shoulders of the Government of Canada since the 4th August, 1914, could submit to a continuance of such a condition in regard to the armament of our soldiers until the Army Council of Great Britain issued notice to them not to send over any more Ross rifles, and announced to them that they would arm our troops with Lee-Enfield rifles. A more humiliating position Canada could not be placed in, and how desperate the condition must have been when the Government of Great Britain would insist on doing for our men what our Government would not do for them.

I do not know, and no man can tell how many Canadian homes have been rendered desolate as the result of the inefficiency of this weapon placed in the hands of our soldiers by our Government. That was not the immediate concern of the Imperial Government in insisting upon a change of armament. Their interest in the matter was the success or failure of the military endeavours being put forward on the battle front; their interest was in the success or failure of the Allied arms. That was the cause that impelled them to insist upon the re-armament of the Canadian forces with a rifle which our men considered efficient and which they considered efficient.

I cannot agree that even the very lucid and courteous statement made here to-night by the Prime Minister is in any degree an excuse, much less a justification, for the terrible sequence of events of which I have spoken. There must have been some means whereby the application of sufficient directive energy backed by the tremendous capital available from the treasury of Canada, could have put into the hands of our men an efficient weapon from the hands of their own Government, from their own people. It was possible, so the Prime Minister informed the House last session, to increase the output of rifles twenty fold in the year and a half that had elapsed since the outbreak of the war. It was possible to create an Enfield rifle factory in the United States; it has been possible to create ammunition factories in many parts of the United States and Canada handling such enormous quantities of munitions of war that the human mind cannot calculate nor grasp the quantity.

It was not possible for the Government of Canada to manufacture, or to secure the manufacture of, sufficient Lee-Enfield rifles to arm the troops of Canada. But it was possible for the Government of Great Britain to do that—for they have done it. To-day, after two and a half years of war, though we had a rifle factory running in good shape in Canada at the beginning of the war, which factory has increased its output twenty times since then—I use the figure given by the Prime Minister—there is not to-day, of all the Canadian forces at the front, one man armed with a Ross rifle, we are informed, and every rifle with which our troops at the front are armed is made and furnished by the British Government. Such a condition is beyond description, it is beyond justification, it is beyond excuse. It can only be ascribed to the fact that we have had a Minister of Militia who, in the case of the Ross rifle, as in case of other militia equipment, has insisted on his own views as against the views of those who are in control of the army of Great Britain.

Now, I should be the last to admit superiority in ability on the part of any other people over the people of Canada. I should be glad to back the Minister of Militia or any other member of the Government—perhaps I might except the ex-Minister of Militia—but I would be willing to back the members of the Government generally—against an equal number of men of equal rank in any other country. But it is not a question of the respective abilities of the men in control of our affairs and those in control of affairs in Great Britain. The men in control of affairs in Great Britain are the people who are running the thing; it is their say; and if we are going to help to win the war, we must do it by helping them and not by going counter to their ideas. When it pleases them to require a rifle of a certain style, or equipment of a certain style, it is for us to provide that which will conform with their idea, so that we may work with them harmoniously. We may think that we have as good as they have or better; but so long as they are carrying the big end of the burden, if we are going to be successful in helping them we must co-operate with them and not antagonize them by the equipment, munitions, or armament we bring forward.

This matter is very much more than a question of a contract between our Government and the Ross Rifle Company. It is a matter which, in the eyes of the British Government, was of such a character and of such importance that the winning of the war depended upon that Government taking the matter into their own hands. But if it was important to the British Government in the winning of the war, it was just as important to the people of Canada in the winning of the war. And it was a thousand times more important to the people of Canada in the preservation of the lives and limbs of the men whom they sent to fight the battles of Canada, the Empire and the world. These men came forward and gave themselves freely for the cause, leaving home, and friends, and property, and business, and prospects, to fight for an ideal, to fight for their country, for its honour and its safety; and we place in their hands a weapon upon which they cannot depend, in which they have lost confidence, which means that they have been slaughtered by our enemies because we did not do our duty by them by giving to them the weapon that they should have had to put them on equal terms with our enemies.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I regret that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) should have made the extraordinary and extravagant statements which have just fallen from his lips. He apparently put out of sight and consideration the fact that those responsible for the administration of public affairs have been as anxious as he or any one else in this country could be to see to it that the men whom Canada has sent to the front were supplied with as good a weapon as possible. Does he realize that he is making this attack upon a weapon for which he himself is responsible? Does he realize that he sat on the Treasury benches, a member of the late Administration in 1908, when serious question arose about this rifle and that his colleague in the Government, speaking words for which he, as a member of the Government, was responsible, took the ground that this was the best rifle that Canada could secure? I wonder if he realizes this, when he makes the most extraordinary statements that have fallen from his lips this evening. The words which I have under my hand are his words, because they were uttered by one of his colleagues in the Government. Why, he even took the ground, through one of his colleagues, that—

> The Ross rifle, in common with all other rifles, military or sporting, may be said to have certain defects, structural weaknesses, or deficiencies. It is not the custom of any government to publish to the world what it considers the weak points of the arms with which its troops are equipped.

This was an absolute denial that the Commons of Canada, the representatives of the people, should be given any knowledge of what the alleged deficiencies of this rifle were. He is responsible also for the statement that this rifle had been sent to the War Office and had been tested, and had been carefully reported upon, and was a good rifle. He is responsible for many other statements which I have under my hand but which I will not take time to quote to-night. I should like to have him understand that when this war broke out in 1914 the military forces of Canada were equipped with a rifle which had been deliberately selected by the hon. gentleman himself. He says that some further test should then have been made. I should like to ask any member of this House, or any other honourable and reasonable man in this country, how, with these statements and many more from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, it would be possible to test that rifle further except by active service in the field. Will my hon. friend tell me how? Does he know of any means by which it could be tested other than by actual practical experience in the field? I do not know of any

Mr. OLIVER: My complaint is that when it was tested by actual service in the field —which did not happen when the Liberal Government was responsible—my hon. friends did not take notice of the results of those tests.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I deny absolutely the assertion which the hon. gentleman has made. We did take notice of it, and we acquiesced at once in the determination of the military authorities at the front that the first division should be armed with Lee-Enfields, and that the Ross rifle should be put aside for the time being. It then became the duty of the Government to do what best could be done; we had to consider what was the best course that lay before us. I have already pointed out that the urgent question then was whether any rifle whatever could be obtained for arming the British and Allied troops about to go to the front. That question was so urgent that the British Government were willing to accept, if they could obtain them, rifles of a very antiquated type, and they asked us to co-operate with them for the purpose of obtaining them. The apparent difficulty with the rifle then was the jamming caused by ammunition which was not fitted for the rifle, being somewhat larger than that produced in Canada. The only remedy to be applied, so far as we understood, was to enlarge the chamber of the rifle. My hon. friend himself had taken the responsibility, which rests on him heavily to-day if he has a conscience, of fixing a chamber of .460 for a cartridge of precisely the same calibre. As I pointed out, a little bit of dirt or anything that would adhere to the cartridge would inevitably cause jamming. That was the condition which my hon. friend had created, with the advice of his experts, with regard to the rifle which he put in the hands of the Canadian troops. We were told some time ago that the boots provided by the late Government were never intended for war, but only for peace. Are we to understand that the rifle which my hon. friend put into the hands of the Canadian troops was intended only for peace, not for war? Is that the position which he takes before this committee and before the people? If our troops were not to go without rifles, there was only one thing to do, and that was to enlarge the chamber of the rifle so that the cartridges would be less liable to jam than if the chamber were left as it was. In that regard we took exactly the same course that the British Government took with regard to the Lee-Enfield rifle. They enlarged the chamber; we enlarged our chamber. We proposed at first to enlarge it from .460 to .462; we eventually enlarged it to .464. After the chamber had been enlarged, tests were made, and it was thought that the rifle would be serviceable under these new conditions. The course which we took had been suggested in the report of Sir John French himself, and we carried it out with reasonable belief that it would make the rifle a serviceable one. We had as good reason to come to that conclusion as the British Government had to reach the conclusion that the enlargement of the chamber of the Lee-Enfield rifle would be attended with a like result. When my hon. friend casts these sneers at us and makes these absurd reproaches against the Government, he does not do himself credit. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are as conscientious and inspired with as full a sense of duty towards the people of this country as he ever was or ever will be. It comes ill from my hon. friend, having regard to some of his own administrative experiences, to cast reproaches of this character upon men who are inspired by no desire in this war except that of doing their full duty to the people of Canada and to the men at the front. He has made absurd suggestions—well, I will withdraw that word, it is unparliamentary—he has made suggestions which seem to me very unreasonable. He has suggested that the Ross Rifle Company was dictating to the Government. I take issue with him absolutely. The Ross Rifle Company never attempted to dictate to the Government; if they had attempted to do so, the Government would not have submitted to their dictation. The hon. gentleman misinterpreted my remarks with regard to expropriation. I did not suggest that the Government might not in a proper case expropriate or that they would have consideration for the wishes of the Ross Rifle Company if they thought that expropriation were proper and in the best interests of the people. If the Government expropriated the property, compensation would be made to the Ross Rifle Company, who would have no cause of complaint —nor do I believe that they would have made any complaint. The question was whether the Government, if they took over the Ross Rifle factory, could operate it more efficiently than it was being operated by the company itself. I am bound to tell my hon. friend that I am absolutely unable to follow his reasoning or to understand what he means when he arrives at the curious argumentative conclusion that upon the terms of the contract as they have been placed upon Hansard we had control of the situation in case war should break out or emergency arise. I doubt very much whether he himself understands what he means. How could we have control of the situation? If the Ross Rifle Company were called upon to produce a number of rifles which they were unable to turn out in a given period, they could give us notice and we could go elsewhere. How did that give us any control of the situation, when the British Government were raking the four corners of the earth trying to get rifles and failing to get them? What advantage would it be to us if the company should give us notice that they could not turn out rifles when we could not get them anywhere else? My hon. friend finds fault with us because we retained the Minister of Militia, who had confidence in the Ross rifle. Surely my hon. friend does not suggest that before the Ross rifle has been pronounced unsuitable by the military authorities at the front, we should have discarded it? What reason would we have for discarding it before actual experience at the front had shown, in the estimation of the military authorities, that it was unsuitable? And when they did pronounce it to be unsuitable, the Minister of Militia and Defence, as I have already declared to the committee, interposed no objection to the course which was taken; he assented at once to the proposed action of the military authorities, both in 1915 and in 1916. When my hon. friend, for some reason unknown to me, suggests this rifle should have been discarded on the outbreak of the war, does he realize that the British Government in the month of December, 1914, ordered 100,000 of these same Ross rifles? That seemed to me to afford fairly reasonable evidence that the rifle was a serviceable rifle; otherwise, for what reason would the British Government have given a large order of that kind, costing $2,500,000 or $3,000,000? We can hardly suppose that they felt themselves to be endowed with such astonishing resources that they could throw to the winds $2,500,000 or $3,000,000 for a rifle which they did not believe to be serviceable. As I said before, the rifle had been approved by the late Government in the form in which we found it when war broke out. The Minister of Militia believed it to be a good rifle. We had no evidence before us that it was not a good rifle until experience in actual warfare, under conditions of the utmost severity, demonstrated, in the opinion of the military authorities at the front, that it ought to be put aside and the Lee-Enfield substituted for it. They made that suggestion to us, and we acquiesced in it. When later on, in the summer of 1916, they made the further suggestion that all Canadian troops at the front should be armed with the Lee-Enfield, instead of the Ross rifle, we again acquiesced. That is the whole situation, and I repeat once more that, in my opinion, it affords no ground whatever for the violent reproaches which my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has seen fit to level against the Government in this connection.

Mr. OLIVER: I will not delay the House at any great length, and I do not intend to follow the Prime Minister in everything he has said. But his suggestion as to my responsibility for the Ross rifle is really hardly to the point. I was a member of the Government which instituted the making of the Ross rifle, and I have nothing to apologize for in regard to that matter. The contract has been read here to-night. It was a good contract, and the rifle was a good rifle for target and sporting purposes, or for any purpose for which it was used up to the outbreak of war. The Prime Minister adopts the very cheap suggestion that it was a rifle for peace, and not for war; it was a rifle which had been used in peace until the outbreak of war. That was the only use there was for it, and it was found to be absolutely satisfactory, to be not only as good as others, but better than others. There is, therefore, no apology necessary from any member of the Liberal Government which made this contract for the Ross rifle as it was when war broke out. But once war broke out, this Government, and not the late Government, became responsible, and when under war conditions the Ross rifle was found to be not satisfactory, when it was found that the troops using it could not depend upon it, when 3,000 of them threw it away and took Lee-Enfields because they believed that their lives depended on making the change, the responsibility for retaining that rifle was the responsibility of this Government and not of the late Liberal Government. I do not share the responsibility for the retention of the Ross rifles by our troops. My hon. friend spoke of my conscience. I am trying to rid my soul of the blood of the men who died in France because we, the people of Canada, armed them with an inferior weapon. As to the provsion in the contract, which my right hon. friend says he does not understand, and that I do not understand—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that I did not understand.

Mr. OLIVER: Then that I did not understand.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that.

Mr. OLIVER: Then I beg the Prime Minister's pardon; I accept his correction.

I would ask him for what purpose can it be imagined that that provision was placed in the contract except to exactly meet such a condition as arose on the outbreak of war, so as to place the Government of the country in a position to provide such rifles as they wished, and as many as they needed for the arming of their troops. There could be no other reason for placing that provision in the contract. That is why I believe the provision was well framed to achieve the purpose that I mention.

To repeat, on this point, the Prime Minister seemed to think that I found fault with the Government because they had taken the rifle to the battlefield. I did not find fault with the Government for that. I do not expect this Government, or any other Government, to be omniscient, to see or know things that have not yet occurred. I absolutely relieve the Government from any responsibility for taking the rifle to the battlefield, and placing it in the hands of the troops for service in France. They had every reason, or at all events, some reason to believe that the rifle was a good rifle; but, as I have already stated, the rifle was under suspicion by the very men who sat around the Prime Minister, and whether it was under suspicion or not, the exigencies of the case were such that it was the business of the Government of Canada to follow events on the battlefield so that on their responsibility, and not on that of British officers, they would be sure that our men had, or had not, in their hands a rifle that was absolutely efficient. I absolutely protest against the responsibility being placed on any other shoulders than those of our own military department, who are charged on our behalf with seeing that our troops are efficient, and that their armament is efficient. It is not the responsibility of the British Government; it is the responsibility of our Government. After experience had shown that the rifle was inefficient, not on the authority of Sir John French, but on the experience of our own men who threw it away, there was no escape from the responsibility of the Government to see that that rifle was replaced as soon as it could be. The Prime Minister has suggested that the Government did everything they could to meet the situation. I recall that on the 17th May last, when the question of the efficiency of the Ross rifle was under consideration in this House, his colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Rogers) suggested, if he did not absolutely make the threat, that he would imprison any man who questioned the efficiency of the Ross rifle. He stated from his place in the House that on the information which he had, he had no reason to believe other than that the Ross rifle was an absolutely efficient rifle; and yet in the hands of the Prime Minister at that time, on that very day, and for five days previously, there had been a cablegram from the accredited agent of the Militia Department in London saying, "Serious condition has arisen regarding Ross rifle. Show this to the Prime Minister." I do not wish to make this the occasion of an exchange of compliments, but as the Prime Minister has been handing a few bouquets to me, I take the opportunity of handing this to him for his consideration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend. His bouquets are so frequent and so fragrant that they are always welcome. I do not desire to repeat what I have already said about ten times since three o'clock this afternoon, but which does not yet seem to have reached the inner consciousness of my hon. friend: that when the military authorities at the front, whom we considered the best judges, directed arming of the Canadian troops with the Lee-Enfield rifle, we acquiesced in it. I leave the situation there, but with this further statement: that we then made the best arrangement we found possible, and which we conceived to be a reasonable arrangement, for improving the Ross rifle so that the jamming, the only defect which had been seriously urged against it up to that time, would be remedied. Again in 1916, we took a like course and in taking it we had the engagement of the British Government that all our troops at the front would be armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle If that does not satisfy my hon. friend as to our desire and intention to do our duty in the matter, if it does not satisfy him that we did our reasonable duty in the matter to the best of our ability, or to the best of the ability of any Government that might have been called upon to deal with the situation, why, he and I shall have to be content to differ about the matter. I should say to him with all courtesy and all respect that all that he has urged in so strong, and even so violent, a manner has not in the least disturbed my opinion as to the wisdom of the course which we took. I do not see that we could have taken any other course, nor do I see that any other course would have been open to any government. It is impossible to complete the discussion this evening; indeed, I made an engagement with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the committee should sit on a subsequent day, and I therefore beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the Prime Minister bear in mind the request which I made to look up in the department—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In regard to bolts?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and also the applications made to the company for changes, when they were made, and when they were complied with, if any were complied with.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY HON. MR. OLIVER.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity of giving a very direct contradiction to a statement that appeared on Wednesday, January 24, in L'Evènement, a newspaper published in the city of Quebec. I would have been able to correct this sooner, had I been better acquainted with the language in which the statement was originally printed. The article begins with large headlines:

Hon. Mr. Oliver, late Liberal minister, requests immediate conscription in Canada. This Liberal leader lets the cat out of the bag. He declares that if the Liberal party came back to power, conscription would be enforced at once. Mr. Oliver reproaches Mr. Sevigny for not preaching immediate enlistment to his constituents during the campaign.

The article goes on:

It ill becomes Mr. Cannon to charge the Conservative Government with the intention of enforcing conscription in Canada. It is evident to those who follow the debates at Ottawa that were a Liberal administration in power conscription would come at once. Hon. Mr. Oliver, one of Sir Wilfrid's first lieutenants, let the cat out of the bag when in the warmth of his oratory he stated:

'The true policy to follow, and which the present Government should immediately adopt, would be to enforce conscription throughout Canada. Recruiting is not satisfactory, and this expedient would settle the whole question.'

The left—

That is the Opposition.

—seemed to receive this declaration with marked satisfaction.

Further to confirm Mr. Oliver's remarks we find the following extract in the report of yesterday's sitting, which is very significant. Mr. Oliver criticises the Government for his apparent lack of organization, and the system followed in recruiting men, and declares that, in his opinion, had things been managed differently, Canada could to-day count her 500,000 men. 'We must not forget,' says he, 'that more than 50,000 men who had enlisted since the beginning of the war, have been later rejected for physical unfitness. Our duty is to send to the firing line half a million men absolutely fit from a physical standpoint.' The only possible solution, according to Mr. Oliver, is the establishment of conscription in Canada. Mr. Oliver was particularly aggressive throughout his speech which can be summed up thus: Conscription is necessary in Canada.

Mr. Oliver then alluded to the campaign now being waged in Dorchester, and made it a pretext to attack Mr. Sevigny because he did not choose to make of his electoral campaign a recruiting tour. Here is how Mr. Sevigny addresses his constituents; said he: 'Every one has a duty to perform in the present war. Some have enlisted to go to the firing line, but those who remain have nevertheless a very important duty to fulfil, that of providing for our agricultural needs, and other requirements.' Mr. Oliver felt indignant at such manner of speech, and claimed that Mr. Sevigny ought to have impressed upon his electors the necessity of enlisting for active service. Mr. Oliver judges that the Government has not the question of military enlistment much at heart, and reiterates his request that conscription be enforced.

I desire to say that the assertion contained in this article is absolutely untrue; and if I would be permitted, I would like to read from the speech referred to the only remarks of mine that included the word "conscription" or related in any way to that matter. It will not be very long and I wish to have the matter absolutely settled. On Tuesday, January 23, 1917, on page 80 of the Unrevised Hansard I am quoted as saying:

Voluntary service has never had a chance in this country under the administration of our friends. For my own part I have said in this House before, and I am prepared to say it again, that in the case of such a world struggle as we are now engaged in National Service is the only logical service; National Service, I say, that will call up the manhood of the nation for military service. But it must be recognized that there are many things that are right in theory that it is not possible to put into practice. I do not challenge the Government because they have not put conscription in force, although they talked it, hinted at it, and tried to get credit for it without doing it. The fault I have to find is that, depending on voluntary service, we never gave voluntary service a fair chance.

$100,000,000 LOAN FOR PUBLIC SERVICE.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 19, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon.—Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On the Preamble.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are the holders of United Kingdom war loans or Anglo-French war loans subject to taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Where?

Mr. LEMIEUX: What I want to make clear is this: Would the holders of those coupons have the same standing as the holders of the Canadian war loans as regards taxation that may be imposed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend knows that there is a Dominion jurisdiction and a provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am speaking of the Dominion jurisdiction.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have exempted from taxation proposed under the authority of the Dominion Parliament the securities which we have issued to meet our war expenditures. There is no such exemption in the case of any other securities, so far as I am aware, whether of the United Kingdom or of any other country.

Bill reported.

QUEBEC HARBOUR LOAN.

On the motion of the Hon. J. D. Hazen (Minister of Marine) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolutions, Mr. Blain in the Chair:

1. That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called the Corporation, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of one and a half million dollars, as are required to enable the Corporation to carry on the construction of such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the port of Quebec.

2. That during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these Resolutions, the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances, shall be deemed to be money required to construct and to be part of the cost of construction of the said terminal facilities, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of one and a half million dollars.

3. That the Corporation shall submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for approval, monthly applications for such advances, with statements showing total expenditure on different items in detail, and upon approval, authority for the payment of the amount applied for may be granted by the Governor in Council.

4. That the Corporation shall upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance, debentures of the Corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue and bearing interest payable half-yearly at the rate of three and one-half per centum per annum.

5. That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these Resolutions, shall be payable by the Corporation out of all its property, assets, tools, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall be a charge thereon next after, and have precedence in regard to payment next after, all debentures or bonds issued by the Corporation amounting to the sum of one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, under Chapter forty-eight of the Statutes of 1898, Chapter thirty-four of the Statutes of 1899, and Chapter thirty-six of the Statutes of 1907.

On resolution 5:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I desire certain information with respect to this matter which, if not convenient to furnish now, may be given on the second reading of the Bill to be based upon these resolutions. And before the second reading, will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries please lay upon the table a plan showing the works that have been carried out and those now in progress.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What amount of security is already outstanding against Quebec harbour, and what is the financial standing of the corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commission?

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The amount advanced to the Harbour Commissioners by the Government since these works were undertaken by authority of the Statute of 1913 is $5,500,000, and in order to complete the plans that have been approved a further expenditure of $1,500,000 is necessary. In addition, there are bonds outstanding in connection with the old scheme of harbour development there, certain of which are held by the public. In all the Acts that have been passed, provision is made that bonds issued by the old commission to private individuals, and still in private hands, shall take precedence over the advances made since 1914. As the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) knows certain other advances were made by the Government in the old days, upon which no interest was paid. I think there is fair reason for believing, in view of the development of the harbour and the increase in the revenue, that the interest on these will be ultimately paid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the amount?

Mr. HAZEN: It was placed on Hansard when the Act of 1913 was introduced, and has been stated several times since, but I have not the information at the moment.

The Bill to be founded upon this resolution—it is practically a copy of the resolution—is in the same terms as the Acts of 1913 and 1914. Since the commencement of the harbour development under the commission, the revenues of the harbour have increased very largely. In the year 1913 the revenue from the harbour was $126,000; during the last year it was $288,000, an increase of $162,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the revenue during the intervening years?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not the figures, but the revenue has increased year by year. It is expected that when this work is completed very much more business will be done than has been done in the past. That is why, even under existing conditions, we ask that the work be proceeded with so that at the earliest possible date the harbour will do the very much larger business which is expected upon the completion of the work and obtain the increased revenue which will naturally result. It is anticipated that much larger vessels will in a short time ply on the St. Lawrence river, and owing to the fact that between Montreal and Quebec there the channel is not deeper than thirty feet, vessels of more than that draught will have to make their terminus at Quebec. From the standpoint of common sense and ordinary business prudence, I think it would be a very great mistake not to proceed to finish this work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What changes have been made in the personnel of the Quebec Harbour Commission?

Mr. HAZEN: Of the $1,500,000, $700,000 will have to be spent during the present year. Probably it will be three years before the total amount is expended. Advances will be made from time to time, probably covering a period of three seasons. The original commission consisted of Sir William Price, chairman; Mr. Gravel, who comes from the south shore, and Mr. Letellier. Sir William Price resigned as chairman of the commission and the other commissioners forwarded their resignations at the same time. The reason given by Sir William for his resignation was that he had very extensive business affairs on his hands; in addition to that he had enlisted for overseas service and, having raised a regiment he expected to go to the front. He would not, therefore, be able to give that attention to the duties of the position which its importance demanded. A new commission was accordingly appointed, consisting of Mr. L'Esperance, formerly member for Montmagny, Mr. Gravel, former commissioner, and Mr. Pennington, a gentleman engaged in the lumber industry in the city of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is Captain Murray's position?

Mr. HAZEN: Captain Murray is harbour master. He was appointed by the old commission, of which Sir William Price was chairman.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I suggest that the next time this matter is taken up, a map should be placed upon the table showing the progress of the work.

Mr. HAZEN: That is a proper suggestion; I shall be delighted to comply with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that work to be executed in the river itself, or will it be necessary to expropriate land?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that all necessary expropriations have been made. About $127,000 worth of dredging is to be performed. An addition is to be built to the elevator, and the elevator conveyors have to be completed. The two latter items will amount, I believe, to nearly $800,000. These are the principal works to be carried on, though a further work is necessary in connection with the completion of the wharf.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will my hon. friend arrange with the Minister of Railways to have wheat brought from the West to that station?

Mr. HAZEN: I have no doubt that the harbour commissioners will do their utmost to have wheat brought from the west to that elevator. Wheat did come to the elevator during this year. The commissioners were handicapped, I believe, by a lack of facilities for getting the wheat speedily from the elevator to the ship, a floating elevator being used for that purpose. When the conveyors are built that difficulty will be overcome. They were hampered, also, by the fact that a million bushels of grain had to remain in the elevator a considerable length of time because of difficulty in getting it out, during which time many millions of bushels could have gone through the elevator. The harbour commissioners fully believe that upon the completion of the elevator they will do a very large business in shipping grain from the port of Quebec, particularly in view of the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern railways are now running into that city. I may mention that the revenues of the Montreal harbour commission last year were the largest in the history of the harbour. Besides paying all expenses, outstanding bills, and interest, the Montreal harbour commissioners had a surplus of something like $25,000 or $30,000. A very large grain business was done last year in the city of Montreal, and it is reasonable to expect that as the Canadian west grows and as its production of grain increases more ships will go to Montreal and Quebec. Moreover, as the harbour facilities at these ports are perfected, there will be larger shipments from Canadian ports and not so much through American ports.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From information that I had from a colonization agent last fall, the business done by the Grand Trunk Pacific railway between Cochrane and Quebec and Amos was excellent. The road was very much encouraged by the support given to it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I notice that the loan is secured by debentures of the corporation repayable in twenty-five years and bearing interest at 3½ per cent. Does the minister expect to secure money at that rate for these bonds, or is that the rate that is asked from other corporations of a similar nature?

Mr. HAZEN: It is not believed for a moment that the Government can borrow money at 3½ per cent. Authority is given to the Government by Parliament to make advances from time to time to the harbour commissioners of Montreal, and, in this case, to the harbour commissioners of Quebec, for the carrying on of work that is approved by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This money the Government of Canada advances to the harbour commissioners who pay interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. It is a rate which, at the time this policy was first embarked on, when financial conditions were very different from what they are at present and the country could borrow money at a rate pretty close to three and one-half per cent, involved little or no charge upon the country. Under existing conditions, of course, the country cannot borrow money at three and one-half per cent. But at the same time, in view of the fact that this is a splendid public work, that the work that is being done by the harbour commissioners at Montreal, is in the interest of the West and of every part of the country that the very best facilities should be afforded for the handling of the freight and traffic of the country during the summer from the ports of Montreal and Quebec, it has not been thought desirable to increase that rate of interest. As a matter of fact, to the extent of the difference between the rate of interest paid by the commissioners and the rate paid by the Government on money it borrows, the country does assist the harbour commissioners. But it is fair to remember that in other parts of the country very large sums of money are spent for the development of the harbours by the Public Works Department upon which no interest at all is charged to the local authorities. It is true that from those harbours that are under the jurisdiction of the Public Works Department certain revenues are derived in the shape of fees; but, as a rule, I do not think the revenue received at any of those harbours would, under normal conditions, pay three and one-half per cent interest on the public money that has been expended to develop them. I refer to harbours like Port Arthur, Toronto, St. John, Halifax, Victoria, Vancouver and others.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The commissioners at Quebec seem to have made a great mistake in not going to the Public Works Department instead of to my hon. friend because apparently had they done so they would have got off without paying any interest.

In looking over the Estimates I find four or five millions of dollars proposed to be voted by the Public Works Department for improvements at Toronto, Port Arthur, and other harbours; and there is no reason that I can see why Quebec should not be treated in the same way as Toronto. I think the Government ought to state what their policy is in regard to harbour improvements throughout the Dominion, and that one system should be adopted for all harbours of this kind, instead of allowing large sums to be spent on certain harbours without any interest being paid, while in other cases interest is charged.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN moved for leave to introduce Bill 23 to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

DISMISSAL OF COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT MIDDLETON, N.S.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN moved:

For a copy of all papers, telegrams, orders in council, etc., with reference to the dismissal of Mr. Schaffner, late Collector of Customs at Middleton, N.S.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this motion I desire to say just a word or two, but I hope that I shall be able to advert to the matter later on in the session when the papers have been brought down. The motion asks for a copy of all papers, telegrams and orders in council in reference to the dismissal of Mr. Schaffner, Collector of Customs at Middleton, in the county of Annapolis. Mr. Schaffner, I am informed, was the Collector of Customs at the port of Middleton for a great number of years, and on the 27th December last he was dismissed under the following notice from the Commissioner of Customs:

Ottawa, December 27, 1916.

L. P. Schaffner, Esq.,
Middleton, N.S.

Sir,—I am directed to inform you that under order in council of 22nd December, 1916, you are dismissed from office as Collector of Customs of the port of Middleton, Nova Scotia, on account of political partisanship.

Under the direction of the department, Mr. Schaffner was removed from office. I am informed, whether accurately or not I cannot say, but I believe my information to be accurate, that he was not a political partisan and had not been guilty of any conduct which might be strictly termed partisan for a great number of years at least. I am prepared to assume that he was guilty of no partisan act, at least since 1911, and I submit that if his head were to fall for such a reason, he should have been removed a very long while ago. Mr. Schaffner is an elderly gentleman, not enjoying good health, and his only son, I believe—I may not be correct as to that—has been fighting overseas in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, was wounded, and is at the present time in a hospital in England. The man appointed in his stead was a young man eligible for service abroad and twenty-five years of age.

I ask the attention of the House just for a moment or two to point out one or two objections to the action of the department in dismissing Mr. Schaffner. It has been pointed out already that the present Administration occupy the Treasury Benches by grace of the Opposition, or of Parliament, and not by the consent of the people of this country. I think it is a fair statement for me to make that since October last, unless for very well founded and serious cause, the Government should have done nothing except carry on the war and such other things as were necessary in the administration of the civil affairs of this country. Whether or not Mr. Schaffner was guilty of political partisanship during the last two or three months, at least since the expiration of this present Parliament, which was, I think, on October 7, 1916, he should not have been removed from office for such a cause. The Government have given notice of their intention to apply to Parliament for an extension of the Parliamentary term. That question will come up later for consideration by Parliament, and I assume that every hon. gentleman will be prepared to deal with it upon the then existing facts. But they can hardly expect a fair and absolutely non-partisan consideration of that proposal by Parliament, or the country, if they continue carrying on a partisan government during the extended term, the term which was given them purely and solely for the purpose of carrying on affairs relating to the war. On November 27, 1915, an order in council was passed by the Government which I would like to read to the House. I have not a copy of the order, but I am reading it from a publication known as the Military Hospitals Commission Bulletin, and it is as follows:—

> That in making appointments to the Government Civil Service, preference be given to the returned members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, especially those who through disability caused by active military service are unable to fill their previous occupations; such appointments to be subject to the provision of the Civil Service Acts and to be made with due regard to the capacity of any applicant to discharge the duties of the position to which it is proposed to appoint him.

I submit that under that order in council, if this Government deemed it proper to dismiss Mr. Schaffner, they were in honour bound to fill that position by the appointment of a returned soldier. If Mr. Schaffner had been guilty of any reprehensible conduct what could be more proper and correct than the appointment to the office of his son, who has actually served at the front, and who is to-day in hospital? Then, if that courtesy would not be extended to the dismissed official, there are, I submit, in Nova Scotia, many returned soldiers who are quite capable of filling such a position. That order in council, which I have just read to the House, I understand, was intended to apply to the inside service; at least it was subject to that narrow interpretation and in order to make sure that it applied to the outside service as well, another order in council was passed on October 12, 1916. I have not a copy of that order in council, but the publication which I am reading summarizes it in the following language:—

> Both in the Inside and Outside Services preference will be given to men who have served overseas and been honourably discharged, especially to those unable to fill their previous occupations owing to disability caused by active military service, and no examination fee will be required. During the war, no male of military age without a badge shall be appointed.

The objections which I wish to urge against the removal of Mr. Schaffner from office are, first, that he should not have been dismissed at all. I say that he was not guilty of partisan conduct. But if he was, the offence was committed many years ago, and the friends of the Administration if they wished to exercise their right to demand his dismissal on that ground, should have done so long ago, or at all events before the expiration of the Parliamentary term on October 7, 1916. I say that the Government have no right now to exercise their power of dismissal of civil servants for an offence of political partisanship committed long before October 7, 1916. Acts of this nature are not calculated to secure from Parliament or from the country proper and fair consideration of the proposals which the Government have presented to Parliament for the extension of the present parliamentary term, and which proposals naturally find considerable support in Canada. I say further that the Government, having decided upon the removal of Mr. Schaffner, should have observed the terms of their own order in council passed in October, 1916, to the effect that in future appointments to the Civil Service, both Inside and Outside, preference should be given to returned soldiers.

The Government, in this case have openly disregarded their own order in council of October, 1915, and the supplementary order in council passed on October 12, 1916, which latter states that "during the war no male of military age without a badge shall be appointed." Surely the Government meant that this order in council should be enforced. At least, I should not like to believe that they were attempting to deceive the public, and had no intention of adhering to the principle laid down in their order in council. In view of all the circumstances, I submit that Mr. Schaffner should be restored to office, and the Government should not be content to rest under the imputation of having made an appointment in contravention of their own order in council. If Mr. Schaffner is not restored to office, the new appointee of the Government should be removed, and a man appointed whose qualifications come within the terms of the order in council which I have quoted.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): I have no objection at all to the papers being brought down. I should like to say a word on the motion. The hon. gentleman knows that there has been a standing rule for a great many years that any official who takes part in a political campaign or interferes in politics in any way shall be liable to dismissal, a statement to that effect by a member of the House of Commons to the head of the department being considered sufficient evidence on which to dismiss the official. That has been the practice not only since 1911, but during the time the hon. gentleman was sitting on this side of the House, when many dismissals took place by the Liberal Government simply on the word of the member representing the constituency concerned. In the present case, Mr. Schaffner had evidently been interfering in politics. I was so advised by the member representing that constituency, and I acted on the rule which has been followed for the last fifteen or twenty years. Personally, I dislike to dismiss an official, but at the same time I think we all agree that when a person accepts a Government position it is much better that so long as he occupies that position he would not interfere in politics, no matter which side he supports. This official certainly knew the rule, and that he was liable to dismissal. With reference to the young man who took the place of Mr. Schaffner, I understand that he had offered his services for overseas, but had been rejected. The statement, therefore, of the hon. member that this man was fit for overseas service and should have gone to the front falls to the ground.

With reference to the orders in council which the hon. member has referred to, I believe that the Government are acting on them right up to the very letter. So far as my own department is concerned, since these orders in council were passed, we have done everything in our power to have every vacant position filled by a returned soldier. I have done that in many cases, and am still doing so. Whenever a vacancy occurs in any constituency I make every possible effort to get a returned soldier to fill it, and if there is no returned soldier available in the locality, I get a returned soldier from some other locality to fill the position temporarily, until a returned soldier from that particular district returns home and will accept the position.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand the minister to say that before he made the new appointment he had evidence that the appointee had been rejected for overseas service, or has the minister obtained that information just lately?

Mr. REID: I had evidence at the time we appointed him that he had been rejected for overseas service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose the records will show that.

Mr. REID: I do not know whether it is in writing or not, but at all events that is the information I obtained.

Mr. MACDONALD: In filling these positions does the minister regard a man who has been rejected for overseas service, as on the same footing as a man who has returned from the front.

Mr. REID: Not at all. I insist on filling the positions with men who have been injured at the front.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Were there not many men in Nova Scotia who had returned injured from the front and were available for appointment for the position of Collector of Customs in Middleton?

Mr. REID: There was none I knew of in that particular county. Furthermore, the salary is very small, and on that account it is often difficult to get a returned soldier to accept these positions.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the salary?

Mr. REID: I do not remember just now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose about $800 or $900?

Mr. REID: We are having difficulty even at the present time in getting returned soldiers to fill some of these positions in the Customs. I am adhering strictly to the rule that every position must be filled by a returned soldier who has come back home injured. In cases where we cannot get a returned soldier we get some man to fill the position temporarily either one who has been rejected for overseas service, or perhaps the son or brother of a soldier at the front until one of that family returns from the front.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Then I assume that the minister will treat this appointment as a temporary one only.

Mr. REID: This is a temporary appointment. There are in the service to-day men whom, if I can get returned soldiers to fill their places, I shall make retire when the time comes. I may also say, for the information of my hon. friend, that I have received a number of letters written by officers in the Customs Department in different parts of this country offering, at any time that soldiers return who are qualified to take their positions and who need positions, to give up their positions to them. In that way I shall be able to fill a good many positions. I have already taken on a very large number of returned soldiers and I am taking them on every day, and I am satisfied that every member in this House in whose constituency there has been any vacancy in my department, will be able to confirm what I say. I have always requested that the name of a returned soldier be given for the vacancy, and if there is none, I send one from the outside temporarily until one from that particular locality returns.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Was the hon. minister informed, before dismissing Mr. Schaffner, that he had a son fighting in the Canadian forces who was wounded and in a hospital at the time Mr. Schaffner was dismissed?

Mr. REID: No, I was not informed; but I was informed later on that this gentleman had a son at the front who was slightly wounded, and if this son comes back and is wounded, he will have an opportunity, if he so desires, of getting a position in the Customs Department. Whenever any vacancies occur, returned soldiers are taken on irrespective of politics and locality. So far as those who have been taken on are concerned, I do not know what their politics are nor what part of the country they come from. That is the policy I have been following and that, I believe, every other member of the government has been following.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are not joking about that?

Mr. REID: I am not joking at all. The hon. member cannot refer to a single instance where we have not taken on returned soldiers irrespective of politics, creed or locality.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who recommends them?

Mr. REID: What we do is this——

Mr. MACDONALD: The district patronage committee.

Mr. REID: We get their names from the Militiary Hospitals Commission, the Pensions Board, the different soldiers' organizations and from members. Their names are taken down, and after the men are examined, they are given positions in some department wherever a vacancy occurs.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that the way in which the Minister of Railways is running his department?

Mr. REID: I am running my department and he is running his, and I am satisfied he is giving the returned soldiers every possible opportunity. I defy any hon. member opposite to point to any case where that course has not been followed in the Customs Department since the order in council was passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Mr. Speaker, as the member making the recommendation upon which this dismissal was made, I desire to say a word or two before the resolution passes. With the manner of bringing this matter before the House to-day by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), I have no complaint to make, but I am bound to think that had the hon. gentleman been fully seized of the facts, he would not have made the speech which he did. I am also bound to think that the friends of the dismissed officer and perhaps the dismissed officer himself, who exerted themselves to have the hon. gentleman bring this matter up, were not serving the best interest of that official; because it is incumbent upon me to make certain statements which I would not have made of my own free will, but which in self defence I must refer to in public. I am free to admit that in connection with this matter I have erred, but my fault, as I see it to-day, does not lie in the fact that a few months ago I made the recommendation for the dismissal of Mr. L. P. Schaffner of Middleton, but rather in the fact that I did not make the recommendation shortly after the election in 1911, because, as my hon. friend has intimated, this Mr. Schaffner, before the Dominion election of 1911, was an exceedingly offensive, active and obnoxious partisan. He was one of the individuals who frequented every loafing place in the town attacking myself, attacking the Liberal-Conservative party and rendering himself obnoxious in every respect to the members of the Liberal-Conservative party. Of course, had I been so minded, I could, immediately after the election of 1911, have made a recommendation to the minister and procured his dismissal. I was, however, seized with compassion for the individual. While I have made some recommendations for dismissal in various parts of my constituency which I represent, Mr. Schaffner is the first resident of my own town who has lost office by reason of the change of Government, and it was because of sympathy and not because of my expecting to gain any political advantage that he was allowed to remain in office as long as he was. I well remember meeting Mr. Schaffner on the day following the Dominion election, and I well remember the look of distress and woe upon his countenance on that occasion, a look somewhat similar to the expressions on the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite since the Dorchester election, and I was struck with pity.

Mr. MARCIL: Easy. You have not heard the full story of the Dorchester election yet.

Mr. DAVIDSON: No, I have not heard it, but I have seen it depicted on the hon. gentleman's face. We have nothing to fear from the story of the Dorchester election. The Conservative party can hear the full report with considerably more pride and satisfaction than the Liberal party can hear it.

I told Mr. Schaffner on that occasion, being struck with sympathy, that, notwithstanding his offences in the past, he had nothing to fear; all he had to do was to go and sin no more. But Mr. Schaffner did not see fit to do that. From that time to the time of his dismissal he kept up the same old practice. Some time afterwards I heard of Mr. Schaffner attending a caucus of the Liberal party in the town of Middleton, a meeting at which candidates to represent the party were nominated, a meeting when work on the revision of voters' lists was done. I went to some of Mr. Schaffner's friends after that and I asked them to point out to Mr. Schaffner that if this thing continued he could not expect to retain his position. I believe, and, in fact, I have been informed that Liberals on that occasion, and on various occasions since at my request, have gone to him and pointed out to him how unwise it was for him to do anything of the kind. That, however, did not prevent him from going on with this kind of thing, until last summer, an offence of what I regarded as an intolerable character was committed by him. No doubt Mr. Schaffner has heard the words uttered by my hon. friend from Halifax imputing crimes and misdemeanors against this Government, charging the Government with dishonesty and with misappropriating funds; but unlike the hon. members of this House, Mr. Schaffner evidently took those words seriously and believed them; and so I found that last summer, when Americans were coming over to get goods out of the customs house, they were gravely informed by this man that the money he was collecting by way of duty was going to Ottawa to be stolen and that there was a corrupt Government in power. I could not countenance anything of that kind, and I did not think it was just that an officer of that character should be retained in office. Mr. Schaffner was not only guilty of acts of offensive partisanship, but he was guilty of gross irregularities in the conduct of his own office.

Matters were brought to me which, if I had reported them to the department, would have led to an investigation; but, out of consideration for Mr. Schaffner, I put the offence on a milder basis and made the recommendaion I did. I am ready to stand before my constituents and justify to the limit the action I have taken.

What the hon. minister has stated in reference to the appointment of a successor to this man is absolutely correct. The person appointed temporarily to fill the office is a young man of excellent habits and ability. At the very opening of the war he offered himself for service abroad, and it was with great disappointment that he found himself turned down. His rejection was followed by a long illness, from which he has just recovered. He is not now in a condition of health to engage in anything like strenuous work. In the absence of any returned soldier in the constituency, I thought he should have this position temporarily. I went over the list of those from the county of Annapolis who had returned from the front, but found none who would be eligible for this position. Had I found one eligible it is quite likely I should have regarded his claims upon the office as higher than those of the gentleman who received it.

The complaint is made that this officer, Mr. Schaffner, has been dismissed, notwithstanding the fact that he has a son serving at the front, a son who has been wounded. I believe that Mr. Schaffner has a son at the front who is doing good service for his country, and that he has received some slight wounds, because of which he has been in the hospital for a short time. But I understand it is nothing very serious, and that he will return to the front shortly.

I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on their new-found concern for the soldiers at the front and even for the relatives of those soldiers. Last session my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and other hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia seriously attacked, not a relative of a soldier at the front, but actually a gallant soldier himself, who was doing sterling service for his country at that time, and who has since made the supreme sacrifice, has given his life for his country. I refer to the late Mr. Gore Foster, of Halifax. At that time it was incumbent upon me to maintain the cause of a gallant soldier against the very violent attacks of these hon. gentlemen. I am glad their attitude towards the soldier has changed and that, while last session they were ready to attack an absent soldier who was fighting for his country and his flag, and to attack him on very paltry grounds, they now hold that even the relatives of soldiers are sacred and shall not be touched, no matter what they do. If the party to which the hon. member for Halifax belongs is sincere, it has an excellent opportunity to show it. At this time there is vacant in the county of Annapolis a position very much better than that which Mr. Schaffner has lost, the position of Registrar of Deeds for the county.

If the hon. gentleman is so concerned for Mr. Schaffner, he could show that concern by having him appointed to this vacant position. A position in the gift of the Liberal provincial Government. We will wait to see how sincere these hon. gentlemen are in this matter.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I confess to a feeling of surprise when I heard the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) present facts to show that, even in this time of war, civil servants are dismissed for offences which evidently are hoary with age. I say I was surprised that this should be done at this time, when I myself and every other member of this House holds his seat not by the voice of the people but by the voices of himself and his fellow-members. I concur in everything that was said by the hon. member for Halifax on that subject and hold with him that in view of our present tenure of office we should be very careful as to the scope we give ourselves, and should devote our efforts simply to the accomplishment of those purposes for which this extension of time was given us. But in his zeal for dismissals the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) is only following the example of his party in the province of Nova Scotia. I think the most conspicious case of dismissal in the province of Nova Scotia was the practical dismissal of our lieutenant governor. When war broke out, we had as lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia a distinguished gentleman who was well qualified for his position and who had taken a particularly active part in providing for the soldiers at the front and those going to the front. Now, if any officers should be continued in their positions during the period of the war, those officers are the lieutenant governors, and this is particularly true of the lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia. But we had those who desired his dismissal sitting, as it were, on the steps of Government House at Halifax, watching not merely the calendar but the clock, yes the chronometer, to determine exactly when the lieutenant governor's term expired, according to London time. They would not even wait until business hours of that day in Nova Scotia, but they dismissed him by meridian time at Greenwich. This shows the extreme desire for dismissals in Nova Scotia even in the case of a lieutenant governor the special representative in the province of His Majesty the King. For their action in this case, I assume, the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself, is particularly responsible. And with this as expressive of the gospel of the Tory party in Nova Scotia, we need hardly wonder at what they may do in the case of a mere custom house officer.

But is it not surprising to see the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) descend to such minor things as these? Very few hon. gentlemen in this House hold the high distinction that he holds as a Canadian statesman. Most of us are ordinary politicians, obliged to give attention to political matters and to look after such things as electoral lists, so that we shall not make any bad friends among the people. But another and higher plane upon which the politician finds no place or standing is that occupied by statesmen. In support of the claim which I make for the hon. member for Annapolis, we have sworn testimony on the records of the High Court in the province of Nova Scotia. That being the case, we expect of him conduct becoming a statesman. Of course, if this evidence went to a jury they might measure it more closely and weigh it more carefully when they were told that this sworn testimony was the evidence of the hon. gentleman himself. But it could not be said that the hon. gentleman, when he solemnly swore that he himself was a statesman, was an independent witness. I well remember meeting the hon. gentleman in my county at a court session, which was largely brought about by the manoeuvering and manipulations of the hon. gentleman when he was attending a local election. While going through my county on that occasion he had a happy faculty of talking glibly about dismissals. His methods were very shrewd. He would go to a postmaster, say, on the north shore in Victoria county and say: You have a post office; you had better vote for our man, and you will hold your office.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has absolutely misrepresented me, and he has done so after having listened to evidence taken in court in which he tried to establish these facts—evidence which was absolutely and entirely contrary in every particular to the statement which the hon. gentleman has made.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think I am out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Cape Breton must accept the statement of the hon. member for Annapolis.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite understand what the hon. gentleman says.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does the hon. gentleman desire me to repeat what I have said?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am up against just what I expected.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I ask the hon. gentleman to take back his assertion to the effect that I had gone to office-holders and advised them not to vote, on the assurance that they would hold their offices, or words to that effect.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member would be well advised to accept the statement of the hon. member for Annapolis as to what was done.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will comply with your ruling, Sir, if we understand each other as to what the ruling is upon. I understand the hon. member for Annapolis to be referring this House to certain evidence that was given before a judge in the county of Victoria.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says that I failed to prove certain things in that court. I submit that that is not the kind of statement upon which I am bound to accept anything he may say in this House.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I rise to a point of order. I do not think there can be any doubt in this matter. The hon. gentleman has said that I went to certain office-holders in the county of Victoria and assured them that if they were to stay home from the polls they would hold their offices. That statement is absolutely false. Furthermore, as I have said, it ought to be within the knowledge of the hon. gentleman that the statement is false, because he tried to establish something of that kind and dismally failed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Cape Breton must accept the statement of the member for Annapolis—that is very clear. No action outside of the House would qualify that rule. I may point out to the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria that the motion under consideration is with respect to the production of certain papers. I do not think that the address which the hon. gentleman was making with respect to the hon. member for Annapolis has any bearing upon the matter before the House. I hope, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will bring his remarks to bear more closely upon the question which is under consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have for a long time had the privilege of addressing this House, and I am aware of my responsibilities and the scope of my power in addressing the Chair. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will at all events keep as close to the line as did the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred. He went far afield; he covered all these grounds, and so did the hon. Minister of Customs. They dealt with our conduct—what we used to do, what we did and what we did not do. In coming to the point that I purpose making, I have the right to deal in a general way with the conduct of the hon. gentleman who represents the county of Annapolis in respect to the matter of dismissals. Beyond that I shall not go. While I may not come to the point as directly as you, Mr. Speaker, might think proper, I will get there, if you permit me, even if by a somewhat circuitous route.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. Minister of Customs and the hon. member for Annapolis were not, I think, out of order in referring to a matter of policy. That is an entirely different matter from dealing with the personal actions of an hon. gentleman who makes a speech in the House. The hon. gentleman would be well advised to confine his remarks to the subject before the Chair.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman has not withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. While the hon. member for North Cape Breton has the floor it is not in order for any hon. gentleman to interrupt, except on a point of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Then I rise to a point of order to remind you that the hon. gentleman has not withdrawn the statement to which I objected.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I heard the hon. member for Annapolis properly, he complained that I said that in the county of Victoria he was asking people to remain home from voting, on the promise of their getting offices, or on the threat that they would lose their position. I said nothing of the kind. Unless a guilty conscience accused him, I do not see how that came to the hon. gentleman's mind. I think it is open to members of the House, even jocularly, if you like, to say something about our friends in the House who are zealous in the discharge of their duties, particularly in the matter of dismissals. I was simply observing that my hon. friend had put himself on the pedestal of a statesman, and that the dismissal of a poor old man in the county of Annapolis, after his having been left in office nearly six years after the change of government in 1911, was not the act of a statesman. I was pointing out that my learned friend was not living up to his old oath, when he swore that he was a statesman in the court of Mr. Justice Russell in the province of Nova Scotia. He was asked: Are you a politician?—asked by Mr. Lovett, a gentleman well known to you Mr. Speaker—are you a politician Mr. Davidson? And he answered: no sir, I am a statesman. I am looking for great things from great sources; and you will pardon me also when I point out that this proud bird, the eagle, which is supposed to deal with this thing, that this great bird, the statesman-eagle of Annapolis, has fallen on such poor, small prey as this poor man who was dismissed from office. After all we shall come to this conclusion that an insect is still but an insect at most, though it crawl on the head of a queen, and after this, notwithstanding the records of Mr. Justice Russel's court and the sworn testimony, we shall have to deal with the member of Annapolis, knowing that he has the same old feet of clay we were accustomed to in the days gone by. We were told that this man Schaffner had on the morning of the election a woe-begone look on his face. That is the statement made by the hon. member for Annapolis. He had a visage that was simply frightful. Well, I should like to have a snapshot of the two visages on that morning, because up to that time and for several days afterwards the position of the hon. member was very insecure indeed; he held on by a single thread; there were only thirteen very doubtful votes between him and the cold shades of outside, and it was only by a compromise, not by the will of the people of Annapolis, that the hon. member has a seat in this House.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Not nearly as insecure as—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DAVIDSON—the hon. gentleman's was six years ago when a judge helped him in.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are some people in this House who can break in from a certain side of the House absolutely regardless of the rules, and they do it with full impunity, for what reason I do not know. I was saying that if the visage of the hon. member was held up to us with the visage of this poor man who was dismissed from office, I think there would be some difficulty for hon. gentlemen in this House to discern which was the most woe-begone. I hope and I believe that the expression of my learned and hon. friend to this man when he met him that morning was: "Alas, my poor brother!"

We are told that this man was to hold his peace for a number of years, that he was to express no opinion, forsooth, because, according to the Minister of Customs, he held an office, the salary of which is so small that not even a limping, crippled returned soldier would take it. That, Sir, is the policy of the high-minded men of the Government and those supporting them; no matter how small the salary was, even if it was so small that nobody would bother taking it who could expect to make a living in any other way—that he has got to go about mum, absolutely tied to the chariot wheels of this party and never express an opinion of his own. I would say to the Minister of Customs, if he were here, and to other members of the Government, that if ever there was a case where there should have been an inquiry before dismissing a man, it was in this case. There is not a word of direct evidence against him, according to the hon. member himself. Every word the hon. member stated against Schaffner is based on hearsay evidence. He travelled on the hearsay evidence of men who came over from the United States, who went to the customs house, and my hon. friend heard them saying that this officer was telling them there were some crooked dealings by this Government, and that money paid for duties might go in that direction. That is absolutely hearsay, and everything else that was laid to the charge of this man is in the same position. I submit that there should have been an investigation. Schaffner is not in the happy position of my hon. friend who can come here and, in the high court of Parliament, state his case and justify this dismissal. This man is a poor man, but he has a right under British justice and under our rules to be heard and have his case put before this House and the authorities of this country, and let them pass judgment upon it. But we have the one-sided partial, statement of the member for Annapolis, without the slightest opportunity being given to this man to state his case. The Government of this country, during war time, when they ought to be dealing with mighty things, take the sword in their hands—it is the only sword any of them ever took—and cut the head off this poor man. I congratulate them upon the high position they have taken, and the kind of slaughter they are making in these war times among the enemies of the Tory party.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Just a word more. The hon. member for Annapolis doubtless has the advantage over me and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in his statements about the conduct of the dismissed official. I suppose we are bound to accept his statements because we are not acquainted with the facts. But, nevertheless, it is a very suspicious circumstance that the official records disclose that Mr. Schaffner was dismissed upon the ground of political partisanship, whereas the hon. member for Annapolis justifies the dismissal upon the ground of gross official irregularity on the part of this dismissed official.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. If I said anything of that kind I did not intend to. What I did say was that he was entitled to dismissal on account of offensive partisanship; but he was also entitled to dismissal on the ground of irregularities. Out of deference to his feelings I advanced the lesser evil.

Mr. MACLEAN: I accept the statement of the hon. member for Annapolis upon that point. But I do say that if the hon. member did not see fit to justify his recommendation for dismissal upon the ground of official irregularity, he should not resort to that defence here to-day. If that official was guilty of official irregularity, it was only fitting and proper that he should be dismissed. But if my hon. friend had knowledge of these facts, he should have communicated them to the Minister of Customs; an investigation should have been held, and upon such grounds the man should have been dismissed. Personally I am not interested in the welfare of Mr. Schaffner. He is absolutely unknown to me.

I made a few observations upon this motion for the purpose of calling to the attention of the House one or two principles that were involved. I say this, that the Government had no right to dismiss an official now or since last October upon the ground of political partisanship unless it was grossly offensive, because the official is in the same position as a member of Parliament, and there has been an understanding that when even a vacancy occurs in Parliament to-day the political party holding that seat shall have it filled by another gentleman supporting that party, if the seat is filled at all. I should like to point ont to the hon. gentleman again that the Government is in power to-day, I assume, with limited powers.

I take it that the extension granted last year was upon the assumption that there should not be an exercise of many of the powers usually exercised during peace time and within the ordinary parliamentary term. I do not find any fault with the statement of the Minister of Customs with respect to what should be the conduct of officials. I think all civil servants should abstain from active political interference. I have always advised any of my own political friends whom I have recommended to office to abstain from political activity, first, because I do not believe in it, and, in the next place, because I have never found their influence of any great value to me. Nor, have I ever observed them to be influential when active for the body who appointed them.

The other principle I wished to impress upon hon. gentlemen was in reference to the fulfilment of their pledges as contained in the orders in council of November, 1915, as amended by the subsequent order in council of October, 1916. The Minister of Customs states that it was not called to his attention that the gentleman appointed had been rejected upon offering to enlist and I am bound to assume that the hon. member for Annapolis never called the attention of the Minister of Customs to this fact.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am quite certain I did advise the minister that this individual had been rejected when he offered for military service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understood the minister to say that he did not have that information.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not think the minister spoke with certainty as to that.

Mr. MACLEAN: Perhaps I am wrong. I want to close by asking the hon. member for Annapolis a question. He heard the Minister of Customs say that he regarded this appointment as temporary and that as soon as he could learn of a returned soldier who was an applicant for the office and who would be fitted for it, the present occupant would be removed and such applicant be put in his place. Do I understand the hon. member for Annapolis to agree with that statement?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understand that the position is just filled temporarily and that if for any reason it should be found advisable not to make the appointment permanent, that the present incumbent should prove incompetent, and there should be any soldier found who would be eligible, I think it very likely he might get it.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

Mr. MACDONALD moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the exclusion at St. John, N.B., from Canada, of Mr. Corsbie, son of Jacob Corsbie, of Trinidad, a British subject, on the alleged ground of his being of Chinese extraction, and in regard to the deportation of said Corsbie.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am making this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to what I think was very objectionable and ill-considered treatment of a young man belonging to the Island of Trinidad and who was endeavouring to come to Canada in the month of August, 1916, for the purpose of being educated. The circumstances in connection with the matter have received a great deal of attention in that sister Dominion of ours and have caused a great deal of ill-feeling. For a number of years the Presbyterian body in Canada have maintained an organization in Trinidad. The matter was brought to my notice and I have been asked to call the attention of the House to it by representatives of the church resident in the Island of Trinidad. The circumstances will be explained perhaps more clearly in the correspondence which I will read than if I attempted to state them. First, I will read from a letter written by the Rev. Dr. Coffin, formerly of Prince Edward Island, but who is now located at San Farnando, Trinidad. He writes on October 14 to a friend of his, a clergyman, in the province of Nova Scotia, as follows:

San Fernando, Trinidad,
October 13, 1916.

Dear Mr. Thomson:

I am enclosing you a statement from Jacob Corsbie in regard to his son. His statement will explain the case. His return has caused a great amount of talk and bad feeling. Personally, I do not believe that he was treated fairly, but according to a rule of thumb method of interpreting the Immigration Act. Canadians can hardly be respected abroad if this is a sample of our laws and their working.

The boy was harshly treated after the manner of a criminal. His brother in Halifax could not see him except under escort of police. His father as you knew is our representative elder and has a seat if elected in the Canadian General Assembly. Just think of him going up and being treated as a criminal practically.

The boy does not know a word of Chinese and is a westerner to all intents and purposes, with almost as much Scotch blood in him as Chinese and in every other respect much more Scotch than Chinese. With all good wishes.

Yours, &c.,

F. J. Coffin.

He encloses a letter written by Mr. Corsbie, father of the young man, which is as follows:

Prince of Wales Street,
San Fernando, Trinidad, B.W.I.,
October 7, 1916.

Dear Sir,—

In reference to our conversation relative to my son, I now write you and ask you to interest yourself in the matter, as I consider this treatment was very unjust to a British subject, and for this purpose I give you the following facts:

1. On the 19th August last, my son, Clement Russell Corsbie, age 14, sailed by the Royal Mail SS. Caraquet for Halifax, N.S., Canada, and has come back yesterday by the same steamer, as the Canadian Government forbade his landing.

2. I came to Trinidad from China in my childhood, and have lived here for over 50 years, formerly as a teacher in connection with the Canadian Mission here, then as bailiff and commissioner of assessments for the borough of San Fernando, and latterly as a Peasant Cocoa proprietor.

3. I received part of my education in Canada at the Galt Collegiate Institute, Ontario, under the late Dr. William Tassie, M.A., LL.D.

4. My wife, the mother of the boy, is a creole of the Island (coloured, not black), and her ancestors for generations have been British subjects. Her grandfather was a Scotchman from Scotland.

5. My son was educated at the Canadian Presbyterian Mission School, San Fernando, and his object in going to Canada was to further his studies under his brother Wilfred (Fred) Corsbie, druggist with E. M. Macleod, Esq., of Halifax, N.S., who has been so employed for the past 8 years.

6. My son had with him a passport from the Government of this colony, stating and certifying that he was a British subject, and required in the name of His Majesty all those whom it may concern to allow Clement Russell Corsbie to pass freely without let or hindrance, and to afford him every assistance and protection of which he may stand in need. Signed by "J. R. Chancellor, R.E., K.C.M.G., D.S.O.", the Governor of the colony, on the 16th day of August, 1916.

7. In the face of this, the Canadian Government flatly declined to admit him unless he deposited £100, and as he and his brother had not this amount, he was . . . transported, and I had to stand the expenses of his being sent back.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

I venture to assert that this is a case of extreme hardship and unjust treatment to a British subject, for my son is a born British subject, and the object he had in view was education. Before leaving here he had complied with all the regulations and requirements. He was going there to be with his brother, who is employed and who would help to maintain him, and my intention was to remit an allowance regularly for his maintenance so he would not be under any charge to the Government there.

Canada claims to be very anxious to promote closer relationship with the West Indies, and to aid in this a trade preference exists between us, but these efforts are wholly offset if the treatment above described is to be meted out to His Majesty's subjects from the West Indies.

Thanking you in anticipation for your kind assistance. I am,

Yours faithfully,

J. W. Corsbie.

Rev. F. J. Coffin, Ph.D.

The boy's mother's relatives are a well known and distinguished family of West Indians. One of them is a solicitor, who occupies a high position in his profession. When this young man arrived at St. John the Government detained him on the ground that he was of Chinese origin. The Rev. Mr. Morton, who was at one time a prominent Presbyterian minister in Trinidad, happened to be in St. John at the time, and obtained the good offices of a gentleman who is well known to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I refer to Judge Forbes. These two gentlemen, I am informed, laid before the Government the facts of the case, which has created a very bad feeling, not only in the island, as shown by these letters and certain other evidence that has come to our people in Nova Scotia, but the subject has also been discussed at very great length in the Presbyterian Church in Nova Scotia generally and with considerable energy in the Presbyterian papers of the province.

I know that the statute is not very broad with reference to the exclusion of persons of Chinese origin, but it does seem to me that in a case like this, where the young man was highly spoken of, there should be such an interpretation of the Act as would avoid such a situation as has occurred. There are certain exemptions from the operations of the Chinese Exclusion Act, which was passed at a time when the feeling in this country in regard to the entry of Chinese was very much stronger than it is now. The exemptions include:—

(a) Members of diplomatic staff, consuls and their servants.

(b) The children born in Canada of parents of Chinese origin and who have left Canada for education or other purposes on substantiating their identity to the satisfaction of the controller of the port or place where they seek to enter on their return.

(c) 1. Merchants, their wives and minor children.
2. The wives and minor children of clergymen.
3. Tourists.
4. Men of science.
5. Subject to regulations made from time to time by Governor in Council, duly certified teachers who shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the Controller.

In this particular case this young man is a minor, the son of a merchant in Trinidad. This Chinese Exclusion Act was manifestly intended to exclude those who are not included in the list of exceptions I have read. It was not intended to exclude such a person as young Corsbie. I am not going to argue whether the Government were acting on the strict letter of the law or not. This young man, according to the strict letter of the law, may possibly be subject to exclusion. But I submit that it was quite within the power of the department, more particularly as power had been given to pass orders in council dealing with certain classes of people whom it was thought desirable to exclude, to have allowed this young man to come into the country, as his identity had been vouched for and his character and status commended to the Government by the gentleman I have mentioned. I think the Government should have had regard to those facts, and should now formally express regret to the Governor of Trinidad for the mistake which they made in excluding this young man, and express their willingness to provide for his admission. One class that are exempt from the operation of the Chinese Immigration Act, subject to regulations made from time to time by the Governor in Council, are duly certified teachers. Now this young man is the son of a teacher, a Canadian graduate. One can well understand what a very real and injurious blow must have been struck at the good feeling which we are so anxious to maintain and develop with our British fellow-citizens in Trinidad, who naturally look to us, as we would desire them to look, in matters of trade and intimacy of all kinds, rather than to the United States—what a deterrent to that good feeling must have arisen when the word reached them that this young man was not allowed to enter Canada to complete his education. The facts that have come to me are from a source that is unquestioned, and I think the Government, now they are brought to their attention, should at once provide for the admission of this young gentleman.

I want to say a word or two generally with reference to the law excluding Chinese. In the United States, at their great universities, one finds quite a number of Chinese who have gone there from China to complete their education, and that ought to be our policy in this country. If the Act, and the regulations made under the Act, are not sufficiently wide to admit these people from China who wish to come here to complete their educational training they should be amended so that there would be no question about the admission of Chinese coming here for that purpose.

I have brought the case of this young man to the attention of the House at the request of some very well-known clergymen in the province of Nova Scotia, who have been connected with the Island of Trinidad The facts are as I have stated, and unless the department has other information justifying their course in this case I submit that some action should be taken by the Government, in order to remove the bad impression which unquestionably exists and will continue to exist in Trinidad in regard to the treatment of this young man.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): This case has been dealt with departmentally. Although I am not conversant with all the facts, I had a short memorandum placed in my hands this morning regarding the motion of my hon. friend. I think some of the statements in the correspondence which he has read are grossly exaggerated. When all the facts are brought down I do not think they will substantiate the statements that were read, that this young man has been treated like a criminal. I cannot quite take the hon. gentleman's view that, because certain respectable gentlemen had vouched for this young man and asked for his admission, the Government should therefore have acceded to their request. We frequently get very strong letters asking us to admit certain people who would be barred by the Immigration Act. In regard to this particular case, the reason why this young man was excluded by the officials of the department was that, according to their interpretation of the Act, he did not come within the exemptions. He was of Chinese origin and therefore was excluded under the Chinese Immigration Act. I will read the short memorandum dealing with this question supplied to me by the Superintendent of Immigration:

Clement Russell Corsbie arrived at St. John, N.B., in September, 1916. While of British nationality, he is of Chinese descent and, not belonging to the exempt classes, could have been legally admitted only upon payment of the $500 head tax. Representations were made to the department by a large number of persons, but as there is no provision in the Chinese Immigration Act for any departure from the terms of same, the department took the stand that admission could be only upon payment of the $500 head tax, and as Corsbie was unable to pay, he was deported. Objection to the department's action was made by his father and a rather severe criticism was made in the Presbyterian Witness, published at Halifax. It was pointed out to this paper that in their views they should criticize the law, not the administration of the law.

(Sgd.) W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration.

That is the only report that has been placed in my hands. I may say that there has been some correspondence with the Governor of Trinidad and a courteous letter was sent to him pointing out that owing to the Chinese Immigration Act this young man was refused admission. I quite agree with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the admission of young Chinese students into the United States under their immigration law for the purpose of attending any of their universities is more liberal than our law in Canada has been up to the present time. For the last two years I have been discussing the question with those who have brought the matter to my attention, and I have already prepared an amendment to the Chinese Immigration Act to be submitted this session, to place the admission of these young Chinese students who desire to attend our schools and colleges, on the same footing as in the United States. This was a case where the young man, according to the interpretation of the officials of the department, did not come under any of the exempt classes, and as he did not have the $500 head tax, he was not admitted. Had he paid the $500 head tax, he would have been admitted and he could have attended any of our universities for one year, and on leaving the country afterwards he would have had that head tax refunded. We do that right along. Any young man of Chinese origin who comes to Canada and attends our universities pays the head tax upon admission, and when he leaves the country, the head tax is refunded. That is the difference between the United States law and ours. The United States do not impose the head tax.

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the wording in the Chinese Immigration Act: "Of Chinese origin"?

Mr. ROCHE: I have not the Act here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would not that mean a man born in China, originating in China? The son of a man who has been a British subject for fifty years is surely not of Chinese origin.

Mr. ROCHE: The Superintendent of Immigration uses the expression "of Chinese descent". The interpretation which the department has placed on the matter—and I think the matter has engaged the particular attention of the department—is that he did not come within any of the exempt classes. That may be wrong and I will have the matter looked into more critically, but I feel sure that no similar case will arise in the future. The Act has not been changed since this Government came into power; this is the manner in which the Act has been administered since it was placed upon the Statute-book, and the same officials are still administering the Act. I quite agree, however, that the Act should be amended and, as I stated before, I have prepared an amendment to be submitted this session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the word in the Act is "origin," and that must mean a man who has been born in China, who is a Chinaman. If the minister is sound in his views, then a man whose great-grandfather happened to be a Chinaman and whose blood might be only about one-tenth Chinese, would be excluded. The Statute surely cannot mean that. In this case the boy was the son of a British subject, a man who had left China when a boy, who had lived in a British colony and who had become a British subject. This boy is a British subject; his mother is not a Chinese woman, and his mother's blood must count in considering the question. If the word is "origin," as the minister seems to think it is, it is clear that this boy ought to have been admitted.

Mr. MACDONALD: The statements that I made in regard to this matter were not comments by myself with reference to anything that occurred at St. John, but were contained in letters which came from Trinidad, and the mention of the manner in which the young man was treated was contained in a letter from the boy's father.

On account of the situation of the library it is difficult to get books outside of those in general use, but my recollection of the Statute is that a person excluded is a person of Chinese origin, and it seems to me a very fine distinction, when you are dealing with a British subject coming from Trinidad, whose status has been certified to by the Government of that colony, to put him within the terms of the Statute. I would like to know what interpretation would be put upon the right to enter Canada of a person for instance, who had been born of a British father but whose mother happened to be born in China, and who therefore had some Chinese blood in him. Could he be exc'uded under that Statute? He could not be, and if you reverse that condition I think that the same reasoning would apply.

I am glad to hear that the minister recognizes that the law requires to be amended. I would suggest, in order to avoid the feeling of resentment which this matter has caused in Trinidad, on account of the notoriety that has been given to this case, that steps be taken to satisfy the authorities there, in so far as it is possible to do so, as to the regret this country has over the exclusion that has been made.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Sir George Foster for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. MACDONALD: Before the House adjourns I would like to ask the hon. gentleman leading the House to call the attention of the Premier to the fact that some information is to be brought down before the War Appropriation Bill comes on. First, I desire to obtain information as to the number of unfit men among the troops taken across the Atlantic, and the cost to the country by reason of these men being enlisted. Then I should like a report on No. 7 and No. 8 hospitals in France, carried on under Canadian auspices. Also, I desire a list of the unmarried men, with their rank and amount of their pay, who are in England and physically fit, and are occupying clerical or staff positions.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) will let me have a memorandum of what he desires, I will bring the matter to the attention of the proper authorities.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 5.15 p.m.

Monday, February 5, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1916-17.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting a Supplementary Estimate for the year ending March 31, 1917, was presented by Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the message from His Excellency the Governor General, with accompanying Estimates, was referred to the Committee of Supply.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

THE ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

With reference to the Hansard of the British House of Commons, July 8, 1915, showing that Sir Arthur Markam asked Mr. Tennant, the Under Secretary for War, the following questions:—

Whether within the past few days the greater part of the Canadian Division at the front had been armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and whether the Canadian Government had been asked to discontinue the manufacture of the Ross rifle?

The Under-Secretary replied as follows:—

"The Ross rifle has been the subject of trial and report by the military authorities in France. The results are now before the Canadian Government. In the light of information received, the situation regarding the War Office contract with reference to this rifle is now being reviewed."

1. Did the Canadian Government receive the report referred to in the reply of the Under Secretary for War.
2. If so, on what date was the report received?
3. What action if any, did the Government take after the receipt of said report, and when was such action taken?
4. Has the manufacture of the Ross rifle on Government account been discontinued?
5. If so, when?

Mr. KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. 19th July, 1915.
3. Action on this matter, i.e., enlargement of chambers, had been taken by the Department of Militia and Defence prior to the receipt of this report.

The Militia Council as a body approved of the enlargement of the chambers in the Ross rifle on the 9th July, 1915, and instructions were issued to the Ross Rifle Co. on that date.

4. No, nor on War Office contract. The Ross rifle contract of 1902 with the Government of Canada contains no proviso permitting of the cancellation of orders founded thereon.

5. Answered by No. 4.

RIVIERE DU LOUP—TADOUSSAC FERRY.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the ferry service been discontinued between River du Loup and Tadoussac during the winter season?
2. If so, why has this service been discontinued?
3. Is the contract still in existence?
4. If so, what company holds same?
5. If not, when did the contract expire?
6. What amount has been paid to the said company during the summer season of 1916, and what amount has been paid during the winter season up to the time of the wreck of the steamer Queen?
7. Is it the intention of the Government to continue such service this winter between River du Loup and Tadoussac?
8. If not, why not?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2. Tenders were called for, but only two proposals were received. The subsidy asked for in one was much too high, and the other tenderer was unable to put a boat on the route during the winter of 1916-17.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. April 30, 1916.

6. No amount has been paid to any one either for the summer of 1916 or the winter of 1916-17.

7. No arrangements have been made.

8. No satisfactory arrangements could be made.

BALLOTS FOR OVERSEAS FORCES.

Mr. KAY:

1. Did the Government send to England in 1915, ballots for the purpose of taking the votes of the soldiers overseas?
2. If so, where are these ballots at the present time?
3. Are they available for use if a general election were held during the present year?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1 and 2. These questions are covered by the answer given to similar questions on the 10th February, 1916. (See Hansard, 1916, vol. 1, p. 673.)

3. The ballots in question are ready, in accordance with the Act, for a general election whenever held.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

To whom were subsidies paid in the calendar year 1916, if any, for trans-Atlantic mail service, in what amounts and upon what basis?

[Mr. Kemp.]

6. If so, has this Government called the attention of the British Government or its representative in Canada, Sir Charles Gunning, to this condition of affairs?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. A certain number of horses have been purchased by the Department of Militia and Defence during the past year for use in Canada. As stated in answer to a question by the hon. member for Kings (P. E. I.) (Mr. J. J. Hughes) on February 14, 1916, (See Hansard, 1916, volume 1, page 759), the Canadian Government has not been purchasing horses for military purposes overseas since the summer of 1915, for the reason that in August of that year an arrangement was made whereby the British Government undertook the purchasing of whatever horses might be necessary, not only for the British forces but for the Canadian forces overseas as well.

2, 3 and 4. This information could not be given at an earlier date, because, when I applied for it, I was informed by Sir Charles Gunning, British Remount Commissioner, Montreal, that it was confidential until the assent of the War Office could be obtained. The assent has now been obtained, and I therefore give the text of a telegram from Sir Charles Gunning as follows:

Am not purchasing horses in Canada at present time. No horses purchased in Canada since December first. Average number per week of horses now being purchased in United States nineteen hundred. No horses being purchased at DesMoines or Indianapolis. Number of horses purchased in Canada between March and November, 1916, six thousand and seventy-nine. Number of horses shipped from Canadian ports during 1916, thirteen thousand three hundred and ninety-six. I do not purchase in Canada during winter months as climatic conditions are such that it is impossible to keep horses in the open, which it is necessary to do for about five weeks to ensure being fit for shipment. It is my intention to resume purchasing in Canada in the spring. The British Remount Officers are in Montreal.

5. The Government have no official information on this subject.

6. The Government has on repeated occasions brought to the attention of the British Government, and also of the British remount commission, the opportunity that exists in Canada to purchase horses suitable for military purposes. These representations are repeated from time to time whenever it seems desirable to do so.

Those in receipt of it were, accordingly, given the privilege of continuing on ordinary rates or taking their discharge. Many were satisfied to remain on ordinary rates.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR A RETURN.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. How many horses have been bought in Canada for war purposes in each of the years 1914, 1915 and 1916, respectively, (a) for the Canadian army; (b) for Britain; and (c) for France and our other allies?
2. What was the amount paid for the horses in each of the years for the different countries mentioned?

NATIONAL SERVICE COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend said the other day that he would look into the question as to whether Major Tilley, a member of the National Service Commission, was in receipt of a salary, and, if so, whether under the statute, he would be disqualified from sitting as a member of the provincial legislature.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really must admit that I have not looked into the matter. As my hon. friend knows, I have been very busy with matters concerning the war appropriation I shall endeavour to get the information as soon as possible.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To-morrow?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will do the best I can.

THE IRISH-CANADIAN RANGERS.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the Minister of Militia prepared to make a statement as to whether the Irish-Canadian Rangers are going to the front as a unit; also as to why the Highland Brigade of Nova Scotia has been prevented from going to the front?

Mr. KEMP: It is intended that the 199th Battalion, known as the Irish Rangers, will be attached to the 5th Division as a unit. With regard to the Highland Brigade of Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy), who has just returned, may have some information. I have not had time to talk to him about the matter, but I will do so; perhaps he will have a statement to make.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the hon. Minister of Militia mean to say that things are going on in England that he does not know anything about?

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BUCHANAN: Has the Government any information to-day from the West with regard to the progress of the negotiations for the settlement of the coal strike? I am advised that at Lethbridge there is already considerable suffering. None of the mines are producing domestic coal. They have not what you call firewood in that country, and the people are burning lumber because they cannot get coal. The situation is extremely serious.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have under my hand a telegram received from the Minister of Labour this morning, the purport of which is that the Fernie strike has been settled. The minister will arrive here on Wednesday morning.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. BUCHANAN: The Prime Minister will observe that the mines at Lethbridge are entirely different from those at Fernie. The mines at Fernie are not producing domestic coal for the use of the people on the prairies, but steam coal. The most critical condition is in regard to the mines at Lethbridge, which produce coal for domestic use on the prairies.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really have no more information than I have given to my hon. friend just now. When the Minister of Labour returns on Wednesday morning, we shall have full information on the matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: The question of the supply of coal for domestic purposes is too essential to be permitted to stand in abeyance until the Minister of Labour returns. We shall be adjourning on Wednesday in all probability, and it is a matter of life and death.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Labour went to the West to study the whole situation in regard to the supply of coal. I am not sure whether the telegram refers to a settlement of all the labour difficulties, or only a partial settlement. In view of the fact that the minister has started upon his return journey, I should suppose that probably a settlement of all the difficulties had been come to. However, I am not sure of that. I shall endeavour to ascertain between now and to-morrow.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LEMIEUX: In view of the judgment by the Exchequer Court a few days ago, will the Minister of Railways say whether the Government intend to implement the legislation of last session concerning the Quebec and Saguenay railway?

Mr. GRAHAM: Before recess?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Minister of the Interior taken into consideration the conditions in the Peace River country in regard to seed grain, and have any steps been taken to meet the conditions?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. Some officials of the Immigration Branch are now in the Peace River country studying conditions with a view to meeting any contingencies that may arise.

FIFTH CANADIAN DIVISION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MARCIL: Can the Government give any further information in regard to the Canadian Associated Press cable which appeared in the morning paper. The despatch reads:

> Brigadier General Garnet Hughes, son of Sir Sam Hughes, it is expected will be given command of the Fifth Canadian Division, the organization of which is being completed here. Whether the Fifth Division will be sent to the front must depend largely upon the response of Canada to the call for men.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have no official information on the subject.

THE CARE OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (Lambton West) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely: the proper treatment, care and provision for employment of returned soldiers, and the desirability of appointing a committee of the House to sit during the adjournment, for the purpose of considering this subject and reporting to the House at as early a date as possible.

And leave having been granted,

Mr. PARDEE: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt of the fact that while the war and the winning of the war is uppermost in our minds, we have the supreme duty of providing that the men who left comfortable homes, who gave up profitable employment and lucrative positions, who went overseas from a sense of loyalty and devotion, and who were willing when so going to make, if necessary, the great sacrifice, and many of whom have returned to Canada broken in body and health, shall be fitly and properly taken care of by the state. Let me for one moment refer to what these men have done. I quote now from a report submitted by the Canadian War Records Office to the right hon. Prime Minister:—

> The duty of the Records Office was to follow the fortunes of the First Division in France, to share its experience, and to give to the people of Canada an account of the performances of its regiments; and finally to enshrine in a contemporary history those exploits which will make the First Division immortal. That division stood at Ypres in May, 1915, as the last bulwark of civilization against the triumphant inroads of barbarism. They held the pass and barred the road to Calais.

If the man who made that report had written volumes of the record of the Canadian troops he could not have said more than he has said in those few sentences. When we say that, just let us consider for one moment what the result would have been to Canada and to the Empire had the road to Calais not been blocked. Those men did it, or helped to do it, and to those men our gratitude ought to be due, not in a sentimental way, but in a manner to redound to the credit of the state. These men, when they enlisted and went overseas, did not go to fight for the love of fighting. They went from a sense of loyalty and a sense of duty. They went to preserve liberty, to maintain justice, to preserve the very Empire itself, and thus—I am speaking here as a Canadian to Canadians—they have secured for Canada and her people prosperity, contentment and wealth. So far as Canada is concerned, with the exception of those mothers and those fathers who have given their sons to this holy cause, none of us has felt the stress of warfare, all have lived in happiness and contentment. It has undoubtedly been noticed by every member of this House that calls are constantly being sent out for charity for these men. Concerts are given, entertainments are advertised as being for the help of the returned soldiers. Let me just read a statement which I cut from one of the Ottawa papers in answer to a circular that apparently had been distributed throughout this city, asking for help of a charitable kind, such as I have described. Here is a letter from a man with sons at the front.

He says:

> I think the conditions revealed in a circular which is being distributed from door to door soliciting aid for our returned soldiers is a disgrace to our country. That the Government should make no provision to aid the returned soldiers who have been rendered unfit for further duty at the front until such time as he would be in a position to help himself, would seem incredible if the information had not come from such a source. If the Government decided that the matter could best be attended to by local boards in the localities whence the soldiers came—why is no provision made to finance such boards?
> If the cost is to be a separate charge on the citizens, why not raise the money by means of taxation, with a poll tax on those who do not otherwise pay taxes?

Many of us are paying from 2 to 2½ per cent of our income to the Patriotic Fund. Those of us who have sons at the front would hesitate to assume additional responsibilities to provide for—I shall say—an additional Patriotic Fund. Our own sons may return disabled, and in need of all the assistance we can render in this line.

If the Government of Canada and of the provinces have done as little as one would infer from a perusal of this circular in question—simply authorizing Aid Commissions to solicit charity, or raise money in any old way, I, for one, cannot agree with that part of the circular which says they "have not been unmindful of their responsibilities."

My argument, and I shall state it very shortly, is that no charity should be asked for, or given, to men who have rendered such splendid service to their country. It is degrading to the men, and it is degrading to the people of Canada. I say that those who, during the stress and struggle of the past two and a half years have lived here in peace and happiness and contentment, should not be solicited to contribute towards a fund to provide for returned soldiers, but that they should be made to pay, and to pay proportionately to their worth. That is, I take it, Sir, the real thought of the people of Canada. I believe that this is a matter which is wholly under the control of the Government, and that the Government should take it up at once. A central organization should be established, and that central organization should see to it that every soldier who returns, and every soldier who ought to be helped, is helped in a way that is fit and proper, to the needs of that particular man. I understand that about 200,000 men have left our shores.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: About 300,000, I think.

Mr. PARDEE: That makes my argument all the stronger. About 300,000 men have left our shores, and, according to the figures which I have, about 10,600 have returned. There are to-day in England about 12,000 invalided Canadian soldiers, and they will return to Canada at the rate of about 2,000 per month. When the war is over the men will come back at the rate of ten times the number that are coming back to-day, and I say that to subject these returned men to the vicissitudes of such an organization as now exists, will do justice neither to the men themselves nor to the citizenship of this country. We established in the province of Ontario a soldiers' commission under the Act of 1916. That soldiers' commission may be all very well in its way, but in speaking to its chairman in Ottawa, he informed me that on making enquiry the answer he received was: We want you to go on and do as much as you can for these men, and when you have got to the end of your tether we will take the matter up. That is not right. That is absolutely throwing back upon charity the maintenance of these men. In so far as the Ottawa commission is concerned, they tell me that they have absolutely got to the end of their rope. They have found employment, not always permanent, for the men who have returned; but to-day they are up against the fact that they cannot take care of any more returned soldiers. Then you have the Soldiers' Association itself here in Ottawa, and I understand that these soldiers' associations have been established in various centres of Canada. In Winnipeg they have a Soldiers' Association with 1,100 members; in Victoria one with 300 members; in Woodstock one with 150 members; in Vancouver, one with 250 members; in Hamilton, one with 300 members; in Edmonton, one with 300 members; in Calgary, one with 200 members; in Ottawa one with 200 members; in Montreal one with 500 members, and in Toronto, one with 700 members. These men are also endeavouring out of the goodness of their hearts—though so far as I know without financial assistance from the Government—to do what they can to help their comrades who have returned from overseas, but it is plainly evident to any one who will take the trouble to think the matter over for a few minutes that every one of these associations or commissions which I have mentioned must very rapidly come to an end of its resources; and then, forsooth, the soldiers will come back here in a broken and maimed condition, and there will be no proper organization to take care of them. I read from a newspaper published last Saturday:

From London, Ontario, it is reported that Private G. Walton of Windsor, a returned invalided soldier, was without overcoat or gloves, and had his hands frozen at Quebec. He is being cared for in the London hospital, and his case should receive such attention as will make similar cases impossible.

That is one concrete case, and, I have no doubt, there are hundreds of similar cases. It is not altogether the fault of the commissions because, so far as I can learn, some of the soldiers themselves are not too anxious to be helped, and some of them do as they ought not to do on their return to this country. Nevertheless, the large proportion of them come back in such a state that if properly taken care of they can be made useful to the state and useful to themselves.

A pension scheme has, of course, been established, but I will not weary the House by referring to it in detail because every member is familiar with its provisions. It makes a certain allowance for certain disabilities according to a percentage. In Class 6, for instance, it provides "Disability under 20 per cent, a gratuity not exceeding $100." That is, if a man comes back 20 per cent less able bodied than when he went away, he is handed $100, and allowed to shift for himself. The men who went overseas were actual economic forces in this country for the good of the country, and if they have returned disabled to even a greater extent than 20 per cent, to the extent of 40 per cent or even up to 60 per cent, my contention is that they ought not to be allowed to depend merely upon a pension. The man who does nothing, who takes all and gives nothing, is of no use to the country. The Pensions Board ought to see that the men who are injured to the extent of 20, 40, 60, or even 80 per cent are taken in hand, taught some trade, and, as I said before, made of actual good to the country and to themselves; otherwise, it simply means that we will be paying millions of dollars in pensions and receiving absolutely no return therefor. Let me read an instance of what they are doing at St. Maurice in France:

> St. Maurice is a hive of workshops of all kinds, shoemaking shops, machine shops, auto repair shops, blacksmith shops with blazing forges, and clothes-making shops, and the workmen are the wounded soldiers from the firing line, minus an arm, leg or eye, on which they had before depended, but now launched on a new line which did not need that arm, leg or eye.

There is also the other scheme of teaching returned soldiers farming, and with that is coupled the question of land grants. With land grants out and out, I am not in sympathy, as I have before said in this House. Then there is the question of central camps, where the men could be taken to learn a trade, and then afterwards be distributed. These are all things, I submit, Mr. Speaker, which the people of this Dominion want to see attended to, and which it is the bounden duty of the Government to do. I admit that it is a large question. Other countries have had wars, and have had to tackle this same sort of problem, but we must remember that today in Canada we have to get into the way of doing big things. We belong to a mighty empire, and we have to grow bigger in the bigness of the whole, and if we want to succeed and be the nation that we ought to be, no duty and no obligation should be too great for us to shoulder on behalf of our citizen soldiers. These men are coming back from the front in daily increasing numbers, and so far as I know their care has so far been neglected by the Government. There is no further time to lose. This House will shortly adjourn for, I suppose, two or three months. In that time valuable information might be collected and valuable statistics gathered by a committee that should be appointed for that purpose. The committee could make a report which would be available for the benefit of the House when it re-assembles. It appears to me that now is the time to take action. No further time should be wasted, for every day that is lost means just that much the worse for the men who return from fighting our battles.

My own opinion is, if I may venture to give it to the House, that a Federal Commission composed of men of the highest standing with broad and full authority should be appointed by the Crown to continue for a period of say five years after the conclusion of peace, for the purpose of dealing with these questions. The commission should, of course, have an efficient staff and equipment. At each provincial capital and at one or more important points in the provinces from which enlistments have been greatest, sub-commissioners or agents should be appointed. They should be required to make frequent reports to the chief commissioners, not only on subjects of which the commission might seek information, but also upon all matters coming to their notice or in any way relative to returned soldiers. This would prevent overlapping of work between Dominion and provincial commissioners in case the provinces undertook in their own way to deal with the situation. Wherever also city or other municipal commissions have been or will be established the federal office should be in close touch with these also.

In conclusion, I again urge that this should be made a Government matter for which the Government should be responsible; that the funds required whatever they may be, should not in any way be allowed to be solicited or distributed in a way which savours of charity, and that whatever moneys are necessary for carrying on the work successfully should be made part of the national debt of Canada for which the people of this country would be responsible.

There can be no question, there is none in my own mind at least, that were this done it would be an aid to recruiting. There are instances within my own personal knowledge, and undoubtedly there are hundreds of others, where recruiting to the extent of at least two or three men has been hindered by the fact that no sufficient provision is made for returned soldiers. When the war ends the need will be greater than it is to-day, or than it has been, and I say that we should guard ourselves against that day, so that when it does come we should be at least in a partial condition and in a partial state of readiness to take care of the men when they come.

I cannot close my remarks better, Sir, than by reading the following paragraph in the Ottawa Soldiers' Aid Commission literature.

> Our duty to them is clear. They have been our substitute on the battlefields of France and Flanders. They have suffered in our behalf. Their bodies have been maimed in our defence. On us rests the high and sacred obligation of making their future lives reasonably comfortable and as useful as possible.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my hon. friend has brought this subject to the attention of the House and country, and I say at once there is not the slightest objection to the constitution of a committee such as he suggests. I shall see to it that such a committee is appointed, and that the information which I am about to give to the House as to what has been done is placed before it with a view to supplementing as far as may be necessary in the judgment of the committee the very great work that has already been accomplished, and which I think is very inadequately appreciated by my hon. friend, judging by the observations he has just addressed to the House.

I quite agree with what my hon. friend has said as to the very great desirability of obtaining employment for the men who return from overseas, and the great desirability also of vocational training and re-education for such of them as are unable to engage in their former occupations. It is beyond question that the worst service we could do to any one of these men would be to place him in such a position that he would not be disposed to make an effort on his own part, in so far as his physical condition permitted. In this country we are all labouring men, in one sense. There is no idle or unemployed class, and it is desirable to give to the returned soldier a reasonable opportunity to engage in any activity which may be of use to him and to the state as well. I understand that to be the view of my hon. friend, and in that view I absolutely concur.

In connection with what my hon. friend has said respecting the raising of funds, I was very much impressed the other evening by the observations which my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) addressed to the House on this subject. I took upon myself to ascertain what measures, if any, had been taken in other countries, particularly in the United Kingdom, to put some restriction or limitation upon the raising of funds in aid of men who have returned from overseas service, because, while it is no doubt true in the vast majority of cases that these funds are undertaken with good-will, with good intentions, and for a good purpose, nevertheless one who listened to the observations of my hon. friend on that subject could not fail to be impressed with the view that there might be opportunities of an undesirable character in that connection, and that some restriction should be placed in this, as in other countries, upon the raising of funds for such purposes. I have placed in the hands of Mr. Gisborne, the Parliamentary counsel, the legislation which has been passed in the United Kingdom, and I have asked him to adapt that legislation to conditions in this country. It will have to be modified very considerably, because in the legislation in the United Kingdom use is made of certain bodies which are non-existent in this country. I hope Mr. Gisborne will soon be able to bring that work to a conclusion, and to present to the Government his recommendations as to the legislation which might be adopted with advantage by this Parliament.

Another observation that I would like to make is that not all the rumours and stories that come to us with regard to returned soldiers are absolutely founded on fact. I have had a great many of them brought to my own attention; I have taken a great deal of trouble on some occasions to investigate them, and in many instances I have found that the person who had written to me on the subject had not been well informed, and that the conditions were absolutely different from those which had been represented to me.

My hon. friend has stated that about 10,600 men have returned from overseas service. I have no official figures before me, and I accept his estimate for the time being. Those men may be divided into two classes: first, those who, upon arrival in Canada, are retained under the care of the Military Hospitals Commission, placed in hospitals, in sanatoria, or in convalescent homes, and who continue to draw their pay and allowances and to be provided for in that way; and, secondly, those who are discharged and as to whom it is the duty of the Federal and provincial governments to see that they have every opportunity for employment either in the occupations in which they were previously engaged or in some other occupation.

It may be well for me to go in some detail into this question, because it is perfectly obvious that my hon. friend is not fully informed as to all that has been done or as to all the arrangements that have been made; and indeed I am sure that is true of a great many of the members of this House and doubtless of a very large number of the people throughout the country, because in the vast work which is being carried on in connection with the war it is beyond expectation that even the members of this House would be fully advised of all that has been accomplished in relation to matters such as this or of a like character.

My hon. friend has referred to the question of settlement upon the land. So far as that is concerned, there was a conference between representatives of the Federal Government and of the provincial governments some few weeks ago at which the subject was taken up in a good deal of detail. The conference was called more particularly for the purpose of ascertaining what arrangements for land settlement or employment would be available in Canada for such of the soldiers from the British Islands as might desire to make their home in this Dominion. It was and is the purpose of the British Government to retain, if possible, those men within the British Islands. If, however, any number of them are disposed to emigrate from the British Isles, it is equally the desire of the British Government that they should come to one or other of the overseas dominions. For that purpose they have constituted in the British Isles a central body on which they have asked each of the overseas dominions to be represented, and we have appointed Mr. J.

4 p.m. Bruce Walker, of Winnipeg, a man of great experience in these matters, to be the representative of Canada for the time being upon the central body. The Imperial Government desire from the Dominion Government, as well as from the provincial governments, information as to what assistance will be given in respect of land settlement. They also desire to know what the conditions are generally throughout the Dominion with regard to employment for those that may not desire to settle upon the land. And it is my expectation, when I go overseas within a few days or weeks, that I shall be able to take with me information upon that subject. The provincial governments have had that matter under consideration, the Federal Government has also had the matter under consideration, and before this session is brought to a conclusion, hon. members may expect that perhaps more than one measure with regard to land settlement will be brought down and submitted for the consideration of Parliament.

The question of demobilization, to which my hon. friend has alluded, generally, if not specifically, has also been under consideration. A commission will shortly be appointed within the United Kingdom to deal with such matters as have to be undertaken there, and I notice that it is the purpose of the National Service Board to obtain pretty full detail from the men of the Canadian forces overseas as to the occupations in which they were engaged before they enlisted, as to their desire upon their return to re-engage in those occupations, or to settle upon the land or to be otherwise employed. The card which is to be sent out to them will ask for information as to a great variety of subjects, which it is thought will be of valuable assistance when demobilization takes place. The National Service Board is also taking steps to make what is called an industrial survey of Canada with a view to ascertaining what employment may be available for men of our own forces or men who may emigrate to this country from the British Islands when the war shall have been brought to a conclusion. In other words, the purpose is to get information, in the first place, from the men themselves as to their desire to settle upon the land or to be employed in some other way, and to obtain a just estimate of their experience in the work for which they are best suited; then in the second place to ascertain by inquiries in this country, first, what opportunities for land settlement there will be, whether under the Federal legislation to which I have alluded or under legislation by the provinces, and, secondly, what opportunities for employment there are likely to be in Canada after the war has been brought to a conclusion.

On the one hand, we shall have information as to the experience, the knowledge, the training of the men who will return from the overseas forces and their desire to settle upon the land or otherwise; on the other hand, information as to the opportunities, whether for land settlement or for other employement, which will be available in this country when the war is over.

Coming, however, to what is being done at the present moment with regard to the men who have returned from overseas, I have asked the Military Hospitals Commission to give me a pretty full memorandum of all that they have undertaken and carried out. It is not claimed, of course, that the arrangements already made have reached a final stage of perfection, and the experience which is gained in these matters from time to time may and very likely will result in additional organization and perhaps in modification of the organization already established. When the men began to return from overseas, the Government sought for the experience of other countries so as to learn by that experience what were the best arrangements for their reception and treatment. It was found that in the United Kingdom, in the other Dominions and in France as well, experiments were being tried, and that it would be necessary for Canada to make experiments and to learn something by her own experience. A system has been evolved here which is thought by those who are responsible for it to be a very good one, and to be equal, if not superior, to any system elsewhere in force within the Empire. At least I am informed by the secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission that Sir Rider Haggard, who recently passed through Canada after visiting South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, was especially appreciative of the system which he found in vogue in this country. I understand he also had a very considerable knowledge of what had been accomplished in this connection in the United Kingdom. Speaking before the Canadian Club at Regina in July last, he said:

I heartily congratulate the Canadian Government for so wise and humane a system. I make no comparisons. We are told that comparisons are odious, but I have travelled through the Empire and I know of no system equal to that which you are fortunate enough to have in Canada.

Another statement coming from a thoroughly impartial source is contained in a letter dated the 15th day of December, 1916, to the Secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission from Mr. W. Fitzpatrick, C. M.G., a member of the State War Council for Victoria, Australia. Mr. Fitzpatrick says:

The principles you have laid down are so sound, and the organization is so good, that I have hopes we will follow in your foot-steps largely. While on the whole there is a great similarity between the methods in Canada and Australia we did not approach the problem with the systematic methods that characterize your schemes. Our work has been disjointed—piecemeal and irregular, but I hope that with the Canadian example before us as I have presented it in my pamphlet there will be more uniformity in the future.

It is, I assume, within the knowledge of the members of this House that during the summer of 1915 a commission was established by order in council which is known as the Military Hospitals Commission. That commission was charged with the duty of providing convalescent homes and hospitals for those who returned to Canada invalided or otherwise disabled. It is presided over by a member of the Government, Sir James Lougheed, and it has established a large number of institutions where men are receiving treatment. In speaking in the debate on the Address, I set forth the character and number of these institutions. Perhaps it might not be amiss if I should state once more the scope which their operations have attained.

There are four classes of patients dealt with by the Commission in hospitals and convalescent homes in various parts of the country. First, there is the treatment of active cases—I understand active cases to be those which require continuous medical treatment. Up to quite recently we have not had many of these; but, owing to the great number of casualties in the fighting on the Somme, it became necessary that active cases, as well as others, should be sent to Canada in order that the British hospitals could be cleared. We have had a number of them already, and anticipate that many more will come in the future. The second class is the convalescent; the third, those who suffer from tuberculosis; and the fourth, those who suffer from some special disorder, such, for instance, as shell shock or rheumatism. The Commission has now in operation, or under construction for the above purposes, the following institutions: for class one, sixteen hospitals or homes, with accommodation for 2,600 men; for class two, twenty-seven institutions, accommodating 4,700 men; for class three, eighteen institutions, with accommodation for 900 men; and for class four, four institutions, with accommodation for 200 men. The number of men who have passed through the hands of the Commission is nearly 10,000.

It might be worth while for me to state, for the information of the House and the country, the course taken with regard to a man from the time he becomes invalided or wounded until he returns to Canada, and until he is finally rehabilitated. When a man is wounded he is taken to the nearest medical station and thence to a base hospital. Possibly, thereafter, he is taken to another hospital, and, if his injury is severe, he is transferred to England. I need not attempt to go through all the various stages of the work in England. When a case reaches a condition in which transference to Canada is deemed advisable a party is made up which is accompanied by medical and other officers, and the men are sent across the Atlantic. The Government has established three receiving depots, the principal one of which is at Quebec, with subsidiary depots at St. John and Halifax. During the summer months most of the steamers come direct to Quebec, where the men disembark and enter the depot. In winter they disembark either at Halifax or at St. John, and the men residing in the Maritime Provinces enter the receiving depot at the port of arrival, and those for other parts of Canada, or destined for further treatment elsewhere, proceed by train to Quebec to enter the receiving depot at the port. A board of three medical officers examines every man who is invalided. This board has before it the medical records forwarded from England, and recommends that the man be discharged or that further treatment be given him, according to his condition. Discharge is given when the disability from which the man is suffering is not a result of service, and has not been aggravated by service. In that case he is given his arrears of pay to date—fifteen days' pay and allowances in advance—a suit of civilian clothing, and free transportation to his home or elected destination, with free meals en route. He is also given a card of introduction to the secretary of the Provincial Employment Commission, to which I shall make reference later.

If the board of medical officers consider that a man's disability is such that he is entitled to a pension, his discharge is postdated thirty days, and pay and allowances to the date of discharge are given to him. He receives also a suit of civilian clothing and transportation to his home or elected destination. A large number, however, of those returned require further medical and surgical treatment. These men are handed over to the Military Hospitals Commission and are sent to one of the institutions operated by that Commission, the choice of the institution being determined partly by the locality in which their homes are situated and partly by the disability from which they are suffering. Each man receives an advance of $10 on boarding the train, and a cheque for a further amount, according to the balance due, is mailed to the paymaster at the point to which the man is going. Men in this class are not given a suit of civilian clothing, as they still remain soldiers and are subject to military discipline. The suit of civilian clothing is, however, given later, on their discharge from the hospital.

A representative of the Military Hospitals Commission interviews each returning man at the receiving depot and obtains a statement regarding his disability, his family, his previous civilian employment, the amount of remuneration he received before enlistment, his occupation, and several other necessary details, and forwards this information to the secretary of the Employment Commission. Telegrams are also despatched to official bodies and others in order that a proper welcome may be tendered by the man's own friends. Usually a man is given leave to visit his home before entering upon treatment, but this permission is granted only when, in the opinion of the Board of Medical Officers, such leave will not be detrimental to his health.

The medical service of the Commission is divided into special classes, including specialists in the following branches: general practice, tuberculosis, orthopaedics, mental diseases, eye, ear, and throat diseases, massage, electrical treatment, physical drill, and rheumatic treatment. The medical services are under the charge of Lieut.-Colonel Alfred Thompson, M.P., the Medical Superintendent.

On the arrival of a man at one of the institutions operated by the Commission, the medical officer in charge orders the treatment which he appears to be in need of, and this treatment is continued until his case has reached finality, whether that should take one month or twelve months. No expense is spared in the provision of the best food and medicines for the patients at these institutions.

I think it is well that I should make special reference to the provision made by the Commission for men suffering from tuberculosis. I understand that in other countries the provision made by the State for cases of this kind is very much less comprehensive than the provision we have made in Canada. A number of men who are under treatment developed the disease, as I understand, before going overseas. Such cases would not be taken in charge by the State in some countries. However, it seemed to us, in view of the dreadful character of this disease, that we should make no discrimination whatever, and, accordingly, all men who develop tuberculosis after they enlist are taken in hand by the Military Hospital Commission and receive treatment. Unfortunately a considerable number of men have developed this disease, many of whom have not been outside of Canada. The cost of providing accommodation and treatment for this class of patient has been very considerable, as there has hitherto been a serious lack throughout Canada of tubercular sanatoria. New institutions have been opened by the commission, while others have been enlarged.

It is needless to say that the sanatoria in which tuberculosis is treated have to be separate institutions. In many instances arrangements have been made with provincial governments which have tuberculosis sanatoria, whereby the institutions are enlarged, the Commission paying half, and, in a good many cases, the provincial government paying half the cost. The additional accommodation will belong absolutely to the province after the needs of the military service shall have been met. In other cases the Commission has been obliged to established its own sanatoria.

The question arose as to the status of men who still continued under treatment in convalescent homes, hospitals or sanatoria. These men continued to be members of the military force. In order to provide for the discipline and pay of men in the various hospitals and homes operated by the Commission, a military organization known as the Military Hospitals Commissions Command has been created, as part of the Canadian Expeditionary Force for home service. This Command is under the direct juristion of the Commission. It is charged with discipline and other matters at the institutions operated by the Commission, and is a direct link between it and the Department of Militia and Defence. Under its auspices special physical drill, which has been found to be of much value in the hospitals of England, has been introduced with most beneficial results.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

My hon. friend referred very properly to the qusetion of re-education and vocational training. It is proper that I should state very briefly what has been done in that regard. A very important part of the work undertaken by the Commission is that which deals with vocational training during the period in which the men are undergoing treatment. The question of re-education after their discharge is, of course, also an important one, particularly for those whose disability is such that they cannot return to their previous civilian occupations. In a large number of the institutions operated by the Commission, classes are held in various subjects, which are attended by the patients. These classes have been found to have not only an educational value, but also a distinct therapeutic value. This educational work is carried on in co-operation with the educational departments of the Provincial Governments.

As I have said, a certain proportion of the men undergoing treatment are found to be unable to follow their previous occupations by reason of their disabilities. The Government has, therefore, arranged, through the Military Hospitals Commission, to carry out a system of re-education after these men have been discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Hitherto I have been speaking of the training and education which have been given to the men while they continued in the military service, under the charge of the Military Hospitals Commission, in some hospital, convalescent home or other institution. What I am about to say relates to the training of these men after they have been discharged from these hospitals, as well as from the military service.

The Government has arranged, through the Military Hospitals Commission, to carry out a system of re-education after discharge from the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The Commission has appointed vocational officers for Ontario, the Maritime Provinces, Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, in conjunction with the Provincial Employment Commissions, which represent the provincial governments. Disabled Soldiers' Training Boards and Provincial Advisory Committees on Training have also been appointed. A Disabled Soldiers' Training Board consists of a member of the Provincial Commission, a vocational officer and a medical man. The duties of this Board are:

(a) To consider all cases which, in the light of the medical reports, appear to be subjects for special training, and to report upon each, with suitable recommendations, to the Military Hospitals Commission.

(b) To consider from time to time reports of the progress of men undergoing training and to make recommendation as to change of treatment or of training, or its discontinuance.

Each Provincial Employment Commission has been asked to nominate suitable persons to act as an advisory committee on the training of disabled soldiers who are eligible for re-education. The personnel of this advisory committee includes in most instances, some person acquainted with the processes of education, an agricultural educationalist, an employer, and a labour representative.

The duties of the provincial advisory committee may be summarized as follows:

(a) To prepare, with the assistance of the vocational officer, schemes of instruction in general subjects and elementary vocational training in, or in connection with the convalescent homes or hospitals of the province.

(b) To organize and carry out schemes as may be approved.

(c) To maintain a regular inspection, preferably through the vocational officer, of all instruction being carried on.

(d) To make a survey of the facilities at present, and from time to time, available for vocational training in public educational institutions, private educational institutions and private workshops, farms, etc.

(e) To assist the Employment Commission by providing definite information as to the training received by men who desire assistance in obtaining employment.

(f) To appoint or approve local sub-committees on training in connection with local employment committees in centres where it may appear necessary to have such committees.

(g) Generally, to advise and assist in the training of returned soldiers in every possible way.

The question of what new occupuations a disabled man may be trained for is clearly first of all, a medical one. But it is also a question for a technical specialist or "vocational counsellor"; a man well versed in a knowledge of the methods of various industries and of the training necessary for those who desire to pursue them. But further, and this is an important consideration, it is an economic consideration, touching the law of supply and demand. While there are a number of occupations for which it is not difficult to train men, it does not follow that employment can readily be obtained in them. Last, but not least, the man's own wishes and desires for his future must, of course, be consulted.

The question, therefore, according to the view of the commission, is an individual one, and each case is investigated separately. The decision as to the occupation for which an opportunity of being trained is to be offered to any man, is made in the light of the medical, technical, economic and personal factors of his case.

As long as a soldier who has not been discharged is under treatment in one of the institutions operated by the commission, he is entitled to pay of rank and his allowances, which include separation allowance, exactly as if he were at the front. When he has been discharged and has been passed for re-education, he and his family are maintained at the expense of the Government, while he is receiving his training. That is to say, a man is found who is not disabled but who cannot resume his former employment. He can doubtless engage in some employment for which, however, he will require necessary education and training. While that man is receiving that training necessary to enable him to undertake a new occupation, he and his family are maintained, as I have said, at the expense of the Government, because it would be impossible for the man to avail himself of the training, if, in the meantime, his family were destitute and suffering. It seems therefore necessary that the Government should go thus far and upon its recommendation the Military Hospitals Commission has been authorized to incur that expense.

A special scale of pay and maintenance has been prepared, which varies according to the size of the family. In other words, the pension to which he is entitled by his disability is augmented by a special allowance for such time as his training may occupy, the purpose being to have the man engage in a new occupation, which, with his pension, will make him comfortable; that is to say, while he is learning that new occupation, the Government supplement his pension allowance by providing for his family.

Mr. OLIVER: I wanted to know about what was the actual amount.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It varies in different cases. I really have not that detail, but when this matter goes before a committee, as it certainly shall in view of the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), all these matters will be submitted in the greatest possible detail by the officers of the Military Hospitals Commission.

Another and an important question, which has been raised by the hon. member who has made the motion, is the introduction of the men who are returning to employment. Employment is in one sense a provincial or local matter, although I do not for one moment desire to minimize the responsibility of the Federal Government for assisting in the matter. There was a conference between the Federal Government and the provincial governments in October, 1915, and the view then taken, without dissent, as I understand, was that, for the time being at least, the question of finding employment should be undertaken and dealt with by the provincial governments. I shall quote textually the memorandum which was agreed upon between the Governments as represented by the head of the Military Hospitals Commission and the representatives of the various provincial governments. That memorandum is textually as follows:

> The Government of each province should appoint a central provincial committee consisting of such number of members as each province may deem advisable.
> All expenditures necessary in connection with the organization and administration of provincial and other purely local committees should be borne by the provincial or local authorities, or by voluntary contributions.
> Each of the provinces of Canada, working through its central committee, should assume the responsibility of endeavouring to find employment for discharged soldiers, who, upon their return to Canada, are physically and otherwise fit to assume such employment. All expenditures necessary in undertaking the duty should be borne by the province.

That was the memorandum agreed upon; that was the scheme prepared at that time and the scheme which has since been carried out. Therefore, the situation resolved itself upon that basis in this way: As to men returning to Canada who are of the convalescent class, they were taken charge of by the Military Hospitals Commission, and in so far as might be advisable or possible, they received training or education which would be of use to them upon their ultimate discharge. So far as concerns the men who were disabled and thereby incapable of resuming their former occupations, the Military Hospitals Commission undertook to make provision for the necessary training, and also to provide for their families in the period in which such training was being received. Then as to those who do not come back as convalescents—

Mr. OLIVER: Is any part of that expense borne by the provincial governments?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. OLIVER: The educational expenses are entirely borne by the Dominion?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: All borne by the Federal Government, as I understand it.

Thus, we have the convalescents who are receiving treatment in hospitals; we have those who are discharged from hospitals but are not disabled and who receive training under the direction of the Military Hospitals Commission, and thirdly, we have those who desire to engage in some employment, and as to those one might look at the situation in a double aspect.

Some of those men who have returned from the front came back to positions which were held open for them after their enlistment, and they are not included in the figures which I am about to give. In fact, I have not before me any statistics with regard to the number of men of that class. But I am about to give some statistics which have been furnished by the secretaries of the Provincial Employment Commissions, and I venture to think that the amount of work which they have accomplished in this connection will be a surprise to most of the members of this House, and perhaps to the people of this country. I have from all nine provinces returns which have been furnished to me by the secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission. They are divided into three classes:—the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found; the number of returned soldiers who are still unemployed; and the number of men discharged from the camps without going overseas, for whom employment has been found.

In the province of Prince Edward Island, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is six; the number for whom employment has not been found is five. In Nova Scotia the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 307, and the soldier for whom employment has not been been found is 15. In New Brunswick, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 190, and the number for whom employment has not been found is 60. In Quebec, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 1,438, and the number for whom employment has not been found is six. In Ontario, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 1,750, and they have no record of any soldier for whom employment has not been found. That is, there is no returned soldier unemployed. In Manitoba, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 633, and they make no report of any who is not employed. In Saskatchewan, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 424, and there is no return of any for whom employment has not been found. In Alberta, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 621, and there are 23 for whom employment has not been found. In British Columbia, the number of returned soldiers for whom employment has been found is 517, and the number for whom employment has not been found is 39. Taking these totals, we find that employment has been found for 5,886 returned soldiers, and that there are 148 in the various provinces for whom employment has not yet been found.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do these figures apply to discharged soldiers?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. PARDEE: Do I understand my right hon. friend to say that there are only 148 returned soldiers in all the provinces for whom employment has not been found?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is the statement made to me on the reports to the secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission by the various provincial committees.

Mr. PARDEE: Is that up to the end of 1915?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is up to the 3rd of February of this year. This information is based upon reports made to the secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission by the various provincial committees which were constituted under the arrangement made in October, 1915, at the conference between the Federal authorities and the provincial authorities. I should add that the secretary of the New Brunswick Provincial Commission states that work can be found for all returned soldiers. That province has 60 unemployed men, but it is not anticipated that they will be out of employment for very long. The secretary of the Soldiers' Aid Commission of Ontario reports that no discharged soldiers able to work are out of employment, and that there are 150 vacancies now on file. That is, there are opportunities for employing 150 men if they are available. The secretary of the Saskatchewan Provincial Committee states that there are practically no returned soldiers out of employment, although the problem of procuring light employment is becoming very difficult.

In addition, in New Brunswick, employment has been found for fifty camp men; that is, men discharged from one or other of the military camps without going overseas. In Ontario, 550 such men have found employment, in Saskatchewan, 34, and in British Columbia 44 such men have procured employment through the provincial committees. If we add these figures, as received from the various provincial committees, we find that there is a total of 678 camp men, for whom employment has been found, and if that number be added to the 5,886 returned soldiers for whom employment has been found through the various provincial committees, we have a total of 6,564 men who enlisted, who have been discharged and for whom employment has been found, while, so far as returns from the various provinces show, there are only 148 men for whom, up to the present, employment has not been found.

I should observe that while the Military Hospitals Commission itself does not undertake any responsibility with regard to employment, that commission does furnish the secretary of every provincial commission with a record of every man returning to the province in question. Shortly before each man is discharged from an hospital or convalescent home, a notification is sent to the secretary of the provincial committee so that, if possible, a situation may be in readiness for him on his return to civil life. It is also stated in the memorandum, from which I am quoting, that the pay and allowances given to the man in advance, on his discharge, are to enable him to look around for satisfactory employment. It also observes that many men go back to their former situations, but that these men are not included in the statement which I have just read giving the total number of men for whom employment has been found by the provincial committees. The memorandum which I have before me speaks with very great appreciation of the splendid manner in which the provincial governments have responded to the present need, and expresses the opinion that as the need becomes more acute the provinces will be ready to redouble their efforts.

I may also add that the Government have not lost sight of the fact that there are many openings in the Federal service which may be filled by returning soldiers. It was my expectation to have this afternoon a statement showing the number of returned soldiers who have been appointed to positions in the Federal service. I am informed that in one department alone at least 120 have been appointed. I have given directions to have the information furnished, and by the time the committee has undertaken its work, that information will also be available.

Orders in council, making provision for giving preference to returned soldiers in the Federal service have been passed, and, if I am not mistaken, have all been brought down. My hon. friend also alluded to the question of pensions.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the question of establishing permanent soldiers' homes been considered?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that that has yet been taken up, but it may be a proper matter for the consideration of the committee who will look into the whole subject. With regard to pensions, the subject was under consideration by a committee last session of Parliament, and I need hardly say that the members of that committee devoted themselves to the very important duty which they were called upon to discharge, with great earnestness, great energy, and great zeal. The report which they made was embodied in an order in council. That order in council was passed, of course, merely as a temporary measure, and it was quite understood that a Bill would be introduced this session. This Bill is in course of preparation, and will be brought down, I hope, at an early date, and I have it in mind that after the Bill is brought down it should be referred to the same committee which had the matter under consideration last year. They devoted a great deal of time to the subject and became thoroughly acquainted with it, and any suggestions for modifications of the report they then made should be considered by that committee in the first instance.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that a Pensions Board has been appointed since last session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, upon the recommendation of the committee. The members are Mr. J. K. L. Ross, Colonel Labatt and Major Todd.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the right hon. gentleman consider whether the French-Canadian element might not be represented on that board?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That will be a matter for consideration. The board was not appointed to represent any particular district, any particular class, or any particular race, and, in appointing it we endeavoured to select the best men available. The suggestion of my hon. friend will of course be considered.

Mr. MACDONALD: Can the Prime Minister give us any information as to the number of pensions distributed to the different ranks.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not that information with me, but I think it can be easily obtained. In conclusion, I merely wish to add a word with reference to some criticism which has been made over delays occurring in the payment of the first pension cheque. The amount of labour involved in dealing with pensions, particularly in the earlier activities of the pensions board, has, of course, been very great, because the Board had not only to undertake and carry out new duties, but was also confronted with the task of establishing a very considerable organization while its ordinary, every-day work was being carried on. I understand, however, that the system which is being adopted will lead to very much less delay than has sometimes occurred in the past. I do not know if there is any further information I can give to the House at the moment, but it would be proper and appropriate for me to say that I entirely agree in and appreciate the remarks which were made by my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) in proposing his motion, as to the splendid patriotism of the men who have enlisted in the Canadian overseas forces, and who, by their valour and heroism at the front, have brought such splendid distinction to the country they represent. I quite agree with him also that the country must do all that is reasonable and just to take every care of these men upon their return to Canada, and that, I am assured, will be the spirit in which every member of the House will approach the consideration of this question.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to make a few observations on this subject I would say that I think the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) is to be congratulated on having brought this matter to the attention of the House, and the House is to be congratulated on the very full information which the Prime Minister has seen fit to give in regard to this question, which is of such great importance to the people of Canada to-day. I know that this information will be gratefully received throughout the country, because there has been considerable curiosity and a good deal of unrest among many of our people as to just what treatment was being accorded our returned soldiers who had seen active service at the front and had been discharged by reason of wounds or some other disability. I think the remarks of my hon. friend from West Lambton were intended to relate particularly to those who had been discharged from overseas service as medically unfit, rather than to those who are receiving medical, hospital, or surgical treatment at the present time. There have been a great many cases of men who have served overseas, and who, though not actually wounded, have been rendered medically unfit and been discharged from further service. The treatment of these men, or some of them at all events, has not been as generous as it might have been. I think my hon. friend from West Lambton referred particularly to those men who had been discharged and who took a ten dollar bill or a fifty dollar bill, or the maximum of one hundred dollars, on being discharged from further service through no fault of their own, but merely because from some cause or another they had become medically unfit. Cases have come to my own knowledge of such men, and these cases involve considerable hardship. In one case a man who had a wife and nine children resident in Canada was discharged on the 20th of May last. Upon his dischargee in England he received $100. He was not returned to Canada until September. Upon his return home he found his wife and family at their last resource; they had even sold the household furniture. The man himself, when he landed at Guelph, where he had formerly lived, was absolutely without a dollar, and saw nothing in sight. He had to be assisted subsequently, and two or three months afterwards he obtained employment as a guard at the provincial institution. I have in mind three cases similar to that I have just mentioned, and I have given this case to illustrate the difficulty to which I think my hon. friend from West Lambton intended to direct the attention of the House, namely, the treatment of men who are returned to Canada before employment is found for them. Their lot is a hard one. Some of them come back none too well clad, and the majority of them without any money at all. One man who had been discharged in England as medically unfit, on landing at Halifax, received $100. Another, some months after his return, received from the department $50, and that man has no employment yet, and he lives in Ontario. This period between the discharge of a man and the day when he obtains employment is certainly a hard time for him, and if married for his family as well.

The news which the Prime Minister has given the House in regard to conditions in Ontario is most gratfying to me, and I am sure the whole province will be gratified to hear that every returned soldier who is fit for work has had employment offered to him, and that there are in Ontario to-day no less than 150 vacant positions which can be filled by returned soldiers, according to the return which I understand, is brought down to the first day of the present month of February. I will certainly take the opportunity of notifying two men whom I have in mind that they had better file their applications with the provincial authorities at once. Every one realizes that the task before the Government and before the country in dealing with the returned soldier is going to be serious, more serious next year than this, most serious when demobilization really sets in. I listened with the greatest interest to the scheme outlined by the Prime Minister this afternoon, and if I had any criticism whatever to offer in regard to it, it would be that it is rather involved: there are too many commissions and sub-commissions, too many divisions and subdivisions. I think it will take some time to work out the scheme, and during the interim there is going to be a great deal of hardship suffered by soldiers on their return to Canada. My suggestion—and I give it only as a suggestion—is that the Government would do well to take some definite step now in regard to vocational training. We are going to have a very large number of men suffering from total permanent disability, who will never be able to earn their living again and who will no doubt in many cases be absolutely dependent upon their pensions; but for men who are only partially disabled, dismembered or blind of an eye, steps should be taken immediately by the Government, and I do not believe in deputing that work to the provincial governments or to any other body. I believe a commission should be formed by this Government, and the formation of a commission, if a commission be thought desirable, should not be delayed, but the work should be undertaken in the very near future. My right hon. friend says that some vocational specialists, some technical specialists, would doubtless have to be employed for such a purpose. Let them be employed, They can be procured.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They have been procured.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let them get to work now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are at work.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let the Government adopt the necessary means to put into application whatever is determined upon by those vocational specialists. This Parliament surely can grant the money for such a purpose, to establish in the immediate future, say during the coming summer, a very broad comprehensive scheme of vocational training, where the services of men who have lost an eye or of men who have been partially dismembered, may in the future be usefully employed. The time to start is immediately. It takes time to work the matter out, but if started during the present spring, by next autumn, when there will be large numbers of men available to take courses at such an institution, that institution can render a tremendous benefit to this country and to the individual who has the benefit of a course in it.

I am not quite as enthusiastic as some people are in regard to the number of returned soldiers who will settle on the land and become agriculturists. Agriculture is a business that must be learned just as any other business, and while a number of returned soldiers will certainly take advantage of an opportunity to go upon the land, I do not think there will be any great rush of returned soldiers upon the land unless the inducements are very great, and unless men have had some previous training in agriculture or unless their minds naturally turn that way I do not think that the land question is going to offer more than a partial solution of the difficulties which will confront Canada when demobilization takes place. At the present time, I am satisfied that the Government has made a splendid showing in regard to its treatment of the injured, of those suffering either from wounds or disease, and I am satisfied that our hospital system, our medical and surgical treatment, and the provision made in this country for tubercular patients on their return from the front are up-to-date and a credit in every respect to the Government. But I do feel that a little more might be done, even as a mere welcome to the man who comes back to this country medically unfit, to keep that man going until his own particular province shall have provided him with an opportunity of obtaining a position. Having regard to the figures submitted to the House to-day, we have nothing to complain of in Ontario. I hope that will continue; I doubt if it will continue because the number of returned soldiers will increase in the future; but for that short period from the time when they arrive in Canada until they obtain positions, those men and their families should not suffer for one moment of time.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I think the House and the country are indebted to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) for the discussion which has been started this afternoon. No one would have walked the hospitals of Europe during the past year and seen the torn and broken men who a few months ago left this country in the fullness of health and strength without realizing that a terrible problem confronts Canada and the British Empire in the absorption of the men who have fought on our behalf. The more one thinks of the problem, the more difficult the solution becomes; and if my opinion is worth anything, I think it will take the best judgment and the best brains of this country as well as of other parts of the British Empire, to make adequate provision for those who, the world admits, have done their duty in fighting for the cause of the Empire. But I think the hon. member for West Lambton forgets somewhat or is not aware of what has already been done. I am inclined to think that not many of the men who have returned from the front are going to be prepared to go on the farm. When I was in England and France and Belgium, I spoke to many men as to what their ambitions for the future were, and the general trend of opinion was that the men wanted to return to the place from which they had come and to go back to the work they knew best. It is simple enough to say: Send a man out on the farm; but if a man knows nothing about farming—and farming to-day is a science, just as many other occupations are—he is not going to be able to earn an adequate living, and if a man cannot earn an adequate living on a farm, he is not going to stay out there simply for the joy of living in the country, and I think that statistics will go to show that of all the men who have returned to Canada, not more than three per cent have expressed their willingness to go on the farm. Therefore, I think a problem that confronts us is this: What steps are we going to take to secure employment for the men who have gone from our shores? As a member of the Soldiers Aid Commission in the province of Ontario—and I use the word "aid" rather than the word "employment" as used by the Premier—I may say that at its early meetings it realized the problem which it had to face, and upon inquiry it soon came to the conclusion that if we were adequately to meet the situation, it was necessary that we should have the co-operation of local boards throughout the province and that we should have the sympathy and the co-operation of the employers. With that end in view the commission set to work to have subsidiary boards established in the larger centres from which more than five soldiers had left for overseas, and at the present time I think there are some fifty-three bodies in Ontario adequately doing the work for which they were constituted. My information is the same as that given by the Prime Minister—that to-day there are vacancies that cannot be filled because the men are not to be had, and that any soldier who wants work and is willing to work can find a position if he applies to the Soldiers' Aid Commission. The commission does not stop altogether at securing employment for these men. The Commission has authority " to care for and find employment for the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force," and by the Statutes of 1916 that power was further extended, so that they have power to care for and find employment for the members of His Majesty's Imperial Forces who went overseas. We are going further than finding employment for these men. If a man comes back so broken that it is impossible for him to get work at his former occupation, the Government of Ontario have placed at the disposal of the commission the technical institutions throughout the province, and a great number of these men are being re-educated under the auspices of the Commission. The commission is making provision also for the maintenance and subsistence of a man's family while he is being re-educated. If it should happen that a man is in a place where work is not available, and work is available at another place, the commission will send the man to the place where work is to be had. The commission makes loans to men to carry them over temporary embarrassments. So, the situation in Ontario is governed most satisfactorily.

I desire to touch for a moment on a misapprehension which exists in the public mind. Let me quote to the House a statement which appeared, I am sure by inadvertence, in the Evening Journal of 21st January last:

> The Government so far recognizes no responsibility towards the man who enlisted in the Expeditionary Force and who developed some disease before he left Canada, although this may have arisen from the hardships and exposure attendant upon the performance of his military duties.

That is a misapprehension of the facts. The Military Hospitals Commission takes care of a man who breaks down from exposure, even though he should go no further than the place in which he was enlisted. Such a man is treated with exactly the same consideration as is the man who has been wounded in battle. The original pension scheme made a distinction between the man who had been wounded in battle and the man who was injured in some other way, but the present order in council makes no distinction. Once a man dons His Majesty's uniform he becomes, so to speak, a ward of the state, and if through exposure, exertion, disease or accident, he becomes a less fit man that he was before he enlisted, he thereby becomes entitled to a pension as if he had been wounded on the field.

Complaints have been made in the past of delays in the granting of pensions. In certain cases, such complaint may have been justified. The pension problem is a new problem for Canada, and, in the nature of things, a certain time must elapse before the complex machinery of the new system can be made to work smoothly. But the organization to-day is so perfected that there is no cause for delay. If a man is entitled to a pension, that pension should be promptly granted to him. There have been cases in which a break occurred between the time when a man's pay and allowances expired and the time when his pension began. But negotiations are now under way to evolve a scheme by which pay and allowances will continue until the pension is granted, so that there will be no time when the disabled man will not receive either his pay and allowances or his pension.

Among the problems that the Pensions Board or the Hospitals Commission will have to face is that of the men who have suffered impairment not amounting to full disability. I think that in Canada we are going to be met very often with this class of case. A man has lost a limb by explosive bullet, shrapnel or otherwise, and has been treated in a convalescent hospital. After treatment he is discharged as fit for work. But when he is thrown into the hurly-burly of industrial life, nerves that had been frayed by exposure in the trenches are going to break, and the man will be unfitted for his occupation. We shall have to face the problem of the man who has been discharged as not entitled to a pension, but who, as subsequent experience shows, is so broken in his health that he must have hospital treatment. I think the Government of Canada will have to meet the situation and that it will be prepared to meet it by taking that man into the hospital and giving him the treatment necessary to restore him, as far as possible, to health and strength. Another problem we shall have to meet is the question of what may be called functional education as distinguished from vocational education. Hundreds of men will come back to this country not much impaired, if you take the mere capacity to work as a standard, but very considerably impaired in relation to the occupation which they followed before enlisting. I have a case in mind, that of a man who, before he went to the front, followed the trade of a boilermaker. He was hit in the right shoulder and an important muscle and nerve was injured. He is as well as ever, apparently, but when he raises his hand above his shoulder, the power to bring it down with the old-time force is gone. He says: I am only entitled to a small pension, because constitutionally I have made a substantial recovery; but because of the injury that I have suffered, I can only earn a labourer's pay, although, before I went to the front, I earned the pay of a skilled mechanic. By a course of functional education, the injured nerve and muscle might be restored to strength. We must consider the question of functional training.

When one visits the Old Country, he realizes the effort that is being made to place the injured soldiers in useful occupations. Our problems are not greater than theirs, but the steps they are taking are an example to us of what can be done. You see there men who have been trained to engage in some lighter occupation than that to which thy were accustomed. You see men who have lost one arm, or perhaps part of a hand, who have been fitted and trained to do as much work as one so injured can possibly do.

In closing, I wish to say, as I said in the beginning, that I believe this country is willing that money should be spent and effort made so to provide that the men who have given to Canada a place among the nations of the world, and who have come back either broken or injured, shall suffer as little as possible for the sacrifices they have made. Because, when the last word is said, they have taken our places in the trenches, and those of us who have remained at home should be only too willing to pay, and pay well.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I am going to take a somewhat critical position, as I think becomes a member of this side of the House; and, while I have nothing but praise for the very full statement given by the Prime Minister, and for the terms of that statement, yet I would venture this criticism: that in dealing with this subject we have been dealing with it as though it were a matter that was not urgent, a matter that was not present; we have been dealing with it as something that might arise, yet might not arise. And the consequence is that tremendous hardship has been caused to individuals and tremendous discredit to the Dominion of Canada, simply because we have not done what we ought to have done and what we must do in time. When the war broke out and we sent 33,000 men to take part in that war, we knew that we would have broken men; we knew that we would have need for provision as to pensions, vocational training, hospital treatment and employment for returned soldiers. But we did not take at that time the steps that we should have taken; we did not take them a year after, or the year after that. We are taking them only now, when the problem has become tremendous, when the discredit has been established, when untold injury has been done to the military and patriotic enthusiasm of the people by the neglect of men who have served our country and to whom our country desires to give every consideration. Because of the policy of " wait and see "—a policy which so nearly destroyed the British Empire—we have had in Canada these unfortunate cases.

The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has drawn attention to the fact that in many cases a long interval has occurred between the shutting off of the ex-soldier's pay and the receiving of his pension. I shall not enlarge upon that; I simply say that within my own knowledge there have been such cases, deplorable and discreditable, which have been seriously detrimental to the credit of our country and to the military enthusiasm of our people. I shall not go into details; they would be harrowing, and would not add to the facts of the case. In my judgment there is no excuse for that condition. The hon. member for Kingston will distinctly remember that that question came up for consideration before the Pensions Committee last year, and that we were at the point of making a recommendation that the pay should continue until the pension began. Upon representation being made to us, however, that that condition would be provided for, we did not put in the recommendation. That is my recollection of the matter.

Another point to which due regard has not been given is this: When a man is discharged without pension, he is discharged because of his unfitness to do the work that we wanted him to do and that he offered to do for us. On the face of it, that is evidence that the man's condition is not such as will enable him to have an equal standing with his competitors in the labour field. I consider that the authorities have been unduly regardless of the facts in shutting off such a man's pay, giving him $10 and a ticket home, and saying: "We do not know you any longer." A man has a family dependent upon him is discharged from military service because he is not fit, physically, mentally or otherwise, to continue in that employ. That is to say, his power or ability to maintain his family is not as it was when he entered our employ, because at that time we took the responsibility of accepting his services in the belief that his physical and mental ability was at a maximum.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. gentleman refer to a man who went overseas and returned?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. Having discharged this man, we say: " We do not owe you anything; we give you no consideration." Even if a man has no dependents at all, he is apt to be placed in the position of a vagrant—as a matter of fact, cases of this kind have occurred—but if he has a family, as in the case, which has been mentioned, of a man with a large number of children, the condition is very much worse. I think that the authorities would do themselves and the country credit if, when they are giving these men their discharges, they do something to help them through the period of difficulty and straitened circumstances which often follows the cutting off of their soldiers' pay and the discontinuance of the separation and Patriotic Fund allowances to their families. We have been proceeding altogether too much upon the assumption that we are dealing with soldiers as the word " soldier " was understood in former days. We are not dealing with soldiers as that word was understood; we are dealing with citizens, and we should deal with them from the standpoint of their citizenship and of their value to the community as citizens.

It seems to me that the Government should long ago have made provision for those totally disabled soldiers who, being unable to take care of themselves, have no relatives, or whose relatives are not in a position to take care of them. This could be accomplished by establishing a number of soldiers' homes, such as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) spoke of during the course of the debate on the Address. Most harrowing cases have come to my attention; I shall not trouble the House with the details of them. I think that the Government has not been well advised in making no provisions for taking proper care of these men.

In regard to vocational training, I had the honour to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister last year the fact that at Edmonton we have a technical school that is available for this work. I do not think that it has yet been availed of, and I would respectfully suggest, if it be in order, that this school, as well as others throughout the country, be availed of to this end.

Mr. G. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister a matter, which, perhaps, is not connected with the subject introduced by the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee). In a number of the provinces of Canada, if not in all of them, the distinction between real property and personal property has been done away with in dealing with the estates of deceased persons. But the law with regard to holograph and nuncupatives wills has been preserved, and that law provides in my province of Saskatchewan and I think also in Ontario, that the holograph or nuncupative will of a soldier shall deal only with personal property. There is apt to be confusion in the minds of the soldiers and the public in the belief that the holograph and nuncupative wills of soldiers deal with all their property as any other wills would do. I wish to make the suggestion to the Government that it make inquiry as to the facts I have stated, and that the request be made to the legislatures of the various provinces in which this distinction is still preserved that the law be so amended that the holograph and nuncupative will of a deceased soldier shall include realty as well as personal property.

Motion for the adjournment of the House negatived.

$100,000,000 PUBLIC SERVICE LOAN.

Bill No. 19, to authorize the raising by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service, Sir Thomas White, read the third time, and passed.

WAR LOAN—$500,000,000.

House again in Committee to consider the following proposed resolutions.—Mr. Rainville in the chair.

1. That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding five hundred million dollars ($500,000,000) be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred by or under the authority of the Governor in Council during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1918, for:—

(a) The defence and security of Canada;

(b) The conduct of naval or military operations in and beyond Canada;

(c) Promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;

(d) The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war; and

(e) Payments made for the said purposes during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and seventeen, in excess of the amounts authorized by The War Appropriation Act, 1916.

2. That the Governor in Council be empowered to raise by way of loan, temporary or otherwise, such sums of money as are required for the purpose of making any payment authorized by any Act founded on these Resolutions.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Can the Prime Minister say whether or not it is expected that the Order which was made by the House last year for a return giving the details of the expenditures that have been made out of the war vote has been complied with? The Minister of Militia, in reply to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) complained that there was quite a number of details, but that is no sufficient reason why the Order of the House should not be complied with. Is the Prime Minister in a position to say that we will get that information this session?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really am not able to say. I thought that the two large volumes containing the proceedings of the War Purchasing Commission already placed on the table of the House would contain that information. I have not looked at the volumes.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is nothing in them as to expenditures.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose it will be all in the auditor general's report when we get it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And when will we have the auditor general's report?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend heard what the Minister of Finance said about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is all we hear. All it amounts to is that we cannot have it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are commencing a little earlier this year than the auditor general expected.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are we to understand that the motion which was passed last year is not to be fulfilled in the terms in which it was ordered by the House? The House ordered certain information to be laid on the table. Twelve months have elapsed, and surely, in all conscience, there has been time enough to furnish that information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I remember that last year the Acting Minister of Militia at that time said that what was being asked for was practically the auditor general's report in advance, and therefore I would assume that the information then asked for would be contained in the report of the auditor general, as soon as we can get that report. We are making every effort to get it. It is not desirable to bring the information down both in the form of a return and also as the auditor general's report. That would be a useless expenditure.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This would perhaps have been a good reason for not granting the motion; but the Order of the House was allowed to be passed and it is due to the House that it should be fulfilled.

ROSS RIFLE—DISCUSSION IN COMMITTEE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for Carleton asked as to the changes in the Ross rifle since the outbreak of war. I am informed that all the changes which have taken place are of a very minor character and are as follows:

Butt trap spring strengthened. Change recommended October 16, 1914, by the Small Arms Committee.

Extractor cut shortened to prevent bolt head turning over. Change recommended by the Small Arms Committee, April 10, 1915.

Strap of piling swivel strengthened. Change recommended by the Small Arms Committee, April 10, 1915.

Rear end of receiver to be rounded. Change recommended by the Small Arms Committee, June 2, 1915.

New pattern nose cap. Change recommended by the Small Arms Committee, June 11, 1915.

Chamber enlarged to .464 to facilitate extraction. Change authorized in July, 1915, and again in August, 1915.

Removal of sling swivel from trigger guard. Change recommended by Small Arms Committee, November 29, 1915.

The screws were rim punched to prevent them working loose. Change made upon advice from overseas.

Bolt stop with larger striking surface. Change recommended by the Small Arms Committee, June 11, 1916.

The cavity in the butt for the oil well was deepened ½ inch, making it 8 inches in depth in the wood. Change recommended by the Small Arms Committee, June 30, 1916.

As I have said, I am informed by the Master General of the Ordnance that the changes are all of a very trivial and minor character.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the Prime Minister tell us exactly where the Government and the country stand with reference to the question of the Ross rifle? Are we to understand that notice of a formal nature has been given to the Ross Rifle Company under the contract of the intention of the Government to ask them to manufacture a rifle similar to the Lee-Enfield rifle, but that no order has been given to the company for any definite number of rifles?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, that is the situation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Having regard to the manifest desirability of having the manufacture of arms in this country, and, more particularly, in view of the situation in the country to the south of us, whence the supply of arms will no doubt be cut off on account of their own necessities—does the right hon. gentleman regard that as a desirable situation? Can he not conceive of the possibility of conferring with the Ross Rifle Company, and obtaining some definite statement as to the number, in order to hasten the manufacture of those rifles upon a larger scale than 10,000, which was intended to be the minimum in peace time? Is there not a way in which the matter could be hastened so that the country might know that this matter is being taken care of? As it is, both parties seem to be at arm's length. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) suggested that if there was any difficulty the Government could solve it by expropriating the factory. The matter seems to have come to a standstill without the exercise of that authority which the Government manifestly have in war time. The matter seems to have got to a stage where nobody is moving, and no preparation is being made for the future.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think there is any detriment to the public interest in the delay which has taken place. As a matter of fact, I have already pointed out that it is impossible to give an order until we get the drawings and specifications which were asked for in September last, but which have not yet been received. The question is as to what the Government should undertake in the production of rifles, having regard to the fact that a very large number of rifles already manufactured will probably be on hand at the end of the war, and that these will be suitable for training purposes. After the conclusion of the war we may expect that training purposes alone will have to be considered for some years. On the other hand as I have already pointed out, there is the fact that undoubtedly the Ross Rifle Company has made a very large expenditure for the purpose of producing rifles on a large scale during the war, and while it is manifestly impossible for the Government to continue to give orders on a war scale in time of peace, nevertheless it is proper for the Government to have such consideration for that expenditure as would not result in marked injustice or unfairness to the interests which have made that expenditure. That is the situation which confronts the Government to-day. It is one that is not free from difficulty, and one to which the best possible consideration will be given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On Friday, in the explanation which he gave upon the subject, my right hon. friend stated to the House that an order in council had been passed fixing the time when the new type of rifle was to be manufactured by the Ross

Rifle Company. The order in council went on to say this:

And that the contractor and the said company be required, on and after the first day of December, 1917, to make all rifles supplied under the said contract to correspond to such last mentioned substituted standard sample rifle the Government undertaking to protect the contractor and his assignee against any actions for infringement of patents as stipulated by the contract, and, moreover, that the Minister of Militia and Defence be authorized to give a notice in the form hereto annexed to the said Sir Charles Ross and his assignee, The Ross Rifle Company.

Are we to understand that no action has been taken by the Company to have rifles manufactured under the terms of this order in council?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot say what the company have done. We have given notice that after the date mentioned the rifles to be produced must be of the new type, but we have not yet given an order for the reason I have mentioned: that we have not yet received the drawings and specifications which are necessary for the purpose of giving such an order. The reason why we have not yet received the drawings and specifications is explained in the telegram which I read to the committee on Friday last.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: About this question of the Ross rifle I wish to say that I altogether object to the Government doing business with a private company for the production of munitions of war such as rifles. I believe that rifles for the purposes of war should be made in a public arsenal on plans devised by our own engineers and experts in the manufacture of rifles, and that we should not be bound, as we are said to be bound, by a contract with the Ross Rifle Company. I want to say further that in view of the statements that were made in this House when the Ross rifle contract was first entered into, some of them by hon. gentlemen associated with the present Government, and in view also of the experience on the battlefields of Europe where the Ross rifle was thrown away by our soldiers as being a bad weapon, their lives being in jeopardy, I do not think we ought to pay another dollar to the Ross Rifle Company. To test the feeling of this committee, I propose to move an amendmend adding Clause 4 to the resolution to this effect:

(4) That none of the money so raised or voted shall be used for the purchase of Ross rifles.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

The people of Canada are more than dissatisfied with the experience of Canada in connection with the Ross rifle. The people of Canada are in favour of the starting of a national arsenal for the manufacture of rifles by ourselves, and they are in favour of the elimination of the whole question of profit in connection with munitions. On my own behalf, on behalf of my constituency which has had rather a wide experience with the Ross rifle, and on behalf of our soldiers who have been to the front and who discarded the Ross rifle, I think this contract ought to come to an end here and now, and that not another dollar ought to be paid to this company for those rifles. I therefore move the amendment which I have just read.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the amendment is in order, but assuming for the moment that it is, it seems to me impossible for the committee to adopt it, and for this reason: The provision which is included with respect to the Ross rifle is not in respect of any further order, but is in respect of an order already given, and upon which the company is already engaged. It is estimated that about 80,000 rifles under the order given in February, 1916, will remain to be delivered after the end of the present fiscal year. The Government having given that order, and thus having entered into a contract for those rifles, is under obligation to pay for them; the rifles must be paid for unless the good faith of the country is to be called in question, or unless in the meantime some other type of rifle may be substituted for them, and I do not think that that is possible within the period mentioned.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to be a party to voting for the breaking of any contract that this Government has entered into in good faith, but I am bound to say that in my judgment the contract entered into was an unjustifiable and improvident contract, judged from every point of view, and I could not conscientiously vote for the payment of any money on that contract. The suggestion that has been made that the contract should be changed is the proper one, I submit, so that the rifles supplied should be Lee-Enfields instead of Ross rifles. Under these circumstances we should be getting value for our money, and the country would get rifles that could be used. The suggestion that it takes a year or any such long period of time to make the change for which provision was made in the original contract entered into so many years ago is, I think, not borne out by the experience we have had in the making of munitions of all kinds throughout the Empire and the United States. There is no manner of doubt in my mind that if the diligence had been used we could have been making Lee-Enfields now at the Ross rifle factory, and if the Government should be put up against it by a vote of this House I believe they could yet get Lee-Enfields made at the Ross rifle factory in time to meet the needs of the war. Therefore, for my part, I am going to support the amendment of the hon. gentleman, if it is in order to move it. While on the subject I wish to make one more observation. The Prime Minister was good enough to say on Friday last that I must suffer in my conscience because of having been a party to the contract that was made by the Government of Canada with the Ross Rifle Company.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If it were so poor a rifle as my hon. friend argued.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not argue; I merely stated the facts. I just want to point out, first, that the Ross rifle contract, made in 1902, provided that in case of war or emergency the Government of Canada was at liberty to make or buy rifles where it pleased and as it pleased, over and above the amount that the Ross Rifle Company could furnish. The second provision that I wish to draw attention to was that the Ross Rifle Company was bound, on due notice, to make any alterations demanded by the Government of Canada, and the third provision was that they were bound by the contract to make any other kind of a rifle that the Government of Canada should see fit to ask or order them to make. So that the original contract provided in these three particulars for the safeguarding by the Government of the interests of the people of Canada under three different sets of circumstances, one of these sets of circumstances being the great condition of war that has arisen. I want to point out further to the Prime Minister and the House that the rifle that was made by the Ross Company under contracts with the Liberal Government was not the rifle that was in the hands of our soldiers in France and Flanders under the administration of this Government.

Mr. EDWARDS: Was it a good rifle?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not sure; it may have been a better rifle. But it was not the rifle. It could not have been a worse rifle, because the rifle that was put in our soldiers' hands in France and Flanders has been taken out of their hands with the consent of this Government forced upon them by the authorities at the British War Office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the rifle that the late Government provided for?

Mr. OLIVER: Mark I, Mark II, and Mark II with three stars. There were three makes provided, and these were all discarded by the present Government. In November, 1911, an order was given for the manufacture of Mark III, and deliveries of that rifle was begun to be made in November, 1912, and it was the Mark III rifle that our soldiers carried in France and Flanders, and which caused the loss of hundreds of lives in those battles.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Before the committee rises at six o'clock, I should like to say just a word with reference to a matter in which my name was mentioned on Friday last, relative to the necessity of drawings and specifications for the purpose of the manufacture of the new rifle. I have read the debate and observe that the Prime Minister expressed the view that the contract called for drawings and specifications to be served upon the company before the notice would take effect. On the contrary, the situation, although in effect exactly the same, is in direct words this: The drawings and specifications are not referred to in the contract itself as having to be served on the company, but as a practical engineering necessity the specifications and drawings have to be served before there can be a proper contractual relationship between the Government and the company. The Militia Department officials take the ground most positively that there can be in effect and in practice no manufacture of rifles and no preparation to manufacture rifles until the drawings and specifications are delivered. That is all I desire to say now.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would submit to the Government the necessity of clearing the air in regard to the rifle situation. My hon. friend the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has moved an amendment, the purport of which is that the contract which this Government made in February, 1916, with the Ross Rifle Company should not be fulfilled. What this House and the country is concerned with at the present time is whether or not this country can supply within her own borders a rifle which will be satisfactory to our men when they go out to fight. Without going into anything that has happened in the past, I think it is conceded and declared by hon. gentlemen on both sides and the proposition is accepted, that the Lee-Enfield pattern, which is now in use in England and which is now being manufactured in England, is such a rifle as would be satisfactory.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said. Did he say that the rifle now being manufactured in England is satisfactory?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is what I understand to be the policy of the Government, because they have intimated to the Ross Rifle Company that they require that company hereafter to manufacture rifles of that pattern.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This particular rifle, as I have already explained three or four times, is not being manufactured in England at the present time.

Mr. MACDONALD: If it is not being manufactured in England, it is being manufactured for the British Government in the United States.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: For the British Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: The question where it is being made for the British Government is a matter of no concern to us. The fact is that a certain rifle of a certain pattern is being manufactured and that this Government have adopted that as being the pattern which is satisfactory to them, and have given notice to the Ross Rifle Company to manufacture rifles of that pattern a year from now. The Government, however, have not intimated to the Ross Rifle Company how many rifles will be required, and the whole rifle situation is for the moment obscure on account of the inability of this Government and the company to come to some understanding in regard to it. The Government ought to know how many rifles they require, but they say: We cannot take any further steps until we have a specification; until we have a certain pattern. My right hon. friend will agree with me that any one who has any experience at all in regard to the manufacture in Canada and elsewhere of goods that are based on steel, especially at this particular juncture, knows that the most important problem is to get the raw material, and if my right hon. friend allows week after week to go by before the blocks of the particular sealed pattern is produced, he is simply postponing to a lengthy, if not to an indefinite period, the manufacture of the rifle by reason of that delay. In order that material may be obtained, it is necessary that information should be given as to how many rifles the Government will require under their contract. The same thing applies to the stock of the rifle. All these matters are based on the raw material. Why is it that the Government stand on the brink of this question and do nothing one way or the other? My complaint is this: They know how many rifles they will require at the end of the year; they know they will need more than ten thousand, which is the minimum fixed in the contract that they would be bound to take; but yet they decline to indicate how many rifles they require, and it is therefore impossible to obtain material. If three months after this they say they want a hundred thousand rifles of the new pattern, where is the material to come from? My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia takes the position, I understand, that the Ross rifle of the type that was sent to the front, is the best type.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The best in the world. It has been proved to be so.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is the position of the ex-minister in the matter. He is to be commended for the fact that he takes his ground and stands upon it. My hon. friend has had this merit in regard to his administration, that if he thought a thing was right, he stood by it, no matter what any one in England said about it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There have been tests of every kind in connection with the two rifles and the records are available. I challenge the world to produce a record showing that the Ross rifle has come out second to the Lee-Enfield. I do not know whether or not the report of a bogus test has been sent by General Alderson to General Gwatkin. If it has, I propose asking some questions about it. But there has never been an official test, or even a general test, as between the Ross rifle and the Lee-Enfield rifle wherein the Ross rifle has not in every sense beaten the Lee-Enfield.

While I am on my feet, I desire to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). He said that the Ross rifle, Mark III, was adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party. I speak from memory, but I think it was in 1910 that the decision was reached to adopt the Ross rifle, Mark III.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is this to be said in favour of the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) that while he was in charge of the militia at least he had his own opinions and was ready to stand by them. In his correspondence with the Prime Minister he spoke broadly of things that were done, or not done, in England, with regard to the whole administration of affairs in relation to our forces, their supply and equipment: but when he has the opportunity he does not back up in this House the statements he made.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have never deviated from any of my statements.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman wrote these things in a letter to the Prime Minister but has not gone any further. This whole question of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) or his former Minister of Militia taking acute issue with those who were responsible for certain things done in a military way on the other side of the water, is a very important problem, and the Ross rifle question is merely one phase of it. The ex-Minister of Militia was right, or else he was wrong, in certain statements that he made, and makes now, not only in regard to the Ross rifle, but in regard to other supplies paid for by the hard-earned money of the people of Canada and scrapped when they were taken overseas, at a loss of millions and millions. We are asked to accept, without a word, the statement of some gentleman over there because he happens to be connected with the War Office, as though he were an infallible being whose opinion is not to be doubted. The right hon. Prime Minister seems to think that because a man wears the uniform of a British officer he is so far above anybody who is Canadian born that by no possibility could anybody in this country venture to question him. The ex-Minister of Militia does not believe in that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Let me correct my hon. friend. He said "Canadian born." My view of this matter has nothing to do with a man being Canadian born, or British born, or German born. The principle that I lay down is that a man is in the service of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman has interpreted my ideas. We send battalions overseas on the pledge of the ministry that these battalions shall go to the front under their Canadian officers. But when they go across the water, some man who has not worn a uniform as long as the men under which the Canadian boys are serving tells them that the pledged faith of the Canadian Government matters nothing, but that because he happens to be a British officer those who come from the dominions, no matter what may be their ability and knowledge of their business, shall have nothing to say. And when in this Canadian Parliament we ask the Canadian Minister of Militia to tell us about it, he cannot tell us anything but must cable to London. And for two and a half weeks he has been sending cables to London, and he cannot tell us to-day where we stand in regard to our forces. We are voting $500,000,000, and it is time that we should learn, in the interests of the country, not only in regard to the Ross rifle, but in regard to the status of our men and their equipment, and all other questions overseas, whether this Government is to accept without question the opinions of gentlemen on the other side of the water. We have been in this war almost three years. The casualties of officers and men belonging to the old regiments of Great Britain have been very great indeed. There are men to-day who are commanding regiments going out from Great Britain that have had no longer military experience than the men coming from Canada. Why, then, should we be told that because a man is attached to a Canadian regiment, his opinion about rifles, equipment, or anything else, is worth nothing, as though he belonged to an inferior people whose right to express an opinion is not to be considered?

Mr. EDWARDS: And who has said that, except it be the hon. gentleman himself?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend should know that actions and results speak louder than words. He ought to know that the ex-Minister of Militia has time and time again arraigned the Government, of which he was then a member, for pursuing that policy in regard to almost everything in connection with our troops overseas.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do not a considerable number of Canadian officers hold responsible positions at the head of the troops in France?

Mr. MACDONALD: What does the hon. gentleman mean? Is he calling upon us to express exultation and delight because a number of our officers who have gone to England are permitted to go to France? If so, he must not expect me to join him. On the other hand, I want to know why it is that two thousand Canadian officers taken from their regiments are not permitted to go to France because somebody who was born in Great Britain, who has had no longer training than many Canadian officers, decides that they shall not go. I want to know why it is that, without regard to the pledged faith of this Government, some man in Great Britain who happened to have a little brief authority decides to butcher our battalions and scatter them to the four winds of heaven. That is what is being done. The reason I mention this matter is because my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) says the Ross rifle is no good—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say the Ross rifle is no good.

Mr. MACDONALD: The right hon. gentleman says that the Ross rifle is not the weapon that our men ought to be armed with during the war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I said that it had been exchanged, for reasons which I gave to the House; I did not say what the hon. gentleman said I said; he knows perfectly well that I did not say it.

Mr. MACDONALD: My right hon. friend is a casuist of the first class. He puts into other words just what I have said. He says the Ross rifle was displaced for good and sufficient reason, that reason being that it was not satisfactory to our forces. But the ex-Minister of Militia tells us that it is a better rifle than the Lee-Enfield. The Prime Minister says that because of the opinion they have in England the Ross rifle must be thrown overboard. Well, we have a fully equipped rifle factory in this country. If we cannot make the Ross rifle, why not make some other rifle? We on this side of the House take the position that there is no more reason to believe we cannot make rifles than there was to believe that we could not make shells. When we ask why rifles are not made in this country the right hon. gentleman says: I have given notice of a year—

Some hon. MEMBERS: When was it given?

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. MACDONALD: In December. But the Prime Minister does not state how many rifles he wants. He does not pursue the ordinary business policy that a person purchasing manufactured steel would pursue, of indicating his requirements so that those who have to obtain raw material may know what they are to arrange for. And he says that somebody in England does not tell him about the pattern. There is the situation. I think his position proves everything that the ex-Minister of Militia said. That hon. gentleman has told us that for ten months at the beginning of the war he was not permitted to have anything to say. And he predicted that the appointment of an Overseas Minister of Militia would lead to a state of chaos, I think he was a true prophet.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have stated the position of the Government over and over again, and I have nothing to add. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) does not understand or appreciate it, that is a matter for himself. I have stated what the difficulties are that the Government will have to consider, and I have nothing to add to what I have already said in that regard.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: What I cannot understand about the situation as explained by the Government is this: Suppose the Government takes the position that they were bound by the contract under ordinary conditions. I do not admit that they were so bound as a matter of fact, but let us assume for the moment that they were bound. But the Government has cancelled other contracts because the conditions are not ordinary conditions. I believe that under the War Measures Act the Government could take possession of the Ross rifle factory. I believe they could go so far as to make a charge against any one and have him shut up. If the Ross rifle is not right, why is not the manufacture of it stopped? If the Government were to break the contract, what is the worst that could result? The worst would be a merely monetary loss through a successful action for damages for violation of the contract. But, technically, an action could not even be begun against the Government without the Government's own consent. I do not depend upon that however. What I say is that, even admitting the Government's contention, the very worst that could happen would be a suit against them for damages. Well, the Government assumes that our sons ought to be armed with some other rifle than the Ross rifle. What, then, is the situation? The situation is, that they are putting in the balance on one side a possible monetary loss through a suit for damages and on the other side the proper or improper equipment of our boys, and they are allowing the prospect of monetary loss to outweigh the proper arming of our boys. I cannot see it in any other way. And the manufacture of a rifle is to continue which the Government say cannot be used. We are spending millions of money, and we are going to spend all that is needed for the successful prosecution of this war. I think, to, that Canada will get all the men that have been asked for if the people are properly approached and properly guided. But we must not acquiesce in the idea that anything in the way of a monetary loss by the country or by the manufacturer of these rifles should stand in the way of the boys at the front having the best rifle that they can get, or that the expenditure of money on a rifle that is not going to be used should be continued. The Finance Minister quite properly delivers lectures on thrift, but how can he reasonably advise ordinary people to stop spending money on things they do not need when he is handing out money for a rifle which he says will not be used? The answer is: "We have a contract signed." Under the present circumstances that answer is no answer, even if the contract has been signed. Considerations of this kind must be put aside in the face of the great crisis which presents itself. The results of a proper course of action in this respect might not be welcome to some, but to many families in Canada the results of the present policy will be much more unwelcome than the cancellation of this contract would be. I shall not enter into an argument as to the merits of the rifle. The Government have given their judgment that the rifle is not serviceable; therefore they should at once stop having these rifles manufactured and asking the people to pay for what they are not going to use.

What can the Government do if they want to manufacture the Lee-Enfield rifle, as they say they do? I believe that we ought to have in Canada a concern for the manufacture of an arm for ourselves. No one denies that there is in this country a large equipment and a staff of expert men. I am informed that the British Government are prepared now, and have been for some months, to send over machinery and equipment to the Ross rifle factory for the manufacture of the Lee-Enfield rifle. The duty of the Government is plain. No matter what the monetary consequences may be, stop manufacturing a rifle that you do not purpose using, take advantage of the offer of the British Government, bring over machinery and equipment and begin at once to manufacture a rifle which the experts of this Government say is the one that our men at the front should use. The necessity of winning the war is paramount to everything else, and, if it cannot be done through an arrangement with Sir Charles Ross, I would go so far as to say that we should nationalize the Ross rifle concern, take advantage of the offer of the British Government and proceed at once to manufacture a rifle which we can use.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman has worked himself up into a state of excitement—

Mr. GRAHAM: I am in earnest, not excited.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: —upon a suggestion which, if he had stopped for a moment to think, he would not have made. He is speaking of the manufacture of these rifles in connection with the arm which is used by the Canadian forces at the front. I have explained at least half a dozen times since this debate began that the Canadian Expeditionary Forces at the front are supplied with the Lee-Enfield rifle and that the British Government have entered into a definite engagement to that end. When my hon. friend, therefore, introduces the bogie of the Canadian forces at the front being supplied with Ross rifles which are to be paid for out of this vote, he introduces a suggestion which, if he had paid any attention to the debate, he would have known to be of no relevancy whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM: The rifles, then, are not going to be used?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The rifles will be used for certain purposes, just as the Ross rifles which are being supplied to the British Government under their order will be used for certain purposes.

Mr. OLIVER: Will they be used for war or for peace purposes?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They will be used in the training of our men, and they may, as I have said already, be used in warfare under different conditions. There is a difference of opinion about the merits of the Ross rifle. I have never ventured an opinion on the merits of the rifle, because I do not possess sufficient knowledge and experience in such matters to make my opinion of any value. I have to go, therefore, by the opinions of others who have the requisite knowledge and experience in this respect. The member for South Renfrew seems to be under the impression that it would be merely a question of paying an amount equal to the profits on the manufacture of the rifle, or something of that kind, if we cancelled this contract at once. In the contract as made by the Government of which the hon. member of South Renfrew was a member, no authority was reserved for cancelling it. If we should say to the Ross Rifle Company: "We will not accept your rifles," what would be the result? The material for those rifles has been obtained, and the parts have very largely been constructed. The parts have not yet been assembled, but if I mistake not very little will remain to be done after March 31 except the assembling. The result of such a proposal as that made by my hon. friend, therefore, would be that we would have to pay for these 80,000 rifles and would not get them for any purposes for which they might be found useful. I should not suppose that any person possessing ordinary common sense would suggest that this be done.

Mr. GRAHAM: Neither would I.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is precisely what my hon. friend suggests, if he i aware of the facts.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What does he suggest, then?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have suggested it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman's suggestion means anything at all, it means precisely what I have stated.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman either was not very sincere in his remarks—which of course, I do not suggest, or, he did not understand what he was talking about.

Mr. GRAHAM: Thank you.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I venture to say that the hon. gentleman did not know the extent to which the manufacture of these rifles has procceded, in the production of the various parts which will eventually be assembled into the completed rifle. If we took the course which he suggests, the net result would be that we would pay for the rifles, but would not get them.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not going to take any part in the discussion of this contract. I have not interfered in any orders in connection with the Ross rifle practically since the war began, because both political parties in days gone by have yielded to improper influences in seeking to make a political football of the manufacture of the Ross rifle under the inspiration of interested parties across the water. In our experience in South Africa we found that the Lee-Enfield rifle jammed repeatedly. I did not want to take up this line of argument, but I purpose doing it owing to the trend that the discussion has taken. I say that the Lee-Enfield rifle jammed repeatedly in South Africa. I can point you to the records of the British House of Commons which show that British officers said that to put that rifle in the hands of their soldiers in South Africa was murdering them. More of their own men, they said, were injured by the Lee-Enfield rifle, owing to the defects of it, than were injured by the Boer Mauser rifle. The British experience in South Africa was that, again and again, not only did the Lee-Enfield jam, but it burst. We all had that experience in South Africa. Then it was found in South Africa that the bolts dropped out very readily. We have had none of that with the Ross rifle. The Lee-Enfield rifle in South Africa was very badly sighted; some of the rifles fired to the left, some fired to the right. Towards the close of the war we got some of them to fire accurately, but the sighting of the rifle was very bad. So we had seven or eight very serious objections to the Lee-Enfield rifle in South Africa. As a result of that the British Government purposed changing their rifle. The British Lee-Enfield private arsenals unfortunately were owned, and are owned to-day, by German interests. I make that statement without fear of contradiction—

Mr. LEMIEUX: A serious statement.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The stock may have been transferred, but they were owned by German authorities, who fought and opposed any change in the British rifle, planning for this war. When this matter was realized, it was decided by the Canadian Government to take up a new rifle. The Mannlicher, a long, quick-firing rifle, was used extensively by the Boers in South Africa. It was not of as long range as the Mauser or the Lee-Enfield, but it was an excellent rapid-fire gun. It was a straight pull rifle the same as the Ross, only with a different mechanism. It was an excellent rifle for any range short of 800 yards, up to close quarters, and we learned to our cost what that rapid-fire rifle meant in South Africa. Accordingly I have yet to see the man who knew anything about a rifle—and there are a great many people making motions about rifles here who do not know the butt end of a rifle from the muzzle—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the British War Office aware that the Lee-Enfield is controlled and owned by German firms?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I said the private factories. The British factories make the Lee-Enfield, but there are also private factories that make the Lee-Enfield.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have they received any orders during the war?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I presume they are turning them out right along. The stock, previous to the war, was held by German interests, and that was known in England; I presume that the British authorities knew of it.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the hon. member suggest that General French or General Haig is in league with Germans?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Neither has said a word against the Ross rifle.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman cannot read.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh yes, I can.

Mr. OLIVER: Then you cannot understand.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh, yes, I can understand, but my hon. friend is so thick in the head that he cannot understand. There is not a word in any report from General Haig or General French saying that the Ross is inferior to the Lee-Enfield or that there has ever been a comparative test.

Mr. PARDEE: What about General Alderson, does he understand rifles?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not think he would know the butt from the muzzle.

Mr. OLIVER: What rifles are the Canadians using in France?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Lee-Enfield at present.

Mr. OLIVER: The Lee-Enfield?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, the Lee-Enfield, I am very sorry to say. The whole mistake in this matter was this; when the Canadians were sent over we armed them with Ross rifles, and when any attempt was made to change anything, the British authorities should have been told: These are Canadian troops; that is made in Canada, we have equipped these men in this way, and it is none of your business; we are responsible for what these men carry and what these men do and we are willing to assume the responsibility. If we had done that and told these gentlemen to keep their hands off, the thing would have been all right. I understand there has been a report read, containing the answer to the ten questions. Suggestions were sent around for weeks by somebody's inspiration, little printed slips were sent around to our troops asking questions about the Ross rifle. These men, having experience of the retreat, the horrible retreat, the murderous retreat of the British soldiers, from Mons to the Marne, where thousands and tens of thousands went down, as the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) might say, murdered, not by the Lee-Enfield rifle, but by the British ammunition—three factories turned out bad ammunition that jammed the rifles. That was the Lee-Enfield rifle; there was not a Ross rifle on the continent at that time. The Lee-Enfield rifle jammed over and over and over again. The Munsters were shot to pieces, the Gordons and the Guards were shot to pieces by the jamming of rifles with bad ammunition. And yet this gentleman from Edmonton, with the opportunity of getting at these facts, stands up and blames the jamming on the Ross rifle.

Mr. OLIVER: What rifle had the Canadians when they were shot to pieces?

Sir SAM HUGHES: They had bad ammunition, that is what they had.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not what Sir Douglas Haig said.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, that is what he says.

Mr. OLIVER: No it is not.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I happen to know. These ten questions were sent around week after week. The boys, most of them, had been accustomed to the Lee-Enfield, and any new rifle coming in, to which they were not accustomed, would naturally be a little odd to them. I quite well remember that when the Snider-Enfield rifle gave place to the Martini, there was any amount of objection. The boys wanted to stick to the Snider-

Enfield. So when the Lee-Enfield came in and took the place of the Martini, the boys wanted to stick to the Martini. So when the Lee-Enfield in turn gave place to the Ross, a number of the soldiers were afraid that the bolt would blow back; they did not understand the mechanism and naturally objected to the straight pull. One of these questions was: Do you not find the Ross rifle a little heavy? The Ross rifle with bayonet is of the same weight as the Lee-Enfield with bayonet. Another question was: Don't you find the Ross rifle too short in the bayonet? The idea there was that the other fellow would get at him in using the bayonet, forgetting that a long rifle with a long bayonet is far easier to thrust aside than a short rifle with a short bayonet. Why I saw Henry Godwin, with a little dagger, beat the champion of the British Army with rifle and bayonet. It is not the length of the rifle and bayonet but the way it is handled; and then, too, the leverage that can be exerted on the end of a long rifle and bayonet by an opponent is much greater than in the case of a short rifle and bayonet, so that the long rifle and bayonet can be more easily thrust aside and is so less useful in the attack. These questions were sent around and there is not one of them that could not be answered in favour of the Ross rifle. General French never had a comparative test. I asked him to have an official test of the two rifles, I offered to let him pick his best experts in England and I would pick the best experts in the Canadian Army, and if I did not trim him to a finish on every point I would agree to swallow the two rifles—a rather difficult job to perform. We have had a lot of talk and nonsense about this thing and therefore I want it clearly understood, in reading these ten question, that not one of them is borne out by any comparative test ever produced in France.

I challenge the Prime Minister to produce a solitary comparative test—he cannot do it, because I have gone into this and fought it out. It is like many another thing. For instance, why did we pay $5,240 for trucks when our own better ones are now running while these are in the ditch, and ours could have been had for $2,800? Because I bowed, foolishly bowed—I should have resigned from the Cabinet or forced the issue of our being allowed to run our own show. Then why was our Oliver equipment discarded? I passed through with the Prime Minister and we only saw two or three regiments, apart from the Canadians, equipped with the Webb equipment. I saw more Canadians with Webb equipment than British soldiers. This is the way this humbug goes on up and down. The inspection and throwing out of our material has been simply, to my mind, a scandal. We had another report—I wonder if that was read? Was that report from General Alderson to General Gwatkin read? Has the Prime Minister ever made any inquiry as to where that report came from?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: How it got out?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes. To whom did General Gwatkin hand that report?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I asked about that and I understood it got out without his authority or knowledge. I do not know how.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Then why was General Gwatkin not dismissed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend was responsible for it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh, no, pardon me, I was not responsible for it. If I had been he would have gone long ago, and the Prime Minister knows it. With regard to this report of Alderson's, Sir Max Aitken and General Carson told me that defective ammunition was being issued. This was after the affair, to which I referred the other evening, concerning the 28th Battalion under Colonel Embury.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where did the defective ammunition come from?

Sir SAM HUGHES: There were three brands of it. I think two were British and one was from the United States but one was Canadian. I want to say that none of our ammunition turned out bad. I forget the names of the brands.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are all on record.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, they are on record. The three brands were defective and no rifle could have fired them. One of them was so deadly that to have sent men to the firing line with it would have been simply murder. We found an ordnance officer attached to Canadian headquarters issuing that ammunition to the extent of 5,000 rounds which were placed in the pouches of one battalion which was in the blow-up. I have no hesitation in saying that that ordnance officer should have been led out and shot, and if I had been running the show I would have carried that out. I protested, and demanded his dismissal, but he is there yet, I understand.

An hon. MEMBER: What happened at St. Julien?

Sir SAM HUGHES: At St. Julien, the Ross rifle was used. The only real rifle victory in this war was fought and won by the Ross rifle, and half of the boys were using bad ammunition at that.

About this Alderson or Gwatkin report—I want the Prime Minister to take note of this, and perhaps Gwatkin will get a ticket for home next week—that report was based on a test between two boys to show that it was bad ammunition. Following upon the Embury affair, General Alderson sent Sir Max Aitken and General Carson each a copy of the report. Each off his own bat wrote him that the report was false, that no such test had ever been held, that it was only a test of ammunition and not of the rifle. One of them pointed out to me moreover that one of the boys who took part in the test, a boy from Millbrook, had never fired a rifle 50 times in his lifetime. He was driving a motor engine and was picked out to test the defective cartridges. When an officer who understood the use of a rifle took it, the test showed that the Lee-Enfield rifle jammed far more frequently than the Ross rifle. They wired to General Alderson, and one of them wrote and sent a corrected report, and yet General Gwatkin did not hand that report out with the other, although, as a matter of fact, it came on the same mail. No explanation was given to the House, and the correcting report was not given out to the press at the same time as the other. There is no doubt that the world put two and two together. Nobody could know of the conspiracy in one of my departments, and this was part and parcel of the conspiracy from start to finish. And yet these gentlemen are there to-day.

There is another matter to which I would refer. The Princess Patricia's battalion went to the front carrying the Lee-Enfield rifle. They were cut to pieces through their rifles jamming. I have letters from the late Colonel Farquhar telling me about it. At that time they had not discovered that the jamming was due to bad ammunition, and he thought it was due to the dirt. He wrote saying " Fix all the boys up with oilcloths, and tell them to take the bolt out, and wipe it clean with the oilcloth," because he said the rifles jammed over and over again with the dirt. A young fellow, a captain from Calgary, told me a week or two ago that when he was in the firing line—he was then a private—they carried sticks and the staves of barrels so as to smash open the bolts in their rifles, which were Lee-Enfields, when they jammed. We did not hear anything of this because there was no one interested in decrying the Lee-Enfield rifle. I would not decry it now but for the course taken by certain gentlemen in this House. The Lee-Enfield was found defective in South Africa; it was rejected by the Japanese Government eighteen years ago as being absolutely unfit for service. It was unfit for service then and it is unfit to-day compared with the Ross rifle. The chamber of the Ross rifle was found to be slightly smaller, and we enlarged it, and every possible objection to the rifle was removed thereby.

There is another matter that I desire to bring up while I am on my feet—I did not intend speaking on this question at all. I have received several cablegrams from officers of certain battalions at the front in the firing line stating that their battalions are going to be broken up to make way for certain other battalions. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has referred to the Highland Brigade of Nova Scotia being broken up. The Prime Minister will recollect that when Nova Scotia sent its first battalion—it was really only half a battalion—the boys were splendid; there were none finer in the world, but that the men did not reflect the credit on the province that they should have done because they did not go into the firing line as a battalion, but were kept as reserves. Individually, they were magnificent, but they did not have the opportunity of doing credit to the province that they would have liked to have had. When the Highland Brigade of Nova Scotia was organized I felt a little keen in regard to the matter because of what had happened, and I took the matter up with the Prime Minister. With his authority I gave my solemn pledge to the officers of the brigade and to the committee that had helped to organize it, that it would be kept intact. The Prime Minister may recall that on one occasion he spoke to me about the 85th Battalion. I said, "For heaven's sake, let us carry out one pledge we have made to the people of Nova Scotia." I merely recall that to the Prime Minister. I gave the same pledge to the Irish Battalion of Montreal. We had Scotch Battalions, English Battalions, Canadian Battalions and darkie battalions, and when the Irishmen of Montreal got their battalion together I thought it was only just to give them the promise and to carry it out, that they would go as a regiment to the front. I did the same with the 104th Battalion of New Brunswick. Every one who knows our history will remember that in 1812 the old 104th marched all through to Canada, as it was at that time, through the wilds in a Canadian winter. When the 104th Battalion was organized for this war we gave the people of New Brunswick to understand that that regiment would be held intact. The same held good of the 105th Battalion from Prince Edward Island. These were the regiments that were to be held intact. That was the plan, and I have seen and heard nothing to cause me to deviate from it to-day.

I may point out that Camp Borden trained more men during the past summer than there are training in England to-day, that Camp Hughes, in Manitoba, trained more men during the past summer than are in England training to-day, and that Valcartier and other camps have trained almost as many, and yet we do not find a resident Minister of Militia at Camp Borden, at Camp Hughes, or at Camp Valcartier. Why all this paraphernalia should be introduced in London, I have never been able to find out. General Carson, with Colonel George Murphy, and thirty-one assistants, ran the business, and when any hon. gentleman asked for any news of his friends at the front he got an answer within a few days. When any hon. gentleman asked if any one was wounded or wanted a report about any one, he got his answer in a very few days from General Carson. To-day you get nothing. General Carson with only thirty-one officers could keep the work going, train men, and send them to the front and win battles, whereas to-day I am told there are 700 assistants, costing $6,000,000 a year, as the result of the action of the Minister of Finance when he ordered the Prime Minister to appoint an Overseas Minister; I forget what he was going to do. We find all that saddled on the country, and I presume to-night the Minister of Finance is preaching thrift and economy to the people of Ottawa.

My plan, and I want it emphasized, and I want the Prime Minister to consider it, was this: We have four divisions at the front. Now I cannot see why we should not have six or even eight, if we have plenty of men in England, and if they are well looked after. I would not run all the new divisions in fresh, but I would do so gradually, after the boys have got in harness and been trained. We need not hold any more of the front than now, but this plan would always allow us to have two divisions in rest. It would absorb the Nova Scotia Highland Brigade, the Quebec Brigade, including the Irish Regiment, the regiments from the eastern townships, the French Canadian regiments, the New Brunswick Brigade, and regiments from the West. Every corps would then have its local representation from all over the Dominion, not necessarily battalion units, because battalions from most localities are now broken up, but taking five or eight battalions from Ontario we could have one part of them as the active brigade, and the other part could be kept in training for details. I worked out the plan with the War Office, with Sir Douglas Haig, and Sir William Robertson, and it met with the approval of every one of them, and for the life of me I cannot see why the plan has not been carried out. This plan would obviate the necessity of breaking up the Nova Scotia Highland Brigade, the New Brunswick Brigade, the Prince Edward Island Battalion, the Irish Regiment of Montreal, the Quebec Battalion and others, and there would be no trouble whatever. Then in the spring, if a drive comes, instead of having four divisions we should have six divisions trained during the winter months, and they would be ready for any drive that might come along. Our losses with the six divisions would be no more than with the four, because we should be holding no more of the front. Our losses would be less per brigade, although the total might be the same.

I might point out that if it had been distinctly understood there was to be no monkeying with the Ross rifle, no changes at all, there would not have been one word more about it. Let me point out further, in regard to Sir John French's report—and I do not blame Sir John French for that report, for it was concocted by the same people who sent over these other reports. I do not blame Sir John French for the statements he made, for he only accepted the statements of Alderson, and the report was made up for Alderson by some of these whippersnappers who have been mentioned, and who knew nothing of a rifle, and whose only ambition was to get rid of everything of Canadian make. Sir John French says in his report that he found 3,000 Lee-Enfields already in the division. I told Sir John French that the British regulars would come along at night, when they did not have an opportunity in the day time, and steal the Ross rifle for their snipers and sharpshooters. The British regulars soon realized the deadly value of the Ross rifle for that kind of work. In the morning our fellows would find their Ross rifles gone and Lee-Enfields left in their stead.

I did not intend to say anything about this matter, but was prompted to do so by the trend given to the debate by some hon. gentleman recalling the old days when some hon. gentlemen who did not belong to the Liberal persuation attacked the Ross rifle. It strikes me that it is not well for the Ross rifle or for the welfare of the troops that this criticism has been launched. The only trouble with the Ross rifle has been bad ammunition. The Lee-Enfields have jammed over and over again. The Ross rifle has jammed over and over again with bad ammunition, but it has not jammed nearly so badly as the Lee-Enfield has jammed.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF: I should like to say a word before the motion is put. We have just listened to a very serious charge by the ex-Minister of Militia against not only this Government but the British Government as well. He says that the Lee-Enfield is no good now, and that it was no good at the time of the South African war. What must we think of this Government and the British Government if the statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia are true? He takes the position that he knows all about the merits of the Ross rifle, and that the chief military authorities in Great Britain and all the members of the British Government know absolutely nothing whatever about it, and he says that the Lee-Enfield rifle is not a fit weapon to put into the hands of our soldiers, let alone the British soldiers. That is a very serious charge to make, and I think some one on the Government benches should have something to say about it. I will not go any further into that; it is a matter for the Government to deal with, and surely the British Government might take notice of it too. If, then, the Ross rifle is declared to be no good by one who claims to know everything about it—

Sir SAM HUGHES: I said the ammunition was no good. I did not say the rifle was no good.

Mr. TURRIFF: He said that the Lee-Enfield was no good in South Africa and no good in the present war, and that on every occasion when a test was made the Ross rifle proved superior to the Lee-Enfield. The ex-minister will not deny that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. TURRIFF: He has the courage of his convictions, and is not afraid to stand by them on the floor of Parliament. While I cannot agree with the ex-minister, I certainly admire his courage in standing by what he believes to be true. My hon. friend does not say that it was bad ammunition. He says the Lee-Enfield was not a good rifle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I said that in this war neither the Ross rifle nor the Lee-Enfield had jammed with good ammunition.

Mr. TURRIFF: I accept my hon. friend's explanation.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is not an explanation; it is my statement.

Mr. TURRIFF: There are one or two things that seem to stand out in the strong light of day in connection with the Ross rifle. Efforts have been made by the Government to show that they were bound to accept the Ross rifle under the contract made by the late Government. But the contract did not provide that the rifle had to be the Ross rifle. The company had to furnish any rifle the Government approved of, and the Government had the right at any time to change the specifications of the Ross rifle that was being manufactured for them. No matter what is said to the contrary, this Government is absolutely responsible for the Ross rifle that is being put in the hands of our Canadian soldiers. I am not going to hold the Government responsible for what happened before the war. There is no question that the Ross rifle is a good target rifle, and probably one of the best sporting rifles in the world, but soon after the war started, as soon as our Canadian troops were engaged in the spring of 1915, it was demonstrated that the Ross rifle was an absolutely unsuitable weapon for our soldiers in the trenches. That is the report of everybody.

Mr. EDWARDS: When was that demonstrated?

Mr. TURRIFF: In the spring of 1915.

Mr. EDWARDS: Before that it had not been demonstrated.

Mr. TURRIFF: I say that it was demonstrated in the first battles in which the Canadian soldiers used the Ross rifle. I know that in the spring of 1915 the British authorities in the field re-armed the First Division with the Lee-Enfield rifle. Previous to that time word was coming back every day of the week from the Canadian soldiers at the front that the Ross rifle was absolutely unsatisfactory, and that on every occasion where it was possible for a Canadian soldier to throw away his Ross rifle and pick up a Lee-Enfield, he did so. Now, do you think that the Canadian soldiers in the First Division, our own people were all crazy; that they were led astray by the manufacturers of the Lee-Enfield rifle in Great Britain; that these men who were fighting and giving their lives for their country did not know one rifle from the another, did not know whether the Ross rifle was a good one or a poor one?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I point out to my hon. friend that it was not until October, 1915, that the Canadians seemed to realize that bad ammunition was the cause of the trouble?

Mr. TURRIFF: Then all I have to say is that the British war authorities took action a long time before the Canadian soldiers found out that the Ross rifle was not a satisfactory rifle, because in the spring of 1915 the First Division was rearmed with Lee-Enfield rifles. I hold the Government responsible from that time forward. I do not hold the Government responsible up to that time; but when, in the spring of 1915, now almost two years ago, they got word that the Ross rifle was an unsatisfactory war weapon—and they got that information from the men carrying the rifles and also from the British authorities—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the Government to be condemned for not observing the British regulations? The British authorities threw out the trucks for the First Division, and then, for the Second Division, I refused to have the trucks changed.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is a matter in regard to which the ex-Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister of Canada are at daggers drawn, the Prime Minister of Canada can deal with that question. I have seen a good deal of correspondence between my hon. friend and the Prime Minister and I am free to admit that the ex-Minister of Militia got the best of that correspondence.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And I will get the best too when it comes to a comparison between the Ross rifle and the Lee-Enfield rifle.

[Mr. Turriff.]

Mr. TURRIFF: If my hon. friend can do that, he is a better man than I think he is, because it does not seem reasonable to me that the British Government, the war ministers, and the generals of Great Britain who are fighting in the fields of France and Flanders to-day can all be fooled or bribed by the Germans. I do not believe that for one moment, and I do not believe the people of Canada or the people of Great Britain will take the view of the ex-Minister of Militia as against that of the British Government, the war generals and the Government of Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I point this out to my hon. friend? I do not suppose one out of a hundred thousand ever heard anything about the matter. It has been shown that reports are allowed to pass through without ever being read.

Mr. TURRIFF: That may be. What I want to do is to show that this Government is responsible for the condition of things in which we find ourselves to-day. I say again that in the spring of 1915, this Government had absolute evidence to show that the Ross rifle was unsatisfactory. Even if they do stick to the strict letter of the law and even if it is a fact that it takes a year to make a change in the manufacture of a rifle, had the Government done its duty, then almost a year ago we could have been supplying a new rifle, but as a matter of fact, no one knows better than hon. members sitting on the Government benches that it does not take a year to change the manufacture of a rifle. They know that under the contract they could have changed the pattern of the rifle, and anybody knows that a great deal of the machinery that is established in a rifle factory is exactly the same whether it is used for the manufacture of a Lee-Enfield or for the manufacture of a Ross rifle. Had the Government acted as they should have acted and taken steps at once to have a new rifle made when they found the Ross rifle was not satisfactory there would have been no need to have stopped the manufacture of rifles. The machinery could have been so changed that within six months the factory could have been turning out either a Lee-Enfield rifle, or the pattern of the Lee-Enfield that is now being manufactured in the United States for the British Government, or any other type of rifle that the Government chose to have manufactured. But they did not do that. They went on manufacturing the Ross rifle in spite of the fact that they knew it was not satisfactory and that the Canadian soldiers of the First Division had thrown away their rifles whenever they could and that they had been re-armed wth the Lee-Enfield rifles. That was the condition of affairs from the spring of 1915 to the spring of 1916. Then the matter is crowded more and more on the attention of the Government. The British authorities took the matter into their own hands and refused to arm the Canadian soldiers with Ross rifles, and they notified this Government as far back as May last that they were going to re-arm the Canadian soldiers with the Lee-Enfield rifle as they went across from Great Britain to France. Why did not the Government even then, one year after they received the first intimation that the Ross rifle was not a satisfactory weapon, make the change? My hon. friends on the Government benches know perfectly well that they could have had those changes made in a short time; that the factory was prepared to make the changes and that the factory suggested that changes should have been made in the rifle that was being turned out, a rifle that our soldiers were being armed with and a rifle that they threw away whenever they got an opportunity to pick up another one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What changes did the hon. gentleman say we should have made that were suggested by the Ross Rifle Company?

Mr. TURRIFF: Does my hon. friend say that no changes were ever suggested by the Ross Rifle Company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the hon. gentleman refers to? He says that the Ross Rifle Company suggested changes which we should have made. When he says that, he ought to know what the changes are; and if he knows what they are, he ought to tell us.

Mr. TURRIFF: I ask my hon. friend, who is a member of the Government: Were changes ever suggested by the Ross Rifle Company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry I cannot answer. I do not know what the hon. gentleman is driving at. When I make a statement I will give the evidence in support of it. I am asking the hon. gentleman to give the evidence in support of his statement.

Mr. TURRIFF: If my hon. friend, who is a member of the Government, cannot answer, how does he expect me, a private member, to answer? My hon. friend will not make the statement, and I challenge him to make the statement. He has made the statement that the Government was bound by the contract made by the late Government, and he has not yet substantiated that statement. If he can do so, we would like to hear him; but my hon. friend has taken good care not to make the statement that no changes were ever suggested by the company manufacturing the Ross rifle. My hon. friend has not made that statement, and I do not think he purposes making it, because he knows he will be getting into deep water if he does. In May or June of last year the British Government said: Don't send over any more Ross rifles.

Mr. EDWARDS: Did the Ross Rifle Company suggest to the Government that any changes should be made in the rifle, and if so, what changes?

Mr. TURRIFF: Now, my hon. friend is trying to take upon himself the duties of the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). We all give the Solicitor General credit for being very clever, and able, and sharp, and I think that if he did not make much progress it would be unwise for the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to try. Last spring the British Government said: Don't send over any more Ross rifles. The Ross rifle is the one that had been in the hands of our Canadian boys at the front. I have heard men who have been in the trenches, and have been fortunate enough to come back, say that in hundreds of cases our Canadian boys have stood with their Ross rifles, jammed and useless in their hands and the Germans have come up and shot them in their tracks. I say again, the Government is responsible to a very large extent for much of the loss of life that occurred through the Canadian soldiers being armed with the Ross rifle long after the Government knew that that rifle was unsatisfactory as a war weapon. We have information, I do not know how true, that a number of Ross rifles—we are told, tens of thousands of them—were tampered with in an effort to improve them, by men either at the front or in Great Britain; that the bolt was taken out and tempered, and was so hardened that it became as brittle as glass, so that in many cases the little knob that keeps the bolt from flying out broke off like a piece of glass and the rifle became useless after firing a few shots. That was done under the regime of the Prime Minister, and we have never heard of any punishment being meted out to the men who tampered with that rifle. Yet these rifles were put into the hands of our soldiers without being tested, after this tempering of the bolt had been done. Who is responsible? Is it the Prime Minister, or is it the ex-Minister of Militia? That mistake cost the lives of hundreds of Canadian boys.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I might point out that the hon. gentleman is wrong. These rifles were put into the hands of soldiers, training in camp in England, and the tempering or tampering, was detected. Those rifles never got to the front.

Mr. TURRIFF: I understand that this tempering was done in England.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Let us explain. After the tempering had been done the rifles were put into the hands of soldiers to be used, and the discovery of the defects was made in England before the troops crossed.

Mr. TURRIFF: On whose authority was that tempering done?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never got to the bottom of it. It was only last year that it occurred, and it is one of the things I was working at when I came home.

Mr. TURRIFF: At all events, it appears that authority was given by somebody to do this tempering, and these rifles were put into the hands of our boys, and hundreds of them lost their lives on account of the rifle proving useless. Not having proper inspection they—

Sir SAM HUGHES. Let me correct the hon. gentleman. Not one of the rifles with a bad bolt got to the front. It is not true what the hon. gentleman says about our boys losing their lives through this—perfect nonsense. If the rifle jammed, it was due to bad ammunition and not to the rifle itself. I examined the matter critically and am confident that that is the case. What harm would happen if the knob of the bolt broke off? If the weapon was defective, the man had only to pick up another one. But this tempering was done in England. As soon as I heard of it, I ordered an inquiry, and this was under way when I came home.

Mr. EDWARDS: When was this?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Last year.

Mr. TURRIFF: Here we have the statement that this was done apparently without the knowledge or authority of the Minister of Militia of that day. Was it done behind his back by his collegues or was it done by somebody in the Old Country? My opinion is that many of those rifles, thousands of them, got across to France and Belgium, and in the time of battle they proved useless after the first few shots. I have talked with returned soldiers, and officers too. The ex-Minister of Militia said that what I have said is absurd—that any man lost his life through the rifle jamming. I have heard these men say that they have seen scores of men shot down with rifles in their hands they could not use.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Due to bad amunition.

Mr. TURRIFF: Well, there is the position of affairs. And in the face of all this the Prime Minister asks this Committee to vote $2,666,000 to buy more Ross rifles.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I challenge the hon. gentleman to give the name of an officer who has seen a score of men shot down.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have their word for it, and I would take the word of an officer who has been in battle as quickly as I would take the word of the ex-Minister of Militia. I have been told not only by officers but by men that these things have occurred. Why has the rifle been changed? We are asked to vote the money for the manufacture of 80,000 additional Ross rifles, a large number already delivered, and a large number not yet delivered nor even manufactured. Surely the time for the Government to cancel the contract for the Ross rifle was when the British Government sent word that they did not want any more Ross rifles sent to Great Britain, and that they would arm the Canadian soldiers with Lee-Enfields. Surely that was the time to let the matter stand in abeyance until the necessary machinery could be put in to manufacture the Lee-Enfield or any other rifle that the Government decided upon. But my hon. friends did not take that means of getting a good rifle to put into the hands of the soldiers; in spite of the advice of the British Government, they continued to manufacture the Ross rifle. My right hon. friend now asks for $2,666,000 to manufacture a rifle which, generally speaking, will not be used for war purposes, but will be utilized for training the men in Great Britain. But it is not necessary to pay $28 for a dummy rifle with which the soldiers may drill and learn how to handle a rifle. You could get something to take the place of a rifle for drilling purposes at a cost of $1, or, at the most $2. My right hon. friend, however, purposes spending $2,666,000 for a rifle which will not be used in war except under certain circumstances; which is not going to be sent to France or Belgium, where the fighting is going on—and he is going to continue purchasing this rifle for months to come. This is an absurd position for the Government to take, and the people will hold the Government responsible, not only for the kind of rifle that they have put into the hands of the soldiers, but also for the waste of money in purchasing rifles that are not going to be used. It is such a waste of money that the only thing that I can compare it with is the extravagance of this Government in everything connected with the war.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor-General): Mr. Chairman, the Government is in the position to-night of being attacked from the opposite side of the House because we authorized the substitution of Lee-Enfield rifles for the Ross rifles too late, and as a result are blamable before the people of Canada—and, at the same time we are attacked by the ex-Minister of Militia because we authorized this substitution too soon. It is rather amusing to observe the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite making their attack from one viewpoint with all the vigour in their power, watching the ex-Minister of Militia making his attack from the opposite viewpoint with the vigour that he is capable of, and at the same time struggling desperately to keep on sympathetic terms with the ex-Minister of Militia. I desire to assure the committee that between the two the members of the Government feel quite comfortable in the belief that the entire course pursued by the Administration with regard to rifles has been the right course; that the substitution was made at the right time, not too soon not too late, made at the only time when in the eyes of intelligent and impartial men we could justify it to the people of Canada.

I would not undertake on any occasion to discuss the comparative merits of the two rifles; no one is less capable of that discussion than I. We cannot be governed as members of the Administration by our own views of the comparative merits of the rifles; we must be governed by the views of those whose opinions are entitled to be the controlling factor in the decision of such a vital question. We have been governed by the views of those men; we have followed their views and the results have justified our decision.

If I may be allowed to make one remark as to what principle I think should be followed in the matter of the selection of a standard rifle for Canada it would be that we should use the same rifle as is adopted as the result of experience by Great Britain herself; that our rifle should be the same rifle as hers, and that the combined wisdom of the two countries should be at the back of whatever rifle is used. That has not been the case in Canada for many years, and those responsible for that not being the case are the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite. They are the persons who, in 1902, undertook to establish a standard service arm for this country; who pinned the fate of this country in peace and war to that arm, and who did so in defiance of the judgment of the authorities in Great Britain. The Liberal Government of Canada entered into a contract on March 27, 1902, for the production of a rifle in Canada of which they were to supply a standard sample to the Ross Rifle Company. They later established a factory on the hill at Quebec and they made that selection in defiance of the advice of the officer commanding the troops in Canada, who informed them that in his judgment it was by no means a suitable place for the establishment of a rifle factory. Political considerations seemed to have governed them from the first, while military considerations were left altogether in the background. Before they went ahead they received a protest from the War Office of Great Britain against the adoption in this or in any part of the British Empire of a standard rifle differing from the standard rifle adopted by Great Britain herself. In defiance of that protest they went ahead, adopted a standard rifle, the Ross rifle, Mark I, placed it with the Ross rifle Company, and manufactured that rifle for some years. They are the parties responsible for the adoption of that standard and for all the consequences that necessarily ensued, And, what consequences necessarily ensued? What consequences are attributable to the action of those who adopted this as the standard rifle of Canada?

They later altered the type in some respects, maintaining the main principle, and they called that the Ross rifle Mark II. Later they altered it again and they called that the Ross rifle Mark II , and that was the rifle adopted by the late Government until shortly before they went out of office.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Hon. Frank Oliver) speaking, I know, not intentionally in the wrong, but utilizing an article which appeared about a month ago in the Toronto Globe, made himself responsible for the assertion that it was this Government which changed from the Mark II to the Mark III rifle.

Mr OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He adheres to that still; he still clings to the Globe article of January 6 last, scarcely a line of which could be properly described as anything less than loathesome mendacity. I purpose establishing what I say. I do not think that the hon. member for Edmonton even yet intends to make a statement that is wrong.

Mr. OLIVER: He does not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not? I happen to have the order in council here, right in front of me, which was passed by the late Administration, adopting the Mark III rifle. No more suitable time than now is likely to present itself for reading that. It is dated October 2, 1911. For the purpose of fitting the story to the necessity of the argument, the Globe has dated it in November, 1911; but, unfortunately for the Globe, the order in council is dated October 2, 1911. Now, perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton will admit that he is wrong. Here is the order in council:

The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia and Defence, advise that an order for 10,000 rifles, for delivery during the calendar year, 1912, be given to the Ross Rifle Company, subject to the provisions of the contract entered into with the company for the manufacture of rifles; and subject to the following further conditions:—

1. That no payment on progress estimates be paid on account of said 10,000 rifles until the Parliamentary appropriation for 1912-13 becomes available.

2. That the pattern of the rifles to be supplied shall be that known as Mark III.

Was that adopting the Mark III rifle? There is no answer. I read from the order in council:

Inasmuch, however, as this pattern has been adopted subject to final agreement on two minor points, viz.: the alteration of the gas vent and the extension of the wooden hand guards for the backsight, any order to be given to the company shall be made subject to the final acceptance of these two features.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that the alteration of the gas vent and the extension of the wooden hand guards for the back sight make it a Mark II?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN (Reading):

As the contract provides that notice of any order for the delivery of rifles during any calendar year should be given to the contractors not later than the 30th September next preceding the beginning of that year, the present recommendation is being made in advance of a final settlement of the two minor points above mentioned, in order to insure delivery of the rifles required during the calendar year 1912.

And this order in council is signed by the Clerk of the Privy Council, and the original bears the autograph signature of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE: Is it not so that the order for Mark III rifles was placed by the Conservative Administration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Later orders were, but the first order is right there.

Mr. PARDEE: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this not an order?

The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia and Defence, advised that an order for 10,000 rifles for delivery during the current year 1912 be given to the Ross Rifle Company—

Mr. PARDEE: That is simply the ordinary notice. Was not that order placed by the Conservative Administration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, the order was filled during our Administration. How could it have been otherwise? The hon. gentlemen were thrown out of power.

Mr. PARDEE: Quite so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they adopted the Ross rifle Mark III before they resigned office, and authorized the giving of an order for 10,000 of these rifles.

Mr. OLIVER: Authorized.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, authorized and more—

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, and who gave the order?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The officers of the Militia Department. Who else?

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no. There is a Minister of Militia, you know, in all Governments.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I point out to the Solicitor General that I think this is piffle. There is no use beating around the bush. The Ross rifle Mark III was authorized by Sir Frederick Borden, if I remember aright, in December, 1910.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is quite right.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I remember the whole thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was seeing first how far these gentlemen would go. As a matter of fact, the notification to the Ross Rifle Company to readjust its factory to make Mark III rifles was served on the company by the Liberal Administration on December 28, 1910. It will be clear, of course, to every one that the hon. gentleman is still quite right in the assertion that the late Government was in no way committed to the Ross rifle Mark III.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman did not make that assertion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That you were not committed to the rifle?

Mr. OLIVER: No, not at all. That is the assertion my hon. friend made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the hon. gentleman to say it, and when I asked him if he meant it he repeated that he did.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh well, my hon. friend is mistaken, that is all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So much for that. In this connection just to show the character of the criticism, just to show the length that newspapers and a certain militant section of hon. gentlemen opposite will go in order to make party capital out of a subject of this kind, let me say that after I made a short speech in Montreal sometime early in November last year in which I in no way attacked hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to this contract, in which I refrained from attack of any character and merely defended the present Administration against attacks which had been made, articles were sent broadcast throughout Canada under the pay of the Liberal party of this country to the effect that I had deceived the people of Montreal——

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —because I had told them that the late Government had adopted the standard of rifle with which the soldiers of Canada went to the front in this war, and they said this: "This is a very flimsy excuse; the only rifle the late Government adopted was the Mark II; it was not the Mark III which is a flimsy weapon—it was not the Mark III at all; that is the adoption of the Borden Government, asserted this article Mr. Meighen succeeded, one writer said, in mixing the babies. Where does the writer of that article, where do the newspapers that sent it throughout Canada stand in the face of the order in council with the signature of the late Prime Minister authorizing an order for Mark III rifles, and in face of the notification to adjust the factory to make Mark III rifle served on the 28th day of December, 1910, or almost a year before they went out of office? I do not criticise even yet the late Administration for the change from the Mark II to the Mark III. It was a perfectly proper change. Perfectly proper for why? For one thing, as I am informed by militia authorities—I do not know myself—the Mark VII ammunition, which became the ammunition of the British Empire, will not fit into the Mark II, but it will fit into the Mark III. There may have been other reasons, I make so criticism against the adoption of the rifle But why deceive the people of this country and make false and mendacious attacks?

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this rifle of theirs was a fine target rifle and was a fine sporting rifle. Those are the words of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). He says: That is all it was used for in our time and it worked very well for those purposes, and there our responsibilities end. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that they did not surely adopt the Mark III as a sporting and target rifle. Was it to shoot bullseyes and partridges that we started the manufacture of these rifles at Quebec? They adopted it as a war rifle for the soldiers of Canada to use—for how long? To use in war until the time came when the proper authorities who should know best decided that there was a better rifle available. Is that common-sense or is it not? Is not that the proper time when the use of the rifle should cease? Is there any time earlier than that moment, when any Government would be justified in discarding the national arm of Canada and reverting to another arm? The moment, I repeat was when those in authority who best knew advised this Government that there was a better rifle available for our troops.

For whatever loss, if there was any,—I do not know because I was not there; the ex-Minister of Militia was there and he knows something about it—for such loss, if any, as resulted from the use of the Ross rifle more than would have resulted from the use of the Lee-Enfield up to the time when we were advised by responsible officers that a better rifle was available, hon. gentlemen opposite, and they alone, are responsible to the people of this country. When did that time come?

Perhaps before I enter upon this phase of my argument, I might revert to a few more of those attacks that have been made even to-night against the statement which I made, I think about as innocent a statement as human breath could make, that we were bound by the contract which the Government of Canada solemnly entered into. Yes, I did say in Montreal that we were bound by the contract of the late Administration, but I uttered a few more sentences right afterwards which are not quoted, which appeared in both the newspapers that reported the speech, but which are omitted designedly in order to give to the people of this country a false impression of what I said.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is on the point to-night when he says that even although there is a contract, you have power under the War Measures Act to break it, and you ought never to put a measure of damages against the lives of the soldiers of Canada. No one subscribes to that doctrine more heartily than I do. No one subscribed to it in more specific terms than I did in the very speech which I made in Montreal. In that speech I said this: although that contract existed, and although in honour we were bound to it, there was in relation to that contract, as there is in relation to every other civil contract, the alternative of damages, an honourable alternative, and that if it had been possible for this Government to have got a better rifle to place in the hands of the troops of this country it would have been our duty to tear that contract in shreds and pay our damages like men. I said that there, and I repeat it now.

But was there a rifle that we could get that was better? Was there a rifle that we could get at that time upon which those who ought to know best, and do know best, had planted the imprint of their approval? Nay, was there a rifle of any kind that we could get at all? If there was I would be glad to hear what it was and where it was. If there was not, was it our duty to keep the Ross rifles, or was it not? I am not holding up a white flag. I am out here in the open. I am ready to discuss this thing to the ground, so far as I am able, and if any hon. gentleman opposite believes that I am making an assertion that varies from the fact, or that he has information which goes to refute anything I say, he is welcome to give it to me now.

I repeat: when did the time come when we were in a position to assure the people of Canada that a more efficient rifle was available for the sons of this country at war? Did it come in 1915? I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, do they think it did? Did it come in 1914? The hon. member for Edmonton says, "Oh, we heard stories from the front that the Ross rifle jammed, and you should have changed the rifle when you heard those stories." Does he repeat that now?

Mr. OLIVER: Sure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, we hear some strange recommendations from the hon. member for Edmonton. I will read a couple of them now, but before I read the first I will say that I think there is a great deal of common sense in it. He was discussing the question of what authority we should take in the matter of a choice of rifle and equipment for this country for our soldiers, and here is where he said we might have got our authority. On page 451 of Hansard, February 2nd, 3 days ago, I find that the hon. member for Edmonton said:

> I should be glad to back the Minister of Militia or any other member of the Government —perhaps I might except the ex-Minister of Militia—but I would be willing to back the members of the Government generally—against an equal number of men of equal rank in any other country. But it is not a question of the respective abilities of the men in control of our affairs and those in control of affairs in Great Britain. The men in control of affairs in Great Britain are the people who are running the thing; it is their say; and if we are going to help to win the war, we must do it by helping them and not by going counter to their ideas. When it pleases them to require a rifle of a certain style, or equipment of a certain style, it is for us to provide that which will conform with their idea, so that we may work with them harmoniously.

Do not take the idea of some of the soldiers of Canada, but take the idea of the Government of Great Britain and their responsible officers—that was the advice given to us by the hon. member for Edmonton on 2nd February. He goes on:

> We may think that we have as good as they have or better; but so long as they are carrying the big end of the burden, if we are going to be successful in helping them we must co-operate with them and not antagonize them by the equipment, munitions, or armament we bring forward.

That is a very good doctrine. It seems to me that that assertion very closely approaches the height of common sense. When we are fighting side by side with the soldiers of the Motherland, we are necessarily under the supreme direction of the military officers of the Mother Country. But the hon. member for Edmonton must admit that we get very different advice from some of his friends opposite, advice which he must admit that it is pretty hard to follow. Take the advice we got to-night from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). He scoffs at the idea of our bowing at all to the knowledge of British officers, or of the British Government, or of anybody else outside of this country. That is very different advice indeed from that tendered by the hon. member (Mr. Oliver). We also got very different advice the other night, which I will read now. Here is some more advice that we got on the 2nd February last:

> The exigencies of the case were such that it was the business of the Government of Canada to follow events on the battlefield so that on their responsibility, and not on that of British officers, they would be sure that our men had, or had not, in their hands a rifle that was absolutely efficient. I absolutely protest against the responsibility being placed on any other shoulders than those of our own military department, who are charged on our behalf with seeing that our troops are efficient, and that their armament is efficient. It is not the responsibility of the British Government; it is the responsibility of our Government; and when, after experience had shown that the rifle was inefficient, not on the authority of Sir John French, but on the experience of our own men who threw it away, there was no escape from the responsibility of the Government to see that that rifle was replaced as soon as it could be.

Very different advice indeed is that we get from hon. gentlemen opposite, diametrically opposed advice, and it is very difficult for the Government to follow it when hon. gentlemen opposite cannot agree among themselves.

An hon. GENTLEMEN: Who said that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the author of this? It is the very same gentleman who was the author of the first statement I read, and just ten minutes after he had given us the first, he gives us this advice, which is diametrically opposite. The hon. gentleman is not so skillful as his leader. His leader very often gets on opposite poles, and enunciates doctrines that are violently opposed to each other, but he takes care that at least some distance of geography intervenes between the one point of delivery and the other, or if he can get no distance in geography, he manages to get some distance in time. Such, Sir, is the advice of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the authority that we should adopt.

I ask again, when did we get such authority as would enable this Government to have discarded the Ross rifle the national arm of this country, and to have accepted the Lee-Enfield? When did we get such authority as would justify our position before reasonable men? Did we get it in 1914, and if so where did we get it from? Did we get it in 1915, and if so what was that authority? Where is the responsible official whose authority we should accept who made a single statement in the year 1915 condemnatory of the Ross rifle? Where is the responsible official whose authority we should listen to for a moment, who advised or recommended the Government to make the change from the Ross rifle to the Lee-Enfield in 1915? The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) laughs. He knows there is no such authority. He knows there is nothing on the record and nothing in existence that would have justified this Government in abandoning the Ross rifle in 1915. I ask him, does he not know that?

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not following my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be a very safe position to take.

Mr. MACDONALD: If I have to say anything about my hon. friend's remarks, I will say it when he is through. He is very fond of carrying on a conversational discussion all around the House. That is not proper debating.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are in committee, it is proper debating. Hon. gentlemen opposite think it is not proper because they do not permit interruptions themselves. I ask him again, if in 1915 there was any recommendation made on the authority of any official or any one else whose authority we ought to accept, that would have justified us in abandoning the Ross rifle for the Lee-Enfield. He heard that, but he won't answer. He knows there was not one. He won't answer because he, himself on the 5th of May 1916, stood up in this House and stated that the Ross rifle we had then was a good rifle, and we ought to keep it. The hon. member for Pictou heard those reports from the front about the jamming of the Ross rifle in the spring of 1915, and he doubtless heard reports about the jamming of the Lee-Enfield too. He heard reports from soldiers who much preferred the Lee-Enfield to the Ross, and I think he must have heard reports from many others who preferred the Ross to the Lee-Enfield. I heard both, myself, and for the life of me, I could not tell from those reports where the balance of merit lay. That was the position in 1915. On the 19th of June 1915, Sir John French wrote to the War Office that there were soldiers in the First Division who had lost confidence in the Ross rifle. And why? Because the Ross rifle had jammed with a bad brand of British ammunition. Sir John French made no other criticism whatever of the national arm of Canada. Now who is the hon. gentleman who will say, that when that report came to this Government we would have been justified in lightly throwing away the national arm of this country for another rifle, even had such another rifle been available anywhere in the world?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman mentioned Sir John French's report. Does Sir John French in that report say that the jamming was caused by a bad brand of British ammunition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was caused by bad British ammunition, and the committee which he refers to in his letter states that it was Brand B 1915 ammunition, and that brand only, which caused special jamming in the Ross rifle.

Mr. OLIVER: Why has not that information been laid on the table of the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has been. It was put on Hansard by the Prime Minister himself. That is what I object to in hon. gentlemen opposite. Instead of studying the facts first, they make their speeches first and study the facts afterwards.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not hear my hon. friend's answer to my question whether Sir John French says in his report that the jamming was caused by a bad brand of British ammunition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says the jamming was caused with British ammunition. At all events, it was bad for the Ross rifle.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. minister puts that part in himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may infer that it is bad if it jams in rifles that were properly made, and the Ross rifles were properly made. I do not know whether Sir John French uses the word " bad " himself or not. At all events, the ammunition was defective, and it has been reported on as defective. Sir John French reports that the jamming was on account of the ammunition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He does not say it was defective.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes he does. His report is on Hansard, page 417, and says:—

Looking:

(2) to the fact that no ammunition of this nature was available in this country and that sufficient supplies could not be obtained from England, and,

(3) to the want of confidence in the rifle which a large number of the infantry evidently felt, as evidenced by the fact that over 3,000 had, without authority, exchanged their rifles for those used by their British comrades, and taken from casualties on the battlefield.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to know why these rifles were sent to England without suitable ammunition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suitable ammunition was sent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Sir John French says not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This other ammunition got in. I understand that, at that time, the ammunition was pooled.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am quoting from Sir John French's report:—

(1) To the unanimous opinion of my Committee that the Ross rifle could not be relied upon to work smoothly and efficiently in rapid fire with any ammunition other than than of Canadian manufacture;

(2) to the fact that no ammunition of this nature was available in this country, and that sufficient supplies could not be obtained from England.

I want to know why these rifles were sent to England without sufficient ammunition suitable for the purpose being sent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We first of all want to know whether that is a fact.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Sir John French says it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he does not. On June 12 when Sir John French re-armed the Third Division with Lee-Enfields, there was not at that time available sufficient Canadian ammunition. The ex-minister can answer that better than I, but I think it was because a plan had been adopted at that time of pooling the ammunition, and as a consequence it was inevitable that some British ammunition should get to our men. Everybody had assumed that the British ammunition and ours were identical. That was the principle of manufacture, and there was no reason for not pooling ammunition, but as soon as it was found there was a make of British ammunition which did not work smoothly in the Ross rifle, from that day other ammunition was provided, and I have a letter here from the War Office to the effect that it would not be necessary to change the Ross rifle in the hands of other troops, because there was sufficient Canadian ammunition on hand.

Sir SAM HUGHES: One would infer from my hon. friend's remarks there was only one brand of British ammunition that was bad, whereas there were three distinct brands of British ammunition that jammed in both the Ross rifle and the Lee-Enfield, and one brand of American ammunition. The brass cartridge case was too much annealed and clung to the chamber of the Ross rifle. That ammunition was supposed to be taken out, and was taken out so far as the Lee-Enfields and our First Division are concerned. But when the Second Division went over with the Ross rifle, as many as 5,000 rounds of this defective ammunition got mixed up with the good ammunition in the Canadian service. That is one point that I think should be positively enquired into.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who was responsible for that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was issued by an Ordnance Officer, a gentleman whose removal I asked for long ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A Canadian officer?

Sir SAM HUGHES: No.

Mr MEIGHEN: Sir John French's report contains this statement, which of itself stood as a barrier, and in view of which no Canadian Government would have been justified in abandoning the national arm of this country:

7. In conclusion, I would observe that in my reports I have never condemned the Ross rifle, nor have I any sufficient data to justify me in doing so.

Now, if Sir John French had not sufficient data on the 19th day of June, 1915, how did the hon. member for Assiniboia have that data, because he said that we had sufficient information in Canada in May 1915, to abandon the Ross rifle?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the Solicitor General read the next six lines of the Report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Wait until we get through with this. We are now through, as there is no answer from the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. TURRIFF: Let my hon. friend sit down first.

Mr. OLIVER: The Solicitor General need not get impatient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend want me to sit down?

Mr. TURRIFF: Prior to that date the First Division had given up the Ross rifle and had been re-armed with the Lee-Enfield.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We all know that. The hon. gentleman has missed the point altogether.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is sufficient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In May, 1915, my hon. friend says we had evidence enough on which to abandon the Ross rifle. Sir John French says that on the 19th day of June, 1915, he did not have sufficient evidence to condemn the Ross rifle. He knew all about the Canadian soldiers picking up the Lee-Enfield rifles, but that was not sufficient for him to condemn the Ross rifle. How is it sufficient for the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Edmonton to condemn the Ross rifle?

Mr. TURRIFF: My answer is that if the fact that 3,000 Canadian soldiers, men of the class that we sent overseas, threw down their rifles as being unfit and unsatisfactory for them to wage an even fight, is not sufficient justification for changing the rifle, why is the Government getting a new rifle to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because we have justification since. I repeat to my hon. friend that Sir John French knew all about the 3,000 Canadian soldiers picking up the Lee-Enfield rifles. That is stated in his report, and he knew all about that at first nand; he saw it. How is it that that was not sufficient to justify him in condemning the rifle, and yet it is sufficient for the hon. member for Assiniboia? Does he know better than Sir John French? Does he know better than the "man called French" referred to in history by the hon. member for Carleton?

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend is hiding behind General French.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On a matter of rifles, I would prefer to hide behind French rather than behind the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. CARVELL: As my hon. friend refers to me, I may say that I was sitting here trying to behave, but if he wants me to get into this thing, I am always ready. Will the Solicitor General read the report of the Committee upon which Sir John French based his report? It will be found on page 430 of Hansard. If he will do that, he will find that in the second column this committee is reported as stating:

The committee were practically unanimous in advising that the Ross rifle should be employed on the lines of communication, and that if possible, the Canadian troops should be armed with the British rifle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is in the paragraph before that? Just let me read that; It is not inconsistent with this paragraph.

Mr. CARVELL: Those are the facts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The paragraph reads:

A unanimous opinion was expressed that the Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914, Mk. VII ammunition only, of those tried, was suitable for rapid fire with the Ross rifle, that provided a sufficient supply of Canadian manufactured ammunition of this type could be supplied, the other defects apparent were not sufficient to condemn the Ross rifle in view of the present shortage of rifles generally, and that those types of British-made ammunition which were tried should not be issued to troops armed with the Ross rifle.

They say: For the present the proper thing is to produce Ross rifles, and that they are all right with Canadian ammunition.

Mr. OLIVER: Where do they say that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In one paragraph.

Mr. CARVELL: Ross rifles?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: Read the paragraph again.

Mr. MEIGHEN (Reading):

A unanimous opinion was expressed that the Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914, Mark VII ammunition only, of those tried, was suitable for rapid fire with the Ross rifle, that provided a sufficient supply of Canadian manufactured ammunition of this type could be supplied, the other defects apparent were not sufficient to condemn the Ross rifle in view of the present shortage of rifles generally.

Why are you to discontinue manufacturing rifles when there is a shortage and when the rifle has not been condemned?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. OLIVER: Go ahead.

Mr. MEIGHEN (Reading):

And that those types of British made ammunition which were tried should not be issued to troops armed with the Ross rifle.

The committee were practically unanimous in advising that the Ross rifle should be employed on the lines of communication, and that if possible, the Canadian troops should be armed with the British rifle.

But they say it is impossible. Now let me ask the hon. member for Edmonton—Sir John French had that report before him when he wrote his letter of the 19th day of June, and having that report, he said: "I have not sufficient data to condemn the Ross rifle." How is the data sufficient for the hon. member for Edmonton to condemn the rifle?

Mr. OLIVER: It was sufficient to make Sir John French disarm the Canadian soldiers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that report signed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the hon. gentleman kindly read the signature? Does it give any comparative test between the Ross rifle and the Lee-Enfield—any test, not hearsay? I can tell you there was no test made between the two rifles.

Mr. CARVELL: The report says: "The following tests were carried out."

Mr. OLIVER: The ex-minister had better settle that with the Solicitor General.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He is wrong sometimes, but he is all right there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The signatures are:

C. M. Mathew, Colonel, D.D.O.S., G.H.Q.
C. R. Woodroffe, Lieut.-General, A.Q.M.G.
H. Guest, Major G.S.
C. D. Baker Carr, Major,
Commandant Machine Gun School.
T. Burchall Wood, Colonel,
A.A. and Q.M.G. 1st Canadian Division.
J. A. Murray, Lieut.-Colonel,
D.O.O. 1st Canadian Division.
W. H. McNeil Campbell, Captain R.A.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would like to make one suggestion which I am sure would settle the whole matter. There are in Canada plenty of men who are experts with the Ross rifle and plenty who are experts with the Lee-Enfield rifle. There is plenty of the defective ammunition of the three brands and plenty of good ammunition. I would suggest that the following test be made: Let one dozen experts with the Ross rifle and one dozen experts with the Lee-Enfield rifle test out the two rifles with good ammunition and with bad ammunition; and if the Ross rifle does not win out in every test, then, as I said before, I am willing to swallow the two rifles.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a sporting offer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a question which I have been trying to have answered by the Solicitor General, but I have been unsuccessful. How does the ex-Minister of Militia account for this statement made by Sir John French, which will be found on page 418 of the Unrevised Hansard:

> I have expressed and acted on my opinion, that, so far as I can judge, the ammunition of British manufacture is not suitable for use with the Ross rifles and that there is a large and growing feeling of want of confidence in their rifle on the part of the men in the Canadian Division, which is amply justified by the report of the committee.

How does my hon. friend explain that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the hon. member for St. John had been paying the slightest vestige of attention to my remarks he would understand what I tried to impress upon him when I was speaking—long before that report was made, early in April, I knew it here; I had copies of the circulars that were being sent out and that were designed to cause want of confidence on the part of the men in the Ross rifles. The ten suggestions embodied in that report were skillfully passed around amongst the soldiers in an endeavour to create amongst them a want of confidence in the rifles they were using. They were written on bits of paper to imitate typewriting.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the ex-minister say who did that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: How could I know? I was not on the ground. They picked them up on the road—anywhere. There was evidence of intention in this matter. Otherwise, how were these ten points embodied in the report of the distinguished officers when they came to make a deliverance on the subject? How did these officers happen on these very ten points? And the man among them who was best posted on the subject of rifles was Col. Kerr.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to ask one other question.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just one other question, and then I will stop. Were the hon. gentleman and his colleagues aware that in the report of Sir John French, in June, 1916, that officer said:

> There is a large and growing feeling of want of confidence in their rifle on the part of the men in the Canadian Division, which is amply justified by the report of the committee.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I assume that the hon. gentleman is quoting enough to show the tenor and is not taking a part away from its context in a way that would change its meaning. I got the report, but paid no attention to it so far as believing it was concerned, because I knew it was nonsense, that it reflected prejudice as created by the circulars which had been sent out with the intention of creating it. But, as I told the Prime Minister at the time, rather than have men in service go into action with rifles in which they had no confidence, even though I knew that rifle to be better than the other ones, and knew that the want of confidence was due to what had been drummed into them. I would accede to the making of a change.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When was that done?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The data before the Committee will show that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is sufficient to know that the Commander of the British forces in France, upon whom the responsibility rested had before him this whole report, ordered and authorized by himself, and in the presence of that report he not only refused to condemn the rifle but stated that he had not sufficient data upon which to condemn it. There was the further fact that in Canada we were not in a position to produce any other rifle.

As to the ammunition, I wish to read from a letter of the 15th July from the War Office to the ex-Minister of Militia. It is specially important in view of the argument of the hon. member for Edmonton. The letter is marked "secret," but this portion it can do no harm to read:

> I am to say that no action is proposed regarding the Second Canadian Division, as it is understood that a sufficient supply of ammunition of Canadian manufacture is available in this country, in the Canadian ordnance depot, to complete the equipment of the division and maintain it in the field for a considerable time.

Who is the man who would say that in the face of this document and of the position taken by the commander of the British forces in France we should lightly abandon the chosen arm of this country and start out to make a different one? I do not think that any man who wishes to be fair, or who has a sense of the responsibility of his position as a member of this House, would say that there was sufficient evidence to justify us in deciding, a year or even six months ahead, to make another rifle and to discard the rifle adopted by the Canadian people on the responsibility of the late Administration.

Now I come to another phase of the subject, one that has been discussed in this House in the debate on the Address, as well as in this debate—the question of the obligation of this Government under the contract itself, the question whether or not we were tied by that contract, and if so, to what extent we were tied. I made the statement in Montreal that the Government were bound by the contract made by the late Administration. I am asked what I meant by that statement. Well, I do not know that I have the power to make that statement any plainer. And though it may seem a startling thing, yet I say that I meant exactly what I said. If I am asked, in what sense we were bound, I answer: Bound in every sense. The best efforts of literary versatility could not produce a simpler expression; common honesty. Common honesty could not produce a truer. But, it is said, Sir Charles Ross would have made new rifles "regardless of the contract." Sir Charles Ross, no doubt, would readjust his factory to make the Lee-Enfield rifle in less than a year if he could; he would not take up a year in making the change merely because the contract allowed that time; of course, he would try to do better than the contract called for. But does that mean that we were not bound by the contract? There is no respect in which we were not bound by the contract which this country had solemnly entered into. I give Sir Charles Ross great credit for having increased the production of his factory and for showing thereby great mechanical skill and great organizing skill as well. I give him credit for the intention to readjust and re-equip to manufacture the Lee-Enfield rifle in less than a year if he could. But I refuse to find, because Sir Charles Ross says he could do this in less than a year, that we should rely upon that and give our orders accordingly. And I refuse to believe, just because he was willing to do the best he could, that we were thereby relieved from the contract. Either we were bound, or we were not bound. If any one thinks we were not bound—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who ever suggested that the Government was not bound?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was not I asked to explain what I meant when I said that the Government was bound by this contract? I have been challenged to-night by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) to say what I meant by the statement that we were bound by a contract solemnly entered into. I was similarly challenged in the debate on the Address. I was challenged by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), a member of the late Administration, to explain to Parliament and the country what I meant by uttering the plain, simple, obvious truth, that we were bound by a solemn contract. It is true we could break it on penalty of damages. But does that say we were not bound? And the hon. gentleman says now that there should be no one so simple as to question the assertion that we were bound—

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the hon. gentleman refers to me, what I said was that, if in the interests of the country and in order to supply our soldiers with a suitable rifle, it was necessary to make a change, this Government had complete power, particularly under the War Measures Act, to make the change, and even to take charge of the factory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly, I made the same statement, and I made it in Montreal also. Certainly, if we had power, we would have done it and paid the damages rather than put an inferior weapon into the hands of our troops, if we had available a better weapon. But would the hon. gentleman even hint that on that account we were not bound by the contract? Of course we were bound by the contract.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Bound by a contract which you could easily put an end to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same as any other contract. If we were not bound by that contract, no government and no individual ever was bound by any.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the minister allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Did the contract with the Ross Rifle Company bind the Government to the making of an inefficient rifle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman consider that a question?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It bound the Government to every term of the contract—and that is what I asserted in Montreal. Nobody would for a moment suggest that we would make an inefficient rifle if we could make a better one and put it in the hands of our troops in time.

Mr. OLIVER: What I am asking the minister is this: did the contract bind the Government to compel the Ross Rifle Company to make an inefficient rifle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Edmonton knows—I am sorry to say it to him, because I have respect for him—that his question is simply nonsense.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The contract speaks for itself, and to its terms we were bound.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I asked him a fair question. I ask him now either for a fair answer or a civil refusal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It binds us to make the rifle that for the time being is the standard rifle. No government in the world would make that standard rifle a day longer than it could help, no matter what the damages were, if they could make a better rifle and get it to the troops in time.

Mr. OLIVER: Does not the contract permit the Government to change the form of the rifle at its pleasure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: With a year's notice.

Mr. CARVELL: Have changes not been made by the Ross Rifle Company since the beginning of the war on one month's or two months' notice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Trifling changes, like the weight of a nose band or something like that—never a change in the type. The hon. member for Carleton stated that he would take the word of the man who runs the factory, irrespective altogether of other authorities. He made that statement in the House, and I have it before me. Let me on this occasion, without at all reflecting on the ability of Sir Charles Ross or the good faith of his company, say this: there was an order once before to change the type of the rifle. A year is all that is allowed by the contract within which to make such a change. What time was taken the last time the type of the rifle was changed? Notice was served on the company on December 28, 1910, and the first rifles of the new pattern were delivered in November, 1912, nearly 23 months afterwards. Something intervened—I am not saying it was the fault of the company. They in the meantime produced some other rifles; they kept their hands busy. But you cannot always depend upon prognostications, particularly on the part of men whose enthusiasm for the rifle, and, perhaps, for their factory, honestly influences their judgment. The hon. member for Carleton observed that the Prime Minister had quoted the authority of a letter signed by Sir George Perley that in the opinion of, as he decribed it, "some official" over in England, that factory could not produce rifles of a new pattern in quantities within two years. Not only was a year necessary, but in the judgment of "some official," to use the graphic language of the hon. member for Carleton, two years were necessary. He said we were taking the judgment of "some official" instead of the judgment of the man who owned the factory. Well, as the Prime Minister pointed out, we are doing nothing of the kind, we are taking all, and making the best decision that we can. But who is this "some official"? He was the Minister of Munitions of the British Government of that day. The Minister of Munitions of the British Government was referred to as "some official," and the hon. member for Carleton said that in his judgment this "some official" was incompetent and that the Prime Minister should be severely castigated for listening to him at all. That is the way the hon. member for Carleton would have us obey the behest of the hon. member for Edmonton—to comply in every case with the judgment of the British Government.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the interpretation which you put upon my words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We had better read the words. What was the date of my hon. friend's speech?

Mr. CARVELL: February 2, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman could give me the page?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not remember making any such statement. You will find it on page 445.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, here it is:

> About the possibility of converting the Ross factory inside of two years in order to make rifles of a new type. He——has given us a statement by some official in England who has some doubts about our ability to convert this factory in two years.

That is, the Prime Minister.

Then further on, he says:

I think that that man, whoever he may be, is incompetent.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not a fair reading. Go back four or five lines.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right. The hon. gentleman gives the reason why he thinks this official is incompetent:

The same people who did not believe that shrapnel shells could be made in America two years ago, who wondered if 200,000 rounds could be made in America, possibly honestly believe that you cannot change this rifle factory to enable it to manufacture Lee-Enfields within two years; but if our experience of munition work in the past two years is any criterion as to our abilities, I think that that man, whoever he may be, is incompetent, and that my right hon. friend is deserving of the severest castigation for listening to his opinion.

The words used by the hon. gentleman are in precisely the language in which I conveyed them to the House.

Mr. CARVELL: Is there any high treason about that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that it was high treason. The hon. gentleman said that he did not use the words; I have given not only the words, but his reasons for using them, and all I have to say is that his reasons were just as weak as his assertions.

Either we are bound by the contract or we are not. If hon. gentleman opposite can procure our release from it, we will release the other party to the contract any time at all. If hon. gentlemen opposite can procure the abandonment of the rights of the contractor by one jot or tittle, we will welcome anything whatever, but in the meantime——

Mr. PUGSLEY: Parliament has given the Government authority to do that, under the War Measures Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for St. John City would like to come to the rescue of those people who attacked me for making the simple assertion that we were bound by the contract. He has said that he would not suggest that we were not bound by it; let me, therefore, deal with those who castigate me for saying that we are.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What seems to me to be extraordinary is that my hon. friend tonight has set up a plea by way of confession of the negligence of himself and his friends, but he avoids the point by saying that there is a contract here which bound them. That is the whole object my hon. friend had in view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I say is that the contract binds both parties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But when the war broke out Parliament gave to this Government the authority to take any step of any kind or description which it might think necessary for the more efficient carrying on of the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Haven't I repeated that over and over again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then what is the use of repeating that argument that the Government was bound?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The fact that we have power to break a contract does not say that we were not bound by it. The Government might break any contract; we did not need any War Measures Act for that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what Parliament gave the power for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We might break it under penalty of damages as any individual can do. But I repeat that if we were not bound by this contract, no person, no Government, no individual, no company was ever bound by any contract in the history of the world.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister allow me to ask him a question? I am following the hon. gentleman very closely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman wait until I am through?

Mr. McKENZIE: I caught you too badly before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then catch me again.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister say that the existence of a contract such as this would justify the Government in continuing to accept inefficient arms?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I told the hon. gentleman twenty times that it never would, and we never would have felt we should continue an inefficient arm or any arm if we could get a better one.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then why talk about the existence of the contract at all?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the hon. gentleman sitting beside my hon. friend challenged me to do so, and dared me to substantiate the statements I made in Montreal. That is none too strong and none too sound a reason, but it is the only reason I have; it is because I am challenged to do so by hon. gentlemen opposite who do not know any better. We would not have been justified in continuing the manufacture of this or any other rifle had we been able in sufficient time to get a rifle that we knew on sufficient authority was a better rifle to use. That is surely sufficient for the hon. member for St. John. Were we in a position to produce another rifle? Was a year's notice necessary? "Oh," he says, "they never would have taken all that time." I have shown that they took twenty-three months in 1910 and 1911. Was a year's notice necessary? If it was not, what is the plight of hon. gentlemen opposite? If a year's notice was not necessary why did hon. gentlemen opposite provide for a year's notice and put it in the power of the contractor to exact it? If it was not necessary, why did the hon. gentlemen give the contractor power to exact this notice if less time was sufficient? There is no answer—and there cannot be an answer.

The British Government tell us that in their judgment two year's time is necessary. "Oh," say some hon. gentlemen opposite, "the British Government have told you that they will supply you with jigs, tools and gauges," and on that they argue that very little time would be required. Do they not observe that in the very letters in which the British Government advises that two years would be necessary, they offer to supply these jigs, tools and gauges? In the same letter in which the British Government offer to give jigs, tools and gauges they offer plans and drawings, etc., and they warn us that we cannot expect substantial deliveries under two years. They may be right or they may be wrong.

Mr. CARVELL: After receiving that letter, did the Government or any official go to Sir Charles Ross or any other member of his company and ask them in what time they would be willing or able to produce the Lee-Enfield rifle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sir Charles Ross often said he could do it in less than a year. We did not ask him, he kept telling us.

Mr. CARVELL: Did you go to him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He came to us. But will any hon. gentleman, on his responsibility as a member, say that we should have taken the unsupported word of a contractor who himself is to make the goods, and who is anxious for an order, and honestly so, that we should take that and have no regard whatever to other authorities even the authority of the British Government?

Mr. CARVELL: But did you ever go to Sir Charles Ross and ask him how long, in his judgment, it would take to convert his plant to manufacture Lee-Enfield rifles, 10,000 or 20,000, or any quantity?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have said that Sir Charles Ross told us without our going to him:

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what time, and what did he say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My recollection is that he stated seven or eight months.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is when he was supplied with the jigs and gauges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is my recollection of his conversation.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is when he was supplied with the equipment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose he said two months, and suppose he was honest in his statement—and I have no reason to question his bona fides. Who is the hon. gentleman who will say that we should have no regard for the opinion of the British Government in this matter, especially when their opinion is backed by their practice in Great Britain in this very hour? They know in Great Britain, at least they have expressed the opinion, that the Enfield .276 is an improvement on the Lee-Enfield which they themselves are producing and using. But they do not change their factories, they do not re-equip their factories to produce the better rifle. Why? Because they know that time, and a long time, would be taken, and that time is the lives of soldiers and that there is no time to spare. That is why they do not re-equip, and that is why they advise us: "Re-equip if you will, but be sure and consider that time will be lost." And we, in our determination of what to do, have regard not only to the judgment of Sir Charles Ross, but to the judgment of the British Government, backed up by the practice of the British Government itself. That is our position in relation to that question.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the hon. gentleman say just what the decision of this Government has been in regard to this Ross rifle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government, in this question, has reached precisely the point clearly defined by the Prime Minister.

The Government has not decided what order to give or whether any order should be given.

Mr. MARCIL: They have decided to let the Ross factory continue to operate in Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have decided that it shall be re-equipped and adjusted to produce the Enfield .276, and notice has been given accordingly. That notice was given on the first day it was possible to do so, that is on the first day when it was possible to secure a standard sample certified by the inspector of small arms in Great Britain.

Mr. CARVELL: Has it also given an order for any rifles?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said it has not. We have not yet received the drawings and specifications essential before any further progress on our part can be made. Ever since we received the report and decision of Sir Douglas Haig, we have made every endeavour to put ourselves in a position to make progress, and we have made the fastest progress in our power.

Now then, after the French report, what next occurred? The next thing that occurred was that on the 12th day of May, 1916, a communication was sent, I think it was directed to the ex-Minister of Militia, by Sir Max Aitken, to the effect that a serious situation existed with regard to the Ross rifle, and Sir Max Aitken asked him to show that cablegram to the Prime Minister. The ex-Minister did as requested. That was on the 12th of May.

Mr. OLIVER: The return brought down gave the first and last sentence of the cablegram, but not the body of the cablegram. Therefore there was information contained in that telegram that has not been laid on the table of the House. Could the minister give this information?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon member will not ask me to give the information when I tell the reason why it was not given. The reason it was not given is that we were not able to obtain the consent of the British Government to its being given, on account of war conditions. We are prepared, at any time that the consent of the British Government can be obtained, to lay the whole thing on the Table and fill in all the blanks that are left in the correspondence as brought down; but they have specifically forbidden that to be sent out for reasons that will be obvious to all.

[Mr. Meighen.]

That cablegram was received from Sir Max Aitken; it was shown to the Prime Minister on the 15th May, no doubt the day when it was received, because these cablegrams are sometimes delayed two or three days in transmission—and on the very same day this Government took a position, through the mouth of the Prime Minister of Canada, and what was it? We placed absolutely in the hands of Sir Douglas Haig, who commanded the British forces in France, the decision as to whether the rifle in the hands of the Canadian troops should be the Ross rifle or the Lee-Enfield. Nothing whatever occurred from the time of the French report, which refused to condemn the rifle, and stated that there was no data on which to condemn it, and the telegram from Sir Max Aitken on May 12. Immediately that cablegram was received we stated the facts to the British Government and to Sir Douglas Haig, and we asked for the judgment of Sir Douglas Haig. We not only asked for it, but offered to abide by that judgment whatever it might be. At that time we authorized the substitution of the Lee-Enfield for the Ross rifle if the commander of the forces in France, who ought to know best, and no man in the world knows better, said it was the proper thing to do. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen when did the time come earlier than the 15th of May at which we should have taken that position? When did it come earlier that we could have justified ourselves in throwing aside the only arm we could manufacture for many months to come, and substituting what could not be got as a matter of fact, another rifle? In that connection be this remembered also, that on the 30th March, 1916, the Prime Minister of Canada placed the position of this Government before the British authorities with regard to rifles, stating that we had given an order already which would be filled about a certain month, (which cannot be given) in the correspondence, and asking the British Government in effect, what do you advise us to do? If we are going to give another order, the time has come to give it. Already we are pressed to do so by the officers of the department, but we do not want to do so until we have the best advice you are able to give us as regards the working out of the rifle which is now in the hands of the Canadian troops, and as to whether any other rifle is available for their supply. What was the answer? On the 26th of the following month, the answer came back to the effect that Great Britain could not undertake to arm the Canadian troops with any rifle, that they were not in a position then, and not even at the date, which was many months ahead, and which has not yet arrived, at which the present order would be fulfilled, to undertake the arming of the troops of Canada with Lee-Enfield rifles. In the face of that situation, with no other rifles available, what could the Government of Canada do but place it in the disposition and judgment of the commander of the British troops in France as to what under all the circumstances should best be done in the way of arming the troops of Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did the Prime Minister not also ask the British officers, I think Sir Douglas Haig, for a comparative test?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is true. Practically the same cablegram that was sent placing it in the hands of Sir Douglas Haig was sent, I think, to Sir Wm. Robertson, and that cablegram asked that after tests under war conditions had been made, the question as to what rifle should be used should be decided by Sir Douglas Haig, and stated that by his decision, whatever it was, we would abide. If the test had been made, well and good. Sir Douglas Haig took the position on 28th May, 1916, that in his judgment the tests already made were sufficient, and by a letter of that date he advised not us, but the War Office in London, that in his judgment it would be better to arm the troops of Canada with the Lee-Enfield rifle. That was done in a letter of the 28th May, and it was confirmed in another letter of the 21st June. As a result, the War Office in London by a communication of the 3rd July following sent to Sir George Perley who transmitted it to us, expressed the opinion that Sir Douglas Haig's action had been correct, that having been given authority, he had taken it and had asked our troops be armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and that the Small Arms Committe confirmed that decision. From that time on, we were in accord; the two Governments and the commander in chief of the forces were in accord that the troops of Canada should be armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There is just one point that I desire to impress upon the House, and that is that the Prime Minister asked that a competitive test between the two rifles should be made under war conditions; he asked that the best possible test should be made. There was no competitive test, and there never has been a competitive test made officially by the British Government of these two rifles. I am merely emphasizing my own position. There has been no competitive test. The test referred to by Sir Douglas Haig was a test in which there was no competition at all. The point I am trying to bring out is that a competitive test was not carried out. If it had been, the Ross rifle would have come out ahead.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That correspondence reached this Government some time in July. I do not remember the exact date. The decision of Sir Douglas Haig was put into effect, he being of the opinion that the tests, whatever they had been, were sufficient. He being of that opinion, armed the troops of Canada with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and thereafter the Ross rifle was not used except, I believe, for special purposes at the front. It must be noted that even at that time Sir Douglas Haig stated that the situation in regard to the Third Division did not apply to the Second Division; in other words, that the complaints which had come from the Third Division had not come from the Second; but his judgment having been made supreme by the action of this Government he decided it was better all things considered, to adopt the Lee-Enfield. It was adopted then and there, and adopted with our authority. There was no earlier time when we could possibly justify the abandonment of our rifle than the date of the letter of the War Office to Sir George Perley, transmitted to us, and now, I am quite certain, on the table of the House, stating that the situation had changed, and that they, the War Office of Great Britain, assumed the responsibility from that date on of providing the troops of Canada with Lee-Enfields. Until that time they had not undertaken to do so. They had advised us before that that they would not be able to do so, but the situation had improved in the meantime, and they stated that they were able to do so in July. That being the judgment of Sir Douglas Haig, this Government acquiesced. Indeed, we were the first of the two Governments to say that if Sir Douglas Haig was of opinion that the Lee-Enfield was better for our troops under all the circumstances, the Lee-Enfield they should have.

From that time on, the situation, as it confronted the Government of Canada, was altered. Up to that time it was not a question of the commercial advantage to this country at all. It was a question of getting the best weapon we could put our hands on for the use of our troops at the front. From that time on, namely, from July, when we were advised that the British Government were able to take care of the arming of the Canadian troops with Lee-Enfield rifles, the situation ceased to have the serious aspect it had previously assumed, and it never has assumed the same aspect since. From that time on, it was practically a commercial question, and nothing else. We wanted to produce our rifles, all the rifles we could produce, not because our troops, would otherwise be unarmed but because it was part of the policy of this country to make in this country as much as possible of what this country used.

In this connection I desire to refer to a speech of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy). In the remarks which he addressed to the House on 29th January last, he used the following words:

> Nothwithstanding General Haig's statement of the urgency of the case and its approval by the Army Council, which offered to supply Lee-Enfields, and which requested that no more Ross rifles be brought to England, it was not until August 30, 1916, more than thirteen months after General French's report and sixteen months after the failure of the rifle had been demonstrated at the battle of St. Julien, that the Government of Canada finally gave its consent to the British War Office supplying Lee-Enfields to the second and third Canadian divisions, and expressed the hope that no re-arming had been done without their knowledge.

Now I have quoted correctly from the speech of the hon. member; that not until August 30, 1916, did the Government of Canada give its consent to the British War Office arming our troops with the Lee-Enfield, and that even then we expressed the hope that it had not been done without our approval. Does the hon. gentleman think that that was quite fair? Does he think it was a correct—I will not use a stronger term—way of stating the contents of the telegram of August 30, 1916? This Government authorized the change on the 15th of May 1916, in a cablegram to Sir Douglas Haig, providing he thought the charge was in the best interest of our troops. We authorized it then and no further approval was necessary. We authorized it to be done and it was done. A month before the 30th of August our troops were armed with the Lee-Enfields.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where does that appear?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the cablegram of the Prime Minister stating we would abide by the judgment of Sir Douglas Haig.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not in Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is right in the file. The cablegram was to Mr. Bonar Law. Secretary of State for the Colonies and it was forwarded at once to the General Officer Commanding at the front.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman says the cable was sent on the 15th of May. That was a cablegram to Sir Max Aitken. I should like to know the position Sir Max Aitken occupied in relation to this Government and the British Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He was appointed by Order in Council, general representative for Canada at the front, and he fulfilled his duties perfectly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought he was an Intelligence Officer, an eye-witness.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The cablegram was sent to Sir Douglas Haig through the instrumentality of Sir Max Aitken. Sir Max Aitken had conveyed the other information to us, and as a consequence this cable went back through the same channel. It is in effect a cable to Sir Douglas Haig, and is supplemented by another cablegram on June 5, in which, practically word for word, the same information was placed before Sir William Robertson, Chief of the Imperial Staff in Great Britain. So that our authority, if Sir Douglas Haig thought it best, was given on the 15th of May, 1916, and could have been given no sooner.

What was the cablegram of August 30, to which the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) referred as being the first approval on the part of the Government of Canada of the change to the Lee-Enfield? It is a cablegram from the Governor General to the Colonial Secretary, as follows:—

> In pursuance of your cable message of July 11, my advisers announced that Canadian troops at front would in future be armed with Lee-Enfield rifles.

That is, we announced, in pursuance of the cable of July 11, that our troops would be so armed. The cable continues:—

> They are confident that no departure from this decision has been made without their knowledge, but they desire to be informed as to report which has reached them that Fourth Canadian Division was armed with Ross rifles when recently despatched to France.

Now, hon. gentlemen have the cablegram in which we stated that on the authority of the cablegram from the British Government we had long ago announced that our troops hereafter would be armed with Lee-Enfield, and we say that notwithstanding that, we have heard a report that the Fourth Division have been sent to the front armed with Ross rifles, and we want to know if that has been done without our approval. And the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) tells this House that this was the first time we had approved of our troops being armed with the Lee-Enfield—the very opposite of the cable.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there a cablegram on the file dated May 15? I do not find it in Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was talking of the cablegram of August 30. The cablegram of the 15th of May was from the Prime Minister to Sir Max Aitken, for transmission to Sir Douglas Haig. That is the situation. From that day we have made every endeavour to procure the rifle and the drawings and specifications. First of all, we had to procure from the British Government a statement as to what rifle in their judgment would be the rifle to be used after the war, what rifle it was best that we should make, having regard to the future. We got that information, and as soon as we got it we immediately proceeded to put ourselves in a position to serve notice on the Ross Rifle Company to adjust their factory to make the rifle so recommended, and we have not lost a day or an hour since. We have pressed the British Government insistently. No doubt they have done their best under the circumstances, but notwithstanding our pressure it was not until the 20th of January this year that we were in a position to serve notice on the company, because we had not the standard arm which was to accompany the notice according to the contract, and without which the notice would have been practically of no effect at all, and almost worthless to the contractor.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Was that standard arm made in Great Britain or in the United States?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the United States, I understand; the British Government is not making it for the reason that they would not take the risk of the delay involved in readjusting their factories to turn out the new rifle.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Lee-Enfield in regard to which notice was given to the Ross Company on the 20th of January was made in the United States and supplied to the British army, why was there such a long delay in getting one of the standard rifles to the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the reason set out in Mr. Bonar Law's cablegram of September 11, 1916. We set out to get that standard rifle in the United States in order to save time. A report that we were doing so reached the War Office, and on September 11 they cabled this Government asking us not to use a rifle procured in the United States as a standard until it had been inspected by the chief inspector of arms and ammunition of the British Government, and received his imprimatur and approval. Were we right in that or not? Should we have defied them and taken the rifle from the United States as a standard?

Sir SAM HUGHES: When were the contracts let in the United States?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have a pretty good idea but do not know that I am justified in giving the dates or deliveries, but I think I am justified in going this far, that if hon. gentlemen will make inquiry as to the date the contract was given in the United States and note the quantities delivered up to the present hour, I do not think they will find very much support for their optimism in thinking you can re-equip a factory and make a new kind of rifle in a very few months. I do not need to go back and repeat that we do not hide behind the contract. We are not attempting to conceal anything. We are quite free to say that if we could have done better by breaking the contract, we should have broken it. But we saw nothing better that could be done.

The very last people who should criticise us for not breaking the contract are the men who made the contract themselves. The criticism comes very ill from those very men who now stand up and make themselves the complainants. They themselves fathered the contract; they fathered this rifle. They forged the chains and fastened them on this country, and now they stand up and declaim against us because we did not burst the fetters with which they in their folly had bound themselves and all Governments to come.

That is the position in which we stand with respect to this rifle. We have nothing to conceal as regards our conduct, nor as regards our treatment of the whole rifle subject. It is a vital subject; it is a subject that goes to the very heart of our success. We have nothing to conceal; we invite no controversy, but we run away from none. Our course has been clear and is not only defensible, but impregnable from beginning to end. Because it is a vital question, one of the most important of the thousand problems that confront us from day to day, it has received, in a special degree, the supervision of the Prime Minister, a supervision that has directed and surveyed, with ceaseless vigilance and with a care and an energy that almost passes comprehension, every phase of this work of this Government. On the record of this Government we stand and we fear the criticism of no man. Fortunately for us every step in the path that we have followed is now marked out by a long line of official records. They are there for all Canadians to read, and we urge upon the people of Canada to read those records in full and to study them carefully, and we appeal with the almost confidence to the judgment of every impartial and intelligent man.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, as the hon. minister says: We are dealing with one of the most important phases of our responsibility in connection with the war. We cannot give this matter too careful attention. We are here to listen to the best that the Government can state on behalf of its course in this connection We have listened carefully and we have heard from the lips of the Prime Minister and from the lips of his Solicitor General, whom we all agree is not the least able member of the Cabinet, the best reasons they have to give for the fact that to-day we are called upon to vote $2,660,000 for rifles that are not to be used at the battle front. After we have paid to the amount of $6,500,000 for Ross rifles made in Canada, not one battalion, not one platoon of Canadian troops at the front is armed with that rifle, after two and a half years of war. In the face of such facts as these, I ask hon. gentleman on the other side of the House: Of what avail is the special pleading of the Solicitor General here to-night? What difference does it make to this country what advice I have given to the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House during this debate, or what advice the hon. member for Pictou, or any other member has given? The question before the country is not what advice we have given; the question is: What has the Government done and how far can the Government justify what it has done before the high court of public opinion? The question of the furnishing of our troops with what is called small arms, with rifles, is the most important question with which we have to deal; but we are dealing to-day with a vote of $500,000,000, appropriated in bulk for expenditure by this Government for the support of Canada's part in the war, and on the most vital point in all this vast expenditure, we find the result that I have already stated, that we have spent $6,500,000 and we practically have not a rifle in the firing line, and we are being called upon to-night to vote, if my hon. friend presses his motion, to pay $2,660,000 for rifles that are not yet manufactured and that will never see the front after they are manufactured. This is a far reaching matter. If such is the record of the Government on this the most important feature connected with the war so far as we are concerned, what are we to believe in regard to the other phases which involve the whole of this stupendous expenditure? We and our children's children will be paying on account of the burden that we are laying upon the people of the country by this vote to-day. We vote the money freely; our people pay it willingly; but surely we ought to know from the Government that the money is being expended wisely and for the purpose for which it is voted, and yet on this vote for rifles to arm our men we are paying $6,500,000 and we have not a rifle in the firing line.

The Solicitor General, in justification of that position, says that the members on this side of the House, the late Government, fourteen years ago, entered into a contract to make rifles in Canada for the use of Canada, which contract binds Canada for all time, and that because of that contract, this condition that I have spoken of exists and we who have ceased to have direction of the affairs of our country for more than five years are to be held responsible, and these gentlemen who have had full direction of the affairs of our country for more than five years are absolutely absolved from responsibility by the special pleading of the Solicitor General and even by the remarks of the Prime Minister the other night. There never was an occasion on which a more absurd contention was presented for the consideration of any deliberative body in the world. While I think it is a waste of time to discuss before this House and the country the respective responsibility of ourselves on this side and they on that side, yet seeing that my hon. friend is a very eminent member of the Government as well as of the legal profession, and that he has laid great stress upon that point and alluded particularly to my humble self, I shall not be accused of trespassing unduly upon the time of the House if I deal with that matter for just one instant. We admit that the Liberal Government made a contract with the Ross Rifle Company; we believe that it was provident to make such a contract at the time at which it was made, and we believe that it was a provident contract. My hon. friend has said and repeated and repeated that we who made the contract are responsible if the rifles made under that contract are ineffiicient rifles. That contract provides, as I have already said: First, that in case of war or emergency the Government does not need to take rifles from the Ross Rifle Company beyond the number that the Ross Rifle Company can supply to the Government's order. Therefore, the Government was not bound for all time, nor for all rifles. And when the Solicitor General says specifically to a listening world that the Government and country were bound, may I be permitted, Mr. Chairman, with your consent, to suggest that the Solicitor General is attempting to deceive the public.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: I will just complete that. The second point is, that the contract entered into by the Liberal Government provided that the Ross Rifle Company should make any alterations in the rifle, or the type of rifle, made by them, at the demand of the Government. Therefore, if the pattern of rifle made under the orders of the late Liberal Government was in any degree insufficient, there was within the four corners of the contract—that, I understand, is the expression used by a legal gentleman—specific provision which places the responsibility upon this Government to maintain that rifle in its condition of efficiency. There was a further provision in the contract that if and when the Government desired to have the company make another kind of rifle altogether, the company was bound to comply. These gentlemen have been in power for more than five and a half years. It was their responsibility during that period to see to it that the rifles manufactured for this country were efficient; it was within their power during the whole of that time to ensure that they should be efficient according to their views. If to-day we have not a battalion, a company, a platoon, at the front armed with Ross rifles, the responsibility is absolutely theirs, and no amount of special pleading, either by the Solicitor General or by the Prime Minister, can place responsibility upon the late Government or upon any member on this side of the House. My hon. friend was strong on the point that the rifle which was in the hands of the troops who crossed the ocean in September, 1914, was of a pattern which had been approved by the late Government. Admit for the sake of the argument that this is true. Specify, if you please, that we eliminate the time intervening between the outgo of the Liberal Government and the declaration of war. Assume that there was no provision in the contract which placed the responsibility upon this Government, and say that the late Government was responsible for the type of Mark III Ross rifle. Yet the late Government never ordered a Mark III rifle to be made, and there was never a Mark III Ross rifle made while the late Government was in office. The Solicitor General himself told us to-night that it was not until December, 1912, a year and two months after the late Government had left office, that the first Ross rifle Mark III was delivered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was in November.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman said December, but I will alter it to November if he pleases. Now, I submit that the Government which found no difficulty, no impediment to the cancelling of a contract for the building of a Canadian navy, a contract which they had in their desks when they took office, accompanied by a deposit of $100,000 of securities for its fulfilment, is not in a position to claim that, because the late Liberal Government had sanctioned Mark III Ross rifle, they were not bound to order the making of that rifle, nor to accept delivery of it when it was made. As a matter of fact, the order for the making of Mark III Ross rifle was given by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) and not by a member of the Liberal Government. So, if my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) did not catch what I said a few minutes ago, perhaps he will understand it when I now repeat it: When he made the statement he did attempting to throw responsibility upon the late Government for making an inefficient rifle under the control of this Government, he was attempting to mislead and deceive the public as to the facts of the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nobody believes that, not even the hon. gentleman himself; he has more intelligence than that.

Mr. OLIVER: I accept my hon. friend's interruption, considering the source from which it comes. Now, my hon. friend has rested his case on the two points, of responsibility of the late Government, and the assertion that the report of Sir John French did not condemn the Ross rifle. Before I touch these points, let me say, as I said the other night, that the responsibility for ensuring that the troops of Canada were efficiently armed and equipped rested upon this Government and not upon the Government of Great Britain, upon our military department, and not the military department of Great Britain; and our friends have no right, either in constitutional practice or as a matter of right, to attempt to shelter themselves behind the officers of the British military administration. We maintain a Militia Department for the purpose of ensuring efficiency in the conduct of our military affairs. We cannot call Sir John French before the bar of Canadian public opinion to condemn him for what he says or does. A system of responsible government is supposed to prevail in this country, and we look to the Minister of Militia and to the Prime Minister of our Government to see that efficiency is maintained. My hon. friend attempted to be funny over the idea that I had used a contradiction of argument in speaking of the necessity of our making our equipment conform with the British requirement, and at the same time holding the Government here responsible for inefficiency in the equipment. I can see no contradiction in those arguments; on the contrary, it appears to me that they are in entire and proper sequence. I leave the question as to the merits of that to the judgment of the committee and of the public. I say, therefore, that this Government had no right to wait until Sir John French reported as he did with regard to the Ross rifle. They had a right to inform themselves—it was their first duty on behalf of the people of Canada and of the soldiers of Canada—in regard to the efficiency of that weapon upon which the lives of our soldiers, prestige of our country and the success of the Allied arms depended. They did not do it—that is confessed and admitted; there is no argument about it. Not only did the Government not attempt to inform themselves as to the efficiency of the Ross rifle, but the ex-Minister of Militia has assured us on the floor of the House that the rifle was and is absolutely efficient. It would be absurd to suggest, in view of the attitude of the ex-minister in regard to the rifle, that the Government used due diligence; that the Government was not guilty of absolute negligence concerning the efficiency of this weapon. They are all the more guilty in the matter because amongst their own followers were men who for years had persistently criticised that weapon as manufactured under Liberal administration. Those critics were either satisfied that a different and superior rifle was in the hands of the troops, or they were willing to submit their criticisms and opinions to political exigency. I do not wish to accuse hon. gentleman on the other side, or indeed, any good citizen of Canada, of being willing to submit such a question as that, involving the issues that it did, to political exigency. I believe that they believed that our troops were armed with an efficient rifle. They had a right to believe that, and today when it is proved that our troops were not armed with an efficient rifle they have a right to hold the ex-minister of Militia and the members of the Government absolutely responsible for the consequences that resulted, terrible though those consequences were.

My hon. friend rests his whole case on the assertion that Sir John French reported in favour of the efficiency of the Ross rifle. On my reading of the report, the hon. gentleman's assertion—his argument, his special pleading—has absolutely no foundation; the report of Sir John French can be read only as a condemnation of the Ross rifle as an efficient weapon in the field, based on the experiences of Sir John French in connection with the operations that were under his direction and control, and for which he was responsible. We judge of what a man thinks by what he does, and the higher and more responsible his position, the more that holds true. When Sir John French, without reference to the Canadian Government or to our Militia Department, Lee-Enfields being as scare as the Prime Minister and the Solicitor-General have said they were, disarmed the First Canadian Division of their Ross rifles and re-armed them with Lee-Enfields—doing so, as he specifically says here, because he did not wish to send them into a certain important battle armed with the Ross rifle—I say that if he had covered a hundred pages with apologies for or explanations of the Ross rifles it would not alter the reasonable and proper conclusion which may be drawn from what he actually did, and the reasons why he did it. My hon. friend reads certain sentences from Sir John French's report and he ascribes to them certain interpretations that, in my humble judgment, with all due respect, I do not consider that the language permits. In his report to the War Office in London on June 19, 1915, Sir John French, speaking of the committee of investigation, said:

> The proceedings of this committee were laid before me on the eve of a serious offensive operation in which the Canadian division was to take part, and I was at the same time informed that over 3,000, or more than one-third of the infantry, of this division had already succeeded in re-arming themselves with the Lee-Enfield rifle without any authority having been given for them to do so.

(1) To the unanimous opinion of my committee that the Ross rifle could not be relied upon to work smoothly and efficiently in rapid fire with any ammunition other than that of Canadian manufacture;

(2) to the fact that no ammunition of this nature was available in this country, and that sufficient supplies could not be obtained from England.

Further on he said:

I did not feel justified in sending this division into battle with the Ross rifle, and ordered the re-arming of the infantry of the division with the Lee-Enfield rifle, which was carried out before they went into action on the 15th inst.

I submit that there is only one conclusion to be drawn from those words; and yet by picking other sentences out of the report, sentences which are not governing in their character, sentences which I am bound to suppose were put there for the purpose of letting down easily the Canadian Department of Militia, the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General have endeavoured to create the impression that Sir John French did not report against the Ross rifle. Sir John French quotes the report of the committee of which he speaks. In his first report he says, in section 7:

I have expressed and acted upon my opinion that, so far as I could test, the ammunition of British manufacture is not suitable for use with Ross rifles, that there is a large and growing feeling of want of confidence in their rifles on the part of the men in the Canadian division, which is amply justified by the report of the committee.

Now, that is a report on the rifle, and that is what Sir John French says. I submit that when the Solicitor General undertook to read another meaning into that report, he was not fair to the House or to the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read the report.

Mr. OLIVER: Carefully edited. I will take the liberty of calling the attention of the House again to some portions of this report of the committee:

Opinion of committee: A unanimous opinion was expressed that Canadian manufactured D.A.C. 1914 Mk. VII ammunition only, of those tried, was suitable for rapid fire with the Ross rifle.

That deals with the question of ammunition, and it points out that only a certain brand of Canadian ammunition would work satisfactorily in the Ross rifle. He says:

That provided a sufficient supply of Canadian manufactured ammunition of this type could be supplied.

But he did not suggest that it could be provided, it had not been provided, and there was no reason to believe that it would be provided.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman forgets that the War Office stated at the very same time in reply to that letter that it was provided.

Mr. OLIVER: This is the report of the committee on which Sir John French based his report. I am reading it to the House. It was upon Sir John French's report that my hon. friend tried to justify himself, it was not on some other report of some body else, it was on this report; and this report explicitly says that the Ross rifle did not work satisfactorily except with a certain kind of ammunition which was not available in sufficient supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read it, it was with re spect to the future.

Mr. OLIVER: He stated:

That provided a sufficient supply of Canadian-manufactured ammunition of this type could be supplied.

Provided it could be supplied, but it had not been supplied and Sir John French gave no indication of his expectation that it could or would be supplied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The War Office did it.

Mr. OLIVER: That is another story. This is the report which my friend was taking up and upon which he rested his whole case. He edited it carefully and I am giving it exactly as it is. He says, and I would like the committee to listen to this feature very carefully:

The other defects apparent were not sufficient to condemn the Ross rifle in view of the present shortage of rifles generally.

They were sufficient to condemn the Ross rifle if other rifles had been available. Is that the proper meaning of these words? There is no other meaning that can be attached to them, and if that is not a straight and square condemnation of the Ross rifle on its merits, then the English language has lost its significance at the hands of my hon. friend. It goes on:

The committee were practically unanimous in advising that the Ross rifle should be employed on the lines of communication, and that if possible, the Canadian troops should be armed with the British rifle.

The merry jest of the right hon. the Prime Minister the other night that the Ross was a rifle for peace and not for war, under the Liberal make, is borne out by this report of the committee that it was good for some places where fighting was not expected, on the lines of communication, but that the troops should be armed with the British rifle. Does my hon. friend attempt to justify the action of this Government in asking this House to vote $2,660,000 to make 80,000 more of these rifles that were specifically condemned in these terms by the authority to which he deferred as being absolute in this matter? The committee sat on the 5th June, 1915, and the report of Sir John French was made on the 19th of June. You will observe that the difficulties and delays which have interfered with the action of this Government in dealing with this matter of rifles did not interfere with Sir John French forwarding his report in a very short time after he got the opinion of the committee to investigate the rifle. There was no delay on the other side of the water; there has been nothing but delay on this side of the water.

Just to go into some of the details of this report, I will ask any man who cares to bring his judgment to bear what conclusion he could possibly reach other than that reached by the committee and transmitted by Sir John French to the War Office.

With regard to the following specific points which the committee was asked to answer, the questions and answers are as stated below:

1. There are frequent reports that the bolt action jams after about 5 rounds.

Now that is not a question of ammunition, that is a question of construction and mechanism, and that is the first statement that the committee made, "there are frequent complaints that the bolt action jams after about 5 rounds," and the Solicitor General tells this House and this country that the report of Sir John French justifies the Government in refusing to take action to replace the Ross rifle with a more efficient weapon as they should have done, and could have done under the contract. The committee go on to say:

2. Full value of rapid fire cannot be developed unless:

(a) Ammunition of Canadian manufacture is used.

(b) Rifle is perfectly clean.

It will be observed in this No. 2, the question of ammunition is considered, and it is stated that the rifle is better adapted for use with ammunition of Canadian manufacture than that of British manufacture. That has nothing whatever to do with the first clause, which said that the bolt action jams after about 5 rounds.

Mr. HANNA: Why did it not jam when they fired 100 rounds in the trial?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know.

Mr. HANNA: You had better read it.

Mr. OLIVER: Does my hon. friend know??

Mr. HANNA: Yes, it was because they were using Canadian ammunition. They fired 100 rounds and it did not jam.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not what this report says, and I can only give what the report says.

Mr. HANNA: It is exactly what it says.

Mr. OLIVER: This is what my hon. friend the Solicitor General rested his case on, and I am willing to rest my case upon it also. I ask the House to read that section, and to take it as it stands, and as it was meant to stand. The second part of section 2 is that the rifle must be perfectly clean. That is a condition that cannot be maintained in trench warfare, and the rifle whose efficiency depends upon perfect cleanliness is not an efficient weapon in trench warfare such as prevails to-day. That has been the contention all the time. It was reported from the front by the first men who went there, and it is borne out by this statement by this committee. The report goes on to deal with the question of ammunition:—

That English-made ammunition is slightly larger than Canadian so that immediately the cartridge exploded the cartridge case fills the chamber so tightly as to cause a jam.

That is not in place of the other disabilities; that is in addition to the other disabilities. No. 4 reads:—

That orders exist that on no account are troops to take out their magazine as it necessitates stripping the rifle.

That is the objection. Then:—

(b) Unless the magazine is unloaded every 24 hours and the spring action eased, the magazine fails to respond.

That had nothing to do with the ammunition.

(5) That dirt accumulates easily in the bolt head and also in the receptive thread in the breech of the rifle. Owing to difficulty of cleaning jams are caused.

That has nothing to do with ammunition:

(6) The screw of the bolt expands under heat and renders it difficult to open the breech (presumably due to the number of bearing surfaces affected.

That is to say, under rapid fire the bolt heats and causes jams.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know that my hon. friend does not desire to mislead the committee, but what he is doing is this: he is reading the questions as if they were answers, while the answers are given below. He has apparently become greatly confused. The first twelve of these questions raise points which the committee were to investigate, and he is reading them as if they were the reports of the investigators.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The reports of the investigators are further down, 1, 2, 3, 4 and up to 12. So let us understand what the situation is, and not run away with the idea that what the hon. gentleman is reading is the report of the committee. What he is reading is matter submitted for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. OLIVER: That is absolutely correct, but the answers themselves do not give an intelligent knowledge of the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend wants to give an intelligent statement of what the committee did find, he should read the points which he mentions and then read the findings of the committee on them. He has not been doing that.

Mr. OLIVER: I will follow the Prime Minister's suggestion.

(1) There are frequent reports that the bolt action jams after about 5 rounds.

The answer to that is, "yes."

(2) Full value of rapid cannot be developed unless: (a) ammunition of Canadian manufacture is used.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: The second is:

(b) Rifle is perfectly clean.

The answer to that is:

Full value of rapid fire can be developed with ammunition of Canadian manufacture only. (b) This point was not tested.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the second.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. The third is:

English-made ammunition is slightly larger than Canadian.

That is of course the contention in regard to the ammunition. The answer is:

The British-made cartridge case appears to be of a slightly thicker gauge than that of Canadian manufacture and the diameter of the cartridge immediately under the rim appears to be slightly greater than that of Canadian manufactured ammunition. This may be the cause of jamming.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: But it does not say that it is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: This may be a very jocular matter to some hon. members, but the question is asked specifically, and the answer is made by a responsible committee who say it may be. They do not say it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does Sir John French recommend?

Mr. OLIVER: That the rifle be taken away.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all; just read his recommendation.

Mr. OLIVER: I am going to read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He recommended that we enlarge the chamber, and that is just what we did.

Mr. OLIVER: He took the rifles away and replaced them with Lee-Enfield rifles; what he argued about is a matter of minor consideration. Remember, what he did, he did on the strength of this report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: That was his interpretation of the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until the chamber was enlarged, and we got Canadian ammunition.

Mr. OLIVER: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER: Then the hon. member is in this position, if he says that, he says that Sir John French did not know his business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. OLIVER: Because, after the chamber had been enlarged, Sir Douglas Haig reported on it exactly as Sir John French had reported. Therefore, either Sir John French did not know his business, or he did not report as my hon. friend suggests he reported.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The report is there.

Mr. OLIVER: I am telling him that it is there, and the report is—I will read it again. It says:

There is a large and growing feeling of want of confidence in their rifle on the part of the men in the Canadian division which is amply justified by the report of the committee.

Can there be any plainer language than that. Then he says:

I did not feel justified in sending this Division into battle with the Ross rifle, and ordered the re-arming of the infantry of the division with the Lee-Enfield rifle, which was carried out before they went into action on the 15th instant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He gives the reasons; you are afraid to give the reasons.

Mr. OLIVER: I am reading the reasons; I am not afraid of them. I say that the reasons are ample. Either they are ample, or Sir John French was not fit for his position. Now, I do not think that either my hon. friend or myself is in a position to criticise Sir John French. The ex-Minister of Militia may do so, but I do not think we are in that position.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Or the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell).

Mr. OLIVER: Possibly, but when Sir John French on this report takes certain action and says that he takes certain action on this report, I am bound to believe that he did what he did for the reason that he gave, and the reason which was good enough for him ought to have been good enough for this Government.

(4) That orders exist that on no account are troops to take out their magazine as it necessitates stripping the rifle.

The answer to that is: "Yes".

The next is:

4. (b) Unless the magazine is unloaded every 24 hours and the spring action eased, the magazine fails to respond.

The answer is:

Possibly this is the case, but the committee were unable to test this point.

Next:

5. That dirt accumulates easily in the bolt head and also in the receptive thread in the breech of the rifle. Owing to difficulty of cleaning jams are caused.

The answer is:

This may be so, but the rifles were not tried under dirty conditions.

Next:

6. The screw of the bolt head expands under heat and renders it difficult to open the breech (presumably due to the number of bearing surfaces affected.)

[Mr. Meighen.]

The answer is:

The expansion of the bolt head was not apparent when firing 100 rounds of Canadian-manufactured ammunition.

Next:

7. The Ross rifle sight is defective because of its delicacy and the smallness of the figures which make it difficult to adjust the sight easily.

The answer is:

Admittedly the figuring of the sighting is small and difficult to read as compared to the British Lee-Enfield rifle.

Next:

8. The magazine case is too thin and is dented easily. This causes a jamb as the spring cannot work.

The answer is:

The magazine case is flat and any dent therein would seriously affect the spring therein.

Next:

9. The foresight is not good for service work. The circular cover easily gets filled with mud and is difficult to clean.

The answer is:

The committee did not consider that any great amount of difference existed in this respect in comparison with the British rifle.

Next:

10. A hole has recently been bored in the base of the magazine to enable the cleaning of the magazine to be carried out without stripping the rifle.

The answer is:

This hole should be covered by a small revolving plate, adjusted by a screw.

Next:

11. It is far easier to load the Lee-Enfield rifle than the Ross rifle with a clip of ammunition. A Lee-Enfield rifle takes 10 rounds, a Ross 5 rounds.

The answer is:

Undoubtedly the loading of the Lee-Enfield can be carried out in half the time, mainly owing to the fact that the guide for the clip on the British rifle is directly over the magazine chamber.

Next:

12. That the shape of the fore part of the chamber of the Ross rifle is different to that of the Lee-Enfield. That this does not allow of the same expansion and is the cause of the jam.

Undoubtedly there is a difference of the shape of the fore part of the chamber, but the committee was not able to decide that this was the cause of the jam.

And this is the representation upon which my hon. friend rests his case, that the Government was justified in enlarging the chamber of the Ross rifle as a means of preventing jams, instead of ordering a new rifle at that time, as they were entitled to do under the terms of the contract made by the Liberal Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did not Sir John French recommend us to enlarge the chamber?

Mr. OLIVER: I am reading the report of the committee appointed by Sir John French.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does not the hon. gentleman answer my question? Did not Sir John French recommend us to enlarge the chamber, and not abandon the rifle at all?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not discussing what Sir John French said. I am discussing this point: We have been considering the reasons why the rifle jammed, and it has been contended by hon. gentlemen opposite that the rifle jammed because the chamber was too small, or that Sir John French believed it jammed because the chamber was too small. The Government delayed more than a year from taking measures to secure an efficient rifle under the contract, because of the statement of Sir John French. And here we have a report of the committee appointed by Sir John French, and that report states that the committee were not able to decide that the bore of the chamber was the cause of the jamming.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did Sir John French recommend us to enlarge the chamber? And he having so recommended, will the hon. gentleman say that we should not have followed his recommendation?

Mr. OLIVER: In a case where the credit of Canada is at stake, where the lives of our men and the success of our armies depend upon the efficiency of the rifle, and when Sir John French reports that he disarmed our men of the Ross rifle, as he did, before he dared send them into action—in such a case I would most certainly take what he did before what he said, even if he said what my hon. friend says he said, for if he said it, he said it without the authority of the committee he had himself appointed to report. The report of the committee, I assume, was available to this Government along with Sir John French's report. It was sent by Sir John French with his own report for the information of this Government, and they are responsible for not giving due consideration to the report of this committee, whatever Sir John French saw fit to report.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does the hon. gentleman contend also that the British Government should have thrown away the Lee-Enfield rifle, instead of enlarging the chamber as they did?

Mr. OLIVER: I know nothing about the Lee-Enfield, and have no idea what the British Government ought to do. I am talking for the soldiers of Canada and the people of Canada. That is the business that is under the hand of the Prime Minister, and that is quite sufficient to absorb the attention of the best of us for the present. I do not know what the British Government did, why they did it, or what the result was. But I do know that this Government delayed a full year in ordering an efficient rifle, which they should have ordered and could have ordered under the contract, while they were enlarging the chamber and tempering the bolts; and at the end of that time Sir Douglas Haig found, as Sir John French had found, that the rifle was inefficient, and that the troops had lost confidence in it. As a matter of fact, the slaughter of Canadians, armed with the Ross rifle, under Sir Douglas Haig's command in 1916, was greater than the slaughter under Sir John French's command in 1915.

Mr. WRIGHT: The same rifle?

Mr. OLIVER: Absolutely the same.

Mr. WRIGHT: And the slaughter was greater?

Mr. OLIVER: More men were engaged.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The German slaughter was greater, too.

Mr. OLIVER: Possibly; I do not know. I am not seriously concerned about the German slaughter. What I am seriously concerned about is this: When I know that Germany is equipped with the best arm that science can devise and money supply, it is up to the Government of Canada not to delay or question or haggle, but to make sure that the soldiers of Canada, too, have a weapon as good as science can devise and money supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman knows that the Germans are armed with the best weapon that science can devise and money supply, why does he recommend this Government to order Lee-Enfields?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is good at conundrums, and I will let him answer that himself; it is really not material. I was desiring to recall some parts of my hon. friend's suggestions in regard to myself, but they have slipped my memory, so I will not trouble the House with refering to them.

We have spent a great deal of time here in discussing this question of the Ross rifle, and for my part I have no apology to offer for having done so. What has struck me most seriously in this connection is the fact that this Government, charged with this stupendous responsibility, could consent to take up the line of argument and the form of discussion that it has seemed good to them to follow. To the damning conditions that exist they set up the plea of due diligence in the effort to amend those condiitons. There is, to my mind, a most striking resemblance in the attitude of the Government in regard to the making of efficient rifles in Canada to that which prevailed a year or more ago in regard to the making of munitions of other kinds in Canada, such as shells and fuses and other articles of a like character. Our hon. friends must accept the position that the attitude was taken that Canada could not do this and Canada could not do that, but Canada did do this and Canada did do that in regard to other munitions of war, munitions that had never been manufactured before in Canada, that had never been manufactured before on this side of the Atlantic. We were able to establish factories, to secure capital, to train men, to enter upon forms of industry that we had never before seen or heard tell of almost: but we were not able to secure the skill or the capital or the energy or we were not able to take the measures that necessity called upon us to take to give our soldiers an efficient weapon with which to meet our enemies in the field of battle. I cannot imagine how any Government can accept such a position as calmly as they have done, and particularly I cannot understand how, in the face of all that has been said, of the fact that they have not been able to make out a case for themselves before the country, they can come before this House and ask us to vote $2,660,000 for the manufacture of still more of these rifles which the British Government practically refuse to allow them to send over to England and which they refuse to allow our armies in France to be armed with further.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the British Government has ordered 100,000 of these rifles and that it has refused to cancel the order, is still taking delivery of them and will be for months to come?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not concerned about the British Government; but now the hon. gentleman has risen to his seat, he reminds me of that little matter which slipped my mind and so I shall be able to refer to it. The committee will pardon me if I bring this matter to their attention. The committee will recall that my hon. friend was very strong on the point that the Government of Canada had on the 15th of May ordered the arming of our troops with Lee-Enfield rifles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Authorized, if Sir Douglas Haig approved.

Mr. OLIVER: What my hon. friend tried to convey to the country was that an order had been issued for the arming of the troops with Lee-Enfield rifles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend did not say that and now he says he does not mean what he said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said meant exactly what I said, exactly what I intended, namely, that we had authorized the change if in the judgment of Sir Douglas Haig it was the best thing to do. That is exactly what I stated and what is true.

Mr. OLIVER: On February 2 my hon. friend the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) read to the House from the papers that were laid upon the Table a cable message from the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The message, which is dated Ottawa, June 5, 1916, is reported on page 410 of the Unrevised Hansard and contains the following:

Secret.

Following from Prime Minister for Sir William Robertson. By reason of rumored dissatisfaction with Ross rifle I held consultation with General Hughes on 15th May and sent unofficial message to Commander in Chief that we were prepared to leave matters to his judgment after making all necessary tests of both rifles under such conditions as are experienced at the front.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just what I said.

Mr. OLIVER: I think my hon. friend conveyed the impression that he had sent an official message, not an unofficial message.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say whether it was official or unofficial.

Mr. OLIVER: That is precisely the point. My hon. friend did not say that he had sent an unofficial message. He did not say that he had sent a message that could be withdrawn under certain circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not withdrawn.

Mr. OLIVER: No, it was not withdrawn.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference, then?

Mr. OLIVER: What my hon. friend did was to put before the House what he desired the House and the country to understand, namely, that the Government had taken the responsibility at that date of ordering the troops to be armed with Lee-Enfield rifles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I did not.

Mr. OLIVER: Now he admits that he did not do so on that date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly I never said so. I said exactly what you read.

Mr. OLIVER: Never meant to say so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Never meant to say so and never did say so. I said exactly what is stated in that cable message.

Mr. OLIVER: No, my hon. friend will have to withdraw a little of that because "unofficial" is stated in this cable message and he did not state "unofficial".

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not pay a bit of attention to it. Will my hon. friend tell me what difference it makes as long as the message was not withdrawn?

Mr. OLIVER: It is not a question as to whether it was withdrawn or not. It was a question of the intent of the message, and the intent is as plain as day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without withdrawal, the effect is the same.

Mr. OLIVER: This leaves open the privilege of withdrawal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not withdrawn.

Mr. OLIVER: It was not an order?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said it was an order; I said it was an authorization.

Mr. OLIVER: We are quite in agreement. All I wanted was to get the position of the hon. gentleman as it is and not as he desired it to appear to the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desired it to appear just as it is.

Mr. OLIVER: Was that the last telegram that was sent in this connection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, there was one on 5th of June, one on the 24th of June and several since.

Mr. OLIVER: Was there not a reply to this telegram received from Sir Douglas Haig?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not that I received.

Mr. OLIVER: There was a despatch from Sir Douglas Haig?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He reported to the War Office.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, he reported to the War Office in pursuance of that communication.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume so. Perhaps he had another communication from the War Office. I do not know.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it is very likely he had, but anyway he reported on the 28th of May, and he reported specifically without equivocation for the re-arming of the Canadian troops with the Lee-Enfield rifle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We had authorized him to do what he thought best before we got the report. That report was sent to the War Office and by them it was transmitted to Sir George Perley and sent out to us in July. But the troops had been re-armed already, and this was done with our authority.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the telegram I have reference to is in Hansard, but I cannot put my finger on it at the moment, and I will not delay the committee. As a matter of fact, the Government did not accept the report of Sir Douglas Haig.

Mr. MEIGHEN. He did not report to us, but to the War Office.

Mr. OLIVER: This Government sent another despatch which insisted that in their opinion the Ross rifle was an efficient rifle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We sent on the 24th June, before we had seen Sir Douglas Haig's report, submitting the same proposal to him—that a change should be made if in their judgment it seemed best. And we got that report in July.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman may have got confused about a letter of 31st August, page 425 of Hansard.

Mr. OLIVER: On 7th June, the Prime Minister sent a despatch to the War Office, containing the following sentence:

> The Ross rifle is the only one we are at present equipped to make in Canada, and we believe it to be efficient if properly handled.

To this Sir Douglas Haig replied on 21st June:

> After consultation with the officer in command during recent heavy fighting, the experience of commanding officer in this fighting was that the Canadians of Third Division at least had lost confidence in their rifle. I must therefore adhere to my recommendation that the 2nd and 3rd Canadian Divisions should be re-armed shortly with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, and I would recommend that the necessary steps to give effect thereto be taken without delay.

Sir Douglas Haig had reported on 28th May in favour of re-arming the troops with the Lee-Enfield rifle. On 7th June this Government reported against that report in the terms that have been read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman listened to what I said, or if he goes by the document, he must be aware that that statement is not correct. Sir Douglas Haig's report was made on 28th May. I have stated that it was written to the War Office. This reached us through Sir George Perley in the month of July. We did not protest against the report of Sir Douglas Haig when we did not get it, of course.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend may, perhaps, recall that on 17th May last I had the honour to bring to the attention of the House a certain extract, a letter addressed by General Alderson to General Gwatkin and published in the Ottawa Citizen. The Prime Minister said that before that date he had cabled to Sir Douglas Haig for a report on the Ross rifle. I am bound to suppose that the Prime Minister received a reply.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have explained to my hon. friend over and over again that I sent the message through the same channel as that through which I received communication. The telegram came from Sir Max Aitken, on the 13th or 14th, and on the 15th I sent a message to Sir Douglas Haig through the person through whom I had got that message.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this the situation? Having received a telegram dated 12th May from Sir Max Aitken to the Minister of Militia of that time, saying that a serious condition had arisen in regard to the Ross rifle, the Prime Minister stated to the House that he had cabled to Sir Douglas Haig, through Sir Max Aitken. And do the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General tell this House and the country that they never heard any more about that matter until July?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We heard nothing more except what is contained in the correspondence brought down.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. OLIVER: I am assuming, for the credit of the Government, that the report of Sir Douglas Haig, made on 28th May, was in response to the cablegram sent by the Prime Minister, as stated. If that is not the case, and if they did not hear from Sir Douglas Haig until July, I can only say that the Government is absolutely condemned for not using due diligence in securing information as to the condition of the Ross rifle. They had received an urgent and special message from their special agent in regard to a serious condition on the field of battle, and they still tell this House that they heard no more about it until July? Well, if that is the measure of this Government's sense of its responsibility in regard to a matter so grave as this, we may as well close the discussion. This Government expends tens of thousands of dollars to keep a military staff in Canada and in England, and to maintain communication between them. We can get everything attended to, apparently, except this Ross rifle business. But it is the most important thing that claims our attention. Either that report of Sir Douglas Haig was in response to the cablegram of the Prime Minister, or it was not. Either the Government heard of it, or it did not. If they did not hear it, if they got no response, that means that they did not use due diligence to gain a knowledge of the circumstances to which the despatch of their agent refers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the cablegram that followed?

Mr. OLIVER: If they did receive Sir Douglas Haig's despatch—and I am bound to believe that they did—then they did not accede to the arming of our troops with Lee-Enfield rifles until they had put in the protest which I have read, until Sir Douglas Haig had made his reply, repeating his first recommendation, and until the War Office had communicated with this Government ordering them, in effect, not to send any more Ross rifles to England.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the use of explaining anything to the hon. gentleman if he ignores both the explanation and the facts that are clearly stated in the documents?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend will have to take the facts as I give them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not give them.

Mr. OLIVER: I give the facts as they are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You refuse to listen when I tell you about the telegrams that were sent.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend insists that I have not stated the facts. I will give place to him in order to afford him an opportunity of stating the facts as be believes them to be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have already done so two or three times, but if the hon. gentleman wants it again, I will give it to him.

Mr. OLIVER: Again, please.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A cablegram came through Sir Max Aitken saying that a serious condition had arisen. Immediately on its receipt a cablegram was sent to Sir Douglas Haig, through the same channel. Sir Max Aitken, placing in the judgment of Sir Douglas Haig the question as between the Ross and Lee-Enfield rifles for the Canadian troops, in the very terms that the telegram sets out. The next thing that was done was the sending of two cablegrams on June 5, one to Sir George Perley and one to Sir William Robertson, particularly repeating the position that we had taken on May 15. we having heard nothing in the meantime. We repeated on June 24. Later in July we received from Sir George Perley correspondence that had passed in the meantime between Sir Douglas Haig and the War Office—not between Sir Douglas Haig and us—part of which correspondence was a letter from Sir Douglas Haig to the War Office dated May 28, and part of which was a letter of June 21 to the War Office. Then there were letters from the War Office to Sir Douglas Haig and from Sir George Perley to Sir William Robertson. All this was transmitted to this Government by Sir George Perley in a letter dated July 5; so that is the first that we knew of the correspondence that had passed. What is the use of talking about our protesting in our cables of June 5 and June 24 against what Sir Douglas Haig said on May 28, when what he said reached us only in July.

Mr. OLIVER: I will take from my hon. friend just what he has said, and I ask him what position the Government is in when, having a High Commissioner in London who was a member of the Government, having this special agent there with all the necessary paraphernalia at hand, they could not get an answer to a question as important as this? I say that the Government is absolutely condemned for lacking diligence in dealing with this matter. My hon friend says that on May 15 they gave specific instructions for the re-arming of the troops with Lee-Enfield rifles, subject to Sir Douglas Haig's opinion. On the 7th they again wrote to the War Office saying:

> The Ross rifle is the only one we are at present equipped to make in Canada. We believe it to be efficient if properly handled.

They were not leaving it to Sir Douglas Haig.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes, we were. Read all of it.

Mr. OLIVER: I am reading this part of it, which carries its own meaning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it does not.

Mr. OLIVER: The meaning of that paragraph was that this Government desired a report in favour of the Ross rifle—some such report as they got from General French. But they did not get it from Sir Douglas Haig; that is the only difference. They tried to get it, but they were not successful.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What nonsense.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is to be congratulated on his parliamentary courtesy. The fact remains that we are called upon to vote this money to a Government which, on its own confession, from start to finish, has convicted itself of absolute lack of diligence on the most important subject under its consideration. They have convicted themselves of leaving in the hands of our soldiers an inefficient rifle after they knew it to be inefficient, and when the terms of the contract with the rifle company enabled them to change that inefficiency to efficiency whenever they desired to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution before the committee is to be considered in the same manner as a resolution of Supply. The amendment that the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has proposed does not seem to be in order, for the following reasons: The Governor General having given his consent to the resolution under consideration, it is not competent for this committee to do otherwise than to agree, reduce, negative, supersede or withdraw by leave. May, in the 11th edition, under the heading, "Committees on Exceptional Expenditure," says:

> "Procedure in a Committee of the Whole House appointed to consider expenditure not included in the Estimates for the year's supply follows, in principle, the procedure of the Committee of Supply.

Under the heading, "The Committee of Supply," the same author says:

Each resolution for a grant forms a distinct motion, which can only be dealt with by being agreed to, reduced, negatived, superseded, or, by leave, withdrawn.

I could quote Bourinot, who, page 427, expresses the same opinion. A decision of the same nature was given during the last session by the Chairman of Committees and may be found in Hansard of May 15, 1916, page 3944. Therefore, in my judgment, it appears that the amendment is not in order, and I so rule.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not question your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I think that this motion was put to the committee once by the Chairman to-night. Members on the other side cried "Lost" and it was, I am almost sure, declared lost until an hon. gentleman rose to make a few additional observations. I am not quite sure that once a motion has been put to the committee the chairman can very well rule it out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment was not declared lost, but, for the reasons stated, the amendment has been ruled out of order, and so I declare it.

Mr. GRAHAM: For reasons which have been explained to me by the Prime Minister, I think it wise to allow this resolution to get into the bill stage, with this understanding of course, that no gentleman who wishes to discuss this further in the committee stage of the Bill will be thought to be retarding the passage of the measure. That is not our object at all. Several gentlemen on this side, thinking the discussion would last so late to-night that the resolution would not be passed, went home. They have some observations to make on other phases of it, and I should like the Prime Minister to fully understand that in agreeing to the passage of this Resolution it is understood these gentlemen will not be thought to be taking up the time of the House unduly or taking advantage of the situation if they discuss the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. members who have gone home, and I should be the last to desire to restrict them in discussion when we come to Committee on the Bill. Some information has been asked for which I shall be very glad to give when we come to the committee stage of the Bill, and there will be exactly the same opportunity of discussion then that there has been upon the Resolution.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to say a few words when the Bill gets into committee, more especially with regard to the equipment which was supplied to the Canadian troops and which was discarded when they reached England. I asked a question with regard to the Oliver equipment, but the Minister side-stepped the question by converting it into a motion for a return. I should like to get the information before the Bill reaches the committee stage.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: All of these political stories about large sums having been lost to the country through equipment having been discarded will be found to have very little foundation. Information on that subject can be given to my hon. friend. I made some pretty careful inquiries into it, and I shall have the information for my hon. friend.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second time, and agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, February 6, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the Table his recommendation and the Clerk's report respecting the promotion of Mr. A. C. Campbell, of the Hansard staff, and of Mr. Harry E. Oliver from committee reporting staff to the Hansard staff, and of the changes in grades thereby required under the Civil Service Act; also his recommendation and the Clerk's report in the matter of the appointment of Mr. D. L. Desaulniers, supervisor of the blue-book translation staff of the House of Commons, to the position of chief translator of the House of Commons; and also his recommendation and the Clerk's report in connection with the appointment of Mr. L. Boulet as chief of pages on the staff of the House of Commons.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendation of the Honourable the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 3rd instant, relative to the yearly increase in salary to certain officers, clerks and employees of the House, pursuant to section 37 of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, be approved.

Mr. MARCIL: I ask the Prime Minister what the Government intends to do in respect to the sessional employees during the adjournment?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The subject has not been brought to my attention; I really could not answer my hon. friend.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the hon. gentleman give the matter of these sessional employees some consideration? He understands what I mean.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall ask his Honour the Speaker to take the matter into consideration, as this is a subject more particularly coming under his jurisdiction, and that of the Commission on Internal Economy.

Motion agreed to.

STATEMENT BY SIR SAM HUGHES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I observe that in one of the morning papers I am credited with having mentioned the name of General Stanley Von Donop as as ordnance officer in connection with certain matters that I referred to last night. I neither directly nor indirectly mentioned General Von Donop; nor did I refer to him—I do not know how the name got into print.

I observe also that the hon. Solicitor General in his opening remarks yesterday—following, I assume, the lead of certain distinguished statesmen, who wish to balance one against the other and show that they are always taking a middle course—stated:

> At the same time we are attacked by the ex-Minister of Militia because we authorized this substitution too soon.

I shall be pleased if the Solicitor General, who is not in his seat now, will show where I have attacked the Government on this matter. I was not aware that I attacked him. When I attack the Government, I will realize it, and I think they will too.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With reference to an inquiry which was made yesterday by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) with regard to the strike in the coal mines in Alberta and British Columbia: the information which has been received indicates that the men resumed work yesterday in all the mines except Coalhurst, and that they were to resume work in that mine to-day.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Is the Prime Minister acquainted with the terms of settlement? I have been advised from Lethbridge that the coal strike has been settled on the basis of a war bonus of $1.75 per week per man from the middle of November last to the end of March, the Government to indemnify the operators for the bonus.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The terms of the settlement will be made known when the Minister of Labour returns; he is expected to arrive here to-morrow. In the meantime, I do not think it desirable that I should make any statement on the subject.

MONTREAL POSTMASTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I do not see the Postmaster-General in his seat, but I should like to ask the Government if it is their intention to appoint a postmaster in Montreal at an early date? I am told that the service there requires the appointment of a postmaster at the earliest possible moment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Postmaster General has not brought the matter to my attention. I shall direct his attention to what my hon. friend has represented.

156TH BATTALION—THE NOVA SCOTIA HIGHLAND BRIGADE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. A. E. KEMP (Minister of Militia): The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) referred on Wednesday last to a matter concerning the 156th Battalion. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) referred on the same day to the matter of the Nova Scotia Highland Brigade. On Thursday a cable message was sent with regard to these matters to the Minister of the Canadian Overseas military forces. An answer was received on Sunday, and did not reach my desk on Monday until after I had left for the House. The answer is:

> At an early stage instructions were given for absorption of 156th Battalion into 109th Battalion, but subsequently in order to aid recruiting in district from which raised and in view of 5th Division being formed order was cancelled, battalion reconstituted and allotted 5th Division. It was impossible to allot all battalions Nova Scotia Highland Brigade to fighting formations; 85th Battalion selected for service with Canadian corps, France; 185th posted to 5th Division; remaining two battalions absorbed into 17th Reserve Battalion Highlanders for purposes supplying reinforcements to 85th, 185th and other Nova Scotia battalions in the field.

THE CARE OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In pursuance of what I said yesterday upon the motion of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), it is my purpose to-morrow to move as follows:

That a committee of nine members be appointed for the purpose of considering, inquiring into and reporting upon:

(a) The reception, treatment, care, training and re-education of the wounded, disabled and convalescent who have served in the Canadian expeditionary forces;

(b) The provision of employment for those who have been honourably discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and the training and re-education of those so discharged who are unable to engage in their former occupation.

I shall not make this motion to-day, but I should be glad if the member for West Lambton would give consideration to its terms. I have asked my right hon. friend to name four gentleman on that side of the House who, with five whom I shall name, would constitute that committee.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suggest to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that it is expedient to appoint a committee of nine to consider and report upon the arrangements which should be made for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of this dominion. It seems to me to be proper that a committee should take that subject into consideration; possibly it might be advisable that a committee of the Senate should also be appointed. I do not intend to suggest that there should be any expenditure of public moneys—certainly not any considerable expenditure—but in order that an appropriate form of celebration may be adopted, it seems to me that a committee of the House might very well be appointed, if my right hon. friend has no objection.

So if my right hon. friend will be good enough to give me the names of four hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, I shall make the motion to-morrow.

[Mr. Kemp.]

DAVIDSON COMMISSION REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: I see that the right hon. leader of the Opposition made inquiry in my absence as to the production of the report of Sir Charles Davidson, the Commissioner to inquire into war purchases. Last Tuesday there were laid on the table of the House three reports covering the submarine investigation, the sale of small arms ammunition, and allegations that unsuitable military cloths were furnished. There was also laid on the Table the entire evidence taken by the Commissioner with regard to the other matters to be reported upon. As the Commissioner explained in his introduction to the first of these reports, quite considerable delay was caused by vicissitudes in his health. I am glad to say that he has quite recovered, and my information is that he is continuously at work and that we may hope to have reports coming in now almost from day to day.

HON. DR. BELAND, M.P.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked whether any efforts had been made to secure the release of a colleague, with whom I am sure we all most heartily sympathize, Dr. Béland, in connection with the release of Baron Von Polenz and Baron Mundhein. Baron Mundhein has never been released; he is still in internment at Fort Henry. I understood my hon. friend to base his inquiry upon the statement of a newspaper in regard to Baron Mundhein.

With regard to Baron Von Polenz; at the time of his release conditions were such that the effecting of any exchange would have been absolutely impossible, and I believe that these conditions as regards individual exchanges have continued since. I think I may add, and this has already been practically recognized, that every endeavour this Government could make to bring about the release of Dr. Béland has been made; and were there any further effort that could be made, certainly the Government would be glad to make it. At the time it would have been quite impossible to connect up the two things, and the case of Baron Von Polenz had to be dealt with on its own merits. In view of the particular circumstances of the case, I may add that every precaution was taken to satisfy absolutely the police authorities that the action taken in his case was one that could be taken without in any way exposing the public safety.

THE 60th BATTALION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was not in a few moments ago when the Minister of Militia made a statement regarding the disposition of some of the battalions in England. Was anything said concerning the 60th Battalion which was at the front fighting?

Mr. KEMP: I do not think there was anything in this despatch regarding the 60th.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the minister any data on the subject?

Mr. KEMP: No, but I can get it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have received several cablegrams that have been addressed to other people to ascertain why they have been taken out of the firing line, and some other battalions, I do not know what they are, substituted for them. Would the minister look into the matter?

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SINCLAIR: Some days ago I drew the attention of the Prime Minister to hardships that were being experienced by Canadians returning from the United States through their children being detained at the border. I mentioned the case of the wife of a Canadian soldier who was visiting her father in Brooklyn, New York, and who arrived at the Canadian boundary with a child six months of age, but was refused admission to Canada because she had not a certificate of health for the child as required by the Interior Department. The objection I saw was that instead of returning the mother to a distant point in the United States some arrangement might have been made by which the child might have been examined at the border. This occurred at MacAdam Junction. When the case was drawn to my attention I laid it before the Prime Minister who said he would submit it to the Minister of the Interior. Would the minister explain how the matter stands and if anything has been done to relax the rule first adopted in regard to this matter?

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of Interior): In reading the hon. gentleman's remarks in Hansard I gathered the opinion that he was under the impression that this was a medical examination enforced against immigrants coming into Canada. That is not the case. The hon. gentleman will remember that last fall there was a very severe epidemic of infantile paralysis particularly in the city and state of New York, which spread to the other neighbouring states, and some of the United States municipalities had actually an embargo against their city of New York. For the protection of our children in Canada it was considered necessary to have an embargo placed against those states in which infantile paralysis was epidemic, we therefore insisted upon any person coming into Canada with children having a certificate from a medical doctor that the children had not been exposed to any case of infantile paralysis within thirty days. The transportation companies were informed as to this requirement, so that any person purchasing tickets to Canada was or should have been informed by the ticket agent as to the necessity of providing certificates of this kind. My hon. friend will see that it would be of no use to have Canadian medical men at the boundary to give such certificates. I may say, however, that this embargo has been removed by reason of the suppression of the infantile paralysis epidemic.

WAR LOAN—$500,000,000.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) Bill No. 24, for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence was read for the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie and Napierville) (translation): Mr. Speaker, before this Bill is passed, I wish to enter once more my protest against this policy which is ruining the people of this country.

I may state that I am not at variance with the ends pursued by the Allies, but solely with the manner in which this war is managed by the Government.

Hon. gentlemen possibly may enquire whether I am alone holding such views. In answer, I might quote from some London papers, statements to the effect that Great Britain, during the year 1915, would never ask for 150,000 men from Canada, realizing that such a sacrifice would be too heavy for us; and, in those papers, it was further stated that Canadians working in the fields were helping the Allies' cause as much as those who were fighting in the trenches.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, quite recently a French lieutenant, after spending twenty-eight months in the trenches, having returned to Canada, on leave, to recuperate, made the following statement:

"On learning that Canada was to send forward 33,000 men, we said to ourselves: what a noble deed? When, later on, we were informed that a second contingent was to be sent overseas, we considered it as a sublime act of patriotism. When, still later on, in January, 1916, the Prime Minister of Canada stated that he would send 500,000 men, we exclaimed: That is madness!"

Now, Mr. Speaker, such being the case, it seems to me that Canada having sent to the front 50,000, 75,000, or even 100,000 men at $1.10 per day, might have stopped and taken up the manufacturing of munitions, though not for the exclusive benefit of the friends of the Government, but in every Canadian centre; and moreover might have utilized Government works for the manufacturing of munitions at cost price, or at a nominal advance of 10 or 15 per cent, whereas it is found that scandalous profits of 400 and 900 per cent have been secured thereon by friends of the Government.

I repeat it, the Government might well have made use of their own plants to turn out war munitions, and supply work to all comers for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the Allies. What happened since this war has broken out? What was the slogan of Lloyd George, the present Prime Minister, when addressing the House of Commons a short time ago? Munitions, munitions, munitions! In fact, this war is nothing else but a war of munitions and guns. So much so, that Great Britain, after sending men over to France to fight in the trenches, recalled home a number of them to turn out munitions instead. Such being the case, I am not at all certain, as a business man and a merchant, and also as the head of a family who has provided for his children by holding the plough, I am not at all certain, I say, whether this Government is doing the right thing towards the people of this country, by sending over to France and Flanders, to wage war, Canadian boys at $1.10 a day, when Great Britain has as many recruits as she is able to send over at one shilling a day. In the meantime, Great Britain is bound to keep at home a fairly large number of men physically fit, for the purpose of turning out munitions. Once more, may I inquire why Canada should commit the egregious mistake of sending her men overseas, instead of keeping them here to turn out munitions for the Allies, who are so much in need of them.

Mr. Speaker, I stated last year in this House and throughout my constituency whenever an opportunity offered, that if it could be shown that by means of 200,000 men drafted from Canada, we might win the war, I would not object to our making such a sacrifice. But, considering that Russia, with a man power of twenty-five or thirty million men, has not enough rifles or munitions to equip one third of that number, while here in Canada we are in need of all our people, I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is high time to put a stop to this sending of troops overseas. We have thinned our ranks to quite a sufficient extent; we have sent over rifles, though they are not any too good, if we are to judge from the statements made in this House for a few days past.

There must have been something in the wind last year, when the right hon. Prime Minister shot his bolt about sending 500,000 men. It is not my intention to cast any aspersions on him, but if we are to judge from the speeches which have been delivered on the Address, it is quite credible that its intent was to enable some fanatics, such as the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), to impugn the province of Quebec and assert that she is not living up to her obligations. Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that the province of Quebec it not fulfilling its duty. What happened when the war broke out? Frenchmen answered their country's call; so did the Belgians. Should not Englishmen who have been here for one, five, or even fifteen years, have answered as well the call of their Mother Country? Such was not the case, however. A number of them enlisted in the Canadian army at $1.10 per day, because the pay was higher with us than at home, and they are welcome to it. The province of Quebec has not received many immigrants from the British Isles; the greater part of these have gone to Ontario and the West. Is it not a matter of course that these people being newcomers in Canada, should answer their country's call, as recruits either for the British or the Canadian contingents? These late arrivals reading in the newspapers that the Huns had thrown bombs on British unfortified cities, were impelled to enlist with the object of defending their relatives at home.

As regards enlisting in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, comparisons between these two provinces are not in order, for the reasons I have stated. If reports in the press are to be credited, Ontario claims 110,000 British born, out of a total of 152,000 enlistments. How many are there in the province of Quebec? I cannot say, but there should not be many of them, British immigrants having kept aloof of our province.

Moreover, I say that this vexed question as regards enlistments, which is being constantly thrown in our faces, with the object of showing that the province of Quebec is disloyal, is very despicable business. It should not be brought up in this House, and the right hon. the Prime Minister should refuse to countenance any attempt of that kind.

Now, I shall take up another point. I was surprised to hear the hon. Minister of Finance, in his speech of January 30 last, refer to the country's prosperity, to the fabulous figures our exports have reached to, and in a general to the prosperous state of business. Of course, I have not been trained to speech-making, neither have I presided over trusts; I am only a farmer and a merchant. However, I am aware that when a town corporation or a school board in the province of Quebec make up their minds to borrow $1,500 or $2,000, they are called upon to refund the amount within twelve months, or even within thirty or ninety days. Now, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance at whose request the House voted 800 millions for 1917-18, would be in a position to refund that amount within ninety days, as the aforesaid corporations do. I believe that the people of this country, who are being deceived day in and day out by the government organs, would consider that the war comes high, should the Minister of Finance some day come out with some, such statement: We are in need of 800 millions, and the loan will have to be refunded within ninety days. In the province of Quebec, families with ten or twelve children are no exception, and they have to be provided for in any case. I wonder whether the people would take stock in any statement made by the minister or his colleagues, as regards the prosperity of the country, if the head of a family, with ten or twelve children to provide for, were called upon to contribute $1,400. How could the people of this country foot the bill? There would not be found 25 per cent in a position to liberate themselves. The ministers hailing from the province of Quebec went through that province last year and attempted to make the people believe that we were actually prosperous, though it is known that it is all the outcome of the manufacturing of shells and guns, with the object of making fodder for guns, as the ministers themselves asserted in 1910. So I say that we should not rely on that prosperity, which is only fictitious, and will be a source of disappointment, once the war is over.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, I wish to call your attention to a question which is being mooted: I mean conscription. La Patrie, of Montreal, suggested yesterday that it might be enacted very soon. Whatever will be the outcome of it, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state right here that I am not in favour of conscription, not any more than I am in favour of sending men overseas. I repeat it, if the Government had at heart the interests of the people, the Prime Minister, previous to embarking for Europe, would state in this House that recruiting will stop at once, in order to enable the youths of Ontario to remain in that province, and the young men in other parts of Canada to remain also where they are, including those from St. Rose, in the county of Dorchester, who were called upon to cross the boundary, should ever conscription be enacted. Of course, should the United States enter the war, these people might be induced to return home. So I say that it is incumbent on the Prime Minister to state that conscription will not become law, and that voluntary enlistments will continue to be the rule. We should keep our own in the country, to raise crops of all kinds, and to turn out butter, cheese and all the foodstuffs required for the provisioning of the Allies.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not delay the House any longer, reserving my right to take up the subject anew when the budget comes under dicussion.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the House must regret, in view of the adjournment to-morrow, that the Government in introducing this measure, which in its general nature has the support of the House in its entirety, has not seen fit to give some information to those who are particularly interested in the welfare of the boys overseas as to the statements made in the report of Dr. Bruce, and in the report of Dr. Baptie and his colleagues with reference to the statements of Dr. Bruce. In the press of the country there have appeared from time to time excerpts from these reports, and certain statements have been made of a nature to excite the public mind with reference to them; but, so far as the House is concerned, we have not received any information whatever. It is true that an order of the House was passed for the laying on the Table of both these reports, but, so far, that order has not been complied with. I submit that there is no valid reason why it should not have been complied with, because I have no doubt whatever that these reports were contained in printed documents which were in the hands of the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Militia, and could have been placed upon the table of the House without any difficulty whatever. It would be in the public interest to know exactly what the statements were, and to know what the real situation is in regard to this very important matter. I hope that before we adjourn to-morrow, the Government will, for the satisfaction of those who are intensely interested in this matter, give the House and the country the exact reports as they have come to them from the different bodies that have been making these investigations.

If one is to judge from the newspaper reports in regard to these matters, Dr. Bruce, about whose standing there is absolutely no question, was appointed by the Government for the purpose of making an examination into the medical conditions which existed on the other side. As I have said, about his standing and ability there can be no question. In these newspaper reports we find it stated that there was no medical inspection of Canadian soldiers in the military hospitals in England by the Canadian Medical Service, that there was no efficient medical inspection of any kind made of our men in the Canadian hospitals, previous to the time when Dr. Bruce took up his duties and made his report. If that statement is correct, it seems to me that a very grave state of affairs indeed is disclosed. We have there the men who have been wounded in France, taken to England, and distributed among the various hospitals all over Great Britain, and yet we are told that they were under no supervision or inspection by the medical men who went over from Canada. Dr. Bruce is authority for the statement that no inspection whatever by any recognized Canadian medical officers was made of those men of ours who were in the military hospitals, and that no efficient inspection of any kind was made by our men of those who were in the Canadian hospitals. As has been pointed out in the newspaper reports, the consequence has been that soldiers have been retained in hospitals who should have returned to duty, thus disclosing gross neglect in the whole matter. The newspapers state that men were retained who should have been returned to duty; and that a great many others should have been returned to Canada where they could have been more economically treated. What is the answer to this? Is the House and the country not to know whether or not these statements are true? My hon friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) went to Toronto shortly before his resignation, and was reported in the Toronto press as having stated that our Canadian soldiers were allowed to come under the knife of first year medical men in charge of the hospitals in England, when qualified doctors were available.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never said first year medical men; if I did I meant first year doctors after they had graduated.

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume that my hon. friend will refer to this matter. I am merely quoting from an extract in a Toronto paper.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never read it.

Mr. MACDONALD: It gives his address in Toronto.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I never heard of the statement before.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am simply taking it from the report in the Toronto newspaper.

An hon. MEMBER: What paper?

Mr. MACDONALD: The Toronto Mail.

An hon. MEMBER: Of what date?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend can satisfy his curiosity by looking it up in the library.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not finding any fault with the hon. member. I may have used the words which he quotes; I will not say that I did not use them, but what was in my mind, and what we objected to, was that first year doctors, not students, should have been put in charge of these hospitals.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: First year after graduation?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, some of them within six weeks of graduation.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is what this report states that my hon. friend said, "first year medical men."

Sir Sam HUGHES: You said first year students before that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not call them students; I read to the House what my hon. friend was reported to have said.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We took the ground that those first year doctors were not fit for the job. I never endorsed those fellows being there, and I wanted to put them out.

Mr. MACDONALD: What the country is particularly interested in is not what my hon. friend was unable to accomplish in regard to this matter, but whether or not the condition of affairs reported by Dr. Bruce existed in England. That is a matter which I assume my hon. friend can discuss.

This report also discloses the very important fact that many soldiers had been sent to England who were unfit and who should not have been enlisted at all. That statement implies a lack of care and of proper management on the part of the medical service of the Militia Department. If large numbers of men were enlisted and sent to England without proper examination, to become a charge upon the country, it will be agreed that it is another very improper condition of affairs. It is stated in that report that in every battalion which arrived in England it was found after medical inspection that from five to fifteen per cent of the men were medically unfit. An instance is given of a particular battalion, the Canadian Pioneer draft, which had 57 unfit men out of 254 which constituted the whole draft of officers and men.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the statement?

Mr. MACDONALD: The statement is that the Canadian Pioneer draft, composed of 254 officers and men, had 57 men who were medically unfit for duty, and were pronounced to be unfit when they reached the other side.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What date is that?

Mr. MACDONALD: It is in the report of Dr. Bruce.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: At what date?

Mr. MACDONALD: I cannot tell my right hon. friend. If we had the advantage of having the report before us we would know exactly about it. In addition, the statement is made in that report, as reported in the newspapers, that 50 per cent of the permanent base duty men in England have never been at the front, and that 56 per cent of the men who were discharged in England as being medically unfit never went to the front. These are statements based on evidence given in this report, and they show conclusively an absolute lack of control in regard to the whole question of medical examination in this country. We are told that men who were physically unfit were sent overseas, thus imposing upon the exchequer of this country an enormous burden which it should not have been called upon to assume, while coupled with that is the question of pensions, which also raises a very grave problem.

Then the statement is made, and a list is given of men on permanent base duty who should never have been enlisted, the number being 846. The list is as follows: Men over age, 413; men under age, 128; extreme flat foot, 90; defective sight, 78; extreme varicose veins, 40; chronic rheumatism, bronchitis and asthma, 81; missing fingers, toes and other deformities, 16, making a total of 846 men on permanent base duty in England who, according to Dr. Bruce, should never have been enlisted at all or sent to the other side. An instance is given in the report of a boy who was enlisted on March 31, 1916, a Pembroke boy, 16 years of age, who weighed only 80 pounds, who had had infantile paralysis, and who had undeveloped muscles in the right hip and thigh. He never did a day's military duty. That boy is over in England and has been in hospital continuously almost since his arrival there. It is incomprehensible how it would be possible, if you had any reasonable medical supervision in Canada, that that boy, apparently one of those who ought never to have been allowed to go across, but rather to be in some institution, should be permitted to pass the various medical examinations that are prescribed resulting in a condition by which he could go across the ocean and become a public charge instead of going to fight. Then Dr. Bruce goes on and charges that methods of handling infectious diseases have been most unsatisfactory. He charges that there was not the slightest regard paid to economy in the management or operation of the medical services generally. In addition to these specific charges he makes nineteen other charges—an arraignment against the medical service. The other day, my right hon. friend, in giving his statement as to the proposed expenditure for medical service this year, stated that it will cost $4,000,000 inclusive of all the other charges which go to make up the account. There are allegations made in regard to the question of sending men to what are known as V. A. D., or Voluntary Aid Detachment, hospitals. I think that some very worthy people raise the point that a great Imperial issue is at stake and that our Canadian boys should be practically compelled to go to the V. A. D. hospitals in order that their faith in the Empire may not be impaired. To say that the Imperial spirit of these poor Canadian boys will be impaired unless they are associated with and lie beside boys from other parts of the Dominion seems to me to be the veriest twaddle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not catch that.

Mr. MACDONALD: The statement that the Imperial spirit of the sons of this country who go over to fight must be increased by their being taken to the V. A. D. hospitals and lying alongside of men from various other parts of the Empire, seems to me to be the veriest twaddle. If the sons of this, or any other overseas dominion, have gone to France, have fought and have been wounded, to say that the patriotism of these people is such a tender plant that it requires nurture that must come from being inured in a hospital with some person from some other part of the Empire seems to me to be a ludicrous position.

Dr. Bruce attacks these methods of dealing with the hospitals in that way. He advocates taking care of all the men in hospitals which the Canadian Government provides. It would seem to be only human nature that the touch of the hand of a nurse from Canada to the boy from this land, or the knowledge that he is being treated by some one from his own country —that smallest touch of home in a foreign land, after all, would add much to the interest and feeling of the young man who is away. It, after all, is a sentimental question, but the problem is a serious one as to whether the sons of Canada who are going over there are being properly treated.

Then, again, the allegation is made that in regard to this and other questions the Canadian organization is being interfered with by the British system. It is asserted that British interference in regard to medical matters exists as well as it does in regard to other matters. That this interference with the authority of our Canadians over there is going on is quite evident. One hears of it every day from those who have been over. Let me give an illustration that occurred at Witley Camp not long ago. There is a camp made up practically and exclusively of Canadians. There is a canteen maintained at Witley by a British contractor, a contractor with the British authorities, and a canteen where liquor of all kinds is sold. On one occasion not very long ago the orderly officer of the day—a Canadian officer—in the performance of his duty, insisted that this canteen should be closed in the interest of the preservation of order amongst the men, and he was told by the contractor that it did not make any difference about what he said, that he had a contract from the British Government, that the British Government had all the say and that the British Government would continue to say that he might sell whatever he wanted to. What has taken place in Canada? Those of us who have had the opportunity of visiting the various camps know that an entirely different system is followed and it is a very proper system. Under this system, wherever there are canteens, the regiment or the battalion runs its own canteen, and whatever profits are made by the canteen go to the regimental or battalion funds, as they should. That is not so in England. Why is it that such interference is permitted? Why is it that liquor is allowed to be sold to our troops by British contractors in camps in which Canadians are excluded from engaging in such a business? The ex-Minister of Militia has made some strong statements in the letters that he has made public, but having had indisputable evidence from an officer who has been in England, I began to realise that some of my hon. friend's statements were not as extreme as some of the public thought they were.

A remarkable statement is made too in this report in regard to the conditions that exist in the hospitals in France. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman to lay on the table, if it is at hand, a report of the French hospitals. This report of Dr. Bruce refers to French hospitals Nos. 7 and 8. These are two hospitals which were sent over to France by the Government equipped with a thousand cots. Yet, I am informed by a gentleman who visited France within the last few months, and whose position in this country could not be questioned, that in one of these hospitals, when he saw it, they only had 314 cots. He informed me that the other hospital at Gravel never treated a person, although maintained at the country's expense, until Dr. Bruce unearthed them. I would like the right hon. gentleman also to lay on the table of the House a statement with regard to the hospitals at Taplow and Luton Hall and Lymphcastle and the Perkins-Bull Hospital. Information comes to Canada from those who have been over there in various capacities, which goes to support the conclusion formed by Dr. Bruce in regard to this matter and which is incorporated in twenty-three deliberate assertions in regard to the conditions there which do not reflect any degree of credit upon the medical service in charge. What are the facts? What is the answer of the Government in regard to it? It is said that a committee of medical men, over which Dr. Baptie presided, went into this report of Dr. Bruce. If one is to judge from what one sees in the press, with some of the conclusions of Dr. Bruce's report, Dr. Baptie and this committee agreed. In how far did they agree with Dr. Bruce's conclusions and in how far did they disagree? All these things, I submit, Mr. Chairman, are of the most vital interest to the fathers and mothers of the boys who are over there. The thought of a dear one being wounded in France and being brought to England coupled with the slightest manner of doubt, such as that which has been raised by Dr. Bruce's assertions, brings an agony and a woe to the hearts of the father or mother of the boy such as few hon. gentlemen can appreciate.

This is a question which is over and above every consideration except the one thing as to whether or not in these respects everything is being done that ought to be done. Does Doctor Baptie seriously answer in any way the statements made by Doctor Bruce; and if so, in what respect? No hon. gentleman in this House who is interested in the boys who have gone overseas would be doing his duty to them if he permitted this House to adjourn without insisting upon this Government giving the House and the country a full explanation in regard to the whole matter. We have seen the newspaper battle that has raged around the question whether Doctor Carleton Jones was this, that, or the other thing, and whether or not he was to be retained in the service. I do not think any Canadian cares tuppence whether he is retained in the service or not so long as we are satisfied that the boys who have gone overseas are being properly treated in the hospitals by the doctors in charge. If Doctor Carleton Jones is doing his duty, let the committee know it; and if he is not doing his duty, let him be removed and some one else put in his place who will do his duty. If it be that the charges made by Doctor Bruce have no justification whatever, it is significant that Doctor Bruce has not been removed. The very fact that Dr. Bruce, instead of being removed, has been promoted to a very important position in France, gives an inference of strength and certainty to his report. If the statements made by Dr. Bruce are not true, he should not be retained in the medical service; if they are true, we want to know from the Government what steps they have taken, are taking or intend to take, to bring about a better condition of affairs in Great Britain and France where those hospitals are being maintained by this Government, and where this Government is paying for the care and attention bestowed upon our soldiers who are sick or wounded.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has called attention to what is suggested in certain reports that are not yet before the House in their entirety, and are only known in so far as their contents have been published in the press. I may say that the printing is being expedited as much as possible. We cabled to Great Britain to ascertain whether any printed copies of the Bruce report were available, and we are informed that forty copies have been mailed. The other report, as I have said, is being printed with all possible expedition. I do not purpose entering into a discussion of the reports before they are on the table of the House and can be examined in their entirety, but some of the suggestions made by my hon. friend are worthy of a moment's attention.

With regard to the lack of inspection of Canadians in Imperial hospitals, I am not qualified to speak from a medical standpoint nor as having any special experience in such matters; but I suppose that the inspection of Canadians in such hospitals would be left to the Imperial authorities, just as the inspection of Imperial soldiers in Canadian hospitals would doubtless be left to the Canadian medical authorities who have control of such hospitals.

My hon. friend has spoken as if the medical service overseas, whether in British hospitals or in Canadian hospitals, was of a very inferior character.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quoted Dr. Bruce's report.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it is most undesirable to spread an impression of that kind amongst the people of this country. I visited forty-three hospitals,

Canadian and British, last year, and I did not see one of them that, so far as I could judge, was not well organized and well carried on. I saw the Canadian hospitals in England; I saw a very large number of British hospitals, and I found the medical men and others in charge of those hospitals keenly alive to their responsibilities and anxious to do everything possible for the comfort of the men under their care.

Mr. MACDONALD: Dr. Bruce does not say so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am speaking at the moment of my own experience and not of Dr. Bruce's. As far as one could judge from such an inspection as I could make of the condition of patients in any of those hospitals, the care and attention that was being bestowed upon our men and upon men from the Mother Country and the other overseas dominions, was, in all those hospitals, as perfect and thorough as one could expect. It is very easy to find fault, and I do not intend to discuss or criticise the report of Dr. Bruce in advance of its being laid upon the table of the House; but I was impressed with the fact, that so far as I could observe he gave no credit for the good work that had been accomplished in the Canadian hospitals overseas. The report was purely critical and did not give reasonable consideration, so far as I could observe, to the very good work which undoubtedly had been done. The reports will be laid upon the table of the House and it will be for hon. gentlemen to come to a conclusion with regard to the whole question.

It is desirable that the Committee should have information as to the personnel and qualifications of the board of which Sir William Baptie was chairman. The gentlemen who constitute that board were men of great experience and high standing. At the head of that board was Surgeon-General Sir William Baptie. He graduated from the University of Glasgow in 1880, entering the Army Medical Service in 1881. During the international occupation of Crete he served as senior medical officer, 1897-98, and received the honour of C.M.G. In South Africa he was on the staff of the Natal Army and was present at all the actions for the relief of Ladysmith and subsequent operations in Natal and Eastern Transvaal. He was mentioned in despatches, promoted to be Lieut.-Colonel, received a medal with five clasps and also received the Victoria Cross. He became Assistant Director General of the Army Medical Service in 1901, continuing in that position until 1906. He was appointed Inspector of Medical Services in 1907, serving in that capacity until 1910, when he became Deputy Director of Medical Services. In 1913, he was appointed Director-General of the Medical Service of India. At the present time he is Director of Medical Services at the War Office. Therefore, if one may judge from the record presented by that career, he is a man whose experience and ability would amply justify his appointment to a position at the head of that board.

The other gentlemen who constitute the board were Canadians, and it might be proper to inform the committee and the country as to their qualifications. One of them was Col. E. C. Ashton, Officer Commanding the Canadian Training Division at Shorncliffe. He has the Colonial Auxiliary Forces Officers' Decoration. He has passed the Militia Staff course. His services are as follows: He was Officer Commanding the 38th Regiment, Canadian Active Militia, and he was placed on the Reserve of Officers in 1912. He was recalled to the Active list in 1915, to assist in the organization of the 13th Brigade, Canadian Field Artillery. He was given command of the 32nd Battery, Canadian Field Artillery, and subsequently he commanded the 36th Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force. At present he is Officer Commanding the Canadian training division at Shorncliffe, England. In civil life he is a prominent physician resident in Brantford, Ontario, where he has been a well-known medical practitioner for fifteen years. He has been an alderman of Brantford. He is a graduate of Trinity and Toronto Universities.

Another gentleman who served is Col. J. F. Fotheringham, C.M.G., Assistant Director of Medical Service of the Second Canadian Division, Expeditionary Force. He is a graduate in arts and medicine of Trinity College and of the University of Toronto, and is also a distinguished physician and writer. He was formerly professor of therapeutics in Trinity University, and is now associate professor of medicine in the University of Toronto. He is head of one of the medical services in Toronto General Hospital and consultant physician to the Hospital for Sick Children. He has been for many years associated actively with the Army Medical Corps, and has held several high administrative medical appointments in Military District No. 2.

Another gentleman who served on that committee is Colonel A. E. Ross, C.M.G., Assistant Director of Medical Services, First Canadian Division, Expeditionary Force. Colonel Ross is a well-known Kingston physician and citizen. He is a graduate of Queen's University, Kingston. He is professor of medical jurisprudence and materia medica in Queen's University. He was mayor of Kingston in 1908 and is at present a member of the Ontario Legislature. For many years he was connected with the Army Medical Service, having been appointed Major in command of No. 6 (later No. 3 Cavalry Field Ambulance), when this was organized in 1906. He went overseas as commanding officer of No. 3, Canadian Field Ambulance. His work in this unit proved so commendable that he was given the honour of C.M.G. When the Second Division reached France and Colonel Foster became Divisional Director of Medical Service, Canadians, Colonel Ross succeeded him as Assistant Director of Medical Service for the First Division. Through his efforts the health conditions of our First Division have been only equalled among the British forces by those of the Guards Division. Colonel Ross served in the South African War, as I am informed.

The fourth Canadian who is a member of this committee is Lieut.-Col. J. M. Elder, No. 3 General Hospital, Boulogne. Col. Elder is a distinguished Montreal surgeon and teacher and writer upon surgical subjects. He graduated from McGill University in arts and medicine. He has been surgeon to the Montreal General Hospital since 1897, and is assistant professor of surgery of McGill University. He is head of the surgical section of No. 3 (McGill) Canadian General Hospital at Boulogne, France. He has been for years connected with the Army Medical Service. He went through the Northwest Rebellion of 1885 and was for twenty-two years surgeon to the Second Regiment, Canadian Artillery, previously the Montreal Garrison Artillery. For these services he possesses the Northwest Rebellion and Long Service medals. Owing to his position at No. 3 General hospital he has had a larger surgical war experience than any other Canadian surgeon. He, also, has the Colonial Auxiliary Forces officers' decoration.

So, this board which, I believe, did not agree in some respects with the report of the board of which Dr. Bruce was the head is composed of men in whose judgment, I think, the country might reasonably have confidence. I do not for a moment desire to cast reflections upon the board of which Dr. Bruce was the head, nor upon Dr. Bruce himself. That gentleman is undoubtedly a surgeon who stands at the very forefront of his profession in Canada; and I have not the slightest doubt that he was perfectly sincere in his criticism and in his recommendations. I do not think, however, that he has had the same length of experience in connection with the Army Medical Service as some of the gentlemen I have named, as shown by the records that are placed before me. However, the reports will be placed before the House in due course, and doubtless they will give rise to a discussion upon the conditions in the British and Canadian hospitals overseas.

So far as one could gain any knowledge through a very limited experience, I was impressed on my visit overseas with the excellence of the British transport system, the British commissariat, and the British medical service. I remember that when I came back from my visit overseas the impression in my mind as to these services was very strong.

My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) has asked for a statement with regard to the unfit—I suppose those who have gone overseas though medically unfit. In the zeal for recruiting which has undoubtedly animated many commanding officers in the organization of regiments, there have been some regrettable features in the sending overseas of men who, when they arrived, were found to be physically unfit. I am not disposed to think that the mere absence of a finger or some slight defect should necessarily cause a man to be regarded as unfit for service at the front. I remember very well that in the summer of 1915, a man came to me who had fought through the second battle of Ypres, or, as it is called, St. Julien. He had not a single finger on his right hand except a stump of the forefinger, enough to enable him to pull the trigger of his rifle. Yet I was informed that he was the best shot in his regiment. He lost his fingers when he was but a year old, through the act of a child a year or two older who placed a red-hot poker in his hand. We hear of rejections also on account of flat feet. I am not sure that it is wise in every case to observe the strict letter of the regulations with regard to flat feet. It is said that some men working in the lumber woods are apt to contract flat feet. Yet I venture to say that these men, if put on the march with others whose feet were normal, would come out a long way ahead at the end of the day. I was told that a large number of lumbermen in one of the battalions were being rejected for the reason that they had flat feet. It seems to me that it would be desirable to try these men out, and see whether in endurance upon the march they would not be quite as capable as others who in this respect would be accepted for enlistment. The memorandum which my hon. friend asked for some time ago as to the unfit enlisted for overseas service has been placed in my hands, by the Deputy Minister of Militia and is:

The records of the department show that the following were returned to Canada during the years 1915 and 1916 as being medically unfit: 2,701 in the year 1915; 3,651 in the year 1916.

These figures, of course, include a number who left Canada fit, but who contracted disease during their training in England. The figures for 1915 also include any wounded returned that year.

The balance of those not found fit for service at the front, such as those with slight defects, over age, etc., are being retained for light duty in England, and it is also understood that two Construction Battalions have been organized from these men.

As to the cost, it will not be possible to state the cost with any degree of accuracy without taking up each individual case, owing to the varying periods of service and the various ranks held, and this would take months to furnish.

The estimated cost per man in the Canadian Expeditionary Force is $1,000 a year.

My hon. friend asked also with regard to No. 7 Hospital and No. 8 Hospital. No. 7 Hospital is at Le Treport, in France. I do not remember the exact complaint made with regard to Le Treport Hospital. I visited that hospital last year on my way from Paris to Folkestone. I spent the greater part of a day there, and, as far as I could judge, the hospital seemed to be well organized. Has my hon. friend any particular information as to its defects?

Mr. MACDONALD: How many cots are there in that hospital?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really do not remember the number of cots; it is a very large hospital. In fact, there are two hospitals there. One is a British hospital, which is located in a very large hotel overlooking the sea and which was built, I was informed, by a German syndicate a year or two before the war. Shortly after the war broke out it was expropriated by the French Government and placed at the disposal of the British authorities. It is a very large and well-equipped hospital. The Canadian hospital was located in tents and huts immediately adjoining. There were a large number of patients in the hospital when I was there, and a large staff of nurses was employed. The hospital was under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Bridges who was attached to the Canadian Permanent Force.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That was near Dieppe?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: At Treport. I recollect that when I first went to France there was a gathering of the officers of all the Canadian hospitals in that vicinity, officers from the staffs of five Canadian hospitals, including the hospital at Treport; and there was present, also, the chief medical officer in the British service who had jurisdiction over the district in which these hospitals were situated. The highest possible compliment was paid to the organization of the Canadian hospitals by that officer in speaking at a dinner which was given by Lieutenant Colonel Murray McLaren and the officers under his command.

No. 8 hospital is at St. Cloud, near Paris, France.

The number of beds laid down for general hospitals is 1,040, with an establishment of 46 officers, 73 nursing sisters, and 201 n.c.o.'s and men.

It, however, frequently happens that after an hospital has been located, the accommodation is from time to time increased, and as a consequence, the staff. There is no information available in Canada as to the present standing in this respect of the hospital at Treport. If particular information is required it will have to be obtained from overseas.

No. 7 is at present used for the accommodation of casualties of the British Expeditionary Forces.

No. 8 was offered by the Canadian Government to the French Government, as a complimentary contribution towards the cost of France's share of the war, to be used for the accommodation of French casualties, but it remains under Canadian control.

Both these hospitals are doing exceedingly good work.

I asked Colonel Mignault, who had to do with the establishment of No. 8 hospital, to give a statement with regard to it some time ago, and I might read one or two quotations from a letter which he has written to me on this subject. He said:

No. 8 Canadian Hospital was sent to France on the 23rd of November, 1915. It took the months of December, January and February to erect it, on the Racing Course at St. Cloud, property of Mr. Blanc. It is built with barracks which were furnished by the French army at a cost of 250,000 fr., but put up by our own men.

On the 1st of March, 1916, the hospital was ready to receive patients, and on the 17th of the same month, the first trainload of wounded from Verdun reached us, and then the hospital was filled up rapidly. It has a capacity of five hundred and twenty (520) beds.

Hospitals in France are divided into three categories, namely A, B, and C, according to the importance and seriousness of cases. Thus, Class A stands for "Les grands blessés"; Class B for "Les blessés moyens," and Class C for "Les petits blessés."

Three hospitals are classified in Paris in Class A. One is the Val de Grace Hospital in Paris (1,000 beds). The second is the American Hospital (600 beds), which is kept up by the generosity of individuals of the great Republic. The third one is the St. Cloud Hospital, No. 8 Canadian General.

So this stands among the three chief hospitals of Paris at the present time, according to the report given to me by Colonel Mignault. Colonel Mignault continues in his letter:

The above-named three hospitals are the only ones classified in Class A, that is to say, they are so thoroughly equipped with surgical appliances, etc., as to be able to take care of all cases, whatever may be their severity or their importance.

With regard to segregation or otherwise of the Canadian wounded, I do not think that there ought to be a policy for segregation or a policy against it. I think that these matters must be determined according to the military exigencies. There is a great deal to be said in favour of Canadians being among their own people and living under the care of Canadian nurses. On the other hand, I think there is much to be said for that fellowship and comradeship which comes from the association of men from this Dominion with men from the Old Country and from the other Dominions in hospitals and convalescent homes. I saw Canadians in our own hospitals; I saw them in British hospitals in many parts of the country; but I never found any complaint whatever from any Canadian or from any soldier in any hospital with respect to the care and attention which he was receiving, and I have heard no complaint from any Canadian who was in a British hospital as to his desire to be placed elsewhere. It may be that some of them would like to be more among their own people. That is quite possible, because I know they were very glad indeed to see the face and hear the voice of some one from home.

With regard to what my hon. friend has said respecting Witley Camp, the statements which he has made come to me for the first time. If he will give me further particulars I shall make it my business to inquire and to see that any such condition is remedied.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is that point?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He said that although a Canadian officer at Witley Camp desired that the canteen should be closed for the welfare of his men, the British contractor, who had some authority from the War Office, disregarded his wishes and insisted upon keeping the canteen open. I think the desire of a Canadian officer in respect of such a matter ought to be respected, and I shall be very glad to take the matter up.

Mr. MACDONALD: I shall very gladly give to the Prime Minister the name of the officer who gives me that information, but if my right hon. friend thinks that the whole question is whether the wish or will of that particular officer who was the orderly officer of the day should be respected is the issue involved in that question he is much mistaken. I fail to see for one moment what possible right the British Government has to lease to any contractor over there the right to sell whisky and rum to Canadian soldiers in a Canadian camp, or to do anything else in a Canadian camp. That is the question involved, and in that regard the problem is very much larger than the mere question of whether the orderly officer of the day is to have his authority flouted and disregarded by a man who happens to be a contractor.

My right hon. friend suggests that there should be no discussion of the Bruce and Baptie reports until the reports come down.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that. I said we could discuss it more effectively.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let us see what the facts in this matter are. This examination of Dr. Bruce's into the Canadian hospitals, according to the information which has unquestionably come from governmental sources, was inaugurated by the ex-Minister of Militia, and the report of Dr. Bruce was made to the ex-minister previous to his retirement.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Made to the then Minister of Militia.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is technical, I will accept that. This was made to the Minister of Militia, not in England or the acting Overseas Minister of Militia in England; it was made to Major General Sir Sam Hughes, Minister of Militia of the Dominion of Canada, before he resigned last fall. Now for what reason or purpose does my right hon. friend come here and, in the month of February, 1917, and as an excuse for not presenting that departmental report to the House, say that he is waiting until he receives some copies of the report from England? And then he undertakes to intimate to me that it is most undesirable for me to discuss this question, when that report must be in the possession of this Government, must be here in Ottawa, and must have been here for some time.

My right hon. friend, having had before him a report which he does not bring to Parliament, introduced a commission presided over by Sir William Baptie which goes out and examines this report of Dr. Bruce's. Again I assume that the report of Sir William Baptie with re erence to the statements made by Dr. Bruce is in the possession of the Government. And yet my right hon. friend intimates that it is undesirable that we should discuss it in this House. How long are we to wait before these reports are brought down? It seems to me that we are the last people on earth before whom this Government desires to place anything. Statements are given out to the press, but nothing is given to Parliament, and we are told it is not desirable to discuss these things in Parliament. It is said to be undesirable to open one's mouth in regard to the interests of the boys overseas. That seems to me a most remarkable position to take. There are many people in this country who have no kith or kin at the front, who are very good at lecturing people who say a word on behalf of the boys who have gone overseas. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to take lecturing from people of that sort. The men who have gone overseas look to us as representatives of the constituencies in Parliament to ascertain the facts in regard to conditions overseas. What is the good of my right hon. friend saying that a certain number of K.C.M.G.'s sat on a commission to consider Dr. Bruce's report? We know that Dr. Bruce is a Canadian surgeon of high standing, that no one would venture to impute anything against him. That being so, he having made two or three charges in regard to the administration of the hospitals of this Canadian Government overseas, the representatives of the people, speaking for the boys who have gone overseas, I submit have a right to discuss this question before Parliament. It is our duty to find out what these reports were and what the truth was. My right hon. friend has not told us just where we stand in regard to this matter. What answer is it to give to the mothers and fathers of the boys who have gone overseas to say that a gentleman with K.C.M.G. tacked to his name has sat on a committee and made a report that we have not yet had placed before us in Parliament? That is where we are in regard to this question.

I submit that this House is entitled to some expression of opinion by the responsible Government of this country as to whether or not they regard the statements of Dr. Bruce's report as having been true, and whether or not they regard the statements of Sir William Baptie's report as true. That is the situation in regard to the men overseas, and that is what I want to know.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The matter of the canteen has come up. When the Canadian division went to England first, in the fall of 1914, I crossed over, and, in my innocence under the British military law and under the Canadian military law, I thought that I had some say still in the affairs of our troops. I was politely informed that I had nothing whatever to do with the canteen or rationing or feeding of the men, that General Alderson had let that to certain English contractors, and that Canada had no right to interfere, as it was outside our military sphere, that the contracts had been let to some company not only for the Canadians, but for the forces in England, and that contracts could not be interfered with. I protested against it. We had learned at Valcartier that as much as $33,000 in one case had been made by one of the contractors in a period of six weeks, and there were upwards of one hundred of these gentlemen. It was the first time that we learned that so much money was being distributed. We set to work to run the canteens under regimental boards, and the result was a saving of upwards of $1,000 a month. There is a regimental fund, money belonging to the men themselves for their own distribution and maintenance. I wanted this plan carried out.

Mr. MARCIL: Did they not try to institute a dry canteen over in England?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will come to that in a minute. I tried to institute a dry canteen, and I was informed in a gentlemanly way that I had no jurisdiction. General Alderson told the men with a great hurrah and bravado in the only speech he ever made except when he read to them a little book which he once published about how not to do things——

Mr. MACDONALD: Who was that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: General Alderson. He told them he was going to make them free men and, as a slap at the Minister of Militia in Canada, he said he was going to give them a wet canteen.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it not the fact that liquor is given to the men every day in the trenches? I have heard objection made in Montreal by parents who would not allow their sons to go over there because they were afraid that they would get into the habit of taking liquor which they had not been in the habit of taking before they went away.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the trenches, when men are standing up to their waists in water, they get a little rum, not as a beverage, but as a stimulant; and, although I may be regarded as a fairly temperate man, I certainly would not object to any officer, non-commissioned officer, or man getting his tot of rum, as they call it, when he is standing up to the waist in water in the trenches.

Mr. MARCIL: Is this done at all times, or only when they are about to go into action?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not discussing that question.

Mr. MARCIL: I am merely asking for information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend's (Mr. Marcil) remarks might be misconstrued. I have never heard that the rum is given to the men when they are going into action. What I have heard is that when men are exhausted, and wet and cold, a very small proportion of rum is given to them merely as a stimulant, for the time being, to prevent unfortunate results from cold and wet. As to rum being given to men going into action, that is something I have never heard of, and I do not believe it for one moment.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that it is the practice to give the men a little liquor in the trenches—

Sir SAM HUGHES: In South Africa where the climate is very hot, we had rum issued to us, but we never used it except when going into some hazardous exercise. I have no hesitation in saying that when the boys wanted it they could get it. If I were running the show to-day, I would say that when men are standing in the trenches up to their waists in water—and I think I can claim to be as practical a temperance man as there is in Canada—I would have no objection to them having their tot of rum. I regard it, under these conditions, as a medicine and not as a beverage. This extraordinary piffle about rum being handed out in the trenches, and all that sort of thing, comes from people who do not understand what they are talking about, and who are simply trying to create an agitation in that regard. I take second place to no man in Canada in supporting the cause of temperance, but I do not like any of this piffle served up when the boys are fighting and dying in the trenches.

Another question which has come up is the question of fallen instep. There are three grades of fallen instep, as I am told by medical men. In the third grade the men are really unfit, and I do not think there are many of that class sent over. There was one fellow who came into Edmonton and was rejected. He wrote to me, and I had a doctor examine him. He had walked from Peace River to Edmonton, and yet he was rejected as unfit. However, I sent him over, and he was rejected over there. He told them that I had sent him, and I arranged that he should go to the front. He went into the trenches, and is one of the best marchers to be found anywhere. Any man accustomed to wearing moccasins is certain to suffer from fallen instep. Nearly all the woodmen are in the habit of wearing moccasins and they often suffer from a fallen instep. I think that the medical regulations should have been relaxed a little in that respect, and I did relax them in the case of two or three who were in the first and second stages of fallen instep, but in the third stage a man cannot march very far.

Then there is the question of segregation, which has been referred to by the Prime Minister. I think that if he reads Dr. Bruce's report the right hon. gentleman will see that he himself agrees exactly with Dr. Bruce. I have not read the report, but Dr. Bruce talked over the matter with me and his views and those of the Prime Minister are exactly the same. I look at the matter purely from a business point of view.

I could never see why our men should be hauled from say Folkestone to the north of Scotland, when we have hospitals of the right class near Folkestone where they could get better service and where $40 or $50 could be saved in each case over sending them to other places. Nor could I see why our men should be sent to the V.A.D. hospitals. These hospitals are presided over by the most charming women in the world; I am not saying a word against them—such nice little girls with five or six weeks' training in some St. John's Ambulance affair or something of that kind as helpers; the dearest little creatures in the world for smoothing brows and holding hands,—but I did object to Canadian soldiers being sent there, and to paying three shillings a day to keep our boys when we had our own highly skilled nurses. The hands of our skilled nurses might be a little rougher, and not so smooth on the brow, but I wanted our boys to get the attendance which could be given by our own nurses who had had at least three years of experience in our hospitals. That is what Dr. Bruce objected to, and that is what I object to. He also objected to having our men kept there when they should be in the trenches. There was one of these V. A. D. hospitals that had a baseball team as you will find it mentioned in the report and the men were kept playing baseball when they should have been in the trenches. When Dr. Bruce was examining these hospitals Colonel Jones, or General Jones, managed to rake up in a very small circle around London, 700 men, and shoved them back into convalescent camps immediately. In 1915 when I was over there and when the Prime Minister was over there, I inspected a battalion at Shorncliffe one day. They had only about 200 men. I asked for the parade state, and it showed that there were about 1,200 men. I wanted to know where they were, and I was told that so many were convalescent, and so many were here, and so many were there. I said, "What are these convalescents doing here, they should not be here." I said that we wanted no men in the battalion except fit men, and so I ordered that the convalescents should be kept all in one place by themselves, and not mixed up with the rest of the camp, the plan being to have them in one camp and divided into six or seven classes, those just out of the hospital, those convalescing, and so on in the various stages up to the last class which would be fit to go back to their battalion and take their places in the trenches. That was the plan which we arranged and carried out until the new overseas minister sent them back, I understand; and now they are rambling all around England. We had hundreds and hundreds of men rambling around England. We were returning from 8 to 10 per cent of our men, while the British regulars were returning about 60 per cent and Kitchener's men were returning about 30 per cent until I arranged that convalescent plan. Then in the similar periods we returned 60 per cent. I am not reflecting on General Jones—I want to let him out—but if this agitation is going to be carried on by the V. A. D. people, fourth grade society dames in London, the facts are going to come out. I do not want to hurt General Jones; I have stuck to him as far as I can.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the ex-minister read the letter written by Lady Drummond on that subject?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Lady Drummond sent me several letters. I am not aware that Lady Drummond or any other society lady was authorized to run our hospitals. There was also Sir William Osler; he wrote several letters. The dear creatures who hang around the outskirts of society in England wrote a great many letters, and interfered, but I was not aware that it was any of their business. I thought that Canada should manage her own affairs. All the agitation has come from these hand-holders and brow-rubbers.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about General Jones?

Sir SAM HUGHES: When I got to England in 1915, and knowing that the Prime Minister was desirous of visiting the hospitals, I got General Jones to furnish for him a list of the hospitals where the boys who had been wounded at St. Julien were placed. It took three weeks to get the list, but I got it and gave it to the Prime Minister. It stated that there were about 200 of the boys at Cardiff. On the way there I happened to get off at Oxford to have a look around, and I found fifteen or sixteen men there. I met one boy who had just the day before passed the "cannot recover" stage, and he said that as soon as he was well again he was going back to the trenches. I said, "You will be of no use in the trenches," He said, "I cannot get cold feet because I have only one foot to get cold." I have seen him since tripping along with a cork leg, about as good looking a boy as there is in the country. At Cheltenham, I found a Canadian nurse and a number of Canadians in the hospital there. The name of not one of them was on the list of General Jones. At Cardiff, I found that there were three Canadians in the hospital, whereas 200 were reported on the list. At Aberystwith I found a number not reported, and I saw that by following Jones' report I would not get anything, and I paid no further attention to it. I was looking at the matter from the business end, and the convalescent system that I established in 1915 during the first year saved Canada $6,000,000, by restoring men to the fighting line who otherwise would have been lying in hospitals in England holding hands and having their brows smoothed as I have pointed out. The very first day on which I let Dr. Bruce loose in England, 700 men were picked up and sent back, and every week they kept going back. There was no system of getting reports about these men at all until I established the convalescent system. I told the Prime Minister this; I told him that Jones' statement was no good. In 1916 I went over intending to look after the business end of things; I was not interfering with the medical end. I challenge any members of this House to find in Dr. Bruce's report any criticism of the doctors. There is an etiquette among doctors, which I am sorry to say, is not observed among politicians, that they must not blackguard or expose each other. I could not induce the doctor for love or money to expose any malpractices. I could not get him to expose those fellows at all.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Perhaps there were none.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not saying anything about that. However, I could not get Dr. Bruce to make any report on that aspect of the case. I do not say that there were many cases of that kind but he would not touch the matter. What he reported on was the way in which we could bring about an improvement in the operation of the hospitals. I selected Dr. Bruce in order to reorganize the business end of the service. The year before I had taken up the financial end of it. I do not know that it interested me very much to hear the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) tell the House the other day—it seemed a sort of a left-handed compliment—that he found things pretty good over there. I did not appreciate him telling me that, because I knew that things were good over there. I knew that the medical end of it under Dr. Bruce would be improved over there and that it would be pretty good here too. The right hon. the First Minister has given us a comparison of a lot of extracts from the statements of those fellows; they are all good chaps—those Canadian officers who had to do with the Canadian end of it. I picked out Col. Ashton as a fighting officer. I did not know what he was as a medical officer but I knew he was a good fighting officer. Col. Fotheringham is a good man; Col. Ross, none better; Dr. Elder—the very best—he stands head and shoulders over Dr. Baptie in ability. Dr. McKeown, head of St. Michael's College, is one of the brightest men in Canada. He had a record unsurpassed in the history of the world for hospital work. Four or five of these gentlemen on Colonel Bruce's committee, I understand, are among the twelve Fellows of the Royal College of Surgeons of England living in Canada. There are Drs. Bruce, McKeown, Scott, and Hunter. Dr. Hunter is an Edinburgh man, now belonging to Winnipeg, who is one of the greatest physicians that it has been my privilege to meet. Dr. Wilson, I understand, comes from St. Catharines and he is one of the ablest and best administrators whom it has been my privilege to fall in with. Taking the Canadians on both lists, they are the pick of the fellows we have over there in the medical service. As far as Dr. Baptie is concerned, I am not going to say a word against him only that he may be a little prehistoric.

Mr. MACDONALD: Were the gentlemen whom the hon. member has named, associated with Dr. Bruce in his examination?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Dr. McKeown and the others?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Drs. McKeown, Scott, Hunter and Wilson.

Mr. MARCIL: All good men.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There is nothing to touch them in Canada. I picked out the very best, the most highly qualified men that I could get. There is scarcely a man amongst those whom I have mentioned who had not a practice of from $30,000 to $150,000 in Canada. They gave their practices up to go over there. I do not know Dr. Baptie and I am not going to say anything against him, but, the fact that he was a medical officer in 1881 does not impress me a particle. He would naturally favour the V.A.D. hospitals. That is where the whole trouble came. Sir George Perley favoured the V.A.D. hospitals, but I did not feel that we were getting the best use of them. When the doctors would demand that the men should be sent to convalescent homes they would be told by the ladies in charge of them that they had been told by Dr. Carleton Jones that they should keep these men until others were sent to take their places. If others were not sent there immediately the men were kept because these places had to be kept up. We were paying three shillings a day for these nurses, while our own nurses were employed on English cases.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who authorized Sir George Perley to do that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not anyway.

Mr. GERMAN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me if Dr. Bruce made a report directly to him as Minister of Militia?

Sir SAM HUGHES: He did.

Mr. GERMAN: When was that report received?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not remember exactly when it was received. It was in the month of September, but it is in the department and it will show.

Mr. GERMAN: I presume that report is in the department and is available?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was in the department when I was there. It was kept. The matter has never been taken up. I left the report there when I moved out.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the ex-minister permit me to call attention to a letter I have received from the mother of one of my constituents who is now in a convalescent home in England. He has been two years in the army, and was thirteen months in the trenches when he was rescued after being buried and was taken to the convalescent home. He belongs to the 26th Battalion and is at present in hut 25, H. Division, Woodcote Park, Epsom, England. He contends that he has been quite fit to go back to work for months past, but that he has been held back. He has asked his mother to find out if he can be sent back to Canada to assist in recruiting or instruction work, as he is tired of staying in the convalescent home.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We used to get many requests of that nature.

Mr. MARCIL: Does it not strike the ex-Minister of Militia as unusual that a man who is fit for the trenches should be held back in a convalescent home?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did he send his mother the doctor's report that he is fit for the trenches?

Mr. MARCIL: He says he is fit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am afraid he is not fit for the front or he would not be asking to be sent home. I cannot give the initials at the end of all these gentlemen's names, but the report of McKeown Scott, Hunter and Wilson will commend itself to any thinking officer in Canada against the report of Baptie, Ashton, Fotheringham, Ross and Elder. I am not saying a word against these gentlemen. Ross deserved the Victoria Cross scores of times while he was at the front, Fotheringham is a first class fellow; Ashton is a bonny fighter, and Elder is one of the best from McGill College. The only weakness that I can find in regard to Dr. Babtie is that he received his medical schooling in the old school, and he is now behind the times as the British Medical Service has been completely reorganized in this war. I am ready now or at any other time to discuss the system of handling convalescents. I introduced that system and it has been adopted by France, Russia, Italy, and even by Germany and Austria in this war. The system is that of bringing the convalescents gradually back to a stage when they will be ready for the front line trenches. I had not completed the business end of the medical system when I left England, and I do not know in what condition it is to-day, but Colonel Bruce will soon be here and will be heard from. We had planned to save millions upon millions of dollars by a system of segregating the men as far as possible. Some say it is impossible to segregate the men at the front but it is very strange how men of certain battalions manage to reach certain hospitals. If you happen to be at the front when they are passing the wounded along, you will hear someone cry: Where are these for? And the answer is: "Matrimonial Bureau No. 1", and they are taken to a certain hospital. When another batch comes along, the order is to send them to "Matrimonial Bureau No. 2", and they are taken to another hospital. That is the way in which they have the hospitals all labelled, according to the opportunities there are for matrimony for the boys. We are to-day paying, separation allowances in Canada for scores of little girls who have married with these boys in England, through the brow rubbing and the hand-holding in the hospitals, I never interfere in regard to that sort of thing; but if a girl is going to have a chance, I want one of the Canadian nurses with three years' training to have it with the boys.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. Chairman, the Government is asking us to vote $500,000,000, a sum which a few years ago would have staggered our imagination. I have no objection personally to the vote if it is necessary, but I think the least the Government could have done would be to give us a detailed statement of expenditure made during the last two and a half years in connection with the war. That statement was asked for last year by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell); but it should have been given even if it had not been asked for, because when the first vote was passed at the short Session of August, 1914, the Prime Minister, as I remember very well, promised that this vote not having been made in the usual manner, we would have a detailed statement of how the money was expended, and a similar promise was made when the next vote was passed. We have received no such detailed statement of what has been done with the money, and it is our right, as the representatives of the people, to know what has been done with the money so that we can hand the information on to our constituents. We have not those details and we are not likely to have them before this vote is passed. Therefore, while there are a great many rumours in the air of over-expenditures, of expenditures that should never have taken place, there is no way in which they can be contradicted, because we have not the facts before us. Personally, I have no desire to circulate any rumour that is not absolutely correct, nor have I any desire to get any political benefit from any statements which may be made against the administration of this Government since the war started. I have no doubt the Government have sins enough to answer for without anything that is wrong being stated in regard to those expenditures, then if the rumours were wrong, we would know how to correct them; but the Government have not done so and the rumours continue. There is no doubt that the men coming back from the front say that unnecessary and exorbitant expenditures have been made, and while there may be some exaggeration in what the ex-Minister of Militia has told us this afternoon, there is a great deal of truth in what he has said. We know that expenditures have been incurred in connection with men who should never have enlisted, who, a blind man almost could tell were too old to enlist or who were suffering from rheumatism, men who everybody knew were not fit to be enlisted, but who were enlisted, and who, after having been kept in Canada for several months, were taken across the water, and we have been paying them their daily wage and also separation allowance, and the Patriotic Fund even has been mulcted to a certain extent. The medical officers who examine recruits ought to have instructions not to take on men of that class because, while such men may be perfectly willing to fight, their enlistment means an unnecessary expense to the country, and in addition to that, they are taken away from their ordinary vocations, and after their return, it takes them some time to settle down again. In fact, some that I know of have not settled down yet since they were taken away. To illustrate my point, I have a memorandum here of some of the battalions that crossed over in the Fall. The 111th Battalion of Galt had 190 men, or a percentage of 29 out of a total of 635 men discharged on arrival in England. The 142nd ("London's Own") arrived in England with 561 men and lost 164, medically unfit, over age, etc., a percentage of 29. The 160th Battalion of Walkerton had only 13 per cent of discharges. Out of a total of 997, only 140 were discharged. The 161st of Clinton made the best showing of the quintette, only nine per cent or 67 of the 740 men with which they arrived in England having been turned down. The 148th of Woodstock, like the 160th, had a percentage of 13. This battalion has rejected 87 men out of a total of 604. Add these up and you will find the number rejected was over 600, a very high percentage. They had been trained all summer in Canada, at Borden Camp or elsewhere, and we had borne the expense of that training. That should not have happened.

5 p.m.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Is not the hon. gentleman aware that each man was passed first by the doctor of the battalion and that at Borden Camp every man was afterwards inspected by a full board of physicians? What further precautions could have been observed?

Mr. NESBITT: That is not speaking very highly of the ability of the physicians. Some of these men would have been rejected on their looks by any member of this House. I know some of the men who were enlisted, and have known them for years, and in the cases I have in mind no medical knowledge would be necessary to lead one to reject them as unfit for overseas service. I am not particularly blaming the Government, except that I think they should have taken care that the medical inspectors were of a high enough class not to pass men simply because they came up for inspection. There is no necessity for the state of affairs that existed; the fact that it exists shows that there is something wrong somewhere.

I wish to say a word or two about the medical report to which my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) referred. I can easily see that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) need not be so far apart. Every one who knows anything about Col. Bruce knows that he is as capable a man in his profession as can be found, and absolutely fearless. The Prime Minister saw the hospitals as a visitor, and perhaps he would not know much more about a hospital than I, and that would not be very much. He would be admitted to the hospital as a visitor and the Prime Minister of Canada. Besides, the medical authorities of the hospital would know that he was to make a visit at a particular time. Even with the little knowledge of the world that I possess, I can easily believe that nothing wrong would appear in that hospital that could possibly be hidden that day. But Col. Bruce visited the hospital on a different mission. He was sent as an inspector, not to approve of everything, but to disapprove of what was wrong. With his expert knowledge, he would easily see that things were going wrong where an ordinary visitor would think they were going right. I do not think that any man should condemn Colonel Bruce for setting forth the details of this hospital work and telling the exact truth. The Government should have felt obliged to him for telling them of anything that was wrong in the hospital. I think if I had been in their place, I should have felt grateful to Colonel Bruce for his services. As to the men from the front, I agree with other hon. gentlemen that I have never met one who made a complaint about the hospitals; on the contrary, they always give the highest praise for the way they were treated, whether the hospitals were conducted by British or by Canadians. But that does not alter my views as to the position that Colonel Bruce occupied, nor by belief that he could easily see shortcomings which would escape the eyes even of patients. I believe that Colonel Bruce did his duty, and I do not see why the reports should not have been brought down. I doubt that there was anything to hide in the matter. The particular incident mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou might be the only one of its kind. I can easily understand that Dr. Bruce's report would be quite correct, and yet that by the time the Babtie investigation was made the local people might have got busy and corrected any fault that existed, and so the Babtie report might be reasonably correct too. Both these reports might have been honest; I am quite sure that the Bruce report was, anyway.

Now, it is not fair to us that these large votes should be passed without a statement being given showing what has been done with the money already voted, that we as representatives of the people, may know what we are talking about when we are asked what has become of the money. We know, of course, that there must have been expenditures which would not have been made had we had better knowledge beforehand. These are things that the people can easily excuse, as we on this side of the House can excuse them. But there is no possible excuse for some of the expenditures that, according to rumours we hear, are constantly taking place. It is a great shame that money voted by this Parliament to fight this war to a finish should be improperly spent. For this expenditure will be a great burden upon the people of this country. We cannot be careful enough in making these expenditures. Yet, according to statements that are made, and judging from knowledge that we have, expenditures have been made which are nothing but a criminal shame.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): It chanced that I was in England at the time when the commission of inquiry was appointed by Sir George Perley and the Government. I am acquainted with the circumstances in which that action was taken. I may say that I have had some experience in connection with hospitals, and with members of the medical profession. For many years I was on the Senate and Board of Governors of the University of Toronto. For a considerable period I was one of the governors of the Toronto General Hospital. I was chairman of a committee at one time which re-organized the staff of the Toronto General Hospital, and I then got to know something of the medical and surgical profession. I found that it was possible for doctors of the highest eminence to disagree, and to disagree quite honestly. I know Dr. Bruce; he is a personal friend of mine, and a man of high standing in the Canadian surgical world. That is, I think, well known by all members of the House. When I went to England I found that Dr. Bruce, acting upon the instructions of the ex-Minister of Militia, had made a report upon the hospital situation in Great Britain and was engaged in attempting to carry out the recommendations of that report, under instructions from the minister and, I believe, with the sanction of the Military Council which had been established in London. I found that great tension, very strong feeling, existed in London, as well as on the Continent, with regard to the Bruce report and his proceeding to carry it out. I took the opportunity of talking with men high in the Canadian medical service, with officers and men of impartial judgment, and I found—I desire to make an absolutely fair statement respecting the matter—that while it was admitted that there were many good points in Dr. Bruce's report, it was in many respects impracticable to carry out its recommendations. I believe that is a fair statement of the opinion of the Canadian Medical Service and of official military opinion of London with respect to Dr. Bruce's report. I do not mean to say that that was a unanimous opinion. Dr. Bruce had some strong votaries and supporters; on the other hand, Dr. Jones had many equally strong votaries and supporters. I found the opinion prevailing very widely that Dr. Jones had been done some injustice, that the difficulties with which he had been obliged to contend had not been taken into account, that as the war had developed burdens had been cast upon him and upon his organization, which had not been foreseen and which could not have been fully and adequately prepared against. We found the opinion prevailing widely among eminent members of the medical profession and among military men that Dr. Jones had done exceptionally well, having regard to all the circumstances surrounding his task. As I have said, it was thought by many—and in this I agreed—that there were many excellent points in Dr. Bruce's report. I believe that Dr. Bruce proceeded with his work in all good faith. He had not been a military man, and to that extent would not be acquainted with the practical difficulties which might stand in the way of carrying out some of the recommendations which he made. In London a newspaper controversy had been proceeding with regard to the question of so-called segregation. It was contended by some that Dr. Bruce's plan provided for the segregation of the Canadian troops—that the Canadian troops should not be allowed to mingle with the troops of Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand in the Canadian and British hospitals, but that they should be gathered together as Canadians in Canadian hospitals, and be treated by Canadian physicians and Canadian surgeons. I found a very strong feeling prevailing in London that it would be an unwise policy, an improper policy, to segregate the Canadians in their own hospitals and to deny to wounded British, Australian and New Zealand soldiers the privileges of Canadian hospitals. I think it is unfortunate that that controversy arose, because in reality—and I know that this is the opinion of Sir George Perley—the truth lies between the two extreme opinions. I do not regard it as necessary that Canadian soldiers, in twos, threes or groups of half a dozen, should be sent to remote parts of the United Kingdom for treatment. On the other hand I think it would be an unmixed misfortune, contrary to Canadian and Imperial interests, if a hard and fast rule were laid down that Canadian soldiers should be segregated in Canadian hospitals and not be allowed to mingle with the wounded soldiers of Great Britain, New Zealand and Australia. While I was in the United Kingdom I visited many Canadian and British hospitals. I took the time to go about among the wards of those hospitals—I think it was one of the most interesting experiences of my life— and I asked many Canadians in those wards as to the treatment which they had experienced since becoming patients there and as to what they thought of the question of segregation. I state the substance of the answers truthfully to the committee when I say that, without any exception, they all spoke in the highest possible terms of the medical, surgical and nursing treatment which they had received in those hospitals. That was true also of the Canadian soldiers whom I saw in the British hospitals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Having regard only to the main question of segregation, would the Canadian soldiers prefer to be segregated, or otherwise?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian troops, according to the opinion of those with whom I discussed the matter, would prefer a condition under which, while there would be a considerable number of Canadian soldiers in a hospital, there would also be soldiers of New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and Great Britain. I myself observed that here would be a Canadian in one bed, here an Australian next to him, there an Irishman and so on. I heard a story when I was at Cliveden that illustrated precisely what I have in mind. A Canadian was engaged in an animated discussion with an Australian about some matter over which they differed. It became heated, and the Irishman interposed in order to compose the difference. He said to the nurse: "This is the first time in the history of the world that an Irishman has been found making peace instead of breaking it." That is typical of what you find in all these hospitals. If in a hospital containing 1,000 beds there are two, three, four or five hundred Canadians, the Canadians will not be lonesome. On the other hand they do like to mingle with the Australians, the New Zealanders and the soldiers from the British Isles. It gives them a wider interest than they would otherwise have; it makes for breadth of view and of sympathy; an exchange of ideas continually goes on among these patients. I talked with hundreds of Canadians in the hospitals which I visited and I never heard one single complaint with regard to their treatment, or in respect to the medical, surgical or nursing services. On the contrary, they all spoke in the highest possible terms of the treatment which they have received in these hospitals. As I say, I think it unfortunate that this question of segregating should have arisen and to say the truth, I do not believe myself that Dr. Bruce had it in his mind that Canadian hospitals should be shut to all except Canadians. I think he had it in mind that a policy should be inaugurated that would aim at getting as many as possible of the Canadian soldiers in to Canadian hospitals. In my view as has so often happened in the case of these controversies, the truth lies between the two extremes. I know that that is the opinion of Sir George Perley, and that is the policy now being adopted. Instead of sending two, three, or half a dozen Canadians to a distance in Great Britain, they will, wherever possible, be sent to Canadian hospitals. So then we shall have a situation in which, in a hospital say of 1,000 beds we may have 300 or 400 or 500 or 700 Canadians, and the remainder British or Australians or New Zealand soldiers. As I say, there was a controversy in London with regard to this question. Lady Drummond had taken up the matter in the Times newspaper, and I desire to say with regard to Lady Drummond and the other ladies whom I saw in London, that they have laid this country under a debt of gratitude for the unselfish service which they have rendered to our soldiers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Lady Drummond has maintained, I believe at her own expense, an establishment in London through which she is in communication with practically every Canadian soldier in Great Britain. That is a great service. I found the same with regard to other Canadian ladies in London. I do not believe we can speak too strongly or too highly of the service which these noble women are rendering in the cause of humanity there in London. I do not know anything that fills me with greater pride than the work being done by Canadian women in London and Great Britain.

There was the tension then that arose by reason of the feeling widely held that Dr. Bruce's report had not taken sufficiently into consideration the difficulties with which Surgeon General Jones had to contend, and that it did not do Surgeon General Jones the justice which it was thought by the Canadian forces he was entitled to. There was also the tension caused by the controversy over the question of segregation which I have discussed. Then there was further question, and this was a most important matter, that many members of the Canadian Medical Service and a good many of the leading officers of Great Britain, did not believe that Dr. Bruce's recommendations could be carried out practically. They did not believe that, having regard to conditions that existed at the front, and at the base hospitals, and the mode of transporting the casualties to the hospitals, that Dr. Bruce's recommendations could be carried out. That is to say they did not regard them as practicable. I talked with Dr. Bruce on one or two occasions in London, and I desire to be absolutely fair to him. As I say, he is a personal friend of mine. He is a surgeon of high standing, and in my view there are many excellent points in his report; but I do think that some of the recommendations which he made were impracticable, and I believe that the carrying out of them in their entirety or in large measure would have gone far to disorganize the Canadian Medical Service in Great Britain and on the continent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was he not promoted by the British War Office?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not touching on Dr. Bruce's technical skill except to say that it is of a very high order. Dr. Bruce is the head of one of the services of the Toronto General Hospital. He is an associate professor of the University of Toronto, and I speak in the highest terms of his ability as a surgeon. What I am saying is that an opinion widely prevailed in military circles in Great Britain that it was not practicable to carry into effect many of Dr. Bruce's recommendations made in absolutely good faith—there is no question about that. That was the situation with which Sir George Perley was confronted, and it was a serious situation.

Mr. MACDONALD: At what time was that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In November. It was a serious situation, and it had to be faced. Sir George Perley was obliged to act. This matter was given the best consideration of which we were capable. We reached the conclusion that in order to resolve the difficulties—because there was a clear cleavage of opinion, military and medical—we should have to appoint a board of inquiry in whom the people of Great Britain, including our own military men there, officers and men, and the people of Canada would have complete confidence. I know that the selection of the personnel was approached in that spirit, and in that spirit only, because I myself advised with regard to some of the appointments. We thought it advisable to have a representative of the University of Toronto, a representative of Queen's University, Kingston, and a representative of McGill. The idea was to get a representative board in whom our military men, both officers and troops in Great Britain, would have confidence, and in whom the people of Canada would have confidence. Let us see whom we chose. I do not believe that a better or fairer board could by any possibility have been selected than that presided over by Dr. Baptie.

Mr. MACDONALD: To-day I learned for the first time of those other medical men who were associated with Dr. Bruce. I assume that the minister's statement is accurate in regard to the other men, and that they assume responsibility for his statement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the position is this, that Dr. Bruce made the report, but I believe that some of these other gentlemen assisted him, obtained information for him, and reported to him. Dr. McKeown is a surgeon of high standing, who is connected with St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto. Dr. Wallace Scott is another physician of good standing connected with St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto. I say nothing against the ability of those men; they are well qualified surgeons.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was the direction given to Dr. Bruce merely or to these gentlemen associated with him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To Dr. Bruce.

Mr. MACDONALD: But they joined in the report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know that they joined in the report, but I think that Dr. Bruce made use of their services for the purpose of obtaining information, and no doubt embodied some of their conclusions or findings in his report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it not rather humiliating to think that Dr. Bruce, a man of outstanding ability, having been ordered to investigate, should, after that, have been succeeded by another board to investigate him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am explaining the circumstances which made the appointment of that board absolutely imperative if the Canadian medical service was not to be disorganized. I have explained all the circumstances which prevailed when the board was appointed. The board had to be appointed in order to deal with the acute differences which had arisen, and I want to refer for a moment now to the personnel of this board. I say that if the Government had tried for six months they could not have obtained better names than were obtained for the board which went into this matter at the instance of Sir George Perley and the Government in order to make a report for the purpose of settling these differences which had arisen, to ascertain whether these findings were correct and practicable. Who are the men of that commission? Who is Dr. Fotheringham? He is associate professor of medicine in the University of Toronto.

Mr. MACDONALD: Nobody questions that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Dr. Fotheringham is on one of the medical services of Toronto General Hospital. Dr. Fotheringham is a consulting physician of the highest standing in the city of Toronto. He is a man who has been connected for twenty or thirty years with the militia of Canada, a man of the highest possible standing. You could not select a physician in Toronto to-day who has in greater measure the confidence of the people of that city than has Dr. Fotheringham. So that no question arises as to him. Who is the other? Dr. Ross, of Kingston. The standing of Dr. Ross of Kingston is of the highest. He is a splendid man, a man who has the confidence of the people of Kingston and of Central Ontario, and I believe of most of the members of this House. Who else? Dr. Elder, of Montreal. Hon. gentlemen from Montreal will know him. No one can impeach his standing. I had the pleasure of conversing with Dr. Elder going over from Boulogne to Folkestone. He is the leading surgeon, I believe, at the McGill Hospital at Folkestone, one of the best, if not the greatest hospital that this war has produced. He is the leading surgeon there, and does any one suppose that he would join in a report in which he did not believe? Does any one suppose that Dr. Elder would make a report with regard to the question of Canadian wounded for any ulterior purpose Is there any hon. member who will raise that question against Dr. Elder?

Mr. MACDONALD: No one is raising a question against Dr. Bruce.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am contending that the men on this commission were men of the highest standing.

Mr. MACDONALD: No one is questioning that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The ex-Minister of Militia has spoken, and spoken quite properly, in high terms of General Ashton. Then there was Sir William Baptie.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does my hon. friend think or say that the men on the Baptie Commission were any better than Dr. Bruce and the men who were working with him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At the outset of my remarks I paid as high a tribute as I could to the surgical ability and standing of Dr. Bruce. I said that I had been on an hospital board long enough to know that doctors differ and honestly differ. If I should have any criticism to make of Dr. Bruce, who is a personal friend of my own, it would not be on the ground of any lack of surgical skill, but on the ground that he had not the military experience which some of the men on that Commission had. I have a high opinion of Dr. Bruce's capabilities, and I said at the outset, and I say now, that he made his report under instructions from the Minister and acted in all good faith.

Then we have Sir William Baptie recommended to Sir George Perley by the British medical authorities. No one can challenge his standing. What happened? We have a report upon a report. We have Dr. Bruce's report, and we have a report on Dr. Bruce's report by five of the ablest medical men that could be selected.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have not the reports; that is the trouble.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, we are talking about them.

Mr. GERMAN: We cannot talk about them until we see them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then why are we discussing them? The reports have been made, and I am relating the circumstances under which they were made. Let us look for a moment at the V. A. D. question. I desire to say that Canada is under a debt of gratitude to those women who work late and early without regard to hours in connection with these hospitals. Why did the British authorities utilize these V. A. D. hospitals? It was for this reason, that they have had casualties on a scale undreamt of a year ago. How many beds are in those V. A. D. hospitals? There are 53,000 beds, equivalent to 53 hospitals. The British medical authorities would tell you: "why of course we would rather have military hospitals, but we have to do the best we can, having regard to the exigencies of a situation in which casualties are coming by the tens of thousands when we expected them by the hundreds." They are only too glad to make use of these V. A. D. hospitals with 53,000 beds because they have not sufficient hospital accommodation otherwise. These are the facts.

So far as the Baptie Commission is concerned, I have indicated the condition that existed in London, the controversy in regard to segregation and the strong feeling that was prevalent in the Canadian medical service in connection with the proposals to carry out the recommendations of Dr. Bruce's report. I have told the House the reasons which influenced Sir George Perley in appointing the Baptie Board of Inquiry. I have also informed the House, although most of us are aware, of the high standing of the members of that board. Until the two reports are tabled, it is quite impossible for the House to form its conclusion upon them, but I desire to say that from numerous conversations which I had with men, with officers, with members of the Canadian medical service, with distinguished medical practitioners in London, and with other prominent people there, I am absolutely of the opinion that in no war in the history of the world has there been anything like the high excellence of medical treatment of the soldiers as has been given to the troops of Great Britain and the Dominions overseas in this war. I desire to say this further, that of the hundreds of men with whom I talked in the hospitals which I visited, Canadian soldiers and Canadian nurses, from almost every constituency represented in this House, all spoke in the highest possible terms of the medical and surgical treatment and of the nursing which has been furnished to the wounded, and I came away with a feeling that all was well in connection with the treatment which had been accorded our Canadian soldiers in Great Britain. Further than that, the Canadian soldiers in Great Britain, while they desire to see a large representation of Canadians in the hospitals, in so far as I was able to gather their opinion from conversation, and from hundreds of letters from Canadian soldiers, do not desire segregation. They do not desire that Canadian hospitals should be maintained exclusively for Canadian soldiers. They want a percentage, a large representation, but they certainly do not desire the doors of the hospital to be closed to the soldiers from New Zealand, Australia, Scotland, England or Ireland. They want to talk with these men. They find it interesting to talk with them. I believe that the association of our wounded soldiers with the wounded soldiers from Australia and New Zealand and other parts of the British Empire will make greatly for the promotion of Imperial sentiment.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will this lying alongside of an Australian or a New Zealander in a hospital impart any more of the Imperial spirit to the heart or the soul of a man whose loyalty was staunch enough to impel him to fight for the Empire.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All these influences contribute to the development of Imperial spirit. There is a comradeship which they greatly value. I never saw a soldier who intimated a contrary opinion. They value the comradeship of the men from the British Isles from New Zealand and Australia. They value the comradeship of their own fellow Canadians and they want to be with them but they do not desire that the Canadian hospitals should be wholly for Canadians. I do not wish to labour that point. I repeat, what I said a few moments ago, that the truth in regard to this matter, as it does in so many cases, lies between the two extremes. On the one hand, I think it is a mistake to send Canadians in small groups to remote parts of the United Kingdom, but, on the other hand, I do not believe that Canadian hospitals should be solely for Canadian wounded. You might have a Canadian hospital with a thousand beds and five or six hundred Canadians in it. Are you going to say that the unoccupied beds shall not be available for wounded soldiers from England, New Zealand or Australia?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does Dr. Bruce say that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, he does not say that. I said before the ex-Minister of Militia came in that I did not believe Dr. Bruce had that in mind. I said that the policy which I understood him to put forward was that we should, as far as possible, have our Canadian soldiers in the Canadian hospitals. I think it is unfortunate that this "segration" controversy should have arisen in London. I know that Sir George Perley's view is that the truth lies between the two extremes and I think the matter is now satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that there were two commissions, and each commission, I presume, made recommendations. Will the minister tell me if there was anything done to implement any of the recommendations made by either commission?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand from the Prime Minister, who has had the matter more immediately in charge, that the recommendations of the Baptie Commission are being carried out.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Wherein did the recommendations of the Baptie Commission differ from the recommendations of Colonel Bruce's Commission?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not propose to go into the details of Dr. Bruce's report. The ex-minister was absent during the major part of my remarks this afternoon. I stated among other things that some of the recommendations made by Dr. Bruce were, in the view of the military authorities, impracticable. With reference to the details of the Baptie report, as the matter is not particularly under the jurisdiction of my department, I do not propose to enter into it. I have taken up the time of the House this afternoon because I think it would be unfortunate in the last degree if the impression should be created erroneously in this country that Canadian wounded are not receiving proper treatment in Great Britain. I believe they are. I believe they have been well treated, that they have had the benefit of the highest medical skill and the best nursing possible, and I have never heard a contrary opinion put forward by any soldier or officer either here or in Great Britain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Except by Colonel Bruce.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking of the men with whom I talked.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was Dr. Bruce's promotion recommended by Sir George Perley to the War Office?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand it was the British service that he was recently appointed to, although I am not informed as to the truth of the report to that effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On whose recommendation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There was a newspaper report that Dr. Bruce was to enter the Imperial service to act in the capacity of consulting surgeon in France. I should imagine that Dr. Bruce would be highly qualified for a position of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it not extraordinary, after his having been taken to task by Dr. Baptie, that he should be promoted by the Imperial authorities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think there is anything extraordinary about it. If my hon. friend has had as much experience of physicians and surgeons as I have had, he will know that they differ and honestly differ. You frequently have men of the highest standing and ability who differ, but that does not mean that they are unqualified in their profession. My opinion is that Dr. Bruce would make an excellent consulting surgeon.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I observed in the report which purported to be issued by the Baptie Commission that an "if" came in; that so long as it was decided that the Canadians and the British and others should mix together they did not think they should be segregated. If I remember aright, this report contained a condition that "if" it was decided to keep the Canadians, Australians, and British soldiers together, then they would agree with Dr. Bruce's report, but otherwise they would not agree.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no information as to that.

Mr. WILCOX: It has been reported that my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) made a statement that a soldier who was returning from the front by the name of Private G. Walton, of Windsor, invalided home——was without overcoat or gloves, and had his hands frozen at Quebec. He is being cared for in the London hospital, and his case should receive such attention as will make similar cases impossible.

Then the hon. gentleman continues:—

That is one concrete case, and, I have no doubt, there are hundreds of similar cases.

I desire to say to my hon. friend that, in regard to this statement, I have received the following telegram:—

Windsor, Ont., Feb. 6, 1917.

O. J. Wilcox,
House of Commons.

Re Pardee newspaper story, Private G. Walton frozen hands account; no issue coats and mitts absolutely false; was met by Sportsman Patriotic Assistant Secretary. Writing particulars.

M. G. Campbell,
President.

I simply allude to this fact to show how careful hon. gentlemen ought to be in reading these newspaper trashy reports as actual proof of conditions.

Mr. PARDEE: I simply told the House that I was reading from a newspaper. I did not take it upon myself to say whether it was true or not; I was simply pointing it out.

At six o'clock, the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.—Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 2—payment of $500,000,000 may be made.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is desirable to make any observations that I have to make on this Bill as brief as possible. I did intend to speak upon the resolution; but time did not permit last night, and it was agreed, I understand, that the same discussion could be carried on in committee on the Bill. The field for discussion which this large vote opens up is very inviting, and my sole purpose in addressing you, Sir, at this juncture is to discharge what I regard as a serious duty to my own constituents, in explaining to them the salient points of this Bill. The Bill itself in a concise way sets forth its purpose. It involves the voting of an enormous sum of money, I suppose the largest individual vote that has ever been before the Parliament of Canada; at all events the largest within my memory of any transactions of this kind in this House. The preamble of the Bill says:

Whereas a state of war exists between His Majesty and the German Emperor, the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary, the Sultan of Turkey, and the King of the Bulgarians; and whereas it is necessary that measures be taken for the common defence and security, and to this end it is expedient that aid as hereinafter provided be rendered to His Majesty: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

The second section of the Bill, which is the important one, says:

From and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund there may be paid and applied beyond the ordinary grants of Parliament a sum not exceeding five hundred million dollars towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred by or under the authority of the Governor in Council during the year ending the thirty-first day of March, 1918.

It is important for the people of this country to have some understanding as to what is to be done with this enormous sum of money. The subdivisions of section 2 set out what those different matters are, and as they are all highly important, I desire to refer to them for a few moments. They are:

(a) the defence and security of Canada;
(b) the conduct of naval and military operations in or beyond Canada;
(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry, and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;
(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war; and
(e) payments made for the said purposes during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and seventeen, in excess of the amount authorized by The War Appropriation Act, 1916.

Speaking for my people, I am not finding fault with this vote; far from it. I am heartily in accord with it, and the only advice which I would attempt to submit would be that the money should be applied carefully and properly to the different subjects enumerated in subsection 2 of this Bill. Liberal as I am, and a true follower of a great Liberal leader, I could not be anything other than in entire accord with proper expenditure being made and proper steps being taken by this Parliament and this country in support of the position which we have so proudly taken in this war. Some attempts are being made in certain quarters to show that the Liberal leader and those who follow him are not doing as much as they ought to; that they are not sincere in their support of the Government in war conditions, and, in fact, that the leader of this great party is not in favour of participation in the wars of Great Britain at all. I was particularly struck by an article which appeared a few days ago in a Conservative paper published in the province of Quebec. La Patrie, I understand, is a stout advocate of Tory principles, a paper which is edited by bright, capable, business young men who understand the politics of this country and who are familiar with the history of the different political parties. I feel gratified that they take a proper view of the position of the great Liberal leader in connection with military matters in the Dominion of Canada, and of his judgment and of the judgment of his party in regard to the relations which Canada should have with matters political and matters imperial in the old land. I think it was about the 25th of January last, when party politics in the province of Quebec were at a high temperature, that La Patrie tried to find fault with my great leader and to hold him up as a man who was not in line with the ideas of the Conservative party, because this paper said:

If Sir Wilfrid Laurier were in power should we participate in the present war? Certainly. It was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who first defined this policy of participation in 1897 at the Jubilee of Queen Victoria in London. "When the hour of battle strikes," he said, "light your beacon-fires on the hills, sound your trumpets and Canada will answer your call in sacrificing the best of her blood."

In 1899 for the first time the Canadian Government took part in an Empire war. The Laurier Government sent the contingent to Africa.

In 1910 Laurier brought about the adoption of the Navy Bill, affirming this constitutional truth: "When Britain (England) is at war, Canada is at war." This navy should be Canadian in peace time and Imperial in war time.

It is Sir Wilfrid Laurier who is the sponsor of military Imperialism in Canada.

That is the position taken by the leader whom I am proud to follow, and it is represented in La Patrie, which intended to put this statement forward as an offence to my great leader and as something which would not be acceptable to the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, particularly in regard to the election going on in the county of Dorchester, and this particular quotation was published for the purpose of rendering matters difficult for the candidate of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in that constituency. I say, therefore, that the expenditure of this money, if it is properly expended in support of King and country in connection with the situation in which we find ourselves, is perfectly satisfactory to me as a humble follower of my great leader.

We had an opportunity of hearing eloquent discussions upon the various phases of the management of the war since it commenced down to the present hour, but we did not hear anything from the Treasury benches that would strengthen our confidence in the manner in which war appropriations have been spent in the past I am sorry that in this discussion no evidence has been given either by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Kemp) or the Secretary for War (Mr. McCurdy)—if that be the proper title—of ability or willingness to explain the matters placed in their charge. One Minister of Militia has been dismissed. One would naturally suppose that the reason for that dismissal is that the Prime Minister thought he had not sufficient grasp of the affairs of his department, especially in view of the tremendous responsibility we have undertaken in participating in this desperate struggle now going on in Europe. And in selecting a man to take the place of the Minister whom he dismisses, one would suppose that the Prime Minister, especially as he has such a wide clientele, so to speak, from which to select, would choose a man having at least a fair knowledge of the subject in hand, and ability to give to the House a business presentment of how the money voted by Parliament had been spent, and a reasonable explanation of the plans of proposed expenditure. I have no fault to find personally with the hon. member who has been selected to be

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Minister of Militia. I have sat in this House with him for some years and have always found him a genial gentleman. But I had hoped that when the House met this year he would show some knowledge of the business for which he was selected, and would give a business account of what is being done by the department. I know that the gentleman appointed as Secretary for War—still assuming that to be the proper title—is a business man, and I expected that he would give some business idea of what was being done both upon this side and upon the other side of the water. But to my amazement—and I speak sincerely—I find that both the minister and his lieutenant are as dumb as oysters, and, assuming that they know anything about the affairs in their charge, refuse to share with us their store of knowledge. It does not require great eloquence to give the House a business idea of what expenditures have been made and what the plans for future expenditure in connection with this war may be. It surely is a surprising thing that it should be thought necessary to have a special pleader in the person of the Solicitor General to tell this House what is being done. To me it is always an indication that things are not what they ought to be when the Solicitor General is called in to give a statement to the House—one, as the Shakespearean phrase has it to make the worse appear the better reason. I do not now find fault with the way in which the Solicitor General puts the case; what I say is that it is not his case, it is not his business. A few years ago, we in this country were putting through a big transaction in the Transcontinental railway, and we were scoffed at by the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), then the leader of the Opposition, because, forsooth, we had lawyers on the Commission. He said we had no business to have lawyers handling such matters. He must have changed his mind; because now, even when dealing with military matters; with the making of ammunition; with rifles, and differentiating between one rifle and another, or between one class of ammunition and another; with tactics on a battlefield; this House must pass over the Minister of Militia and the Secretary for War, and must pass over an ex-Minister of Militia as well, and learn from the Solicitor General what is being done in these matters. Surely the Prime Minister will remember how he used to attack us for trusting to lawyers business that he said belonged to Parliament. I want to be honest with myself. Of men who are not specialists in any business that is to be dealt with, the lawyer has as much opportunity of knowing about that business as anybody. For, if he has any practice in the courts, he has to deal with every kind of business, and, while, he is master of no trade, he will know something about a great many.

We are called upon to hand over this huge sum of money to the Governor in Council. Well, we all know who the Governor in Council are. But will any of these hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches say that he knows anything about war matters? I do not think there is one of them who would venture to cast the first stone at the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) if the accusation were that that hon. gentleman did not know enough about military affairs. There is the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). He is a splendid speaker. But because a man is a good speaker it does not follow that he is a good financier or a good business man. If I had any advice to give the hon. Minister of Finance, it would be to pay less attention to the rules of elocution and more to the multiplication table. If I have any weakness about the Minister of Finance it is in thinking too much of him. I suppose that I still have some of the old regard that men always feel for an erring brother, based, I suppose, on the hope that he will complete the circle and some day find his way back to the Liberal fold. Perhaps the Minister of Finance is too easily dissuaded from his purposes. I think it was on the evening of the 30th of last month that the hon. gentleman was speaking when the House rose at six o'clock. At that time he was going strong in a certain direction and talking pretty straight about the ex-Minister of Militia and his manoeuvring in his department.

When he came back after dinner, he saw a great light. Our Saul of Tarsus had become Paul the Apostle, and he had little, if anything, to say against the manipulations of the ex-Minister of Militia. I have a third quotation here, the words of which clearly indicate that they were uttered after dinner. I am not now suggesting that a dinner in Ottawa means very much, or that any reason of that kind resulted in a changed view on the part of the Minister of Finance. However, when he came back he said:

> I repeat that if you take all the nations that are engaged in this war, and have regard to the scale of their operations, the mode of purchase, the administrative acts which have been taken, their financial operations, having regard also to the proportion which must be observed between their operations and ours, in my belief there has been less waste in connection with the administration of the Militia Department and this Government of Canada than in connection with the administration of any other belligerent in the world. I say that not only with regard to the present war but in regard to any war of the past.

That is a most extraordinary statement for the minister to make. The Minister of Finance never went through a war before this one, and I never heard of any book being published which made comparative statements respecting wastefulness in matters connected with war. I am at a loss, therefore, to know how my hon. friend is in a position to say that the conditions prevailing in Canada since the war began have been economically superior to anything that has ever happened since the world began. One would hardly suppose that a careful, cool, calculating mathematician such as the Minister of Finance ought to be would make statements of that kind without having the very best proof to back them up. This statement was made by the Minister of Finance after the ex-Minister of Militia had spoken on the same evening, and no doubt it was with the statement of his expert in mind that the Minister of Finance made this declaration of economy. If hon. gentlemen will refer to Hansard of January 30, page 279, they will find the following:

> Mr. Pugsley: Before my hon. friend leaves that matter, could he say what was the value of the equipment which was thrown away?
> Sir Sam Hughes: I forget; it was millions. We did not look at the value; we were so busy swearing.

That is the evidence upon which the Minister of Finance reached the conclusion that the greatest economy and thrift ever known had been practised—a declaration by the ex-minister that he could not look at figures, never knew anything about the multiplication table—he was too busy swearing. I should not care to go to a jury with evidence of that kind and ask them to give me a verdict according to the evidence. That, Sir, is one reason why I find fault with the Minister of Finance and one reason why I should hesitate, if the case were not as urgent as it is, to put $500,000,000 into his hands to be expended as may be deemed proper by him and those associated with him—for I assume that the counsel of the Minister of Finance will have to prevail in matters affecting the disbursement of this money.

I had intended to quote a few gems from the speeches of the ex-Minister of War. I realize that the ex-minister is not such an authority to-day with my friends opposite as he used to be. I have recollections of seeing during the last five years my distinguished friends across the way making most elaborate salaams to this dignitary, with palms in their hands. But now I observe that only one member on that side of the House pays the slightest attention to the ex-minister, and that is the hon. member for Chateauguay, a gentleman who, I understand, is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling tombstones. This is explained by the old saying: "Where the carcass is, there the eagles will gather". I want to give the Minister of Finance further evidence of the kind of economy that was practised during the five years that the ex-Minister of Militia was in office. I find that the ex-minister, as reported on page 511 of Hansard, after making some extensive observations regarding the wastefulness that he said was being practised on both sides of the water, says:

> This is the way this humbug goes on, up and down.

He says further, on the same page:

> There is no doubt that the world put two and two together. Nobody could know of the conspiracy in my department, and this was part and parcel of the conspiracy from start to finish. And yet these gentlemen are there to-day.

He intimates that while he was in office some men in the department evidently had nothing to do but conspire to defeat him in some of his purposes—laudable purposes, no doubt—and he says that those who were conspiring, are still there. That circumstance is not such as causes me to have great confidence in the administration of the Governor in Council. He says further, speaking about the kind of ammunition that was being made:

> Yes, they are on record.

That is, the nature of the different kinds of ammunition.

> The three brands were defective and no rifle could have fired them. One of them was so deadly that to have sent men to the firing line with it would have been simply murder. We found an ordnance officer attached to Canadian headquarters issuing that ammunition to the extent of 5,000 rounds which were placed in the pouches of one battalion after the blow-up. I have no hesitation in saying that that ordnance officer should have been led out and shot, and if I had been running the show I would have carried that out. I protested, and demanded his dismissal, but he is there yet.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does he mean by calling it a show?

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know, perhaps a sort of zoo he was running, but I do not know what he means by it. It seems there were some parties concerned in the show who did not dance to his pipe, and he certainly finds fault. But this is too serious for me to pass over without calling the Prime Minister's attention to it. There is somebody somewhere for whom the Prime Minister is responsible who was putting ammunition in the pouches and bags of Canadian soldiers, and the giving of that ammunition to them was, according to the ex-minister, equivalent to murder. That is a very serious matter, and I heard no explanation and no contradiction by the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Militia, or the Secretary of War; they have allowed this to go by the board and made no explanation of it at all. If I should be asked by my constituents: Have you consented to giving $500,000,000 to that group of gentlemen to be expended by them? Did you find out if that sort of officer is yet in charge? Is that same officer, who, according to the ex-Minister of Militia, should have been shot, and who he says is still in the employ of the Government, is he yet there and is he still going to have charge of the ammunition to be given to our boys to defend themselves? I cannot say. The hon. gentlemen on the other side are not very communicative. They will not tell us. But this is what the ex-Minister of Militia has said, and we have no reason to suppose that he has said anything but the truth.

He gave us another pathetic statement about the Highland Brigade, and he disclosed the truth, which is really pathetic, about the condition of things which existed in the camp. A good deal of fault has been found in the province from which I come in respect to that Highland Brigade. It was promised, as the ex-minister has said, that these men would be kept together. He says that he had the authority of the Prime Minister in making that statement. On the strength of that statement the very best men that we have in the province of Nova Scotia went out recruiting. I may mention as one Bishop Morrison, of the diocese of Antigonish. Bishop Morrison went out among his people with this promise in his hand, that young men would be kept together, that they would not be broken up, that brothers, relatives, neighbours would be together and it would be a sort of outing for them where they would not be separated. On the strength of that promise he got many Scotch Highland Catholics in Antigonish and all through his diocese to join. What will Bishop Morrison say to-day to the fathers and mothers who come to him and say: Bishop, you promised our boys would be kept together; we took your word for it, and they went out; but now we find that they are broken up, sent hither and thither, and there is no unity in the regiments as you promised. I think the Prime Minister should have some regard for the obligations and the feelings of gentlemen of that class who went forth believing the Government would do what they promised to do and represented to the people that that would be the case; and that certainly the word of the Government, as presented by the Prime Minister, would not be departed from. I am sure that for myself I should be quite willing to take the Prime Minister's word for such a statement, as for almost anything else; but I am sorry to say that his residence in Ontario and his commingling with such people as he associates with does not help him along the lines of stability and veracity. What the ex-Minister of Militia said is this:

When the Highland Brigade of Nova Scotia was organized I felt a little keen in regard to the matter because of what had happened and I took the matter up with the Prime Minister. With his authority I gave my solemn pledge to the officers of the brigade and to the committee that had helped to organize it that it would be kept intact. The Prime Minister may recall that on one occasion he spoke to me about the 58th Battalion. I said, "for heaven's sake let us carry out one pledge which we have made to the people of Nova Scotia."

It was, of course, very pathethic. The ex-minister says: "everything else has gone; we have made thousands of pledges, we have broken them, they are gone, but this one thing, stand by the pledge that you and I gave to the people of Nova Scotia". But no, they did not stand by it, it is gone.

The ex-minister comes to the question of financing again. He calls to account the Prime Minister and others for their system of financing the brigades, and he says that there were more men drilled at Camp Borden, Camp Valcartier and elsewhere in Canada than are being drilled on the other side. Then he says:

Why all this paraphernalia should be introduced in London I have never been able to find out.

The Prime Minister is familiar with our Statutes in Nova Scotia, and he knows that our Probate Act refers to paraphernalia. Paraphernalia is something that is never considered worth mentioning in an inventory and although it is the property of the dead man there is nothing said about it. I do not know whether that is the sort of paraphernalia that the Minister refers to here. However, he does not give any description of it beyond the statement that there is a paraphernalia and that paraphernalia exists in London. He says:

General Carson, with Colonel George Murphy, and thirty-one assistants, ran the business—

That is during his regime.

—and when any hon. gentleman asked for any news of his friends at the front he got an answer within a few days. When any hon. gentleman asked if any one was wounded or wanted a report about any one, he got his answer in a very few days from General Carson. To-day you get nothing. General Carson with only thirty-one officers could keep the work going, train men, and send them to the front and win battles, whereas to-day I am told there are 700 assistants, costing $6,000,000 a year, as the result of the action of the Minister of Finance when he ordered the Prime Minister to appoint an overseas minister; I forget what he was going to do. We find all that saddled on the country, and I presume to-night the Minister of Finance is preaching thrift and economy to the people of Ottawa.

He is, on one hand, squandering the money of the people of Canada, and in his line of talk going around preaching economy. That is what his colleague or the man who was his colleague for the last five years accuses him of. That, sir, to some extent is the testimony upon which the decision of the Minister of Finance is based when he tells this country that there never was in this world (or almost in the world to come) any such high-class economy as was practised in Canada. I find here a letter from the ex-Minister of Militia to the Prime Minister bearing date 13th of May, 1915, which was put on record by himself I am going to quote only a few lines from it. He said:

I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister on May 13, and I presume there is no objection to my reading it. The faults complained in it have been rectified by the War Purchasing Commission, and I think it is in justice to myself that I should place it on record to show the life we had to lead in the Militia Department:

May 13, 1915.

Dear Sir Robert,

Since my return from England last November, I have repeatedly notified you that owing to the interference and plans of the "so-called" sub-committee and to the repeated hold-ups and needless obstructions of some of my colleagues in the affairs of this department, the Contract Branch has been very much hampered and practically blockaded; delays have been very prolonged; the cost has been greatly enhanced and the goods supplied have been, in many cases, inferior. Indeed, the most ardent agents of the German Government—

This is the part to which I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister particularly:

—indeed the most ardent agents of the German Government could scarcely have been more successful in holding up the proper equipment of our forces, had they been in control.

That, Sir, is a tremendous indictment. We are told by the ex-Minister of Militia that even if the most ardent agents of our arch enemy had been in charge of matters in the Militia Department and of the Government, they could not have been more successful in obstructing and blocking our success than those who were in charge. That goes without a reply. It is not for me to say it is not true. I believe if it was not true it would have been contradicted. I notice that the special pleader, the learned counsel, who comes forward to save the ship when there are rocks and breakers in sight, steered clear of this piece of dangerous and hazardous navigation. He did not tell us anything about that. I will be asked by my constituents: were you a party to handing over to the Government $500,000,000, and I will have to admit that I was. I consent to it because, for the present, they are the only power. I will have to plead theology, and say that the power is from the Lord, although the party in power are rather poor representatives in exercising it sometimes. But I will have to say that for the present they are the power, and I will have to plead my theological knowledge in voting them the money in the hope that they will do better things, and that no minister, or any other man who may have inside knowledge of the working of this Government, will ever again be in a position to say that this Government, or a certain wing of it, was more successful in blocking the preparations of war than any agency of the Germans could have been if they had had the matter in hand. I trust that the outgoing of the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) will have the effect of stirring up the Prime Minister and those who support him, and of ensuring that matters will be better handled in the future than they have been in the past.

If we were to go upon the evidence, and if the occasion would permit us to cause any delay in granting the money, I would feel justified in supporting that delay and stopping the supply if that were possible. But the matter is too urgent, and the occasion is too grave and I am sure that the people who sent me here would rather take the grave risks of having the money spent, perhaps recklessly and ineffectively in some regards, than have me for one moment interfere with the voting of the money. I am sure there are many people in my riding who will regard this expenditure as very large. As I said at the beginning it is, so far as I know, the largest vote that ever came before a Canadian Parliament. It involves the payment of $62.50 by every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada, and of $312.50 for every family of five in the Dominion. These are large amounts, but still the cause is worthy, and we are heart and soul behind this thing. We can only hope that we shall get proper value for the expenditure of the money. There must be a landmark from which the Prime Minister can start afresh, turn a new page; and if he cannot turn a new page in everything, he can surely turn a new page in regard to the question of patronage. This is an opportunity for him to start a fresh page in the matter of patronage. I am speaking only about the province of Nova Scotia, for I know very little of what is being done elsewhere. I have told the Prime Minister over and over again, and I take the responsibility of telling him again, that there is not the slightest difference between the expenditure of war money, so far as patronage is concerned, and the expenditure of any other vote that passes this House. It is well known that in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in the Department of Public Works, and in the Department of the Interior, though they have not very much patronage in the Department of the Interior, the expenditure is strictly along party lines and is distributed among party friends and party favourites. I take the responsibility of saying, and I challenge contradiction from any member of this House, or from any one outside of this House, to say that in the province from which I come there is the slightest difference between the expenditure of war moneys that we vote in this way, and other moneys that are voted. I submit to the Prime Minister that this would be a good occasion for him to make a fresh resolution to start anew and spend this money in such a way that nobody can find fault and so that Grit and Tory, saint and sinner, shall have an equal opportunity of giving value for the money which has to be expended.

I have not very much more to say in connection with this matter. I hope that we shall get good returns for this very large expenditure, and that those whom the Prime Minister has called to his council, his Minister of Militia, and his Secretary of War, will take this matter in hand and try to learn something about it. So far, they have not given us the slightest evidence that they knew anything about it at all, and I think it is a pity that we should be called upon to pay handsome salaries to ministers and their secretaries, when we have not the slightest evidence that they are taking any interest in the matter, but, on the contrary, are leaving it entirely to parties outside. I presume we should not expect very much from them this session, but when we meet again after the adjournment I hope that they will have learned something about their departments, and about this business, and that when questions are asked concerning matters pertaining particularly to the War Department we shall get an answer first-hand from the proper source, and not have to take it second-hand from people who are not supposed to know very much about it, and who try to cover up the crevices of their ignorance by the continuous flow of their eloquence.

Before I sit down, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to a case that has been brought to my attention concerning a soldier who enlisted at Windsor, in the province of Nova Scotia. A young man by the name of H. Bruce Hawkins was enlisted by Lieutenant Fielding at Windsor on the 25th September, 1916. He was examined by Dr. Keddy—I presume of Windsor—and passed the examination. Lieutenant Fielding told him that his pay would begin on the day that he was passed by Dr. Keddy. On the 4th October, 1916, he was given transportation to St. John, N.B., on arrival there was examined by a board of examiners, and directed, after he had passed the examination, to join the company of Lieutenant Blair. From there he went to Montreal. Arriving at Montreal, he was again examined by a medical board, passed and put on duty. When pay day arrived he was not paid and the paymaster had no record of his joining the company. He was told that he had been reported by Lieutenant Blair as being in the St. John hospital. That is an extraordinary condition of things. Lieutenant Blair took him to Montreal, passed him over to some other officer and then reported that he was in the hospital in St. John. It was about the 24th October, 1916, that this young man went looking for his pay. Then he was re-examined by a board of examiners who found that there was a small piece of his little finger that was slightly touching on the third finger and for that reason he was discharged and sent back with no clothing except what he had when he left home and without a cent of money. I am informed that he was obliged to pawn his watch in Montreal with a man by the name of Heller, at 217 St. Lawrence street. Hon. gentlemen from Montreal will know whether I am giving a true account or not. Mr. Heller took his watch in security for a little money to take him home. He was obliged to go back home and was not paid for the month or more that he was in the service. He had passed the medical examination three times—first by Dr. Keddy, then by the board at St. John, and then by the board at Montreal. He did everything he could do to enlist, but from the time that he offered himself to the present he has not been paid anything. I just want to draw this to the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Militia in the hope that they will take some steps to do justice to this poor young man and see that he gets the little money that is coming to him for the time during which he served. This information was sent to me and I was asked to bring it to the notice of the minister. I have done so in this way, because, the time being short, I have had no opportunity of calling upon the minister.

Mr. KEMP: Will my hon. friend be good enough to give the name of the battalion in which he enlisted so that we can trace it in that way?

Mr. McKENZIE: I may be able to get that information, but I do not have it in my hands at the present moment. That is all I have to say on that matter . In conclusion, let me express the hope that wise counsels will prevail across the way, that this bickering and fighting, now that the ex-Minister of Militia has gone, will pass away and that we will learn that there are other people in the world who can do something besides the hon. gentleman who has left the Cabinet. Of course, in times of war, I suppose we will be disillusioned in a great many directions. For 4,000 years we have been under the delusion that the Lord had created the heavens and the earth, the firmament and the waters under the earth. Now, we are all disillusioned, because we find that all these things were done by Sir Sam Hughes himself. However, we are learning and we hope that the Prime Minister and the rest of them have not lived in vain with this great man for the last five years.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There were one or two observations made in the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the committee (Mr. McKenzie) that I would like to refer to. With respect to the Nova Scotia Highland Brigade, it would have been a most desirable thing if it could have been kept together overseas. It was my strong desire that that should be done. The officers, I think, were consulted about the arrangements, and I understand that, with the exception of some modification which has been made recently, they were reasonably satisfied that the exigencies of the situation made necessary the course which was adopted. I trust my hon. friend will take into account the fact that conditions at the front may sometimes make it necessary to depart from the course that was intended in the first instance. I think he also realizes how undesirable it would be for persons sitting here in Ottawa to undertake to control the military authorities at the front in respect of such matters. My hon. friend has spoken of the remarks of the Solicitor General with respect to certain matters under discussion, and he seems to have arrived at the conclusion that no lawyer ought to speak on such a subject. I am afraid that my hon. friend and I would both be debarred if that were the case. He also made the observation that a lawyer does not always know what he is talking about. Perhaps in one or two of my hon. friend's observations he was endeavouring to exemplify that truth, because I observed that he was under the impression that the officer of whom the ex-Minister of Militia spoke was in the service of the Canadian Government. I did not so understand it and I think that my hon. friend, if he reads Hansard, will find that he is mistaken. My hon. friend also spoke of the idea that has been more or less current in the press, that a great deal of Canadian equipment has been scrapped or destroyed overseas. Most extravagant, unfortunate and unwarranted statements have been made in that regard, and I took it upon myself some months ago to endeavour to ascertain what the facts were. I think it due to the committee that I should give a summary of what the result of my inquiry was. I am informed, in the first place, as to the general service wagon:—

General Service Wagons (Bain).

All Canadian General Service (Bain) Wagons supplied to the 1st, 2nd, 3rd and 4th Divisions have either gone to the front, or have been retained where found necessary for local transport purposes, in camps or barracks in England. Generally speaking, such wagons have gone to the front, but many are still in use in England, and so far as is known are giving satisfactory results.

That is the information which I received from the responsible officers of the department. Then, in regard to harness, we have heard and read doubtless about the scrapping and destruction of harness overseas of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The memorandum which I have here on that subject is:—

Lumber Harness. This harness has been used in England for local transport purposes both for Canadian and War Office services, in fact, the War Office purchased from the Canadian Ordnance all of the lumber harness that could be spared from the Canadian supplies, paying full price for the same. The purchase of the harness by the War Office might be looked upon as pretty conclusive evidence of the utility of the harness, and that it had not been consigned to the scrap heap.

Saddles. The saddles, supplied to the Canadian troops going overseas, are identical with War Office pattern, and no complaint has ever been received by this department. They were not consigned to the scrap heap.

Then follows the Oliver equipment; but as I am going to read a fuller statement with regard to that, I will pass over it for the moment:

Clothing. All articles of clothing of Canadian manufacture, as supplied to the Chief Ordnance Officer, C.E.F., are taken to the front by units and individuals proceeding on active service.

It is quite untrue that any of the clothing has been scrapped or destroyed, so far as my information goes, and I have endeavoured to get reliable information and I have got it from the officers of the department who are responsible for the statements they make.

Other equipment. All other equipments of Canadian manufacture, embracing wheeled and motor vehicles, harness and saddlery, signalling stores, engineer and artillery technical stores, are considered equal in manufacture to, and in conformity with similar articles of War Office equipment and have gone across to the front with the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Motor trucks. Second Division. The Kelly Motor Truck was considered by the War Office as up to the Imperial standard and has been accepted in exchange for Imperial trucks loaned to the Canadian Forces.

It is true that the motor trucks did not arrive in England in time to equip the Second Division. The trucks for this division were borrowed from the War Office, and replaced by our trucks on their arrival in England. No detention of Second Division in going to France was ocasioned. The Government lost nothing by this, as the trucks supplied by Canada, while just as efficient as the Imperial ones, cost less money.

Motor cars and motor ambulances. These vehicles were accepted by the War Office as efficient and quite suitable for service at the front.

In conjunction with the report made by Col. Hallick on his return to Canada from England, with regard to the equipment mentioned in the statement which I have just read, the following remarks are extracted from a report by Colonel Murphy:

All clothing, underclothing and boots, and all equipment, including transport, vehicles and harness, which are issued to the troops in England, are of Canadian manufacture. For the last nine months I have been carrying on the duties of the Quartermaster General of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and am therefore in a position to make the above statement.

With regard to the Oliver equipment, as there has been a great deal of discussion in the papers, it seems advisable that I should give the report of the responsible officers of the department in that respect, as well as certain information that I have obtained from Sir George Perley, to whom I sent a message by cable on the subject. The memorandum which I am reading is signed by the quartermaster general, Major General D. A. Macdonald, and was enclosed to me by the Minister of Militia a day or two ago. It reads as follows:

Memo for the Information of the Minister.

Re "Oliver" equipment.—The pattern of dismounted equipment authorized for use by the Canadian Militia up to the commencement of the war was known as the "Oliver," which was issued to all dismounted soldiers, and at the commencement of hostilities such of this equipment as was available was collected, issued to the 1st Division, C.E.F., and taken by it to France: it however was replaced subsequently (in 1915) by British "web" and without expense to Canada when it was returned here to be converted and was taken into further use. This was the same equipment as was issued to the Canadian troops who served in South Africa.

The mobilization of the 2nd Division and reinforcements for both the 1st and 2nd Divisions, up to a maximum of 108,000 men followed rapidly and for this number (108,000) ninety-seven thousand sets of "Oliver" equipment had been provided for in the fall of 1914, as follows:

Aug.....	30,000	sets for	1st Division C.E.F.
Sept....	2,000	" "	additional units for 1st Division.
Sept....	35,000	" "	reinforcements.
Oct.....	30,000	" "	2nd Division, C.E.F.
Total....	97,000

But as in January, 1915, the G.O.C. Canadians, England, reported that "Oliver" equipment was not as satisfactory as the War Office web equipment, steps were taken immediately to provide for the conversion of the "Oliver" equipment to a "Valise" equipment, approximating as closely as possible the War Office pattern. At this time it was not possible to obtain the War Office web equipment either in Canada or elsewhere, as the War Office was unable to meet its own necessities.

Some time in February, 1915, the honourable the Minister (Sir Sam Hughes) conducted a demonstration for Militia Council, of four patterns of dismounted equipment, viz.—

(1) "Oliver" equipment.
(2) "Oliver" equipment converted (as referred to above).
(3) War Office "Web".
(4) War Office leather.

at which it was decided to proceed with the conversion of such "Oliver" equipment as was possible.

Subsequently it was ascertained that the 2nd Division had had its converted "Oliver" equipment replaced by "web" when going to the front, and as more equipment was required for the C.E.F. on increase of establishment, a pattern of equipment, which it was considered would be acceptable to the War Office as suitable for service in the field and producible in Canada was given consideration.

A pattern known as "1916 dismounted equipment" was adopted late in the year 1915 and was issued to all C.E.F. in Canada; very many battalions trained with it in Canada and on the whole it proved satisfactory. When the 4th Division, C.E.F., left England for the front it was in possession of this equipment, but later War Office "web" was issued to replace it, without expense to the Canadian public, the reason of the G.O.C. in Chief B.E.F., being as below:—

'That though the Canadian equipment was made of excellent material it did not give the same measure of comfort on the march as the "web" and was less suitable for carrying ammunition in charger clips.

That the "gas helmet" could not be tucked away under the soldier's jacket collar properly or rapidly owing to the wide strap which fits close on the shoulders.'

In conclusion it might be said that when the war commenced the department had no other equipment to issue the men and that as War Office could not meet its own necessities then, or during the following 18 months for the continually expanding British army, "web" could not be obtained for the C.E.F., as it has never been made in Canada. Further, that though the Canadian equipment has not had much use in the field for war purposes, the whole that has been purchased has had hard and constant use for training purposes, and at this moment is continued in use in England and Canada until the men are placed under orders as reinforcements for the front, when it is replaced by "web" to accustom the men to its use. That the Canadian equipment issued to the overseas units when leaving Canada had on their arrival in England been scrapped or otherwise destroyed is without foundation in fact.

(Sgd.) D. A. Macdonald,
Major-General, Quartermaster-General.

Then I asked Sir George Perley for a statement, and he has given me the following statement in a cable message under date of the 31st of January, 1917:

London, Jan. 31, 1917.

Statements that Canadian leather equipment has been burned on arrival in England are absurd and untrue. Oliver equipment with which First Division proceeded to France was subsequently replaced here without expense to Canadian public and it was returned to Canada early in 1915 for use there. Converted Oliver equipment with which Second Division was equipped was replaced before going to France and later returned to Canada for further service. 1916 Canadian leather equipment with which Fourth Division proceeded to France was eventually replaced by web equipment without expense to Canadian public. Large number of troops in training in England use Canadian leather equipment. Sufficient web equipment is now being supplied troops in training in England to enable reinforcements to proceed overseas with acceptable equipment properly adjusted.

It seemed to me desirable that I should make that statement to the committee.

With respect to certain other matters which have been raised, I might say that the Second contingent was authorized by order in council of November 7, 1914. The despatch of that contingent to England commenced on the 10th of April, 1915, and was completed on the 9th of August of that year. The number of ships required was twenty-one, and the total numbers that went forward in the contingent were: officers 930, other ranks 21,640, total 22,570. I am further informed, by memorandum placed in my hands by the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, that the contingent was despatched to England as soon as accommodation and transports were available. I am informed that this contingent went to the front on September 13, 1915.

I have already explained that the motor trucks with which this contingent was equipped were loaned for the time being from the War Office. I have here a memorandum on the purchase of these motor trucks which I desire to read:

The purchase of motor trucks was authorized by order in council dated 15th December, 1914; —50 trucks from the Kelly-Springfield Company, Springfield, Ohio; 50 trucks from the Packard, Detroit, Michigan; and 50 trucks from the White Company, Cleveland, Ohio. One of the terms of the order in council was that if any of these firms failed to accept the order under the conditions named in the order in council, the portion of the order allotted to such firms should be distributed among the others accepting the conditions price: list price, less 20 per cent. discount f.o.b. place of manufacture. It was a further condition of the order that each firm representing any truck purchased should agree to have made in Canada such portions of the bodies and tire work as could be done in this country. Orders were placed in Canada by telegram for the bodies on 17th December, 1914, and for the tires on December 18th, 1914. The order for the chassis was delayed owing to the desire of the Prime Minister to institute certain inquiries in regard to the reliability of the Kelly-Springfield motor. On 5th January, 1915, the Prime Minister instructed to proceed with placing the order, and on the 15th of that month the firms named in the order in council were asked by wire to supply the trucks.

I interrupt the memorandum to say that a question had been raised as to the durability and reliability of the Kelly-Springfield motor, and it seemed to me desirable that the doubt should be absolutely cleared up before we should proceed to give an order. For that reason there was a delay during which I undertook to satisfy myself on that point. It eventually proved that the motor was entirely serviceable. The memorandum continues:

The Kelly-Springfield Company accepted immediately and the contract was made on the 16th January. The White Company offered only twenty per cent. f.o.b. Cleveland, and the Packard Company did not close within the period specified for acceptance, viz.: one week. The balance of the order was accordingly given to the Kelly-Springfield Company, who completed the entire delivery of the chassis by 19th February, 1915.

My recollection of the exact terms of the order is that we insisted that the various companies from whom these motor trucks were to be purchased should give a price to the Government based on a deduction of the commission which they allowed to their agents. As we were ordering direct, we thought the Government was entitled to a deduction equal to the commission ordinarily paid. The memorandum proceeds:

Owing, however, to the bodies originally ordered not fitting, and fresh bodies having to be made, the motor trucks did not arrive in England in time to equip the Second Division. But the Second Division was not delayed in proceeding overseas or in going to France by reason thereof. The trucks for this division were borrowed from the War Office and replaced by our trucks on their arrival in England. The Government lost nothing by their exchange with the War Office, as the trucks supplied by Canada, while just as efficient as the Imperial, cost less money.

There is another matter upon which I desire to give the committee some information, as the question is raised by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). He spoke of the response to the National Service card. On the 2nd instant, I procured from the Secretary of the National Service Board a statement as to the number of cards which had been received up to that time. He informs me that the estimate of National Service cards received to that date was 1,350,220, and that the cards were still being received at the rate of about 40,000 per day.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): The right hon. gentleman who leads the House has told us that there have been a lot of wrong statements regarding the scrapping of articles of war equipment purchased in Canada and taken overseas. So far as this House is concerned, the information that we get in this matter is from the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). He more than any one else has stated that articles purchased in this country have been scrapped. So, if anything has been wrongly stated, it comes from a former colleague of the right hon. Prime Minister. And I can hardly suppose that the ex-Minister of Militia has made such erroneous statements as would appear from the statements read by the Prime Minister. But that will be a question for investigation later on. At present, we are asked to appropriate $500,000,000 to be handed over to this Government to expend at their own sweet will. This is an amount which would have staggered the imagination of Canadians a few years ago —a very few years ago. To-day, we feel that we are strong enough financially to stand expenditure of this kind. But it is our duty, and the people of the country will see to it that we are held responsible for the performance of that duty, to see to it that this money is properly expended. There has been some discussion in the press of the formation of a national government. If anything would induce me to believe that the time was ripe for a national government, it would be the fact that we are asked to hand over $500,000,000 to the Government now in power. Consider the statements that have been made by ministers of the Crown themselves. Judging by what the ex-Minister of Militia has said, it would appear that for months, yes for years, he in his department was surrounded by what a former Prime Minister of Canada called, a nest of traitors. The Minister of Finance rises in his place in this House and states that expenditures made by the ex-Minister of Militia, when he was in office, were extravagant expenditures. He instanced one very large item, the expenditure on shovels I wonder if they were scrapped? I think that about $50,000 or $60,000 was paid out for shovels. The Minister of Finance admits that that was an extravagant expenditure, and he intimates, if he does not state it as a fact, that other extravagant expenditures were made in that department, and that in order to protect himself and, as far as he could, safeguard the treasury, he found it necessary to write a letter to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, in his letter to the ex-Minister of Militia, states that his time for several months was taken up with settling quarrels and differences between the ex-minister and other members of the Cabinet. To hand over to this Government on their own demand the enormous sum of $500,000,000, to be expended without our having any further information than we have now, is a rather hard proposal to put before the people's representatives.

The discussion this afternoon started on the report of Dr. Bruce. I would not assert that the Prime Minister would endeavour to mislead the House or the country, but his statement regarding Dr. Bruce's report was certainly a misleading one. It misled me, and I venture to say that it would mislead the people. The Prime Minister asserted very emphatically that he would not discuss Dr. Bruce's report until it was laid on the table of the House—indeed, that, until it should be laid on the table, the report should not be generally discussed. He said further that he had cabled to London for copies of the report and that about forty copies would very shortly be available for distribution. From that one would infer that the report had been published in England but had never come to this country. However, in answer to a question that I put this afternoon, we have been informed by the ex-Minister of Militia that Dr. Bruce's report had been sent to him in September last and has been in the possession of the Government since that time. An order of the House has been passed for the production of this report, and I cannot understand either why the Department of Militia has not produced it or why the Prime Minister has not seen that it was produced. The subsequent report is also in the department, and I think the Government is very much to blame for misleading the House and the country, even if not intentionally, by giving the impression that that report is not available, whereas it is in their own possession.

I quite understand that it is very much easier to sit outside and criticise what is being done within than to sit inside and improve what is being done. It is not difficult to criticise, but it may be difficult to administer the various departments in a time like this. Certain matters, however, can and should be very considerably improved. The House will adjourn, supposedly tomorrow. The Government have established a National Service Commission, ostensibly in order to ascertain what can be done further in the way of recruiting; but they do not deign to tell us what definite action they purpose taking in the matter of recruiting. Recruiting is practically at a standstill. On Sunday, January 21, a recruiting campaign was begun in the town of Welland in order to get recruits for the 176th Battalion. The town and the county of Welland and the whole Niagara district have done admirably in the matter of recruiting. This district has made a splendid record for itself. Diligent and intelligent work in connection with this recruiting campaign was carried on for a week, with the result that only three recruits were obtained. There are a large number of men in that town and throughout the county who could go to the front. Why do they not go? I will tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia why they do not go. There are in Canada thousands of militiamen who have volunteered for overseas service—they may be found at Niagara Falls, St. Catharines and other points. These men are officered by men who are drawing their pay simply for the sake of drawing it; who have no intention of going to the front, and who would not be allowed to go to the front even if they went to England. The young men in that district and throughout Canada generally know this, and they say: if men are needed, why do they not send the men that they have? The Colonel of the 176th battalion, who is a Conservative, representing the county of Welland in the local Legislature, made a statement along these lines at a recruiting meeting: The press report says:

> The commander of the 176th explained that he had brought 623 from Camp Borden to Niagara Falls and had since taken on 125 men, but owing to discharges for medical unfitness and desertions the strength of the battalion was only 648.

Or only 25 more than they had when they came from Camp Borden. One hundred men had deserted or been discharged for unfitness. At the city of St. Catharines they have the 213th Battalion, which, for some unknown reason, is called the American Legion. This battalion has a full complement of officers—colonel, majors and captains—men who will not go to the front and who cannot go even if they want to; and the battalion has only about 213 men. The number may be even less, because I was told on excellent authority that the men were deserting. Then there is the 176th, also with a full complement of officers and 600 men. There you have two battalions and two sets of officers, but scarcely enough men altogether to make up one battalion. Is that a situation which would appeal to the young men throughout the locality as being satisfactory? Is it not rather discouraging? If that is the prevailing situation throughout this country, that we have numbers of battalions in different localities one-half or less than one-half strength but with a full complement of officers, it being known that these officers will not go to the front and that they are drawing pay, why, in all reason and sensibleness, does not the Government bulk these men and send to the front all men who are fit to go? They want to go, they are appealing to be allowed to go. They do not want to stay here with the training they have had. Why does not the Government send the men to the front where they wish to go and where they can be of some use, and discharge these officers who are drawing pay? Then you would have some encouragement among the young men of this country to join the colours. I should like to know from the Minister of Militia, and I wish he would tell this House, how many colonels and majors and captains there are in London at this hour drawing pay who are not on actual active service, who will not and cannot go to the front. I know some, and a friend of mine who came from London only a few weeks ago, a very reputable gentleman, says that these officers who will not go to the front are having a high time, living at the Carlton and the Savoy at the country's expense. I believe they cannot go to the front, in the first place because they are not qualified, and in the next place because there are no positions for them in the capacity of colonel, major or captain. Now I say that condition of affairs is what is destroying recruiting in this country. I know it, because I have spoken to young men about recruiting. I belong to the recruiting committee in the county of Welland, and we have worked energetically to secure recruits for these battalions. You cannot do it. Young men say when you ask them: Why do they not take the men they have and discharge the officers who are not qualified to fill the positions, men who have had no military training, men who never were in camp, but who are simply boosted into these positions—I will not say for political reasons, at least not on the part of the Government, but through local political reasons—boosted into these positions which they are not fitted to fill, men who never intend to go to the front but who are drawing the pay of a colonel, a major or a captain, although they are doing no service to the country? Why should the people's money be thus squandered in this time of stress, at a time when we are asked to vote $500,000,000? I trust that that money will not continue to be expended in that sort of way for any very lengthy period. The Prime Minister stated in his remarks in this House on the 22nd of January that he had enlisted 434,529 men.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say we had enlisted that many; I detailed how it was made up.

Mr. GERMAN: Enlisted for overseas 392,647; actual militia called out and under orders, 9,052. The right hon. gentleman gave the details, but it totalled 434,529. Now let us see what has become of them. There went overseas to December 31, 280,562. For other services there were about 30,000, making altogether 310,522, the total who left Canada. There were serving in Canada 48,312; actual militia on guard duty, 9,052; permanent force 2,470, or a total in Canada of 58,824, making a grand total of 370,746. According to the Prime Minister, there were on duty in Canada a total number, as specified by him, of 434,529; and of these 370,746 are accounted for. But there are 63,773 who are not accounted for. Where are they? I should like to know. I should like the Minister of Militia to explain the 63,773 men who are not accounted for according to the Prime Minister's statement. But he says there are 280,562 who went overseas up to December 31. What has become of them? He tells us that there are at the front 110,000; that there are under orders for the front 10,000; and on sundry services in England 17,383; total casualties, including those who have been returned, 71,263, making a total of 209,646. There were 280,562 who went overseas. There are only 209,646 accounted for, and so there are 70,916 not accounted for. Where are they? Does the Department of Militia know where they are? Does the minister know where they are? There is a total of 134,689 men in Canada and overseas who are unaccounted for and as to whom the Minister of Militia gives no information. So that instead of there being for actual service 434,529, there are only something less than 300,000. It seems to me that that is a condition of affairs which is interfering with recruiting in this country. It is the serious interference with recruiting. The two factors to my mind which are most prominent in causing depression in recruiting are these: that the men are kept here not on service, and that they have a large number of officers who will not go to the front, who it is known do not intend to go to the front, and who are deriving pay from the Government simply as officers, being practically on a holiday. Those are conditions which should be and must be rectified if there is to be any effective service in the future. Whether or not conscription is to be resorted to, I do not know, but something must be done to bring about a different condition of affairs than exists at present, and I am confident that if the Militia Department would go at this recruiting matter as a business enterprise, with the proper sort of energy, they could get all the men they would require.

It is said that the ex-Minister of Militia was a very energetic man. So he was. He claims credit for having recruited all the forces that were recruited. Well, at the time of the breaking out of this war, the men were all anxious to go, whether we had a Minister of Militia or not, the men would have joined the forces. They were anxious to join. It did not require the energy of the Minister of Militia—and he has great energy; it did not require the intelligence of the Government, to bring about recruiting in those days. But now has come a time when it requires some active intelligence to bring about recruiting in Canada, and the first thing, to my mind, which the Department of Militia should do to secure further recruits is to send to the front every man in Canada who is wearing a uniform and who is fit to go to the front, and to discharge every officer, to put him off the payroll, who is not fitted to go to the front and who will not go to the front. If you do that you will create a condition of confidence in the country, you will create a condition of affairs which will make not only for the well being of the country, but for the general enlistment of further recruits throughout. Canada. The National service system which has been adopted may be of some use, but I doubt it very much. Speaking for myself, I have not the slightest confidence that it will produce good results. The National Service cards have been sent out. Some of them will be answered, but what possible effect will they have, so far as recruiting is concerned, and, to my mind, recruiting is the supreme interest at the present time. So far as work at home is concerned, we must look for results in a different way. I believe it would have been better to have put the matter altogether in the hands of the municipalities instead of sending out these National Service cards. It would have been better to have put the matter in the hands of the authorities in each municipality, and called on them to make a return to the Government of every available man in that municipality, stating for what purpose he was available. You would have got the returns and got them quickly, and you would have got them without frightening a large number of people into leaving the country out of fear of conscription. You would have got a better report. You could have had committees formed in each county who would look into the requirements of each district, and you would have got, by that means, a result which would have been of far greater benefit than that which is likely to be derived from the National Service Commission.

I do not wish to take up the time of this committee further, but I do feel that the Government have been, if not negligent, at any rate unwise in their system of recruiting. I think they are unwise at the present time, and that they will fail to get recruits unless they change the system which they have adopted, and carried out up to the present time. Change that system, dismiss the officers who are drawing pay and who are of no use, send to the front the men who want to go there, and you will have no difficulty in getting recruits to fill up the ranks in the future.

Hon. Mr. KEMP: I wish to say just a word in regard to one matter referred to in the speech of my hon. friend from Welland, that is in regard to the battalions which are under strength at the present time. My hon. friend referred to two battalions that are under strength, one in the county of Lincoln, and the other in the county of Welland, one having between 600 and 700 men, and the other being of lesser strength.

Mr. GERMAN: 200.

Mr. KEMP: Over 200, I think. It is all very fine at this stage of the game to say that the mode of recruiting is wrong. We decided when the war broke out, and I think the country approved of it, that the best mode of raising recruits was by the battalion method, and that method was pursued. It was the only course, I think, that should have been pursued, and it has been followed and has been a success. Nearly 400,000 men have joined the forces through that system. Recruiting has now fallen off, and there are a number of battalions which are only partially filled. These battalions are being consolidated in some instances, and in other instances are being sent overseas in drafts. My hon. friend asks: Why don't you get all these troops out of the country, irrespective of the regiments that are under strength? But the battalions are not only under strength in the counties of Lincoln and Welland; they are under strength in many places throughout the country. We are sending troops out of the country at the present time.

Mr. GERMAN: Why does the minister not unite these battalions that are under strength and make one battalion up to full strength, and so do away with these surplus officers?

Mr. KEMP: I have just informed my hon. friend that that is exactly what we are doing as fast as we can. The reason they are not going out of the country at once is two-fold. One reason is that the British Government has told us that they have no shelter for any more troops than the number that they wish us to send over during the winter months. The other reason is that the Admiralty is not able to furnish transports for the conveyance of the troops. But there are a good many troops going over every month. We are sending exactly the number that the British Government want us to send during these months. I repeat that the regiments under strength are being consolidated in some cases, and that in others they are going over in drafts.

It seems to me that my hon. friend reflects to some extent upon the officers of the forces, that have gone over. All the officers to whom he refers were not in employment in England or at the front. Some of my colleagues have been on the other side recently and they know more about that than I do. They know about the number of senior officers who are in that position at the other side at the present time. But there is a very good explanation.

Mr. GERMAN: Why do you not bring them home?

Mr. KEMP: We will see about that in a minute. So far as the officers in this country are concerned, there are many who have done splendid service in recruiting, but who are not fit to go to the front, and who perhaps did not intend to go to the front. But they have done their bit in recruiting. They are not military men, but they have done all they could do to serve the Empire in getting battalions together. Recently they have not been so successful, because recruiting has fallen off. These men have done the best they could do, and they will revert to civil life as soon as possible. In the regiments to which my hon. friend referred, although one is only 600 or 700 strong, it is necessary to have colonels and majors in the meantime. We cannot get along without officers for these regiments. As I said, these regiments are being consolidated, and they are being sent to England at the present time in accordance with the instructions which we receive from the British Government as to the number of troops they can accommodate during the winter months. They are being sent as fast as the British Admiralty can send us transports. They are not going over as fast as at other times, but they are being sent at the rate of 7,000, 8,000 and 9,000 a month. When the spring comes, the course that I have outlined in respect to sending them over will be followed. As I said, the men who are not fit to go to the front will revert to civil life, and they will be taken off the pay-list. They will willingly go off the pay-roll. There are many officers in this country who have done good work, and who did not have to be taken off the pay-list, because when they finished their work, they sent in their resignations and asked to be relieved. That is what is being done. I do not think that my hon. friend could name any man who has engaged in this work from a selfish motive. They have done their duty, and for the most part they have done it well and patriotically.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am loth to prolong this discussion, but I feel that I cannot retain my seat and listen in silence to the remarks of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) with respect to many brave officers at present in the United Kingdom. It is easy to say that Canadian officers in the United Kingdom should either be sent to the front or sent home. That may sound very well, but the matter should be looked into a little more carefully before my hon. friend makes reflections upon as brave a body of Canadian officers wearing the King's uniform as there are in Great Britain to-day. It is not well that any hon. member of this House should generalize with respect to men who have raised battalions in this country, men who have gone to personal expense, who have spent their time, given their services freely, and faced the perils of an Atlantic voyage to take their men across; men who desired to get to the front but who are unable to get there because the positions are filled which they would be glad to occupy. I have had dozens, yes, scores of officers in Great Britain come to me and say: "We want to get to the front; cannot you get us there?" The reason why they cannot get to the front is perfectly obvious. There are a certain number of officers in command of the men at the front. I discussed this very matter with Sir Julian Byng, I asked Sir Julian Byng whether it would not be possible to get more of the Canadian officers in Great Britain who are willing and anxious to go to the front, who plead to be allowed to go to the front, and his answer was: "We have officers in charge of the men in the trenches who have been here for months, some of them for a year, and some of them for two years; they are experienced officers; I do not care how capable the officers may be who are in England, if I substituted these officers for the men who are actually trained in the trenches, it would mean casualties." That was his answer and that is the answer that appeals to any one's common sense. He was quite willing that men should go over there as supernumeraries, and if qualified should, as vacancies occurred take their places in charge of the battalions in the trenches; but it is manifestly unfair to say that the Canadian officers who are in London to-day, who have qualified themselves by training and who are anxious to go to the front should either be sent there, when as a matter of fact there is no place for them, or be discharged and sent back to Canada.

Supposing that policy had been followed from the beginning, what would have been the result? There is many an officer in his grave to-day who waited for six or nine months in London before he had an opportunity to go to the front, the opportunity which he longed for. There are Canadian officers in London to-day anxious to go to the front, pleading to be allowed to go, and who will get their chance when there is a vacancy. Take the case that was brought repeatedly to my attention in England; take the case of a colonel, some prominent man who spent months of his time in one of the constituencies represented in this House recruiting a regiment. His personal weight and influence had much to do with the success of recruiting that regiment. I know of cases in which the colonel had everything to do with the recruiting, not because of his military ability, but because of his personality, his weight and influence in the community. That man recruited his battalion and when he had recruited it to strength it went overseas. He accompanied it. Let us assume for a moment that for some reason he is not qualified to go to the front; does any one in this House begrudge that man the opportunity of going overseas with his force even if he has to return without going to the front? We all know what public opinion is. We know that the colonel who has recruited his battalion in a county practically must accompany his men to Great Britain. He must go over or else he will come in for a great deal of personal criticism that is decidedly objectionable. That is what has gone on. They go overseas. Many are qualified to go to the front. As positions become vacant which they can fill they are allocated to those positions, but until these positions become vacant obviously those qualified men have to wait for them and if they are not qualified they will be returned to Canada in due course. I hope I misunderstood the hon. member for Welland when he spoke about the men in the hotels in London. These men have recruited battalions here, they have gone to London and they are waiting their opportunity to go to the front. It is manifestly unfair—and I refrain from using a stronger expression—to cast any aspersion on the courage of these men.

Mr. GERMAN: How many are over there now?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know.

Mr. GERMAN: Does the Department of Militia know?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They probably could tell my hon. friend, but it makes no difference how many are there; they have recruited their regiments, gone over there in good faith; they are ready to go to the front when the opportunity does come, and they are waiting for the opportunity to come. Let us look into that further. Look at the Canadian casualties. Is there any man in this House who expected that the Canadian casualties would be on the scale they have been? What is the reason for the breaking up of battalions when they go over to Great Britain? The reason is the casualties which have taken place at the front and the need for reinforcements. If there had not been these casualties in the Canadian force we would have been able to maintain four or five divisions at the front. But on account of these casualties Canada has not been able to maintain four or five divisions at the front, and these regiments that have been sent forward have had to be broken up and the officers separated from their commands. Instead of there being criticism of these officers there should be the very opposite of criticism. These men feel it; they are cut to the heart when their regiments are necessarily broken up by reason of military exigencies. They do not want to be separated from their regiments, and most of them—I do not say all of them, but I have no information to the contrary—desire the first opportunity of going to the front. If there was anything I discovered amongst the men and officers wearing the Canadian uniform in London it was their intense desire to go to the front.

10 p.m.

Mr. GERMAN: Is there any thing to prevent them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of course.

Mr. GERMAN: Why cannot they go as privates? There are colonels who are no better than lots of privates in the ranks.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That sounds very specious. A man who is quite competent to act as a colonel might not be quite as competent to act as a private. He might be of an age at which he might be quite competent to command men and yet not competent to take his place as a private in the trenches. It is unfair to the gallant body of men in London to cast any such reflections upon their patriotism or courage as that which has been cast upon them by the hon. member for Welland.

Mr. GERMAN: I did not intend to impeach the courage or cast any reflection on any of the brave officers in London. I did not intend to do any such thing but I say that there are officers in London drawing pay who cannot go to the front, who will not go to the front, and whom it is the duty of this Government to return to Canada. Are they to be kept over there? If so, for how long? They have been there for months and some of them for a year or more. I have had something to do with recruiting in the section from which I come and I and others in my locality who are not in the Militia force know a good deal about recruiting. We think that we know something about the military situation as well as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. This is one of the things that is interfering with recruiting in Canada. There ought to be a remedy and there is one. Are these men to stay there until the end of the war? The Minister of Finance has just told us that he could not send these Canadian officers to the front as colonels, majors and captains because they have officers in the trenches who are more capable. They have officers in the trenches who enlisted as privates and who have gained their rank for brave deeds in the trenches and they are filling the place of lieutenants, and captains by promoting men from the ranks. So they should, instead of sending over men who have had no experience in the trenches, and placing them as colonels and captains over men who are just as good as they are, who have enlisted as privates and who have fought the battles of the country from the beginning. Are they to be supplanted by newcomers without trench experience? Certainly not. They should be rewarded by receiving the positions which become vacant when casualties occur in the superior ranks. These are the men who should be promoted. The hon. gentleman speaks very speciously of the officers there. I have not a word to say of the officers over there as men. I am perfectly willing that a colonel should go over with his regiment.

Should he stay there for six months and receive pay for doing nothing at this particular time when we are voting $500,000,000 for this war, and when the Minister of Finance is asking for $100,000,000 of a war loan? Is that a time when men should stay in London under pay, doing nothing, waiting for an opportunity to go to the front, forsooth! when my hon. friend knows as well as I know, and as the Minister of Militia and the ex-Minister of Militia knows, that these men will never go to the front in the capacity of colonel or major in which they went over to England, because those positions will be filled by the men who are promoted and who are fighting the battles in the trenches?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): Mr. Chairman, there is poison gas disseminated in connection with this war from other quarters than the trenches in the German line, and there is sniping equally as disastrous to the cause of the war as that of the German sharpshooters. I am one of those colonels, commanding officers, of whom the hon. gentlemen who act the part of political snipers in Canada speak so contemptuously in this House and through their press. I think it is well that there is one of those commanding officers present from London to answer face to face some of those who have just as much right to be over there as we have had, but who content themselves with discouraging the public men of Canada who do attempt to set an example to so many others in Canada who might be serving their country, but who decline to do so. One feels almost ashamed to discuss service to one's country from the low standpoint of pay; but as a commanding officer who did not put on his uniform because of any pay attached to it, I would like to say that in the office which I carry on at home, and from which a large proportion of the staff have gone to serve our country, from the manager down to the printer's devil, the average pay of the workmen in that office is the pay that a commanding officer in the Canadian Militia receives for commanding a regiment. I hope that is sufficient illustration to convey to the intelligence of some of those hon. gentlemen to whom the pay of a commanding officer looms so large, that possibly there is some other incentive than to receive the same pay as scores of his own staff that impels him to put on the uniform.

I would like to cite my case as an example of what does prompt a member of Parliament to offer his services at the front. At a certain stage in recruiting in Canada, the then Minister of Militia called for 100,000 additional troops. We have about 100 infantry battalions in Canada, so that meant an overseas battalion, in addition to those already raised, from each of the infantry battalions in this country. As I had the honour at that time of commanding an infantry regiment in Canada, I felt that it was an appeal to me to raise an overseas battalion, and I promptly volunteered to do it and I did do it.

As the Minister of Finance has said, the personal influence of a commanding officer had a great deal to do at that time in securing recruits. I feel quite sure that the fact that I had the honourable position of a member of the House of Commons gave me a great leverage in going about through my district and asking the young men of Westminster district—not to go to the front, but to come to the front with me. I may say to the hon. gentleman who says that the commanding officers might go as privates that I will forestall his objection by telling him that when I was of the age at which men do go as privates, I went to the front as a private in the service of my country. I am not of that age now and I could not go as a private nor as a lieutenant. If I volunteered I would not be accepted. But I did raise a very fine battalion in my district because of my personal appeals, and, if I do say it, because of what little prestige I have in that district.

Under ordinary circumstances I and my battalion might very well have gone to the front as a unit. It was our desire. Many a political enemy at home—because we have a few snipers there, although in the West they do not flourish—has caused it to be asked of me on the platform or elsewhere: "Are you going to the front yourself"?—the imputation being that I was doing a grandstand play. I answered them honestly and truthfully that it was my desire and my intention to go to the front. My battalion arrived in England with thirteen others in a convoy, a total of 14,000 troops, immediately after the terrible experience on the Somme. The Canadian Headquarters in London were confronted then with a demand for the immediate services of about 19,000 men to replace the casualties which had just occurred, and it was our fortune when we arrived in England, to be selected as some of those reinforcements which were immediately sent. I think all the battalions in that convoy except two were drafted for that purpose. My battalion sent 400 men to the trenches within two weeks of our arrival in England, 100 a week later, and since then they have been going continuously. Now then, which is the more glorious, which is the more to be commended in a commanding officer, that, being met with a demand there to send men into the fighting line and having recruited men for the fighting line, he should say: "I have brought these men to fight and they are at your service"; or that he should come to his political headquarters, if he has any political standing, and say: "Do not send these men to fight, but leave them with me for my honour and glory so that I may go forward as a commanding officer"? What would the hon. gentlemen have said if it had turned out that I was asked to send 500 men immediately to the trenches and I said: "Do not do that; what position do you put me in; if you send those, I cannot go?" And why could I not go? Because the regiment most calling for men at that time was one from my very own district, the 47th Westminster Battalion straight from the Somme, 400 shy, including in the ranks of officers twelve out of my own home regiment, including hundreds of men the every day associates of those whom I had brought over. What more natural than that my 400 should go to their own neighbours from Westminster, to their own officers of their old regiment? And why could not the Colonel go? Because —greatly to the disappointment, seemingly, of these gentlemen opposite—Colonel Winsby, of the 47th, had not been shot; Major Coote second in command, of the 47th, and Major in my regiment at home, had not been shot. They remained in command. Therefore, Colonel Taylor and Major Cunningham of the recently-arrived regiment were not able to go to the front. What would the hon. gentleman have? Am I to be condemned by him and those like him because I took a battalion to England? Am I to be condemned because, having sent my men into the firing line, I come back and take up my duties as a member of this House?

I will show to some of these gentlemen what their criticism of unemployed officers means in some cases. An instance arose in England in June of 1915. A number of senior officers became unpleasantly conscious of their great numbers in England. There were eighty majors, for instance, who said: "We dislike remaining here; we came over to go to the front; let us go forward as supernumerary lieutenants". And they went as supernumerary lieutenants. Now, the supernumerary lieutenant has almost less than no duties. He is the understudy of the lieutenant in charge of a platoon. He is not quite so useful as a sergeant in charge of any section, because the sergeant has been trained with the section from the beginning and is more accustomed to it than the supernumerary lieutenant can be. Not afraid of German bullets, and perhaps too conscious of the criticism such as is offered in this House to-night, these majors said: "Let us go over the parapet with the men". They went. Only twenty came back. Are we to cheer in this House because in that one stroke we wiped out sixty superfluous majors?

The hon. gentleman asks why these men are not sent home at once. The answer is so plain that I wonder that anyone should ask the question with a desire of obtaining knowledge. If asked with the idea that, being unanswered, it will make a point to the discredit of the soldiers of Canada, the question seems more intelligible. I would like to bear in upon the consciousness of some of these hon. gentlemen the fact that a senior military officer is not made in five minutes. And, as it takes a long time to make him, so it should take a correspondingly long time to arrive at the conclusion that he should be discarded and sent home. As the training proceeds in Canada, there are technical courses of all kinds to qualify the officers for the duties they are to exercise at the front. When we are asked to send an officer to a school at Quebec, to a school at Ottawa, or Winnipeg, or Victoria, as I was asked from time to time to send mine, the accompanying note nearly always is: Send a senior officer, if possible. And properly so; because a senior officer should be qualified to lead in every branch of instruction. In the case of my battalion, nearly every senior officer had been the subject of a special course of training at some of these schools, to the exclusion of the junior officers, because the number was limited.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They attended several schools in some cases.

Mr. TAYLOR: Some of these officers had attended several schools, as the former Minister of Militia reminds me. Now, what would have been said of this Government if the moment these highly trained officers arrived in London they were told: "Since you cannot go forward with your battalion, you had better go straight home?" Then we should have had a political scandal.

As to unemployment in London, as to the presence of officers in hotels in London, I wonder where these hon. gentlemen get their information. During the two months I spent in the Old Country, I was in London, I suppose, five or six times. On every occasion when I was there I had been sent for by an officer of higher command in London for some specific business. My visits there, I suppose, were generally for two days at a time—business starting to-day and finishing to-morrow. As these hon. gentlemen see it, I was one of the officers, "crowding the hotels in London." I saw no officers there during my time who were not properly there. The majority of them were on leave from the front, the few weeks' leave that the officer gets after a great many months of service. The minority were of my class, officers who had come to England with the bona fide intention of going to the front, and who had not achieved their ambition. I do not think a large percentage of these officers were in what we would call an idle class, or that by their presence or their actions they constituted a reflection upon the Canadian military service. It seemed to me they were an exceptionally fine body of men. We are asked why they spent months there instead of coming home. I had an illustration. I will not mention names, because to do so would be like advertising that the officer to whom I refer had spent so many months idle. I found in a camp to which I went in England one of the very finest officers in British Columbia, a man, perhaps, fifteen or twenty years my junior, trained in every respect, who had brought over a battalion equal in merit to any battalion that had left our province, but a battalion that, like my own, was broken up on arrival there. That man had come across with no other idea than that of serving at the front. He had closed all his affairs in Canada. He was not even a member of Parliament, and could not have a member of Parliament's excuse—these hon. gentlemen seem to think it is an excuse—to come back to Canada. He waited for employment. He got employment the day I left England, that is, nine months after arrival there. He got the remnant of his own battalion, the remnant of my battalion, and the remnant of the 158th Battalion of Vancouver, to be under his command as the 1st British Columbia Training Battalion. And a fine training officer he is. Why should we criticise that officer for having been compelled to wait that time? These hon. gentlemen speak, in connection with this, as in connection with all other military subjects we have heard discussed in the House, as if they were the discoverers of something which, if they were the Government, would be done, but which is not done by this seemingly neglectful Administration.

We are told that the administration in London should grapple with the question of unemployment. These gentlemen opposite must know—because they have read it in their own press, paragraph after paragraph—that the subject is being grappled with. They know that about two months ago a board was appointed to examine in detail into the standing of every officer not in serious employment in England; that this board visited every Canadian camp in England, questioned all the officers, as well as men of other ranks, as to their capacity and as to whether they could profitably take up military service other than what they had gone to England to do. The men were then divided into three categories: those who could advantageously be sent to the front and be replaced in England by others returning from the front; those who could do nothing at the front or in England, but might with advantage be given permission to return to Canada—because you cannot return without permission—and those who could profitably continue to be employed in London or in other parts of England. The question was dealt with in the most serious manner at that time by a board of very competent officers, several of whom had seen service at the front, some of whom had served with distinction there and, having come back to London, found themselves temporarily unemployed. If an abuse had crept in, they were instructed to see that that abuse was discontinued, and they were inspired with a desire that it should be discontinued. No doubt as a result of the report of that board, officers have returned, opportunity has been found to send officers to France, and every opportunity has been taken to substitute the services of returned soldiers for services that had been performed in the Old Country by Canadians who had not been to the front. When the officers are moved on under these circumstances, I do not think they should be pilloried as having been driven to do something that they were unwilling to do. I prefer to take the view that the officers who go there, do so in good faith, ready to lay themselves on the altar of their country and to make whatever sacrifices they may be called upon to make. Do these hon. gentlemen opposite realize for a moment that soldiering is not eight hours' work a day during six days of the week? Do they realize that there are a great many soldiers in England and in France who are not in the firing line; that there are a great many private soldiers who are unemployed in quite as wide a sense as these officers are unemployed, and that it is absolutely true that these men are serving their country efficiently and nobly? We have millions of soldiers in reserve in England and France who are not working every day, or six days a week, just the same as we have some idle officers. These soldiers are kept for the great drive which we all anticipate, and which only can change the condition from that of apparent stalemate now prevailing. Are they to be pilloried as men who are eating the bread of idleness in England? Is it fair to our soldiers who remain in Canada, having been trained here, that they should be pilloried, as is the custom to-day, not only occasionally in the House, but also in the party press? Are they not just as useful to us in reserve in Canada, waiting to go to England and France when they are sent for, as they would be if we got them out of our sight by sending them to England or to France? Are we improving the cause of the war by having nothing but criticism—small-souled, mean-spirited criticism, if I may use the expression—of those who try to serve the Empire, but who are not permitted to do so to the extent that they desire? It seems to me, as an officer who has had much experience in recruiting, that more harm has been done to the cause of recruiting in Canada by the statements made this session from the other side of the House and widely disseminated as they have been, for political purposes by the party press—the fountainheads of the poisoned political gas in this country—than by any possible combination of errors on the part of the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have been very much interested in the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor). I do not wish to criticise them, except to say that his entire speech was absolutely spoiled by the bitter partisanship of his last few words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. GRAHAM: One would think, to hear him speak of poisoned gas, that we on this side had no interest in the war.

Mr. BEST: It seems to fit well.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend, who is always interrupting, may say what he likes, but this is too serious a matter to be allowed to pass. If we on this side, who have made as many sacrifices as my hon. friend has in this war—some of us have devoted as much time as he has to matters affecting the war—are not to be allowed to criticise simply because he does not like it, then this is not a free country, and the liberties that we pretend to be fighting for he purposes taking away from us.

Mr. BEST: I do not purpose taking away any liberties. You have just told us what you pretend to be fighting for in the House, and I agree with you.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are you fighting for?

Mr. GRAHAM: He is not fighting for anything. I really do not understand what my hon. friend means. I wish to point out that any criticism that we have made has not been such as was indicated by my hon. friend. He has said that the criticism has been made solely for party purposes. I want to tell him that there are men on this side of the House who have an interest in seeing that our share in the war is conducted in the best possible manner with regard not only to the safety of the Empire, but also to the safety of the men at the front. It is our purpose to criticise in order to bring about that result, and if my hon. friend considers that to be against the best interest of the Allies, then he has not the judgment that I think he ought to have.

Mr. TAYLOR: What I said was that untrue statements disseminated from the House had injured the cause of recruiting.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend said that the criticism indulged in during this session had injured recruiting.

Mr. EDWARDS: So it has.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend thinks it has. He has been here all the time, and he does not know about the outside.

Mr. EDWARDS: Neither do you.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have delivered several recruiting speeches since the session opened. I say that just such speeches as my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) has made have done injury to the cause of recruiting. We want to work in harmony with the Government in everything that will conduce to the best interests of Canada and the Empire, and I leave it to the serious judgment of the men on the Government side who do things as to whether or not that is the case. But if we are to be scolded because we criticise and make suggestions, then I say, Sir, that what we pretend to be fighting for is a myth. The full liberty of the member to discuss is given to us by the constitution of this country, and the more acute the situation is the more it is right, and the more it is our duty, to criticise, if that criticism will conduce to the best interests of the cause we all have at heart. Now this attempt to create discord, I do not think is the proper thing. I was deeply interested in the remarks of my hon friend (Mr. Taylor). He is a man who can speak with some knowledge of the conditions and of the situation in which he found himself. I took more than ordinary interest in what he said, and I might tell him that I was more than interested; I felt that he had spoken from his heart as to the conditions. But, Sir, when he turns on us and insists that we are doing something injurious to the cause of the Empire, and gives us a lecture, intimating that we have not the cause of the Empire at heart, I want to tell him that he is altogether wrong, and that we on this side of the House have as much right to free speech, and are as much interested in the war, as hon gentlemen opposite. And when the history of this country comes to be written, it will be found that the criticism made by members on this side of the House has helped and not hindered the cause of the Empire.

Mr. EDWARDS: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) and I would like to add one or two words. I did not understand nor do I think the members of this House understood that the member for New Westminster was charging against the Liberal members of this House or the Liberal party as a whole that they should not make any criticism whatever. He stated that in this House during this session there had been criticisms offered on this Government which were founded on untrue statement, and that those untrue statements, offered in the form of criticisms, were hurtful to recruiting. And in making that statement he said what every man in this House knows to be absolutely true. I want to ask my hon. friend if he thinks the statement made the other day by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that because of the retempering of the bolts of the Ross rifle hundreds of lives had been sacrificed at the front was in the interest of recruiting. It was pointed out to him that that retempering took place last year, and not one of those rifles was in the hands of those men. But that makes no difference to that gentleman; his statement has gone upon Hansard, it has been caught up by certain of the party press, and sent out to the country. Was he man enough then to get up on the floor and retract his statements and say he had made a mistake? We had another instance in the case of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who pours out a tale of woe about a returned soldier in Windsor who came back to Canada, was allowed to pass through the country without any overcoat, who had frozen his hands and feet and all that sort of thing; and he wound up by saying that he had no doubt there were hundreds of cases just like this throughout the country. That goes through the country, it is picked up by the press and circulated. The proof in that case lies in the fact that members belonging to the Soldiers' Relief Committee in Windsor sent to the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) a telegram, which was read here to-night at six o'clock, to the effect that the statement of the hon. member for Lambton, as published in the press, was absolutely false. When challenged with that to-night at six o'clock by the hon. member for North Essex, what did the hon. member for Lambton say? He said: I merely read what was in the press, what was stated in the newspaper, that is all that I did. That is not all that he did, for he followed up that statement, without trying to ascertain whether it was authentic, by his statement that he did not doubt there were hundreds of cases like that. This is the kind of statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite to which the hon. member for New Westminster referred when he said, and truly said, that statements are made on the floor of the House by hon. gentlemen opposite that are a hindrance to recruiting. Does the member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham) think that his presence on the platform at a political meeting in the city of Toronto, when a man by the name of Hartley Dewart went into details and disregarded facts in regard to the exportation of nickel, and was supported and endorsed by the presence of the hon. gentleman on the platform—does he think that attitude was a proper one and in the interest of recruiting? I for one do not think it was.

Mr. Speaker, this war has demonstrated this fact, that we have, over at the front, Canadians who never were known in the public life of this country before, who were considered small men if you like, hardly recognizable, but who have proved themselves to be big men in every sense of the word. It has also been demonstrated on the floor of this Parliament that we have men who have been in the public eye as representative men, holding seats in this Parliament, who have shown by their attitude and their words that they are small men—small men and very small. Talk about their conscience being affected by the Ross rifle and that sort of thing! The stain is not in the conscience of hon. gentlemen opposite; for I say to them: if you will look down to your finger tips you will find that the stain is produced by your attempt, for political purposes, to turn the bloody key in the door of office and to open the portals to yourselves.

Mr. MACDONALD: After this scolding which we have received from our friend, with the true Germanic spirit which prevents him from permitting any man in this free country to say anything in this Parliament or out of it, or to venture in any way to disagree with him, I wish to read some extracts from a letter which I have received from another Colonel; not my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), but a colonel who left this country for the war in 1914 and has not come home yet. I read this just for the purpose of telling my hon. friend who has just sat down that there are some people in this country who do not agree with him, and who do not agree with our colonel friend from New Westminster. The letter is of such a character that if I read it in full detail my hon. friend who has just sat down would at once proceed to scold me and to scold the colonel, because he would say the publication of such statements would prevent recruiting in this country. I shall read one or two extracts and leave it to this House, once we have got back to our normal frame of mind and after the lecture which the hon. member for New Westminster has given us, as to whether or not there is justification for hon. gentlemen on this side saying something about the conduct of the war. This letter came to me unsolicited; I had no communication with this gentleman in any way whatever. It came to me in the month of December, and among the expressions which he makes use of is the following:

> If the people of Canada knew what goes on here in the waste of public money, the creation of jobs for disgruntled politicians and wire pullers, it would make very interesting reading for the Canadian people.

Mr. TAYLOR: What is his name?

Mr. MACDONALD: I will give to the Minister of Militia, if he desires, the name of this colonel.

Sir SAM HUGHES: As one having the interest of the soldiers at heart, I respectfully submit that the hon. member should not give out the name of the officer. I have never heard of this case, but I do not like to see the name of an officer brought in.

Mr. MACDONALD: If it is bad form for this colonel over in England, who is not a political colonel, to write certain remarks of this kind, what is the form of the Colonel from New Westminster?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not think my hon. friend should give the officer away.

Mr. TAYLOR: The colonel from New Westminster is not anonymous or ashamed of what he said.

Mr. MACDONALD: This gentleman is not anonymous. If it comes to a question of pluck and achievement, the gentlemen of whom I am speaking will compare with the hon. member for New Westminster. He did not spend two months in England; he went over in 1914, and has not come home yet. He goes on:

> If the facts that exist here were known in Canada—but our mouths are closed as long as we wear uniforms.

Mr. TAYLOR: Where is that from, is it from France?

Mr. MACDONALD: No, it is written from a camp in England. If my hon. friend wants to suggest any question about this letter, I pledge my word as a member of this House that I will give the name of the writer to the Minister of Militia.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What is he doing in England?

Mr. MACDONALD: He is at work in England at the present time. He goes on further:

> The impression with many officers is that the young life's blood of Canada is exploited to glorify the Tory party, and I must admit that it seems to be true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: What further does the gentleman say:

> I do not know whether the censor will pass this or not. If he does not I hope he will pass it on to the Government for I am going to sign my name to it and dare any one to contradict anything written here.

I have stated what I am prepared to do in regard to the matter. I desire to say that if, as has been suggested by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) that this colonel, who went over in August, 1914, and has not yet seen his home or family, is not permitted to express his opinion in regard to the conditions over there without being denounced by hon. gentlement opposite, my hon. friend from Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has no right to lecture the men who sit on this side of the House when there are in France the graves of three boys, sons of members, and when there are some twenty-five to thirty members on this side of the House whose boys are over there. We need no lectures from hon. gentlemen opposite on this question.

Mr. TAYLOR: But what your friend says is not true.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will put the word of the man who wrote this statement against the word of my hon. friend.

Mr. TAYLOR: It is not true.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Who is he?

Mr. MACDONALD: I have told my hon. friend from Annapolis what I will do with respect to the name. I merely rose for the purpose of showing that there are colonels on the other side who have something to say.

Mr. TAYLOR: I said that the statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. MACDONALD: Here is the letter with the signature to it, and I am prepared to show it to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Militia at any moment. These statements are made by a man who left here two and a half years ago, and there is no justification whatever for the suggestion that hon. members on this side of the House should not indulge in reasonable criticism. What criticism has ever been made in this House so keen as that made by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), who declared that if the conditions as he found them to exist at one time in England were permitted to continue under the administration of a new Minister of Militia, the forces would be reduced to a chaotic condition. Has there been anything more emphatic than that statement? Could any stronger criticism be made?

Sir SAM HUGHES: What I said had reference to the statement that political action had been taken on the other side during the last nine months or during whatever time that officer has been over there. What I meant to say was that under my administration, I challenge the face of clay to point to a single instance of political preferment.

Mr. MACDONALD: I shall be very glad to show this letter to my hon. friend. He knows this colonel.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If I was Minister of Militia I would refuse to look at a letter of that kind from an officer, because it immediately brings him under the law. That was my reason for suggesting that he should not divulge the name to the Prime Minister except in confidence.

Mr. MACDONALD: An officer who is a member of Parliament has a double advantage, and certain exemptions.

Sir SAM HUGHES: An officer is always permitted to criticise favourably, but he is not permitted to criticise adversely.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the law of the country.

Mr. MACDONALD: This gentleman writes this letter expecting that it might not pass the censor. He makes the statement which I have read.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I made the suggestion for the protection of the officer.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have quoted from this letter for the purpose of showing that there are men on the other side of the Atlantic to-day who have gone from Canada, and who have certain opinions about the administration of affairs there at the present time; and the opinion of a man in that position is to be regarded as of as much weight as the opinion of my hon. friend from Westminster. I do not think that in the debate that has taken place to-day, or in the attitude which the Opposition have adopted in regard to this measure there has been anything unfair. Recognizing as we all do that it is to be passed through this stage to-day, and that we are looking forward to adjournment, I say it is not reasonable and proper for hon. gentlemen to undertake to say that we on this side of the House have not the right to ask for information, or that we have not the right to call the attention of the House and of the country to facts that are within the knowledge of the House or to information that is given to us as members of Parliament representing the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who says that the hon. gentleman has no such right?

Mr. MACDONALD: We have had an intimation from my hon. friend from Westminster.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. TAYLOR: I rise to a question of privilege. I am being misquoted by the hon. member. My reference was solely to untrue and unfair criticism from the other side of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: These are not the words you used, as you will see in Hansard.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend made a general statement in regard to criticism from this side of the House, and I appeal to the judgment of this committee whether in the discussions that have taken place we have not been entirely within our rights in asking for information, in discussing the merits of the Ross rifle, or in discussing the question of the reports of Dr. Bruce and Dr. Baptie.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Dr. Bruce is in Canada to-night.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am aware of that. I submit to this committee and to the House that we have a perfect right to criticise, and that we cannot be asked to abrogate our constitutional functions as representatives of the people in discussing these matters. We have had tremendous expenditures during the past two years. We have had the great question of recruiting, the question as to whether or not recruiting has been properly carried on, and the question as to whether or not the aim of the Prime Minister as to raising 500,000 men can be realized. What sense is there in declaring that in regard to matters like these silence should reign, and that no man shall criticise or make suggestion. It is for the maintenance forever of that right in this country that we are fighting against a system which would prevent that criticism, the system which prevails in Germany, a militarism that wants to dominate the world. Our criticism has been legitimate and proper, and it has been within our rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me note a specific instance. What does my hon. friend think of the statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) to the effect that the Prime Minister had stated before the Ontario Recruiting League that it was his desire that there should be no more recruiting in Canada? What is his opinion as to that statement? Does he consider it fair criticism?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend wants me to discuss a question of difference of opinion between the hon. member for Assiniboia and the Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A difference of opinion! Does the hon. gentleman agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia?

Mr. MACDONALD: Probably the end of that matter has not been heard of. I am not here to discuss details. That is a personal matter between the hon. member for Assiniboia and the Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. The hon. member for Assiniboia does not claim to have been present at the meeting. The Prime Minister was there, and he specifically and emphatically denies the statement; but there has been no retraction by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and no one has come to his rescue.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let me suggest to the Solicitor General that possibly we have not heard the end of the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Give us the end of it now.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend from Assiniboia is not here. Were he here he would be perfectly able to take care of himself. I do not think the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) was fair to the Liberal party with regard to his address yesterday. Everyone who knows that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) knows that he is not a gentleman who assails this House with extreme utterances at any time, but on the altogether too rare occasions upon which he has addressed the House he has not done so offensively or in such a way as to entitle him to be regarded as in any way extreme. The right hon. the Prime Minister yesterday complimented my hon. friend from West Lambton on the manner in which he had brought the attention of the House and the country to the duty which we are called upon to perform in reference to our returned soldiers. That speech was not regarded by the right hon. Prime Minister as having been the result of any idea of imputing blame to the Government at all. Every hon. gentleman who heard the hon. member for West Lambton knows that his speech was not of a controversial character and was not intended to impute blame to the Government. He asked for the best possible good and with the best of intentions that both sides of this House should join in the appointment of a committee to take into their most careful and serious consideration this great problem in the interim between now and the resumption of the session. It is only fair to my hon. friend who is not here that I should make this statement in reference to him.

In regard to the whole question of this debate, I regret that at this stage there should be any manifestation of feeling in reference to it. The ex-Minister of Militia refers to the fact that Dr. Bruce is in Canada. I understand that Dr. Bruce has arrived in Canada and in order that we may bring the discussion of this question back to where we started this afternoon I would like to ask the Prime Minister, as I am informed Dr. Bruce is preparing to make some statement to the Canadian people with regard to the question of the examination which he has made into medical conditions on the other side, whether he will not endeavour to give us to-morrow, before the House adjourns, the reports made by Dr. Bruce and Dr. Baptie, if they are in his possession. I understand from the statement of the ex-Minister of Militia that the report of Dr. Bruce is in the department. Let us have it on the table of 11 p.m the House to-morrow so that in the consideration of this matter, if there is to be any statement made by Dr. Bruce the House and the country will be seized of the facts in regard to the whole question after seeing the reports of Dr. Bruce and Dr. Baptie.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not going to take any part in any of the pros and cons. I have been in the House for twenty-seven sessions and I have to express my regret at the quarrelings and contentions, backwards and forwards, over a great question of this kind. It is quite unseemly. But, I always appreciate criticism and I think I have had as much nasty criticism as any gentleman present. Last spring the Globe came out with an editorial attacking the department for having 200 or 300 officers lying around England idle. A short time after the troops first went over we had no staff, and no officers attached to the staff. They were taken from the various regiments as they passed over. These officers, although acting as staff officers, had to appear on the roll of the regiments as colonels, majors and captains. They were taken from the regiments and they were not on the headquarters or the various divisional or brigade staffs. These officers, could not draw their pay and allowances for staff work because they were only attached to regiments. The paymaster General across the water mentioned that there were 200 or 230 odd officers attached to regiments who were not drawing pay and allowances and some clever editor, seeing it, thought there were 200 or more officers in England unattached. Then, writers up and down the country, of course to help the cause and not at all with the intention of injuring the Tory party or the Minister of Militia, but to help the cause and to make the boys over there feel more at home and the friends and mothers of the boys more comfortable here came out with column after column attacking the Department of Militia and Defence for having these 200 odd officers in England for whom there was nothing to do. But every officer was actively employed. Shortly after this occurred there came the Zillebeke affair in June. I had an application, through our staff, from the War Office for upwards of 200 officers and I had an application when I was in England to send over 400 officers to fill the places of the boys who had gone.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Six hundred altogether?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Nearly 600 altogether to go and fill the gaps. We did not have the officers there. I gave instructions that well-educated, intelligent, capable boys, sergeants, corporals and privates in the ranks should be promoted, and hundreds of these boys were promoted. I did not take the criticism seriously. I rather enjoyed it. I think I have told the story told by Barnum the first time I saw him when I was a boy. He said: I spend $75,000 a year to have the show condemned, and I spend $750,000 to have the show advertised. I get ten times as much value out of the $75,000 that I spend to have the show condemned as I do out of the $750,000 that I spend to have the show advertised. Everybody copies the condemnation and nobody believes it, but the advertisement is all the greater. I have learned to proceed upon that line. There has been a great deal of criticism, but it does not affect me.

Now, I want to say a word about getting the battalions across the sea. I am going to make this statement that in all the recruiting that has ever been carried on in civilized warfare, or any other kind of warfare, none has equalled that which has been carried on in Canada. We sent the officers who recruited these battalions over with them. There was some criticism, but I paid no attention to it. I felt that people, such for instance as my friend Taylor here, who had raised regiments, were entitled to take their regiments across, and serve a few weeks at all events with their regiments. Then we gave them what we called a Cook's tour to the front, where they would get a little experience and a great deal of information, so that they might be able to come back home and give Canada the benefit of the experience and information which they had acquired. I took that view, and it has been proved to be the practical and proper view of the matter, and it has been carried out. There is no doubt that there are a number of these fellows who are good fellows, the very best in the world, whose whole hearts are in the cause, like my friend Taylor here, who went to work and did their best, although they knew that their chances of getting to the front were more or less hazy. But they wanted to go. One member of this House, Col. Arthurs—I read the most touching letter I have seen for many a day—is in the trenches. He had reduced his rank and gone over in spite of his son's remonstrance from the trenches ordering his dad to get out. These officers went over in command. They knew that the chances were that a great majority of their battalions would have to be broken up for draft purposes. But, there is nothing wrong in having these officers overseas. It was due to their efforts that many of these regiments were recruited. Colonel Taylor, for instance, was the most powerful recruiting agent one could have in his district. I think these men were entitled to a trip over and a little visit there; it does not cost a great deal, and they are doing something useful. When they return to their homes, they will have acquired further experience, and they will be able to do even better work in the way of recruiting in Canada. Before I left England I gave directions for the organization of a committee. I demanded a report of every officer employed in England at that time. The report was not completed when I came away, and the instructions were to classify the officers, as my hon. friend has stated, into three classes and then to select those who were suitable for a command, and if possible, to give them an opportunity.

I want to say another word about the Fifth Division and the boys at the front. I am satisfied—and I do not want to go further than to express my own views—that we can have a Fifth Division and, if necessary, a Sixth and a Seventh and an Eighth Division at the front, from the men whom we now have across the water. That proposition I put in black and white to Sir Douglas Haig, Sir William Robertson and Mr. Lloyd George, now Prime Minister. My purpose was to have as many as possible of those men trained, and we have heard here to-night how men were taken over to France the second week they were in England, with no more experience than that, and put right into the trenches. I can tell of men who, within a week after their arrival in England, were sent over to France, and who the first morning after they arrived in France, were wounded and some of them killed, so that there is nothing in the story about the necessity of Canadian soldiers being kept in England for training purposes. They learn more in a week in the trenches than they do in a month in England or in Canada. My proposition was to put as many divisions at the front as we possibly could, to have a certain frontage and to take care of that and no more. Our casualties would be no greater if we had six divisions than if we had four divisions, because we would have only a certain length of front, and the men I am satisfied would be more healthy in France than they are in England. In that way we would have six divisions trained ready for action in the great drive which is coming on at an early date, whereas now we shall have only four divisions trained for it. There should be two Canadian Army Corps at the front, one which I would like to see under the command of General Turner and the other under the command of General Currie. I should imagine that General Turner is sick of his job in London and that he would be glad to get back to the music of the guns. If General Byng has to be disposed of, he should be made an officer commanding an army because the Canadian boys like him. I do not wish to bring up anything controversial; but the whole matter is very easy: We have plenty of men across the water, and the few that are in England can very well get on without General Turner.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): Mr. Chairman, I do not arise for the purpose of criticising the Militia Department of this country. I could, of course, under my privilege as a member of the House of Commons criticise the department, but I am not entitled to criticise it outside, and I am not going to say anything in this House which I am not permitted to say on the hustings of this country.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is all wrong. If he will read the address I gave to this House in the year 1901 in the Hutton matter, he will see the law laid down there on the subject. He can from his seat here to-night, or on the street to-morrow, if the House is in session, tell the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Militia, or the ex-Minister of Militia exactly what he thinks of them, positively or negatively, and no man can lay a finger on him under the law. Admiral Napier left the fleet in front of Kronstadt and came back to the House of Commons and pounded the life out of the Admiralty.

Mr. CARROLL: What the ex-minister has stated was what I was trying to point out. Perhaps I did not make myself quite clear, that I was allowed as a member of this House to criticise the military authorities and, indeed, any person, even the King; but when the House is not in session, I am not allowed to do it outside, and I do not purpose saying anything in this House or outside while the House is in session that I am not permitted to say outside while the House is not in session.

I am sorry I was not in the House yesterday when the matter of looking after returned soldiers was under discussion. Last evening I received from a personal friend of mine in the city of Sydney, who by the way is a very strong party man and who happens to be a Conservative, a letter regarding the matter of looking after our returned soldiers and also giving some strictures regarding the appointment of censors around the Marconi stations. He takes the ground that a great many of our men, who should be at the front to-day or who should be training for service at the front, were given positions as decoders or censors at those stations at the beginning of the war, and that they should be relieved to-day and their positions given to returned soldiers. We have in the island of Cape Breton a considerable number of returned soldiers who would make excellent decoders and censors. It strikes me that in the matter of appointing decoders and censors, the Government undertook to appoint men who in some cases had private incomes, who in many other cases had large wages and who are receiving the same large wages to-day. The names that I have in my hand are all those of censors; my friend does not mention the decoders at all. I wish it to be understood that I am saying nothing against any of these men or their capacities as censors; I have no doubt that the censors are good censors and that the decoders are good decoders. Mr. D. S. Hooper of Louisburg is assistant censor and at the present time is receiving $5 per day. He is Superintendent of Government Telegraph at a salary of $600 per year with horse-hire, and he is also local manager of the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company at a salary of $500 per year.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: When was he appointed?

Mr. CARROLL: He was appointed at least two years ago. I know a gentleman in the town of Glace Bay, a man who went over with either the Pioneers or the Tunnellers, Mr. Dan McDougall—and he is not a political friend of mine—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that old Dan?

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, old Dan McDougall. He was returned some time ago as being medically unfit. He is a man of considerable education.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He was concerned in the strike?

Mr. CARROLL: He was the leader of the United Mine Workers' strike?

Sir SAM HUGHES: He is a very good fellow.

Mr. CARROLL: A good man. I am mentioning his name because I know him personally. He is a man of education, if not a man of means. I think in justice to Mr. McDougall it would be well for whoever has charge of the Censorship Branch that this matter should be looked into. When Mr. McDougall came back from the front, medically unfit for service, he could not get anything to do, and he had to go into the mines to work, although that is rather strenuous work for a person who is medically unfit for military service.

Then there is another man, Mr. W. T. Hayden, who is assistant censor at $4 per day. He is also private secretary to Mr. J. C. Douglas who has the patronage of Cape Breton county so far as military matters are concerned and who is a member of the legislature.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is Mr. Douglas a Tory?

Mr. CARROLL: Yes. Then there is Mr. Charles Macdonald who my informant states is decoding clerk at a salary of $3.25 per day, but I think as a matter of fact the salary for decoding clerks is $2.50. Mr. Macdonald is law clerk with Mr. J. C. Douglas. Then there is Mr. E. L. Gilpin of North Sydney who is censor at the cable office at a salary of $7 per day. He is also property agent of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company at a salary of $3,000 per year, and secretary of the Steel Workers' Benefit Fund at a salary of $1,200 per year. I think we have some returned officers, who, having been wounded at the front, have been sent back as medically unfit, who would be well suited for a position of that kind. Not that Mr. Gilpin is not able to fill the position, but because he seems to be a man moderately well off, judging from the salary he gets. Another gentleman to whom I would refer is Mr. E. C. Burke, a very fine, estimable gentleman. He is assistant censor in the cable office at five dollars a day. He is also employed with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company at a salary of $1,800 a year. Then we come to Mr. B. Archibald, of North Sydney, who is assistant censor at the cable office at five dollars a day. He is also stipendiary magistrate of the town of North Sydney and carries on a legal business in that town. The gentleman who sends me the information says that he is a man of independent means. If he said he was wealthy I think he would be nearer the mark. Though Mr. Archibald is one of the first gentlemen in our country, yet if he were relieved of that job and some returned soldier who had the capacity to do this work were given the position I think it would be an advantage.

There are a few grievances under which I think the soldiers at the front are suffering at this time, and I intend to ask the Minister of Militia the privilege of writing to him a letter to tell him in my own humble way of the things that I think should be remedied. It is not my intention to criticise, as I have said. In any case, the Government might not be the subject of criticism, as it might be that officers in England are responsible for the grievances. If the Minister of Militia will give me the privilege, I will bring these matters to his attention in a letter; or, if he would prefer it, I will see him in his office, and in an interview discuss them with him.

That is all I have to say. I think that the Government should take into consideration this matter of the censorship, not only in the places to which I have referred, but generally, because I think the same conditions hold elsewhere. Where men are able to earn a living otherwise, yet are given large salaries as most of these men are, they should be relieved of these positions and the positions given to returned soldiers, who are capable of filling them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The matter of the censorship drawn to the attention of the House by the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) is one that involves not one department, but three, I think. It involves chiefly the Department of Militia and Defence, but also the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Post Office Department. With the view to making such a survey as the hon. member for South Cape Breton asks for, I undertook some three months ago, at the request of the Government, to look over the entire censorship service. At that time I obtained a report on each censor and assistant censor, as well as each decoder. I also obtained reports as to the advisability of eliminating some positions in the service, reducing salaries, and otherwise cutting down expenses. The result was a very considerable saving. It is evident from what the hon. member for North Cape Breton has said that the salaries paid now are substantially less than they were at the opening of the war. Of course, at first it was expected that the war would not last long; and, as men of superior capacity were needed, and as they were required—as I understood it then, and as I still understand it—to give up their ordinary avocations and devote themselves to this work, good salaries had to be paid. But, as the service was lasting beyond what had been anticipated, it was thought not unfair to ask these officers to accept lower pay. Some services were eliminated as the result of the fact that the necessity for them that originally existed no longer obtained. It was desired to know how far, in reducing the staff, we could have regard to the fact that some of the men employed might possibly be eligible for military service, and a report with this in view was obtained on every man. And I must say that, judging from the report which came to the department, the number remaining who are eligible for military service is a very small one, and where the men are so eligible, it has been considered impossible to dismiss them for the reason that there was not available any one capable of filling that particular office. I admit the principle laid down by the hon. member for South Cape Breton, that preference should be given to a returned soldier in every service. I do not know that this would be of so much value in the work of the censorship as in more permanent offices in the Civil Service. The appointee to a censorship holds office only until the end of the war. It is not a very great reward to give a returned soldier, but if he wants it, he should have the preference,—and will be given it if the matter is brought to my attention. Of course, we have to maintain the standard of the service; we cannot allow that to go down.

Mr. CARROL: There is nothing very technical about this business. The men who are now in office went in knowing nothing about the censorship, and depending simply upon their instructions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say there was anything technical about it, but that it takes a degree of intelligence above the ordinary, as well as education and maturity of judgment more than can be secured for very small remuneration. But, while the standard of service must be maintained, yet, subject to that, the returned soldier must get the preference. I shall be glad to review what the hon. gentleman has said, and to make a specific investigation in every case.

QUEBEC HARBOUR LOAN.

Bill No. 25, to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners was on motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 2—$1,500,000 may be advanced to Harbour Commission for terminal facilities:

Mr. NESBITT: Why does the minister allow the commissioners to repay the interest out of the money that he is advancing?

Mr. HAZEN: That is always done in connection with these works during the period of construction. No new principle is involved.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see by the paper this evening that the chairman of the Quebec Harbour Commission, Mr. L'Esperance, states that in connection with the improvements in the harbour at Quebec the Government intend to spend $700,000 this year on the river St. Charles works. Is that a fact?

Mr. HAZEN: The harbour commissioners have nothing to do with the works at the St. Charles river.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But he speaks of these works in the St. Charles river as included in the harbour of Quebec.

Mr. HAZEN: That is a matter that comes within the jurisdiction of the Public Works Department.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—interest on debentures during construction of works to be charged to capital account:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can the minister give a statement of the indebtedness of the Quebec Harbour Commission?

Mr. HAZEN: Between the years 1886 and 1892 there was advanced by the Government on harbour debentures the sum of $3,612,802.42. There was advanced by the Government without security, $584,773.26. The old Harbour Commissioners borrowed from the public $1,150,000, making a total of $5,347,575.68 that had been borrowed by the Harbour Commissioners up to the time this new work was started in 1913.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The interest charges on debentures taken up by the public are paid out of the advance made by the Government?

Mr. HAZEN: They are paid out of the revenues of the harbour, but the interest on the $1,150,000 which in those days was loaned by the public, has a prior claim to the interest on the money advanced by the Government since 1913. The people who loaned that money to the old commissioners are protected by a clause making that interest a prior charge.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Civil government—Department of Finance and Treasury Board—$600.

Mr. GRAHAM: One of the effects of the war has been to cause people to open their hearts and sympathies not only to those engaged in the war, but to all other needy people. Never in the history of Canada have the poor been so well looked after as they have been since the war began; the greater the burden imposed upon the people, the greater the burden they seem able and willing to bear. We are taking a new outlook: viewing things from a different angle. I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance a case which, I think, deserves his consideration. Probably no legal right is involved, but when we are gladly preparing to look after those who are injured in the cause of Canada and the Empire, I think we may, without creating a precedent and without doing anything but honour to ourselves, consider a case of this kind. I refer to the case of Colin C. McNab, now a resident of Braeside, who was engaged by the Canadian Pacific Railway as a telegraph operator during the Northwest Rebellion. According to the information given to me by him, he was placed by the company in charge of officers of the militia. His pay came indirectly from the Government. He worked day and night for months during many long weary hours in the Northwest, and as a result of disease contracted in that employment he lost his eyesight and has since been blind. He has been groping his way through life, not an object of charity—he does not wish to be that—but he does think, and I think with him, that the people of Canada might well, through their Government, place an amount in the Estimates which would in a measure assist him in bearing the affliction that has come upon him on account of his work for the benefit of Canada during the Northwest rebellion. I know that this case has been brought before the Militia Department under the late Government as well as this Government, and the ground has been taken that there is no legal claim, as he was not really an employee of the Militia Department, though in substance he contends he was. I admit that at once. If anything is to be given, it must come under the heading of what we call a compassionate allowance, and not through any right. I know that last year the minister took the ground that it might establish a precedent. I do not think it would establish any precedent, but I would go so far as to say that if any other case arose that was on all fours with this case, I would grant gladly and support a compassionate allowance. He did this work, he became subject to this life-long affliction, the terrible one of blindness, at a time when men in employment such as his had no opportunity of being surrounded with such safeguards as they have now; there were no Workmen's Compensation Acts of which a man could take advantage in order that he might be protected if injured. He did his duty, and, taking the hours he worked day and night, he did not receive as much pay as an ordinary soldier does at the present time. I am pleading his case not on any legal ground, I am not suggesting that he has a legal claim, but as one which might be properly expressed in the words compassionate allowance. I believe that no precedent would be established by giving him a small amount, and I plead with the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates for next year an amount which they think fair and proper in order that this man may be helped through the balance of his life to enjoy himself as much as possible with this great affliction. I asked him to put a statement fairly from his own standpoint, and this is what he has given me:

I was turned over to the Militia Department at Ottawa with instructions to report to Colonel Jackson. My wages, transportation, and expenses were paid by the Militia Department until I returned to Ottawa. I received orders from Colonel Jackson to report to Colonel Forrest at Qu'Appelle. I was under that gentleman's orders until the rebellion was suppressed. If it will be necessary to take it up in the House, the thing should be considered.

First, I worked day and night to assist the expedition, and when you consider overtime I did not receive as much as a private soldier to-day.

Second, I lost my eyesight through exposure in connection with the Northwest rebellion. That has been proven by certificates furnished by Dr. Edwards, Government officer, Qu'Appelle, and Dr. Horsey, Ottawa.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How old is he?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know, but I should think that he is forty-five or fifty years old.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This case has been before me for consideration. I understand that it was brought before the Militia Department during the period of the late Government, and also since the present Government assumed office. There seems no doubt that under the regulations of the Militia Department this unfortunate man would not be entitled to a pension. As my hon. friend has said, there is no legal claim. He was not a member of the militia force; he was not, so far as the facts are in my information paid by the Government; he was in private employ. He was a telegrapher in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway at the time of the Northwest rebellion. I believe that even if he had been a member of the militia he would not be legally entitled to a pension because of the period which has elapsed.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not his fault.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is, of course, good reason for the rule which debars a man after a certain time because there is uncertainty in relating his affliction to his service at so remote a date; there is always an element of uncertainty in those cases which are brought forward after a lapse of years. So that on legal grounds or under the regulations of the Militia Department he clearly would not be entitled to consideration for pension. My hon. friend recognizes that, and puts forward the case as one for compassionate allowance on the part of the Government. In admitting a case of that kind we must have regard to principle and to precedent, which must necessarily be established. My difficulty in regard to this case has not been one of lack of sympathy for him, because I think it is a hard case. This man is heavily afflicted, being blind, and our sympathies naturally go out to him. But when we consider putting him upon the pension list of the Dominion, we have to proceed in accordance with some principle, otherwise we should establish a precedent which would be embarrassing to ourselves and to succeeding Governments in matters of this kind. If the man was in private employ, I cannot see on what principle we can place him upon the list of those to whom the Government has granted pensions on the ground of compassionate allowance. One naturally considers just what the adoption of that principle would lead to. We take the case of a man who is engaged by a railway company as an engineer or brakeman or other employee in connection with the bringing up of supplies for an army in time of war. Supposing that he was injured; could you rightly differentiate his case from the case of this unfortunate man? Take the case even of an operative who is injured to-day in a munitions factory. He is in private employ, but nevertheless he is doing work indirectly or even directly connected with the carrying on of the war. My hon. friend will realize the questions that might arise from the establishment of a precedent of this character. My hon. friend has stated that he has been informed that this man was sent out to the Northwest by the Militia Department and paid by the Militia Department. If that is so, that has not been brought to my attention. If my hon. friend can establish that I will be glad to look into the case again, although I shall not commit myself and cannot, of course, commit the Government to any course of action.

That is a new statement, so far as I am concerned. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and Dr. Maloney have brought this case to my attention, and so far I have been unable to see on what principle I could admit this man, although, so far as my own sympathies are concerned, I would like to do so. I am afraid, however, that a precedent might be established that would be quite unsound, and that would commit this and succeeding Governments to similar action on what might possibly be a large scale.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will try to get the information.

Civil Government—Department of Finance and Treasury Board. To provide for increased salary of J. C. Saunders, Assistant Deputy Minister—$300.

Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal): What is the salary of the assistant deputy minister?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The salary of the Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance is $4,500. My hon. friend knows that Mr. H. T. Ross, who was a very valuable member of the staff of the Finance Department, and who acted most acceptably as deputy minister for many years, resigned in order to take a much more lucrative position with the Canadian Bankers' Association. I filled the vacancy by promoting Mr. Saunders, who has been the Dominion bookkeeper for many years, a very capable official.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And deserving of promotion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I adopted the principle of promotion, and Mr. Saunders occupies the position which a couple of months ago was occupied by a Mr. Ross.

Mr. MARTIN: What is the salary of the secretary?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My private secretary, Mr. Veitz, has gone to the front. He left the service of the department last spring. I took a young man on in his place, and he is now acting as my secretary. For some months he acted as assistant secretary, and the salary which he was getting was, I think, something like $1,300. I took him on as my secretary, and he becomes entitled to the secretarial allowance of $600, that is $300 for the period of six months ending 31st March of this year.

Mr. MARTIN: I am not against the increase of salaries, but if the minister finds it necessary to make an increase of $500 in the case of his deputy minister, and increases the salary of his secretary from $1,300 to $1,600, I would ask if it would not be possible for him to put an item in the estimates increasing the salaries of the letter carriers, not only in Montreal, but all over Canada. He knows very well that the cost of living has increased, and that those letter carriers get a salary of $900 a year. There is no better class of employees in the Government service. They work 365 days in the year, working on New Year's Day and on Christmas Day. I think that these men are deserving of an increase because the cost of living to-day is so high, being more than 100 per cent in different articles than it was before. The man who is getting $900 a year to-day is really not getting more than $450. If the big salaries have to be increased the small ones ought to be increased also, and those who are getting $750, $800 and $900 should receive the consideration of the Minister of Finance. I am not speaking only for the letter carriers of Montreal, but for all the letter carriers in Canada. Their wage is a small one, and it should be increased at this time. They have asked the Government to do so, but have received no answer yet.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter to which my hon. friend refers comes more particularly under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General, whom I have not consulted in respect to it. There is nothing further that I can add to-night. The representations that have been made by the hon. member will no doubt receive the best consideration of the Postmaster General.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see an item in connection with the Postmaster General's Department, providing an increase in the salary of Mr. Robert Fowler, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General. I know Mr. Fowler. He is a very good official, but I did not know that he was Assistant Deputy Postmaster General. When I was in charge of the department the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General was Major Verret, who is at the front. He left with the First Contingent, and is now serving in France. I would be very sorry indeed to hear that during his service at the front for his country he had lost his position. I hope it is not the case, and that some explanation will be given by the head of the department. Outside of that, I know that Mr. Fowler is a very deserving official, but I am surprised to find that he is the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that Mr. Verret is at the front, and while he is away there has to be an Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is only acting then?

Mr. REID: He may be acting, but even as acting assistant deputy he is entitled to the increase in salary. The fact that it has been done in this way does not imply that Mr. Verret has been removed from his position. I know that that is not the case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope not.

Mr. REID: Mr. Fowler is there while Mr. Verret is away.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As the vote is worded it would mean that there are two Assistant Deputy Postmaster Generals.

Mr. REID: There is only one acting now.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two ministers of Militia, and we get it all the way through.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think the item ought be changed and that it should read "Acting Assistant Deputy Postmaster General". I do not think it is possible that the Government can have created another Assistant Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. REID: I think it is all right.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The item as it appears in the Estimates is precisely as it came from the department. I do not think for one moment that any change has been made in the status of Major Verret. Whether Mr. Fowler is Assistant Deputy Postmaster

General or not, I am not prepared to say, but I shall draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the matter. I do not believe that this item would make him Assistant Deputy Postmaster General if he was not. I am sorry that the Postmaster General is not here, as I am not in a position to give my hon. friend any information.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will not insist, but if Mr. Fowler is only acting assistant deputy I think the wording of the item should be changed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for St. Mary's (Mr. Martin) in respect to some extra allowance being given to postal carriers in some of the cities at least, if not in all I think it is a case deserving the consideration of the Government. I understand that the matter has been placed before them by the Postal Carriers' Association and that possibly it will receive the favourable consideration of the Government. Therefore, I merely wish to concur in the suggestion of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Mary's (Mr. Martin) that something ought to be done for them either in the way of an increase in salary or a bonus or something of that nature. The Minister of Finance made a remark in answer to the statement made by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in which he asked for a compassionate allowance for a certain person in the province of Ontario. On page 5 of the Estimates I find:

Allowance to Emile Carrier for injuries which resulted in the loss of an eye. . . $600.

This in the nature of a compassionate allowance. The Minister of Finance suggested a moment ago that these votes should be based upon some principle. I brought to the attention of the Department of Railways and Canals the case of a young man in Halifax who was in the employ of that department. About a year ago a fire occurred in a shed upon one of the piers of the Intercolonial railway. This employee was at his home and had retired for the night when he was called out by his chief at the freight shed to fight the fire. While so engaged he lost his life. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Department of Railways and Canals was kind enough to advise me the other day that this young man was being allowed $500. Here is the case where a young man is taken from his home after his working hours, is engaged in protecting the property of the Government, and loses his life and it is proposed to vote a compassionate allowance of $500. On the other hand, here is a case where $600 is proposed to be voted to a man for the loss of an eye. I am not objecting to it, but it does seem to me there is a variance in the application of the principle as between these two cases. I hope the day will soon come when we can take care of the employees of governments in a more scientific fashion than we are doing to-day. In almost all of the provinces we have the Workmen's Compensation Act but it cannot provide for the employees of the Government and I hope we may establish some protection in the nature of the Workmen's Compensation Act for the employees of the Government who may meet with accidents. I refer to the matter to show that there is a very material distinction made between these two cases and I trust that the Minister of Railways and Canals will remember my observations to-night and look into the case further.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did the young man leave any dependents?

Mr. MACLEAN: He did not leave any dependents except that he was a substantial contributor to the upkeep of his home and parents.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This afternoon I made an inquiry of the right hon. the Prime Minister to know whether a postmaster at Montreal has been appointed. I see there are three vacancies in the higher outside Civil Service at Montreal—the collector of the port of Montreal and the postmaster of Montreal and the inspector of weights and measures. The three most important offices in the outside Civil Service are now vacant in Montreal. Whilst it is none of my business to recommend to the Government who ought to be appointed, I may be allowed to say a word or two about what public opinion considers to be the proper disposition of these offices. First of all, I wish to say that the post office lost an excellent official in the death of the late Mr. Bergeron. He was a kindly and courteous gentleman, he was in his office every day, the public had access to him, and really, he is lamented by the whole population of Montreal. We all know his geniality and his great courtesy towards the public and he will be hard to replace. Yet, if the Government would accept my recommendation, I would say first of all proceed by way of promotion. There are excellent officers in the office in Montreal. For instance, there is Mr. Gaboury, who started at almost the lowest rung of the ladder and who now holds the office of post office inspector for the eastern section of Canada, a district extending from Montreal to Halifax. I am quite sure that his appointment would be very popular with the business men of Montreal. There is also in the post office Mr. Barcelo, who is very active, and who has taken a great interest in his work since he has been appointed. Of course, if the Government will go outside, there are some very excellent names. There is my friend Mr. Robillard, editor of La Patrie, who is a good fellow, who served his country in the Northwest rebellion, who has been in journalism for thirty years, who is, in fact, one of the deans of the press in Montreal and who is certainly entitled to some recognition at the hands of his political friends. Then, there is Mr. H. A. Cholette, K.C., a fighter of the old days who would, I am sure, be an excellent postmaster of Montreal. I have a certain sympathy with him because he belongs to the same profession as I do and if the Government appoint him I think it will be a very popular appointment.

Mr. REID: Appoint them all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are many more. I understand that my hon. friend for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) has some recommendations to make also.

Mr. KEMP: Have you a preference for any of these that you have named?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, any of them would satisfy me; any one of them would make an excellent postmaster and would be an ornament to the office. As regards the Customs, I think the Government and the country have sustained a real loss in the resignation of Mr. White who was for many years the member for Cardwell in the House of Commons. For twenty-one years he has been collector of the largest port in Canada and everybody agrees that he has fulfilled his duties to the satisfaction of the minister, of the Government, and of the public in general. There again the Government can proceed by way of promotion. The name of Mr. McLaughlin, one of the chief officials at the port of Montreal, has been mentioned and I think the name will be well received by the business community. As regards the inspector of weights and measures, as some names have been mentioned from among members of the House of Commons, I shall make no comment here. But if one hon. member whose name has been mentioned gets the appointment, I will give him my blessing and say to the Government that they have made a good appointment.

12 Midnight.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have only a word or two to say. I fully concur in what has just been stated by the honourable member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as regards the late Mr. Bergeron. He was really a man of worth and of many parts, a faithful officer, a painstaking and most efficient official. I was well acquainted with him and, while he was not on my side of politics I always found him to be a loyal opponent.

As just stated by the honourable member for Rouville, there is at present on the post office staff a first rate official in the person of Mr. Gaboury, post office inspector at Montreal, who deserves recognition for his services. I think he was a political opponent, but, to my mind, in connection with such an appointment, integrity, honesty, character should be more particularly sought for in the appointee. Mr. Gaboury would undoubtedly fill the position most creditably; but there is another gentleman whom I would recommend to this Government and who is already on the staff of the post office. He is an old-time friend of mine, an opponent, a Conservative of years bygone, who was the party's standard bearer in the county of Montcalm. For many years he occupied a seat in the House; a well-to-do farmer, who lost whatever money he had, and whose circumstances were straitened through the sacrifices he was called upon to make to uphold the policy of the friends of this Administration. He is a straightforward and honest man, a most faithful and devoted employee, and I would be happy were he to be appointed postmaster. I refer to Mr. Octave Magnan, former member for Montcalm, who has expended his private means in forwarding the fortunes of his party and of his friends. He was appointed to a position in the post office, here he surely does not hold the place due him. I recommend him most earnestly to the consideration of his friends so that the electors of Montcalm may rejoice at hearing that their former representative is appointed postmaster of Montreal. It would be a great act of justice, and a day of rejoicing for the people whom I have the honour to represent in this House.

I trust that the honourable the minister will take in good part the remarks which have just fallen from the lips of the representative of Montcalm, and that they will be of some benefit to his former opponent. I had him as a rival candidate, but I am proud to say to his friends that he was a most trustworthy opponent, a man who showed unfailing courtesy in the discussion of public concerns. When he was appointed to the position he now occupied, I helped materially by recommending him to the former Postmaster General, Mr. Casgrain.

As regards Mr. Cholette, a lawyer of Montreal, to whom reference was made by the honourable member for Rouville, he is a good man who has worked hard in the interest of his party. In no way self-seeking, his sole object has been to help on his political friends; he has been constantly in the fray; he was even a candidate two or three times in the Magdalen islands. He has a large family to support, and is by no means a wealthy man. He is a lawyer of note, and I would be glad to see him appointed to such a position.

There are in the ranks of the Conservative party many others whose claims are entitled to consideration. I may mention in passing the name of Mr. Emile Léonard, barrister. When still a very young man he represented here the county of Laval. He has ever been faithful to his party. Uninterruptedly on the firing line, he never swerved from the stand that he was a faithful supporter of the Conservative party. Should the Government's choice fall on him, I would be very glad of it. But in closing I say to the honourable the minister: Do not forget my old friend Magnan, whom I recommend to you, most urgently, considering how hard he worked for his party. Being to-day the representative of the constituency he used to represent, I deem it my duty to recommend him most earnestly to the consideration of the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: This money has all been expended; it is not for expenditure in the future?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Or that will be expended before the 31st of March.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is for this year; it is not for next year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: For this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I find that nearly all of it is for the operation of the Government railways.

Mr. REID: That is right.

Mr. GRAHAM: That means, it is money that will be returned to the Treasury, but that has to be voted.

Reverting again to my suggestion to the Minister of Finance, I take it for granted that he has not shut the door more tightly in regard to the McNab case and that he is going to give it some consideration during recess, and that I am going to receive some information from him on this subject.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be only too glad to take into consideration anything that my hon. friend may submit.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have no letter carriers in my constituency, but I am pleased to support the suggestion made by the hon. member of St. Mary's, Montreal (Mr. Martin) in that connection. There was a petition circulated on behalf of the letter carriers and they sent their representatives around in various counties. One of them was sent to me from a branch of the association in the city of Sydney, and I replied saying that if the matter came up in the House of Commons I would give it my sympathetic support. As has already been pointed out, the pay of these men was fixed some years ago when the cost of living was about half what it is to-day. These men have been in the business for quite a while, and as it is not so easy for a man to get away from a position in which he has established himself, I think that, having regard to the fact that the cost of living for these men and their families has more than doubled, they deserve the consideration of the Government as to whether or not some further remuneration should be given to them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if any decision has been reached in regard to the increase, more or less promised, but hinted some years ago, to the Civil Service? I understand that lately the Government received a delegation from the Civil Service Association, which laid a request before the Government. I know that we are passing through hard times and that the expenditures of the country are high, but the man who suffers most in these days from the high cost of living is really the man who has nothing to depend upon but his fixed salary.

Has my hon. friend considered the position in which the Civil Service is to-day? And does he intend to do something about it? Three years ago, just before the war, he had a tender spot in his heart for the Civil Service. Perhaps, in his anxiety about the war, he may have overlooked the poor civil servant. I cannot forget that I am the son of a civil servant myself, and I know what the anxieties of the poor civil servants are. We all expect a word of hope from the Minister of Finance on behalf of this class of employees.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the midst of a war such as this, and with the burdens that are thrust upon the public, the time is not very opportune for considering a revision of the Civil Service salary list. But we are all aware that the cost of living has gone up during the past few years, especially since the outbreak of the war. It is altogether probable that when the House resumes after the recess we shall deal with the questions of the salaries at least of the lower grades of the Service. The matter has been under consideration.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

SUPPLY BILL.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively March 31, 1917, and March 31, 1918.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first and the second time, considered in committee, and reported.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

CONFISCATION OF COAL BY RAILWAYS.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before the House adjourns, I wish to say a word about the coal situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the leave of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With the leave of the House, of course, because I consider this a very important question. I reported to the Minister of Railways this evening that several consignees were complaining that coal consigned to private firms was being confiscated by certain railway companies—and I named one of the companies—much to the detriment of private industry in Canada. My hon. friend has been good enough to notify the company named to respect the rights of private firms, and I thank him for what he did. Had it not been for the happy intervention of the hon. minister, a very important pulp establishment would have been obliged to close its doors, and leave about 800 hands inactive, incurring thereby a loss of about $10,000 daily. As the complaint seems to be general, I would like my hon. friend to give the House and the country a pronouncement on the subject. Can any railway company, by this high-handed action—I shall not say abuse its privileges, because such a privilege does not belong to it—deprive its customers of property of which they stand greatly in need?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the railways have the right to do this, because trains must be kept moving. The stopping of the trains would more seriously discommode the public than the action to which my hon. friend refers. There is, no doubt, great scarcity of coal all over Canada; the Intercolonial railway itself has had to take coal belonging to other people. The coal companies have not been able to get the necessary number of men to enable them to fill their contracts. We ourselves have had to bring in some 500,000 tons of coal. I am sure that the company that took this coal is in a very bad way; in fact, all the Canadian railways are in a bad way in different localities. As I told the hon. gentleman, I wired the president of the company to which he referred and asked him to try and let up so that the different industries could be kept going. I shall be very glad to do anything that I can in the matter.

Mr. REID: Has the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) seen the statement read by the Prime Minister in the House a few days ago with regard to this matter?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the hon. gentleman give a synopsis of it?

Mr. REID: It is a statement by Sir Henry Drayton, Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and may be found on page 210 of Hansard. The Prime Minister read it in reply to a question put by the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the gist of the statement?

Mr. REID: It is as follows:

The practice of commandeering coal by railways is the occasion of great annoyance and frequently positive loss to consignees. It is a practice which is not covered by the Railway Act, one way or the other, nor authorized by any regulation of the Board. The practice is very similar to the practice of general average applicable at sea, and the taking of necessary cargoes, belonging of course, to consignees, in case of emergency, It is justified by the railways in that it is better that some freight should move rather than that no freight should move at all.

Railway companies, of course, ought to lay in their own coal; they ought to have supplies; they ought to be able to carry on their business without commandeering coal; but, at the same time, it has to be recognized that the coal shortage is very acute, and that railways in some instances have been entirely unable to obtain supplies of coal which they in due season contracted for.

The Board has already had up the question of coal confiscation with the railways, and everything has been done to minimize it. The complaints on this score now are very much fewer than they were, and the situation is being got in hand.

The Board has not been advised of any confiscation of coal belonging to the Nova Scotia Underwear Company, but the matter will be immediately taken up.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 12.33 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, February 7, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That as the time for receiving Petitions for Private Bills, and the time for presenting Private Bills without an additional charge will be curtailed by the adjournment of the House, be it resolved, That Petitions for Private Bills be received by the House if presented on or before the 10th of May next, and that the time for presenting Private Bills without the payment of the additional charges provided for under paragraphs (b) and (c) of subsection 3 of rule 89 be extended until May the 24th next and June the 21st next respectively.

Motion agreed to.

WAR LOAN—$500,000,000.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden for the third reading of Bill No. 24, for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER: In order to facilitate the trip of my right hon. friend to the other side of the ocean, we have discussed this Bill without having before us much of the information to which we on this side of the House think we are entitled. I would remind my hon. friend that when we meet again we expect to have all the information which we have not yet received, that is to say, the Bruce report, the Baptie report, and the details of the expenditure of the money that has been voted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I expect to lay on the Table of the House to-day the Bruce report and the Baptie report. To do so it is necessary to take the only copy that is at present in the Department of Militia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it intended to utilize any portion of the $500,000,000 for the purpose of building war vessels in Canada? I do not mean battleships, but destroyers and submarines. I think it is most important that this should be done, and I think it would be of interest to the House and the country to have some information on the subject. The terms of the Bill are quite broad enough, I am sure, to permit of this being done, and it would appear to be in the public interest.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it would be undesirable to make such a statement as my hon. friend suggests. I may say that communications of a highly confidential character, of which I have privately informed the right hon. leader of the Opposition, have passed on the subject, and I shall be very glad to acquaint my hon. friend privately with what information is available.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the ordinary course it would not be possible for members to discuss this vote when we reassemble unless an opportunity were afforded by the Government for us to do so. Will we be able to discuss this on the Militia Estimates?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would not be disposed to interpose the slightest objection to full discussion of the subject. As a matter of fact, there was some suggestion yesterday that the Government were averse to criticism and were not desirous of supplying information. On the contrary, I stated when I first presented this war appropriation to the House that I was ready to give all available information asked for, and I have already given a good deal of information that was not asked for—some which is in my possession I have not yet had an opportunity to give. We shall be very glad to have a discussion. I do not think that under the rules of the House hon. gentlemen opposite would be precluded from bringing up the discussion of this subject on the Militia Estimates.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You will bring on the Militia Estimates as early as possible?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall.

HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendations of the Honourable the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 6th instant relative to the promotion of Mr. A. C. Campbell to the position of Associate Editor of Debates and Reporter, of Mr. Harry E. Oliver to the position of Debates Reporter, and of Mr. D. L. Desaulniers to the position of Chief Translator, and the appointment of Mr. L. Boulet as Chief of Pages, be confirmed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With reference to the two last named appointments, Messrs. Desaulniers and Boulet, I have no observation to make. I would simply ask as to the others, Messrs. Campbell and Oliver, if this promotion is in accordance with any recommendations coming from the Debates Committee. Mr. Campbell is a very valuable officer, of that I have personal knowledge. But we have a Debates Committee which is supposed to take some cognizance of these matters.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed by the clerk that it comes through the regular channel, that the Debates Committee is not alluded to in the Civil Service Act, and I do not think there is any recommendation from them. As far as I am concerned, I know nothing about it except that this motion was put in my hands in the ordinary course.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The matter had better stand. It can be taken up at the next sitting.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the Prime Minister give an explanation of how the appointment of Mr. Desaulniers was brought about?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not the slightest knowledge of the subject. The motion is put before me in the ordinary course to move. It comes through the regular channel, and I really know no more about it than my hon. friend. If it is desired there is no reason why it should not stand.

Mr. MARCIL: I think it might be desirable that Mr. Laframboise, an old official of the House, should know the circumstances under which he is being replaced.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my right hon. friend has no objection, I would move the motion in this form:

That the recommendation of the hon. the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 6th instant relative to the promotion of Mr. D. L. Desaulniers to the position of the Chief Translator and the appointment of Mr. L. Boulet as Chief of Pages, be confirmed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My objection to the motion as first proposed was to the change in the Debates staff. I think this should not be made except upon the advice of the Debates Committee, which is appointed by this House to supervise these matters. As to the other two promotions, those of Mr. Desaulniers and Mr. Boulet, I have no objection to offer, because these matters come within the province of Mr. Speaker alone. Mr. Desaulniers takes the place of Mr. Laframboise. I have been informed, and I have reason to believe, that Mr. Laframboise has been very harshly dealt with, but I do not take exception to these promotions as they come within the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to as to appointments of Mr. Desaulniers and Mr. Boulet.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:—

That the following members be appointed a committee to consider and report upon the arrangements which should be made for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion, namely, Messrs. Foster (Sir George), Graham, Hughes (Sir Sam), Jameson, Lemieux, Macdonald, Murphy, Sévigny and Taylor.

Motion agreed to.

CARE OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With reference to the subject that was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) a few days ago, I beg to move, seconded by Sir George Foster, that

The following members, namely, Sir Herbert Ames, Mr. R. B. Bennett (Calgary), Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure), Mr. Middlebro, Mr. Murphy, Mr. McCurdy, Mr. Pardee, Mr. Ross and Mr. Sutherland, be appointed a committee for the purpose of considering and enquiring into and reporting upon (a) the reception, treatment, care, training and re-education of the wounded disabled and convalescent who have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces; (b) the provision of employment for those who have been honourably discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, and the training and re-education of those so discharged who are unable to engage in their former occupation.

This is precisely in the form in which I read the motion to the House yesterday, and I have very great pleasure in moving it now, as I have no doubt that the enquiry which is proposed will elicit not only information as to existing arrangements, which I have already given to the House in speaking on my hon. friend's motion, but it doubtless will furnish the committee with very much fuller information on the subject, as my statement to the House was, of course, only a summary of the very great work which has been undertaken by the Military Hospitals Commission, and by various committees and boards which have been already created.

I have no doubt that the work which this committee will do will be of as great service to the House and to the country as that which was performed by the Committee on Pensions last session. I also entertain no doubt that this Committee will proceed with the discharge of its duties with the same ability, energy and devotion which characterized the work of the Pensions Committee last year.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Is it the intention that the committee shall sit during the recess, and if so, is any provision being made to that effect?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No provision is required. The House is technically in session during the adjournment, and a committee has the same power to sit as if we were proceeding with business here from day to day.

Motion agreed to.

CONGESTION OF RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) desired to obtain information as to the effect of the reduction in passenger trains. I have a memorandum from Sir Henry Drayton which is somewhat lengthy. I can read it or have it embodied in Hansard.

Mr. GRAHAM: Put it on Hansard.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN handed in the following memorandum for publication in Hansard by consent of the House.

CONGESTION OF TRAFFIC.

The Right Honourable Premier desires a memorandum on the question of passenger train reduction and the consequent results on traffic.

Attached hereto is a copy of the judgment of the Board on the question of a reduced passenger service and the necessity of drastic action.

The following statement gives the number of trains cancelled, engines released, crews released, and reduction of train mileage daily and weekly, with the resultant approximate coal saving on the Canadian Pacific, Grand Trunk, and Canadian Northern Railways:

	C.P.R.	G.T.R.	C.N.R.
Trains cancelled ..	59	57	18
Engines released ..	24	28	12
Crews released ...	27	19	15
Train miles reduced daily	3,611	3,409	1,924
Train miles reduced weekly	25,280	23,866	11,544
Approximate coal saving in tons per week	1,204	1,137	577

The above statistics, as reported by the railway companies, are confirmed by present time tables and the observations of the Board's operating department.

All the equipment available has been put in freight service, but the freight service has not enjoyed the full benefit of the additions owing to the fact that the companies have been running for some time at high pressure, with locomotives so busy that they were not being repaired as and when they should, with the result that a comparatively large number of locomotives are now under repair.

The weather conditions have been such that the anticipated movement has not been obtained.

Effective steps were taken to increase the supply of coal, coke, and raw materials for munition works by movement by the car ferries over Lake Erie. The sudden piling up of ice entirely prevented this movement. For the first time in some thirty years even passenger ferries at Detroit were either unable to run or were impeded in their work, and for some time the car ferries running between Windsor and Detroit had to cease operation.

Coincident with the reduction of passenger service, weather conditions became and have continued bad and transportation rendered difficult. These difficulties have been the more acute owing to the shortage of labour. The different yards at terminal and transfer points were blocked with snow. The snow was not removed while in a soft condition, as the railways claim owing to a shortage of men, and the work of cleaning up the yards at once became both expensive and difficult.

At Massena Springs, for example, the Grand Trunk reported only yesterday that they could get only a limited number of men to dig out coal cars at that point, urgently required in Ottawa, although they were paying wages as high as $4 a day in view of the emergency.

The effect of weather conditions may be illustrated by the investigation lately held by the Board with reference to the service between Quebec and Chicoutimi.

Weather conditions were, comparatively speaking, favorable from the period January 1st to January 13th, both inclusive. During that period the line under observation carried 538 passenger cars, 1,626 freight cars, and 25 snow ploughs, or a total of 2,189 cars. In making this total haul, 2,074 tons of coal were consumed.

During the second period under observation, January 14th to January 24th, both inclusive, there were moved over the line, 290 passenger cars, 1,620 freight cars, and 33 snow ploughs,—total 1,943 cars.

In making this movement, and for an eleven day period as against thirteen days in the first instance, no less than 2,626 tons of coal were consumed. As a result it would seem that, during the second period, with two days less operation, 552 tons of coal were burned in excess of that consumed in the former period, although 246 less cars were carried.

The conditions to-day leave very much to be desired. The movement is not what it ought to be. Beyond all question it would have been a great deal worse had the passenger service not been reduced.

The approximate amount of coal saved by reducing the service is 2,918 tons a week. These figures are not based upon extraordinary conditions, but upon ordinary operating conditions. If it had been at all possible to have maintained the old passenger service and carry on freight business, which I very much doubt, a much larger amount than this tonnage would have been required.

With the coal shortage common both to American and Canadian points, differing only in degree at different centres, and with the railways, disappointed in their own coal movement, commandeering coal for the purpose of keeping their trains running, if the result of the decreased passenger service has merely enabled munition works and coal dealers to obtain the coal formerly consumed in the passenger service, rendering unnecessary, as the reduction does, confiscation of coal at least to that extent, on this ground alone the reduction of passenger service, in my view, was entirely justified.

The reduction, however, has done more than this. It has enabled the railways, even under the present trying conditions, to continue the coal movement, to continue hauling a sufficient quantity of grain to be turned into flour for the overseas forces, and to continue the service to the munition plants, with the result that, although impeded, these most necessary activities have been carried on.

Objections have naturally been made to the reduced service, but I think I may say that wherever those members of the public who are complaining have learned the traffic conditions obtaining in the country, the necessity of keeping up the movement of food and munitions to the front and the supplying of coal and feed corn and other necessities to our own people, the reductions and all consequent inconveniences have been cheerfully accepted.

TRAFFIC CONGESTION.

The Chief Commissioner:—

The matter of traffic congestion has been anxiously considered for some time past. In so far as the fact of congestion is concerned, there is no room for doubt.

Coal and coke shipments have been delayed to a serious, and in some instances to an alarming, extent; the proper supply of raw materials to munition factories has been interrupted; and the movement of grain from the North West, which is much required not only by the grain producing territory in the West but as well by the consuming eastern centres, to say nothing at all of the overseas' demands which must be met, has been interfered with.

The grain movement from the West has been limited to some extent by the movement into and out of the Eastern territory and storage facilities therein, and has also in no small measure been injuriously affected by a shortage of box cars and by a shortage of men, and to a lesser extent of locomotive power.

The causes of congestion are not altogether a railway failure, but include an irregular loading movement overseas, resulting in an uncertainty in the railway movement and consequent congestion of traffic of itself in excess of the traffic ordinarily offered on Canadian lines.

Over and above all this, the situation is rendered the more acute by reason of the fact that, owing to the financial and traffic conditions obtaining in 1914, and for a portion of 1915, the Railway Companies had not ordered equipment, which has now become necessary, and later were unable to get it, speaking generally, except at largely increased prices on deliveries at an early date.

Again, over and above all this, the congestion became more marked, in the first instance on the lines in American territory, with the result that traffic which otherwise would have been routed on American lines was routed via Canadian lines and offered in large quantities before protective embargoes went into force. The result is a traffic congestion at all points at the border, both on the Canadian and American sides, and at a large number of the divisional points and at all large terminals.

The imperative duty of the Board is to see, in the first instance, that this country fails in no regard in supplying materials necessary in the prosecution of the war. This, of course, means that the transportation required by the Imperial Munitions Board from the different factories producing munitions or materials required by the Empire and its Allies, must be properly and efficiently supplied. It also means that the full movement of grain and flour required both by Great Britain and by the Allied Nations be fully and completely maintained.

In like manner, it is the duty of the Board to see that the freight movement of the necessities of life for our own people and raw material required for our export trade, on which depends so much in the matter of exchange and the financial standing of the country, is not allowed to suffer.

The Board has done everything possible to expedite the movement of these commodities with the equipment and competent men now available for freight service. No more can at the moment be done in this direction—the Railways are using every man available and every engine fit to use owned by the Companies or which they have been able to rent for this purpose.

The question now that the Board has to decide is as to whether the movement already referred to as being so necessary should continue to suffer, or whether, on the other hand, engines and men now used in the passenger business ought to be released and put into the freight service.

In my opinion, there is no room for doubt as to what ought to be done. Convenience and comfort on the one hand must be sacrificed to necessity on the other.

The companies have been advised that the freight movement must be increased and the passenger movement curtailed to the full extent that that movement can be curtailed and the necessary communication between different districts maintained.

Circulars No. 138 and 139 issued by the Board, requiring ten days' notice to the Board and to the public of changes in passenger service will be suspended until further order. It is necessary that this should be done, in view of the direction to the Railway Companies to forthwith cut off all unnecessary passenger movement and to increase the facilities of the freight service.

It is quite true that not all of the passenger locomotives can be effectively used in the freight service, but many of them can however; and, apart from the question of locomotives, the crews will become available and the supply of railway men, competent and efficient, directly increased in the proportion that the passenger service is reduced. Over and above all this in the public interest in view of the coal shortage existing the large quantity of coal consumed in passenger service ought to be curtailed as much as possible.

More effective service can be given in the mechanic and locomotive shops of the Companies, and the freight equipment be better maintained and made more efficient than it is to-day, with a reduced passenger service.

There will also be more room in the yards and a more free and expeditious movement of freight trains will become possible.

In my view, the Board cannot well at the present moment order the Companies to remove any specific trains. The details of the different passenger movements are much more familiar to the Companies than they are to the Board, and in the reductions that must be made the Companies will have to see that every section of the country at least has the necessary passenger movement both in and out, although this may mean the carrying on of some trains not of themselves remunerative and the cancellation of trains which may be remunerative to the Companies.

The chief congestion is to be found at the frontier and on the section between Hamilton and Toronto. Three Companies are directly interested in the passenger movement here,—the Grand Trunk, Canadian Pacific, and Toronto, Hamilton, & Buffalo Railway Companies. The territory is one requiring, undoubtedly, a good passenger service. Probably each and every Company will be able to show that every train operated in this district is operated at a profit. It is, however, absolutely necessary that at this the most congested point, the companies must lose their passenger revenue and the public be inconvenienced, until the present emergency is past. There are now 40 trains operated daily over the territory, that is, 20 into and 20 out of Toronto. In view of these circumstances, a radical cut in this service must immediately go into effect.

This district must be supplied with coal and raw material, not only owing to its own necessities, but also owing to the fact that in it are situated a large number of munition factories now in danger of being closed.

In my view, direction ought to be given immediately that out of these 40 trains 16 must be cancelled, the Companies to select out of the total those trains which can be cancelled with the least possible public inconvenience. The mere factor of Company revenue cannot be made a controlling factor.

After a careful review of the situation, I am further of the opinion that the Canadian Pacific ought to and can re-arrange its service so that a saving can be made of some 26 engines and crews, the Grand Trunk 35, and the Canadian Northern 12.

The reductions which are now proposed in the passenger service, entailing as they do a considerable loss of passenger revenue in some cases to the companies and inconvenience to the general public, are merely tentative. As and when the congestion from which the country is now suffering, and which probably will continue to a greater or less degree until the opening of navigation, is removed, the service must be restored.

All companies must use all suitable equipment and men released from the passenger service for the transportation of freight.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LABOUR TROUBLE AT THETFORD MINES.

Mr. VERVILLE:

What were the names and occupations of the gentlemen sent to Thetford Mines to get information or to settle the labour trouble during last year?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Stands.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This question of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) has been on the Order Paper since the 25th January.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The reason it has not been answered is that my hon. friend the Minister of Labour has been absent for a very considerable time in connection with the strike in the western coal mines.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I know, but there must be a record of these names in his office.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may have neglected it, but I have had rather too much to do.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

PURCHASE OF LEWIS MACHINE GUNS.

Mr. KYTE:

1. What is the number of Lewis machine guns purchased by the Department of Militia and Defence since August 1, 1914?
2. How many were purchased during the year 1916?
3. What was the price paid for each gun?
4. Have any complaints against the Lewis machine guns reached the Government?
5. If so, when?
6. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the Lewis machine gun has been condemned by the United States War Department?

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not considered in the public interest to answer this question at present.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

MAIL ROUTE; BRAMPTON AND PALESTINE.

Mr. TRUAX:

1. Was a petition received by the Postmaster General's Department from residents on Rural Mail delivery route between Brampton and Palestine, Peel county, to serve one Ed. McCann?
2. If so, by whom was it presented, and on what date?
3. What action has been taken by the department in regard to same?

Mr. BLONDIN:

1. Yes.
2. Presented by Mr. Blain, M.P. for Peel in July last.
3. No action taken by the department because request is contrary to regulations of rural delivery.

QUARANTINE RESERVE AT COUTTS.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. How much land is set aside for the Quarantine Reserve at Coutts, Alberta?
2. How much stock was quarantined at this reserve during the past year of 1916?
3. Have representations been made to the Government for the opening of this reserve for settlement?
4. Does the Government consider it necessary to retain so much land for the Quarantine Reserve?
5. Is any of this reserve sub-let to ranchers?
6. If so, to whom, and at what rate?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. The land set aside for the quarantine reserve at Coutts, is that portion bounded by the Milk river on the north, the Alberta Railway Company's right-of-way on the west, the International Boundary on the south, and the dividing line between ranges 14 and 15 on the east, west of the fourth Meridian.

2. The number of animals quarantined at Coutts during the year of 1916: 34,384 sheep, 3 goats, 3 swine.

3. Yes, but as the land was still required for quarantine purposes, no action could be taken with a view to opening up for settlement lands included in the reserve.

4. It is considered necessary to retain our present quarantine reserve at Coutts in order to provide grazing for the large bands of sheep entering this country from the United States and quarantined at that point. Owing to the nature of the soil, it is very difficult for the animals to obtain sufficient grass without wandering over a wide territory. It is also advisable that the land should be retained in view of changes it may be necessary to make in the Animals Quarantine Regulations as circumstances require.

5. No record of such.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—CARRIAGE OF LIQUORS.

*Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

Referring to "An Act in aid of Provincial Legislation Prohibiting the sale or use of Intoxicating Liquors" passed last session, and attaching heavy penalties to the carrying of such liquors into prohibition provinces:

1. Is the Government aware that large quantities of intoxicating liquors have been carried by its own railway and steamship employees from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into Prince Edward Island contrary to the provisions of the Act above cited?

2. What instructions, if any, did the Government give its railway and steamship employees in regard to the carrying of such liquors from the mainland into the province of Prince Edward Island?

3. If no instructions were given, why did the Government elect to pursue such a course?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. The Department of Railways and Canals has no information as to the extent of the movement of intoxicating liquors by the Canadian Government railways and steamers from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island, and is not aware that any movement has taken place contrary to the provisions of the Act.

2. Instructions in the hands of agents on the Canadian Government Railways recite the clauses of Federal Act May 18, 1916, as to penalty attaching for shipping intoxicating liquors contrary to law.

JUDGES ON PROVINCIAL COMMISSIONS.

Mr. PARDEE:

1. Has the Department of Justice or any officer thereof given any opinion as to the right of judges to sit upon commissions enacted by provincial governments?

2. If so, what was said opinion?

3. Was the advice of the Department of Justice asked and obtained by the Minister of Public Works previous to his charges before Judge Galt, that judges so acting were taking graft?

4. If so, what was the date of asking said advice, and what opinion was given by the Department of Justice?

1. No, except as may appear by the letters, copies of which are annexed.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The Minister of Public Works did not at any time ask or obtain the advice of the Department of Justice on the question.

4. Answered by No. 3.

Ottawa, October 11, 1906.

My Dear Sir,—I have your letter of the 6th inst., asking my opinion whether the statutes of 1905, chapter 31, section 7, would interfere with your acting upon a commission for revision and consolidation of the statutes in force in your province.

I am quite aware, as you point out, that it has been usual for judges in Ontario to act upon such commissions, and that some of the judges of the Superior Courts in Ontario are appointed upon a commission, recently constituted for revision of the statutes of that province.

I have not given any very profound consideration to the question whether such a position is or is not opposed to the spirit of the enactment to which you refer. I have thought that was rather a question for the construction, judicially, and by the judge himself, which he might put upon the provision, but I may say that although the language of the section is very sweeping in its provision that judges are not to engage in any occupation or business other than judicial duties, it would occur to my mind that Parliament never could have intended to prohibit a judge from work of the character in question. Such work is offered him by the Crown itself. True, it is not the Crown in the same capacity as that from which his commission as a judge issued; still, it is an appointment, or mandate, from the Crown itself which he is asked to undertake, and the duties, while possibly not actually judicial, are none the less of a character which demand the exercise of judicial functions and certainly such as in no way conflict with judicial duties, unless possibly to the extent you indicate, that time might be taken which otherwise would be devoted to judicial work.

Whether the acceptance of any particular commission of this character would or would not so occupy the time of the judge as to interfere materially with his ability properly to discharge his judicial duties must, I think, be decided by each judge for himself, but upon the question whether the enactment was intended to preclude the judge from accepting a commission of this character, my view would be that there was no impropriety in the judge so accepting.

I remain, yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) A. B. Aylesworth.

The Honourable
Mr. Justice Wetmore,
Moosomin, Sask.

Ottawa, 10th May, 1906.

Dear Judge Harvey,—Referring to your letter of 24th March last, the minister desires me to say that he does not consider that your acting as commissioner for the revision of the statutes is within the prohibition of the recent Act forbidding judges to engage in business.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) E. L. Newcombe.

The Honourable
Mr. Justice Harvey,
Macleod, Alta.

Ottawa, May 2, 1910.

My Dear Maclean,—I have your letter of the 28th April with reference to your proposal to appoint Judge Drysdale Chairman of the Commission to Administer the Affairs of the Victoria General Hospital at Halifax.

I see no objection from the point of view of this department in the judge acting in this capacity, and the more especially as you state his services will be gratuitous and the position purely honorary.

I remain, yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) A. B. AYLESWORTH.

The Honourable
A. K. Maclean,
Attorney General,
Halifax, N.S.

Ottawa, November 10, 1910.

Dear Sir,—I have your letter of the 8th inst., with reference to the question whether section 33 of the Judges' Act (R.S.C., c. 138) prevents a judge from acting as commissioner of the Victoria General Hospital at Halifax.

This is a matter of interpretation of a statute, and therefore one for judicial decision. My opinion in the matter is of no more value than that of any other lawyer, but I have no objection to saying to you that it would not seem to me a judge acting in this capacity was engaging in an "occupation or business," more especially as the position, I understand, carries with it no salary of any description.

I did not know whether or not any judge of Nova Scotia had been in fact appointed to these positions, but some time ago the Attorney General asked me if this department would have any objection to such an appointment being made, and I replied to him that I saw no objection from the point of view of this department, inasmuch as I assumed that the duties of the office would not interfere with the judge effectively discharging his regular judicial duties.

I remain, yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) A. B. Aylesworth.

John J. Power, Esq., K.C.,
Halifax, N.S.

Ottawa, 16th October, 1912.

My Dear Chief Justice,—Referring to your letter of 2nd instant, I would prefer not to express an opinion as to the application of the statute to the execution of commissions by the judges. There is, of course, quite a variety of commissions which may be issued, and some may be regarded in a different light from others. Therefore, I do not wish to give a general answer. Moreover, I think that the judges must determine for themselves in the first instance the propriety of accepting any commission, and that I must remain free to consider any case which may arise and require my consideration unembarrassed by a previously stated opinion.

With kind regards,

I remain, yours very truly,

(Sgd.) C. J. Doherty.

Quebec.

Ottawa, 4th December, 1913.

Sir,—Referring to your letter of 27th ultimo, wherein you ask the Minister of Justice to be good enough to give the leave necessary so that Judge Patterson, of the County Court for District No. 5 may act as a member of the Provincial Commission as to the use of electricity in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, I observe that in your view this would not cause any interference with the discharge of the judge's judicial duties or detriment to the administration of justice within his district. In these circumstances the minister does not perceive that any leave on his part would be necessary or effectual. It is the duty of the judge, of course, to see that he does not infringe the requirements of the Judges' Act, and the minister exercises no dispensing power.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) E. L. Newcombe,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

The Honourable
O. T. Daniels, K.C.,
Attorney General,
Halifax, N.S.

IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE.

ADJOURNMENT TO ENABLE PRIME MINISTER TO ATTEND.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday the 7th instant, it stand adjourned until Thursday, the 19th day of April next.

He said: This motion is made in pursuance of what passed between my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and myself in the debate on the Address. I have consulted him as to a suitable date on which to re-assemble, and we are both agreed it ought to be after Easter Sunday, which falls this year on the 8th of April. The date I am suggesting here for the re-assembling is the Thursday of the following week. It seemed to me that we should leave a convenient period between Easter and the date on which the House re-assembles, and furthermore, in view of the purpose for which the adjournment is being made, it hardly seems possible to adjourn for a shorter period than that which I have here indicated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

PROMOTION OF TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Before the opening of Parliament a large delegation of manufacturers and business men, from Montreal and Toronto chiefly, approached my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) with a view to obtaining aid from the Government in promoting closer trade relations between Canada and France. At the head of the delegation was the hon. Senator Beaubien, who has taken a very deep interest in this question. He visited France as one of the Canadian delegates at his own expense. There is a widespread feeling both in France and Canada that the trade between the two countries could be very materially increased if the natural resources and manufactured products of the two countries were better advertised and more widely known. I understand that a concrete scheme was proposed to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that the Chambers of Commerce in France, acting under the authority of the French Government, are willing to provide us with what I might call an exhibition train, which would start from the north of France and, travelling from city to city and town to town, display samples of our manufactured products and mineral and other resources to the people of that country. I need not say that this is a very important matter, and that if this plan were carried out, it would promote to a very considerable degree closer trade relations between the two countries. There are many things we can buy from France, and many more things that France can take from us. I understand that my hon. friend is well disposed towards this scheme, and I should like to know before the adjournment if anything concrete has been done towards carrying it out. I understand from the answer which the minister is reported to have made to the delegation, that he is willing to do something along this line, but he was leaving for England just then and the matter was dropped. I can assure my hon. friend that there are many manufacturers and business men in Canada awaiting with interest the answer of the Government, so that they can make preparation for having the train equipped and the manufactured goods and natural resources of Canada widely advertised in France.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend has spoken of closer trade relations between Canada and France. Of course, what he meant was trade exchanges. There is nothing official about this; that is, there is no question of negotiations between this Government and the French Government in regard to trade relations now existing or that may exist in future between the two governments. The information in reference to this matter can be tersely and very quickly given. The trade delegation which was spoken of by my hon. friend met me and we had a conference in Ottawa, based upon this idea: In the first place it was not proposed by the delegation, nor on the other hand was it sustained by the department as a possible proposal, that we should make an exhibition of Canada's resources and manufactured goods in France, or that France should undertake a similar exhibition in Canada. It was all based on the idea that as our trade commission had visited France and opened up personal and business relationships with their Chambers of Commerce and business men, if circumstances were at all favourable, it would be a good thing to follow that up with an exhibition on wheels of samples of such goods as in the opinion of our trade commission and our manufacturers and business men might stand a chance of selling economically and profitably in France. This exhibition of samples, for such it would really be, would be on wheels and not housed in the Chambers of Commerce or in an exhibition or buildings of any kind. It would be much after the style of similar displays that have been made in Canada on two or three occasions, where samples of different lines of goods are arranged and displayed in cars, and the train runs through the country, stopping at various places, and an opportunity is given to the buying public to come in and see the goods, and to the exponent of the line of goods on the car to give information as to prices, possibilities, and the like of that. That is the first thing I wish to make plain: that, so far as Canada is concerned, it was not to be an exhibition, but a display of samples of goods which might possibly find a market in France. Having discussed the question with the delegation, the conclusion I came to, and expressed to them, was somewhat along this line. If the manufacturers generally thought the plan feasible and advisable, and would stand behind it, then in the first place they should provide the samples at their own expense. In the second place, if arrangements can be made for the carriage of these goods across the Atlantic and throughout France without expense to Canada, that will cover another factor in the case and will be another step towards the realization of the idea. I was informed that these samples would be carried from New York by the French line of vessels, without expense to the exhibitors, and that the same line would bring free to Canada a display of samples which the French people should arrange for exhibition in Canada. I was informed also that arrangements could be made in France for the free transportation of the exhibition train throughout those parts of France which it was proposed to visit. That, I understand, still holds good. The Department of Commerce of France and the Chambers of Commerce which have been approached were in nearly every case favourable to such an interchange of samples, and I believe that the French Government were favourable to the plan being carried out along these lines. When I left for England, the matter was in about that stage, and I left a memorandum and a letter which based the whole operation on the conditions I have named. When I was in London, I received some advice from this side, especially of the general adherence of the manufacturers and producers to the scheme and their intention to stand behind it and make it successful. My hon. friend will see that in a thing of this kind, unless it is very carefully thought out and very well done, it would be better not to start it at all. And arrangements for such a work cannot be made within a limited space of time. My own view was that this was an excellent idea, one that would be very beneficial if it could be carried out. But there was then, as there still is, some doubt in my mind as to whether this is the opportune time. When I was in Great Britain a couple of weeks ago, nothing impressed me more than the burden which was laid upon the inland transport system of Great Britain and upon the transport facilities as between Great Britain and the Allied countries in carrying on the operations of the war. I am quite certain that any request made to the British Government to allow their railways to allocate a train to such a purpose as this, would not be acquiesced in. I was also impressed with the fact that in France there is no more difficult and pressing problem than the transport problem. Great Britain, with supplies obtained from the United States and Canada, is making every possible effort to sustain the work of the French Government in preparing the transport which, within the next few days may be, and within the next few months certainly, will be absolutely necessary for the conduct of the war. The question arises in my mind, and it sticks there yet, as to whether it will be possible under these conditions for the French Government to favour the abstraction from necessary transport of any portion of the effective power of the railway system. That I think must be settled first of all; and I am now in communication with the French Minister of Commerce, who, I know, has had this matter brought to his attention, to know whether or not he considers it possible that it can be done now, or whether it would be better at a more favourable and opportune time. That is where the matter stands. I have great sympathy with the idea, but would like to see it carried out at the most opportune time when we are best assured of good results.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am perfectly satisfied with the very clear and interesting answer given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). He has referred to a memorandum sent to the delegates on his departure for England. Would he send me, confidentially if he thinks best, the correspondence on the subject. I ask in no critical spirit. I have taken some interest in this matter, as the hon. gentleman knows, and wish to work harmoniously with him and the delegates to carry out the scheme to success. The hon. gentleman has made a very luminous statement. I would be the first to admit that perhaps it would not be proper to insist at this time on this train being equipped and sent from point to point in France, in view of the necessities arising from the war.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no objection to my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) having a copy of the instructions. An order of the House has already been passed for the correspondence. But the correspondence is very voluminous, and a great deal of it is not necessary to an understanding of the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I leave that to the hon. minister; all I want is the essential documents.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I went through the whole correspondence, and I can give in a very few pages all that is necessary to an understanding of the project. In the meantime, I will send to the hon. gentleman a copy of the memorandum.

DOMINIONS ROYAL COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the report of the Dominions Royal Commission being prepared, and is it likely to be presented soon?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The reason I went to Great Britain so hurriedly and at the time I did was that the commission was meeting in London for the purpose of drawing up the final report. The commission finished that work while I was in London. The draft is ready for final revision. Two reports will be issued, an interim report for Canada, which will be out probably in the course of three or four weeks, and the final report of the commission, which will probably be issued inside of a couple of months.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY THE HON. ROBERT ROGERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, in order to call attention to an editorial article which appeared in this morning's Ottawa Citizen, referring to a report recently made by Commissioner Galt, of the city of Winnipeg, a report that carries with it in its every line unmistakable evidence of animus, temper and misrepresentation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) is speaking to a question of privilege. I submit to you, Sir, that it is not in order for him to impugn the character of the commmissioner. He can dispute the commissioner's conclusions, if he wants to, but he has no right to impugn the character of the commissioner.

Mr. SPEAKER: Speaking without having had opportunity to consult the rules, I am inclined to think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. ROGERS: I accept your ruling in the matter, Mr. Speaker. However, I presume that this report was made largely due to the fact that some time previously I had occasion to refer to Commissioner Galt as a judge who was guilty of bartering the honour of the King's—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: I am only repeating what I said on a previous occasion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I take the same point of order. The hon. gentleman is entitled to make an explanation. He can deny, or qualify as he may, the findings of the commissioner, but he has no right to impugn the character of the commissioner or his authority in making that investigation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that Rule 19 does not cover that special point; I have not had opportunity to refer to Bourinot.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Rule 19 is not the rule on which I rely. My point is this: On a question of privilege, the hon. gentleman has the right to deny statements that have been made, and to disprove the findings of the commissioner. But at this stage, on a question of privilege, he has no right to characterize the character or work of the commissioner.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is that the member who rises to a question of privilege must state the ground of his complaint, and deny, or qualify the statement.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) put his objection on the ground of the commissioner's judicial position?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, I do not make the point that the commissioner had or had not a judicial position. That is a point to be debated at the proper time. But I say that the hon. minister (Mr. Rogers), rising to make a personal explanation, has no right, except to deny or qualify the finding of the commissioner; he has no right to question the commissioner's authority.

Mr. ROGERS: I did not refer to questioning his authority.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: My reference was by way of explanation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend said that he had attacked the commissioner for occupying an illegal position —that is a thing he has no right to do.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not agree with my right hon. friend in that; I think I am quite within the rule. However, I shall not dispute the point, because it is not relevant to the matter to which I purpose referring. I was simply saying that in his report he gives every evidence of being sore. This, however, was no justification for the article that appeared in the Citizen of this morning's date, in that there is no honest reason why a sheet like the Ottawa Citizen should take this special occasion of also being sore. Yet, for the past two years at least, it has given evidence of being sore, and very sore.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is not speaking to his question of privilege. I repeat that he can refer to the finding of the judge, but he has no right to go beyond that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon. Over and over again in this House I have heard newspaper articles discussed in the same way that my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) is now discussing them, upon the Orders of the Day as a question of privilege. I have never before heard such a point of order raised as that raised by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The judge to whom my hon. friend refers was acting in a position which has been assumed by judges over and over again.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. ROGERS: I am speaking of the Citizen just now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend can do no more than deny what the Citizen says.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order in respect of the Citizen newspaper. The sole question is as to how the hon. member should make denial of the specific article complained of.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is over-anxious in his desire that I should not make the statement that I purpose making. Were it not for the fact that I am an individual known to be full of great kindness and long-suffering, I would long before this have taken this House and the country into my confidence in respect to the reasons why I have not to-day the full and complete support of the Citizen newspaper. I hope my right hon. friend does not think I am out of order in saying that. Because, if the Citizen was the pure sheet that it would like its readers to believe it to be, then it would undoubtedly be obliged to support me, for the simple reason that the owners of the Citizen newspaper had the very best of reasons to know that the affairs of my department are honourably and honestly administered in the public interest. Heaven knows, the owners of the Citizen know, and I know, that I have not the support of that petty little sheet to-day simply because I would not yield to pressure and become a party to the purchasing, for a post office site in the city of Montreal, of a lot which the Southams were most anxious to sell to the Government at a cost of $100,000; a site that was not suitable and not in the public interest to purchase.

4 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Order. Is the hon. gentleman in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. leader of the Opposition raises a point of order. Will he state it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The hon. gentleman proceeds not by way of making a personal explanation regarding the article in the Citizen, but by way of making an attack upon a citizen of this country. That, I submit, is not a proper explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not had an opportunity of going into the matter as fully as I would wish. I am of opinion, and while I was a private member of this House

I held the view that it was open to an hon. member to defend his character from attacks by newspapers, and I have always noticed that on questions of privilege more or less latitude has been shown. It does seem to me that it ought to be open to an hon. member of this House to so state his position that he may be enabled to clear aspersions which may have reflected on his character. For that reason, I would feel inclined to err rather on the side of latitude than on that of restriction in the matter of enabling an hon. member to make his defence.

Mr. ROGERS: My only desire was to give to the House and the country the reasons why I have been subjected to the various attacks, especially the one published to-day in the Ottawa Citizen. The only reason that I can assign, Sir, for that is that I have not been prepared to despoil the administration of my department for the personal gain of that compact. If I had, I would to-day have their full and devoted support. That is the explanation which I give of the attacks upon me by the Ottawa Citizen, not only to-day but upon former occasions, every one of which has been unfounded, untrue, and unworthy of a paper claiming to be a reputable journal.

RECRUITING IN PARIS AND BURFORD.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. H. FISHER (Brant): An item appears in the Toronto World of Thursday last, the 1st instant, which I have no doubt has appeared also in other papers. The item is sent out from Brantford, Ontario, and reads:

> Exodus from Village.
> Referring to the poor success which has been attendant upon recruiting in Paris, Brant county, an officer who was prominent in recruiting around Burford last fall makes the pertinent comment that the village of Burford is now denuded of young men. It was not enlistment that took them, he added, but an exodus to the States.

I wish to say that this item reflects most unfairly upon two important centres in the constituency I represent, namely the town of Paris and the village of Burford. In fairness to the town of Paris, my home town, I desire to say that I doubt if there is any town in Canada of the same size that has a better record in the way of recruiting, and, as the former Minister of Militia has said, in the way of fighting also. It has a total population of about 4,500, and, owing to the large number of girls who are employed in the mills, probably 60 per cent of the population is of the gentler sex. Yet from this town over 500 men have enlisted, being one in nine of the total population, or one in five at the outside, of the male population. That, it seems to me, is a record of which the citizens of Paris have reason to be proud; and of which I, as a citizen of Paris, certainly am proud. A number of these young men have already laid down their lives for the Empire, and we have many more who have returned seriously maimed and injured.

In regard to the second statement that the young men of Burford have gone to the United States to avoid enlistment, I have no hesitation whatever, knowing the young men of Burford as I do, in saying that the statement is absolutely untrue; and I doubt very much if any officer ever made it. I would much prefer to believe tha he has been misquoted.

I have made these few remarks as I felt it was only fair, in justice to these two important centres in my constituency, that I should offer this explanation.

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN laid on the table of the House a report by Colonel Bruce on the Canadian Army Medical Service.

He said: This is the only copy that is available on this side of the ocean at the present moment. I have, however, decided that it had better be laid on the table of the House, as further copies are coming in the immediate future. I should explain that it is marked "confidential, for official use only." Under ordinary conditions, I should think it ought not to be brought down; but it would appear that it has been made public, wholly or partially, through the press, I do not know in what way. Further, it seems to me that to avoid any misconception and understanding which might arise, if it was not brought down and laid upon the table of the House, it is better to take that course than to refuse to lay upon the Table a document which was intended only for confidential official use in the first instance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will it be printed during the recess?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is being printed now, I understand. Some forty copies, I think, are coming from England by mail. These will be available, and we will have further copies printed if necessary.

I am also laying upon the table of the House the report of the Board of Enquiry of which Sir William Baptie was chairman. This report deals with practically the same matter as the report I have already laid upon the table of the House, and it is proper that if the one report is placed before the House and the country, the other report should also be made public.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I may say that General Wilson of Montreal notified me that he had found a parcel in his office which had been left by a young soldier named Shaw who came back some time last fall. It had been injured by water, but he forwarded it to me last week, though I did not get either the letter or the parcel until yesterday. It consists of four or five copies of a report—I have not looked at it—of General Jones, and the Bruce report. I think that if there is any way of making provision for them being printed also, it should be made I will send them to the Minister of Militia. As to the publication of these reports, the first report, a fly leaf, was given to me by Dr. Bruce, and the next two or three reports were sent by Surgeon-General Jones. Soon thereafter I found correspondence in England and in Canada from some ladies' societies—I forget what they were—and from Sir William Osler on the subject. Then we found, a week or two later, correspondence from the other side. I presume that the reports give a little about each side concerned in the case. I make this explanation to the Prime Minister as to how the reports got out. The first report I ever saw was issued by some women's associations to which General Jones had evidently given a copy.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER GALT OF WINNIPEG.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As the report of Commissioner Galt has been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. Minister of Public Works, I expect that we will have it when the House meets again.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That was not a report made to this Government, and we have not got it, so far as I am aware.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not think it is beyond the power of the Government to get that report. It has been referred to in this House, and I think we should have it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that the rule to which my right hon. friend refers applies to the case in question, but I will give it consideration.

RESIGNATION OF SIR SAM HUGHES.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the late ex-Minister of Militia, which brought about the latter's resignation, be brought down?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It can be brought down.

Mr. MARCIL: It has not yet been brought down.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It has not.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE moved that the Bill be referred to a special committee composed of Messrs. Ames, Armstrong (Lambton), Bennett (Calgary), Blain, Cochrane, Carvell, Crothers, Cromwell, Donaldson, Fowler, Graham, Green, Lapointe, Lemieux, Macdonell, Maclean (York), McCurdy, Meighen, Murphy, Nesbitt, Oliver, Pugsley, Rainville, Reid, Sinclair and Turriff.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it the intention to convene the committee during the recess, and if so what arrangements are being made in that regard? Shall we meet in the minister's office, or where?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think it would be a good plan to meet say a week before the 19th of April, so that the matter would be fresh in our minds when the House resumes. We will undertake to call the committee together a week before that date.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Who will undertake to call it?

Mr. COCHRANE: I will.

Mr. GERMAN: Will the minister state what this committee is to do?

Mr. COCHRANE: It will go over the Bill, and approve, or disapprove, of the clauses and consider any representations made by the railway companies or other people with reference to it. It will consider the whole matter.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister does not suggest that the report of that committee will be binding on this House?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: If the committee is expected to meet during the adjournment, it would not be possible for me to attend, and, therefore, if it is intended to take serious action during that period I shall have to ask to be released from the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think that that would be a good reason for the hon. gentleman's retirement from the committee. I am rather inclined to think that there will be difficulty in getting the committee convened. It may be easy to call the members together, but many are called, and few may come. As I understand it, this Bill is referred to a special committee instead of being referred directly to the House. That committee, of course, will have to bring its report to the House to be dealt with by the Committee of the Whole in the usual way.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There may be difficulty in accomplishing a large amount of work upon this Bill, but possibly something can be done by such of the members of the committee as can assemble from time to time during adjournment. Of course, on account of the very great distance at which many hon. gentlemen reside, it would be impossible, I suppose, to do more than fix a certain date at which the Bill might be taken up for a week or ten days. It might be impossible to have the committee meet at certain intervals, because the journey which some of the members would be called upon to undertake is too great, and the inconvenience also would be too great. Possibly the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) might be able to accede to the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals that there should be a meeting say a week before the House re-assembles.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to disturb the arrangements; I only wish to make it clear that I would not be able to attend during the recess, and therefore, if there was an urgent reason for convening the full committee it would be better to release me, and appoint some other member.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The business on the Order Paper having been disposed of, I declare this sitting suspended until 5.15.

The House resumed at 5.15 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

Bill No. 24, An Act for granting to His Majesty aid for military and naval defence.

IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE.

STATEMENT BY SIR ROBERT BORDEN.

Right Hon Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Perhaps the House will permit me before moving the adjournment, to depart from the usual custom and say a few words. I desire to express, in the first place, my appreciation of the consideration of hon. gentlemen, and especially of hon. gentlemen on the other side, in expediting the business of the House by reason of the necessity that I and some of my colleagues, should proceed overseas in the immediate future. As far as the call for that purpose concerned me, it seemed that one should consider it in the same way as if it were a call to the trenches. Therefore, putting aside all considerations of whatever character, I thought it my duty to obey it.

I realize, as I have said before, that the adjournment which has been agreed to and the arrangements necessary to bring about that adjournment within a suitable period entail some inconvenience upon hon. members of the House, but I know that considering the greatness of the cause which we all have at heart they will not be disposed to regard that inconvenience either as unnecessary or as undesirable.

We are facing in these days very great events. That might, indeed, be said of the whole period covered by the past two and a half years, but within the past eight or ten days events have been moving with even greater rapidity, and I trust, and more than that, I believe, that the trend of these events is for an earlier consummation of that issue towards which this country, in common with all the Empire, has directed its energies in no small way ever since the commencement of this war. Every reason that influenced the mind and the soul of the Canadian people when war was first declared prevails in ten-fold measure to-day. The renewal, in an intense form, of the submarine campaign with all the barbarous methods which accompany it, can only serve to steel our resolve. More than that, the sufferings and barbarities that have been inflicted on some of the smaller nations should serve to strengthen that determination. I am voicing an opinion in which I am sure my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will concur, when I say that the barbarities inflicted on the heroic Belgian people, in leading them into practical slavery by thousands, by tens of thousands, and even by hundreds of thousands, have shocked the conscience not only of the Allied nations but of the whole civilized world. It is fitting that we should at this moment and in this, if not in some more formal manner, raise our protest against such outrages and barbarities, which in the end can serve no good purpose even for the enemy nations, as they will but strengthen the determination of the British people and of all the Allied nations.

That brings me to the further thought that our own work in this war is by no means concluded. The Canadian people have done mighty things in this war. The splendour of their devotion, their resourcefulness, their determination, their valour and heroism on the field of battle, whether in attack or in defence, have placed Canada upon a status before the nations of the world to which none of us could have looked forward in August, 1914. Their effort has been a glorious one. But we have not yet attained to the authorized standard which was established in January a year ago, although we have made very considerable effort towards reaching that standard. The fact that nearly 180,000 men were enlisted in 1916, and that 165,000 of them went overseas in that year, constitutes in itself an achievement to which I believe few of us in August, 1914, could have looked forward. But, as I have said, the effort must not be stayed, because the purpose for which we have entered this war has not yet been accomplished. It may be that the war will yet be prolonged for a very considerable period. On the other hand, it may be that the end will come sooner than many of us now anticipate. As to all this, we cannot form even a conjecture which is based upon reliable grounds. But we do know that all the allied nations are united in the firm determination of which I have spoken, and we are all, I am sure, inspired with a just confidence that these efforts will not be in vain. All the sacrifices made, in blood and in treasure would indeed be vain, and worse than useless, if the great purpose for which the war was undertaken should not be accomplished. This is a war of nations, but more than that, it is a war of absolutely conflicting ideals; and unless the purpose for which it has been undertaken by the allied nations is accomplished, one could not look forward with reasonable confidence to a development of future civilization upon the principles of freedom and justice. The democracies of the world are on trial. So, I pray that we may, all, whether in this House or out of it, unite in the effort to throw the full strength of this country into the conflict. Appreciating, as I do, the co-operation of my hon. friends on the other side of the House in facilitating the passage of the Bill, the largest appropriation for one purpose that ever passed this Parliament, the largest for one purpose that is likely to pass this Parliament for many years to come, I most earnestly invite their continued co-operation, and the co-operation of all the people of this country, irrespective of political opinion, irrespective of race or creed, in the firm determination to make our cause triumphant, and for that purpose to throw into this war the greatest and strongest efforts of a united people. Once more, Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friends on the other side of the House for their co-operation in the passing of this measure, and I trust that it may be made thoroughly to subserve the great purpose for which it has been framed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in endeavouring to facilitate the business of the House, so that my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) and his colleagues might proceed to London in answer to the invitation they have received, we do not claim to have done anything for which we deserve thanks—we have only done what was our duty as members of this House and as Canadians

As regards the object of the war, I share the sentiments expressed by my right hon. friend. The course of this war, from the day when the neutrality of Belgium was cynically violated by Germany down to the present, and its latest developments, have shown the world, have satisfied everybody, that there can be but one end to the war, and that it must be carried to that end—such a victory over Germany that a recurrence of such an issue shall not be seen at least for generations to come.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 5.45 p.m., until Thursday the 19th day of April next.

Thursday, April 19, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE moved:

That the resolution adopted by the House on the 7th February, 1917, referring to Bill No. 13, an Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, to a special committee (of twenty-six) members, be amended by adding thereto:

1. That Rule 11 be suspended in connection therewith;

2. That the quorum of the said Committee be of nine members;

3. That the said Committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time; and have leave to sit while the House is in session; and also be authorized to have their proceedings and such evidence as may be taken, printed from day to day for the use of the Committee, and that Rule 74 be suspended in reference thereto; and

4. That the name "Kamouraska" be inserted immediately after the name "Lapointe".

Mr. GRAHAM: I am told that this is not really a consolidation of the Railway Act, but that it contains much new and important matter. I understand that the committee has not yet had a quorum and has not made the recommendation embodied in the resolution. Would it not be wiser and more in accordance with the rules of the House for the minister to call his committee together and have it recommend that this resolution be submitted to the House?

Mr. COCHRANE: It was an oversight that this was not done when the committee was moved. The committee is called to meet to-morrow morning and it would help things along if this motion were allowed to pass.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not suppose that much progress could be made by proceeding as suggested by the minister, because the ordinary notice of motion would have to be given before the rule could be suspended. I should like to make an inquiry as to a point raised by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), who was informally named as chairman in the absence of a quorum. He took the point that the appointment of the committee might be irregular, the rule providing that no committee of the House should consist of more than fifteen members unless by special leave of the House. I understood that the matter was to be looked into by the hon. Minister of Customs or by the hon. Minister of Railways. Has any decision been arrived at as to that point?

Mr. REID: I have not gone into the matter. I do not think that I agreed to look into it any more than any other member of the committee. I thought that perhaps the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley), knowing the rules of the House much better than I, would look into the matter and be able to say whether there was any irregularity. Personally, I do not agree with the interpretation of the rules by the hon. member for East Lambton.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is another point.

This committee is to consist of a joint committee of both Houses.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: I understood so.

Mr. REID: That was last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the hon. minister will look at Hansard he will find that that was to be the proceeding this year as well, in order to save time. That committee, therefore, will not be fully constituted if it meets before the Senate Committee joins with ours. It would be very much out of place for this House to say that its committee should sit while the House is in session until the Senate agrees to the same procedure.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would it not be more respectful to the committee to sit and see whether or not the suggestion has been made? As the committee has been appointed by unanimous resolution of the House, I would understand that it is regularly appointed. No committee can be appointed to be composed of more than fifteen members, unless by special permission of the House, and this committee has been so appointed. The committee has not yet sat and, it seems to me these questions should be referred to it for its consideration. The meeting of the committee was called, but there was no quorum and so there has been no real sitting of the committee yet.

The SPEAKER: I am of the opinion that this resolution is of such character as to require unanimous consent for its adoption. In the absence of such consent it cannot properly be put at this stage.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is not unanimous consent?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Motion stands.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

THETFORD MINES LABOUR TROUBLE.

Mr. VERVILLE: What were the names and occupations of the gentlemen sent to Thetford Mines to get information or to settle the labour trouble during last year?

Mr. CROTHERS: Stand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This question has been standing since the 25th of January. When may we expect an answer?

Mr. CROTHERS: I can give a verbal answer now. I was not in the city on the 25th of January and I was not here until after the House rose, so my attention was not called to the question. Two gentlemen were sent; one was Mr. Archand who was at that time one of the fair-wage officers of the department, and the other was Mr. Blanchet, a barrister of Ottawa.

POTATO CONSIGNMENTS.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON:

1. Has the Government been informed that it is alleged a large quantity of potatoes have been kept in cars, since first of November, 1916, on some lines of Canadian Government or other railways in Canada, and that said potatoes were frozen or spoiled, consequently having to be thrown away and thus unavailable for consumption?

2. Has the Government received any complaints in the matter? If so, from whom?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. Under a joint agreement the Grand Trunk railway handles Intercolonial freight at Montreal, and on November 15, that company complained that a large number of Intercolonial railway cars of potatoes had accumulated in their Montreal yards. The Intercolonial railway authorities urged consignees as strongly as possible to take delivery, and finally were obliged to threaten to unload if consignees would not.

2. No complaint since that time. The Government has no further information on the subject.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS UNDER SECTION 21 OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

How many appointments have been made by the present Administration since they took office, under the provision of Section 21 of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Certificates of Qualification issued by the commission since October 15, 1911, under the provisions of section 21 of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908—174.

What amounts, if any, were paid to the Outlook Publishing Company, Limited, or to F. C. Cox, of Middleton, N.S., during the year 1916, for printing and advertising?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Agriculture Department, $24; Post Office Department, $7.60, Public Works Department, $6.20.

COST OF HANSARD.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE:

What has been the total cost of the Hansard yearly for the last three years, as to cost of staff, translation, printing and distribution respectively?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

				$ 217,790 14

It is impossible to give the cost of distribution as all parliamentary papers are distributed from the one office and the exact cost of Hansard cannot be given.

FOOD INSPECTORS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many food inspectors are in the employ of the Canadian Government?

2. What was the total amount paid for remuneration of food inspectors in 1916?

3. How many new appointments were made in 1916?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

Agriculture: 1. 197 food inspectors (inspectors of meats, meat food products, canned fruits, vegetables and milk), appointed under the Meat and Canned Foods Act, are at the present time in the employ of the Department of Agriculture.

2. $254,729.95.

3. 42 new appointments were made in 1916, but of these 23 were made to replace officers who left the service during 1916.

Inland revenue: 1. 35.

2. $7,374.02.

3. 9 new appointments were made in 1916, but of these two were made to replace officers who left the service during 1916.

1. How many persons are employed in the customs service at the port of North Sydney?

2. What were the names, dates of appointments and respective salaries, on appointment of these persons?

4. If so, what are the names of the persons receiving increase and the respective amounts of said increases?

3. Have such claims been recognized by the Government?

4. If not, why not?

5. If so, what action has been taken in connection therewith?

6. In such cases is not the enlisted person entitled to pay up to time of discharge, and also the payment of his hospital account?

DEATH OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF CONNAUGHT. EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I should like to call the attention of the House briefly, and I hope fittingly, to a sad event which has occurred since the House adjourned. I allude to the death of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught, who passed away on the 14th of March at Clarence House in London after a brief illness. I very well remember the beautiful autumn day on which His Royal Highness and the Duchess of Connaught made their entry into the capital city of the Dominion, passing along in front of the old Parliament Building, and on to their new home farther down on the banks of the Ottawa. Her Royal Highness was by person entirely unknown to us at that time, but she was heartily welcomed as the consort of the soldier son of the well beloved Queen Victoria. As the wife of a soldier whom she accompanied on his journeyings around the Empire she became known to all, and her grace and dignity endeared her to the hearts of British subjects the wide world over. Her Royal Highness soon entered into the life of Canada, quietly but with zest. Canadian sports and social activities attracted her attention, and participation. Local charities, and the wider charities of the provinces and of the Dominion claimed her devotion. In all of these she participated unobtrusively, kindly, and effectively. The war brought about a situation very trying to Her Royal Highness, in that the land of her birth was involved in hostility to the land of her adoption. Her Royal Highness ably seconded the untiring efforts of the Duke of Connaught in everything that had for its object the welfare and comfort of the soldier, whether in Canada or at the front, and more particularly those whose lot it was, in the fortunes of war, to become prisoners in a hostile country. Great charities were inaugurated or helped by Her Royal Highness, and which, owing to her strong sympathy and tactful manner, were crowned with success. On leaving Canada in October, 1916, after a sojourn here of almost five years, she continued to go about doing good in London and its vicinity, the soldiers chiefly being the object of solicitude, and more particularly those from the country of her five years' sojourn. She has passed away, but not from our memories. Her singular directness of manner, her innate kindness, the personal touch which she seemed to give to her acquaintanceship and her friendships, remain with us. When the news of her death came across the ocean it left us all with a sense of personal loss. I think I may take it upon myself to say that I am voicing the opinion of this Parliament and of the people of Canada in asking this House to convey to His Royal Highness and to the family so sadly bereaved our deepest and most heartfelt sympathy.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the members of the House of Commons will, I am sure, avail themselves of this, the first opportunity at their disposal, to express their deep sense of reverence for the memory of the noble lady who for five years was associated with the life of this country. Every word that has fallen from the lips of my right hon. friend is true to the very letter. The memory of Her Royal Highness will ever be cherished by the Canadian people, who had learned to appreciate her many noble qualities. As has been observed by my right hon. friend, Her Royal Highness was of a retiring and unobtrusive disposition. The duties of her office, whether public or private, she carried out in a most admirable manner, never sparing herself so far as her health would permit. Notwithstanding her ill health, which prevented her during her residence in Canada from participating to the extent she would wish in philanthropic and social duties, the people of Canada had opportunity to appreciate to some extent her kindness of heart and her beneficence. It was her fate, as has been observed by my right hon. friend, to have the last years of her life saddened by this terrible war between two countries to which she was bound by such close ties. It is written that a daughter will leave the house of her father to follow her husband. This Her Royal Highness did. When she wedded a son of Queen Victoria she was not only wedded to the life of her husband but also to his country. No one within the wide range of the British Empire could suffer more than she, the agony that has resulted from this war. Her heart ever beat true to the cause of her adopted country. I hope that our expression of to-day will convey to her husband and to her children some consolation in the knowledge that her memory will ever endure in the hearts of the people of Canada.

DECLARATION OF WAR BY THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): I wish Mr. Speaker to allude to an event of very great importance, namely, the entrance of the United States of America into the war which for nearly three years now has plagued the world and has raged with unexampled destructiveness. Yesterday the British Parliament passed a resolution affirming their appreciation and gratefully recognizing the fact that at this supreme juncture the United States had elected to take its place on the side of the Allies, in vindication of the cause of right, and justice, and freedom for which the Allies have so long been fighting. While there are many considerations which attach to such action by the United States when its President made his memorable address on the second of April, there are some which make it peculiarly important and peculiarly fateful. The United States, for a hundred years and more, by its traditions and its practice had kept almost completely aloof from European wars and contentions. It had enjoyed for a century uninterrupted peace with outside powers of great strength. It had successfully passed through a period of internal struggle, the greatest which ever fell to the lot of a nation. The result of that struggle was to reaffirm freedom; and in the succeeding years the North and the South, at one time rent apart by this internal war, had been welded together in peace, concord, and union. The country's traditions, its history, its pacific pursuits, its geographical position, the allocation of its population with so many millions dwelling at a distance from the sea-coast and far from the menace or the allurements of possible warfare, had bred in its people a spirit of antagonism to war itself, and particularly to war in which the territorial possessions or the general rights of the nation were not attacked or infringed upon. When the German hordes smashed through Belgium defying its guaranteed immunity from invasion, a sentiment was violated which was possibly as strong in the United States of America as in any other country. The developments of the war, from the first outbreak until it included virtually the whole world, involved in many cases the defiance of principles of international action and of humanitarianism which were held dear by the people of the United States. Yet for two years and a half that nation maintained its position of neutrality, maintained it honestly, maintained it thoroughly, even under conditions of great provocation and difficulty. The United States had no territory to gain by entering into the war, it had no selfish motives so far as power territorial or political was concerned. It stood as a great neutral power, carefully noting the trend and development of the war; protesting on one side and on the other at the violation or infringement of rights. But at last the nation came to the conclusion that it could no longer remain neutral, and it felt compelled to throw its weight of one hundred millions of peace-loving, liberty-loving, democratic people with the cause of the Allies.

To my mind, outside of any armies which the United States may gather, drill, and send to a fighting front; outside of any aid which can be given by her fleet, now large and capable of being made much larger and more powerful; outside of any strength which she may bring to this contest by virtue of her resources, the supremest effect of the entrance of the United States into this war is that in the gradual clarifying of the issues she came to the conclusion that the moral and international sanctions were against the Germans and in favour of the Allies. It is something when such a nation, trying by every possible means to avoid entrance upon the arena, finds itself at last compelled by virtue of its high traditions of morality, humanitarianism and regard for international rights, to come to the conclusion that it can stay out no longer, but must throw its sword into the scale in favour of democracy, of justice, and of the liberties of small nations. That, to my mind, is the greatest factor which the entrance of the United States imports into this contest, and history, I believe, will so record it.

As was voiced yesterday in the Mother of Parliaments, in both branches, the United States brings at once, by the position she has taken, a wealth of and a quickly utilizable power of resource, which is of immense benefit to the allied forces in this war against Germany. I think sometimes we can easily make the mistake of not properly understanding and adequately weighing the immense drain upon the warring nations in blood and resources during the last two years and eight months. France stood to her trenches week after week, month after month, year after year, to beat back the millions of her enemies who already had desecrated and destroyed one-tenth of her territory and were seeking to wreak upon the other nine-tenths the same vengeance and destruction. France did not do that without the shedding of blood almost without parallel, without a drain upon her resources of moral and human fibre that cannot be calculated and which cannot be portrayed by pencil or by tongue. If that be true in reference to France, it is measureably true with the other warring nations and allies. Great Britain herself, who has taken a tremendous part in this contest both by sea and by land, who has borne the brunt of practically the whole of the burden by sea, has within two years made out of her peace-loving citizens, an army that in number, in calibre, in courage and in skill in armed warfare, has never been surpassed by the soldiers of any nation however long they may have been trained and drilled in the exercises of war. Great Britain has felt the drain, and felt the drain in a way which we, who are so far distant from the scene of action, find it difficult to have adequate conception of.

Leaving that argument to apply to all the forces which have been in this war for these two years and eight months, what an immense thing it is that new resources, virgin and untouched, new resources in material and new resources in men, come now upon the theatre of this contest to take their vital and strong part in the ultimate decision that has been so long and so destructively fought for on all the fronts in this war.

It not only imparts courage to the soldiers who have been long warring, but it gives actual sustenance, food, munitions and support in a way in which these things were not given before at a time when they are badly needed, and in the way of finance itself—moneys which make it possible for Russia, Italy, France, if not for Great Britain herself, to go forward in the remaining months of the war with a feeling of confidence and trust that financial resources will not be failing them, and that in these last decisive months of the war what the United States has to give in that respect will be to a large extent determining factors in the result that shall be attained.

If we come down to the actual forces now in the field, Great Britain's experience is rich and ripe and will be availed of. Great Britain sent her whole standing army in the early part of the war into France. The men who were the fighters in the ranks were the officers and trainers of the fighters who took part in the gallant contests in France and Belgium which ultimately resulted in the victory of the Marne, suffered a great depletion in their ranks. There was not only the loss of actual numbers, but the loss as well of those officers and trained men who were fitted for training the soldiers to take the vacant places in the depleted ranks of that first British army. The United States to-day could possibly send a good, well-organized little army to the front, but if they did they would deprive themselves of those very factors which are necessary to the early and complete training of that large army which in the end might be effective. So that, we come down to the conclusion that, with all the wisdom that has been gained from the past, and having regard to all the necessities of the situation, a large army from the United States cannot find its way to the battle front for eight, or nine, or twelve months at the very least. But, even though that be so, that might be the very time at which the coming of a new, fresh army of a million or two million might be the deciding factor in the war.

We do not know when this war shall cease. It is endless, its lengthening out has paralyzed the thought and conception of all men who thought about it and its possible time of conclusion. Three months —six months we said; nine months, a year, we said; and yet two years and eight months have passed their long, dreary and sanguinary length and there is no man who can tell how long this gigantic struggle may yet last. If it turns out that this war, holding all these different points of vantage, works its weary length along for another year, with the increasing exhaustion of the Allies and enemy forces, then the importation of a fresh, virile force of a million or two millions of men spells absolute victory for the side upon which it fights and absolute defeat for the side against which it fights. I think it was Count Reventlow, who, after two years of cogitation, in a sentence or two, placed the issue between the two parties pretty accurately when he said: There is a necessity for victory for Germany or it will spell the downfall of the German monarchy. That is really the clarified issue to-day—the democracies of the world are at war with the autocratic bureaus and kaisers of the world and the ultimate grinding down of the whole issue must be this: That in Germany the people must rule, and only by a victory of the Allies does it seem possible that the results which we are fighting for can be won.

The United States entered upon this undertaking not yet a month ago and with characteristic energy it is preparing in a scientific and energetic way. It has the wide and sometimes bitter, experience of the nations which have been warring from which to get its information so that it may avoid the mistakes, and at the same time avail of those things which have been most effective. The United States having entered into this war, and living up to the declaration of its president, will without doubt carry out the work to which it has set itself with the same characteristic energy and, we trust, with the same success as has characterized the efforts of the other allied nations. To us who live here, along a border of 4,000 miles, neighbours in peace for a hundred years now with the people to the south of us, it is very gratifying that our neighbours, with whom we are upon such good terms and with whom we have so much to do, have agreed with us in our conception of the rights of the issues in this warfare and have now joined with us, and with the other defenders of those rights, in pushing the war to a successful conclusion and in bringing about an era when the democracies of the world shall enjoy the freedom and peace to which they are entitled.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the entrance of the United States into this world-wide war introduces a new chapter not only into the history of the United States itself, but into the history of the world. If, in the month of August 1914, any citizen of the United States had ventured to predict that in this conflict the United States itself would take a part, that man, at that time, would not have been taken seriously. Many people indeed outside of the United States, and perhaps also within the United States, were sorry, when the neutrality of Belgium was invaded, that the United States did not raise its powerful voice to at least protest against that outrage. But such a course of action would not have been in accordance with the traditions of the Republic. The founders of the American nation had hoped, and indeed they in solemn terms warned their people, that they should forever keep away from the conflicts of Europe. They had hoped that the young nation which had just had its birth, would initiate a new civilization which would furnish an example to the rest of the world, and that as far as they were concerned they would live at peace with every nation. But, they had counted without regard to the march of events, the discoveries of science, the facilities of locomotion and communication which have brought the nations of the earth very close to one another. The principle has at last found expression in the United States itself that no nation which pretends to be civilized can keep outside the pale of civilization, that there is a solidarity amongst all nations and that the law of might against right cannot go unchallenged. Therefore, they have thrown their sword into the balance.

Some people, in fact many people, have found fault with what they called the hesitation of the President. We in this House and in this country do not share those views. President Wilson has acted with great caution; he has acted with great prudence; but at the same time he has always maintained high ideals of the civilization of the world. He had to contend not only with the German element in the population of the Republic, but also with the great body of pacifists who hoped against all hope that they would forever keep their country free from the bane of war. But by the course he has pursued the President has at last brought the whole of the American people, almost without exception, to stand behind him in support of the cause of the Allies. No more than this could be expected from that nation. I share in everything that has been said by my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster).

We do not know when this war will end. We all hope that it will end even before the American Army is called upon to fight. If it is called upon to fight, then there can be no doubt as to the issue. But we hope that the issue will be decided even before the armies of the United States cross the sea, and that the weight of their moral action alone will be a decisive factor in favour of victory. We, more than any other part of the British Empire, more than any other part of the civilized world, are interested in the action which has just been taken by the United States. We share with them this continent. We hope that henceforth, as a result of this war, the solidarity of the nations will be established; not only that the solidarity of nations will be established but that the brotherhood of man will be the basis of the future relationships of the world. Let us hope that this brotherhood of man with man will commence in our relationship with the United States. There were some men amongst us who were afraid of too close relations with the United States. We have no such fear on one side of the House at all events, and I am glad to say that now there is not much fear on the other side either. My hon. friends on the other side now realize that there are no dregs in the cup of freedom, that it is wholesome to the last drop. Free wheat has come about as the result of the present situation. I shall not dilate upon this point, it may come up for discussion later on; but upon the present occasion I join my voice most gladly in everything that has been said by my right hon. friend.

4 p.m.

MR. BALFOUR AND GENERAL JOFFRE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the Acting Prime Minister inform us if the report in the press of this morning is true, that the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour and General Joffre are to be officially invited by the Government to visit Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know the source of my hon. friend's information

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Ottawa morning papers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be better able to answer that question in the course of a day or two than at present. In the meantime, my hon. friend may rest assured that it would be a source of the greatest possible satisfaction to us if we could prevail upon Mr. Balfour and his distinguished colleagues on that Commission, when they have come to this side of the water, to pay Canada a visit.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is this other consideration, that it is a wonderful thing that such men in such positions could have taken the time to have crossed the Atlantic—to say nothing of the perils of the crossing—out of the midst of the business of this war, and it is very likely that they will want to get back again just as quickly as their most urgent business will permit.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): The Minister of Labour to-day referred to the fact that previous to the adjournment of the House in February he had been absent from the House for some time in connection with labour matters in the West; and the House will recall that the Premier announced that on his return the minister would give to the House a statement as to what he had done in the West in regard to adjusting the difficulties which had arisen in connection with the mining situation there. I understand that while in the West the minister made some arrangement of a character which assured the temporary resumption of work by the men; but I see the following dispatch in yesterday's paper:

> Calgary, April 17.—The coal miners of nearly every mine of the district are out on strike because of the delay in the settlement of the men's affairs.
> The ranks of idle miners were augmented this morning by the other places in the Crow's Nest Pass country going out.
>
> The miners now out are at Michel, Blairmore, Canmore, Hillcrest, Bellevue, and Frank.
> Those at Drumheller also are out, but the difficulty in the latter company is of a different nature.

The minister is well aware that this subject is of very great importance and is regarded as such not only by the men interested but by labour everywhere. I would ask the minister to give to the House a statement such as was promised by the Prime Minister.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Labour disturbances in mining industries are perhaps more numerous and more serious the world over than in any other. The reason of that, I think, is not very far to seek, although I do not purpose at the present time to discuss that subject. That has been our experience in Canada.

Eight or nine years ago we had, in the province of my hon. friend who has just spoken, a cessation of work amongst miners for a period of twenty-two months. During that time there was much public disorder and it was found expedient to call out the militia in order to restore and maintain order.

We had serious disturbance in the western coal fields in 1903, 1906 and 1907, and it was with the view of preventing such disturbances in the mining industry that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was passed. It can hardly be said that the Act has been a success so far as mining operations are concerned; it has been more successful in other lines of industry. Neither the operators nor the miners in Western Canada have paid any attention whatever to the Act, nor has any attempt been made, so far as I am aware, to enforce its provisions. I believe that it was applied to one of the disturbances there in 1907, but the finding of the Board was ignored by the miners. There was another strike there in 1909, and the most serious one, which lasted about eight months, was in the year 1911. In the autumn of that year the strike was ended by an agreement made between the Western Coal Operators' Association and the members of the United Mine Workers of America in District No. 18, covering the southeastern part of British Columbia and the southwestern part of Alberta. That agreement, which was to continue for three years from the 31st of the following March, provided for the adjustment of any strike conditions that might arise during that period, and it worked surprisingly well. Before the end of that period, namely, March 1915, a new agreement was entered into, to continue for two years from March 31, 1915, containing somewhat similar provisions for the adjustment of conditions in the meantime. That worked very satisfactorily until July last, and I was very much gratified in the feeling that we were to have no more serious labor troubles in that western mining district. But in July of last year the miners, probably influenced by a war bonus that had been given to miners in Wales after the outbreak of the war, demanded, in addition to the wages and conditions of labour set forth in the then current agreement, a war bonus of ten per cent on their wages. The operators were reluctant—and I may add that I myself was reluctant—to take any part in a departure from an agreement deliberately entered into. However, it was said on behalf of the miners that they would no longer adhere to the provisions of that agreement, and that unless their demands were met, they would cease work. The operators finally, in substance, conceded the payment of a war bonus of about 10 per cent. It was not put just in that way; the bonus was arranged on a sliding scale of from 5 to 12½ per cent, according to the class of worker, and averaging 7½ or 8 per cent. A supplementary agreement to this effect was made on the 16th of August last, the current agreement in all other respects to remain in force until April 1 of this year. In less than three months after that, on November 11, another demand was made for an increase of twenty-five per cent—a second war bonus. Or, putting it another way, the men said that unless an inquiry were made as to the advance in the cost of living and a war bonus equivalent to that advance paid, they would all quit work on November 25. Well, it was a very serious condition of affairs. Winter was coming on; the farmers on the plains required coal; the railways required coal and the smelters required coal and coke. As hon. gentlemen know, the smelters are manufacturing copper, zinc and lead, which are essential to the manufacture of shells. The cessation of work in district No. 18, therefore, would mean suffering on the part of farmers on the plains, the holding up of railway operations and, worse, the cessation of the output of those ingredients absolutely essential to the manufacture of shells. Two or three of the representatives of the miners came to Ottawa at our request, and while they were here or on their way, the men went out on strike. Then we undertook to make an inquiry concerning the high cost of living. An officer of the department satisfactory to both parties was appointed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who?

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Harrison, fair wage officer, whose headquarters are at Calgary. He did not complete the inquiry until some time in January, when the operators refused to contribute any money towards this increase in the cost of living. The immediate conditions were worse, in a sense, than they had been in November. I went out in the latter part of January, when the thermometer registered 48 degrees below zero. Intense suffering would follow if these coal mines were closed up. Hon. gentlemen know that the domestic coal used in the West does not endure for any length of time unless it is very carefully stored; it disintegrates, slackens and becomes useless. Generally speaking, no large stocks of coal, therefore, are kept on hand for domestic purposes, and the closing of these mines for a few days would mean great suffering. The operators refused to do anything. It was found by the Commissioner that the increase in the cost of living was equivalent to $1.75 a week in wages. In order that the mines might be continued, I undertook that we would check up the amount that would be payable to these miners at the rate of $1.75 per week from and after the 15th of November until the 4th of February, and that we would advance that amount in the first instance and take our chances of getting it back from the larger consumers, several of whom had undertaken to pay, for the coal shipped to them during that period, a sum equivalent to this $1.75 in addition to the price that they had arranged to pay for it. The operators undertook to pay that $1.75 per week from and after the 3rd of February until the 1st of April when the current agreement would expire. This agreement provides that thirty days before its expiration, which would be the 31st of March, the operators and the representatives of the miners should meet together and endeavour to negotiate a new agreement to become effective on the first of April, this proviso being intended to prevent a cessation of work at the end of the period covered by the agreement, as had occurred three or four times previously. A conference was held at Calgary early in March, but the operators felt that the new demands made by the miners were so great that there was no probability of any understanding being reached. I went out there and spent nine days with them, and two weeks ago last Monday I succeeded in inducing them to appoint a sub-committee of four representatives of the operators and four representatives of the miners, which sub-committee has been in session ever since. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has referred to some of the mines in which the men have gone out on strike. My advice is that they have done so as their protest against the protracted negotiations going on at Calgary. They have got the impression that the operators and the miners should have reached a conclusion earlier. The last word I received in regard to the matter was from my officer at Calgary who said it was expected that the joint conference of operators and miners would to-day report a conclusion reached by this sub-committee. I have no doubt the conclusion will be accepted by the operators, but it will have to be submitted to the miners of the different mines throughout that district for their approval. If, as is anticipated, an agreement is reached to the satisfaction of the gentlemen representing the miners, I am confident that they will induce the miners to accept it and that there will be no further trouble.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much money has the Government paid out in consequence of the undertaking given by the minister to make up this difference in regard to the cost of living? Has the Minister received from the parties who have got the coal anything to compensate the Government for the disbursement, and if so, how much?

Mr. CROTHERS: It has been a very slow process to get the reports as to the quantities that have been shipped to different people, but the amount paid out by the Government is about $92,000, and I believe that we shall receive every dollar of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much have you received now?

Mr. CROTHERS: We have not received any. The time has not arrived for its return. The other day I wrote to the president of a company in the United States which had received 41,000 tons from one mine, pointing out to him the arrangement that had been made and telling him that we expected his company to contribute. I was very much gratified at his prompt reply: "Certainly, we will contribute whatever is said to be right." It was thought that contributions should be 25 cents per ton, and that is what I believe the operators have added to their prices from and after the 3rd of February to cover the payment of $1.75 per week. Three or four of the larger consumers agreed to contribute before we undertook to advance the money, so that I do not think the Government will lose a dollar in the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was the payment provided for by a special Order in Council, and, if so, would the minister bring down the Order in Council and any other papers relating to the matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: The money was advanced under the authority of an Order in Council, and I shall be glad to bring it down.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister say if the conference sitting at Calgary has relation to the domestic coal mines or to the steam coal mines?

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. CROTHERS: It has relation to all the mines, the lignite mines as well as the bituminous mines, to all the members of the association operating in District 18, or about twenty mines.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it the domestic miners that are making trouble or the steam coal miners?

Mr. CROTHERS: Most of the domestic coal is produced at the Galt mine at Lethbridge, and the men there are working. There is another mine at Bankhead, where domestic coal is produced chiefly, and the men there are also working. I do not think that lignite coal is produced at any of the mines where the men are out at the present time.

Mr. OLIVER: The position is that it is not the domestic coal mines, the mines upon which the prairie farmer or dweller depends for his coal, that are being shut down.

Mr. CROTHERS: Not at the present time.

Mr. OLIVER: It is the mines that provide the steam and smelting coal.

Mr. CROTHERS: But they were all involved last winter. They all belong to the same association. I am not sure that any of the mines producing lignite coal are shut down, but I rather think not.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker, this discussion is all more or less in violation of the rules of the House, and I do not wish to aggravate that condition, but I hope the House will pardon me for saying, in connection with this discussion, that I was yesterday in conference with representatives of the mining industries of Cobalt and Porcupine and the adjacent camps, and they feel that trouble is coming in that quarter, their view, and probably that of a large number of the people of this country, being that labour strikes in connection with mining ought in a time of war to be dealt with under the War Measures Act, if we have one, in the way that similar strikes have been dealt with in England. Such strikes have been anticipated there in this way, and as a consequence they have not occurred. We ought to find a way, in the state of war that obtains in Canada to-day, of approaching these mining labour troubles before they reach a head and if possible preventing a strike occurring. It is not a hard thing to do. The War Measures method must be adopted by Parliament and this Government in connection with the failure of our railways to deliver coal and freight of other kind to our cities, in particular to the manufacturing cities of Ontario.

Mr. CROTHERS: In reply to my hon. friend, I would say that no other country in the world that I am aware of has had so few labour troubles as Canada has had in the last few years. Australia is sometimes referred to. Last year, with only two-thirds of our population, they had four times the number of strikes we had, and so with the United States and with England. Things are not just as we would like to have them in Canada in this respect, but our wage-earners have shown up well in the matter of freedom from strikes.

RAILWAY SERVICE BETWEEN MURRAY BAY AND STE. ANNE DE BEAUPRE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I am sorry that the Minister of Railways has left the House, but perhaps some other member of the Government will bring to his attention the question I desire to ask. It was reported a few days ago that the branch line of the Intercolonial from Rivière Ouelle would be discontinued and a new service inaugurated on the north shore of the river between Murray Bay and Ste. Anne de Beaupré, running through Ste. Irenes to Ste. Anne de Beaupré and connecting up with the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway. One report said that the rails of this branch line had already been carried over to the other side to be used on the Quebec and Saguenay line. I sent a telegram to the Minister of Railways, and another to the Minister of Inland Revenue, whom I am happy to see in the House, and four days later the Minister of Inland Revenue informed me that the report was erroneous and without foundation. But since that time the new service has practically been advertised in the ministerial papers of the province. Yesterday, in La Patrie, of Montreal, the fare between Murray Bay and Quebec was announced. I think the people of the district are entitled to know the intention of the Government in this matter.

Mr. REID: The Minister of Railways is out of the chamber at the moment, but I shall see him directly, and will give my hon. friend the information he desires to-morrow.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would ask that the information be made public, because many people are interested in this service. In addition to what my hon. friend from Kamouraska has pointed out, there is a large colony of Americans, who come up every year to spend the summer at Murray Bay and in the neighbouring district, who would be very much inconvenienced if they were deprived of this valuable service.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They will be soldiering this summer.

SUPPLY.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would point out that according to Rule 17 (c) the House has no Supply ready to take to-day. I would not make any objection because we might take Civil Government Estimates as we have done before, but as we got the Auditor General's Report only the other day, we are not in a position to take Civil Government Estimates now.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is Civil Government that we propose to go on with, if my right hon. friend has no objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest that we take it up to-morrow. I will raise no objection then.

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

The House again proceeded to consideration of the motion of Mr. R. Bickerdike (Montreal, St. Lawrence) for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code and to abolish capital punishment.

He said: Since the House adjourned there have been a number of occurrences bearing on this question, one of the most important of which is the fact that Russia in the last week of the month of March abolished capital punishment, and I hope that this Parliament will at an early date pass a resolution congratulating them on having abolished not only capital punishment, but also the Romanoff dynasty. Another important occurrence was the sentencing to death of a young boy of sixteen in Manitoba. I did not think it was possible to find in this country a judge or a jury that would condemn a child to be hanged. However, such is the case. This boy is to be hanged on the 15th of May. A large number of petitions have been circulated throughout the country asking for clemency, not only to save the life of this young boy, but to save this young nation from the everlasting disgrace of hanging a child of sixteen. If there is one thing on which we all are agreed it is the fact that women and children should be exempt from hanging in Canada. We have had several mass meetings in different places in the province of Quebec, one in Montreal and another in Sherbrooke, and with the permission of the House I shall read the following resolution, which was passed at a meeting of the citizens of Montreal, held in the Windsor Hall on Monday evening, April 2, 1917, and which is identical with the resolutions passed at the other meetings:

BE IT RESOLVED, That whereas there now lies within the Dominion of Canada a young lad of sixteen under the condemnation of death and whose father is at the present moment fighting with his regiment in the British army in France in defence of the Empire; and

WHEREAS this meeting has heard read a petition addressed to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada praying for the commutation of his sentence of death to one of imprisonment:

BE IT RESOLVED that it is the sense of this meeting that the infliction of the death penalty is contrary to the dictates of civilization and Christianity, and we hereby protest against the proposed hanging of this young boy of the tender years of sixteen and which we consider would be a blot on the fair name of the Dominion of Canada;

AND BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that copies of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada and all members of the Dominion Parliament.

If we cannot all agree that capital punishment should be abolished entirely at this time, we can surely all agree that the day has gone by for hanging women and children. And I hope that every member of this House will have an opportunity to declare by his vote whether he is in favour of hanging this boy or not.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman object to shooting?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I do.

Mr. BURNHAM: Then, he must object to the war?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I do.

Mr. BURNHAM: Gracious, this is terrible.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: If I had to shoot the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burnham) I would, as the Irishman says, only wing him, not kill him.

When the House adjourned on January 31st, I was about to say that in the early days I had had my attention called to the brutal and inhuman practice of hanging in this and other countries whose citizens lay claim to being quite civilized and generally as enlightened as those of other communities, where this horrible practice of the Middle Ages has long since been abolished. Having first been actuated by sentiment in my opposition to the infliction of the death penalty, I began to read upon the subject, and from being an opponent on the ground that it was brutal and inhuman, I finally have come to the further belief that the question is one of government, as it relates to the safety of life and the more certain and unerring enforcement of law.

In presenting an argument in support of these measures for the abolishment of capital punishment, I have endeavoured to show that the main defence in support of the death penalty inflicted by the state, to wit: that its infliction is a prevention of crime and therefore insures greater safety of life, is wholly and absolutely in error. I have endeavoured also to show that the example set by the state in taking human life, is at once brutalizing and demoralizing; that it has a strong tendency to destroy in the breasts of men the sense of the sacredness of life; and that it acts as a dangerous suggestion to the vicious mind. I have endeavoured to show that in communities where the death penalty is not inflicted, life is quite as secure, as there is far more certainty of conviction than in communities where capital punishment is enforced. For the purpose of setting forth the best possible data upon this subject, I have used statistics and quotations taken from numerous and well informed authorities.

We are told that "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." This is quite true, but it has nothing to do with the penal laws of to-day. Moses may have decreed that "Witches shall be put to death," but because of this there is no reason why any statute should exist to-day perpetuating this decree. Moses may have laid down that if A destroys B's eye, then shall A have his own eye burst or excised, or that if A breaks B's tooth, then shall a dental surgeon be told off to draw a similar tooth of his. Because a certain code of laws was suitable for a nomadic people many thousands of years ago, it is absurd to quote them as having binding force to-day under very different conditions.

Capital punishment by legal statutes has been an institution rock-buttressed, respected, protected and even fawned upon by the elect as one of the indispensable pillars of a righteous and self-respecting government. The following are the names of some who have declared against the death penalty: Abraham Lincoln, Senator Sherman, Roscoe Conkling, Horatio Seymour, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, A. B. Richmond, Wendell Phillips. Catherine, Empress of Russia, said, "We must punish crime without imitating it. The punishment by death is rarely anything but a useless barbarity." Elizabeth, another of the Russian empresses, said: "Experience demonstrates that capital punishment never yet made man better." The Right Hon. John Bright said:

> Whenever you hang a man in the face of the public under the circumstances to which we are so accustomed, if you do in the slightest degree deter from crime by the shocking nature of the punishment, I will undertake to say that you, by so much, may by much more, weaken that very and greater security which arises from the reverence with which human life is regarded.

The State does not kill people merely because they are worthless and to be rid of them. Insane asylums are built at great expenses for the incurable, upon whom relatives cannot bear to look, who personally may be better off dead. The State tenderly cares for all such cases. This is done because the example of kindness and humanity to the unfortunate is of an inestimable benefit to society. A man would be a brute —lower than the dogs that devoured the body of Jezebel—who would say, kill them to be rid of these imbecile burdens. It is not possible to imagine the effect society would feel if we were to destroy all imbeciles and the incurable insane. What a horrible example would be set for the people of the State to follow. No calculation could be made of the injury to the morals of the State by countenancing such conduct. One of the greatest advantages to the State from the preservation and tender care and treatment of the hopeless insane is this example of humane treatment and of tender consideration of a human life however useless and pitiable it may seem. Our citizens are taught to be kind and gentle to the unfortunate by this example of the State.

As professors of the religion of Jesus Christ, we find no sanction in the record of His life and teachings to the shedding of human blood by judicial process. The whole trend of His example and precept was in the direction of love for the whole brotherhood of man.

Mr. BURNHAM: Was not He sacrificed in order that the word of God might be fulfilled?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Surely.

Mr. BURNHAM: Well, what is the matter with that?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The only thing the matter with it is that you do not believe it. Revenge and the retaliation had no place in the heart of the Redeemer, and if we are Christians, they can have no place in our hearts, and certainly should not have in the State. As we apprehend, the attitude of the State towards its criminals should be one of reformation, coupled always with such powerful restraint as will ensure the safety of society. That the substitution of life imprisonment for the death penalty is a step that may be taken with safety is manifest not only from years of successful experience in those States where capital punishment has been abolished, but also in our own country, where we have criminals serving life sentences in the penitentiary, whose crimes were as atrocious as those of others who were executed.

May I now ask the members of this House if they believe any boy sixteen years of age, any mother's son, either black or white, should be hanged? His father is right in the trenches, where our friend came from recently, fighting the battles of the Empire. I have much pleasure in moving the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Bickerdike) has introduced the same subject on several occasions in this House and, I believe, moved the adoption of practically the same Bill. On each occasion the position assumed by the Government was stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who, unfortunately, is not in the House at present. I believe, however, that my views on the question, never before expressed in Parliament or elsewhere, as far as I remember, coincide in principle with those of the minister and are line for line and precept for precept opposed to those of the hon. member.

Perhaps it would be better for me first to state the points which he has advanced upon which we are in agreement. I agree with the hon. member in this, that in all cases where the crime of murder, or treason, or rape, or any crime punishable by death under the code is committed, it would be inconsistent with the principles of humanity that the supreme penalty should be exacted. I agree with him further that we are not able to justify the exaction of the supreme penalty in any case by reference to any doctrine merely because such doctrine is laid down in the Mosaic law. But, I cannot carry my agreement with the hon. member for Montreal any further than that. I do not know, if ever, in the course of my life, I had sympathy with the movement for the abolition of capital punishment, but I do know this, that my experience in the criminal courts in Canada, and my experience later on in connection with the applications for clemency, have driven me from any sympathy that at any time I might have had with the opposition to capital punishment. The hon. member this afternoon endeavoured to get the assent of the House to this modification of his request, namely: if we cannot look for entire abolition, we must at least look for the abolition of the punishment as applicable to children and women. I do not think that the adoption of even that restriction in the absolute could possibly be made. He has referred to a case which is just now, or very shortly will be, before His Royal Highness, that of the convicted murderer Spain from the courts of Manitoba. That was the case where a boy of sixteen, himself not a native of this country, a native of England, murdered in cold blood—and the adjective cannot be too strongly emphasized so far as my information at present goes—two innocent people, two respectable citizens of that province, under most revolting circumstances. It would ill-become me to make any statement—because I do not know all the circumstances, although I know some of them—as to what should be the attitude of the Governor in Council and of His Royal Highness with regard to that case. I have simply to say that the circumstances already made known need only be considered to convince hon. members of this House that if capital punishment is to still remain the final, supreme penalty in the worst cases of murder, it might well be that that case would show that there should be no restriction in its application merely on the score of age. It must be remembered that though the Code lays down the penalty of death as the last supreme penalty that can be exacted in cases of murder, cases of rape and cases of treason, still it is well known everywhere, of course well known in this House and I think well known to juries, in almost every case explained specifically to juries by the trial judges, that there is a prerogative of clemency that still remains, and that the mere finding of a verdict of guilty by no means necessarily entails punishment by death. Consequently the objection raised by my hon. friend this afternoon and at other times has not the force he desires to give it. It is true that juries are more careful, more cautious before they bring in a verdict of guilty in a trial for murder or treason—but particularly in a case of murder where a judge has no option but to impose a penalty of death—than in other cases; and as a consequence it happens no doubt that there are many murderers who escape, proportionately more perhaps than of those who are guilty of other crimes. That may be one of the results that we must suffer by reason of our jurisprudence in this regard. But while juries are more careful, it does not go to the extreme the hon. member fears. Juries are well aware and they are well instructed that the prerogative of clemency lies behind, securely reposing in the Crown; the Crown has power to reduce and to exact only such punishment as to the Crown may seem mete. The duty upon the judge in case of murder—in other cases it is optional—is imperative; he must, where a verdict of guilty is brought in, himself sentence the prisoner to be hanged. I cannot speak from as wide an experience as perhaps other members of this House, but I can speak from some experience, and I can say that I never knew a jury to whom was committed this awful trust of determining upon the guilt or innocence of a person accused of murder who did not know and who did not admit that they knew that there was a prerogative of mercy, and that their verdict in itself should not mean an irremediable sentence of death. To my mind that disposes in the main of the objection which the hon. gentleman raises. I am quite willing to admit that the fear, if you may call it so, that the verdict of the jury may result in the taking of a human life does bring on them a caution that sometimes is extreme; that as a consequence perhaps a disproportionate number escape; but I cannot go further and say that the result of that small number, whatever it may be, escaping is anything like so disastrous in relation to the commission of the crime of murder throughout the country as would be the enactment of legislation that would take away the terror and fear of death which deters evil-doers. The

5 p.m.

Mosaic law must be read with reference to the conditions that existed in Mosaic times; our law must be read with reference to conditions that now obtain. What was necessary then is vital now and that is to see that there is held before the wrong-doer and the criminal such a punishment as bears fitting proportion to the crime he contemplates, and bears a character that becomes the crime he contemplates. It must not be of such a kind as has been found insufficient to deter even those who contemplate lesser wrongs.

I have been impressed with this as I have walked through jails and prisons on many occasions long before I entered this House, that the mere punishment by incarceration as incarceration is now in these later days understood and practised, while it has a terror of a character, while it is a punishment of a character and a fitting punishment, would weigh very little in the mind of a man whose lust or greed or passion was so violent or so sordid as would drive him to the taking of human life. It is true that certain portions of civilization, intelligent portions of civilization, have moved beyond the point that we have gone, and have carried the attribute of mercy so far as to abolish capital punishment in every case. But I do not think the movement has been very general. I think this has been a slow movement for many years gone by, and my hon. friend is bound to admit, from instances that have been cited to the House by the minister in other debates, that while it has gone forward and has resulted in the abolition of capital punishment in certain cases, there are many others where it has gone the other way and where public opinion that once went as far as abolition has been reversed and where the old punishment has been restored.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: You cannot name one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot name them, but I think I could name them after very little inquiry. Does the hon. member say that in no state of the Union has a reversal of legislation taken place? That may be, but it does not apply the world over. It may be, as the hon. gentleman says, that there is no state in the American Union that once has abolished capital punishment and later returned to it, but I am quite sure that I myself have read of cases in which countries where they have at one time gone that length and later gone back again.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: No country and no state that has abolished capital punishment has ever returned to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says that it applies to all countries as well as to all states of the Union. I do not think he is correct in that. He may be correct as to the states, but, correct or not, the records do show that in some of the cases, at all events, where the abolition took place the result has not been by any means a diminution of the crime of murder. There might result an increase in the proportion of convictions of murder known to have been committed, but cases are undoubtedly recorded in well authenticated works where there has been a pronounced increase in the perpetration of the crime of murder.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Can the hon. gentleman put his finger on a single case or a single statement to that effect? I challenge that statement. I have the facts here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman may not have all the facts.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I have sufficient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: While the rules of the House may prevent my speaking again in this debate, the hon. gentleman will introduce his Bill again and we shall have an opportunity of threshing this out. There may be differences of opinion on that point; there may be differences of authority, and the hon. gentleman may have one side and we may have to other; but what appeals to me most of all is this: the character of the punishment must be such as will appeal as a fitting punishment; as will appeal with sufficient terror to the type of man who would contemplate the crime of murder. It would take a great deal of argument to convince me that incarceration as now necessarily practiced can be made such a dreaded punishment as will hold in check the passions of men who contemplate the crime of murder. Remember again that in this country—and I believe the same principles apply in the old land and in other countries as well—though the supreme penalty is exacted by law, that is to say, is called for on the part of the bench as the sentence that must follow conviction for murder, certain well known principles obtain in the execution of that sentence after it is pronounced. One principle I might state is this: it is well known that insanity as defined by the Code, while not a defence, may be pleaded in several ways and may result in there being no possibility of conviction, because of proven incapacity to commit the crime. But insanity is there defined as insanity in such a degree as in stated degree to paralyse the intellect and prevent the man from knowing in reality the difference between right and wrong. Now, while there may not be incapacitation of intellect to that extent, there may be such a condition of mind, such a lack of development of intellect, such an absence of the full human faculties, as would make it not a fitting case in which to exact the extreme penalty: such a failure fully to appreciate the nature and consequence of the act as, while it would not render the man incapable of committing an act under the definition of the Code, still makes a proper case for interposition on the part of the Crown and of reducing the conviction to imprisonment for a term of years or for life. That is one principle, and the utmost care is exercised in every case to ascertain whether or not in each individual conviction the prisoner comes within its terms. There are other principles that obtain. It would be impossible for example to deny that if, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, given in the immediate presence of the witnesses and in the hearing of all the evidence, there should develop other evidence not at the trial producable, or other proper ground to create a reasonable doubt, that reasonable doubt finds interpretation in the decision as to the execution of the penalty. I do not need to pass over again the arguments that have been advanced, much more ably than I can advance them, by the Minister of Justice in previous debates. I think the sense of the House remains pretty much as it was in those previous sessions; I do not know that my own conviction on the subject remains undisturbed by the discussions that have taken place. It would seem to me hard to credit that any one could during many years come in contact with the administration of criminal law and come in contact with the criminal himself as one in the practice of such law must necessarily come, and still believe that there could be as full and adequate prevention of the crime of murder by any system of imprisonment as there is by the holding out of the possibility of death itself.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend from St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) deserves very great credit for the persistence with which he has been bringing forward this Bill year after year against the manifest conviction of the House. His motives are certainly most honourable, and they are dictated by a cause which everybody appreciates, even if we do not agree with his convictions. To-day, if I understood his observations aright, I thought that he would have been satisfied if the Government had seen its way to accept his Bill partially if not in toto; if the Government had been willing to abolish capital punishment in the case of rape and in the case of murder committed by women and children. At the present time, so far as the first of these is concerned, I do not think that there is any necessity of changing the law. The offence, if I remember aright, is punishable by death or by imprisonment for life or for a period subject to the discretion of the court. The offence is, we are all happy to observe, one of rare occurrence in this country. In the province from which I come, I know of only one conviction during the last fifty years. In that case the prisoner convicted was sentenced, not to death, but to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. Whether he fulfilled his whole term I do not know. As far as crimes committed by women are concerned, in the province from which I come only two sentences have been executed against women during the last sixty years. Undoubtedly there is something revolting in the idea that a woman should be sentenced to death. The member for St. Lawrence must remember the case which occurred in the county of Terrebonne not far from Montreal. The woman was convicted the same time as the person who actually perpetrated the crime. There is no doubt whatever, notwithstanding the sympathy we may have for her case, that of the two she was the more guilty. She enticed a young boy to commit an awful murder, and if there was more guilt on the head of one than on the other, no man could resist the conviction that the woman was the more guilty than the actual perpetrator of the deed. The question as to whether the woman or the actual perpetrator of the deed should be executed is one worthy of consideration. I mention this to my hon. friend simply to show that it is not sufficient to be guided solely by sentiment, and that there may be reasons why the law should be left as it is at present, whether the offender be a man or a woman. I am not aware that a boy has been executed in Canada within the memory of any living man. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) have alluded to the painful case of that boy in Manitoba. So far as we can judge from the reports in the newspapers, it is a horrible case, but I hope there may be redeeming features which will permit the Minister of Justice to report favourably to His Excellency in the matter.

My hon. friend has stated that capital punishment has been abolished in several countries. I do not know whether it is on this occasion or on a previous occasion that he referred to France. Capital punishment, so far as I am aware, has not been abolished in France; but in that country, during the presidency of Mr. Fallières, it is well known that during the first six years of his seven years tenure of office he would not sign a single sentence of execution, but public opinion at last revolted, and under the powerful force of public opinion President Fallières had to abandon his own private views and at length was compelled to see that the law was carried out.

The matter to which my hon. friend has given his attention, and to which I have no doubt he will give his attention again if the House does not agree with him to-day, is one which has appealed to many thinkers, and we have had very weighty opinions on both sides of the question, some holding that the death penalty should never be abolished in the case of murder. At the present time, although rape carries with it nominally the penalty of death, with the alternative of imprisonment, no man, no matter what the circumstances are, is sentenced to death for that crime, so that there is no necessity for considering that aspect of the case. But, there has undoubtedly been a sense prevailing in the great majority of the nations of the earth that murder should be punished by death. It is a painful thing to say so; it is a thing against which our instincts revolt; but, after all, if the crime is to be thus punished, I do not know that any serious injustice has taken place. I know that there is no duty which comes within the purview of the Government—I am sure it is the same with the present Government as it was with the last Government—which is more painful than to have to pronounce whether or not a prisoner shall be condemned to death. I am sure that with the present Government, as with the previous Government, the facts of the case are scanned with great diligence and always with the view, if possible, to find any reason for exercising clemency, and if any reason be found, clemency is recommended to the Governor General. There are cases, however, so heinous that it is felt that the ends of justice would not be met if the penalty provided by the law were not carried out.

Whether or not the penalty of death is a deterrent is a much mooted question. Education has more to do with the prevention of crime than even the deterrent effect of the punishment, and in this country it can happily be said that cases of murder are very few in fact, amongst the native population they are becoming less and less frequent. All the cases which have taken place recently have been amongst a class of foreigners who come from a country in which the crime of murder is a daily custom. Without being invidious, I believe that many crimes of that nature have been committed by Italians who came from the south of Italy, where it is the pernicious habit of every man to carry a stiletto. The carrying of weapons is prohibited in this country by law, and I have no doubt that a generation hence these citizens will be just as peaceful and orderly as are our own people. We come, however, always to the same problem: What is the most effective law? Shall we continue the law which we have had on the Statute Book ever since the country has been a country, and which is still the law amongst the most civilized nations of the earth, or shall we be carried away by a feeling of humanity, which is most commendable and most honourable, I admit, but which, after all, will not serve the ends of justice as well as does the present law?

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all delighted with the humane tendencies of the gentleman who has introduced this Bill so frequently and who hopes by knocking at the door of Parliament continuously to at last effect an entrance because of the very weariness of the inmates. I am not attributing to the hon. gentleman, I hope, an unworthy motive. We are well aware that he is a gentleman of such distinguished characteristics that his influence in Canada is always for the best and his views are always regarded with great respect. There can be no question also that it is advisable that a leaning to gentleness and kindness should, if possible, characterize a nation as well as an individual, and the hon. member (Mr. Bickerdike) exhibits on behalf of this House those very advanced characteristics which possibly at some time in the future may be crystallized into a form of law. No one, I presume, says his views are inadvisable in the abstract or that they are wrong in principle, but they are not adoptable at present because they are inexpedient. That, I believe is the general view of the most advanced thinkers. We must however, say that all credit is due to the hon. gentleman for leading us in the paths of virtue and human kindness, and we recognize this and the country recognizes this, and the persistence of the hon. gentleman will no doubt, in itself, have a very salutary influence.

There are some very singular things in connection with the consideration of human life and the taking of it away. God takes away human life. If we believe in God—and I presume the hon. member for St. Lawrence does—God takes away human life through at least His natural instruments. He has arranged it so that the slightest infraction of His law meets with the penalty, and if at any time a deadly sin is committed, that penalty is death. There is no consideration, except perhaps it may be through an abstract principle of the grace of God or some other remote consideration of that kind, such as an analysis of the prompting of the Divine mercy which we cannot consider since they are infinite, and since therefore, they are beyond the grasp of a finite mind, they can be dealt with only in an approximate way. And since they can be dealt with only in an approximate way, these are matters simply for analysis and not for final decision. Whilst we cannot argue about it for the reasons I have given, we can, nevertheless, adopt the means that we see employed by the highest power in carrying out the purposes of the world, and if, therefore, we would imitate the Creator, for a deadly sin we would provide the penalty of death. It must be remembered that there is a very great deal in this which the hon. member has not touched upon. He represents with all his kindness the advanced school of pure utilitarism, that is to say, what ministers to the general comfort and to the general peace of mind. What is influencing him is what we might call the general well-being in an abstract condition of perfection in humanity That is the undercurrent of his thought, and the consideration that is influencing him in bringing forward this measure. Such a consideration as that is absolutely the wrong point of view to take in considering this or any other question founded upon the principles of conduct. It is to deny altogether the priori and to say that there are no abstract abiding principals in the world which are infused into us in some way which we cannot grasp, but which, nevertheless, come to us exactly as the principle of life itself comes to us. We can make nitrogen, hydrogen and oxygen and those other things which go to make up the hemoglobin, but we cannot infuse into the compound the vital spark which starts off the circulation and produces the life of man. Therefore, there is something behind it all which we are ignoring when we are eternally looking at our own reflection in the mirror of nature. That must be thoroughly recognized or else we sink down to the level of the brute that crawls upon all fours. We have, strange to say, recognized the extraordinary character of the universe, its illimitability, the fact that space is infinite and beyond our comprehension, that the theory of motion itself is beyond our comprehension. Nevertheless, the principles of conduct move us to an immediate and final consideration, without giving to them in any sense that which we would give to them in reference to these eternal principles to which I have referred. If we are circumscribed within the confines of this narrow sphere within which we live, then those principles of utilitarianism which the hon. gentleman advocates might well be so considered. But it is not so, and when we see that the eternal Creator of it all has laid down an inviolable law which cannot be infringed, which even the youngest child that ever was born and some indeed that are not born cannot infringe without the penalty being exacted mercilessly, it must be apparent that we cannot regard these things as some humane gentlemen pretend to do. The hon. gentleman himself is not so much older than I am, that it would be presumptuous in me to say he has made a mistake in his consideration of life. Life is not a Sunday school, nor is it, for most of us, that easy affair which possibly it has been to him. It is a most serious and awful thing. It is not a comedy nor a drama, but a tragedy. We must bear in mind that life is not to be considered in the light of these humane principles which the hon. gentleman has laid down. If we are to be scientific, we must examine the facts as they are. If we are to be philosophical or religious, we must examine the facts as they are. If however, we are simply to be utilitarian without regard to those other two great divisions of thought, we will no doubt follow the course adopted by the hon. gentleman. We will live in places where it is more offensive to have a hanging or an execution than it is to face the alternatives. If the hon. gentleman lived in a mining camp, where murders were frequently committed, he would at last beyond a doubt be prevailed upon to say, "This must be stopped; the men who have committed these crimes cannot be confined, and because we have no place within which to confine them, so we will have to take them out and shoot them." Why is the extreme penalty necessary? We admit that in many cases confinement would probably do, and I must confess that I shudder at the thought of hanging the young. I shudder also at Hell, not from fear of it, but at the awfulness of it. I suppose the hon. member (Mr. Bickerdike) has not given up his belief in Hell, and if he has not, he must know that while the torment of a hanging or execution ceases after a few struggles from the unfortunate victim, the torments of Hell endure forever. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is versed in Purgatory.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I have never been there.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman will do well if he ever gets there. In this system of the Almighty a form of punishment is exacted, not merely, as I understand it, for the purification of the individual concerned, but as an example to all mankind, and it must be remembered that example, and not vengeance, is at the basis of all this. The lax and the lazy, the indolent and the vagrant, all who are inclined to degenerate, must understand that when they commit a terrible sin they must pay the penalty. If we adopted the plan of turning the other cheek, our act might be, according to the theory, a very fine one. But strange to say, the Son of God who advocated that cause, was himself the victim of a different system. We can only understand these things as they are presented to us. The Highest Power of all exacted the penalty of death—there must be satisfaction. I do not suppose that the satisfaction was that of vengeance, for though the men of whom we read in the Old Testament gloried in the vengeance which they considered so delightful and so necessary, it would be absurd to suppose that the Creator of the universe would execute vengeance upon mortals who exist upon a planet so small as to be invisible from the sun. These things must give us pause. We think too highly of ourselves and too little of the Almighty, I believe. It is upon a different ground, upon the ground of necessity, that this infliction of the last dread penalty is to be justified. In the family, mistaken kindness to a son may cause his ideas to become lax, with the consequence that he grows up a shiftless good-for-nothing. But had he been dealt with a little more stringently, a little more strictly, he might grow up a good man. That may be the basis of it all. We are not competent to form opinions in opposition to the laws of Almighty God. One must not set up his theories, collected here in the House of Commons or in his study, in opposition to these laws. In olden times people followed more or less the dictates of nature, but we now-a-days have become so refined that we regard nature rather as a nuisance, as a very vulgar means to an entirely different end. People should study the natural sciences. Our study of those sciences has taught us that that which was once thought to be the thunderbolt of Jupiter is in reality a fusion of hydrogen and nitrogen gases at high electric tension. These studies have caused us to understand that the form of the crystal is due to a certain degree of chemical tension, of heat or otherwise, a regular falling into their places of the molecules that compose it. And so the common carbon, under intense heat and vast pressure, becomes the clarified crystal that we call the diamond. These things give us a different conception of life and cause us to see that there is something in the purpose which God has unfolded, something in the law and order which he has inculcated. They teach us that we must not give way to every little heartfelt impulse, for that course is not in accordance with the laws that govern our life. If what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bickerdike) says is true, that we should always be kindly, long-suffering, humane and forgiving, then the Maker of the universe has made a huge mistake, for he has not brought it about that way at all. Nor is there any warrant for it in the Scripture nor in history. Possibly the evolution of mankind and of nature, by strong and subtle promptings, may bring us to that conclusion, as it has brought us from time to time to other conclusions, but we should not reach such conclusions by argument that is in direct opposition to the natural manifestations to which I have been referring. The case of rape referred to by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) calls to mind the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). That hon. gentleman said that whatever might be the theory of the speakers in the House with regard to the necessity or otherwise of capital punishment, it was necessary if the lives of the lonely settlers on the prairie were to be preserved, and if the women were to stay upon the farms. He said, as nearly as I can remember: If you remove the dread of the death penalty you will make it impossible for farmers of the West to continue their work, for their womenfolk will not remain in remote parts of the country but will come nearer to the centres of population where they will be able to feel safe. There you have the natural necessity of the case. One statement of that kind is worth all the theoretical argument that might be advanced in a week's time in this House. Facts are the things which must rule us. The mere taking of life is, I fancy, that which presents the picture of the greatest horror to the hon. member for St. Lawrence. Is not that so?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Yes.

Mr. BURNHAM: I can well understand that to a gentle soul things of that description are dreadful. And, that being so, a war such as the present is beyond all conception dreadful. But it so happens that it is sometimes necessary, in order to stop an assailant, to take his life. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that if he were attacked, and if it were a question of his own life or that of his assailant he would not kill that assailant if he had the power?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: That is the only ground, I believe, on which the killing of a man is justified—self-defence. That is the only ground upon which such an act is justified by Scripture, history or reason.

Mr BURNHAM: That is the ground upon which men are hanged; self-defence is the justification advanced for capital punishment. I repeat that no one for a moment accepts the ghastly doctrine that the reason for capital punishment is that society must wreak vengeance upon the criminal. It is because we must defend ourselves. This modification is asked for not so much in the interest of men as of women and children. That lets the cat out of the bag. There is no justification for the rest of the hon. gentleman's argument. We are not concerned with the rest of his argument because, if he admits that self-defence justifies decapitation, or hanging, or any other form of capital punishment, if that is the ground upon which he bases his argument, it is met. The equation being declared, there is no difficulty and therefore no justification for his Bill. We have met his objections; we meet them now.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Would you hang the boy?

Mr. BURNHAM: No. The reason I would not hang the boy is not because it is a violation of the principle I have laid down but I do not think that a boy could be competent within the meaning of the law. I think that a boy should be taken as not possessing the ability—the ability of a man—to consider what he did. If a boy of sixteen is as old as a man is at twenty-one, if he thoroughly understands the nature of his action, I would say hang him. So far as my experience goes, boys of sixteen are very irresponsible. They might be influenced on the spur of the moment by some one else, or through some fascination amounting to hypnotism to do something which, with consideration, they would not do. But, I do not believe that they can be guilty of the nefarious and hideous villainy that must characterize the act of the true murderer. I do not think they are capable of it. Therefore, I would say that I would not hang a boy under any circumstances. But nowadays women are to be considered as men. They do not want woman suffrage; they want equal suffrage. They do not want to be distinguished as electors they wish to co-operate with men and since men and women are to be the same electoral entities, they must appear before the law on an equal footing without distinction in every possible case. This is one of them. If I am liable to be hanged, my wife, if I have one, must be liable also.

Mr. GRAHAM: You ought to have one.

Mr. BURNHAM: Of course, that is another matter.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: It is time you had.

Mr. BURNHAM: Now, you are trying to put me off the track. I think we should deal with these questions on their merits. I would like to say, with the permission of the House, that I desire to resume this question at eight o'clock, when I shall have given it further consideration.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. BURNHAM (continuing): Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose to continue my remarks at length, but I would say that before six o'clock I understood that we had arrived at an amicable conclusion, namely that the hon. member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) agreed that we were entitled to slay people if they desired to take our lives, or in other words, in self defence. The theory of capital punishment is founded on self defence. On that we agreed, and the necessity of the Bill is therefore not apparent. It is, of course, possible to substitute imprisonment for capital punishment; but it has been ascertained in many countries that life imprisonment is not by any means the deterrent that capital punishment is. In those countries where it has been thought expedient to inflict capital punishment as rarely as possible, in the absence of superior conditions and the progress of education, it has been found that serious crime increased. I make this statement, but I do not intend to back it up by statistics, nor to implement it in any way. I simply wish to say that I am aware that in some countries or states where they had capital punishment and gave it up from humanitarian impulses, they had to restore it, serious crime became so rampant. The corrective which the hon. member for St. Lawrence is looking for is that of superior education and a general improvement of general conditions. Those things alone will bring about that state of things to which the hon. member looks forward; and when it comes it will be recognized and the various measures which are now employed, which are extremely severe and whose ghastliness alone the hon. member admits is the cause of his dislike for them, will disappear. Conditions are not so savage as they used to be. People do not hang for sheep stealing or poaching or other little amusements of that kind; but there was a time, and there are conditions in this world, in which the very severest and most terrible measures may be necessary in self defence; and it would be a serious thing if a Bill like this should pass before its time. From the testimony given by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and some other western gentlemen, it would be a very serious mistake to bring it on even if it resulted in only one or two serious crimes before the impropriety of its abolishment was discovered. We must safeguard life at all hazards, we must be extremely careful of it, much more so than of those who commit the crime of murder. In the course of time we all hope to abolish capital punishment, or rather hope that it will render itself unnecessary; it will abolish itself, and we hope indeed that all forms of punishment will in time disappear since the necessity for them will have disappeared; and we hope also that the whole human race will find that its future does not prevent the terrible aspect it does at the present time. I might as well go further in my spirit of altruism and hope for the best for the Opposition.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) endeavouring, as he says, to explain the inexplicable. Whether he succeeded or not I am really at a loss to know; he may have and he may not have. But although he is not in favour of capital punishment, he nearly smothered us with language. He has arrived, at the conclusion, however, that the abolition of capital punishment is right, and his concluding remark is that this is not an opportune time to enact such legislation. He has converted himself at least, by his argument, to practically the same viewpoint as the hon. member (Mr. Bickerdike). I do not agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) that this is not a proper time, unless we are prepared to say that we are less advanced than many states of the Union which, having passed Acts for the abolition of capital punishment, have not re-enacted that legislation again, so far as I know. It is not to my mind a matter of theology, and I would not like to undertake the task of discussing that deep subject with any person, much less with my well-informed friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), because I admit he would have me lost in that discussion. It It is a question of the protection of society, and how that can be accomplished with the minimum of harm done. It must be remembered, in listening to the arguments against this legislation, that the same arguments were advanced in every country where it was proposed, but the answer has been as I have said a moment ago, that with one or two exceptions no country has returned to capital punishment that ever made the experiment of its abolition. The result must have been good, else that would not have been the case. It is true also that in every reform there are men who put their feet against the cleats as if they were in a tug-of-war and refuse to be pulled so long as they can keep their dead weight holding back. But public opinion is going to crowd the Parliament of Canada, whatever Government is at the head of affairs in this country, on until it gets the courage to adopt this great measure of reform. A few years ago had anybody told members of this House that practically all Canada would have adopted woman suffrage, he would have been laughed at. There were a few advocates of woman suffrage in the legislature of Ontario, in which I had the honour of having a seat at that time, but so few that it was difficult when the late Mr. Smith of Peel, a few years ago, introduced a resolution to that effect for him to get a sufficient number of members to stand up and have a vote taken on the question; there was almost a solid legislature against it. Now there is a solid legislature for it. Go through the western provinces, as I had the privilege of doing a few weeks ago, and we find the people unanimous for women being put on a plane of equality with men in this respect. I venture the assertion that it will not be very long before this House takes the same stand, and I think it should. Then take the temperance question. It is not so many years ago since prohibition was looked upon as a movement so far in advance of the time that the majority were against it. To-day the people are almost unanimous in favour of very advanced legislation, and most of them, I think, are in favour of the complete abolition of the traffic in intoxicating liquor as a beverage. It should not be discouraging to the member for St. Lawrence division to find that even in the parliamentary ranks there are men with these old conservative ideas of going slowly in these matters.

Mr. BRADBURY: Because you have so many Conservatives over there.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know that there are many anywhere now who would call themselves Convervatives. However, Sir, that does not mean that this legislation should not be passed. I think we owe a debt of gratitude to the member for St. Lawrence for continually pressing this matter. It is the one great thing he has in his mind, and I heartily approve his stand in regard to it.

From my earliest recollection I have been impressed with the view that capital punishment should not be exercised in any country in the world. In our present condition of enlightenment there is no need for it. On what ground do we punish the criminal? The chief ground is the protection of society. The second, which ought not to be forgotten, is that of giving the individual an opportunity of reformation. That is not a light matter. It is not within the purview of man to take away from any human being the opportunity of reformation, unless he is absolutely sure that it is necessary to do so in order to protect the public. Is the punishment of hanging or the death penalty an example more striking or more effective than any other form of punishment? I can answer only by presenting the experience of countries which have abolished capital punishment. I have read everything I could get on this question during the last twenty years and I am firmly convinced that the experience of other countries teaches most clearly that life imprisonment has just as deterrent an effect on crime as has capital punishment. It may not be your view; it may not be the view of others, but the practical test of the correctness of that view must be found in the experience of other countries. That is as to the past. As to the future, surely imprisonment for life protects the public just as much as hanging. The criminal is shut out from society and has no opportunity of committing crime, but he has an opportunity, if the reforms which ought to take place and must take place are carried out, to contribute to the maintenance of himself and his family, or if he has no family, to contribute something to the welfare of the public. I have always taken the position that our criminal law should be so administered that the man who by his own act has caused the support of those depending upon him to be taken away should be allowed a certain amount every day for his work and that a portion of that amount should go to the sustenance of his family. To come back to my contention, surely if a man be incarcerated the public is just as safe from his depredations as they would be if his life were taken.

The next point is the reformation of the individual. This may be called sentimental. Some will say that a man sufficiently hardened to take the life of a fellow-being is not susceptible of reformation; that it is sufficient to give him two or three months to make his peace with his Maker. I cannot accept that view; I believe that is going beyond the purview of mankind. No human being is so bereft of all that is right that in his constitution there is nothing good. It may be small; from the human standpoint it may be almost imperceptible to some, but I contend that the Creator never sent a being into this world who did not possess some good traits of character which if developed would lead him into a higher and better life. Our criminals become such largely through neglect during childhood and youth, and through the influence of their surroundings. Some are criminals through heredity, and that brings us back to the original position that the forebears of this man, who is said to be a criminal through hereditary instinct, must have been surrounded by conditions and circumstances that led him into criminality. I must admit that in these times of stress, we are, perhaps, losing sight of the proportion and value of human life; but if we value the future of the human family as well as the present, is it not well worth while to make an attempt, on behalf of those by whom we are surrounded, on behalf of the criminal, to secure the reformation of that criminal? If there be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, is it not worth while that the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada should give several sinners each year full opportunity for repentance? The evidence on which a criminal is convicted is, I suppose, in nine cases out of ten, purely circumstantial. I admit that in very few cases does the administration of justice, as justice is displayed on our statute book, go wrong in Canada. Perhaps there is no country in the world where justice is meted out so efficiently as it is under the British flag. But notwithstanding that, we do take human life; we take it by statute. There are over two hundred men in this Parliament, and we arrogate to ourselves the right to pass a law which gives one human being the right under certain conditions to take the life of his fellow-being. I could never bring myself to feel that I was justified in going that far. Fully convinced as I am that society would be as thoroughly protected by life imprisonment of the convicted one as it is by capital punishment, and that an opportunity should be given for the reformation of the criminal, I am unable to see any reason why I should change my mind in favour of the death penalty.

I was pleased to see to-day on the floor of the House a former member of the Ontario Government, and I am of the opinion that if he could have spoken his mind in this House this afternoon, his views would have, partially at least, coincided with those of the hon. member for the St. Lawrence division. I had the honour of preceding as Provincial Secretary of Ontario the Hon. Mr. Hanna, and my predecessor was the late Mr. Stratton, who had the idea that the Central Prison at Toronto should be removed from the centre of that city and that different treatment should be meted out to those sent up for less than two years. I was very strongly of the same view. When the Hon. Mr. Hanna came into office, he proceeded along lines of prison reform, and the very same arguments that I have heard here this afternoon in favour of capital punishment were uttered against his propositions for prison reform. He took the ground, after full investigation in some of the states of the Union where the methods of dealing with criminals have been greatly revised, where capital punishment has been abolished, that there was a better method of treating our unfortunate brethren than by the utmost severity of the law. He took the viewpoint expressed a moment ago by myself, that if there was something good in humanity it should be cultivated, and that it was the duty of the state not to crush out with an iron hand what is good, but to give it an opportunity to develop, and sooner or later, in the majority of cases, the man whom we formerly looked upon as a criminal might become a benefit and even an ornament to society. He established the prison farm system, and the prisoners do the work of the ordinary farmer; out of doors engaged in healthy occupation. They are not only improving themselves physically, but they are earning for the State and they are producing for their own maintenance as well as for the maintenance of others, and although it is true that occasionally a man does not respect the liberty thus given him, the records of the Province of Ontario will show that this reformation in the treatment of prisoners has been good not only for the individual, but for the State.

From various states of the Union and from other countries have come men to investigate the system of prison reform which is in its early stages in Ontario, with the object of adapting that system in their own country. The very same principle that applies to the treatment of men convicted of minor offences can be applied to the treatment of our unfortunate, yes, vicious fellow men who have committed greater crimes. This advance movement in the mehod of treating criminals may be slow, but leading men of the Dominion, who are not in public life, but who have the keeping of their brethren in their care, men high up in the ministry, men in the professions, thinking business-men, are joining in a movement to urge upon the Parliament of Canada at least to try the experiment of the abolition of Capital Punishment. This reform will come in this country just as surely as these other reforms have come, and it is the duty of this Parliament not to hang back until it is crowded and shoved along, but to lead the way in this great reform, in which they will certainly have the support of the best people in the country. I am strongly in favor of the proposition of my hon. friend.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition to-day referred to the duty of members of the Government. To those who have not been members of a Government and who have not had to deal with this very serious question, I might implement his remarks by saying that it is one of the most difficult of the problems that come before a Government for solution. Imagine men sitting around a Cabinet Council with the life of a human being in the balance! The Minister of Justice makes a report. What is the report? Not that the man ought to die, but that under our law he ought to die. The Minister of Justice is not responsible; he who signs the Order in Council is not responsible, but we, the representatives of the people are responsible for compelling the members of the Government, even those who do not believe in capital punishment, to agree to the taking of the life of a fellow being. It is a very difficult position for a member of the Government to be in who holds the views that I hold. The system is all wrong. Punishment should be meted out by the statutes of our country so far as we can go to make the punishment adequate, but it ought not to go so far as to take the life of a fellow being. In the years that are to come, when those who succeed us, perhaps some of the younger men in the House, now look back at what is taking place this session on this question and at what has taken place at previous sessions, they will wonder why men were so slow, why men were too timid, why they hesitated to take this forward step in Canada when they had such striking examples elsewhere in the world. After the suggestions of my hon. friend from St. Lawrence have been on the Statute Book of Canada, after the operation of the law which he suggests has been shown to be beneficial instead of detrimental, then when the history of this country comes to be written, the name of Robert Bickerdike will stand out brighter in the pages of our history than that of others amongst us who talk louder and longer on other questions, but who have no more seriousness, no more strength of purpose, no more perseverance—if as much—than has my hon. friend. I intend to vote in favour of his Bill.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer humble apologies on behalf of that section of our community which obeys the law, which maintains the State, and which, speaking generally, conforms to the rules of life laid down by God and man. It is apparently the view of my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) that this element of the community is of a negligible character, and the only thing to be considered is the right, interest, and advantage of those who set at defiance the laws of God and man. In my view there is no foundation for the suggestion that the proposal now before the House is in the interest of the sacredness of human life. My emphatic protest against it is that it is an attack upon the sacredness of human life. I have listened to the eloquence of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in regard to the opportunity that should be given to the convicted murderer for reformation. I am here to speak on behalf of the victim, and to ask where does consideration for the victim come in? Where and how does the victim have an opportunity to make his peace with God, who has been hurried into the presence of his Maker by the hand of a murderer? You say, but the murder has been done. That is true, but murders are done to-day, and other murders are done to-morrow, and the obligation is laid upon the members of this House, representing the people of Canada, to see that such measures are placed upon the statute book and such administration given as will secure as far as possible, that no man, woman or child shall be hurried unprepared into the presence of their Maker by the hand of a murderer.

I was somewhat touched by the suggestion that those who are not in favour of the murderer as against the murdered are therein non-progressive. Permit me to point out that all that has been argued here to-day was argued thousands of years ago amongst many savage tribes, and amongst many tribes the principle still prevails to-day that a murder can be condoned by the payment of money. Surely that is a much better principle than destroying the life of the murderer, better than placing the murderer in duress at the expense of the state? We are not going forward when we are heading to the condition of savagery which prevailed thousands of years ago, as history tells us and which prevails to-day, as we know of our own knowledge.

It is a question of stupendous importance; it touches the heart and mind of every responsible member of Parliament, of every man charged with responsibility in connection with the matter, and I certainly want to discharge my duty, as our friends here want to discharge theirs. It is an easy way of escaping responsibility—and this is the logic of the attitude taken—to say that the murder having been committed the only question to be considered is the good of the murderer. I submit that the question to be considered is the future good of society and of the State, and if it should unfortunately be the case that the good of the murderer does not run on all fours with the good of the State, then in my humble judgment so much the worse for the murderer. His was the choice not the unfortunate victim's. The State has to consider the question of the greatest good to the greatest number, and I submit that that question is decided by taking such a course as shall tend in the largest possible measure to protect the interests of the law-abiding section of the community against the passion or rapacity or other evil desires that may be conjured up by those who are not of a law-abiding character. It has been stated that some of the states of the Union have declared against capital punishment. I am sorry I am not as familiar with the course of history in the neighbouring republic as some of our friends seem to be. I am somewhat familiar with recent history, however, and I would ask whether the state of California is one of those that have abolished capital punishment.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Not yet.

Mr. OLIVER: Because I recall that at the time of the San Francisco earthquake advantage was taken of that terrible tragedy by the criminally inclined to commit murders and robbery, and under the authority of the Governor of the state, so I am credibly informed, the late General Funston posted soldiers in the streets with orders to shoot on sight any one caught in the act of robbing a body, or pillaging of any kind. Who will say that that was not a wise and humane course to take? Or are those states in which we read of lynchings taking place, the states that have declared against capital punishment?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. OLIVER: Well, I am here to make this argument. Wherever an aggrieved citizen or family feel that substantial justice cannot be expected at the hands of authority, then under the law of God that is planted in the heart of man, the law will be taken in the hands of those that are aggrieved. That is the lynch law that prevails and has prevailed for ages throughout the United States. There is no state of the Union today where it does not prevail on occasion. I do not think there is any example that can be drawn from history, recent or ancient, that will prove that those who commit the most terrible offence against humanity should not be dealt with according to the laws laid down in Scripture and implanted by the Divine Power in the heart of mankind.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY. (St. John City): I desire to say a very few words upon this question. I agree that the measure introduced by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) is one of very great importance, and deserving, I think, of the very serious consideration of this House. I notice that a difference of opinion has been expressed as to what has taken place in other countries which have done away with capital punishment. My hon. friend the Solicitor General stated that he knew of countries which had adopted legislation abolishing capital punishment, but which had gone back to the law as they had it before. That statement was denied by my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill, and I am inclined to think that my hon. friend from St. Lawrence is in the right, and that there are very few, if any, countries, that have taken what is regarded by a great many people, and myself among the number, as a forward movement, and have afterwards reversed their action. I think the measure is one that ought fairly to go to a special committee to investigate the results of similar legislation in other countries, more particularly in the United States. I am inclined to think that the records will show that, so far from the abolition of capital punishment leading to an increase of crime, the effect has been quite the reverse. I am inclined to think that those persons who commit murder have but little regard to the consequences to themselves; I doubt if many who have in their hearts the desire to do murder are deterred by the knowledge that the penalty may be the loss of their own lives.

It is a most serious thing to take human life. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has asked why regard should be paid to the welfare of the murderer, seeing that he has sent his victim into eternity without warning and without opportunity to repent of crimes of which possibly he may have been guilty. But the law to-day provides that all possible mercy shall be extended to the murderer and that before he is called upon to pass into the presence of his Maker he shall have opportunity to repent in order that, if possible, he may leave this world with his sins washed away. That shows that society has some regard at all events for the future well being of the man found guilty of murder. If imprisonment for life would be an equal deterrent from crime, surely it would be better to provide that punishment rather than that the law should take the life of a human being without benefit to society. It is true, as the hon. member for Edmonton says, that society must recognize the horrible nature of the crime of which the murderer is guilty. But taking his life will not restore the life that he has taken; it can do no good to the murderer's victim. So, it seems to me the only way in which we can regard this punishment is from the standpoint of the protection of society. I have heard it said that in the city of St. John, less than a hundred years ago, a negro boy, thirteen years of age, was hanged for the crime of theft—for the stealing of a loaf of bread he was convicted and sentenced and the sentence was executed. The Governor could not commute the sentence; the boy had violated the law and it was the duty of the officers of the law to inflict upon him the penalty for his crime. But public opinion was so aroused by the brutal result of the enforcement of the law, that an amendment was soon made doing away with the penalty of death except for the crimes of murder and rape.

My hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) has challenged—and I think has challenged on good grounds—any opponent of this Bill to point to any country in the civilized world which has done away with capital punishment and afterwards re-enacted it. The fact that the experience in this respect is all one way seems to me a strong argument in favour of passing this measure. I would ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), who is leading the opposition to this Bill, if he does not think it would be wise and proper to let the measure go to a second reading and let it be referred to a committee to obtain reliable information on this subject for the information of the House and the country.

My hon. friend from Edmonton asked whether the states of the American Union in which the death penalty had been abolished were those in which so many lynchings had taken place. My information is that those states of the Union that have done away with capital punishment occupy the very first rank among the civilized states of the world, and that those states in which lynchings have been most frequent are those in which the death penalty is still exacted for the crime of murder. It is the fashion among some hon. gentlemen—and I am sorry that the hon. member for Edmonton seems to have fallen into that error—to reflect unfavourably upon the state of society in the neighbouring republic. I have been in many parts of that country, and I venture to say that taking the states of the Union one with another, and taking their people one with another, they stand in the very first rank amongst the civilized peoples of the world.

I appeal again to the Solicitor General not to stop this Bill at its present stage, but to let it go to a second reading, to be referred then to a committee to collect information upon this subject upon which the House and the country can rely.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (translation): Mr. Speaker, kindly allow me a few remarks anent the question now before the House. The subject is of the greatest importance and deserving of our very earnest consideration. Every year the House is called upon to pronounce on this proposition, which our learned friend brings forward with characteristic perseverance, study and energy. I do not intend this evening to repeat all the arguments which I have had the opportunity already of bringing to bear in this debate, I merely wish to call attention to a few points, the House having long ago heard the pro and con of this important discussion. Any lengthy remarks on my part would be out of place.

First of all, I may be permitted to reply to the honourable and learned member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) who, when this question was last debated, took me to task because I did not share his views. My object in taking the floor is to reply to the unfair references of the learned member. He states I am in favour of capital punishment because the more hangings, the better for me. That is quite uncalled for, and the distinguished member in speaking thus was most unfair.

What benefit does a Crown attorney reap when cases of capital punishment increase in number? That does not add to his fees? What interest can the legal representative of the Crown have in the matter? None whatever. Our grief is profound and our misgivings many when we have to insist on the law taking its course after a jury has brought in a verdict of guilty against an individual. How deep our regret when we have to move for a sentence of death! How cautiously we proceed! First of all the facts are investigated by men quite competent and wise. They decide as to whether any one is liable to prosecution. Then the grand jury takes the matter in hand, and no precaution is overlooked that may prevent a possible mistake. Yes, I reiterate my statement, nothing is neglected and in case of doubt, if we are not fully convinced of the guilt of the accused, we instruct the jury to render a verdict in favour of the prisoner. People are fond of talking against miscarriages of justice, miscarriages that never have taken place. It has been stated that an Italian who had been adjudged guilty and was reprieved later on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice had been the victim of a judicial error. I was Crown prosecutor at the first trial. The jury failed to agree and the case was postponed to the next assizes. The prisoner claimed that he had not produced all his witnesses and taken advantage of all his privileges. For those reasons we adjourned his case to the next term so as to give him an opportunity of preparing his defence. His means being insufficient to allow him to bring his witnesses to court, the Crown undertook to pay their conduct-money. So we obtained the evidence of witnesses whom he claimed would testify on his behalf, but their testimony went against him and left no doubt as to his guilt. Later on, after serving a term in gaol, he was sentenced to hang, but the Minister of Justice thought fit to recommend his enlargement. I do not blame the hon. the minister but there had certainly been no miscarriage of justice. The guilt had been established beyond all doubt, but certain parties who had testified against the prisoner thought fit for one reason or another to swear to an affidavit that might justify the Minister of Justice setting him free. Again I say there had been no error, but the pardon was a mere act of clemency on the part of the minister.

It has been said and repeated on all occasions that capital punishment is absolutely ineffective and does not act as a deterrent; that it is too severe, and should be abolished; that the laws of humanity do not countenance the infliction of the sentence of death on human being. Quite easy to argue and quite easy to bring to pass. My observation, however, and my experience have fully satisfied me that since the infliction of the death penalty on murderers, there has been a marked decrease in the number of murders.

One can easily make the statement that the extreme penalty is no deterrent; but I claim that if capital punishment be done away with, crime will increase a hundredfold. Many criminally inclined wisely fear the scaffold, and were confinement the only punishment, many more among them would become murderers. It has been urged that it is wrong and inhuman to take the lives of the culprits; but when assassins, bandits and murderers kill; when they strike right and left, who among them has ever stayed his hand, impelled by like consideration for his victim? Murderers find time to effect their reconciliation with society and make their peace with their own conscience and with God. They have ample opportunity to arrange their domestic matters, while the victims they have ushered unprepared into eternity without a moment's notice may not have had the opportunity of making preparation, of putting their affairs in order, and especially making themselves ready for the life eternal.

Well, my opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that such an argument takes into account only one side of the question. Had this mode of dealing with criminals not been attempted elsewhere, were we without any experience from other countries, we might perhaps say: Let us do away with capital punishment and judge of the results in the next few years to come. But the experiment has been tried and the states which introduced the new system had to return to the old, on account of the large increase in crime.

I am quite aware that no reasoning on my part will convince any of the hon. members who have taken sides on this question; and it is far from my thought, quite far indeed, to say anything that may stand in the way of my hon. friend's efforts.

Should his proposition prevail, so much the better for him; and if I could anywise help him, I should do it quite heartily. What could I deny the hon. member from St. Lawrence? He is an old friend of mine, a generous man, an old fighter who always answered the call when his services were required. Were my convictions different, I should be the first to side with him; but it is a matter of conscience with me to raise my voice against this Bill.

I am merely setting forth my personal views on the matter, without any desire to turn the House against the project. Ordinarily people may be persuaded to change their opinions; but this does not obtain in the House of Commons, where every speaker expounds his viewpoint without in any way attempting to influence his fellow members.

Wherefore I say to my honourable friend, that the time is not ripe for a measure of this nature; that the House could not put it on the Statute-books, because I believe it is not in the country's interest. My honest conviction is that its effects on general morality would be disastrous.

How often have I heard criminals declare: Were it not that I may hang for it, I should have seen that you dissapeared long ago. . . or again: that you would not sleep alive tonight. How often have I listened to similar utterances since I am become a member of the Bar, not mixing with criminals, but as Crown attorney having to meet constantly prisoners who are brought before the Court.

During my inquiry, as Royal Commissioner, into the St. Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary, I examined the files of all the prisoners, over five hundred of them. Many had been sentenced to hang but the penalty had been commuted to confinement for life.

Many of the prisoners whom it is sought to protect by substituting perpetual imprisonment to the gallows, on the plea that the ends of justice would be met, are not satisfied with that commutation. And I beg to say to the learned member, who fathers the present Bill, that within the walls of St-Vincent-de-Paul I heard murderers declare that they would have much preferred hanging to languishing all their lifetime in a prison. Not only did they feel their own personal responsability and guilt, but they lived to regret an action which brought shame to their wife, their children, their brothers, an entire family and sometimes more than one, for whom the life sentence of one of their members is a perpetual disgrace. If on the other hand the culprit expiates his crime on the scaffold, his wife at least regains her freedom and the crime is not a matter of reproach from morning till night as happens when the criminal is confined for life. After an execution, the victim passes into oblivion, society is rid of him. If he be simply imprisoned for life, no month or week or day goes by without recalling to his relatives the fact of his existence. Thus it happens that a large number of those innocent families finding the memory of the past unbearable and still more the thought of the future have to leave the country, some of them even changing their name so that the public may not recognize in them the wife or children of a life convict. More grief is caused by a life sentence than by an execution.

My learned friend aims at affording society a larger measure of protection. He would do away with capital punishment in order to protect, as he states, the unfortunate relatives of the prisoner. Well, my opinion is that the new system would be a greater chastisement to them, that the penalty, instead of being an alleviation, would be a greater hardship, and your measure would fall short of its aim.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say on the question; I felt that in justice to myself and to the electors I represent, my duty called for those few remarks. I have spoken in all earnestness, fully convinced that the House should not pass the Bill.

Mr. GEORGE H. BRADBURY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I would not have felt called upon to say one word here to-night on this very important question were it not for the fact that during the discussion this afternoon a matter was mentioned affecting my own constituency. One of the foulest murders that has ever been committed in the West was committed at Rockwood within the last year, and the hon. gentleman who is fathering this Bill (Mr. Bickerdike) has taken a very active interest in asking that the sentence of the court be set aside by the Government on the ground that the young man who committed the crime was, as he claimed, only sixteen years of age. This young man came to the district outside the town of Stonewall two or three years ago and secured employment with the Vincent family, one of the oldest families in that district. He was taken into the confidence of the family and treated more like their own boy than the hired man. Mr. Vincent had gone to the city and sold his wheat. The boy was with him and he knew all about it; he knew that Mr. Vincent had received $1,700. They came back to the farm. The boy got there first, shot the wife, Mrs. Vincent, and killed her.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Intentionally?

Mr. BRADBURY: It is the plea of the young man himself that the shooting of Mrs. Vincent was accidental, but he is the only one who says so. He made no attempt at all to render any assistance to the woman after she was shot. When the husband came home he took the first opportunity to shoot him too. He shot him, rendering him unconscious, and then he went and got a shot gun, blew the man's head off, got the money and got away with it. Yet, we are asked to believe that the shooting of Mrs. Vincent was accidental.

I do not understand that the enforcement of the death penalty is a matter of vengeance. The law, I believe, is administered for the purpose of preventing the perpetration of crimes of this character. If there ever was a case calling for very careful consideration by council I would think it would be this one. I am not going to discuss the general principles of the Bill submitted by my hon. friend. There is room for discussion both ways. There is no doubt that there are cases in which there are extenuating circumstances, where murders are committed hastily, where, for instance, a man in a passion will lift up a gun or an axe and take another man's life. These are cases in which there might be some jurisdiction for granting a reprieve, but careful consideration must be given when it is evident that a cold-blooded murder has been committed after having been planned, no doubt as this murder must have been planned, by this young man. They claim he is only sixteen years of age. I have not been in the district since this murder was committed, but I have letters from my friends there who claim that the boy is over twenty years and that he has the appearance of a man. I think that indicates that he is much older than he claims to be. But, whether he is sixteen years of age or not, he had been working for some years in the district, he was thoroughly responsible and knew what he was doing, and if crimes of this kind are to be committed in this country without punishment such as the law provides, I have very grave doubts as to the country being able to maintain its proud boast that it has never had a lynching. Why? Simply because the law has been administered. If a man was guilty of murder he was almost sure to suffer the penalty provided for the offence. When I went to the West some thirty years ago gamblers used to come across from the other side of the line. The red-coated mounted police were patrolling the boundary in southern Manitoba and when these gamblers would fall out, one would say to the other: If I had you over on the other side of the line I would blow your brains out. Why did they not do it on this side of the line?—because they knew that if they did it they would suffer the death penalty.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Was there not capital punishment on the other side?

Mr. BRADBURY: There was, but, unfortunately, the law was not administered as it was here. With reference to this murder of which I have spoken, I hope that this application will receive very careful consideration at the hands of the Government, as all matters of that kind must. It is a very serious matter to take the life of any man either by law or otherwise, but I firmly believe that if capital punishment were done away with there would be more lives taken in this country than there are at the present time.

There is no question but that the fear of the gallows has saved many a man's life. Everybody in the western country knows that this is the case and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who spoke so feelingly, knows that it is true. I am not bloodthirsty enough to wish to take any man's life. I heard the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) a few moments ago make the statement that the taking of a life by law would not do any 9 p.m. good to the party who had been murdered. I agree with my hon. friend thoroughly, but the law was not designed as a matter of vengeance, or to do any good to the party murdered. It was designed to set an example, to deter others from committing the same crime that the condemned person was suffering for. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) made an eloquent appeal. I sympathize with the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentlemen who are advocating this bill, but, there is no analogy between the prison reforms that are taking place in Ontario and in other parts of this great continent, or between men who have committed some petty crime and found their way into the penitentiary, and a cold-blooded murder where a man premeditates a crime and goes out and deliberately murders another.

Another argument advanced by these hon. gentlemen is that you are ushering a man into eternity without giving him an opportunity to prepare. That is a sound argument, but what about that man and woman who were ushered into eternity by this young man without a moment's notice? They were given no time to prepare. It might as well have been their own son that committed that murder as the man who did it because he was treated as a member of the family. What about the children, the orphans, the brothers and sisters left to mourn the death of their parents? If this crime is not punished according to our present law, what is there to prevent other crimes being committed by men of this stamp? We have had several cases in that western country of young English boys coming out and committing horrible crimes.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Not English boys.

Mr. BRADBURY: English boys from the Bernardo school—more than half a dozen cases of them. It is a serious question and one that ought to be weighed very seriously by every member of this House before voting for a bill that would in any way lessen the penalty for murder. In view of that fact, in view of the murder that has been committed among my own friends, and the possibility that this matter will come before the Government on an application for a reprieve and that petitions have been largely signed all over the country—for it is no trouble to get a petition of this kind signed, as people become hysterical on such occasions and thousands and thousands of people will sign it who know nothing at all about the evidence, who do not weigh the matter but simply sign the petition because they think it is kindly and right thing to ask for the life of this young man—I take the position I have taken. I do not intend to say anything more on this Bill and would not have spoken if this case had not been brought forward as one reason why a Bill of this kind should be passed. This is a case which I think should emphasize the necessity of keeping the law just as it is, leaving the law to take its course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no right to further intervene in the debate, having spoken once. I simply rise to refer to the request of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) to allow the Bill to pass the second reading and be submitted to a committee of the House, and to give my reason for the position I think the House should take. He based his request upon the fact that a statement of mine to the effect that there have been countries in Europe, if not States in the American Republic, which had abolished capital punishment and afterwards reverted to it, was denied by the hon. member for the St. Lawrence division (Mr. Bickerdike), and that consequently there was a state of disputed facts that might well be submitted to a committee. I do not think that a very strong case could be made for a submission to a committee on so narrow a dispute on facts as that. I observe this, and I had it in mind at the time I was speaking before, that in the debate in 1915 the Minister of Justice referred to several countries as in the category I described. He referred to Austria-Hungary as having abolished capital punishment and having again returned to that treatment of murderers, and asserted as a fact that this had been the case. He referred also to the cases of Brunswick, Cobourg, Nassau, and Oldenburg which abolished capital punishment in 1849; Saxe-Meiningen and Saxe-Weimar in 1862 and Baden in 1863 and to Saxony which abolished it in 1868, all of whom returned to capital punishment under the Imperial Criminal Code of 1872. He referred further to the case of Russia who abolished capital punishment in 1850 and again returned to it, and for many years continued the practice of capital punishment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then repealed it again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not altogether. But even if they had it would still be a case of a country that had abolished capital punishment and returned to it and so would come within the class to which I referred. It is true that in 1907 capital punishment was again abolished in Russia, and again I am relying upon the minister's statement, which he says he very carefully affirmed. He says that while it was abolished in 1907 it was not wholly abolished, but was retained only for the offence of the murder of the Emperor or Empress of Russia or the heir to the throne. It may be that under the newer conditions that now obtain in Russia the lives of the people generally may be considered as sacred as those of the Emperor or Empress and the heir to the throne. He referred also to certain states of the American Union as having long ago abolished capital punishment and having then found the error of their ways. He referred to Rhode Island, Colorado and the state of Maine, and said:

> It is true, some of these states have since abolished it again. But, so far as the hon. gentleman seems to find what he regards as an unanswerable argument in the fact that that those states that have abolished capital punishment have never repented their action.

Those are cases, several of them in Europe especially, where there has been reversion, that is where capital punishment once abolished was afterwards restored. I have read the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence division following the Minister of Justice. I have read his speech again in 1916, and I listened to his speech to-day; but I have seen nothing to contradict the individual instances given by the Minister of Justice. I shall not refer to the subject further than to say that if I have observed the course of the debate correctly I do not think that the sense of this House is to the effect that there should be any serious intention on the part of this Parliament at this time to abolish capital punishment. The discussion is well worth while, but it would be saying too much to gather from this debate that there appears to be a sense of the House looking to a serious consideration of its abolition now. I think myself the vote of the second reading might well take place.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I presume I shall be expected to reply to some of the very unjust criticisms that have been offered to the Bill which I introduced. I would say to my good friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) that the statement I made was this, that no country or no state in the world that had abolished capital punishment had resumed it at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Resumed it since.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Resumed it at the present time. I know that there were some cases, as in Russia, which, as my hon. friend said, abolished capital punishment for everything except the murder of the crowned heads.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about those states in Germany?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I have some doubt about them. But it may be possible that Austria-Hungary, from some things that they have done recently, would return to capital puishment. But I do not think that our House should follow them.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. member prefer to follow the examples he has cited or those in Great Britain and France?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I would prefer to follow Russia just now.

Mr. BURNHAM: Yes, I thought so.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I hope that within a week this House will send a cable to Petrograd congratulating Russia on having abolished capital punishment entirely, and also upon the removal of all German influences in that country.

My good friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) has undertaken to say that that young man was guilty of murder. I have in my possession ten thousand or fifteen thousand signatures of people who say he was not.

Mr. BRADBURY: He was found guilty by the trial judge.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Found guilty by the jury and sentenced by Judge Macdonald—and I hope Judge Macdonald will be ashamed of himself for doing so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope the hon. member does not mean to cast any reflection upon the Bench, because he would be distinctly out of order in doing so.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Well, may I express my opinion about the jury? I still say that I am ashamed of him, if he is not ashamed of himself. I am sure there is not any man in Canada, in this House or out of it, who would stand for hanging a woman or a child, notwithstanding what my leader said this afternoon. I cannot believe it possible that a man who is a man would stand for hanging a woman or a child, and I do not think that any of those who have spoken to-day would do so. They might give somebody else thirty pieces of silver to go and do it, but they would not do it themselves. The right hon. leader of the Opposition spoke of President Fallières this afternoon. I think that President Fallières was the greatest and best man that France ever produced. What did President Fallières say? He said that if the judges who condemned a man to death had to do the hanging, there would be no more hanging. I have a better suggestion than that, I should like to see my good friend the leader of the Opposition and my good friend the member for West Peterborough do the hanging. I think that under those conditions hanging would soon stop.

Mr. BURNHAM: I have seen men whom I would hang with pleasure.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I have not the slightest doubt of that. Any man who would stand up in this House and say he wanted to hang that boy would do almost anything.

Mr. BURNHAM: I did not say that.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) said that he was very much pleased that justice in Canada was administered in such a just and equitable manner. I question very much whether he was correct in that view. I knew a man not four hundred miles from Montreal who stole a horse and buggy. He was sentenced to penitentiary for two years, persecuted right to the end by the man he stole the horse and buggy from, while the man he stole the horse and buggy from stole a whole railroad and burst a bank—and he was knighted. I think your whole system of punishment is wrong. You should punish with a view to making better men and women when you put them into prison. You punish for revenge, but you have no authority from Scripture to punish at all. There is not a verse in the word of God from Genesis to Revelation that gives you authority to punish a man at all or to hang him. I challenge the whole House to find it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no use appealiny to the other side; they are not familiar with the Scriptures.

Mr. BURNHAM: I asked you about hell.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) apologized for what he was doing. What do they say in France—qui s'excuse s'accuse? He said he was sorry when he had to hang these men; it pains him very much—but he takes the pay all the same. It is blood money, but, like Pilate of old, he washes his hands of it and turns it over to the jury, asking them to be merciful—after saying everything he could against the prisoner.

The Minister of Justice said that he had divine sanction for hanging these poor criminals and sending their souls into eternity. I challenged him then to produce that authority, and I challenge him now to do so. The Minister has no divine mandate to hang a boy. If he has such a mandate, it should be placed on the Table of the House so that members on each side may examine it, so that it may be incorporated in the Canadian Archives, to enable generations yet unborn to realize that in the year 1917 there was in the Canadian Government a Minister of Justice who had divine authority for hanging a boy. With all due respect to the Minister of Justice, his extravagant utterances on this subject could have been inspired only by a prejudice. Take the case of self-defence. I contend that only in self-defence, if at all, are we justified in taking human life.

Conceiving that a man has the right under natural instinct and statutory laws to kill another in self-defence, can any man establish self-defence by shooting another who was known to be as helpless as if handcuffed with his hands behind his back? Then, it is no better in principle for the state to do this than it is for a citizen. Society has no more right to trifle with the most sacred work of God than the individual has. The minister sends a young boy, handcuffed and guarded by the police, from a modern penitentiary of cement, granite, steel and armour plate, takes him out upon the gallows and hangs him until he is dead. Surely my friends won't say that that boy was hanged in self-defence.

Mr. BURNHAM: I ask the hon. gentleman, since he draws so much upon his vivid imagination—

Mr. BICKERDIKE: That is no imagination. The boy is condemned there in Winnipeg.

Mr. BURNHAM: —regarding the horrors of condemning this young man to death—

Mr. BICKERDIKE: This child.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentlemen, then, how he escapes condemning the work of the Creator in condemning to eternal punishment a man who had committed a sin like that?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: That is too deep for me; I give it up. It is a question that would require a notice of motion. Seven and one-half millions against one poor unfortunate fellow locked up in a penitentiary —and yet you say you are going to hang him in self-defence. I should like very much to touch the heart of the Solicitor General. I know it is difficult. I mentioned a case last session, and as I think he did not grasp it, I submit again that where the equities are equal, the element of mercy should hold the balance of power in deciding this question—the awful suffering and remorse of the family of the victim of a homicide. I agree that it is hard on the family of the deceased, and my sympathy goes out to them. Whether his death was the result of an assassination or a justifiable homicide, it is all the same to them. But, for that reason, would you have two widows, two sets of orphans, and two sorrowing parents? I do not think that capital punishment does any good. The family of the prisoner are just as innocent of an offence as the family of the deceased, and are just as much entitled to compassion and sympathy. For example, a man commits murder. He probably got drunk, or was by environment made a criminal. He has a good wife and also children; a good mother and father, and a large number of relatives, all innocent people, and profoundly grieved that the offense was committed. The accused is tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged. The very thought of taking the life of the husband, father, brother and son breaks a multitude of hearts. The time has healed the wounds that grief for the victim rent, but as the days roll by and the time approaches for the execution of the prisoner, the heart of the mother and the father all but breaks, the affectionate and tender cord of love that stretches from the altar to the scaffold is crushed but not broken, and the heart of the wife is burned to its very socket. She goes to and from the awful death cell. Little innocent hearts of children are crushed like the tender blades of grass beneath the angry heels of cannon on the German battlefield, yet they are all innocent. The brother and sister suffer for his sins, and see his ghost-like form in their dreams of repose. As the day draws near, the father and mother with tottering footsteps visit the death cell, and their minds wander back to the time when a little boy said his prayers at his mother's knee, and they ask God why they have this affliction to bear. The wife, children, relatives and friends all bid him good-bye and leave with breaking hearts, bitterly thinking of tomorrow. With heart-breaking despair, the mother prays God to spare her son, and as the time flies by the height of Heaven could not measure her sorrow. The father's hair turns gray over night, and the very souls are all scarred and forever seared over by the thought of the vengeance visited on their unfortunate relative, son and husband and father. The parents are hurried to their graves by broken hearts; the wife tries to forget, but cannot forgive; and the hearts of the children, relatives and friends are hardened by the harrowing example of killing by the State. Two families are in mourning, and the prisoner's family crushed and heart-broken by a protracted suspense, and that amounts to cruelty to the innocents. Then why make two families instead of one desolate.

Then, suppose he was innocent? There have been cases—we have had such cases right here in Canada—of innocent men being hanged. There was such a case not long ago in the United States, and I will mention others before I get through. The State cannot retract what it has done. If life imprisonment would serve the same purpose, would you not prefer it to the death penalty?

It is this spirit which must modify the law. Even if hell and death alike were necessary to be emphasized as penalties for the wicked in more barbarous ages, it is heaven and life which are to be chiefly taught as rewards for the good in the better and gentler days that are dawning. And this expresses a similar view to that maintained by the most competent judges, that pushing the death penalty only makes it worthless as a deterrent in communities that have reached the state of settled obedience to law.

It appears to me, therefore, to be in harmony with the highest teaching of life that if the death penalty be the greatest deterrent in Canada in the twentieth century, then Christianity has not succeeded in influencing men's thoughts as much as the so-called pagan pre-Christian philosophers of Rome. They had so prepared men's minds and developed men's characters that the death penalty was able to be abolished in Rome within five hundred years of Rome being founded, whereas some of our judges on the bench and most of our Christian bishops to-day in England say that capital punishment should not be abolished because it is the most powerful deterrent.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) spoke about this young man who had committed murder. To hear the hon. gentleman talk you would think that there was no capital punishment in Manitoba, and that it was for that reason that this crime took place. But that is not the case at all, for capital punishment is the law for Manitoba. I hope it will not be so for long.

Theoretically, from a contemplation of the claims of a Christianity exercised for nearly two thousand years, I should have expected that capital punishment would not now be the only and best deterrent from crime, and upon grounds of theory alone I should have felt justified in advocating that England, the professed pioneer in our humanitarian reforms, should have been willing to set the great example to the world of abolishing capital punishment as the proof of the sincerity of her claim. She has, however, lost that honour. Others have preceded her in the field, and with more matured faith in human nature and in the progress of culture, have removed its stigma from their statute-books. The result has been so thoroughly satisfactory, and the success has been so commensurate with the state of cultured civilization, that Canada has no excuse for now holding back from the same step, unless she is willing to stand self-convicted of a lower civilization and of a more perpetuated brutality than those nations who have found themselves fit to be freed from the yoke of death.

If Canada is lower in civilization than the countries wherein capital punishment has been successfully abolished, where is the boasted value of the freedom of her institutions, of her religion, of the development of her humanity and of her culture?

Any sufficiently civilized country that has enough faith may fearlessly abolish capital punishment from her statute-book. The actual valuelessness of capital punishment as a deterrent, and of its evil effect as an incentive to induce similar crimes, is to be gathered from the records of every land.

With the progress of civilization the inviolability of human life is more and more recognized. The idea of the dignity of man, of the inviolability of life even in the newborn child, is derived from Christianity, and a higher civilization must seek to proclaim it in legislation. But each execution speaks a different language. It proclaims in a loud voice to the crowd assembled round the scaffold that the State does not consider itself bound to respect human life, and that it regards itself as authorized to do that which is a crime in the individual.

My hon. friend from Edmonton said that there was Scripture authority for hanging. I maintain that there is no such authority. But there is a commandment which says "Thou shalt not kill;" and all the legislation in the country will never get the "not" out of that commandment. That applies to the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) as well as the leader of the Opposition and the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). That commandment was given amidst the thunders of Sinai. It does not say that the state may kill and that the individual must not; that the state may murder a man but that the individual must not murder. There are no exceptions to that law.

Mr. BURNHAM: How does the hon. member then make an exception?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I do not.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman makes an exception of self-defence.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I say the command is plain—"Thou shalt not kill". Of course, the hon. member (Mr. Burnham) will say that the word "not" should not be there.

Mr. BALL: The Old Testament Scriptures say "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." And Christ himself when he was being taken, and when Peter drew his sword and cut off the ear of the High Priest's servant, said "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." What construction does the hon. gentelman put upon these words in the Old Testament Scriptures and in the New?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: It seems to me the matter is very simple. Christ's words were "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." But does that mean that all our returned soldiers must be killed? Surely there is no argument in these words against what I have said. And it is true the Old Testament Scriptures contain the words the hon gentleman (Mr. Ball) has quoted. And those words are perfectly true. For that is what has been done, and is being done to-day even here in Canada. But the "shall" there was not a command but a prophecy.

Mr. WRIGHT: What word, then, would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bickerdike) have used?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: You find the same used in the declaration that in the latter days perilous times shall come. Why, Moses himself was a murderer. He killed the Egyptian with whom he contended. Yet his blood was not shed by man.

Mr. BALL: What construction do you place upon the words, "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword"?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Why, that means that the Lord was opposed to war. There is no other construction possible. Any Sunday-School child will tell you that. The construction is that the law does not approve of killing at all, neither with the sword of Peter nor the sword of anybody else, not even with the sword of the Kaiser.

Mr. GRAHAM: Christ would not allow even the ear of the murderer to be cut off.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: There is a justification for everything I say to-night, because we find that the only letter that was ever written by our Lord Jesus Christ was the one written by Him in the sand when He sat as a jury trying a poor woman who had made a mistake. When He finished He, as if to interpret the letter He had written, said to the woman: Where are thy accusers? and the woman answered him, Sir, there are none. That was the letter supposed to be written in the sand.

Mr. BURNHAM: What about those people who go into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The only one that I have seen gnashing his teeth to-day has been my good friend the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). When I hear a minister of the gospel—I am speaking about Protestant ministers—preaching in the pulpit on Sunday about Jesus Christ's sacrifices and the forgiveness of sins, and on Monday advocating capital punishment and revenge, I say that he is neither more nor less than a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal, and I ask the old question: Was it he or his parents who sinned? for that man was certainly born blind.

May I be permitted to quote from a good friend of mine in New York, Mr. Thomas Mott Osborne, one of the greatest authorities on capital punishment on this side of the Atlantic, if not in the world. He says:

Certainly we ought to be in no way behind Russia in conserving human life. There is no question as this one of capital punishment which calls for plain common sense in dealing with it. It is not an abstruse question. The ridiculous thing we do in prisons with our prisoners will not bear being brought to light. For instance, what is the advantage in shaving the heads of prisoners? What is the use of treating a man in such a way that he is stamped as a convict when he goes back into civil life? I plead for this question to be approached in a reasonable and intelligent manner without trace of hysteria. There is no doubt that a lot of men are in prison who ought not to be there, but it is equally true that there are a lot who are not there and ought to be there.

Perhaps my hon. friend who was knighted might be amongst them. Mr. Osborne goes on to say:

It is not advisable to get sentimental about the men in prison, for in all my experience I have discovered only two men whom I thought were really innocent and ought not be in prison.

The whole question of capital punishment must be viewed from the point of the advantage of society.

It is no use discussing that question from any other point of view in any country.

If it is for the advantage of society that men ought to be killed, then let them be killed.

But we have first of all to see that it is for the advantage of society. If it is for the advantage and protection of society that men should be killed, let us kill them; but if not, let us not do so.

Equally, if it is to the advantage of society that a man should be shackled for life, then let him be shackled. The advantage and interests of society must be the first consideration. As with a man who has the smallpox. You send him to the hospital and quarantine him, not only to protect society, but also to protect himself.

That is what we do when we send a man to penitentiary for life.

The certainty of punishment is far more effective than the magnitude of it. A man will be in more fear of punishment if he knows that when found guilty the hand of the law will certainly fall upon him, and exact the penalty. That is clearly seen in the punishment of our own children. It is also proved by statistics. In the state of Maine capital punishment has been abolished, re-introduced and abolished again, with the result that there has been a greater percentage of convictions with the absence of capital punishment than with it. A jury is not so ready to convict a man if they know that the penalty will be death, but they will find a man guilty more often if the punishment is a mere nominal one. The statistics for the state of Maine show that when capital punishment was in force only 27 per cent of convictions followed the indictments. When it was removed that number increased to 59 per cent. When capital punishment was re-introduced the figure dropped to 30 per cent., and when it was abolished again the number increased to 60 per cent, thus showing that there are a greater number of convictions with the absence of capital punishment.

Mr. GRAHAM: Maine was one of the states that the minister said had abolished capital punishment and had reinstated it. I see it has abolished it again.

Mr BURNHAM: Does the hon. member overlook the fact that some of the states abolished capital punishment because the citizens wished to have the privilege of killing people without being punished for it? You will find that to be the case in some remote districts.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Mr. Osborne goes on to say:

I personally have put more men to death than any other man in the United States. I have executed forty men during my term of two and a half years as warden of Sing Sing prison. I did not attend the executions, and on all occasions except two I was absent from the prison as a protest. But there is not a man who has anything to do with executions directly who does not hate it.

There is also the uncertainty of execution which has a great influence on crime.

He goes on to prove that of the criminals condemned in the state of New York only about 1.3 per cent were executed. He goes on to say:

It is claimed that capital punishment frightens people from committing crime, and because of fear they will refrain from murder. But where is there a man worth his salt who will change his line of conduct because of a fear of punishment? I have never yet found a crook who is frightened by the severity of the law. There might be a few cowards outside who are prevented from murder by fear of the chair. But the example of the state makes murderers. There are boys in the underworld who regard the men who go to the chair as heroes, and there is not one man who goes to the chair who does not go there bravely and ready to meet his fate. For every man you put to death, there are six boys ready to spring up in his place. The fear of punishment is not a deterrent. There are two kinds of a murderer—one who commits a crime in the heat of passion or when enraged by liquor, and the other who deliberately plans a murder and who also at the same time plans his escape from the law.

It has been conceded by some of the most eminent physicians that any man committing a murder has an unbalanced mind at the moment. At the moment, at least, he is temporarily insane. He may be enraged through a sense of being wronged, or through kindred emotions, and is in no mood to weigh the results of his acts, or to take account of punishments confronting him. It is sad to believe that much of the prejudice in favour of the gallows may be traced to three discreditable sources. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) has cited those.

Let me close by saying that capital punishment, although sanctioned by the letter of the old Biblical law, is contrary to its interpretation in the light of Christianity.

I would like to have an opportunity of making good the statement I made to my hon. friend, the Solicitor General, because I would not like to have him think for a moment that I would contradict him without being quite sure. Therefore, if it is agreeable to the House, I would move the adjournment of the debate to enable me to bring the documents down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The debate cannot be adjourned after the mover of the second reading has replied. There cannot be any more debate.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The second reading has not been passed yet. If my hon. friend is going to adopt the Bill, all right.

Up to now the Bill has not had a second reading. We have simply been debating it. For that reason I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand the hon. gentleman is not through with his speech, and it is on this account he asks for the adjournment of the debate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is the hon. gentleman tired out?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: No. This afternoon I flatly contradicted the Solicitor General, one of the men I have the most respect for in this House, and I wish to convince him that I am right. I have not the necessary documents with me to do that, but I have wired to Montreal for them, and it is for that reason that I ask for the adjournment of the debate.

[Mr. Bickerdike.]

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

Friday, April 20, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. U. TREMBLAY.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the Table his recommendation and the Clerk's report in the matter of the appointment of Mr. U. Tremblay to the Blue Book Translation Branch of the Translation Staff of the House of Commons.

FREE WHEAT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I lay on the Table the Order in Council asked for yesterday by the leader of the Opposition, placing on the free list, wheat, wheat flour and semolina.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is there any correspondence attached to the Order in Council?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no correspondence.

OLIVER EQUIPMENT.

Sir EDWARD KEMP laid on the Table of the House, Memorandum as to Oliver Equipment, (already published in Revised Hansard, page 577).

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

PROPOSED CELEBRATION.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved:

That the following words be added to the resolution adopted by the House on Wednesday, the seventh day of February last, appointing the Committee to consider and report upon the Fiftieth Anniversary of Confederation: "And that the Committee is hereby empowered to meet in joint sittings with the like committee of the Senate."

Motion agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has amended its resolution of Wednesday, the seventh day of February last, appointing the Committee to consider and report on the matter of celebrating the Fiftieth Anniversary of Confederation, by adding thereto the following words: "And that the Committee is hereby empowered to meet in joint sittings with the like Committee of the Senate;" and requesting Their Honours to similarly amend their resolution passed the same day, in connection with the same subject.

Motion agreed to.

RIVIERE OUELLE-MURRAY BAY STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will the Minister of Railways give me some information about the service of the steamer Champlain between Rivière Ouelle wharf and Murray Bay? I received a letter from the minister stating that I had evidently been misinformed. The Montreal Gazette, however, of this morning publishes an official advertisement of the closing of the branch line between Rivière Ouelle Junction and Rivière Ouelle wharf.

Mr. COCHRANE: I still stand by my letter. I said the service was not going to be taken off and it shall not.

SUPPLY.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White for Committee of Supply:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not object to the House going into Committee of Supply. I understand that we are to take up the Civil Government Estimates, but this will not interfere with rule 17 (c) which requires that the estimates of any department shall be first taken up on a day other than Friday.

House in Committee of Supply. Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Department of Customs—Salaries and Contingencies, $353,100.

Mr. REID: We have just the same number of officials as we had last year. The estimates for the salaries of those officials was $328,237.50 last year; this year the salaries amount to $328,100 or a decrease of $137.50, the reason being that we have reduced the number of officials in subdivision (a) of the Third Division from 27 to 23, but we have added four in the subdivision below that, thereby reducing the total amount. We have, of course, added the statutory increases. There have been no other changes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is an actual economy of $137.50 in that department?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is a great example for the colleagues of my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: We have really done better than that because in that amount is included the payment of officials who are serving overseas.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that something will crop up later on which will wipe out this saving?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Although a resident of the city of Ottawa, and the representative of a constituency part of which is within the city of Ottawa, I was unaware until recently, when the Parliamentary Committee on Returned Soldiers met here shortly after the adjournment, that a number of drastic, I had almost said revolutionary, changes have been made in the Civil Service Act. These changes are so important and so few members of the House may be informed regarding them, that I think it is absolutely necessary at the outset of the considerations of these Estimates that the attention of hon. gentlemen should be drawn to them. If members of the committee will get No. 4 of the printed proceedings of the Parliamentary Committee on Returned Soldiers, they will find most of these changes set out in the evidence of Dr. Adam Shortt, Civil Service Commissioner, generally referred to, erroneously, as the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. For instance, at page 370 he refers to an Order in Council that was passed on the 12th of October, 1916, and explaining the gist of that Order in Council, he says (page 371):

> It comes down to this, that the only person eligible to enter the Service in the regular way at the present time are those below the military age, and that age has been reduced by this Order in Council from 18, which was formerly the minimum, to 16, and those over the military age. Formerly they could not be admitted above the age of 35, now they can be taken in to an indefinite age.

I submit that that is scarcely a provision that would apply to returned soldiers.

> —which is dependent upon the judgment of those who issue these certificates, or who suggest them for employment.

He then went on to explain that the discretion as to the admission of persons over thirty-five years of age rested jointly with the departmental heads and the Civil Service Commissioners. Further on he explains that whereas in the past it had been customary to employ temporary help for a period of six months only, by this Order in Council that time limit was abolished, and on page 371 he says that any one taken on temporarily could now be kept on until the end of the war, in any department of the inside or outside service.

Mr. REID: Is the hon. gentleman objecting to that?

Mr. MURPHY: I am not objecting to anything as yet, but am merely stating the changes that have been made, so that the committee may discuss the minister's Estimates intelligently and find out to what extent he has availed himself of these Orders in Council. On page 372 Dr. Shortt further explains that on the 1st of January, 1917, the following Order in Council was passed:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and in virtue of the provisions of section 6 of the War Measures Act, 1914, is pleased to order that section 22 of the Civil Service Act, 1908, as amended by chapter 8 of the Statutes of 1910, relating to the appointment to the position of messengers, porters, sorters and packers, and to certain other positions, shall be and the same is hereby amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(3). Any person who has been on active service overseas in the Military or Naval forces of His Majesty during the present war may be appointed either temporarily or permanently to any of the said positions upon his satisfying the deputy head of the department in which he is to be appointed that he can read and write and also that he has the usual qualifications required with respect to character and health.

As Dr. Shortt went on to explain in his evidence, that removed all restrictions for the future and threw that class of the Civil Service open to appointments made practically by the minister of the day. That is perhaps the most drastic of all the changes. There are others that I need not refer to at the moment, but I think it is important that the committee should understand that by Order in Council the statutory law of this country relating to the Civil Service has been changed in several very important particulars, and before we pass these estimates the committee should know to what extent these changes have been taken advantage of by the responsible heads of the different departments, and how many persons have been employed under the new regulations. I now invite the Minister of Customs to give us that information regarding his department.

Mr. REID: This Order in Council gives us power to appoint a man over thirty-five years of age. Under the Act a man had to bu under thirty-five or over eighteen years of age. Speaking for myself, I think that men between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five, if they are qualified for overseas service should be given a position in the overseas forces. In filling vacancies in my own department, I try to find a man who is ineligible for military service, and if possible the relative of an overseas soldier. As my hon. friend has explained, this Order in Council extends the age limit, but the appointments are made in the usual way through the Civil Service Commission. I think this new provision is a good thing. It would hardly be fair for us to fill vacancies with men who were qualified for overseas service. With regard to the outside service, appointments are always made on the minister's recommendation, and so far as my own department is concerned preference is always given to a returned soldier. The Order in Council to which reference has been made provides that vacant positions in the Civil Service are first to be offered to returned soldiers, and since the passing of that order, so far as I can recollect, every position filled in my department has been filled by the appointment of a returned soldier. I believe there was one case, which was mentioned prior to the adjournment, in which an appointment was made temporarily until a returned soldier could be found to fill the position. The position was a small one at some port in eastern Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: What the hon. minister has stated is no doubt very interesting, but it does not touch the points I endeavoured to bring before the committee. The first point is as to the increased age at which appointments may be made. At page 371 of the evidence appears the following question and answer:

Q. But if the discretion is all right he can be taken in at seventy?

A. Yes, but usually, unless there are special circumstances, not over sixty.

But the Order in Council of January, 1917, opens up a much wider field. It takes out of the hands of the Civil Service Commissioners altogether the appointments that have rested with them under the Civil Service Act and hands them over to the minister of the day. At page 373 of the evidence you find this:

Q. In other words, these appointments may be made outside the Civil Service Commissioners altogether?—A. Yes.

Q. By the Deputy head?—A. Well, by the head who orders the deputy head to take action.

That is the evidence of Dr. Shortt, of the Civil Service Commission. It will be seen that the Order in Council makes the most radical change in the statute law relating to the Civil Service. I would ask the minister to what extent he has availed himself of this power and how many appointments he has made by virtue of it.

Mr. REID: I am sending for the Order in Council of January, 1917, and when I have it before me I can discuss it better. So far, I have not made any appointments to the Inside Service except on certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the minister please give us a list of appointments?

Mr. REID: The appointments are:

W. A. Deslauriers, P. W. Johnston, November 1, 1915; B. L. Peters, J. J. Wall, W. Worsley, December 1, 1915; J. W. Pilon, J. S. Deachman, R. R. Fitzgerald, September 1, 1916; E. Petrie, K. S. Raynard, October 1, 1916; J. G. Raymond, April 17, 1916.

All these appointments are made at salaries of $800, except that of J. G. Raymond, who is appointed at $500.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: To what positions are these men appointed?

Mr. REID: Clerks in the Inside Service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are these new appointments, or are they the filling of vacancies?

Mr. REID: They are all to fill vacancies caused by death or resignation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not aware that these Orders in Council, which practically supersede the Civil Service Act, were drawn to the attention of the House. I understand from the minister that he is sending for them?

Mr. REID: Yes. I am not sure whether they were brought down or not, but I will have them here in a few minutes.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the minister made any appointments under these Orders in Council, and if so, out of what vote were the appointees paid?

Mr. REID: We have not made any appointments to the Inside Service under the Order in Council to which the hon. gentleman refers. These appointments were made through the Civil Service Commissioners, and payment is made out of this vote.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I understand it, those whose names the minister read were returned soldiers?

Mr. REID: No. No appointments of returned soldiers have been made by the Department of Customs in the Inside Service, but, so far as I can remember, we have appointed over two hundred in the Outside Service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But these appointments to the Outside Service do not relate to the vote now before the committee?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. TURRIFF: Were those appointed under the Order in Council all between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five?

Mr. REID: Those whose names I have read were appointed under certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners, and they are all under thirty-five.

Mr. TURRIFF: Do I understand the minister to say that a man between eighteen and thirty-five should not be given an appointment in the Civil Service, but should be given an appointment to go to the front?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yet he tells us that he has appointed to the Civil Service all these men who were between eighteen and thirty-five?

Mr. REID: These appointments were made prior to the passing of the Order in Council of January, 1917. Up to that time we could only make appointments under the Civil Service Act and under the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners. This meant that appointments were confined to those of between eighteen and thirty-five.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister has told us that an Order in Council had been passed providing that, as far as possible, new appointments should be made from amongst returned soldiers.

Is there anything in that Order in Council which provides that a returned soldier who was an official of my hon. friend's department should be dismissed on his return?

Mr. REID: No, there is nothing of the kind.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will my hon. friend say if he has dismissed any returned soldiers?

Mr. REID: I dismissed one, in so far as my memory goes.

Mr. TURRIFF: I presume my hon. friend refers to the case of Colonel Spittal?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Would my hon. friend tell the House the reason why he dismissed that official of his department who had served at the front for many months and who has returned?

Mr. REID: The reason was this as far as I can remember: Colonel (Major, I believe it is) Spittal was a returned soldier. He returned many months ago. When he came back I understand the Militia Department notified him that they did not require his services any longer. We were paying Mr. Spittal his salary right along and he was not performing any service either in the Militia Department or the Customs Department. I directed the Commissioner of Customs to send for Mr. Spittal, to ask him to come back and take his position, and to inform him that as they did not require him in the Milita Department and as we were paying his salary, we required his services in the Customs Department. I informed him that if he did not wish to come back and take his position, I would replace him. I could not see any reason why, when he came back uninjured, and just as healthy and well as the day he left, the Government of Canada should pay him a salary for walking around the city of Ottawa. I sent for him and took the matter up with him myself. He claimed that the Militia Department, or the Government, had not the power to dispense with his services and he refused to come back to the Customs Department. I said to him: If you will not come back to the Customs Department when you are not working for the Militia, and when they say they do not want you, then, of course, I must dispense with your services and put another man on. That is the only reason why I let Mr. Spittal out. He never was injured at the front like the returned soldiers we are speaking of. I will explain the policy which I have been following in so far as it has to do with soldiers who have returned and who have been injured at the front. They, in my opinion, should have the first chance where there is a vacancy. Mr. Spittal never was in that position and I think myself that if he had any difference with the Militia Department his duty was to come back and take his position in the Customs Department. If he had done so there would never have been any trouble whatever. This is the story in so far as Mr. Spittal is concerned.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend takes the position that it was the duty of Col. Spittal to come back and go to work in the Customs Department, but if Col. Spittal had done so that would have been carrying out the wishes of the Militia Department who were wrongfully endeavouring to dismiss him, and who had informed him that he must take off his uniform and not wear it again. He refuses to obey the orders of the Militia Department simply because he is in the right, and as he was sent over here from the front, where he was doing duty for Canada, by the War Office, he claims that under the Militia Act, and, I think, rightly, he cannot be summarily dismissed without a word. Without any reason, or excuse, or justification whatever, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, in order to help the Militia Department out, sends for Col. Spittal and says: Either come back to your work or I will dismiss you. My hon. friend dismissed him and the Militia Department are trying to dismiss him and they cannot. There is the position. Here is a man who has done his duty at the front. He is not one of those men, and there are hundreds and thousands of them, who have been sent over to England, and who have been enjoying big salaries all along while doing nothing and who, in many cases, are drawing two salaries, not only a salary from the Militia Department, but a salary from one of the other departments of the Government. Here is a man that the Government want to get rid of because he is not amenable to some of the things they want done, and they take this method of dismissing him. The Minister of Customs has lent himself to carrying that out. My hon. friend is getting very careful all at once of the salary paid to one of the men who has gone to the front in defence of the country, and he should have some better explanation and excuse to give than that which he has put up. That is only a method to bring about his dismissal and to enable the Militia Department to get rid of him. It is certainly not a desire for economy that has induced my hon. friend to take that position. I do not think he did that for the purpose of making the expenditures for this year $130 less than last year. He will have to put up a better explanation before the people will be satisfied that a returned soldier should be treated as Col. Spittal has been treated by the Militia and Customs Departments.

Mr. KYTE: Is it the policy of the Minister of Customs to appoint no persons to the outside service except returned soldiers as vacancies occur?

Mr. REID: The Order in Council which was passed was for the purpose of giving returned soldiers an opportunity to fill any vacancies and in the administration of the Customs Department I have endeavoured in every case to appoint a returned soldier. The policy I have been trying to follow has been this: I am having a number of returned soldiers trained to act as relieving officers. We have always had a number of men to act as relieving officers in the several provinces so that in case of sickness, or in case an extra man is required for a few weeks, or during the temporary absence of an officer, we have some person to send and replace the permanent officer. I have been endeavouring to have a number of men appointed and educated in the customs service so that when a vacancy occurs in any particular constituency I can send one of these men as relieving officer to fill the position temporarily until a returned soldier would come back to that particular constituency. Then I would appoint that returned soldier to the vacancy and transfer the relieving officer to some other point. I have been following out that policy and as far as I can remember at the present time it has worked well. I do not know at the moment of any appointment that has been made except in that way since the Order in Council was passed.

Mr. KYTE: Take the case of a sub-collectorship that has become vacant in Nova Scotia; would it be the policy of the minister to give a preference to a returned soldier rather than to a person who had not served overseas?

Mr. REID: Yes, that would be my policy, but, of course, there are some cases where the salaries are $100 or $200 and where it is almost impossible to get a returned soldier. There are some vacancies, I do not know whether they are in Nova Scotia or not, where the duties are simply the clearing of vessels, and where the salary is from $100 to $200, on which you could not expect a man to live. In these cases it may be necessary to appoint men temporarily, and then afterwards give the positions to returned soldiers who have been so badly injured that they cannot earn their living by manual labour or by the pursuit of their previous occupation, but whose pensions of from $400 to $600 would be so supplemented by the small salary attached to the positions that they could live comfortably.

Mr. KYTE: I am merely endeavouring to get at the minister's policy, in regard to these appointments. A vacancy might occur in the Customs in my own constituency; in fact there is one, and a young man from the district might return from the war who would be very glad to accept a position at $200. I have in mind the position of sub-collector of customs in the district of West Arichat which has been vacant for four years. The business has all to be transacted at Arichat which sometimes causes inconvenience and loss to the captains of vessels and to importers. Two years ago I asked the minister if he intended to fill the office, and the answer was that no complaints had come to him of any inconvenience on account of his not having filled that office. I desire to repeat the statement made then that considerable inconvenience has arisen in respect of the business arising from day to day. If the minister will say to me that it is his intention to appoint a returned soldier in accordance with the general policy which he has adopted of giving preference to these soldiers, I could understand his keeping the office open until a returned soldier became available.

Mr. REID: With reference to this particular office, when we come to the other Estimates I shall have more information; but if the hon. member should have a returned soldier later on who had been injured to such an extent that he is really not able to do manual labour or to earn his living by his previous profession, I would be very glad indeed to give that man assistance even to the extent of appointing him to the position the hon. member named. I would even go to the extent of opening up the office again. But if he should be a man who was not injured and was able to do some other work, it would be better to hold the position until we get some man who would be able to attend only to such simple matters as the clearance of vessels. I am extremely anxious to hold such positions for men who cannot make anything beyond their pensions. If I should hear of a man of that kind I would appoint him.

Mr. KYTE: The only preference, then, is to men who have been wounded. I understood that all men who returned whether they were wounded or not, would be entitled to special consideration.

Mr. REID: Any man who has been at the front will certainly be entitled to such an appointment. But so far, of course, all the appointments of this kind that I have made have been of men who have been wounded; and I think every one will agree that if we can help those men it is well to do so. Such positions as my hon. friend referred to, I should like to give to men who have been seriously wounded and who could not do any other work. But all men who have been at the front come under the one head, that they are entitled to consideration and shall have it.

Mr. KYTE: First consideration?

Mr. REID: First consideration.

Mr. MURPHY: A word was used inadvertently by the minister a few minutes ago, perhaps inadvertently, that may or may not be indicative of intention under the changes wrought by these Orders in Council. I would be the last to say that that word indicates the minister's intention; but when the hon. minister stated that if any vacancy occurred in a constituency he would send a returned soldier to that constituency, somehow or other that suggested to me that possibly the application by wholesale of these changes to which I have been drawing attention would follow. That may not be the case, and my apprehension on that score may be quite unfounded. But what the minister said, is, that if a vacancy occurred in a constituency he would send a returned soldier to that constituency. By a further section of this Order in Council, even the elementary test of reading and writing is, according to Dr. Shortt, practically abolished for appointment to this lower grade division, inasmuch as the whole matter is now left in the hands of the deputy head of the department, who is, of course, subject to the head. In the absence of the Order in Council, and of the information which the minister says he will give to the House, I shall not press the matter further at this time.

I wish to ask the minister, in view of his express declaration this afternoon, which I must do him the justice of saying is in accordance with his intention expressed outside of the House, that he will give the first preference to returned soldiers, is it his intention to apply that policy to the vacant collectorship at Montreal?

Mr. REID: That is my intention. The position in the city of Montreal is a very, very important one. At the time of the resignation of Mr. White, I decided that it was necessary to have an experienced officer immediately take charge until the question of a permanent appointment was decided on. The man I was going to send at once was Mr. H. C. Blair of the city of Ottawa. Mr. Blair came originally, I think, from Nova Scotia.

Mr. STANFIELD: From Truro.

Mr. REID: From Truro. He has been in the service thirty or thirty-five years. I think there is no man in the Customs Department better qualified or more able to handle a position of that kind than Mr. Blair. Mr. Blair himself in August, 1914, at the time of the outbreak of the war, was very anxious to go to the front; in fact he asked me and urged me to allow him to go, and also applied to General Hughes. He was not allowed to go because he was over age and because we could not spare him at that time. We had educated him as to the needs of the department; he had been given all necessary instructions as to how to handle the Customs business in case war was declared. He was the man who went from Sydney to Vancouver months before the outbreak of war instructing the collectors so that they would know how to act if war was declared. Mr. Blair sent his own son to the front, and to-day he lies buried in France, a wife and small child surviving him. I sent Mr. Blair to Toronto because he was the man who was qualified to go there. He was feeling badly over the loss of his son. I sent Mr. Bertram from Toronto to Montreal; he is one of the best officials in Canada. It required a man like Mr. Bertram or Mr. Blair to take charge of that office at that particular time. Any one who knows Mr. Bertram will say that no other man in Canada is better qualified than he is. My understanding of the Order in Council is that if a returned soldier is entitled to a position as an officer of Customs at a salary of $200, he is entitled to a position in the city of Montreal at $4,500. I have, therefore, taken the same position in respect to this office as I have in respect to the other offices in Canada now vacant and which I am holding. I have sent men from other offices to fill positions temporarily until I can get men who have served at the front and who I believe could fill the positions. I have sent Mr. Bertram to Montreal as collector, and he is filling the position well. In these war times it requires a man of his experience or that of Mr. Blair's to fill that position temporarily, until an appointment is finally made. If I were to appoint a man other than one who has had experience, it would be necessary to have a man like Mr. Blair or Mr. Bertram work with him for a few months in order to educate him so that he might discharge his duties efficiently. In Montreal we collect $35,000,000 per annum—I think that was the amount collected last year. Most of the shipments from Canada pass through that port. I have stated the position that I took when vacancies occurred, and that is the position I am going to take until I can get men from the front. I know most of the men in Montreal who have gone to the front, and I believe that any man who goes to the front and does his duty for his country should get that position as well as any other.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is my hon. friend holding that position open for the return of the hon. Postmaster General from the front? 4 p.m.

Mr. REID: If the Postmaster General goes to the front, takes part in the war, and comes back maimed or otherwise and wants that position, I will give it to him or to any other man who does the same thing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Could the minister be induced to reduce his staff in some of the smaller country towns where he has a great excess of employees? In 1912, a year or two after the present Administration came into power, a return was brought down showing the increase in the number of officials of the Government, and, if I remember rightly, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs was one of the worst offenders. My recollection is that, although there was a decrease in customs receipts, his staff increased to the extent of something like 1,600. My hon. friend has not corrected that, as far as I know, at least in many of these places with which I am acquainted. I find the proof of this in the answer to a question which the Minister of Customs put before the House yesterday. The question was asked by the member for North Cape Breton, and was as follows:

How many persons are employed in the Customs service at the Port of North Sydney?

The answer is "Ten, one of whom is absent on active military service." Then he gives the names, as follows:

Jos. McPherson, J. L. Brennan, David Edwards, J. H. Cameron, F. E. Jackson, John Cogan, J. J. McDonald, H. W. McNeil, Jas. McLeod, Angus Young.

In another part of this answer I find, that the total collections for the year 1916 at the port of North Sydney amounted to $66,460, showing that my hon. friend spends about 14 per cent of the money that he gets from the port of North Sydney in paying his large staff of officers. I give that as an example of the manner in which my hon. friend has enormously increased his staff in many of the ports of Nova Scotia during the time that he has occupied the position of Minister of Customs. If my hon. friend is sincere in what he says about returned soldiers, I have no doubt that he could make room for at least one thousand of them by getting rid of a large number of these unnecessary men that he has in small ports throughout the Dominion and whom he appointed at a time when his department was running wild in the matter of appointments. I should like to know whether my hon. friend will adopt the advice of the hon. gentleman who sits to his right, who has asked us all to practice economy, by getting rid of some of these unnecessary men to whom he is now paying salaries.

Mr. REID: In the port that my hon. friend mentions we have not any greater number of employees than we had at the time I took charge of the department. As my hon. friend mentioned, one of the men is overseas and we have therefore decreased the staff to that extent. In the port of North Sydney, if I remember rightly, a great deal of harbour work is going on, and even though the collections may not be very large, many vessels are clearing and other business requires the attention of a number of officials. Since the war broke out, although the revenue and the work have increased very materially at practically all ports, I have not appointed a man to a vacancy if it has been at all possible to do without him. Only when the inspectors and the collectors have pressed hard for the appointment and have proved to my satisfaction that they could not get along without it have I consented to fill the vacancies, and in filling them I have proceeded as I stated a few minutes ago. Not having the other memorandum in connection with the outside service, I am not able to give the hon. member as full information as if we were considering the outside service.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend is quite right in stating that we are discussing the Inside Service, and I will try to avoid taking up the time of the committee in regard to the Outside Service. My object in mentioning this matter was to give my hon. friend an opportunity of exercising economy. If he would accept my advice we might save a considerable amount of money and possibly make room for a number of returned soldiers.

Another matter in connection with the Civil Service which I think pertains chiefly to the Inside Service is what I regard as an abuse of section 21 of the Civil Service Act. Hon. members who are familiar with that Act will remember that section 21 was inserted for the purpose of enabling the Government to appoint experts in departments where they were found to be necessary. I recollect very well when the Civil Service Act was passed in 1908 that the Minister of Finance of that day explained to the House, in connection with this section, that circumstances would arise where it would not be possible to submit candidates to examination and competition; that occasionally a department might wish to introduce from abroad or even from Canada an eminent man who had made a reputation for himself in some branch and who would not be willing to submit himself to examination by the Civil Service Commission. For example, we might want an engineer who had a great reputation in connection with the railways or public works of the country, who would not be willing to pass any examination, and who would not accept a position unless he was taken on without examination. That was the reason why section 21 was inserted in the Civil Service Act. I find, however, that large additions have been made to the Civil Service by the present Administration under the provisions of section 21 on the pretense that the appointees are experts. Last year I took occasion to ask how many of those appointments had been made, and I find by the answer that was given to the House yesterday that there has been an increase of fifteen of those experts during the past year. I do not know in which department they are; I presume they are in different departments.

Mr. REID: There are none in mine.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At all events we have fifteen additional experts appointed during the current year, and the total number is now 174. Since the present Government came into power they have appointed, under section 21, according to the return given to the House yesterday, 174 experts without examination and without any competition. No one would believe that even twelve of those were genuine experts. I would not like to say that twelve of them were men who were honestly appointed under section 21; but suppose we estimate that twice as many were so appointed, and I think I am far within the limit when I admit that there were 24 of them altogether who were introduced by the present Administration as genuine experts under that section, that would leave 150 bogus ones for whom some excuse has to be made. Every one of those men is appointed by an Order in Council, which contains a statement complying with section 21, which provides that:—

> If the deputy head reports that the knowledge and ability requisite for the position are wholly or in part professional, technical or otherwise peculiar, the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the head of the department, based on the report in writing of the deputy head, may appoint a person to the position without competitive examination and without reference to the age limit, provided the said person obtains from the Commission a certificate, to be given with or without examination, as is determined by the regulations of the Commission, that he possesses the requisite knowledge and ability and is duly qualified as to health, character and habits.

Every one of those 150 employees who are described as experts has been appointed under a special Order in Council and therefore that Order in Council must have contained an incorrect statement. That is rather a strong assertion to make. It is rather hard for us to believe that fifteen gentlemen sitting around the Council Board conspired to deceive His Excellency by stating that they required such and such a man as an expert whereas as a matter of fact they required him only because he was a supporter of the party. It is hard to believe that the Cabinet would agree to deceive His Excellency by passing a sham Order in Council of that kind for the purpose of getting a position for a supporter of the party. That, however, appears to be the situation. I am quite certain that all these so-called eminent men from abroad or from Canada were not appointed on their merits. At least 150 of them are what I call bogus experts, men who have been introduced into the Civil Service under this section when they should not have been introduced and when there is no good reason for their introduction. Last year we were given by a return the numbers in each department. The Department of Agriculture appointed 29; the Commission of Conservation, 5; External Affairs, 1; Governor General's Secretary, 1; House of Commons, 2; Indian Affairs, 3; Interior, 11; Inland Revenue, 17; Justice, 12; Labour, 1; Mines, 13; Marine and Fisheries, 4; Militia and Defence, 9; Naval Service, 2; Post Office, 5; Privy Council, 1; Public Works, 28; Printing and Stationery, 1; Railways and Canals, 2; Royal North West Mounted Police, 1; Senate, 1; Secretary of State, 7; Trade and Commerce, 3; making 159, whereas the answer given to the question asked yesterday was that the number had risen to 174 since this return was brought down last year. Will any person believe that fifteen experts were appointed by the Government since last year; I would like to have the names of the men who have been appointed during the year 1916-17, if my hon. friend will give them to me. A large number of those so-called experts are not genuine experts; they are put into the departments under the provisions of section 21 by false representations made to His Excellency when the Orders in Council are passed. If I am incorrect in my statement, the minister can easily put me right by bringing down to the House the names of these 174 men, their former addresses, the nature of their business prior to their appointment and an account of what they are doing at the present time for the salaries they are receiving. The House will then be able to judge whether I am right or wrong in saying that they should not have been appointed.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is giving me quite a contract. So far as the Customs Department is concerned he has not mentioned a single man who has been taken on under that section. I would suggest that each minister give my hon. friend this information when his estimates are up. I will mention it to my colleagues, that they may be prepared to answer my hon. friend. I do not think an unreasonable number of men have been taken on under this section. In the Public Works Department, for instance, twenty-eight men have been appointed under Section 21 in the last six years. That would include architects, engineers, and so forth, and in a large department like the Public Works I should think there would be perhaps four or five changes of that sort in a year. As regards the Inland Revenue Department, some of the men my hon. friend mentioned would no doubt be analysts, who would of course come in under Section 21. As we come to each department I am sure the hon. member will see that we were fully justified in appointing these men.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister give us particulars regarding the fifteen men who were appointed last year as experts?

Mr. REID: They were not in my department, but I will see that my hon. friend gets that information from the departments concerned.

Mr. TURRIFF: When the minister called Colonel Spittal to his office and summarily dismissed him, was the Colonel given a chance to explain why he could not comply with the order of the Militia Department to take off his uniform.

Mr. REID: As I remember it, Colonel Spittal came to my office, and I asked him to come back. The Commissioner was present at the time. Colonel Spittal had been paid his salary for six or seven months and had not been doing anything either for the militia or for the Civil Service. He said he would not come back, and that he had a case against the Militia Department, and had engaged a lawyer and was going to fight the Militia Department over his dismissal. He took the ground that the Militia Department or the Government had not the power to dismiss him. While he was fighting his case I wanted him to come back, but he absolutely refused. So I said: "If you refuse to come back I am going to dispense with your service, and we will fill your place with some other man." I was not going to pay him while he was walking around doing nothing, except fighting his case.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend has not answered my question. When the minister had Colonel Spittal on the carpet, did the minister give him an opportunity of explaining why he could not accept his dismissal from the Militia Department?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is another point. Every time the minister refers to the Order in Council regarding returned soldiers, he says. "So far as my own department is concerned." Do I understand that this Order in Council applies only to the Customs Department?

Mr. REID: It applies to all departments of the Government, but of course I can speak for my own department only. I understand the other ministers are carrying out the same policy.

Mr. TURRIFF: Are these men appointed by Order in Council, or are they simply engaged by the ministers?

Mr. REID: When there is a vacancy in the Customs Department, the returned soldier fills in an application form and is examined to see whether he is qualified to fill the position. He has to have sufficient education to do clerical work, but the examination is a very simple affair. After he has been tried out for two or three months, he is appointed by Order in Council if satisfactory.

Mr. TURRIFF: Then it comes down to this: These men, if satisfactory, are appointed by Order in Council after two or three months' probation. The Minister of Customs and the other ministers are therefore jointly responsible for all these appointments of returned soldiers, just as they are responsible for the appointment of men who are not returned soldiers. Each minister must accept responsibility for the Order in Council appointing these men.

Mr. REID: Each minister is responsible for his own department.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, but as all the ministers consent to the Order in Council, they are all jointly responsible for all the appointments.

Mr. REID: That is right.

Mr. TURRIFF: Then all the ministers are responsible for appointing these men who have not been to the front.

Mr. SINCLAIR: With further reference to the appointments under section 21, I think it would be satisfactory if the minister would give us the assurance that his colleagues, when their Estimates are up, will give us the names of these experts, together with their age, former and present employment, former and present address, and what salaries they are getting. Will the minister consider this sufficient notice to the other members of the cabinet to have this information ready when their Estimates are up?

Mr. REID: I will bring this matter to the attention of my colleagues, so that they will know what is wanted.

Department of Customs—Salaries, $328,100; contingencies, $25,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is an increase in contingencies of $5,000.

Mr. REID: Last year there was a supplementary vote of $4,000, so that this really represents an increase of only $1,000.

Department of Public Works—Salaries, $590,250; contingencies, $85,000.

[Mr. Turriff.]

Mr. REID: Hon. members will see that we have the same number of officials as before in every branch of the department—a total of 396. There is an increase in salaries of $10,740, but that is wholly accounted for by the statutory increases. The contingencies are exactly the same as for the previous year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see that 28 appointments have been made under section 21 without competition in the Department of Public Works. I desire to be informed as to the dates of appointment, former employments, present duties, and salaries of these officers.

Mr. REID: The deputy minister informs me that these appointments were chiefly of architects. Before other items of the Public Works Department are brought before the committee, a list will be prepared giving the information the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. KNOWLES: I suppose this is not the item from which the superintendents of telephones in British Columbia are paid?

Mr. REID: No, they are in the Outside Service.

Department of the Interior—Salaries, $1,191,255; contingencies, $115,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is an increase of $19,600 in salaries.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. There is the same number of employees, and the increase in salaries is more than accounted for by the statutory increases. There is a reduction of $5,000 in contingencies.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does this vote include the Outside as well as the Inside Service?

Mr. ROCHE: No, only the Inside Service.

Mr. TURRIFF: And the statutory increases make a total of $19,600?

Mr. ROCHE: More than that. Officers who have resigned or died have been replaced by appointees at the minimum salaries of their several classes. These changes represent in the aggregate a considerable decrease. The statutory increases make a net increase in the salaries of $19,600.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I desire to ask for the same information with regard to the Department of the Interior that I have already asked for with regard to Customs and Public Works. According to the list, appearing at page 948 of Hansard of last year, 15 appointments were made by competition and 11 without competition. I would like to get the names, former employments, present duties and salaries of these officers.

Mr. ROCHE: I can have that information ready for Monday. I think that only one was appointed last year under section 21 of the Civil Service Act, Mr. M. S. White, a translator, a gentleman who speaks seven languages.

Mr. TURRIFF: What proportion does the revenue of the department bear to the revenue of a few years ago? Has it increased or decreased?

Mr. ROCHE: Increased.

Mr. TURRIFF: How does the revenue compare with the expenditures of the department?

Mr. ROCHE: There has been considerably more revenue during the past year than expenditure. The revenue for eleven months is $9,000,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: For the last year of the department?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. It is only fair to explain that in that $9,000,000 are included the collections for seed grain.

Mr. TURRIFF: That does not give any idea as to the regular revenue of the department. What I had reference to was the ordinary revenues of the department from the lands branch, the timber branch and the mines that happen to be under the control of the department. How do those revenues compare with the revenue of three or four years ago and how do these compare with the expenditures?

Mr. ROCHE: The ordinary revenue of the department for the past year is about $2,000,000 in excess of the expenditure.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the ordinary revenue include school lands?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Of course, the revenue from school lands is only a trust fund?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, but that is included in the revenues of the department.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is revenue that you cannot expend.

Mr. ROCHE: It is chargeable to expenditure just the same.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the expenditure in connection with the disposal of school lands come out of this item?

Mr. ROCHE: No, this is entirely contingencies and salaries of the inside service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Col. Bradshaw, while engaged in auctioning off school lands, would not be considered as being in the Inside Service?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Department of Indian Affairs—Salaries, $126,862.50.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps the minister will tell us about whether he was pleased or not with the commission he recently had in British Columbia and whether he would appoint that commission if he had it to do over again? That is the commission which carried on some kind of work in British Columbia in connection with Indians. Chief Justice Wetmore was the head of it and eventually became so disgusted with it that he threw it up, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. ROCHE: In the first place, the hon. gentleman is giving me credit for something for which I should not have any credit at all, that is the naming of the personnel of the commission, because the commission was named when I was not in the country. However, the report that has been handed in by the commission is an excellent report, and shows that they did good work. The work extended over a period of time greater than either we or they anticipated and involved a great deal of labour and travel in the interior of the province. There was a great deal of hardship in connection with that travel. But, upon the whole, I think that they have done excellent work. I do not know what criticism hon. gentlemen have to make outside of the criticism that they have taken longer with their work than it was anticipated they would. But, they seemed to have thought that was necessary and I have no fault to find with them in that particular.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a matter of fact I have heard that their chief avocation was joy-riding up and down the country and in the most outrageous manner.

Mr. ROCHE: That is all news to me.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister does not hear all that goes on. Will he tell us why Mr. Justice Wetmore resigned?

Mr. ROCHE: On account of ill-health.

Mr. KNOWLES: He almost immediately afterwards went on a commission in Saskatchewan, farther away from his home and where the climate is harsher than in British Columbia. Perhaps the pace was not as swift.

Mr. ROCHE: Chief Justice Wetmore stated that he could not stand the onerous travel.

Mr. TURRIFF: Who recommended the appointment of Miss Smith, daughter of the Indian Agent at Kamloops, as stenographer?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not know who made the recommendation but I presume the recommendation came through the usual channel. I am not prepared to say that it did not come from the agent himself but at any rate we have to employ stenographers to do the work. Has the hon. gentleman any particualar complaint to make about Miss Smith?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, I understand that there is a great deal of criticism. The Indian agent appointed there, Mr. Smith, is a darkey; he is according to information, unable to write a letter himself and his daughter has been appointed as stenographer. The minister knows as well as I do that there has never been any very great good feeling between our Indians and our coloured people in Canada, and I understand an appointment of this kind has caused a good deal of dissatisfaction among the Indians at that point. I would like to know who recommended the appointment of his daughter as stenographer and what work she has to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think you had better inquire of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. gentleman's information is faulty in regard to the capabilities of the Indian agent at Kamloops. I do not know whether he wishes to draw the colour line or not, or to say, that all things being equal, if a man has the ability to discharge his duties, he should not be employed because of his colour. Evidently the Kamloops Board of Trade thought he was all right as he was their secretary and he gave every satisfaction. He was an alderman as well. Surely, it is not necessary that this gentleman, occupying this most prominent position, should employ another to write his letters because he could not do it himself. He has sufficient ability and he is discharging the duties of his position in quite a competent manner. We have very few complaints, and that only on the part of a comparatively few Indians, in regard to the manner in which the agent is discharging his duties. His agency has been well managed and he is up to the average of any white man who has been our agent.

Mr. KYTE: Are there any vacancies on the staff of this department in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ROCHE: I only know of one vacancy and that is in the inspectorate. Inspector Foster, who was under criticism by some Nova Scotia members in sessions gone by, went to the front and paid the supreme sacrifice, his place has not been filled.

Mr. KYTE: Is it the intention of the department to fill that position?

Mr. ROCHE: Not at the present time.

Mr. KYTE: Is the position of teacher at the Indian Reserve at Salmon river, Richmond county, vacant at the present time?

Mr. ROCHE: I am not at all certain about that. Has the hon. gentleman information about it?

Mr. KYTE: I understood that he resigned about the first of April, and I should like to know the circumstances, and to have copies of any reports made to the department by the superintendent of agencies, the inspector of schools or the Indian agent that would throw some light upon the cause of his resignation.

Mr. ROCHE: I will secure that information.

Department of Agriculture—Salaries, $490,675; contingencies, $100,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is an increase of $50,000 in the total. Will the minister explain that?

Mr. BURRELL: The increase in the First Division, Subdivision B, is accounted for by the translation of one Outside civil servant into the Inside Service and the promotion of six clerks, three patent examiners and the head of the entomological division at the experimental farm, and two in the live-stock department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In a return given last year of new appointments under section 21 of the Civil Service Act, it was stated that the Department of Agriculture appointed three by competition and twenty-nine without competition under that section. Would the minister give the names of those appointees, their former employment, and all other details as to their appointment?

Mr. BURRELL: I shall be very glad to get that information.

Mr. KNOWLES: In case a patent is granted and it is subsequently ascertained that it is not really a new invention but that it is covered by a patent already existing, is it the intention to amend or remedy that condition or leave it to the public to take action to upset the patent so improperly given?

Mr. BURRELL: I could not answer that offhand.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a very important question and one which often arises. Sometimes, with the multitude of patents going through, patents are allowed to slip through that would not be granted if information which may subsequently be secured had been before the patent examiners at the time. Is the patent allowed to stand in such a case?

Mr. BURRELL: I think they have the right to appeal to the Exchequer Court, which is sometimes done.

Mr. KNOWLES: I know. But I would urge on the minister that if he is giving consideration to this matter it should be done more often. I think it would be an improvement to the public service if even at a late date a wrongfully granted patent should be remedied.

Department of Marine and Fisheries—Salaries, $207,950; contingencies, $32,000.

Mr. REID (Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries): This shows that we have had a reduction in the staff of the inside service in the lower grade of the first division. We promoted some from the first division, subdivision B, to the first division, subdivision A. In the second division, subdivision B, we have dropped a number as well as in the third division, subdivision B.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many new appointments were made during the year?

Mr. REID: The deputy minister informs me that we have made few appointments. The only appointments that have been made have been to fill vacancies that have occurred, and in each case that has been done through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Any dismissals?

Mr. REID: No, none.

Mr. TURRIFF: Can the acting minister say if the minister's German private secretary, of whom there was some discussion a year or so ago, is over in the Old Country with the minister?

Mr. REID: No. The private secretary is doing his work here. As I understood from the discussion last year, he had a brother at the front.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which front was he at?

Department of the Secretary of State—Salaries, including P. T. Kirwan, promoted to first division, subdivision B; J. F. Champagne, promoted to second division, subdivision A; M. J. Birdwhistle, promoted to second division, subdivision B, at $1,200—$76,737.50.

Mr. MURPHY: The names of three of the officers are specially mentioned. Is that for the reason that they are being promoted beyond the limit allowed by the Civil Service Act? I recognize the names as those of three deserving officials.

Mr. PATENAUDE: Mr. Champagne came into the department as a junior second class clerk in 1906 at $800, which was increased in the same year by special vote of Parliament to $950. He reached in 1908 the maximum of $1,100 which under the Act of that year was increased to $1,200. In 1913 he passed a special examination and was attached to subdivision B of the second division, making his salary $1,300. In 1914 he received an additional $600 by special vote of Parliament. Mr. Champagne possesses exceptional skill as an illuminator and engrosser. He is now getting $1,450 a year. Promotion would give him an increase of $100.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I notice that in this department eight experts were appointed. Will the minister give us the names and particulars?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Yes, I will bring them down when the regular estimates are under consideration.

Mr. TURRIFF: Has the minister adopted the same rule as that adopted by the Minister of Customs in appointing returned soldiers to positions as they become vacant?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Yes, they have the preference.

Mr. TURRIFF: I understand that my hon. friend has very recently appointed a superintendent of distribution in the Printing Bureau, a man who is not a returned soldier.

Mr. PATENAUDE: That is Mr. Paradis, who was appointed superintendent. He has been there for two or three years and was previously in the service for thirty years. His assistant is Captain Normandin who is back from the front and wounded.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am referring to the appointment of Mr. J. François Dugas, who has been appointed Superintendent of Distribution in the Printing Bureau at a salary of $2,500. Mr. Dugas was a grocer on Bank street in Ottawa, never was at the front and never was connected with the army in any way.

Mr. PATENAUDE: I do not know about the case of Mr. Dugas. I will inquire about it and bring down the information.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will my hon. friend also look into the case of E. G. Laverdure who, I am informed has been appointed controller of advertising in the Printing Bureau at $1,600 a year. He was a tinsmith and plumber in the city of Ottawa, and not a soldier.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery — Salaries, $65,762.50; contingencies, $10,300.

Mr. KYTE: Has the printing of the electoral lists been commenced? Revision of these has been recently completed in Nova Scotia.

Mr. PATENAUDE: Not yet.

Mr. KNOWLES: In my town a paper called the Moosejaw News is given a substantial patronage from this Government for printing work. What official has charge of sending advertising out to different papers throughout Canada?

Mr. PATENAUDE: It is done through the King's Printer himself and the officers who are under him.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has he an absolutely free hand as to the distribution of this patronage?

Mr. PATENAUDE: It is done through the King's Printer, and, when it
5 p.m. is something particular, after conference with the minister.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are these men the sole judges as to what papers to send to and what papers not to send to?

Mr. PATENAUDE: They are not.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who, then, is the last resort to decide what patronage shall be given to particular papers?

Mr PATENAUDE: The minister himself.

[Mr. Patenaude.]

Mr. KNOWLES: To what extent does the Moosejaw News obtain patronage as a result of the minister's discretion?

Mr. PATENAUDE: I can bring down the information.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister let me know early next week how much the Moosejaw News has received lately?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: Would it be possible to get from the department of the hon. minister a copy of the electoral lists for any of the divisions of Nova Scotia?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Yes. I have been asked by some of our friends in other counties to do that, and in accordance with their desire I have had typewritten copies made for the members.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister personally remember whether a short time ago the Saskatoon Star and the Regina Post were cut out of the book of life in the way of advertising? I may explain that these two strong Conservative newspapers turned in favour of free wheat about a month ahead of the Government. Will the minister be so kind, when he is getting the information at the same time to get me information as to what patronage was given to the Saskatoon Star and the Regina Post respectively month by month for the last twelve months? The only hope left for him in the province of Saskatchewan is the Moosejaw News.

Mr. REID: The others will see the light before long.

Mr. TURRIFF: They saw the light and they went the other way.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the advertising branch of Public Printing and Stationery some names of new appointees were cited a few moments ago by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The minister may or may not be aware of the circumstances under which the gentleman who had charge of the advertising, Mr. Vincent Braceland, recently left the department. Can he tell me if the position vacated by Mr. Braceland has been filled, and if so, by whom?

Mr. PATENAUDE: The position has been filled by Mr. Laverdure at a salary of of $1,800.

Department of Mines—Salaries and contingencies, $387,485.

Mr. MURPHY: What are the increases in the number of officials?

Mr. PATENAUDE: There is an increase of $13,672. There are three new appointments and the balance of the increase is for statutory increases. The three new appointments comprise two assistant chemists at a salary of $1,600 each. The two assistant chemists are required at our fuel testing laboratories.

Mr. MURPHY: Where are those laboratories?

Mr. PATENAUDE: I cannot say off hand. The appointments have been made owing to numerous requests that have been received by the department during the past year. The third appointment is for a highways engineer. A new laboratory for testing road materials will be completed in the course of the next few months and the tests in connection with this work which have hitherto been carried out in the laboratory of the Columbia University, New York, will be made at the Mines Branch instead.

Mr. MURPHY: Have any of these appointments been made yet?

Mr. PATENAUDE: Not yet.

Mr. KNOWLES: To what extent does the minister keep in touch with the mining industry? I understand that the Institute of Mines hold meetings annually, and it used to be the custom for the Minister of Mines to attend and discuss with the mining engineers matters relating to that industry and to keep in touch with the institute. I understand the Minister of Agriculture some time ago went down to Montreal and gave the members of the institute an address on the connection between agriculture and mining. New ministers have been put in charge of some of the departments almost every few months for quite a while now, and so far as we know that condition of affairs may continue. There is now a new minister in charge of the mines branch. I would like to know to what extent he is endeavouring to obtain that information which, even if it is only a smattering, must be necessary for a real Minister of Mines. Is he attending classes in night schools, taking lessons, or reading books or discussing mining matter with experts?

Mr. PATENAUDE: The minister is not an expert so far as the mining industry is concerned, but he is assisted by a very able deputy minister who is an expert.

Mr. KNOWLES: As the mining industry is a very important one in Canada, I would suggest to the minister that the person in charge of his department should know more about it than the average member of the House. The minister, of course, has been recently appointed, but I think that in the course of a few months he should become partially expert in this matter. Otherwise, he cannot give us any useful information in the House and he will not be of much practical use in the department. He might endeavour to become more informed with regard to these things, so that he will not have to depend altogether on the advice of his deputy.

Mr. PATENAUDE: I assure my hon. friend that I will try to comply with his desire.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is the Deputy Minister of Mines?

Mr. PATENAUDE: R. G. McConnell.

Department of Railways and Canals—Salaries, including assistant to minister at $4,500; F. M. Maclennan at $1,800; R. H. Lang at $1,800, and contingencies, $210,987.50.

Mr. MURPHY: What increases are there?

Mr. COCHRANE: An increase to Mr. Bell, whom I have made assistant to myself, $1,000; an increase to Mr. Yates, who is my secretary, and an increase to the secretary of the department, Mr. Pugsley. There are two other increases in sub-division (a) of the second division. One gentleman who was on the Transcontinental we have brought into the department; the other one, who was on outside work on the Hudson Bay railway, we have put on the permanent staff. We have the same number in the department although we have increased some salaries. The balance of the increase is due to statutory increases.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is this item of $4,500, salary for an assistant to the minister, in connection with the running of the Transcontinental?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it is in connection with the inside staff of the department.

Mr. TURRIFF: I should like to say a word or two as to the manner in which the Transcontinental from Toronto to Winnipeg is run. It seems to me from the way the road is being run that the department is deliberately trying to throw the business away to some other line. I will give the minister my experience on a trip over that road. I had come down over that road, which is a good one to travel over, and decided I would go back that way. Two days before I was leaving for the West I went into the Grand Trunk office here and asked them to reserve a lower berth for me from Toronto to Winnipeg. They said they would wire to Toronto, and if I would call the next day they would give me a telegram which would assure me of the reservation. I called the next day, and they said they could not understand why they had not heard from the Toronto office. They wired a second time, and on the following day, the day I was leaving the Central station here at one o'clock, I called again, and was told they had no reply from Toronto to their second message, but that I would be absolutely certain of finding a lower berth reserved for me when I got to Toronto. The train leaves Toronto at 11.30, and I got in some time before that. The city ticket office was closed, and I went up to the Grand Trunk office in the Union Station. They told me they had no record whatever of a berth for me. They had their diagram there, and every berth was marked off. So I saw the conductor of the sleeping car and asked him what I should do. He said that all the berths were taken, as the diagram showed, and all I could do was to wait on the chance of somebody not turning up and claiming their berth. I had to sit up until 12.30 before I found out whether I could get a berth or not, and then I got a lower. I would point out that there were three other lower berths at least that were never occupied all night on that train. I know that for a fact, because I went through the train between one and two o'clock in the morning. But there I was, sitting up till 12.30 to see whether I could get a berth or not. Now, my hon. friend must know that a road will never pay if officials are allowed to do business in that way. If passengers are put to such inconvenience as that they will never travel over the road again.

Mr. COCHRANE: What was the date?

Mr. TURRIFF: I can get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. COCHRANE: I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. TURRIFF: It was in the month of July last. But that was not the end of my troubles. When I got to Cochrane I went into the Transcontinental office and wired to some friends of mine at Minaki, care of the Grand Trunk Hotel at that town. It took the clerk about ten minutes to tell me what the charge was for the message, but eventually he found out and I paid it. The telegram was asking some friends of mine to meet me at the station. I was not sure whether they were at Minaki or Winnipeg, but when I got to Minaki and they did not meet me at the station I concluded they were at Winnipeg and went on there. When I got to Winnipeg I found that they were at Minaki, and I went down and saw them over the week end. They told me they had never received the telegram, and what is more it had not been delivered when they left there a month afterwards. That was my experience on that trip. I am not bringing this matter up so much for the purpose of making complaint, as to let the minister know that some of his officials are either mighty careless, or deliberately trying to throw the business to the other roads. I do not know which it is, but I have given the absolute facts, and I leave it with the minister to take what steps he can to better this state of affairs.

Mr. COCHRANE: With regard to the wire to Toronto for a berth, that is purely a Grand Trunk matter, but I shall be very glad to take it up with them if my hon. friend will give me the date of the telegram. The other matter of the telegram to Minaki from Cochrane is under our control, and I shall be very glad to find out the facts if my hon. friend will give me the date. We will not stand for anything like that, because it is certainly not in the interests of the public or the interests of the road.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it true that a change has taken place in the policy of the department in regard to the appointment of officials on the eastern division of the Intercolonial. The reason I ask is that a gentleman by the name of Mr. Frank Stanfield, representing the county of Colchester in the Nova Scotia Legislature, resigned some months ago. At least, he sent his resignation to the Conservative Committee in the town of Truro, and it was stated in the public press that he was resigning his seat in the Legislature as a protest against the manner in which the Minister of Railways was making appointments on the eastern division. Some time in February, the Nova Scotia legislature assembled and has been in session ever since, but Mr. Stanfield did not take his seat until a few days ago, when he appeared in the House and made the statement that the Minister of Railways had changed his policy, that he had in fact capitulated, and that in future, appointments on that division would be made in a manner that would be satisfactory to him and his friends. The inference to be drawn is that he would never have returned to the House unless the minister had made this change in policy. Would the minister be good enough to tell us if he has really changed his policy in that regard, and if we may expect that appointments on the eastern division will be made in a different manner in the future?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have made no change in policy. My policy is to appoint the best man. If it is possible to find him on the road we certainly take him. It has been my policy ever since I took charge of the department to promote men when I knew they were capable of filling the vacant position.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister did not promise to make any change—is that what we are to understand?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have said exactly what I mean.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is it the intention of the Department of Railways to make repairs on the Transcontinental line between Levis and Moncton during the present summer? There have been several wrecks which, it is said, have been due to the track not being in proper condition, especially through the presence of faulty ties. This is unfortunate because between Levis and Edmundston enough lumber is made to employ 250 cars a day for three months. If the road were in better condition it would no doubt reap greater benefits from this business.

Mr. COCHRANE: No doubt the road needs ties, all roads do in the spring. This work will be attended to during the spring and summer on the Transcontinental as it is on other roads.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope the minister will not think I am pressing for an answer he does not want to give if I call his attention again to the question put by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). I wish the minister could tell us more definitely whether the statements made by Mr. Stanfield have any foundation or not. Canadians are now called upon to give attention to the question whether it is or is not advisable for the state to launch into the business of conducting the railways. We shall soon be called upon to consider the report of the Commission appointed to investigate that matter. The experience to guide us in the consideration of the recommendations of that commission can only be the experience of the minister of Railways. As many of us think very highly of the hon. minister as an administrator, we should like very much to know whether he has stood the test of maintaining a business administration of our railways, or whether the remarks of Mr. Stanfield are well-founded. Those of us who have been in the House for any length of time are aware that a man in the position of the Minister of Railways must be almost more than human to bear up against the influence brought against him, no matter which party is in power. The chief reason given by those who oppose Government ownership of railways is that we shall never be able to get heads of departments strong enough to administer the railways. If this be true, it will be better for us not to undertake governmental administration of the railway, but if it is not true a strong argument against that course is removed. Therefore, it is very important that we should know the truth of this matter. This is the first time, so far as I know, when this issue has risen directly between the man with political influence and the head of the Department. I have had something to do with the Minister of Railways. I have come in contact with him in connection with the submission of route maps, when the influence of municipalities was strongly exerted in favour of this or that view; and I can honestly say that I then formed the opinion that he was a man exceptionally fair in his decisions. I confess that it will be a disappointment to me if he cannot assure us that there is no ground for the statements which Mr. Stanfield makes. There is no use quibbling; Mr. Stanfield gave the people in the provincial House to understand that the minister had had to capitulate. He did not use that exact form of words, but that is the effect of what he said. Cannot the minister tell us categorically and unequivocally whether there is or is not any foundation for the statement made by Mr. Stanfield in the provincial House?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not seen the statement made by Mr. Stanfield, and I will not contradict a statement that I have not seen.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Will the minister tell us what policy he intends to pursue with regard to transportation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during the comming summer? The minister will remember that a delegation waited upon him some months ago, and the information I have is that he stated that the steamers hitherto employed in the service would be discontinued during the coming summer. That was a great disappointment to the business people of Prince Edward Island. It is stated that another delegation waited upon the minister, and that he gave them some assurance that the facilities at present afforded would be continued during the coming season. What are the real facts in this matter?

Mr. COCHRANE: A deputation came to see me, but I made no promise as to what we will or will not do. We were disappointed in that the terminals were not finished last fall. The contractors say that the weather was so rough that they could not go on dredging for a large part of the time. When the terminals are finished we will lay down a policy.

Mr. HUGHES: And in the meantime what course will the minister pursue?

Mr. COCHRANE: The boats are running.

Mr. HUGHES: And will continue to run as usual until the terminals are completed?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, unless we change.

Post Office Department—Salaries, $842,820; contingencies, $125,000.

Mr. MURPHY: This is not quite the same as last year.

Mr. PATENAUDE: There have been 37 statutory increases of $100 each, and 435 statutory increases of $50 each.

Mr. TURRIFF: I desire to be informed for what reason Mrs. Mapleton, the postmistress at Middlethorp post office in Saskatchewan, was dismissed. This lady is the oldest settler there. She has been dismissed from the postmastership, my information is, without good cause.

Mr. PATENAUDE: I will get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand that the postmaster of Anderson, in the county of Restigouche, was dismissed lately, and I would like to be informed why.

Mr. PATENAUDE: I will give the facts at a subsequent sitting of the House.

Civil Service Commission—Salaries, $33,075; contingencies, $15,500.

Mr. PATENAUDE: This is made up of statutory increases amounting to $500 and by the provision of $100 for the promotion of one clerk from the maximum of the 3-B subdivision to the minimum of 3-A subdivision.

Mr. MURPHY: By a statute passed a few years ago provision was made for the appointment of a third member of the Civil Service Commission. Has that appointment been made?

Mr. PATENAUDE: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it the intention of the minister, or the Government, to apply to that position the same policy which the Minister of Customs enunciated in regard to positions under his control: that it is his intention to appoint returned soldiers?

Mr. PATENAUDE: That is a matter for the Government.

Mr. MURPHY: Which member of the Government?

Mr. PATENAUDE: The whole of the Government, but the appointment has not been considered.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is it the intention to retain the Civil Service Commission now that the Government have practically superseded it by Orders in Council?

Mr. REID: It is being used just the same.

Mr. MURPHY: Used or abused?

Department of Naval Service—Salaries, $188,950.

Mr. MURPHY: What are the increases there?

Mr. REID: Provision is made for the appointment of a draughtsman in the Hydrographic Survey in class 2-B at a salary of $1,300, and the other increases are the regular statutory increases.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could the minister give me any information about a certain ice-breaker that was under the control of the Minister of Naval Affairs and was started in the Vickers-Maxim yard at Montreal at the time war broke out?

Mr. REID: I could not answer that. It is under another vote, and I would ask the hon. member to bring that up when that vote is taken up and when the minister will be here.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there any part of this vote intended for officials outside of the department at Ottawa?

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not know that the minister is quite reasonable in the request which he has made. Possibly decisions such as I refer to are made by the men who are paid out of this vote, and I presume that the disposal of that ice-breaker to Russia was recommended by some person whose salary we are voting.

Mr. REID: There are two branches of the Department of Marine and Fisheries—the Marine Department and the Naval Department. Unfortunately, the hon. member did not bring that up when the Deputy Minister of Marine was here, because the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service tells me that it comes under the Marine and Fisheries branch of the department. I would not have had any objection to giving my hon. friend all the information I could if he had brought it up when the Deputy Minister of Marine was here. Before we bring up the Marine and Fisheries estimates again the Minister will be here and give the explanation himself.

Mr. KNOWLES: The explanation, of course, is very reasonable if the minister says it is under a different division of the department. Will the minister get me the information without my making a motion for a return in regard to the progress made on that boat, how much was rebated by the Vickers-Maxim firm, how much Russia paid for the boat and how much Canada would have paid if the boat had been completed here?

Mr. REID: We may not be able to get part of that information in the department, but all the information that is in the department I will get for the hon. member.

Mr. TURRIFF: If I understand correctly, we are paying $188,000 in salaries in Ottawa for the running of the Naval Department?

Mr. REID: That is the position and the details are all set out. This vote is for the officials employed in the Inside Service in Ottawa.

Mr. TURRIFF: Of the Naval Department?

Mr. REID: Of the Naval Department; that is the branch under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. TURRIFF: And we have two boats now, I understand, one laid up and one in commission.

Mr. REID: Of course, the hon. member knows that the Fisheries branch comes under the Naval Department, so that this includes salaries of the Fisheries branch as well as the other naval services.

Mr. TURRIFF: Do the Fisheries come under the Naval branch instead of the Marine branch?

Mr. REID: The department was divided under two heads and the Fisheries branch comes under the Deputy Minister of Naval Service.

Mr. TURRIFF: It seems rather peculiar that fisheries should come under the Naval branch instead of the Marine and Fisheries branch.

Mr. MURPHY: It is the other way round, is it not?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. MURPHY: The vote preceding the one we are discussing is headed "Department of Marine and Fisheries."

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think it would be convenient if the minister would make a statement as to what branches of the Marine and Fisheries Department are under the Naval Service and what branches under the Marine and Fisheries. It is confusing to a great many people. I do not think that the division has been plainly stated in the House. If the minister has the information at hand I think it would be good policy to put it on record.

Mr. REID: Under the Naval branch of the department we have the hydrographic survey, the tidal survey, the wireless, fisheries and fishery protection service. The division is shown in the annual report.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Life-saving?

Mr. REID: The life-saving stations are under the Naval branch.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the weather report service under?

Mr. REID: That is under the Marine and Fisheries Department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand from a statement in the press that the superintendent of the life-saving stations, Mr.

Nickerson, was dismissed. Will the minister tell us if that is true, and, if so, why he was dismissed?

Mr. REID: He was dismissed. His services were not further required and the work done by him is now done by officers of the fisheries protection service. His salary was saved.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who performs the duties of the late officer?

Mr. REID: The captains in the fisheries protection service now do the work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Of course the branch is a very important one. Last year a very serious accident took place in my own constituency owing to the fact that the lifeboat was not in repair, and the lifeboat crew were therefore unable to give any assistance to the wrecked sailors of the dredge Cape Breton, that was driven by a storm on that coast. That fact, together with the dismissal of the superintendent, led me to inquire why he was dismissed and also why the lifeboat at the Whitehead station was not in commission at the time of the wreck of the Cape Breton, which involved the lives of a number of men.

Mr. REID: The dispensing with the services of Mr. Nickerson meant a reorganization of the service and the placing of the responsibility on the captains. The department thought that it would secure better satisfaction and better service by placing the responsibility on the captains.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many captains are there?

Mr. REID: There are five or six boats along that coast.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would it not seem that if no one man were responsible for the inspection it would be less efficiently done than if some man were placed in charge of it?

Mr. REID: As I understand, each boat is on a particular service, taking a portion of the coast line, and the captain while on duty is supposed to perform the work that Mr. Nickerson formerly did. Thus you have the services of five men instead of one, and each is charged with responsibility.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Do I understand that the five captains are cruising along the same territory in the Maritime Provinces or is the territory divided up?

Mr. REID: Each vessel has a section of territory of its own.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: What captains were responsible for the condition of affairs at the Whitehead and Canso stations during the past year?

Mr. REID: I could not give that information now, but will do so on the other Estimates.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would be interesting to know just what territory each captain has, so we would know to whom we should go when anything of that kind happens.

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Nickerson, the late superintendent furnished an annual report as to the work done in life saving every year, the conditions of the life boats and other matters pertaining to the duties that devolved on him. Is any similar report furnished by the captains?

Mr. REID: Mr. Nickerson, as I understand, did not furnish such a report. The captains do furnish a report on each route on which they work, and the department has these reports.

Mr. TURRIFF: Newspaper items have appeared about some naval construction that is being undertaken by the Naval Department. Would the minister give us some information as to the intention of the Government? Are they starting in on a programme of naval construction or what?

Mr. REID: As I understand the construction to which the hon. gentleman refers is for the Imperial Government. It would not be proper to announce everything that has been done, but I have no doubt that on the other Estimates the minister will give as much information as possible. It is all for the Imperial Government, and the Naval Department is merely acting for them.

Mr. TURRIFF: The Imperial Government is paying for it?

Mr. REID: Yes, and the Naval Department are only agents in respect of the matters to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that the commandeering of ships for war purposes comes under the jurisdiction of the Naval Department. I have seen in the newspapers that the Government have taken some new position in regard to this important matter. If so it would be very interesting to the people of Canada to know just what their policy is. Very shortly after the declaration of war, I undertook to draw to the attention of the Government the fact that Canadian ships were being commandeered by the Imperial Government and I then thought and said that the proper policy to adopt would be for our own Government to requisition such ships belonging to Canadians as might be required for the war, and to hand them over to the Imperial Government. We should have kept control of our own shipping. The Government did not act on that suggestion, and, as we all know, during the two and one-half years of war, Canadian ships have been requisitioned by the Imperial authorities. It has been said in the newspapers recently that the Government has taken some action in this matter and that some agreement has been reached between the Government of Canada and the Imperial authorities by which the requisitioning of Canadian ships will be done by the Canadian Government. Will the minister say if that is the case, and what the policy of the Government is in regard to this question?

Mr. REID: It strikes me that at the commencement of the war or shortly after that a few vessels of Canadian registry were requisitioned by the British Government; but afterwards it was arranged and understood that if vessels of Canadian registry were to be requisitioned, the British Government would apply to the Canadian Government and ask if they would requisition the ships.

The Canadian Government themselves make the requisition and then hand the vessel over to the British authorities. If the British Government wish to have the services of any Canadian registered vessel they ask us to requisition it in the interests of the war, and as a rule we do so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is this procedure founded on an Order in Council?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister produce it?

Mr. REID: Yes. The Order in Council gives the Minister of Marine and Fisheries power to requisition vessels, but it is all done through the Canadian Government. This course has been followed for some time.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, April 23, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE ROSS RIFLE FACTORY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. W. KYTE: Would the Minister of Militia and Defence kindly inform the House when the papers relative to the taking over of the Ross rifle factory will be brought down, and whether a statement will shortly be made by the Government with reference to the manufacture of rifles in Canada?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Order in Council providing for the taking over of the Ross rifle factory will be brought down to-morrow.

Mr. KYTE: Will the Government be in a position to make a statement with regard to the manufacture of rifles in this country at an early date?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Appraisers are now taking an inventory of the Ross rifle factory. The Government is using the greatest possible dispatch in having the necessary specifications and patterns prepared for the making of a new rifle.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the factory at present closed?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: A certain number of men are employed in the taking of the inventory, but there is no manufacturing going on at the present time.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask the leader of the House when the Public Accounts Committee will be called again?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will inform my hon. friend to-morrow.

ENLISTED CIVIL SERVANTS.

PAY AND SEPARATION ALLOWANCE.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would the Minister of Militia and Defence kindly inform us what the policy of the Government is with regard to the salaries of inside civil servants who have enlisted? It will be remembered that when these civil servants were invited to offer themselves for overseas service they were given the assurance that their salaries would not be lower than what they were receiving in the service, and I understand that the military pay has been supplemented in certain cases in accordance with that assurance. Those civil servants who enlisted two years ago would now be getting, if they had remained in the service, their regular statutory increase, and I wish to know whether allowance is made for that when they are given their military pay.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The question which my hon. friend raises was brought to my attention this morning. My own view is that these civil servants should get the regular statutory increase, and the matter is being looked into with a view to ascertaining the exact position.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to ask a question with regard to separation allowances in the case of civil servants who have enlisted. A return was laid upon the Table the other day giving the names of a number of members of this House who had been appointed to different positions in the Militia, some of them occupying the position of colonel, and who were receiving their sessional indemnity, the salary attached to their military position, and separation allowance as well. I am told that in the case of at least some civil servants who have enlisted the separation allowance has been refused. I would ask whether that is the case, and if so, why a distinction is made to the prejudice of the members of the Civil Service.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not heard that there has been any discrimination against either members of Parliament or civil servants in respect of enlistment in the overseas forces.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a case within my own personal knowledge of the wife of a civil servant who was refused a separation allowance. She was informed by the Department of Militia and Defence that no separation allowance was granted in the case of a civil servant. We also know from the return that was laid on the Table the other day that separation allowances have been granted to the wives of members of Parliament, who were receiving both military pay and their sessional indemnities.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I should be glad if my hon. friend would give me the name of the person he has in mind, so that we may look into the case, and I shall then be able to answer intelligently the question which my hon. friend raises. Personally I do not see why any civil servant in the overseas forces should not be entitled to a separation allowance for his wife.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: It might be a little objectionable to give the name, because sometimes when a civil servant complains he does not possibly receive the treatment from the officials which he otherwise would receive. But if my hon. friend will make inquiry in the department he will find the statement which I have made to be correct, and if he does not find it to be correct, I shall gladly furnish him with the name.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will make inquiry, but I can assure my hon. friend that no soldier will be discriminated against for advancing his claim.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—PURCHASE OF COAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to the following despatch from Stellarton, which appears in the Halifax Herald:

> Stellarton, April 20.—There is much excitement in this town as to future work in the Acadia Coal company's mines. This seems a peculiar statement when anything black is saleable as fuel. The company have now about 20,000 tons in bank. Cars are not obtainable, it is claimed, to ship this to customers. It is rumored that there is serious trouble between the company and the management of the Intercolonial.
> This company, being on the line to Sydney, supplies the larger share of the tonnage on the eastern division. Report says that the Canadian Pacific pays over $5 a ton to this company and to the Greenwood company, and that they guarantee cars to take their tonnage. The Canadian government import coal at a cost of $7 per ton at least. The company says its wages to the men are dependent on the price it gets from the I. C. R., who take one-third of its product.
> Further rumour says that Scotia is having a price 50 cents in excess of that offered and that they have limited the quantity that it will require from that company. All the miners want is no discrimination against this company and the going price, so that thereby they can secure the going wage.

I am advised that the Minister of Railways has offered this company $4.25 a ton for coal, while the Canadian Pacific Railway is paying this and other companies $5.25 a ton, and I am also informed that the minister paid $9.25 for coal purchased in the United States and delivered at Halifax. What is the position of my hon. friend with regard to this matter?

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): We have made no contract yet with this company, but we have offered them the same price at which we are buying from other companies. I have not heard anything with reference to a shortage of cars, but I will take the matter up, and if the coal is shipped there will certainly be cars to ship it in.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not referring to the non-shipment of coal, although it is well known in Nova Scotia that there are 20,000 tons of coal banked up at the Acadia mines through the failure of the Intercolonial to supply cars. What I wanted to know is why the Minister of Railways was haggling with this company and offering them $4.25 a ton for coal when the Canadian Pacific Railway was paying for the same quality $5.25 a ton, and when my hon. friend had paid $9.25 a ton for American coal delivered at Halifax.

Mr. COCHRANE: We never paid $9.25 a ton for coal delivered at Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was so stated by my hon. friend himself in this House in February last.

Mr. COCHRANE: But we offered this company and other companies more money than their contract called for, and they did not fill their contract.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. COCHRANE: That is a matter for us to settle, not you.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is not altogether a matter for my hon. friend to settle, but for the people of this country. The Minister of Railways does not own the country yet as he will find out.

FARM LABOURERS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I should like to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to a statement in the Montreal Gazette, to the effect that some of his officials in the United States, in their advertisements for farm labourers for Western Canada, had stated that there would be no conscription here, and that the men would be exempt from all military service. The Gazette states, also, that these advertisements have been withdrawn. Will the hon. gentleman bring down the advertisements in question, together with any instructions that have been issued in the matter?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

COAL PRICES AND SHIPBUILDING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City and County): As the subject of coal has been mentioned, I desire to call the attention of the Government to the fact that during the past winter, and even up to the present time, in the city of St. John where a great deal of anthracite coal is burned which can only be obtained from the United States, people have been obliged to pay an enormous price for that article, as much, I am informed, as $13.75 a ton. We are told that the reason for these high prices is that coal has to be brought to St. John by vessel and that there is a great scarcity in tonnage, and therefore freights are very high. I do not dispute that; my object in rising is to call the attention of the Government to the fact, which I have brought before this House on many occasions, that there is a great scarcity of tonnage for carrying the water-borne freight of Canada. The matter is a very serious one indeed for those who have to use American coal transported by water. I would ask the Government if any steps have been taken by them to encourage the building of ships, more especially wooden ships, not merely to engage in ocean transportation but for coast transportation, which is vital to the people of our country. I was glad to notice the other day that the authority in the United States charged with these matters had decided to give an order for one thousand wooden vessels.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) that he is not in order in entering upon a discussion at this stage. And, may I say, there is a growing tendency, I fear, to rather enlarge upon the privilege afforded private members on the Orders of the Day of asking questions upon matters of importance. This, if allowed to grow, will result in inconvenience. Of course, a certain latitude for the asking of questions upon the Orders of the Day has always been granted, but I hope that hon. members will guard themselves against the tendency to dilate upon questions which may involve the necessity of lengthy replies by members of the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I agree, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary to avoid as far as possible such discussion. But the conditions of the moment are unusual. These are times that are trying the souls of our people. In the city from which I come the cost of living—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that there is no subject before the Chair. I wish he would submit his question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Having made my preliminary observations. I desire to ask if any steps have been taken by the Government for the building of vessels in Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Orders have been placed by the Imperial Government with Canadian shipyards for some twenty-two vessels. I understand that further orders for eight vessels are under consideration. This will involve a tonnage of 175,000 tons. The effect is that all the shipbuilding plants of Canada have sufficient orders to carry them well into the middle of 1918. We have given attention to the question of shipbuilding, because, as the hon. gentleman says, it is vital at this time. The more ships we can build, the more the existing shipping of the world will be available for the transportation to our Allies of commodities of all kinds. Some time ago I took up this question with the Imperial Munitions Board acting for the Imperial Government here, as to what is to be done towards building wooden ships for the purpose of transporting the products of Canada to Great Britain in order to assist in the situation which has become so acute by reason of the submarine menace. The representative of the Minister of Shipping, Mr. Perry, has been looking into the question, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada. Recently I offered, on behalf of the Government, to find money on this side of the ocean, to the amount of $10,000,000, to place the Imperial Government in funds for the construction and purchase of wooden ships in Canada. The matter is now under consideration, and I am of the opinion that orders for a considerable tonnage of wooden ships will be placed in Canada through the Imperial Munitions Board. These, of course, will be of service to transport our products to the United Kingdom, and will also ease the general shipping situation to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Perhaps I should add a word in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) on the subject of coal. He will be aware that an order in Council was passed last November, concerning the prices of fuel, clothing, and food. Under that order we have sent out questionaires to all the known coal dealers in Canada, and to these we have received answers under oath. I have not the figures before me, but, speaking from memory, I think there is no return showing any such price as my hon. friend has stated. Speaking further from memory, I think the order contains a provision compelling dealers to sell any of the products referred to at a reasonable and just price; so that, if any one in the city of St. John feels aggrieved at the price charged for coal, with the consent of the Attorney General of the province he can prosecute the dealer for demanding a higher price than is reasonable and just.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I disclaim having suggested that the coal dealers of St. John were asking more than a fair price. What I said was that the excessive freight which they were compelled to pay for water transportation is alleged to be the cause of the very high price. I am sorry to learn from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) that the Government itself has taken no steps to build ships in Canada but is relying upon the Imperial Government.

CANADIAN PRISONERS OF WAR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I wish to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) a question in regard to the position of Canadian Prisoners of War in Germany. I have a letter from one of these prisoners who states that after these men were detained there was some difficulty about their pay being made available through governmental sources for the purpose of enabling them to get food, and that as a consequence the parents and friends of the prisoners contributed, as we all know they did, to send food to them. It was stated in the press not long ago that some restriction was imposed on the rights of the relatives and friends of prisoners to send them clothing or food and the matter upon which I want information is: What is the Government doing now? Is it possible for the Government to utilize the pay of these men, which is running on, I presume, although they are prisoners, for the purpose of enabling them to get food through governmental sources, or what provision is being made now for them in view of the fact that private parties are prevented from sending them sustenance?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The question which my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) raises, I think, has reference to the Red Cross Society's shipments to Great Britain. I am not prepared to make a statement at the moment but I shall endeavour to do so to-morrow and in the meantime I shall make further inquiry.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—COAL CONTRACTS.

Mr. MACDONALD: On Thursday last the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) promised to bring down a statement in regard to coal contracts which I asked the minister about a short time ago and he has not done so.

THE DUTY ON SEED BEANS.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, on account of the great shortage in the bean crop in Canada during 1916, and the urgent need in this country for this article, in the interest of the consumer and producer, beans for seed purposes should be allowed to come into Canada duty free.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my chief reason for moving this resolution is the great shortage in the bean crop in the south-western part of Ontario. We have been unfortunate in our attempts to get seed for the different crops which the farmers are desirous of putting in. This is particularly true of the bean crop, which last season was a complete failure in the counties of Essex, Kent and Lambton, and in parts of Elgin county. We have had to get the seed from the United States. The seed which was brought in last year from the United States matured about two weeks earlier than the home-grown seed, and the farmers who were fortunate enough to get seed from the United States had a great advantage over those who used home-grown seed. They are anxious, therefore, to get as much of the seed this year from the state of Michigan as they possibly can. A request to this effect has been made in a petition which, I understand, has been forwarded to the Government, and the demand has been voiced also by farmers' associations in the county of Kent. In view of the high price of seed at the present time, a greatly increased production during this year will result if the Government can see its way clear to allow the farmers to have their bean seed brought in free of duty and free of war tax. The Prime Minister and the other members of the Government, as well as the citizens of Canada, are particularly anxious that every farmer shall produce as much as he possibly can, and if satisfactory results in this respect are to be obtained, it will be absolutely necessary to get the seed to which I have referred. If this House is in sympathy with the proposals to this effect which have been advanced from time to time by different boards of trade and by different municipal councils throughout the country, I feel satisfied that the request will be granted and this motion allowed to go into effect.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter of production is, of course, a very important one, and within the next few days I shall be glad to look into the subject of my hon. friend's motion and see what, if anything, can be done. I spoke to my hon. friend the other day, and I understood that it was not his intention to bring this resolution up until after the Budget. I do not understand that he is pressing the motion to-day, and if he is content to withdraw it, having brought it to the attention of the Government, I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

Mr. McCOIG: I have no desire to press the matter against the wishes of the Minister of Finance, but if it is some time before the Budget is brought down and the people do not know what course the Government purposes adopting, the result may be detrimental to the best interests of this year's crop. It will be satisfactory, however, if the farmers have the seed before May 24 or June 1. Undoubtedly they are anxious to know whether the Government will grant this request, for if the duty be removed many farmers will put in seed who otherwise would, perhaps, be unable to secure the necessary seed or who would not be anxious to pay the price which they have to pay under existing circumstances.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I should like to say a few words on this resolution, I would move that the debate be now adjourned.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree to that.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On the motion of Mr. Pugsley:

That, whereas, in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the provincial franchise has been granted to women, by legislative enactment, and in British Columbia the electors have voted in favour of similar legislation;

Whereas it is proposed in the Dominion Elections Act that persons entitled to vote for members of a Provincial Legislature shall also be entitled to vote for members of Parliament, but in respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan—alone of all the provinces of Canada—it is provided that only males shall be entitled to vote for members of the Federal Parliament, thus creating an anomalous situation as between the provinces, which should be removed;

Whereas during the present Empire struggle the women of Canada have shown a most intelligent and patriotic interest in, and an unselfish devotion to, the welfare of the state;

And, whereas it seems but just and right that they should be given a voice in the direction of its affairs:

In the opinion of this House it is desirable that provision be made either to grant to women who are qualified to vote for members of a Provincial Legislature, the right also to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament, or to grant to women throughout the Dominion the right to vote for members of Parliament, subject to such provisions and limitations as may seem reasonable to Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I had intended to press this resolution to a vote this afternoon; but some arrangements were made by other gentlemen in regard to motions further down the list, and for reasons which have been presented to me by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), and which seem to be very well founded, I would ask that this motion stand.

Motion stands.

VICTORIA BRIDGE TOLL RATES.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) moved for:

A copy of the Order in Council increasing the toll rates on Victoria Bridge, Montreal, and also a copy of all petitions, telegrams, letters and other documents referring to said increase.

[Mr. McCoig.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any length. I wish only to draw the attention of the Government to the very serious state of affairs which exists in connection with the toll rates on Victoria bridge, Montreal, which is the only connecting link across the river St. Lawrence between the great commercial metropolis of Canada and the south shore. A few weeks ago the people were startled to learn that the toll rates were increased. I do not know the reason for the change, but I wish to inform my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals, that some relief should certainly be afforded to the farmers of the counties on the south shore. I have not the present tariff before me, but I know the rates are simply prohibitive for the farmers of the counties of Laprairie, Rouville, Chambly and Verchères, not to mention others, and I sincerely hope that the representatives of the province of Quebec in the Government will do something to remove that disability which is fastened upon the farmers of the south shore. The increase, I am sure, has passed unnoticed when my hon. friends were absent from Council, but it seems to me that to call their attention to this real grievance will be sufficient to effect a cure.

I think the time has come when the Grand Trunk Railway Company should give us free ingress and free egress across the Victoria bridge. This bridge has been very heavily subsidized, first for the original construction and later on for its reconstruction, so that it seems to me that the people in that section of the country should receive ample justice on the part of that company. I quite understand that, like all other transportation companies, the Grand Trunk Railway has passed through hard times; but when one considers that such a large population has to make use of that connecting link between the two shores of the St. Lawrence river, one feels that the Government should make it a point, if not to make the bridge free for the farmers and the community at large, at least to have the old toll rates restored. I make a special appeal to the hon. Secretary of State, (Mr. Patenaude), who represents one of the large constituencies of the city of Montreal, and also to the Deputy Speaker of the House (Mr. Rainville) who represents the counties of Chambly and Verchères.

Mr. PATENAUDE: My hon. friend must be mistaken, because there has been no change in the rates so far as the farmers are concerned; the change is only as regards motor trucks, and I presume the Minister of Railways will have an explanation for that.

Mr. REID: Perhaps I should reply to the hon. member, as this matter was brought before me when I was acting for the Minister of Railways in his absence. The matter is one of routine. After having heard the case as represented by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I went into it thoroughly with the deputy minister and other officials, and found that the tolls had not been revised for many years. The deputy minister, after investigating the matter very carefully, recommended that the changes were fair and just, and I therefore recommended the changes to Council and they were approved. The changes, however, were not so drastic as the hon. member has stated. At the time care was taken to protect the farmers and the increase was more in regard to motor trucks. After the Order in Council was passed, I noticed that there were some complaints, but I understand they were taken up with the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and that the grievances complained of were removed. At all events I gave notice to the effect that if there were any grievances, these toll rates could be revised from time to time, and I was willing at any time to hear complaints which, if well founded, would result in a revision of the rates. From that day, however, to the time that I ceased administering the department, no complaint was registered. I have not asked the minister if any complaints have been received since then, but I have been advised by the Grand Trunk officials themselves and others that there are no grievances now, or that if there are any, they are so small that no one cares to take any further interest in them. As my hon. friend knows, the matter can be brought before the Minister of Railways at any time, and I am quite satisfied that he will do his best to remedy any grievance that is shown to exist. The rates are not permanent; they can be revised at any time.

4 p.m.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very glad to hear that the rates can be revised when a grievance is shown to exist. In the present case the grievance is certainly felt by the farmers, and also by the business men of Montreal. My hon. friend (Mr. Patenaude) stated that the farmers were not hit by this new regulation. Well, I can say this: I represent the constituency of Rouville, which, as my hon. friend knows, is a farming community, and when I was there ten or twelve days ago I met several farmers both of St. Hyacinthe and Rouville, and the whole talk was of the rates on the Victoria Bridge. My hon. friend must not forget that motor trucks are used very extensively in that very progressive district, in the Counties of Laprarie, Rouville, and Chambly-Verchères. I need not say that it is the most progressive district in my province. I have also heard some very bitter complaints from the merchants of Montreal. I am sure my hon. friend will bear me out when I say that there is a large local trade between Montreal and the south shore. The wholesale grocers of Montreal send motor trucks over the Victoria Bridge, simply loaded with merchandise to be delivered at Laprairie, St. Lambert, Chambly, Longueuil, Marieville, and other smaller towns and villages. I have heard some members of the Montreal Board of Trade complain very bitterly about these high rates, and I might mention many who do an extensive business on the south shore. They stated that the rates were almost prohibitive. I am glad to have had this opportunity of bringing the matter before the House, and to have the promise of the acting minister that a remedy will be found for this evil.

Motion agreed to.

LUCEVILLE, RIMOUSKI COUNTY.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) moved for:

A copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and all other papers concerning the substitution of the name of Luceville given to the Intercolonial Railway station of Sainte Luce, County of Rimouski, Quebec.

He said: This motion will be more interesting to those members of the House who are familiar with the French language. Sainte Luce, the old name of the village is a much better name than Luceville. It was an old French name and was euphonious. Sombody, possibly a busybody in the village, undertook to get the name of the post office and station changed, and against the will of the parish priest and of the community generally, and in spite of shoals of protesting letters and telegrams, the name was changed to Luceville. This is really a grievance for that constituency, not only to those who appreciate euphony and like to stick to old names with a romance about them, but from a business point of view as well. I sincerely hope that my hon. friend the Secretary of State, who attends to our affairs in the province of Quebec, will see to it that the old name of Sainte Luce is restored. Some people in the Province of Quebec have a very officious way of getting old names with a flavour of romance about them changed for new names which have no meaning at all. What meaning has Luceville? It is ugly, it is not euphonious, and there is no romance about it; whereas the old name of Sainte Luce has a pleasant ring about it. I sincerely trust that my hon. friend will see that the name of the station and of the post office is restored.

Hon. E. L. PATENAUDE (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to bring down the documents in connection with this matter and if there is anything that can be done in the premises, I shall do it with pleasure.

Motion agreed to.

THE DUTY ON TRACTOR ENGINES.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, on account of the urgent need of greater production of foodstuffs and the admitted shortage of farm labour, tractor engines suitable for all kinds of farm work, which will be of great assistance to producers, should be admitted into Canada free of duty.

He said: I feel satisfied that every member of the House will agree with me that it is of supreme importance that this resolution should be passed. We have it on the highest authority that there is great food shortage at this time. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) have urged our farmers to produce as much as possible. But, with the great shortage of labour, especially in the province of Ontario, it is out of the question for our farmers, under present conditions, to get in the crops that our people are anxious they should get in. I was talking to Mr. Foulds, manager of the Thames Valley Land Company, which has large holdings in the township of Tilbury, in the county of Kent, and he informed me that fields aggregating no less than four hundred acres in the most fertile portion of their lands would be left uncultivated this year owing to the shortage of labour and the lateness of the season. I asked him whether, if he had a light tractor engine, he would be able to handle the entire farm, and his answer was that he believed he could. He said he had been communicating with the provincial authorities with a view to getting one of the ten tractors purchased by the Government of the province. But it is likely he would be unsuccessful because of the great demand that has arisen for these tractors. It goes to show how urgently the tractors are needed when the provincial Government purchases ten of them and brings them from the other side of the line, where they are manufactured. We learn, also, that the enterprising members of the Board of Trade of Toronto are drawing upon their private bank accounts to purchase five tractors with a view to distributing them where they can do the best work. With such evidences of an urgent demand for these machines on the part of our own people, it would seem only fair that this Parliament should take action at least to the extent of allowing these tractors to be brought in without an additional fine. I believe that if the duty were removed many farmers would be able to purchase these tractors privately, and if the duty were removed the cost to the purchasers would be greatly reduced. The tariff formerly was 20 per cent and now there is an additional 7½ per cent. That is to say, if this duty were taken off we should be able to purchase five tractors for the present cost of four. I believe I am within the mark when I say that at present one thousand of these tractors could be used in Ontario. If the duty were removed these machines would be of some assistance in getting in the spring crop, and our farmers would be in a much better position to put in an additional wheat crop this fall, and in the meantime there would be the summer fallowing and preparation for that crop. I understand from newspaper reports that other countries have placed orders for no fewer than 50,000 farm tractors. This is an indication of how widely useful these machines can be made in assisting greater agricultural production, and makes all the stronger the case in favour of this resolution. Should the Government object to allowing the free entry of the larger tractors, I would be prepared to amend this resolution by confining it to tractors of 8-16 horse-power, or possibly 10-20 horse-power. That, I understand to mean, a tractor that will pull 8 or 10 horse-power and will develop power on the belt of 16 or 20 horse-power. These tractors will be sufficiently large for our immediate purposes, and their importation will not interfere with any manufacture in Canada. I believe that the Massey-Harris Company are getting out a small tractor, but it is practically still in the experimental stage. We see by the press this morning that in all churches throughout the Dominion preachers have been urging greater production. And we are warned by those who are in a better position to judge than most of the members of this House can possibly be that there is danger in the Old World, and even here, of actual famine. This being so, it is clearly the duty of Parliament to give farmers every possible assistance. With the use of these tractors our farmers will be able to produce more, and thus Canada, besides sending her men to the front, will be able to give assistance in providing supplies for the troops and the people generally without which we cannot succeed in winning the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): I am not clear as to what item in the Tariff the hon. member refers to. The resolution speaks of "tractor engines suitable for all kinds of farm work." These engines to-day are manufactured in Canada, by one or more concerns. Some time ago we placed ditching machines on the free list, but that was partly on the ground that they were not manufactured in Canada. As I have pointed out in the House before, one item in the Tariff depends upon another. If we take away the duty on tractor engines, then, as tractor engines are manufactured in Canada, we should have to take away the duties on the raw materials which enter into their manufacture, on the coal used in their production, and even on the building material used in the construction of the buildings in which they are produced.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will the minister please say where these tractor engines are manufactured in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Assuming that I understand the article to which he refers, I am informed that they are manufactured in Hamilton, Brantford, and possibly some other places.

Mr. McCOIG: I may inform the minister that the 8-10, and 10-20 tractors are not manufactured in Canada, though I understand that the Massey-Harris people are experimenting with them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman's resolution refers to "tractor engines suitable for all kinds of farm work." The description is about as wide as he can make it. The questions we must consider are, first, are these manufactured in Canada? and second, can they be manufactured in Canada? If they are manufactured in Canada, our farmers can buy them; if they are not now manufactured here but can be, then it is important that Canadians should make them.

Mr. McCOIG: But the nation will starve in the meantime.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree that these machines cannot be made in Canada. My information is that they are actually manufactured here and can be bought. It is the policy of the Government to encourage the manufacture of all articles that can be produced in Canada. It is in the national interest now more than ever that if an article can be bought in Canada it should be bought here rather than abroad, for it is necessary above all in time of war that we should conserve our resources. Speaking also from the standpoint of revenue, there never was a time when this Dominion needed revenue more than it does at present.

Mr. TURRIFF: Import the goods.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There never was a time when this Dominion needed revenue more than it does at present. Our war expenditures are at the rate of $1,000,000 a day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some time ago I saw in the newspapers that the British Government had bought, for the use of its farmers, 2,000 of these tractor ploughs. I suppose that is what my hon. friend (Mr. McCoig) means. Were any of these purchased in Canada or were they not all purchased in the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no information as to that point, but I am perfectly satisfied that if the Dominion Government desired to buy 2,000 ploughs it would be very much better that they should place the order for them in the Dominion of Canada than in the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you could get them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But the point is that while we might get these tractors in the United States, they are manufactured, or can be manufactured, in Canada and in ordinary times it is desirable that our Canadian manufacturers should build them.

Mr. PARDEE: Does the hon. gentleman say they can be bought in Canada? I understand the Ontario Government are bringing them in from the United States. Why are they doing that if they can buy them here?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not able to say whether the Ontario Government are buying them in the United States or not, but I am referring to traction engines. Traction engines are manufactured in Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think it will clear matters up a little bit if we get an idea of the kind of engine that is meant. You can get a traction engine to run a threshing machine in Canada; they are made at half a dozen or a dozen places. But, the tractor engines that are now being used by the western farmers for drawing a double mould board, or a two or four furrow plough, are not made in Canada except experimentally. We cannot get them in quantity; we have to buy them in the United States.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will observe the wording of the resolution. It refers to "tractor engines suitable for all kinds of farm work."

Mr. McCOIG: I suggested when I was making my remarks that I would be willing to so amend my resolution as to confine it to the 8-16 and 10-20 tractors which are suitable for farm purposes. The large tractors, the 20-30 and 20-40, are too heavy for farm work and are almost impracticable because they pack the ground too much.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not possible for me to agree to the amendment of this motion unless my hon. friend desires to give notice of it. I can only speak of the resolution as it stands on the Order Paper, and as it stands on the Order Paper it should be voted down for the reason which I have given; that is, that the tractor engines can be manufactured in Canada, and it is against the national interest that they should be imported from the United States. I was developing my argument as to the need that Canada has for additional revenue. Then, beyond the desirability of manufacturing these goods in Canada, if there ever was a time in the history of the Dominion when we need revenue it is the present. We have an expenditure in connection with this war at the rate of $1,000,000 a day. In so far as I know, all classes in the community are doing well. I do not think that the farmers have ever done as well in the history of the Dominion as they are doing at the present time. I do not believe that as high prices have ever been obtained for farm produce as are being obtained at present. I do not believe that general business in the Dominion was ever better or as good as it is at the present time. That being so, there would seem to be no reason why the duty should be taken off these articles any more than off a further range of articles that my hon. friend might mention. The present is not a time to reduce or remove duties which give us our revenue. So that, on two grounds, first, on the ground of revenue, second, on the ground that these articles are being, or can be, manufactured in Canada, I think my hon. gentleman's motion should be negatived. If he desires to withdraw this motion and substitute a motion which covers a certain line of traction engines which he mentioned, but which I cannot identify and about which I have no information at the present time, I would be willing that that should be done, but, as it stands, the resolution should be negatived.

Mr. WILCOX: Mr. Speaker, I want, in the first place, to associate myself with those who are in favour of any measure that will benefit the agricultural classes of this country at this time. I am rather inclined to the view, however, that the suggestion which has been made by my hon. friend from West Kent (Mr. McCoig) this afternoon, if carried into effect, would not be the benefit to the farmers that he anticipates, but would, on the other hand, work a great injury. We have in the little town of Essex, six miles from where I live, a splendid industry which is branching out into the manufacture of farm tractors. They are putting up at the present time, I understand, seven of these tractors for the express purpose of assisting in all light farm work. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) were to act upon the suggestion of my hon. friend from West Kent, I think it would have the effect of wiping out of existence that infant industry, which, I do believe, is contrary to the policy of both political parties. As I understand the principle upon which both political parties stand in regard to this matter, it is that the infant industry shall have a reasonable protection until such time as it is enabled to compete against the industries of the outside world. My hon. friend (Mr. McCoig) says that is false. There may be some question about that point, but I know that up our way in the splendid city of Windsor, where we are hoping to build up a great industrial centre, the Liberals have very little to say about free trade.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman did not say what you intimated at all.

Mr. McCOIG: I did not address any remarks to the hon. gentleman whatever.

I did not refer in any way whatever to anything that the hon. gentleman said. That is all imaginary on the part of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WILCOX: I heard a breath floating from the other side that sounded like that. I may be pardoned for referring to the question of traction ditchers which has been dealt with. I think the Minister of Finance will agree when I state that I was the first member of this House who suggested to him that, as this machine was not manufactured in Canada and was only manufactured in the United States, it might be placed on the free list. I have watched this very closely because the question of tile draining in the county of Essex and in western Ontario, where it is a flat, level, but very rich and fertile country, is a live issue and we have dozens of these machines in our neighborhood. There is one working on my own farm, or on my father's farm, and we know, what we had to pay when these machines had a duty imposed upon them. We had to pay twenty-five cents a rod for the digging of the trench and the placing of the tile. The duty was taken off. A few more machines were brought in and the men who brought the machines in joined together and raised the cost of laying the tile to twenty-eight cents a rod. That is what we are paying to-day. So that the elimination of the duty on the tile ditching machines did not reduce the price to the farmer of the laying of the tile, but, in my opinion, it did have the effect for all time to come, while the tariff remains as it is, of preventing all possibility of any tile ditching machines being constructed in the Dominion of Canada. So it seems to me that when our policy is based upon that principle of a reasonable protection for an infant industry, when we are commencing to build up that industry, I believe, as the farmers of this country have been loyal and patriotic in their adherence to that principle in our national policy in the past, they will stand by it in the future in the same way. I also believe that the benefit which my hon. friend anticipates would flow from the reduction of duty would not be secured. Therefore, I think the tariff should remain as it is.

Mr. NESBITT: What firm in Essex are making these machines?

Mr. WILCOX: The firm there is making a farm tractor with a capacity of drawing two or three plows. They have purchased a machine shop and commenced operations about two months ago. I am quite confident that if my hon. friend will send a telegram this afternoon, that company will be able to fill right away all the orders that he can take in the county of Kent.

Mr. McCOIG: Last fall—I did not want to bring any personal matter into this debate—I waited on Mr. McGregor, head of the Ford factory in Ford, and asked when I could get a tractor for my own farm, as at the request of this Government I wanted one to get in all the wheat possible. Mr. McGregor told me that he could not guarantee me a tractor within two years; and the whole nation would starve before these tractors would be ready to cultivate land to produce wheat.

Mr. LALOR: If the hon. member will wire to the Canadian Engine Company at Dunnville, Ontario, he can get a tractor because we manufacture them.

Mr. McCOIG: What horse-power?

Mr. LALOR: I do not know exactly the horse-power, but large enough to do ploughing.

Mr. NESBITT: That is the trouble, they are too large.

Mr. McCOIG: These are kerosene burning engines and they afford a great saving in cost over the gasolene engines to which my hon. friend (Mr. Lalor) referred.

Mr. NESBITT: Are the McGregor people at Ford the same as the firm at Essex?

Mr. WILCOX: No, they are not the same people. The Ford people have not commenced to construct tractors. I understand they have not commenced even in Detroit, and I know they have not in Walkerville. The firm I have reference to is starting a factory in the town of Essex.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the name of the firm?

Mr. WILCOX: I think it is The Essex County Tractor Company, but I would not be positive as to the name.

Mr. NESBITT: Have they produced these tractors yet?

Mr. WILCOX: I shall send a telegram this afternoon and get that information. I am sure they are now manufacturing tractors and putting them on the market. They had one on exhibition at the fall fair last year.

Mr. NESBITT: The reason I ask these questions is that I wish to be absolutely fair in these things. So far as the Ford people are concerned, I know that what the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) says is correct, because I wrote them myself and they are not in a position to produce any tractors yet. As to the factory in Essex, I never heard of it before. That of course, does not say, that it does not exist. I wish them success. But in the meantime I want to impress on the Minister of Finance that this year in Ontario we are suffering very materially from the lack of farm labour. There is a great deal in the newspapers about the city people sending students into the country and going themselves, and all that sort of thing; but as a matter of fact the ordinary farmer does not pay much attention to that because he knows as well as I do that a man cannot come from the city, unaccustomed to heavy manual labour, and be much use on the farm.

Mr. WILCOX: Men from the city have proved to be good fighters and I do not know why they should not be good farmers if they apply themselves.

Mr. NESBITT: They would undoubtedly become good farmers if they had the time and experience, as good as anybody else. But at the same time no man can successfully do a kind of work to which he is not accustomed until he has had training and experience. The tractors of which the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) speaks were exhibited last year at all the ploughing matches in the country. They were all of American manufacture. The tariff at the present time as against American machines is 20 per cent and 7½ per cent, or 27½ per cent. The machines that were exhibited and were put into use last fall, these American machines, were very light and capable, with engines able to draw two or three ploughs. I saw them working in two or three instances and know that they did excellent work and could be used on the ordinary farm at least in central and western Ontario. I think it would be a material advantage to the people of Ontario, and, perhaps, to other parts of the country if this change in the tariff were made. I leave my hon. friends to speak for the West, but it would certainly be of material advantage to us if the duty were taken off. A duty of 27½ per cent is very high; it is altogether unnecessarily high. I do not know of any manufacture that requires a duty of 27½ per cent to do business in this country. The minister is quite right in saying that if an article is manufactured in Canada and the duty is taken off the finished article the duty should also be removed from the raw material entering into its production. But for the benefit of the farmer and of the community at large, it would be wise for the minister to remove the duty from light tractors used for ploughing purposes, and I hope he will give this matter serious consideration. I am sure that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) will be willing to amend his resolution to conform to that suggestion.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): It seems to me that when so much has been said by the Government in connection with greater production, this matter deserves serious consideration. A campaign is being carried on all over Canada to-day, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, calling on the farmers to produce more foodstuffs, and there is absolutely no question that the world's supply of food is now at a lower ebb than it has been for many, many years. It was stated last week by an authority engaged in compiling figures relating to this matter that during the present year the amount of wheat produced will be 310,000,000 bushels less than the different countries that use wheat as a food have been in the habit of importing yearly. In view of this shortage and of the necessity for all the production possible, it would seem to be a matter of common sense on the part of the Finance Minister and of the Government to help along production by granting the request made by the member for Kent. There is no use preaching production to a farmer if the conditions are not such that he can produce with advantage to himself. If you want to secure the greatest possible amount of production, the proper course is to make the way easy for the man who produces.

I am quite sure that the tractors that the member for Kent wishes to have put on the free list are quite different from the ones that the Minister of Finance spoke about. The traction engines that we have seen in the West by the hundreds are engines that can be used for a number of purposes, chiefly for running separators; they move from field to field by their own power and draw the separator and a wagon or two along with them. That is not the sort of engine that the member for Kent wants to have put on the free list. The engine to which he refers takes the place of six or eight horses. Hundreds of them are being used in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; they will do as much breaking as eight or nine horses. I know one firm in Winnipeg which has made a contract with a Minneapolis manufacturer for the purchase of several hundred of these tractors; they are being bought throughout the whole country. They retail at a rather high price, something like $1,650; but in the West they find that a tractor of that kind, notwithstanding the high cost of fuel oil, does the work cheaper and more quickly than it can be done by using horses, especially in breaking up the land. A number of these tractors, all from the United States, were exhibited at exhibitions last summer. I think I can reasonably assure the Finance Minister that the tractor engine referred to by the member for Kent is not manufactured for practical puposes in Canada. I believe, however that the manufacturers are taking the matter up, and it is probable that in a year or two they will have an engine on the market that will be all right. If these tractors were being manufactured in Canada, I feel certain that the Government of Ontario would have purchased them from Canadian manufacturers instead of going to the United States for them. The fact that they bought them in the United States is conclusive proof that they could not secure them in the province of Ontario.

If the duty upon these tractors were removed, one result would be a very much increased crop during the year 1918. I do not know that the removal of the duty would make much difference so far as the present year's crop is concerned. In another month the sowing season will be over, and those who have not obtained tractors would hardly be able to secure them in time to use them advantageously between now and the end of the seeding. We have no certainty that the war will be over a year from now, but we do know that food is becoming very much scarcer in Britain. I see that the British Government have arranged with Mr. Henry Ford, the maker of the Ford automobile, to send specifications of his tractor engine to Britain. The British Government will then have these tractors manufactured in Great Britain and used to plough up the parks and vacant lots throughout the British Isles in order to secure the cultivation of a largely increased acreage. If it is necessary for the British Government to take such drastic steps as these in order to increase their own food supply, it seems to me that it would be wise for this Parliament to do everything in its power to increase the supply of wheat, not only this year, but during next year as well. From all the information I have been able to get in the West, I understand that the acreage in wheat this year will be less than last year, on account of last fall being a bad season. Only a small amount of land was got ready for this spring, and while the total acreage in crop this year will not be less than last year, the acreage in wheat will be considerably less, that of flax, barley and oats being, perhaps, somewhat larger. We have to take it for granted that there will be a big demand for food next year, and it is not wise to wait until next year to prepare for the sowing of the 1918 crop. We have to begin to prepare now, and we can do no better than adopt the resolution of the member for Kent and have these tractors put on the free list. The wording of the resolution is, perhaps a little wide; it might be better to narrow it down and state more definitely just what kind of tractor is meant. If my hon. friend the member for Kent and the Minister of Finance get together, they can very soon arrange that.

I say again that if the Government wish to carry out the policy of more production they ought to adopt the suggestion made by the member for Kent and put these tractors on the free list. It would be a big help to the farmers not only of Ontario, but of the three prairie provinces as well, and the result would be a largely increased acreage during the season of 1918.

Mr. BLAIN: Will the member for Kent state the selling price of the tractor to which he refers?

Mr. McCOIG: Four of these tractors were brought into Chatham the other day, and the price of each, in round figures, was $1,150. That includes a plough which will turn three furrows.

Mr. BLAIN: Where is it manufactured?

Mr. McCOIG: In Chicago, by the International Harvester Company. It burns kerosene instead of gasolene.

Mr. LALOR: Is that laid down price including duty?

Mr. McCOIG: Yes, that includes the duty and the freight.

Mr. LALOR: What is the horse-power?

Mr. McCOIG: For that size, eight and sixteen: that is, eight on the draw and sixteen on the belt. It is a tractor that is used for ploughing, discing and cultivating, and the farmers also use it for grinding, or filling the silos in other seasons of the year.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): The figures that have just been given to us in answer to the questions asked by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) prove that it might be well for the Government to consider whether or not $1,140 is a very large expenditure for any farmer to incur for a tractor engine of the kind that the hon. member for West Kent has reference to, for farm purposes. The cry has been made here several times today and it has been repeated throughout the country that production is the one essential thing at the present time; that production is needed as a war measure. If production is needed as a war measure, I maintain that the lessening of the duty on those tractor engines should be entered into by the Government as a war measure. If the duty cannot be lessened, why can not some sort of a rebate be made? Why cannot the Government do something of its own accord to carry out its own policy of increased production? Why preach production and not help production? Why say: Produce for the sake of the mother country on account of the shortage in food which is becoming extreme, while at the same time the Government does not do everything possible to carry out the policy of production which it has enunciated. The Minister of Finance in one breath says: We never before needed revenue so much as we need it now; and in the next: Buy at home. If you reduce the duty, people will buy more of these engines and the minister will get more revenue than by putting an extreme duty on this article, and production will be increased. If the Government is honest in its professions for greater production, then it cannot better exemplify its honesty to the people of Canada and of the mother country than by giving every possible help it can, even as a war measure, to this very thing that it desires, viz., production. These things have to be taken into consideration in times which are as extreme as those we are living in. Perhaps home manufacture may be a little hurt, but surely everyone is willing to undergo some sacrifice for the sake of the one great cause which we are all trying to accomplish. If the revenue is going to be injured by the passing of the motion of the hon. member for West Kent, I would suggest to the Government and to the Minister of Finance in particular that a tax on excess war profits in the manufacture of munitions might make up some of the depreciation in the revenue. There are many ways in which we might increase the production, and if the Government is really anxious for production, the best thing it can do is to make it easy for the people to produce.

Mr. T. J. STEWART (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was not in the House when the mover of the resolution was speaking as I should like to have heard the arguments in favour of the duty being taken off tractor engines. I have had the privilege of handling tractor engines for a number of years, and I know what they cost in this country and in the United States very approximately. If the duty is taken off those tractor engines, the manufacturers in this country will not be able to exist, because the manufacturers in the United States, having a larger field in which to sell their goods, manufacture these engines in large numbers and consequently can produce them more cheaply than can manufacturers in this country. In the East not more than one or two farmers in a thousand use those tractors as the farms are too small. I have been through the West and tractors are used in the West a good deal; but I have not heard any complaint as to the duty on tractor engines, and I am quite convinced that if the duty is taken off the manufacturers in this country will not be able to compete. I know the Sawyer-Massey Company and the Waterhouse Company, but I am not aware that they have made a great deal of money during the years those duties have been in existence.

Mr. PARDEE: How many tractors do those companies produce in a year?

Mr. STEWART: I do not think the Sawyer-Massey would produce more than 32 or 35 altogether in a year. The market in this country is very limited for those engines; perhaps fifty or sixty are sold in the United States for one here.

Mr. PARDEE: Why does the Ontario Government go to the States?

Mr. STEWART: Nobody knows that. I know from the cost of the tractor engines manufactured in the United States that no Canadian firm is able to manufacture in competition with the United States manufacturers considering the large markets the latter have and the larger production compared with the production in Canada. If the duty is taken off, those Canadian manufacturers who have been in business for so many years, and who are able to produce sufficient to cope with the demand, will be crippled, so that I think the Government would be very foolish to take off the duty for the benefit of a few farmers when it would ruin the manufacturers who have built up a good trade.

Mr. McCOIG: My impression is that the hon. member for West Hamilton does not understand the situation. This is a clear case of many men standing up in Parliament and on public platforms who do not understand the real wants of the farmers. The tractors to which the hon. member refers are threshing machine tractors, which cost in the neighbourhood of four or five thousand dollars. The tractors to which I refer cost about $1,150. Let me cite the name of Mr. John Johnston, of the county of Kent, who purchased one last year. He had read the arguments put forth by different speakers on public platforms throughout the country in favour of greater production. He had one thousand dollars on hand and he said: "I am going out to comply with the request of the Government and buy a tractor engine; I am going to start ploughing to-morrow, and until it is too late to put in wheat I am going to sow every acre of my farm I can in wheat, to carry out the wish of the people of this country." He has two hundred or two hundred and fifty acres of land, and at the price of wheat to-day he will make enough to pay him back the price paid for the tractor. His brother, A. Johnston, took a tractor off the train at the city of Chatham last Monday, paying all the expenses amounting to $1,150, and he is going to try to produce all that is possible. Mr. Wm. McNeilage took one home last Monday also and paid $1,150 for it, and he is going to use it for the very purpose that the member on that side and on this side of the House are asking the farmers to do; that the preachers in every pulpit in the country are asking for; that is, for increased production. At the present time you cannot get the man-power or the horses to do the work that one of these tractor engines will do in the same time. The hon. member is not aware of the kind of tractor these are. There is no manufacturer in this country making this engine. The Minister of Agriculture, who has no doubt interested himself in this great question, possibly was at the Whitby Exposition last fall and must have seen a number of American tractor engines which were there and which all did the work to the entire satisfaction of the farmers. When we can get one of those tractors that will plough six acres in a day, that will disc and cultivate and fix ready for seeding ten acres a day; when it will take three men with two three-horse teams and one two-horse team to do the same amount of work. If these men know nothing about farm work they know that if they persist in their attitude they will kill the very thing we want in this country, namely, greater production. Let us get these implements in free now, that we may produce the food that is wanted so urgently, and then you can put as high a tariff on after the war as you like, and I will not object. Let the people who are anxious to do the work—not the arm-chair fellows who come around in vacation time and get in the way,—get the implements, and then we will have greater production. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) is the last man who should throw cold water on this scheme. He said the resolution introduced and carried through this House by the Minister of Finance to remove the tariff on tile draining machinery had been a detriment, rather than otherwise.

5 p.m.

Mr. WILCOX: I did not say that. I said that the farmers were paying a greater price for their tile draining now than before the duty was taken off.

Mr. McCOIG: The hon. gentleman said that on account of the duty being removed the farmers were now paying, 28 cents a rod instead of 25 cents. The hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Truax) in his bye election for this House when the campaign literature was being circulated, remembers very well that one of the things for which the Government claimed credit was the removal of the duty on ditchers. Surely the hon. member for North Essex is not going to repudiate the statement that was made in his party campaign literature circulated in the agricultural constituencies. This is not a personal matter with me, for I have already purchased a machine. I got one last fall, and there was such a demand for these machines at that time, that another man bought it from me for exactly what I paid for it. I got another one the other day. so that personally. I have nothing to gain, but it is of the men who are going to buy in the future that I am thinking. Many and many an acre of land will go into fall wheat this year if the Government will grant this request, and the machines will come in in greater numbers than carloads of four. Many of our farmers would buy the machines and do not only their own work, but their neighbours' as well, the neighbours possibly threshing for the man who is operating the tractor. If the Government will give the farmers this assistance our crop of wheat next fall will be doubled, instead of falling off 180,000,000 bushels, as it did in 1916. That is what we are all out for. We are not here for political capital all the time, and certainly not on this question. We ask the Government to grant this request because we believe it will assist in carrying out the demand that this Government is making upon our farmers from time to time. There are many other arguments which I could advance, but I will content myself with this quotation:—

> Allies require food above all from America. The Allies' greatest problem—and the one which you can best aid our allied cause by helping to solve—is that of food, which involves that of shipping.
> Please remember that there is no British food problem, no French food problem, nor Italian, nor Russian food problem. It is all one great question. At a recent allied conference the Allied Governments agreed to pool their food supplies.
> While England is not short of food, and probably could get along if she had only herself to consider, all is not well with France and Italy. Their food shortage is acute. It is growing more so.

Those are the words of the Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour. Surely when he comes from the old land with a message like that we should not hesitate a moment to pass this resolution, so that we may get the tractors in time for the spring seeding. If we delay for two or three weeks longer the machines will be of no use this season. I am pleased to amend the resolution at the request of the Finance Minister so that all tractors over 8, 16, 10, 20 horsepower be excluded.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The resolution as it stands includes tractor engines suitable for all kinds of farm work. If my hon. friend desires to narrow his resolution I should like him to give notice, so that I may look into it.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member rises to discuss the question before the House?

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I wish to answer a statement made by the hon. member in reference to myself.

[Mr. McCoig.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member rises to a point of order it is not proper for him to discuss the motion at this stage, because the debate has been closed by the member who moved the resolution.

Mr. STEWART: I do not know whether you call it a point of order or not, but he made a statement about myself that is not correct, and I wish to contradict him.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister wants a day or two to consider this resolution, I understand.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no doubt in my mind that it is not competent for the hon. member to amend his resolution except by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: We understand that. I just wanted the leader of the Government and myself to understand each other.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The resolution as it stands on the order paper is wider than is now proposed, and it would be negatived as far as the Government is concerned. If my hon. friend desires to put another resolution on the order paper covering his amended motion, it is open to him to do so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I see the point raised by the leader of the House. I have not consulted my hon. friend, but would the leader of the House assure us that within a reasonable time we shall have an opportunity to discuss the amended resolution?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend can discuss this and any other cognate question upon the Budget; the place where these questions should be discussed.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. McCoig.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

FREE TRANSPORTATION FOR PROVINCIAL LEGISLATORS.

Mr. G. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: As the Railway Act is under revision by a Special Committee of the House, this appears an opportune time to bring to the consideration of the House and of this committee the amendment proposed by this Bill. The purpose is to give to the members of the local Legislatures similar pass privileges to those enjoyed by members of this Parliament. It is not proposed to add any new burden to the railway companies, for it is the practice of railway companies to give passes to the members of the provincial legislatures. It may be of interest to the House to know under what circumstances section 343 of the Railway Act, which it is here proposed to amend, was passed. I am informed that in 1903 the late Senator Davis of Prince Albert, being then a member of this House, made some criticism of one of the railway companies, from which company he held a pass. The criticism was objectionable to the company, and they promptly withdrew the pass and so notified Mr. Davis. He spoke to the late Mr. Blair, who was then Minister of Railways, telling him of the circumstance. As the Railway Act was then under the consideration of Parliament, this section was put in so as to avoid the recurrence of such instances and to place members of Parliament on an independent footing with reference to the railways. This subject of passes has been and is a matter of discussion on public platforms. The fact that a member of the legislature holds a pass from a railway company becomes the subject of remark. To my mind, members of provincial legislatures are entitled to the same protection for their personal honour that members of this House are entitled to. The legislature of Nova Scotia has endeavoured to deal with the matter. In the Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1906, Chapter 25, section 3, the following is enacted:

> 234a. Every railway company shall furnish free transportation upon any of its trains for members of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, with their baggage, and also for such officers and servants as may be employed by the Governor in Council in business or work connected with the railways of the province, or any of them, with their baggage or equipment, and shall also when required haul free of charge any car provided for the Governor-in-Council.

Whether the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia has the power to pass such an Act affecting railways under the control of this Parliament is a matter I am not going to discuss. But I understand that the practice of the railways is to conform to this section and to issue passes to members of the legislature. The legislature has done all it could, at any rate, to put its members in a right light before the country. I am informed by leaders of the Opposition in two of the provinces that the passes which are issued to them by the railway companies cover transportation, not only within the province in which they reside, but also over the whole of their system. Perhaps when the matter is under consideration, it may be desirable to give them the same privileges which it is proposed by this Bill to give to members of Provincial Cabinets. The Bill, as it is presented, limits the passes of members of the legislature to transportation within the province in which they reside, while providing for passes to be given to members of Provincial Cabinets good throughout the whole of Canada.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): I cannot altogether agree with this Bill, and I would suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Railways without giving it the second reading. I think it is going rather further than we should go to compel railways to give transportation to all members of provincial legislatures. I understood the hon. member (Mr. McCraney) to say that the railways gave to members of the Nova Scotia legislature passes that are good over their entire systems. That is not the case so far as the Government railways are concerned. I think that on company railways also such passes are confined to the limits of the province except in the case of the ministers of the Crown.

Mr. McCRANEY: The minister is correct—members of the legislature are given transportation within the province in which they reside, but ministers of the Crown have passes good throughout the whole system. That is what this Bill provides.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has been found by the railway companies and also by the Minister of Railways in relation to government roads, that it is a reasonable courtesy to extend to the members of provincial legislatures practically the same privileges that by law are extended to members of Parliament.

It ought to be borne in mind that there is scarcely a railway system in Canada but owns roads as parts of its system which were very largely subsidized by the different provinces. The same remark would apply to the Intercolonial railway itself. The most valuable section of that road, the portion from St. John to the boundary line of Nova Scotia, was built at the expense of the province of New Brunswick, and it was handed over as an asset to the Government of Canada without the province of New Brunswick receiving one single dollar of the cost of that road. So it is with the Canadian Pacific. That road consists of a line from McAdam Junction to St. Andrews, from McAdam Junction to Woodstock, from St. John to McAdam Junction, and of the New Brunswick railway, built from a point opposite Fredericton up the St. John river to Edmunston in the county of Madawaska. These railways now form the entire Canadian Pacific Railway system in the province of New Brunswick and were constructed, or largely constructed at the expense of New Brunswick. To all these different lines the Dominion Government contributed very little compared with what was contributed by the province. I presume the same remark would apply to railways in all other sections of Canada. I doubt if you could pick out a single railway, or part of a railway system, in the Dominion of Canada which has not been constructed very largely through the assistance of the various provinces.

Why, on principle, should the public men in the different provinces be placed in any different position, as far the railway companies are concerned, from that which is occupied by the members of this Parliament? The reasons why, by law, railway companies are compelled to give passes to the different members is that there may be no favouritism, that in the discharge of his public duties no member of this Parliament shall feel that he is under any obligation to the railway companies which come here from time to time for the purpose of securing legislation. It is very desirable in the public interest that that should be so. It is very desirable that when a railway company comes to this Parliament no member should feel that he is enjoying any favour from that particular company; that the right and privilege of transportation that he has is a right and privilege conferred upon him by law, that he should be free and independent to discharge his duties to the public entirely without reference to the railway companies.

The same rule should be applied to the members of the provincial governments and legislatures. It is extremely desirable that they should be in the same free and independent position as members of this Parliament. But, it may be asked: Why should not that privilege be conferred upon them by legislation of the provincial legislatures? It could be done in their respective provinces if it were not for the fact that this Parliament for years has been—whether in the public interest or otherwise it is not necessary now to say—infringing upon the rights of the provinces. Time after time, session after session, it has been declared by this Parliament that certain railways should be brought under the exclusive legislation of the Dominion Parliament. It is provided that if any of these railways which have been incorporated, subsidized and largely built by the provinces, connects with the Intercolonial railway or the Canadian Pacific railway or any other line of railway which receives authority from the Dominion Parliament, ipso facto that railway comes under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament and the right of the provincial legislatures to impose any obligation upon it is thereby taken away because, by the legislation of this Parliament, it is taken entirely out of the control and placed beyond the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. That being so, I think there is every reason for placing members of the provincial legislatures in the same independent position as that in which members of this House have, by law, been placed.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): I was endeavouring to get the full import of the views expressed by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I think I succeeded to the extent of learning the principle upon which he understands the present enactment was inserted in the Railway Act, namely, that it being in the public interest that members of this House should be enabled to ascertain to the very best advantage the conditions in all parts of Canada, it was well that they should be free at all times to travel in the different parts of the country and that they should be free to do so under such legislation as would make it their right and not make it an obligation on their part to the railway companies. I do not purpose to argue it now. It might be that the logical extension of that principle would be to enable members of the provincial legislatures to travel within the borders of their provinces. But I cannot for the life of me understand how, by any extension of the principle we adopted in this House some years ago, it could be argued that that right should be extended to members of provincial legislatures to travel throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Whether, if this Act go no further than to enable members of the provincial legislatures to travel within the borders of their own province, it would then be acceptable, I would not care to say.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is as far as it does go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It appears to me that as a general principle the shorter our steps, and the less distance we go in that direction the better. Every one knows the abuses to which these rights, or alleged rights, are always put. But, at all events, the proposal, in its present form, does not appear to be one which should be adopted in principle, if the passage of the second reading would mean adoption in principle, because it goes further in my judgment than we can justify ourselves in going.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I read the Bill it is limited to the provinces. It says:

> and to members of the Executive Councils of the provinces of Canada, and within the provinces in which they reside, to members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of the provinces of Canada.

Except as to members of the Government, it is limited to the province; as to members of the Government it is broader.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see the significance of the conjunction in that event or even that it meets the objection that could be raised to the principle. At all events, I should not care to concede or extend the right further without the fullest consideration. I would suggest that, without adopting the principle of the Bill, it be referred to the committee to which all railway amendments are now referred.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That means, as I understand, the second reading without affirming the principle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Railways.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rather thought the Solicitor General meant—and I think that is what the Minister of Railways would do—to refer this to the special committee.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, to the Railway Committee of the House.

Mr. McCRANEY: I understand from the Solicitor General that it was a special committee to which he thought this Bill should be referred and not to the general Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. I moved the motion on the understanding that all amendments are being considered now by this special committee on railway matters, and I see by the public press that the Minister of Railways is inviting suggestions by letter and otherwise. That is the committee which should consider this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion was submitted by me in plain terms to the House and announced carried, and it is therefore too late to discuss it.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD.

On the motion of Hon. W. J. Roche, that the House do tomorrow resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed Resolution:—

Resolved,—That it is expedient to establish a board, to be called "The Soldier Settlement Board," consisting of three commissioners, and to provide for salaries and expenses in connection therewith, and to empower the Minister of the Interior, at the request of the board, to reserve such Dominion lands as may be required, and upon the recommendation of the board, to grant a free entry for not more than one hundred and sixty acres of such reserved lands to any person who has served in the naval or military expeditionary forces of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing British Dominions or Colonies, and who has left the forces with an honourable record or who has been honourably discharged, and the widow of any such person who died on active service, subject to such conditions as in the opinion of the Governor in Council are necessary to secure the use of the land for the purposes for which it is granted; and further to provide that the board may loan, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, to any such settler an amount not exceeding two thousand dollars for acquiring land for agricultural purposes, payment of encumbrances on lands used for agricultural purposes, improvement of agricultural lands, erection of farm buildings and purchase of stock, machinery and equipment, the money to be expended under the supervision of the board, and all expenditure made under the terms of this resolution to be paid out of such moneys as Parliament may appropriate for the purpose.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is distribution of the land to returned soldiers to be limited to those of Canadian origin?

Mr. ROCHE: Oh no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It will include those from all parts of the Empire?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is unlimited?

[Mr. McCraney.]

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair

Civil Government—Department of Labour, salaries, etc., $54,137.50.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are there any new officers in the department?

Mr. CROTHERS: There appears to be one more. The number last year was 39; this year it is 40. There are 5 instead of 4 officials in subdivision A of the third division this year. I understand that one of these positions is vacant. The amount of this vote last year was $54,012; this year it is $54,137.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have any returned soldiers been taken into the department?

Mr. CROTHERS: One at least.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have all employees been appointed under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think not; we have some temporary employees.

Mr. VERVILLE: It was reported in the press some time ago that Mr. Brown, Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour had been suspended or dismissed from the department. I should like to ask the minister whether he is still in the employ of the department, and why he was suspended?

Mr. CROTHERS: The office of Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour has been abolished.

Mr. TURRIFF: On what date?

Mr. CROTHERS: Just a day or two ago.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is since Mr. Brown was abolished.

Mr. CROTHERS: Since he was suspended.

Mr. VERVILLLE: It is quite a while since I saw that report in the press.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister took him from the office, not the office from him.

Mr. CROTHERS: The office was abolished and his services are to be discontinued from June 1.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do I understand that his services are to be discontinued from the 1st of June and that the office was abolished a couple of days ago?

Mr. CROTHERS: It is all in the same Order in Council.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the minister tell us why this was done?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no objection to telling you why, but in the absence of the person who is directly interested, I am reluctant to say anything concerning this matter. I do not like to speak disparagingly of one who has no opportunity of saying anything by way of explanation, or defence, or mitigation. I suppose it is so in all cases where the person concerned is not a member of this House; whatever you have to say touching a matter of this kind has to be said in his absence, and he, therefore, has no opportunity of saying anything by way of explanation. Speaking sincerely, I would prefer not to say anything about it; but my hon. friends are, of course, entitled to ask the reason and to get it.

Mr. VERVILLE: I would like to know why.

Mr. CROTHERS: The immediate cause of his suspension arose in this way: on a Saturday evening in the latter part of February he applied to the deputy minister for leave of absence for a few days. As the matter of his absence had been up at least on one occasion before, the deputy referred him to me. Mr. Brown telephoned me to say his wife was leaving the city on Monday and that he would like to have three or four days off. I said, "all right; take three or four days." Well, he took all that week and three days of the next week, and when he returned he did not say anything about it, make any explanation, apology, or anything else. I, therefore, gave him notice of suspension. The facts are that for a long time he had not been satisfactorily discharging the duties of his office. He appeared to be obsessed with a grossly exaggerated conception of the importance of a civil servant in the first division. He used to do things without saying anything about them, a thing which I think a man in his position should not have done. He used to do things that he was distinctly told not to do, and he would criticise the way in which the Department of Labour was administered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He was justified in that.

Mr. CROTHERS: The department may not be managed properly; it may be very inefficiently administered; but it appeared to me it was no part of the duty of an assistant deputy minister to criticise the way in which the department was administered. I do not think he was competent to discharge the duties of his office; I think he was incompetent; I think he was insubordinate, and he was disloyal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In what sense was he disloyal?

Mr. CROTHERS: In the sense that he was not loyal to the head of the department.

Mr. VERVILLE: I suppose the same thing will apply in any of the other departments, that if an employee asks leave of absence for a certain length of time, and stays away three or four or five times longer than he is permitted, he will be suspended?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know what action the other ministers would take in a case of that kind.

Mr. VERVILLE: I am not asking the minister to tell me whether that course of action will apply or not; but I say for the benefit of the other ministers that there are men employed in the other departments who have asked for leave of absence for a very short space of time who have travelled all through the West for four or five months.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not had very much experience in any other department; but I have acted in a few of the other departments in the absence of the ministers, and I remember distinctly deputies coming in and apologizing for being away half a day, and giving reasons for their absence; such as sickness in the family or something of that sort, and, of course, nothing more was said about the matter. In this case, however, no effort at all was made to explain or apologize.

Mr. VERVILLE: It was not a question of apology; it was a question of whether or not he was competent to fill the position.

Mr. CROTHERS: I gave incompetency as one reason; there are several others.

Mr. TURRIFF: Apparently the reason given is that this official took two or three days longer leave of absence than he had asked for, and because on his return he did not come to the minister and apologize, the minister first suspended him and then fired him, and now the minister brings in a further excuse that the official was not competent anyway. If the assistant deputy minister was not competent, it has taken the minister five years to find that out. He was not suspended or dismissed for incompetency; but simply because he did not apologize to the minister for being two or three days over his leave he was fired.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know whether my hon. friend knows better than I why he was fired. I have told the committee why his services were dispensed with. My hon. friend is probably right, that his services should have been dispensed with five years ago; I know that I spoke about it several years ago. I may add that he has not received any statutory increase of salary for three or four years because he had not, in my judgment, efficiently discharged the duties of his office.

Mr. VERVILLE: Will the minister give us a little explanation about this item of $15,000 for sundries? I am not saying it should not be inserted in the Estimates, but I would like some explanation.

Mr. CROTHERS: This item comprises three items: extra clerical and other assistance, $1,000; printing and stationery, $7,000; sundries, $7,000. This includes stationery and printing other than the Labour Gazette, travelling expenses for officers resident at Ottawa, postage, clerical assistance, clerical help, etc.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister given all the reasons that prompted him to dispense with the services of Mr. Brown?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think those I gave would cover them. I have not gone into all the details.

Mr. MACDONALD: Either they do cover them, or they do not.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think they cover them.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister should tell us in what respect Mr. Brown was incompetent and also in what particular respect he was disloyal. I know nothing about Mr. Brown except that he was always regarded by the public as an efficient officer; but if a man is said by a minister of the Crown to be incompetent and disloyal, those general words ought to be particularized, and definite instances given in which the incompetency has arisen and the disloyalty become apparent. It is very easy to use those words in a general sense and they carry meanings which are very broad. Mr. Brown is a journalist; I remember when he was in the press gallery here, and while he was in the department, as far as competency is concerned, his intelligence and capacity ought to have made him competent for the office. Therefore, if the minister says he is incompetent, I ask: Wherein is he incompetent? The same applies to the question of his disloyalty. It is only fair that we should know these things.

Mr. CROTHERS: As my hon. friend from Pictou has said, when Mr. Brown was appointed to a position in the Department of Labour, he had been a newspaper reporter of some experience, but no distinction. He was appointed to the position without any examination whatever, under the provisions of section 21 of the Civil Service Amendment Act, the Civil Service Commission after profound deliberation for three months gravely certified that the duties of this office called for qualifications of a professional and technical character. As hon. gentlemen will remember, under section 21 of the Civil Service Amendment Act, a man may be appointed without any examination whatever when it is certified by the Civil Service Commission that the duties of the office call for qualifications of a professional, technical or otherwise peculiar character, and in this case such a certificate was given. If a university graduate were to apply for a position carrying a salary of $500 a year, he or she would have to pass an examination; but under this certificate, issued by the Civil Service Commission in this case, this man was appointed at a salary of $2,800 a year to advance to $4,000 by annual increments of $100. That is a little device that is sometimes adopted to foist into the service one who cannot get in by the regular route.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the present Government knows more about that than anybody else.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think you will find any men of that kind in the Labour Department.

Mr. GRAHAM: I guess the other ministers are pretty bad, then.

Mr. CROTHERS: In answer to my hon. friend from Pictou, I would say that I have had many complaints both from employers and employees of the manner in which Mr. Brown discharged the duties of his office. I remember on one occasion he went down to New York at the public expense without saying a word to me that he was going, and he did not even condescend to make any report when he came back as to the reason for his visit. I could also give instances where he has criticised the management of the department behind my back. There have been occasions when I have told him that we did not require certain things, and months afterwards I have found out that he had got them. I have on other occasions distinctly told him to do certain things which he did not do. I have no desire to go into these details, but hon. gentlemen have a right to ask for them, and I have a right to give them. It is not a pleasant thing to dismiss a man from office if he is discharging his duties fairly and efficiently, but, as I said before, Mr. Brown seemed to be obsessed by a grossly exaggerated conception of the responsibilities and importance of a civil servant in the first division.

Mr. VERVILLE: I should have thought that the Minister of Labour would have acquired a sufficient amount of knowledge in the last five years to know the kind of man he needs in the department. The minister has been speaking of technical men. I think in a department like his it would be better if there was less technicality and more common sense. I am not referring to this Government particularly, for that is what I have always said. Until you get practical men in the Department of Labour you will never make it a success.

Mr. CROTHERS: We have them there now.

Mr. VERVILLE: In inferior positions, carrying parcels and such like. That is the only kind of practical men you have in the department. The minister might say that the fair wages officers are practical men. Why, it is only two years ago that he appointed one in Winnipeg who did not know who was the head of the labour movement there; he was not a practical man. The only men who should be appointed as fair wage officers are men of practical experience who have come in contact with the different labour elements throughout the country. Surely there are men in this country with common sense enough and practical experience to fill the position that has been made vacant by Mr. Brown's dismissal. I am sorry to hear the minister say that he is going to abolish this position. With all due respect for the minister and the deputy minister, I say there is a practical side to the department that nobody seems to know anything about.

Mr. CROTHERS: Which side is that?

Mr. GRAHAM: The inside.

Mr. VERVILLE: Everything pertaining to the department. It would not be fair to expect the minister or his deputy to have all the practical knowledge that is necessary. A professional man cannot have that knowledge. But my point is that if practical labour men were appointed to high positions in the department, they would be able to render a great service to the minister and the country.

Mr. CROTHERS: When I took charge of the Labour Department, the two fair wage officers were Mr. McNiven and Mr. Dubreuil. Mr. McNiven was transferred within a few months to Vancouver. He is a man with a great deal of experience and strong common sense, and has discharged the duties of his office for the past five years with perfect satisfaction to me. Speaking from memory, I do not think I have ever had a complaint against him or his work. He has settled scores of disputes which would have ripened into serious trouble but for his presence on the ground at Vancouver. I have unbounded confidence in him. Not long after I was placed in charge of the department, I recommended that he be given an increase in salary, because I thought he was worth more than he was getting. Mr. Dubreuil was also a first class man, who looked after the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. He spoke both English and French fluently and did his work well and I increased his salary because I did not think I could get another man to do the work as well as he, and we were likely to lose him if he did not get an increase. I was very sorry, indeed, when he was taken away. The gentleman at Winnipeg that my hon. friend has referred to served us faithfully there for about three years, and did a great deal of extra work in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway, over which he went two or three times to see that the men constructing the road were being treated properly. He looked after his territory to the satisfaction of every one, and I never had a complaint against him. Unfortunately, his health failed him about a year ago, and he was obliged to resign his position. I have two or three other men who have not had as much experience as Mr. McNiven or Mr. Dubreuil, but who are discharging their duties efficiently. The only complaint I remember in connection with a fair wage officer was that a man whom I had appointed myself had not fixed the wage schedule fairly on some public work. I sent another man to the works and he came to the conclusion that the first man had not put the wages as high as they should have been, and the schedule was changed accordingly. That is the only complaint I can remember that has been made against any fair wage officer in the last five years. My hon. friend wants us to have practical men. I think we already have practical men in the department.

Mr. VERVILLE: In the inside service?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. VERVILLE: Name them.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have now in the department one of the officers who was there when I took charge.

Mr. VERVILLE: There were two.

Mr. CROTHERS: None have been dismissed. Not a single Liberal has been dismissed from my department since I was placed in charge of it. And when I took charge there was only one Liberal-Conservative in the department, and he had been appointed prior to 1896 and has since been superannuated.

An hon. MEMBER: That applies to the Inside Service?

Mr. CROTHERS: Inside Service and Outside Service. I know the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers—the correspondents of the Labour Gazette. I have explained that to the House before, but perhaps it will bear repeating. When I was placed in charge of the department I asked for a list of all employees with particulars in each case showing name, age, salary, when appointed, the duties assigned, and how those duties were being discharged. This list was made up by one of the officers of the department, one who had always been a Liberal. Out of the seventy or so correspondents of the Labour Gazette throughout the whole country from Vancouver to Halifax, there were about five or six who were reported as not discharging their duties even fairly well. I gave word to have them dismissed. I did not know whether they were Liberals or Conservatives, and I don't know yet; nor do I care. Others were appointed in their places.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister will pardon me, I hope, if I return to the case of Mr. Brown. I hold no brief for Mr. Brown, but I think I was responsible for his appointment when Minister of Labour, and at that time I felt, and the Government felt, that a good appointment had been made. Mr. Brown had been for several years a journalist in Ottawa, the representative in the Press Gallery of the Montreal Witness, and he had taken a very promment position with relation to the Salvation Army in Ottawa. By all the people of Ottawa he was considered a very upright gentleman and quite capable of filling any position in the Civil Service. Now, the word "disloyal" which the minister has used carries with it an imputation of meanness which I cannot believe to be attachable to Mr. Brown; he is the very opposite of a disloyal officer, in my judgment. The minister says that Mr. Brown had, perhaps, too high a conception of his position and his duties. That is quite a human failing, and perhaps Mr. Brown may have it. He may have throught that at times things were not done according to the ethics of the department. But let the minister put himself in Mr. Brown's position. If he were assistant deputy minister of the department and should differ with his minister on some matters of official duty, would he consider that a sufficient reason for the minister to dismiss him? Unless he can show that Mr. Brown was disloyal in having divulged the affairs of the department in a mean way, or in not fulfilling the duties of his office, surely he will not say that Mr. Brown should be put on the street. Mr. Brown occupied what I consider a very responsible position and was a respected member of the Civil Service. Surely, though he may have differed in opinion with the minister, or with the deputy minister, that is not a good reason for such action as the minister has taken. We are passing through a crisis which affects civil servants perhaps more than any other members of the community, and yet for petty reasons the hon. minister dismisses such a member of the Civil Service as Mr. Brown. I can assure the minister that Mr. Brown enjoys a very high reputation, and his dismissal will create in the minds of the people the belief that the minister had other reasons for this dismissal than those which he has stated this evening. I have had experience as a member of the Government, and I know that an officer may be fussy, capricious, or annoying to his fellow employees. But the man who holds the position of minister must be human and must be Christian. Surely, the fact that an officer differs with his superiors on unimportant questions is no reason for throwing that officer on the street. I appeal to the better instincts of the hon. minister and would ask him to reconsider his decision.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend does not attach the same meaning to the word "disloyalty" that I do. In using the word I did not refer to differences of opinion on questions of the policy or action of the department. Disloyalty includes such an act as going to others with criticisms of the department, or finding fault with the minister behind his back. It was such things I had in mind when I used the word. A difference of opinion is all right. My deputy may have a suggestion to make, and we talk it over. Perhaps his suggestion is adopted, or perhaps my view is adopted, but in making such a suggestion, the deputy minister is not only not disloyal, but he is performing his duty.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I fail to understand in what this alleged disloyalty consists. Can my hon friend establish that Mr. Brown gave away the secrets of the department, or struck his minister from behind, or wrote to the press against his minister? Such things, of course, I agree would be disloyal. But even to criticise the minister in his presence——

Mr. CROTHERS: No, not in my presence.

Mr. LEMIEUX: or with his fellow officers of the department as to a certain line of policy—

Mr. CROTHERS: No, outside of the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The duty of a minister of the Crown is not to accept only the advice of those who are always ready to abide by his decision, but to listen also to adverse criticisms. I remember that when I was appointed Postmaster General, I warned the deputy minister to speak boldly if he should differ with me on an appointment or on the policy of the department. The minister is not omniscient; he must take the advice, and believe in the common sense and loyalty, of those who surround him; and the best protection he has is sometimes the adverse criticism he receives from his officers. When I was in the Post Office Department there were scores of employees who had been there since Confederation and who consequently were not in sympathy with the head of the department. They were the very best of officers and I never had, during the six years I was there, occasion to dismiss one of these men. I would not have dismissed one of them for differing with me. I would be only too glad to accept their criticism in good spirit and to listen to their views whether I was prepared to accept their decision or not. Really, I do not think my hon. friend is doing justice to Mr. Brown. Mr. Brown enjoys a higher reputation than that given to him this evening by my hon. friend.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend will persist in talking about a set of circumstances that do not exist. He is too clear-headed a man to misunderstand what I said. When I speak of disloyalty,—and the sense in which I use the word is the proper sense in which to use it—he gets up and proceeds to lecture me as if I had refused to discuss matters with this officer and had therefore dismissed him because he disagreed with me. That is not the question at all and I think my hon. friend knows that it is not the question. He followed me when I spoke about criticising the department behind my back and outside of the department. That is what I call disloyalty and that is one of the things for which this officer was dismissed. Yet, my hon. friend presumes to discuss the matter as if I had dismissed him because he did not agree with me on everything. That is not the point at all and I think my hon. friend knows it is not the point.

Mr. BURNHAM: If, as a man in a way representing the taxpayers of this country, I may be allowed to make an observation, it is that the criticism of the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) would certainly be justified if one of the major officers of the department could go off to New York at the public expense, stay there as long as he pleased and come back without reporting. If that is the way the taxpayers' money of this country is to be expended, the Department of Labour had better be abolished. I cannot see any justification for such conduct.

Mr. KYTE: May I ask the Minister of Labour when he first made up his mind to abolish the office? He has intimated that he has abolished the office. I would like to know when he abolished that office.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not believe I could tell my hon. friend the exact day or week. I do not think an assistant deputy minister is necessary or desirable in that department. There never was an assistant deputy minister until this man was appointed.

Mr. KYTE: Will the minister say it is not his intention to appoint another officer to do the work done by Mr. Brown?

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I do not say that. I may recommend some one else but he will not be under the name or style of Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour.

Mr. KYTE: So that the minister is abolishing the office for the purpose of making it easier to abolish Mr. Brown?

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, no.

Mr. KYTE: Changing the name only. He admits that another appointment is to be made but he says that the officer will not be known as assistant deputy minister.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say that it would be made; I say it might be made.

Mr. KYTE: Will this new man who may be appointed have the same salary that Mr. Brown enjoyed?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was there any investigation before the dismissal of Mr. Brown? I ask this because I happen to know Mr. Brown; he was in a very high position and surely this cannot pass unnoticed. Was there an investigation as to the facts which gave rise to his dismissal?

Mr. CROTHERS: Does my hon. friend mean an investigation by any outside party or outside source?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, it was not necessary; I knew the facts myself.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The minister talks about the facts; I would like to know what the facts are.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is war time, and economy is necessary; at all events the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) told us this afternoon that the Cabinet needed money, and as, according to the minister, an assistant deputy minister is not necessary, I suppose the minister will move to reduce the vote by the amount intended for that officer and dispense with the services of anybody for that purpose this year?

Mr. VERVILLE: I do not quite agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend. This department has not any too much money to its credit so far. If the minister is going to appoint anybody else to do some of the work in the Labour Department. I would not ask the minister to drop the provision for that man this year, but I would ask him to pick out of the 7,000,000 people in the nine provinces, and God knows how many cities, a good, competent, practical labour man, and I do not care what his politics are. Politics makes no difference at all. Let that man try to help him in carrying on the work of his department.

Mr. GRAHAM: The vote is for the assistant deputy minister. The minister may not use it for anything else; so that he might as well drop it. If it is a vote for something else he had better put it under that designation. He cannot take a vote for one officer and give it to another.

Mr. CROTHERS: We do not put it under the name of the assistant deputy minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not the vote before me.

Mr. CROTHERS: There is a practice that obtains in the department, and has for many years—I do not know whether it will strike hon. members as being a reasonable one or not—but it is this: If a man is promoted from one position to another, the sum of money that he received in the lower position is voted next year and may be voted for ten years one after another although the position is not filled. The vote is taken every year and if it is thought wise at any time to appoint a man to the vacancy he is appointed and the money is there to pay him. Take the $3,000 item there, for instance; that was voted for Mr. Coats, who was then editor of the Labour Gazette. He was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce about two and a half years ago. The vote appeared there every year. It was there last year and was there this year, but it was not used. It may be thought necessary this year to appoint a man to the position covered by this vote, to do certain work in the Department. There are several vacancies, as I have explained. If a man is promoted or dies, the vote for his former position is carried on and there is a vacancy which may not be filled for two or three years. I do not know whether it is a good practice, but I found it and it has been continued, not only in my Department but in other departments.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are not economizing at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: It does not follow that this will be expended

Mr. MACDONALD: Why put the vote in if you are not going to expend it?

Mr. CROTHERS: We may want it.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister has explained that in his judgment the position of assistant deputy minister in the Labour Department is not necessary. Therefore it seems to me reasonable to say that the work that the assistant deputy minister is accomplishing could have been done in the department without having an assistant deputy.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think that follows at all.

Mr. TURRIFF: Now my hon. friend dismisses the assistant deputy and says that the position does not need to be filled and is abolished, that it is not necessary or advisable; and he proposes to put somebody in the assistant deputy minister's place, perhaps not under the same title but under another title. I suppose the assistant deputy minister was not appointed as assistant deputy, at least his name does not appear under that title, but simply as a clerk in the First Division.

Mr. CROTHERS: He was appointed as assistant deputy.

Mr. TURRIFF: Therefore my hon. friend intends to replace Mr. Brown, though not calling the new official by the same name. He dismisses Mr. Brown, he abolishes the office; then, as he says, he proposes to appoint somebody else to the position.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say that.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend says practically that.

Mr. CROTHERS: I said I might.

Mr. TURRIFF: We know what that means under this Government, which is not noted for its economy. We know that when my hon. friend gets that vote through and says he may appoint some one to take that position, there will be enough hangers-on looking for jobs, and especially jobs at that salary, to make it certain that before very long my hon. friend will fill that position. Is it his intention to give Mr. Brown employment in any other capacity?

Mr. CROTHERS: It is not my intention at present.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has criticised the late Government for the appointment of Mr. Brown under section 21 of the Civil Service Act.

9 p.m.

It would take all night to discuss appointments under section 21 in the last three or four years. If he appoints another gentleman to do Mr. Brown's work, will it be under section 21 or through the Civil Service Commission direct by examination?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not able to tell my hon. friend that. When the time comes and it is thought necessary to put an additional man in the office, I will consider all these questions. We are not in a position now to say what we will do.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend admits that he will do just what he criticises the other Government for doing, and he will not commit himself to doing anything else.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend did not catch the point of my criticism. My point was that a certificate was given to the effect that the duties of this office required professional and technical knowledge. It is perfectly right, if you want a skilled engineer, to appoint him under section 21 as a technical officer, without examination.

Mr. GRAHAM: They never would allow me to do it in the Railway Department.

Mr. CROTHERS: But why it should be said that the duties of this particular office require qualifications of a professional or technical character is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then we may take it for granted that the minister's conclusion is that he would not appoint a new man under section 21, because, according to his interpretation of the Act, the qualifications for this office, as outlined by him, are not such as would make the person to be appointed eligible under section 21. Then it will be under the ordinary Civil Service system. I might say to the minister that he is wrong about engineers. Under the former Administration, when the Railway Department wanted an engineer I was not allowed to select a man, no matter what his technical knowledge was. We had to accept the man given to us by the Civil Service Commission after passing his examination, and the commission gave us good men; I am not objecting at all to the appointments. But the minister is wrong in thinking that the other departments by which he is surrounded—unless the Civil Service Commission has changed—are allowed to take even these technical men, unless under some very exceptional circumstances, without the ordinary Civil Service examination.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend is not familiar with section 21.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, yes he is, but he has not used it as much as the Minister of Labour has.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not used it at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I mean the Government.

Mr. CROTHERS: You cannot make an appointment under section 21 without a certificate from the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely; I know that.

Mr. CROTHERS: The deputy head of a department, with the approval of the head, may notify the commission that they require a civil servant with certain qualifications, and such an appointment may be made without any examination, because the section so provides. The Civil Service Commission determine whether or not the candidate has the qualifications. For instance, you ask for a graduate in a certain line, perhaps economics. The Civil Service Commission ascertain whether the applicant is a graduate of a recognized university. Then the candidate does not have to pass any examination. The matter has to go through the hands of the Civil Service Commission to that extent, but it is up to the commission to say whether the duties of the position call for qualifications of a professional and technical character.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I think I could make a fair proposition to the minister. If he can promise this committee that he will keep the place and the salary attached to it for a good returned soldier from the trenches, I think the committee will vote heartily the amount.

Mr. CROTHERS: I might say, for the information of my hon. friend, that an Order in Council was passed some time ago providing that all these positions should be filled by returned soldiers, if suitable men could be got; and I know I have followed that myself and I think all other departments are following it as closely as possible. Sometimes you cannot find a returned soldier to fill a certain position. But I have refused this last two weeks dozens of applicants for positions by telling them that an Order in Council requires that positions be filled by returned soldiers and that if we cannot find one now for any position we must leave the position open until we do find one. That is the policy of the Government under that order.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister has read, I suppose, of a gentleman in Toronto who claims that, althought a returned soldier, he was sent to the patronage committee of the Conservative party in Toronto to get their recommendation.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not live in Toronto.

Mr. GRAHAM: That occurred, all the same.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the custom of the department to fill all positions of this kind by promotion in the department? That would be a sound policy and one which the minister would find to produce efficiency in his department. Even if a returned soldier should be available, it might be that he would perhaps fit in lower down, and that promotions might be made within the department to fill positions requiring considerable training. I would think that if positions of that kind could be filled by promotion from among the men in this own department it would tend to efficiency and be an encouragement to better work within the department.

One of the criticisms of this Government has been that in several of the departments employees have not been promoted as rapidly as they should. As to the Department of Railways, almost disastrous results occurred in the province of Nova Scotia by reason of the fact that promotions were not made within the ranks of the officials of the department. I hope that the Minister of Labour will take a hint from the fact that the Minister of Railways was chastised and brought to his milk, as the saying goes, by some of the criticisms which were made in the province of Nova Scotia, and, if he has suitable men in his own department made the necessary promotion from among them.

Mr. CROTHERS: For the benefit of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I may tell him that by several years we have anticipated his contention. In our department we have been doing the very things that he says we ought to do, that is, promoting men to higher positions as vacancies occur. Take the case of Mr. Coats, who was mentioned a moment ago. When he has transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce, another young man in the service was put in his place to do the work he had been doing, but at a very much smaller salary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the name of the officer?

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Stewart. Weekly or monthly we are promoting men from the lower positions to higher ones as vacancies occur. We always do that in our department.

Mr. MORPHY: In one respect I am forced to disagree with both the minister and the hon. member for North Cape Breton. When we are thinking about the returned soldier we ought to think along lines that will be conducive to his wellfare. If a man standing next for promotion in the Civil Service was within military age, physically fit and did not go to the front for his country, it would be monstrous to promote him, no matter what the length of his service might be, and thereby refrain from giving the position to a returned soldier who had done his bit and who was fit for the job.

Mr. GRAHAM: How many correspondents are there?

Mr. CROTHERS: About 70.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not easy to get good ones, is it?

Mr. CROTHERS: No, we do not pay enough.

Conciliation and Labour Act, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of the Labour Gazette, and allowance to correspondents, and for clerical assistance in preparing tables of statistics, $35,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What practical steps has the minister taken to deal with the problem of the high cost of living in Canada? I am aware that an Order in Council was passed in regard to the matter, and that Mr. O'Connor has been employed in that connection, but so far I have been unable to observe that in any part of Canada the Government have taken hold of this problem with any strength or vigour or in such way as to produce results. In Australia, where they have a War Measures Act similar to ours, the Government have taken vast powers and have regulated the cost of staple products which enter into the daily life of the citizens of the country. We have had nothing of that kind here, and I think the minister ought to tell us what he has tried to do, even though he has not succeeded in doing very much, to meet the paramount necessity which exists all over Canada, particularly among the labouring people, of dealing with the exorbitant cost of all the necessaries of life.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have a report in process of preparation, which will be ready in a few days, and which will go into particulars concerning the matter to which my hon. friend directs attention. However, I do not mind telling him, in a general way, what we have done. The Order in Council, a copy of which I have not at hand, is aimed at preventing restriction of trade, exorbitant prices, combines, and so on. For instance, it makes it obligatory for one who is in possession of articles of food, clothing or fuel—the Order in Council is confined to these three classes of goods—in amounts more than ordinarily necessary for his own use or for carrying on his business, to sell these goods at a fair and reasonable price. We took up the question of coal. We sent to every known coal dealer in Canada a number of questions which were very full and very searching. He was required to say where he bought the coal in the first place, what he paid for it at point of shipment, what the freight cost him, the cost of unloading and selling, and the amount of his overhead expenses. Satisfactory sworn returns were obtained from nearly all the coal dealers in Canada. It was necessary in some cases to communicate with the firms more than once, but in the end I think we got answers to all the questions which were asked. With one or two exceptions we were satisfied that no unreasonable profits were made by the retail dealers in coal. We got statements of prices, and so on, not only from them, but from other sources as well, and were enabled to compare the two, and with the exception of one place, I do not remember that any complaints were made that the people were being overcharged for their coal. Then we took up the price of sugar. We found that an agreement existed between the manufacturers and wholesale and retail men with regard to prices.

After some correspondence, some of these men came to see us, and in many cases, if not in all of them, the practice which we thought objectionable was discontinued. I know one refinery, for instance, that controlled the sale of sugar in two provinces, and only fifty-two men in the two provinces could buy sugar from that refinery, no one being able to purchase sugar from it unless he belonged to the association or complied with the conditions necessary to become a member of the association. We took the matter up; the attorneys general of the provinces consented that a prosecution should be taken against those men, the result being that they came down from their perch and discontinued this objectionable practice. We have investigated the cold storage business throughout the country; we have examined into the way in which collieries are conducted as to prices and all that sort of thing, and in a few days I will have ready a full report which I expect to placed upon the Table and which will set forth the details of what we have done in these various lines. Of course, the great majority of the people of this country understand the main factors in the rise of prices, although they are confidently told by those who have an object in view that there are other causes. It is probably safe to say that thirty million men, if not a good many more, have been withdrawn from productive work to engage in destructive work. It is said that those men consume at least fifty per cent more than they would if they were civilians. That gives us the equivalent of 45,000,000 men consuming foodstuffs and producing nothing, withdrawn from productive labour and engaged in destructive labour. Before the war broke out, there was just about enough food grown to cover the world's consumption; we had not to throw any surplus food into the ocean. Take 45,000,000 men from producing; set them to destroy life and property; take that, in connection with the fact that last year, with slight exceptions in certain places, crops were short the world over, and with all this destruction and waste going on lessening production, and you have the main factors causing the advance in prices. Some people tell us that the rise in prices is due to cold storage and combinations. I admit that in some cases those things have had a slight influence on prices, but the main factors are those I have stated. We are endeavouring under that Order in Council to offset so far as we can those influences that, to a slight extent, may affect prices, but on the whole the others are the main factors.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has in the course of his few remarks admitted that, although a condition has existed, he has done nothing to remedy it.

Mr. CROTHERS: He has not admitted anything of the kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will my hon. friend kindly restate what he has done?

Mr. CROTHERS: I thought I made myself perfectly clear. My hon. friend was not in the House at the time, I am told.

Mr PUGSLEY: The minister appointed some committees.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was in the House.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not think my hon. friend was here all the time.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend made an argument that because he made certain inquiries he had performed his duty.

Mr. CROTHERS: I said, if my hon. friend was here or if he was out of the House, that we had sent questionaires to all the coal dealers in Canada and that from reports which we had received under oath and from other information, we were satisfied that the coal dealers were not making any undue profits and that there were no combinations as to coal except in one or two places.

Mr. MACDONALD: I heard all that.

Mr. CROTHERS: Then why does my hon friend say that I have done nothing? We have done the same thing in regard to sugar, cold storage, etc.

Mr. MACDONALD: What my hon. friend has said means that he considers there is no duty thrown upon him or upon the Government to deal with the whole question of the food supply of this country in some drastic and imperative manner. Why did my hon. friend proceed under the War Measures Act and have an Order in Council passed giving him plenary powers, if the powers he was going to take simply consisted in the power to investigate matters by asking certain people certain questions? Does my hon. friend mean to say that this Government could not have taken, under the War Measures Act, powers of such a nature that they would be enabled to deal with problems of this kind and fix the cost of staple articles at figures within the reach of the ordinary individual? In this country we produce approximately 200,000,000 bushels of grain, whereas Canada consumes only 50,000,000 at the most. Does my hon. friend mean to say that there are no means that he or his associates in the Government could have devised by which the people of this country could have received the bread they require at some figure within reason, considering that we produce in this country four times what we consume and that we have such a huge surplus for export abroad?

Mr. BURNHAM: Free wheat will have that effect.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not intend to pay any attention to my hon. friend who dreams about things. The situation shows that in regard to this matter the minister apparently thought his duty was ended when he asked certain questions of certain people. He asked one sugar man as to whether he had a combination with any other brother sugar man in regard to the prices they were to charge, and he found there was a combination, but he said that it faded away. Then he said that the retail coal dealers were not asking exorbitant prices for their coal. Did it never occur to my hon. friend that it was his duty and that of his colleagues in the Government much earlier in this war to allocate to their respective duties in this country those people who were engaged in performing definite services for the country? So far as coal is concerned, my hon. friend and his colleagues permitted recruiting sergeants to proceed into all of the coal mining districts of this country and take away from those coal mines the expert operators and the men who were able to produce that necessary and essential article which enters into the household life of every one in this northern country. They allowed recruiting to go on without paying any attention to the proper distribution of labour or the necessity of utilizing for the defence of the country those people who should go to the front. My hon. friend was a member of the Government which allowed 50,000 men to go to England who ought never to have gone there because they were medically unfit to fight. whereas had the Government paid any attention to looking after the national duty that each citizen of this country should have discharged, those men could have remained in peaceful occupation and assisted in the production of those articles that are essential to the well-being of the people. When my hon. friend tells the people that he has performed his duty by asking certain questions of certain people, and stopping there, his answer is not an efficient one and will not be so regarded. My hon. friend thinks his task is all performed; that there is nothing left for him to do. That is my hon. friend's position in regard to the matter. My hon. friend had an Order in Council passed. Occasionally we see these Orders in Council that are passed; there is a regular bureau of a political nature run by this Government under which announcements are made to the country through the Conservative press, but the last institution that this Government seems to think it necessary to consult respecting the interest of this country is this Parliament. We come down here after Parliament has sat for two or three months and have to request the Government to bring down and place upon the Table important Orders in Council which they ought to bring down of their own volition. My hon. friend has thrown upon the municipalities the task of enforcing this Order in Council, which they have passed under the War Measures Act, an Act which gave the Government wider powers than have been taken by any other Government engaged in the war. Suppose my hon. friend saw fit to pass an Order in Council dealing with the question of recruiting, would not the whole country stand aghast if he left its enforcement to the municipal authorities? And yet that is what he did in regard to this question of the high cost of living, which, next to the task of winning the war, is daily becoming the most vital problem we have to solve. But my hon. friend thinks that he and his Government have performed their full duty when they have asked certain questions, and put up to a municipal body the responsibility of enforcing these provisions. I had expected that my hon. friend would tell the House that he had at least attempted to grapple with this question, but all he tells us is that he has satisfied himself that the retail coal dealers are not asking too much for coal; that the sugar combine faded away when he peered into it, and that he talked to some tannery about the cost of making leather. If my hon. friend thinks that that is doing his full duty to the people of this country under war conditions, I must tell him that he occupies a very ridiculous position before the people.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am afraid my hon. friend has never read the Order in Council. I will send him a copy of it to-morrow. My hon. friend is confusing matters. He started by accusing the Labour Department of not having done anything under this Order in Council, and he wound up by blaming the department for some recruiting that was done at the mines.

Mr. MACDONALD: I blame the whole Government for that. This question is too serious to quibble over. I pointed out that the whole trouble arose from the fact that the Government had not systematically allocated to the citizens of this country the various duties they should perform with a view to the winning of the war, that whilst it was desirable men should be recruited it was also necessary that work like coal mining should be carried on, that the Government had had no plan at all, and that hundreds of men had been allowed to go to the front who ought never to have left this country. In England, coal miners are exempt from military service; in fact, thousands were brought back from the front to work in the mines in England. Through the lack of system on the part of this Government the price of coal has gone up, owing to the scarcity of labour to work the mines. My hon. friend and this Government should have done what the Government of England did; told the men who were supplying the fuel of the people that they were performing a national service. The Government ought to have known that when they permitted recruiting officers to go amongst these hardy and adventurous men, inducing them to enlist, they were creating a situation under which the price of coal was bound to go up and contribute to the high cost of living in this country.

Mr. CROTHERS: The remarks of my hon. friend show that he does not know what was done with regard to recruiting, either. He is talking without knowledge.

Mr. MACDONALD: That statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. CROTHERS: It just shows that my hon. friend does not know what he is talking about. Let us confine ourselves for a moment to this Order in Council; we will come to the other matter later. My hon. friend says that we have left the enforcement of this law to the various municipalities. There is no truth in that so far as I know. I don't think he has read the Order in Council, and I will send him a copy tomorrow. When he reads it, he will see that the matter is not left to the municipalities altogether.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is left to them?

Mr. CROTHERS: It is left to them to ask such questions as the Minister of Labour might ask touching matters within their own municipality, and if they find out that anything is being done in their municipality in contravention of the law they can proceed to prosecute.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is not that leaving it to them?

Mr. CROTHERS: Would you have this Government inquiring into the cost of milk in Nanaimo, for instance, or on Vancouver Island?

Mr. KYTE: They do it in Australia.

Mr. CROTHERS: They do many things in Australia that we do not do here.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: They do many things there that we ought to do here—build ships for instance.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend talks a great deal about shipbuilding and Australia is often mentioned. I do not want to say anything derogatory of Australia, but just take this point. It is said that Australia manages labour unions and strikes a great deal better than we do in Canada. Well last year, with their population of 5,000,000 they had 300 strikes, and with our population of 8,000,000 we had only 75, so Australia has got ahead of us in that regard. The government thought it right to empower the municipalities to inquire into conditions in their own municipality, and if the questions asked are not answered according to the Order in Council the municipal authorities may proceed against a delinquent, with the consent of the attorney general of the province. My hon. friend must remember that the Labour Department has to do not only with conditions in one municipality but with matters that effect the country as a whole.

Mr. MACDONALD: What have you done?

Mr. CROTHERS: Does my hon. friend want me to tell him three or four times?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the Minister could more easily tell us what he has not done.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, because it is so little. What have we done in regard to sugar and coal? We have sent out questionaires to all the coal dealers in Canada and have received replies under oath, and have checked them up to see whether they were correct.

Mr. KYTE: Has that reduced the cost of these commodities?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am told that it has, in some places. The prices are not so high here as elsewhere. We have also sent out questionaires to the sugar dealers all over the country, and have received replies under oath. Some of them were not satisfactory, and we repeated our questions. We have also investigated the question of bread.

Mr. MACDONALD: You did not say that before.

Mr. CROTHERS: I mention it now, as bread is very important. As I was saying, the Order in Council provides that no prosecution shall be held without the consent of the attorney general of the province.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you put that in?

Mr. CROTHERS: For the same reason that you put it in the Lord's Day Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the reason?

Mr. CROTHERS: When you were passing the Lord's Day Act you left it to the discretion of the attorney general of the province whether there should be any prosecution. We thought that principle a very good one, and applied it in this case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In order to prevent prosecutions.

Mr. CROTHERS: If the replies to the questions indicate that there has been a contravention of the law, we send the evidence to the attorney general of the province, pointing out that we think there has been a contravention of the Order in Council, and it is then up to him to prosecute if he thinks fit.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend think that in passing an Order in Council under the War Measures Act, one of the most plenary Acts ever put on the Statute Book, the Government has fulfilled its duty when it turns over the responsibility of enforcing the law to the provincial and municipal authorities?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend is wandering again. If my hon. friend thinks that anything wrong has been done under this Order in Council, it is his privilege and right to criticise it in this House, but it is not proper for him to say to me, in discussing this Order in Council, that I should have seen that no recruiting was allowed at a certain mine. That has nothing to do with this Order in Council. But I may tell my hon. friend for his information—for he does not appear to know it—that long, long ago instructions were given to the recruiting officers not to recruit men in these mines, on the ground that these men were needed for carrying on mining. And the recruiting ceased. So, it will be seen, we have anticipated some of these things.

Mr. KYTE: How long ago?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not remember.

Mr. MACDONALD: Now that my hon. friend has delivered himself of his wonderful knowledge, I desire to pay a tribute of admiration to the gigantic brain that has been working so ponderously on this question of the cost of living. The hon. gentleman said I was incorrect in saying that he had cast the responsibility of this matter upon the municipalities, and then he went on to prove very completely that what I had said was true. He told us the powers given to the municipalities, and declared his opinion that the Government had fulfilled its duty by declaring that the responsibility of carrying out this order under the War Measures Act should rest upon the Attorneys General of the provinces. If that is the way this Government has taken of exercising the powers given it by this Parliament under the War Measures Act at the inception of the war, it is time this Parliament reviewed the War Measures Act and the provisions made under it. As to the constitutional point involved in this reference to the municipalities, there is not a man sitting behind the hon. minister who is acquainted with legal or constitutional matters who will say that this Government is justified under the provisions of the War Measures Act in getting rid of its responsibility for the enforcement of any part of this law by attempting to throw that responsibility upon some other body. As to this question of recruiting coal miners, the hon. minister's knowledge is singularly limited. He has told us that in November last orders were given that there should be no more recruiting in the coal mines. That is to say, two years and three months after the war began, for the first time the Government interfered—

Mr. CROTHERS: No, long before that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let me tell the hon. gentleman for his information—and I come from a coal-mining country and know whereof I speak—that the recruiting officers of this Government have been active right along, and are active at this moment, in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, recruiting men for the war. Shall we say that they are ignoring the instructions that were given them? That is only another way of saying that the Government have never dealt practically with the question of arranging to have proper National Service, for the organizing of bodies of men to work as well as bodies of men to fight. The responsibility for the increased cost of living, which is already severely felt by the people of this country, will be placed upon the shoulders of the hon. minister and his associates because of their absolute failure to deal with the question.

Mr. BURNHAM: One statement was made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), which, as it appears in cold type, will look very badly and will give a wrong impression. He said that fifty thousand men had been sent overseas who were returned and should never have been sent.

Mr. MACDONALD: I said that according to the evidence submitted to members of this House, fifty thousand men, medically unfit, had been recruited and sent across.

Mr. BURNHAM: That gives a wrong impression. The hon. gentleman must know that the Army Act and the K.R. & O. allow men to misstate their ages. A man, on his attestation, may make a solemn declaration that he is forty-four years of age, when in fact he is fifty-four, without incurring any penalty. A great many men, in mistaken zeal, thought they could get away with that, and stated that they were forty-four, and so came within the required age, and so got across. But when they were pressed for an accurate statement, they had to admit that they were of a greater age, and so they had to be returned to this country. This accounts for a large number of the fifty thousand. And they were admitted by reason of a flaw in the Army Act, and no power in the world, no minister of any nation could possibly have prevented it, because it is in all of the Army Acts. And why it is there, I do not know. Now, a word as to another point suggested by the hon. member. The Minister of Labour has been reproached with having allowed food prices to go up without taking proper steps to prevent it. The hon. gentleman is one of those who have been pressing for free wheat on the ground that this change would send up the prices. At one moment the hon. gentleman is for limiting the prices that have gone up, and at another he is for taking steps to cause prices to go up. Which is it to be? We do not wish to go to the people with two horns of the dilemma—one is surely bad enough. Let us know which it is to be.

Mr. KYTE: I am sure that those who read the statements of the Minister of Labour here to-night will be disappointed to find that, when he was requested to give full explanation of the results of the operations of his department with regard to the cost of living, no results were forthcoming. He did state that questions were sent out as to the cost of certain commodities, but he was unable to point out that his activity resulted in reducing the cost of living by one iota. We had a complaint in Montreal a few months ago because potatoes were selling in that city at $3.50 a bag. The Minister of Labour made some inquiry and ascertained that, whereas the dealers in Montreal alleged that there was a great shortage of potatoes in Canada and that this was the reason why prices had gone up, the fact was that, over and above all the requirements for consumption and for seed for the forthcoming season, there was a surplus of two million bushels of potatoes in the Dominion. But the hon. minister did nothing, and potatoes are selling at $3.50 a bag, if not $4.00, in Montreal at this time. As to the price of flour, the hon. gentleman stated that the result of his inquiry was to show that no undue profits were being charged by those engaged in the production of this article.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say that.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. gentleman was speaking generally of articles of consumption, and stated that there was no evidence of undue profits being paid.

Mr. CROTHERS: No.

Mr. KYTE: Does the hon. gentleman think that when milling companies which were content to earn six or seven per cent before the war are now dividing profits among their shareholders at the rate of twenty-four per cent, that is not an undue profit for war times? The minister stated also that the high cost of these articles of food was due to the large number of men who were taken from the ranks of the producers and became consumers. But how is that to be reconciled with the statement made in the press the other day, that, as to the wheat in this country, over and above all that was needed for consumption and as seed for the coming season, there was not less than 116,000,000 bushels in the Dominion at this time? Besides that, the wheat now held by the millers, and for the flour produced from which they are charging enormous prices, was purchased by them from the farmers at from $1.20 to $1.40 a bushel? The farmers received no benefit, the speculators got it all, and they have been dividing enormous profits at the very time when the minister tells us that no undue prices were being charged. Read the trade journals from day to day and you will find that companies engaged in the manufacture of food products are dividing among their shareholders much larger profits than those they made before the war. Companies that were content with five, six, or seven per cent before the war, are almost invariably paying dividends of from fifteen to thirty per cent. Yet the Minister of Labour says there is no undue profit enjoyed by those engaged in the production of these particular commodities. How is the consumer affected? To-day flour is quoted at $12.70 by the car load. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) had something to say about putting wheat on the free list. At the time that the agitation for putting wheat on the free list was most acute the farmer might very well have looked for increased prices for the wheat which he had raised and it was a time when the consumer could afford to pay a little more for his supply. But they dawdled along for five years, until the price of flour got beyond the reach of the average consumer in Canada, and then they took the duty off to enable the speculator to create a panic and put $1.20 on the price of flour. That is the result of the hon. gentleman's activity on behalf of the consumer. There is not a commodity that enters into general consumption that has not been enhanced beyond all proportion to the exigencies of the times unless you take into account the greed of those engaged in the manufacture of these products. The minister had an opportunity to-night to state wherein his activities had resulted in reducing the cost of living with regard to one commodity to the consumers of this country, but he has failed to do so. He has said that these commodities are dearer elsewhere than here. It is quite true that in Germany, and in Berlin they are, but with that exception food prices in Canada are dearer than they are in any part of the civilized world.

Mr. CROTHERS: The prices in Canada have gone up less rapidly than in any other belligerent country in the world, with the single exception of New Zealand.

Mr. KYTE: Australia?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, Australia. They are about the same in New Zealand as in Canada. Prices have gone up less rapidly than in any other belligerent country, New Zealand only excepted, and they are about the same as in Canada. My hon. friend has grown very eloquent over prices and found fault with my department for not keeping down the prices of everything. I remember him making a very eloquent speech not very long ago, but when he got down to facts there did not seem to be very much in it. We have endeavoured to carry out our part in enforcing that Order in Council. The right was given to the municipalities to investigate within their own limits and to enforce the Order in Council. We thought it better to leave it to the attorney generals of the different provinces rather than to undertake to prosecute ourselves, just as hon. gentlemen did when they were in power in regard to the Lord's Day Act. Another instance was when they passed the Alien Labour Act. They started in by attempting to enforce it from Ottawa. They had not gone very far before they got tired of it, and they amended the Act so that they would not have to enforce it. They never attempted to enforce it afterwards, and I can fairly say that we never attempted to do so either. We left it to those who felt that they were aggrieved, just as in this instance we leave it to those municipalities who feel that they are aggrieved.

Mr. VERVILLE: Who asked for the change in the Alien Labour Act?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know; I was not in the House at the time. As a matter of fact, it was changed and no attempt was made by the late Government to enforce it. I am not blaming them for that but I am giving that as another illustration of why this Government had kept away from enforcing a statute passed by this Parliament. It is the duty of the province to enforce the criminal law, or quasi criminal law, and this Government does not undertake to enforce any Act, of this character, speaking generally although there are one or two exceptions. That is what we have done with regard to that Order in Council. No prosecution may be had under it without the consent of the attorney general of the province in which it is said the offence is committed. We believe that the attorney general of the province is in the best position to say whether a prosecution should be instituted or not. If the facts do not warrant a prosecution he does not order one. But, we have carried out the law. We have sent out these questions and wherever doubt arose we have sent out a man to examine witnesses under oath and have compelled people to show us their books; we have investigated cold storage and all that sort of thing. We are preparing a full and detailed statement of what we have done and the results and these reports respecting coal, sugar, bread, and cold storage——

An hon. MEMBER: Anthracite coal?

Mr. CROTHERS: The report as to anthracite coal will be laid on the table a few days and every hon. member will have an opportunity of reading the reports in detail.

Mr. KYTE: How very consoling it will be to the consumers to know that the Minister of Labour is preparing a report as to the inquiries he had made. It will satisfy them, no doubt, for the increased cost of leaving. The Minister of Labour stated that the cost of food products is less in Canada than in any other belligerent country with the exception of New Zealand.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I said the price had gone up less rapidly in Canada than in any other country.

Mr. KYTE: I take issue with the minister. I cite the case of Australia, while in January flour was selling at $5.80 in Australia, it was $9.50 in Montreal; butter was selling on the 15th of January in Australia at 28 cents a pound and in the city of Montreal at 40 cents and the same applies to eggs, bacon and all other commodities that enter into the daily consumption of the home. I would suggest to the Minister of Labour to inform himself a little more on these particular subjects before he undertakes to discuss them here.

Mr. CROTHERS: I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that his giving to us the prices of these things in Australia does not prove or disprove what I said. That is not the question; the question is the advance since the war. If the hon. gentleman takes prices at the commencement of the war and compares them with what they are now he will see how rapidly they have gone up. I did not say that prices here were as low as in any other country. What I said was that prices had not gone up as rapidly in Canada as in any other belligerent country with the exception of New Zealand.

Mr. KYTE: Which shows that the minister does not face the question but is quibbling in order to get around it. We are discussing the question of the cost of these commodities. Compare the cost of commodities in this country with prices in England. I suppose the Minister of Labour gets some consolation from the circumstance that the cost of these commodities is greater in England than in Canada. But we overlook the fact that England is an importing country whereas Canada is an exporting country and the cost of these commodities imported into England depends entirely on the uncertainty of transportation conditions.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. CROTHERS: What about prices in the United States? My hon. friend and others are claiming the right to send stuff over there because prices there are higher than here, and they have not had any war there.

Mr. KYTE: The United States up to a few weeks ago was not a belligerent country. The United States was making more money out of the war than any other country. They did not know what to do with the money they were making, therefore they were not as much concerned about the cost of living as about the money they were making. The Government of that country were under no patriotic duty at that particular time to see that the cost of living was not unduly enhanced. But the moment war was declared by the United States they took the matter up and they have done more after three weeks to prevent the rise of the price of food products in the United States than this Government has done in three years.

Mr. CROTHERS: What has been the result?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to say a word on this subject of ships. The Minister of Labour is rather disposed to ridicule any suggestion with regard to this Government improving the means of transportation. Some gentlemen rather intimate that the reason for the farmers of the West desiring to secure a market for wheat in the United States is that they wish to be able to get increased prices. I do not think that that at all follows as the reason. If a farmer has a larger and wider market, a market to which he can continually send all that he produces, he may well be content to receive the same price which he has been receiving for the smaller product at home. If the farmer can find a market for ten thousand bushels of grain he may make more money at the same price than he would make if he was selling only some five thousand bushels. This larger market will induce the farmers of the West, and indeed of the East as well, to increase their production, because they know that they will always have a steady market for what they produce. I know that if we in New Brunswick had free access to the American market for our potatoes, which this Government can secure at once by placing on the statute-book a law admitting potatoes from the United States into Canada free of duty, the result would be that farmers would double and treble and quadruple their production in the province of New Brunswick because when potatoes are worth $3 or $4 per barrel in the United States the price in New Brunswick is less than that by the amount of the American duty.

Mr. CROTHERS: How much a barrel were they this winter?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend knows they are getting a high price.

Mr. CROTHERS: How much? $8.50 a barrel.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But that has not always been so. Two years ago the farmers were glad to sell potatoes in New Brunswick at 40 cents a bushel. But if they had a larger market they would be in the same position as the producer of wheat with a larger market. It would encourage increased production and add enormously to the prosperity of the farmers, even although the price of the product should not be materially increased.

With regard to ships, I say that this Government, so far as the question of transportation is concerned, have absolutely fallen down in the discharge of their duty. This war has been in progress since August, 1914, well on to three years. Surely this Government ought to have recognized that the result of the great European war would be a greater demand for vessels. They ought to have realized that there would be the submarine warfare, that the shipping of Great Britain and her Allies would be imperilled and that there would so be a greater demand for new shipping. In Canada we have magnificent opportunities for shipbuilding. I remember, when I was a comparatively young man, when in the province of New Brunswick there were dozens of shipyards turning out magnificent wooden ships which sailed upon every sea and carried the fame and reputation of our province to all parts of the world. There are splendid opportunities for shipbuilding. But this Government took no steps to encourage the building of ships. Over and over again I and other members of this House have appealed to the Government to do something, to give bonuses, or to themselves engage in shipbuilding, for the people of this country.

10 p.m.

Mr. LALOR: Did your Government do anything for shipbuilding along these lines?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Fortunately our Government did not hold the reins of power during a great European war. The conditions have changed materally, and I say that any men managing the affairs of this country with reasonable foresight must have known that there would happen the very thing that has happened to-day, when the British Government is begging for ships. Has my hon. friend read the report of the interview with Mr. Balfour only a few days ago in which he implored the Government of the United States to send all the ships they could, wooden vessels, cruisers, destroyers, even tug boats, to put them in the service of the Empire and their Allies in order to try and overcome the German submarine menace? What did the United States do? Within a week after the declaration of war the United States gave an order for one thousand wooden vessels, appropriating $50,000,000 for the purpose of providing one thousand wooden ships to be built upon both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts for the service of the Allies in this war. In the face of this splendid work on the part of the United States, this Government stands in a deplorable condition. Canada has done absolutely nothing. Was it because this Government in 1913 was informed by Mr. Winston Churchill that to build ships of any size you must have a firm foundation on which to lay the keels, and that it would be a very difficult task for Canada to engage in the building of large ships? Or was it because in 1911 the Nationalist allies of this Government in the province of Quebec declared that they would oppose to the last the building of a Canadian navy? Was that the reason of it? Is that the reason why this Government has taken from that time to this no step of any kind or description for the establishment of ship yards in Canada and the building of ships? We want ships to carry the products of Canada across the ocean to serve the Allies in this hour of tremendous need, because the products on this side of the ocean are required perhaps more than anything else. It is the danger of starvation which is facing Italy and France, and to a certain extent England, which is awakening the strongest feeling of apprehension on the part of the Allied Governments. And that is why they rejoice so greatly that the United States has come into this war, because she will be able to furnish ships, she will be able to give increased means of transportation, and in that way to do enormous service to the Allies. This Government, as I have said, has done nothing. We implored them even to place engines, these Diesel oil engines, which would be useful for auxiliary power in the case of wooden vessels, upon the free list. Session after session members on this side of the House have appealed to the Government to do this. The Government waited upwards of two and a half years before doing it. At last they did it and gave some little measure of encouragement to shipbuilding in that respect. But that is all they have done. It is true that they point with some degree of pride to the fact that ships are being built in Canada for the British and other Governments. Where are they being built? Some of them at the Vickers-Maxim Works in Montreal. Is this Government entitled to any credit for the establishment of these works? No, Sir, none whatever. They were established under the Liberal Government in the year 1908. Is the Government entitled to any credit for the ships that are being built at the yards of the Port Arthur Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company on the northwestern coast of lake Superior near Port Arthur? Not at all; these works were established before the present Government came into power. So with the shipbuilding works at Toronto; so with the Collingwood Shipbuilding plant and with most of the plants which are in operation to-day in Canada. This Government has, I say to its discredit, done absolutely nothing for the purpose of building up a shipbuilding industry in this country.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Was it not prior to 1896 that the Act was passed which granted subsidies to dry docks and under which the Collingwood dock was placed on a footing to do business?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think not.

Mr. BENNETT: That Act was in force prior to 1896; anybody could have taken advantage of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the Act was amended. Under the Act as originally passed no dry docks at all—at all events, not more than one two—were built. When the Liberal Government came into power they amended the Dry Dock Act, and I think that if my hon. friend will look into the statutes and look up the date when the dry dock at Collingwood was built, he will find that it was under the amended Act which was passed after the Liberal Government came into power. I want to call attention to the fact that this Government, so far from doing anything to encourage shipbuilding and Canadian transportation, actually permitted the British Government to commandeer a number of large vessels which were engaged in the transport of coal between the mines in Nova Scotia and the city of Montreal. This greatly hampered the business of the coal companies, and allowed a very important step to be taken towards increasing the cost of coal in the city of Montreal. With regard to our coast trade, our shipping has decreased most materially. It is an extraordinary fact that the cost of bringing coal by water from the coal mines of Pennsylvania is to-day 100 per cent greater than the cost of bringing coal by rail from Pennsylvania to the cities of Montreal and Ottawa. This surprising fact resulted, as I have said, from the great scarcity of shipping. At the very commencement of this war the Government ought to have anticipated the coming scarcity of shipping and to have taken steps to encourage shipbuilding in Canada. We had hoped that a great shipbuilding yard would have been established in the Maritime Provinces, because when the late Government went out of office there was in the Department of Marine and Fisheries a tender from one of the greatest shipbuilding firms in the world for the building of cruisers and destroyers. If that tender had been accepted, long before this the contract would have been completed and the company engaged in building commercial vessels, probably employing 5,000 or 6,000 men. When this Government came into office, however, they cancelled that contract and returned the amount of deposit, and from that day to this nothing whatever has been done in the way of establishing a shipbuilding plant. Go to the ports upon the Atlantic coast; go to the ports upon the St. Lawrence; go to the Great Lakes or west to British Columbia, and you will be able to find hardly anything of a practical character that has been done by this Government to encourage shipbuilding. The Minister of Finance made the statement to-day that the Imperial Munitions Board are thinking of engaging in the manufacture of wooden ships in Canada and that he, on behalf of the Government has made an offer to lend to the Imperial Munitions Board the sum of $10,000,000. I assume that that amount will carry interest, and that the rate will be at least as high as the rate the United States is going to charge the Allies, 3½ per cent. But, Sir, that does not fill the Bill. These ships will be under the control of the British Government; they will be used for transportation in the interests of the British Government. That will not at all improve the conditions affecting the inland coastal transportation of Canada, water transportation between one part of Canada and another the point of production and the point of consumption. It will not in any way relieve the difficult situation in which we find ourselves to-day. I agree with what the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has said, that the Minister of Labour has given no satisfactory explanation as to the high cost of living. It is not enough for this Government simply to say they have appointed commissions. It is true that some three years ago they appointed a commission which investigated the high cost of living, which commission found, I believe, that if the people of Canada would eat more fish and potatoes and less meat and flour, they would be able to get along more cheaply—a most valuable report, I suppose, in the opinion of the Minister of Labour. Afterwards it was announced by the newspapers that a committee of the Government, of which the hon. Robert Rogers was the head, had been appointed to take up this question immediately and arrive at a solution. A deputation waited upon him and he gave them the greatest possible encouragement as to what this active sub-committee was to do with a view to reducing the cost of living. Well, we have had no report as to what they have accomplished but we know what they said they could accomplish. It remains for the Minister of Labour to say to-night that he has sent out hundreds of questions to the people engaged in the coal business and in the sugar business, and that if he finds that the answers which he has received show an unsatisfactory state of affairs, he will forward them to the municipal authorities and expect them to take action.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, to the Attorney-General of the province.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend has taken a splendid means of shirking the responsibility which rests upon this Government.

Mr. CROTHERS: Just as you did on the Sunday question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is a terrible confession for my hon. friend to make. He implies that the late Government, in regard to the Sunday question, referred the matter to the Attorney General of each of the provinces, and he says that this Government did the same thing in the case of the high cost of living and for the same reason. In other words, he wants us to understand that it was done in order to shirk responsibility.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was reminding you of what you did, that is all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend is satisfied with that explanation, of course, I have nothing further to say. It does seem to one that this Government ought to have grappled with this question long ago. The British Government is commandeering every flour mill in Great Britain for the purpose of controlling the cost of flour. Why did not this Government adopt a similar course in Canada? The cost of flour regulates very largely the cost of other food products. Why did they not take charge of the mills of Canada when they saw that millions upon millions of dollars worth of stock, absolutely watered, not representing a single dollar of investment on the part of the capitalists, was earning 10, 15 and 20 per cent, the money coming out of the pockets of the Canadian consumer? Why did the Government not intervene and take charge of the flour mills, thus keeping down the price of flour and the cost of bread? When they saw that the cost of transporting coal between the mines of Nova Scotia and the cities upon the St. Lawrence was increasing because of the scarcity of shipping, why did they not take steps early in this war to acquire ships for the purpose of transporting coal from the mines to the places of consumption, in order to make the price of coal as low as possible to the thousands of poor people who were compelled to use it? When they saw, as they ought to have seen two years ago, that the cost of transportation between the anthracite mines of Pennsylvania and the ports of the Maritime Provinces was increasing so as to cause great hardship to the people, why did they not take some steps to engage in the building of ships and go into the transportation business in order to keep down the cost of fuel? My hon. friend must not treat the matter lightly; and while he may agree with the Minister of Finance that there is a condition of prosperity in this country, in the part of the Dominion from which I come there are thousands of people with a limited and a fixed income who are placed in a deplorable condition by reason of the high cost of flour, butter, meat, eggs, poultry and fuel. People who were ordinarily in comfortable circumstances are placed almost in a condition of distress. The matter is not one to be dealt with lightly and it is one which reflects upon this Government that while this condition of affairs exists, and while there are thousands of people in this country who are growing poorer and poorer as a result of this war, the Government does nothing. Do I say the Government does nothing? Not exactly that—it does nothing but appoint commissions and have its members interviewed by the news papers, telling the people what the Government is doing in order to ascertain whether or not the cost of living is too great. Let me, even now, implore the Government to take effective measures, to take control of the flour mills of the country, to take control of the transportation business of the country.

Mr. CROTHERS: Would it do for us to fix the price of wheat to the farmers?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no objection to that whatever.

Mr MEDERIC MARTIN: There is no necessity for that in Montreal or in the other cities of Canada. If you do that you will enrich the farmer to the detriment of the rest of the people. You are looking for votes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think there would be no objection for the Government to take control of the price of wheat provided they do as Lloyd George's Government has done, namely, guarantee to the farmers a minimum price for their wheat because thereby the production would be increased. But what is the use to-day of the western farmer increasing his production when up to a few days ago when this Order in Council was passed granting free wheat, the farmer has not been able to get his produce out to market, because it is a fact that to-day every elevator in the Canadian West is filled with grain? It is an open secret that millions of bushels are still in the hands of the farmers as they are not able to get their grain to market. I was told the other day of a man who had ten thousand bushels of grain in one of the districts of western Canada which he is not able to dispose of because he cannot get cars to take it to the market, and that is the case with thousands of farmers in the West.

Mr. CROTHERS: Would my hon. friend suggest that we should fix the price of potatoes for the farmers of New Brunswick?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no objection whatever.

Mr. CROTHERS: We want the farmers of New Brunswick to hear that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let the Government do exactly what the British Government has done, namely, fix the price of potatoes for a term of years, having reference to the cost of production. If that is done, the patriotic farmers of New Brunswick will be heart and soul with the Government and a reduction will be affected in the cost of living. Reference has been made to Australia. Let us consider for a moment how differently the Australian Government deals with the farmer from the way in which this Government does. The Australian Government realises that the farmer cannot raise produce without fertilizer or without machinery. I do not know as to the tariff on machinery in Australia, but I am told that it is very much lower than in this country. On the Government railroads in Australia fertilizer is carried absolutely free for the farmers in order that they may get it as cheaply as possible, whereas in this country the farmers have to pay the highest possible price for their fertilizer. Let us take the case of farm tractors, with one of which a farmer can plough in a day as many acres as he can with a large number of horses and men, and at very much less expense. As was well shown to-day by my hon. friend from West Kent (Mr. McCoig), this Government is charging 27½ per cent duty on the value of farm tractors, and yet the farmer is asked to increase production, and the Government is asking the people to believe that it is giving encouragement to the farmers. There is a duty upon fertilizer, and when it was proposed to impose this increased duty of 7½ per cent as a war tax, it took all the pressure which it was possible for members on this side of the House, assisted by agricultural societies throughout the country, to bring to bear upon this Government in order to get it to do away with the tax which it was proposing to put upon fertilizers. Has the Government done anything to give to the farmers of Canada fertilizer at a low price? Was the Government not aware that to-day not a pound of potash could be bought in the whole Dominion of Canada, although it is a fertilizer which is most essential to the farmers and the lack of which makes it necessary for him to secure some other kind of fertilizer in regard to which he ought to have Government assistance?

Mr. EDWARDS: Where did the farmers formerly get that potash from?

Mr. PUGSLEY: From Germany, but there are other fertilizers which should be secured.

Mr. LALOR: Is this Government to blame for the German potash not coming here?

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Government is to blame for not getting other fertilizer into this country to take its place.

Mr. STEELE: Does my hon. friend say that there is no potash purchaseable in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Practically none.

Mr. STEELE: I think I can give him the names of firms that can supply all the potash he wants.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If he will send it down to New Brunswick he will find a market at a good price for every pound of it. Contrast the conduct of this Government with regard to farm tractors with the conduct of the British Government. The British Government wants to increase production just as this Government professes to do. The British Government, however, is in earnest. It is a working Government. Within the last two months the British Government has given an order to American manufacturers for two thousand tractors to be sent to England for the purpose of assisting the farmers in increasing production. This Government, instead of doing that, says to-day, through the Minister of Finance, the farmer is doing mighty well in this country, and here is a chance to take 27½ per cent out of their pockets, and while we cry with one voice: produce, produce, produce, with another voice we say: put your hands in your pockets if you want the farm tractors and pay into the treasury of this country all we demand for the purpose of revenue. Let me ask the Minister of Labour really to do something; let me ask his colleagues really to do something. We have in this Government the most splendid set of talkers that one could gather together. They go to New York and with their eloquence thrill the audiences which gather to meet them. We next hear of them at Boston, where they thrill the people with a beautiful story of Canada, its splendid present and its glorious future, and they hold a high reputation for oratory in that city. They are the greatest aggregation of talkers that one could gather together, but I doubt if one could scrape together a bunch of gentlemen with less desire than the present Government for real solid productive work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What strikes me in connection with this Order in Council is the roundabout method of prosecution. I do not wish to deal with this matter as a party question, because the constituents of hon. gentlemen opposite as well as of hon. gentlemen on this side are both confronted with the high cost of living. I think it was Charles Dickens who exposed the circumlocution office in London some years ago, but to my mind the circumlocution office is not to be compared with the Department of Labour in its methods of prosecutions under this Act. I read a description of the method in a speech by the Hon. Mr. Lucas in the Legislature of Ontario some time ago. One of the members had asked him how offenders would be proceeded against and, if I remember correctly, this was the method: If a citizen of my constituency wishes to complain about the price he has to pay for flour, sugar, or any other commodity, he complains to the municipal council of his county, and here I might say that the municipal council in my county meets only twice a year, and their next meeting will not be till January, 1918.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is that place on the map?

Mr. SINCLAIR: So if a citizen in my county wishes to complain he will have to wait till early next year. The complaint comes up before the municipal council, and they appoint a commission to investigate; evidence is taken, and they have a case, we will suppose. But they cannot prosecute; my hon. friend from Pictou was mistaken about that; they have no power to prosecute under these regulations. What they do is to refer the matter back to the Minister of Labour. Then he looks at the papers that have been sent on from the municipal council, and makes up his mind whether the case shall go any further. If he thinks he has a good case he appoints another commission to go over the very same matter, call the very same witnesses, and hear the very same evidence. When the commission make out their report to the minister, even then he does not prosecute, but turns the matter over to the Attorney General of the province in which the offence took place, and the Attorney General decides whether there shall be a prosecution or not. That is the roundabout method the minister has adopted. Suppose that any other of the laws of this country were attempted to be enforced in that way! Would not every one think it ridiculous? If a man were guilty of smuggling, for instance, and some person had to complain to the municipal council in the first place, and then six months afterwards the council investigate and send on the papers to the Minister of Labour; the Minister of Labour investigates, and turns the case over to the Attorney General of the province in which the offence was committed. Would not every body laugh if such a method were adopted in this Dominion in regard to smuggling? And is the high cost of living any less important to the people of this Dominion than the law relating to smuggling? I cannot help thinking—it strikes me most forcibly—that the Minister of Labour is not sincere. If he had been he would never have adopted such a roundabout method of prosecuting. I should like him to explain to the House why he did not pass a regulation empowering himself to take proceedings against an offender, instead of having the matter dealt with in such a roundabout way.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is clear that the hon. member for Guysborough has not read this Order in Council. There is no necessity for such a circuitous method as he has described. The municipality, or the member for Guysborough himself, may, with the consent of the Attorney general of the province, prosecute any body without any reference to the Minister of Labour whatever, and the fact that he can do that, taken in conjunction with the speech we have just heard, shows that the hon. member for Guysborough has not read the Order in Council at all. I must also send him a copy to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD: What was the trouble that my hon. friend the Mayor of Montreal had in regard to prosecutions?

Mr. CROTHERS: The Mayor of Montreal is quite able to speak for himself.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Of course he is. I hope my hon. friend will not mind my speaking in French.

(Continuing in French) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the newspapers reported yesterday an interview given lately by the honourable the Minister of Labour, stating that the Mayor of the city of Montreal had not done his duty by the citizens of that city.

The increase in the cost of living is not a question of recent date; yet the minister has been pleased to do what he has always done since he has the honour of sitting on the Treasury benches: he springs up at the last minute and tries to get the people of this country to believe that he is ever intent on securing their welfare. But we know otherwise, as I shall endeavour to prove.

First the coal question. Some time last March, I received a telegram from the minister, about eleven o'clock at night, and the next day I got in touch with the Board of Control to have an investigation made into the causes of the increase in the price of that commodity. The next day, I gave instructions to the superintendent of Municipal Charities to go around—the coalyards in the city and secure prices. It was found that the abnormal rise in the price of coal was not due to the retailers, but was a result of the importers or wholesale dealers, refusing to supply the retailers unless the latter agreed to let them fix the price beforehand.

Regarding the high cost of living, the matter had been foreseen by us last fall. The Montreal Board of Control and Council had passed resolutions requesting the Government to lay an embargo on some necessaries of life, and it should have been done for instance on potatoes, wheat, flour and some other farm produce, as was just now pointed out by the hon. member for St. John, N. B. (Mr. Pugsley). We were of opinion that the transport and sale of commodities should be under the control of the Government, who would see that enough remained in the country to feed the population. In this case as in all others, the Government has pursued its usual policy of inaction, with a vi w to getting votes, especially the farmers' votes, at the next elections. But our farmers are wise enough to understand that present prices for farm products are abnormal. I say further that the greater part of such abnormal increase in the price of commodities does not go to the farmer, but to the monopolists and speculators. This year had the Government been in earnest, a commission would have been appointed by the Minister of Labour in all the large centres, to inquire into the quantities of produce held in the cold storage plants, such as poultry, mutton—I know that some has been stored up for as long as 36 months,—beef, butter and cheese. The quantities of wheat and flour in warehouses and elevators might also have been investigated.

The Government should have held back what was required of those staple commodities for the people, set a price on them, and allow the rest to be exported to our allies. What is the present situation regarding potatoes? They are selling to-day in Montreal at $4.00 a bag, and of this the farmer gets only $1.75 to $2.00. I myself bought them in the country at $2.00 a bag when they fetched $4.00 in the city.

At the beginning of the war, especially last year, it was the Government's duty, as they saw prices soaring all the time, to at once lay an embargo on those commodities, and to withold from exportation a sufficient quantity to meet the needs of the community. The farmers are not the only ones to be considered; but one must also take into account the workingman, the under-paid or small earner, who do not hope to see their salaries keep pace with the ever-increasing cost of living. You failed to do so; the city of Montreal entreated the Government to commandeer these commodities, and the Government had not the pluck to do so. As to the coal situation, again I say that the minister wired me at the last minute, stating that coal was selling in Ottawa at $8 a ton and asking whether it was true that $14 to $15 was asked for them in Montreal, and if so, to let him know immediately. I replied to the Minister; I did every thing possible under the circumstances and I find it strange that the minister should now see fit to cast any blame on us.

There is another point I should like to deal with before I take my seat. The Government has lately passed an Order in Council providing for the free entry of wheat. In 1911, I was in favour of reciprocity, but it seems to me that to-day is not the time to apply it without at least taking steps to keep enough wheat in the country to feed our families and ensure cheap bread instead of helping to increase the price. It is a move merely to catch the western farmer's vote, as can be seen by the statement in the Order in Council to the effect that the measure is intended to secure a better price for Canadian wheat. Here again, I claim, it is not the farmer who will reap the greatest share, but, as was said a moment ago by the hon. member for St. John, N.B., the speculator who has stored the grain of the western prairies in order to enhance the price through exportation into the United States. I say that here again a state of things is created which tends to raise the price of commodities; and so much is that the case, that since the Order in Council has been passed, the price of a certain quality of bread in Montreal has been raised from one to two cents since yesterday.

The Government has always been keen on unloading its blunders not only on the corporation of Montreal, but in all important centres it has been anxious to shift responsibility for its action on the shoulders of the provincial governments, as was instanced by the speech of the Minister of Labour this evening. As a parting word, let me tell him that he has not worked in the interest of the people at large, or of the city and towns in particular, but has always favoured the trusts, of which he is the protector and friend.

Mr. CROTHERS: I regret that I did not follow very closely what the hon. member (Mr. Martin) said, but I assume that he was discussing the cost of living. I had the honour and pleasure of spending a day in Montreal some months ago, and the hon. gentleman, as mayor, treated me like a prince. He spent nearly the whole day with me, and there was nothing in Montreal too good for me. And all the time I was with him he did not say anything about the high cost of anything we ate or drank.

Mr. MARTIN: Did the hon. gentleman say it was a few weeks ago?

Mr. CROTHERS: About a year ago.

Mr. MARTIN: On Labour Day?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: That was not the time. The war—

Mr. CROTHERS: We had had war for a couple of years then, and the hon. gentleman did not say a word. We noticed in the press a few months ago that coal was selling in Montreal at very high prices—$15 a ton in the centre of the city, and $20 a ton in the suburbs. I did not wait to write to the mayor, but sent him a telegram, asking as to the facts. And, if I remember well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) wrote back stating that it was true. So, I wrote that the best thing he could do was to send a solicitor to represent the city corporation, and we would help him to deal with the matter. But the mayor did not send anybody, he did not give us a chance to help him, and I took the matter up without hearing from Montreal.

Mr. MARTIN: But I sent some one to make inquiries, to secure bills for coal and these were sent to the hon. minister. At least, if they were not sent, my instructions were not obeyed. What would the minister have us do? The mere fact that a sale has been made at a higher than reasonable price is not an offence? We have to prove that he has coal in his yard which he refuses to sell. That is what our attorney—

Mr. CROTHERS: Why did you not send a man up to consult?

Mr. MARTIN: Because it was not necessary. I spoke to Mr. Lamarche, formerly a member of this House, and to Mr. Laurandeau, and they told us that what we must do is to make an inquiry and send the facts to the minister. We sent bills for coal that had been received. And the commission is going yet.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was not necessary to send anything of that kind to us. If the hon. gentleman found that any man was selling coal at prices that were unreasonable or unjust, he could take action against him.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not what Mr. Laurandeau tells us, and he is an ex-judge. The minister may say that Mr. Laurandeau did not understand it. In that case I am ready to believe that nobody could understand it.

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend had sent his solicitor as we requested we would have pointed out to him what should be done.

Mr. MARTIN: The Government should have entered upon an inquiry last fall, to find out just what supplies were available. Then they should have put on an embargo wherever it was necessary, in order to keep food for the family—the family of Canada, whose interest the Government has in charge. They should have provided that what food was necessary should be kept at home and the rest sent to the Allies.

Mr. CROTHERS: And what was the hon. gentleman's duty as mayor of Montreal?

Mr. MARTIN: To work for the people, as I did. And next election will prove that they think I did well.

Mr. VERVILLE: Has anybody been prosecuted under this Order in Council?

Mr. CROTHERS: No, we have no power to prosecute.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. VERVILLE: I believe the time has come—in fact, came some time ago—when the Government should try to control the prices of foodstuffs. In dealing with the case of the miners of the West the minister stated that the Government had paid $92,000 on account, as I understood him, of the increased cost of living, that increase for the time covered having been $1.75 a week. But if the minister does not proceed to the regulation of food supplies in four or five months from now, perhaps, the cost of living will have gone up another $1.75 a week. Will he then take another $92,000 to make that up? Anybody who knows the conditions here and on the other side of the line knows that the profits paid in Canada in some cases are quite unreasonable. The minister spoke of the increase in the cost of living in the United States, but he forgets that the wages there are higher than in Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: No.

Mr. VERVILLE: Then, they must have changed very lately, for about the first of the month I was in Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis and Cleveland, and in those cities wages were higher than in Canada. And the minister knows it. We cannot compare the cost of living on this side and on the other side unless we take wages into account. The hon. gentleman knows that as soon as war was declared between the United States and Germany the heads of the labour people in the United States were called into consultation by the Government upon the cost of living. There is an example which the minister might well follow. If my hon. friend has not done it so far, why does he not do it now? It is better now than never. Why does he not consult the best labour men in the country and ask them to help him to solve the problem of the high cost of living? I do not say that my hon. friend can do it alone but if he would gather together a number of men, the same as they have done in the United States, he would do something towards finding a solution for this difficulty. The resolution which No. 149, International Association, signed——

Mr. CROTHERS: Have they reduced the price of anything yet?

Mr. VERVILLE: They have not reduced the price but they are going to control prices. It is only three weeks since war was declared.

Mr. CROTHERS: But before war was declared they had street riots over there concerning the prices of food and we have not had any here yet.

Mr. VERVILLE: Certainly, but here, the increased cost of living goes on and I believe that in September we will have two labour days; on the first of September they will parade the streets and next day they will supply themselves in the cold storages, and I would be the very first man to tell them to do so if things keep on as they are. I am supposed to keep the peace, but there is a limit to everything and my hon. friend knows that the people of the country will not stand for much more and that they are calling upon him to take this matter up with the best elements to be found in the country, to settle this question and to endeavour to prevent what will be a great calamity. He may not be able to prevent it. My hon. friend said a moment ago that the Order in Council was put on the same basis as the Lord's Day Act. But, the Lord's Day Act was a matter of conscience; this is a matter of hunger and there is a great difference between your stomach and your conscience. The people make this appeal to the minister and he can himself see what the condition is in any part of the country that he may care to go to. You must regulate the food of the people. Seven-eighths of the people of Canada are just on the verge of revolution because they are short of food supplies and they will not stand it all the time. My hon. friend knows the conditions under which the people are living and he has been told it by a great many of his friends. My hon. friend's own officers must have kept him informed as to the conditions and he cannot ignore the facts that are existing in different parts of the country. The fact that he stated that there was an increase of $1.75 per week in the cost of living in connection with mining in the West shows that he realizes that the cost of living has gone up. If the cost of living has increased in the West it has also increased in the East and that is the danger. If you cannot lower the cost of living at the present you can regulate it. You can regulate the profits that some of those large interests are making. I am willing to give them a living profit but to take a profit over and above that is wrong. If my hon. friend does not know what is going on in this country amongst the rank and file of the people, then he has not received reports from his officers, but I believe that he does know. That is why I am appealing to the minister to immediately get the best elements from among the labour movement and the business men, if you like, and try to find a solution of the cost of living problem because it is getting very dangerous.

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. member for Maisonneuve is a leader amongst the working people of this country, and he has told us a good deal, but he has not told us what he has done towards paying the advance in the cost of foodstuffs. Under this order he could take action against any man in the city of Montreal whom he thought was overcharging, and prosecute him with the assent of the Attorney General. I do not apprehend that it would be a very easy matter. What is it that controls the price of most of these things? Take cheese; there is a very great demand for cheese to be sent across the ocean to the army. What would my hon. friend do there—fix the price at which the maker of cheese should sell the cheese for at the factory and bring it down below what he could get for it for export? Would he adopt the same method with regard to butter, flour or anything of that kind? When you get down to the actual work you will find it very difficult to fix the price of any of these things. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he would probably learn something of a very practical nature if he would take this order, and finding some one on the corner in Montreal whom he thought was charging too much for his butter or bacon, he would ask the Attorney General to authorise a prosecution, lay an information, bring the dealer before the police magistrate and have him convicted and fined $5,000. If he did that it would be a lesson to him and an example to every other man who was overcharging. It is an easy matter for him to get up and say that you should do so and so, and the Government should do so and so, but what is he doing for the working man?

Mr. VERVILLE: If I were Minister of Labour I would do more than he has done. I would have a change in the whole situation or I would not stay in the Cabinet. I would be man enough to get out of it.

Mr. CROTHERS: You are representing the people in this House. Why do you not get out because you cannot do anything?

Mr. VERVILLE: I have not the responsibility nor the power to do that; the minister has that in his hands.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have just the power you have under this order.

Mr. VERVILLE: Yes, but I have only the power of an individual while the Government are absolutely powerful in the country. Perhaps the Minister of Labour inside the Council room was in favour of regulating the prices of food and his colleagues did not look at it in the same light. If that were so I would get out of the Cabinet. I would do something for those I represent or get out.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is no doubt the price of foodstuffs has risen considerably since the beginning of the war, especially during the last twelve months. We have had two solutions proposed this evening. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) suggests in all seriousness that the Government should fix the price of potatoes, wheat, flour and so on. He does not say what that price would be but he proposes to make the price arbitrary and force the farmer to take whatever the Government says he should take for the article that he produces. I do not think that would meet the situation, because if the member of St. John was a member of the Government and was looking for votes, he would fix the price according to the number of votes that he could get by fixing the price. If he thought he could get more votes by fixing the price in the interest of the man who was producing the foodstuffs then his bowels of compassion would be all dried up in regard to the man who was consuming the foodstuffs. But that does not meet the situation. Then the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) has a plan for meeting the situation and meeting it most certainly. He stands up in this House, professing to represent the labour interests of this country and he says that if something is not done to reduce the price of these foodstuffs he will encourage the mob in Montreal or anywhere to break into the storehouses and help themselves. In the time I have had a seat in this House I have never heard a responsible member of Parliament give expression to anything approaching the statement made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and I say it is very little credit to him to make such a statement. It is one which he should not have made as a responsible member of Parliament, because in that position more importance is attached to his utterances than perhaps should attach to them.

I remember in years gone by, when the farmers of this country were not making one-half of one per cent on their investments during the regime of the Liberal Government, one of the responsible members of the Laurier Government offered a solution to the farmers of the country who were making nothing. His suggestion was that they should work harder and eat less. That was the Liberal solution of the difficulty so far as the farmers of Canada were concerned during the fifteen years they were in power—work harder and eat less. In all the discussion we have heard this evening in regard to the high cost of living and foodstuffs, not one gentleman has attempted to get at the real reason for these high prices. Why is cheese the price it is to-day? Would any hon. member opposite say that the Government should step in and tell the farmers that they must take fifteen cents or eighteen cents or twenty cents a pound for cheese instead of the price they are getting, which is fixed by the demand across the water? Will any member opposite, as a member of the Liberal party advocate that ? The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said that he would fix the prices. He did not say at what figure he would fix them. In regard to the price of butter and nearly all of these articles, if you look into the facts you will find that there is a reasonable cause at least for the great part of the increase in price. Take grain for instance. What about the grain crop of the United States for last year? The corn crop there was about 400,000,000 bushels short. The wheat crop was hundreds of millions of bushels short. The oat crop was short. Look into the number of head of cattle, sheep and swine in the United States, and you will find an enormous decrease; not only last year but for several years. The same holds good in this country and has held good for many years back in the countries of Europe. These are natural causes for a part, at least, of the high cost of foodstuffs. You have also to take into consideration, when you are considering the price of butter and eggs and things like that, the produce of the farm, the difficulty that the farmer has in securing labour for the production of these articles. Not one hon. gentleman who has spoken with regard to the matter has touched on that phase of the question. And yet that is something which every farmer in the country is thoroughly aware of. He is up against the difficulty of getting labour and has to pay many times what he paid a few years ago.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said that the Government should have foreseen all these things, the need of ships, and what was about to happen in this war. When the members on this side of the House sounded a note of warning in regard to the war which is now on, every

hon. member opposite, including the member for St. John, ridiculed the suggestion. We were talking utter nonsense when we spoke of the war cloud hovering over Europe. They ridiculed the idea of war coming and did not want us to make any preparation for the effective carrying on of our part in this great struggle. It is true that the price of food products is high, but I will venture the statement that during the winter which has just closed, taking into consideration the wages paid, the demand for labour in almost every walk that you could speak of, at high prices, and the cost of foodstuffs, there has been less actual distress in the centres of population in the Dominion of Canada than there has been during any winter in the last ten or fifteen years. And if you are considering the question of the high cost of living and foodstuffs and all that sort of thing, it is only fair to consider the ability of the population to pay the prices which are being demanded at the present time, as well as to inquire into the real causes for the prices being high. But I believe that during the last winter and at the present time there has been, as I have said, less distress throughout the Dominion of Canada because of the high cost of living than there has been in this country in the last fifteen or twenty years.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is now eleven o'clock. We have had a very interesting discussion and perhaps we might pass an item and adjourn.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite desire to discuss the other three items? There are only three others.

Mr. GRAHAM: But they are fraught with great significance. I should not like to have to reply to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to-night, for instance. I would suggest that we pass item 265 and adjourn. We have worked pretty hard.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 11 o'clock p.m.

Monday, April 24, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT IN OVERSEAS FORCES.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): I desire to present an amended return with respect to the pay of Members of Parliament serving in the Overseas Forces. In the return as presented to the House there was a clerical error, the effect of which was to show that Lt.-Col. W. F. Cockshutt was drawing separation allowance and pay. As a matter of fact, he has drawn neither separation allowance nor pay from the Government. The figures should have appeared immediately opposite the name of the officer preceding his, on the return.

Mr. GRAHAM: What officer was that?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Lieut. Carroll.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO moved:

That the Public Accounts and the Report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916, be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL SERVICE CARDS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. EDWARDS: Yesterday a question of which I had given notice, relating to National Service cards, was put, and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) gave what is supposed to be an answer. I do not know who prepared the answer, nor where he got his information. It is given at page 702 of yesterday's Hansard. I would draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in this answer the second part of the question is entirely ignored.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The information came from the National Service Commission. I shall draw the attention of the Director of National Service to the observations of my hon. friend.

ENLISTED CIVIL SERVANTS.

PAY AND SEPARATION ALLOWANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) each asked questions yesterday, the first with regard to Civil Service enlistment and statutory increases of pay, and the second with regard to Civil Service enlistments and separation allowance. The answer to these questions is as follows:

A civil servant who enlists receives full pay the same as if he were employed doing his civil service duties, provided always that his civil pay is greater than that which he would draw as a soldier.

The Government has undertaken to see that a civil servant receives pay not less than what he would have received had he remained at home and had not enlisted. He does not, therefore, receive separation allowance extra, but it is the intention that he shall receive the regular statutory increases provided he is receiving only one salary.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that no civil servant who is allowed his pay as a civil servant receives separation allowance?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The answer covers that question. The civil servant receives his full pay as a civil servant.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And no civil servants have been allowed separation allowance?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Civil servants are not allowed separation allowance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, am I to understand that members of Parliament, with the exception of Mr. Cockshutt, have received separation allowance in addition to their sessional indemnity, although they have been absent from Parliament?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am not sure on that point. The return speaks for itself. I am not sure that the hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that all members of Parliament have received separation allowances.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then the minister will withdraw the statement that there is no discrimination?

MONEY ORDERS FOR PRISONERS OF WAR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) yesterday asked for information in reference to money orders and parcels for Canadian prisoners of war. First, in regard to money orders, the answer is:

About the beginning of the year 1916, arrangements were made by the Chief Paymaster, London, England, through the Red Cross and Post Office, to forward small amounts of pay to prisoners of war in Germany. The requests come from the men themselves by post card, and up to January, 1917, the remittances were made by post office order. This practice was discontinued at our request because no receipts or absolute guarantee that the money reached the men were obtained. Since January, 1917, the American Express made payments in cash to the men themselves and obtained individual receipts, at first through their own agents in Germany, and, since United States declared war, through Dutch agents of the American Express Company in Germany. Small sums are sent, not exceeding three pounds, which are charged to the men's accounts in London. I may add that the pay of prisoners of war is credited to the men's accounts, and accumulates, less these small remittances.

PARCELS FOR PRISONERS OF WAR.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In regard to parcels for Canadian prisoners of war, the answer is rather a long one, and therefore I will lay on the table of the House the particulars in reference to this matter. These particulars are set forth in the regulations which were in effect prior to the 1st of February, 1917, and the regulations which have been in effect since that time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Militia if he would be good enough to assent to the proposition that the answer in regard to parcels be published in Hansard. The question is an important one, and that would be the most convenient way by which the matter could be made public for the information of the House and the country generally.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of the House, I would be very glad that the documents which I have laid on the table of the House should be published in Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have before me the statement submitted by the hon. the Minister of Militia. While it is somewhat out of the usual order, yet, owing to the importance of this document and the desirability of this information being published as widely as possible, with the unanimous consent of the House, I can see no objection to this document being considered as read for the purpose of being printed in Hansard.

The regulations are:

Post Office Department,
Ottawa, Canada.

Regulations in Force Prior to 1st February, 1917.

Re Correspondence for Prisoners of war in Germany.

1. Letters (letters should be left open) postcards and postal parcels should be addressed as follows:—

1. Rank, initials, name.
2. Regiment, or other unit.
3. British (or Canadian, French, Belgian or Russian) prisoner of war.
4. Place of internment.
5. Germany.

Place of internment should be stated always if possible, and parcels cannot be accepted unless place of internment is stated. All addresses must be in ink.

2. Communications should be limited to private and family news and to necessary business communications, and should not be sent too frequently.

No references to the Naval, Military or Political situation or to naval or military movements and organizations are allowed. Letters or postcards containing such references will not be delivered.

3. Friends of prisoners of war are advised to send postcards in preference to letters as postcards are less likely to be delayed. If letters are sent, they should not exceed in length two sides of a sheet of note paper and should contain nothing but the sheet of note paper. On no account should the writing be crossed.

4. Letters cannot for the present be accepted for registration.

5. Postage need not be paid either on letters or parcels addressed to prisoners of war.

6. No letters should be enclosed in parcels, and newspapers must not on any account be sent. So far as is known there is no restriction on the contents of parcels; tobacco may be sent and will be admitted duty free but foodstuffs of a perishable character should not be sent. Parcels should not exceed 11 pounds in weight.

7. Remittances can be made by money order to prisoners of war. Instructions as to how to proceed can be obtained from Postmasters of Accounting Post Offices. The transmission of coin, either in letters or parcels, is expressly prohibited. Postal notes and Bank notes should not be sent.

8. It must be understood that no guarantee of the delivery of either parcels or letters can be given and that the Post Office accepts no responsibility. In any case, considerable delay may take place and failure to receive an acknowledgment should not necessarily be taken as an indication that letters and parcels sent have not been delivered.

9. So far as is known, prisoners of war in Germany are allowed to write letters or postcards from time to time; but they may not always have facilities for doing so and the fact that no communication is received from them need not give rise to anxiety.

Unless they are so addressed they cannot be accepted. The address should be in the following form:—

Canadian Prisoner of War, Gottingen, Germany, c/o Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England.

(b) Packing.—Parcels should be packed in the same manner as parcels for delivery in the United Kingdom. Despatch Notes and Customs' Declarations are not required. The parcels will be repacked before being despatched from the United Kingdom.

(c) Prohibitions.—The following articles, in addition to those mentioned in paragraph 5 (d), must not be included:—

(i) Tins or other receptacles which cannot conveniently be opened for inspection.

(ii) Foodstuffs of all kinds.

(iii) (To enemy countries only).—Regulation uniforms, and all articles of clothing, and boots for naval and military prisoners other than officers.

(d) Persons desiring to have food or articles of clothing sent to a Canadian Prisoner of War belonging to the Canadian Contingent should send money for the purpose to Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society. Articles other than food or clothing for such prisoners may also be purchased through the Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England, or may be sent to the Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England, to be forwarded if not prohibited. The letter will be opened by the Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England, and the parcel will be sent in accordance with the request contained in the letter. The name of any adopter or relative at whose expense a parcel is sent will be communicated to the Prisoner of War.

(Letters addressed to the Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England, as distinct from those addressed to Prisoners, care of the Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England, must be prepaid).

In the case of Canadian Prisoners of War belonging to the Imperial Forces or of Canadian civilian Prisoners of War or of Allied Prisoners of War, the terms of this regulation apply, and the same procedure should be followed, with the exception that in all such cases letters should be addressed care of, and Money Orders drawn in favour of the Central Prisoners of War Committee, 4 Thurloe Place, London, S.W., England, who are acting for this class of prisoners.

4. Parcels for Officers:—

(a) Method of address. Parcels should be addressed in the manner stated in paragraph 2 (a) as applicable to letters. Parcels will not be accepted for transmission unless the address includes the name of the place of internment. The address must be clearly written in ink in at least two places on the outer cover of each parcel.

(b) Packing.—Parcels for Officer Prisoners of War must be very strongly packed. Ordinary thin cardboard boxes such as shoeboxes, and thin wooden boxes should not be used; nor does a single sheet of ordinary brown paper afford sufficient protection. Parcels which are found to be inadequately protected will not be forwarded. Even where proper materials are used, it is important that the contents should be tightly packed so as not to shake about during transit. All parcels should be packed in such a way as not to impede examination by the censors.

(c) The following forms of packing are recommended:—

(i) Strong double cardboard or strawboard boxes. Those made of corrugated cardboard and having lids which completely enclose the sides of the box are most suitable.

(ii) Strong wooden boxes.

(iii) Tin boxes such as are used for packing biscuits.

Parcels for Prisoners of War in Bulgaria and Turkey must be packed in wood, tin or hemp canvas; no other kind of textile material may be used. Parcels packed merely in paper or cardboard cannot be accepted.

Parcels for Prisoners of War in Germany or Austria-Hungary must not be packed in any kind of textile material.

Butter, etc., should be wrapped in several folds of grease-proof paper and enclosed in a tin which should have a tightly fitting lid but not be sealed against inspection; the tin should be enclosed with any other articles for transmission in an outer box.

(d) Customs Declarations, which must be prepared in ink in duplicate, are only required for parcels addressed to Holland.

Despatch Notes are only required for parcels sent to Turkey and Bulgaria.

(e) In addition to the articles mentioned in paragraph 5 (d), perishable foodstuffs must not be included in a parcel for an officer.

5. Parcel Post—General.—The following regulations are applicable to all parcels for Prisoners of War, whether officers, naval or military prisoners other than officers, or civilians.

(b) The address of the sender must also be clearly shown.

(c) No Customs Duty is payable. Information as to any special restrictions that may be imposed from time to time at particular camps, may be obtained from the Central Prisoners of War Committee, 4 Thurloe Place, London, S.W., England.

(d) The following articles must not be included in a parcel:—

(i) Written communications (letters must be sent separately by letter post).

(ii) Printed matter.

(iii) Pictorial illustrations and photographs.

(iv) Money..

(v) Stationery, stamps, playing cards and similar articles affording facilities for secret communications.

(vi) Textiles, wool, cotton, leather or rubber. (Articles of clothing may, however, be sent to Officer Prisoners of War).

(vii) Tennis-balls, footballs, and golf-balls.

(viii) Spirits or solidified spirits for cooking stoves, matches or other inflamable material.

(ix) (To enemy countries only.) Photographic apparatus, field glasses, sextants, compasses and other instruments of use for Military or Naval purposes.

(e) Any parcel found to contravene these rules will be returned to the sender or sent to the Dead Letter Office for disposal if the name and address of the sender are not known.

6. Printed matter from the United Kingdom (i.e., newspapers, books, magazines, etc.) may not be sent to Prisoners of War in neutral or enemy countries except by the holders of special permits from the War Office (publishers or newsagents in the United Kingdom) to whom therefore orders for the dispatch of papers, books, magazines should be given by members of the public desiring to have such articles forwarded. Addresses of firms holding permits for this purpose may be obtained from the Chief Postal Censor, Strand House, Portugal St., London, W.C.

Educational books (not fiction, magazines or current war literature) may also be sent from the United Kingdom to British (including Canadian) Prisoners of War through the medium of the British Prisoners of War Book Concern (Educational). Information respecting that scheme may be obtained on application to A. T. Davies, Esq., Board of Education, Whitehall, London, S.W.

7. No printed matter to be sent from Canada. No newspapers, books, magazines, or printed matter of any kind, are to be sent from Canada to Prisoners of War interned in neutral or enemy countries.

8. Registration.—Letters addressed to Prisoners of War in Holland only may be registered.

No charge is made for registration; but the fact of registration does not necessarily give any claim to compensation for loss.

9. Remittance of Money.—(a) Remittance may be sent direct to Prisoners of War and should be made by means of Post Office Money Orders, which are issued free of commission. Instructions as to how to proceed can be obtained from Postmasters of Accounting Offices. The transmission of coin, either in letters or in parcels, is prohibited.

(b) Postal notes, bank notes and cheques may not be sent to Prisoners of War in enemy countries.

(c) Bank notes and cheques may be sent to Prisoners of War in neutral countries.

10. No guarantee of delivery of either parcels or letters can be given. Considerable delay may take place, and failure to receive an acknowledgment need not be taken to mean that letters and parcels sent have not been delivered.

11. Prisoners of War abroad are allowed to write letters or postcards from time to time; but they may not always have facilities for doing so; and the fact that no communication is received from them need not give rise to anxiety.

12. Central Prisoners of War Committee.—Persons seeking information and advice in regard to British (including Canadian) Prisoners of War are invited to apply to the Central Prisoners of War Committee, 4 Thurloe Place, London, S.W., England.

13. It is to be noted that the above regulations governing communication with Prisoners of War contain numerous and important changes, superseding previous regulations on and from 1st February, 1917.

Deputy Postmaster General.

LANCE CORPORAL READ.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) to the case of Lance Corporal Read, who is now at the front and who is a member of the 13th Battalion. Corporal Read wrote me a letter, dated the 7th April, in which he calls attention to something which I believe is important not only to himself but to others in a like situation. He was married on the 8th October, 1916, with the permission of his commanding officer, after having fulfilled all the formalities required of a soldier. He finds now that a separation allowance is refused his wife, the conditions having been changed. He sets forth all the facts in a communication to the chief paymaster of the regiment, and he asks me to call the attention of the minister to the case. I do so now because Corporal Read was formerly a resident of Notre Dame de Grace, Montreal. Two certificates accompanied the letter. His wife has been left without support of any kind. I hope the minister will give the matter his attention.

CANTEEN SYSTEM IN ENGLAND.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the hon. the Minister of Militia be good enough to give the House a statement, similar to that which he has just given in reference to the treatment of prisoners of war, in regard to the position of the canteen system in the various camps in England which are under the control of the Canadian authorities, as to whether there are wet canteens still in existence, as to who the contractors are who have to do with their maintenance and carrying on, and what is the policy of the Government and the department overseas in regard to the matter?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will look into that matter and endeavour to get my hon. friend an answer in due course.

THE BUDGET.

ANNUAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Honourable Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:—

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by this motion to make the annual budget statement.

The features of the public finances in which I conceive the House to be chiefly interested at the present time are the relationship between national income and national expenditure and the increase in the national debt. For the first year of the war the revenue from all sources was about one hundred and thirty million dollars. It rose during the second year to $170,000,000. For the year ended March 31 last, I am happy to say, our income will reach two hundred and thirty-two millions, or one hundred million in advance of the fiscal year 1915. In round figures, $134,000,000 of the aggregate was derived from customs, $24,000,000 from excise, and $12,500,000 from the business profits war tax. From this last named tax, which was introduced by the Budget of last year, we estimated that we should receive twenty-five million dollars during the three years of its currency. Our experience has proved that this estimate will be largely exceeded. This tax was retroactive, being levied in respect of business accounting periods ending subsequently to December 31, 1914. The profits of the first accounting period of businesses subject to the tax were much affected by the severe depression and dislocation of business incidental to the first months of the war. Nevertheless, from this first period the sum of $12,500,000 has already been collected, and when the full levy is made we expect to have collected in respect of this period as much as $15,000,000. For the second accounting period the taxes for which are payable during this year we estimate that the amount collected will be much larger—in fact, as high as $20,000,000, or more. The increase will, of course, be due to the business prosperity which has prevailed in Canada during the past year and the profits made in supplying munitions of war. On the whole, notwithstanding the difficulty of organizing on short notice the official machinery necessary to cover so large a country as Canada the tax has worked out much more satisfactorily than we expected, and the total results will be much greater than the estimate.

I have said that the total income of the past fiscal year was $232,000,000. Leaving aside for the moment our direct war expenditure, our outlay for the past year was upon ordinary account $145,000,000 and $27,000,000 upon capital and subsidy account, or a total of $172,000,000. It is to be borne in mind that of our ordinary expenditure $25,000,000 represents increased interest and pension charges due to the war. Taking our total revenue at $232,000,000 and our total current and capital expenditure at $172,000,000, we find that during the past fiscal year we were able to pay from our income all current and capital expenditure, all charges of interest upon our increased national debt, all pension outlays, and in addition devote the sum of $60,000,000 to payment of the principal of our war expenditure. For a country such as Canada, of sparse population and without the conditions of long-established and concentrated wealth prevailing in older and more settled communities, the result must be regarded as extremely satisfactory.

Coming next to the question of our direct war expenditure, we find that with our increasing military effort it also is continually increasing. Since the beginnng of hostilities our total war outlay, including estimated and unadjusted liability to Great Britain for the maintenance of our troops at the front and inclusive of withheld pay, totals, so far as we can calculate, about $600,000,000. As the result of this large war expenditure, the net national debt of Canada, which was $336,000,000 before the outbreak of war, has risen to over $900,000,000, although this will not be shown by our official statements for some months to come.

By the end of the present fiscal year it may reach $1,200,000,000.

From the beginning it has been clear that it would not be possible for the people of Canada to pay, during the war, more than a part of the principal of our war expenditure. The policy of the Government has therefore been directed along two main lines: first, to fund the war indebtedness so as to postpone its maturities to periods well beyond the end of the war, and secondly, by increased taxation on the one hand and the reduction of current expenditure on works on the other to be in a position to meet from annual income all annual outlays including increased interest and pension charges and in addition a substantial amount of the war expenditure itself.

In order to carry out this programme it will be necessary, as our war expenditure, and consequently our interest and pension charges increase, to increase also our income. This raises the question of the sources of revenue still open to us. A higher customs taxation upon luxuries has been frequently suggested, but this proposal overlooks the fact that most articles of this character are embraced under fixed rates in the treaty with France, and the tariff cannot therefore be raised in respect of these. Apart from this we should hesitate at a time when France needs the advantage of all her sales on this side of the Atlantic to assist her exchange, to place a prohibition or increased duty against importations from our great Ally.

Then it has been frequently suggested that following the example of Great Britain and the United States, we should adopt an income tax upon all incomes beyond say $1,000 or $2,000. The comparison in this regard, however, of Canada with either of these countries is fallacious. We are not a country of large accumulated wealth and of incomes derived from investments. Canadian incomes are derived mostly from personal earnings, and while there are many exceptions, the rule prevails generally throughout the Dominion. So far as I am aware the incomes of the professional and salaried classes throughout Canada have not materially increased since the outbreak of the war. In the case of many they have actually declined. This being so, it does not seem equitable to impose upon these the burden of an additional income tax—for they are taxed now upon their incomes by municipalities and provinces—at a time when owing to the war the cost of living has so greatly increased. If such a tax is to be imposed, it seems to me that so far as the great majority of Canadians are concerned, it might better be levied in time of peace, when the cost of living is again normal. It is further to be pointed out that the maximum amount which would be obtained from such a tax in Canada would in terms of Dominion finance be comparatively small and that its administration would require almost a second Civil Service sufficient in number to cover every municipality, rural and urban, throughout the Dominion. The cost of levy and collection of such a tax would be much higher proportionately than in a geographically small, wealthy, densely populated country like Great Britain or than in the United States, which although of the same area as Canada has twelve times the population and much more than twelve times our wealth. On the whole it would appear to me that the income tax should not be resorted to by the Dominion Government until its necessity becomes clearly and unmistakably apparent notwithstanding the drawbacks which I have mentioned. In connection with this tax it is also to be observed that the larger incomes in so far as they are not personally earned are derived in part from holdings in joint stock companies already subject to taxation under the provisions of the Business Profits War Tax Act. It must also be remembered that the Canadian public are voluntarily supporting the Canadian Patriotic, Red Cross, and other funds. The amount contributed annually to these funds is much in excess of the amount likely to be realized from any income tax. It is true that some wealthy men do not contribute their fair share to these funds. But this would also be true in any scheme of income taxation especially with issues of Dominion bonds exempt from Dominion taxation.

The question of further revenue then narrows down to abnormal profits made by business firms during the period of the war and this in my view is the proper and legitimate source to which to look for increased revenue to meet the increased cost of the war. If a business is making, in war time, profits above the normal, they must be due to the abnormal conditions created by the war, that is to say such a business is deriving advantage from the war. It follows that it may properly be required to contribute a share of such profits to the Government for the purposes of the war. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, that it makes much much difference whether the business in question is the making of munitions or of any other class. Munitions are needed and no discredit attaches to the enterprise which provides them. The steel company which engages in the production of munitions could in most cases make as much if not more money by selling its steel products in world markets. Moreover, it would be inequitable to discriminate against the firm which makes a profit upon the finished article known as munitions and leave untaxed the profits (it may be equally large) of those firms which manufacture and supply the raw material or partly manufactured products from which they are made, or the businesses throughout the country which make abnormal profits from the distribution of money expended by Governments in payment for such munitions. If higher profits are made in the manufacture of munitions the higher the tax taken under business profits legislation.

In accordance with the principle which I have enunciated the Government last year imposed the Business Profits War Tax. Under that legislation profits in excess of a certain percentage upon capital invested were taxed to the extent of twenty-five per cent of such excess. This measure has proved quite successful, not the least of its merits being the small cost of its administration which will probably not exceed one-half of one per cent upon the amount collected. In view of the increasing interest and pension charges due to the war and believing this to be the true source to which recourse should now be had for further revenue we propose to extend this tax by taking an increased share of profits.

We propose to take from persons, firms and companies liable to the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, fifty per cent of all profits in excess of 15 per cent but not exceeding twenty per cent per annum and seventy-five per cent of all profits in excess of twenty per cent per annum upon capital. That is to say up to fifteen per cent they will be liable to the existing legislation and in addition we shall take one-half of their profits between 15 per cent and 20 per cent and three-fourths of their profits beyond 20 per cent. The increased tax will chiefly affect manufacturers of munitions and other war supplies. While the percentage of excess profits which is taken is large, sufficient is left to provide incentive to effort on the part of all subject to the war tax.

[Sir Thomas White.]

The new legislation will apply to the last accounting period of the three year term provided for in the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, namely, to all accounting periods ending after December 31, 1916, I am unable to estimate what amount will be derived from this taxation as it will depend upon the condition of business during the year. It will however give us without doubt a very substantial additional revenue.

Before leaving the question of taxation I desire to say that the measures we have adopted have necessarily broadened in their scope as the war has progressed. No one has at any time been able to forecast the length of the war. It has now lasted nearly three years and the end is not yet in sight. Should another year be added to its duration with the consequent increase in our financial burden new sources of revenue must undoubtedly be sought. In seeking for these it should I am sure always be kept in mind that Canada has been in the past and will likely be for many years in the future a country inviting immigration and capital to develop its resources and contribute to its prosperity. Especially should we in considering taxation measures for the period following the war keep in view the desirability of the flow of settlers and of capital to Canada not being retarded through fear on their part of heavy Federal taxation.

Canada's War Loan.

The question of our financing since the last Budget was fully explained and discussed in the first part of this session. During the recess we successfully floated the third Canadian War Loan, an issue of $150,000,000 five per cent, twenty year bonds at 96. The public response was most gratifying, the issue having been oversubscribed to the extent of about one hundred million dollars. The proceeds of this loan will enable us to finance both ourselves and the Imperial treasury in respect of expenditure in Canada until June. It is my present intention to arrange then for an issue of notes or treasury bills and if conditions are favourable offer another war loan in the early fall.

Since the outbreak of war we have floated in Canada domestic loans aggregating $350,000,000 and have in addition furnished $150,000,000 through our chartered banks to the Imperial Treasury to meet its commitments for munitions and supplies purchased in Canada. Everywhere, I believe, this is regarded as a very notable achievement on the part of Canada. It has not only made possible our participation on a large scale in the war but it has in greater measure than we realized brought about the present state of prosperity in the Dominion. Without the aid afforded by the savings of our people the expenditures which have been made in Canada by both Governments for supplies and munitions could not have been made, so that those who have saved have benefited not only themselves but the entire community. While our national saving during the war has been gratifyingly large it is not so great as it should have been and to-day no better advice can be offered to the public than to exercise the strictest thrift and economy. Every additional day the war lasts makes this individual and national duty the more imperative.

Canada's Trade 1916-17.

No aspect of our affairs during the war is more striking than the vast increase which has taken place in our international trade. The aggregate of our imports and exports (excluding coin and bullion) for the fiscal year 1912 was $841,000,000; for 1913 $1,063,000,000; for 1914 $1,090,000,000; for 1915 $958,000,000; for 1916 $1,309,000,000. For the year ended on March 31 last, the total international trade of Canada reached the enormous total of $2,043,000,000.

Mr MICHAEL CLARK: Would the minister kindly give us a statement of the exports and imports?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend does not mind, I would prefer to give them in committee. I have them here, but I cannot conveniently lay my hand upon them. This, Mr. Speaker, is nearly double the volume of the largest trade in the history of Canada before the war. Equally notable with this huge increase in volume is the change which has taken place in relative amounts of imports and exports. For 1912, the balance against us was $125,000,000; for 1913, $309,000,000; for 1914, $180,000,000; for 1915, $36,000,000. For 1916, we had for the first time in many years a favourable balance of $249,000,000. During the last fiscal year this favourable balance increased to $314,000,000. Figures such as these indicate a very prosperous condition within the Dominion. It must however be steadily kept in mind that the higher prices obtainable under war conditions for our national products and the output of our industrial plants of war supplies and munitions are chiefly responsible for this extraordinarily favourable condition of our external trade, and that with the cessation of the war dislocation of industry and modification of prices are bound to ensue. I take it that it is unnecessary for me to mention the large increase in our exports due to our grain and other commodities sent abroad by us and the high prices which have been and are being obtained for them. I said that, with the cessation of the war, dislocation of industry and modification of prices are bound to ensue. The only safeguard against these conditions is saving on the part of all who are now engaged at good wages and are in a position to save and the careful husbanding of their resources by firms and companies engaged in business. The position of most businesses in Canada is now thoroughly sound and it is for their proprietors, with the prudent watchfulness of their bankers to keep them in that condition. The sources of danger to business in war time are speculation in commodities and stock exploitation on the exchanges. With these avoided and national savings greatly increased we might look forward with confidence to whatever may occur in the reconstruction period after the war.

We have no tariff changes to propose.

To carry out the taxation proposal which I have announced and certain necessary amendments to the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, I beg to give notice of the following resolution which I shall move in committee:

RESOLVED, That it is expedient to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, by providing:—

1. That in any business taxable under the Act where the annual profits exceed fifteen per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to fifty per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said fifteen per centum but not exceeding twenty per centum per annum, and where the profits exceed twenty per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to seventy-five per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said twenty per centum, and such increases in the tax shall be levied against and paid by the person owning such business for each and every accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen;

2. That for the purposes of the said Act, the actual unimpaired reserve, rest or accumulated profits held at the commencement of an accounting period by an incorporated company shall be included as part of its capital as long as it is held and used by the company as capital;

That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on and from the eighteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen;

3. That the tax shall be paid each year within one month from the date of the mailing of the notice of assessment;

4. That with respect to every business liable to taxation hereunder the period for which the returns shall be made and during which it shall be liable for assessment shall be at least thirty-six months, commencing with the beginning of the first accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, 1914, or for such less period as the business may have been carried on from the beginning of the said accounting period to the end of the period for which the said tax may be levied under the said Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, circumstances have conspired to make it impossible for me to give any close study to the financial operations of the Government during the past year, and I therefore cannot discuss many of their phases which are usually debated when the annual statement of the Minister of Finance is under consideration. Consequently, my remarks this afternoon shall be of a very general character, and, I trust, brief. I am sure we all can at least congratulate the Minister of Finance on the brevity of his remarks this afternoon, and I only regret that I cannot promise the House to imitate his example myself.

The speech to which we have just listened is a statement in a very compact form of the trade and financial conditions of the country during the past twelve months, but beyond that I think it may be said of the speech that it is disappointing for what it does not contain. At the present time, the Canadian people are anxiously interested in many pressing matters of an economic nature, and they naturally expected from the Government some reference to the same, or some intimation that consideration was being given them. Considering the world-wide conditions of to-day, it is gratifying, not only to friends of the Administration, but to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and to the people generally, to learn of the volume of our import and export trade and the buoyancy of our revenues. At the beginning of the war one could hardly have expected the conditions which prevail to-day. One would have been optimistic indeed to anticipate the commercial condition which at present exists throughout the country. It is gratifying indeed to learn that during the past fiscal year our total trade amounts to over $2,000,000,000, and that our revenues reach the sum of $230,000,000. One might, however, also say with accuracy, that it is disappointing that our revenues are not larger than they are, but this I shall make reference to later.

[Sir Thomas White.]

While, in a general way, these trade and revenue figures indicate a pleasing activity in the trade and economic affairs of our country, we must remember that they are largely artificial and do not represent a normal or healthy condition, a condition that will endure for long in this country. The high prices which prevail to-day alone account very largely for the increased total money value of our export and import trade. Our revenue, which, after all, is almost wholly derived from our imports which are dutiable, is in turn made possible by our export trade In other words, it is impossible for this country to have imports unless it has exports, there is no way by which we can pay for our imports other than by our exports. It is, therefore, important and desirable to understand the clear relation which exists between our export trade and our general commercial and financial conditions.

If we study our export trade it will be seen that our fortunate position is largely the result of the misfortunes of our Allies, a circumstance which should impress upon us the necessity of contributing now, in our days of prosperity, to the cause for which we are fighting. The taxation of war profits, and the securing of revenue should not be postponed for a year, or two years, but should be accomplished now to assist in defraying the large expenditures which the country is making on account of the war.

The Minister of Finance was exceedingly fair this afternoon in disclaiming any credit for himself or the Government for the great increase in our total trade, which amounted, he said, to over $2,000,000,000. I wish to give the House a few figures to show how this large volume of trade is dependent upon war conditions—in fact, attributable to the war almost entirely. I am not giving these figures because I think hon. gentlemen around me are not aware of the fact, but rather because there is a tendency on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends, sometimes in the House and sometimes outside, to ascribe to themselves and the Administration credit for the great growth of our domestic and external trade. During the present session of Parliament the Minister of Finance, in answer to a charge from this side of the House that the Administration lacked leadership, practically ascribed to the Administration the credit, or a very large share of it, for the great development of our trade. He said:—

Years ago we used to talk of the total trade of Canada as being $500,000,000. The year before the war the total trade of Canada, exports and imports, amounted to $1,000,000,000, and we congratulated ourselves upon the fact. It was wonderful that the total trade of Canada should be one-fifth of the total trade of Great Britain. Canada was coming on. For the first six months of the year just past the total trade of Canada exceeded $1,000,000,000, which was the high-water mark for the year preceding the war, and this year we shall have a total trade of over $2,000,000,000. And yet my hon. friends say there is no leadership. Of course, being modest men, we give the credit to the public. If my right hon. friend had found a condition like it he would take the credit for the party. We say that under our administration the favour of Providence, and the energy and intelligence and patriotism of the Canadian people, all these things have been accomplished

The Minister of Finance was good enough, in apportioning the credit, to associate with the Administration a bountiful Providence and a generous, intelligent and patriotic Canadian people. He failed, however, to apportion the exact values to these three agencies, but I suppose that our friends supporting the Government would, under urgent circumstances, take great care to give the Administration the major proportion of the credit, and a very small share to a bountiful Providence, and to a generous, intelligent and patriotic people. I almost feel like apologizing for occupying the time of the House in referring to this matter, but I wish to remove, if I can, the impression which hon. gentlemen opposite frequently seek to give the country that this great growth in our volume of trade is due almost entirely to the efforts of the Administration. I shall now give a few figures to indicate how directly war conditions are responsible for this trade development.

4 p.m.

According to a return furnished on my motion some few days ago, I find we exported for the nine months of the fiscal year ending December 31, 1916, in value $22,959,000 of explosives, whereas in 1914 we exported only $228,000 worth. In guns, rifles, cartridges, rifles and ammunitions we exported $160,310,000 for the same period in 1916, whereas during the year 1914 there was exported but $143,921; $5,187,000 is the money value of chemicals exported in 1916; it was less than a million dollars in 1914; $4,419,000 represents the value of our exports of automobiles in 1916, as against nothing in 1914. Very large increases over the years before the war, were maintained last year in the export of horses, wheat, steel, iron, and the manufactures of iron and steel. The excess of exported manufactured goods in 1917 over 1914 will alone amount to over $300,000,000.

I trust that hon. gentlemen will not consider that I am unnecessarily consuming the time of the House in seeking thus to accentuate the fact that our abnormal trade development is almost absolutely the result of unfortunate war conditions, that it is not a healthy or normal development, and that it must cease with the ending of the war, which we all hope will be soon. So, really, it does not afford us much ground for unbounded gratification. It is rather a situation of gravity, for the future at least, and contains many features demanding our serious consideration. Friends of the Administration are therefore not in a position to ascribe to this Government any credit or glory for this abnormal trade development.

I wish to say a few words with respect to our income and expenditure during the past year. According to the statement of the Minister of Finance this afternoon, our revenue from all sources during the past year was $230,000,000, $134,000,000 of which was derived from customs, $24,000,000 from excise, and $12,000,000 from the business profits tax. Our expenditure in consolidated revenue account and capital account combined amounted to $170,000,000. This leaves a surplus of $60,000,000 to be applied against war expenditure. We are also informed by the Minister of Finance that our war expenditures up to the end of last year had reached the tremendous sum of $600,000,000; and he anticipates that at the end of the present fiscal year our national debt will amount to $1,300,000,000. This will entail an interest charge of about $65,000,000 a year. There will be a pension account also of about $25,000,000 a year. That is to say, there will be fixed annual charges of from $90,000,000 to $95,000,000, or more than the total revenues of Canada from taxation in any year since Confederation, except for about five years and these all in the latter part of the last decade. We find that the war is costing us over $1,000,000 a day. Now, I think that, if one were to go carefully into the figures it would be found that our contribution from revenue to war expenditures thus far has been less than $60,000,000. Against the surplus of $60,000,000 which we have to apply to war expenditure at the end of the last fiscal year this year, there was a considerable deficit in 1914 which must be reckoned into the calculation. I speak subject to correction, but I think we have paid considerably less than $60,000,000 on account of our war expenditures from the beginning up to the present time. Now, it is a fair question to put to this House and to the country: With our expenditures on war account, great as they are, and with this country so prosperous, whether it is satisfactory that we should have contributed out of our revenue toward that expenditure only $60,000,000 or less? Are we now doing our full duty, or are we leaving too much to the future to pay? I believe that we are borrowing too much and paying too little.

There are facts which should be carefully considered in this connection. After the war, we shall have a national debt of from $1,300,000,000 to $1,500,000,000, with charges for interest and pensions approximating, as I have already pointed out, $100,000,000 a year, which must be paid and for which the people must be taxed. We shall have a smaller supply of capital, interest rates will be higher, and the productive capacity of the country will be less. The transition from a state of peace to a state of war was made easier in our case by the absorption of men into the army, but the transition in the reverse direction will be complicated, not only by the discharge of munition workers from their employment, but in addition there will be the demobilization of the army. These are important facts and should be considered in discussing the question whether we should or should not now tax ourselves more in order to pay a greater portion of our war obligations than we are paying. We must further remember that the immense expenditure for war which is being added to our debt is unproductive. It leaves us richer in ideals and in history, it is true, but in a monetary sense the expenditure is unproductive. If the amount which we are obliged to borrow for war purposes were expended in the construction of railways, the development of agriculture, and the establishment of industrial enterprises, it would add to the productive power of industry and trade thus making it relatively easier to meet interest and sinking fund charges upon the debt. With these things in mind, is the Government policy with respect to taxation for war expenditure the correct one? Is it one which is approved by the best judgment of our people? Are we not handing down to posterity the obligation to pay too largely for our patriotic performances?

Taking the position, as I do, that we are not presently contributing sufficiently to war expenditures, I realize that hon. gentlemen opposite will naturally inquire what suggestion hon. members on this side would make, what policy they would propound. In the first place I assert, and this is but a repetition of what we on this side have said on every budget deliverance of the Minister of Finance since the beginning of the war, there should be further retrenchment in civil expenditure so as to leave a greater amount to apply to war expenditures, thus minimizing the additions to our debt. We have presented this view in the past, generally and in detail, and there is no necessity for me to repeat at length these arguments, nor do I intend to do so. Some little improvement has been made, and I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have reason to feel gratified that their criticisms in this respect in the past, have borne some fruit at least.

Our consolidated fund account expenditure for the last year amounted to $122,392,000. Our interest charges and pensions, due to the war and payable in the last fiscal year, amounted to $14,500,000; at least that is what I make it from an official statement furnished me, although I understood the Minister of Finance to say this afternoon that it amounted to $25,000,000. But, I think $14,500,000 represents the actual additional amounts chargeable to war and paid on interest and pension account for the year ended March 31 last. If you deduct this $14,500,000 from the $122,392,000, the total amount of the consolidated fund expenditure last year, you have a net consolidated fund account expenditure of $107,482,000, not a cent of which is attributable to war. The question naturally arises, and I put it to the House, if that is a fair amount for this country to expend in war days, a sum which is above the amount expended for similar purposes in days of peace, and when the country was growing and developing in population and in wealth, and when every branch of the public service was adequately fed. In 1910 our expenditures on consolidated fund account amounted to $79,411,000; in 1911 to $87,774,000 and in 1912, to $98,161,000. These were prosperous days in Canada; they were days of peace. Am I making an extravagant statement when I say that in the year ended March 31 last, having in view the circumstances and conditions prevailing, $107,482,000 was an expenditure for ordinary purposes which was unnecessarily excessive. If that had been reduced to the amount of the expenditure in 1910, our surplus for this year, instead of being $60,000,000, would have been over $80,000,000, and that we would have reduced the national debt to that further extent.

On previous occasions I have discussed with some particularity the financial operations of some of the departments of Government. I find that still there is very little reduction, if any, in many departmental expenditures, and it is very difficult for me to understand why this should be so, because in several of these departments at least there is not the peace time activity, and there is not accordingly the necessity for the same volume of expenditure as in days of peace. I find that our Immigration expenditures for 1911 and 1917 are practically the same, the difference being only $68. In 1911 I suppose our immigrants numbered 300,000 or more—I am speaking from memory only—last year our immigration did not much exceed 50,000. The quarantine branch expenditures are practically the same as in peace days notwithstanding the fact that at our national ports we have no immigration. I suppose if one took the time to inquire why there was no diminution in the expenditure of this particular branch of the Government one would find that at the ports of Halifax, St. John and Quebec we have quarantine officers who are being paid the usual salaries which they received in peace days, notwithstanding the fact that there is absolutely no immigration at any of these ports, and there has been none practically during the last three years, yet these quarantine officers, I believe it would be found, are being paid for services which are not performed. The expenses of administration of the Indian department are a little larger than they were in 1911, a circumstance which is difficult to understand and more difficult to explain. The Dominion Lands expenditures to-day are greater than in 1911 notwithstanding the fact that our lands entries in the Canadian Northwest are necessarily far below those of peace days, the natural result of the loss of immigration. In the Public Works Department there was last year a very substantial reduction, a reduction which should have been commenced immediately after the beginning of the war. I might inform the Minister of Finance that the Public Works Department made unnecessary expenditures in 1915 and 1916 which will exceed the amount he will likely obtain next year from the taxation proposals which he announced to-day. We find that public works expenditures on consolidated fund account are still practically spending what it was in 1911. I have not the figures before me, but they are somewhere about $8,000,000. I repeat what I have said on many other occasions when discussing the budget that there is no reason why the expenditures of this department should not be very much reduced below what they were last year, and they were very considerably below what they were the previous year. I find that the Post Office Department expenses were greater than in 1911, or 1912, by about $6,000,000. I do not intend to refer to the departmental expenditure at greater length. I have said what I have largely to again impress upon the Government if I can the fact that the method of procuring money to meet war expenditures and to keep the national debt down to the minimum, is to retrench in our civil expenditures, and I submit to-day, as I have oftentimes done in the past, that there is an opportunity for a saving of $25,000,000 in that field, which is a very substantial sum, and it should be saved.

It should be said that very substantial reductions have been made in two or three branches of the public service; but they were forced reductions, they were unavoidable. For instance, in the fiscal year ending in 1917 the expenditures on account of the militia were $3,800,000. In 1914 the expenditures for militia were $11,000,000. Here we find a saving of over $7,000,000 in one department alone. That, of course, was a forced reduction in expenditure. It was inevitable, it was unavoidable. Similar reductions have occurred in respect of the naval service, in respect of steamboat mail subsidies; and were it not for the fact that in respect of these three branches of the public service savings aggregating ten or eleven million dollars, have been forced, there would have been, in reality, no reduction in the civil expenditures of the country as compared with the expenditures of former years.

One cannot but ask: Why are not some very substantial reductions being made in our ordinary expenditures? I think I have established pretty clearly, and pointed out, I trust, in a very fair way, that there is an opportunity of administrative retrenchment which would amount to $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, and naturally I ask: Why is this not done? I submit that if the Government made up its mind to be bold and strong in the crisis and to part company with patronage and party considerations, this could be done, and that if patronage and party considerations were eliminated from war expenditures we would be relieved of adding to our public debt a sum which would approximate over $100,000,000. The announcement of the application of $60,000,000, being the surplus, towards the reduction of our war expenditures was received with much gratification by hon gentlemen opposite. But that is no proof or evidence of proper administration upon the part of the Government. The statement I make is that instead of the application of a surplus of $60,000,000, there should have been an application of a sum of considerably over $100,000,000, and that would have been more gratifying still to hon. gentlemen opposite, as it would have been to hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House.

Upon the occasion of the Budget debate last year, we received from the Minister of Trade and Commerce some encouragement that hereafter there would be an elimination of party and political considerations in the expenditure of public money, particularly in these days. I should like to read to the House, in order that hon. members may not forget, the very noble utterance, the solemn exhortations, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon that occasion directed largely to his own colleagues in the Government and his friends behind him, in respect to this phase of public affairs. He said:

> Now, as to patronage, I have been thirty-four years in public life; I have been a pretty close student of political parties and political history in this country, and I have simply this to say—I give it as my individual opinion—I have long felt it and I feel it now—that in the whole course of my political life I cannot point to a single instance where political patronage ever raised the status of the bench, ever promoted the efficiency of the Civil Service, ever helped to economy in administration or enhanced the status of public administrators, no matter what functions they performed, ever helped a member of Parliament in reality, or ever strengthened a Government in reality. On the contrary it almost always causes the dry rot and disintegration that break up government after government and party after party, and I wish now, in the white heat and light of this great contest and struggle and the self-sacrifice that we are called upon to make, that we might speak from the heart out, and make an agreement in this country between both parties, that hereafter patronage shall not be applied by political parties in the administration of our public services.

I had hoped for much from these remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, given to the House last year. I had hoped that he would have been a powerful influence in translating this solemn exhortation into actual practice. I had hoped that he would have exercised a favourable and compelling influence upon his colleagues towards the elimination of patronage and waste in respect to Government expenditure. But, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been on many and on long journeys since then. I fear he is absorbed in visionary occupations which consume too much altogether of his time and energy and which apparently up to this date have all been barren of result, so far as the good of the country is concerned. It would seem that the solemn injunctions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce last year and the practice of the Government in this respect are practically two separate currents, running in absolutely opposite directions and seldom, if ever, gliding into one another. A great gulf, I am sorry to say, separates the preachments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the actual practice of the Government in this respect to war expenditure during the year that has just closed. In respect to war expenditures I wish to submit, though I do not propose discussing the matter in detail, that we still find partisanship and patronage entwining their vulgar forms around the beautiful administrative ideals which the Minister of Trade and Commerce held up to our adoration last year and which he exhorted the Government to adopt.

I notice upon the Order Paper a Bill standing in the name of the Minister of Railways, entitled "An Act to Encourage and Assist the Improvement of Highways." I have not seen the Bill, but, according to the newspapers, it involves a contemplated expenditure of $10,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In these war times?

Mr. MACLEAN: $10,000,000. I say that this Bill is for the relief of the Government, not for the relief of highways. It is founded not upon public policy, but upon party exigencies. It cannot but shock all sensible people to find that in the existing circumstances the Government proposes to introduce a bill involving an expenditure of $10,000,000—an expenditure which, by the way, they do not intend to make this year, or next year. I shall lose my confidence in the judgment of the people of my country if they approve of the action of the Government in bringing forward for the approval of Parliament at this present moment a measure of this character. Perhaps the measure is not the Government's; it may be that of the Minister of Railways, who has a reputation for inflexible determination to turn neither to the right nor to the left when he undertakes anything. This is an admirable quality and I admire it wherever found. Sometimes, however, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is diabolical in his pertinacity and determination to swerve neither to the right nor to the left. He recently drove a whole family almost to political suicide in my province; there is one constituency in the province of Nova Scotia which does not know whether or not it is represented in this Parliament. This Bill involves an expenditure of $10,000,000. The Government have no policy, no scheme, no plan worked out in regard to this proposed expenditure; I venture the assertion that the matter has not received from them five minutes' consideration. They have had no conferences with provinces or municipalities, or with men who are expert in highway construction. They do not know whether they could go to the money markets of the world to-day and borrow $10,000,000 if the purpose of their borrowing were disclosed. Further, they could not expend one single dollar of that money this year if it were voted to them this minute by Parliament. If they attempted to do so it would be nothing less than utter and wicked waste. I assert that the purpose for which this Bill has been placed upon the order paper at this stage is to meet party exigencies. I do not say that at the proper time, under proper conditions and safeguards, when the Government shall have given mature consideration to the matter of assisting the highways of our country, such a policy would not be a beneficent and truly wise one; but at this moment, without these safeguards and without these conditions existing, it is not a wise proposal. If the Minister of Railways has not yet spoken to his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as to the propriety, financially and morally, of asking for this legislation, I would suggest that on the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce from Washington he should enter into a serious and solemn conference with that colleague and obtain his opinion in regard to the matter. I hardly think, however, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he still entertains the altruistic ideas which he propounded to the House about a year ago in respect to public expenditures, will approve the proposed scheme.

I have spoken at some length as to the propriety of husbanding our financial resources which are derivable from customs, excise and our special war taxation. The question naturally comes to one's mind: should these sources of revenue be supplemented? From what I have already submitted to the House it would logically appear that our revenues should be supplemented in some form or other. How far should a Government finance a war by loan and how far by taxation is a very interesting question and a somewhat difficult one to answer in precise terms. All countries engaged in war at the present day or in times past have been obliged to consider this matter. In the case of Canada, inevitably we must do a great deal of borrowing, but it is an important question for consideration as to how much of war expenditure we should secure by taxation. It is my opinion that the impression is deep-seated and widely prevalent in Canada that a vast quantity of substantial wealth and income is not contributing to the revenue of the country for war purposes. In my personal experience I have found men who really feel that they are not contributing out of their abundance more than they do towards the payment of our war expenditures. Concerns and individuals who are enjoying unprecedented profits and incomes due to the war are not in many cases reached at all in the matter of revenue for war purposes. The limit which the poor can pay is soon reached. They may be fairly prosperous, but that will be short-lived, and there is this to be remembered as well: their incomes buy no more, perhaps less, than it did before the war. I submit, as a sound principle of taxation, that of the money needed by the state, the rich should contribute more than the moderately rich and the moderately rich more than the poor, and that the amounts contributed should increase, not proportionately, but progressively, as wealth increases. There is a great distinction between financing a war by loans and financing it by taxation. In financing by taxation the rich and the moderately rich bear the whole burden of the charge placed upon them at the time. Under the loan method they are compensated by taxation laid on all sections and classes of the community which future generations must pay as a reward for the patriotic conduct of those who have been good enough to loan money to the state. We have spent now in connection with the war some six hundred million dollars, and, at the very most, we have paid but sixty million dollars. Is that sufficient? It is not sufficient; there should be more taxation and less borrowing, that being the proper policy to pursue in the circumstances. The scope of the Business Profits War Tax Act should be widened, as it is a fair matter of complaint on the part of many of those who are already taxed under that Act that there are many other concerns and partnerships which barely fail to qaulify within the Act as taxpayers, but which should be contributing something. In many cases their profits exceed the profits of companies and concerns which are taxed under the Business Profits War Tax Act. It is very hard to answer that criticism because, as the minister himself stated this afternoon, any businessman or concern that is to-day making a profit, is doing so almost entirely owing to war conditions, and therefore, as the minister put it, such profit is fairly a matter of taxation.

I shall not, at the present moment at least, analyse the announcement made by the minister this afternoon in respect to additional taxation under the Business Profits War Tax Act. I would, however, point out to him that it would have been far better had he last year imposed this taxation under that Act to the same extent as he proposes to do this year, because the profits earned by those liable to taxation under that Act were very much greater last year than they will be this year, or than they will be next year. Many concerns in Canada manufacturing munitions which made large profits last year are not likely to make very much profit this year and are likely to make much less the next year. The minister states that if the war continues, the Government will probably have to make a further levy of taxation upon business profits. The time to secure all you can as a tax on business profits is when the maximum profits are being earned, because it is useless imposing taxation when such profits have practically ceased to be earned. It is in the day of prosperity that he should secure by taxation the maximum amount, and he should not wait until the last days of the war, when the financial conditions of the country will not be as they are to-day, to impose fresh taxation in the hope of securing additional revenue. If he does so, I believe he will fail.

I wish to refer briefly to that portion of our revenue which is secured by taxation upon imports. At the beginning of the war or shortly afterwards, the minister brought into effect amendments to the tarriff, imposing seven and a half per cent surtax upon the general tarriff, and seven and a half per cent upon non-dutiable goods. This application of the seven and a half per cent tax was made indiscriminately, and I said then and I say now, I am of the opinion that it was not in the interest of the country, nor of the revenues, to have applied the seven and a half per cent tax indiscriminately as he did. In the one case to the general tarriff and in the other by applying it to free goods. Were one to take the time to study carefully the result of the imposition the seven and a half per cent upon the general tarriff, one could, I think, show that it has yielded little or no revenue. I find in the Customs returns for 1916 at page 192 sets forth that the tariff war tax yielded $21,-814,000, and I take it that that statement in the Customs returns means that the $21,-814,000 came from the seven and a half per cent super tax on dutiable goods and the seven and a half per cent tax on free goods.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What year was that?

Mr. MACLEAN: The year ended March 31, 1916. I find that in that year free goods were imported to the amount of $254,312,000, and seven and a half per cent on that would yield about $19,000,000, so that it would appear that out of the total revenue of $21,-814,000 received from this source, $19,000,000 came from free goods and practically nothing came from the imposition of the seven and a half per cent super tax upon imports already dutiable. If that statement be susceptible of any explanation, I have no doubt we shall have it. As a matter of fact, however, I think it was always anticipated by the Minister of Finance that he would get little revenue by reason of the imposition of the seven and a half per cent super tax on dutiable goods, but that he would get a substantial revenue from the imposition of the seven and a half per cent tax on free goods. If it be the case that the imposition of the seven and a half per cent super tax on dutiable goods is yielding little or no revenue, it should be removed, it does not promote trade interests it rather impedes trade. It adds to the cost of articles essential to life to-day, now oppressive in prices, thereby involving a great hardship to the masses of the people. I submit there should have been some readjustment of the tariff this year, and what more natural than to expect a remission of the surtax of 7½ per cent upon the general tariff. Why should it not be removed, in some cases at least? If its imposition was intended virtually to prohibit some classes of imports, which might at present in some cases be desirable, I would not object. It might be justifiable to continue the present duties on luxuries. Speaking generally, however, I say that the imposition of the 7½ per cent surtax was a mistake in the first place, and I think in justice to the people of this country it should be removed, or modified at least and this would have been a proper time for the Minister of Finance to act in that respect.

The Minister of Finance was considering the question of tariffs quite recently, from motives of party welfare I have no doubt, and not in the interests of the state, and by subterranean paths rather than by direct routes. I am sure it must have been a veritable Gethsemane for him when the hon. gentleman who now sits at his right hand (Mr. Meighen) returned from the West a few days ago and informed him that he must enter into a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The Government have, in fact, entered into a statutory reciprocity treaty with the United States, terminable at the will of either country, in respect of wheat and flour, which have been so long the subject of discussion in Parliament and the country. If the Government are truthful men, and speak after intelligent consideration of the matters upon which they assume to guide and instruct the public, I suppose now, in view of this arrangement, we must expect Canadian wheat to lose its identity, Canadian eastbound and westbound traffic to be very much injured, if it does not altogether cease to exist, the flour mills of this country to be ruined and go into the hands of receivers, and this country to become, for a time at least, the back-door of Chicago. But if the Government are not true prophets, and the prevailing view in Western Canada is correct, we shall all be benefited temporarily, and later this temporary arrangement will inevitably be made permanent.

5 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under which flag?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not going to say very much about the placing of wheat on the free list, because there are many gentlemen on this side of the House who are better informed on that subject than I, and they propose discussing the subject in this debate. I have only one word to say about it. This statutory treaty, was negotiated and put into effect under the War Measures Act. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that by no flight of the imagination can any man truthfully say that that Order in Council was properly a war measure.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was a death-bed repentance.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was a political measure prompted by partisan motives almost entirely, I venture to say. It involved an amendment to the tariff of this country. Now, in our Customs Act, we have ample machinery for doing exactly what was done by this Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act. At any rate, Parliament was about to meet; the representatives of the people were soon to assemble in this forum to deliberate on all matters of interest to the country, and in fairness and justice to the people, who are the masters, I say this change in the tariff should have been announced here by the minister. He should have given Parliament his reasons for the change here to-day; the representatives of the people should have heard from his own lips the reasons which prompted him to make this move, so that we could determine whether or not he was justified in making it.

Mr. GRAHAM: His reason for the change is sitting right beside him (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I doubt very much if he had authority under the War Measures Act to pass the Order in Council. I have not given the matter much consideration, though I propose to do so later on, but I doubt very much if the Order in Council is within the spirit of the Act, and I am afraid my hon. friend had no legal authority for passing the Order in Council. Indeed, I doubt very much whether the United States will accept the Order in Council as the equivalent of placing wheat and flour on the free list. I doubt if in the end they will permit our wheat and flour to enter the United States duty free. It is certainly not within the spirit of the conditions contained in their tariff Act. I doubt whether the proper authority in the United States responsible for rulings on tariff questions will consider this Order in Council as placing Canadian wheat and flour on their free list in the sense intended by the United States Tariff Act. However, this matter will be discussed later on. I assume that hon. gentlemen opposite consider that the passage of this Order in Council will result in some benefit to the producers of wheat in western Canada. I assume they had that in mind when the Order in Council was passed, although not so much as they had in mind party considerations. But if they thought it would benefit the West, why was not the Order in Council passed last autumn? Would it not have done more good then than to-day, when last year's production has been largely disposed of, although no doubt a considerable portion of the crop is still held in the West. But if it was a good thing to do at the beginning of the seeding season of 1917, would it not have been a better thing to do at the beginning of the harvest season of 1916? Will the Minister of Finance or his colleagues explain upon what grounds the Government refused to place wheat and flour on the free list in August or September last, when it was urged just as strongly then as now? How long does the Government expect that this Order in Council shall remain effective? Do I understand the minister and the Government to say that as soon as the war ends this Order in Council becomes void?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Order in Council has precisely the same effect as an Act of this Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN: We understand one another, I think. When the war ends the Order in Council ends.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, the effect of that Order in Council is to place wheat, wheat flour, and semolina on the free list, and they remain on the free list until a change is made by or under the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am glad to have that as the opinion of the Minister of Finance. I suppose it is the view of the Government. But from the proposition stated by the minister I entirely dissent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the hon. gentleman wishes, I can give him the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, whose opinion is entitled to some weight.

Mr. MACLEAN: It is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does the minister say that these articles can be removed from the free list only by the authority of Parliament?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Wheat, wheat flour, and semolina have been placed on the free list by Order in Council, which Order in Council has precisely the same authority as an Act of Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: So far, so good.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The effect of that Order in Council remains until some other disposition of the matter is made by or under the authority of this Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The minister does not say, by Act of Parliament?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the hon. gentleman wants a legal opinion, and if he will permit me, I will read the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice on this matter. It is as follows:

> I have considered upon your suggestion the effect of the Order in Council of 16th instant, whereby His Excellency the Governor General in Council directed under the authority of the War Measures Act, 1914, that wheat, wheat flour and semolina should be transferred to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty of customs.
>
> Section 6 of the War Measures Act 1914 confers upon the Governor in Council very comprehensive powers to make such orders and regulations as he may by reason of the war deem advisable for the peace, order and welfare of Canada, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict, it is declared, that these powers extend to all matters coming within certain classes of subjects specially mentioned, among others, "trade, exportation, importation, production, and manufacture." It is provided, moreover, that all such orders and regulations shall have the force of law.
> This section has always been interpreted and acted upon as intended to confer legislative powers, and I am of opinion that that intention is expressed with sufficient aptitude, and that therefore the legislative powers of Parliament, within the purview of the section, have been delegated to the Governor in Council. Moreover, having regard to the narrative of the Order in Council, the power executed in the sanctioning of the Order in Council, appears to fall very clearly, not only within the general description of powers, but also within the special enumeration to which I have referred. Therefore I am of opinion that the Order in Council became effective as from its date permanently to remove the duty imposed by the customs tariff from wheat, wheat flour, and semolina, and that these products accordingly become free of customs duty, and will remain free unless fresh duties be imposed by or under the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the date of that memorandum?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is dated 17th April.

Mr. MACLEAN: I have great confidence in the legal acumen of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and ordinarily I should defer to his opinion; but in this matter, I submit with confidence, the opinion which he has given the minister is an erroneous one, if it is contended that the opinion is to the effect that the Order in Council extends beyond the end of the war. I believe that the Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act ends with the war. And if that be true the houses of Hohenzollern and Hapsburg have as much to do with the termination of this Order in Council as have the Government and the people of Canada. The letter which has just been read is to the effect that under section 6 of the War Measures Act ample authority and power is vested in the Governor in Council to pass the Order in Council in question. That is a debatable question I submit, though I do not deny that there is room for the position taken by the Deputy Minister of Justice. But I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to section 3 of the Act, which is as follows:

3. The provisions of sections 6, 10, 11 and 13 of this Act shall only be in force during war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended.

That is, when the war ends, Section 6 is no longer in force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But what is done under it is still in force.

Mr. MACLEAN: Not at all. That is an absurd position, I submit, for my learned friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) to take. Perhaps I should not say "absurd"—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me ask the hon. gentleman a question. Under the War Measures Act we are expropriating the Ross rifle factory. Will he say that when the war is over that factory reverts to its former owners?

Mr. MACLEAN: No, because nothing is left to revert.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The factory would still be there.

Mr. MACLEAN: The powers of the Government were exhausted to the absolute extinction of the title of the Ross rifle property in its former owners.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But not of the factory.

Mr. MACLEAN: Under this Act it is explicitly stated that the provisions of section 6 on the cessation of the war shall no longer be in force. An Order in Council cannot remain alive unless it is based upon some living statutory authority. That is the rational, the reasonable construction of the Act. It was never intended that the War Measures Act should permit an amendment of the Customs Act that should continue in operation after the cessation of the war. At the most it was intended that this power should be extended to the Government temporarily and during the continuance of the war, and during that time the Act and possibly the Order in Council is in force. Therefore, I say, this Order in Council with respect to flour and wheat is in operation only during the war and terminates with the ending of the war. If the Minister of Finance intended that these products should be placed upon the free list, there was a positive and direct way to accomplish that end. He should have proceeded under the Customs Act. He could have announced an amendment to the Tariff Act to-day in this House, and in that very instant of time the amendment would have become operative throughout the whole country. I always anticipated that it was the intention of the Government that this Order in Council should be operative only during the war. The Parliamentary Secretary for External Affairs (Mr. Hugh Clark), speaking recently at Montreal, stated that it was proper to do this for the United States, because now she was our ally. Now, it seems the logical inference that when the war is over and the United States is no longer our ally in war, the reason for the Order in Council having ceased to exist, the Order in Council itself will automatically pass away. The Parliamentary Secretary for External Affairs evidently entertains the same view I do about the scope of the Order in Council.

It was for these reasons that a few moments ago I ventured the statement that the passage of this Order in Council was not a declaration of settled policy, but was a matter of party and political manoeuvring forced upon the Government by their friends from the western provinces. The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is not as astute as the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Railways is a plain, blunt man who goes directly to his objective point, but the Minister of Finance has more experience and skill in finesse, and he will endeavour to achieve his point, not always by direct, but if needs be by indirect and circuitous routes, if to him it seems politically more advantageous. Had the Minister of Railways been as astute as the Minister of Finance, he would have introduced his Highways Bill under the War Measures Act. The Highways Bill will be designated by the people of Canada of both parties as a piece of political manoeuvring, and the Minister of Railways will likely go down in history as a pure politician. The Minister of Finance attempted to amend the Tariff Act by means of the War Measures Act, and his friends will claim that he is a patriot. That is the distinction. It shows that they were brought up in different schools. The one is the product of the methods adopted on King street, Toronto; the other is the plain, old-fashioned, product of the school of North Bay, Ontario.

If this new reciprocity treaty is to be stable, and if it represents a declaration of public policy on the part of the Government, then it will have the hearty approval of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. If it is to be in force during the continuance of the war only, and is terminable at the will of our enemies, or at the moment we accomplish their defeat, or if it was enacted, as it would appear to have been, as a purely party and political expedient, it is to be condemned by every right-thinking man in this country. This is not a time to play fast and loose with such a matter as our tariff. These matters should be dealt with by open, frank and proper methods. It appears to me that it was never intended that this Order in Council was to represent the real economic policy of the Government upon a vexed issue; I believe it to be a pure party and political measure. If the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) desired for the people of the western provinces, whom he represents in the Government, that they have permanently the advantage of the American market for their wheat and flour, he would have suggested and insisted that the Order in Council be based upon, not the War Measures Act, but the Customs Tariff law, or better still, that the amendment to the tariff be made on the floor of Parliament by the Minister of Finance when he was delivering his annual budget. I am not saying that if this Order in Council is to be effective only during the period of the war it will not be of some benefit to the western producers of wheat, but I do say that it will be more beneficial to them if they know that it is to be permanent. You could not encourage the western wheat producer to grow wheat under this Order in Council if he knew that it ended on the 30th day of June, 1917, if the war should then end. You must have the element of permanency in anything to ensure the full measure of benefit, and particularly in an Order in Council of this character.

Mr. LALOR: Is the hon. gentleman aware that wheat is 27 cents a bushel to-day higher in Winnipeg than in Chicago?

Mr. MACLEAN: If the hon. gentleman says that is a fact I accept his word. I am not endeavouring to argue that phase of the question at all. If the price of wheat is 27 cents a bushel higher in Chicago than in Winnipeg then I say, let the western farmer feel that he is likely to reap that advantage permanently.

Mr. LALOR: I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood me; what I said was just the opposite. I said that in Winnipeg it was 27 cents higher than in Chicago.

Mr. MACLEAN: Well, I suppose my hon. friend will then say to his friends and the Government that the passage of the Order in Council was a foolish thing. Now, they give a further reason for the passage of this Order in Council and I want to read it to the House. This is a most astonishing thing as it appears to me:

> And whereas it is desirable at a time when a special appeal is being made for increased agricultural production to supply grain and food stuffs to Great Britain and her Allies which now include the United States of America,—

It would appear that the Order in Council was passed to encourage the production of wheat and flour in this country so that we might help our ally the United States. That is what that portion of the Order in Council which I have read seems to suggest. I suppose it was inserted for that purpose. If so, it is deceptive, because it does not truly set forth the facts. The United States is a great producer of wheat, as we are, and our Allies, Britain, France and Belgium look to the United States as they look to us, to exert our utmost efforts to see that sufficient food products are grown this year, next year and the following year after that, whether the war so long continues or not, in order that the needs of the Allies, present and future, may be met. The Order in Council is based in part on the theory that the rich and powerful republic to the south of us might need our wheat and our flour, and as our ally and for her possible succor we should encourage the production of wheat in this country. That is a proposition I cannot subscribe to. The United States has just entered the war. She has dedicated her life and her fortunes, everything they have, and everything they are, with the pride of those who knew that the time had come when they were privileged to spend their blood and their might for the principles which gave them birth and happiness, using the exact words of President Wilson

And they came in at a very opportune moment for the Allies. They came in with $7,000,000,000 to start with, an amount almost equal to the total gold supply of the whole world. I do not think it is fair to say in that Order in Council that we should necessarily encourage the production of wheat in the Canadian provinces for our new and mighty Ally, the United States. Our wheat is not vital to her life, I trust. If they want wheat they are willing to buy it and pay for it as a commercial transaction.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN: While the Government were considering the matter of amending the tariff under the War Measures Act, which was an objectionable method, I say they should have considered further amendments to the tariff. The Minister of Finance was sweating great drops of blood and undergoing terrible agony when he consented to the new reciprocity treaty to satisfy his friends of the western provinces, and he might as well have considered the abandonment of further items of tariff taxation, limited though it might be, to encourage agricultural production, which is needed now and in the next few years to come. Should the war fortunately end during the current year, as I trust it will, there would still exist a great necessity for increased productions in all the food-producing countries of the world for 1918, and the same will be true of 1919 and 1920. The world will be fortunate indeed if it escapes a famine, not only during the days of actual war, but after the days of peace come and the armies have been restored to their several countries. Any Government policy should be predicated not upon the demands of to-day or to-morrow, or of this year, but upon those of several years to come. Talking production is waste of time unless we encourage and assist as far as we can those who are engaged in agricultural pursuits. The removal of duties upon fertilizers, farm machinery and all the instruments of production would be of considerable advantage in these years to the men who are exhorted by Governments and by business men and by everybody to increase their productions. Even if you did it under the War Measures Act, it would be evidence of good intention at least. But we observe that there is nothing in the speech which has been delivered by the Minister of Finance to indicate that he has given any consideration whatever to aid in this manner increased production.

In many other respects much might be done to encourage production. There might be a reduction in freight rates upon all the commodities which are instruments in production, such as farm machinery and fertilizers. It would not be a difficult matter for this country to arrange in one way or another, even if it were paid for out of the treasury, to have the freight rates reduced upon these commodities which are so essential in production. It would assist in the accomplishment of the end which we all desire. Then I think the Government might very well insist upon a preference in transportation for such things as seed, fertilizers, farm machinery, etc., in view of the existing congestion of traffic. If we desire to actually increase production it is only a fair suggestion that there should be some preference in transportation in view of the congestion and the many restrictions to-day placed upon transportation, in order that we might thus encourage the men whom we are continuously and persistently exhorting to increase production for the good of this country, for the welfare of humanity, and for the great cause which we have at heart. Further, would not a reduction, or an elimination entirely in many cases, of the duty on high-priced articles of necessity be of advantage to the Canadian consumer to-day? Would it not widen the field of competition and assist in the restoration of more healthy trade conditions and thus restrict the possibility of manipulation of prices and the withholding of products from the market? Every other protectionist country in the world has since the beginning of the war reduced or removed entirely the duties upon food products. This is the only country in the world, I think, which deliberately undertook to increase taxation upon the actual necessities of life, even food products, when the 7½ per cent was added to the general tariff in 1915. I think I may fairly be justified in expressing my surprise that nothing has been done by the Government in this direction. Apparently they have not taken into consideration at all the doing of anything to relieve the distress and anxiety of so many of our people in respect to the high cost of living. Nothing has been done. A commission was appointed some years ago to inquire into this matter, but, instead of being called a commission to inquire into the high cost of living, it might more properly be described as a commission to inquire as to what was the cost of the living of the dead. They have been engaged upon this investigation for a long time now, and it looks as if most persons in this country who might be interested in that report will probably be numbered among the dead before any report is made. An Order in Council was passed not so very long ago delegating to the provinces and the municipalities the power of investigating, and, in certain circumstances, taking action where it was found that the prevailing prices were unfair and unjust. That was not a serious attempt to meet the situation, I submit. It is purely a jest. It was never intended as a serious act in respect to a very serious and vital question to the people of this country. I am perfectly justified in designating that Order in Council as an intended jest.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that there were many things not contained in the financial statement of the Minister of Finance which the people of this country might naturally expect to find in it. But I do not propose prolonging further my remarks at the present time. My colleagues upon this side will amplify and add to all that I have ventured to address to the House this afternoon in my imperfect way, and I shall no longer continue my remarks upon the motion of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I rise, Sir, because, in the first place, I think it would be unfortunate for this debate to collapse at this moment without some attempt to bring home to the Parliament and to the people of Canada the exact financial position of the country as a result of the war; some conception of the magnitude of the problems which have arisen during the war and which are, no doubt, present to the mind of the hon. Minister of Finance, as, indeed, he indicated in very, very brief references in a very brief speech.

I cannot, Sir, quite join in the congratulations of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to the minister on the brevity of his speech. I myself believe in a brief speech; it is, as a rule, more effective than a long drawn-out harangue. But a Budget speech may be so brief as to be almost perfunctory. We have been accustomed for years in this House, in dealing with trade questions in the Budget, to hear our Finance Minister of either complexion of politics, in stating the figures of the trade, go into a little detail as to what part of it constitutes exports and what part of it constitutes imports; as to what part of the trade takes place with the United Kingdom and what part of it takes place with the United States, the two countries with which, of course, we do the vast proportion of our trade. That is one of the items in which, I venture to say, the speech of my hon. friend was brief almost to the point of being perfunctory. I can join, however, my hon. friend, the junior member for Halifax, in his congratulations to the minister on the favourable statement he has to make to the House as to the mere figures of the trade of the country and as to the prosperity we are enjoying at the present time. I join equally my hon. friend in the warnings he gave the House—warnings which were not needed by the minister—as to the transient nature of that prosperity and as to the peculiar way in which our trade has been increased.

Let me repeat, that it would be a misfortune if this debate had been allowed to collapse at the present moment. I do not think that the minister's speech, apart from dealing with the mere figures of our trade at the moment, can be considered a satisfactory statement of the financial conditions of the country; nor yet did it afford evidence of any idea in the mind of the minister or in the policy of the Government, as to the necessary steps which must be taken to deal with the terrible problems which are before this country and which have been referred to in a measure by my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax. Take the one figure that was given to us by my hon. friend from Halifax, that of a yearly interest charge of $65,000,000 which has already accrued as debt interest alone in this country since the beginning of war. When I reflect, Sir, that the total income and expenditure of Canada for all purposes was much below that figure twenty years ago, I cannot but think that as we are approaching the end of the war—we all hope so, anyhow—the minister might have given some evidence of the steps and the policies which will be necessary to deal with such interest charge and with the other innumerable problems which have already arisen out of the war and which will increase as the months go on.

The Minister of Finance closed his statement by saying that there were no tariff changes in the Budget. Well, as my hon. friend from Halifax has pointed out, that is not the way we get our tariff changes nowadays. In other words, if we are to apply the arguments which we heard in the country six years ago from my friend the Minister of Finance and from every gentleman on the other side of the House whose speeches I have perused—and which we have heard from the minister in very recent times—we have been annexed to the United States by an Order in Council. Our railroads and our railroad services have been automatically twisted north and south by those who swore upon a hundred platforms that so far as they could they should never run any way except east and west. Well, if my hon. friend the Solicitor General and the Deputy Minister of Justice are right in their law—or, rather, I ought to say, if my hon. friend from Halifax is right in his law and the Order in Council lapses at the end of the war, I can only trust that the annexation will lapse then also.

I would not like to be in the position of the Minister of Finance on this question. He and I have had many good-natured bouts across this floor, and I do not think any one in the House has a greater admiration for many of his qualities than I have. But I must say that there is one of his qualities which I would not want to emulate, however much I might admire it. I have had far too little experience myself as a quick-change artist to envy his position at the present time. I cannot help recalling that only in the last session of Parliament my hon. friend delivered a speech one hour and three-quarters in duration—and that was quite a long speech, much longer than the Budget speech; one of his speeches upon which the member for Halifax could not have congratulated him on the quality of brevity—in which he gave the reasons why we should not have free wheat. What changes this war has brought about! I recall a special sentence in the first speech which my hon. friend delivered in this House. After having told us how his party had been put in power by the assembled and serried hordes of men behind him from the province of Ontario and how he had got the support of all classes in that province, he turned to us and said: "Would it not be the part of wisdom, the great province of Ontario having spoken in this way, for hon. gentlemen opposite to accept the verdict?" And now he himself, by an Order in Council, has torn the verdict to shreds and tatters. What changes, Mr. Speaker, this war has brought about! But I should be the last man to quarrel with the change, and here I offer my hearty congratulations to the minister. I hail with pleasure anything in the way of freer trade, come from where it may, and I offer the minister my hearty congratulations, as I do also upon his increase of direct taxation announced in his Budget statement.

I know, in answer to the comments that I have been making, that it will be said by some hon. gentlemen opposite—they have already been saying it in the country—that this free wheat is a mere war measure, and they leave the people of Ontario to infer that it will disappear at the end of the war. The Minister of Finance and the Solicitor General do not feel disposed to take that course; and if they do not, I shall give them credit for courage and honesty; but the fact remains that hon. gentlemen opposite are saying on the public platforms now that this is a war measure, and the inference is that it will disappear after the war is over. Something of that meaning must have been in the mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce at an interview he gave on the status of the change. He made one of those curious statements that only he is capable of producing, when he said: "This is removed from the realm of trade." When I read that statement, two thoughts occurred to me: the first was, if it was removed from the realm of trade, into what realm was it removed? I wondered whether it had gone into the realm of science or astronomy or some realm of that kind. The second was, that we are dealing in wheat with the United States, disloyal though that may be, especially in this time of war. The keystone of the arch, as my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) said in the debate six years ago—I remember what he said because I followed his speech—is gone. We are dealing with the United States, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that this thing is removed from the realm of trade. Had he been here, I would have asked him what realm it has gone into. Then I would have gone on to ask him why a Minister of Trade and Commerce should rejoice in any act of the Government being removed from the realm of trade. To an ordinary man like myself, a Minister of Trade and Commerce ought to be a man whose endeavour is to promote trade, but the gentleman who holds the portfolio of Trade and Commerce at the present time might be better described as a minister to prevent trade. He went to the Antipodes and came back without paying expenses as the greatest commercial traveller in the world. On his way back he stopped off at Japan, but I do not know that our trade with Japan has increased by reason of his visit, and I do not know of anything he has done to increase the trade of the country; and now when the Minister of Finance, aided by the advice and assistance of the Solicitor General, brings in a measure for the establishment of free trade in wheat with the United States of America, the Minister of Trade and Commerce rejoices in the fact that it is removed from the realm of trade. It will be said that this is a war measure and the inference will be drawn. I suppose every one says it is a war measure; that this is being done under the War Measures Act. If it be that, then I think even as fair an opponent of the Administration as I am myself, or as fair a critic of the Administration as I claim to have been, is entitled to point out that a little tardiness has been shown in producing this measure. The war has been in existence for two and three-quarters years. Surely, if it be only a war measure it should have occurred to the Administration sooner. The war was in a very active state a year ago when the Minister of Finance delivered a speech lasting an hour and three-quarters, telling us why we could not do this very thing. If it be a war measure—and we are all interested in war measures and in their success, I call you to witness, Sir, that no man can charge me with having taken much interest in anything else than the war for the last three years—why was it not put into force at the beginning of the war? My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has pointed to the fact that nearly every country at war made tremendous tariff changes almost immediately the war began. Take Germany, our great opponent in arms, but the exemplar of hon. gentlemen opposite in tariff matters—at least until lately. I really hope they will not go to Germany. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will not even call them Germans; he always refers to them as " Huns." What an illogical thing it would be for a civilized gentleman in the twentieth century to do—to go to the " Huns " for a fiscal policy. I should be sorry to do it myself; I would rather go to free England. That, however, is by the way. What did Germany do in regard to these matters? I read:—

On September 17, 1914, His Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen forwarded a list of the articles in respect of which customs duties had been suspended by the German Government up to that date.

From some points of view these Huns are a pretty wide-awake people, for this was done within six weeks of the commencement of the war.

[Mr. M. Clark.]

This list, which is a lengthy one, includes inter alia: Bread, beans, butter, eggs, poultry, edible fats, fish, meat, prepared alimentary products, cereals and flour, potatoes, cheese, cattle, pigs and sheep, and margarine.

The Board of Trade have also a copy of a German proclamation dated March 8, 1915, which temporarily suspended the customs duties on a large number of other articles, including certain fruit, game, arrowroot, sago and tapioca, sugar and yeast.

Let me say that similar changes were made—and almost as early—in Austria-Hungary, France, Italy, and in non-belligerent countries, such as Portugal and Spain. In Sweden customs duties on wheat and wheat flour—the very change to which my hon. friends opposite have become wide-awake after the war has been in existence for nearly three years—were suspended in December, 1914, when the war had not been in existence six months. I think it is fair to give the history of what these countries have done and to indulge in the reasonable criticism that, if this is to be defended as a war measure, then the Government must, with that defence, receive the condemnation of having been at least two years and a half too long in introducing it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer) (resuming): Mr. Speaker, the war will pass. It is taking a long time and has brought heavy burdens and large problems, but it will pass. But the problems arising out of it, I venture to predict, will remain as long as the breath lasts in the body of the youngest member of this House. When I arose this afternoon it was with the serious purpose of endeavouring to contribute my humble quota to the financial principles which I believe will need to be followed by this country through its responsible ministers, of whatever political stripe they may be, if we are to deal satisfactorily with those problems within the present generation of men. I believe there will be such a change brought into the life of our country by the experiences of the war, and especially when our soldiers return, our soldiers who have gone in numbers which no one would have predicted was possible for Canada before the war, that our people will not be content with any perfunctory handling of these problems. They will demand that our public men shall go to the roots of them, shall study the needs of the country, and the economic principles which are necessary to solve those needs.

I want to lay down four principles which I believe will guide our statesmen of the next generation in the solution of these problems. These principles will compel themselves to be adopted by our statesmen, whatever they may call themselves, Liberal, Tory or Independent. The first of them has nothing novel about it, but there must be something good about it, for it has always had very strong supporters in this House. I know that in enunciating these principles to my hon. friend the minister of Finance, I not only have one of the aptest minds to impress that Canada has at the present time in her service, or has had at any time so far as my knowledge of those minds goes, but from his utterances today I know that he is partially converted to my views already, and to the extent that he is not converted he has such an agile mind that I know his conversion will be simple if the conditions are at all favourable.

The first principle that I want to emphasize was dealt with at considerable length and in very great detail by my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) this afternoon. It will be absolutely necessary to economize to the utmost extent in the moneys of the country. Since Confederation, as far as my reading of Hansard has informed me, every party in this country when in opposition has preached ecomomy and I am afraid it is equally true that every party in office has practised extravagance. That is a very lamentable record for the people of this country. There are two reasons why that record will be broken after the war. I believe, Sir, for a time conditions will be so bad that there will not be the money to spend, and that is a sure way of curing a man of extravagance. I indicated the other reason a moment ago, when I said the people of this country will be so chastened, so changed by the war, and will direct such close attention to the proceedings of Parliament that they will no longer be content to watch the struggle between the ins and the outs, but will demand that sound principles be applied to finance and to the public policy of the country generally.

We have ten governments in this country; ten prime ministers for seven millions of people! Heaven save the mark. Ten sets of cabinet ministers, and ten sets of legislators. That is a pretty formidable thing just as I have stated it, but when you have each of these governments spending far more money than they should, I submit, Sir, that public extravagance has become in some of its aspects, the most serious problem and the most serious evil in the public life of this country. I do not want to say more under that head. I am perfectly certain that what I have said finds a resting place in the mind of every serious hon. gentleman in this House. It must do so, because the moment they get into Opposition they say exactly what I am saying, and have said so ever since Confederation.

The second principle which I want to lay down, and which will be forced upon the attention of our finance ministers, is that wealth must contribute more largely to the expenses of the Federal Government than it has ever done in the past. My hon. friend the minister indicated that this afternoon; he bases his proposed taxation in this Budget, as he did in his last, upon that principle. But I am not quite satisfied with the extent to which he is carrying his principle out. I am sure he means well, and I am sure the country recognizes that he has brought to the greater problems that have arisen during the course of this war a very acute mind and a very great knowledge of financial technique, and I am sure he has done what is perhaps the best thing that any man can do in this world: he has brought to the discharge of his duties an enormous amount of energy, continued application, and hard work. I say that with the very greatest pleasure, and I believe that it is generally recognized throughout the nation. But when I reflect that the business tax imposed last year, with all its retroaction, raised only $12,500,000, I do not think any one will seriously claim that wealth is making anything like its proper contribution in this day. towards the expenses of the Government. It is making no contribution comparable to the services and the sacrifices of the men in the trenches, and the generosity of the whole of our people, from the poorest to the wealthiest, in their private capacity, in support of the Belgian Relief, Red Cross, and Patriotic Funds, and in the hundred other ways that money has had to be raised in the course of the war. Compare that sum of $12,500,000 with the enormous increase in our trade, as revealed in the figures of the Finance Minister, especially the enormous increase in our export trade. What, Sir, do those tremendous figures mean, figures running into the hundreds of millions, carrying our trade at once very close to the $2,000,000,000 mark? Those figures mean what we all know they mean from other sources of knowledge. They mean that there are men making enormous sums of money at the present time out of munitions and other war supplies, because of the enormous expansion of our trade, and I submit that the sum of $12,500,000 is an extremely paltry sum compared with the tremendous figures revealed by the trade of the country since the war began.

I was not quite content with the reasons, not heard for the first time, which the Minister of Finance gave for his want of belief in an income tax. He says our population is sparse. He forgets that in the year 1842, when Sir Robert Peel imposed his income tax, Britain was a very small country and had a comparatively sparse population. And after all, wealth is not entirely derived from the number of people in a country. Though our population is small, if we compare the resources in which our people operate with the resources that Britain has had at any time, we see that the boot is on the other leg. We have sources of untold wealth in Canada, if we but had the courage to embark upon a fiscal policy which would enable our people to use them.

The Minister of Finance referred to Great Britain and the United States as if they were the only two countries in the world which had an income tax. But Germany had an income tax before the war—it had to come to it; it found, as every country will find that follows tariff legislation, that a tariff is no good, that it is an effete and always dying thing. There was a proposal in the German parliament in the early portion of the year in which war broke out to increase the income tax enormously on the lines of graduation which have been followed for a good many years in Great Britain, which form of tax has produced such enormous sums of money for Great Britain since the war began. And some believe that it was in part their fear of this graduated income tax that led the junkers to engage in the machinations which brought about the war. I should like to impress upon the Minister of Finance that the example of Great Britain, followed seventy or eighty years later by the United States—and in a great many things we follow the United States in pretty close proximity—and followed later by Germany, will stand careful consideration upon his part. He was surprised that his business tax gave him so much money as it has given. If my memory serves me well, he was surprised last year at the results of other forms of direct taxation which he had introduced in the previous Budget. The fact is that direct taxes, in fairly prosperous countries, generally yield results that surprise the Ministers who propose them.

The hon. gentleman said that the greatest objection to an income tax is that it is inequitable in its application. He spoke in that connection of people drawing salaries, salaries not too high considering the high cost of living. I venture to think that if he would give the necessary accompanying relief in tariff taxation and so reduce the cost of living, a man receiving a salary would be far better off to pay an income tax directly, for then he would be able to buy the things he needs to keep his house going as cheaply as he can get them in the free markets of the world. That was the experience in Great Britain before the war. But, however the hon. minister thinks about it, either he or some successor of his will be compelled within the next half generation to get vastly more of the federal revenues from the wealthy men of the country than he has done by tariff legislation in the past. The hon. gentleman talks of the inequitableness of an income tax! There is no form of direct taxation that has ever been devised, or even dreamed of by the mind of man, that could be nearly so inequitable in its application as a tariff. The mischief of a tariff is that it gathers most of our revenues from the poorest of our people. In the presence of the sacrifices and sufferings of this war, and in the prospect of the better character that I trust our people will have in the way of unselfishness as a result of that war, is not the statement I have just made enough to raise a doubt in the mind of every hon. gentleman present, who thinks seriously at all, as to how long we can impose tariffs in this country. I say, a tariff takes the most of our revenues from the poorest of the people. Do I need to prove it? It is easily done. The habitant in Quebec with fifteen children pays federal taxes upon the little stockings and boots even of the smallest child, and on all they use and wear, until those children become self-supporting. But the wealthy bachelor, living in apartments, wears one pair of socks and pays duty thereupon. The poorest of our population have the largest families, and they pay more taxes than the richest of our population, so far as the tariff is concerned. An ingenious friend of mine told me to-day that if Mr. John D. Rockefeller should come to this country now, the poorest man in Canada with a large family would pay more federal taxes than Mr. Rockefeller would, in spite of the Minister of Finance's business tax, because the Rockefeller wealth is held individually and not through corporations. I give that statement for what it may be worth, but there is a great deal of truth in it anyhow, and it is a curious commentary upon the statement I have made, which statement is capable of the most direct proof. And the custom of raising revenues by a tariff has so seared the consciences of men that in the United States it was the custom to put a higher tax on the rough goods used by the poor than upon the fine goods used by the rich. That was the moral effect of the tariff, until the people grew so disgusted with it that they turned to a president with sense enough to lead them away from it, as President Wilson has been doing.

My third principle—and let me say there is a correlation, a distinct logical connection, between these principles which I am trying to bring before House in the most serious spirit—is that, we must maintain the foreign commerce of the country, and extend it. I think I can prove this from the minister's speech, brief as it was. He told us of the amazing prosperity that we were now enjoying, which contrasts very much with the conditions in Canada just before the war broke out. And in the next breath he told us that our foreign commerce had expanded in a way that no man would have believed possible a few years ago. Here we have two things—prosperity; foreign commerce. Of course, the hon. minister knows, and was perfectly candid in admitting, that the foreign commerce we are doing at the present time is largely artificial. Owing to no fault of our own, owing to circumstances in our conduct which will redound to the eternal credit of Canada, we are at war. We are obliged to borrow hugely because we are at war. We are at war in the best of causes, fighting for civilization and liberty. But Canada, though she is righteously at war, bears a striking resemblance financially to the man who has become hard-up and goes to borrow from a Jew.

He gets $50 or $100 and he signs a paper by which for the $100 he promises to pay in three months, shall we say, if he is a decent kind of a Jew, $112—pretty good interest—but it is only a decent Jew who would charge $12 for a $100 advance for three months. The man who gets into that unfortunate position is all right as long as the $100 lasts. One hundred dollars will carry him any way for a few days of the three months but £100 would probably be better for the whole period. But, if he gets through his £100, or his $100, at the end of two months the third month of the period is a pretty bad one for him and he is wondering where he will get the $112 to pay back the money he has borrowed. That is the position of Canada to-day, financially, not morally, and our trade is largely the result of that position. We are borrowing and are doing a trade that is absolutely artificial, that is promoted by the exigencies of war and that is not as big an increase in trade as it looks because of the rise in prices. It is very clear that if I were selling three hogs before the war for $10 apiece, and I am selling two now for $20 apiece, I am doing a trade which will look better in the value column but is not as good in the production column and certainly does not look as good on the breakfast table because, whatever our fiscal prejudices may be, most of us will admit that three hogs will feed more people than two. Our trade is artificially promoted by the exigencies of war.

But, is there not vast instruction, and needed instruction, along the lines which have been debated in this House ever since Confederation? Why, Sir, we are told that you need a tariff, and a long period of protection, to raise industries, to promote commerce and to create prosperity. Last year the United States created a record for all nations and all times up to the present in the financial value of her exports. She exported three billion dollars worth of goods. She was all the better able to do that because she had been gradually freeing her commerce under a fiscally enlightened president. Canada's figures as given to-day are simply marvellous. If we had exports comparable with our imports the exports must be marvellous. But, I venture to give the House a figure that is possibly more marvellous; before last year the record for export trade for all time was held by Great Britain and Ireland. There were two billion dollars worth of exports and that figure was reached in time of peace and not owing to the exigencies of war at all. How was that figure reached?—by promotion of foreign commerce. Two billion dollars' worth of exports from two little islands which could be put twice into my province of Alberta and you would have 30,000 square miles left, and with all kinds of material out of which she had to make the articles of export brought into the country, not even found there as we can find them in such rich abundance here! Shall we as Canadians, in face of a record like that, made in times of peace, be content to follow false fiscal ideals and keep our progress as slow as it has been? Why, Sir, I venture to think that if this country had the courage to face the issue and to apply those principles that it ought to apply, there is no reason why in ten years time Canada should not have 15,000,000 people and be the most marvellous country, or one of the most marvellous countries, in the world. That is my belief in Canadians, and it is my belief in Canada if they will not hamper it. You should increase foreign commerce, you should broaden it out, and you cannot do it by building a Chinese wall around your border. You cannot increase foreign commerce in that way. You must release foreign commerce by taking off the obstacles that prevent its expansion. You must down with your tariff wall and trust to freedom. Why should we not trust to freedom? That is what we are fighting for in Europe. We are fighting for freedom; our sons are dying for it, and we have shouldered the burden in order that the fight for freedom may be brought to a victorious end.

But you say: Oh, yes, but we are fighting for freedom from oppression by a foreign tyrant, for civil and religious freedom, for the freedom of self-government. But what is any freedom worth if you cannot sell in the best market the produce of physical brawn and sinew and effort? We must increase our foreign commerce. That is my next principle.

The fourth principle I want to lay down, and which I think should be easily understood by hon. gentlemen opposite is that we ought to make Canada fiscally as good a country to live in as is the United States. When I first talked tariff in this House (before my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was in it, although he was a keen observer of Canadian affairs at that time) and when I first talked free trade, I was told that by hon. gentlemen opposite that I did not understand this country, that I was up against a condition. It was said to me: Look at the tariff of the United States. Well, I am looking at it, but my hon. friends opposite have stopped looking at it. It is they who are up against a condition now. My contention on this point is that instead of telling us that there were no tariff changes in the Budget my hon. friend would have shown more fiscal enlightenment if he had put everything on the free list in Canada that is on the free list in the United States. That would be the natural outcome of the principle which was enforced upon me by my hon. friends opposite. That would be in accordance with looking at conditions like those of the United States and looking at the tariff of the United States. I have not made a list of the articles myself but I could give one that occurs to me. Why should we have a 30 per cent tariff on boots and shoes and have free boots and shoes in the United States? Is it because the boot makers of Canada are duffers? I am sure that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), would not admit that for a moment. Why should we have to pay 30 per cent on our boots and shoes with free boots and shoes in the United States? Does Canadian stubble not wear out the farmer's boots, and the boots of the farmer's boys, as fast as the stubble in the United States? Do our streets not wear out the boots of our poor people and of our salaried people that my hon. friend has such compassion for in the matter of an income tax? Do our streets not wear out our boots as fast as the streets in the United States? As a matter of mercy and justice to our own inhabitants why should we maintain a tariff like this? But, there is a deeper reason. We should always try to look at these things as patriotic men who want to try to make our country big and great. We are looking for immigration from the United States and the Director General is moving heaven and earth to get people in from the United States.

Talk about trucking and trading with the Yankees! We would not be convicted of trucking and trading with the Yankees on this side of the House. Bringing people from there and sending wheat there! Is reciprocity dead? It is the liveliest corpse that ever came out of a grave on a resurrection morn. We shall need people to develop our resources, to create wealth, which we shall tax in a direct manner, to produce the material which we shall exchange freely, following the example of the Mother country and leaving forever the example of the Huns. We shall need these people after the war. They might have had the encouragement that I am suggesting, and I really hope that my hon. friend will look into this before he brings in another Budget—according to the expectation of some people, he may not have opportunity to do that for a long while. But that is something that is in the lap of the gods and in the womb of the future. I hope he will study the question, anyhow, and that, if he does not, some successor of his will do so the next time a Budget is produced in this House.

I daresay that some of my hon. friends opposite would like to turn to me and say: Well you are a great bore; after all, your speech is just another exposition of free trade. Well it is, and what can one do but keep expounding what one believes to be true until it reaches the unenlightened, or those who do not want to be enlightened. I was told the same thing about free wheat. I got an immense encouragement from the recent history of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and every little encouragement, to a man who loves freedom as much as I do, will keep him going on preaching it as long as he is above the sod. It is an exposition of free trade, but I am afraid I have to give the House more than an exposition of free trade in these war times. I think that the war has afforded the greatest vindication of free trade that ever principle received in the history of mankind. I think so. I pointed out this afternoon that I was glad of the opportunity of putting on Hansard what had actually happened in other countries of the world in regard to fiscal policy since the war began. It is a very interesting study, this fiscal question, more interesting than any fiction if a man will only give his mind to it. The tariff conditions in the world at the time the war broke out were very interesting. It would have appeared at the time the war broke out that while Britain was wedded more strongly than before to her free trade policy, the Central Empires—Germany the leader of them—were more firmly wedded than ever to the system of protection. They had built up the system in Germany in a period of forty years. They had buttressed it in every conceivable way, and appeared to be wedded to it. But the moment the war struck them what happened? Well, this is what happened: that Great Britain stayed with her fiscal policy of freedom, fighting for freedom because she knew better what it was than any other country in the world. She appreciated it more—I mean in fiscal matters—and she knew that fiscal freedom and all-round freedom was worth fighting for. Little Denmark and Holland, each rather largely free trade countries and wonderfully prosperous as a result, did not need to alter their fiscal policy. They did not put any imposts on. Whereas Germany and Austria-Hungary and the neutral protectionist countries ran away from their fiscal policies the moment the storm of war struck them.

Mr. Speaker, when I go to sea I should like to go always in a ship that could stand rough weather—and protection is evidently no ship for sailing when the waves roll high. She is all right, perhaps, for foolish economic escapades on the part of young and inexperieced peoples when conditions are reasonably favourable, the breezes are favourable and things are good; but when a storm strikes her every principle she carries is jettisoned. Protection is deserted, their tariff walls are thrown down as I put on record from Board of Trade figures this afternoon. We are at the parting of the ways in Canada. We have these problems to tackle. Our people, I believe, will look more anxiously to us for the tackling of them than they have ever done before, and we shall have to choose whether Canada is going on along the line of freedom fiscally to get nearer to the Mother Country's example, or whether she is going to keep wallowing in the beggarly elements of the Hun's policies or former United States policies; whether she is going to keep decking herself in the worn out and cast aside garments of nations which have become more advanced and more enlightened. I put that to the House seriously, not in a contentious spirit, but with the love of Canada and hope for its future as strong in my heart as it can be in the case of any man not born in Canada. We shall have to choose.

Have we any other guidance as to the worthiness of the free trade ship? I venture to think that the greatest financial miracle of the war has been the financing of Great Britain. It has been a war of miracles; we live in marvellous times. We have lived to see the people of Russia apparently cast off in a moment, before anybody was looking for such a thing, the swaddling clothes and bands of autocracy and become one of the free democracies of the world. We have seen her reach her hands over the heads of the Allies and grasp the great democracy of the West to the south of us at a time when that great democracy, speaking the English tongue, is throwing in her lot with the British Empire and giving her guarantee not only of the winning of the war but of the results of the war being such as will be thoroughly satisfactory to every free man everywhere. But financially there has been no miracle in the history of the world like what has been accomplished by Great Britain in this war. It is something worthy of our study, and something which we should follow as an example. Germany imposed some direct taxation before the war. Last year, (that is in the year 1916), she raised £25,000,000 sterling by direct taxation, when she needed money worse than ever before in her history—£25,000,000. Before the war Britain's income had risen to £200,000,000, in times of peace. That is what Britain was raising by direct taxation before the war. Last year Britain raised £500,000,000 by direct taxation of her people—£500,000,000 as compared with £25,000,000 raised by Germany. And yet there are people living—I am not sure whether my hon. friend from Halidmand (Mr. Lalor) would not be one of them—who would tell us that the tariff is the enlightened line of business, and not this free trade policy that Britain followed. £500,000,000 raised in the middle of this war by Great Britain, one and one-half times the greatest previous income she had ever raised. Was there ever a financial miracle like that in the history of the world? At the beginning of the war Britain needed in the worst kind of way to buy munitions because she had not prepared herself for fighting on land. Many people say it was foolish of her not to have done so. Well, I do not think so, because if she had prepared to the same extent on land as on sea she would have been bankrupt before the war began—no country could have stood it. Britain's defence was on the sea. She needed in the worst kind of way to buy munitions at the commencement of the war. She was able at once to do it on an enormous extent in the United States because of the wealth that she had built up by her fiscal policy in the generations that preceded the war. She needed for the purpose of correcting her exchange, rapidly to convert her securities, British held in foreign lands, into money, and she did that at once. She was able to do that and correct her exchange because of the enormous wealth which she had invested in the United States as the result of having become so wealthy through a wise fiscal policy. She did all these things while Germany's finances, as I have shown you by a single figure, showed no elasticity whatever. In addition to that, we all know how she has financed the Allies. It is admitted by the first action in the United States as the result of the important conference that is now going on at Washington that Britain has borne the heaviest financial burden of the war. She financed the Allies; she kept the seas of the world open for the trade of the world. If it had not been for Britain's fiscal policy and Britain's wealth anl Britain's command of shipping, the United States and Canada would have had a very different record to show in the matter of exports from the figures I quoted to you a few moments ago. She has preserved the trade of the world, financed the Allies, raised an amount of money by direct taxation that never was attempted, much less done, by any other country in the history of the world. She has done all that, and she has been a prime factor with the other Allies, whose efforts I do not for a moment deprecate, in saving, as the Allies are saving, the freedom of civilization and the progress of humanity. She has done that because of a wise fiscal policy, which I submit to you, Sir, this young country and its public men ought to study deeply and honestly, and to apply to the management of Canada's own affairs.

Sir HERBERT AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine): It is always a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, for us to listen to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and to hear that he still stands four-square by the principle of free trade. I do not think, however, that he is making very many converts on this side of the House, nor have we reason to believe that he is making very many converts on his own side of the House. I confess that I was waiting for him to tell us in what manner he would raise the $135,000,000 that has been raised during the past year by the present tariff to meet Canada's expenditures. By what means would he undertake to raise that revenue, which we all know is so much needed? The hon. member for Red Deer loves to tell us that he is a pioneer along the road of enlightenment, but I am rather wondering whether he is keeping as close a touch as he should upon the old land. I am wondering whether he is interpreting the signs of the times quite as faithfully as we have been led to believe he has been accustomed to do. If we can judge from the symptoms that are being evidenced in Old Country legislation, the days of free trade in old England are numbered. The Old Country, which has been so often held up to us as a shining example of free trade, is, under the stress of war, and of unification of the Empire, beginning to find that the time may not be far distant when it may adopt to some extent a policy of protection that will enable Britain and all her overseas dominions, by reciprocal arrangement, so to help one another that the great British Empire will be stronger than it ever has been. So I was glad to-day when the Finance Minister, in making his Budget statement, did not deal with any further alterations of the tariff. When the question of free wheat was raised, I could not help feeling that our friends opposite were not altogether justified in considering that the action taken by the Government in this regard was a capitulation of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House so far as their views regarding reciprocity were concerned. It must be remembered that had the reciprocity pact gone through we Canadians would have lost control of our tariff; our tariff would have been regulated from Washington. As it is, we still keep control of the wheat and flour situation, inasmuch as we are taking advantage of a clause in standing legislation of the United States, and at any moment we can declare that wheat and flour shall again be placed on the protected list. We are in no way implicated in any arrangement that we cannot alter. Inasmuch as great events are probably pending; inasmuch as when this war shall be over new reciprocal trade arrangements may possibly be made throughout all parts of the British Empire, is it not desirable that Canada should not be tangled up with any other nation in such manner as to lose control of her own fiscal arrangements?

I rose not to discuss the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer, but rather to say a few words in respect to what was advanced by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) this afternoon. I did not intend to take part in this debate, but I could not quite allow all that he said in criticism of the Finance Minister and the Government and members on this side of the House to pass without challenge. He endeavoured to create the impression here and throughout the country that the present Government was not in any way endeavouring to exercise economy in order to hold the ordinary expenditure on capital and consolidated account within reasonable bounds. Now, those of us on this side of the House who since the war began have had occasion from time to time to make representations to our ministers urging that certain things be done in our constituencies have all certainly come to know that the war is on and that every ordinary expenditure that could be avoided is avoided by the Government. We have come to know also that the appointment of additional employees is discouraged. We have come to know also that the advancing of salaries is not frequent. We certainly, if the members on the other side of the House have not, have had brought to our attention daily instances of the economy practised by the Government. We have received the almost stereotyped form from our ministers: "Inasmuch as the war is on, it is not advisable to make any new expenditures, advances in salaries or things of that kind." We have only to take the figures as they are published to see that these professions are borne out by the facts. If the junior member for Halifax had presented to the House the comparative summary statement in the Estimates of the figures for last year and this year he would have been compelled in all fairness to admit that the Estimates for this coming year are by no means inflated. We find that even under very adverse circumstances the amount that this House is to be asked to vote this year out of the consolidated fund is less than it was asked to vote last year. That is not so outside. Every industry is increasing its staff; expenses are running up in every other walk of life; the expenses of railway companies are increasing. Every enterprise and industry throughout Canada is complaining that its expenditures in the way of salaries, supplies, and so on, are greatly increased. Yet we find that the Government on consolidated account purposes spending even less in the coming year than was spent last year. If we look over these figures more closely we find that there is still further reason for congratulating the Government on the evidences of economy that are to be found. If you turn to the summary of the Estimates you will find that an estimated expenditure of $182,359,000 is to be made on consolidated fund account in 1917-18 as against $183,956,000 in 1916-17.

First of all, it is necessary to notice that there is a great difference in the charges for interest, and you cannot blame the Government if the interest charges have advanced. We have borrowed money in order to carry on the war and the interest must be paid; that is something over which we have no control. In 1916-17, the interest charge was $39,649,000; while in 1917-18, the interest charge is $57,720,000, so, in order to make a fair comparison, we would have to deduct from those figures the amount of interest in the two years. That would leave $144,306,000 for the fiscal year 1916-17 and $124,639,000 for the year 1917-18. But there is another item that will have to be deducted in order to make a fair comparison between the two, and that is the expenditure for pensions. We voted $3,000,000 for pensions in 1916-17 and $8,375,000 for pensions in 1917-18. If you deduct the pensions for these two years, you make the contrast still greater; you find that the straight expenditure on Consolidated Fund was $140,900,000; while for 1917-18, it was only $115,875,000, or a difference of about $25,000,000. That is evidence it seems to me, right in the Estimates that are presented to this House, that this Government is endeavouring to reduce ordinary expenditure by cutting out every possible unnecessary expense; and when one considers how the world over, all evidence goes to show that everything is costing more than it did before, one realizes that the actual saving on the part of the Government far exceeds $25,000,000 per annum on ordinary expenditure.

The same is true in regard to Capital Account. Let us turn to the Public Accounts on page 90 and read the amounts that have been expended for some years past on Capital Account. We can go back for ten years which would bring us to 1907, in which year we spent $30,000,000 on Capital Account. In 1908-09, we spent $42,000,000; in 1909-10, $29,000,000; in 1910-11, $30,000,000; in 1911-12, $30,000,000; in 1912-13, $27,000,000; in 1913-14, $37,000,000; in 1914-15, $41,000,000; in 1915-16, $38,000,000; whereas last year, we spent only $27,000,000, and in the Estimates for this year, it is expected that we shall spend only $21,113,550 on capital account, so that since the war began the expenditures on Capital Account have been very much less than during the previous eight or nine years. I give these instances merely in order that members may see that when the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) criticises this Government for not having put the pruning knife into the Estimates and not attempting to save money on current expenditure in war time, he is hardly doing full justice to the efforts of the Government.

I noticed while the hon. member for Halifax was speaking, his criticism in advance of the presentation of the Roads Bill which is to be brought in by the Minister of Railways and Canals. I do not in any way wish to discuss that Bill before it has been presented, but I want to look at that matter from a different angle, and one which perhaps has not occurred to the hon. member or his colleagues on that side of the House. We are in a short time to face a great problem in the matter of returned soldiers. The unfit men are coming back gradually at the rate of a thousand or fifteen hundred a month, and they are being taken care of by the Military Hospitals Commission, and the commissions founded in the various provinces. These men, as far as possible, are being given positions and they will doubtless all be absorbed. The day, however, is coming when the war will be over, when there will be between two and three hundred thousand men who will come back to Canada in a short space of time and who will have to be absorbed. Out of the first 216,000 men who went overseas, 142,000 had been accustomed to manual labour before they enlisted, so that it will be necessary, as an after-war measure, to find employment for very large numbers of men who have practically no trade, but who depend for their livelihood on manual labour. A very large percentage of these men, it has been found, are not willing to go on farms, that being the experience of all the commissions which have been working in behalf of returned soldiers. Therefore, although great inducements are being given by this Government and the provincial governments for men to go on the farms, the majority will look for work similar to that which they were engaged in before enlistment. Consequently there will have to be provided in Canada during the interim period, while these men are passing out of military life into civil life, a large quantity of labour by which men who are fit may be able to earn their livelihood from day to day and week to week until they are absorbed in various lines of activities. For that reason, I would like to see the authority taken by this House to build roads throughout the country, and expend $10,000,000 for that purpose, even if it be only as a provision made in advance for the employment of men coming from the front who cannot be absorbed in agriculture.

9 p.m.

It ought to be very gratifying to this House to have the minister point out this afternoon that during the past fiscal year $60,000,000 of the amount that has been raised by taxation has been applied to war account. If we are spending a million dollars a day on war account, that would mean that we are paying about one-sixth of our war expenditure as we go along.

That would mean that a single year of war, at this rate, represents a debt that will take six years to repay if we undertake to pay that off after the war. With the increased taxation that the minister suggested this afternoon and with the increased economy which the Government intends to exercise, I do not think the figure which the hon. member for Halifax mentioned this afternoon as the figure that we ought to aim at, viz., $100,000,000 for war expenditure annually, is a figure beyond our reach, and I should not be greatly surprised if that $60,000,000 should be very largely increased in the course of the next twelve months.

The principle that the minister has propounded this afternoon in regard to the additional taxation will find very little criticism on either side of the House. The minister has laid down the principle that those who have should give; that those who are making large profits out of the war should be the ones to contribute largely towards the carrying on of the war. If you analyze the minister's proposition, you will see that is exactly what he has accomplished. I took the trouble to work out a sample case which, perhaps, will make this clear to hon. members and will make it possible for them to make it clearer when they are passing it on to others. Supposing you have a business with a capital of $100,000, and supposing that business, under war conditions, makes a profit of 25 per cent or $$25,000. How much will that business pay under the old arrangement and how much under the new? Under the old arrangement, the first $7,000 was exempt, the taxation being only on $18,000. Twenty-five per cent on $18,000 is $4,500, so that the net profit on the business that was making $25,000 would be $20,500 or 20½ per cent, and the Government would receive 4½ per cent of the entire 20½ per cent profit. Under the new arrangement, the first $7,000 is exempt as before, leaving $18,000 to be taxed. The first $8,000 will be taxed 25 per cent; the next $5,000 will be taxed 50 per cent and the next $5,000 will be taxed 75 per cent. That will work out at $8,250, so that out of the $25,000 earned, that firm under the new taxation will have to pay $8,250 or 8¼ per cent to the Government, and will retain $16,750 or 16¾ per cent. In other words, when the firm reaches the stage where it is making profits of 25 per cent and upwards, it will give to the Government nearly double the amount it did under the taxation prior to this measure. The House will admit that as soon as profits reach the neighbourhood of thirty to forty per cent, it is only right that the Government under the circumstances should take a very large proportion of that amount, and I have reason to believe that this measure will, in the course of the next year, while it may prevent the establishment of new industries of a war character, be received favourably and the extra tax paid without protest by the established companies who are at present making large dividends. I believe it will increase the $60,000,000 which the minister is now able to lay aside for war purposes to perhaps $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 this year. I think the people of Canada are to be congratulated upon the splendid way they have taken all war taxes that have come to them, without grumbling of any kind. When you part a man forcibly from a large share of his profits, you are not liable to get a blessing from him, but there has been very little grumbling indeed from the people whose profits have been taken to carry on the war, and as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) pointed out, it should be borne in mind that this does not begin to represent what the people of Canada have given for war purposes. I made a calculation not long ago that up to date the people of Canada have voluntarily contributed upwards of $40,000,000 to the various patriotic and benevolent enterprises that have been carried on during the war; every dollar of that was given voluntarily. In this calendar year I venture to say that the people of Canada will voluntarily contribute almost as much to carry on these patriotic works as the Minister of Finance will get by his special tax on profits. Certainly they contributed as much last year, and there is no reason to believe they will not do as well this year. So when we speak of what the people of Canada are giving to the war, we must remember that they are giving generously of their own free will, as well as what is being taken from them by taxation.

I have been indignant lately, on reading some of the speeches that have been made at certain political gatherings, more especially in my own province, to find a tendency on the part of some speakers to criticise this Government and hold it up to disparagement on the ground that the public debt is increasing. Of course the public debt is increasing; every man in Canada knows that, and every member of this House knows why it is increasing. Every dollar of war expenditure that has been voted has been voted with the unanimous consent of the House. The Bills that have been presented here for prosecuting the war have been endorsed by Liberals and Conservatives alike, with equal unanimity. It was known when those Bills were presented that the Government intended to borrow the money and spend it for war purposes, and that the amount would be added to our consolidated debt, and for any man to criticise the Government at this time because the debt is increasing is almost equivalent to saying we are doing too much in our time in carrying on the war to the maximum of our ability. If the money is not being spent properly, if there has been extravagance, if we are not getting one hundred cents on the dollar, or as nearly so as possible, the hon. gentlemen have the right to examine and criticise.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the only ground on which we criticise.

Sir HERBERT AMES: But to condemn the Government because these figures are growing from month to month is not a fair way of treating this question. The people of this country have responded magnificently in furnishing the moneys necessary to carry on the war. I had the privilege of speaking in New York and Washington recently on the part Canada is playing in the great war, and I assure you that the admiration of the American people for what Canada is doing in this war exceeded all expectations. They admire us not only for the men we have sent and the sacrifices we have made, but for the magnificent way in which the country has financed itself. At the commencement of the war we were under the impression that the only place to borrow money was in England. Almost all our funded debt was held there, a mere bagatelle being held in Canada, and the only loan we had floated in the United States was for purely domestic purposes, and we soon ceased to get money in that market. Since the beginning of the war, knowing we could not borrow money in England, and that we could not get money in America for war purposes, we have had confidence in our own people and have had no reason to regret it. It will always be a proud page in the history of Canada that when the Minister of Finance asked for $50,000,000 he got $100,000,000; when he asked for $100,000,000 he got $200,000,000, and when he asked for $150,000,000 he got $250,000,000. When this war is over perhaps two-thirds or more of our funded debt will be held by our own people, and if our securities grow in value as we expect they will it will be our own people who will benefit by that, and if anything goes wrong we will bring no one down but ourselves. So I think the country has reason to congratulate itself, and particularly have we reason to congratulate ourselves and the Minister of Finance on the magnificent way in which we have gone through the last year under conditions which have never been equalled in the history of Canada, or in any other land until this great war came.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat has told the House that he did not intend to speak on this occasion. Apparently, as the Government was worried over the way things were going, my hon. friend was put up to get them out of a difficulty, and it was very fitting that he should be selected for that task. For I remember in the year 1911, when the Conservative party found themselves in difficulties in the province of Quebec, and thought their only hope of salvation lay in an amalgamation with the Nationalists, it was the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) who was chosen to make the necessary arrangements between the Conservative party and the Nationalists in order to bring the party home to victory. My hon. friend, of course, was also the party who furnished the money on that occasion. It is only natural, then, that to-night, when the Acting Prime Minister seems worried and his colleagues beside him, that my hon. friend should be put up to get them out of their difficulty.

My hon. friend began his address by pointing out to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) that free trade in England was about at an end, and he spoke of certain legislation. I have not followed the legislation of the Old Land as closely, perhaps, as some other hon. gentlemen, but I fail to recall a single piece of legislation that has been introduced in the British House of Commons since the beginning of the war for the purpose of doing away with free trade in Great Britain. The hon. member for Red Deer gave a very able exposition this afternoon of what Great Britain has accomplished under free trade, as compared with what the Central Empires have done under protection. After the experience the British trader has had, and he is the cleverest trader in the world, of the value to Great Britain of free trade in this war, I do not think he will ever depart from the policy that has made Great Britain the greatest commercial nation upon the earth, and has enabled her to finance not only her own share of the war, but to help her Allies as well. Of course, there was a conference in Paris, and something was said there about trade amongst the Allies. But we have had talk about preferential trade within the Empire for many a long day. For one, I hope I shall never live to see the day when the good relations between Great Britain and Canada will be hampered by any written agreement or any preferential trade. The farmers of the West, the men who it is supposed, will benefit most by preferential trade within the Empire, have declared time and again that they do not want preferential trade, they do not want an increased price for their wheat which will mean that the labouring masses of Great Britain will pay more for their bread. I hope the present relations will always exist, Great Britain being left free to do what she likes with her tariff and Canada free to do what she likes with hers, the cordiality of inter-Imperial relations being left wholly unhampered by any written or hard-and-fast agreement.

My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, (Sir Herbert Ames) made one very peculiar statement. If I understood him, he said that if the reciprocity pact had passed in 1911 our tariff arrangements would be made at Washington instead of at Ottawa. Then, what does he think of the Minister of Finance who adopts exactly that policy to-day? Has the minister transferred the making of the Canadian tariff from Ottawa to Washington?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I endeavoured to make as clear as I could the point that under this arrangement of free wheat we had not in the slightest degree impaired our control of our own tariff.

Mr. TURRIFF: Under the reciprocity pact it was left open to either side to bring the arrangement to an end at any time. It is true that in this case of free wheat—and I will take up that subject more directly later on—the Government have so provided that they can bring the arrangement to an end even without appealing to Parliament. So they can use the free wheat argument as a vote-catcher for three or four months, while at the same time they can tell their friends in the East, the millers and the railroads, that it is only a temporary war measure which can be cancelled by Order in Council. But in fact they can do more even than that—they need not even pass an Order in Council. The matter has been looked into, and it is clear that the moment the war stops free trade in wheat under the present Order in Council comes to an end.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who told you that?

Mr. TURRIFF: A better lawyer than my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen)—or rather, as I do not wish to say anything objectionable, a lawyer in whose opinion I should have much more confidence than in that of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read the opinion of that lawyer.

Mr. TURRIFF: The hon. gentleman will get all the legal opinion he wants before this debate is finished. The hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, says that by putting wheat on the free list we are not following the example of 1911. But let my hon. friend consider the facts. In 1915 the wheat crop of Canada amounted to 370,000,000 bushels. That quantity of wheat at the price ruling to-day—say $2.25 a bushel—would represent one-third of the total export and import trade of Canada of which the minister boasted, and which certainly was something to boast about. The hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, would have us believe that the effect of the reciprocity agreement of 1911 would have been to put the making of the Canadian tariff in the power of Washington, but that putting wheat on the free list, though that crop alone might easily amount to one-third of our total trade, has nothing whatever to do with giving Washington any control in our tariff affairs. The two stories do not hang together.

The same hon. gentleman had something to say about the wonderful economy of this Government, and held it to be a matter of pride that the Minister of Finance was able to announce that $60,000,000 would be left to apply in paying for the war. Well, it seems to me that at this time, when we are having great business success, when we are taking in over a million dollars a day paid by Great Britain and our Allies for war munitions, and when a large part of that money is profit, surely this is the time when we ought to pay, not $60,000,000, but double that amount on account of the war. Had this Government practised reasonable economy during the years they have been in office, they would be able to pay towards the expense of the war more than twice what they are paying. And why not? Why should not we follow the example of Great Britain where, as pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) they raised one hundred and fifty per cent more revenue by direct taxation than had been raised in the years previous to the war. But the economy of this Government only shows up when compared with their tremendously extravagant expenditure during the two or three years prior to the war. Compare their expenditure to-day with the really economical expenditures of the late Government—expenditures which the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, in those days criticised as being extravagant in the extreme, and it becomes manifest that the so-called economy of to-day is really extravagance.

Let us see how these figures compare? If I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Finance aright when he was beginning the Budget speech, I think he made the statement that the expenditure on ordinary account during the past year was $143,000,000. My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) says that is very economical, but the last year that the Liberals were in power—1910-1911—the expenditure for the same account was under $80,000,000. When you compare the figures of last year with those of five years ago, the figures of last year do not look economical at all; they are very extravagant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that what is $143,000,000 to-day was $80,000,000 five years ago?

Mr. TURRIFF: The expenditure on ordinary account was under $80,000,000 during the last full year the Liberals were in power, and I understood the Minister of Finance to say that the expenditure on ordinary account last year was $143,000,000. Of course, there is some deduction to be made for the extra amount of interest on the debt and pensions, but it does not begin to keep the expenditure of to-day anything near what it was in 1910-11. The only way you can show any economy at all is by showing that you are not quite as extravagant in your expenditure as you were two years before the war. But, in 1910-11 the country was prosperous, the revenue was buoyant, and the expenditures were very much lower than they are to-day. Here we are almost three years engaged in this war, we are piling up a war debt of $1,000,000 a day, as my hon. friend told us this afternoon, and instead of economising we are going on in the most extravagant way spending fifty per cent more than was expended five years ago. I think nobody will say that there are many more people in Canada to-day than there were five years ago. It is time that there should be economy practised. We are all hoping that the war will end this year, but there is nothing definite to show that it will end this year. It is quite possible that it will go on for a year and a half, and if it does, look at the debt we will have piled up at the rate of $1,000,000 a day; and it keeps on increasing. The longer we are engaged in the war the more the war costs in Canada per day. When this war is over, when 300,000 or 400,000 Canadians come back from the front, and, being turned out of employment, have to go out and find work wherever they may be able to find it, and when 300,000 or 400,000 men and women who are working in munition factories are turned out of work, see what it means. For two or three years after the war the country will be coming through an equilibrium again, and during that time the factories that are making munitions will have to find a new outlet for their product. The revenue will fall off, our imports will decline, prices of farm produce will go down, exports will decrease, there will not be the same amount of revenue coming into the Dominion, and if my hon. friend should be Minister of Finance then he will not have the revenue of $230,000,000 that he has now. He will have a much smaller revenue, and in the meantime our debt will be doubled up as compared with what it is to-day. How are we going to manage the affairs of this country, how are we going to take care of our ordinary expenditure, of the interest on our debt, of our pension fund, of our sinking fund, if we do not meet the situation by economy? This is the time to begin practising economy and not wait until hard times are upon us. We should practise economy now that the revenues are buoyant, when the money is coming in as never before, and when everybody in business is making money out of borrowed money. We are not paying anything practically on account of the cost of the war. As my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) pointed out to-day, since this Government came into power there have been more deficits than would represent the amount that we have paid on account of the war. We are going on borrowed money, but later on we will have to meet the interest on that money. In the meantime, my hon. friends, instead of practising economy, are going on full sail ahead and spending 50 per cent more than their expenditure a few years ago. Here is a statement showing the increase in the cost of running the different departments as between the years 1910-11 and 1914-15:—

Department.	Increase, Per Cent.
Justice	13
Arts, Agriculture and Statistics	300
Civil Government	38
Fisheries	91
Mines and Geological Survey	92
Immigration	50
Indians	65
Legislation	43
Lighthouse and Coastal Service	30
Miscellaneous	151
Mounted Police	32
Ocean and River Service	30
Penitentiaries	63
Police	89
Public Works Consolidated Fund account	124
Public Works capital account	233
Public Works collection of revenue	36
Railways	14
Steamboat inspection	52
Administration of the Yukon Territory	12
Adulteration of Food	124
Customs	72
Dominion Lands	105
Excise	18
Post Office	114
Labour	32
Railways and Canals, collection of revenue	18
Weights and Measures	172
Naval Service	43

Although there was an increase of 50 per cent in the cost of immigration, we are not getting one-quarter of the immigrants that we got in 1910-11. With regard to Indians, there is absolutely no justification whatever for the increase of 65 per cent in the cost of running that department compared with five years ago. It is absolutely absurd and it shows the extravagance of this Government. They are not making any effort whatever to curtail the expenditure. The cost of the administration of the Yukon Territory increased 12 per cent, and, Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there are a quarter of the people in the Yukon to-day than there were when it cost 12 per cent less. The increase in the Customs Department is accounted for by the fact that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) has just doubled up the number of civil servants in that department. And in the face of that my hon. friends on the other side of the House talk about this Government being an economical Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What were the years compared?

Mr. TURRIFF: I was comparing 1911 with 1915.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did you make up these figures yourself?

Mr. TURRIFF: I did not make them personally, but they were made from the blue-books, every one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You should revise them.

Mr. CROTHERS: They are not right, I can tell you.

Mr. TURRIFF: I venture to assert that they are.

Mr. CROTHERS: I know that they are not as far as the Department of Labour is concerned.

Mr. TURRIFF: What did the Labour Department cost in 1915-16?

Mr. CROTHERS: I cannot give the figures exactly but I know there was not an increase of 30 per cent.

Mr. TURRIFF: I will give the Labour Department over again. In 1910-11 it cost $63,441 and in 1914-15 it cost $93,402, an increase of $29,961, or 32 per cent. I will venture this assertion, that if my hon. friend will take the figures I have quoted and go over them he will find that they are correct, perhaps not to a cent in every case but practically correct, because they have all been taken from the blue-books and checked over and over again.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am satisfied the figures given for my department are not correct.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend will be able to give the correct figures. When my hon. friend tries to make out that this Government is practising economy, it is only economical as compared with the extravagant expenditures of the year or two before the war, not with what was being expended a few years back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why do you not take the expenditures for this last year instead of two years ago?

Mr. TURRIFF: I took the last expenditures that were available when these figures were made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend from St. Antoine, Montreal, (Sir Herbert Ames) spoke of how much more the Government was going to tax the wealthy, the manufacturers, under the new arrangement as announced by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend will turn to page 77 of the Public Accounts, he will find that the expenditures for the Labour Department for 1910-11 were $93,000, not $63,000 as he gave.

Mr. TURRIFF: We can settle that matter again. But I will venture the assertion that generally speaking those figures are right, and I may state that I risk my seat in the House on the correctness, generally speaking, of these figures. It is quite possible I may have made a mistake in one of them. The hon. member for St. Antoine division spoke about the new rate of taxation introduced by the minister this afternoon, and he showed how much more taxes a firm would have to pay that was capitalized at $100,000 under the new rate of taxation than under the old rate. But my hon. friend knows perfectly well that in his own city, not long ago, it was published in the papers by one of the munition firms there that they had made 1,500 per cent, and it was stated in the newspapers that they had paid 900 per cent. And how were they enabled to do that? They were enabled to do that owing to the prices fixed by this Government, through their Imperial Munitions Board—first through the old Shell Committee and subsequently through the Imperial Board. This Government, through their Imperial Munitions Board which they appointed, fixed the prices for these concerns who have been enabled to make not 25 per cent, as my hon. friend stated, but hundreds per cent, and I ask you is it right that the people of Canada should be compelled to pay for the munitions that their soldiers are using at prices so extravagant as those prices to enable companies to make many hundreds per cent? We know of a case in Hamilton where a man made all the money he wanted in the first year and then offered his plant to the Government to let them make munitions at cost and the Government refused it. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour stated that the Government was not going into competition with private enterprise. There was an opportunity for the Government to have found out how much it cost to make shells and shell cases and other munitions. They would not accept the offer, and the next year this man turned over his profits to the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, you are guessing.

Mr. TURRIFF: It was so stated in the papers and never contradicted.

Mr. CROTHERS: I never made that statement in my life.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. TURRIFF: Did not Mr. Baily of Hamilton hand anything over to the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe he did to the Munitions Board.

Mr. TURRIFF: He offered this Government to hand over his factory to your Board, and the second year he handed over the profits, $775,000, and it was divided up, as was stated, between the British Patriotic Fund and some of the Canadian patriotic funds.

Sir HERBERT AMES: We did not get any of it.

Mr. TURRIFF: The Government fixes the price and enables their friends the manufacturers to charge almost any profit they like. And then we have my hon. friend from Montreal coming forward and stating that this is an economical Government.

I rose for the purpose of moving an amendment and on that amendment I wish to say a few words. The amendment I propose to move at the conclusion of my remarks is as follows:

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This House desires to take the earliest opportunity of expressing its pleasure that the Government has at last yielded to the persistent demands of the Grain Growers of the West as frequently set forth by delegations and resolutions of the representatives of the farming interest, and repeatedly voiced by the Liberal party in this House, by placing wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, and thereby securing a free market for wheat and wheat products in the United States.

This House is of the opinion that if the policy of Free Wheat is made permanent it will enormously increase the prosperity of the West and be to the general advantage of the whole Dominion.

In order that the country may be assured of such permanency and that the action of the Administration is not a mere temporary expedient which may be revoked at any time by the Government without reference to Parliament, this House would urge upon the Government the desirability of submitting early in the present session a measure to place by statute wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, and thereby encourage the farmers to engage in the largest wheat production possible.

We have heard a good deal in this House during the past few years about free wheat, and the Government have at last been forced to listen to their friends in the West and in the East and to put wheat, wheat flour and wheat products on the free list. What has induced the Government to do this? Not the welfare of the farmer; not the welfare of anybody in this Dominion; absolutely nothing but the partisan purpose of helping themselves out in the face of a coming election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What coming election?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend confessed that there were to be two, one in Alberta and one in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not on free wheat, surely.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend the Solicitor General made a trip out West.

Mr. GRAHAM: Free wheat was one of the prisoners that my hon friend let free.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend went West to ostensibly look into the question of penitentiaries, and while he was there he was told emphatically by his own friends that unless wheat were placed on the free list his candidates would have very little chance of returning to this House. My hon. friend, by one of his little adroit movements, has now practically got rid of the leading member of the Government from the West and is able to take his place. He does not want to come back from the West without some following there, so he sends out s.o.s. calls for help to his friend, the Minister of Finance, and they prepare this Order in Council to give free wheat to the farmers. I may say to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, that of all the members on that side of the House I think he is the best.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a doubtful compliment,

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not know that that is saying very much, but under the circumstances my hon. friend the minister has not done too badly, and I congratulate him for putting wheat on the free list. It will be a help; it is a good thing for the West. I told my hon. friends many times in this House that free wheat had to come; that it was a question that would not down. It has not been downed; it has downed the Minister of Finance and the whole Government and they have had to put wheat on the free list. They are entitled to all the credit they can get out of it, which will not be very much. There is not a man in the West who does not know that this move on the part of the Government is simply a death-bed repentance; it is just a little better than dying in sin. My hon. friends think it may help them to get out of purgatory; it may, but I doubt it. Well, we will give hon. gentlemen the credit of having done this, but I wish to point out to them that since 1911 there has not been one year in which free wheat would not have been worth more to the farmers than it is worth this year. I wish to point out to the Minister of Finance that the statements he makes in the Order in Council relating to free wheat are not correct. My hon. friend got his information, he says, from the Grain Commission. Who is the head of the Grain Commission? A police court partisan lawyer from Montreal, recently appointed, who knows no more about the wheat question than the man in the moon.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. TURRIFF: A man by the name of Boyd, I think. At all events, he spent his life in Montreal studying and practising law. I assume that the only thing that recommended him to the Minister of Finance and his understudy the Solicitor General was the fact that he was president of a Conservative Association.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where?

Mr. TURRIFF: Near Westmount. It appears that he has qualifications that my hon. friend the Solicitor General was not aware of, so he is that much better. This is the kind of person who gives my hon. friend the Minister of Finance information about this wheat question. I quote from the Order in Council:

> And whereas in normal times there exists a good commercial export demand for milling purposes from Great Britain and the continent for wheat of all grades;
> And whereas this demand has for some time past almost entirely ceased on account of shortage of ocean shipping due to submarine warfare, practically all available tonnage being required to transport grain of the higher grades and flour made therefrom, purchased in Canada and the United States by the British and Allied Governments for their respective needs.

According to that, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would want this House and the country to believe that there was not a good demand for low-grade wheat.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: There was demand in Canada, but the difficulties of shipping to the United States when there was a duty enabled the Canadian buyer to crowd the price down unreasonably. While this year there was a greater difference in the respective values of low-grade wheat on the Canadian and American sides of the line, so little wheat was selling in those parts of the province where the quality was low-grade that it did not amount to much in the total. My constituency runs 110 miles along the American boundary; it is practically a wheat field 66 by 110 miles, one of the biggest wheat-producing constituencies in the West. In that constituency not 10 per cent of the wheat paid the cost of cutting last year. We were hit worse than any other part of the country. The wheat was of a poor quality, but dozens of my constituents drove their wheat across the boundary line and got from 25 to 50 cents a bushel more for it than they could get at home. If this Government wanted to benefit the farmers why did they not put wheat on the free list last fall? Why did they wait until the great bulk of it had passed into the hands of the speculator? To-day it is estimated that only 21 per cent of the wheat of the West is in the hands of the farmer, 79 per cent, less wheat has been sold, being in the hands of the millers and speculators. Although the elevators are filled with the wheat bought for the millers at $1.20 to $1.40 a bushel, they are compelling the bakers to charge the poor people of Canada the price of bread not on $1.40 wheat but on $2.40 wheat. That is the way in which the Government have handled this free wheat question. They have played right into the hands of the speculators from the first to the last. The measure is a good one, brought down at any time, even at the eleventh hour, but if my hon. friends opposite had had the interest of the farmers at heart, they would have given the farmers free wheat last fall. They knew last fall that the crop in the eastern part of Saskatchewan was ruined; they did not have to wait until the month of April to find that out. Just imagine how the farmers were dealt with on this low grade wheat. Let me cite an instance. When I was in the West two or three weeks ago, I was speaking to a man and this is what he told me: "I drew a load of wheat into Carnduff and the elevator man offered me ninety cents a bushel." I said, "all right, I am satisfied with that price, but this wheat was grown on flax ground where flax had been grown the year before; there is a lot of flax in it and flax is worth $2.30 a bushel; you should allow me something for the flax.' The elevator man said, 'I have no means of separating the flax from the wheat, but instead of docking you six pounds for the dirt in the wheat, I will dock you only two pounds." Just then a neighbour of his came in and said to him, "my friend, you are very foolish to sell wheat for ninety cents a bushel; take it down to Sherwood and you will get a much better price." Sherwood is in North Dakota just two miles south of the boundary line and south of Carnduff. The man replied, "it is only a poor grade of wheat which would ordinarily sell as feed wheat." His friend said, "I do not care what it is, you take it down there and you will get a much better price for it." He, however, sold his wheat at ninety cents a bushel and the next day he loaded up a similar load of wheat and took it down to Sherwood. The elevator man there separated out the flax and paid him $23.50 for the flax that was in it, viz., one bushel out of seven. Then he paid him not ninety cents, but $1.58 a bushel for the wheat, out of which the farmer had to pay ten cents a bushel duty. Then he paid him 25 cents a bushel for the screenings that were screened from the wheat, so that the farmer got in Sherwood double the price that he received in Carnduff for the same kind of wheat. That is the way in which the farmers have been dealt with on this poor crop and the Government wait until they have practically sold it all before bringing free wheat into force.

It is not necessary to draw the wheat to the American buyers across the line. Another constituent of mine living at Maryfield, in township eleven, sixty odd miles from the boundary line, shipped a carload of this wheat down to Minneapolis. It was only feed wheat that went forty-six pounds to the bushel and the price at Fort William for the wheat was 98 cents on the day that he sold it in Minneapolis for $1,70½. The man's name was Adolf Olsen of Maryfield, Saskatchewan. Out of the price he received he had to pay ten cents duty and three cents difference in freight, or thirteen cents altogether. That would give him 1.57½, whereas he could have got only 98 cents at Fort William.

Mr. LALOR: Is there a grain grower's elevator at Carnduff?

Mr. TURRIFF: There are three or four elevators there and it is quite possible there is one belonging to the Grain Growers' Association, but I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They could sell it to the Grain Growers' by shipping it to Fort William.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is a farmers' elevator owned by the farmers in that part of my constituency. They have a farmers' elevator down at Sherwood, because during the last number of years millions of bushels have been drawn by wagons across the line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why do the Grain Growers' Grain Company not pay a fair price for the wheat?

Mr. TURRIFF: I refer my hon. friend to the Grain Growers' Grain Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is a shareholder.

Mr. TURRIFF: I might be a shareholder if I wanted to be one, but I do not happen to be a grain grower and I never was a shareholder in that company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You repudiate their methods of buying?

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member is simply stating facts.

Mr. TURRIFF: As my hon. friend knows, to the cost of his party, the grain growers have done a great work all through that country in the education of the people, and they have done it in my hon. friend's own constituency, and nobody knows that better than does my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They pay fair prices in my constituency and I have no criticism to make, but if they do not pay fair prices in my hon. friend's constituency, why does he not go after them?

Mr. TURRIFF: If my hon. friend thinks that the Grain Growers' Company are not doing their duty, is it the duty of the Opposition or the duty of the Government to interfere?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are doing their duty in my county all right. If they are not doing it in yours, why do you not complain? It is a delicate point.

Mr. TURRIFF: It is not a delicate question at all. I am just showing what this Government did during this season of poor wheat in that part of the country. This does not apply all over Saskatchewan, nor in Alberta, where they had a good season, but in the southern and eastern part of Saskatchewan and in the southern part of Manitoba the crop was very poor, and if the Government had wished to help out the farmers the time to do it was last fall, before the crops were sold, and not this spring, when 79 per cent of the fall wheat of the country had gone out of the farmers' hands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the figures which the hon. member gave us he showed a difference across the border of 59 cents per bushel. He will admit the best the Government could have done would have been to modify the difference by ten cents, whereas the Grain Growers' Grain Company could have modified it by 49 cents. They must be robbing the farmers to the extent of 49 cents a bushel if his statement be true. How does my hon. friend explain that?

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend always tries to get away from the fact that the Government is responsible. Had my hon. friend taken off that duty last fall instead of this spring buyers from the United States would have come across and bought that wheat. The fact of having to put the wheat through the customs makes it difficult for the farmers. I do not want to be understood as saying that generally speaking there is any such difference as I have stated, but there has never been a year when there would not have been more aggregate profit to the farmers of the West, and the statement that there was not a demand for the low grade wheat is not correct, because you could sell your low grade in Canada at any time. The low grade wheat is not ground by itself, nor is high grade wheat ground by itself. They are always mixed in the grinding to a greater or less extent, and this low grade wheat is being bought by the millers in order to mix it with good wheat. Therefore, the Government have taken advantage of the farmers to the extent that they have waited until the wheat was out of the farmers' hands before giving them the relief that they might have given them last fall.

The Minister of Finance took credit for the great balance of trade in our favour. According to him, if the Germans had sunk 100 more ships laden with Canadien imports, our balance of trade would have made a still better showing. That was a point hardly worthy of my hon. friend. I am glad to see the minister is getting over the great fear he had five years ago that if we allowed the Canadian farmer to sell his wheat in the United States, the British Empire would totter in ruins, and Canadians become disloyal. That was the statement made by one of the celebrated eighteen Liberals who went back on us in 1911. Sir Edmund Walker said that if the Canadian farmer was allowed to sell his produce in the United States he would become a disloyal Canadian, and it would end in the annexation of Canada to the United States.

The Minister of Finance was one of those eighteen, and I am delighted to see that he has got over the nightmare he had then, and has now no fears of the Canadian farmer becoming disloyal if he sells his wheat in the United States. What has brought about the change in my hon. friend's views? Economics has nothing to do with the change. What did the Solicitor General say on this question last year? Closing the debate on the resolution I had moved in favour of free wheat he said (Hansard, 1916, p. 1068):

> I have always believed, and never more than now, that at least ninety per cent of this free wheat issue is purely political, while, for the other ten per cent it is economically unsound.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was there a war on then?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, the war was on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is ninety-five per cent political now.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend says that ninety-five per cent of the agitation is political. For once in his life he has told the absolute truth, because I am sure that ninety-five per cent of the reasons that actuated him in putting wheat on the free list were purely political. His object was to save the party. Will my hon. friend, who said last year that ninety per cent of the agitation for free wheat was purely political and the other ten per cent mistaken economics, tell us what has made him change his mind? Why has he insisted on the Minister of Finance putting wheat on the free list? Will my hon. friend give us his reasons now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that the attitude of my hon. friend would indicate that ninety-five per cent of his talk was purely political.

Mr. TURRIFF: I say that ninety-five per cent of the motives that actuated my hon. friend in getting wheat put on the free list were purely partisan. His object was to save himself and the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is actuating your indignation at the present time?

Mr. TURRIFF: I am trying to tell the House and the country that we are pleased to have wheat put on the free list, but the Government made a great mistake, in the interests of the farmers, in not taking this action last fall. If the Solicitor General will put wheat on the free list now, when he still believes that ninety per cent of the agitation for it is purely political, why would he not do it last fall? What has the Minister of Finance to say? I could read pages of reasons that he gave why wheat should not be put on the free list. What has made my hon. friend change his mind?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Read the Order in Council.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have it here, and the statements it makes are not true. I do not say the Minister of Finance did not believe these statements; I think he did. I do not think he would put a statement in an Order in Council that he did not believe to be absolutely true; I have that much faith in him. But the statements made in the Order in Council are certainly not correct, and nobody knows it better than my hon. friend the Solicitor General, who went on a trip all through the West, with his ear to the ground, and from every direction the cry came, "Either free wheat, or no Conservatives go to Ottawa at the next election." So at the eleventh hour my hon. friend calls on the Minister of Finance to put wheat on the free list. It was a case of death-bed repentance. However, they are entitled to all the credit they can get out of it, and they will get some credit for it in the West; they will get some votes that otherwise would have gone against them.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is what hurts.

Mr. TURRIFF: It does not hurt me half so bad as my hon. friend will get hurt if he appeals to his constituents again.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Are you sorry that wheat was placed on the free list? What are you mad about?

Mr. TURRIFF: I am not mad about it. We are pleased to have it on the free list, and my hon. friends are entitled to all the credit they can get out of it. But now the Government have left it in such a position that not even an Order in Council is necessary; for as soon as the war ceases, unless the Order in Council is amended or wheat is placed on the free list in the ordinary way which should have been followed, wheat will be no longer free. As it stands to-day this accomplishes exactly the purposes hon. gentlemen opposite have in view —to enable their candidates in the West to declare that this means free wheat for all time, and the candidates in Ontario and in the East generally to do as they have been doing, to tell their electors that this is only a war measure and that as soon as the war is over things will be as they were before. It is the same old story—playing the double game, one policy for the West and another policy for the East. Now, my resolution only asks these hon. gentlemen to make it clear that they have done that which they say it was their intention to do—to put wheat permanently on the free list. The cry of the Government is for more production. But how can they expect the farmers to go into heavy expenditure for increased production with the prospect before them that the moment the war ceases they will lose the American market?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not correct.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will the hon. gentleman make it clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is clear.

Mr. TURRIFF: The hon. gentleman will excuse me, but it is not clear. I have taken the advice of lawyers who have looked into this question, and they tell me that not only is it not clear that the effect is what hon. gentlemen opposite say it is, but on the contrary it is clear that the moment war is over wheat will no longer be on the free list.

The Minister of Finance took great credit to himself for raising $12,500,000 of revenue from the wealth of Canada. He said Canada was not a wealthy country, that the wealth was not where it could be reached by an income tax. But the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, spent five minutes in telling us how wealthy Canada was in that it could absorb hundreds of millions of the war debt. Does not that prove that the wealth of Canada is a good field for taxation? Wealth yielded $12,500,000 in taxes last year, but I venture to say that the workingmen of Canada paid $25,000,000 within the same time. The Minister of Finance proposes to tax wealth more heavily. That is a move in the right direction. Why should not the incomes of very wealthy men be very heavily taxed? We have men in Ottawa with incomes of $200,000 and $250,000 a year, and they are not asked to pay a dollar on those incomes, while the poor man with half a dozen children, who finds it hard to furnish his table with proper and sufficient food, is taxed at every turn.

The Minister of Finance stated this afternoon that there was some correspondence on this subject of free wheat between the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and himself. May I ask if he will bring down that correspondence?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman knows I could not do that without violating my oath of office. The correspondence from the Prime Minister, of course, is confidential.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am surprised at that statement from the Minister of Finance. Surely, on reflection, he will agree that correspondence between one minister and another is not necessarily confidential. Before the recess an ex-minister laid before the House correspondence that had passed between himself and the Prime Minister while they were both members of the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That may be entirely in the discretion of the minister. I regard any correspondence between myself and the Prime Minister as being of the same character as discussion at the Council Board. Apart from the question I have raised as to a minister's oath of office, there is no doubt that the correspondence to which reference has been made was in fact confidential and could not be brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That puts it on another ground.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It puts it on both grounds.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) cannot blame me or imimpute to me any wrong motives, I am sure, because he himself mentioned this correspondence. Now may I ask whether before passing this Order in Council the Government had any correspondence with the Government of the United States to know whether that Government would accept an Order in Council putting wheat on the free list as they would accept an amendment of the Customs Act for the same purpose? And will the minister please say if the United States was notified when this action was taken?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We had no communication whatever with the Government of the United States before taking this action. Immediately after the action had been taken, and after the close of the exchanges for the day, I notified the press, and at the same time I wrote a letter to the Consul-General of the United States in Ottawa, Colonel Foster, enclosing a copy of the Order in Council, and Colonel Foster immediately despatched it to Washington, and, I understand, also telegraphed it.

Mr. TURRIFF: And, of course, the Government have not had any further word from the United States as to whether they will accept that as satisfactory or not. Now, in conclusion, I move the resolution which I have already read. I hope the Government will see its way clear to carry out the idea expressed in this amendment, in order to satisfy the farmers throughout Canada that it is the intention of the Government that wheat shall remain on the free list and shall not be subject to an Order in Council or to automatic reversion to the dutiable list on the ending of the war. If this is done, the farmer will have some inducement to put in larger crops. Not this year, for nothing that this House can do now will effect the size of the crop of the present year. But the season from the latter part of May to the middle of July is the time when, in the West, new ground is broken for wheat for the following year. If it is made clear that wheat is on the free list permanently, you will have a largely increased acreage broken during the present spring and summer and a largely increased acreage sown to wheat during the next year which will be a benefit not only to Canada but to Great Britain, the Allies and the whole world. It was stated here today that there was a possibility of there being a food famine in the world on account of this terrible war and if anything can be done to increase production it ought to be done. There is nothing that can be done that will have as good an effect in increasing production as having it made absolutely clear to the farmers that wheat is on the free list permanently and that it is not to be taken off either by Order in Council, or automatically, as soon as the war ceases.

On motion of Mr. Meighen the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

RETURNED SOLDIERS.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Sir HERBERT AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine) presented the following Preliminary Report of the Special Committee of the House of Commons in reference to the care of and provision for returned soldiers.

The Special Committee, appointed to consider, inquire into and report upon the reception, treatment, care, training and re-education of the wounded, disabled and convalescent returned soldiers of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, in accordance with a resolution adopted by the committee, beg leave to present to the House the following Preliminary Report:

Your Committee, pursuant to the resolution passed by the House on Wednesday, 7th February last, appointing nine members to constitute the Committee, met on the said 7th February, when the following members, namely, Sir Herbert Ames, Hon. Charles Marcil, Hon. F. B. McCurdy, Mr. W. S. Middlebro, Mr. F. F. Pardee, Mr. Duncan C. Ross and Mr. Donald Sutherland were present and elected Sir Herbert Ames as Chairman of the Committee. The Committee at once proceeded to consider what information could be secured regarding existing agencies of assistance given to disabled returned soldiers and instructed the Clerk of the Committee to request the attendance of certain gentlemen of the Military Hospitals Commission and of the Militia Department to appear and give evidence before the Committee.

On Thursday, 22nd February, when your Committee again met, the Chairman's attention was directed to what the members of the Committee considered a technical difficulty. Your Committee had not been given power to send for persons and papers, to report from time to time, to adjourn from place to place, to print for the use of the Committee the evidence taken, nor could it ask leave to do so owing to the extended adjournment of the House. Obviously, there was but one course to follow in order to conform strictly with the rule. All nine members present considered that the inquiry was urgent and that it was the undoubted desire of the House that the Committee should hold immediate sessions. Your Committee thereupon resolved to proceed with the inquiry as if it had been granted leave by the House to send for persons and papers, to report from time to time, to adjourn from place to place and to print for the use of the Committee the evidence taken. Notwithstanding this, your Committeee, during the adjournment, has held ten business sessions at which important testimony was given and statements and papers were submitted by representatives of Returned Soldiers' Associations, Provincial Soldiers Aid Commissions, Military Hospitals, Convalescent Homes and Benevolent Societies from every province of the Dominion. Four sessions were held in Ottawa, two in Montreal and four in Toronto. The inquiry, in respect to the first matter of reference, is almost terminated so far as the hearing of evidence is concerned, and your Committee will be able to present to the House an Interim Report in the course of three or four weeks.

Your Committee therefore recommends to the House the desirability of ratifying the action of the Committee in having proceeded with the inquiry as if the House had granted to the Committee, at the time of its appointment, the various powers and authorities above mentioned, and the Committee further recommends that such powers and authorities be granted for the future work of the Committee, and in addition thereto, that the Committee be empowered to sit while the House is in session.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Sir HERBERT AMES moved:

That the recommendations contained in the Preliminary Report of the Committee on Returned Soldiers be concurred in, and the action of the Committee in exercising certain powers and authorities referred to in the report, notwithstanding the fact that such powers and authorities were not given in the original appointment of the Committee, be approved and ratified, and that the said Committee is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers, to report from time to time, to adjourn from place to place, to print the evidence taken before the Committee; and that the Committee be authorized to sit while the House is in session.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COCHRANE moved:

That the names of Messrs. Hartt, Weichel and Bradbury be substituted for those of Messrs. Crothers, Fowler and Sir Herbert Ames on the special committee to whom was referred Bill No. 13, an Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, and also that the name of Mr. Macdonald (Pictou) be added to the said committee.

Motion agreed to.

NEWSPRINT PAPER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With your leave, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Government whether or not an Order in Council was passed during the recess fixing the price of paper to be supplied by manufacturers to publishers, and, if so, whether the Order in Council will be brought down to the House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: An Order in Council has been passed giving the Minister of Customs authority to fix the price of newsprint paper in Canada. The purpose of the Order was to provide an adequate supply of newsprint paper at reasonable prices to the publishers of newspapers. The Order to which I refer was not to become effective until gazetted. It provided that newsprint papers could only be exported by license. That Order was not gazetted, because, upon taking the matter up with the manufacturers of newsprint paper, an arrangement was reached whereby they made a fixed mill price and by reason of that action it was not thought necessary to enforce the Order in Council. Subsequently, in order to meet a situation which developed, a further Order in Council was passed; under the provisions of which the Minister of Customs was authorized to fix the price of newsprint paper sold in Canada, and an officer of the Government was authorized, if necessary, to take possession of supplies of newsprint paper required by newspaper publishers throughout Canada and to sell at a price fixed by the minister, and distribute to Canadian newspapers. If my Rt. Hon. friend desires that both Orders should be brought down I shall be very glad to lay them upon the Table in due course.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is a very important action, and I imagine it should have been communicated to Parliament as soon as Parliament convened. It is practically amending the tariff, and I should expect the minister to be kind enough to bring down these papers, the first Order in Council, the agreement with the manufacturers and publishers, and the second Order in Council.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no written agreement between the Government and the manufacturers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is an agreement between the manufacturers and the publishers, as I understood.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: An understanding was reached whereby $2.50 was fixed as the mill price. I am not aware that there is any written agreement between the manufacturers of news print paper and the newspaper publishers of Canada, but the manufacturers agreed among themselves to fix a price of $2.50 at the mill to supply the Canadian newspaper publishers who have been their customers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As a consequence of the first Order in Council which was passed but not gazetted, and which was not to come into force until it was gazetted, an agreement of some kind was made between the manufacturers themselves or between the manufacturers and publishers. The Government must have had communication of that agreement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The communication which the Government had was that the price had been fixed at $2.50 at the mill, and we did not gazette the Order in Council or proceed further because that price had been fixed. The fixing of the price depended on the passing of the Order in Council whose object was to secure to the Canadian publishers of newspapers an adequate supply of news print at a reasonable price.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that the Government have not a copy of this document in their archives?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have no document evidencing an agreement between the manufacturers themselves or between them and the newspaper publishers; but we have what I shall be very glad to bring down, the Order in Council which I have mentioned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The rest was hearsay.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure whether there was a letter in which it was stated that the price had been fixed at $2.50 at the mill. If there is such a letter I shall bring that down too. It was verbally communicated to me by the President of the Pulp and Paper Association that the price of $2.50 had been fixed. That price having been fixed, it was not necessary to gazette the Order in Council.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On the Order Notices of Motion:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is there any reason for further delay in proceeding with the Notice which stands in my name providing for the granting of the franchise to women?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The subject matter of this resolution is of great importance. It is not of immediate urgency as the question of the franchise is not before the House. I asked my hon. friend the other day if he would be good enough to let this stand because it is a matter of great importance involving a question of policy, and as the Prime Minister spoke to a somewhat similar resolution, I think in the early part of last session, it would seem to me not only expedient but courteous to allow the matter to stand until his return. I am sure that my hon. friend will be willing to agree to that. He will be given an opportunity of bringing forward and discussing his motion; in other words, he will be in precisely the same position as he is to-day. I have asked the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) to allow his motion also to stand.

Motion stands.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—PROMOTION OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. Herménégilde Boulay (Rimouski) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the employees on the Government railway should be promoted to official positions on that line before allowing the General Manager to employ strangers.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I gladly take advantage of the presence of the Minister of Railways here tonight to call attention to certain facts connected with the management of the Intercolonial. At every session of Parliament, I have reluctantly to revert to the same subject. This year, as nothing was done to remedy a situation which I consider defective, I must again take up the question, the more willingly because the minister is here present to hear what I have to say in criticism of that management. The main grievance relates to the unfair treatment meted out to old employees of the road—they are government employees—in the matter of promotion. Since I have the honour to sit in this House, I always heard it claimed by ministers who have charge of the several departments that they made it their duty to promote officials according to each one's deserts and as a reward for his zeal in the performance of his duties. Now, I am sorry to see a different policy has prevailed in the case of the Intercolonial and other Government railways since our party came into power. True it is that the liberal party —gentlemen on the left can take their medicine— set a poor example during the few years they were in charge. During the liberal regime, we had to fight the same abuses; but the remissness of the late Government towards old officials is no excuse why we on this side should adopt a similar policy.

Mr. GAUVREAU (Translation): You would be quite at a loss to point to any specific cases.

Mr. BOULAY: I recall immediately a man by the name of Russell who was imported by the liberal party, and also one McGovern, both of whom were most objectionable men. There are many others whose names I do not recall, but if the hon. member for Temiscouata should insist, I might supply him with the list not later than to-morrow.

I have no fault to find with the general manager, Mr. Gutelius, as regards his courtesy, civility, manners and his general ability as manager of the Intercolonial. But even admitting his fitness for the position, of which I have no doubt, yet it must be said old officials of the Intercolonial could have been found fully competent to fill this post. But no complaints have as yet been heard. If Mr. Gutelius's appointment as head manager had been the only one of the kind, if instead of strangers being brought in to fill the vacancies, old employees had received promotion, or again had those strangers once appointed given satisfaction, I should keep silent and admit that the appointments were made in the public interest. But facts point to a different conclusion. Last year, it may be remembered, or perhaps is it two years ago, I voiced a complaint against Mr. Devonish who had been appointed superintendent at Campellton notwithstanding my protests. At the time of the appointment, my adverse attitude was commended; Mr. Devonish had been imported from another country, Ireland, I believe; at any rate, he certainly had never been previously on the staff of that railway. As superintendent he was a dismal failure. All winter the trains were snowbound on the Intercolonial between Mont-Joli and Campbellton due to Mr. Devonish being absolutely unacquainted with the road, on which he had never been employed, and with the climate of the country. No more incompetent person could have been secured for the position. Fortunately last winter his place has been taken by an old Intercolonial railwayman who had twenty-five to thirty years' experience and who is proof how much better service can be obtained by promoting employees than by filling vacancies with outsiders. Notwithstand that the past winter was very severe, trains were operated regularly on the Mont-Joli-Campbellton section. There have been delays of course, but no complaints were heard regarding the inefficiency of the management as in the previous year.

Another remark concerns the men on the Campbellton-Mont-Joli division as well as all the employees of the road.

It just comes to me that the hon. member for Temiscouata asked for names. He must recall Mr. Brady who was brought in by the late government and who did not prove to be one of the very clever men.

Mr. GAUVREAU: He did better at any rate than your Mr. Gutelius, of whom you complain.

M. BOULAY: Mr. McNeillie was another general superintendent selected from the staff of the Canadian Pacific. What practical acquaintance did he have with the Intercolonial, to warrant his being appointed general manager from Halifax to Montreal? He was a very nice man, very courteous and polite, but could not old employees be found just as civil and competent? Some twenty superior officials come from the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk railways; they hold positions which could have been filled as effectively by Intercolonial railwaymen. What ambition can there be in a man who starts at the bottom rung, as an operator or switchman, if he knows that the authorities have no intention of promoting him as a reward for his good work?

I complained also on different occasions that for the last forty-five years that part of the line that crosses the counties of Rimouski and especially Matane is operated by men from New-Brunswick. I made many attempts to obtain redress, but to this day I have always been unable to persuade the Intercolonial management that this section should be handled by men from the province of Quebec. The late Government should have understood that it was unfair that matters pertaining to the province of Quebec be always controlled by people from other provinces. Are not the men on the Montreal-Mont-Joli section quite competent? Why is the Mont-Joli-Moncton section kept under the management of men who do not speak French and seem to make it a point not to understand the language? It would be easy to create a new division from Montreal to Campbellton, as I often advocated, and to appoint one or two superintendents, if necessary, who would have charge of the whole line in the province of Quebec. I am again referring to the section between Mont-Joli and Campbellton which comprises 105 miles, of which only twelve run into New Brunswick. Why should that whole section be operated by New Brunswickers, when only twelve miles of the line run into their province? Such a practice is unfair to the French-Canadian patrons of the road, a large number of whom do not speak English. They have to deal with superintendents, freight agents and yard masters who cannot understand them. Why persist in allowing such grievances to exist when by a mere stroke of the pen the whole situation could be remedied to everyone's satisfaction. My contention is borne out by the fact that Mr. Gutelius has transferred the train despatchers of the Lévis Rivière-du-Loup section to Lévis, and the Lévis train despatchers run the section from Lévis to Rivière-du-Loup, while the train despatchers of the Rivière-du-Loup section run the section from Rivière-du-Loup to Mont Joli, and the Mont Joli-Campbellton section is run by the New Brunswick office to Campbellton, that is to say backwards. Now the division from Rivière-du-Loup to Montreal is operated from Lévis, while that from Rivière-du-Loup to Mont Joli is operated from Rivière-du-Loup and from Mont Joli to Campbellton the line is controlled from the New Brunswick office at Campbellton. Can anything be more unfair? Why is it persisted in? Is it that I have the honour to represent the county of Rimouski-Matane, or in order to cause annoyance to the employees? I hope my words this year will be heard and the situation remedied. The train despatcher's office at Campbellton could just as easily be located at Mont-Joli. It would be to the benefit of the road, as those in charge would be familiar with the line and the people they would have to deal with, while the Campbellton men know nothing of the road, the slopes and the weather conditions along the line. I am quite aware that the latter men would not find the transfer to Mont-Joli congenial, but after all it is not of our making if they do not understand the two languages as we do, and if they are not satisfied they are always at liberty to remain in New Brunswick, to which province they rightly belong.

I would like to call attention to another grievance which constantly entails friction and animosities between the two races. Instead of fomenting troubles, every one of us should strive in his own sphere to eliminate any cause of disagreement. Thus when French-Canadian applicants are called upon to pass examinations for brakemen or firemen, those examinations should be conducted in French as on the other western divisions. But it is not done. If a man from Rimouski or Matane applies for such a position, he passes his examination at Campbellton before examiners who do not understand French and who, when they are so-minded, put all kinds of difficulties in the way of the candidate and cause him to fall out with his representative in Parliament and renounce his own party. Such is the case. I asked Mr. Gutelius to have the applicants examined in French, either at Rivière-du-Loup or Lévis. I hope this small favour will be granted. Such grievances are easy of redress if you only set about doing it. All kinds of petty means are taken to bring about the failure of the candidates. After being examined at Campbellton on the "Standard Rules" which are printed only in English, when there should be copies in both languages, they are sent to Moncton to be examined on colours. If the members of this House knew how many colours the applicants are called upon to distinguish, some hundred of them, they would be surprised at the possible extent of human stupidity. The colours are placed before them and they are asked to explain the difference between the different shades. It seems to me that the colours in use on railways are not so complicated; why not stick to the three colours used, red, green and white? Why require them to distinguish between all the colours of the rainbow? If, perchance, the unfortunate applicant mentions the French name of a colour placed before him, he is refused and sent back home. I wish to apprise the House of those facts, so that the members may understand to what length these vexations go. I was a railwayman myself for some time and know all about it. An examination is also made of the eyesight. I always thought that normally a man sees with both eyes; but the candidate is asked to read with his left hand or his right hand over one eye. If he cannot read with one eye closed, he is not accepted. I know many people who cannot read with only one eye, and yet read quite well with both? Where is the man who does not constantly make use of both eyes? Those minutiæ it seems to me, are ridiculous and merely a source of annoyance to the applicant. Why not examine him with both his eyes open and see whether he is short sighted or not.

For some years past I advocated the employment of French-Canadians on the dining cars, especially from Campbellton to Montreal. Something has been done as a result, but we have not yet obtained complete justice. All winter, while the local and express services were suspended, a dining-car was run between St. Leonards and Montreal, and not one single man on the car understood French; meanwhile, the French-speaking waiters were kept on the Nova-Scotia and New-Brunswick divisions, where a knowledge of French on the dining-cars is not requisite.

I must also take exception to the cancelling of the local train during a part of the winter. On the Campbellton-Moncton division, although the number of passengers is not more than a quarter of what it is in my county, a local service was kept up all winter. From Rivière-du-Loup to Lévis, the train was run as usual, but from Rivière-du-Loup to Campbellton it was cancelled, although it is one of the best paying parts of the line. The train was resumed again only lately.

Those are small grievances which are such as to provoke unnecessarily a part of the population and one wonders how it is that a part of the province of Quebec is thus unfairly dealt with when another section is well treated.

A few years ago what are called the "Standard Rules" were contrived. Well, I have a lot of experience with railway rules and when a knowledge of the Standard Rules was required of applicants, I refrained from criticism because I wished to examine them first. All I have to say is that they have been in force for the last two years and they have proven a real failure. They put the life of passengers in jeopardy and cause much annoyance to the railwaymen themselves by placing most of the responsibility for the running of the train on the conductor. Instead of giving him instructions, as was done before, to meet another train at a particular point, he is simply told that such a passenger train is so many hours late. The unfortunate conductor must at each station make a computation to see if a train running behind him or in the opposite direction will reach him at any particular siding. It is nothing but computation and worry and the conductor can scarcely bear the strain. I fail to see why this system was adopted, because it makes the position unbearable for the train employees and endangers the lives of the travelling public. A mistake in the number of hours a train is late may result in a collision.

Now what about the medical examination and the medical examiners for the Superannuation Fund of the Intercolonial? Here again the French-Canadians are submitted to gross discrimination. The employees on the Montreal-Mont-Joli division are required to repair to Moncton to be examined by physicians who do not speak a word of French. The applicants have to get interpreters and often return without having obtained satisfaction. Why not appoint a practitioner from the province of Quebec who could do the work as well as the Moncton doctors. It is a small matter and putting it right would satisfy the people. This is one of the grievances, and the employees on the Intercolonial suffer grievances, as they have proven by their vote at the last election.

The French-Canadians in the province of Quebec labour under another disadvantage. I often had occasion to call at the public offices of the Intercolonial at Moncton and, except Mr. Melançon, not one of of the employees speak both languages although there are twenty-five to thirty high officials who are paid fairly big salaries, judging from the list I shall give out. There are many in the province of Quebec who would willingly accept the remuneration. Here are some of the salaries paid to heads of departments: E. P. Gutelius, general manager, $20,000; Superintendent of Car Service, $200 monthly; Alward, General Solicitor, $5,000.

Mr. GAUVREAU (Translation): The latter was brought from Ottawa to replace Mr. Caron.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Quite likely. C. B. Brown, Chief Engineer, $6,000; Shannon, Comptroller and Treasurer, $5,000; Story, General Freight Agent, $416.66 monthly; Allen, General Baggage Agent, $125 per month; Joughins, Superintendent of Motive Power, $400 per month.

The member for Temiscouata might take note that this man was appointed by his own party.

Mr. GAUVREAU (Translation): You cannot say he is unfit; he is one of the best men on the Intercolonial.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Possibly; I am not discussing his ability; he is not a French-Canadian. C. E. Smith, Master Car Builder, $3,600; Appleton, General Master Mechanics, $3,600; Simpson, General Fuel Agent, $3,600; W. R. Devonish, Superintendent, $275 per month. There are others, but I do not wish to take all the time of the House. All those big salaries go to men who do not come from the province of Quebec and none of whom understand a single word of French. Here is room, it seems, for improvement, if it were desired to treat us fairly, I called lately in an office at Moncton, where twelve men were employed, and not one spoke French, except a young stenographer. To my question whether she earned more than the others, she replied that she had the smallest salary. Does it not seem that an employee speaking both languages should in justice receive higher pay than any who can use only one language, especially when the knowledge of French is apt to help an important section of the public, such as the French-speaking population of Canada?

I shall not speak any longer to the resolution; but I hope the Minister of Railways will heed my remarks and prove he understands their capital importance by giving justice to the French element in Canada. If you wish to encourage the present members of the Civil Service, the best plan is to adapt a system of promotions. I had occasion now and then to recommend certain employees for promotion; the answer came back from Moncton, without the applicants being examined or even when the authorities knew nothing of them: " the men you recommend are not competent." Here is a case in point. I complained again t the appointment on the division of the Intercolonial in which my constituency is comprised of a man by the name of Bovard who had been dismissed from the Transcontinental because he could not speak French. I remonstrated that we had no use for the man and that the position should have been given to a man from my district; I suggested two names; those two men were quite competent, with twenty years' experience, being qualified even to be superintendents; but my recommendation was turned down, without the men being known or being examined; I believe the Minister himself wrote to me: "Your men are not competent". It is the stereotyped answer when French-Canadians apply for positions of some importance. I submit those facts to the House, and especially to the attention of the Minister of Railways, if he cares in the least to deal fairly by the people of the Province of Quebec.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, in the resolution which the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) has presented to the House there is a great deal that is deserving of support. From what I have heard of the hon. gentleman's administration of the patronage of his county, as well as in adjoining counties, I do not wonder that the Minister of Railways sometimes feels rather reluctant to agree to his recommendations, and I can well understand that the minister may sometimes do an injustice to people along the line of the Intercolonial railway

4 p.m. just because of the persistent and sometimes unfair pressure brought to bear on him by the hon. gentleman I say this particularly because I know the activities of the hon gentleman have not been confined to his own constituency, but that on more than one occasion he has come down into the province of New Brunswick and tried to take away from men who may fairly be entitled to some voice with the minister any influence they may have. The hon. gentleman's influence extends through the county of Rimouski and into the county of Madawaska, and I do not know, without knowledge of all the circumstances, that I can very much blame the Minister of Railways for not paying special attention to the representations of the hon. gentleman who has moved this motion; but at the same time, I think the Minister of Railways ought to give some consideration to the special question raised by this resolution. Although I do not quite agree with its terms, with the spirit of it I entirely agree. The resolution states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the employees on the Government railway should be promoted to official positions on that line before allowing the General Manager to employ strangers.

In the management of any large business, whether it is the business of a railway or a commercial or manufacturing business, that is a principle which might well be adhered to. Take for instance the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which perhaps ought to be the model for railway management, although it may not be just and proper to put that railway company ahead of the Grand Trunk, because the management of the Grand Trunk has been exceedingly good; I understand it is a principle on those railroads that when a young man enters one of their offices, even in a humble capacity, he can, if he attends to his duties, look forward to the time when he may occupy the position of superintendent of the line or even a higher position. The same is true in the United States in the case of great manufacturing companies like the Bethlehem Steel, where some forty thousand people are employed. A boy who enters the employment of that company merely as a messenger boy can look forward with hope and confidence to the time when he may occupy a position of great responsibility. It is the same with the Armours, who employ between thirty and forty thousand people, and with other big concerns in the United States, and that is the only way to ensure loyalty on the part of the employees of any great company. In the case of the Intercolonial Railway, however, since this Government have come into office, the heads of the employees have been cut off almost indiscriminately. First it is the Board of Management who are deprived of their positions; then it is the engineer of permanent way, a splendid official, one who has given years of service to the Intercolonial, but who, without reason, is dismissed, and a gentleman from another railroad, who had never before been connected with the Intercolonial, is brought in to take his place. The same is true with regard to the general traffic manager. Although he had given satisfaction to the public and discharged his duties faithfully, he is dismissed by this Government and another gentleman is brought in from another railroad to fill his position. So you might take the cases of gentlemen occupying positions of responsibility in which they had served the public and the country well, who have been dismissed without rhyme or reason and strangers brought in to take their places. That is not the proper method of managing a great railroad. I am told by gentlemen who are familiar with the condition of affairs at Moncton that many of the old employees do not know to-day whether or not, when they wake up to-morrow, they will still be in the employ of the Intercolonial, there being no security of employment. The result is that the feeling of loyalty amongst the employees is destroyed, their ambition is crushed, they are prevented from giving the highest service which a man is capable of giving to his employer, and the consequence is that the service on the railroad is very much impaired. The Minister of Railways apparently trusts everything to Mr. Gutelius, but he ought to look into this matter himself. I have nothing to say against Mr. Gutelius, personally, but I claim that he is no better than the men who have been discharged to make room for him. I am told that he brought into the Intercolonial a number of American citizens, some men from Ontario, some from the Grand Trunk, and some from the Canadian Pacific. I am told that even typists and ordinary clerks are brought in from other railroads or other parts of the Dominion to take positions on the Intercolonial at Moncton, and instead of these positions being given to those who are already employed and who have given good service, the latter are passed over and others taken in to fill the places that properly belong to these older employees. Has the operation of the Intercolonial been such as to be approved by the public? I submit not. From my observations, I do not believe the management of the Intercolonial was ever so bad as it is to-day. During the past winter there was scarcely a week in which the newspapers had not an account of a wreck on the Intercolonial.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Scarcely a day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What excuse is there for wrecks? Is not the reason that somebody has neglected his duty, that somebody has been guilty of an oversight or want of care? Is it not because there is not that devotion to duty amongst the employees of the Intercolonial which there would be if the same system that is pursued in regard to employment of officials on other railroads were pursued in regard to the employees of the Intercolonial? The history of the Intercolonial during the past winter has been a history of mismanagement, neglect, destruction of property and inconvenience to the travelling public. I cannot speak of what the roadbed is like in all the sections of the Dominion through which that railway passes, but I know that on quite a number of occasions trains have left the track on account of broken rails. The other day, within three miles of the city of St. John, a suburban train ran off the track and the passengers had to walk into the the city. That is only one instance of inconvenience to passengers which are occurring on the Intercolonial railroad and which are an evidence of want of care on the part of the management. These things would not occur with proper oversight and care, and it would almost seem as if under the management of the Intercolonial it is a question of balancing loss of life and accident to passengers and employees against the cost which will be incurred by managing the road efficiently and seeing that proper service is obtained from those who are employed on the line.

With regard to train accommodation, the Intercolonial has now been in operation for a great many years between Montreal, St. John, Halifax, the Sydneys and all parts of Nova Scotia, and I declare to you, Sir, that the service has never within my recollection been so unsatisfactory as it is now. In former years there was some encouragement given to travel between the great commercial city of St. John and points on the north shore of the province. The people of St. John were also encouraged to travel to Quebec and Montreal by the Intercolonial, with which road we had direct connection at Moncton. But to-day that is all done away with, and apparently no attention is paid to the comfort or convenience of people who wish to travel from St. John to the north shore of the province or to Quebec and Montreal. Any one leaving St. John for the north shore or for Quebec has to take a local train to Moncton, and wait there from one to three hours until he can catch a train going to the north or to Quebec, and the same thing applies on the return journey. No attention whatever is paid now to the comfort and convenience of the travelling public. Formerly we used to have a very good suburban service on the Intercolonial, but when I was down at St. John recently I found that that had all been changed, and to-day the suburban service from the country districts into the city of St. John is not much better than it was twenty years ago; it is certainly not as good as it was a couple of years ago, or even last year. These changes for the worse seem to have been made without any reason. I do not intend to take up any time in elaborating these just grounds for public complaint, as other hon. gentlemen will no doubt speak on this motion, and my hon. friend from Moncton will be able to speak of conditions in his district with more knowledge than I. I am simply voicing the complaints which are made in the portion of the province from which I come, and pointing out that the universal sentiment of the people is that there is no excuse for the want of accommodation, no excuse for the lack of regard to the comfort and convenience of the travelling public, and no excuse for the many disastrous wrecks that have occurred during the past year. I do not blame the minister for that, except in this sense; he ought to give personal attention to these matters. That is what a minister is for, it seems to me, to give personal attention to the management of the great interests which are confided to his care. I do not know whether the Minister of Railways gives these matters his personal attention or not. If he does, and still allows these things to go on, he is greatly to blame, and if he does not, he is to blame for leaving the management so entirely in the hands of the General Manager of the Intercolonial. I am going to support this motion of my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) because the spirit of it is good, though I would alter two or three words if I had the amending of it. But perhaps the minister will agree to an amendment himself, which will meet with the views of the House. This is a resolution which ought to be passed. The people of this country have a right to expect the Intercolonial to be managed just as any great railway company is managing its railway. It should be managed in such a way as to secure loyalty and the best possible service from its employees, and to prevent the gross injustice which has been done to the employees of this great railroad system in the past few years under the management of the present Minister of Railways and the gentleman whom he brought in from outside to occupy the responsible position of General Manager.

Mr. JOHN STANFIELD (Colchester): My name has been before the public more or less during the last few months in connection with this matter, and I wish to correct certain statements that have appeared in the newspapers of the country. I am sorry to say that the papers that are supposed to be friendly to me have magnified the incident in which my name was mentioned, and have made statements that were incorrect. A statement was sent out to the press from this House last Thursday or Friday night in connection with what the Minister of Railways had said in regard to some remarks made by my brother in the local House, and, according to this report, the Minister of Railways said that he did not know and did not care. I have consulted Hansard, and have spoken to the members who were sitting next to the minister when he was speaking, and I find that this newspaper report is absolutely false.

Mr. CARVELL: Stand by the minister.

Mr. STANFIELD: I will stand by what is fair and square, but will oppose him or any one else when I think it is right to do so. What I wish to say is this: Some hon. members on this side of the House, as well as on the other, were under the impression that I was trying to dictate to the Minister of Railways and the General Manager of Government Railways that a certain man should be promoted to a vacancy on the Intercolonial. I do not think that I have any right to dictate; I might suggest whom they might promote. But I say that we have as good men in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as can be obtained anywhere else; they have proved themselves to be so.

All I need do is to point to Mr. McDougall, General Manager of the Dominion Coal Company, who has been promoted step by step from boy to general manager, and has made good. In his speech yesterday, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) referred to a constituency in Nova Scotia as to which he said the people did not know whether it was represented in this Parliament or not. If he was alluding to the county of Colchester, I can tell him that the people of that county are well satisfied with the way they are being represented, and they do know that they are being represented here at the present moment. I am not saying this boastfully; I am simply stating what I know to be a fact.

Before taking my seat I should like to correct the statement of the hon member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who said that this passenger agent was discharged. He was not discharged, but superannuated, and Mr. Malanson, Assistant Passenger Agent, was appointed in his place and has made good. I will say this for Mr. Hayes of the Intercolonial Railway: as far as I know, he has not brought in a single man from another road to fill a vacancy on the Intercolonial, but has promoted men from the ranks, and I am sure that if Mr Gutelius will follow the same policy in his management of the road, and will promote the men we have in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, a better spirit will prevail amongst the employees of the road.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Were not the Chief Engineer and the General Traffic Manager both brought in from outside?

Mr. STANFIELD: Yes. I would support this motion if after the word "railway" were inserted the words "when qualified."

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): I do not know whether to congratulate the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) or the Minister of Railways on the rapprochement that has taken place between them. They are both gentlemen for whom hon. members on this side of the House have a very high regard. I know I am speaking the sentiments of my colleagues around me when I say we are delighted to see that the hatchet has been buried, and that they are now able to live together in peace and harmony, and the Chief Whip of the Conservative party resuming the place he has filled so worthily for the past five years. But I am at a loss to know exactly where he stands. His conclusions are all right, however. He could vote for this motion provided a reasonable amendment were added, and I hope he will vote for it. But I must say I am rather disappointed in the hon member for Colchester, that he takes so much back water as he does. I thought he would make a stronger fight.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is somewhat subdued.

Mr. CARVELL: He is getting along fairly well, but I must say he is not measuring up to the standard he at first set for himself, he is not fulfilling the expectations formed of him by the people generally. He made a start some months ago, and was determined to show up the mismanagement of the Intrercolonial. Well, it was a good start anyway.

If it is necessary to go to Ontario, or to the West, or to the United States, to find a man to act as superintendent or head of a department of the Intercolonial, the conclusion seems inevitable that there is not much brains left among the employees of the Intercolonial. But there is hardly a railway in Canada that has not in its employ men who were trained on the Intercolonial and who are making good. Go to the United States, go to Western Canada, and you will find former Intercolonial men engaged in all departments of the great railways, and making good everywhere.

The great trouble with the Intercolonial is that it is being run on no principle whatever. The Minister of Railways, I think, would like to run it on something like business principles. He hands over the direction of affairs to his General Manager, giving that gentleman the widest powers which he exercises like—well, I will not say what I was going to say, but, let us say, as a man from Berlin would exercise them. He has no regard for the feelings of anybody, but simply says: I am the Almighty so far as the Intercolonial is concerned, and I will do as I have a mind to so long as the minister will stand behind me. And he does things in that way, until it comes to the ordinary work of the railway, and then the politician steps in. And that is what the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) is finding fault with. The whole thing is honeycombed with politics. A man cannot get a position on the Intercolonial—except the big men whom Mr. Gutelius employs—otherwise than by going through the Conservative patronage committee. I informed the Minister of Railways privately yesterday of a case to which I will not refer now at length, the case of a man who could not even get a siding except through the patronage committee. Afterwards, he got his siding and paid for it, but as the Tory patronage committee did not want it, in three weeks it was taken up, and now he has to have the produce in which he deals teamed a quarter of a mile to and from his warehouse. This siding was absolutely taken up because the politicians of that part of the province did not want it.

Mr. COPP: Worse than that they are competitors in business.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. I gave the minister the details, and he has promised to investigate, so I shall have nothing further to say about the matter now. We see the result of this political management of the Intercolonial in the operation of the trains. I was foolish enough to make two trips on the Intercolonial last winter, and I got just what I might have expected. I got tied up in each case, and was from six to ten hours late. In one case I got behind a wreck, fifty or sixty miles east of Lévis, about five o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and we did not get out of there until two o'clock on Sunday morning. I was informed that there were only two cars off the track, and on the Canadian Pacific railway or any other similar road the track would have been cleared in two hours. As well as we could find out, there was only one wrecking train in that portion of the country, and it was down on the Transcontinental, and apparently there was nobody who knew or cared or could do anything about it. I do not think I have been on the Intercolonial once within the last two years when I have not been from two to ten hours late. There is no need for that. The thing is badly managed in some way—and, I think, in every way.

I had not intended to speak on this motion, but I think it is not only the privilege but the duty of every member from the Maritime Provinces to tell the people something of the way the Intercolonial is managed. There have been wrecks, not one a week but practically one a day, during the whole winter. And I am told by men who have seen it that the trains seem to run pretty much at haphazard. A train goes along, apparently, until they think it time to boil the kettle, and then they get out and have a picnic. Then, if they escape a pitch-in from the rear, they resume the trip when it suits them and finish according as may be. Possibly, this is putting it rather strong, but it is the current talk about the Intercolonial. We are looking to the Minister of Railways to improve these things; and if Mr. Gutelius cannot run the road any better, then let the minister employ somebody at less than $20,000 a year, and perhaps he will get better results. It is possible to pay a man too much, and sometimes I wonder if that is not the case in the operation of the Government railways of Canada. In my judgment, the difficulty would be in great part met if this resolution were carried into effect and party patronage were eliminated from the operation of the road. Then the men who have grown up on the system could be promoted instead of allowing outsiders to come in and take from these people the positions that they have fairly earned. How can you expect efficiency in a business, or a Government, or any other activity, if there is no possibility of promotion beyond a certain point? A man on the Intercolonial is apt to say: What is the use of my working and becoming efficient?—I cannot get beyond the position of conductor or engineer; if somebody is wanted as superintendent or assistant superintendent, a politician will be brought in from some other part of the country. Let the minister adopt the spirit of this resolution and instruct the superintendent to promote the men on the Intercolonial—and there are hundreds of them who are fit to be promoted—and thus assure these employees that if they make themselves efficient they will be rewarded. In the employees of the Intercolonial the minister has a class of people who are just as capable as those on the Canadian Pacific. Yet, let any man travel in the province of New Brunswick on the Intercolonial and on the Canadian Pacific, and even though he has his eyes shut or is blindfolded, he will be able to determine before going five miles on which road he is travelling. One does not need to be told that he has left one system and gone to the other—he knows it by the operation of the road. He knows it because the Intercolonial railway is being operated so much less efficiently than the Canadian Pacific—that is patent to every man who can look and to every man who cannot look. Therefore, I hope this resolution will pass. Then, I hope that the minister will carry out the real spirit of the proposals, and try and eliminate some of the politics which are running rampant on the Government system of railways in Canada.

Mr. CHARLES A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouta) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am not very much in sympathy with the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay); but I must say that I give my hearty support to his resolution as drafted. Of course I am aware that his intention in bringing the matter before the House is to create an opportunity of calling attention to the treatment meted out to him by his political associates. The motion may be double-edged, but as the intention is to help the men on the Intercolonial, my hon. friend is entitled to support from this side of the House. When I hear such criticisms levelled at the management of the Government railway, I wish to recall to the hon. member that before 1911 there was a good board of management, to which the Liberal Government had appointed a French-Canadian, Mr. Caron, from whom his compatriots could expect fair treatment. The friends of the hon. gentleman from Rimouski were barely secure on the Treasury benches, when he himself, who had a vengeance to wreak, as well as the hon. member for l'Islet (Dr. Paquet) for well-known motives, were clamouring for the abolition of the Board, knowing full-well that the disappearance of the Board meant the dismissal of Mr. Caron. A General Manager was then appointed; his name sounds a good deal like that of a "Boche" and his methods have something of the Prussian about them. At any rate, the grievances exist, the employees on the Intercolonial are treated unfairly; we are here to protect them, and we must take every means to obtain redress.

The member for Rimouski, in an effort to prove that his party was not solely responsible for the present situation, states that the Liberals had imported men who had never been employed on the Intercolonial. When called upon to give specific instances, he mentioned a certain Mr. Russell. I remember his appointment. He has been made superintendent as a kind of experiment, but complaints were made all along the line, and justly so, so that after ten months Russell was dismissed.

I wish to observe en passant, that the Minister of Railways may be doing his best, but even taking into account his noted stoicism, I fail to see why he leaves the absolute management of the most valuable property of the country in the hands of Mr. Gutelius. In his office the minister is always courteous and even amiable, and ready, I believe, to do his best by French-Canadians. That is why I fail to understand why Mr. Gutelius is allowed the upper hand. The mere fact that there is general dissatisfaction would justify the Minister of Railways, were he like some politicians I know, in depriving Mr. Gutelius of a position which he exploits, not only to the detriment of the road and the men, but even against the friends of the Government. Thus, not long ago, at the time of the New Brunswick elections, which caused much rejoicing in the Liberal camp, I read in a newspaper published in that province the reply of a Conservative leader, who was asked to what he attributed the defeat of his party: "If you wish said he, to explain the defeat of the Government of New Brunswick, look at Mr. Gutelius." Of course, the hon. member for Rimouski finds little satisfaction in such facts, and if I mention them it is to obtain for the men on the Intercolonial some measure of freedom—not by shooting holes in the British flag—but the freedom of men who have a right to be treated fairly. That is the case to such an extent, that formerly the trades unions of the Intercolonial were a kind of shelter for the railwaymen. If a man were in trouble, if he were destitute or had been dismissed for or without cause, he found among the members of the trades unions help and protection. Now men who are dismissed, sometimes through mere personal spite, appeal in vain to his fellow members of the union for redress: the officers of the union are in fear of the General Manager.

Quite possibly the minister who has been ill and had to travel extensively for his health is not aware of what is going on on the Intercolonial. I must bear witness to his kindness because when I appealed to him in the name of humanity on behalf of employees in destitute circumstances, I was always well received. For that only, I should forgive him many of his political sins in the past.

If things are going far from smoothly on the Intercolonial it is because the minister places too much confidence in Mr. Gutelius and will not be undeceived. The day his eyes are opened, he will get rid of that gentleman and appoint another manager at a smaller salary; or he will take in his own hands the management of the road and I think the province of Quebec and the whole country will feel there has been an improvement.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rimouski will rally to his motion the unanimous support of the House. He simply requests after all that the management of the railway be not left entirely under the control of Mr. Gutelius. Mr. Speaker, when a minister has charge of the most valuable property of the Government and knows the large number of men employed in connection with it, should not the mere fact that a general discontent exists, that the employees are provoked to the point of rising as one man to vote against the Government, make him realize the extent of the grievance and prompt him to eradicate it. And should he find that Mr. Gutelius is at the bottom of the general unrest, ought he not to order his dismissal? There is no lack of men in the Maritime Provinces, in Quebec or elsewhere who could be appointed General Manager.

The hon. member for Rimouski must be congratulated; his resolution is timely and will have good results. If he could suggest a scheme to operate the road, that would best fit conditions like those that prevailed last winter, he would deserve the thanks of this House and of his electors. Never has a railway been so badly managed as was the Intercolonial last winter. In fact accidents were far too frequent, and so much has their number increased that one does not feel safe when he travels on that road. Mr. Speaker, if this resolution has no other effect than to bring the Minister of Railways to realize that he must enquire for himself and dispense with the services of Mr. Gutelius, he will have earned the gratitude not only of his electors but of the whole province of Quebec.

Hon. J. D. REID: Mr. Speaker, I see no reason for not accepting the resolution because, so far as I know, the policy enunciated in it has been carried out, so far as it could be, on the Government railway system. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said a few minutes ago that they had as good men in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, with as much brains as in any other part of the Dominion.

Mr. CARVELL: Sure I said that.

Mr. REID: I agree to every word of that. But let me say that from 1891 until 1896, when the Conservative party were in power, the Intercolonial was operated under the management of Mr. Pottinger who had been manager for many years and who had, so far as I know, carried on the operation of the railway successfully. I have nothing but words of praise to utter, in so far as Mr. Pottinger is concerned. Yet, during all that time, hon. gentlemen opposite criticised the management of the Intercolonial just as they are doing now. Mr. Pottinger was not fit to run the road, according to them everything was run politically.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Boulay is not on this side of the House; Mr. Boulay is on that side of the House.

Mr. REID: By the support of Mr. Boulay's resolution I think all the hon. members opposite are coming over to this side.

Mr. GRAHAM: Soon.

Mr. REID: No, as supporters of ours.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, no.

Mr. REID: Oh, yes. I was going to say—

Mr. GRAHAM: It is kind of in the air, like.

Mr. REID: I was going to say that when the Liberals came into power they at once decided to make a change. Mr. Pottinger was not considered by them to be qualified to run the road. Although there are in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia men with as much brains as in any other part of Canada, although there were men on the Intercolonial who had served from boyhood up, yet, instead of taking a man with brains from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, they went to the Grand Trunk and took Mr. Harris as general manager of the Intercolonial. Where were the men with brains from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick at that time? The Liberals then showed that, so far as they were concerned, they had to go outside of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to get a man to operate the Intercolonial, and they went to the Grand Trunk railway. They were not satisfied with Mr. Harris and they put back Mr. Pottinger whom they had been condemning for fifteen or twenty years. But again Mr. Pottinger was not satisfactory. Why? Because they wanted to run the road politically. Then they wanted some more men with brains. Did they go to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick? They came right up to Ontario and went to the Canadian Pacific Railway and took Mr. Brady off the Canadian Pacific and made him superintendent of the Intercolonial. Although the hon. member for Carleton stated a few moments ago that they could produce men in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick who had been serving on the Intercolonial for many years and who were competent to act as superintendent, they went to the Canadian Pacific Railway and took Mr. Brady.

Mr. COPP: Did you approve of Mr. Brady at that time?

Mr. REID: That is not the question I am discussing. They went further, they came here to Ottawa and formed a Board. How many men did they take from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for that Board? The first man was Mr. Campbell, the deputy minister, who is from the province of Ontario. They wanted another man. Did they go to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? They took Mr. Caron from the city of Ottawa, who had never run a railway in his life. They wanted another man to make up the Board. Did they go to the Intercolonial? Did they take an operating man? No, they went to the Grand Trunk and took Mr. Tiffin.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, Mr. Tiffin was on the Intercolonial at the time and had been for years.

Mr. REID: Mr. Tiffin was taken from the Grand Trunk and put on the Intercolonial by the Liberal party.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not on that Board.

Mr. REID: He was taken from the Grand Trunk and put on the Intercolonial as an employee.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister is getting excited. He was going along at a pretty good gait and has got into deep water. His memory has failed him. Mr. Tiffin was an old employee in charge of the traffic on the Intercolonial when he was placed on this Board. In addition to that, Mr. Pottinger was placed on this Board. This Board was modelled on the lines of the management of the Pennsylvania railway, and the heads of the several departments composed it. In deference to the French-speaking people living along the Intercolonial, the Liberal Government did what had never been done before; they placed a French-speaking man on that Board to have something to say as to how the road should be managed. That was Mr. Caron, formerly of the province of Quebec, latterly of Ottawa. As connecting link between the Government and the Board, the deputy minister was placed on it as chairman, because the late Government never shirked its responsibility in the management of the Intercolonial. So they made the deputy minister the connecting link with the Government in the management of the road.

Mr. GAUVREAU: And they were all British subjects.

Mr. REID: I am not finding fault with the men appointed. What I am endeavouring to prove is that Mr. Tiffin was an employee of another railway, from which he was taken and put on the Intercolonial. He was not promoted from the Intercolonial, except that when the Board was formed he was then made a member of the Board. Thus that very prominent position into which Mr. Tiffin was placed at first could have been filled, if the hon. members opposite are correct, by a promotion from the Intercolonial. But that was not done. Mr. Caron was put on because he was a French-Canadian. There is no objection to that; that is perfectly right. But does the hon. member mean to say, when he interjects that remark, that along the Intercolonial from Montreal to Sydney, where there are hundreds, yes thousands, of French-Canadian employees who have served the road from boyhood up, there was not a man on the Intercolonial qualified to sit on that Board, and that it was necessary to go to the province of Ontario and take a man from the city of Ottawa?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend's memory is at fault again. He means well, but he overlooks the chief fact. At that time the law was changed; what had never been done before was done then. An Act was passed allowing claimants against the Intercolonial up to a certain amount to sue the Government without going through the Exchequer Court. Mr. Caron, being a lawyer, was placed on the Board for the purpose of managing these cases at short range instead of at long range. Every employee on the Intercolonial could not have done that.

Mr. CROTHERS: Could you not have found a French-Canadian lawyer down there?

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall not answer my hon. friend; this is not a labour problem.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, it is; you are labouring very hard over it.

Mr. GRAHAM: For me it is not a labour problem. The names of many legal gentlemen were submitted. I do not hesitate to say that I consulted the members along the Intercolonial, because the Intercolonial is owned by the people and not by any general manager. Several names which had been presented were submitted to the men interested and Mr. Caron was unanimously selected. He was a good man, and it was a mistake to put him off the Board.

Mr. REID: I am not finding fault with Mr. Caron. What I find fault with is this: although members of the Bar of French descent were practising between Montreal and Sydney and had been doing business for the Government for many years in connection with the Intercolonial, you came to the province of Ontario and got for the position in question a man who was not at that time a qualified practitioner in the province of Quebec. I have in mind the reason why Mr. Caron was put on there.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course it is only a suspicion.

Mr. REID: It is only a suspicion, but there is no harm in mentioning it. Mr. Caron was a good politician, and it was an awfully good thing to have a good politician on that board You could not get a better man than Mr. Caron; he is a fine man.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad that you agree.

Mr. REID: Yes, he had a lot of experience in this House and in other ways so far as politics are concerned. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House say that the Intercolonial is honeycombed with politics. I agree with them to this extent: it was honeycombed with politics prior to our coming into power. So long as the hon. member for South Renfrew was operating the Intercolonial Railway, I am satisfied that there was no possible chance for the promotion of any Tory between Montreal and Sydney. There were no Tories on the Intercolonial Railway who had any brains at that time for promotion— 5 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon friend surely does not mean to say that there were no Tories with brains on the Intercolonial?

Mr. REID: I mean in the opinion of the hon. member for South Renfrew. There was no chance for any good Tory at that time, so far as the Intercolonial railway was concerned.

Mr. CARVELL: There are lots of them now.

Mr. REID: Of course there are, because we have been giving them their rights since we came into power. During the fifteen years that we were in opposition many men on the Intercolonial railway who should have been promoted did not get their rights, and many of them, because of their having received no promotion during fifteen years, since reached the age limit and could not get the promotion to which they were entitled.

Hon. gentlemen have complained that there were wrecks on the Intercolonial railway. I submit that the Intercolonial railway is in the same position as any other railway with regard to wrecks; you cannot operate a railway without wrecks occurring. In my opinion, however, there have been fewer wrecks on the Intercolonial, proportionately speaking, than on any other railroad in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. REID: As to the service on the Intercolonial railway, I have it from highest officials of the department, as well as from other railways, that the service is equal to if not better than that of any of the other Canadian systems—and the Intercolonial railway has been in this position ever since war broke out in August, 1914. The Intercolonial railway is practically the only outlet to Halifax for the traffic over the other railways; consequently it has really been overloaded. An enormous amount of equipment has been added to the Intercolonial during the last two or three years and this railway was able last year, when not hampered on account of storms, to transport traffic much quicker than other roads. The Intercolonial railway, upon the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners, took up the question of cutting down the passenger traffic on account of the enormous amount of foodstuffs and munitions that had to be transported. As on other railroads, passenger trains were taken off. The people were, of course, inconvenienced by this, but aside from the few discussions I have heard in this House, it is evident that the general public of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, through which this road runs, were willing, on account of the necessity of transporting materials necessary in connection with the war, to bear with that inconvenience. There has been very little grumbling. I do not think that the Intercolonial is deserving of censure in that respect; as a matter of fact, I think it is putting on its passenger trains earlier than the other railways.

As to the suburban services at St. John and Halifax, new cars and new engines, if I remember rightly, have been put on by the Minister of Railways and Canals and they have a splendid service; since the minister put on this new equipment I have not heard one word of complaint. I have no doubt that the Minister of Railways and Canals will put more cars and engines on the railway as fast as he can supply them. From the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite, the people might come to the conclusion, if the matter were not properly explained, that under Liberal adminstration any brains that were required in the Intercolonial railway were obtained by the promotion of officials of the railway. I think, however, I have shown that during the fifteen long years that my hon. friends were in power, when they wanted brains for the permanent positions, instead of taking the brains on the Intercolonial, they simply came to Ontario and secured the brains here for the management of that railway.

Mr. MACDONALD: I trust the minister will not forget to tell us how many men during the past year were taken from other roads to fill positions under the general management.

Mr. REID: I would be very glad to give my hon. friend that information if I had it before me. As regards the taking of employees from other roads, when some experienced men were required, owing to the fact that promotions had not been made from time to time as they should have been made during those fifteen long years of Liberal rule, the older men were not dismissed, as stated by the hon. member, but were superannuated and new officials taken on. Take the case of Mr. Hayes. There should have been an official on the Intercolonial trained up to fill that position, but as during those fifteen long years the late Government had not allowed a man on the Intercolonial to be trained up to fill it, this Government had to take from outside a man who had the experience.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister mean to say that because Conservatives had not been promoted, the Government were compelled to take a Liberal, or to go outside and select a new man, and that they went outside and selected a new man? Is that the argument the minister makes?

Mr. REID: I repeat what I have already said. When the Liberals were in power for fifteen long years, I had not heard of any case in which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), we shall say, urged the Minister of Railways to promote an official on the Intercolonial to the position to which he would properly be entitled on account of his experience.

Mr. CARVELL: For fifteen long years I supported that Government which the minister speaks about, and at the end of the fifteen years we went out of power. I had but one constituent employed on the Intercolonial railway. A few weeks after the Liberal Government went out of power, the present Government dismissed him, and I think they were quite right in doing so. I did not urge upon the Minister of Railways to promote any one.

Mr. REID: In the interest of the employees who had joined this railway, I think it was the duty of the hon. member to stand up in the House then as he has done to-day and tell the Government of that day: "These men are employees of the Intercolonial; they are there working on the road; give them promotion; do not bring in Mr. Harris from Montreal."

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister please come back to my question? Did he refuse to appoint Liberals, and was that the reason why he brought in outsiders?

Mr. REID: In every case where we could find an employee qualified to fill a vacancy we promoted him. The policy of the Intercolonial and the policy of the Minister of Railways, to my knowledge, is that whenever there is a man with the knowledge requisite for a vacant position, he is to be promoted. That is the policy which has been followed by the Conservative party since we have been in power, and that is the policy which the Minister of Railways is trying to follow now, and as that is the purport of the resolution now before the House, so far as I am concerned, I see no reason why we should not support it.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the people of the Maritime Provinces, generally, and the employees of the Intercolonial particularly will feel gratified when they read in the public press the statement made by the Minister of Customs, and thus learn that they have been deceiving themselves for the past two years in regard to the management of that railway. I have listened with some degree of interest to the arguments on the resolution now before the House. I have the privilege of living near the Intercolonial railway centre and I know something about what is in the minds of the people in that vicinity in regard to the operation of that railway during the past few years. The minister has given rather a vague historical sketch of the operation of the Intercolonial for the past twenty-one years. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has drawn his attention to the fact that his memory has failed on several points. It has not only failed him in regard to the matters drawn to his attention by that hon. member, but it has failed him in other matters to which I shall direct him to. I have had some experience of the Intercolonial for years past, and this is the first time I have heard that Mr. Pottinger was dismissed from the Intercolonial by the former Government and Mr. Harris made General Manager in his stead. I was not aware that that ever took place, and I think it is another lapse of memory on the part of the minister. So far as I can remember, Mr. Pottinger was General Manager of the Intercolonial prior to the defeat of the Government in 1896. He remained in that position until a Board of Management, of which he was a member, was organized; in fact, he acted as deputy chairman of the board up to the defeat of the Government in 1911. Mr. Harris was brought from Montreal to Moncton to take charge of a certain branch of the Intercolonial, but he was weighed in the balance and found wanting, and he was soon sent back to Montreal, or somewhere else entirely removed from the operation of the Intercolonial.

The resolution submitted by the hon. member for Rimouski is very important and I sincerely trust that it will have the hearty support and co-operation not only of hon. members on this side of the House, because this should not be a political question, but of hon. members on the other side. The principle embodied in the resolution must appeal to every intelligent citizen who knows anything about the operation of the Intercolonial railway, and anything of the employees of that road. I was surprised that the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) did not take a stronger stand in support of the hon. member who introduced the resolution. The very strongest arguments that I have heard in favour of the principle of this resolution have appeared in newspapers supporting the hon. member for Colchester; in fact, if my information is correct, they have appeared in a paper owned by the hon. gentleman himself, together with a criticism of the Minister of Railways for not promoting men employed on the Intercolonial to important positions on that road. I am sure the hon. member for Colchester took a proper stand at that time in regard to that very matter, and I regret, on behalf of the employees of the Intercolonial railway in the Maritime Provinces in particular, the statement he has made this afternoon, and the action he has taken in practically withdrawing the support he gave during the time this matter was before the public in the newspapers. He has apparently withdrawn his support from the employees of the Intercolonial in the Maritime Provinces.

With regard to the operation of the Intercolonial the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) would have us believe that the poor service is entirely due to the trains and motive power being used for the transport of troops and munitions, but I can tell him that the statement made by my hon. friend from Carleton as to the operation of the road is perfectly true. On one occasion last winter, wishing to go from one station on the Intercolonial to another, I telephoned to the station to find out what train I could catch, and what information do you suppose I got? They said, "Yesterday's Maritime express will be here today on Ocean Limited's time, running three and one-half hours late." The Minister of Customs would have us believe that no complaints are being made in regard to the service, and he says that if the travelling public are inconvenienced in any way, it is because the trains are required for the transport of troops and war supplies. I should like to mention one little incident in this connection. The railway men of Moncton have been trying for years to get a special train to take them from Moncton to Shediac at five o'clock when the day's work is done, but all their requests were turned down. Strange to say, in February last, although the road was then very busy carrying munitions of war, this train was put on from Moncton to Shediac.

Mr. CARVELL: An election was coming on down there in two weeks.

Mr. COPP: The election was on then. This new train was started on February 10, and was kept on for fourteen days, and on the 25th it was withdrawn because forsooth, they had no motive power to haul the train!

Mr. CARVELL: The election was on the 24th. No politics in that?

Mr. COPP: For the Minister of Customs to say that the road is being run in the interests of the people of the Maritime Provinces, and that there is no dissatisfaction with the service, is to talk nonsense. I could not follow the arguments of my hon. friend from Rimouski very well, and perhaps they were not on exactly the same line as mine, but I think I am voicing the sentiments of every person in the Maritime Provinces when I say that promotions on the Intercolonial should be made from the ranks of the employees. The men who have worked for years on the road, and gained the necessary experience, should be the first to be considered when a vacancy arises. My hon. friend (Mr. Reid) says that many men have been promoted in the last six years. Well, I can tell him that in that period more men still have been promoted out of the service, dismissed by politicians. That is what is going on.

The principle of this resolution has my very hearty support. Though I would not go so far as to say that the manager of the railway should be debarred from employing expert help for special purposes, I am thoroughly in favour of the general principle that the men who have gained their experience on the Intercolonial are just as capable, if not more so, of filling the higher positions than men brought in from outside.

In answer to a question I put on the Order Paper last session, I was told, if I remember correctly, that about twenty-three men had been brought in from outside to work on the Intercolonial. If there is any position on the Intercolonial that Intercolonial employees cannot fill, it is all right to get men from outside, but I know of cases without number where properly qualified men in the service have been passed over when a vacancy occurred. Some men who have been forced out of the service have through sheer ability made good with other railways, and others have taken positions in an entirely different line of work, and made good. Now, if these men had been promoted on the Intercolonial as they should have been, who can doubt that they would have made good there, after their many years experience on the road? A case came to my knowledge within the past week where a man who had practically given the best years of his life to the Intercolonial, had been discharged from the service without a moment's notice, and without a single charge being laid against him in any shape, manner or form. And yet my hon. friend would have us believe that there are no politics in the promotions and dismissals on the Intercolonial. As one hon. gentleman has said, the Intercolonial is simply honeycombed with politics, and it is becoming more honeycombed year after year. Hon. gentlemen opposite have given the manager of the road carte blanche. Now, I would be the last one to say a word against Mr. Gutelius's reputation as an engineer or as Manager of the Intercolonial, but I do know this, that down in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we have men with a little horse sense, and if the manager of the road has the vast experience and the great ability that hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe, he certainly is not applying it in his management of the road when the train from St. John to Halifax to connect with the Maritime Express from Montreal, day after day runs from twenty-four to thirty-six and even seventy-two hours late; and that is not the only case I could give. I sincerely trust that we have succeeded in bringing home to the Minister of Railways the many short-comings in the service, and the inconvenience and discomfort that the people of the Maritime Provinces have to put up with at the present time owing to the unsatisfactory operation of the road.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): There is no objection to the passing of this resolution. It goes without saying that the Minister of Railways must be responsible to the public for the appointment of officials and for the management of the road. I have been more than amazed at many of the exaggerated statements that have been made in this debate, particularly those of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp). I do not think there has been a single case in which the Maritime express was seventy-two hours late.

Mr. COPP: Not only seventy-two hours late, but cancelled altogether.

Mr. COCHRANE: Probably there is not a road in Canada that has to contend with such snow difficulties as has the Intercolonial. We have had, without exaggeration, at least fifty feet of snow at places between Mont Joli and Montreal. The handling of the snow this season has cost us over $100,000 more than for any former season in the history of the Intercolonial. I am always glad to get recommendations and advice from hon. members residing in the territory served by the Intercolonial. Of course, I cannot promise always to accept these suggestions; in fact, if I did, there would soon be a great muddle and the road could not be run at all. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) stated that we had dismissed the Engineer of Maintenance on the Intercolonial. Without criticising or finding fault with my predecessor in office, I may explain that when a Bridge Engineer was appointed on the Intercolonial—an officer which the road had never had before—we had to run wrecking trains to several bridges, because though the locomotives had been increased in weight the bridges had not been strengthened, and examination showed that in many cases the rivets were withdrawn, the heads having been pulled off, so it was a miracle that we had not had more wrecks and greater loss of life than actually occurred. As to dismissals from the Intercolonial, I make the statement without fear of contradiction that I have not dismissed one-tenth as many during my whole term of office as hon. gentlemen opposite dismissed in the first six years of the control of the road. There is an arrangement with the different organizations under which there must be investigation before a man can be dismissed. I have adhered to this in every case, and I defy any one to show where a single man has been dismissed for political reasons without an investigation, or any case in which that investigation did not show that his dismissal was warranted.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I can give the minister a case in my own riding.

Mr. COCHRANE: The different organizations would not stand for it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: On the contrary.

Mr. COCHRANE: If in any case a mistake has been made, the man has been restored to his position, and paid. As to patronage, I am satisfied that I cannot fairly be accused of running the railway in that interest. The criticism of the people on my own side of the House is that I give no weight to such considerations. I have certainly tried to run the railroad in a business way, and in the interests of the whole people. I feel that as Minister of Railways I am not representing the Conservative party alone but have in charge the interests of the whole people, and I have acted accordingly.

Certain remarks were made about Mr. Gutelius. I could not follow very well the remarks made in the French language, but I believe there was an insinuation that Mr. Gutelius was a German. He is not a German, and never was. He was born in the United States, where his people have lived for generations. He is a naturalized Canadian, and has been in Canada for nearly twenty years.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it not a fact that he was not naturalized until he was appointed to the management of the road?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think so. But he had lived in Canada long before that and had been engaged in the operation of Canadian railways.

Mr. GAUVREAU: We have lots of Germans of whom the same can be said.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have not lots of Germans on the Intercolonial. I think it should be borne in mind that since I took hold of the railway we have taken over the operation of more than two thousand miles of new line and a great number of those employed in the operation of the Intercolonial have been put on those added railways. I am willing, and pleased, and proud, to promote men on the Intercolonial, and I am glad to have any member of this House, Grit or Tory, recommend a man for promotion. Our promotions on the Intercolonial have not by any means been of Tories only; many of those promoted have been Grits. We choose the men who stand out among their fellows as being worthy of promotion.

A remark was made concerning Mr. Caron which my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) answered very well. But I may add, in answer to some of our French representatives, that Mr. Mathieu was appointed two or three years ago as counsel for the Intercolonial. I realize that the French population has a right to have proper representation not only among the officials but in the management of the road. I am glad at any time to get the names of those who are thought to be fit for promotion, because we still want assistant superintendents and superintendents. I do not think any of the gentlemen who have made remarks this afternoon—some very harsh and very exaggerated remarks—can name a man in the employ of the Intercolonial whom they would appoint to the position of general manager, if they had the power. I shall be glad to get the names if they care to give them.

Mr. COPP: Will you take the recommendation?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have to be the judge of that; but I shall be very glad to get the names. The hon. gentleman has not given any name.

Mr. COPP: I am afraid the minister would not take my recommendation.

Mr. COCHRANE: Perhaps not. I do not think we should take everybody's recommendation, for after all, as I have said, we are responsible for the running of the road. Complaint has been made about accidents. We have carried seven million passengers this year, the largest number in the history of the road, and we have not killed one passenger—not one. I am willing to leave it to any competent railway man to judge whether our management has not been an improvement upon any that went before.

With regard to taking off trains, we did not do anything other than what was done on every road in Ontario, by the direction of the Railway Commission, in order to help out the transportation question. I am surprised at the statements with regard to trains being late. There is not a train running into Ottawa or Montreal which is not late time and time again. I do not expect that if our Saviour were running the Intercolonial railway He would satisfy a great number of the people down there anyway. I do not expect at all to satisfy them no matter how long I run the road, but I intend to do what I think is right no matter whom it pleases or whom it does not.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is an interesting psychological study. Hearing the hon. gentleman this afternoon speaking as he did with apparent candour in reference to the way the Intercolonial has been operated, one would fancy that my hon. friend was absolutely sincere in the statements he made and actually believed that in the operation of the road he was doing exactly the proper thing. The real fact of the matter is that either my hon. friend is sincere in his assumptions or he is being deceived. We are bound to assume that my hon. friend is sincere in the statements which he has made to the House. If he is sincere he is being grossly deceived in regard to the information that comes to him as to the operation of the Intercolonial. It may be that my hon. friend, psychologically speaking, is not in a position to grasp the theory of the people living along the Intercolonial with regard to the method of administration. If, as is stated in the country sometimes, it is the intention of this Government to inaugurate a broad system of government ownership of railways, they will have absolutely no support or sympathy from the people of that part of the Dominion if what they are doing is any indication of what they will do on a larger scale.

My hon. friend suggests that he is under the impression that the Intercolonial is being run satisfactorily. It may be that my hon. friend does not understand the people of the Maritime Provinces. I think that is the real fact of the matter. He does not understand their aspirations, but trusts entirely to subordinates and accepts what they say to him on the supposition that their statements represent the facts. That is the most generous and sympathetic attitude to adopt in regard to my hon. friend. To say that during the last two years there was the slightest appreciation of the conditions that existed in the Maritime Provinces by the men who were running the Intercolonial would be to make an absolutely mistaken statement. If one takes a train on that railway at any season of the year, or connects from any of the railways operating in any other part of Canada, one at once sees that the whole system has fallen down. When anything is said they say: The Intercolonial has to haul all the troops that are sailing from Halifax in winter and therefore you should excuse all these imperfections. But the whole trouble in regard to the management of the Intercolonial in reference to that phase of the situation was that, although this war has lasted for nearly three years, although the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and myself, a year ago, on the 4th of May, said to the then Acting Minister of Railways that the provision at that time in regard to the supply of cars, both for passenger and freight service, was wholly inadequate, and that they ought to have proceeded long before that in order to prepare for the conditions created by the war, it was only at a late day that my hon. friend undertook to deal with the question at all. Embargos were placed on freight coming from the Maritime Provinces in 1915 by those who were in control of the railway and the business interests of those provinces suffered in a tremendous degree on account of the lack of foresight of the management. Notwithstanding all that was brought to the attention of the Acting Minister of Railways, totally inadequate provision was made to meet the condition which arose. It was necessary to have a thousand extra freight cars to deal with that situation in an effective way. But, during last winter, the business interests of the Maritime Provinces were tied up again, the whole of the passenger service was dislocated and the conditions, as described by hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me this afternoon, were not in any degree exaggerated. The business men of those provinces could not deal with business men west of Montreal. They were told that the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk refused to give cars to the Intercolonial, because, when they got them down there, they never brought them back. It was impossible to get freight west of Montreal. The same condition existed, by reason of some difference that arose between the management of the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific, with reference to the passenger connection at St. John. This was due to a misunderstanding between the men who are operating the Intercolonial and those in charge of connecting roads. Day by day business men came to St. John from the United States or upper Canada to find that the Canadian Pacific train had left half an hour before they arrived, simply because the Intercolonial management would not deal with these roads in what they thought was a proper way.

Mr. COCHRANE: The freight embargo was put on by the Grand Trunk in Montreal. Under an arrangement, made by the late Government—I do not say it was a bad arrangement—they were unable to handle freight, and therefore we had to bring 49 engines and vans up in order to keep the overseas stuff moving. We could not move freight west simply because the Grand Trunk could not accept it.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. COCHRANE: There was an arrangement made by Act of Parliament, but they got the stuff there or at Ste. Rosalie junction.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not the Canadian Pacific. There is no arrangement by Act of Parliament with the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. COCHRANE: If a shipper bills freight from Pictou to Toronto over the Canadian Pacific, we have no right to have it billed by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MACDONALD: We were speaking about freight going east, and my hon. friend's remarks apply to freight going west. If my hon. friend had the cars that the ex-Minister of Railways had pleaded with the acting minister to get in ample quantities, and if he had got the engines that he was asked to get and which he could have got, we would not have had that blockade.

Mr. COCHRANE: We are not responsible for the blockade. They would not accept a car from us.

Mr. MACDONALD: You could have taken the cars from them if they would not take the cars from you. All you had to do was to supply engines to take the cars that were tied up at these connecting points.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Canadian Pacific embargoed stuff going from Montreal. They would not take any freight except for overseas business.

Mr. MACDONALD: The management of the Intercolonial created these conditions both in regard to passengers and freight, and it is that same kind of management that has caused hon. gentlemen to complain about the conditions to-day. Then, I come to the question, which is the particular subject of this motion, of the promotion of men in the service. The Minister of Customs went off to give us some ancient history in regard to the matter, but my hon. friend did not venture to deal with the proposal, which is the subject of this motion, in regard to promotion of men who are in the service. That is something that is bitterly complained of. It is the thing that caused the former whip of the Conservative party to send his resignation as a member of this House to the chairman of the executive of the party in his county and to resign his position as whip in this House, and which caused his brother, a member of the Legislature for the county of Colchester, to send his resignation as a member to the Chairman of the Conservative organization in that county; and also, according to his own statement, to decline to take his seat in the Legislature until, as he said, the Minister of Railways came down. Take, for instance, the man who is now Superintendent of the Intercolonial from Saint John to Truro, a man named Devenish. This man was first heard from in connection with railroading as an engineer on the Transcontinental, and it is said that he was very useful to Mr. Gutelius in connection with the preparation of the partisan report which he made upon the construction of that railway. Let me give an illustration of the extent to which the public are inconvenienced under the administration of this man. Three weeks ago a through passenger train left St. John on time at two o'clock. At Coldbrook it was held up for ten minutes awaiting the arrival of a suburban train running from Rothesay. Imagine a through train with connections from Boston and New York being held up at a side station for a suburban train on a very short line. Farther along the road they came to Painsec, where they were held up for half an hour waiting to cross another train from the east, when they could have reached Sackville in ten minutes. At McCurdy's siding they were held up to overtake a freight train on a small siding and to wait for another freight train which had left Truro ten minutes before, with the result that the three trains were tied up at this little inconsequential siding three miles out of Truro for nearly an hour. Forty-five passengers going to Prince Edward Island arrived at Truro two hours late by reason of the magnificent superintendence of this gentleman, Mr. Devenish, who was brought to the Intercolonial by the minister and Mr. Gutelius. One passenger said to an official: "This is very queer train dispatching." The official said: "Train dispatching! This is not train dispatching, this is train detaining." Here is this gentleman, Mr. Devenish, who was not brought up on the Intercolonial, placed in control of that section of the road, without any knowledge of local conditions, and under such circumstances that to-day there is not a business man or a patron of the road from Truro to Saint John who does not condemn my hon. friend for having placed that gentleman there. Why was he put there? Does my hon. friend mean to say that there were not men on the Intercolonial, conductors of long experience, men of intelligence and capacity, who were fit to superintend that division of the road? Does he mean to say that there was no man on that railway who could have done that superintending and could not do it to-day better than Mr. Devenish? My hon. friend must recognize these conditions. If he is sincere in the position he takes, for his own good I would advise him to get some information as to exactly what is going on down there. Take, for instance, the case of my hon. friend for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) and his brother. It is all very well for the Minister of Railways to-day to say that he is in favour of the general principle of promotion on the Intercolonial. Why did he, in the year 1915, import twenty-three men from outside on the Intercolonial? My hon. friend himself gave us the information last winter. On the 26th of April, in answer to the question of my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp), the then Acting-Minister of Railways, told this House that down to Dec. 31, 1915, twenty-three outside men were appointed. In the engineering department there was one man at $500 a month, one at $110 a month, two at $100 a month, one at $165 a month and so on. Some of these men in different departments were brought in at salaries of from $6,000 to $8,000. In regard to every one of those appointments to positions of a subordinate character under the general manager, there is not a man on the Intercolonial, Liberal or Conservative, who does not know that there are men on the road who could do that work as well as these men. The minister will have to give us in a few days a list of the men he has employed since December, 1915, from outside the Intercolonial, so that we will have this list brought up to date. I presume he will be willing to produce that list. We will then be able to get at the facts in connection with the objections raised by the hon. member for Colchester. My hon. friend says his policy has always been to promote men from the railway staff rather than to take men from outside. That is a remarkable statement in view of the fact that he took on twenty-three outside men, as he said, last year; and I do not know how many he has taken since. I have here what the brother of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield), who is the member for Colchester in the Provincial House, said. It is just as well that the House should understand, since we are on this question, just what the feeling of the people down there is. Men on the Intercolonial and in the Maritime Provinces are opposed to this Government on account of the way they and the public have been treated. That is the reason why Mr. Stanfield, the member of the local legislature for Colchester, did not take his seat in the House of Assembly. This is what he says:

> As you are aware, I did not take my seat in this House until Wednesday last. I represent a county in which a large number of employees of the Canadian Government Railway reside. These employees I consider to be as efficient as any railway men in the world. As a public man, I naturally come into contact with a great many railway men. As a business man, representing large commercial interests, I have constant business dealings with the railway. Questions arose in regard to promotion of employees. I took the ground that the railway management had not sufficiently recognized in this respect the merits and the rights of the men. I contended that the principle should be adopted and clearly understood that all promotions to higher positions on the C.G.R. should be given to employees of the said railway.

To emphasize my position in this matter, I deemed it to be advisable to refrain from taking my seat in this House until I obtained assurances in regard to the principle for which I contended.

He does not mention here that in addition to refusing to take his seat in the House he sent his resignation to the Chairman of his party, or that he got his brother, the member of this House for the same county, to send his resignation to the Chairman of the Convention in the county and to resign his position as whip of the Conservative party in this House.

Mr. CARVELL: Does he say what pledges he received?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am coming to that. It is all very well for the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Railways to say that they have recognized in the past the principle of promotion on the Intercolonial. But if that was so, what was the meaning of the Stanfield brothers acting as they did in this matter of resigning their seats and refusing to continue their positions in the Conservative party, and calling on their party to accept their resignations? Mr. Stanfield goes on:

I am now pleased to be able to make it known to the employees of the Canadian Government Railway system, and to this House, that the management agrees to the general principle of promotion within the ranks, which I claimed to be only fair and just.

What does that mean? That the Minister of Railways had declined to take this position until Mr. Stanfield and his brother had made this threat, and having made the threat they now absolutely say to the people and the Legislature of Nova Scotia that the Minister of Railways now agrees to the general principle of promotion within the ranks, and that he succeeded in this matter. He goes on:

I consider, therefore, that having succeeded in this matter and having, as I believe, vindicated the fair and reasonable rights of the men of the Canadian Government Railway, I am better able to serve their interests and the interests of the public, by being sworn in as a member of this House to which I was elected last June by the votes of the people of the County of Colchester.

What does that mean? Either that we are to believe the statement of these two members of the Government to-day that they have always recognized the principle of promotion, and we are bound to believe them, and that the brothers Stanfield have been, as I have said, in common parlance making a grand stand play for the benefit of their constituents and the railway employees—either that is the situation, or Messrs. Stanfield are telling the truth; that it was necessary for them to threaten to resign their seats and to take the position which one of them in the Legislature of Nova Scotia said it was necessary for him to take before the Government or the Minister of Railways would recognize the principle which is contained in this resolution.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, we were on the point of considering the statement made by Mr Stanfield, the local member for Colchester, in regard to the difference of opinion he had with the Minister of Railways respecting a certain appointment, and I gave the House what Mr. Stanfield had said in the provincial legislature on the subject and pointed out that, as a result of his statement, either the minister was entirely mistaken in the assumption that he has given to the House that in the past he has been in the habit of promoting employees of the Intercolonial to fill the different positions, or Mr. Stanfield is mistaken. This is the statement given by the minister in answer to the questions asked him by the hon. member for Guysboro, as reported in Hansard, page 692:

Mr. SINCLAIR: . . . Would the minister be good enough to tell us if he has really changed his policy in that regard, and if we may expect that appointments on the eastern division will be made in a different manner in the future?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have made no change in policy. My policy is to appoint the best man. If it is possible to find him on the road we certainly take him. It has been my policy ever since I took charge of the department to promote men when I knew they were capable of filling the vacant position.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister did not promise to make any change—is that what we are to understand?

The minister very delicately sidestepped that straight question and answered:

Mr. COCHRANE: I have said exactly what I mean.

In other words, he had said what he had said, and he proposed to leave it a mystery to the speculation of an admiring public as to whether Mr. Stanfield had stampeded him or he had stampeded Mr. Stanfield. I recall that under the regime of the old Empress of China (a regime which has now disappeared, to be superseded by a republic), the admiration of the diplomatic world was always extended to the state documents that were in vogue in those days, because of the marvellous art displayed in all of those documents of what was known in diplomatic circles as "saving their face." It was that marvellous quality which caused the American humorist to say:

> For ways that are dark
> And tricks that are vain,
> The heathen Chinee is peculiar.

Whether it is my hon. friend the minister or the Stanfield family that has resorted to this Oriental system of deceiving the public and throwing dust into their eyes, I am not sure, but certainly there was some development of that particular art, because we have these two absolutely distinct statements staring us in the face: on the one hand, the announcement to an admiring public by the self-sacrificing member of the local legislature that he had refrained from taking his seat as a representative of the people in the council halls of the province; that he had sent his resignation to the President of the Conservative Association in the riding by way of protest against the nefarious system which the Minister of Railways had established in the Intercolonial of ignoring the promotion of competent appointees, and on the other, the statement of the minister, reiterated to-day, that he had not in the slightest iota departed from his policy upon that question. These are two absolutely contradictory statements. Were it not for the fact that we have the real facts at our disposal and are able to give them to the House and to the people, members of Parliament would be left in wonderment at the Oriental adeptness of mind of these two gentlemen. The minister has the proud satisfaction now of having the former whip of the party state in the House that he was all right again—in somewhat abstruse language, I admit, but still that was the effect. What are the facts? There was the necessity of appointing an official in the city of Halifax to look after the terminals that were being established there. In spite of the pathetic appeals which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) made in the House last year and which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr Maclean reiterated yesterday, pointedly calling the attention of Parliament and the country to the fact that those appeals had fallen on unheeding ears, the Minister of Railways continued the old system of patronage on the Intercolonial; and so when this vacancy occurred, along came the Stanfield brothers who recommended to the General Manager or to the minister the appointment of a Mr. McNutt to have charge of those terminals. Mr. McNutt was a train despatcher on the Intercolonial, and a very estimable man as a train despatcher, but I am going to say this to the minister, that when the Stanfields came to him and wanted him to appoint a train despatcher to look after the terminals at Halifax, he very properly refused to appoint him, and in that respect he was correct. What did the Stanfields do? They immediately proceeded to declare that the principle of promotion of appointees had been violated by this terrible minister; they set on foot their organ, the Truro Citizen, to belabour the hon. gentleman, which it did in every mood and tense for months to the interest of the people of the Maritime Provinces. The minister, however, foolishly did a wrong thing. Instead of looking around amongst the employees of the Intercolonial and ascertaining whether or not there was a competent conductor or trainman who had experience in handling cars and trains to be found who could be placed in that position, and promoting such a man who would be competent whereas a train despatcher would not be, the minister deserted the Intercolonial altogether, and at the instigation no doubt of his general manager, he proceeded to appoint another man from somewhere else who had no connection with the Intercolonial. The result was that they were both wrong: the Stanfields were wrong because they were recommending a man whose line of training did not fit him for the position—

Mr. STANFIELD: I never recommended a man.

Mr. MACDONALD: Well, if my hon. friend did not recommend him, his brother did. It amounts to the same thing. They proceeded to ask the public to regard them with admiration because they had stood up for the interest of the men on the Intercolonial, while the minister proceeded to have his organs throughout Upper Canada, where the facts were not known, clothe him with a mantle of great virtue and propriety as standing solidly against this nefarious system of patronage which the hon. member for Colchester was trying to impose upon him. That is the way the game was played.

Mr. COCHRANE: He was not recommended by a member at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who recommended him?

Mr. COCHRANE: A railway man, capable of knowing, recommended him.

Mr. MACDONALD: Recommended whom?

Mr. COCHRANE: The man my hon. friend is speaking about.

Mr. MACDONALD: Which man?

Mr. COCHRANE: The assistant superintendent at Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD: The one the minister appointed?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not say that he was recommended by a member. I said that the minister went to another part of the country to get him. The man recommended by the member for Colchester was Mr. McNutt, a train despatcher of Truro. That was the first act. What was the next? The next act was that Mr. Stanfield, the member of the provincial legislature, proceeded to write a letter to the president of the Conservative Association in his county, who happens to be a brother of the man whom he had recommended for the position. Mr. Stanfield became rather jealous of the adulation which was being extended to the Minister of Railways for having withstood the onslaught of these patronage hunters in Nova Scotia, and he thought he was entitled to some kudos. He immediately started the theory that he was not so particular about McNutt as he was concerning the principle of the promotion of employees and his newspaper sedulously cultivated that idea. Therefore, he sent his resignation to Mr. McNutt the president of the association, and the hon. member for Colchester in this House followed that up by sending in his resignation also. But all the while the minister stands grim and glum behind the great reputation for political virtue that he has gathered to himself as the result of standing against the onslaught of the gentleman from Colchester. Then came the third act of the drama. An impasse occurred. The member for Colchester in the provincial legislature could not take his seat in the face of those conditions. His brother in this House also was troubled as to what his attitude should be. In the interim, after the adjournment of this House had taken place, these two doughty forces which had been battling so sturdily decided to get together. They made a compromise, and the minister created a new job altogether, viz. Inspector of Train Despatchers.

Mr. STANFIELD: It is not a new job.

Mr. MACDONALD: How was the vacancy created?

Mr. STANFIELD: I forget the gentleman's name who occupied it previously, but he was given another position.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend's explanation is worse than his denial.

Mr. GRAHAM: Like the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), he is trying to explain the inexplicable.

Mr. MACDONALD: The situation could not last. The member for Colchester in the legislature was faced with the alternative of resigning, and the embarrassment here had also to be removed, so Mr. McNutt was made Inspector of Train Despatchers. Then came the fourth act, and we are now approaching the final scene. The appointment of Mr. McNutt as Inspector of Train Despatchers saved the face of the member for Colchester in the provincial legislature and he returned to the House, and in a statement which I read this afternoon announced to an admiring country that the principle of promotion for employees of the road for which he had contended was vindicated notwithstanding the opposition of the Minister of Railways, and consequently he might be allowed to take his seat. But now, the Minister of Railways tells us that he stands to-day where he always stood, immovable as a rock; that the principle of promotion of employees, except when he wants to appoint somebody else, is to be maintained as firmly as ever. So the curtain rings down on the scene with the member for Colchester having succeeded in getting his man appointed to an equally good position, while the minister goes on with the same old system of patronage on the Intercolonial, without the principle having been settled at all. It is rather difficult to tell at this stage if my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) is playing a minor part in this drama or not. He is a doughty warrior at long distance. He has threatened the Minister of Railways, and his reputation as a threatener and as a patronage dispenser has extended beyond the bounds of his own province. Whether his appearance to-day with this resolution is for the purpose of enabling these warriors in the play to make their exits gracefully, I am unable to determine. But no matter whether this resolution is agreed to by hon. gentlemen or not, the same old game will go on, notwithstanding the declaration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and not a man will be employed on the Intercolonial, whether a returned soldier or not, unless he is recommended by the man who has the patronage. That is the situation.

In all frankness I would say to the minister that the complaints which have been made with regard to the operation of the Intercolonial during the last two winters are founded upon absolutely justifiable grounds. We urged last winter, during the absence of the minister, that some prescience, some capacity to look ahead, should be shown by the management. In that marvelous utterance of President Wilson, when he addressed Congress the other day on the duty of the nation in the war, one of the things he laid particular stress upon was the necessity for the transportation companies to use all their efforts, and, by looking ahead, to prepare for the condition which would ensue if war was declared. The obligation which President Wilson sought to impress upon the transportation companies of the United States rested equally upon this Government from the very beginning of the war in regard to the Government Railway. The Government knew that it would be necessary to transport our troops and war materials to the eastern part of Canada over that road, and it was the bounden duty of the management of the Intercolonial the moment war was declared to order such an excess of equipment over what would be required in normal times, both cars and locomotives, that there would be no danger of holding up the transportation of troops or war material. We asked them in this House to do that, but they never moved. Instead of giving orders to all the car shops in Canada to prepare for the condition which has existed in every one of the last three winters, and which will exist again next winter, unless the war should fortunately end before, the Government proceeded to buy some second-hand cars in the United States, with the result that there have been endless stoppages, tie-ups and vexatious delays, and the common talk in the Maritime Provinces is that it is due wholly and solely to the absolute lack of foresight displayed by the management of the Intercolonial.

My hon. friend said that the General Manager of the Intercolonial was a Canadian citizen. Rightly or wrongly, the people of the Maritime Provinces view the General Manager with some suspicion. It is true he is an American citizen, but the United States is filled with German-American citizens. The General Manager of the Intercolonial came to Canada about 1897, and worked with different railways here until he was employed as one of the investigating commissioners on the Transcontinental. Although he conducted that inquiry with Senator Staunton, he never took the oath of allegiance to His Majesty King George V, and it was not until after the report had been laid on the table of the House and was under discussion here, and after the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) had asked whether Mr. Gutelius was a Canadian citizen or not, that he proceeded to take the oath of allegiance. One of the men that Mr. Gutelius brought in from outside was a man named Ruhl, who was also said to come from the United States. He was employed at $200 a month as engineer. In the autumn of 1915 there appeared on the eastern portion of the Intercolonial, in the employment of Mr. Ruhl, a man who was unquestionably a German. He had been in Germany until after the war began, and when he came on the Intercolonial he was employed in some out-of-the-way place with some Austrians and Germans. When he came to my town the gang of men with whom he was going to work discovered who he was and refused to work a day longer if he was employed. The man then disappeared. This was in the year 1915. Mr. Ruhl, who had been employed as engineer on the eastern portion of the Intercolonial, went away too, and I do not know whether he is employed on the railway now or not. These are facts about which there is no manner of doubt, and they add to the sense of insecurity and suspicion with which the people of the Maritime Provinces view the management of the Intercolonial.

And when you see everything tied up, as has been the case for the last two or three winters, with trains delayed and lack of connection, and freight impossible to be moved, is it any wonder that there is complaint. This resolution gives us an opportunity to voice the deep feeling that unquestionably exists in the Maritime Provinces with regard to the management of the Intercolonial at this time. The minister has told us that he stands where he has always stood with regard to appointments. On the other hand, we have the statement by a prominent public man supporting the minister that he has compelled the minister to recede from the position he formerly held on that question. To-day the minister accepts the motion of his follower from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay), but I am afraid that there will be little result from that resolution and the present debate upon it. The minister will go on enforcing, as he has always done, the principle of patronage ot the fullest degree. He tells us with pride that he has not made dismissals, and says that with regard to dismissals an arrangement exists with the brotherhoods. That arrangement was made by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), and of course, it must be carried out. But the fact remains that for employees on the road there is a system of demerits, and if an employee is not satisfactory to the person who directs the patronage of the district, every small fault of which he may be guilty will be charged against him in full. I think the minister does not know what goes on in this regard,—I am bound to say I believe that fully. But the present discussion will enlighten him, and I hope that the result of this discussion and of the acceptance of the resolution will be to enable him to carry into effect that which he says he wishes to carry into effect, due promotion of the men who are employed on the Intercolonial.

Mr. COCHRANE: Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) name a man on the Intercolonial whom, if he were the minister, he would appoint as manager?

Mr. MACDONALD: I should be glad to confer with my hon. friend and give him a suggestion on that point.

Mr. COCHRANE: Name one now.

Mr. MACDONALD: I could name two or three.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): This discussion has taken a much wider range than I had expected it would in view of the terms of the resolution. But the minister has told us that he is glad to have suggestions and advice from members of the House or from anybody who has advice to give. I take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded to call his attention to certain matters relating to that portion of the Government Railways system known as the Prince Edward Island Railway. That line has deteriorated very considerably during the last couple of years. The minister smiles—

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, I do.

Mr. HUGHES: I am satisfied he has had representations made to him about this deterioration.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. HUGHES: Let me give the minister some facts within my personal knowledge. The road-bed has deteriorated, because few ties have been supplied within recent years, and many of the ties are rotten, in fact so soft that they will not hold the spikes. The consequence is that trains run off the track. There must be records of these things in the department. I personally have seen the wrecks.

Mr. COCHRANE: Does the hon. gentleman know of a railway that does not have wrecks?

Mr. HUGHES: It is not good management to have ties so rotten and so soft that the rails spread because the spikes do not hold. I myself saw cars that had been wrecked, and their contents destroyed or damaged, the railway being put to a considerable loss. It would be a penny-wise-and-pound-foolish policy to continue this neglect. Again, the rolling stock has deteriorated. I know personally that engines going out to haul trains have not been able to take them to their destination, and other engines have to be sent out to do the work. Many of the engines are leaky. There is a shortage of box cars on the road. Every business man in Prince Edward Island knows that. I do some business in the produce line, and I know that every man who applied for cars last fall had to wait a considerable time before he got them. I should have thought that the minister would have this information, but he does not seem to have it. I understood that the Board of Trade in Charlottetown had made representations to the department on these points, and I presume that the members supporting the Government have also made representations on the same line to the minister. If they have not done so, I think they have been remiss in their duty. I hope the minister will be able to assure me that this condition of affairs will be improved. If the ties have not been prepared this winter to replace those that have rotted, the minister will have many wrecks in the fall when the produce is moving. And he will not be able to meet the trade conditions unless more engines and more box cars are provided for the railway. There are capital machine shops in Charlottetown, built several years ago, at which, I should think, a good deal of work could be done. I am confident that the members from Prince Edward Island who support the Government will tell the minister exactly what I have told him. I should be very glad to have his assurance that the conditions will be improved.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): As I am one of those residing in the country served by the Intercolonial railway, I suppose it is in order for me to speak of the management of the road, as we see it in the island of Cape Breton from which I come. If this is to be regarded as an occasion for imparting information to the minister, then, however great his capacity, I think enough has been given him to make it unnecessary for me to impose further in the same direction. I do not intend to make severe criticism of the management, for I think that, if criticism can produce results in this case, sufficient has already been given to assure us of all we desire. When I read this resolution, I thought it would not cover a criticism of the management, as it relates to promotions to positions as these fall vacant and the men in the service of the road prove fit to fill them.

That phase of the subject was dealt with very fully and satisfactorily by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the necessity of such a policy was so clearly established by him that it would be superfluous on my part to touch upon it any further. I think we must recognize, however, that if there is a management, either by the minister or a board of management, they must take the responsibility of managing the road. While we may suggest to them the way in which this shall be done, the final responsibility is with the minister and his officers and the people will hold the minister responsible for the way in which the road is managed. While the Intercolonial, or any other road owned by the Government, is so held and possessed, no minister need hope to escape criticism. No matter whether there is a general manager, or a board of management, the people of this country through this House will criticise that management and the responsible minister must have a seat on the floor of this House and answer to such criticism. Of course, the minister, whether or not he is in fault directly in connection with this mismanagement, if mismanagement there be, must, as a matter of course, take the full responsibility and be answerable to this House.

The minister and the hon. gentlemen from Quebec, Ontario and farther west hardly appreciate the situation in Nova Scotia in so far as the Intercolonial is concerned. Ontario is a regular gridiron of railways and if you do not get satisfaction from one road you will get it from another. New Brunswick is in much the same position. In Nova Scotia we have to rely practically on one road. We have the Intercolonial extending through the length of the province from Amherst to Sydney and no other competing road for passengers or freight. It must therefore be understood that it is of the highest importance to the public in Nova Scotia that proper management should prevail in connection with that road. For that reason, we are always bound, in doing our duty to the people we represent, to bring any grievances we have to the notice of the minister.

He has had a great many attacks made upon him lately in connection with this matter. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has explained the various stages of the very interesting drama which was played with some degree of manoeuvring between the minister and two hon. gentlemen, one in the local House and the other an honoured and respected member of this House. I have sat in this House for some years since the minister came here, and also before, I have watched his conduct, and no matter what the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) may say, I am disposed to think that the hon. gentleman is in the place in which he was before this row began and that it was up to the hon. member for Colchester to make the most of it and let himself down as gracefully as possible. The play between these hon. gentlemen reminds me of a story that was told me by a little Micmac pupil who was going to school in my part of the country. He related to me that one day he had had a falling out with the teacher and I asked him what the trouble was. He said: He always makes me sweep house, draw water, chop wood and put on the fire. One day we made up our minds that we would not do these things. The teacher said: Why did you not haul the water, why did you not make the fire, why did you not chop the wood, why did you not sweep house? We said: We won't do it. Then, there was an awful row. The little Indian boy was willing to stop there without telling me anything more of the story: I asked: What happened, and he replied: We had to draw the water, we had to sweep house, we had to chop the wood, we had to put on the fire, and we all got licked. I believe the minister was the teacher in this case and that the hon. member for Colchester had to haul the water, chop the wood, sweep house, put on the fire and that they all got a licking. No matter how they may tell this to the people of Colchester and of Nova Scotia, I believe that the gentlemen from Colchester climbed down and that the minister is in the same condition that he was in before this row began.

I am sorry that he has found it so very difficult to manage the people of Nova Scotia in connection with this railway. I wish to assure the minister that he would never come across a more kindly people than the people of Cape Breton, a people so easily pleased, or who will appreciate so much anything that is done for them by a magnate such as the minister. But he tells us that he is going to give up and he suggests that our "saviour" should try to manage the road down there. I am glad that he is generous enough to say that we could get a manager who is not available in the province of Ontario. But I hope he will be able to make another try himself and not put us to the necessity of going out of Ontario looking for such a high and sacred management as he suggested this afternoon.

There are a few things in respect to this management that I would like to bring to the notice of the minister. This is a straight question of management, small in itself, but important to the people of Cape Breton. The minister is aware that under Conservative rule, when the road was built into the island of Cape Breton, about 1890, an hotel was built at the Grand Narrows by a gentleman who then occupied a seat in this House, supporting the Government of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. That hotel was built, and encouraged to be built, for the accommodation of people travelling on the Intercolonial. It has always been a stopping place for refreshments in the evening on the return of the train arriving at the Grand Narrows about six o'clock. Later on a restaurant was built there and the public has been accommodated for the last twenty-six or twenty-seven years by the train stopping at this station and allowing the public to patronize these two places. Money has been invested in the hotel and in the restaurant. But, to the consternation of the men who have invested their money in these enterprises, an order was issued preventing the train from stopping at these places, and they have been given the go-by. The result of it is that these men are put out of business. That may appear a very small matter to the Government and to the minister, but it is everything to these two men who have put their money into these enterprises, enterprises which have a vested right, having existed in this country for over thirty years. I submit to the minister that by a stroke of the pen he should not put these men out of business in that way. The fact that this hotel and this restaurant were there was a great accommodation to the public. The train stopped for twenty minutes and people were enabled to go to the hotel and the restaurant and get such food as they required. What happens now? You get to the Grand Narrows about six o'clock, and two hours, or two hours and a half, after that you get to Sydney or North Sydney—that is, about eight o'clock—when all the hotels are cleared up and when no food is supplied unless for extraordinary purposes and on extraordinary occasions. The result will be that people will have to go without food; even although they are travelling with small children they must go to bed hungry or else rove around hunting for a restaurant simply because for some freak or other the management of the Intercolonial thought proper to run by this place and not afford the former opportunity of obtaining food at the customary place. It may be said that passengers can get a meal on the train. A person gets for twenty-five cents or fifty cents all he needs at a restaurant or hotel, but in the dining car he cannot get anything worthy of the name of a meal for less than $1 50 or $2. People cannot afford that, and the result is that they have to go hungry. The hotel is a splendid hotel, well kept, and a commodious building. It is run by a Mr. McNeill, who caters to the public with excellent taste, and is willing on all occasions to do what he can to meet the demands of the public. Those in charge of the restaurant also do what they can to meet the demands of the travelling public. Grand Narrows is one of the beauty spots of the Bras d'Or lakes, and people are always glad to have an opportunity to rest at that hotel. If conditions continue as they have been since January, there will be no hotel, as it could not be kept up without the railway business. This means so much to the travelling public that, as it involves no additional expense to the railway and does not incommode anybody, this request should certainly be granted. The train must stop there for five minutes for water and the additonal fifteen minutes would not be missed. I do not wish to make any harsh criticism of the minister, whom I have always found willing and obliging so far as I am concerned. I must say that so far as railway building in Cape Breton is concerned he has done nothing for us, and I hope that he will not throw any obstacles in the way of further development in railway matters in the island of Cape Breton if the opportunity should come his way. But for the present I am not dealing with that subject. I believe that the minister is just where he was on the management of the Intercolonial. There is no triumph, so far as the member for Colchester is concerned, and I feel that the minister will keep the management himself instead of getting any outside divine aid; and I hope that he will have the trains stop at Grand Narrows as before.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, during the few years I have been in this Parliament I have been accustomed year after year to hear members discuss the Intercolonial as though it were a property in which the people of the lower provinces alone were interested. No more fatal misapprehension, it seems to me, could prevail than that. I claim, as one who was born in the lower provinces and who now lives in Western Canada, to have as great an interest, in fact, if not a greater interest in the Intercolonial than the gentlemen who now represent constituencies in the Maritime Provinces. The Intercolonial railway is not in any sense a Maritime Province project only. It is a railway system in the operation of which the whole of Canada is vitally concerned. It is a railway system whose terminals must serve Western Canada if we are to maintain national ports. It is a railway system over which must be carried in winter the major part of the traffic which must give it revenue, and upon the success of the West and the ability of our people to produce traffic for that road, to no small extent depends not only its prosperity but the future of the great ports of Halifax and St. John. I regret very greatly to hear gentlemen in this House year after year discuss Intercolonial questions as though they affected individuals only in the counties in which they live.

For a single moment look at the history of that road. It was built as part of the Confederation compact. It was built away from the frontier in order that it might serve a great military purpose, and in order, if occasion necessitated and conditions warranted, that troops might be moved from the East without traversing foreign territory. The wisdom, if you will, of the choice of route has to some extent been vindicated by recent events, and that road, whose construction was part of the Confederation compact or agreement, has, in the largest, the truest and the best sense, served this nation and this Empire since 1914 as has no other piece of track within it.

I should like to remind my friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley)—who, with his usual sophistry, has endeavoured to blame where he should have praised—that no single track in Canada has discharged greater duties, carried more freight and passengers safely, than has the Intercolonial since the beginning of this war. Let me say that a number of the difficulties under which the Intercolonial is now suffering may be directly traced to observations such as this House has listened to this afternoon. Might I ask my friends, especially my friends from the Maritime Provinces, in the light of the history to which I have referred, to think of the hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian money that has been poured into that enterprise, conceived as a term of Confederation, and built under very difficult conditions.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hundreds of millions, does the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Hundreds of millions into the Intercolonial.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: From first to last?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If I had the blue book at hand I could give the figures.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hundreds of millions is a pretty broad term.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Certainly it is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think it is correct.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member for Pictou will send across the blue book containing the figures. I have them in my head, but my memory may be inaccurate. That investment is a charge against the people of Canada as a whole, not against the Maritime Provinces. It is an investment upon which interest is being paid by the people of this Dominion, the man in Western Canada as well as the man in Eastern Canada. We must look upon the Intercolonial Railway as a vast national enterprise. It was for that reason that the late Mr. Blair extended it into the city of Montreal. Every one who remembers the conditions under which that road was being operated to Levis will remember the policy upon which hon. gentlemen opposite extended it into Montreal. It was that in fact and in deed it might become a national enterprise. This being a national enterprise touching our only two ocean winter ports, St. John and Halifax, we find that from year to year it had a long series of deficits which were charged against the people of Canada as a whole and had to be paid by the taxpayer of British Columbia as well as by the taxpayer of Nova Scotia. Better business management was demanded. When the Railway Act was revised and the Railway Commission created, there was a strong movement on the part of many thoughtful public men in Canada to bring the Intercolonial Railway under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. But, unfortunately, for political reasons, Mr. Blair was not able to do it. Only yesterday I heard the hon. member for St. John City say that he could never quite understand why the Intercolonial and Government roads were not brought under the Commission—and I quite agree. I agree that the time has come when the Intercolonial Railway should be under the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada; when freight and passenger charges should be regulated not by political considerations, but by the nature and character of the services rendered. I hope that before the minister has concluded the revision of the Railway Act it will be found possible to bring that road under the Railway Commission. The hon. member for St. John City agreed with that view when he was speaking yesterday in the Railway Committee. I should like as a western man to say this to the House: If we who live upon the plains could enjoy the same freight rates as you who live along the Intercolonial, we would be the most joyous and happy people you ever heard or dreamed of. I wonder if this House realizes that the rates prevailing on the Intercolonial Railway in the province of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are all the way from 25 to 78 per cent less than those we pay upon the plains for the same services.

9 p.m.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: They correspond with the rates generally in force in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They correspond with the rates in the Maritime Provinces, the hon. gentleman says: But we have it on the authority of the hon. member for North Cape Breton, who has just taken his seat, that there are no other lines there.

Mr. HUGHES: As far as the Canadian Pacific Railway goes.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Canadian Pacific Railway does not go beyond St. John with its own rails. The lines that are operated in Nova Scotia other than those of the Government have their own rates, because we have not competition within that territory, as my hon. friend knows. In Prince Edward Island the only line is the Government road.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have the figures here to which my hon. friend was referring a moment ago. So far from being several hundred millions, the total cost of the Intercolonial railway and connected railways is given on page 88 of the Public Accounts as $106,291,552.

Mr. REID: Does that include equipment?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It says: "Intercolonial and connected railways."

Mr. REID: But not equipment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The amount for canals is $98,000,000. The expenses of canals and the expenses of the Intercolonial railway run pretty nearly together.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. member for St. John city is quite right. He said it was less than $100,000,000; I said over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You said several hundred millions.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I was wrong in that, because I was including the Transcontinental railway, now being operated as a Government road. Those were the figures I had in mind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Transcontinental is a different road altogether.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The figures I had in mind were those applicable to roads now operated by the Government. That is why I may have confused the figures for the moment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Transcontinental was so unimportant that it was forgotten.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, it is such a monument to the incapacity of hon. gentlemen opposite that I did not care to refer to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We appreciate the hon. gentleman's consideration.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I thank my hon. friend from St. John for appreciating my consideration, but I do not think the epitaph has yet been wholly written.

Having referred to these deficits and to the efforts of ministers to remedy them, let us look the facts fairly in the eye.

When this Government came into power I happened to know the policy of the present Minister of Railways. Having been born, as I have said, in New Brunswick, I took a considerable interest in the Intercolonial railway. It suffered and has suffered from the evil of political patronage, and it will suffer from that evil just so long as it is not under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. There never was a more perfect political machine anywhere than the Intercolonial railway in the time of Hon. Mr. Emmerson. A more perfect political machine could not be conceived, devised and operated than the Intercolonial during the last five years of the fifteen years of Liberal administration. I do not blame them; they were merely improving on conditions as they found them—that is all. I remember discussing the question of the Intercolonial with the Minister of Railways and Canals when the present Administration came into power. He had in his mind two fixed ideas. The first was that the principle of public ownership might be vindicated and the Intercolonial railway saved to the people of Canada. For be it known that the late Minister of Railways and Canals had agreed to hand over the Intercolonial railway to the Canadian Northern interests if the then Government would be sustained in the coming general election. I did not get that second-hand from any one; I have it first hand from the people themselves. The present Minister of Railways did not believe that the road should be handed over to a private corporation, be it the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian Northern. What he did was to endeavour, with what success I shall presently relate, to bring about such a condition as would vindicate the principle of public ownership of that utility. How did he endeavour to do that? He endeavoured to do it first of all by business management, and, secondly, by the corollary of that, the elimination of patronage. So far as the first point is concerned, what he did was this: he asked the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the best railway manager they could give him, and they suggested Mr. Gutelius. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company had had Mr. Gutelius in their employ for many years. The hon. member for Pictou suggested here this evening that he was a German. Mr. Gutelius is a Dutchman by descent and not a German.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not say that he was German; I said that he had lived in Canada for fifteen years without having taken out Canadian citizenship.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend said that he was of German extraction; I took the words down at the time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I said that he was a German-American.

Mr. BENNETT: He is not a German-American, and never was. The ancestors of Mr. Gutelius lived in the United States and have lived upon the American continent for a longer period of years than the ancestors of the distinguished gentleman from Pictou. They have been on this continent something like three hundred years, I am advised. Well, not that long; 250 or thereabouts.

Mr. MACDONALD: Take another hundred or two off.

Mr. McKENZIE: He must be Indian.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but he is not German. The hon. member for Pictou suggested here this evening by inference that the accidents on the Intercolonial, the difficulties of transport and the need of engines were due to the German-American origin of Mr. Gutelius.

This inference he has left in the minds of the people of Canada to-day. Such an inference is unworthy of any member of Parliament; it is unworthy of the hon. member for Pictou; it is unworthy of any man occupying a public position or filling a public trust to insinuate by inference that a man who has taken the oath of allegiance to our Sovereign, whose ancestors have lived on the American continent for over two hundred years, and who never was a German-American, privily or by negligence agreed to become or became a party to the failure of the Intercolonial to discharge the obligations cast upon it by reason of the movement of our troops and supplies to the sea. I want to go further.

Having conceived the idea of a business manager and having obtained the services of Mr. Gutelius, the Minister of Railways did what any business man would do; he said: "I am not an expert on traffic matters"—and I was very much taken with what my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) said in a more moderate manner than he usually does, when he said that there is bound to be criticism of a public-owned railway directly administered by the Government. But the criticism of the minister in this case must ultimately be the criticism of the instrument he has chosen for the purpose of discharging that duty. The minister sought the advice of the best transportation men in Canada, and that advice brought Mr. Gutelius into the position of General Manager of the Intercolonial. If Mr. Gutelius has failed to discharge his duties and obligations he must be answerable to the Government which appointed him and to the minister under whose control he is. But up to the moment, so far as I have been able to understand, the minister has held Mr. Gutelius responsible for operations as being a first class transportation expert, and he has not undertaken himself to endeavour to say what he thinks should be done or should not be done, but has left it to the expert who is fitted for that purpose and who is supposed to know because he was so recommended. That is the position. Is that not the position that the president of any railway company would take, that he would hold the general manager responsible for the operation of the railway? The president of a railway company is not always an expert on transportation, but presidents hold their general managers responsible for the administration of the trust and for the manner in which they operate their facilities. That is what has been done in this case, and I should like to say to hon. gentlemen from the lower provinces that, knowing something of the administration of roads in other parts of Canada, having passed over the Intercolonial two or three times during the past two or three months, sometimes during the depth of winter; knowing that during the last session there were as many as fifty feet of snow that had to be handled first and last—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Fifty feet?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Fifty feet of snow.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was that on the level?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That was not on the level. According to hon. gentlemen opposite, one would never expect to find anything on the level so far as the Intercolonial is concerned. But the climatic conditions under which that road has to be operated in northern New Brunswick and Quebec makes it most difficult, and no gentleman knows better than the hon. member for St. John what those difficulties are. The general manager has during the last year been operating his system under exceptional difficulties. First of all, he has had cast upon his line a greater burden than any single line was ever expected to carry. Now that the United States is in the war, our troops and war supplies can be carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway through the state of Maine; prior to that time, however, they could not be, and thus there was thrust upon the Intercolonial a greater burden than any single line ever carried before except some lines west of Lake Superior in the wheat season in the fall of the year. The Intercolonial has discharged that duty fairly well. I have it from the words of an important transportation man in this country that what has been done by Mr. Gutelius since the outbreak of the war in relation to the management to the Intercolonial has been most commendable, and should merit the commendation of thoughtful Canadians who know the conditions. It is so easy to criticise. The hon. member for North Cape Breton has been fair about that. As long as the road is operated in the way it is, I suppose it will be criticised, but there is no appreciation on the part of the people of the enormous volume of traffic that road has handled.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) spoke this afternoon about the suburban trains being taken off and there not being the same service. I should like to remind him that on the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Northern, by order of the Board of Railway Commissioners last fall, their train services were curtailed, because it was necessary in the public interest that it should be so. If that be so, and Mr. Gutelius has followed that practice on the Intercolonial, who is this high-souled and high-minded patriot who has spoken this afternoon in order to make a little political capital? If the hon. gentleman seeks to know what is the matter with the Intercolonial, one of the difficulties it suffers from to-day is that there is no appreciation on the part of members of Parliament and others throughout the territory which it covers of the enormous difficulties it has had to overcome in the matter of handling the business of the country during the last eighteen months. How many hon. members have visited Halifax and seen the freight handled by the Intercolonial there? How many have seen what that road has done in relation to traffic handled since the war broke out? Let them ask the representatives of the British transport system what they think of it. I prefer their judgment to that of the hon. member for St. John who, for a little cheap clap-trap political capital, has spoken in this House to-day—and he is not one of those who do not know. He has eyes, but he sees not, and ears but he hears not, lest seeing or hearing he might be converted by the truth. We listened this afternoon to the speech of that hon. gentleman condemning the service and in that calm way of his talking of wrecks—he did not talk of wars, but of wrecks; he did not talk of the sawdust wharves of by-gone days, but he said there was bad track. It was not the Leary wharf, but bad track. When I hear an hon. gentleman of the years, experience, training, and knowledge of the hon. member for St. John, in a deliberative assembly like the House of Commons of Canada, condemn a railway because there is a wreck, I know that one of two things has happened: either he has a false perspective or he is lacking in the essential elements of patriotism to his country. It is either one of the two things. In this case it is both. With a lack of perspective that is not what I would expect of him in the days that I knew him, he speaks of wrecks as indicating negligence on the part of the Minister of Railways. The Pennsylvania railroad lost in killed and injured 55 passengers the other day, the first they have lost for many years, although they have steel equipment, 90 pound rails and the finest locomotives in the world, because in the last analysis you have to depend upon the human equation, and humanity is frail; it may fail in relation to up-keep or to the handling of the locomotive; it may fail in any way. Appliances may fail. Therefore, a man, who, for the sake of cheap political capital, will endeavour to make the people believe, especially in the middle of a great war, that he is speaking in their behalf when he criticises the operations of a railway which has handled hundreds of thousands of his fellow Canadians without the loss of one, and millions of tons of freight for the Allies, is unworthy the name of a Canadian ex-minister of the Crown. He says that the public service has failed. If there has been a lessening of the public service, why should there not be? If the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern are ordered by Sir Henry Drayton to cut down their service, why should the general manager of the Intercolonial not cut down his service. Speaking for my constituents, I voice their protest with my own when I say that we object to pay unnecessary deficits to keep up the service on the Intercolonial in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The hon. member is criticising the service because it may influence a small vote in some suburban neighbourhood round about the city of St. John, and the voters may think, how great and glorious is my hon. friend. That is false perspective and false patriotism.

One word more and I shall have concluded. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was interested in a family quarrel, as he called it. He was more interested in the house of Stanfield than in the house of George, and he was much more interested in the change in the fortunes of the house of Stanfield than he was in the administration of a great public utility. As one hon. gentleman beside me says, he was much more interested in the unshrinkables than in the dye-hards. I do not know just what that means. Now I put it to my hon. friend, who after all is a fair-minded Scotchman—some of my hon. friends doubt whether he is fair-minded, but I can assure them that beneath that somewhat rough exterior there beats a very kindly heart; he can be fair-minded although he does not always show it. I should like to ask my hon. friend from Pictou if he does not believe that the Intercolonial during the last twenty-four months has discharged very great public duties in a manner of which any Canadian might well be proud?

Mr. MACDONALD: I know a great deal more about the Intercolonial than my hon.

friend does, for he has only travelled over it once or twice, and I would say in all seriousness that the Intercolonial has absolutely failed to perform its national duty in this the greatest crisis in our history.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And the hon. gentleman beside him (Mr. Pugsley) applauds. It fills him with great glee to think that a public utility operated by this Government is not discharging its duty. He rejoices in it. Let me ask my hon. friend from Pictou what he has done for the Intercolonial? What word of encouragement has he spoken to the men toiling eighteen hours a day to make it successful? What word of comfort has he offered to the general manager whom he has vilified and slandered to-night? What effort has he made in the public weal to make the Intercolonial a greater national asset than it has been? That is the question. What constructive suggestions have we heard from him this evening? We have heard a long tirade of criticism and violent denunciation of the nationalities of the men charged with high responsibilities, but we have not heard a word of constructive suggestion, or of help or comfort for those who have toiled in season and out of season to enable the road to carry 300,000 of our fellow-citizens to the sea.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend will find that in the session of 1915-1916, standing in my place in Parliament, I called the attention of the railway officials to the extra duty that would be imposed upon them in connection with the war, and pleaded with them to provide in advance the necessary equipment to meet the conditions; but they absolutely failed to do so.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The equipment was ordered. But a single track railway cannot do the impossible, and you cannot double-track the Intercolonial railway in war time. But if we had had the rails and the money that have been uselessly sunk between Quebec and Moncton on the National Transcontinental—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Does he deny what I state as a fact, that a very large proportion of the traffic properly belonging to the Intercolonial has been carried over the Transcontinental between Moncton and Quebec?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman states it as a fact, and his statement of a fact is always entitled to the consideration it deserves.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Railways also knows it to be a fact.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That will make a difference, but he has not so told me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this a double-track road between those points?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I wish it were a double-track road, because a double-track road means that traffic going in one direction travels on one line, and traffic in the other direction on the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is how the through traffic is operated.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My hon. friend knows much better than I that the operation of the National Transcontinental between Quebec and Moncton has not paid its operating costs.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will make inquiry he will find that every day during the past year a large number of trains containing fifty, sixty and sometimes seventy cars, pass over the Transcontinental.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The more trains the greater the deficit on that line.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The grade is twice as low as on the Intercolonial.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I thought my hon. friend knew enough about railway matters to know that the greater the number of trains on that section of the Transcontinental the greater the deficit. It is through traffic, and all it gets is its proportion of the through rate, and the through rate has to be so low that the carriage of the traffic over that road means a deficit every time a wheel is turned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is my hon. friend not aware that the reason why the Intercolonial authorities have carried such an enormous proportion of the traffic over the Transcontinental is because of its low grades? One locomotive can haul so many more cars than on the Intercolonial.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the lowest-grade argument I have heard for a long time. My hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend answer my question?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes I will, promptly. It is not so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is so.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And the hon. member for St. John knows that on that portion of the Transcontinental between Quebec and Moncton the traffic has not paid the operating costs, outside altogether of a single cent of interest on the enormous investment made, and that in the opinion of the best railway experts on the American continent this country would be well served is that there has been no politics in the In-another part of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman deny that vast quantities of freight have been carried by the Intercolonial authorities of the Transcontinental?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I say this, and I desire to say it as strongly as I can, that to the extent to which that line could be used, it has been used to keep the rails from rusting; that is the position.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. member had better go over that road once, and he would then change his opinion.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The road travels through territory served by that distinguished servant of the State, the hon. member from Carleton, and so it must be a good one.

Mr. CARVELL: I have seen trains on the Transcontinental pulling seventy-five loaded cars, and as many as ten such trains a day. On the Intercolonial you cannot pull thirty cars with the best engine you have.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am sorry the hon. gentleman can count so well on the Transcontinental, and that his vision is so obscured on the Intercolonial.

Mr. CARVELL: Go over the road and find out for yourself. You don't know now.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have seen trains on the Intercolonial with more than thirty or fifty cars. But of course one has a double vision when the traffic is travelling upon one's own pet railway, and a little political capital can be made out of it. The hon. member for Carleton knows as well as any man living, that the road has not justified its existence, in view of the capital expenditure involved in its construction, and never will so far as the present generation is concerned, and that the best masters of American transporation declare not only that the rails should never have been laid, but that they should now be taken up and laid somewhere else where they could be used profitably.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

One word about political patronage. As an humble member of the Conservative party ever since the day I was able to think, I go down to the lower provinces occasionally, and the one bitter complaint I have always heard since the year 1911 when the present Government took charge, is that there has been no politics in the intercolonial.

It is the old game on the part of the Liberal party—to charge political administration of the Intercolonial and thus draw a red herring across the trail, while they keep their friends in office on the road. It is so everywhere. It has been so since this war began. They denounce the Tories for putting Tories into office, but when you analyze the facts you will find that the Grits have the jobs, and their friends seek to keep them there by denouncing the Tories for using patronage. It is one of the cleverest schemes of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, on the other hand, you find Tories condemning the management of the Intercolonial for leaving the Liberals in their positions. Down in Moncton and in Westmorland how did they vote? Did they vote condemnation of the Government? No. They voted because they were Liberals left over from 1911.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not what the people of Moncton and the railway employees there will tell you. They will tell you that there is no justification for the conduct of the officials of the Intercolonial in the treatment of the men.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has raised a second point to which I wish to refer. The first point was patronage, and the second the low rates. No road in Canada, and with one exception, none on the American continent, has as low freight rates as the Intercolonial. I challenge any hon. gentleman to contravert that statement. Give us in Western Canada the rates that are charged on the Intercolonial and our people will add enormously to their returns. These rates are maintained at the cost of the whole people of Canada, and we have the right to demand efficient administration of the road. But under the devilish patronage system which grew up prior to 1911, and of which there is no greater disciple than the hon. gentleman from Carleton—

Mr. CARVELL: Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. B. Bennett) ever hear about the train that was put on between Moncton and Shediac two weeks before the election and was taken off the day after it?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes, it was a replacement of a train that used to be there and which had been taken off for efficiency, but the politicians demanded that it should be put back again.

Mr. CARVELL: Taken off five years ago.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, only five months ago, and put back again at the demand of politicians, Tory politicians—and I denounce the Tory politicians for that as much as I do the men whom they feebly imitate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought the hon. gentleman said that there was no patronage, yet he admits that a train was put on a couple of weeks before an election and then, they having lost the election, it was taken off the day after.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman did not follow me. I said that the minister endeavoured to conduct the Intercolonial without patronage, but that our own people have not accepted his position but have bitterly complained and criticized him. Yet the principle for which he contended, the principle of Government ownership of that public utility, depends upon a non-political, efficient, business administration. The minister entrusted it to the hands of the general manager, and that general manager, free from political control, might have been able to carry that principle into full effect. But heirs of all the ages though we be, beneficiaries of all the past with regard to the Intercolonial, it was not possible wholly to divorce the administration of the road from politics in a single moment, and the result has been that the minister has been subject to criticism on the part of his own friends. And hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of assisting to maintain and vindicate the principle of public ownership, have taken every opportunity in their power to stimulate criticism and stir the antipathies of the people, in order to make them believe that they are ill-used, although the Government was making a supreme effort to manage this road, not for the people of the Maritime Provinces alone, but for all the people, against the control of a private corporation to which it was to be handed over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does that explain the putting on of election trains?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Certainly. Because in the days of the last election, it was not one election train but a whole series of them, with free tickets handed out by political workers with a view to securing votes. I know this, for I was down there shortly afterwards.

I see that my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has the following notice of motion on the Order Paper:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the prevailing system of party patronage constitutes a menace to honest and efficient government, incites to great waste of resources and extravagance, in its application to expenditures and appointments for military purposes, greatly injures the proper fulfilment of our duty to the nation, tends inevitably to corrupt and lower the tone of public morals and should forthwith be eliminated from our Federal administration.

Noble words! High sentiments! Lofty aspirations! But my hon. friend from Pictou and my hon. friend from St. John believe in these things in the abstract. The resolution is put there as a means of throwing dust in the eyes of the people, as the hon. gentleman says the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) has been doing. But if hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere, they would have practiced something of these virtues which they profess in opposition.

I do feel that the members of this House should look upon the Intercolonial railway as something more than two lines of steel owned by the people of the lower provinces. My hon. friend from Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes) failed to tell the House, when he talked of lack of equipment, that he was speaking of a narrow-gauge road, one in which standard equipment cannot be used.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: We had that information thirty years ago.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I did not know that the hon. gentleman had received it yet, and one would not have supposed that he had it from the way he spoke. I am glad that his constituents had the information thirty years ago, and that he has discovered it to-night. But, in fairness, he should have stated the fact to the House. It is not to be expected that the facilities of a narrow gauge road can be maintained in as high a state of efficiency as those of a standard road. Speaking as one from Western Canada who is interested in the Intercolonial and the work it does, interested in the vast terminals being completed at St. John and Halifax—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Whereabouts at St. John?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Then, when my hon. friend ran an election in 1896 on the cry of better terms for St. John he was merely bluffing because St. John is without all these better facilities yet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The work is stopped.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The work is stopped in the midst of the war and I dare say some revenue is stopped a bit also. But it may be that in the midst of war you have to stop some work. That shows the insincerity of my hon. friend when he asks the Government to stop some public undertakings in the midst of the war. If it should happen that the undertakings are near home it is all bad; if it should happen that they are near some other person's home it is all right. That may be politics but it is not statecraft in the middle of a great war. This House has a right to ask that the Intercolonial shall be so operated, conducted and managed as to show no deficits but to maintain an equilibrum between revenue and expenditure so that the axiom, or the principle, upon which transportation facilities are provided, may be maintained. What is the principle?—that they who use must pay. With reference to transportation, if the facilities do not pay for themselves in revenue, the rate should be so raised as to enable the revenue to pay the expenditures. The people of the lower provinces objected so strongly a few months ago when the management increased the rates upon the road that the rates had to be reduced again. Under a railway commission that would not happen. I say once more that I have no interest in the Intercolonial except the large interest that every man has who lives in Canada, no interest except to see that it properly serves the great ports of Halifax and St. John. St. John is served, it is true, by the Canadian Pacific, but Halifax is served only by the Intercolonial. I hope, Sir, to see the day when great ships crossing the Atlantic, as the Mauretania did in 90 hours, may be able to land passengers at Halifax at the splendid terminals there, swinging in alongside of the dock without tugs, without having to turn the vessel to come in to that magnificent terminal, and being able to embark passengers at the dock head and setting them down in Chicago two days sooner than they could arrive by way of New York. That is one of the things we should contemplate the possibility of and if we are true to the vast and matchless opportunities that lie before us, by reason of the great harbour at Halifax for passengers, by reason of the harbour at St. John for freight traffic, and by reason of this Intercolonial railway, that has been built up with the revenues of the people of Canada, we will be able to discharge some of the duties that we owe alike to Canadians and to the people of the other parts of the Empire, and in addition, we will be able to make this a country of which all men shall be proud. The hon. member for St. John stands here in the midst of a great war, denounces the management of the Intercolonial and tries to make us believe that the men in charge of that road are inefficient, that men should be elevated to high positions whether they are qualified or not as long as seniority or something else is observed, that men should be promoted without regard to fitness or to the fact that they are bringing discredit on their own country by not giving assistance to those who are labouring to promote the success of the operation of that great road.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to make a correction of the hon. gentleman. Neither I nor any member on this side of the House said that men should be promoted regardless of fitness. What we do claim is that the Intercolonial has had for years many men fitted to take higher positions in connection with the management of the railway.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend not know that in the administration of the Canadian Pacific, the Pennsylvania and every other great railway system they have regard to one thing only, and that is fitness?

Mr. PUGSLEY: And promotion.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: In order that a road might be 100 per cent efficient a man of 25, possessing the qualifications, might be placed over a man of 45 or 65. In the administration of a great public trust, such as the Intercolonial is, that road must ultimately depend upon, first of all, an efficient general manager, and, secondly, he, on his part, must have a free hand to select the instruments to carry out his directions from the standpoint of efficiency without regard to political considerations. On that principle and for that purpose this House will lend its assistance to the Minister of Railways and Canals, who has endeavoured to follow that line, although he has not received that great measure of assistance he should have received even from his own people. I believe that in the end it will be found that the Intercolonial has entered upon an era of prosperity based upon business management that will reflect credit not only upon the Government, or the set of men who may devise policies and who have the courage to carry them forward regardless of party consideration, but upon the Canadian people who are endeavouring and who are willing and anxious to make out of their public facilities and their transportation system a success comparable to that of any privately-owned enterprise.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, before the debate closes, I wish to make a few remarks. I do not rise with the intention of answering the eloquent remarks of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett). He has made an appeal to the sense of the Canadian people and he has told us that the Intercolonial railway is not merely the property of the people of the Maritime Provinces and that it is not merely for the interest of the people of that part of Canada. If my hon. friend had been here twelve or fifteen years ago he might have heard many of us, including myself, declare in this House that the construction of the Intercolonial railway was not for the especial benefit of the Maritime Provinces but that it was built as a national enterprise for the benefit of the provinces of the west as they grow, and as they will grow in the future, as much as for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces themselves. The pact of Confederation was not made with the intention of keeping apart the Maritime Provinces from the provinces of the west. It was made with the intention of making one race, one nationality, with a great future before it, and possessing great industries and commercial interests. My hon. friend has told us that if the deficits continue on the Intercolonial the rest of the people will not be prepared to stand by those deficits. That is not a national, or a Canadian utterance, in my judgment. What would the hon. member for Calgary say if I were to tell him that I, as a member from the Maritime Provinces, will not stand by the expenditures for the construction and maintenance of the canals of Ontario from which we have no direct benefit? The canals of Ontario are national enterprises in the same sense as the Intercolonial, or any other railway to which our support may be extended, is. We do not come here for the purpose of pleading. I believe myself as broadminded a Canadian as any member of this House or as any man in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. My interests are in the west as much as in the east, but at the same time, how can we expect that we should not be allowed to claim on the part of the people we represent what we look for from the administration of any department of Government. The administration of the Intercolonial is in the hands of the Department of Railways and Canals. We have the same minister in charge of the canals and the Intercolonial railway. I do not speak for the Maritime Provinces with the intention of making apologies to the western part of Canada. We have come into Confederation and although we have not come with all the natural resources possessed by Ontario or Quebec we have come with vast harbours planted along our coasts, We have vast harbours planted along our coast, as Joseph Howe said, by the hand of Providence, not merely for the use and advantage of the Maritime Provinces, but more particularly for the use and advantage of the western provinces. Without the ports of Saint John and Halifax, without the advantage of the coast of the Maritime Provinces, the people of Ontario and the West to-day would be at the mercy of the collectors of customs of Boston and New York, and there would be no Confederation and no Canada. When we ask for improvements in the management of the Intercolonial, we do not come as beggars from any other portion of Canada, but simply exercise our right, as has been done by my hon. friend from Calgary to-day.

I rose merely to discharge my duty as a member for a constituency traversed by the Intercolonial, and to express my sympathy with the principle involved in the motion now before the House. I shall not attempt to vouch for all the statements he has given to the House, but shall leave it to the minister to ascertain their correctness. The hon. member for Calgary intimated that the members on this side of the House desired promotions to be made irrespective of ability or qualification. I heard no such suggestion this afternoon, and I am sure that the intention of the resolution is that such promotion should be made only among officials who have shown the capacity, the adaptability and the ability to fill the positions to which they may be called. It is in the general interest of the nation that such promotions should be made. The hon. member for Calgary suggested that the Intercolonial should be placed on the same level as a corporation railway. Every corporation railway, in the interests of its service, seeks to give promotion to its employees as they develop and show ability for better employment. That is the best security they can give to the public.

My hon. friend has spoken of the deficits on the Intercolonial under the Liberal Administration. Every one knew at the time of Confederation that the Intercolonial for many years would have to meet annual deficits, but it was felt that the great advantages which would flow from the operation of the railroad in linking together the portions of this great country would far exceed the small amounts that we would have to pay from year to year until we attained the development of this country foreseen by the fathers of Confederation as brightly as any one of us sees it to-day. I am not attacking any deficit that may occur under the administration of my hon. friend. It may be that this year, owing to war conditions and the exceptionally unfavourable climatic conditions, a deficit will be unavoidable. I do not object to that; we will have to pay what is necessary for the maintenance of a good national road that will develop the interests of the country. It has been reported that this year a great many accidents have occurred on the Intercolonial, more perhaps than on any other road; but the conditions have been most extraordinary. Not for many years have we had a winter in Eastern Canada which made the operation of railroads so difficult. But, of course, in former years we have had hard winters and have had to compete with them, and the ministers of former days encountered the same difficulties that have confronted my hon. friend this year.

Returning to the main motion, I desire to support a suggestion made by my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) as to a division between Campbellton and Rimouski, the division lying between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. I do this not because I should like to see a division of the people of the provinces; but because conditions have changed in the last few years, and the change has impressed itself on me as one living in the northern district of New Brunswick, not a long distance from the province of Quebec. Conditions have changed in this respect, that the officials of the section Moncton-Ste. Flavie have been given during the past few years a greatly extended line to manage. They have been given the Fredericton railway from Newcastle to Fredericton and, a year ago, the International railway, which has been taken over by the Railway Department. Both of these roads have been given to the same officials at Campbellton. It may therefore be that that district would have sufficient work in the development of the trade which is bound to accrue more particularly along the line of the International if that road is to be given a good service. I believe that more attention might be given to that road than it has received since the Intercolonial took it over. It might be that it would be better to make one division from Moncton to Campbellton and extend the division from Levis or Riviere du Loup to Campbellton. On that division it would perhaps be easier for the department and the Minister of Railways and Canals to have employees speaking both languages, French and English, as requested, naturally and rightly, by the people of the province of Quebec. The minister has said that he would consider any suggestions that might be made. I have all possible sympathy for the hon. minister, and when I refer to a particular incident I do not wish to hold him responsible for it. I may tell him, however, that there are many instances of political doings in the sections of the country traversed by the Intercolonial railway of which he may not be aware. This, perhaps, is due to the fact that the local politicians are using their influence in a way that the minister would condemn. I am sure that he will condemn this influence as represented in a particular case which I shall bring to his attention. In northern New Brunswick the local Conservative politicians have been very active during the past four or five years.

Mr. CARVELL: They are a bad lot.

Mr. TURGEON: So far as the Conservative politicians in my county are concerned, I adopt the expression of the hon. member for Carleton. They have been trying to use kaiserism in their administration of the political part of the Intercolonial Railway. If a man does not promise to vote for the Conservative party and to condemn everything done by the Liberal party, he will get no employment from these people either as workingman or section man. The case that I want to bring to the attention of the minister will astonish him, and will show that there exists a great deal of that partisanship which the hon. member for Calgary condemned so forcibly a few moments ago. The man whose case I refer to has been in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway since 1900. I remember the day when he was appointed section man; he had been section foreman for seven years previous to that time on the Canadian Pacific railway and had come back to his native place, Petit Rocher, in the province of New Brunswick. The trouble arose not through a question of duty, but through a quarrel with his foreman. I should say, rather, that it was a family quarrel. His foreman was his brother-in-law, and, as very often happens in such cases, they disagreed. There were some heated words at dinner hour, the matter was investigated and the result was that the politician of the locality had a reason for saying that he should not be further employed. Not very long ago the Conservative politicians told this man that if he would sever his connection with the Liberal party and proclaim himself ready to do the bidding of the Conservative politicians, he would get his position again. They told him that if he would write a letter to that effect to the Conservative candidate, he would be once more installed in his position. When I heard of this I thought that I could easily afford to lose two or three votes in Gloucester county for the sake of justice, so I advised the man to make such a declaration and to send such a letter. He refused to do so, and he has not yet been reinstated in his position. This is the condition in the county of Gloucester to which I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals; most probably the same condition prevails in many of the other counties on the north shore of the province of New Brunswick. Certainly this man's dismissal was not based on good grounds; he lost his position simply because he happened to be a Liberal, and he is kept out of it because he does not wish to make a declaration of faith against his conscience or against his political principles. I am sure that the Minister of Railways and Canals feels as I do, that this man has been ill-treated. I have no criticism to offer to the minister himself, but if he will allow me, I shall make another suggestion. The minister has for some time past not enjoyed good health—to the sorrow of every member of this House and of the people of Canada. This year he seems to have more viltality and is willing, as usual, to give all the attention possible to the administration of the Government Railways. He has extended his system over the Transcontinental as far as Winnipeg. I will not stop to deny the accusations made by the member for Calgary concerning the construction of the Transcontinental. I shall do that upon some other occasion; it would require a special debate if we were to discuss that question. My hon. friend has given notice of a Bill concerning the construction of highways. I believe that he should withdraw that Bill and give his sole attention to the administration of the government railways. If he does this, he will be doing as much as his health will permit, and will have sufficient to occupy his time and attention.

10 p.m.

I hope that this motion will receive from the Minister of Railways and Canals the attention that it deserves and that promotions will be made among officials of the railway, not indiscriminately, but by the selection of men who have proved themselves worthy of promotion. Reference has been made by the Minister of Customs to Mr. Pottinger. The hon. gentleman said that the Liberals were condemning his political activity before they came into power. I do not know to what extent that may have been the case, but I do know that when the Liberal party came into power they retained the services of Mr. Pottinger and those services were appreciated more and more each year. He was given a prominent place on the commission appointed by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals with a view to putting an end to the deficits which the member for Calgary deplored so much this evening. If the present Minister of Railways and Canals, when he came into office, did not wish to retain the whole commission, he should at least have retained the services of Mr. Pottinger as head of the department. Had he done this he would not have subjected himself to the censure which has come from all parts of the country since that time. No man in Canada perhaps was better qualified than Mr. Pottinger to remain at the head of the administration of the Intercolonial and of the Government railways. His knowledge and experience were known and appreciated not only in Canada, but in the United States. When he met magnates and chief superintendents and managers of railroads, he had not always to listen to them, but they listened to him, and they had always a great deal to learn in their meetings with him.

As regards the case that I have cited, if the minister wishes me to give him the name of that section man, I shall be glad to do so to-morrow or the next day. I have spoken at greater length than I had anticipated, still my remarks have come from me spontaneously because I felt that the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) was not giving justice either to the Liberal party or to the country.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a few words with reference to the management of the Intercolonial railway, confining myself to the operation of the Transcontinental railway. I am aware of a great many facts, because I live by the side of this railway and I know what is going on. I can assure the Minister of Railways that during the last six months, not one week has passed without a wreck taking place on that line between Levis and Moncton. I know as a fact that one day there were three trains wrecked on the west side of Edmundston and two between Edmundston and Moncton. I am giving these facts because I am aware that the minister is not informed of what is going on so far as this particular branch of the Transcontinental is concerned, I am sorry that the hon. minister has not been properly informed in regard to the management of this railway during the last few months. The people in that section have refused to ship their goods along that line because they never reach their destination. Let me cite an example. Not very long ago a carload of wheat was shipped along that line. There was a big wreck between Moncton and Edmundston and eight cars went into the ditch; the car loaded with wheat opened up, and the wheat scattered all along the track. I have already drawn the attention of my hon. friend to the condition of the road-bed of this particular railroad, and I hope he will take my remarks into consideration, because in a few months from now this railroad will not be able to be operated. There are a great many people working as employees of that railroad between Moncton and Levis. We were accused this afternoon by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) because people from New Brunswick were working in the province of Quebec. So far as the operation of the railroad is concerned, it is not only the people from one particular province who have the say in the matter; it is the people of Canada. I know a great many of our employees are from the province of Quebec and are now residing in the province of New Brunswick, but we find no fault except that we like to receive our proper share so far as the number of employees on the road is concerned. The Minister of Customs has said this afternoon that if we are short of good men we can go into the province of Ontario and get competent employees there. We have one good man from Ontario, that is the Minister of Railways. I am sorry he has not been well for the last year or two, but we are glad to see him back in good health. I trust he will see his way clear to appoint people from his own province if he cannot find men in the lower provinces, and that he will not go too often to the United States for employees, because I am sure Canada produces as good railway employees as any other country in the world.

I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the International railway connecting St. Leonard and Campbellton, in the province of New Brunswick. I happened to travel on that road last year and this year, and if I told my hon. friend what I saw in a day or two he would be very much surprised. There are water tanks all along that line of railway which have been frozen since last December, so that they cannot be used until the warmer weather comes, and in the meantime a pumping system has been installed. The men are digging holes along the brooks and rivers and connecting the engine by hose with the water in the brook or river and pumping it in. It takes about two hours to fill up an engine, and while the employees are not to blame because they are paid for their extra time, the travelling public have to suffer on account of the delay in filling up the engine with water. I would like the minister to take this matter into consideration. There are no dining cars and no sleepers on that train, and during last year it never arrived on time. It is due at St. Leonards at 4.20 p.m. to connect with the Canadian Pacific railway and the Transcontinental. The public are getting tired of the management because they have not the proper accommodation, and they are not getting their goods shipped to their points of destination. They have to travel by train because there are no highways between the two places I have mentioned, and they are punished by having to travel on that railroad. There is some talk about the Government taking over all the railways of Canada. From my experience during the last year or two, I think it would be the most unfortunate thing if the Dominion of Canada or the Government were to take hold of any branch railway. I had a great admiration for the Minister of Railways some time ago, when he mentioned to me that it was his intention to buy out many branch lines of railway; he was sincere in his statement, but the people of New Brunswick are no longer anxious to see the Government operating any branch lines as feeders for the Intercolonial railway. We have had very bad management and we do not wish any more branch lines to be bought by the Government.

In conclusion, I hope my hon. friend will consider the operation of the International railway and of the Transcontinental between Levis and Moncton. The people along the line travel as little as they can because they never reach their destination at the proper time, the trains being slow in leaving and late in arriving at destination. I wish my hon. friend would take up the idea of running an express between St. Leonard and Campbellton some time next month. He should give us an opportunity to prove that if we had an express between these two places we could make it pay very well.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski): I had no idea that this motion would provide so much discussion, as I brought it up purely for the purpose of criticizing the management of the Intercolonial in the matter of promotions, but before dealing with that I will turn for a moment to the remarks that have been made by my hon. friend from Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Michaud) about the International railway. I corroborate everything he has said about the way the engines were compelled to take water last winter, but it was impossible for the management to do any better, and my hon. friend was certainly wrong in saying that the Government had not done a good service to the population scattered along that line, because if the Government had not taken over the road the people would have had no railway service at all. The road was already going to pieces when the Government took it over two years ago, and they could not have done better than they did last winter; we were very lucky indeed to get the service at all.

If I understood my hon. friend correctly, he suggested that an express train should be put on that branch. I agree with him. As soon as the road bed is good enough, I think it would be in the interests of the Intercolonial to have an express train on this branch. It would not only increase the passenger traffic, but would be an accommodation to the settlers scattered along the road, and would help greatly in settling this promising section of New Brunswick.

Coming back to my resolution, I divide it into two parts, the first referring to an injustice done to the old employees in the matter of promotions. In my remarks this afternoon I proved that the employees of the road had been passed by when vacancies occurred, and my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) pointed out that according to an answer he received last year the number of officials who were appointed to high positions on the Intercolonial from other roads was nearly thirty. In no case were these imported men any better than men who could have been chosen from the ranks of the Intercolonial. I have met a good many of these outside men, and so far from being as efficient as the old employees, they do not know the road at all at first, and have to serve a kind of apprenticeship before they can discharge their duties properly. I am not speaking of Mr. Gutelius, because I do not think the Minister of Railways could have selected a better man for the position, and I have never reflected on him in that respect in any of the speeches I have made on the Intercolonial. I repeat what I have said before, that he is a gentleman in every respect, a man of great ability, very polite, and he gives every employee from the highest to the lowest a chance to air any grievance he may have, and I am not aware of any instance where an employee has not got justice. Under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Brady occupied that position and things were quite different. Not only were the employees not given the opportunity of bringing their cases before him, but even the business men, the patrons of the Intercolonial, could not approach him to discuss business matters. Mr. Gutelius is quite different and can be seen by any of the employees or patrons of the road. The only thing I complain of is that he goes outside in filling the higher positions on the road, and I think that charge is justified by the cases that have been cited this afternoon. I have mentioned the case of Mr. Devenish and the hon. member from Pictou also spoke of him. It was a great mystery to me why Mr. Devenish was brought to Canada to take the place of Mr. Price. I pleaded then with Mr. Gutelius and the Minister of Railways for justice for the province of Quebec. We had been run by the province of New Brunswick for forty-five years, and that ninety-two mile section in the province of Quebec had never received its share of patronage in respect to high positions on the Intercolonial. Mr. Gutelius said that Mr. Devenish was there on a kind of an apprenticeship, and that when he was promoted to a higher position I should be able to appoint a superintendent, or at least an assistant-superintendent, from the province of Quebec. This did not satisfy our people in the province of Quebec, but I told them we would soon get justice. I waited, and what happened? Mr. Devenish proved a failure in his administration of the railway. It was clear that he had no capacity for operating that part of the road between Campbellton and Mont Joli, and Mr. Gutelius made him superintendent of a division somewhere near Moncton. Then, instead of giving us justice as he had promised, he appoinnted Mr. Fitzmaurice, against whom I have nothing personally, for he is a gentleman and knows something about the road; in fact, he was brought up on the Intercolonial, and I shall not say much about his promotion. We should have obtained what we were promised. The best way to give us that was to nominate an assistant superintendent. But this was not done. On this ground I criticise the administration of the road. Had I not suggested the name of the man to fill the position I should feel now that I had failed in my duty. But I was watching the game, and as soon as the job was open I suggested the names of three men, all men who had been on the Intercolonial from ten to twenty years and of whose competency for the position there could be no question. There was not the slightest reason to refuse all these and give the position to a man who had only had four or five years' experience, a switchman who knew nothing about running a road, who knew nothing of the population amidst whom his work was to be carried on, and who did not understand even a single word of French, though his work was to be amongst a population made up almost exclusively of French-Canadians. And this is the kind of thing that has been going on for forty-five years, ever since the road was built. The people of Nova Scotia do not like to have the part of the road that runs through their province administered by men from British Columbia. I know that, because I travel over the road. Nor do the people along the Intercolonial in Quebec want men from other provinces to occupy high positions in the service of the railway there. We want our own situations for our own men. If there were any difficulty about it, I would not grumble; if there were good reasons against it, I would not complain. But the road has everything to gain by giving us justice. In the first place, it will take away all the animosities that sometimes exist between the two races when they do not understand each other. If we had a superintendent to cover the whole system in the province of Quebec we should have nothing to do with the road in other provinces, and the employees would accomplish their duty much better and the relations of all the people would be a good deal more friendly.

The appointment of these strangers to administer the affairs of the Intercolonial is objectionable from another standpoint. The old employees, seeing these men come to take the places to which they might reasonably have expected to be promoted, instead of fulfilling their duties with enthusiasm, naturally tend to do their work in such a way as merely to avoid trouble. That is the reason why last year, in such a place as the Matapedia valley, the road was blocked for days and days, and twenty-five to thirty-five hours was occupied with a run that ordinarily takes seven hours. But if they had had a superintendent known to them, like Mr. Fitzmaurice, they would have done as they did last winter, when trains worked smoothly and not a single one was blocked.

I must add a few words in justice to Mr. Gutelius. During the last local election I happened to be in New Brunswick. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) does not like to see me interfering in New Brunswick affairs. But I may tell him that I have property in New Brunswick, that my county borders on that province, and that among the settlers along the Intercolonial railway in the county of Restigouche ten per cent come from the county of Rimouski. It is only natural on my part to look after their interest when they want to be helped. The population of Restigouche is about seventy per cent French, and consequently a French-Canadian feels pretty well at home when he gets into that county. I was there during the local election, and heard speeches made at a number of meetings. And one of the things I heard said with reference to Mr. Gutelius by a frined of hon. gentlemen opposite was this: If we ever get into power at Ottawa we know one thing for sure, and that is that the Intercolonial will not be run by a German. Now, that is not fair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did the hon. gentleman notice in the newspaper published in St. John a statement attributed to the former Attorney General stating that immediately upon the return of Sir Robert Borden from England, as a result of the defeat of the Conservatives in New Brunswick, an effort would be made to dismiss Mr. Gutelius.

Mr. BOULAY: I am sorry, but I was not able to understand what the hon. gentleman said. I am quoting what I heard with my own ears. The words were plain, and they were as I have stated them. I say such a statement is not fair, not only to the country, but also to a gentleman, as Mr. Gutelius is. I know by conversation with him that he is not a German, and I know that he has never acted as a German but as a business man who knows his business and wishes to be fair. He has fulfilled his duty to the best of his ability, and it is most unfair to attempt to create feeling against him. Of course, those to whom this statement about Mr. Gutelius was made did not hear the other side, and believing what they heard they would naturally support the side favoured by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I am sorry that my hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) is not in his seat. He challenged me to give the names of men imported by the Liberal party to take the places of the old employees of the Intercolonial.

When I spoke this afternoon as to the example which was given by the Liberal party and when I said that they had exceeded anything which had been done by our own Administration, I was right. I shall quote several names from memory. There was Mr. Russell, who was general manager, Mr. McGovern, who was a track master right in my own district, Mr. Joughins, who is a general machinist, Mr. Brassard assistant superintendent at Rivière du Loup, Mr. Harris, Moncton, Mr. Tiffin who was brought from the Grand Trunk to Moncton, notwithstanding what the hon. member for St. John said about his being an Intercolonial man, Mr. Oulette, who was appointed superintendent from the outside and whom the Liberal party had to let go after three months trial, Mr. Dube, whom they also brought from the Grand Trunk and finally, and the best of them all, Mr. Brady, I hope my honourable friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) will take note of that and not interrupt me any more while I am telling the truth. Now, with regard to dismissals; this question has been discussed pretty fully during the last five or six years and it is not necessary for me to refer to it again at any very great length. But, I wish to point out that we have been a good deal more lenient than our friends opposite were. In my constituency from Campbellton to Levis we have made very few dismissals since we have been in power. We have only put out of office those that were too bad and this was not done without an investigation being given. Since I have been the representative of my county, I have recommended many Liberals to small positions such as brakemen and firemen and I have done all I could to help the people there without discrimination as to party.

My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and my hon. friend from St. John say that the management has been unsatisfactory with regard to the running of trains during the last two years. Any man who has a knowledge of railroading will admit that under the conditions trains could not be run more regularly. The running of the trains has been affected by the conditions and the critical times we are going through. I have looked into the matter very carefully and no man could do better than Mr. Gutelius in running the Intercolonial since the outbreak of war. As many trains as possible have been run. Instead of building the Transcontinental railway my hon. friends opposite should have doubletracked the Intercolonial. It would have been a good deal more profitable than to have wasted so many millions in constructing a railroad through a wilderness without any profit to the country.

While I am talking about the Transcontinental, I would like to give the House a bit of my own experience in connnection with that undertaking. I travelled over a part of the railway which has been built west of Quebec. I happened to go 300 miles west of Quebec, and I found on this part of the line evidence of the greatest scandals in the construction of the road. I would invite my hon. friends opposite to visit the Transcontinental west of Quebec, at least as far as Parent, and if they do they will agree with me that a great robbery has been committed in the construction of that road. On the division, covering 100 miles, between Fitzpatrick and Parent the removal of the stones that had fallen on the road, because the work had not been properly done in the first instance, cost the Government last year $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Clearing up the track for 100 miles cost $10,000?

Mr. BOULAY: It cost that to remove the stone that had fallen on the track over a distance of 100 miles, and one small stone of 10,000 pounds fell on a tender one day. That I know because I was told so by the employees.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the effect on the tender of this 10,000 pound stone?

Mr. BOULAY: I suppose it wrecked the train. It is not a cutting at all; it is just a hole that has been cut through the stones instead of the cuttings having been made as they should have been, and as they were certainly contracted for. The object seems to have been to construct the road in the quickest possible way, and now every year, until the work is made perfect, we will have to sustain a loss of thousands and thousands of dollars to remove the stone from the tracks that should have been removed at the time of construction.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I would like to know what phase of the resolution the hon. gentleman is discussing now?

Mr. SPEAKER: I hesitate to call the hon. member for Rimouski to order because he is closing a debate that has taken a very wide range to-day, but the point of order taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria is sound. The hon. gentleman, I think, is very far from the subject, and at this hour of the night it would be well to get back to it.

Mr. BOULAY: I think I have said enough to give an illustration of the bad administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. To conclude, I hope my remarks will be taken in good part by the Minister of Railways. I think he knows what we want in that part of the province of Quebec which I have the honour to represent. We do not want Mr. Gutelius to be taken away. He is a man of great ability, and he gives satisfaction generally to the people in his administration. What we want for the old employees is more encouragement, more promotions. The system of promotion that has been applied, as I have heard ministers say, in their own departments, should be applied to the Intercolonial railway. I hope that in future the people of the part of the province of Quebec in which I live will get justice so that we shall have no reason for criticism.

[Mr. Boulay.]

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY BONDS

Mr. GRAHAM:

Is the Canadian Bank of Commerce a holder of bonds of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government has no information.

RELEASE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. As a result of his western trip, has the Solicitor General recommended the release of prisoners to assist in farm operations in the Prairie Provinces?
2. If so, how many are to be sent, respectively, into the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. The trip in question was an inspection trip of western penitentiaries made with a view to acquiring personal knowledge of, and information concerning, applicants for parole, and particularly those seeking parole for the purpose of enlisting for overseas service. Prisoners have been released before and since for reasons, among others, that they expressed desire to assist in farm work, and were known to be capable of so doing. It has not been the practice to compel service of such men in any special province.

2. Answered by No. 1.

ALLEGED STONING OF TROOPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. BEST (Dufferin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to an article that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday the 24th inst., part of which reads as follows:

Warned that the 204th had been stoned at Rivière du Loup, we turned out, officers and N.C.O's at that place and formed a cordon around the train. As it was night there were only a few loafers about, mostly bootleggers, and we kept them back from the train. Just as the train started a few stones were thrown, but did no damage.

The second section of our train was delayed at Chaudière, earlier in the day, and the men went for a route march. When the train pulled out again some of the crowd that had gathered started throwing things, and a brick went through a window of the officers' car. By good fortune no one was hit.

But I certainly never before appreciated how strongly treasonous is the feeling in some parts of Quebec. You have the feeling there of going through enemy country—excepting that in enemy country the populace would be kept better in hand, and confined to their homes after dark.

I think it is the duty of the Government to see whether this report is true or not, and if so, to see that the offenders are punished. If the hon. members of the Government, and also the hon. members of the Opposition were half as anxious to see that our soldiers were protected passing through Quebec, as at least one hon-member of the Government and two hon. members of the Opposition are in advising the Imperial Government on Home Rule—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman reading an extract from a newspaper?

Mr. BEST: Yes, I was reading part of this.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order—

Mr. BEST: I have read this from an article that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, the 24th, down to "I think it is the duty of the Government to see whether this report is true or not." I think that is quite satisfactory to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the custom which has prevailed in this House for sometime, it is in order at this stage to ask questions upon important topics of the day, but not to enter into any extended remarks. My object in rising was to ascertain clearly whether the hon. gentleman was making extended remarks or quoting an extract from a newspaper. I understand he has now concluded his question to the Government.

Mr. BEST: I wish to obey the rules of the Chair, but I think this is a serious affair; the troops passing through to defend the public—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. Best.]

Mr. BEST: I would like to know what the Government is going to do in the matter.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I am ready to answer the hon. gentleman.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that I did not hear distinctly the wording of the report to which my hon. friend draws the attention of the Government. It had not previously come to my attention, but I shall be very glad, as it will appear on Hansard, to have it carefully looked into.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope this matter will not be allowed to rest where it is. There should be an investigation of the matter.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It is an awful lie.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The statement either is true or is not true.

Mr. GAUVREAU: We are getting used to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If it is true, such conduct ought to be put down at once; if it is not true, it ought to be made known at once that it is not true.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Speaker, I myself saw—

Mr. SPEAKER: The matter has been submitted to the Government for consideration, and it would be unwise to enter into a discussion of it, particularly as there is no question before the Chair. Therefore, I respectfully ask the hon. minister to refrain from discussing it.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY HON. GEORGE GRAHAM AS TO INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I seldom do this, because I know that human nature is weak and that sometimes in moments of excitements things are said which, perhaps would not be said under conditions of ordinary calm and in the presence of the gentleman at whom they are aimed. But I find in Hansard this morning that the hon. member for Calgary, (Mr. R. B. Bennett) in very characteristic manner, made a statement last night concerning myself and public business which, I think, cannot go unchallenged. I was not in the House at the time. Particularly do I wish to speak of this because the hon. member for Calgary occupies a very prominent position. He is supposed to be at least semi-independent and to be devoting his energies to the cause of Empire in the performance of certain work which has been committed to his hands. This hon. gentleman, occupying such a position, in which he is appealing to young men and young women, older men and older women of both parties throughout Canada, cannot escape with this statement uncontradicted. I read in Hansard these words uttered by the hon. member for Calgary:

For be it known that the late Minister of Railways and Canals had agreed to hand over the Intercolonial Railway to the Canadian Northern interests if the then Government would be sustained in the coming general election.

Mr. Speaker, this statement from beginning to end is devoid of the least vestige of truth. There was no such understanding, verbal or written; no agreement with the Canadian Northern, verbal or written, and no understanding to make such an agreement, either verbal or written. This morning I wired to the Canadian Northern people, and I received the following reply from Sir Donald Mann:

Hon. George Graham, Ottawa.

I could not have made the statement that you had agreed to hand over Intercolonial to Canadian Northern for there never was such agreement or understanding.

Donald Mann.

So far as an agreement or understanding is concerned, I think I have made it clear to the country that absolutely no foundation, near or remote, exists for the lurid utterance of the member for Calgary. Let me read one other sentence from the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett):

I did not get that second-hand from any one; I have it first hand from the people themselves.

One of the chief people says this statement is untrue. Now, all that is left of my hon. friend's statement is this: it is possible, though I do not give it credence, that some other member of the Canadian Northern Railway Company may have said something to the member for Calgary. I am not my brother's keeper so far as the language of a railway magnate or of the member for Calgary is concerned, and, as I stated a moment ago, I do not give that statement of the hon. member for Calgary credence. But if any member of the Canadian Northern Railway Company made that statement to the hon. member for Calgary, he uttered a falsehood and he knew it was a falsehood when he uttered it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman rise to a question of privilege?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Purely a question of privilege, as to the observations of the former Minister of Railways and Canals. Language is used for the purpose either of disguising or of expressing thought. The meaning that it conveys depends upon the sense in which it is used by the person who means it as well as by the person who receives or understands it. If language is used for the purpose of conveying thought, not only did I correctly state the sense of what I heard and was told, but if the hon. gentleman will inquire further of the former Minister of Finance he will find that capital value had been fixed upon the Intercolonial, as well as the rate of interest that was to be paid upon the capital by way of rental and the term of years during which the lease was to run.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I merely wish to say that these are the facts upon which I based the statement which I made, and which I desire, so far as I am concerned, to repeat.

CANADIAN NAVAL AEROPLANE SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Some time ago a statement appeared in the public press that young Canadians were to be instructed in the use of æroplanes or hydroplanes, which were to be utilized in connection with the Canadian Naval Service. I am informed on good authority that several æroplanes or hydroplanes have been brought into Canada with a view to beginning this service, and that an instructor has been sent from Great Britain. I am informed, also, that for some time the whole matter has been hung up, the idea being that the service should have been entered upon somewhere in the Maritime Provinces in connection with the Naval Services, where preparations were being made to that end. I would like to ask the leader of the House whether these preparations have been discontinued, and whether it is intended to go on with the establishment of an æroplane service in connection with the Canadian navy?

Hon. J. D. REID: As this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Naval Service Department, and I am acting for the minister during his absence, I will draw the attention of the deputy minister to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and to-morrow I will give him a reply.

SALE OF LIQUOR IN CANADIAN MILITARY CAMPS.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the evils alleged to exist among our soldiers overseas arising out of the liquor traffic in camps and military centres.

And leave having been granted:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I hope to detain the House not more than five minutes, because I am told that my hon. friend the Solicitor General is going to address the House to-day on the Budget, and I do not want to intrude on his time. I think, however, the question I am bringing to the attention of the House deserves some special consideration. As long as the information which I intend to give to the House came only from private sources, I should certainly not have dared to give it any publicity; but now that the press in Canada and the old country has revealed some staggering facts in connection with the use or rather the abuse of liquor, in the camps where our boys are in England, I think it is my duty as a public man to call the attention of the Government and of Parliament to this very serious state of affairs. I am glad to see my good friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) in his seat, as I wish to pay some tribute to him. Much as I differ from him and much as I disagree with what I would call his failings or shortcomings, I am sure every one will admit that, as regards the discipline of our soldiers when they were under his control, the hon. gentleman followed a stern and unbending rule, and I wish that the same rule were observed by his successors. I must, of course, say at once that I do not charge my hon. friend, the present Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp), nor do I charge the Government with any lax conduct in this matter, because perhaps, so far as the matter stands now, it is beyond their power to intervene.

As I stated a moment ago, Sir, the question is now made public by the reference which has been made to it in the press, and that is the reason why I wish to call the attention of the Government and of Parliament to the very serious state of affairs which is alleged to exist in the camps where our soldiers are in England. Mr. Lloyd George, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, some months ago stated, if I mistake not, that the soldiers of Great Britain or the soldiers of the Allies had two enemies to fight, the Germans and alcohol, and of the two he claimed that alcohol was the worst enemy to fight. I for one regret that when the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence had established the rule of a dry canteen in our military camps, that rule should not have been observed afterwards. I do not know how matters stand at present in our various camps in Ontario and the West, but at Valcartier, so far as I know, many serious blunders have been committed, and I unfortunately happen to know that at Valcartier there were certain very grave abuses arising out of the use of liquor by our soldiers. I am not going to speak about our own country because the remedy lies within our own power; that is to say, the local Governments can intervene, and I suppose the military authorities of the country can intervene, and make a very stringent rule that no wet canteen shall exist in the camps.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did the hon. member say anything about liquor being used to any extent at Valcartier camp?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have under my hand an article referring to some very disgraceful incidents which took place at Valcartier camp. I was not speaking of the regime of my hon. friend. This happened lately.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does my hon. friend refer to the first camp or to the last camp?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The last camp. It would be too long to read the description of what happened there. There may be only a few individual cases, but the gentleman who has written about the matter gives a very ghastly picture of what has occurred. But my object in rising this afternoon is to call attention to what has been disclosed in the press as to what has happened in the various camps in England. First of all, every hon. member is aware of the very sad picture which was drawn a few weeks ago by Dr. Clarke, lately of the Toronto General Hospital, of the conditions in the camps in England; but as I have not under my hand Dr. Clarke's report, I shall not refer to it; I know that the revelations made at the time by him startled the country. What I wish to refer to this afternoon is an article which is published in a very substantial paper having a very wide circulation in Canada. I refer to the Financial Post of Canada, published at Toronto. In its issue of April 21, the Financial Post contains a long article of several pages, under the title "Evils in the army arising out of the liquor traffic; millions lost to Canada." Whilst on the whole the article is a plea for prohibition in Canada, yet there are facts which apply to particular cases in the camps in England. I will not read the whole of the article but just a few passages. For instance, the writer says:

One of the earliest as well as one of the most courageous and efficient of the acts of Sir Sam Hughes was to insist on a dry canteen for the Canadian Expeditionary Forces; and it has worked untold damage to Canada's soldiers that the Canadian regulation, whether by British military insistence or weak-kneed surrender on the part of some Canadian official overseas, was over-ridden, and a wet canteen started in full swing in every camp.

If there was one consolation for the parents of the soldiers as they marched out from Valcartier camp when it was under the direction of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia, it was the fact that they knew that under his unbending discipline the boys would not be faced by the liquor sellers. Unfortunately, as the writer says, the wet canteen has replaced the dry canteen, not only in Canada, but in Great Britain. This article is followed by a long letter written by one of our soldiers, Capt. Paul Goforth. I do not know if this officer is known by some of my fellow members in the House of Commons or not, but the letter is written very boldly by him in the columns of the Toronto Financial Post.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did the hon. member say that the wet canteen is restored in Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what the writer says.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does he give the date of its restoration?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. I will not read the whole of the letter; I simply give some outstanding facts.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the letter signed by the writer?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is signed by Capt. Paul Goforth.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He does not know what he is speaking about.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This letter is published in the Toronto Financial Post which has a wide circulation and is a highly respectable paper. This is what Captain Goforth says:

Some of the revelations I intend to make may be regarded as breaches of military discipline, bnt it is high time that some one in the army spoke out plainly to the people at home, and I accept the responsibility for what I have to say. I am speaking, not as an officer criticising my superiors in the service, but as a citizen of Canada and a British subject protesting against the continuance, in any form, of an unpatriotic and costly traffic which hampers the work of the army—

Mark those words!

—which hampers the work of the army at every turn and which has ruined and is ruining thousands of our best officers, non-commissioned officers, and men.

I need not dilate on this, for unfortunately it is substantiated in the report made by Dr. Bruce. I shall not refer to what everyone has in mind regarding the very serious condition that has arisen in some of the camps through the abuse of liquor. Now, I come to the facts. Captain Goforth states:

By the introduction of the wet canteen—

There would be seem to be no question at all about the introduction of the wet canteen.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Whereabouts?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will read what he says:

By the introduction of the wet canteen the liquor traffic was officially recognized as a good thing and many a Canadian boy was led to take his first glass of beer.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Is that in England?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose so. He goes on:

That was one time that we should have stood on our own feet and been true to Canadian sentiment and Canadian ideals instead of pandering to a time-honored custom of the British army—"a custom more honored in the breach than the observance." The wet canteen was introduced primarily "to prevent our men getting harder liquor elsewhere"; but that excuse is a mockery, as every one knows who has seen the "underground railway" of the liquor traffic at work. This enemy in our midst has made it fearfully easy for men to get more of the poison which is drawing them down to the dust.

My hon. friend asks whether this is taking place in England. Of course it is, and I appeal to my hon. friend as a gentleman with the interest of the boys at heart, and perhaps with some relatives at the front, is there not some way of restricting the use of liquor in our camps in England, where our Canadian soldiers are being trained to fight for King and country. I may be told that the moment our soldiers enter Britain they come under the control of the British officers and under British Army regulations; that is quite true. But considering the wonderful effort that Canada has made for the flag, is it not possible for the Canadian Government to assert themselves in such a righteous cause as I am presenting this afternoon, and say that our boys in England and in France shall not have the use of liquor in England or at the front any more than they had in our camps in Canada? Let me remind the Minister of Militia and Defence of what has been done in Russia. We are all aware that the liquor traffic has been abolished in that country; vodka is not distilled in Russia to-day. We all know too that Russian soldiers have been sent in large numbers to France to fight alongside their French comrades; and although the troops are fighting side by side, and the French soldiers are allowed to use wine, everybody knows that it is forbidden under very severe penalties to serve liquor to the Russian soldiers. Now, if it is possible for France and Russia to arrange for Russia to maintain this control over her troops in France, would it not be a far easier thing to arrange as between France and England.

I now come to the facts in Captain Goforth's letter.

> At Bustard Camp one evening after "lights out," some drunken sergeants were making so much noise that the men in the lines near by could not get to sleep. I was present as orderly officer of the day when Capt. A———, the captain of the week, went to the sergeants' mess to stop the noise. The Regimental Sergeant-Major was befuddled with drink; and one sergeant under the influence of liquor, rushed forward and attempted to assault Capt. A———.

Does it make for discipline, I ask, to see an officer or sergeant befuddled with drink in the presence of the rank and file. Why the very mention of the fact is sufficient, it seems to me, to stir the Minister of Militia and Defence to doing his duty in the matter. Captain Goforth goes on:

> Again at Sling Plantation Camp, the muddiest of them all, I was obliged, as orderly officer, to place under arrest a man who was drunk and disorderly and who was resisting arrest with a drawn bayonet. He came at me with blood in his eye; and before his hand was seized from behind by the sergeant of the guard, he had brought his bayonet within a foot of my face. No sober man in the Canadian army would have acted as he did. The tolerance of the liquor traffic is more than a question of discipline; it is a question of our firmness or feebleness of purpose in prosecuting this war.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

> At Tidworth Barracks, Capt. ——— and another of our officers were broken through drink. The General Officer Commanding having no further use for their services, they were "permitted to resign their commissions in the Canadian Expeditionary Force".
>
> At the Canadian Base Depot, Havre, France, where I spent eight months, the problem was the same. More or less kindly French civilians could not be kept away; and those of our men who wanted more than they could get at the wet canteen had no difficulty in securing cheap whiskey, wine, and brandy.
>
> At Pond Farm Camp on Salisbury Plains, our mess caterer, a civilian, took enough whiskey to send him into delirium tremens, and then became so violent that he had to be tied hand and foot and kept in the guard tent all night, while his screams kept the camp awake.

Further on he says:

> The degrading effect of liquor on character is its crowning infamy. The terrible temptations which are inseparable from the abnormal life of a soldier are but dimly understood by those who have always had a comfortable home; and, in the hour of temptation, even the strongest man needs all his faculties braced to resist.

I will not say anything further about the consequences to our men in the large camps and in the large cities. On that point we have before us the picture drawn by Dr. Bruce in his report.

I do not ask the Minister of Militia and Defence to dictate to the Imperial authorities. But it seems to me that the Canadian Government should respectfully ask the War Office to prevent liquor being served in the camps in England where Canadian soldiers are being trained. I have given the instance of the Russian soldiers in the trenches and camps in France. The Russian Government was able to prevent the sale of alcohol to the soldiers of that country in France, and surely it should be far more easy for the Canadian Government to insist with the War Office that no liquor shall be sold to our soldiers in the camps in England. In discussing this matter and speaking of it as I do, I do not mean to attack the Government. I simply wish to be the spokesman for the fathers and mothers whose boys are at the front and those whose boys are about to be sent to fight the battles of the Empire.

Sir SAM HUGHES: As the late Minister of Militia, possibly I can throw a little light on this matter. When the boys went to camp in Salisbury Plain, the dry canteen was established so far as they were concerned. Of course, there was nothing to prevent a soldier from going to an outlying town and getting hard liquor.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was at the intervention of my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) that the dry canteen was established?

Sir SAM HUGHES: They carried the good customs with them from here, and kept the most of them right through. While I was in England in 1914, I undertook to establish control over the canteens. The plan was to have battalion canteens, just as we have to-day throughout Canada and have had for a long time. The profits from these canteens—dry canteens—go to the battalions concerned. But I was politely informed that we had no control. That was the first intimation I had, and this is a matter to which I referred some time ago—

Mr. MACDONALD: Who gave that intimation?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It came from those in charge. General Alderson made some arrangement with the High Commissioner, and the matter was communicated from the High Commissioner to the Prime Minister, stating that it was their intention to establish dry canteens. I cannot agree with the statement of procedure as outlined by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). My position is that Canada should have full control of her troops in England; we need not doff our hat to anybody to ask what our troops shall have in the way of a canteen. Had my plan been carried out, we should have been in control of our troops in England. But that was not granted. Of course, if we go hat in hand, I suppose we can get what we ask for. General Alderson was notified from here, in response to his intimation that they purposed restoring the wet canteen—I do not know the details of the communication between the Prime Minister and him through Sir George Perley—but, at all events, the wet canteens were established by the authorities in England.

Mr. MACDONALD: How long ago?

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the camp at Salisbury Plain. This is a well-known instance. I took this as a personal insult from General Alderson. He made the announcement to the men. The first time he got the troops together—except when he assembled them to read some extracts from a little book he had got up to tell them how to win wars—he announced to them that he had assembled them to give them an important communication, to tell them that he would make them free men, and that they were to have wet canteens. He told them they were not to be tied to anybody's apron-strings but were to be free men, to drink as they chose. From that hour to this I have never had anything to do with it—never bothered about it at all. When they undertook to establish the canteen system, we were met with the same objection —that the canteens had been let to some corporation or parties and that these had control, and we had nothing to say.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron): Reference has been made to the wet canteen in the camps in Canada. I was for about four or five months in the largest artillery camp ever held in Canada; and, with one exception—that of a man who had been on leave and who was brought in under guard from North Bay—there was not one single man in that camp of five thousand men, to my knowledge—and I am around practically all the time—under the influence of liquor. Now, in reference to the camps in England, I am sorry that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux)—

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lewis) says that at Petawawa he was around all the time, under the influence of liquor?

Mr. LEWIS: No, sir, any one who knows me, knows different. I am sorry the hon. member for Rouville has seen fit to bring up this matter. I have no objection to his talking prohibition anywhere at the proper time. Temperate living is the right principle, as every right-thinking man will agree. But, when recruiting is at its present stage in Canada, to make statements in this House to go broadcast through the country, founded on erroneous statements which the hon. gentleman has received, I think is a mistake.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, my statements were not based on facts received from private sources. I base them on an article in the Financial Post which is open to everybody to read. And I may say that I avoided reading the most serious statements contained in that article.

Mr. LEWIS: I notice that a reverend gentleman in London, Ontario, Mr. Flanders, made a statement two months ago on the platform, and letters came in from returned soldiers by the dozens absolutely refuting that statement. I believe I had exceptional opportunities while I was in England to have knowledge of the facts in reference to this matter. When I first reached there I was informed by the general in charge of the division in which my battery was stationed, that, owing to my success in recruiting, I should get as much knowledge as I could in reference to the camps and the treatment of the Canadians in England and France, and should then return to Canada for the purpose of recruiting more men for the artillery, that more men was the great need. For that purpose I was there. I was at Aldershot and also for months in camp at Witley, Milford and Bramshott, at which are concentrated over 40,000 men. There were 30,000 at Witley, and I say on my honour as a member of this House that with one exception, and that was the same man that was brought back from North Bay to Petawawa, there was not a man under the influence of liquor to my knowledge there. I was in every Canadian division in France from Belgium to the Somme. I travelled to every large base hospital and every base of concentration; I was looking out all the time and was taking notes as to what I could say to the young men in Canada and to his father and mother as to the conditions there. With the exception of those poor chaps, and I am glad to say that there are not as many as people think, considering the great number we have there who have been injured at the front, there is not a young man or an older man who will not return to Canada better physically and mentally than when he left these shores. The same matter as that to which my hon. friend has referred, with regard to Russia, was brought up by this gentleman, the Rev. Mr. Flanders, and I am glad to say that the heads of the Methodist church, in selecting the pulpits to be occupied by members of their ministry, have moved Mr. Flanders to a far western situation, because I feel he should not have taken that stand on the information he had. When these letters appeared I was telegraphed to by the Battery officers, stating that they were going to do harm. I discussed the matter with one young man who had been wounded on the 16th of September on the Somme, and who had been nine months in the Canadian camps. I discussed it with dozens of other young men. They all stated that the assertion was absolutely untrue as to their officers being incapacitated through liquor. There is a point which the hon. gentleman has made which carries that out. He says that men have been broken for drinking. It is an unpardonable sin in the British army, or in the Canadian army in England, or at the front, to be under the influence of liquor. Occasionally you see the announcement that a court martial has been held and that a man has been discharged from the service. In the few cases in which a court martial is held it is to try a case in which a soldier has been charged with drunkenness and never to investigate an accusation of cowardice. I have the firm belief that the hon. gentleman wishes to fairly put the matter before the people, but I walked through the trenches in the Canadian division in Belgium and France and I asked the men who were there in the trenches and dugouts how they were getting along. That is what I was there for. At the great concentration camp at Havre I went through the whole camp on the parade and I said: Boys, how are you any complaints? I saw them last December in the dugouts at the front trenches and I am glad to say they were very comfortable. It was dry, although cold outside. I would say: How are you boys; are you getting lots to eat? They would say: Lots to eat but nothing to drink. I heard that repeatedly. It may have been a joke, but I believe it was true. They could not possibly get anything to drink there with the exception of the rum issue. I saw a letter the other day from a young man, written on the 31st March, and he said that no matter what clothes they had, the cold, damp wind bored through them. He was a boy who had never taken a drink in his life, but he said that if it were not for the tot of rum at two in the morning they would not be able to stand it. Does the hon. gentleman think of comparing the action of the Russians with that of the French or the English? Could our young men do what they have done if conditions were just as these letters assert? This whole country will be benefited in the future. The young men who return uninjured will be benefited mentally and physically by what they are experiencing there. As to any change in the camps in England, I believe there will not be any camps there in two or three months. The men will all be at the front, because, from the present state of recruiting, there will be no one to take their places. I am very sorry to differ from my hon. friend, but these are the facts to my own knowledge. There may have been some drinking going on that I did not know about, but I would just like to mention that the batteries of the 14th Brigade topped the score in England for shooting. Could they have done it under the influence of liquor? I submit, Sir, that the evidence that we have before us is absolutely against the statement that the hon. gentleman has made.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lewis) who has just sat down in an expression of regret that my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has brought this question up, especially as he has done so absolutely on the authority of some letters to the newspapers, even if these letters are from officers who have possibly some very strong views upon the liquor question. It would have been very easy for any one who knew that the question was to be up to have brought strong testimony for the other side from officers who were also chaplains in the forces, and who have written to contradict the statements that have been read from by my hon. friend. I do not know whether my hon. friend said it or whether he read it from one of these letters, that men have been known to take their first drink since they went to the front. But, there are an awful lot of men who have taken their first drink who have never gone to the front. I know my hon. friend's biography pretty well, and I do not think that he, any more than myself, has ever been to war, but I should be surprised to learn that he is a life teetotaller. I do not, however, rise to go into the merits of the question at all; I rise to join with my hon. friend in his expression of regret. I know something about what goes on in the trenches at first hand. I know about the amount of drinking that is done there, and I know something about the amount of fighting that is done there. Personally, the last men I would want to dictate to as to their habits in this world are the officers and soldiers of France, Britain and Canada to-day. My hon. friend says the French soldiers get wine. Is he ashamed of what they did on the wine at Verdun? I know that a certain amount of rum is given to the British soldiers in the trenches. Are they not making a pretty good job of the business they have in hand? I, for one, have nothing but gratitude to these soldiers. I have no criticism to offer to them as to their personal habits, and they are the last men in the world that I would want to put in leading strings. They are going to lead the world to freedom and to victory before this war is over.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it seems fitting that at this moment I should rise to say a word on a question about which I ought to know something. I had the honour of taking a battalion from Western Canada to England. I took that battalion across the ocean, and trained it for four and a half months in different camps in England. I took a battalion across who did not all belong to Sunday school classes, who were men organized for the purpose of discharging the great duties they are discharging to-day, not only to their own credit but to the credit of the people of Canada. I had more trouble in Canada with a dry canteen than I ever had with my men in England with a wet canteen in the camp. The ex-minister (Sir Sam Hughes) asks me how I make that out. When the men got leave to go to the city of Winnipeg or other places in Canada they often came back to the camp under the influence of liquor and would be paraded, as they ought to be, before the commanding officer. I had more men paraded in my orderly room in Canada than I had in any camp in England. I say it is a slander on the men who are performing noble deeds for Canada and for Empire to insinuate that they are drunkards—because that is really what this matter means—on the other side of the water. I am surprised that my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has taken his brief from this article without making sure that he was on solid ground. Even if he had been absolutely sure that it was correct I doubt the wisdom at this stage in the affairs of Canada of bringing a matter like this before the country. Is it calculated, I ask the hon. gentleman, to encourage recruiting all over Canada or is it calculated to discourage recruiting? Surely it cannot be the object of the hon. gentleman to discourage recruiting. If it was, he could not do anything better than what he has done to-day in bringing this matter before the House as he has. Let me read an article from a chaplain, Captain Daw. Captain Daw was canon of an English church in Hamilton and was a chaplain in England in one of these camps referred to. He knows the writer of the article the hon. gentleman has read and he makes a statement here in the Hamilton Herald of Tuesday, April 24. It is headed "Captain Daw is Champion of the Men Overseas." Should we not all be champions of the men overseas? "He refutes statements about them made by Captain Goforth." That is the gentleman from whom my hon. friend has his brief. The article is as follows:

In the person of Capt. (Rev.) Canon S. Daw recently returned from England where he served as chaplain af the 120th battalion, the Canadian soldiers in training in the old country have a champion who will not sit dumbly by and hear evil spoken against their characters without making protest against what he calls the injustice and untruthfulness of such statements. Capt. Daw denies the charges of drunkenness and misconduct against the brave lads overseas.

This morning a Toronto paper published an editorial calling the wet canteens of England a national curse and citing extracts contributed by Capt. Goforth to the Financial Post, in which it is stated that Canadian troops in the old country are being debilitated and ruined for useful citizenship by these canteens and "the birds of prey who hang around the camps and give the soldiers loathsome diseases".

Speaking from his own experience and observations while in England Capt. Daw denied these charges absolutely when interviewed regarding the matter this morning. He said: "Capt. Goforth is a crank. That article he contributed to the Post was written three years ago when conditions were much different. Then there were some old soldiers in England who did do some things that were wrong, but not nearly as bad as he paints them; but now such conditions are as dead as the dodo in England, and it is not fair to publish that at this date about our Canadian soldiers.

"England believes in temperance and I believe that those wet canteens stand for temperance. They are run by the army and navy department, and controlled by the colonel of the battalion. They don't sell hard liquor. They sell mostly beer.

"The colonel of one battalion told me over and over again that they had less drunkenness in England than in Canada. I have seen in one night more cases of drunkenness in the streets between the Westinghouse and the central part of the city than I saw all the time I was in England."

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Is that the letter of a reverend gentleman?

Mr. BRADBURY: That is the letter of Rev. Captain Daw, chaplain of one of the Canadian battalions, who was in England. It is not necessary for me to add much to what I have already said. It is unfortunate that a gentleman occupying the prominent position that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) occupies, knowing that his statement will go broadcast over Canada in the press of the country, should rise in his place and read an article such as he read before the House to-day—an article that, as stated here, is three years old, without making any investigation to find out whether or not the matter contained in it is correct. But, as I said, even if the statements were true, it is not in the interests of recruiting at the present moment that these statements should be made. I want to say, as a Colonel who had my own battalion to control and administer, that the statements regarding the conduct of Canadian soldiers in our camps are absolutely untrue. I was located in the Witley camp, where there were forty thousand men for three months.

The conditions are these: A great deal is made about the wet canteen. The wet canteen is under the control of the British Government. It is not the worst institution in the world, regardless of what some hon. gentlemen may think. It is far better, to my mind, to have a wet canteen in a camp in England than no canteen at all, or a dry canteen. I will tell you why. Every one of our camps is adjacent to small towns and every one of these towns has all kinds of public houses, and it is far better that our men should be able to get their beer under proper restrictions within our lines than that they should go downtown and get it to excess and get drunk in the pubs. Hard liquor is not sold in our canteen; but downtown the men can get all the hard liquor they want. If my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) had taken a battalion over himself, as I think he ought to have done, he would have been able to speak, as I am speaking, from personal touch and personal knowledge, and he would never have made the mistake that he has made to-day of bringing this question before the House. I am sure that no officer who has commanded a battalion in England will corroborate the statements made in the article read by my hon. friend this afternoon. I had very little trouble with my men in England, where there was a wet canteen. Out of 1,100 men I never had more than two or three brought before me in the morning because of their having taken too much beer the night before. Drunkenness on the part of soldiers is a crime that is dealt with severely by the commanding officers. One would almost think, after hearing the hon. member for Rouville, that the Canadian men across the water were a lot of children who are not able to take care of themselves. The men who have crossed the water, I say, to fight our battles are the flower of the young manhood of Canada, well able to take care of themselves, and of the enemy, too. These men do not need to be taught the lesson of restraint; they were taught that in their own Canadian homes and cities before they left. There never was a better behaved army in the world than the Canadian army and it is a slander on our men to bring matters like this before the House and to have it heralded throughout Canada and throughout the world that the Canadian boys are subject to temptations which they cannot resist. Any one who has visited England, whether as civilian or as soldier, knows the temptations that surround the men. Is a soldier any more likely to succumb to these temptations than the average man? Can the Canadian Government check what is going on over there? You might as well ask them to check what is going on in France. When this war is over and our men come back, few or many—God grant that it will be many—those who have taken the position taken to-day by my hon. friend will have to answer to these men. They will not soon forget the insult that has been hurled at them to-day across the floor of this House. I may be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, if I feel keenly on this matter. I had a very deep feeling of regret upon having to part with the men that I took across the water. I would not be here if it were possible for me to be with my men. I am here first on account of my health; next, on account of my age. But the men of my battalion and of hundreds of other battalions who are to-day in the firing line are as well-behaved as any class of citizens in Canada or anywhere else. Instead of casting aspersions on them, we ought to be doing all that we can to make them realize that we appreciate the great sacrifices they are making for their country and for the rest of us who are not performing the duties that we ought to perform.

I regret exceedingly that a gentleman of my hon. friend's parliamentary experience should have been so easily led into the error of bringing a matter like this before the House, upon the authority that he has read to the House. Last December I visited our men who are in the trenches—and a finer body of men I never saw in my life. I was anxious to find out just how the men were treated and just what the conditions were under which they lived. I questioned hundreds of privates as to how they were getting along, whether they were being well taken care of and well fed. I never heard a grouch from any one all the time I was in France except this: when I was going out of the Somme I was approached by four officers, and this remark was made: "Colonel, you are a member of the House of Commons. When you go back, tell the Minister of Militia to give us more rum." Why was this said? I walked along the trenches in the middle of December. During the whole of the twelve days that I was at the front ice was hanging from the trees and the whole country was covered with hoar frost. I never saw the sun; everything was frozen and wet. The men stand in the trenches from evening until almost daylight before they are relieved, sometimes almost perishing with cold, sometimes wet up to the knees. Under these circumstances, I hope that there are no hon. gentlemen in this House who would deny these men the little tot of rum they get to revive them and put life into them. Coming across on the boat I had with me Rev. Mr. Gordon (Ralph Connor), the noted novelist, who is known to every one in Canada. No stronger temperance man has lived in Canada than Ralph Connor; no man has preached the principles of temperance more energetically from pulpit and platform than he. I discussed the liquor question with the reverend gentleman, and he said to me: "Colonel, I would just about as soon take the rifle from a man as take his tot of rum from him in the morning in the trenches." That is a pretty strong assertion to come from a reverend gentleman who is such a stong temperance advocate.

If the hon. gentleman were just as anxious to send recruits across the water to defend the principles that these men are contending for, and for which they are willing to give their lives, as he is to bring forward a matter that reflects upon their honour, stability, and character, it would be a good thing for Canada. I say that it would be better for him to do that than to take the rather unpatriotic stand that he is taking to-day.

With all due respect to my hon. friend, I cannot help but feel that he has not played a very patriotic part in bringing this resolution before the House and in building up a case on information that is absolutely false, and that is nearly three years old according to the Rev. Captain Daw. For what purpose has he done this? For the purpose of trying to make the people of Canada believe that in some way this Government has neglected the interest of the men it has sent overseas. Surely there is no patriotism in an action of that kind. I regret that I have had to say one word on this question; but as one who has been across the water and has seen the conditions as they exist, I wish to give a most emphatic denial to the statement made by the gentleman who wrote that article, or to any gentleman in this House or out of it who states that the Canadian soldiers are drinking to excess in their camps, because that statement is absolutely untrue and unfounded.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I certainly had no intention of taking any part in this debate; but when I ventured to offer a remark to the effect that I did not wish to share altogether the view of my hon. friend he appealed to me direct, and I am glad to give him my answer at once. I cannot see that there was anything wrong in my hon. friend from Rouville bringing this matter up, because every one knows—and no one better than my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury)—that for years back, before the war and since the war, there has been controversy in this House as to whether we should have wet canteens or dry canteens in our military camps. My hon. friend has heard this question discussed from both sides. Men there were—and I think he was one of them at the time—who believed we should have dry canteens and no liquor at all in the camps; men there were who believed there should be liquor in the camps, and when the war broke out the then Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) took the ground that no liquor should be allowed in any camp for Canadian troops whether in Canada or in Great Britain. I have no fault to find with the ground which he took, although I am not of his way of thinking. There are other men who believe that there should be liquor in the camps, and I understood from what he said that General Alderson and the present High Commissioner, de facto, had taken the ground that there should be liquor allowed. If liquor be allowed in any camp, there may be excesses. I shall not be shocked; I shall not be scandalized in that. Human nature is the same everywhere and I am prepared to believe, indeed I know, as every one knows, that the Canadian troops have been well behaved, indeed none better. We know what the Canadian troops have done in the field, and I believe they have done just as well in the camps as in the field. If, however, I am told to-day that there have been a few excesses amongst them, will any one think any less of them for that? Who will cast a stone at them? Not I. But my hon. friend knows that there are two sets of views in this country upon this question. There are men to-day who believe that no liquor should be allowed to the troops; there are others who take a different view. I am not prepared to say one way or the other. There is in this country a growing sentiment in favour of prohibition everywhere. You have legislation introduced into all the provinces to restrict the sale of liquor; you have it in Ontario; you have it in the western provinces; you have at the present time a contest under way on the other side of the river to prevent the sale of liquor in Hull. That is the prevailing sentiment amongst the people of Canada. My hon. friend tells me it would be cruel to the fighting men if they were not given rum while in the trenches. For my part I am prepared to take that view. I do not pose as a temperance man any more than my fellow-man; I do not pose as a prohibitionist; I am not. I do not pose as a teetotaller; I am not, but I claim to be a temperance man all the same. If, however, my hon. friend believes that the men should have their toddy I bow to his belief, but I may say to him that it is a moot question whether or not it is good for the men to have liquor even in the hard conditions under which they live in the trenches. I know that all the lumbermen of Ottawa, when they send their men into the camps, where they have to go through the rigours of winter, to spend months in the open, in the snow, in the wet, in the cold, suffering great hardships, do not allow any liquor in those camps. The opinion prevails amongst the lumbermen of Ottawa that the men are better without any liquor at all; that they are better if they use tea as a stimulant instead of liquor. To-day, however, there are two sets of views upon this question. There are men who believe that no liquor at all ought to be allowed in any camp; there are men who believe the contrary. But when my hon. friend from Rouville brings the attention of the House to the side of the case of those who believe there should be no liquor sold in the camps, and when he gives as a reason for his statements a letter under the signature of an officer, he has committed no wrong and he does no injury to anybody. It is a cheap way, I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) of creating prejudices, to speak as he has just done. The ex-Minister of Militia thought one way, namely, that there should be no liquor in the camps. He has his good points and he has his faults, but every one must give him credit for having the courage of his opinion. He followed that policy. I understand that policy has been reversed. I am not here to criticise; I do not know whether the Government were right or wrong, but right or wrong I did not criticise them. I have, however, to say to my hon. friend that if, in this free Parliament, we are not permitted to debate questions that are discussed in the press that is not my understanding of British freedom.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take more than a moment of the time of the House, because the ground has been already well covered. We have had cited the evidence of eye-witnesses, and, it seems to me, we have to accept such evidence as final. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) on Tuesday of this week asked me across the floor of the House if I would secure information regarding wet or dry canteens in England, and I promised him I would do so. In the latter part of March last I cabled to England asking for information in respect to wet or dry canteens in our camps there, and after my hon. friend spoke to me on Tuesday last I cabled again to England, but I have not yet received a reply. I have every reason to believe that when the report reaches us it will be quite satisfactory to every one in the House. I regret, as others have regretted, that my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has brought this matter up in the way he has done. If he wished to bring the matter up, it would have been better if he had pursued the course taken by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) on Tuesday last. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), it seemed to me, was attempting to create the impression that wet canteens had been restored in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, in England. Am I right or wrong?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In England? I am going to say very little on that point now because the report that is being prepared will show the exact condition of affairs in England.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If I did not make myself understood, I repeat that I have no fault to find at all with the judgment of the militia authorities on this point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The wet canteen has been restored in England.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend from Rouville brought this matter up in the House this afternoon on the evidence of Captain Goforth, and in the first part of his remarks he led the House to believe, as I think my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did also, that wet canteens had been restored in Canada. As has been stated, the dry canteen was introduced into military camps in this country under the regime of my predecessor. The dry canteen is in existence at our camps in Canada at the present time, and it will continue to exist. There is no intention whatever of making a change. I wish to state as emphatically as I can, that we have no intention of restoring a wet canteen in the camps in Canada. Such a thing has never been thought of. Indeed, would it not be ridiculous to reintroduce the wet canteen into Canada, if it ever did exist in this country, and I do not know as to that? But as prohibition has been carried in so many provinces of the Dominion, would it not be ridiculous for us to say that liquor shall be sold at the camps where our soldiers are? Such a thing would be intolerable, and public opinion I am sure would denounce it in no uncertain terms. So far as I am concerned, there is no danger whatever of the wet canteen being introduced in Canada. Prohibition has carried in practically every province except Quebec, and I hope Quebec will soon follow the example set by the other provinces. Soldiers, when they are leaving camp sometimes get a little liquor at the places along the road, but once Quebec follows the example of the other provinces, this will be no longer possible.

My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) referred to Valcartier. I know nothing of the circumstances to which he alluded; I have never heard of any unseemly conduct because of the use of liquor in that camp.

With regard to the Canadian soldier in England, we know that Great Britain is not a prohibition country, and our camps over there are quite close to villages and towns where there are many public houses. With the little information I have on conditions over there, I think I may be permitted to say this: If they have what is called the wet canteen in England, would it not be better so far as our troops are concerned—and I submit this for the earnest consideration of every member of the House—would it not be better to allow light beers to be sold to our troops over there under our supervision, rather than have the soldiers go outside the camps to the public houses in the towns and villages nearby, where they can get hard liquor and stronger drink. I do not propose to go into the merits of the question of prohibition, which has been discussed this afternoon. Every one knows that the regulations of the British Army with regard to drunkenness are very severe. I know of some poor fellows who have been tried by court martial and been punished for being slightly intoxicated.

I want to endorse what the members of the House have said with reference to the splendid conduct of our troops in Great Britain and France. I do not think there has been any drinking to speak of amongst them. I was very glad to hear the hon. member from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) say that the conduct of our troops in England and France was even better than their conduct here in Canada. I need not take up the time of the House any longer. As soon as I receive the report which I have cabled for I shall be very glad to submit it to the House.

Mr. SAMUEL J. DONALDSON (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to have to rise and address the House for the first time on a matter of this kind, but owing to the position I have occupied in military affairs for the last year I feel compelled to say something in defence of the soldier who has gone to the front to defend the lives of the people of Canada and of the Mother Country. I am very sorry that this matter should have been brought up in the House to-day. Last year I took a battalion of 1,496 to Camp Hughes on the 6th of June, and on the 19th of October I landed in the County of Kent, England, in company with another battalion, and I can say positively that such a thing as hard liquor was never sold within my lines. If I had the records of my orderly room here I should be only too glad to show them to hon. gentlemen, to prove that I never had a case of drunkenness before me in practically four months. The fathers and the mothers, and the sisters and the brothers of the boys fighting at the front for the people here at home have enough anxiety reading the casualty lists every morning, without being troubled further by suggestions that our boys in the Old Country are being degraded through the use of liquor. The thing is absolutely ridiculous, and I am surprised that my hon. friend from Rouville should have brought the matter up. This talk about our men being degraded is absolutely false. He talks of more liquor; it is more recruits we want. That would have been a fitting subject for him to speak on, but he should not belittle the men who have gone over to fight for us.

Let me relate a little incident which will show the character of our men over there. A call was made on me for five hundred men to proceed to France within forty-eight hours. In order to provide for casualties I arranged with headquarters for six hundred men, and their last leave was cut down to three days. Now, any one who knows the geography of the Old Country knows that it takes more than three days to get to some parts of Ireland and Scotland. Some of the men, when they got their leave, took a chance and thought they would try to make it and get back. Every one of those men was back on the day their passes were cut, except twenty-five. Had these men been addicted to drink, what would have happened? Why, I should have had to use the hundred that I had allowed for casualties, and probably drawn on my battalion for another hundred. There is no use in beating about the bush in this matter, such a thing as strong drink ruining our young men in England is absolutely out of the question. I took over three sons, two sons-in-law and four nephews. And the mother of my boys was over there and saw what was going on, and she has no fear of leaving her boys over there. And those boys have as good a mother as has any man sitting on the other side of the House. I say it is a crime to bring up in the House a matter like this, with our boys probably dying by hundreds this very day. Get out and get some more men. That is what we want.

I do not know what object the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) has in bringing up this matter in the House. I am sure it is not going to get him very many votes from the temperance people. My experience is that when these people vote they vote party, anyway. But there is one thing sure—the Government should be proud, and the opposition should be proud also, of the class of men Canada has been sending to the front. They cannot be beaten anywhere in the world. If they were addicted to strong drink they would not be playing the part, the important part, that they are playing to-day in this great struggle. I have told you about the men I took over there. Those men went there to fight for their country; they did not go there to drink whiskey. Such a discussion as this is a hardship on the mothers and fathers, the brothers and sisters, of the boys at the front. Reading of it, they will be thinking that their dear ones run the risk not merely of being killed by bullet or shell, but of being ruined by drinking whiskey. I think the hon. gentleman who brought this matter forward will probably make up his mind that it was rather a mistake. My advice to him is, in future when such newspaper articles come to his attention—and this one happens to be three years old—to make inquiries as to the facts. Had the hon. gentleman asked me about the conditions, I would gladly have told him; for I know what I am talking about, I know exactly the conditions. During the four months I was in the Old Country, I saw only two of our men under the influence of liquor, and that was on Christmas Day. The guard-room happened to be right in front of my hut. I heard somebody call, "Guard, turn out!" I went to the window to see what was going on, and these two chaps were coming down, and called the guard to turn out and salute.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): I think that, as one who spent six months in England and a few days in France, I am called upon to say something on behalf of the soldiers. I certainly do not agree with St. Paul and my superior officers, that all things are not expedient. I think that we should discuss things like this in this House as well as elsewhere. I have yet to learn that it is unwise to discuss a matter which so intimately concerns our people. The case of the canteen is a very simple one. You believe in the dry canteen for Canada; those who believe in the wet canteen somewhere else may rise in their places. You cannot believe in both a dry canteen and a wet canteen at one and the same time. But I wish to say this very definitely—the Canadian soldier in England as in Canada is a sober man. Knowing humanity as I do—and I have lived quite a few years now; and I may tell you that I was connected with the 93rd Battalion from its inception and was with it in England until it was dispersed and sent to France —a more sober, orderly, upright, and thoroughly decent lot of men I never saw, even amongst the politicians. We have got to bear in mind that we are not in Heaven. And we have got to bear in mind that God Almighty is not a prohibitionist. But I have seen enough of humanity to lead me to believe that our restrictions must be of the strongest. We must put restrictions upon ourselves. Pray, what man is so confident of himself that he can give rein to himself and go where he likes and do what he likes? And what is true of each of us is true of humanity in the aggregate; we must do everything we can to narrow down and restrict the tendency of humanity to go astray. Therefore, it seems to me, the argument is rather academic than practical. And I cannot repeat too often that having seen a very large number of troops, both Canadians and Imperials, as they call those of Great Britain— and having been at the camps at Otterpool, East Sandling and West Sandling as well as elsewhere, and having heard the reports of others, the Canadian soldier is an upright, sober, decent man, as men go. When we went to France—and I may say for the benefit of those who take an interest in these things, that we paid our own expenses—we made inquiries there also. And it would be a splendid thing if all the members of this House were sent to England and France to investigate conditions. I was advocating that with the Minister of Finance the other day. They could do no greater service to Canada and the Canadian army than to go and look into these matters. It would be a good thing for Canada and a good thing for them.

When we investigated things in France we found that men were being called upon to exert themselves to the utmost not only physically, but nervously; that is, they had to draw upon their nerve power. We found that men, who, before, perhaps, had not been very great men, after they had gone to France, had become really great. They were able to stand the stress and storm, the horror and danger of war. We were right where it was going on. We were amidst the thunders of it and we saw these men bear themselves casually; they were not afraid. Was there drunkenness there? There was not. I have seen no less than one million soldiers since I left this country, and I must confess that I do not think that out of the 500,000 of them whom I saw frequently I beheld five men whom I would call the worse of liquor.

But there are other things that must engage our attention, because much of Canada will be in danger of disease if we do not look to it. There are things that we do not want to talk about, but it is not blinked in Britain, and it will go through this country as it will through the world generally if we do not take some means to counteract it. There were cases by the thousand in the hospitals. Liquor is not in it for one minute with venereal diseases. Statistics show that they are twenty-five times worse than alcohol ever was. We must look these things in the face, because we must protect our country. Ordinary contact, even indirect, in bad cases anybody who is at all acquainted with these matters knows, is almost as serious as the act itself. To shake hands with a person who has syphilis may give a person who is entirely innocent syphilis. That, as Scripture tells us, will go down to even the third and fourth generation. This country is in some danger. We must exert ourselves in every way. Now let me say, with reference to a thing that I do know something about, that is, the liquor question, that the Canadian soldiers are not by any means drunken, but are, indeed, a most sober lot of men. Canada may well be proud of them and the mothers and fathers of this country need not fear if they send their sons to the front that they will be destroyed by license in drink.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to intervene in this debate, but it appears to me that having regard to the conditions at the front to-day, where we are confronted with the greatest events in the history of the world, and having regard to the conditions here when it is desirable that we should rally our man power to the utmost of our ability, it would be unfortunate if the statement brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) should be not only contradicted, but absolutely refuted. No question arises as to the right of the hon. member to bring forward this matter for discussion. It is clearly within the right of this House to discuss a matter of such great importance, but, personally, I would not like to assume the responsibility which he assumes to-day upon the strength of a letter appearing in a financial paper in the city of Toronto. I say that with all respect to my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and believing that he was actuated by the best of intentions. But the effect of the statements which he has brought to the attention of the House is to create an impression, widespread throughout this country, that the evils in the army arising out of the liquor traffic are of a general and widespread character, among our troops at the front. The heading of this article to which my hon. friend has given sanction by bringing it to the attention of the House, and consequently to the attention of the public of Canada, is this:

> Wet Canteen is Ruining Countless Canadian Soldiers.

There are fathers and mothers, sisters and wives in this country who, in pursuance of the highest sense of patriotic duty, are sending forward daily those that are nearest and dearest to them to do battle for their country, for the Empire and for the great cause of humanity for which we are contending. It is desirable that if the statement made in this paper is not correct, is not accurate. is not well-founded, as I believe to be the fact, they should be made aware of it. I feel more inclined to speak because during November last I was in England and visited the front. One can estimate whether a body of men are being injured by drink or any other evil habit by seeing them, by living with them, by talking to them, by witnessing what they do and by knowing what they have done. I crossed on the Mauritania with 3,500 Canadian troops. One regiment was from British Columbia, one was from Glengarry and Stormont, and the third was from Toronto. I desire to say that in all my life —and I have mixed with all classes of people in my life—I have never known a more sober, self-respecting, God-fearing lot of men than those 3,500 whom I addressed in mid-Atlantic in the great dining room of the ship as she was flying before the storm on that trip to England. I can see their faces to-day and I never think of them without being moved by the recollection. When I looked into their faces I saw their mothers' faces. I saw, in their faces, women I have known when I was a boy in the country—for I was raised in the country—and in the villages and towns and cities of Canada—typical Canadians all and, as has been said by a previous speaker, they were absolutely the flower of the youth of Canada. Does any man mean to tell me that these men were addicted to the evils of liquor? Can any man make experienced men in this House believe that? I never saw a cleaner, a more self-respecting, a more God-fearing or a more physically fit lot of men in my life. Let me say another thing. We discuss many matters in this House from day to day, I think without full realization of the time in which we are living. One reason is that we are so far remote from the field of conflict. Three thousand miles of Atlantic separate us from the United Kingdom, and in addition to that this country is thirty-six hundred miles from Halifax to Vancouver; so that all of us are three thousand miles from the United Kingdom and some are four thousand, some are five thousand, and some are six thousand miles. To-day, when we are debating in this House, men are dying by the thousands and tens of thousands in the greatest battle in the history of the world. Do we realize it? I do not mean to say that we should not carry on the business of the country; I am the last man to say that. But do we realize it? None of us can realize it. If we could see what is going on at that front to-day, not in the eye of mind but with our physical eyes, would we not have a better sense of perspective or proportion than we have to-day as to the matters being discussed in this House? Why do I mention this? Because it is pertinent to the argument which I am making. I say that our soldiers who are going to the front are bound to be a self-respecting lot of men. Does any man suppose that these men can face death from day to day without becoming, in a sense they never experienced before, religious? Does anybody think that the voyage across the Atlantic can be undertaken lightly, that men are light-hearted even in the Mauritania? When a man steps on one of these transports filled with Canadian troops, fair game at that time because a ship of war, I tell you that every man on that ship, officers and men, feels intensely that he may be face to face with death. They are a serious-minded lot of men, they are not thinking of drink. And on Sunday, you go into their services and see their faces. I tell you that what makes a man religious is to look face to face with death or great danger. Those men are serious-minded men. I say to this House and to the people of Canada that I never saw a cleaner, a more physically fit, a more self-respecting and sober lot of men than these thirty-five hundred men that I accompanied across on the Mauritania. I take off my hat to those men. I say that I felt, Minister of the Crown as I was, a great sense of my own unworthiness when I considered the sacrifice that these men were making. Those men have given up their occupations, their callings, their hearths, and their homes. They have left their families, their fathers and their mothers, their wives, their sisters; they have gone forward under the inspiration of a great ideal. When in England I went to Witley Camp. I talked with General Meighen there and with all the other officers. I visited the hospitals. I mingled with the men; I talked to the men. I think I have a fair estimation of the character of men and their quality. From my experience I say the same thing with regard to the men at Witley Camp as I say of the men on the Mauritania—clean men, physically fit men, self-respecting men, officers imbued with the highest sense of their duty to the men—those are the men that I saw there and I came away with precisely the same feeling: all is well at the camps, all is well with our men, all is well with our officers, well fed, well looked after, camp well regulated, discipline good. All that I saw with my own eyes. I was in England and I saw many officers and men there. I never saw a drunken man from the time I left this country until I returned. I never saw a soldier under the influence of liquor in England or on the Continent.

Let me tell this House another thing, and I regard it as absolutely conclusive as to the physical condition of our men at the front. There is no man of higher standing in Montreal in the medical profession than Dr. Elder; the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will agree to that. He is a surgeon of the highest standing. He was in charge of the McGill Hospital unit at Boulonge. That is one of the best hospital units in the world, a great credit to the great university that established it. Dr. Elder told me that up to that time thirty-five thousand men had passed through that hospital, had been treated in that hospital and sent across to Folkestone and to the other hospitals in England. He said that less than one-half of one per cent had been the rate of mortality among the thirty-five thousand men. I said: how do you account for it? Why, he said, it is very simple: the men are in the pink of condition. In civil life, he said, we operate and the operation is perfectly done, but some other conditions set up due to the age of the man or to disease of the kidneys or of the heart or of the liver; some complications set in and the patient dies notwithstanding that a perfect operation has been performed. That is well known to all medical men. But, he said, these men are precisely as if they were trained for the operating table. He told me some marvellous cases of operations. Why, he said, in civil life we would not think of such a thing, we would amputate the leg or the arm; but these men are in such perfect condition that they recover without amputation, septicemia does not set in. Does any man mean to tell me that of these thirty-five thousand men, the pick, from the physical standpoint, of all the men he had ever seen in his long experience—does any man mean to tell me that those men are suffering from addiction to drink? I went to the front and I saw those men behind the Canadian line at Vimy Ridge. I saw Vimy Ridge. The Canadians were in front of Vimy Ridge. And I want to tell this House that I said to General Byng: I do not see how you are ever going to take that ridge. He said: We will take that Ridge, the Canadians will take that ridge. Before us lay a plain where the year before 180,000 French and 180,000 Germans had lost their lives or fallen in battle for Vimy Ridge. There, before Vimy Ridge, were three brigades of Canadians, the other brigade being on the Somme. I saw the life of these men. When they go into the trenches they sometimes stand in six inches or a foot of water and frequently they sleep leaning forward against the parapet. When they come back they go into hutments, not the warm camps of the lumber district referred to by my right hon. friend, but hutments, temporary structures, heated with oil stoves. You would see those men come in cased with mud, standing around the stoves. Talk about cold weather! We think this country is cold, but I give you my word that no one in this country knows what cold is until he has been in England or on the continent in November and December. The temperature is not so low; it is the dampness. I motored for three hours from Boulogne to a point behind the Canadian lines. I had on an ordinary heavy winter overcoat and a fur coat over that, and we were covered with rugs, but we were chilled to the bone when we reached our destination. The men were working under these conditions. When they came out of the trenches they changed their clothes and had a bath. They were well fed. I said to General Byng: "Have you any message for the people of Canada with regard to the Canadians? He said: "They are sound clean through; you may tell that to the people of Canada." General Byng is one of the best soldiers in the world; he is the man who had charge of the evacuation of Suvla Ray. He is proud of his Canadians and they are proud of him. Since I was there last fall these Canadians have achieved one of the most notable victories of the world at that same Vimy Ridge.

Now, let us see what this all amounts to. Here is a letter, written it is said, three years ago—I do not know whether it was or not—appearing in a financial journal in the city of Toronto; and on the strength of that, if the statement of my hon. friend had not been met and, I believe, refuted—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend know the editor?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not, but whether I knew the editor or not I should have hesitated, if I had been in the position of my hon. friend, to give currency on the wings of the press to a statement as sweeping as that, upon the strength of a letter stated here to be three years old. I believe that if this statement had not been met in the way it has been met in this House, it would have done great damage to recruiting and would have been properly and justly resented by all the soldiers across the seas.

I apologize to the House if I appear to have been speaking feelingly. I do not challenge for one moment the right of the hon. member for Rouville to bring this matter up. I am glad, in one way, that it has come up, because I believe that the statements made here to-day will go far to reassure the people with regard to the facts. In one way it is unfortunate, regrettable; because even the bringing of it up is bound to do some harm at a time like this, when the minds of men and women are tortured with anxiety as to their loved ones overseas. I say that any statement of a sweeping character with regard to the soldiers overseas being addicted to strong drink is a slander upon them, and I believe that they will resent it, not only on their own accord, but because of the anxiety it will create in the minds of those they have left behind. Their fathers, their mothers and wives here are torn with anxiety about them, and they in turn are torn with anxiety about their wives and mothers and sisters at home. Will it make them any more comfortable at the front; will it make it any easier for them to perform the duties which they are performing there, to know that the impression is being created in this country among those they left behind that they are being demoralized by drink in England and at the front? Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely untrue.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Some days ago I asked the Minister of Militia to give to this House some information with regard to the operation of the canteens in the camps in England. I asked that question for the purpose of getting an authoritative statement as to the conditions that existed there, and I assume that the minister will give me the information when he receives it. I did this in consequence of information that I had received as to the bad effects of the operation in certain camps in England of what is known in Canada as the wet canteen. I had intended, when this information should have been forthcoming, to direct the attention of the House to the subject; I was not aware that the hon. member for Rouville had intended to deal with it. I want to say to the Minister of Finance that the member for Rouville was properly within his rights and privileges as a member of this House in directing the attention of Parliament to this question, and in what he said he was stating what is manifestly correct. My questioning on the subject and my hon. friend's discussion of it to-day were prompted solely by one desire, and that an honest and true one. Hon. gentlemen opposite, with assumed indignation, undertook to say that this gentleman, whose boy is going to the front, and all the rest of us who have boys at the front, have no right to discuss the manner in which the welfare of the men overseas is being had in regard by those who are responsible. One can make eloquent speeches in eulogy of the splendid deeds of the boys who have gone, but that is not necessary. There are those who hold in their hearts and minds thoughts which are far more eloquent than any uttered words in regard to the great mission of the men who have gone forth to fight. But it is not correct to say that we who are here at home have no right to assume that any question raised in the public press as to the welfare of those who have gone to the front is not a proper subject for consideration and deliberation by this Parliament.

Only one question is involved in this discussion. The Financial Post, a responsible paper published in the city of Toronto, in its issue of April 21, only five days ago, published the statement to which the member for Rouville has directed attention. I assume that every hon. member in this House received that paper. I did so, and I saw that other hon. gentlemen received it. To say that we must not discuss matters which are mentioned in the press for fear of hurting recruiting is to assume that we in this Parliament, the boys who have gone and those who have been left behind are a lot of children who cannot look the facts in the face.

Who first during this session brought before the House the question of a wet canteen? The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, who discussed freely and frankly here in Parliament, on the 6th of February, the question of the wet canteen, and I hope that no one will feel that my hon. friend from Rouville had in his mind when he brought up this question any desire except the one which I am sure animates him, of endeavouring to obtain that which is best for those who are fighting for us, because no political advantage can be secured from such clap-trap as the statement that such a matter as this cannot be discussed here without slandering our boys at the front. Either a wet canteen in England is good for our boys, or it is not. That is the only issue. We are well aware that the ex-Minister of Militia inaugurated the dry canteen in Canada, and that during his regime as Minister of Militia there was a dry canteen in all the camps in Canada, and he himself told us in Parliament on the 6th of February that when he was in control as Minister of Militia he insisted on a dry canteen being in existence in Great Britain. He tells us that the reason that that dry canteen was changed into a wet canteen was because General Alderson, according to the ex-minister's statement, made a change under these conditions:

> General Alderson told the men with a great hurrah and bravado in the only speech he ever made except when he read to them a little book which he once published about how not to do things. He told them he was going to make them free men, and as a slap at the Minister of Militia in Canada, he said he was going to give them a wet canteen.

That is the way the wet canteen came into existence in the Canadian camps in England, and the ex-Minister of Militia said to-day, in dealing with this question, that this canteen was carried on by contractors who had contracts with the British Government and not with the Canadian military authorities, though these camps are under Canadian control. The result is that to-day and for some time past there has been a wet canteen in the Canadian camps in England, and the Financial Post, a responsible newspaper, five days ago asserted that the existence of the wet canteen was a serious menace to our boys overseas. Is that not a subject to be discussed in this House of Commons? Does any hon. gentleman want to take the position that in this free Parliament we cannot consider and deliberate as to whether or not a wet canteen is the proper thing to have on the other side in the interest of the boys who have gone overseas? Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that because you mention this matter you are slandering the boys. My hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Lewis) and my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) lamented, almost with tears in their eyes, that this question had been brought up, and that it was a slander on the boys at the front.

Mr. BRADBURY: It is a slander.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend who speaks about its being a slander does not know what he is saying. No one wants to slander any boy who has gone overseas to fight. My hon. friend's assumed indignation, his deliberate misunderstanding of this question simply show that he is looking for a little notoriety, desiring to tell a story of his own doings and taking the opportunity of this discussion to do so. When he undertakes to lecture the hon. member for Rouville about his not raising a regiment I may tell him that my hon. friend's son is going to the front and going to France to fight, which is more than this hon. gentleman has done.

Mr. BRADBURY: The hon. gentleman has not much of a story to tell the House about what he has done for his country.

Mr. MACDONALD: My only son of military age, if he is not in France at this moment, will be there in a week to fight, and he will stay there. Although on this side of this House we are not as strong numerically as hon. members on the other side, we have more sons and brothers and friends at the front than have hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend has been travelling around so long at the country's expense, garbed in an officer's uniform that he does not know certain things that have been going on in Canada. I resent the suggestion that, when any man in this free Parliament brings a question up for discussion, in the fair mood in which my hon. friend from Rouville has brought it up, not with any idea of creating any hostility or of arousing any feelings the hon. member who does so is said to be attacking the boys at the front. Every hon. gentleman with cool blood knew that there was no such idea in the mind of the hon. member for Rouville. My reason for speaking on this subject is because I know that the attempt will be made to circulate throughout this country the impression I have stated because my hon. friend happens to be a French-Canadian from the province of Quebec. In this war and in the part that we in this Parliament and the people of Canada are going to play in it, if with our hearts sore on behalf of those who have gone out to fight for us, we cannot here as representatives of the people sit down and consider what is best for the welfare of those boys without being told, when a discussion is commenced, as the hon. member for Rouville has commenced this one to-day, that we are slandering the boys, I say that such talk is worthy only of children and not of free men in this Parliament. What is the sole and only issue here? It is whether a wet canteen or a dry canteen in England is in the interest of the boys.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the whole question.

Mr. MACDONALD: The ex-Minister of Militia says that a wet canteen is not in the interest of the boys. He tells us that the wet canteen was established by General Alderson—to use the minister's own words—as a direct insult upon himself personally. Is that true? If that statement of the ex-minister's is true, what do these other gentlemen who have been discussing this question to-day say? Nobody is attacking the soldiers. The Financial Post does not attack them; it suggests that wet canteens should be done away with because they are an injury to our boys. If they are an injury to the boys, then we want to know it, and I do not care what military exploits hon. gentlemen on the other side may have performed themselves, I want to know, and every father and mother in this country wants to know, whether a wet canteen is likely to contribute to the detriment or to the advancement of the boys who are overseas. For myself I purpose waiting for the information which the Minister of Militia has intimated he will bring down upon this question as to the number of these canteens, as to the regimental reports, and as to the men that have been brought before their commanding officers to be dealt with in regard to offences relating to this matter. The motion of my hon. friend is simply a motion of adjournment in order that the attention of the House may be called to this matter. If hon. members will look at the papers of yesterday they will find a despatch telling how Sir Hamar Greenwood deals with this question to which my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) has referred—incidentally to discussing this question of the canteen. Sir Hamar Greenwood dealt with it in the frankest possible way, pointing out the regrettable number of our Canadian boys who were in the hospitals. If, over in Great Britain, Sir Hamar Greenwood can discuss, in the interest, as he alleges, of the Canadian people, this question and how best to deal with it, can it be said that in this Parliament we cannot discuss this question of a wet canteen or a dry canteen, like gentlemen and like men, knowing the seriousness of the issue at this time, with a full knowledge of the questions that are being fought out across the ocean, with all the fateful influence that they will bring to Canada and to those who will come after us? If we in this House cannot discuss this question and find out what is best for our sons who are overseas, then I say that we occupy a very peculiar position. That is what my hon. friend from Rouville, with the best intentions and in a very proper spirit, sought to do, and I submit that he had the right to bring this matter before the attention of Parliament.

Mr. JOHN STANFIELD (Colchester): I shall occupy the time of the House for only a few minutes. I want to say this for the boys from Nova Scotia. At Aldershot camp, (Nova Scotia) they behaved splendidly. On the boat going over, there were 5,988 troops; four battalions from Nova Scotia, one from Toronto, and one from Prince Albert commanded by my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Donaldson). Captain Hayes told me that he had never had better-behaved men on his boat. The officers commanding the battalions had no trouble at all with the men. The four battalions went to Witley Camp, where a wet canteen was operated by the Imperial authorities. Personally, I think that when a man is in training he should do without strong drink, but of course when our soldiers get over to the other side, they come under British control. To prove how well the boys from Nova Scotia behaved at Witley Camp, when they were given fifty-fifty leave, that is, half of them going for six days' leave and then the other half, there were only seven absentees out of 4,000 men when the leave was up. The Provost-Marshal of London complimented the Highland Brigade from Nova Scotia on their splendid conduct while in the city. Owing to a severe operation I had met with, the medical officers considered that it would be unwise for me to go to France, even on a tour to see what was going on. I should have liked to go, but I took their advice and came home, so I cannot speak of conditions at the front. But I can say this for the boys from Nova Scotia and other parts of Canada in training at Witley Camp, that I never saw a drunken man the whole time I was there.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): I think one of the most extraordinary propositions that I have ever heard has been laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon. It was very proper that this question, which concerns the welfare of our troops in England, should be brought up by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and he has brought it before the House in a very fair and equitable manner. It is to Parliament that these matters must in the last analysis come, and it was only right that my hon. friend should direct the attention of Parliament to the condition of affairs which the correspondent of a reputable newspaper describes as existing in Canadian camps in England. No sooner had my hon. friend sat down than one hon. gentleman opposite got up and said that even if the allegations were true, the subject was one that ought never to have been discussed on the floor of the House. That was a most remarkable thing to say. When it is alleged that a grievance exists, and that grievance is brought to the attention of Parliament and substantiated by an hon. member of this House, all hon. gentlemen opposite can do is to fall back on the old time-worn argument that it will hurt recruiting. The truth is, recruiting is not hurt by criticism, the object of which is to secure better health and better conditions for our troops. Recruiting cannot be hurt by criticism of that kind. But this Government, which has been so utterly lacking in giving a lead to recruiting, the moment criticism is made falls back on the old argument: Do not criticise, it will hurt recruiting. The whole question in a nut shell is this: Is the dry or the wet canteen the better for our men?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the whole question.

Mr. PARDEE: We had a long peroration from the Minister of Finance describing his trip abroad and his utterances there, but what I should have liked to hear from him as leader of the House, is a declaration as to whether the Government is in favour of a dry or a wet canteen. If the wet canteen was not a good thing in Canada, is it any better for being in England? If it is not a good thing, and I am not expressing an opinion one way or the other, let the Government consider the representations that have been made here this afternoon, with a view to finding out what will be in the best interests of the troops. But for hon. gentlemen opposite to impute disloyalty to us, and hint that we are trying to hurt recruiting, when we are simply making an honest criticism of conditions in England and at the front, is to my mind carrying an absurdity altogether too far, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it.

In conclusion, I would just like to say this: I think the people of this country will think it a very strange thing for the Government, from the Minister of Finance down, to deprecate criticism of conditions which vitally affect the welfare of our troops at the front, saying that even if the allegations are true we have no right to discuss them because, forsooth, the discussion will hurt recruiting. If the time has come when the Government is not prepared to face the facts as they are, and endeavour in their wisdom to right them, then the sooner the Government and this whole House of Commons gets out and lets another set of men in, the better for the whole country. Somebody may say: "You are finding fault because the men get a tot of rum." The hon. member for Rouville never hinted at such a thing. He brought the conditions to the attention of Parliament in order that they may be righted. Let the Government drop once for all this silly cry of hurting recruiting, and be men enough to say whether these allegations are true or false.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): I am sure the people of the country will realize that hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to make political capital out of this discussion. Any man who listened to the speech of my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) could reach no other conclusion. He was eager to discuss every other branch of military affairs but the matter now before the House. He charges the Government with lack of leadership in recruiting. I should like to know what that has to do with the question before the House, and whether a charge of that kind is not intended to injure the Government. My hon. friend seems to forget that he belongs to a party which promised to give the Government whole hearted support during this war until victory was won. For my part I do not think the Government can be charged with maintaining a wet canteen. I do not wish to discuss this matter politically, but the party of hon. gentlemen opposite was in power for fifteen years, and, as their right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated——

Mr. PARDEE: Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) dispute the word of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) when he says that General Alderson, through Sir George Perley, established the wet canteen?

Mr. BLAIN: I do not propose to discuss that part of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend is ambitious to make this a broader discussion than you, Mr. Speaker, I am sure, would allow under this resolution. I was saying: The party of the hon. gentlemen opposite was in power for fifteen years, and this question of the wet or dry canteen was under discussion for all that time. Yet they took no action, and it was left to the Liberal-Conservative party, represented by the Government now in power, to introduce and enforce the dry canteen in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Dry here, wet there.

Mr. BLAIN: This matter was discussed in this House a session or two ago, since the war broke out. It was then stated, without contradiction, that the canteen within the borders of Canada was under the control of the Canadian Government, but that when our troops went overseas they were under the control of the British authorities.

Mr. MACDONALD: With the permission of the hon. gentleman, I desire to say that I plainly asked the Prime Minister in February last who was in control of these camps in England, and he stated that the Canadian authorities were in control through the Canadian Overseas Minister of Militia.

Mr. BLAIN: The hon. gentleman must remember that the resolution presented by the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is in favour of the discussion of a definite matter of urgent importance as > Evils alleged to exist among our soldiers overseas arising out of the liquor traffic in camps and military centres.

It does not say anything about either the wet or the dry canteen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLAIN: But the discussion has been broadened—I think with a view to injuring the Government—it involves consideration of the question whether or not the centres of population near the camps in the Old Country should or should not have the open bar. I repeat that the Canadian people will realize that this Government is not open to censure at least from the Opposition on this subject. Except for what we have heard from the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) we have not had any expression of opinion on the main point from any hon. gentleman opposite, not even from the leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This subject was discussed for twenty years in this country, including all the time he was in power, and so far as we can judge from any utterance of his he does not know yet whether he is in favour of the dry or of the wet canteen. We need not look for any guidance in this matter from the right hon. gentleman, I am sure of that. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), now so zealous for the welfare of the soldiers, and my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) have spoken, yet neither has ventured to express himself on one side or on the other. Their ambition, I think, is to do injury to the Government. I say that in kindness, but I have listened to the discussion carefully, and I cannot see how any good can come out of it. This country, as well as Britain, has been at war for nearly three years. Hundreds of thousands of our soldiers have been sent overseas. Thousands of letters have come to friends in Canada from those men. In the county of Peel, which I have the honour to represent, the number recruited runs into hundreds. Their friends have received many letters from them, and these letters appear week after week in the local newspapers. And the same is true of many other places. But I have yet to read one line from a soldier at the front making any complaint against the regulations in force in Great Britain or France with respect to the liquor traffic. If there was any complaint to be made surely we should have heard about it from some of our own men. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I would ask even the right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself, if any of them has in his possession, or has ever seen, a letter from a Canadian soldier across the water making any charge against the Government in relation to this matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BLAIN: I myself am asking a question and trying to get an answer from some hon. gentleman on that side. I would put the question to my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley). Has he in his possession, or has he ever seen during the last three years while we have been at war, any letter from a Canadian soldier in England or in France making a charge against the Government with respect to the wet canteen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That gives me the opportunity to ask the question I wanted to ask the hon. gentleman. I understand that no soldier at the front is allowed to send any letter making complaint in regard to such a matter. I am told, further, that at the time of the most serious difficulty in regard to the use of the Ross rifle our Canadian soldiers were informed that any soldier who made a complaint would be court martialed.

Mr. BLAIN: That looks rather political also. But would the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer the question I put? He knows that many questions have been written about by the soldiers, especially while they were in England before going to the front. Does he know of any letter from any of our soldiers making a complaint such as the hon. member for Rouville has made in this House to-day?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman refer to a complaint specifically against the opportunity afforded to obtain strong drink? If so, I have not received any such letter of complaint against that privilege being given.

Mr. BLAIN: Hundreds of our soldiers have been discharged and have returned to their homes in all parts of Canada. Some of these men have addressed public meetings. But I have yet to hear of one complaint being voiced by these men, either on the public platform or in the press, or in any other way, such as my hon. friend has made this afternoon. Therefore, I have the right to say that, so far as the Government is concerned they have no complaint. I would venture to remark that if my hon. friend from Rouville had been particularly anxious about the welfare of the soldiers at the front, my hon. friend could have gone to the Minister of Militia privately and asked him the question. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) instead of putting his question on the Order Paper could have done that also. As everybody knows, we are passing through very critical times now and statements of this kind going broadcast through the country, while we are trying to urge our people to go to the front to fight this tremendous battle, may have a most undesirable effect. Therefore, hon. gentlemen on both sides should be careful what matters they bring up for discussion. I am sure that my hon. friend from Rouville on reflection, will agree after this discussion is over, that he could have obtained that information from the Minister of Militia without bringing it up on the floor of the House especially when he has so little to substantiate the statements which he has made.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the newspaper called the Financial Post, which was the subject of a good deal of discussion this afternoon. On the front page of this newspaper I notice a conspicuous headline which says:

"Evils in the army arising out of the liquor traffic. Millions lost to Canada. Wet canteen is ruining countless Canadian soldiers. Vice rampant as result of liquor obtainable in the army. How this affects Canada in dollars and cents, adding to our heavy burden of debt."

No doubt it was the conspicuous, glaring headline that caught the eye of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and led him to read the lengthy and striking article of which that is the heading. As an hon. gentleman who is interested in the affairs of this country and of the Canadian army and of the Empire, and anxious for their welfare in every phase and ramification, he was no doubt led to inquire as to the truth or falsity of this article. It is not long since an article appeared in a newspaper no more conspicuous, and not regarded as any greater authority than the Post, having something to do with a criticism in connection with the Ross rifle. That paper was taken up by one of the ministers of the Crown and made the subject of comment in this House; that minister even went so far as to intimate that any person who would give publicity to such language should be shot. The article in the Post to which reference has been made appeared on the 21st of the month. To-day is the 26th so there has been ample opportunity for ministers to notice this article and reply to or refute it; but nothing of the kind was done. The hon. member for Rouville refrained for five days from making any comments on this article, I suppose expecting a satisfactory reply to it to be made by some one on behalf of the Government, an explanation that would be satisfactory to the people of this country, particularly to those who have sons in the army or expecting to go overseas. Nothing had been said and so it was quite proper for an hon. gentleman of the prominence and responsibility of the hon. member for Rouville to bring this matter up in the House, and make some inquiries about it. I do not think it was at all necessary for the hon. gentlemen opposite to fly into such a passion as they did on account of this inquiry. All that was necessary was for the Minister of Militia to say that the article was not true, and to give such explanation as would be fitting from the parliamentary head of the military service of Canada. But I am sorry to say that occasion has been taken by the forelock and by some of our safety-first colonels in this House to spread themselves and to give the country to understand that they had special and first-hand knowledge about this thing. We never heard of them very much before and I do not blame them for taking this opportunity of making it known to the people that they did don the khaki and did go across the Atlantic, otherwise we would perhaps never have heard about them. There was no occasion to fly into a passion as they did in giving this explanation. One hon. gentleman, who sits on that side of the House and who donned the khaki and who went across the ocean just as well as the colonels who have spoken so strongly to-day, gave much more damaging information in respect to what is afflicting our young men on the other side of the water than the mere inquiry which was instituted by the hon. member for Rouville. I am sure that if any one should be subject to criticism, if any one is deserving of condemnation for making statements in connection with the evils into which our young men fall in connection with the army, it is this gentleman on the other side who is just as well informed, I presume, as any of those who have spoken to-day. He has given most startling information. But they say nothing about him, he is all right. But any hon. gentleman from this side of the House who says anything at all about any matter calling for criticism is made the subject of attack. We in this Parliament profess to be proud to follow the practices of the Mother of Parliaments in the great mother country, and if we do so in parliamentary matters I do not think we shall go far astray. What has been the course of criticism in the Mother of Parliaments since war broke out. It will not be denied that at the outbreak of the war they had in England as strong a Government as they ever had in that country. It was led by as able a man as ever occupied the high position of First Minister in Great Britain. What has happened? Criticism has practically driven that Government out of power and has forced that premier to give up the full power which he enjoyed and to enter into an alliance with the Opposition and to form a compromise coalition Government. This great leader in England was obliged to vacate his high position at the head of the Government and the country and give way to another man. We would be safe in following the high example of the Mother of Parliaments. Therefore I submit that no man has the right to come here and censure us for any action we may take in bringing matters before the House in a public way if it be found necessary to do so. When did the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) become so opposed to publicity? He used to be a strong man on publicity. He used to be much in favour of seeing things brought to the full blaze of the light of public opinion, so far at least as the public press and Parliament could do so. I remember well, as I was here some years before that hon. member came to this House, when he published in a newspaper of his own party, possibly his own organ in the province of Manitoba, a full report of a speech that he never delivered in this House; and, what is even more extraordinary, he also published in the same newspaper the reply that Mr. Oliver made to it—which was never delivered in the House either. These were the old-time practices of my hon. friend. I am surprised that he should now turn his hose on publicity with such force and disapprove so severely of the course taken by the hon. member for Rouville in bringing this matter to the notice of the House. If the speech of the member for Rouville is published in the newspapers it will be very different from the publicity of the hon. member for Selkirk, for it will be a speech which was actually delivered in this House. My hon. friend used to be perfectly satisfied with speeches which he himself wrote down and sent to the press. He also took the extraordinary course of making and publishing the other fellow's speech as well.

Mr. GRAHAM: Bilingualism.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend says, bilingualism. It was duplicity of a kind that I cannot fathom. We were told by hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly by that preacher of righteousness, the Minister of Finance, that it was scandalous, shameful, preposterous, cowardly; it was had in all the adjectives that Webster, Worcester, or Walker could produce, that this matter should be brought to the attention of the House. This is a new gospel. We are told that we scandalize people if we point out their sins; if we indicate the way that they should follow; if we suggest that no matter how excellent they may be, they may get into difficulties. If we do these things, we are an anathema in the view of hon. gentlemen supporting the Government. The preacher who stands in the pulpit and advises the ungodly man to forsake his ways and to return unto the Lord, is, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, insulting and scandalizing his people. He is accusing them of being traitors and cowards if he points out to them the way in which they ought to go and urges them to avoid every appearance of evil. According to the doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite, preachers must now be informed that they should no longer advise their people to seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and that then all other things shall be added unto them. If they preach any such gospel, our friends on the other side, led by the Minister of Finance, will say that they are cowards and that they are insulting the intelligence of the people. The truth will always bear the light, and we should always bring forward such things as are conducive to enlightenment and to the best interests of the people. In the mother country there was not one iota of restraint upon the members of Parliament; they always pointed out what they thought was wrong and directed the Government into the path of duty. Neither Parliament nor press hesitated to discuss these things. I submit, therefore, that it was altogether unnecessary for hon. gentlemen opposite to fly into a passion because, forsooth, the member for Rouville took notice of this newspaper article and brought it to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite who have responsibilities in that connection. Hon. gentlemen cannot escape responsibility for the wet canteen, if it is a bad thing. It is of no use to say that the 3,000 miles of the Atlantic deprive us of jurisdiction over those whom we send across the water. We have jurisdiction over there in the person of a minister of the Crown representing this Government, who has full sway over military men while they are in our own camps. If it is a good thing that we should have a dry canteen in Canada—and I am in favour of it—why should we not have a dry canteen on the other side? The Government and the Militia Department who have full control and management of the camps while our units are there cannot take shelter under the fact that some colonel over there took the responsibility of breaking away from the rules and of making a new departure. A strong Government would not have permitted this, and I am sorry to say that we have not a Government that is strong enough to go up against even a single-handed colonel, bring him to task and show him that we in Canada know what is good for our men. If it was good for our men to have a dry canteen in Canada, it is good for them to have it on the other side of the Atlantic. If our boys have been injured in any way by the wet canteen, if there is any truth in the article which has been read, the responsibility is brought home to the Government, and they cannot get away from it by endeavouring to switch it onto somebody else. If they do not exercise their authority to deal with this matter the people will hold them responsible. The member for Rouville would be responsible if he had not brought this matter to the notice of the Government. It is for us to appeal to the Government and to ask them to do what their majority in this House enables them to do. If they fail in their duty we shall, like Paul of old, appeal to Cæsar, and to Cæsar we shall go, and the people of this country will see to it that there is in power a government which will look after the virtue and honour of the young men of Canada. We would be false to our trust and to our duty if we had not in proper manner brought the subject matter of this article to the attention of the Government.

We were challenged to show that there were any bad effects from the wet canteen. The hon. member for Selkirk put forth a very lame argument, the defects in which can be very easily demonstrated by a domestic illustration. Suppose a good wife should say: "My husband is a drunkard, and I bring liquor home to him because I prefer that he drink in his own house rather than get drunk down town." That, you say, would be poor temperance and poor preaching; yet that is in substance the argument put forward by the member for Selkirk. He said: "I was bringing liquor to them; I was enabling them to have some sort of liquor. If they wanted to get drunk it was better for them to get it within the lines than to go outside for it." I think the proper procedure is to make the obtaining of liquor as difficult as possible for the young men of Canada. If ale, porter and such drinks are obtainable within the lines these are merely kindling-wood to the appetites of the young men. They will get the hard liquor if it is to be got at all, whereas if their appetites had not been kindled in this way they would no doubt have had the strength and will and purpose to keep clear of it altogether. The Government should take no credit for a dry canteen in Canada unless they apply the principle across the water, where so many of our young men are to-day. This is the place of authority; this is the place where laws are made; this is the Parliament which has control over our military matters. If there is anything to be rectified this is the place to do it. This is the place where the people congregate; we are here representing the whole of Canada; the congregations of the people are here; the power rests in this House, and you, Sir, being the spokesman between us and the King, are supposed to carry our complaints to the foot of the Throne. We have no other place to which to go, and if we are going to be shut off from this avenue of publicity and bringing to light that which is wrong, and to be deprived of the power to rectify that which is wrong, and of doing for our young men either at home or abroad all that is necessary to be done and all that this Parliament can do, we are taking a backward step; we are putting back the hands of the clock and going to the old days when two or three plutocrats in this country and other countries ruled the roost, and the poor people had nothing to say either through their representatives or otherwise. The hon. member for Rouville was perfectly justified in bringing this matter before the House, and in the mild manner in which he framed the resolution and the mild and characteristic manner in which he spoke on it, there was no justification whatever for the outburst of hon. gentlemen who took occasion to tell the world their vast knowledge in connection with those things, and as I have said before, to tell us all that they, forsooth, had to cross the Atlantic. When I was listening this afternoon to those speeches from those distinguished military men, telling us so often what they did on the other side, my mind reverted to the old school boy story of the boy who was making a picture of a horse on his slate on his desk in the school, and when he was through he had to write under the picture "This is a horse" or nobody in the world would have supposed it was a horse. Such is the case of those "safety-first" heroes. Nobody would have thought they had been anywhere within the smell of powder except for the opportunity my hon. friend from Rouville gave them to-day of spreading themselves before the House and getting that glory for which they so eagerly sought.

I could not say less in view of the onslaught made not only upon the hon. member for Rouville but on the principle upon which he was acting and upon the rule which he invoked in bringing this matter to the notice of the people through the instrumentality of you, Sir, and this Parliament. I fully approve the course which he has taken, and if there be any truth in the statements that we have heard, these matters should be looked into and put right. We were challenged by some hon. members to produce any evidence of ill-effects of wet canteens. I have the evidence of an officer belonging to my province who was in training camps in Nova Scotia and in training camps in England. In Nova Scotia he was in a training camp with a dry canteen; in England he was in a training camp with a wet canteen, and he had the same boys under him in both places. In Nova Scotia, they used to go out on long marches fully accoutred, the same as they were marching to the front, and nobody fell by the wayside, every one being capable of completing the march and returning to camp in first-class condition. The same boys went across to the Old Country under the same officers, and when they went on long marches there, travelling perhaps over easier roads than they were accustomed to travel over in Nova Scotia, dozens of them fell by the wayside because they could not complete the march which they could do with ease in this country, for the simple reason that they were indulging freely in this miserable beer. If I had no other reason for saying that a wet canteen is a drawback to the young man who indulges in it, I should certainly insist that no person is better at any time than when he is in his own senses, with the machinery of his brain, body, muscles, brawn and everything that makes up the man in the normal condition. That is the proper condition for a man to be in, not stimulated with false courage and strength by drinking miserable beer that he may be used to take under the circumstances of the wet canteen. I do not care whether you call it "wet canteen" or anything else, I say that the boys should not be drinking alcohol; they should be getting plenty of healthful food, a good place to sleep in, good clothing and all the suitable circumstances that they can get. Then they will be able to fight every time, and they will not require any stimulant. The Scotchman of Nova Scotia, of Ontario, the Irishman or Frenchman of Canada do not need alcohol to stimulate them to fight; they will fight without it in the future as they have done in the past. Let us strike out of their path any miserable obstacle that will lessen their courage, their virtue and their standing as men worthy of the Canadian soil.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has introduced here to-day a discussion that can serve no useful purpose, and I feel satisfied, when the news goes abroad throughout Canada to-morrow, as it undoubtedly will, that notwithstanding the time of stress in which we are living, when minutes mean so much, the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada has devoted a whole day to the discussion of a subject on the strength of an article of doubtful quality that appears in a newspaper, many of the friends of the youths who are to-day fighting the battles of the Empire will suffer untold anxieties and alarm with regard to those who are near and dear to them. We have listened to the speech of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who has not advanced any arguments to sustain the newspaper article which has been read here this afternoon, but who has endeavoured to justify the attitude of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who have spoken on this question. We heard from the lips of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) the statement that the whole question was whether there should be a dry canteen or a wet canteen, and that we were justified in discussing that question. Yet, the leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman who has moved the motion and those who have supported him, have taken no stand in regard to what the hon. member for West Lambton has said, that the question before the House is whether there should be a dry canteen or a wet canteen; they do not commit themselves either one way or the other upon that question. I must, therefore, ask myself what object they have in view in introducing this question into this House at this particular time? We are living in one of the most critical, most strenuous ages that have ever confronted the people of this world, when the people of the British Empire are bending every sinew, exerting every energy to win in the greatest conflict that has ever engaged the attention of man. We have sent overseas many thousands of the flower of the manhood of Canada—we have not sent them; they have gone voluntarily. Hon. members will remember that a large proportion of the First Contingent consisted of men who were born and who grew up in the old land, men who had been in this country for only a few years. Yet hon. gentlemen in this House insult the Government of the British Empire, the Government that are endeavouring, aye, that have made good progress, towards winning this war for civilization, for liberty and for mankind. They are the people that you are condemning by your action to-day.

It is not the Government of Canada but the Government of the British Empire that you are condemning, and as I said before this discussion cannot possibly serve any useful purpose; indeed, I believe it will do a great injury to the cause that we all ought to have so much at heart. Some of us know intimately many of the young men who went over with the first contingent, and day after day we have followed their fortunes with the utmost interest, and when we have it from the lips of these men themselves that there is not the danger that has been suggested here today, I would ask the members of this House what can be the object of a man of the prominence of the hon. member from Rouville, a man who occupied a prominent position in the late government, in introducing a question in this House about the authenticity of which he himself is not satisfied, his information being derived from a mere newspaper article. The hon. member from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) holds the paper up and says it was no doubt the glaring headlines that induced the hon. member to bring this matter before the House. The hon. member for Rouville is not a youth in politics; he understands the meaning of words, and I again say what I have said before, that I believe many of the statements that have been made and published by the leaders of the Liberal party and by the Liberal press have done much to retard recruiting in Canada. I believe that when the discussion that has taken place here to-day is spread broadcast throughout the country, recruiting in Canada will be injured once more. In view of the statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite and by one hon. member on this side of the House, the hon. member from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), I think we should be doing a good act if we agreed to expunge from the records of this House the whole discussion on this miserable question that has taken place this afternoon. We are living in a strenuous age, an age calling on each of us to do his utmost; and yet, can any man who has listened to this discussion conceal from himself the fact that some members of this House have endeavoured to make political capital out of this miserable question? I am not here to make any apology for the men at the front. They need no apology from anyone in this House; they need no advice from any member of this House. They are able to take care of themselves, and able to advise us. When you think of what they have accomplished, can you have any doubt in your mind as to their being physically fit and able to cope with the pick of the enemy troops? When you think of the battles of Ypres, and of the capture of Vimy Ridge only a few days ago, everyone must realize that there cannot be the danger that has been implied here this afternoon.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have criticised hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have raised battalions in this country and have taken them overseas. They have sneered at these patriotic men, who had the interests of their country at heart, and who would have liked to go to the front. These are the men who know what conditions are in England. I am not here to deprecate the value of the great work that has been done by the British Government. Our Allies are looking to the British Empire for every possible assistance. The British Government has been the backbone of the Allies, the brawn and sinew throughout the whole conflict, and do you mean to tell me that we, sitting here thousands of miles from the scene of conflict, are in a position to criticise the British Government for lack of attention to their duties in respect of the fitness of the men they are sending to the front? Are these men crazy, are they fools, to allow men to be sent overseas unfit, when they are trying to raise men by every possible means? I can trust the British Government in this matter, a Government that has raised an army of nearly six million fighting men, and I am not going to sit in my seat and listen to hon. gentlemen opposite censuring the very best men the Empire can produce, men who are devoting every ounce of energy they possess towards winning the war. Nor would I be justified in sitting in my place and listening to hon. gentlemen opposite treating these subjects in a jocular way, and advancing arguments that are not pertinent to the question without raising a protest. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that this Government has absolutely nothing to do with these matters, and in view of the discussion here this afternoon I believe the people of Canada can come to no other conclusion than that the burdens of state rest very lightly upon some hon. members of this House when a whole day can be devoted to an aimless discussion that can serve no useful purpose, and which I am sure the hon. member from Rouville now regrets that he ever introduced into this House. As I said before, I think we should expunge from the records the statements made not only by the hon. member for Rouville, but by the hon. member from Peterborough. They have made statements that are not justifiable, have slandered the men who are fighting our battles for us, men who realize their responsibilities better than hon. members sitting comfortably in this House. Some of those men have been in the thick of the fray for nearly three years, and thousands and, I am afraid, tens of thousands of them will never return to Canada The blood of those men that have fallen on the fields of France and Flanders is crying out to us to see that this fight is carried to a successful conclusion; and do you mean to tell me that a discussion of this nature is going to assist one iota in winning the war? It is much to our discredit that this question has been brought before the House and our time wasted, when there are so many other questions of importance demanding our attention.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I desire to say a few words before this question is withdrawn, chiefly to endorse the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), that it was extremely unwise to bring this matter before the House. This discussion, which was introduced by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and has taken up the whole day, is based upon evidence so weak that not one of us would throw at it a dead cat with reputable antecedents. What is the basis of it? A letter said to have been written by somebody called Goforth. I understood the hon. member for Rouville to say he did not know anything about this Mr. Goforth, and I have not heard a single gentleman who has spoken in this debate say that he knew anything about him. Even the Financial Post, which publishes his letter does not pretend to say that it knows anything about Mr. Goforth. So, we have had a discussioin here spreading over the whole day based upon the evidence of somebody we know nothing about. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this is a question between the dry and the wet canteen.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear! That is the whole question.

Mr. CROTHERS: I submit that this is not the whole question; it is not the question at all as set forth in the letter upon which this discussion is based. Mr. Goforth does not seem to have signed his letter or to have dated it, nor is there any statement as to where it was written or when except that one hon. gentleman said it was written three years ago, but nobody has attempted to either substantiate or disprove that. The letter itself, however, does not pretend to be a declaration in favour of the dry canteen against the wet canteen. If hon. gentlemen opposite ever find time to read the whole letter—it spreads over five columns—they will find that it is devoted to two things particularly: First, a general lecture in favour of the prohibition of the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors in Great Britain, France and Canada; and, second, promiscuous charges, with no names given, against the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of our overseas forces. It seems to me that this is a very unfair statement to send out to the country. It is defamatory of every one of the hundreds of thousands belonging to our expeditionary forces. Why? Because it defames them generally, and, as nobody's name is given it is applicable to the whole force. This man Goforth, whoever he is—and nobody seems to know anything about him—

Mr. REID: Except the hon. member for Rouville.

Mr. CROTHERS: I understand that hon. gentleman to say that even he does not know anything about him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crothers) know the standing of the Financial Post?

Mr. CROTHERS: I heard of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the hon. gentleman think the Financial Post defames our soldiers?

Mr. CROTHERS: I say that the Post itself does not pretend to set forth facts as a basis for its criticism—not a fact. And this man Goforth, instead of advocating the dry canteen, rather argues in favour of the wet canteen, as will be seen by those who read his letter. His contention is that intoxicating liquor will find its way to the military camps until the manufacture, importation and sale of it is prohibited. Speaking of Valcartier Camp, he said:

Every one who is in a position to know knew that as long as there was liquor for sale in the City of Quebec, in the Province of Quebec, or the Dominion of Canada, too much of that liquor would find its way into Valcartier Camp. Nearly every night there was drinking in the tents around us—

This was in Valcartier with its dry canteen.

—and the following extracts from my diary speak for themselves.

Mr. GRAHAM: That could not have been written three years ago.

Mr. CROTHERS: This diary is dated 13th September, 1914, and that is nearly three years ago.

Mr. GRAHAM: But the letter must have been written after that.

Mr. CROTHERS: But the subject here is Valcartier Camp in 1914. Here are some of the extracts from the diary:

Friday, September 13. Our tent pulled down by men returning drunk from Quebec. Lantern smashed; liberal dose of kerosene in the bread bag. R. B. staggering drunk, turned somersault on the tent when it was down.

This in a dry canteen.

Tuesday, September 22. Tent ahead of us pulled down at midnight in the rain. Drunken brawl. In morning I counted outside the tent, seven empty gin bottles, four brandy flasks, one whiskey bottle and one Jamaica rum.

All in a dry canteen. The hon. member for Rouville said that the whole question is whether there shall be a wet or a dry canteen, but here is this man's own description of a dry canteen.

Mr. TURRIFF: What would a wet one be?

Mr. CROTHERS: One at a time, please. This writer goes on to show that, notwithstanding the dry canteen, if you allow the manufacture, importation and sale of liquor anywhere in the Dominion, it will not make much difference, for the men will get it if they want it. In the third column of the letter there is something also bearing out what I said as to his argument being in favour of total prohibition and not in favour of a dry canteen, his argument being that if liquor is manufactured nothing will prevent the soldier getting it if he wants it. He says:

[Mr. Crothers.]

Liquor in the army is bound up with the question of liquor in the nation. We cannot give up one and keep the other. As long as the manufacture and sale of liquor as a beverage remains unprohibited in Canada, Great Britain or France, so long will our armies be hampered in their struggle.

As in the army so in the nation, all attempts at "control" short of total prohibition are exasperating failures.

Dry canteens and all the rest of them.

The damage to war work caused by drunken civilians—

He does not confine his criticisms to drunken soldiers.

—will never be estimated, and who will say that all the guilt must be borne by the drunkard, not by the brewer and the distiller. The problem of compensation will be ready for discussion when the brewers and distillers come forward with a reasonable proposal of compensation by them for the criminal waste—

Then he goes on to discuss the problem of compensation. The argument of this writer, whoever he is, is not directed especially against the wet canteen, but is directed especially against the manufacture of liquor; and he says in substance and gives as evidence the conditions at Valcartier, that if it is manufactured and sold outside you will have the army drinking whiskey.

Life will not be safe, women and children will not be safe as long as we give the liquor traffic a free hand to turn madmen loose on society.

I might read a whole column, it is a temperance lecture of the old kind in favour of the prohibition of the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors.

The way this matter has been brought before the House, intentionally or otherwise, reflects upon the character of every officer, non-commissioned officer and man who has gone across the ocean to fight for the liberties of this country and is defamatory of every single one of them because the charges are made in a general way and applicable to every one; insulting to our soldiers, insulting to the men who are risking their lives for us, and many have sacrificed their lives and others will do so while still others will come back crippled for life. And yet the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), on the strength of a letter like that, written by a man about whom he knows nothing, for the Financial Post does not pretend to know anything about him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are you sure of that?

Mr. CROTHERS: It does not say so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you read the editorial comment?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, I read the whole thing; I did not stop at part of it as my hon. friend did. As I say, we have no evidence whatever as to who this man is, where he is from or what reliance is to be placed on his statements. I understood it to be said to-day that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) desired to get some information touching this matter and went to the Minister of Militia quietly to ask him as to conditions across the sea. That, I submit, was a proper course to take. I understood that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was requested to allow this motion to stand until the questions asked the Minister of Militia by my hon. friend from Pictou should be answered. If these questions were answered and answered satisfactorily there would have been no necessity to bring this matter up here or anywhere else. It does not appear why the hon. member for Rouville did not wait instead of exposing every member of our expeditionary force to the insults that have been hurled against every one of them here this afternoon. These are men who are sacrificing their lives for this country. It is not fair treatment of our boys at the front. In addition to what I have already said we have had the evidence here this afternoon of three or four hon. members of this House who have been on the ground and who know what the conditions are with respect to these particular charges. Not only that, but we have men commanding our men in France; we have men training our men in England, men who are on the ground. Does any one suppose that General Byng has no regard for the character or welfare of our young men over there? He is on the ground. He knows the conditions. I have confidence in General Byng and the Canadian officers with him. Does any one believe for a moment that if conditions existed such as this man Goforth, wherever he comes from, said existed they would be permitted by these officers to continue? Does anyone for one moment believe that the gentlemen who represent the Government of Canada in England have no regard for the welfare of our young men over there? They have just as much regard for their welfare as any hon. gentleman on the other side of the 9 p.m. House or on this side of the House. I have confidence in those men who are on the ground. I think we can safely leave the matter to them, although there is no objection to inquiring into it quietly. I submit that the hon. member for Rouville would have discharged his duties as an hon. member of this House better in the interests of this country and in fair play to the soldiers of this country if he had gone privately to the Minister of Militia and said: Here is a fellow called Goforth, I do not know where he comes from, who says something here in the shape of a letter which is not signed by him, which has no date, which I find in the Financial Post. There are some grave charges made in this letter. Can you tell me whether these conditions exist in England or not? If you cannot, will you be kind enough to ascertain by cable from somebody in England in whom you have confidence, who can tell you? Then he could wait a day or two until there was an opportunity to receive an answer, and if the answer was satisfactory he would have spared the relatives of these boys who are at the front from feeling that their sons and husbands and brothers have been insulted and defamed by several members of the Opposition in this House.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think I am within the judgment of the House when I say that there were two definite statements made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). I was not able to apprehend which of those two statements was put forward by the hon. member himself and which was given currency by him, although originating in the letter of Mr. Goforth, portions of which he read to the House. But the two definite statements which I noticed were, first, that there existed at the present time a wet canteen in Canada, and, second, that a change with regard to the operation of the canteens overseas had been made since the present Minister of Militia assumed the duties of that office. Statements have been made during this debate which have abundantly proven the falsity of both these statements, so I shall not dwell further on those points.

The letter read by the hon. member for Rouville shows distinctly that in Canada, where there is a dry canteen, conditions were totally unsatisfactory. If Mr. Goforth's letter meant anything at all it meant that in Canada, under the operation of the dry canteen, conditions existed which were unsatisfactory. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) referred to vague reports which he had from officers—he was very indistinct in referring to his authority for these reports. He suggested that officers had told him so and so? Now, on the other hand the House listened this afternoon, not to vague or indistinct alleged reports from undisclosed officers, but to the testimony of officers, members of this House, who after having done good work in recruiting and assisting in the raising of a force, have gone overseas, seen the conditions which existed on the other side, and have come back and given us first hand their stories. The story of each one tallies with the story of the other. Whatever the conditions may have been three years ago, when Mr. Goforth wrote his letter, they are, at the present time, according to this firsthand evidence, highly satisfactory.

In passing, perhaps it is not out of place to refer to the force about which Mr. Goforth wrote. The prestige which is enjoyed by Canadians and Canadian troops on the other side at the present time was established by this same force of whom he wrote. When the test came at Ypres, Givenchy, Langemarck and Festubert, they were not found wanting. Whether the stories which have been detailed through the medium of the letter published in the Post, and read by the hon. member for Rouville this afternoon, are credited or not, the fact remains that when it came to the test for which these boys went overseas, they made good and established a reputation for tenacity and gallantry which resounds throughout the whole world.
